Germany and Poland: In order to make it more convenient for the Saints in Germany and Poland to comply with the financial law, we arranged with President Smith and Apostle T. W. Williams that while in Germany they try to locate some one to act in the capacity of Bishop's agent, and they have arranged with Brother Walter Muller, Len-anstrasse 17, Braunschweig, Germany, to handle this work.

We hereby ratify this appointment and sincerely trust that the Saints in this part of the Lord's vineyard will appreciate the opportunity which is before them to assist in developing our work there by contributing as the Lord blesses them. There are honest-hearted souls in all parts of the globe, and it but remains with those who have received the light of the angel's message to do their part and make possible the carrying of the gospel light to them.

To this end we hope that God's blessings will attend the efforts of the Saints in other lands.

Sincerely yours,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE,
Presiding Bishop.

President of Little Sioux District urges young people's prayer services be established.

To the Saints of the Little Sioux District; Greeting: The time is here when all should be awake to the interest of the young of the church. There is a disposition manifest among the young people of the district to want to do something, and I note too that there is more activity in some branches than others, but our midweek prayer meetings, generally speaking, are very poorly attended, especially by the young.

We have here at Pisgah just recently provided for a young people's prayer meeting. The ladies' aid building has been provided with seats and the young people held their first session there last Thursday evening. There were forty-two present, and twenty-two took part in prayer and testimony. The brethren of the priesthood who had charge of the meeting reported that it was good to be there and remarked on what a joy it was to sit and listen to the testimonies of those young people. Yes, it brings tears of joy to sit in such heavenly places, and I feel sure that their numbers will increase. I suggest that all branch presidents in the district provide for special prayer meetings for the young people where they can meet aside from the older members. They will feel more free to take part, as it is their meeting, and it will require an effort on their part to make the meeting a success. The Lord is moving upon the minds of the young, and it is your duty and mine to do all in our power to aid and encourage them in their work. Let us invite the fathers and mothers to assist in this.

This morning's mail brought word from Brother Daniel Macgregor that he had baptized seventy-one at Missouri Valley up to this date and more to come. This is good news. We have more calls for preaching than we can fill. Thrust in your sickles, brethren; there is no time to lose.

Sincerely,
JOSEPH W. LANE.

PISGAH, IOWA.

Requests for Prayers

Sister Fannie I. Morrison Meehan, formerly editor of the Sunshine Band department in Zion's Hope, is afflicted with cancer of the intestines. She sends a letter asking the Saints to fast and pray for her on April 1, that if God sees fit she may be spared, but at least she may be given fortitude and strength. She is glad to yield to God's will, knowing he doeth all things well. Her letter arrived too late to print in full.

Young People's Day in Des Moines

A radio message from Des Moines tells us that they observed Sunday, the 13th, as young people's day. Although it rained heavily all day the attendance was good and the services interesting and profitable. They began with the regular prayer meeting at 8.15 and closed with a sermon by the pastor, A. E. Warr. Three of the young men of the ministry gave excellent sermons to an appreciative audience. They are enthusiastic over other special days of this character.

Book Reviews

American Red Cross Work Among the French People

A new book by Fisher Ames, jr., published by the Macmillan Co., New York City. Illustrated, 178 pages, price $2.

Though most of us appreciate in general the work of the Red Cross, and understand something of its scope, the civilian relief work is the least known of all.

This volume indicates what was done in France alone, revealing a surprise to many people, and concludes the splendid series issued under the auspices of the Red Cross to give the American people an adequate idea of the wonderful work which their dollars did in France through the Red Cross organization.

To read such a book is to be impressed greatly with the possibilities of organization with funds to back it. Among orphaned children, refugees, mutilated soldiers, the sick, the great work of organized relief went on, quietly but efficiently.

The chapter on how the Red Cross made over mutilated faces so the owners were not ashamed to return to their associates is full of heart throbs. One French soldier refused to meet his family for two and a half years because as a result of many wounds and operations he was so repulsive to look at. But at the Red Cross studio he was given a face mask (that is the term used, though it does not do justice to the delicate methods used) which gave him unbounded joy. His despondency left, and he desired immediately to return to his family.

Yet this is but a hint of the scope of the work done by some of the best methods of modern times in saving to the world those who otherwise would be human wrecks or victims of early death.

Good Progress on New Quarters

Considerable progress has been made in remodeling the Armory Building on South Osage Street, and fitting it for occupancy by the combined Herald Publishing House, of Lamoni, Iowa, and the Ensign Publishing House, of Independence. Partitions, vaults, skylights, sanitary arrangements and fixtures, and a new heating plant are among the principal alterations, though so much has been undertaken that the old building will hardly be recognized by those who knew it best.—Zion's Ensign, March 17, 1921.

"The Seven Last Words of Christ"

The rendering of Theodore Dubois' oratorio, "The seven last words of Christ," was particularly appropriate on the Friday before Easter, as these words or sentences were all uttered from the cross. They were as follows:

1st. "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." (Luke 23: 34.)

2d. "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." (Luke 23: 43.)

3d. "Woman, behold thy son." (John 19: 26.)

4th. "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Matthew 27: 46; Mark 15: 34.)

5th. "I thirst!" (John 19: 28.)

6th. "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." (Luke 23: 46.)

7th. "It is finished." (John 19: 30.)

The attendance was not at all what it should have been, when this oratorio was presented by the Lamoni choir the evening of March 25, but that may have been due to the strenuous program in the recent weeks, and in part to the fact that it was offered on behalf of the lyceum course.

The rendition, however, was excellent. The soloists, Bertha F. Burgess, George Anway, and H. A. Koehler have all of them had experience in such work, and thus rendered their parts exceedingly well. There were also some eighty voices in the choruses and they showed as usual the result of careful training, making on the whole an inspirational effort long to be remembered in the history of the Lamoni choir.

There were about eight-five persons engaged in the preparation and rendition of this beautiful oratorio, making it one of the best events of the kind ever held in Lamoni.

It is well that we should pause, even though it be for but an hour, to realize even in small part the agony of the cross, and the tremendous significance of the sacrifice made by Jesus. He possessed already the glory of the Father, and he had laid it aside, and voluntarily came down and became like man, to be tempted and tried in all things as man is. But further than that he suffered as never another man did. He possessed the capacity to suffer more greatly than others. He was not phlegmatic.

Yet there nailed to the cross, he thought still of others; first of all for his enemies, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." Second, for the thief on the cross, "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." Third, for his mother, "Woman, behold thy son," directing her attention to the Apostle John.

He suffered the keen anguish in the garden, so that he sweat great drops of blood, and on the cross that agony speaks again, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" How keen must have been the anguish, the physical and spiritual suffering, to rend from him that cry! Then the tragedy moves on swiftly to the close, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." "It is finished."

The work that he came to do had been completed. He was now ready again to be glorified of the Father, with the glory he had with him before the world was.

That hour to his disciples was the very darkest. They had seen the miracles he had done; they had heard him speak, and through personal contact with him, and through the witness of the Father, they had recognized him for what he was—the very Son of God, hope of Israel, the Messiah, the very Christ.

Yet within twenty-four hours after they had sat with him at meat, had partaken of the paschal supper, and shared with him the initiation of the Lord's supper, which was henceforth to take a foremost place as a sacrament for all Christians, they had followed him to Gethsemane, though he had gone for a little while aside alone; they had witnessed his taking by the soldiers; and following afar off, they doubtless witnessed his trial before the high priest, before Herod, and before Pilate. He had been scorned and insulted; he had been mocked, and had, from pure physical exhaustion, sunk on the hillside. Then on Calvary, he had been lifted up on the cross, and there he had died. Then in the midst of the supernatural darkness they had slipped away to their own places, for it seemed that hope was gone. He in whom they had placed their trust had passed into death, and had been laid in the tomb, and soldiers placed to guard that tomb.

Yet that darkest hour was but the preparation for the glory of the Easter morn. They had so soon forgotten his earlier statements that he would be crucified, and would rise again. They had forgotten in the very recent days he had said, And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."

But now comes the morning after the Sabbath, that glorious first day of the week, when the angels bear witness, "He is not here, for he has risen from the dead."

It is not perhaps surprising that this wonderful story of the Son of God, who should come to earth, and be put to death, should arise from the grave and ascend to sit down on the right hand of Majesty on high, having once been told among men, should have been repeated abroad among the nations. Nor should it be surprising that some should see the ascent of the sun, or the budding of spring, as a type of resurrection. Still it is doubtless true that in the beginning most of the many symbols we use to-day were clearly recognized as symbols.

To-day we still have the Easter egg, Easter lilies, the rabbit, and even the bonfire. But we are able clearly to consider them for what they are, symbols of that wonderful part of which they are after all but a feeble type.

Death comes in time to all; one by one we see our loved ones and friends of other days pass from us. But Jesus having risen from the dead gives us the splendid assurance that man does not die; and that what we call death is after all but a change. And so, though in Adam all die, yet in Christ are all made alive. There may thus come something of selfish joy to us in what Easter signifies.

But after all, with all of its symbolism and all of its meanings, Easter is still preeminently a day set apart to Him who has risen triumphant over all human weaknesses; who has met every trial and his conquered; who has risen supreme over death, and all it signifies. For He has ascended on high to sit down on the right hand of God, and is alive forever—

The motto of the Zion Builders is: "Study to show thyself approved." The purpose of the services is to answer the question, "What does it mean to be a Latter Day Saint?"

Does an Education Pay?

It most certainly does, when rightly administered and directed.

In a recent HERALD there appeared a statement in an advertisement ascribed to the United States Commissioner of Education, concerning which we have received a number of queries and objections. A great deal of discouragement and dissatisfaction has also been expressed. Some have directly asked for a further explanation or editorial comment in fear of discouragement and injury to the work as a whole.

It is probable that most of the objections are based on the statement in the concluding paragraph, that 99 per cent of the wealth of this country is due to acquired ability. This is taken in connection with what precedes to mean that which is received directly through the schools, and hence is discouraging to those whose school opportunities have been limited.

As it happens, the original statement as made by Doctor Claxton on May 19, 1920, printed in Bulletin 19W, Number 29, is even stronger than the paraphrase in this advertisement. He states,

"There are but three factors in the production of material wealth: First is the natural resources of the country: the fertility of the soil, the forests, the mines, the water power, the climatic conditions, position. Second, the native ability of the people, whether they be tall and strong, broad shouldered, three-story heads with mansard roofs, or whether they be weaklings, low-browed, and nerveless, their constitutions sapped by the vices and excesses of their ancestors before they were born. The third factor is acquired ability of the people; the thing that we call education, that comes directly and indirectly from and through the schools."

He concludes that if the acquired ability be zero, all our wealth will disappear.

"Ninety-nine per cent of the wealth of this country is due to the schools and the teachers. They are wealth producers as no others are."

Men who have not had the privilege of going to college, but who have spent every spare hour in study, naturally resent this. They overlook for the moment the word "indirectly" and the claim that may be made on behalf of the schools that the very texts they study are the outgrowth of schools.

It is undoubtedly true that we have not in the past sufficiently valued the work of our schools and their possibilities. Particularly is this true of the importance of properly directed college and university work. The primary and secondary educational work is largely taken up with definite problems of instruction, according to a certain curriculum. The university, however, presents three entirely different departments of work for the benefit of society. First, is the conservation of the knowledge of the past, under the direction of a curator.

Second, is research work, to develop new fields of knowledge.

Third, is teaching the students in the under graduate and post graduate courses.

Possibly a fourth department could be grouped roughly as the professional school.

Probably the work of the professional school is better understood than any other department of university work. The importance of conserving the knowledge of the past, and the immediate importance of research work, is often lost sight of. Yet the advancement of the last hundred years has been the result of the quiet work of the laboratory in the university and in commercial and private research. The immediate connection of this theoretical work has not always been seen. But it is on that firm basis that much of our material prosperity has been erected.

But we must note that if to acquired ability is credited all that is gained from birth then it is not limited by the hours spent in the schoolroom, nor is it directly traceable to the schools. How far the development of instinct in the infant can be indirectly traced to the schools is indeed a problem, and it may be readily denied that it is even remotely connected.

All will admit that the wealth of the country depends upon the three factors set forth, but it would hardly seem that the relationship is the simple one of multiplication. In the first place there are elements omitted—application or work is also essential. In the second place, the reduction of acquired ability to zero does not reduce the product to zero, though in one sense it might; that is, if the removal of acquired ability presumably reduced us all to the condition at birth with no one to care for us. But the same result could be so easily achieved by making not all natural resources zero, but by the elimination of just one natural resource, such as water. It could be reached much more quickly by the elimination of one other natural resource, which is not even listed or intimated as valuable for wealth, namely, air. Because of this, the original assumption is made that loss of acquired ability means the return to a state of barbarism.

It is quite evident that the wealth of a civilized people is many times that of barbarians. But a return to barbarism would not mean the elimination of all elements of wealth, as there would still remain food, clothing, shelter, mineral wealth, and waterfalls, and instruments of defense; live stock, wild vegetation, and possibly even something of agriculture. So the function is not simple multiplication.

The most casual observer would be quite willing to concede that the great bulk, if not 99 per cent of our wealth, is represented by the difference between civilization and barbarism. Nor does this become at all objectionable. Yet we note how vital a part the other elements must play for the development of wealth. For after all the school cannot create character. It cannot create intelligence. Education can only develop and unfold the possibilities of native ability, and that native ability is taken to be and is that of a civilized race not that of barbarians.

Of old the importance of native ability was expressed briefly, "You cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear," meaning that you cannot educate even a stupid prince and make of him a wise man, for his natural capacity will remain unchanged.

The same may be expressed by a college couplet once popular:

"You may lead your horse to water, but you cannot make him drink, drink, drink;

You may send your boy to college, but they cannot make him think, think, think."

The inaccuracy of old methods of examination is coming to be recognized under recent psychological tests. Education is not merely a process of acquiring a number of facts, most of which unfortunately are forgotten before one receives his diploma. In the past, education has been expressed as mental discipline. In recent years it has been recognized that even mechanical arts are as efficient for mental discipline and culture as are the so-called classical studies; though there are a great many who will still insist on the great added value of accurate thinking required to acquire thoroughly a foreign language; the excellent mental training of mathematics and logic in accurate thought, compared with some of the indefinite studies of the times.

Education also trains one how to think, which is in part a repetition of the above. It also trains one where to look for the answer to a question; how to utilize that answer, and rightly evaluate it.

But recent psychological tests, and especially those made in the army of the United States, when nearly one and three quarters million young men were examined, emphasize the importance of intellectual acuity, the ability to grasp and solve a problem quickly and accurately; ability to meet any new situation alertly. As a result of these tests the conclusion has been reached that there is a mental limit; that there is a school limit beyond which some cannot successfully proceed. The school cannot develop and create intellectual acuity, if it is not there. It can only develop the native ability. But when we realize that four and a half per cent are classed as very superior, and an additional nine per cent as superior, when an additional sixteen and one half per cent is above the average, we must recognize that there still remains a tremendous field for our colleges and universities if we are to meet the needs of the hour; and if those who are capable are to receive the benefit of proper development in preparation.

A careful examination may show that the years in the actual schoolroom have been limited; yet mental acuity or native ability which is a prime requisite has made possible adequate and even excellent preparation. The term "acquired ability" or education then includes all that we gain, not only within the schoolroom, but from our private study as well, and in this exegesis is extended to include all development, whether of instinct, reflex, or cognition.

Those who have followed the situation closely realize that even for those who have had the advantage of years in the schoolroom, if this preparation is to be made available there must be not only the native ability to acquire, but also a continuation of habits of study outside of the schoolroom in the long after years.

As we consider the situation carefully we find there is a tremendous field for us in which to develop school facilities. We note also the great contribution educational institutions are giving and have given to society at a minimum of expense. Although the expense appears large, it is small compared to the results secured, and particularly is this true when we examine our other annual expenditures and the acquisition secured therefrom.

It is certainly true that an education does, as a rule, pay financially. It is also true that in the church remuneration is not measured by fitness and training. Nor are appointments made on the basis of scholastic attainment alone, though it is doubtless also true that the earnest desire to render better service as shown in preparation, is pleasing to our heavenly Father.

Of him who hath much, much is required. From the young man or young woman to whom is given much native ability and the added opportunities of special training, there naturally should be required the greater service. But the Lord calls whom he finds to be fit. And it is also true that some at least have felt the call of God to them to make a special effort for preparation in this school and college for better service. In every department of life's work, a good general training is a decided advantage for better service.

Elder S. S. Smith secured a column in the Montreal Witness and Canadian Homestead, pointing out the position of our church and the parts of church history in reply to a previous editorial in this publication. The editor has evidently allowed him an opening for a further article in reply to a question.

Organization of the Young People

In our previous accounts we have left out one factor concerning the organization of the young people here in Lamoni, which no doubt was copied after the organization at Independence.

Every ticket was numbered. The seven coupons for the week all bore the same number. When a ticket was distributed, that person's name was set opposite the number. Each evening the tickets taken in at the door were checked up, and a card sent to absentees. In addition to the check, there was the memory of those who did the checking, for in many instances a ticket holder came after the hour reserved for ticket holders. This was part of the follow-up.

There was also the distribution daily of outlines of the previous evening's sermons, which meant a personal contact each day. The purpose was that everything that was humanly possible should be done, then in addition thereto, after doing our best, ask for divine guidance, and divine blessing on the effort.

The organization was affected by the young people choosing their own representatives, who then conferred with the branch presidency. C. E. Wight was thus appointed to have charge. He and his chosen assistants selected sub-committees, and each committee consulted with an advisory council. The committee of Cyril E. Wight, Wilbur Prall, and Roy Cheville handled everything through these other organized committees.

The committee on letters, consisting of some six or seven young people, have been mailing out each day more than two hundred letters. These letters go to at least twenty-seven States in the Union, to the District of Columbia, three provinces in Canada, and are sent to Washington, Oregon, California, Utah, Virginia, Massachusetts, Ontario, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Texas, and Oklahoma. We sketched over rather quickly those whose names begin with the eight letters of the alphabet—A to H—and were surprised to note four letters being sent to each of the three States, Kansas, Montana, and Wyoming, and five to Illinois. These letters were sent to different cities and towns in each State.

It is not possible to give credit to all whom credit is due for the success of these meetings in Lamoni. But everyone who was permitted to assist did so, and there seemed to be a united effort in prayer and in attendance, even though not permitted to help in any other way.

Good Meetings in Saint Louis

The services held in Saint Louis, March 6 to 20, are reported to have been a great success, with continued interest from night to night. On March 13 a special prayer meeting was held for the young people, which proved very inspiring. The branch presidency sent out letters, and had cards prepared with songs printed on one side and an invitation on the other. On Saturday evening, the 19th, a reception was held for Brother E. E. Long, and a substantial purse presented. He was very much touched, as he said it was about the first time in his experience as a minister.

Girl Leaders

The girls of the recreational leadership class have qualified as first rank Orioles, and will at once take up the work of the Temple Builders and then scout work. There are some thirty girls in this class, who expect to be fully qualified to assist in this work in their several communities. They are pushing their work energetically and will no doubt be fully qualified by June.

Dancing

There is no laxity in adverse sentiment to the modern dance.

The position of the church has been very clear with regard to dancing.

"Resolved, That the practice of dancing should be discouraged, and that members of the church should be urged to avoid the practice, as being one likely to lead their minds from Christ and his gospel."—General Conference Resolutions, No. 317, adopted April 16, 1886.

"Resolved, That we consider the practice of dancing and card playing as unbecoming true Christians, and should be avoided by all Saints."—General Conference Resolutions, No. 377, adopted April 12, 1893.

Both of these statements are conservative. Occasionally we hear rumors of there being a great deal of dancing at certain central places. Recently we heard that the young people in Independence were crazy about the dance; that they were all dancing. But investigation proved that only a very, very few were affected; but the farther they go, such rumors grow, and quite unjustly.

Recently the subject was brought up in class at Graceland College; later a debate was held. Finally, by request, the matter was discussed in chapel in a conservative way, C. E. Wight discussing it from a spiritual viewpoint; Professor F. M. McDowell from the educational point of view, and Doctor Clara White from the point of physical reaction. The results, we learn, have been good. It may be that a few have engaged in dancing at private homes, but if so, they are very few in number. It has not had the sanction of the college, and very few were affected.

Late hours and other factors result very frequently in physical deterioration, and the late dances, particularly, have meant immorality. In other cases it has meant the decrease of spirituality.

The report that the young people at the central places are generally engaging in dancing is a misrepresentation. The form of the church action is not one of compulsion, and occasionally a few young people have indulged, but such occasions are exceptional rather than the reverse.

It is better as a rule to permit discussion under proper supervision than to attempt suppression by compulsion, as the latter course is nearly always disastrous.

The position of the church institution—the church college—of its president, and of its faculty is most emphatically clear in opposition to dancing, either in a public dance hall or at private dances. There has been no laxity upon their part, either of approval or permission, or of avoidance of the question.

S. A. BURGESS.

Humility Manifested

In these meetings for the young people the spirit of humility is plainly manifest. President Elbert A. Smith shows his deep interest in the young people by laying aside his office work for a week and devoting himself to these services. In doing so a service is rendered not alone to the young people of Lamoni, but as a type for the young people of the whole church. He designated another young man as the spokesman in Independence, but he himself consented to address this smaller audience, setting as he has so many times an example of Christian humility. Also as a result of this effort, we expect to have his sermons to publish for the benefit of all of the young people of the church.

Many who might have crowded in upstairs attended the services night after night in the overflow meeting, and many of those who would like to have attended at least one service upstairs, went night after night to the service below in the lower auditorium, conducted by Elder A. B. Phillips in Independence, and Elder J. W. Wight in Lamoni.

Still others gave their time in both places to care for small children at home and in the church, so that as many as possible would be free to attend.

Elder Roy Cheville, a young man of unusual ability both as a speaker and musical leader, and who is associated in the district presidency of the Des Moines District, took charge of the music in the lower auditorium at Lamoni. We do not know who performed the like service in Independence, who also is worthy of honor. H. A. Koehler, recently president of the Western Maine District, who left his field to come to Grace-land to study, also assisted in the work in the basement, upstairs, or wherever he was needed.

The glorious thing is that many hundreds of others were willing to make a like sacrifice or effort to see that the work as a whole might succeed. Many rendered his or her own small part, however seemingly insignificant, in order that the whole work might be accomplished.

Many others of ability quietly stood aside, taking no part of any prominence, but sustaining the effort with their prayers and their presence.

It is not surprising that men and women thus seemingly ignored, and seemingly having so insignificant a part, will doubtless in a short time find the full responsibility of some great service for the cause of Christ. But it is well that it is so.

Services in Philadelphia

The Spirit of God is working with the young people, as is shown by the spreading of the movement for special services on their behalf. Many requests are coming in for more information.

Among others, special services were begun in Philadelphia on the 13th, and continued over the 27th. In the musical work it appears that Paul N. Craig and his wife have rendered splendid service. D. T. Williams, the speaker, gained the hearts of his hearers the very first night, and the interest and devotion have grown night by night.

On Tuesday morning, March 22, President Elbert A. Smith, who was still in Lamoni, advised us over the phone that he had received a message from Albert N. Hoxie. Unfortunately this was too late for use in the HERALD of last week. Brother Hoxie expressed the great enthusiasm felt in these meetings, unfolding much as nature unfolds her riches in the early springtime. That the services for Sunday, the 20th, were just one great meeting after another, until 10 o'clock in the evening. At the close, the young people pledged themselves to visit the homes of every Saint during the second week. They have determined to continue the work with unabated interest after the services have closed. Their aim is to prepare builders for Zion, the beautiful.

We have had no further news (March 26) of the work there, and of the success of the second week's effort.

Apostle John W. Rushton was called to Independence by the illness of his mother. We are very glad to be able to report that she has shown decided improvement since his arrival. If she continues to improve, he expects to be in Des Moines in the near future to hold a week's special revival service.

We have just noted in The Liahona for March 15, announcement of the death of Anton H. Lund, March 2. Mr. Lund was one of the first presidency in the Utah church for the past twenty years.

Why the Annual Tithing Report?

By B. R. McGuire, Presiding Bishop

Because it is the simplest and most systematic way, as well as an essential part of good stewardship management.

It is genuinely human to want to know the why of things.

When Christ was asked, "By what authority doest thou these things?" (Mark 11:28) it was prompted by an outgrowth of that characteristic—"why?"

Properly balanced and controlled, this spirit produces the engineer, scientist, inventor, and philosopher.

For those who desire to know the reason the annual tithing report is required from each church member, we offer the following for consideration:

First. It promotes systematic tithing, making it easier for the member to observe the spirit and letter of the law.

Second. It is essential to the proper management of a stewardship, without which the relationship contemplated in the law between the individual and the church cannot exist.

We shall proceed on the assumption that our readers accept the principle of tithing as a part of the gospel. It was observed by Abraham (Genesis 14:20), Jacob (Genesis 28:22), and approved by Christ (Matthew 23:23), and is commanded in latter-day revelation. (Doctrine and Covenants 94:3.)

Our next step is to determine what is the "tithe." Jacob vowed that if God "will give me bread to eat and raiment to put on (the necessities of life), I will give the tenth unto thee." (Genesis 28:20, 22.) Or, as Abraham said, "tithes of all," referring to the increase he had taken as spoils of war. (Genesis 14:20.) Moses gave the commandment to Israel, "Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed that thy fields bringeth forth year by year. (Deuteronomy 14:22.)

Then followed the command to tithe their corn, wine, oil, herds, and flocks, which would be their all, save the food they had consumed and the raiment obtained.

These and other passages teach that we should pay one tenth of our increase year by year. The increase practically amounts to what is left from our income after the necessary living expenses have been deducted.

We have this problem before us in reckoning the tenth due the Lord: either to list our income throughout the year in wages, profits, gifts, interest, etc., and from the total deduct all the year's living expenses, such as board, food, rent, taxes, interest, doctor bills, light, fuel, etc. The result would be the increase on which we owed the tithe to God. Or, as an alternative, we can use the form which I believe all will concede to be easier, more systematic, and in just as full accord with the letter and spirit of the law. This provides that once each year a person should determine his present net worth and add to this the total of the year's expenses for such things as are not actual "living expenses"—offerings, gifts, pleasures, education, etc. This sum would be the amount subject to tithing.

The objection may be made that you have not been keeping account of these expenses, and, therefore, cannot make a tithing report. Suppose you watch yourself one month and make a record of these expenses. Multiply the total by the number of months involved in your report, making a little extra allowance for vacation and Christmas. If you will ask God to direct you in this matter you will need have no fear that he will not accept the results of a sincere and conscientious effort. Thus the annual tithing report becomes an instrument to aid the tithing payer in carrying out the letter and spirit of the law in a systematic manner.

Necessary Part of Stewardship

The annual tithing report should be filed with the Presiding Bishop, as a stewardship between God and man cannot be established or perpetuated without it. In support of this proposition we call attention to the following scriptures:

"And the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and wise steward, whom his Lord shall make ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season? Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing. Of a truth I say unto you, that he will make him ruler over all that he hath."—Luke 12:42-44.

"And he said unto his disciples, There was a certain rich man who had a steward; and the same was accused unto him, that he had wasted his goods. And he called him, and said unto him, How is it that I hear this of thee? Give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward."—Luke 16:1, 2.

"For verily thus saith the Lord, it is expedient in me for a bishop to be appointed unto you, or of you unto the church, in this part of the Lord's vineyard; and verily in this thing ye have done wisely, for it is required of the Lord, at the hand of every steward, to render an account of his stewardship, both in time and in eternity."—Doctrine and Covenants 72:1.

"... for according to the law every man that cometh up to Zion must lay all things before the bishop in Zion."—Doctrine and Covenants 72:3.

"For a bishop must be blameless as the steward of God."—Titus 1:7.

From these, and many other passages, we gather the facts that:

First. Every man labors as a steward; "none are exempt from this law who belong to the church of the living God." (Doctrine and Covenants 70:3.)

Second. Each steward should render an accounting of his stewardship over earthly blessings to the Bishop.

As cited above, the Lord requires of every man an account of his stewardship, and in this connection says they had done wisely in appointing a bishop. Titus calls the bishop, "The steward of God."

As the steward of God, the Bishop must render an account of his stewardship to God in his annual report to the church. This report is audited, published, and scrutinized by the church, and his worthiness as therein set forth will determine whether or not you will sustain him.

It is your privilege to follow the example required of the Bishop. We gather the thought from the experience of Ananias and Sapphira that true accounting in temporal matters was expected by the church from the membership in Peter's day, as it is written: "... render an account of his stewardship, both in time and eternity."

—In time, to God's servant.

—In eternity, to God.

The annual tithing report should be filed because it is the simplest and most systematic way, as well as an essential part of good stewardship management.

I have always believed that if men could be made to understand one another they would necessarily be friendly.—David Grayson.

Our Young People on Dancing

By O. L. Thompson

"Let us provide clean and constructive pleasure for our young people."

There is probably no one who has the interests of the young people of the church at heart more than the writer. And understanding their natural, impulsive instincts under normal conditions, he feels he can approach this subject with at least a degree of comprehension. It is true that they must have an outlet for their surplus ambitions, and their desire for recreation and wholesome social charm must be supplied.

"We are young only once," is an old adage, but it contains food for thought. From it has come the semiabsurd saying, "The young must sow their wild oats." Although the writer believes that the young must sow the seeds of their reserve energy, he also believes that we must be cautious in that sowing. The fact that "we are young only once" and that we are, while we are young, to a large extent forming our foundational character for manhood and womanhood, which has to do with our future destiny, should cause us to take every precaution during this period.

Red-blooded, nerve-vibrating, unconstrained youthful vitality, not yet affected by the serious tasks and responsibilities of those of mature years, must not be mistaken for wild oats, but rather as a natural tendency to be wisely and tactfully governed. An engine, well supplied with fuel and other necessities and allowed to run wild, will soon destroy itself.

Paul, in his letter to the Galatians, made a statement seemingly simple but really containing a vast amount of meaning, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." During the period of adolescence there develop habits and tendencies often detrimental which sooner or later cause a regretful reaping.

Dance Hall a Guilty Factor

Dancing is a kind of recreation and pleasure which is of a doubtful character. When we are told by statisticians that from seventy-five to ninety per cent of the downfall of our young people can be traced to the dance hall, it should cause us to pause and ponder over the character of this kind of pastime. This practice had its origin with the Hottentot and heathen, and is not worthy of the precious time of the cultivated, refined, and intellectual. In its practice, hearts have been torn, Satanic jealousy has raged, souls have been robbed of their virtue, homes have been broken, and hundreds have sunk into the underworld. It is a God-defaming practice which has for its basic enticing potency neither movement nor melody, but an undercurrent caused by intimacy of sex. This can be best proven by asking the participants, "Why not have dances for men only, or ladies only?" If this could be enjoyed as a pastime and become prevalent, dancing could be tolerated by Christian people as an exercise. But to draw such a line on this prevalent pastime would cause it to lose its enticement. It has become so universal a practice in the world by non-Christian people (for no real Christian people could conscientiously engage in such practice) that many innocent young people, led by frivolous society, foster it today in its camouflage gayety, which acts on the same principle as a poisonous, sugar-coated pill. It is true that many engage in the practice and apparently receive no harmful results, but likewise this is true of many other doubtful practices of life. It is a gamble entered into which one cannot win and may lose. This is true of every evil of life. We not only affect ourselves, but when we participate we influence others in one way or another. "Abstain from all appearance of evil," is the injunction given to us in the Scriptures.

An Underworld Enticement

Dancing should have its place to-day as ever, classed with the saloon, the opium dive, gambling den, and all other soul-destroying things of the underworld, into which people are drawn by objects which attract the senses, viz: music, costly decorations, beautiful lights, incense, polished floors, banquets, and wines. These sense-satisfying things, music, food, etc., are all right in their place, but they have been misused as enticements to sinful practices. They are made to hold the individual in a state of hypnotism until within the grasp of evil, in much the same manner as a snake holds a frog under its hypnotic gaze until he is seized.

Our Church Stand Distinctive

The writer, as a representative for the church, has felt a degree of pride in the fact that we had the distinction of having taken a decided stand against this practice. And he has come out boldly in denouncing it among our people. He has taught them that it is a practice to avoid because of its being "one likely to lead . . . minds from Christ and his gospel." (General Conference Resolutions, No. 317.) Also as a practice stated by the church as one "unbecoming true Christians and should be avoided by all Saints." (Ibid., No. 377.)

He has encouraged our young people to attend our college, Graceland, where environment and association with Saints would be in their favor. We have in mind now three young girls who left our fields of labor to take up work at Graceland. They had previously been baptized into the church. Before this they had all participated in dancing as a pastime, but they immediately discontinued the practice, believing it to be un-Christian, and wended their way to Graceland. Dancing had sort of a charm for at least two of them, and it was in a sense a sacrifice for them to lay the practice aside. Naturally it would be a temptation when placed in their way again, which they would, we are satisfied, overcome. But at Graceland, among our own people, there would be supplied more wholesome recreation and pleasure on which to spend youthful surplus vitality, and therefore no such temptation would come to them.

"Private Dances" Pernicious

We naturally felt quite disturbed and somewhat surprised to learn that many of our young people were engaging in the practice in the form of "private dances," and that the practice was being discussed even in class work at the college. We have no disposition to condemn our college or its splendid array of teachers, but as a church and in the church college, are we considering the church and the stand it has taken? Should we tolerate such a question being discussed there? Are our fathers and mothers allowing their children who have been baptized into the kingdom of Christ to carry on the practice in homes? Are we teaching our young people in the Sabbath schools the position of the church on dancing? Will latter-day Israel follow in the path of former-day Israel?

Our people should thoroughly understand before uniting with the church that dancing is "unbecoming true Christians," and that it leads "minds from Christ and his gospel." And surely the sweet Spirit of the Master, which leads and guides us in the ways of righteousness, along with the wonderful blessings which the gospel affords, is sufficient without taking part in worldly practices. We should no more desire to be found in a dance hall when the Master comes than we would in a saloon or other place of like character.

We are not looking for perfection as yet, but we are looking for advancement, not a backward step. If we live as close as we possibly can, we are liable to make errors, but when we do willful things that are wrong and know that we are doing wrong at the time, we cannot excuse ourselves.

Therefore, let us provide clean, constructive rather than destructive pleasure for our young people. And may our entertainment be more of an uplifting character for them.

Satanic powers are raging! The world is in commotion! "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues."—Revelation 18: 4.

"I Wish I Could Preach"

By Elmer K. Patterson

How many young men indulge in the passive wish that never develops into a moving, impelling desire? A remedy is suggested.

Perhaps it would be a most common thing for us to say that some years ago a young man, just past his teens, entered this wonderful church. And perhaps it would be equally as common and natural for us to add, that about the first thing to come to him in the wake of his baptism was a thing he has always held as being, a "desire" to preach.

True, this is no uncommon thing, nor has the young man's life been uncommon, following his acceptance of the true plan of salvation. But because of the mere fact that it has not been uncommon, but rather quite typical of other lives, are we going to assume the privilege of discussing this young man and see if he really did "desire" to preach.

We presume, if you happen to be a young man reading this, that more than once you have returned from a wonderful sermon delivered by some Latter Day Saint preacher, and as you wended your way home the lessons couched in the message surged through your mind, and then suddenly you began to have that old familiar Latter Day Saint wish, "I wish I were a preacher."

And, sister, have you ever heard some one tell about the wonderful work that is being done in the Women's Department, when as you listened with attentive ears to the inspiring account your heart began to swell and flutter, and your cheeks seemed to flush with the rising of some inner joy, and then, almost before you realize it you were wishing that you too were taking a greater part in church work, just as you had so often wished before.

It would be quite possible for us to ask similar questions of our relations to the work involved in all other branches of church activity. But let us ask ourselves another question, Did we, you and I, or do we, really desire to accomplish some certain thing or things that we have longed to do but have not as yet accomplished?

An Analysis of the Young Man

Let us return to the young man already referred to. Several years have come and gone in that young man's life since he made his covenant with the Lord; years that cannot be recalled, only in memory. And now we find him to-day a grown man, quite matured, bright and to some degree promising, yet in spite of his wishes he is not permitted to preach.

All during those years he has worked in honest employment, attended church regularly, lent his financial support, paid his tithing, read the standard works of the church, and in addition to all this and many other good things, the sweet

Spirit has come to him many times as a witness to his faith, yet he does not preach, nor can he.

This same young man has a fair command of English and possesses that rare faculty of meeting people of higher station on apparently common ground. He is honest, and to all outward appearances as well as the visible expressions of inward grace manifest in proper outward ways and in proper places, would prove that he is recognized of God as his child, yet he does not preach, as he so often says he wishes. He has never been called.

Once this young man would say, "I wish I too could preach," or "I wish I too was a mighty preacher like so and so." But now those wishes have grown, and like a multitude of our "want to be's," "would be's," "but can't be's," he will often declare, even publicly, that he longs to preach more than anything else in all the world.

But, dear reader, do you really think he does?

This same young man has had a perfectly good Bible in his home for years, and he has often read 2 Timothy 2: 15, and even pondered over its personal import, as well as many other suggestions and commandments found there and elsewhere, which when obeyed would fit him for a preacher service. Yet he does not nor cannot preach, and why?

Can you tell?

To the mind of the writer, wish and desire have gotten mixed up in the young man's mind, and the wrong influence is in the lead, namely wish. Desire, we believe, demands backbone to accomplish the thing or things desired, while wish is only what we might call the wide-awake, daytime expression of a dream; and even then we often resort to the use of a chicken bone to make it appear more tangible. And what's the result?

The Self-Discovering Place

Are we not, more or less, putting wish ahead of desire, continually?

Quite often, after we have passed on down the stream of time for a considerable distance, we arrive suddenly at a self-discovering place, and perhaps we can attribute this to the sure mercies of God who is ever mindful of the least of us, even you and me. But when we arrive at this place, we will more than likely look back on the past and mourn.

"How foolish we've been! How blind! How could I have been so stupid?" we say.

The scales, as it were, fall from our eyes, and we discover that for a long, long, time our wishbone has been where our backbone ought to have been.

It's one thing to wish and quite another thing to desire. This truth we believe we can glean from the marvelous accomplishments of the Savior.

Christ left the courts of glory and came down to earth with a multifold desire. He desired to destroy the works of Satan and open the way whereby man might return unto his God in a state of perfection. He desired to establish his church. He desired to prove to a sin-sick world the power of God and the eternal value of the gospel. He desired to teach men and mankind truth, that you and I might know which was the truth and which was the lie.

Had he only wished to have done those things he might not have gotten any farther than some of the great philosophers, whose works follow them as truth, but which is truth only in part, as seen through a glass darkly. But no, Jesus desired, and this desire was so keen that all the fiery darts of the Adversary could not turn him from accomplishing his desire, and he won and became Christ indeed.

If our desires were anywhere nearly as great as our wishes, or even partially as great as we have often dreamed them to be, we would have long since realized those desires, or at least we would be well on the road to their realization.

Was Our Desire Real?

We believe we all can think of things we have always wanted to do. But did we really want to do them? Was the real, actual desire there? If it were, pray tell me how it comes that right now, for the life of us, we just can't think of why we did not do some of them.

We all have heard the doctrine of the gathering, and we presume that we all more or less grasp an idea of its vast importance. But how many times have we wished and wished and then wished some more that the gathering was completed and Zion redeemed? But like the young man that wishes to preach yet does not and cannot, we've had our wishbone where our backbone should have been, and our desires have not been keen enough, (speaking of the church as a whole) and the result is, Zion is still unredeemed and the gathering only commenced.

If we had quit wishing a long time ago and really desired to effect the gathering according to the law, if we really desired to redeem Zion according to the instructions given, this phase of the great latter-day work would have been right now so near its fulfillment that the world would marvel at our works, and better still we would be even now enjoying some of the wonderful blessings that the Lord's servants tell us are in store for us when we do accomplish this thing.

If the young man referred to in this article really wanted to preach, he would more than likely be preaching to-day. But he is only wishing, and naturally he will never put forth the proper efforts to do the things actually needed to qualify himself for that thing until he stops merely wishing. He must first desire, and if that desire is of the right sort he will get busy at once. He will prepare and move out in the direction of his chosen goal. He will look things squarely in the face. He will brace up and meet the requirements and will say with a real meaning, "Lord, I'm going to get there, and I'm going to fight a good fight and win because thou desirest men, red-blooded men, and hundreds of them, too."

The harvest is ripe but the laborers are few.

But the best harvest hands are those that have learned the business of harvesting by reason of an undying desire to accomplish that one thing. And just as there is only one right way to become a real harvest hand in the earth's grain-fields, so is there but one right way to become a real harvest hand in the Lord's vineyard.

Jesus said, I am the way; follow me.

Will Wishes Redeem Zion?

If we as a church or as individuals are ever going to become more spiritual and united, if we are going to gather in the regions round about in accordance with the law, if we are going to clean up our homes, cleanse ourselves from all iniquity, shun the very appearance of evil, become humble and full of love, and eventually redeem Zion, we will quit our wishing right now and fan that little spark of "desire" to serve God and obey his commands, lurking within us, until it rises to that quality that fears no obstacle and knows nothing but successful accomplishment.

If this church is going to demonstrate a greater progress in the future than in the past (and the individual makes up the church) we will simply get our backbone where our wishbone now is, or has been, and with the kind of labor and effort that loves the righteous struggle join hands and strike out upon that one right path to man, and follow that Holy One who got there.

That one was Christ Jesus—the one who did not wish, but desired and did.

Do you?

Truth Links

By James E. Yates

Truth is a golden chain, each link a treasure, and each treasure a power to draw us to better things.

To gain a clear understanding of a great truth is to receive a distinct contribution to our spiritual well-being.

There can be no spiritual improvement apart from the comprehension of the truth; soul growth must therefore depend upon mind activity.

Soul salvation in the celestial realms without knowledge is impossible; for at that time "the knowledge of God shall cover the earth as the waters cover the deep."

Ignorance and salvation are not kinsmen, neither have they any affinity for each other; therefore where there is no knowledge of God there can be no salvation.

To contrast the works of the flesh with the works of the Spirit is to see with a greater vision the great things of the Lord.

The more abundant life which Christ came to impart is not wholly identical with the life of mortal existence.

The power of physical movement is not in its manifestations an evidence of spiritual life, for an angleworm moves, but is not responsive to the power of the "abundant life."

The wind moves, but is not identified with life, either physical or spiritual; so also does a watch have movement, but in the substance of its cold dead metals it is not a thing of life; so also a man may wriggle like a worm, rage like the wind, or move with the precision of the finest timepiece and yet be as dead as a stone.

Merely because a man moves, is no proof that he is alive; and it was of those who are dead while they live that Jesus spake when he said: "Let the dead bury the dead."

All physical organism depends upon material of its kind in order to maintain its structural identity. The house depends upon its walls to stand, the tree upon its fiber, the body upon its bone and sinew and food to replenish the same; and the same is true of spiritual organism and of spiritual life.

A spiritual organism of individual life may be to-day strongly charged and actuated with the "more abundant life" of which Christ is the Great Source, and yet through a lack of proper and regular spiritual nourishment become a skinny skeleton or a cold corpse in a surprisingly short time if we are not aware.

Physical organism depends upon action for its being, structure, and shape; and upon action or protection from too much action, for its perpetuity; thus by rotary action the earth is round; by the action of liberty in the breeze a tree is sprangled; and by the application of force to a mold a brick is squared; but the same rotary motion which formed the earth into a sphere, would, if increased to violent velocity, set the earth on fire. The same action which forced the brick into the mold, would, if applied in another way, crush it into powder, and the exercise required to keep a mortal body fit, would, if increased to violence, destroy it.

So also violent action in spiritual organism will kill; and should the all-wise One pour out his mighty wisdom and power upon souls that are incapacitated to receive in such a degree, those souls would be helplessly and hopelessly crushed; and to attempt to develop inferior spiritual life to the standard of superior spiritual excellence by the violence of compulsion, would be as deadly and impossible to the spiritual life as a crushing weight would be to the body.

We must therefore continue to receive "grace for grace" and "line up line, precept upon precept, here a little, and there a little," and thus on and on, to the "measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ"; for the great God's only highway leading up to spiritual excellence and eternal salvation leads through the land where growth and gradual unfoldment is the process of attainment.

We are to grow in grace and in knowledge of the truth; and there has been no provision made for an acrobatic entrance into heaven.

Observance of Tithing Law Urged

The Presiding Bishopric has sent out circular letters to all of the missionaries, urging the teaching of tithing as an essential part of the law of the church, and essential to the right living of the gospel of Jesus Christ. The Master sent out his ministry with the commandment to "teach them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." When he comes, if we are to be found worthy, it must be because we have done our duty. Many fail because they have not yet been sufficiently taught. There is grave need of an educational work still along these lines.

It is not enough that one should be baptized into the kingdom. He should first be converted, and part of his conversion is shown in his willingness to assist in the work with his means and ability.

Interesting College Debate

"The debate in the religious education class last Tuesday was, 'Resolved, that all men shall finally be saved in the celestial glory.' The affirmative was upheld by Ruth Wood and H. E. Winegar; the negative by Madge Green and J. R. Lentell. The debate was very interesting, and the debaters showed that they had analyzed their subject well. The judges, Peter Muceus, J. F. Garver, and David Hopkins, gave their decision to the negative."—Graceland Record.

Orchestral Number of Autumn Leaves

The Orchestral Number of Autumn Leaves (almost the entire April number being devoted to that subject) is on our desk, and is a most creditable number indeed. Pictures are shown of five typical church orchestras, with brief sketches of their work.

There are some inspirational and informational articles and a special orchestra story written for the number by Joseph H. Anthony. Elder A. H. Mills is responsible for the collection of contributions and planning the arrangement. The transposition chart is an excellent aid to newer orchestras.

Those not on the subscription list should send in fifteen cents for a copy of this number.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

THE FUTURE OF PALESTINE

[The following is an account of an address delivered by Doctor Garnett M. Brickner, rabbi of the Holy Blossom Synagogue, before a congregation of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, in Toronto, and published in the Toronto Globe for March 8.—EDITORS.]

"For two thousand years the Jews have believed in the final return of the race to Palestine. The great rabbis have, through the centuries, urged the realization of the prophecies of old. And during all that time there has not been one nation which understood the Jews better than Great Britain. In England, under the Union Jack, the Jews feel at home," said the speaker.

Message From the East

The rabbi stated that, although civilization had developed in the east, scientific progress and advance had been made in the west. "But the progress has been without God, and that is why there is at present a restlessness in the world, a yearning and a great urging for a new spiritual message, which is to come from the east, from where the great ethical and moral teachings had their origin.

"The west combined its materialism with progress, but now it seeks again to combine with the spiritual influences from the east. Progress has become divorced from religion. If the Spirit of God had been in the world, the great war would not have been fought," the speaker declared.

Dates From Dreyfus Case

"The modern movement of Zionism dates back to the time of the famous Dreyfus affair," he said. "It would be impossible to house all the Jews of the world in Palestine on account of its limited area, and, moreover, it would be undesirable, as other nations would lose an important element in their citizenship. Only those Jews who want to fully live out their ideals, joined by hundreds of thousands of refugees, will populate the new Zion," he stated.

As in Days of Joshua

"There are 8,000 pioneers on the way from all over Europe to the Holy Land at present, and when the country is finally settled all the newcomers ask from the world is funds to help them buy back the land of their fathers. The soil will be divided again as in the times of Joshua. The people will possess the soil and the subsoil rights in common; there will be no chance of profiteering or any schemes of cornering the land," he stated.

"The Hebrew language is again the national tongue in Palestine," said the rabbi. "The country glories in the newly cultivated orange groves and vineyards. All business is done on the cooperative scale. Women have an equal opportunity with men, despite opposition. Jewish art has sprung up, and has expressed itself in the erection of a Jewish art school in Jerusalem. The university is nearing completion. From there the law will go over the whole world," he said.

"And as soon as the Jews are strong enough to govern themselves, Great Britain will take back its mandate to the league, and the Hebrew flag will float over the Holy Land. The Jews and their neighbors, the Arabs, of the same Semitic race, will live in peace and harmony, despite the artificially created difficulties by political trouble-mongers," said the rabbi. "Zionism has a bright future, and Great Britain will be blessed, and the world with it, when the Jews are reinstated in their land, and the message of God will go forth once again from Jerusalem," he concluded.

MANY HEBREWS ARE TAKING TO FARMING

Encouraging tendency among late arrivals at eastern ports.

A large number of Hebrew immigrants now coming into the United States as part of the present great influx of immigrants are being placed on farms rather than in the highly populated cities of the eastern States, says the Nation's Business. The Hebrew Immigrant Aid and Sheltering Society is the organization directing the movement of placing incoming Hebrews on the farms and in rural sections of the country. Even in some instances work is found for these aliens before they have passed through the government's barrage and inspection at Ellis Island.

A complete system of tending over and watching these migrants as they leave the island and until they reach their destination on the farm has been worked out by the society, agents being at every transfer point to dispatch further these future citizens of America.

The society recently opened in New York a large institution where it quarters and feeds the incoming Hebrews until they are again prepared for a trip to their final destination. The organization works in close cooperation with the bureau of immigration of the department of labor.

FIVE MILLIONS FOR PALESTINE TRADE

Leading New York Jews have already subscribed a million dollars for this immense new corporation.

The formation of a $5,000,000 corporation, the American Palestine Company, to promote commerce and industry in the Holy Land, was announced last night at a dinner given by the company's officials at the Jewish Centre, No. 113 West 86th Street. About 250 of New York's leading Jewish business men attended.

The President of the company, Samuel Lamport, announced that already $1,000,000 worth of stock had been subscribed for. The meeting was presided over by Louis Marshall. Other speakers were Samson Benderly, secretary of the company, who has recently returned from Palestine; Judge Otto A. Rosalsky, Judge Julian M. Mack, and Rabbi Meyer Berlin.—New York Evening World.

Musical Leadership

In the interests of better music for the church, Elder Harold C. Burgess will lecture each morning for a week to the class in religious education at Graceland College. He will instruct the class in the work of conducting better song services, according to the Graceland Record. The same news sheet reports that it is rumored that Brother Elbert A. Smith is to return to Lamoni in about a month to deliver his lectures to the same class.

Sister A. E. Campbell writes from Cobalt, Ontario, that she desires the prayers of the Saints because of heart trouble. She has been very energetic in taking the welcome message of the gospel to her neighbors and in doing so arouses some enmity as well as makes some friends. She is eleven miles from a church but arranges for preaching once a week at her home.

It ain't of so much importance that you possess a belief, as that the belief possesses you.—David Grayson.

PASTORAL

Why People Don't Go to Church

A Scranton pastor discusses an important subject in a frank way.

There was a good attendance at the Washburn Street Presbyterian church Sunday night to hear Doctor D. H. Johnston preach on "Why people don't attend church." The text was Hebrews 10: 25: "Not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together, as the manner of some is."

Doctor Johnston said in part: "We cannot be too frequently reminded of our obligations to attend the services of the church. I do not deny that we can sing his praises in our homes, and have communion with him. But a special promise is made in connection with the church. 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' The church service then is a meeting with God, and that is its principal value. If you miss that point of contact with him, you miss the real blessing of the church service.

"Our hearty regularity at church will be contagious. Our spiritual life is very much like a watch—liable to run down. We feel the need of a new start each week. One of the best ways of advertising the church is by regular attendance. The proof of Christianity is written in the biography of the saints. Real civilization is advanced by spiritual means. The march of civilization is set to the music of religion.

"Why do so many people stay away from the church? You know the old excuses. None of them true. You say you don't like the singing. Then sing and improve it. You say a member of the church met you on the street the other day and didn't speak to you. Why don't you speak to him? Others say, 'I can read better sermons at home.' The text says, 'Not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together as the manner of some is.' The only compliance with that is church attendance if you are as flimsy as the soldier who was asked to explain the presence of a leg of mutton in his possession after foraging had been forbidden. He said: 'I killed the sheep in self-defense.' Some say they were absent from church because they were up so late Saturday night they didn't feel like going to church. You have no right to spend your Saturday nights in a way that will unfit you for church Sunday morning. Others spend Sunday in such a way that they are about as amiable on Monday morning as a neurasthenic mule. Another excuse is, 'I want to spend Sunday with my wife and children.' Why don't you take them with you? You take them to other places. In apostolic times whole families went to church. The real reason is they have lost their love for Christ and the church, and no longer thirst after righteousness and have no desire to be filled:

"The fault for nonattendance upon the church is not the fault of the church or the preacher. It is with the people themselves. If Jesus could not succeed because of the unbelief of certain ones mentioned in the Bible, how can you expect the preacher to succeed? How can the preacher reach men if they care nothing about the gospel? How can the church build up the city of God, if the people prefer Vanity Fair? The people refused to listen to Christ when he was here. Would they do differently now? The church is blamed for not taking away the sins of the people. But suppose the people don't want their sins taken away? There are thousands of people in this city to-night who don't want their sins rebuked, their dishonest practices condemned, or to be separated from their favorite vices. That is the reason they don't attend the churches.

"There are too many people who want the pulpit to administer sedatives and soothing powders, instead of stirring men to heroism and noble deeds. They want a gospel like a safety razor warranted not to cut, or like rubber heels warranted not to jar the most delicate organism. Some people are so delicate to-day they can't spend an hour and a half in church a month, but they can spend every night in the week at some place of amusement.

"Do you really want to be Christians? If so, there is but one channel through which spiritual strength can come to society. And that channel is organized religion—the church. If you want your son to be a lawyer, you send him to a law school; if you want him to be a physician, you send him to a medical school; if you want him to be a machinist, you send him to a machine shop to learn the trade. If you want him to be a Christian, you ought to send him to the church. The church is the bride of Christ, and you can't neglect the bride without offending the groom, and you can't neglect the church and keep the good will of Christ, for the church is the bride of Christ."—Scranton Times.

Elders' Quorum Work in England

Quorum work has been reorganized and its officials intend that it shall succeed. They desire cooperative effort.

May I ask space in your valuable columns for the elders' quorum (British Isles)? On the advice of President F. M. Smith and Apostle T. W. Williams, there was a readjustment of the executive of more than one organization, including the quorum of elders. It had been in existence many years and had passed through many trying experiences, owing to the constant migration of its members either to the higher quorums or to the land of promise. Executives were formed and reformed, and it was left to our esteemed brother, J. E. Meredith, of Birmingham, to hold the reins of presidency for upwards of fourteen years. He has, despite the many drawbacks coming across his pathway, striven with might and main to bring the quorum members up to the high level they ought to occupy as ministers in the church and kingdom of God.

Time, talents, money, and personal comforts were sacrificed with the one idea in view to call the elders to a sense of their duty and to help them discharge the functions of their office, so that the church as a whole might occupy her right and proper place in the affairs of men. One great disadvantage to success is the scattered condition of the elders, making it difficult to get the representative meetings held with anything like the success one would like.

The only time we could look forward to was the annual conference of the mission, but even then so much time was taken up with the agenda that it was nigh impossible to get sufficient time to hold a fairly good meeting. Even at these meetings we could not get the number of elders present that we would like to see. So if the quorum executive has not in the past achieved its goal the responsibility is not theirs, but it lies with the individual members of the quorum so to strive that the requests of the executive may be carried into effect. When this is done, the question often asked, "What good is the quorum to individual elders?" will answer itself. Try it for a year and see.

Well, the suggestion of President F. M. Smith and his colleague has been acceded to, and a new executive has come into being. It is composed of the younger element of the eldership, and has started out with a good determination to attempt to get the brethren together more often and study the many and varied questions that affect their ministry. The idea of localizing the brethren is good, and has but one drawback; that is, in the Sheffield, Birmingham, London, and Welsh Districts, there are but a few elders and they are scattered over a very wide area, making it nigh impossible to set up local executives and hold meetings regularly so as to guarantee success. To counteract this means a great sacrifice. The Manchester District is the most favored of the British Isles Mission, having about twenty-seven elders, and the longest distance to travel is twenty miles; that is from Wigan to Manchester to hold quorum meetings.

The president of the quorum hopes to get to each district as opportunity offers, and in the meantime the other districts ought to get their elders together and invite papers, lectures, etc., and afterwards pass them around to the others, so that all may benefit from the experience and understanding of the quorum as a whole. In Manchester we have held two enjoyable meetings and are looking ahead for more good times. At our last meeting, Elder John Bailey gave a paper on "The elders' quorum: what is it?" It was a splendid effort and well received. It has been typed, and a copy will be sent to each of the districts for their consideration.

We appeal to all our brethren to send along their suggestions, ideas, and promises of help, so that they may be discussed and acted upon for our mutual improvement. This is not confined to the elders alone. We shall put every suggestion, whether from the higher councils or lower (if any such there be) before our quorum. Let us hear from you, brothers and sisters, for are we not all workers together in one common cause? The following will always be pleased to hear from you: E. Maloney, president, 20 Chipping Street, Longsight, Manchester; John Bailey, 45 Rochdale Road, Harpurhey, Manchester; A. T. Trapp, Lyndhurst, Carlton Road, Gloucester; or our secretary, H. L. Griffiths, 33 Parrin Lane, Monton, Manchester.

The slogan for the quorum is "Cooperative service." Let us all remember the great lesson: The more I give to my brother, the richer I become. The clarion call is to duty, and there can be no furlough, not even sick leave, when we enlist in the army of the Lord. Just consider it. Trusting the Spirit of the Master will bless our united efforts to uphold the dignity and honor of the priesthood and the glory of the church's great name, and with every kind wish for future welfare, I am,

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD MALONEY,

President of the Quorum.

MANCHESTER, ENGLAND, 20 Chipping Street, Longsight.

Lust for Audiences

The lust for big, roaring audiences ruins more preachers than dabbling in oil stocks or getting the sore throat and going into politics, which also hurts enough of them. It is not the size of the audience that counts. It is what is made of the audience. It is a fearful and glorious thing to preach to a big or to a small audience. But is not the small assembly really best for lasting results? Henry Ward Beecher said after years of experience that the best congregation he knew anything about was that in which one man was the preacher and one man the audience! Jesus Christ thought it worth while to give the major part of his time and personality to twelve men. Bruce says that "the training of the twelve" was "a landmark in the gospel history."—Exchange.

Here is a little sermon which has been recently reproduced in several papers:

"The man who reverences the Lord's name, observes the Lord's Day, frequents the Lord's house, and reads the Lord's Book will never be a disturbing element in any desirable community. On the contrary, it is he and his like who make any community a desirable place in which to live."—Toronto Globe.

HYMNS AND POEMS

Christ Is Risen

By Rees Jenkins

(An Easter song composed on Easter Sunday, March 30, and on the following Sabbath, April 7, 1918, at Damascus, Syria.)

Christ is risen; life is given
And vouchsafed to all mankind
On condition of obedience
To the truth that is outlined
In the gospel taught by Jesus
And then sealed by his own blood,
Ratifying this the cov'nant
That he made 'tween man and God.

Christ is risen; life is given;
Death is conquered; all is well.
The Messiah is victorious;
Broken is Death's icy spell.
May our hearts be joined in praises
For the gift of God's dear Son
For he burst Death's chains asunder
And for man, the vict'ry won.

Christ is risen; life is given;
Death subdued, and man set free,
If he will but yield obedience
To the law of liberty,
Which the gospel is revealing
To all those forsaking sin—
For the knowledge will be given
Of the doctrine taught therein.

Christ is risen; life is given;
He was offered up for all,
And thus met the claims of justice—
Brought redemption from the fall.
He was sought by all the ancients,
Watched, and looked for, in all lands.
Him they worshiped from the Orient,
Yet observed not God's commands.

Christ is risen; life is given;
Nature's symbols are replete;
As the sun in heaven is central,
So in Christ life is complete.
He's the center of attraction—
In the center life is seen;
Thus in him, man's life is centered;
What will be, now is; hath been.

Christ is risen; life is given;
Types and shadows are fulfilled;
All they did was to prefigure;
Life itself they left unfilled.
They were only types and symbols—
Promises of God's dear Son,
Who would suffer death yet conquer,
And ascend when all was done.

Christ is risen; life is given;
It is offered free to all
Kindred, nations, tongues, and people,
Such as will obey the call.

Righteousness hence is required,
For the gospel thus demands;
Hence it calls unto repentance;
Faith and virtue it commands.

Christ is risen; life is given;
And salvation is proclaimed;
Liberty to man delivered—
Man—whom Christ by death reclaimed!
Hark! ye nations, to the message,
For it is not sent in vain;
It condemns those who reject it;
Others life eternal gain.

Christ is risen; life is given;
Praises ever to his name.
Join with instrument and voices,
And his work let all proclaim.
All ye heavens, sing his praises,
Let the earth the echoes ring.
Let all nations, tongues, and people,
Now proclaim the Christ their King.

Christ is risen; life is given;
Death has yielded; man is born,
Born of water and the Spirit
Into life's eternal morn.
In the water we are buried,
Token of the death we die,
Then come forth, receive the Spirit
Which is given from on high.

Easter Praise

By Hattie Hughes

Let all the earth in gladness ring,
The Lord has risen to-day;
In joyful praise O let us sing,
The Lord has risen to-day.

No more shall sorrow sweep the earth,
Or darkness fill the tomb,
Since Jesus came of lowly birth
To penetrate the gloom.

This world for centuries was lost
Till Christ the Savior came
With legions of the heavenly host,
And rent the veil in twain.

And so this joyful Easter morn
We celebrate the day,
When angels came at early dawn
To roll the stone away.

Let all the mountains shout for joy,
Rocks, rills, and valleys sing;
And heavenly choirs their tongues employ.
All hail the risen King!

Love

By J. E. Vanderwood

God is love, and all his children
Should possess a love sublime;
For without it life is empty,
'Tis a useless waste of time.

Oh, that we could once awaken
To the subtle powers of love,
That its sacred hand still beck'ning
Might lead us to heights above.

Strange it seems, but it is certain
He who lacks this magic power
Must decrease and sink to ruin,
For he has no saving power.

Love, the highest law of heaven,
Sheds its rays on you and me,
As we find its truth reflected In the Man of Galilee.

Love, my friend, is the dynamic
Of this universe of ours;
Everything that has a being
Must confess its mighty powers.

Nothing long can live without it;
In its absence chaos reigns;
But all those who do possess it
Walk with God on higher planes.

In its presence virtues linger—
Robust is the life of love—
It is powerful and eternal,
Yet as gentle as a dove.

Peace abounds where love is present;
Sorrows flee when love appears;
Happiness enshrouds the person
Who through love has conquered fears.

What a blessedness of spirit
Follows in the wake of love;
What a noble aspiration
Is expressed in deeds of love.

Duty soon becomes a pleasure,
Service brings a joy each day,
When with loving benedictions
We pursue the perfect way.

Faith is kindled into being,
Hope as well is made secure;
Everything is made triumphant
When our life and love is pure.

Home with love becomes as heaven,
Church with love is God's abode.
Love impels when all creation
Balks before coercion's goad.

Selfless love, a gift from heaven,
Worthy thrice the giver be;
For, alone, this love untarnished
Bringeth life complete to me.

He who lives this law celestial
Keeps all other laws as well,
And the greatness of his glory
Mortal tongue may never tell.

Earth with love would be as Zion.
Oh, that we could learn the art
To put from us pride and malice,
And thus purify the heart.

THE SEMINAR

The Aims of the Church

By Max Carmichael

This, the fifth of a series of articles on Zion's problems, discusses the aims of the church regarding economic resources and some of the requirements of temporal equality.

What does the church plan to do with the economic resources of Zion and her borders? What is the attitude of the church toward them? This question takes us back to the fundamental reasons for the gathering. The group or the church in the gathered state is attempting to make conditions such that the individual members can easily adjust themselves to the physical environment around them both economically and morally; and further, the church or group is attempting to make this adjustment so easy that the individual members can find occasion for the expression of powers gained by this adjustment, powers of both an economic and a spiritual nature. In other words the church is attempting to make conditions so that each individual member can earn a living, but still further, earn a surplus, which can be used in turn for the benefit of others.

The church is attempting to make the conditions such that the individual members can earn this living righteously, and when the surplus is earned, the individual can spend the surplus or use the surplus most advantageously for the good of society through the machinery of the church. Saying these same things in the common terms of the church members, the church is attempting to bring about temporal equality, that in the long run there may be spiritual equality, for without unity in temporal things, spiritual unity is impossible.

The second aim of the church is to secure the church as a whole against the encroachment of sin, to secure safety, both temporal and spiritual, for its members. In other words every individual member cannot be secure in the earning of his livelihood by righteous methods until the members as a whole within the church are economically independent of the world. In other words, when the time comes that he who does not "take up his sword against his neighbor, must needs flee unto Zion for safety," we hope to have conditions such that those who do flee can live in Zion safely. We must remember that we may flee to Zion for safety, but Zion will not afford us that safety unless we do something, and that something is a well-worked-out plan of cooperation in a full cycle of economic relations, producing and distributing within ourselves the necessaries of life.

Temporal Equality

How does the church expect to accomplish its first aim,

May we stand with hands extended
Like the Christ who dwells above.
Let us teach our fellow creatures
That God's greatest gift is love.

Nothing short of love can lift us
To the heights of grace divine;
Neither can we gain his presence
'Til his love our hearts entwine.

So we live with greater courage—
All things come from God above—
And with Paul we are persuaded namely, temporal equality? We would say in short by the law of consecration and stewardship. These two, stewardship and consecration, are really one and inseparable. The world has conceived of them both, but hardly together, and not at all as being used under a unified system of well-directed, concerted action. In fact the doctrine of stewardship and consecration cannot be fully worked out except under concerted action, with official machinery to operate the system. This brings us to the question as to what is the doctrine of stewardship and consecration.
That the greatest grace is love.

We shall attempt to give the characteristics of this doctrine in the order in which we conceive they might evolve in the mind of man.

Stewardship involves the recognition that there is a God who created all things, among them men; next that man is in an imperfect state, unredeemed; and that God has a plan well organized to redeem mankind.

As we come to believe and know these truths, we would realize that we should help God in this plan of redemption, and that God has given us the control of our physical and mental faculties and of the world and its property in order to give us our free agency in helping him to redeem the world, and thereby through our free agency to work out our own redemption by the submergence of our wills to his mind and direction. In other words, our physical and mental faculties and the control of property are loaned to us by God for us to use in helping out in the redemption of ourselves and the world.

Therefore, in order to help God with as much concentrated effort as possible, we should use our physical and mental faculties and the property we control for the exclusive purpose of aiding God in the redemption of the race. Of course we must recognize that in order to keep our mental and physical faculties up to their maximum efficiency, we must be consumers of wealth or property, but we should ourselves consume only such wealth as is necessary to maintain the maximum efficiency of our faculties, in other words, our needs and just wants. True to God's well-developed plan, we find that should we consume any more than our needs and just wants, our faculties are lessened in efficiency.

Consequently the law or doctrine of stewardships further means that all excess faculties that we may cultivate over and above that which is necessary to earn sufficient wealth to keep such faculties at their maximum, and all excess property that we produce and accumulate over and above our needs and just wants, or in other words, our surplus, should be consecrated to the end that the world might be redeemed speedily. Thus do stewardship and consecration unite.

Consecration

Consecration means the absolute devotion of all human faculties and property first to the necessary upkeep of these faculties and property, and next to the redemption of the world. Also that the upkeep of the faculties and property already possessed is not an end itself, but is done in order that they might be with maximum effort consecrated to the divine purpose of God. We said above that we should recognize that God has a plan to redeem the world. Therefore we should all unite in the one plan. We should conduct our stewardship and make our consecration in harmony with that plan, in harmony with its laws.

This redemption is to be accomplished by our working with God. As we all must work with God, we must necessarily work with one another in a united effort. This united effort among men must be done under regulations, God's regulations, which of necessity must be revealed to willing mankind. This united effort among men under God's regulations necessitates leadership among men, leadership recognized of God, in other words, priesthood. We are to redeem the world under some common scheme and under some common leadership. The actual execution of the plan necessitates some sort of official machinery. The use of our surplus faculties and property for the redemption of the world should be done under some sort of cooperative machinery, the basis for which will be revealed to us by God.

Consecration is, then, the use of our faculties and property for the redemption of the world according to the rules of this common scheme and under the machinery which is necessary to carry into effect this common scheme. Stewardship involves our willingness so to use our faculties and property. It involves a willingness upon our part to live only on our needs and just wants, and not to consume wealth for personal ends and gratification of ungodly lusts.

We must form the habit of living upon our needs and just wants. We must do this willingly and without complaint, no matter how much excess property we may accumulate. The need of official machinery to execute this common scheme means that our needs and just wants should be determined in accordance with the divine law, and should be submitted to the inspection of a common tribunal, that therefore all members of the common scheme of redemption may know that each individual member is true to the trust that God has imposed upon him, and which he is presuming to execute before his fellow men.

As heads of families we must be willing that the common tribunal should know our needs and just wants. We must be willing that this common tribunal, which represents the group, should pass upon the necessity of our family expenditures, either by way of consent or dissent. Thus shall we come to a unity of thought and of operation. We can only do this when we are pure in heart and love our brethren as ourselves. This does not mean that all shall consume the same amount of wealth in the maintenance of their faculties. The needs of individuals differ; necessarily their needs and just wants shall differ. The common tribunal will take these individual differences into consideration.

Even though we all live strictly according to our needs and just wants, temporal equality is not effected until our surplus energy and property is disposed of. It must be disposed of in some way. If we are to work together in the redemption of the race with our surplus, shall each man be left to be his own judge absolutely as to how he shall use this excess faculty or property; or would the need of complying with the plan of God necessitate some cooperation and direction in the use of this surplus? In other words, shall the official machinery of the united effort among men in union with God have any function here? Obviously it should.

A Common Tribunal

Hence the doctrine of stewardship and consecration involves the willingness to listen to the suggestions of the common tribunal as to how this excess faculty and property shall be used. It involves a willingness to hand over this excess property and faculty to the uses of the church and even to the possession of the church at times that the united effort of the redemption of the world may the better be accomplished. The common tribunal in order to execute this common scheme must have some system of accounting among the individual members in order that justice and equality may be maintained. This means a willingness upon the part of the steward to hand a periodic inventory of his property and faculty, also an income and expenditure sheet for the same period.

Any student of accounting knows that both the balance sheet (inventory) and the profit and loss statement must be handed in simultaneously in order that a check upon the financial status may be had. If a person becomes willing in all these regards and acts in accordance with such willing-

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Our May Institute

Your editor has just returned from Independence where, in counsel with her fellow executives, plans were formulated and rounded out concerning an institute for field workers and organizers, and such other women as are interested in the work of our department and are able to attend.

This institute is to be held the week of May 15 to 22. It will open on Sunday evening with an address by Historian Walter W. Smith on the subject of the relation of study to service. It will close on the following Sunday morning with a sermon on women's work in connection with church work, delivered by one of the First Presidency.

The interim between these two dates is to be well filled with lectures, talks, addresses, demonstrations, exhibitions, slides, films, and even little dramas, in presentation of the various phases of our work. The program as outlined will engage the attention and service of over forty different people, most of whom are leaders in their lines. A little diversion is planned for one afternoon, the nature of which will not be announced just now.

At any rate, we wish our field workers and organizers throughout the country to please take notice of this announcement and from this moment begin to lay plans to be present. The intensive training offered is such that no live-wire officer in our department can well afford to miss it. Expenses will be confined to those of traveling, for the good sisters of Independence will gladly care for the visiting workers. Our lines of lectures, materials, and suggestions of various kinds will be given freely to those who attend, and each one will go out from this institute feeling much better prepared for service in our department.

Those districts that are deeply concerned about the progress and advancement of their members and that feel that the work of the Women's Department is valuable to that advancement, will do well to see that their organizers are enabled to attend this meeting. The results may not be apparent in tangible returns that can be estimated in dollars and cents. Nothing that is purely educational can be. But nevertheless we consider that the returns will be definite and of a nature no district can afford to be without.

Watch our columns for further announcements concerning our May institute!

Beautify Your Home Grounds

Mother Nature is willing and ready to yield rich returns for a small amount of labor and attention at the proper time. 'Tis a pity she does not always receive all the encouragement she should in regard to the surroundings of the home. A lawn, however tiny, when well kept and tidy, is a thing of beauty, and will do a great deal towards establishing in the minds of those who live under its influence, a sense of contact, of association with the God of nature, an appreciation of his blessings, which none of us can afford to have our children and our families miss.

The sisters of the Laurel Club in Independence are gradually rounding up a program of activity connected with their determination to make of Zion a "City Beautiful" in very ness, he is a true steward, and thus helps to accomplish the first aim of the church, temporal equality and spiritual equality. How long will it be before any great numbers are thus willing to live in temporal equality, and thus make it possible to live in spiritual equality?

[EDITORS' NOTE: The next article of the series will be on the question of "Economic independence of the church," and will appear in an early number.]

deed. They have made arrangements with a local nurseryman by which all who order trees, shrubs, bulbs, plants, or seeds through their club will receive a thirty per cent discount. They are expecting to place "Make Independence Beautiful" cards in every home and store whose owner will accept the implied obligation to support the movement. They have arranged for lectures from specialists, one last week being given by the assistant landscape artist from Missouri State University at Columbia.

Most of these things and others can be emulated by our branches everywhere. Improvement clubs can be formed among the children, who will take a new interest in staying off the grass when they see their own little printed signs there with the meaningful "P-L-E-A-S-E!"

Little prizes of plants or bulbs or shrubbery offered to those householders who make the greatest improvement in their home surroundings will stimulate lots of good-natured rivalry, and the results obtained will amply repay every contestant, for beauty is ever its own reward!

We have been very much interested in an item which has been going the rounds of many newspapers this winter, and have decided to give it to our readers as it appeared, leaving it to stand on its own merits. Whether or not the results will be as stated or hoped, those who try it out will be benefited by the information and knowledge obtained. We quote:

"Discovery of the long-sought fertilizer that will grow grass and kill weeds is announced by the experiment station of Rhode Island State College as the result of twenty years of research. The realization of the dream of gardeners the world over—a weedless lawn—is possible without trouble or expense, according to the official college statement, and merely by the use of ammonium sulphate instead of nitrate of sodium in annual application of fertilizer.

"Slowly but surely the weeds disappear and the lawn will become the even velvety green that is the envy of every neighbor," said the announcement. "By using ammonium sulphate the required amount of nitrogen is furnished, and the soil kept in the acid condition under which the grass develops best, but the weeds are so weakened that they are crowded out."

Here's for the soft, green, velvety lawns which are the delight of all hearts!

Our Field Workers

The general conference executive of the Women's Department have been trying to complete their list of field workers before such time as the coming reunions shall require their services. Already some of the more forward-looking reunion committees are writing our office for the dating of representatives who will be able to present the various phases of our work at the coming summer meetings.

May we ask that when such requests are submitted to us, they shall be very definite in regard to the details of time, nature of service specifically desired, character of meetings contemplated, etc.? Some have written wishing a field worker for their reunion, omitting to state just when that reunion will be. Manifestly it will not be possible for us to make bookings upon such meager information.

We wish to impress upon our district organizers, too, as well as district presidents, the value of having special workers come into their localities in order to help get the work on its feet. One of our workers went to a district conference last month, presented our work in two splendid addresses made to mixed audiences, and did it so well that she was besieged with questions and eager desires to hear more. Following up the opportunity thus offered, she and the organizer went into each branch in the district, and were able to present the work in such a way as to effect organization in six out of the eight branches in the district. These were organized to meet the local needs, and the sisters throughout have felt an impetus towards our Zion ideal not before experienced. Incidentally, about $20 worth of our Women's Department literature was sold, exclusive of the orders for leaflet courses which have followed in the wake of the local organizations.

It is the aim of our executive to have a number of such qualified workers, who can go into a district in this way and help the organizer get well started, or to rekindle some of the fires that have gone out. We shall be glad to have any write us in regard to this work.

Ladies' Relief Society

A society has lately been formed by the ladies of Nauvoo for the relief of the poor, the destitute, the widow and the orphan; and for the exercise of all benevolent purposes. The society is known by the name of the "Ladies' Relief Society of the City of Nauvoo," and was organized on Thursday, the 24th of March, A. D. 1842.

The society is duly organized with a presidentess or chair-woman and two counselors, chosen by herself; a treasurer and secretary. Mrs. Emma Smith takes the presidential chair; Mrs. Elizabeth Ann Whitney and Mrs. Sarah M. Cleveland are her counselors; Miss Elvira Cole is treasurers and our well-known and talented poetess, Miss Eliza R. Snow, secretary.

There was a very numerous attendance at the organization of the society and also at their subsequent meetings, of some of our most intelligent, humane, philanthropic, and respectable ladies; and we are well assured from a knowledge of those pure principles of benevolence that flow spontaneously from their humane and philanthropic bosoms, that with the resources they will have at command they will fly to the relief of the stranger; they will pour in oil and wine to the wounded heart of the distressed; they will dry up the tear of the orphan, and make the widow's heart to rejoice.

Our ladies have always been signalized for their acts of benevolence and kindness; but the cruel usage that they have received from the barbarians of Missouri has hitherto prevented their extending the hand of charity in a conspicuous manner; yet in the midst of their persecutions, when the bread has been torn from their helpless offspring by their cruel oppression, they have always been ready to open their doors to the weary traveler to divide their scanty pittance with the hungry, and from their robbed and impoverished wardrobes to divide with the more needy and destitute; and now that they are living in a more genial soil, and among a less barbarous people, and possess facilities that they have not heretofore enjoyed, we feel convinced that with their concentrated efforts the condition of the suffering poor of the stranger and the fatherless will be ameliorated.

We had the privilege of being present at their organization, and were much pleased with their modus operandi, and the good order that prevailed; they are strictly parliamentary in their proceedings, and we believe that they will make pretty good democrats.

EDITOR.

In the issue of Times and Seasons dated April 1, 1842, appears the above account of the first organization of the women of our church. It is from the pen of Joseph Smith, jr. Read it, dear reader, as often as is necessary for you to catch their enthusiasm and understanding, their spirit of sacrifice, to hold it and to keep it. It is now or never with Latter Day Saint women who wish to be able to efficiently render the aid which women alone can give their families and friends. We must be ready for emergencies we have never before had to meet. Humble, united efforts to keep in touch with each other and to qualify ourselves in women's arts is as important as any other effort the church is putting forth. This is sound doctrine!

An Appreciation

How many know the value of a field worker? Such able assistants as they are! Our district, prior to our last conference, was an unorganized field of labor, so far as the Women's Department was concerned. But Sister Rosa Teir was sent to us, in answer to our call for help, and proved to be a most able representative for the department. She came to our conference and introduced the work, making many converts to it, and arousing interest among both men and women.

Following the conference, we went together throughout the district, making an almost complete tour of the branches, and organizing our work in most of them. Now we are hoping that these local organizations will prove to be very active. We shall do everything we can to that end, in order that Sister Teir's noble efforts shall not have been in vain.

Appreciatively,

BLANCHE BARBER, District Organizer.

Extracts From Organizers' Letters

One superintendent reports: "Our Women's Department has done much to get our women acquainted with each other, and the sisters seem to have more love and charity towards each other!" Is not this one fact worth the effort made? Although we look for far greater results, let us be thankful for all the good accomplished and press onward to our best. I love the work, and hope and pray I may become more worthy of the trust. Your colaborer in the building of Zion.—Effie Hield, Southern Wisconsin.

Conditions of weather have hindered me from making many visits to locals but I have tried to encourage by letter all I could, both locally and individually. I want the coming year to be a success in the Women's Department work, inasmuch as I have ability and power in a humble and righteous way.—Cora Henson, Southeastern Illinois.

I received some splendid reports from both home department and local Women's Department. I feel we will be able to accomplish more this year than any year past. Quite a few seem more interested in study, and I think we will be able to organize some good classes soon. I feel my inability to be of much service in so great a work, but desire to do what I can, the best I can. Ever praying that the sisters of this district may be helpful in the redemption of Zion.—Mrs. J. A. Graves, Spring River District.

How I'd love this work if I were fitted for it! I find that an organizer needs to be a person of broad vision, good education, much enthusiasm, few home duties, and great executive ability. I have a great desire to see the work prosper under proper leadership. It is very much worth while.—Ida Monroe, Lamoni Stake.

It seems to me our work must be largely one of preparation. I find that a great deal must be done as we teach our children. We must watch the opportune moment and offer something when prejudice is temporarily dethroned and reason is in power. It takes patience with a capital letter, and that is one virtue that has always been hard for me to cultivate. I am optimistic for the future, however, and am seeing clearly that we must all be educated to a wider view of religion before all the results we long for can come to pass. This can be done by the right leaders if they work with God, but it may be a painful process for some people. I try always to keep my eyes on the bright goal ahead and make the matters of the present fit together to bring about the accomplishment of our purposes in the future. The Lord has been very near to me in this work. He has shown me in dreams and vision where there was danger. This has helped me to face the conditions I have found. This work really needs one who could give her entire time, just as the missionary does, one who could be free to travel from branch to branch, and stay for a week at a time, if need be, to get things moving. . . . I wish to seek continually to improve any talents I may have, and to become more fully qualified for service.—Mrs. C. I. Carpenter, Kewanee District.

We have just had our annual sale and bazaar, and netted close to $200. We are having fine meeting here locally, taking up the three study courses. We were fortunate in getting a splendid leader for the Temple Builders, and they are doing fine work. Our home and child welfare class meets one evening a month. It is composed of young matrons mostly, with a sprinkling of older ones who help by their experiences. I certainly will study and try to follow out instructions given.—Cleda Simpson, Northern California.

Composer a Colored Woman

It is not generally known that the composer of "The end of a perfect day" is a colored woman. She is Mrs. Carrie Jacobs Bond and is her own publisher. "The American Musician" says Mrs. Bond has "received more from this composition than she can spend extravagantly the balance of her life." Mrs. Bond is an elderly woman whom the writer above-mentioned describes as very attractive in manner, and an accomplished musician.—The Presbyterian.

Notes About Women

One of the latest fads among the women on the Riviera is that of wearing monocles.

In Egypt it is a custom for women not to go to church for a year or more after there has been a death in the family.

France has more than 2,000,000 husbandless women, all of whom are now seeking mates in the United States and other countries.

Dancing in Colleges

Graceland College speaks forcefully on the subject, believing the dance to be detrimental.

The Literary Digest, one of the leading periodicals of the country, has written to some of the principal colleges and universities of the United States relative to the subject of dancing in coeducational institutions. The following is the reply of Graceland College to this inquiry and is published because it is believed that the people of the church will be interested in the matter.

As the educational institution of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, this college stands for a certain spiritual ideal. This ideal is the final realization of the teachings of Christ on the earth. The tendency of the dance, particularly the modern dance, is destructive of the basic elements of this ideal.

The dance appeals to two instincts: that of rhythm and that of sex. Both appeals have been perverted. The perversion of the rhythm appeal is manifest in the modern dance music, and the perversion of the sex appeal in the modern dance and indecency of dress.

We consider the dance detrimental to the best interests of an educational institution, particularly one motivated by a spiritual ideal.

Our suggestion as to meeting the situation is based upon our own successful experience:

First: Converting our young people to an appreciation of our ideal.

Second: Providing suitable recreational and social activities and encouraging participation therein.

Holden Stake

Elder S. W. L. Scott judiciously mixes choral enthusiasm with religious fervor—and gets worth-while results.

Time with never-folded wing is bearing us onward toward the goal, and I appreciate the golden chain of a common faith which moves the world out of static conditions, over-bannered by the wisdom of the Infinite, to the dawn of the ethical civilization heralded in the message of Jesus. I hail the hope, the star-spring from on high, which anchors common interests to cables of future happiness, and that subtle and mysterious quality we call love, which binds us together into families and nations, and is destined to unite mankind into a sacred brotherhood. So you will notice I am optimistic on general principles.

I have been in the Holden Stake since November of last year, with ten days' absence, performing duties as a missionary. My first introduction was at Knobnoster in a two weeks' effort in the new Saints' church. The meetings were successful, and some were added to the church by baptism. The cooperation of the branch was certainly commendable. A beautiful concrete example does this community of Saints represent, individually and collectively. They have as their president Brother R. E. Burgess, who draws on the bank of kindness heavily in administrative methods.

We organized a choral association at Knobnoster of thirty-two members, and conducted a "study class" evenings before preaching. Brother Burgess was elected president; Sisters Eva Redfield Moorman and Vivian Hanson, directors; Sister Holland, secretary-treasurer; Sister Tressie Enfield, pianist; and Sisters Bertha Hanson and Eva Redfield Moorman, musical missionaries. A wonderful enthusiasm was manifested in this line of the Master's work, a veritable organized "help and government" set in the church to assist in floating the gospel barge on ripples of song waves. The Knobnoster Choral Association rendered two anthems at the musical session of the Holden Stake conference, after a few rehearsals, which sent out tides of enthusiasm, crystallizing in other organizations wherever we go. So far as we have learned, they have set the pace—the grand allegro march.

Moving along to Grandview, we were one with the Saints on "opening day," January 2. The church building at that point is also a beautiful structure—at present a model of neatness and cleanliness under Brother and Sister Clines's janitorship. The cost, near $11,000, is a guarantee of credit to the community. As to acoustic and phonic properties, the auditorium excels any building in which I ever delivered a discourse or warbled a solo. You do not crane your neck nor palm your ear to catch testimonies or song articulation. Everything is distinctly audible. I understand this was planned by our church architect. We protracted our evangelizing effort there two weeks with fine attendance and interest. Brother C. V. Hopkins presides here, and if the avoirdupois of 305 pounds qualifies his administrative ability, he surely throws dignity to the scale. Grandview is an immigrant branch from various States, and the melting crucible, or "threshing floor," has made the wheat and gold appear to proper advantage. Good Saints there.

Returning to Knobnoster, we assisted the "choral" for a few evenings and occupied the pulpit also. The first ten days of February I was at Coldwater, Michigan, on a business proposition, plus the occupancy of the pulpit and directing a musicale. Forget not that we have some rare voices at that place.

February 13 I was again in the harness at Knobnoster, lifting up the "ensign" with Bible and baton. Attending one or two sessions of conference at Holden Stake, February 25 to 27, we directed the musical activities of the Knobnoster Choral Association, and preached at eleven for the "old folk at home"—beautiful Saints' Home. Brother and Sister Self and Brother I. M. Smith aided us, and the Knobnoster singers came out and "rushed" the volume of song. I enjoyed the occasion; was amused to see the "nodding" assent and to hear them cry out, "Come again." These old folks were contented and happy. They said so. May the benedictions of heaven come to them in their old age and infirm conditions.

The conference was largely attended, every department of church work being encouragingly represented and vigorously executed. Do not understand that we are all perfect in all things. The Lord can only inaugurate the ecclesiastical features of his work until the "set time" to favor the industrial development has come to Zion. Observation shows that Satan is more active and powerful in the stakes to overthrow the most important points in the latter-day work. In this high mount of vision, with an outlook upon all the world, stand some who, when the tempter approaches with the mammon of temporal wealth, saying, "All these will I give you if you will fall down and worship me," fail in the grace that conquers greed, and stand not with the Son of God. The passions, ambitions, jealousies, envies, individual, become national. The world's desolating war of midnight burning red, bursting shell, and saw-toothed bayonet originated in these passions. Far back do illegitimate ambitions deeply-rooted extend. Behind the veil of Christianity they conceal the soul of barbarism. At the foot of the Cross they summon the gods of cruelty and lust. They plot atrocities and brutalities within the temples of religion. But here I am moralizing. But as in the days of the Son of Man in old Judea, tradition, or something, prompts the highly temperatured to pray and "weep" for the other fellow instead of "yourselves and your children."

Back to Grandview, March 2, we entered upon another ten days' service, occupying the evenings with song service and public administrations of the word. Organized a choral association at that place with Elder C. V. Hopkins, president; Sister Edgerton, secretary-treasurer; Brother Danforth, director; Sister Danforth, pianist; Sisters Dyer and Hopkins, musical missionaries. Resolving ourselves into a "study class" from blackboard, we get into the elementaries each evening before preaching. Here, as at other points, interest and enthusiasm went bounding. Wednesday evening, March 9, Sister Johnson, stake chorister, came and for two evenings gave instructions and pictured the vision of a "stake musical organization"—the merging of locals into one musical kingdom. The services—prayer, sacrament, Sunday school, Religio, song service, preaching—all were uplifting.

I am to begin a series at Warrensburg Sunday, March 20. The Saints are very kind. I remember with emphasis Brother and Sister Goode, of Knobnoster, who kindly gave me a home and administered to my needs, as also Brother and Sister H. M. Taylor and Brother and Sister Hopkins. Blessings to ye all.
 Hopefully, S. W. L. SCOTT.

Holloway-Williams and Bruce Debate

The usual church propositions debated fourteen nights.

Our debate with representatives of the Church of Christ (Campbellites) materialized and is finished. I wish to say if I am any judge it was a clear-cut victory for truth, and I believe all the Saints and many others will coincide in this verdict.

At our reunion last August these people conceived the idea we were not representing the gospel properly, so they challenged us for debate. We told them we did not think there was a real demand for debate, but they thought it would be a great proselyting scheme (for them) and after lengthy negotiations we finally got them signed up on fair propositions for fourteen sessions. The first proposition was, "Joseph Smith was a prophet of God." The second was, "The Bible is a final and complete revelation of God's will to man." Then followed the usual church propositions; ours first and theirs last. The debate was held in the Christian church of Bellingham. G. W. Williams of Midvale, Idaho, was secured to represent the Church of Christ, and Brother Leonard G. Holloway our side. After the fifth night Mr. Williams became ill, and his moderator, John M. Bruce, of Vancouver, British Columbia, took it on to the finish. Mr. Bruce proved a better debater than Mr. Williams, but that is not saying much. Brother Holloway seemed ready for any emergency, and took them as they came, handling every situation fearlessly and in a way to command respect.

When on the Campbellite Church proposition we were given an adverse decision by the chairman which would have eliminated all history. An appeal was made to the house and the decision reversed. It is really remarkable how they claim the right when on our church proposition to lug into the debate any and everything, just so it is against us, especially the enemy's statements, but when it comes to their church and its modern origin it is decidedly unfair (?) to even make reference to their own creditable historians. It was the more remarkable that the right so to introduce their own histories was questioned when one of the rules to govern the debate read, "The Bible to be the standard of evidence; all other evidence to be received on its own merits." The weakness of the Campbellite cause was thus demonstrated and shows what subterfuges they will resort to in order to maintain their palsied theory of a Pentecostal origin, which they do not care to have contaminated by evidences on a modern origin. Brother Holloway shot that theory full of holes at long range, and when at close quarters it was literally blown up with the powder of their own guns (Campbellite histories).

One of the conundrums of modern times is why the Campbellites present in their histories a modern origin, and A. Campbell as their founder and leader, justifying a restoration of the primitive order; but in their debates with us they take a long run to Pentecost for their origin, with Alexander Campbell merely a respected member, and hardly that. When we refer to him as their founder and leader their kitten-like purr develops into a lion like roar of protest. Either their histories are wrong and their polemics are right or their polemics are wrong and their histories right. In other words, Who tells the truth, their histories or their polemics? To be consistent they should tie up their old leaky craft to one pier or the other. The situation puts one in mind of the story of the white man and the Indian that went hunting. A turkey and a buzzard were shot, and in dividing the game at night this was the proposition of the white man, "I'll take the turkey and you take the buzzard, or you take the turkey and I'll take the turkey." The Indian after scratching his head slowly remarked, "Indian never heard white man say me take turkey once."

There was much argument in this debate common to all debates with this people, which it is not necessary to repeat, as we know their beaten track so well, but there may be a few points worthy of note. The crux of this debate as in all others has rested largely on the question of continued revelation. This principle they fight bitterly, knowing if such is maintained not only their theory but their church goes down. The question of priesthood, too, is a fair and square issue, but with us such is dependent on a continued revelation for its restoration in latter days.

One amusing feature I might mention: Williams referred to Genesis 7:48 of the Inspired Translation where Enoch "stretched forth his arms, and his heart swelled wide as eternity, and his bowels yearned, and all eternity shook." This he took as an especial gem of Mormon inspiration, and classified it as the worst case of bowel trouble ever coming under his observation. With apologies, Brother Holloway came back with this from the King James translation: "My bowels boiled and rested not: the days of affliction prevented me. I went mourning without the sun: I stood up, and I cried in the congregation. I am a brother to dragons, and a companion to owls. My skin is black upon me, and my bones are burned with heat." (Job 30:27-30.) "Wherefore my bowels shall sound like a harp for Moab, and my inward parts for Kirharesh." (Isaiah 16:11.) "Out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." (John 7:38.) "I am poured out like water, and my bones are out of joint: my heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels." (Psalm 22:14.) Silence reigned on the bowel question from then on: It is startling how quickly they drop such matters when they see where figurative language leads them when taken literally. If such language was found only in modern revelation they would harp on it until the crack of doom.

Williams made an extended argument on the "last will and testament." "Was Christ in his right mind when he made that will?" "This will is perfect and cannot be broken." "If therefore perfect and complete there is no room for Joe Smith and his modern revelation." "Christ made his own will and Joe Smith could not furnish a new plan of salvation." This was met by showing this last will and testament of Christ included the principle of revelation, and it would not be a perfect will to-day if the channel of inspiration were closed. (1 Thessalonians 1:5.) Eliminate revelation, and the "will" is imperfect. The "will" anciently embraced the laying on of hands, and the "gift," "birth," and "baptism" of the Holy Spirit. What right have the Campbellites to claim the inheritance set forth in this "will" when they stubbornly refuse to comply with its provisions? Since they do not claim such, therefore they are not in possession of the perfect will and have no right to preach and administer its ordinances. They may have a part of the letter but none of the Spirit.

Of course they brought out 1 Corinthians 13:8-13 and Revelation 22:18, 19, as well as 2 Peter 1:3. They always do. These texts are their stock evidences, yet these texts always prove a boomerang to them. They imagine they have a walk-away when it comes to that, but if they are satisfied with the outcome of that particular argument we are. When they contend that "all things that pertain to life and godliness" had been given was merely the Bible, they make serious mistake. Really, what were some of the "all things" the ancients received? Priesthood, authority, revelation, spiritual gifts, a gospel of power (authority), Holy Ghost, much assurance, signs, and miracles were all included. If the "all things" was indeed the gospel, are we not entitled to the same gospel with all that it embraced?

The "truth" that was to spring out of the earth (Psalm 85) was Jesus Christ, they say. The angel of Revelation 14:6, 7, was merely figurative, like the "woman" of the twelfth chapter and the "horses" of the sixth chapter. His argument was, if it was a literal angel the angel would go around preaching personally to the world. His reasoning was shown to be faulty on this, for if the angel was not literal, then "heaven," "the gospel," "the earth," and "every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people" were also figurative. He was hardly counting on this turn of affairs, so he dropped it.

If God does not reveal himself to-day, why pray? This was asked and urged. He admitted he prayed, and he said he did not ask amiss, but he and his church were committed to the idea of not receiving anything, for if God answered it would destroy their pet theory of a full and complete revelation. It was shown if God would reveal to-day it would not be something altogether different to that of ancient times as was suggested. The illustration was used of a professor and his class in mathematics. The professor asks each pupil to pass to the blackboard and there demonstrate the various steps necessary to observe to arrive at a proper conclusion. They try, but not being familiar with the process or rules of the science, they fail, for they do not understand. The professor then illustrates the various steps and gets the proper result. What has he done? Has he added anything to the science of mathematics? Assuredly not. Well, what has he really done? The answer is, he has added on to the intelligence of his pupils. Richardson's life of Alexander Campbell was read where Mr. Campbell speaks of an act of Providence in saving his life from shipwreck while at sea. The question was asked, Was this a true circumstance where God was said to have revealed an event to the mind of Mr. Campbell before the actual event transpired? This circumstance was immediately branded as false in justification of the theory that God does not reveal. On this he finally admitted it was a premonition, but said premonition was not revelation. But Mr. Campbell calls it an act of Providence. In one speech he accidentally committed himself and said, "Wish we had another Pentecost." What inconsistency, to wish and pray for a cause and deny the possibility of such an effect! With them the apostles were the only ones to confer miraculous powers, but it was shown Ananias, who no doubt received it from the apostles, conferred such on Saul (Acts 9:17), then Saul or Paul later conferred it upon Timothy (2 Timothy 1:6). Let's see; the apostles were first, Ananias the second, Paul the third, and Timothy the fourth this side of the apostles. Then the fact stares them in the face, the "elders" of the church were vested with such powers under God (James 5:14), and even to all "them that believe" the apostles' words (Mark 16:17) the signs were to follow.

It was claimed there was no complete apostasy of the primitive church. In this it was shown his own books taught otherwise. If there was no apostasy, he was urged to show how he claimed the church, by succession, reformation, or restoration. A veiled intimation that it came through Huss, Luther, and others was made, and from Revelation 12:17 he conveyed the idea there was a "remnant," but when A. Campbell's respects to Luther and other reformers were read they were not flattering, and even the "remnant" was "overcome" (Revelation 13:7), and "wear out the saints" (Daniel 7:21, 25), and "destroy the mighty and the holy people" (Daniel 8:24). He was urged to give further evidence and show identity, and how he connected up with Pentecost, but in this he failed, for such position was at variance with their own authorized books, for such claim an apostasy and a restoration. The "famine" of Amos 8:11, 12 was applied to that period between the Old and New Testament, in fact all the book of Amos was fulfilled before Christ, but when it was shown that a part was in fulfillment to-day (Amos 9:14), his attempted exegesis fell flat and he let it rest there.

It was claimed "priesthood" belonged to the regime of Moses and his type law, and when that law was done away it took the priesthood with it. He based this conclusion on Hebrews 7:14, "the priesthood being changed," but a change does not imply a relegation of priesthood. There was a change of the law, but did Christ do away with all law because there was a change? Well, hardly. Job awaited the time when his "change" came (Job 14:14), but this did not carry with it the idea of an annihilation because he was to be changed. Bruce fumbled on high priests and urged it applied to the law of Moses, but Hebrews 3: 1 and 5: 1 confronted him. His contention that Christ was the only high priest under the gospel was not well founded, for one man cannot fill an "order," and the "order of Melchisedec" existed. He argued because the definite article "the" was used in Hebrews 3: 1 as applying to Christ, the high priest, there could be only the one, but it was read, "consider the apostle and high priest of our profession, Christ Jesus." The "the" here referred to applies to "apostles" as well as high priests, and it would be foolish to affirm Christ was the only apostle because of this. But, he argued, "for if he were on earth, he should not be a priest" (Hebrews 8: 4), therefore he did not assume his great office of high priest until after his ascension, but this is evidently an error, for "Christ being come an high priest" (Hebrews 9: 11), so evidently Christ was a high priest while here.

He took the position that the ten-toe kingdoms of Daniel 2: 44 were the Roman kings and not those of latter days. He had trouble on this, I assure you. He waxed eloquent when he asked for just one proof text where prayer for the Holy Spirit was expressed. He was gratified with Acts 8: 15.

In showing how the first baptizing was performed in the movement started by the Campbells, a chart was displayed by Brother Holloway based on the event as described in their histories where Thomas Campbell has the candidates wade into the water to the depth of their necks while he climbs out on an overhanging root and dips their heads under. Bruce dubbed this a moving picture show, but he was informed it represented facts of their own history and he should always remember it. He made one statement I verily believe was true, that ninety-five per cent of their people had never read the works of Alexander Campbell. This evidently is a fact, for the ignorance they display in such things is amazing.

The debate was not very largely attended, the audiences ranging all the way from 100 to 175. It was evidently a fact the pastors of the other churches warned their members to stay away. As the debate progressed even many of the Church of Christ decided it was more healthy for them to stay away, for some nights there were not over a dozen present. We had a good representation of our people throughout, and they all seemed to enjoy it greatly. There were quite a number of the Brighamites in attendance and they evidently appreciated it, too. A few Adventists and some of the Christian Church were in evidence. There is no question but the debate has done good to the limited number that heard it, and we will see from this victory that more consideration and respect will be shown us. I am confident our Campbellite friends will think twice before they again go into a public discussion to build up their tottering church. We are in no way discouraged over the results, and we give God due praise and thanksgiving for his wonderful blessing. To him be all the glory.

Hopefully, your brother in the conflict,

S. S. SMITH.

Curtis-Arceneaux Debate

A twelve-night debate with a Disciple representative at Flint, Michigan.

The twelve-night debate between Elder J. F. Curtis and J. E. Arceneaux, of Texas, representing the Church of Christ (Disciples) drew to a close on Friday evening. A great deal of interest was manifested, the attendance ranging from 700 to 1,200 every evening. Mr. Arceneaux spent considerable time trying to show the supposed inconsistencies of the three standard books. He ridiculed the idea that the prophecy of the Rebellion has been partly and is being fulfilled. He asked Brother Curtis to prove that an angel appeared to Joseph Smith and was in turn asked to prove that an angel appeared to Moses.

Mr. Arceneaux said that faith, repentance, and baptism in water are all that is necessary to salvation, because Paul said about 63 A. D., "One Lord, one faith, one baptism," but admits that previous to that time there were two baptisms.

A rather amusing incident occurred when Mr. Arceneaux said that the Utah church was to be complimented in that they did not publish the Inspired Translation of the Bible, to which Elder Curtis replied that they did not publish it because we have the copyright, but that in three years' missionary work in Utah he had seen it both used and sold. The next evening Mr. Arceneaux produced a telegram signed by H. J. Grant saying, "We neither indorse nor sell the purported Inspired Translation."

The next evening Elder Curtis showed a telegram from the Herald Publishing House showing that as recently as January of this year the Deseret News Publishing Co. purchased a number of copies of the Inspired Translation.

Mr. Arceneaux also attacked the Book of Mormon, putting a strained interpretation on Jacob 2: 39, saying that it left a loophole for polygamy. Using D. H. Bays' work and affidavits of several people he tried to prove that Joseph Smith was in polygamy. Elder Curtis upset this argument by giving the testimony of Joseph F. Smith as contained in the court records that polygamy is emphatically forbidden by the Book of Mormon, and also showed that the affidavits were sworn to before the private secretary of Brigham Young, as the notary was himself a polygamist.

Mr. Arceneaux read some extracts from a book by Shook to the effect that a century ago archaeologists believed that the Indians were of the ten lost tribes of Israel, but left the impression that modern archaeology saw no connection between the Jew and the Indian.

Elder Curtis showed that the Book of Mormon had nothing to do with the ten lost tribes; then taking the same book showed that the writer, Shook, was a Disciple minister and by reading more extracts from it proved that modern archaeology is in exact accord with the Book of Mormon.

A hotly contested point was whether Christ and the gospel were known to the people of the Old Testament. Elder Curtis proved that it is the gospel of Christ that saves in all ages of the world. Speaking of Alexander Campbell, the founder of the Disciple Church, Brother Curtis read extracts from their own works, showing that he preached, then he was licensed to preach, then ordained to preach, and then baptized.

Towards the close of the debate the discussion had centered around three questions, authority of the priesthood, whether or not there was the church or kingdom before Pentecost, and whether or not Christ was a high priest before the resurrection. On the first of these three questions Mr. Arceneaux insisted that if the Devil went out preaching the gospel and made a convert and baptized him he would be just as much a Christian as though he were converted by one of the apostles.

Taking it all together it was a great victory for the church, and it is expected that during the coming week when Brother Curtis will preach many who showed an interest in the work will be added to the fold.

Ever praying for the cause and that truth may prevail,

Valedictory Note From A. W. Smith

"My heart is with you; my prayers shall be for you."

Dear Coworkers: At the last executive meeting of the General Sunday school officers we placed the Christmas offering in charge of the Bishop. As a result Brother McGuire's office will assume immediate charge of this work.

You will, I am sure, be interested to know just what the schools have accomplished during the past four years. During 1917, 1918, and 1919 the Sunday school turned over to the church a total of $266,539.63. We do not know just what the total for 1920 will be, but thus far a total of $70,335.96 has been received. This makes a grand total of $336,875.59. The church debt was paid and many thousands of dollars have made possible the purchase of lands in Zion.

I feel that you have done a wonderful work, that you have proven your willingness to do things in a big way. I know God has been pleased with your efforts and that he has poured out his blessings upon those who have so willingly and so earnestly devoted themselves to this, his work. The good that has been accomplished has not been and is not limited to the monetary assistance alone, but has increased our social standing and helped us to understand our work better and has enthused us with a desire to do our part in this great work of the Master.

Your liberal and sincere response gave me much encouragement and enthused me in my feeble efforts. You made my work a real pleasure, and now as I turn over the reins to more capable hands I sincerely hope and pray that you will continue to support the work and encourage it with all the enthusiasm at your command. My heart is with you; my prayers shall be for you.

May God bless you for the splendid support and cooperation given during the past four years. I thank you for it—I truly appreciate it.

Most sincerely yours,
A. W. SMITH.

Total 1920 Christmas Offering

The 1920 Christmas offering totals $86,273.40. This is a fine showing. We are indeed elated with the gift you have made in commemoration of the Nineteen Hundred and Twentieth birthday of the King of kings.

"When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. And when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary, his mother, and fell down, and worshiped him; and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh."—Matthew 2: 10, 11.

It is indeed fitting that we should perpetuate this ancient custom of tribute to our Lord.

It has meant a sacrifice for many. I am sure you are willing to make more of these because he first loved us and gave his life for us.

"He who gives that which does not call for any sacrifice has made no gift."

May your star shine along the 1921 Christmas offering way and give many "exceeding great joy," is the wish of—

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

The Student Organization at Ames

A group of twenty-four Latter Day Saint students meet regularly twice a week to discuss common problems.

The twenty-four Latter Day Saint students attending Iowa State College at Ames, Iowa, have organized and meet every Sunday morning at 9.30 in Alumni Hall. A constructive study of the first principles and church organization has been taken up. The study class is led by Sister Jessie Morant of Lamoni, who took special work at Graceland College and is now making a special study of sociology. Sunday evenings are devoted to the study of Zion's establishment; the class is conducted in seminar form, and the recent articles in the HERALD are used as guides.

Brother Willard Hield, a senior in agricultural education, was recently ordained to the office of elder by recommendation of the First Presidency. Brother Hield completed the junior college work at Graceland before coming to Ames and is especially fitted to take care of the spiritual side of the work.

Sacrament services are held once a month, and usually some of the priesthood from Des Moines or Boone are present to lead or assist.

The college calendar is so complete that it has been hard to find a time during the week on which to hold social gatherings. However two very pleasant evenings have been spent, one at the home of Sister C. A. Weeks and the other with Brother and Sister D. M. Hall.

Every year there are more and more young Latter Day Saints coming to Iowa State College; for instance, in 1915 it is reported that there were only four; now there are twenty-four. From the present organization as a class it is hoped that some definite plan will evolve that will be practical and will give the foundation scheme for other organizations in schools of higher learning where our young people go. In a student body of four to eight thousand, or many times more, it is very easy to be swallowed up and rush along with the tide. You may have friends among the students and unless you take the same class work or live in the same house it is doubtful whether you will see them once a week and then only as you are hurrying to or from a class. To cope with this condition we need some place where our young people can meet at their convenience and talk over school problems and, still more important, where they will come in contact with the other young Saints and church literature. It certainly is inspiring to know that most of our students have a vision of Zion and are following courses of study not only to develop their own personal ambitions but tending toward service to others.

At its best, college life at large institutions is none to religious. But many parents make the mistake of magnifying the evils of university life and hesitate to send their children away to school. Sherwood Eddy, world leader of student religious life, says that only one of every nine college graduates changes his moral life after graduation. If this be true, which we have every reason to believe, it is imperative that our young people be grounded and established in the faith before they finish their education, and still more desirable that this be their preparation before coming up to college, so that while in study they may get a vision of the future and yearn for a home in Zion where they may be of service to their brothers.

N. RAY CARMICHAEL.

This Brother Likes the Herald

And he prefers to commend its contributors now while he may encourage them to do even better.

It has been stated that it is not good policy to leave off the flowers too long. We are reasonably sure of them when we die, but a few occasionally while we are living are very acceptable, especially at this time of the year, when real flowers are scarce. Artificial ones may be obtained any time—they are like the praises of men.

The HERALD of March 9 contained what I consider some real talk. In fact it was all good, the writings of those contributing showing the deliberations of mature minds. "Education," by A. H. Parsons, is to the bit. "The carpenter and college graduate" hits the right spot to those whose tendency is to overemphasize the need of education, and who have not had the joy of fashioning anything with their own hands. I have a neighbor, a professor in our collegiate department, a very devout Presbyterian, who continually rants about the great advantages to be derived from a university education, but who forgets the very necessary part of being able also to labor with the hands to produce something which shall stand in remembrance after our thinking apparatus is stilled forever. I shall give him the HERALD to read.

"The value of the social survey," by Hale W. Smith, is what we need, and we should have more of it. Where he speaks of storehouses in rural districts, that is something we need, and badly. Only last fall many of our well-to-do farmer Saints had an overabundance of potatoes for which they could obtain only 80 cents to $1 per bag if selling to the buyers; yet we Saints in the city were paying $2 to $2.50 for what we got. Apples could not be obtained except at unheard-of prices, while many of our farmer Saints had them going to waste, no means of disposing of them.

I would like to be near enough to pat H. W. Savage and Max Carmichael on the back for their excellent articles. More power to them; may their tribe increase. Carmichael's article is just what is needed. Let us have some more of them. We have undertaken to do some instructing upon the temporal law, including an explanation of the law of tithing, offering, consecration, stewardships, inheritances.

The pastor preaches one Sunday night upon a subject chosen by himself. I occupy the following Sunday. Our time is forty minutes. So we have to do some condensing.

Elder W. A. Smith of Independence has been a-preaching (as he puts it) here for some time. Has baptized some seven or eight, among them being a little colored girl who was in our home as maid for over two years. She is the first of her people to obey the gospel, and it takes courage to make the start. It brought to our mind what our late father told us when Maggie Campbell (now Macgregor) obeyed the gospel in Proton Branch, she being the first fruits there, the second eldest branch in the Owen Sound District. It took some courage for her, a slip of a girl, to face the jeers and taunts of the world and her own people, and step out to obey this new religion as it was called. But what a power for good she has been! Without her would (wee Macgregor) Muckle Dan be the mighty man that he is? We scarcely think so. But they are all links in the great chain. The maid who is in our home now, and who has been with us over two years, also quietly packed up her clothes and requested our good wife to go with her. She wanted to be baptized. So if we have not been able by our preaching to convert any, probably our home life has had an effect for good.

Elder Smith is a fine man, much beloved by the Saints.

Now we shall close. Kind regards to Brother E. D. Moore; also our good Brother Sam Burgess. We value them for their advice and counsel of the past, which has been of inestimable worth unto us. Also for their association (on paper). We trust that in the near future when ye editorial staff are comfortably settled in your new abode, we may be able to walk into ye editors' sanctum and cry aloud, Hoo are ye, mon? We're a' Scotch thegither. Even if it is the 17th of Ireland.

Sincerely your brother,

OWEN SOUND, ONTARIO.

Agricultural Notes

Compiled by C. E. Irwin

President J. R. Howard, in his address at the annual meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation, said: "The heart of America is the farm home where you and I live. If we are to build up agriculture as we hope to do, we must give our first thought to our farm life and our farm homes." Accordingly the federation went on record as favoring the plan to extend the benefits of the organization to the women who preside over those homes, and to invite participation in its councils. Mrs. Sewall of Indiana said: "Let's do away with stag parties and smokers for men, and pink teas and gossip for women, and all gather under one roof in equal partnership to work out our common problems."

Still another evidence that the farmers of Iowa can work best when they work together, lies in the fact that, starting in 1919 with one spraying ring, the number has increased till now more than 137 cooperative orchard-spraying rings are operating in the State with a membership ranging from three to fifteen farmers.

Twenty-eight of the forty-eight States have created by legislative act or executive authority, state marketing agencies. Several of the remaining States are considering the adoption of similar plans. The general practice is to establish a division of bureau of markets.

The new annual white sweet clover recently discovered by Professor Hughes of Iowa State College has been given the name of "Hubam." More than 45,000 seed samples of this plant were distributed during 1920, and from the tests which have been made it seems that the new plant will find immediate acceptance.

An interesting report of a cost of production survey made by the farm management department of Iowa State College has been published in part. The figures are for Story and Jones Counties, and the study was confined to an attempt to determine the cost of producing corn. In Story County the net cost per bushel ranged from 75 cents to $1.19, the average being 91 cents, while in Jones County the cost ranged from 60 cents to $1.56, the average being 86 cents. This wide variation suggests at least one thing, and that is that costs can be reduced. When neighbors growing corn find that one can produce it at 60 cents and the other has more than double this expenditure per bushel, there should be ample evidence of the necessity for head work.

The following publications were issued by the United States Department of Agriculture during the week ended March 5, 1921:

The Farm Kitchen as a Workshop. Farmers' Bulletin 607.
Roses for the Home. Farmers' Bulletin 750 (revised edition).

Goose Raising. Farmers' Bulletin 767.

Hog Cholera. Farmers' Bulletin 834.

New Branch at Duluth

A new branch with forty-one charter members, and two thriving Sunday schools.

An enjoyable time was had by the Minnesota Saints at the district conference held at Duluth Saturday and Sunday, March 5 and 6. In addition to the usual routine business incidental to such occasions was the added pleasure of organizing the new Duluth Branch. Old resident members especially, who have struggled and prayed for the past twenty years, wept with joy when they counted forty-one charter members, nineteen of whom were recently baptized. They have two thriving Sunday schools, twenty-five blocks apart. Credit may be given Brother and Sister C. A. Kress, who, by the providence of God we believe, were mainly instrumental in accomplishing these desirable conditions, they having moved there from Frazee last November.

I assisted as opportunity permitted me occasionally to leave my regular work in the Twin Cities. We had a mild form of opposition from some of the other church ministers, but the Brighamites who are canvassing the city with four men caused us the most annoyance. We offered to furnish a man to divide the time with them. No response as yet.

The reunion of the Minnesota District will be held at Minneapolis, commencing June 18, 1921. We have decided to accept the offer of the church Health Department to have a physician and nurse present, believing it to be a step in the right direction. A new large tent is to be bought. The committee will make full announcements in the near future. We have many lovely camping sites surrounding this great northern city, and I hope the Saints will economize, leave out the frivolous amusements of the world, and both young and old come together and take part in that which will give real pleasure and leave no sting behind.

Editors Herald: We can see daily our little branch of about one hundred members growing more in the knowledge of our Lord and Master. Greater unity is prevailing at each gathering, and God's hands are still laden with blessing, and we as a branch in his vineyard surely are receiving the blessings that come from him.

We will celebrate our second anniversary Easter Sunday with a program. The Saints that have been with this branch since its organization surely can say that it has been two years of rejoicing, even though at times the clouds hung low and many could not see the silver lining, but every time God has seen fit to lift the cloud and bestow us with such blessings that it seemed as though we could not hold them.

On March 13 we had gathered together in fasting and prayer for those of our number that were sick; and also the sick in general, and with the conditions of our branch in mind. We were told in the gift of tongues delivered through our branch president that the Saints were acceptable in his sight, and that our sick were in his hands, and to leave them with him. Three brethren were also spoken to in regard to their work. Long will the memories of this meeting remain.

So we are indeed rejoicing in the great restored gospel, with its gifts and blessings, and in our little band of young people that God in his mercy has with his loving arm drawn from the allurements of the world, that we might learn of his love. We are looking forward to the time when Muskegon will send forth sowers for the Master, to gather the harvest into the fold.

Missouri as a Market Place

The Missouri River was the great highway to the West, and especially the Northwest, during the 19th century. Its union with the Mississippi takes place in this State. The Mississippi River flows along the eastern boundary of the State, which fact is very significant for commerce. This resulted at an early date in making Saint Louis the greatest market for raw furs in the world, which it still continues to be. At first the furs were only those of the American Northwest. Now furs come from all over the world, from Canada and Siberia, to this market.

There are packing houses at both ends of the State, at Kansas City, Kansas, and at East Saint Louis, as well as Kansas City. Saint Louis is one of the largest boot- and shoe-manufacturing centers in the country if not the largest. There are various factories for clothing and cotton mills. Both Kansas City and Saint Louis are readily accessible to the cotton belt, and a great deal of cotton passes through, making it possible for the establishment of cotton mills in the State, as being more accessible to the original sources than is the East. It possesses water transportation in the rivers, as well as railroad transportation to the South.

Athletics in Des Moines

The following radiogram was received from Elder A. E. Warr, of Des Moines, Iowa: "The Young Men's Athletic Club had a get-together meeting Monday night, March 6. Between 35 and 40 were in attendance. The baseball team which is to represent the Sunday school in the city Sunday School League, under direction of the Y. M. C. A., was re-organized. Frank Mussell was reelected business manager, and much enthusiasm was manifested. Steps are now being taken looking toward the erection of a gymnasium for the branch. This is a very great need."

Workers Manage an Iron Works

The Crescent Iron Works in Norfolk, Virginia, last fall was threatened with a strike, and also with a maturing mortgage that could not be conveniently met. The International Association of Machinists, having enough money in its treasury, bought the mortgage, took over the plant, turned it into a closed shop, and put the men on a three days' schedule, admitting many extra men who had been without work.

The immediate results were highly profitable, for instead of paying out money for strike benefits, it was put into real property, and the men secured everything that they were demanding. It is hoped that the experiment may prove a success, though naturally that will depend upon the ability of administration that the machinists can produce or hire.

Eugene Debs was called to Washington recently, leaving the penitentiary without guards. He proceeded to Washington where he had a conference with Attorney General Daugherty, and returned again unattended to the penitentiary. There is an investigation being made in his case on behalf of the United States, looking to his parole.

LAMONI STAKE MAGAZINE NUMBER

OUR AIM

By John F. Garver, President Lamoni Stake

"By their fruits ye shall know them."

We have perhaps all heard now and then of late years in the church, particularly in the work of our auxiliaries, now known as our departments, in one form or another, the slogan, "Have an aim." And we have heard not infrequently its more ambitious adaptation, "Aim high."

This is all very well, and as it should be. And we need furthermore the vision properly to evaluate the things of this world, and the persistence to hold to the course we set for ourselves; for we must have not only the perspective to determine the highest aim possible, but also the staying qualities to leave off the superficial that we may with undivided ambition, and if need be without applause, labor for the achievement of the greatest good to the greatest number.

The criticism was heard here some months ago, "Lamoni has no aim." This observation came from what we call a "newcomer"—a man unacquainted with the ways of Lamoni Stake and her people, one mistaking an unpretentious manner for a lack of vision, a modest appearance for a lack of ambition.

Lamoni has an aim—the most potent, the most vital to the cause entrusted to us, and on the achievement of which awaits every institution, every activity, temporal and spiritual, with which the church has to do. This aim is not only certain, it is high. And, thanks be to God, though in their explosion Lamoni's guns may have been muffled, they have nevertheless been hitting the bull's eye, plumb center, and often.

The Aim

Some years ago at a meeting of farmers in a rural community hard by Lamoni Town, a double-fisted old clodhopper, the father of a dozen, more or less, up-standing, clean-limbed young men, and stalwart, was demonstrating before a farmer's institute an effectual method for the harvesting of hay. Observing that the method required a considerable man power, a neighbor, a father of few, and in the farming industry a stand-patter, spoke up sneeringly to ask, "But where do you get the men to mount all that fool machinery?"

With the tolerance born of a superior vision and greater works, the demonstrator replied, emphatically, "Why, I raise 'em!"

Now it is just so in all the world: Whatever the machinery, whatever the task, whatever the importance of the trust imposed, all things else remain, if not inoperative, then inadequately operated until there appear the men to man them to fullest and to most effectual capacity.

As in the world, so also in the church. Our every department, our every institution, our every aspiration, our every assignment as by Deity imposed, must needs await, and, if we may be so pointedly frank, does actually await, and this very day awaits man power: man-sized man power, raised to the highest possible point of efficiency, and devoted to the last ounce of its energy to the cause it is our honor as a people to bear in all the world.

And since we need men, what higher aim may a community have than this—to develop men for the various callings and institutions of the church! In the face of this great need comes now Lamoni for this once out of the seclusion of her modesty to observe that she has not only caught the vision, for she is actually making good in the producing of men.

The Fruits

It has been fittingly said that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. As expressed by the greatest of all teachers, the same truth is more profoundly set forth in the simple, yet impressive language, "By their fruits ye shall know them." It is to this test of tests we unhesitatingly subject ourselves in the observation that though aspiring to the highest of the high, to the making of men, Lamoni is hitting the mark.

It might be in poor taste for us to point to particular men who are clearly products of Lamoni: or to men aided at Lamoni in their work of preparation. We may, however, permit another to speak for us. We venture then, with his permission, to quote from a letter of Elder J. A. Gardner, Independence, Missouri, referring to the late young people's services of that place, and indirectly citing the very results we have herein presumed to discuss. Should the reader be interested further in the matter of particulars, he may turn to the roster, appearing elsewhere in this issue, under the caption, "Who's who in Lamoni Stake," and to the goodly number of men not named therein who are likewise serving the church, and who may be referred to as Lamoni men. In his letter Elder Gardner says:

"I feel that Lamoni has given us much. Brother H. C. Burgess and Brother D. T. Williams are both Lamoni men. Brother R. V. Hopkins and Brother Elbert A. Smith, who are directly in charge of our services, are both Lamoni men. Many of the young people who have taken prominent parts and have given largely of their time and personal service are Lamoni people, and Graceland College students. Brother Richard J. Lambert, chairman of the publicity committee, and teacher of one of our large classes, is a Lamoni man. We are happy to express our appreciation for what Lamoni has done for Independence."

Many other communities might bear like witness to the realization of Lamoni's aim in the development of men. In various church institutions they are found, and under various callings. And in Lamoni Stake they abound, so that with hardly an exception we after supplying others find yet the men to man our own local cause.

We have said Lamoni is hitting the mark; for we are not content to rest on the laurels of yesterday. Yea, we

President F. M. Smith Reaches Jerusalem

"I am beginning to experience the grip with which Jerusalem holds all who become familiar with its aspects."

T. W. Williams and I reached Jerusalem last Friday, February 25, coming from Cairo. Brother Passman met us at the train and took us at once to the house. Brother and Sister Passman were very glad to see us, as you can imagine. They have not had an easy time of it, and have long been looking forward to our visit. I feel sure they will be much heartened by our visit.

Saturday was a bright pleasant day, though snow still lay upon the ground. Brother Passman, Brother Williams, and I went into the Old City, passing through Damascus Gate. We made a hasty visit to the temple area, then out Saint Stephens Gate, down across the valley of the Brook Kedron, past the Garden of Gethsemane, up the Mount of Olives, thence north across the Mount, over Mount Scopus, and back to the house again. It was a hasty trip, made largely for the purpose of orientation, for we expect to visit all those places again more leisurely. But the trip was full of interest to us, and not entirely devoid of emotion, for who can pass over those grounds, and from the Mount of Olives see Jerusalem spread out before him on the west, and see the Dead Sea and the River Jordan to the east, and not experience some emotion at finding himself on ground so intimately associated with history of such deep interest to Christian believers?

To-day we took another trip for orientation purpose. Going up Jaffa Road to Jaffa Gate, we began a "walk around" Old Jerusalem. We followed the wall around the whole of the Old City, noting only hastily the various points of interest for future closer observation and study. It took us only about two hours or a little more to make the trip and return to the house—about four miles. But it was four miles full of interest.

My first impressions of Jerusalem were somewhat disappointing. Perhaps I too early saw the filth and dirt which abound within the Old City, and the somber reality of modern Jerusalem clashed a bit with the ideals I had formed from reading and thinking. Often have I in the past when reading of the events which happened in and around Jerusalem, and descriptions of things there, felt my mind reaching for an imagination which would do justice to this city which occupies a place so unique in the world of religion and philosophy, to say nothing of history; and from pictures and descriptions I had formed ideas so generally correct that I find a degree of familiarity in many of the views I behold here; yet the first trip into the city brought me the disappointment I spoke of. But to-day I am beginning to experience the grip with which Jerusalem holds all who become familiar with its aspects. I am looking forward with keen anticipation to learning more of its points of interest.

Sunday was an interesting day to us, in observing the methods according to which Brother Passman conducts his services. At 10.30 a. m. a meeting is held in which he preaches in German. Following this an hour or so is spent in studying chapters in the Bible, one class being conducted in German, the other in English. At 7.30 another meeting is held. After the formal opening, a Hebrew translation of the sermon is read by a young man, then Brother Passman preaches the sermon in English. This German outline from which the Hebrew is translated and from which Brother Passman speaks, is written early in the week so the young man can have time to translate into Hebrew. The young man, Herman Rauch, a University of Leipsig man, does not speak English, so when Brother Passman has his sermon written, he next day reads it to the young man in German, who writes it in German, after they have discussed it till he understands it thoroughly. Then from this German translation the Hebrew is made.

Next Sunday night Brother Williams will be the speaker; so yesterday Brother Williams had a unique experience in sermon writing, while I went shopping with Brother Passman. To-day Brother Passman and Brother Rauch are wrestling with the German translation of Brother Williams's sermon, and to-morrow Brother Rauch will set it over into Hebrew. Some task, but efficient work.

By the way, I quite enjoyed the shopping trip yesterday. We went through the main streets, David Street and Christian Street, and went at one time into the Jewish quarter to shop. It was interesting to see Brother Passman and the "boys" "Jew" the Jews. The boys were Herman Rauch (above referred to), a German, and Alex Klein, an Austrian. They carried the baskets and helped make the bargains, as one talked Arabic and both German, and one Hebrew. Every article purchased had to be "dickered" for and the price fixed. In almost every instance it was less than that first asked, and usually more than that first offered.

It was an interesting experience for me, a mere onlooker. I shall not describe the sights of that trip, for they defy description, nor shall I attempt to give you even the faintest idea of the varied odors one encounters. Varied is right. But one doesn't have much time either to enjoy or otherwise the odors, for in the narrow streets the pressing throng keeps one busy dodging. It is some trick to steer a clear course between some anything but appetite-tempting messes of cooked foods at the side of the street displayed for sale and the busy and sure-footed and heavily loaded pack burros wiggling and jostling their way through the streets. "Rubbing elbows" is quite real in these narrow streets.

Well, more anon.

It has rained most of the time since we came. Snow is about gone, but visible on the surrounding hills.

Yours, FREDERICK M. SMITH.

[EDITORS' NOTE: The second letter from President Smith written from Palestine, will appear next week.]

The Young People Are Aroused

Already we learn of special services being arranged for young people's services at various points, definite plans being made and dates set at the following places:

Toronto, April 10 to 17, with Daniel T. Williams speaker.

Des Moines, April 24 to May 1.

Council Bluffs, May 8 to 15.

Hiteman, Iowa (in Lamoni Stake), April 10 to 17.

Almost any community with sufficient of the spirit of the latter-day work, and who will prayerfully and energetically plan and work for them, can make a success of these meetings. But as has so often been remarked by those who have had to do with such meetings, it requires much preparation and working out of details, so the meetings will be a climax from the beginning, rather than to develop the interest almost exclusively after the opening service.

Stake Organization

By S. A. Burgess

A resume of the development of the stake ideal in the church.

The earliest reference that we find to a stake organization is given in the revelation of May, 1833, section 91, providing for a stake of Zion at Kirtland, though this declares that "it be done according to the pattern which I have given unto you." This would seem to intimate an earlier revelation of the plan or pattern. And it is true that early in 1831, in section 68: 4, the stakes of Zion are referred to.

While turning again to section 91 we find for the first time, so far as we have been able to discover, a definite plan for the laying out and building of a stake of Zion. And in this instance the revelation specifies in regard to several of the lots the use to which they are to be put. In June, 1833, (section 93: 1) there is given a brief revelation to Enoch, giving some further light upon its organization and general plan. We also find Joseph Smith setting forth as the definite plan for the upbuilding of Zion the following:

A Plan for Building Zion

"This plat contains one mile square, all the squares of the plat contain ten acres each, being forty rods square. You will observe that the lots are laid off alternately in the squares; in one square running from the south and north to the line through the center of the square; and in the next, the lots run from the east and west to the center line. Each lot is four perches in front; and twenty back, making one half of an acre in each lot, so that no one street will be built on, entirely through the street; but one square the houses will stand on one street, and on the next one another, except the middle range of squares, which runs north and south, in which range are the painted squares.

"The lots are laid off in these squares north and south, all of them; because these squares are forty perches by sixty, being twenty perches longer than the other, their greatest length being east and west, and by running all these squares, north and south, it makes all the lots in the city of one size.

"The painted squares in the middle are for public buildings. The one without any figures is for storehouses for the bishop, and to be devoted to his use. Figure first is for temples for the use of the Presidency; the circles inside of the square are the places for the temples. You will see it contains twelve figures, two are for the temples of the lesser priesthood. It is also to contain twelve temples. The whole plat is supposed to contain from fifteen to twenty thousand people; you will therefore see that it will require twenty-four buildings to supply them with houses of worship, schools, etc.; and none of these temples are to be smaller than the one of which we send you a draft. This temple is to be built in the square marked figure first; and to be built where the circle is, which has a cross on it; on the north and south of the plat where the line is drawn, is to be laid off for barns, stables, etc.; for the use of the city; so that no barns or stables will be in the city among the houses; the ground to be occupied by these must be laid off according to wisdom.

"On the north and south are to be laid off the farms for the agriculturists, and sufficient quantity of land to supply the whole plat; and if it cannot be laid off without going too great a distance from the city, there must also be some laid off on the east and west.

"When this square is thus laid off and supplied, lay off another in the same way, and so fill up the world in these last days; and let every man live in the city, for this is the city of Zion. All the streets are of one width, being eight perches wide. Also the space round the outer edge of the painted squares is to be eight perches between the temple and the street, on every side.

"No one lot, in this city, is to contain more than one house, and that to be built twenty-five feet back from the street, leaving a small yard in front, to be planted in a grove, according to the taste of the builder; the rest of the lot for gardens, etc.; all the houses to be built of brick and stones."—Times and Seasons, vol. 6, p. 786. Church History, vol. 1, p. 297, 298.

In December, 1833, we find:

Stakes or Curtains for Zion

"Zion shall not be moved out of her place, notwithstanding her children are scattered, they that remain and are pure in heart shall return and come to their inheritances; they and their children, with songs of everlasting joy; to build up the waste places of Zion. And all these things, that the prophets might be fulfilled. And, behold, there is none other place appointed than that which I have appointed, neither shall there be any other place appointed than that which I have appointed for the work of the gathering of my saints, until the day cometh when there is found no more room for them; and then I have other places which I will appoint unto them, and they shall be called stakes, for the curtains, or the strength of Zion."—Doctrine and Covenants 98: 4.

In section 104: 14 provision is made in the organization of the priesthood for a standing high council at the stakes of Zion.

In the meantime, in 1836, we find a reference to the stake organization and high council at Kirtland, and also to the twelve high councilors of Zion. (Church History, vol. 2, p. 24.) The same year Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon, of the First Presidency, were requested to locate other stakes for the gathering of the Saints. (Church History, vol. 2, p. 189.)

On June 28, 1838, a conference was held at Adam-oni-ahman for the purpose of organizing a stake. John Smith was chosen as president and Vinson Knight as bishop pro tem. (Ibid., p. 156.) We note in this instance that the organization was of "a presidency and high council, to preside over this stake of Zion, and attend to the affairs of the church in Daviess County." This record is of interest as it shows clearly the presidency of three, the high council of twelve high priests, and the provision for a stake bishop.

On October 5, 1839, a General Conference was held at Commerce, Illinois, at which the following business took place:

"The President then spoke at some length upon the situation of the church, the difficulties they had to contend with, and the manner in which they had been led to this place; and wished to know the views of the brethren, whether they wished to appoint this a stake or not, stating that he believed it to be a good place and suited for the Saints.

"It was then unanimously agreed upon that it should be appointed a stake and a place of gathering for the Saints. The following officers were then appointed; viz:

"William Marks to be president. Bishop Whitney to be bishop of Middle Ward. Bishop Partridge to be bishop of Upper Ward. Bishop Knight to be bishop of Lower Ward."—Church History, vol. 2, p. 371.

At the same time it appears that a stake was organized on the other side of the river in Iowa Territory with Elder John Smith as president and Alanson Ripley as bishop.

"In July, 1840, the presidency decided to organize a stake at Crooked Creek, Illinois, according to a request from a branch located there."—Ibid., p. 450.

While we have noted no distinct statement of an organization of stakes at these points, on December 4 and 5, 1841, a conference was held at Remus, at which time the organization of the stake at that place was discontinued. In January, the next year, at a conference held at Zarahemla the stake there was also discontinued.

This may have been covered by the action of the General Conference of October, 1840, at which time "Hyrum Smith, Lyman Wight, and Almon Babbitt were appointed a committee to organize stakes between Nauvoo and Kirtland, Ohio."—Ibid., p. 467.

During that month stakes were organized as follows: "Lima, Quincy, Mount Hope, in Adams County, and one at Freedom; and on November 1 they organized a stake in Morgan County, Illinois, called Geneva Stake."—Ibid., p. 468.

It is noteworthy in any event that with the exception of Kirtland the stakes appear to have been organized upon recommendation of the presidency or a committee appointed especially and upon the approval of the General Conference. Its importance is later emphasized by the provision in section 107:11. This provided that baptism for the dead can only be acceptable when performed in Zion and her stakes and in Jerusalem.

This understanding of the organization of stakes appears to have continued in the Reorganized Church in its early history, despite the smallness of their number. Thus in General Conference of April 6, 1853, a stake of Zion was appointed at Argyle, Wisconsin, to be known as the Zarahemla Stake, with William Cline as president. (Church History, vol. 3, p. 218.) Prior to that there existed no recognized stakes for the Reorganized Church. (Ibid., p. 210.) This appears, however, to have been the only stake organized and recognized by the Reorganized Church until 1901, for in 1873 the following revelation was given:

"It is not expedient in me that there shall be any stakes appointed until I command my people. When it shall be necessary I will command that they be established. Let my commandments to gather into the regions round about, and the counsel of the elders of my church guide in this matter until it shall be otherwise given of me."—Doctrine and Covenants 117:11.

Branches Were Small

When we consider the scattered condition of the Saints at that time and how limited was their number, this is by no means surprising. An examination of the Conference Minutes for 1873 seems to show only about four thousand members reported to the conference. This is not necessarily exhaustive for it is not presented by the recorder summarized as we have it now, but by the reports from districts to the conference, very much as at present branches report to a district conference. So it is not necessarily complete, but it appears very doubtful if there existed any branch with as many as two hundred and fifty members. The largest district possessed only five hundred and fifty-two members and that district reported twelve branches. This declares, and appears to have been quite true, it was not expedient at that time that stakes be organized.

The record so far as given in the Church History does not show a complete organization at Zarahemla, as only the presidency are given, not a stake bishop and high council. Independence has always been presented as the place of Zion. This revelation counsels gathering to this country and the regions round about.

In 1894, section 122:12, it is declared "that Lamoni, Iowa, having been made by the agreement of the church under the law of the land the principal place of business of the church, it is wise and expedient that it should be considered and declared by the conference to be the seat of the presidency of the church, and in due time be made a stake." This prepared the way for the revelation of 1901, section 125:10, at which time stakes at Independence and Lamoni were provided for.

And again is the pattern set forth, as found in the law, a presiding high priest with counselors, a high council, and a bishop with his counselors. These stakes were made coextensive with the whole Independence District and Decatur District. There appears in this to have been some change, as most of the earlier stakes, so far as we can ascertain from history, consisted of a large branch. However, in the case of Adam-ondi-ahman it appears to have taken jurisdiction over the surrounding territory of Daviess County, and we have to remember that in the thirties the counties were much larger than now, especially in the western part of Missouri.

The real principle of the stake is carried out in both instances, a large branch as a stronghold of Zion and this place being a social center to the surrounding territory. In 1916 the new Independence Stake was distinctively limited to one city, which in 1920 was designated as Zion; but there does not appear to be anything contrary to the ordinary concept in the joining to a strong central place of the contiguous territory as was the case with the earlier Independence Stake and still is the case with the Lamoni, Kansas City, Holden, and Far West Stakes. There occurs another slight change in the organization of the Far West Stake, and that is the stake does not take its name from the central branch, as is the case with all of the other stakes.

From this it would appear that three stakes have been provided for by direct revelation—Kirtland, Lamoni, and the early Independence Stake. In each instance the revelation was given at the beginning of stake organizations, and thereafter further stakes were organized at the direction of the First Presidency or special committee and of the General Conference.

The revelation of March 3, 1873, states what appears to be very clearly a fact: it was not then expedient for any stakes to be appointed; that when it was expedient God would command his people. He has commanded and we have acted in accordance with the commands. This could be interpreted in two ways: one, that no stakes should be organized except by separate revelation, though it is not so stated; second, that no stakes be appointed until the command is given. When it is necessary the command will be given and then stakes may be organized. That is, that when the command is given, the time has arrived for stake organizations, and we may proceed as wisdom may direct to organize other stakes. This is equally consistent, at least with the text, and follows the practice of the early church after Kirtland.

Educational Work in Lamoni

Lamoni has always ranked high in educational standards. It is a matter of particular pride to note that with the educational facilities throughout the State, Lamoni has an unusually well-equipped high school and general school building. It takes in part the place of a consolidated school, drawing from the neighborhood for many miles around. Educational standards are unusually high, and provision is made, through better salaries, to secure teachers of more than average ability, and at the same time to procure all the laboratory facilities needed or desirable. It is not surprising, therefore, to learn that Lamoni is ranked well up with larger cities of the State for its educational equipment and standards. Indeed it is said it is the only place of its size in Iowa to have a regular kindergarten department in its schools.

Lamoni Stake Sunday School

The enrollment of the Sunday schools in Lamoni Stake total about 1,738, with schools in the following places: Andover, Allendale, and Blythedale, Missouri; Bloomington, Centerville, Chariton, Creston, Davis City, Evergreen, Hiteman, Lamoni, Lone Rock, Lucas, Oland, Pleasanton, Thompson.

The official roster for 1921 is: Robert J. Wildey, superintendent; A. L. Keen, assistant superintendent; E. Dewey White, secretary; Edward Downey, treasurer; Nellie M. Prall member library board.

History of Lamoni Stake

By Vida E. Smith

(For many of the items of interest herein set forth the writer is indebted to the manuscript of the former stake historian, Duncan Campbell. He has furnished the general church historian with a remarkably clear, full, and pleasing arrangement of the history of the Decatur District, later the Lamoni Stake.—V. E. S.)

"My people are directed to establish two stakes: one at Independence, Missouri, one at Lamoni, Iowa, organizing them after the pattern which is found in the law; a presiding high priest with counselors, a high council, and a bishop and his counselors. These stakes shall be made to comprise the boundaries of the districts as they now stand, the center at the towns and places named; and the majority of the councils that should be chosen should be residents of the places named, in order that there may ever be a sufficient body to transact the business required."—Doctrine and Covenants, 125: 10.

When in 1846 and 1847 a stream of Saints poured from the city of Nauvoo, into the State of Iowa, it carried many heartsick with that latest phase of church life. The very fiber of church faith seemed torn to quivering shreds. By force of circumstances their tents were pitched in Iowa for the remainder of the winter. They lingered into the spring, and then to the gathering of the harvest, and by that time the deep-soiled prairies had thrown about many of those stout but sorely perplexed hearts the wizardry of its calm and the solace of its peace, and not less grateful given the promise of earthly comforts. From the Nishnabotna Valley in the west, which recognizes but one superior in soil test in all the world, and where some day a splendid stake will rise, to the banks of the mighty Father of Waters, the refugees scattered.

That broken march to the West left splendid treasure in Iowa; fit subjects for the sun to smile upon, and magnificent spirits for the citizenship of this conservative but gracious and hospitable State.

The valley of the Grand, spread rich and fertile, caught some from the net that was broken. In one corner of Decatur County there lies the dust of a little band, among them one of the council of the stake of Nauvoo. Near this quiet bit of Iowa soil many a soul lingered, building new altars to the God of their fathers, and the snows of winter lay far and white and for weeks unbroken. The soft tints of spring came with the snow's going, and soon the harvest with apron overflowing poured her bounties for them.

The years went by, until one day two travelers came knocking at the doors of old-time Saints in Decatur County. Over on the majestic bluffs of Grand River these two men stood under the sky of their King, and asked admission to the home of his refugees. One was tall and slight, impulsive and eager, and his dark eyes held the fire of a great desire: a modern Galahad recruiting for the search of a modern Holy Grail, Edmond C. Briggs. The other, not so tall, suave, serene, smiling his way into hearts even before his message fell in pleasant tones, William W. Blair. And they cried: "We bring you good tidings of great joy." And the people knew the sound of the message and opened their hearts and said, "We are with you to wait and to pray."

That was the beginning, the breaking of the soil for the foundation of the stake of Lamoni.

Lamoni Stake is not without her romance, nor her history, although unlike the older stakes, she has not the coloring of persecution and bloodshed and the "iron taste" of the oppressed and pursued. History for her is not rich in old prophecy nor thick with tear-wet stones of fallen homes. She has been the practical, the conservative, the deliberate. She may have lost some froward heads of golden grain because she whetted too particularly her ancient scythe. But she plowed her furrows straight, and she garnered the returns with thrift and dispensed with cheer and not profligacy.

From those men who came in 1859, the old spirit was set flaming in many hearts; and after them came others. You nor I can estimate the full meaning of the message these men carried to the hearts of the Saints. Branches were organized, Franklin and Little River among the first. Scarcely a decade had passed since the remnant spill from the west-bound caravansary before they were reporting to the church conference under the official name of the Decatur District of Iowa. That conference was held October 6 to 10, 1859, in the grain barn of Israel L. Rogers, near Sandwich, Illinois, and was one of the happiest of meetings with the most joyful prospects.

While the spirit of the gathering for Zion's weal thus worked among the waiting ones, it also found audience in the quiet little city of Nauvoo. There a young man lay on the bed of a convalescent, and his spirit was caught in a vortex of indecision. The soft air of late summer drifted into the open window, on its breath the odor of sweet earth things; far off the murmur of the Mississippi slipping over with musical cadence, the treacherous, beautiful falls. The young man wrote:

"I had slept and woke refreshed; my mind recurred to the question of my future life and what its work should be. I had been and was still reading law under the care of a lawyer named William McLennan. . . . While engaged in this contemplation and perplexed by these recurring questions, the room suddenly expanded and passed away. I saw stretched out before me towns, cities, busy marts, court-houses, courts and assemblies of men, all busy and all marked by those characteristics that are found in the world, where men win place and renown. This stayed before my vision till I had noted clearly that choice of perferment here was offered to him who would enter in, but who did so must go into the busy whirl and be submerged by its din, bustle, and confusion. In the subtle transition of a dream I was gazing over a wide expanse of country in a prairie land; no mountains were to be seen, but far as the eye could reach, hill and dale, hamlet and village, farm and farmhouse, pleasant cot and homelike place, everywhere betokening thrift, industry, and the pursuits of a happy peace, were open to the view. I remarked to him standing by me, but whose presence I had not before noticed, 'This must be the country of a happy people.'

"To this he replied, 'Which would you prefer, life, success, and renown among the busy scenes that you first saw; or a place among these people, without honor or renown? Think of it well, for the choice will be offered to you sooner or later, and you must be prepared to decide. Your decision once made you cannot recall it, and must abide the result.'

"No time was given me for a reply, for as suddenly as it had come, so suddenly was it gone, and I found myself sitting upright on the side of the bed where I had been lying. The rays of the declining sun shining athwart the western hills and over the shimmering river, making the afternoon all glorious with their splendor, shone into my room instinct with life and motion, filling me with gladness that I should live. From that hour, at leisure, at work or play, I kept before me what had been presented, and was at length prepared to answer when the opportunity for the choice should be given."—Autobiography of Joseph Smith, Church History, vol. 3, pp. 254, 255.

This was in 1853. Here then in this early day was the Lamoni Stake born of the Spirit and prophesied of. How do we know? Oh, Lamoni people love to tell of that time many years later when President Joseph Smith was asked, Have you ever seen the place shown you that day? Stepping to the upper window in the old Herald Office, with a gesture he indicated the country all about him and said, "There it is." But from that summer day in 1853 to the actual birth of the Lamoni Stake is a long story. The accretions to the Decatur District were swift and the quality the best. From Michigan and Illinois, Wisconsin, Texas, and California, "from many an ancient river" they came, in white-covered, slow-moving wagons, jogging along; and after the manner of men versed in Genesis they exclaimed, "It is good."

Schoolhouses were requisitioned wherein to "hold meetings." Each settler planted a grove on the windward side

Missouri; and here she lay alongside her queenly sister State waiting with deep rich soil and low taxes.

Then a movement was made that coordinated the forces of heart and pocketbook. An order was founded for the purchase of land to be sold to the home seekers on easy terms, and large tracts of the finest land in Decatur County were purchased and houses built for home seekers. This movement was not brought about by any occult or so-called special divine command. It was what these men deemed a wise thing, and in most cases it so proved. There were among of the little frame house—or log it may have been, but logs were not plentiful as these people settled more and more on the broken rolling prairies, farther and farther from the muddy local streams.

Then came a day when the young man "took his place," and the whole world for Latter Day Saints became a wonderful, rose-lined pocket of promises. Men's eyes turned Zionward, and I believe in most instances it was with all the good intention the word implies, for heart and hand were in tune with their fathers' hoped-for Zion. Committees were appointed and drove through Iowa, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska, seeking information for the benefit of those who could not go on such excursion.

Missouri, dear old Missouri! Like the Jews with faces turned towards the beloved city, the Saints strained their eyes for the wood-crowned heights and golden meadows of these early settlers and advisers men of long and devoted friendship in gospel bond. It was the moving of a good spirit that prompted the organization of the first "United Order of Enoch."

Iowa had been a haven for colonies: The Amana Society on the Iowa River; the Holland settlement at Pella; the Hungarians in the valley of the Grand, and others. And what more likely than when the Order of Enoch began buying up land near the Missouri line, and Saints began moving in, the old settlers should at once call the new settlement "The Colony." Thus it was known for many years.

The funds for investment were contributed from east and west, sometimes from people who had never seen an Iowa prairie spread in springtime splendor beneath an Iowa sky. Into the community came men known as celebrities in the Reorganization of the church. Here they planted their roof trees and invested their all with absolute faith in the future of the place.

In this territory known as Decatur District was located the official place of business of the whole church, the State granting in 1891 liberal corporative privileges, and treating always with dignity and kindly courtesy the church as a body and its members individually, recognizing their virtues as citizens and their gifts and talents as men and women.

The conduct of men on these prairies was a warm, living contact, an unforgettable one, and under these conditions was laid the stones for the foundation of the Lamoni Stake. Over into Missouri the district grew—"The Decatur District of Iowa in Missouri." Serenely it sat like a monitor of peace on the disputed strip that led Governor Boggs of unhappy memory, and Governor Lucas of worthy recall, to much discomfort, and legislators to many squabbles.

What mattered it to Decatur District? She dipped one hand in loved Missouri; it was filled with life's good things. With the other she caressed the hills of Iowa, where fed her cattle, and in either State she saw the schoolhouses filling with rosy, well-fed children, who came forth men and women with a purpose and with skill. They said in the "will to victory of those who went before us have we come into this noble land. They left to us the priceless heritage of their experience and accomplishment."

Ah, no truly great mind forgets its benefactors or promoters, and shall Lamoni Stake? Then came to these hills the institutions of the church: the Herald Publishing House, the Saints' Homes, Graceland College, the Children's Home, and some people said, "Here is a community of philosophers"; another commented, "A place for the student"; still another, "Ideal for old people and children"; and the restive one sighed, "Too much like a monastery, a cloister."

Some lifted busy hands and complained, "So intensely afar." But railroads zigzagged through choice farms and magnificent pastures, and highways were cast up and kept rolled down so the motorist could cut the trip of a thousand miles square in two by time's valuation.

A long time ago some were wont to say with kindly condescension, "A simple farming community." True, it had no large cities in its scope, but the farmer came into his own, and the same dear souls smile now and say: "Agricultural people—sons in Ames and girls at Iowa City; no wonder they can, such prices as we pay for life's necessities."

Decatur District kept busy at her Father's business and her own. She enlarged her borders and united her forces. She had coal mines; and miners whose music was a treat as they stood to sing in their comfortable and pleasant places of service and with instruments of brass and of string and the organ made melody.

Then one day embryonic bonds were broken, and Lamoni Stake was born. The stage of waiting was gone by, henceforth she must be what was planned from the beginning, a new stake. It was May, 1901. Many of the Saints had lingered in Independence, after the conference, for the organization of the Independence Stake. The center stake in the keystone State of the Republic, the fond land of dreams and place of glad desire. Now they came for this scene in the Brick Church in the town of Lamoni.

All were invited to take part. The presidents of the district and of the branch occupied at the opening of the service at 2.30. Very distinctly there comes to me that scene in the big, comfortable, practical old Brick Church. The spring air came in at open windows; the elm branches with their new dress of delicate green brushed at the casement; doves flew about the belfry and birds came to take a peep at this new proceeding.

Up these wide aisles we had come with our babies to be blessed. Here young and old had sat trembling with a new joy when hands in confirmation had been laid on them. Here our little ones had made their first public appearance, singing, "God is love," in sweet, thin treble. Here had the lovers stood and made the vows eternal. And here had lain for one sad, sanctified hour the dust of our beautiful and beloved dead. Here we had heard the law, and here full of the testimony. Now a new something was coming to pass: an organization; a birth; an entry into being of a power for perpetual good. To many it was the forecast of a hastening millennium. To others it was the fulfillment of promise. To still others a dream come true.

The bashful beams of the springtime sun stole in and lingered through the time. The two presidents relinquished office in the district and branch; and so there was no district, but just the people and a territory which by vote they proceeded to organize and call "The Lamoni Stake." Unique in many ways, most of all in name, holding unusual prerogatives as a community, being in the majority in civic matters, now this territory is vested with an ecclesiastical name, one that is unequivocally Latter Day Saint, a name springing direct from the most peculiar of all literature peculiar to the church, a name that has become to many sacred, and to the student always romantic.

John Smith, for many years a vigorous representative of the church in the East, but in later years in the business office of the Herald Publishing House, was nominated by the joint council through President Smith, as president of the new stake. He followed his speech of acceptance by nominating as his counselors, Jeremiah A. Gunsolley and David W. Wight. All these were accepted by the people.

The President of the church then proceeded to announce choice for the high council of the stake. Frederick A. Smith, John R. Evans, Frederick B. Blair, Richard J. Lambert, Henry A. Stebbins, Frank E. Cochran, and Joseph S. Snively each expressed willingness to serve with the exception of Elder Cochran, who, not feeling that he had sufficient light to justify acceptance, declined. Elder Martin M. Turpen was named to complete the seven, and he accepted. These men were separately voted upon by the body and accepted and ordained.

Bishop William Anderson and his counselors, Francis M. Weld and Frederick M. Smith, constituting the bishopric of Decatur District, were accepted as the bishopric of the stake.

The president of the stake, his counselors, and the seven above named for the high council were ordained to the high council, and being so directed, retired to make choice of the remaining five for the council. The intermission was spent in a time of social chat, following a speech by President Smith. The return of the council called all to order. The names of Isaac N. Roberts, Charles H. Lake, Richard S. Salyards, Duncan Campbell, and David J. Krahl were presented to complete the council. Each accepting, and being accepted, was ordained. This completed the standing high council of Lamoni Stake. Bishop Anderson took over financial concerns, and the work of the stake began.

At the first conference of the stake held in June, 1901, at Cleveland, Iowa, every branch in the stake reported: Lamoni, Centerville, Davis City, Wirt, Leon, Cleveland, Pleasanton, Greenville, Evergreen, Hiteman, Allendale, Lucas, Iowa; and Lone Rock, Missouri.

The stake at this time occupied ten and one half counties: Decatur, Ringgold, Union, Lucas, Clark, Wayne, Appanoose, and Monroe of Iowa; and Harrison, Mercer, and that part of Worth County east of the middle fork of Grand River, of Missouri. In 1903 that portion of Worth County west of the middle fork of Grand River was added to Lamoni Stake, the stake boundaries now including the eight counties of Iowa and three of Missouri, a total of eleven counties.

The Sunday school and Religio of the district adapted themselves to new conditions, and at the General Convention of 1902 were granted permission to take upon themselves the new name. They drank in inspiration and enthusiasm from the spirit of the organization of the stake.

On October 3, 1901, the "shadow of the sable wing" fell upon the organization for the first time, when the news came of the death of the junior counselor to President John Smith, Elder David W. Wight, at that time laboring with all the zeal and ardor of his splendid, young manhood in the missionary field of Utah. Other deaths followed in the years that came and went; this one we mention as the first blow that fell on the official force of the stake. William Anderson of the bishopric passed March 4, 1911, and his successor Joseph Roberts, July 14, 1916.

Of the high council, none of the charter members remain. John R. Evans, Isaac N. Roberts, and Charles Lake are dead, none of them, however, dying during occupancy.

J. A. Gunsolley, counselor to the first president of the stake, holds place as a member of the present council, as does F. M. Weld, a counselor in the first bishopric. Others occupy in various other places of trust and usefulness in the church so far as they are able.

In October, 1903, the stake conference assembled decided upon the holding of a reunion. This first reunion was held in Davis City in 1904. This was the beginning of the reunion movement in the stake.

In 1905 the reunion was held in a strip of beautiful woodland a mile south of Lamoni. This became a permanent home for the reunion of the Saints of the Lamoni Stake. The land was purchased, cleared, and fenced, wells and buildings provided, streets laid out and named, electricity and water under pressure supplied.

Year after year it has become more and more delightful as a place of sacred communion and social enlightenment, and the regeneration of gospel hopes and rekindling of gospel faith. Permanently a place of sacred and sweet memory for twelve bright and beautiful days in each summertime.

Early in its life, the organized women's work of the stake was moving under the name, "The Daughters of Zion," and the Prayer Union was holding regular meetings.

A most commendable work of the women of the stake was the organization of the Patronesses of Graceland College. There were also various study classes and relief and social clubs, both in country and town, all tending to the betterment of social conditions and strengthening the bond of service for church and state.

At the conference of February, 1919, the stake had a membership of 3,423.

The personnel of the stake officers at the time of this writing is as follows: J. F. Garver, president; C. E. Wight and D. T. Williams, counselors; Bishop, Albert Carmichael; counselors, A. J. Yarrington and R. J. Lambert (Elder Lambert has by the church been assigned to work in connection with Zion's Ensign and other interests, which made necessary his removal to Independence, Missouri, in June, 1918, but he still serves on occasion, and will continue to do so until his successor is appointed); high councilmen, David Keown, D. C. White, J. A. Gunsolley, F. M. Weld, G. W. Blair, Eli Hayer, John Midgorden, F. M. McDowell, G. R. Wells, Oscar Anderson, R. A. Ballantyne, A. M. Carmichael; clerk, Helen R. Bootman.

Only once has there been a change in the president, in 1916, when the reorganization of the stake was made necessary by the weight of years beginning to rest heavily on John Smith. The mantle of this office was then taken from the shoulders of this good man, and laid upon the younger ones of his counselor, the other John, mentioned in the preceding paragraph, where it rests to-day.

No longer can Lamoni Stake be thought upon as a plainly practical proposition. Her serene and placid story is illustrated with many pictures done "in colors that never fade," for love wields the brush and dips it in a fountain of richly colored memory. Her name has been told on the winds of nearly every land, and her friends and visitors find her villages and farms and busy little cities filled with the spirit of hope and thrift, and courageous undertaking and noble accomplishments. Many have come in, and many have gone out, and some returned. To-day by the eternal count it is not a matter so much who they were, thanks to the Master Builder of the great structure; it is not so much who they are as it is what they were and what they have done. If Lamoni was to be a place of preparation, who shall say she is not filling her calling in a measure, and that nobly? If a retreat for meditation and study and rest, her windows are open—look in. If for any other or many other good and necessary things, her granaries, her stock fields, her orchards, mines, and meadows are rich with evidence of intelligent pursuit in noble professions. Her sons and daughters put part of the "glow in Old Glory," and because of them mingles now a beloved bit of Lamoni splendid young dust forevermore with the soil of France.

Lamoni Stake

By A. J. Yarrington

A survey of the general and outward aspects of the territory involved.

The Lamoni Stake with headquarters at Lamoni, Iowa, was the first stake outside of the "center place" to be established by the Reorganization. In April, 1901, a revelation was given directing its organization. (Doctor and Covenants 125:10.)

Eight counties in south central Iowa, viz, Union, Clark, Lucas, Monroe, Appanoose, Wayne, Decatur, and Ringgold, with three in north central Missouri, viz, Worth, Harrison, and Mercer, compose the territorial area with approximately three and one half million acres of arable land, well adapted to agricultural purposes, especially when considered in its broader significance, which would include horticulture, animal husbandry, dairying, and poultry raising; pleasantly situated on the elevated plateau midway between the two great rivers of North America, the Mississippi and Missouri, and having a mean elevation slightly exceeding one thousand feet. The locality is well adapted to the production of grasses and forage crops as well as the principal grains for stock feeding and milk production which with the moderate temperature, all make for good conditions for diversified farming and is particularly well adapted to dairying and poultry raising. The length of the season during which dairy cows may be fed on pasture, the short mild winter season, the ability to produce an abundance of the best foods for milk production, thus reducing the necessity of shipping concentrated feeds at high cost to the minimum, all contribute to make this an ideal dairy section.

Topography

The general topography of the land is that of a high rolling plateau with natural drainage afforded by numerous small streams which find their outlet in one or another of three principal streams flowing through the stake: The Chariton River, having its rise in Wayne County, one branch flowing in a northwesterly course to the central part of Lucas County and then taking a southward and easterly course, uniting with the south branch in Appanoose County, furnishes a drainage system for the three counties. The Grand River with its branches flowing through the central portion, and the Platt River in the west, afford an outlet for surplus surface water.

The average annual rainfall is about 30 inches, varying from 25 inches in the western counties to 35 inches in the eastern counties.

Climate

The climate is moderate, rarely rising to extremes of heat except for short periods and at infrequent times. On the have not yet been worked. Aside from the coal a small amount of timber is found principally along the streams; this supply is gradually being reduced and the planting of new areas to trees should be encouraged.

The coal fields that are now being worked are located principally in Monroe, Lucas, and Appanoose Counties, Iowa. The whole of Appanoose County may be considered to be coal land since there is no portion of it which is not legitimate ground for prospecting. The area underlaid by the Mystic coal, so far as now known, includes in all two hundred ninety-eight square miles or 190,720 acres. The coal will average other hand the extreme of cold is seldom reached and then for only short periods.

The average temperature for the six months from April to September inclusive is approximately 66 degrees, while that for the six months from October to March inclusive is about 32 degrees, or a mean annual temperature of 49 degrees. These figures agree closely with the statistics gathered by the Government and show that for the health of the people and the convenience of industry we are indeed happily situated.

Water

An abundance of good drinking water is available at a depth of twenty-five to forty feet and is secured by wells made by digging, or boring; where reservoir capacity is not essential a bored well lined with tile is quite common and affords a moderate supply of clean, wholesome water free from stagnation, as the small diameter contributes to frequent change. For stock the larger wells are favorable, as reservoir capacity is thus secured. Ponds are sometimes constructed to insure ample supply on large stock farms.

Fuels

The chief fuel produced in the region is bituminous coal, which exists in abundance, ample for the needs of the market region for many years to come, and it is supposed from various surveys and tests that vast areas of coal exist which about two and one half feet in thickness and should yield about 3,600 tons per acre. In point of output and number of men employed, Monroe County has first place in Iowa, with Appanoose a close competitor. There is a small mine at Cainsville in Harrison County, Missouri. These at once furnish not only abundant fuel for domestic consumption but available fuel for power for various industries.

Soils

Speaking in general terms of the soils, they consist of loess, alluvium, and gumbo. Fortunately gumbo, the least desirable of these, is known mainly as a subsoil and is limited in area. The most widespread of these soils is loess, and happily it is one of the best. The alluvium, too, ranks high for many purposes.

Production

The chief natural resources of wealth in the Lamoni Stake lies in its soils, the production from which compares favorably with other parts of the country, and while the immediately available resources of the soils are gratifying, it is the opinion of the writer that extensive application of scientific farming methods has many pleasant surprises in store for those agriculturists who will study its possibilities and go scientifically after the results. This territory being in the heart of the great corn belt, the chief grain produced is naturally corn; the next in importance are oats, wheat, and rye in the order named; and various other grains as buckwheat, kaffir corn, and pop corn are produced in limited quantities.

Many kinds of grasses do well. Aside from the native wild grass which is now practically superseded by tame grasses, blue grass is the most common, seeming to thrive naturally; it seeds itself and will crowd out and supplant other grasses in a few years. It is excellent for pasture in connection with other grasses; timothy and red clover both thrive well and are the principal hay crop; alfalfa and sudan grasses are grown to a less extent; on the whole the grass plants. The principal products of these plants are printing, bakery products, candy, cigars, and tobacco, carriage and wagon material, artificial stone, mineral and soda water, automobile parts, etc.

The raw materials are produced, and the industries using them should be encouraged within the stake, viz: Butter, cheese, condensed milk, ice cream manufacturing, bread and other bakery products, brick and tile, canning and preserving, crushed rock and stone, slaughtering and meat packing, food preparation, glove making, etc.

Horticulture

Not least among the possibilities is the fruit-growing industry. The apple is the chief variety of fruit produced, though a large variety of fruits do well, such as the pear, peach, cherry, and a large variety of the small fruits. Orchards, when well cared for and systematically sprayed, produce abundant crops of fruit of excellent quality and flavor.

Apiary

The bee industry has been but little developed, although the conditions are generally favorable and this department should receive more attention. The mild climate, the abundance of flowering plants, shrubs, and trees provide food almost without cost. There is a ready and convenient market for a large production of honey.

Industries

Ninety-seven manufacturing industries in the eight Iowa counties show a production of approximately three millions of dollars value. This would indicate no very extensive

The near proximity of cheap fuel as well as available water power makes possible a number of locations for the development of the industries requiring power to operate; the shipping facilities both for gathering the raw material and distributing the finished product are already in existence. The labor problem would have to be developed with the growth of the industries.

Transportation

A glance at any map will at once indicate the transportation facilities so far as railroads are concerned, there appearing a veritable network of railways. The stake is crossed from north to south by the Wabash in the eastern part, the Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific, and the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy near the central part, and by the Chicago and Great Western in the western portion. The main line of the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy, from Chicago to Denver, traverses the stake from east to west in the northern portion, and the Koekuk and Shenandoah line of the same system crosses the stake the entire length from east to west near the central part; these with the various connecting lines furnish ready transportation to all parts of the country and all the principal market centers.

Beside railroads, a considerable mileage of good dirt roads has been brought to grade and the work is yet in progress. Up-to-date figures are not available for the miles now completed. There are 1,286 miles of primary roads in the eight Iowa counties which, under the Federal aid plan, will be improved and brought to grade, affording excellent opportunity for motor vehicle transportation.

"In 1917 traffic counts were made at forty-seven stations located in seventeen different counties, widely distributed in the State. These counts were all taken on the roads of the intercounty system. . . . The results of the traffic count for two years agree quite closely and indicate that the traffic over our roads on the basis of its origin is divided into the following parts: Local, or town to farm traffic, 46 per cent. Interurban and intercounty, 47 per cent. Tourist or inter-state, 6½ per cent. Of equal interest was the information developed that eighty-six per cent of the traffic was motor driven and only fourteen per cent horse drawn."—Iowa Documents, vol. 4.

Light and Power

Practically all towns in the stake are supplied with electric light and power. A number of the larger towns have local plants, some municipally owned and some owned by private corporations; from these, other towns are supplied so that almost every town and village has electric service. A goodly number of farms are also served by these interurban electric lines.

The electric plant at Lamoni serves approximately four thousand people with both light and power, supplying besides Lamoni, Davis City, Kellerton, and Grand River. The high school building, the Herald Publishing House, and a few residences near by are heated by steam from this plant. An ice-manufacturing plant is also conducted in connection with this power plant, supplying Lamoni and shipping some to other towns.

Branches

There are now fifteen organized branches in the stake. Lamoni has the largest membership, and is the seat of the stake presidency and stake bishopric.

The outstanding features of this locality are a good farming locality with exceptionally good church and school privileges. The public schools are of the best and serve the kindergarten, grade, and high school classes, including manual training and domestic science.

Graceland College furnishes a two-year course in college work together with an academic and a religious training department. The college is fully accredited, and students finishing here get full credit for two years' work in any other college. Graceland has enlarged her capacity this year by the erection of a new fireproof building costing approximately one hundred thousand dollars.

The settlement of the Saints at Lamoni in any considerable numbers began in the early seventies when the Order of Enoch, a stock company corporation, purchased a large tract of land and began a definite settlement.

The branch at Lamoni reported a membership of 153 at the conference of 1875.

The Herald Publishing House moved their printing plant from Plano, Illinois, to Lamoni and began the publication of that paper here on November 1, 1881.

Near Lamoni in the adjacent rural districts are a number of branches who own their church buildings, which furnish wholesome social centers for their respective neighborhoods.

Four miles to the northwest is Bloomington Branch with a membership of earnest, devoted Saints. Regular services are held each Sunday with preaching, Sunday school, and Religio.

Six miles west an appointment is maintained, and regular Sunday services are held but no branch organization is had.

Evergreen, six miles southwest on the Inter-State Trail, has an organized branch and a comfortable chapel where regular services are maintained.

Lone Rock, twelve miles southwest in Harrison County, Missouri, has an organized branch and holds regular services. Oland, six and one half miles south on the Jefferson Highway, also in Harrison County, Missouri, has a pleasantly situated chapel and an organized branch, holding regular services.

These above named are all situated in rural districts and are not served by railways. All are readily accessible by automobile whenever dirt roads are in fair condition, and all are served by district schools.

Located on the Burlington Railway, we have at Andover in Harrison County, Missouri, an organized branch, owning their chapel and maintaining regular services.

Davis City, eight miles east from Lamoni, located on Grand River, has a small but growing branch, owning a comfortable and well-located church building and maintaining regular services.

Pleasanton, in the southeast corner of Decatur County, Iowa, has a small branch and own their chapel. This is a good stock and farming section, as also are all the branches above named, and the membership are largely engaged in agricultural pursuits or in such pursuits in the towns and villages as are calculated to serve the agriculturists which support them.

Hiteman, in Monroe County, is a coal-mining town, and the members of the branch at that place are chiefly engaged in mining. They own a commodious chapel and have an energetic and devoted membership.

Centerville, a city of over eight thousand population, the county seat of Appanoose County, is a coal-mining center. A number of mines are in operation in this county and the annual output is among the largest of the State. The branch at this place owns a commodious chapel but for several years has not, for various causes enjoyed the growth and development that might be expected in a city of its size.

Chariton, a city of some six thousand population, the county seat of Lucas County, is in the midst of a fine agricultural as well as a mining section. Two coal mines are in operation here, and a good farming country surrounds the city. A devoted group of Saints, owning their chapel, reside here. This is a good location for Saints desiring employment in the various vocations incident to a small city or on the farm or for practical coal miners.

Lucas is also a coal-mining town, located in Lucas County, and on account of the renewed activity in the mines at this place the branch here is enjoying a revival of its old-time vigor. This is in good agricultural territory.

Creston, the county seat of Union County, with a population of eight thousand, is a thriving little city in the heart of the great blue-grass section of Iowa and for several years held a fall festival known as the "Bluegrass Palace," the main building being constructed entirely of grass. This is an excellent corn, grain, and grass section and affords at once a fine location for families desiring to engage in agricultural pursuits or who desire employment in the city. A small branch of devoted Saints is located here, but without a chapel of their own in which to meet. Regular services are maintained in a rented hall.

At Lacona, in the extreme northern part of the stake, is a small band of Saints known as the Graceland Branch. This is a good farming section and only about thirty-five miles from Des Moines, the State capital and Iowa's metropolis.

Allendale, a village in Worth County, Missouri, is our most westerly branch of the stake. This was one of the early organizations but on account of removals to other points the number of members residing here has been reduced to a small band and it is with difficulty that an organization can be maintained. We learn that some members are moving in this year and hope for better things for this branch.

Church Institutions in Lamoni Stake

By S. A. Burgess

Providing a home for these institutions has given Lamoni a distinctiveness among towns of its size.

The Herald Publishing House

The early history of the SAINTS' HERALD, before its removal to Lamoni, in 1881, as well as its subsequent history is given able consideration in the Jubilee Number, published January 26, 1910. Space here does not permit more than a brief review of the earlier years.

From 1860 to 1863 the HERALD was printed at Cincinnati, evidently on a commercial press. From the very first it has been a publication of the church. In 1863 a move was made to Plano, Kendall County, Illinois, where it was printed for the first time on our own press—a No. 4 Franklin Medallion Hand Press. In 1866 larger quarters were secured, and in the fall of 1868 a Taylor Power Press and two smaller presses purchased, the power press, however, being run by hand till May 1, 1869.

The HERALD started out in Plano with machinery costing $275, with Isaac Sheen for an editorial force, and William D. Morton, sr., in charge of the mechanical department.

The move to Lamoni, Iowa, November 1, 1881, was a significant advance. An office building two stories and 30 by 60 feet, had been erected, with engine room attached. Work was started with an 8-horse power engine, two cylinder power presses, a job press, and a force of eight. The old equipment was evidently left behind.

As Joseph Smith became editor on May 1, 1865, he had served in that capacity for sixteen and a half years before coming to Lamoni. He was editor in chief for nearly fifty years, the most significant years of his ministry being spent in Lamoni.

In 1891 the building was enlarged to give more room for the Herald force, and to supply office rooms for the general church officers. Many of us can remember the old building in the second stage, but this building, with practically all of its contents, was destroyed by fire on January 5, 1907. Despite this catastrophe, the HERALD did not suspend publication. The issue of January 9 was small, but not a single issue was missed.

Very quickly after the fire the present building was erected, with power house attached. Electricity has ever since been the motor power, and this electric current was also placed at the service of the town of Lamoni and its inhabitants. The building is heated by the exhaust steam from the engine house. In fact, since then this exhaust steam is also being used to heat the new high school building and a few homes in the vicinity.

Not to weary our readers with a technical description of the new machinery, perhaps it would suffice to note that the small beginning, with an expense of less than $250 at Plano for press and fixtures, had increased at the last report, June 30, 1919, to $29,356.87, together with real estate of over $39,000; showing total inventory resources of $151,356.65, and a present worth of nearly $117,000.

Joseph Smith was editor in chief to the day of his death, December 10, 1914. During much of the time, especially in the earlier years, President Joseph Smith acted as sole editor. Mark H. Forscutt, David H. Smith, Milton B. Oliver, Henry A. Stebbins, all acted as assistant editors in the years before the movement to Lamoni.

Brother Daniel F. Lambert served for two and a half months, from September 1 to November 19, 1883. W. W. Blair became associate editor April 25, 1885, and continued in that capacity until April, 1893. Richard S. Salyards took up work in the Herald Office in May, 1888, and in June, 1891, was made assistant to the editor. In 1893 Joseph Luff was made corresponding editor. In April, 1895, Heman C. Smith became corresponding editor, and Joseph Luff retired. In June, 1897, both Heman C. Smith and Joseph Luff were chosen as corresponding editors. In 1900 Frederick M. Smith became assistant editor, and Richard S. Salyards and Heman C. Smith retired on May 30. Then David W. Wight appeared as corresponding editor, together with Joseph Luff. October 3, 1901, Elder Wight was overtaken by death, and in the spring of 1902 Elder Francis M. Sheehy was appointed corresponding editor, continuing with Elder Luff until May, 1903. F. M. Smith continued as assistant until May, 1904, when he became corresponding editor, and remained as such until 1906, except that in 1903 Joseph Smith and Frederick M. Smith are shown as editors, with Richard C. Kelley as assistant, serving from June 4 to October 14 of that year.

In the spring of 1904 I. A. Smith was appointed and served until September. He was followed by Leon A. Gould, who served until May, 1908.

In May, 1906, Elbert A. Smith was made associate editor, and continued in that capacity until June, 1913, when he became editor, and has continued in that capacity ever since. He was associated with Joseph Smith until December 10, 1914, then after the death of Joseph Smith acting alone until July 11, 1917, when by action of the Board of Publication, Frederick M. Smith and Elbert A. Smith were made editors, and still continue in that capacity.

Israel A. Smith was appointed assistant editor in May, 1908, but on January 10, 1912, he was announced as managing editor, ill health in his family requiring the absence of Elbert A. Smith. He continued as managing editor until May 28, 1913, when John F. Garver succeeded him as assistant editor in the issue of June 4, 1913, continuing until May 31, 1916. John F. Garver having been chosen as president of the Lamoni Stake, Edward D. Moore became assistant editor. He was so listed in the issue of June 7, 1916, and still continues in that capacity. Owing to the sudden ill health of Elbert A. Smith, Samuel A. Burgess was appointed as asso-

TWO LAMONI BUILDINGS

The new high school building in the foreground was erected in 1913, was burned the same year and rebuilt soon after. It occupies a block adjoining the Herald Publishing House, seen to the right. ciate editor, announcement being made in the issue of January 24, 1917.

Zion's Hope, which had been started in Plano, has been printed ever since under varying circumstances and conditions. At first it was the Sunday school paper, and continued so until quite recent years, but for the past ten years it has been dedicated to the "tiny tots" of the church, with Ethel I. Skank as editor, associated with Estella Wight.

The Stepping Stones, with Estella Wight as editor, has become the Sunday school paper for the juniors, and has continued with marked success the past ten years.

Sister Marietta Walker, having been greatly instrumental in starting Zion's Hope, proceeded shortly after the removal to Lamoni to publish a young people's magazine, Autumn Leaves, of which she continued as editor for a great many years. She was then succeeded by Elbert A. Smith, and upon his resignation three years ago, E. D. Moore, who had been acting as associate editor, became sole editor.

Autumn Leaves and Stepping Stones are publications developed in Lamoni. To these must be added the Journal of History, which started in 1908, and of which Heman C. Smith was the editor until his death in April, 1919, being associated with Frederick M. Smith, Daniel F. Lambert, and others. On July 1, 1919, Walter W. Smith as church historian became editor, associated with Heman Hale Smith, assistant church historian.

The Sunday school Quarterlies have also been developed at the Herald Publishing House in Lamoni, as have also the Religio Quarterlies, though the latter were published for a short time at the Ensign Publishing House in Independence. In addition thereto, the publication of books and of tracts has greatly increased the amount of business transacted, while net worth has increased one hundred thousand dollars, from nearly $17,000 March 16, 1882, to nearly $117,000 June 30, 1919, the date of last report.

Plans have now been made for the removal of the publishing house to Independence, but for nearly forty years Lamoni has been the center of the publishing interests of the church. The machinery will be removed, but the building, and the electric plant, which has grown out of the publishing house business, will remain to Lamoni, and will doubtless be put to further industrial use.

As business managers we note: Joseph Smith continued in that capacity until 1885. Then followed David Dancer, Frank Criley, John Smith, Frederick B. Blair, Albert Carmichael, O. W. Parker, J. A. Koehler, and Albert Carmichael, in order. January 1, 1921, G. S. Trowbridge, of Saint Louis, became general manager for the Board of Publication, and will doubtless have much to do with the future success of the publishing interests of the church. He has given and is giving his principal attention to the removal and consolidation at Independence, Missouri.

The Herald Publishing House building has from the first provided offices for the general officers of the church. It was enlarged in 1891 with this end in view. In the new building, half of the upper floor was taken with church offices; half of the south half with the church library. The editors and proof readers alone have had as a rule their offices on the second floor.

As the general officers have removed to Independence, the stake officers have moved in. Still later one large room has been set aside as a meeting place for the health department of the church and classes in nursing. One room also, for several years, has been used as a storage room.

With the removal of the church library, and with the removal of the Herald Publishing House, half of the second floor will be left vacant, as well as all of the two lower floors. The present plan is to use it temporarily as a dormitory for the young men of the college, but it will doubtless later be put to industrial use.

Graceland College

It may be significant, and certainly is of interest, to note

"THE BRICK CHURCH," LAMONI, IOWA

The entire premises about the church in Lamoni are being worked over into an elaborate scheme or landscape decoration which already greatly improves the appearance, but promises to make it the beauty spot of Lamoni. There is a commodious park extending from the side of the building to the reader's right the full length of a block. Hundreds of bulbs, shrubs, and trees are being set, and ball courts being arranged for.

that President Joseph Smith, upon first taking charge of the HERALD, May 1, 1865, incidentally stressed his feelings of lack of preparation, and that in the first editorial he wrote, published in the issue of May 15, 1865, the subject that he took was the unequivocal one of "Education." In this editorial he took distinctly the position that a proper system of education would make men not only learned, but much better, and so should make religion clearer, and give it a more steadfast hold upon us. Knowledge is power; power is desirable if used for a good and noble purpose.

In 1869 a movement was made for the establishment of a school which, in a later resolution of the conference, became a movement for a school of the prophets. This was not effected because of lack of previous preparation necessary.

The early church made a decided effort both at Far West and Nauvoo, not only for school work, but for advance university work as well. In the Reorganization the same spirit obtained, though but few were able to perceive the necessity of preparation before a school of the prophets would be a possibility, on anything like the plane that it should occupy.

As a result of preliminary effort, reaching back for several years, Graceland College was opened in September, 1895. The classes were small, and held in the France Block down town, while the building on the hill was being completed. To this building there were added in order, Marietta Hall, Patroness Hall, and the farmhouse, as dormitories. With the farmhouse, an additional forty acres of land was added for farm work.

In very recent years there is being added a new building, costing more than all the college real estate put together. It is a unit in a new establishment of college buildings, and doubtless will soon be thrown open for dedication and service. Also additional land has been purchased within the past years, making now a total of about 125 acres.

It is indeed unfortunate that so many years of her work should have been under such extreme difficulties, financial and otherwise, but those years are now past, and have been past for five years at least. The college is out of debt, and its value to the church is recognized. The value of educational work is clearly recognized, and the necessity for preparation for the future service of Zion.

It is indeed well that such a place as Lamoni should be found for a college town. It is free from many distractions of a large city. Being in a farming community, and possessing land, it offers both employment and produce to assist in the maintaining of the institution, and we confidently expect it will become more and more the college town of the church.

Graceland is definitely established as a junior college at the present. It possesses collaterally the usual departments of music and oratory; the usual departments of shorthand and typewriting; academic work for secondary education. Most professional schools to-day are requiring two years of college work, and there is very little difference in the work offered as a rule in the first two years of college work, for a prospective lawyer, doctor, dentist, engineer, teacher, or for other preprofessional student. A lawyer, for his best work, should have a knowledge of Latin. A doctor should also have a knowledge of Latin. For a doctor, dentist, or sanitary engineer, a knowledge of science, especially chemistry. An engineer will need a foundation of mathematics and of science.

For a school-teacher, psychology and some work in the history or principles of education are an advantage. For all work should be given in English and history, but some five to six studies each year will meet the preprofessional requirements. This work can be taken up with a minimum of equipment.

But the advanced work of the senior college, the third and fourth year of college, requires extensive and expensive laboratories and library facilities, to say nothing of the expense necessary for professional schools.

This preliminary collegiate work, however, can be taken as well, or even to better advantage in the small junior college.

Coming from the strict discipline of the high school, it is a decided advantage to have the personal supervision that is possible in the junior college, to say nothing of the value of our having, even for a short time, the general supervision over the religious education of our young people. The religious and moral training is an essential part of the work in our college. Though as time passes, we naturally expect that our college will grow greatly and take up other necessary work for the benefit of the young, and in their preparation for better service.

We shall not attempt to list the members of the faculty, nor credit the men who have served faithfully as president or business manager of the institution, further than to say that Graceland College is making splendid progress under the supervision of President George N. Briggs. Under his direction, and Professor Floyd M. McDowell's supervision, the junior college is firmly and strongly established.

Twenty-five years of Graceland's history is past, and we are already well into the second quarter of a century. Much depends upon our moral and financial support. And again will it depend on how thorough a use we will make of its facilities and how far we shall encourage their development.

Homes for the Old Folks

Twenty-five years ago, the first old folks' home of the church was established in Lamoni, in the northwest corner of the town, connected with a farm of 240 acres. For some years this was the only old folks' home in the church. Later a home was secured in Kirtland, and one in Independence, which have since been closed, on the opening of the home at Holden, Missouri.

In Lamoni, some fifteen years ago, the former family residence of Joseph Smith was taken over and made into another home—Liberty Home. Two large frame buildings there take care of practically as many as the Saints' Home. The farms are adjoining, and Liberty Home includes the additional forty acres belonging to the homestead of Joseph Smith, which he transferred to the church when he removed to Independence, Missouri.

The administration of these homes is in general under the Presiding Bishop, but in particular they are handled by the local stake bishopric. In fact, the local bishopric are also members of the Children's Home Board. And Bishop Carmichael has been chairman of the Graceland College Board for the past ten years. These two homes and the grounds immediately surrounding them supply a place of quiet retirement for those whose greatest work in life has been completed. There is no clamor of street cars, or milk carts rattling over the cobble stones. The scene is particularly soothing and peaceful.

The past year the establishment has been increased with this work owes its start and continued success to the support given by the women of the church.

Commercial Institutions

There are several who have at least the spirit and desire to enter into a stewardship and have attempted to do so in the Lamoni Stake, even though they have not done so by any formality, but doubtless will do so when fully formulated and approved by the Bishop. These are in particular the following-named enterprises.

In addition thereto there are also individuals who have additional farm facilities. Everything is done in a business way to make its administration acceptable.

The surroundings are pleasant for those who have retired from close contact with the turmoil of the world.

The Children's Home

Lamoni is an ideal place for a children's home. It is a small town, in a rural community. It possesses good schools, together with the influence of a church community.

The Children's Home is a separate corporation, owning the former home of Elijah Banta, which has been enlarged, and some twenty acres of land. It has housed as high as forty children, though the average number would probably be around twenty-five or thirty.

It has assisted in the adoption of many children into private homes, while those in charge have endeavored to make of the place itself a home, rather than an institution. It has doubtless become superior to some private homes, though no institution or general home can equal, for a young child, a private home of the best class.

Miss Zilpha Monroe is now matron, with an efficient corps of coworkers.

The Children's Home is incorporated, and is managed by a board selected by General Conference, three of whom, however, are nominated by the Women's Department. In fact, their affairs adjusted so as formally to enter upon stewardships when the Bishop decides on the formula to be adopted. We are pleased to learn from all these that their stewardships are prosperous.

The Lamoni Electric Co. started in business as part of the Herald Publishing House, and was financed by that institution. In 1915, however, a separate corporation was formed, and the electric light plant extended its services to neighboring towns: Davis City, Kellerton, and Grand River. It also installed an artificial ice plant, which supplies Lamoni and vicinity, and occasionally has been able to ship out an extra carload.

The Lamoni Storehouse is a local retail institution which is gradually enlarging its scope until eventually, no doubt, it will do a general business. At present it handles groceries, meats, some dry goods, household utensils, etc., coal, feed, and other mill products from their own local mill.

A mail order department has recently been established which has resulted in the distribution of goods in considerable quantities to Des Moines, Chariton, and other convenient points. Inquiries have come in from as far away as Hawaii.

The Lamoni Steam Laundry is a fully equipped modern laundry and dry-cleaning establishment belonging to the church and doing not only the work for the local church institutions but for the community and outside points as well.

As is the case with the other church institutions in Lamoni, it is operated by church members, and it is interesting to note that they begin their business day with a prayer as the group assemble for the day's work, each of them participating in turn.

Though not a church institution, it is interesting to note that the State Savings Bank in Lamoni, with resources of over a million dollars, is owned by our church members; all its officers are Latter Day Saints, and all the employees. Their place of business is on a principal corner and is one of the show places of Lamoni.

Who's Who in Lamoni Stake

By John F. Garver

A magazine number of the HERALD devoted to Lamoni Stake would perhaps be incomplete without something in the way of a roster of the names of those serving in the various offices and appointments of the stake since its organization. The matter is gathered up then in this form, with the assurance that to those who have been acquainted with the men it will be of some considerable interest, especially to such as have not known men named have served in the capacity indicated.

As set forth elsewhere in this issue, the stake at its organization counted the following:

President, John Smith, with counselors Jeremiah A. Gun-solley and David A. Wight.

Bishop, William Anderson, with counselors Francis M. Weld and Frederick M. Smith.

Secretaries

As secretaries of the high council, the following have served, in the order listed: Richard J. Lambert, David J. Krahl, Leon A. Gould, John F. Garver, Paul N. Craig, and Cyril E. Wight.

Benjamin M. Anderson was secretary of the Decatur District, and was sustained as the first secretary of the stake. Successors in this office have served in the order named: David J. Krahl, Leon A. Gould, Hugo H. Gold, Claude I. Carpenter, Amy Vredenburg (now Mrs. Ralph Travis), and Helen R. Bootman, the incumbent. The first of these, Benjamin M. Anderson, was required to resign on account of work which took him away from home and the conferences, the remaining ones before the incumbent because of removal from the stake.

The High Council

The first vacancy in the high council occurred when the council on February 21, 1902, and the conference on February 22 approved Frederick B. Blair to succeed David A. Wight, deceased, as a counselor to the stake president. Again occurred a vacancy when Frederick A. Smith was by action of the April, 1902, General Conference ordained an apostle. And for the third time thus early in its work the high council was invaded when on April 22, 1902, Charles H. Lake, because of removal from the stake, found it necessary to file his resignation.

These vacancies were filled following action of the council had April 29, 1902, concurring in recommendations which with concurrence of the stake conference, which is invariably had in like instances, placed on the council, Elbert A. Smith, George W. Blair, and Eli A. Steadman.

The ranks were for the fourth time broken when Richard J. Lambert resigned on September 5, 1902, to go in the stake bishopric as a counselor to William Anderson, to succeed Frederick M. Smith; and for the fifth when Isaac N. Roberts removing from the stake resigned on May 25, 1903.

These vacancies were filled by calling to the council Leon A. Gould and David Keown, the council voting on the first named, May 20, 1905; the last, March 7, 1906.

Henry A. Stebbins on account of growing deafness resigned

A counselor in the Lamoni Stake Presidency. At present most of his time is devoted to teaching the class in religious education at Graceland College, but with the ending of the present school year he will devote all his time to church work in connection with his pastoral responsibility.

May 11, 1907. He was succeeded by Moroni Traxler, council action on the recommendation occurring June 11, 1907.

David J. Krahl, removing from the stake, resigned October 25, 1907. Action by the council on May 12, 1908, concurred in appointment of David C. White to fill this vacancy.

Elbert A. Smith having at the General Conference of 1909 been made one of the First Presidency of the church, on May 25, 1909, tendered his resignation as a high counselor. On this same date, May 25, 1909, action by the council concurring in his appointment as a counselor in the stake presidency, released Richard S. Salyards from the high council. On removing from the stake, Leon A. Gould, February 10, 1911, resigned from the council.

To fill these vacancies action was had by the council on June 2, 1911, concurring in calling to the council Gomer R. Wells, Amos Berve, and John Midgorden.

Withdrawal of Moroni Traxler from the council an February 29, 1912, created a vacancy which was filled by the appointment of Eli Hayer, council action being June 7, 1912.

Vacancy occurring by the demise of Eli A. Steadman, September 8, 1912, was filled by calling to serve in his stead Francis M. Weld, the council concurring in the appointment October 18, 1912.

On June 17, 1916, the following-named men resigned from the council for reasons as stated: John R. Evans and Joseph S. Snively on account of the infirmities of age, Duncan Campbell and Amos Berve because of removal from the stake.

ELDER DANIEL T. WILLIAMS

A very late picture of Brother Williams, one of the Lamoni Stake presidency. When he is at home his special assignment is the field work of the stake, though of late he has been in demand for special meetings in Independence, Philadelphia, Toronto, and Kirtland.

To fill vacancies incident to the resignations just cited, the council on October 11, 1916, approved for members of the council, Jeremiah A. Gunsolley, who some years before had resigned from the stake presidency, Roy V. Hopkins, and Floyd M. McDowell; and on January 1, 1917, Charles F. Graham.

The demise of Charles F. Graham, July 3, 1917, made a vacancy, filled following action by the council on February 11, 1919, in the appointment of Oscar Anderson.

Roy V. Hopkins, removed from the stake, submitted his resignation, which was acted on by the council, January 4, 1920, as was that of Martin M. Turpen, the same date, whose appointment to a mission in the South made it impracticable for him to meet with the council.

These vacancies were filled following action by the council, June 6, 1920, concurring in the appointment of A. Max Carmichael and Robert A. Ballantyne.

Bishopric

The first vacancy in the stake bishopric occurred as a result of the ordination of Frederick M. Smith to the First Presidency of the church, in April, 1902. Elder Smith was succeeded by Richard J. Lambert, approved for the appointment by the high council September 5, 1902, and by the stake conference October 11, 1902.

Francis M. Weld resigned from the bishopric, January 10, 1903. He was succeeded by David C. White, approved by the council May 25, 1903, by the conference June 6, 1903.

After serving some years, David C. White resigned. His successor was provided for by action of the council May 25, 1909, and the conference June 5, 1909, in the person of Joseph Roberts.

Bishop William Anderson after a long and faithful service in the work of the church passed to his reward March 5, 1911. He was succeeded as bishop of the stake by Joseph Roberts, on recommendation of the First Presidency and Quorum of Twelve, and concurrence of the council on June 2, 1911, and the conference, June 3, 1911.

On nomination by Bishop Roberts the council on June 2, 1911, and conference June 3, 1911, concurred in continuing Richard J. Lambert as a counselor in the bishopric, and in the appointment of Oscar Anderson as the remaining counselor.

Bishop Roberts after a few short though intensive years of work in this office, departed this life July 14, 1916. To succeed him as bishop of the stake, Albert Carmichael, on nomination by the First Presidency and Presiding Bishopric, was on November 3, 1916, approved by the stake high council, and on the following day by the conference, under which appointment he has since served.

Bishop Carmichael nominated as counselors Richard J. Lambert and Alvah J. Yarrington, the nominations being concurred in by the council and conference, November 3 and 4, 1916, respectively.

The Presidency

The stake presidency was soon after appointment broken in upon by the early demise of David A. Wight, October 3, 1901. To succeed him Frederick B. Blair, on nomination by the president, John Smith, was approved by the council on January 28, 1902, and by the conference, February 22, 1902.

The stake work, under its development, calling for full time of the presidency, and since they were required to give attention to other duties, Jeremiah A. Gunsolley at Graceland College, and Frederick B. Blair at the Herald Publishing House, these men tendered their resignations, the former January 12, 1907, the latter February 20, 1909.

To succeed as counselors, John F. Garver was on nomination by the president approved by the council May 13, 1907, by the conference, October 26, 1907; Richard S. Salyards being likewise approved May 25, 1909, and June 5, 1909.

Owing to the growing infirmities of age, John Smith, on June 17, 1916, was honorably released after his fifteen years of faithful service as president of the stake.

To succeed Elder Smith, John F. Garver, for near nine years his counselor, was on action of the joint council of First Presidency and Quorum of Twelve, action of the 1916 General Conference, of the Lamoni Stake High Council June 17, 1916, and stake conference, same date, set apart on June 18, 1916, as president of the stake.

As counselors in the presidency, on nomination by John F. Garver and concurrence of the council and conference, June 17, 1916, Edward J. Giles and Paul N. Craig were so appointed.

Edward J. Giles resigned February 28, 1917, Paul N. Craig,

June 10, 1918. To succeed as counselors, Daniel T. Williams was by the president nominated, being approved by the council July 28, 1918, and by the conference July 31, 1918; and Cyril E. Wight chosen in like manner, council action being June 1, 1919, conference June 12, 1919.

Present Officers

Thus are found officers serving at this writing as follows: Stake secretary, Helen R. Bootman.

Council secretary, Cyril E. Wight.

High councilors in the order of appointment, George W. Blair, David Keown, David C. White, Gomer R. Wells, John Midgorden, Eli Hayer, Francis M. Weld, Jeremiah A. Gun-solley, Floyd M. McDowell, Oscar Anderson, A. Max Carmichael, and Robert A. Ballantyne.

Bishopric, Albert Carmichael, Richard J. Lambert, Alvah J. Yarrington, Elder Lambert on occasion only, being now located at Independence, Missouri.

Presidency, John F. Garver, Cyril E. Wight, and Daniel T. Williams.

Recapitulation

Of these officers, Richard J. Lambert is the only one serving continuously since the organization of the stake, first on the high council and as its secretary, then as a counselor in the bishopric.

George W. Blair comes next in length of service. Approved as a high councilor April 29, 1902, he has had a longer unbroken service under a single appointment than has any other man of the stake.

John Smith comes next, with fifteen years of service as stake president.

Then comes John F. Garver, eight years and eight months in the presidency as a counselor, and four and one half years as president, thirteen years and five months in all.

In the various appointments above named, there have served in the presidency ten men, in the bishopric nine, on the council thirty-one, as secretaries for the council six, secretaries for the stake seven, five men and two women. This aggregates in all sixty-three persons. It should be kept in mind however, that certain have served in two capacities, some in three. So it is that in service the stake has counted, to be exact, forty-eight men and two women, fifty in all.

There have during occupancy passed on before, of the presidency, David A. Wight; of the bishopric, William Anderson and Joseph Roberts; of the council, Eli A. Steadman and Charles F. Graham, five in all.

Vacancies other than those by death and just mentioned, have occurred in the secretaryship of the stake, six times; in the secretaryship of the council, five times; in the council, nineteen times; in the bishopric, four times; in the presidency, counting the release of John F. Garver as counselor, seven times.

Thus runs the official roster of Lamoni Stake; interesting indeed to those who would keep the record straight, or who like to delve into statistics, or who know the men engaged in the work which has made the roster possible and necessary.

On Easter Sunday four were baptized in Saint Louis, probably in part the result of the two weeks' services held there by Elder E. E. Long.

Apostle John W. Rushton is holding a special series of meetings in Des Moines, April 3 to 10 inclusive.

Lamoni has the largest number of Boy Scouts of any town of its size in Iowa.

Administrative Methods and Ideals in the Lamoni Stake

By Edward D. Moore

Some distinctive ways in which a stake organization functions, as demonstrated in the only Iowa stake.

Since a stake organization implies a more efficient means of bringing about ideal conditions among the membership, we shall discuss here some methods now in operation in the Lamoni Stake, not only that it may form a part of the historical record, but that any good results accruing may be of value to others who are alert to the best in administrative activities.

As indicated elsewhere in this issue, the territory covered by the Lamoni Stake is quite typical of the average district in the Middle West. The soil is of average fertility. Some branches are conveniently located; some are not. Some of the Saints live on farms, some toil in coal mines, some are in business, some have retired. There are communities in the coal-mining districts largely Welch, but as a rule one finds a cosmopolitan grouping as he does anywhere else in the United States.

There are few very wealthy and few destitute. Some have believed that the spirituality of the Saints here has ranked high as compared with the average community in the church; and it is freely conceded that the educational atmosphere of Graceland College has affected favorably the resident membership. Individual talent in the cultural aspects of life is frequently manifested.

So the problem of ministering to the membership here is about as one knows it in his home branch, a goodly portion of the membership having moved in from other places to make this their home.

Lamoni Branch is considerably larger than the average, having a resident membership of some twelve hundred.

For a number of years the town was the seat of the First Presidency and the headquarters of the church. A number of General Conferences of the church have been held here. The establishment and growth of the institutions of the church, such as Graceland College, two Saints' Homes, Children's Home, have added to the population of the town, but have affected little the administrative problems.

Coordination

There has been for years a distinct tendency in the stake toward a closer coordination of the various forces at work on the problems of the church. It has been manifested in a resolution here, another there, and a tendency on the part of the people to turn over to the presidency of the stake, or to the bishopric, or to other officers, various responsibilities and definite charges, with the customary "power to act."

So when in 1918 the church in General Conference adopted an arrangement whereby a definite system of coordination was to be recognized in all its activities, Lamoni Stake at once took further steps that would bring about a fuller coordination in this territory.

No coordination committee has been appointed, nor has any formal action been had definitely to define coordination for Lamoni Stake; concurrent action was taken however in stake and auxiliary sessions, indorsing action by the general bodies, and pledging the stake and its departments to conform to the spirit of coordination as same might become operative within the stake, the officers as already constituted being left to carry forward the work. The various departmental heads, together with the stake officers proper, have thus been recognized as such, and in consultation they function under their several appointments, as supervised and directed by the stake presidency, all efforts being closely affiliated so as to prevent duplication and to result in an effectual administration of affairs of the church within the stake.

In the matter of presidential nomination, the first official act was the request of the local Religio Department of Lamoni that the branch presidency (which is also the stake presidency) nominate for the presidency of the local Religio, the resolution providing that the three chosen as the Religio presidency should nominate the subordinate officers.

Later the local Sunday school also on its own initiative, adopted a like resolution, asking that the branch presidency nominate one for superintendent, the branch presidency and superintendent-elect concurrently to nominate subordinate officers.

The stake presidency, the stake high council concurring, have nominated for these appointments, their nominations being in each instance elected.

The stake Sunday School and Religio Departments have also, each, separately, and voluntarily, requested the stake presidency to nominate for departmental heads, which has been done, and the parties nominated selected.

A resolution originating with members of the stake high council and passed by the council as the voluntary act of the council, without suggestion one way or another from the stake presidency, either directly or indirectly, and unanimously concurred in by the stake conference, requests the stake presidency when in the judgment of the presidency the interests of the cause may be served thereby, to nominate for presidents of branches. Under this action nominations are sometimes made, and so far selections have without exception been made by the affected branches accordingly. The latest action in this matter of recognition of presiding officers was that of the last reunion session, which referred the work of the next reunion not to a special committee by the assembly appointed, as was the former custom, but to the stake officers as such, the presidency and bishopric each to function as their appointments signify, the reunion to be thus carried on as is other church work within the stake. This action also originated with the people, being their voluntary, unsolicited, and unanimously expressed will and order.

In the matter of all nominations, it is clearly understood those of the stake presidency are not final, others being permitted and opportunity for same being always held open. And in some instances others have been made and voted upon, though nominees of the presidency have always been the ones chosen.

This work of coordination and of consequent recognition of official appointees has all come about not as the result of a revolution, but rather as a gradual evolution, as already indicated, having its beginning some years ago, being accentuated by action of the general church of 1918, and invariably originating with the people. Working to a more central, definite, and permanent direction, and as a consequence, to a closer affiliation of the several departments and to a greater efficiency, the liberties of the people being at the same time conserved in the power of recall, as in the right of free action, both original and final, the system is being continued and in all probability will be continued to the good of the cause as in Lamoni Stake represented.

Between the stake presidency and bishopric there is also the closest possible cooperation, making practicable an exchange of counsel and a mutual sharing of burdens at once strengthening and heartening to both departments; and a coordination of effort which makes possible more work with less expenditure of time and vitality than could otherwise be the case. The various functions of each department being respected by the other, each set of officers is likewise respected by the other. So it is that in harmony and with effectualness may the work be carried on.

The High Council.

As in the matter of departmental relations and recognition of the full scope of official functions, so in the case of the stake high council there is between the council and stake officers proper the closest cooperation, the council acting in an advisory capacity, and should it be considered necessary, as a possible check. Regarding the place of the council in the church affairs of the stake, in November, 1916, J. F. Garver, stake president, went on record in the following manner:

"The functions of the council, then, as expressed by President Garver are as follows:

"To act as an advisory board or cabinet to the stake presidency, in all spiritual interests of the church within the stake; and as such cabinet to be taken into the confidence of the presidency in all matters of policy, especially if such policy be in any sense a departure from former custom or procedure, the presidency to prosecute the work of the stake with the full concurrence and support of the council. . . .

"President Garver expressed the further conviction that the stake high council occupies in the work of the stake bishopric a relation similar to that sustained to the presidency. . . ."

Both the council and bishopric concurred in this opinion, and the council has accordingly functioned in both departments. Particularly does the council serve in connection with the presidency, as counseled with in matters of administrative policy, action, etc. And so is there brought to the work the strength of the council in its official as well as individual capacity.

Ordinations

Paul warned Timothy to "lay hands suddenly on no man," and the officials of the Lamoni Stake have taken the charge literally. They have understood that the ordination of a man to any order of the priesthood is a sacred act, and that there should be no element of doubt nor cause for regret concerning the validity of the call, nor the method of choosing.

Consequently one who is proposed for the priesthood is safeguarded in every possible way, as well as are the people and the general interests of the church as same may be represented.

The intimation of the Spirit coming to the proper authority, he makes sure for himself as to the qualifications of the one indicated for appointment, and as to timeliness for the ordination. The first officer being clear in the matter, it is then submitted for further consideration, if coming to a branch president other than Lamoni, to the stake presidency; if to the stake president, to his counselors, if the man indicated be a member of Lamoni Branch, if otherwise, to his counselors and to the president of the branch where the man has membership. If concurred in by the stake presidency, or counselors and branch president, as the case may be, the proposal then goes to the stake high council in session, where all aspects of the recommendation may be fully discussed. If the high council concurs, then, and not till then, the matter is officially and formally brought before the branch where the one under consideration has membership. He is privileged to speak for himself, others may discuss his qualifications, etc., as they care to, then the vote is taken. With the sanction of the branch, the ordination is referred to the stake conference, and when the choice is there ratified, the ordination takes place.

Women's Department in Lamoni Stake

Since the general revision of the Women's Department, the work has been reorganized in four branches of the Lamoni Stake. There are still ten branches where the work has not been entered upon. In these places it is hoped to find, or create, sufficient interest to effect an organization in the near future.

There are four groups in Lamoni, one of which has been occupied with lessons in home nursing under the direction of Miss Myrtle Radmall, R. N., and will be taken up in turn by the other groups.

Before election all four groups were occupied with the study of citizenship, and since that time three of them have been studying the food and body course as outlined by the General Women's Department. In addition to the study, the different groups have been interested in meeting community needs, and with the very efficient aid of the "friendly visitors" in each group have rendered service in various ways.

Gracland College is made the special charge of one group, the Children's Home of another, and the Homes for the aged another. The fourth group will take special interest in the public schools.

The dormitory students of Gracland have been entertained in the various homes of the town at the suggestion of the group leader, also the public schools have been visited and the teachers entertained.

A good interest is manifest, and the ideal had is for a more intelligent parenthood, such an understanding of child nature as to insure proper development both physical and spiritual, and better conditions of the homes that shall cause them to fill the place designed in the plan for the establishment of Zion.

Mrs. Ida C. Monroe is stake organizer and has recently been organizing the women in various outlying branches into working groups.

A Timber for the Temple

By Elbert A. Smith

"Ye are God's building."—Paul.

Read on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the baptism of Elder John Smith, November 30, 1915, at Lamoni.

In the years now over and past,
In the days that are spent and done,
A king on his temple intent,
Needed a timber enduring;
That had soaked up the summer sun,
Resisted the hard winter blast,
Grown rugged and strong, insuring
A purpose tenacious, unbent.

He searched through the forest full long.
He weighed him full many a stick.

And he hewed them clear to the quick.
He searched them with infinite art,
The weak, the upstanding, the strong,
Through fiber and bark to the heart.

'Til at last there came to his hand,
Rough, with the bark on, unpolished,
A timber that surely would stand
Full many and many a stroke,
Nor yet be ever demolished,
Straight and clear and fragrant and clean,—
Under the rough outer part of it,—
In its grain and fiber serene,
To the sound, strong, red heart of it.
He wrought it with patience and skill,
Set it in his building with care;
And there it continueth still,
In accord with the Architect's will,

Supporting the load it must bear.

Kind friends, you must surely have guessed
The meaning conveyed in these lines,
Though roughly and vaguely portrayed,
In meter and rhymes disarrayed,
As by one whose worthy designs
Find their clothing none of the best.

The king who pursued this strange quest,
Our Lord, his temple erecting,
Each timber with caution inspecting.
The section of rough English oak,
Shaped with many and many a stroke,
Is neither a fable nor myth,—
Our rugged and honest John Smith,—
Under the rough outer part of him,
In his fiber and grain serene,
Sound, tender, unbroken, and clean,
Clear to the stanch, true heart of him.

Road Systems in Lamoni Stake

The roads of the Lamoni Stake are as yet mostly dirt roads. A great deal of work, however, has been done in recent years in grading and dragging. It has benefited greatly from the State Highway Commission, which has selected certain roads as primary roads and expended considerable funds, Federal and county, on putting them to grade.

Lamoni, Iowa, is one of the leading communities for good roads. The Inter-State Trail was organized in Lamoni, with W. A. Hopkins as president, extending from Kansas City to Saint Paul. This trail was afterwards incorporated as part of the Jefferson Highway, from Winnipeg, Canada, south to New Orleans and the Gulf of Mexico. This is one of the best cared for auto routes in Iowa. About one third of the Jefferson Highway is gravel or other hard surface. The part of this highway running north through Decatur and Clark Counties has been well graded, new bridges and culverts put in, some railroad crossings eliminated, but is not as yet paved.

Other good trails are the Waubonsie Trail running across the southern tier of Iowa counties, from Keokuk through Lamoni and Shenandoah, Iowa. A special train went from Lamoni and neighboring towns to Shenandoah, to secure the trail passing through this town, and were successful. In eastern counties of the stake, the Chicago, Kansas City, and Gulf Trail passes north and south, then turns east to Rock Island. Passing through the same eastern counties we find the Union Route. A good east and west highway passes through the second tier of Iowa counties, Union, Clark, Lucas, and Monroe. This is the Bluegrass Trail from Omaha to Burlington. In the extreme west of the stake is to be found the Ayr Line, from Des Moines to Saint Joseph and Kansas City. Then the Capital Highway, Cannon Ball Trail, and others. The State highways form an excellent system of dirt roads, and noting the benefit of grading and dragging, many secondary roads are in good condition, and compare favorably with the trails; and in some townships are better than some of the main trails. Streets are paved in the principal towns. Most of the auto trails can be traveled during the greater part of the year. They furnish a means of transportation by no means second to the railroads.

These main north and south trails, the Jefferson Highway, Chicago, Kansas City and Gulf, the Union Trail, the Ayr Line, Cannon Ball, and other trails extend south and through the three Missouri counties, which are part of the stake. A great deal of tourist traffic goes through Lamoni, as the Jefferson Highway is conceded to be one of the best-marked roads.

In the extreme northeastern corner of the stake, Albia has a street car system, reaching out to the neighboring towns.

Thomas J. Burch, who for the past ten years has been janitor of the church at Lamoni, Iowa, passed away suddenly at his home the morning of April 1. Brother Burch has been a member of the church for about fifty years, first in Saint Louis, then in Pleasanton, Iowa, at which latter place he was one of the pillars of the church, and did much to insure its continuance. But coming to Lamoni he willingly accepted the humble post of janitor. The sympathy of all the employees of the Publishing House goes out to his daughter Ethel, who has worked here for the past several years and who expects to continue with the publishing house in Independence.

The midsummer number of Autumn Leaves will be devoted entirely to Boy Scout work. Is your troop going to be represented?

This, then, is Lamoni's aim: To produce men—men of capability, men of vision, men of consecration, men of God, men ready and fired with the zeal of abandonment for the common cause—the call of God to the church—the preaching of the gospel in all the world and the redemption of Zion.

Let the several requirements carry these men individually wherever and into whatever they may, men of loyalty, who would die before they would betray the trust; and, better still, men who, let come what may, will live up to trust—this is the ambition, the aim of Lamoni—to make such men and to yield them ever, on demand, and fully equipped.

May God give us steady hands, that we may develop men true and mighty. May he make brave our hearts, so that having for whatever task God has thus prepared them to do.

Parents' and Teachers' Problems

Text: Child Study and Child Training, by W. B. Forbush.

CHAPTER VII

The Forces That Make a Man

"The child is born in part, he is made in part, in part he makes himself."

- I. What are the three universal forces that make men?
- II. According to Horne, what is the function of each force?

A. Heredity.

1. What is heredity? Racial? Immediate?
2. Define as closely as you can the limits of heredity.
3. How may marriage influence hereditary tendencies? Why, from this viewpoint, is a wise marriage a Christian duty?
4. How are we responsible for our progeny?
5. Is it possible for a child to inherit an appetite for strong drink? How do you explain the fact that some of the sons of drunkards become addicted to drink, while others do not?
6. How may evil tendencies be overcome and desirable tendencies be developed?

B. Environment.

1. Discuss "Put into the environment what you want in the man."
2. Can this be done without lavish expenditures?
3. Apply question 1 to (a) religion, (b) art, (c) music, (d) manners, (e) taste, etc.

E. Will.

1. How do our wills govern the making of our children?
2. How does the child's will govern his heredity and environment?
3. How far can an individual become what he will?
4. What are the instincts, and why should they be developed?
5. Answer the above for Feelings, Sense, Perceptions, Memory, and Conscience.

- III. What importance does Horne attach to the home in the process of "man-making"?

Debate: Resolved that heredity has more to do with the forming of character than environment.

MAUDE PEAK PARHAM.

A Correction

In our columns in issue of March 2, under the caption, "What the other fellows are doing," appeared a paragraph concerning activities in the Saint Joseph local, which paragraph contained a statement we gladly correct in harmony with the wishes of the organizer there, Sister Anna Salyards. She writes: "Will you kindly correct the statement that the civics class here is taught by a paid teacher? The misunderstanding grew out of the fact that we have a member of our branch, who is one of the high school faculty. He teaches our class in sociology, one in civics, and also helps in Sunday school and Religio, but he does it, as all good Latter Day Saints do, as his contribution to the work of the church, entirely without pay."

We appreciate this correction, for it reflects the spirit of fair play and justice which is dear to all of us. We appreciate and rejoice in the fact that in our church are to be found so many qualified and talented young people, who are really "specialists" in their line, and would in other organizations doubtless be receiving pay for their labors, giving so splendidly and freely of their time and energy for the common good of their fellow church members. Truly it is a day of consecration, and out of that principle grow the fairest flowers of human character—unselfishness, devotion, humility, patience, and love.

A. A.

Just a Little Friendly Hint!

Recalling that "a hint to the wise is sufficient," we feel like addressing a remark in the direction of our district presidents all over this broad land of ours, and shall feel that this will be all that is necessary:

Simply this: Next May, from the 15th to the 22d, the Women's Department will be holding a session of intensive training for their field workers and district organizers. The time will be filled to the brim with new and attractive presentations of the various phases of the work intrusted to this department—lectures, exhibits, charts, films, dramas, demonstrations, etc.—work and opportunity to qualify which no organizer should miss. The benefits of the institute will accrue directly to the districts and branches and reunions to which the attendants shall disperse at its close.

What would be right down good business on the part of a district towards a proposition of that kind?

Watch the church papers for announcements!

Are you scoutmasters talking and dreaming "scouting" all the time? If not, it may be that you do not understand all that it means to the boys.—Boys Department.

A progressive Jewish rabbi expressed the wish that we could get rid of the word God altogether and substitute some such word as "Cosmos." When asked if the "Cosmos" knew that it was a "cosmos" or that we were talking about it, he replied that he did not think so. "Then I would rather worship you," I said, "than your 'Cosmos,' for you would at least know that I revered you."

You Boy Scouts! Have you written that story yet? Better think twice before you lose the chance to win one of the fine prizes offered. Remember May 15 is the date for the closing of the contest. Get your stories and articles in early. Announcement was on back of March 9 HERALD.

Reports from Iowa City state that an average good day's, but not an exceptional day's attendance at the various churches there on the part of the students is 11,668, with an attendance at Bible classes of about 863. While this is not exceptionally high, with a little over 50 per cent of church membership in attendance, it probably would be found a good average for most congregations throughout the country.

Faith

Sermon by President Elbert A. Smith, during Zion Builder Services at Lamoni, Iowa, March 13, 1921. Reported by Winsome Smith McDonald.

You might naturally imagine that after a man has preached for a number of years under various conditions that he would approach a sermon or a series of sermons with absolute unconcern, but I believe that whenever a man reaches that condition he ceases to preach. He may keep on talking but he is not preaching any longer. Certainly I have never felt a more profound feeling of responsibility than I feel in entering upon this series of meetings, and I depend very greatly upon your faith and prayers.

The subject as announced for to-night is that of faith, and the text is found in Mark 11: 23, "Have faith in God," the language of our Lord and Master.

Some two or three weeks ago a group of Chinese students studying in the University of Illinois sent out a questionnaire to one thousand prominent men of the United States, men supposed to be Christians. There were only three questions in this questionnaire: "Do you believe in God? If so, why? What kind of a God do you believe in?"

It would seem to be a little bit ironical that it should be necessary for "heathen Chinese" to ask Christians if they believed in God; but evidently these students considered it necessary, and certainly they went to the root of the matter, because the first question in the "greater catechism" is, Do you believe in God? I do not refer to any catechism of any denomination, but the greater catechism that confronts humanity and soon or late presents its question mark to every human.

What Is Your Mental Attitude?

I want to ask you first of all, What is your mental attitude toward this question? Alma, one of the Book of Mormon preachers, has a wonderful sermon on faith in the sixteenth chapter of Alma, and in it he exhorts his hearers to have faith; but he adds that if they can do nothing more than merely desire to believe they should let that desire work in them and cultivate it and presently it will give place to faith.

Do you desire to believe? That may seem to be begging the question before the evidence is presented; but I have on my desk in the office a book by a very modern philosopher named William James, and the title of that book is The Will to Believe. It is not so easy to get the meaning of William James as it is of Alma; getting his meaning is something like trying to extract an ounce of gold from a ton of quartz. With William James it is somewhat difficult to extract the gold, while the gold of Alma lies on the surface; anyone can carry it away, and the vein will never be any the poorer. But when you have extracted the meaning from James's book it is identical with the advice given by Alma. He holds that it is not illogical, or begging the question, to have a will and desire to believe.

Why not? Faith offers you everything that man needs; doubt offers you nothing and would take away even that which you seem to have. It is the creeping paralysis of all hope and all human initiative. What have you young people to do with atheism! Nothing!

Faith Dynamic in All Human Institutions and Activities

Faith is dynamic in all human activity, and in all human institutions and governments. It may seem to be something intangible, but it underlies all human institutions and transactions.

The family and the home, for instance, are considered by all writers on economics and sociology as the unit of civilization. Faith underlies the family and the home.

Some bright day some one of these girls appears on the street or in the parlor with a diamond ring on her finger which she is trying to conceal from her companions—yes, she is not. Where did she get that diamond ring? Did she pick it up in the street? No, your guess is wrong. Did her mother give it to her to pay her for washing the dishes or darning socks? You are getting farther away all the time. Some young man for whom that girl never did a day's work in the world spent his last dollar to get that diamond ring, and while bands played, and rainbows danced round him, and heaven poured its glory into his heart, he put it on her finger.

I am not making light of that transaction; that ring tells a story that is as old as Adam and as sacred as religion. But why did he put that ring on her finger? Because he had faith in her. Why did she permit him to put it on her finger? She had faith in him. Well will it be for that home if they "keep the faith." I heard a new version of the marriage covenant the other day: "We promise to love, honor, and behave."

It seems to me that if a man can, and indeed desires to trust his name and his honor and the immortal souls of his children to a woman, he ought to trust the God who made the woman.

Faith underlies all government, particularly all democratic government. There sat around a table in France four men, the Greek Orlando, the French Clemenceau, a little Welsh giant named David Lloyd George, and a Yankee Puritan and idealist named Woodrow Wilson, and while the world looked on they handled the destinies of nations as children play with cob houses. Why were they permitted to do it? Because the world had faith in them. No king ever had the power that Woodrow Wilson had, but mark you how soon it faded when the people for some reason or other began to lose their faith in him.

All business is transacted on faith, or nearly all of it. How long since any of you saw a ten-dollar gold piece? I have a recollection of seeing one at one time, but it was a long time ago. I believe it was yellow. We do not see them any more. About all we have is paper money with the promise of the Government or some bank or individual on it—and indeed most of our business is done on personal check. It does seem to me if we can trust the promises of men on paper we ought to trust the promise of God who has attached his name to the greatest promissory note that man ever read.

Faith is the dynamic that moves people in all of their undertakings. By faith men plant, believing they will reap. By faith they build, believing they will occupy. By faith they explore, thinking they will discover. By faith Columbus discovered America.

Faith is a universal instinct. I am not speaking now of faith in humanity, but of faith in some higher power. All races of men have some form of religion, and have always had some form of religion. Every idol, no matter how crude, stands for an ideal; it testifies of the never-ending search for God by man. But on the other hand atheism is an artificial culture, not spontaneous in the heart: it must be kept alive by argumentation and breaks down in every great crisis.

Faith in Law the Basis of Science

Some one may have told you that science is antagonistic to religion, but the greater scientists apparently do not take that view of the question. Lord Kelvin tells us that "science positively affirms creative power." (Christian Apologetics p. 25.) Sir Oliver Lodge tells us that "religion has its roots deep down in the heart of humanity and in the reality of things." (Continuity, p. 106.) Edgar Lucien Larkin, head of Lowe Observatory, says: "There is not a great scientist now living not aware of the existence of mind in the Sidereal Universe—a dominating mind."—Within the Mind Maze, p. 364.

Some day you may meet some little two-by-four instructor who has read two or three pages of Darwin who may tell you that religion and science are in hopeless conflict, but remember the statements of these men, and no keener minds have existed in our time.

Essentially both religion and science rest on faith. All of the sciences are based on faith in the universality of law and the continuity of law. Now let us explain that for a moment. We cannot go back into history very far, that is in recorded history. We may go back to Egypt, Nineveh, and Bablyon, but back of that we cannot hope to find any record of anything even approaching scientific observation; yet science has the most implicit faith that law has always been in force, and that it will always continue without change or deviation—that law is the same now as it was millenniums ago, and will so continue forever and forever.

Sir Oliver Lodge has a wonderful lecture on "Continuity," and bases his faith in the immortality of the soul on that law.

So we may say that by faith geology reads the prehistoric record of the earth as it was written in the rocks, believing that the same laws were in force then that are in force now, in other words basing all conclusions on faith in the continuity of law.

We are bound by the forces of circumstances to this old earth; it seems to us to be a stupendous affair, but compared with some of the heavenly bodies it is almost insignificant. It would be insignificant were it not for the freight it bears of human souls, human aspirations, and human destinies.

We are limited and chained to this little old earth that Mark Twain dubbed "the wart." It is true, we may get into an airplane and travel up the heavenly speedway for a few miles, but law ever reaches after us and pulls us back again. All we can touch with our hands, all we can break to pieces with a hammer, all that we can put into the acid is on this small globe. And yet science has faith that law is universal. What a stupendous conception! Talk about the faith of religion!

If a man could start to-night for the most distant star that can be seen through the most powerful telescope and travel with the speed of an express train, he would be old and dead before he got out of the switch yards; and his bones would be turned to dust long before the conductor came to take up his ticket. Yet science believes that in that far-away star and in others that we can never hope to see with any instrument, faith reigns universal. So we may say that by faith science weighs the stars. And by faith chemistry mixes her compounds.

Science rears her edifices then upon faith in universal and continuous law; while religion builds her temple on faith in an everlasting, unchangeable, universal Lawgiver, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, without beginning or ending of years, all powerful, all wise.

Faith Bears Her Own Credentials

Faith bears her own credentials. Doubt is negative and usually destructive. Faith is affirmative and constructive. Why not ally ourselves with the builders, and certainly if we are to be Zion Builders, we shall need to have faith, because when we move out into the building of Zion we are undertaking an experiment that is stupendous, that is filled with perils as well as possibilities. We must have faith in the God who promised Zion and in the laws that will redeem Zion, and more than that we must have faith in the fellow men who work with us, whether they be general church officials or local officials, in the endeavor to redeem Zion. If we look with a doubtful eye on the promises of God we will never put our all into the venture; if we look with the cold eye of suspicion on those who are directing the destinies of the church we cannot hope to cooperate with them in the redemption of Zion. We must have faith.

Atheism leads inevitably to anarchy. That is its logical course. Emma Goldman so expressed it frankly in a statement of her creed. She said, "I believe in no God!" And her statement followed very logically, "I believe in no government! I believe in no marriage! I believe in no property!" And we gave her a free ticket to Russia where she hoped to find no God, and no government, and no marriage, and no property.

Atheism leads to anarchy, not only individually but nationally, and only a short time ago a prominent Jew, the president of the chamber of commerce in Boston, is reported to have said, "You may be astonished to hear me, a Jew, say this; but in my opinion we stand before two alternatives—either anarchy or Jesus Christ."

Every individual in his own life faces that choice, between Jesus Christ or anarchy. Do you want something, my young friends, that will give you a definite purpose, that will give you abiding principle? Come and stand with me in imagination on the banks of the Niagara River as I stood not so long ago. The night is falling, and we see pushing out over the waters into the darkness a boat. This boat pursues a definite course, it has a certain goal somewhere, it speaks of purpose and of power. A moment later we see another boat, but its oars are drifting in the water, its rudder swings with the current, it is directed by the waves and winds of chance, and it is going down stream to inevitable ruin.

Haven't you seen human lives that bear the same comparison? One young man starting out in life with a purpose and ideals, governed by principles instead of impulses, while another simply allows himself to drift? My young people, I want you during these meetings to make a decision; I want you to compare the lives of some men you may observe around you and see what kind of a man or woman you want to be.

Pardon the seeming indelicacy of calling names, but look at some of the young men in the community, men like Floyd M. McDowell, Cyril E. Wight, Harold C. Burgess, or Max Carmichael, or fifty others I might name, who are endeavoring to shape their lives towards a certain goal that they may fit their lives to serve men, which is the service of God; men who are governed by principle, not by impulse. Then you may compare them with the hangers-on of society whom you see in every village and city, young men whose only vocation is to hang around street corners and in bum restaurants or in back rooms where greasy cards are shuffled; who poison the air with tobacco smoke, render it discordant with oaths, and ruin the appearance of society by projecting into it vicious and dissipated faces. Now what kind of man do you want to be?

And you girls, look at the lives of some of the women around you that you have reason to admire, young women who are modest and wish to cultivate themselves that they may become true women. Compare them with some of the overpainted and underdressed creatures that you see on the street, whose only desire is to work up a flirtation, and alas for them, the only kind of men to whom they may appeal is the kind of creature I have just described.

I am not going to force a decision on you, but God will force it on you. I know many of you have made your decision, and made it right. Steel your wills during these meetings to abide by your decision. But if there are some here who have not yet made a decision, God will plead with them. I can only talk with them for forty-five minutes, but God's Spirit will plead with them when no one is by.

I wish, oh, how I wish, I could help even one of them to make the decision that he would be a man of principle and of power, a man who would take Jesus Christ to be his guide. If I could influence even one to do that during these meetings, I would be well repaid; and I think all of us who have helped in any way to make these meetings a success would have drawn out rich dividends on the investment. I would rather have the most insignificant share in that kind of an enterprise than the controlling stock in the great Comstock Mine when it was at its richest.

Religion gives men principles, purpose, faith, power, a definite goal, a certain course.

The Sound Basis of Faith

Faith has a sound basis. Some people confuse faith with credulity. But credulity has its root in ignorance. Any man can be credulous; the halfwit can be credulous; but faith calls for the keenest minds and the biggest hearts and the cleanest lives that ever were developed. Faith has its roots in observation and in revelation, and the two meet together in one soul and qualify him to be a follower of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Faith takes its stand on the known and reaches into the unknown, or as the Apostle Paul tells us in the Roman letter that the invisible things of creation are understood by the things that are seen. When we study creation, it argues the existence of a Creator, to say the least. When we see a painted picture we know there was an artist that painted it; the colors did not spontaneously arrange themselves on a self-created canvas. We see a house and we know some one made it. When we see creation, we reason that back of it is a Creator; but worlds without end we cannot find him out by human observation alone, because our eyes are fitted to see material things, and God is a spirit.

That is where revelation steps in and reveals to us his character and his will concerning man, so the two meeting together, observation and revelation, create and upbuild faith in the human heart—neither one is complete without the other.

Faith Taught by the Revelations

Faith is justified by our consideration and contemplation of the written revelations of God. I should say by all the revelations God has given to us. The whole body of the written word as we have it in the Bible, in the Book of Mormon, and in the Book of Covenants appeals to man's faith for the simple reason that it answers his spiritual needs; it gives him hope where otherwise there would be no hope; brings him light where otherwise there would be no light; so I say the whole body of the written revelations of God appeals to the faith of men and supplements the great commandment that Jesus Christ gave when he said, "Have faith in God."

But perhaps even greater than that is the revelation of God that we have in the character and life of Jesus Christ himself. I want to tell you, my young friends, that the older you grow and the more you contemplate and study the character of Jesus Christ, the more wonderful it will become to you. During the last few years of my experience, there is one thing that has grown bigger and bigger to me, grander and ever more grand, and that is the character and life of the man of Galilee.

One autumn evening I stood on the very summit of Mount Manitou. About me were the mighty granite boulders and the great pine trees, and there spread out directly at my feet lay the Colorado plains. I could look over them for hundreds of miles and see the play of sunlight and Titanic shadows. About me were the rush and roar of the elements, because it was storming up there in the mountains. And there I had such a conception as I had never known before of the awful majesty and power of Almighty God. It was written in the universe, in the heavens, and in the rocks under my feet; but the more his majesty and power and greatness were borne in upon me, the smaller and smaller and more insignificant I became in my own vision. I saw nothing in all those things to indicate to me that God cared anything for me or that there was any more possibility that I could ever communicate with him or have fellowship with him than there was for the ant that was crushed under my foot.

Then there came to me the absolute necessity that Jesus Christ should come into the world in the flesh to reveal to us the character and the love and the mercy of God his Father. The mountains revealed to me a God of power and of dominion, but Jesus Christ came into my life revealing to me a personal God of love.

The law of Moses came out of Sinai with thunder so the children of Israel hid their faces and they said, "Our God is a terrible God," but Jesus Christ came walking along the shores of Galilee with love in his heart, and he said, "Come unto me, all ye who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." I thanked God for the revelation of Jesus Christ as I stood on the mountain. It was as though some one had lighted a lamp and put it in the window and the universe had a new meaning for me.

The War Between Faith and Doubt

Now in conclusion, my brothers and sisters, I wish to present to you this thought, There is a great war that has been going on for centuries. It will go on so long as men think. No man who thinks can escape it. I refer to the war between faith and doubt. You cannot avoid it. You cannot escape the war between faith and doubt; but you can make your decision and you can choose which side you are going to fight on.

You can stand in the shadows with doubt and resist the appeal of God that comes into your heart and says, "Believe in me." Or you can stand in the light with faith and resist the encroachment of paralyzing doubt that comes into your life from time to time. You need not be surprised that you have doubts. Your soul is a battle ground between God and the Devil, and the very fact that the battle is raging in you shows you are worth consideration. You cannot escape the struggle. You can only choose which side you will fight on.

Why not choose to fight under the flag of King Immanuel? I call to mind the experience of the life of one of our most brilliant elders who years ago was in the field but was constantly troubled with doubts. He doubted this and he doubted that, and finally he grew tired of the never-ending struggle against doubt and quit his ministry and finally quit the church, thinking he would find peace. But he did not escape that war. There is no escape from that war. He still was torn with conflict, while he lived, but the trouble with him then was that he was fighting on the wrong side. Often there came into his mind the thought, "Perhaps after all it was the work of God; perhaps I had in my hands the pearl of great price, and I have simply thrown it away. Perhaps God gave me a trust and a mission and I did not prove true to it." He did not escape the fighting or find peace, but instead he was found fighting on the wrong side, trying to resist the divine appeal and keeping God out of his life.

Our call to you is to enlist on the side of faith, and though you may have to fight all your life against doubts, you will be fighting under the banner of Jesus Christ, and your faith will grow brighter and brighter and finally faith will lead you to the knowledge Alma speaks of in the Book of Mormon. May the Spirit and the grace of God abide with you, is my prayer.

Healing the Sick

Whence comes the power by which many people of many cults perform miracles?

A recent letter from Elder H. L. Holt, for many years a general missionary of the church, incloses a clipping from the San Jose (California) Mercury Herald, concerning meetings held by Mrs. Aimee Semple McPherson, a woman evangelist in the Baptist Church of that city.

Mrs. McPherson teaches that divine healing is a part of the gospel. She urges that people should attend several services, and thus get the spirit of the meeting before asking for administration. As sin and suffering go hand in hand, so does redemption from sin and healing go together.

The method used is anointing with oil, laying on of hands, and prayer. The results are stated to be wonderful, and some who were suffering from neuritis, rheumatism, and spinal troubles showed instant relief. One woman who came on crutches and had to be helped up left the platform and church without them. Some are not healed instantly, or not healed at all; but Mrs. McPherson urges that where there is a sincere desire, so that one is willing to surrender his life to the service of the Master, he may come with full confidence that he will not depart without a blessing. She disclaims any power in and of herself, but declares that she is only the minister. Healing, she states, comes only as the seeker exercises faith in Jesus to heal his infirmity, and as he is willing to surrender his life to his service.

The question is raised by some of our readers, By what power is such healing done? Some express a confusion of mind.

We should remember that such instances are by no means few. In the Middle Ages, there were some who claimed to be healed by touching certain relics. Many report cases of healing under the hands of their ministers in the Episcopal Church to-day. The influence of mind over matter is readily recognized. This is especially true in all neuroses, so that considerable literature has gone out concerning psychic therapeutics.

We remember some twenty years ago reading several books on the subject, the titles of which we cannot now recall accurately. One was by a physician in London. He discussed learnedly faith healing, which he did not altogether credit, as he was a thoroughgoing doctor of medicine. But he pointed out continually the influence of mind in the creation of disease, and in the healing of sickness. He stated that people had taken sick, and had even expired over the description of a disease which they did not have. Others had recovered through action of the mind over matter. It had a very different effect than that which would be ordinarily expected, but had the effect which the patient was looking for.

A book on Mind the King shows the influence of thought disturbing the balance of the body, and shows many instances where ill health has been brought on as a result only of thought. Healings have resulted through faith, and physicians quite generally recognize the value of faith and a hopeful attitude in the healing of any and every physical infirmity.

The plain facts appear to be that the organization of man is such that there exists not only psychic parallelism, but a certain dominance of mind over body. This fact can be used by strong-minded men to assist in healing of infirmity. And healing may be the result of suggestions having human origin.

There is also the case, which might be considered almost classic, where a man was urged by his friends to place himself in the care of a certain practitioner, who would treat him mentally by absent treatments. His friends suggested that he should go aside and pray, and enter into a silence, and that he should write a letter to the practitioner repeating certain sentiments. He did this day after day, for some two or three weeks, and showed marked improvement. But at the end of that period he received a letter from the practitioner that, "I have been out of town the past month, and have just returned, and find your letters awaiting me. I will be glad to undertake your treatment, beginning next Monday, at (such an hour)." The patient had gained steadily. As soon as he learned this fact he suffered a serious relapse. That story will illustrate the influence of a man's own mind, or of autosuggestion, and how little, at times, the help of others has to do with the healing.

In the second place, it is possible that the suggestion and mental power may come from another. But as suggested by one writer, "If some other man put his spirit upon me, I receive not only the physical benefit, but also the evils from his spirit." There is something worthy of thought in that.

When the healing comes through the Spirit of God, its influence is to purify and cleanse, as well as heal. "And if they have committed any sins, they shall be forgiven them." The benefits received through the Spirit of God can only be beneficial, without evil aftereffects.

A mistaken notion may result in a present physical benefit, but in a greater spiritual loss. That the Spirit of God acts upon a recognized mental factor of man is by no means a source of discouragement. It is a reason for exercising wisdom. It is a reason why we should not look upon administration for the sick as mere routine. It is a reason why we should not go through it merely as a form. It is a reason why those who go through it merely as a form, without faith, do not receive the benefit desired. It means that an elder administering under the Spirit of God should not, in his later conversation, consciously or unconsciously undo part at least of the effects received through administration.

We have known elders to administer, and then sit down and tell of all the people they knew who had the same sickness, and each story ended with, "He died," or "She died," or he remembered one or two who "went crazy." Fortunately, in this case, the Spirit of God did its work, though the elder, through lack of understanding, did what lay in his power to prevent.

That which can be acted upon by a higher power can also be acted upon by a lesser power, a power from beneath.

We have been told that in the last days there shall arise false prophets, who shall show great signs and wonders, inasmuch that if possible they shall deceive the very elect. (Matthew 24: 24.)

On the other hand, in the days of the Master, the disciples came to Jesus and told him that they saw one casting out devils in his name, and he followed not after them, so they forbade him. But Jesus said (Mark 9: 37, I. T.): "Forbid him not; for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can speak evil of me. For he that is not against us is on our part." (The rest of the chapter is well worth reading.)

We should not attempt to say by what power these healings are undertaken. Healings are possible through human power; they are possible through evil power; they are possible through the power of God. We may, however, very properly add that in this instance the minister appears to be trying to carry out the commandments of God as written in the New Testament. That which is good cometh from God. But that is no reason why we should go out after such. The light that is with us is greater than with them. It does not follow that because we make a very indifferent effort and go through a form and do not secure results, that we should be disturbed, when we find some one else making very devoted and careful preparation in deep humility, securing the desired physical results. Our remedy is to hold fast to the rod of iron, and strive more earnestly to prepare ourselves to carry out with greater devotion the commandments of God.

Even though the Master told his disciples not to forbid this one who was casting out devils in his name, the disciples would have made a very grievous error if they had left off to follow after such an one. The Spirit of God is a light that lighteth everyone that cometh into the world. One who is earnestly seeking the right is not left entirely without help. Nor are the blessings of God confined to solely one people, even though by carrying out fully his commandments, there is received by those who have taken upon them fully his name to follow after the way he has pointed out, a greater blessing, with a greater power for service. Physical healing is not the only nor even the greatest blessing of God.

The discussion above refers principally to the human mechanism of healing. There can be of course no real comparison between the methods laid down in the law of God and any other.

In that truly divine plan there is required: "Is any sick among you?"

1. "Let him call for the elders of the church."

These are men called of God and appointed to that task. It is here that all others fail.

2. "And let them pray over him.

3. "Anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord."

4. "And the prayer of faith shall heal the sick."

Then the promise follows: "And the Lord shall raise him up."

And also: "If he have committed any sins, they shall be forgiven him."

Thus is combined physical and spiritual healing.

For this reason, these healings by others should not disturb us. We rejoice for the help that is received by those who are sick, and rejoice for the spirit of devotion shown, but we would urge, Be not deceived; follow after the Master, and keep all of his commandments. There is nothing then in heaven or on the earth that is not possible unto us, if only we follow after him with sufficient devotion and consecrated purpose.

Uniform Dress at Graceland

The women students at Graceland College have adopted rules that will affect commencement this year and school period costumes next year.

After considerable discussion, all actuated by the most friendly feelings and the utmost harmony, the women students at Graceland recently adopted a final report of a sub-committee of their choosing on the uniform dress problem as follows:

"1. Resolved, that we adopt a uniformity of dress, consisting of a black, dark blue, butcher's blue, or white middy blouse, and black, dark blue, butcher's blue, or white skirt, or Peter Pan dress of any of these colors and low-heeled shoes. This costume shall be donned in the morning and worn during school period. This resolution shall be put into effect at the beginning of the next school year.

"2. Resolved, that for commencement exercises the dresses shall be white in color, of a moderate price, and of simple material, as organdy or voile. They shall be made simply and not as evening gowns, and all shall be a uniform distance from the floor. This shall become effective at this year's commencement."

Their original resolution was quite expressive of the spirit that makes for finer ideals, better manhood and womanhood. While we have not been especially concerned over the dress problem at Graceland, we have no doubt this action will cause rejoicing in many a mother's heart who has sent or will send her girl to Graceland College. It means fewer heartaches, less extravagances, more contentment, and consequently more efficiency.

Their original action was to adopt the following:

"Resolved, that the women students of Graceland College, in order to be in more perfect harmony with the Zionie ideal of equality, petition the faculty and supervisory committee of this institution to establish a uniformity of dress for girls, this to include the dress for graduation exercises."

May we hope that some day the women of this church, actuated by this ideal and skilled in the art of combining beauty and utility in clothing, will set the pace in a similar sensible, wholesome decision of this kind? We shall cherish such a desire, fondly believing it will come.

Valuable Series of Sermons

In this week's issue we are publishing the first of a series of sermons delivered by President Elbert A. Smith, at the Zion Builder Services for the young people of Lamoni. These sermons will be printed in pamphlet form and may be secured by order from the Herald Publishing House. Prices will be announced. Though delivered in Lamoni, they are dedicated to the young builders of Zion everywhere.

Surveys of Infancy

A recent survey was made in New Bedford, Massachusetts, to determine a baby's chance of living beyond its first year. Unskilled and semiskilled occupations predominate. Wages were low at the time the survey was made, and this resulted in poor home-sanitation, congestion, lack of adequate medical care, and mothers who were overworked to earn more in the factories. Where the fathers earned less than sufficient for a decent standard of living, the mothers had to work in the cotton mills. Thus nearly half were gainfully employed during the year before the baby was born, and 40 per cent in the year following the birth.

The harmful results of depriving a young baby of its mother's care and nursing show that where mothers left to go to work when the baby was less than four months old, the mortality was nearly twice the average rate. In the low wage group, twenty babies out of every hundred born alive, died before the end of the first year. In the highest wage group, only six out of every hundred died.

The next time, a survey was made in Akron, Ohio, which shows an infant mortality of eighty-six per thousand births. This is compared with New Zealand cities, as Dunedin, where the rate is only forty-six. This report confirms all previous reports that where the father's earnings increase, infant mortality falls. When the father's earnings are not sufficient, the death rate rises. The mortality among children of native mothers was much lower than in the case of foreign-born mothers, especially in digestive and respiratory diseases.

The death rate among babies artificially fed was found to be four times as great as among those breast fed.

Reports show that a decided increase in health facilities is needed for the protection both of babies and mothers.

The New College Building

We note from the Lamoni Chronicle that the new brick building, designed by Church Architect Henry C. Smith, and erected under his direction during the past one and a half years, is now completed, and will be open for use in about a week.

The building is 105 by 65 feet; two stories high. Failure to secure the necessary material changed the plan to make it three stories. It is commodious and modern, and has been erected at a cost of about $90,000. The building is fireproof, being built of steel and brick; the window casings, floor supports, and doors are all of metal; the floors and stairway of cement. A large fan ventilating system is installed to insure circulation. It will be steam heated, as are the other buildings.

This same account states that the upper floor has been temporarily fitted to be used as a dormitory—six large rooms being subdivided for reception room and bedrooms. Two small rooms on the east side will be used by the dean of women. The first floor and basement will be devoted to class use.

Elder D. T. Williams, after the close of the meetings at Philadelphia, March 27, paid a short visit to Elkton and Elks Mills, thence to Brooklyn. His effort on Friday night, April 1, at Brooklyn, was spoken of in the communion service Sunday morning as the most sublime and soul-stirring sermon they had ever listened to in Brooklyn.

From there he proceeded to Scranton, Pennsylvania, for Sunday, then on to Buffalo, and from there on to Toronto, to open the one week's services April 10 to 17 inclusive.

"Any Afflicted . . . Any Sick?"

By Arthur Leverton

A discussion of the differences between affliction and sickness as related to healing by prayer and administration.

"Is any among you afflicted? let him pray. Is any merry? let him sing psalms. Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him."—James 5: 13, 14.

By the discussions and various opinions which have been had, and which we have listened to, especially on the first clause of verse 13 which reads, "Is any afflicted? let him pray," we have been forced to the conclusion that there did not appear to be a definite line drawn between what is affliction and what is sickness. Some have taken the position that if a person were distressed with pain through the effects of headache or toothache, he should pray, for that was affliction; and it was not in harmony with the law to send for the elders to come and administer in such cases.

Again, a person may meet with an accident and get severely hurt, his body crushed, bones broken, and flesh badly lacerated. Well, says one, that is affliction; he should pray. No says another; in severe cases like that they should call for the elders and be administered to. But, says another, what about neuralgia? Why, says some one, that is an affliction, and prayer is the antidote for its removal. But, says another, neuralgia is a sickness, and sometimes kills people. Oh, says the other, that is when it gets near the heart; of course it does then sometimes become fatal.

So we have to conclude from the above argument that neuralgia is an affliction if it keeps a certain distance from the heart, and it makes no difference how much suffering, distress, and pain may have to be endured by the patient, prayer is the remedy for its cure or removal. On the other hand, if the said affliction comes within a certain region in proximity to the heart, then it becomes a sickness and the elders should be sent for at once, and the ordinance of administration attended to without delay. But where shall we discover the line that separates affliction from sickness? I have had many try to define the line, but none have ever been able to do so to my satisfaction when they amalgamate affliction and sickness.

Again, sore eyes has been pronounced an affliction, yet Jesus administered to the blind. (See Mark 7: 32-35; 8: 22-25; John 9: 6, 7.) So not being able to get a reliable definition from such arguments as the above to the word of the Lord in question, and believing the ordinances of God should be administered with intelligence, I therefore (some years ago) appealed to the Lord for a proper understanding of those scriptures. And still, at times hearing the same old arguments advanced, I thought I would give my understanding of those scriptures aforesaid; not to find fault with any, but hoping and praying that it may be a means to help to arrive at a better understanding.

"Is any merry? let him sing psalms." I think it will be admitted by all that merriment is a condition of the mind. And when the mind becomes exceedingly affected with merriment, it must have an outlet somewhere or somehow. Some employ very improper means to exhaust their merriment (which the Saints of God should always avoid), for the apostle here says, "Let him sing psalms." The Apostle Paul says, "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord." (Colossians 3:16.)

"Is any among you afflicted? let him pray." Despondency, melancholy, sorrow, and grief are also conditions of the mind. I ask, Is there no remedy for that poor soul who has been overtaken with misfortune, who has brought sadness, sorrow, grief, and despondency upon him? Yes, thank the Lord, there is: "Let them pray." Such people are mentally afflicted but not physically sick. So it would be of little or no use to call for the elders to administer to them (unless their mental depression was so great and continued so long that it brought on physical sickness), but they can go to the Lord in prayer and seek relief and comfort at the throne of grace.

Twice—yes, three times—in my life, I have proved this to be a fact. It is true, the circumstances were different in each case. I was physically well, but my mind was sorely afflicted; so much so that for a time I had but little rest night or day, for sleep had departed from my eyes. My appetite failed me and I became reduced in stature. In each case I took my trouble to the Lord, and thanks be to my heavenly Father, it was while I was pleading at the throne of grace, I received permanent relief. So I can say from experience, "Is any among you afflicted [in mind]? let him pray."

"Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him."

I think it will be conceded by all that he has reference to those who are or may be stricken with disease, and who are physically sick. And I have no idea that it makes any difference what the disease may be, either headache, toothache, pneumonia, or smallpox, it is God's appointed remedy for the sick. And if I am sick and feel that I must have help and relief, then this is the Lord's prescription for his faithful and confiding children.

But in verse 16 there is a preparation to be had in order that the blessing of health may be obtained, viz: "Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much."

Therefore, let us as God's children be obedient to the whole law, and not seek to obtain a full blessing on only a partial obedience. Let us remember to confess our faults one to another, and pray one for another as well as send for the elders of the church, when we are sick, that the blessing from our heavenly Father may be obtained.

Frederick W. Blanchard, 46 Chatham Street, East Lynn, Massachusetts, writes us that the work there has been again opened in a small hall, and he would like the names and addresses of any Saints or friends living in Lynn or its vicinity, as they wish to locate all of those who are sufficiently near and have them meet with them.

The Saints at Rupert, Idaho, are organized and the branch is in a flourishing condition. They meet in a hall and hold regular services. Sister J. L. Benson was taken to the Sanitarium but is much improved. One baptism recently. Easter services well attended.

The young people and choir of the Akron, Ohio, Branch gave an appreciated musicale on the evening of March 25. A nicely balanced program was rendered and Saints and non-members gave appreciative audience.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

EUROPE LOOKS FOR SECOND ADVENT OF CHRIST

Des Moines Evening Tribune of March 14, quotes Bishop Nicholai of Serbia, who says European civilization is in danger.

Bishop Nicholai of Serbia, called by the Archbishop of Canterbury, "the greatest churchman in the world," is in Des Moines to-day with an amazing message from the heart of stricken Europe.

"Europe is very sick," said the bishop, "sick at heart, in spirit and in body.

"Glorious in war, in peace Europe is on the way to losing her soul.

"I do not come for money, but to beg you to help us in our great moral crisis, which is the real emergency."

The bishop, who is only forty years old, and the youngest bishop in the Greek Church, was brought to the city by the open forum department of the Des Moines women's club. He will speak to-night at Hoyt Sherman Place.

During the day he speaks at East and West High Schools, at Drake University, and before the Chamber of Commerce and social workers.

Idealism in Eclipse

"The cause of the European situation is that now each individual is the center of his own petty, selfish dreams—there is no vision of great glory.

"Of course, it was expected that after the war would come reactions from the years of glory and self-sacrifice. But none expected such corruption as obtrudes its loathsome head.

"The moral weakness of Europe to-day is far more definite than her material weakness.

"Destruction may have stopped, but construction has not yet begun."

End of World Coming?

"You have heard the history of the end of Babylon? of old Greece? of Pompeii and ancient Rome? Well, you can read the signs of a dying empire on the bodies of the European state to-day.

"Just before the end of those ancient empires, belief in immortality died. It is dead or dying in Europe to-day.

"It is curious, to-day, to note how much talk there is of the world's end in every European country. The press is full of it (shamefacedly, but irresistibly), as are the mouths of men.

"Religionists pray for Christ to come again.

"From the common people you will receive the direct, open assurance that Christ will come again, ere long. It is most curious."

Second Coming of Christ

"In one section, an interesting state of mind exists. Conviction that the Son of Man will soon reappear on earth is absolute. They say he is now 'in the clouds,' and speak of him as the 'aërial Christ.'

"Unbelief is general, but the unbelievers have turned superstitious. They talk of spiritism and of dreams; Britain is swept by a belief in fairies.

"There have been of late revivals of belief in charms and talismans, in occult signs, black magic, fortune telling. And the few absolute atheists think and talk, 'carpe diem,' which means, 'enjoy the day.' They think they will perish on the morrow.

"I wonder if here in America you have heard about the soul-corrupting, nerve-exciting, mind-killing motion pictures films which, amazingly filthy, have been spread all over Germany for old and young to see."

Debaucheries

"I wonder if you have heard of the thievery in hotels, railway trains, and private homes, of the murders throughout Europe, of the orgies of divorce.

"While the birth rate drops, marriage has become a saturnalian profanation among certain classes.

"I know you have heard of the starving children, for you have given to them with a splendid generosity which even callous Europe notes.

"Who else cares for those little bits of human flesh and soul? Only God, apparently—God and the Anglo-Saxons!

"Europe is forgetting childhood."

Not Here for Money

"I have not come to beg money for Europe; there has been too much of that. One does not give a drunkard money with which to buy more drink.

"I think America can overcome her own corruption, and give the world leadership. The world is faint for leadership.

"To you doers of the impossible, Europe looks for moral leadership far more than for money—for material help, but far more for spiritual inspiration, religious revival, new education, new civilization, new Christianity."

CHRISTIANITY AND THE WAR

A question which has often been asked during the last few years is, "Why did not Christianity prevent the war?" This is how the matter has been put by an able thinker, and his words are eminently worthy of consideration by those who have had the same problem to face:

"It never occurred to anyone to ask why science did not prevent the war. And I never heard anyone ask, 'Why did not big business or the newspapers or the universities prevent the war?' It never seemed to occur to anyone that commerce or the press or education could avert such disasters. . . . It was a mighty tribute which men paid to the strength of spiritual forces when they said, sometimes wistfully and sometimes with a sneer, 'Why did not Christianity prevent this war?' Well, why didn't it? I have my own idea about that. I have the feeling that it was because we did not have enough of Christianity on hand in the summer of 1914, and what we had was not always of the right sort."

This goes to the heart of the matter. It was not the fault of Christianity, but, on the contrary, it was the absence of real Christianity that led to the war. We must always be careful lest we draw wrong conclusions or attribute to Christianity something with which it has little or nothing to do. It can be said without any question that, if those who commenced the war had been actuated by genuine Christianity, the catastrophe would never have happened.—Toronto Globe, March 5, 1921.

On the occasion of his leaving the managership of Lamoni Electric Co., at Lamoni, Iowa, in order to devote his time to musical work throughout the church, the employees of the institution surprised Elder Harold C. Burgess by the giving of a most useful gift. On the evening of April 1 they called at his home en masse and spent the evening pleasantly. Upon leaving, they rolled out a barrel which was apparently full of typical April Fool material, but which divulged at the bottom a new Remington portable typewriter.

The church has indorsed the Boy Scout movement. Are you talking for the church or against the church in this respect?—Boys Department.

PASTORAL

Administrative Methods and Ideals in the Lamoni Stake

(Concluded.)

By Edward D. Moore

Some distinctive ways in which a stake organization functions, as demonstrated in the only Iowa stake.

Silencing of Priesthood

There is always a possibility that causes will arise demanding official attention for wrongdoing or failure on the part of those holding the priesthood. This may even lead to the calling in of the license of the one in error, it being considered better that one man be thus dealt with than for the whole people to suffer.

So in Lamoni Stake there have been some cases of official silence, in which the men affected have been asked to hand over their official licenses until such time as they may have taken approved steps to remove the cause for action.

Yet this, save in extreme cases, requiring immediate action, is not done hastily. The man himself is labored with, prayerfully and with patience, in all ordinary instances, and given opportunity for repentance and restitution. If this is not forthcoming, an order of silence is promulgated. No public notice is given except in case the one adversely affected persists in acting as if still authorized, or in the event other interests of the church seem to require. It is always possible for the one affected by silence imposed to appeal to the First Presidency of the church for a rehearing of the whole case.

This has created a situation whereby the interests of the various quorums of priesthood in the stake are also safeguarded. Quorums are now free to enroll all resident ordained men in their respective quorums or divisions, without special inquiry as to the standing of the individual, relying on the investigation and indorsement of the proper officials in the administrative department. One silenced is automatically removed from quorum activity till the silence is removed.

In like manner, the quorums have no occasion for sections in their constitutions barring those who use tobacco, for none who use the weed are knowingly allowed to officiate among the Saints.

Auditing of Accounts

With some fifty thousand dollars handled each year by the stake bishopric, and a large number of departmental funds still handled by respective treasurers, the problem of proper audit of these accounts is no small one.

In March, 1913, there was a consolidation of auditing interests in the coordination of all stake auditing under the charge of one committee, a member elected by the stake, the Sunday school, and the Religio. This continued in effect in the stake till an arrangement was effected in June, 1919, whereby all funds of the stake organization of the church, and its various departments involved, are audited by an auditor nominated by the stake presidency, and elected by the conference.

A like system is in vogue in Lamoni Branch, having been put in effect January 1, 1920.

Secretarial and Recording Work

Because of the large volume of business handled in the office of the stake presidency and secretary-recorder, and in order to provide that the detail work be done by one remunerated for the service, and answerable as to time and efficiency, as well as to insure convenient access to the records, the office assistant of the stake presidency is annually elected to handle the work of secretary-recorder. All minutes of the conferences, branch business meetings, changes in roster of names—in fact the routine usually handled by branch and stake clerks, is thus done by an elective, paid assistant.

The new arrangement whereby the general church statistician deals with the branches of a stake entirely through the stake office, further effects a centralization demanding such action. So it is that all affairs for the stake in connection with the statistical department are handled by the assistant in the office of the stake presidency.

This gives the necessary access to the records without any duplication of work. Furthermore, since the offices of the stake presidency and bishopric are in the Herald Office Building, with fireproof vaults convenient, safety from loss is assured; an item of much importance.

Selection of General Conference Delegates

The problem of choosing the most representative delegates to the General Conferences of the church is a momentous one in the stakes, where the attendance is much greater than the delegation list.

A custom has developed here whereby, in accordance with stake conference resolution, the stake presidency are considered a standing committee on nomination for this purpose, and invariably their nominations have been indorsed as the choice of the body.

In order to secure a consensus of opinion, the stake presidency sent out some three years ago a questionnaire to the priesthood and to others asking that consideration and discussion be had as to the qualifications for a delegate. Individuals and quorums gave the matter due consideration, made report, and the answers though varying as much as the individuals answering, have aided materially in the work of nominating.

Spiritual Manifestations

Every encouragement is offered the Saints to make the utmost spiritual development, yet as every thoughtful Saint realizes, where the genuine in outward spiritual manifestations exists the counterfeit is apt to appear. Seeking the best good of all the people all the time, the presidency of the stake have created a situation whereby the Saints expect as members in general and individuals in particular, to be protected from any influence manifested in public meeting not wholesome, or not of God.

So in the exercise of the outward gifts of the gospel, if a member is perceived to be moved by his own enthusiasm, or by some power manifestly not of God, those in charge have kindly but firmly handled the situation as it arose, seeking to exercise the wisdom God demands with the spirit of discernment.

Division of Stake Work

The responsibility of caring for the spiritual interest of Lamoni Branch is rather a heavy one, requiring considerable personal attention; and the direct supervision of the work throughout the stake must be given special consideration. To this end, the three members of the presidency, John F. Garver, Cyril E. Wight, and Daniel T. Williams have arranged between themselves that the president shall be responsible for all administrative matters, and for the general supervision and direction of the work in all its parts. Cyril E. Wight functions as office man, along with his work as instructor in connection with the class in religious education at Graceland College. Daniel T. Williams is charged with the responsibility as field man, to care for the interests of outside branches and general extension work, such as appointments out from the branches, including Lamoni.

Sometimes as many as ten of these appointments are filled simultaneously from Lamoni, often looked after by the branch or group of Saints living in the community, sometimes in the care of an elder residing in Lamoni.

While these general arbitrary divisions and assignments are observed, the presidency work as a unit in all matters of policy, method, etc., and each in the several departments above designated as occasion may require.

Division of Priesthood Work in Lamoni Branch

In the management of the ministerial work in Lamoni Branch there has been developed a plan which anticipates that each member holding the priesthood and not disqualified for active labor, has a definite assignment. In some cases these assignments are necessarily heavier and more multiplied than in others, according to the ability and disposition of those laboring, and the needs of the work; but the ideal is that every man of God be engaged profitably in the great preparational work of the church, that Zion conditions may be developed.

With this ideal is the allied hope that no member shall be left without the personal ministrations of those interested in and responsible for his soul's welfare.

The religious services held at the church, in the institutions, and in the church homes of Lamoni are all under the general supervision of the branch presidency, with men in direct charge under their appointment.

In accordance with the decision of the church a few years ago, the offices of presiding priest, presiding teacher, and presiding deacon are abolished, and in their stead the work is so divided and assigned that the men of the various orders are responsible directly to those in charge of the work.

One deacon is appointed as custodian of the church property, in charge of the church building and grounds and responsible for their care. Another is in charge of relief for the poor, etc. Another is made responsible for the ushering and order at the services, which he attends to with assistants. Still another is responsible for the collection and disbursement of all the finances of the branch.

The branch president, custodian deacon, and finance deacon, acting as a committee, an annual budget is decided on and presented to the branch for ratification, setting forth the various items requiring funds for the coming year. The deacons under appointment visit the homes of the members and raise in cash and pledges at the beginning of the year the funds necessary for the maintenance of the branch work.

An elder is held responsible for the selection and placing of the eighteen priests necessary to distribute the emblems at the monthly sacrament meetings.

In the thirteen urban and two rural districts arbitrarily set off in the territory comprising the Lamoni Branch, the branch presidency semiannually appointed men to look after the pastoral work. The plan is that in each of these districts (called groups in some other communities) composed of from eighteen to thirty-four families, according to convenience of location, a high priest or elder, priest, teacher, and deacon are assigned. The high priest or elder is made responsible for the work of visiting the membership, and other general pastoral requirements, to be assisted by the remaining brethren, with the duty of reporting monthly the exact situation in the district, number of families visited, by whom, etc. A district, then, in this relation, comes to have much the same aspect so far as pastoral attention is concerned as does a small branch, looked after by a corresponding set of officers.

Four wards are recognized for prayer meeting purposes, and in three of these a prayer service is held, in the fourth two like services being held each Wednesday evening, except the third in each month, when a union service is held at the church. On the same general plan a weekly prayer meeting for young people is held at the church and another at Graceland College.

Prayer meetings are held at the two Saints' Homes each Wednesday evening, as are sacrament service on the first Sunday of the month, in charge of men specially appointed; and as is also a preaching service each Sunday evening.

The children and employees at the Children's Home attend the church and other general services as they desire, with no special public meetings provided for them.

An extensive card index system is maintained in the office of the branch presidency, recording not only the official activities of all members of the priesthood under appointment, but a careful notation of the personnel and location and spiritual condition of each family, times and dates families are visited, etc.

When a family is visited by one or more of the priesthood, they who visit are given credit for the work and the family is charged with having been visited on a certain date. The monthly reports being entered promptly, indicate at all times the situation as to the priesthood in charge, and the membership affected.

It is one of the expressed ideals of the presidency of the branch that, should the need arise, a call might be sent out into the various districts of the town and through the officials the entire membership be reached within a few hours. To a large extent this is possible to-day.

It is a further and greater ideal that no member of the priesthood may have occasion for lack of development and opportunity for experience, nor that any member may righteously complain that he has been neglected and overlooked in the personal and godly ministrations of the servants upon whom God has laid the responsibility for the leadership of the flock.

While there has developed a strongly centralized government in the branch and stake, there is perhaps a wider distribution of effort and a more personal and individual responsibility toward God and the people than ever before.

The Stake Bishopric

The spiritual and the financial interests of the stake go hand in hand, there being as already indicated the most favorable sort of cooperation between these departments, separate in some aspects, but inseparably bound up in others.

The financial work of the stake is well organized, under the direction of Bishop Albert Carmichael, with Alvah J. Yarrington and Richard J. Lambert as counselors. The latter has been out of the stake for several years, in charge of important work in Independence.

Elder Yarrington is constantly at the office except as the demands of the work take him out among the Saints.

In addition to the usual collection of tithes, offerings, and surplus, and the care of the needy, the bishopric have had in operation for several years a well-organized insurance department. Reliable companies are represented and the customary premiums charged, but the profits accruing revert to the funds of the church.

A real estate department is maintained, affording impartial information to buyer and seller, often invaluable to those who from a distance would make inquiries looking toward a change of location and bettering of their situation.

In the various branches local solicitors are appointed by and responsible to the bishopric, for the collection of all funds, reporting monthly.

In Lamoni all relief work among the poor and needy has been centralized in this department, the bishopric being greatly assisted by the relief deacon above mentioned. Some of this work was previously under the care of various departments of church work, such as the Sunday school and Religio.

In this office they have developed large wall maps, well mounted on framed wall board, showing all Iowa and Missouri counties of the Lamoni Stake.

These maps were made by securing large topographical county maps, trimming all the edges, and joining them when mounting. The effect is very striking, with the maps, drawn to a scale of three fourths of an inch to a mile, showing all township and section lines, county road systems, schools, and churches, in addition to towns, streams, and woods.

Colored tacks have been inserted to show the following points at a glance: Schools, churches not Latter Day Saint, Latter Day Saint churches, Latter Day Saint branches and churches, Latter Day Saint members, bishop's solicitors, coal mines.

As the industrial features of this department develop, other items will be carried graphically, and the results be most gratifying indeed. It inspires one with the possibilities of such maps, which will no doubt include soil maps, products maps, etc., till one can in a few minutes visualize the whole situation from an economic standpoint.

An addressograph mailing list of all the membership is maintained in this office, and the communications of import are sent out through the circular letter method, some of these letters having appeared in the HERALD the past season.

This office has charge of the transportation system required to carry on the preaching appointments out from Lamoni. When possible, those living in the community where the preaching is done are required to see to the conveyance of the speaker to and from his place of appointment, but when this is not possible such arrangements are made from Lamoni. Through the kindness of those brethren who own automobiles, not only the preachers are thus conveyed, but often a goodly corps of musicians, skilled in vocal and instrumental work, to the support of the services as held.

Because of the consistent work and teaching done by this department, the average of tithe-paying membership is commendably high, as compared with other sections of the church.

In cases of transgression requiring court action, the stake bishopric act as the court of original jurisdiction in the case, but they seldom have occasion to officiate in this capacity, few cases coming up for trial.

Summary

The above is all set forth largely as items of fact, based on conditions in the Lamoni Stake and branch of to-day and yesterday.

The following is a summarized survey of the situation presented herewith, as it appears to the writer, who has been on the grounds as an interested participant and observer for a number of years.

Larger bodies of Saints require stronger and more closely knit organization. The ideals of the church, its recorded statutes, its underlying principles, the demands of efficiency, seem to lead to a more and more definite program and assignment of responsibility.

Coordination as seen in operation under the unifying influence of the Spirit of God, is but the common impulse of God's children to work together in peace and happiness. It is but the natural desire to advise and confer and secure

The Economic Independence of the Church

By Max Carmichael

This article, the sixth in the series on Zionie problems, argues that only by faith in the stewardship plan may we hope to attain the necessary economic independence as an organization.

How is the church to accomplish its second aim with the economic and industrial possibilities of the regions of Zion? Or in other words how is the church to be brought into economic independence, at least, relative independence? For we necessarily can be independent only to a degree and not in the absolute. So long as nations continue to control the earth, economic independence absolutely is an impossibility. When our Savior comes, conditions may be different. The second aim means that within the church, within those who are willing to work according to the law of stewardships and consecrations, all the industries which take the necessities of life from the producer to the consumer must exist. This is its final meaning, its absolute meaning. We shall be able to approximate it only.

This second aim is absolutely predicated upon the first aim. We cannot work out this economic independence until there are a sufficient number living in economic equality and in accordance with the law of stewardships who can man all the necessary industries to establish this economic independence. Thus the second aim of the church is sequential to the first aim. It cannot come until the first aim is quite materially reached with quite a number of people. It will come to the same degree as the people of the church decide to live according to the law of stewardships. It will follow the accomplishment of the first one easily.

It absolutely cannot precede the first aim. Any attempt to gather the Saints into the regions round about, and establish all the necessary industries essential to complete satisfaction of needs and wants, with these people not living according to the law of stewardships, as was done in Nauvoo, will end in failure. Such a plan is bound to end in disunion, ruin, corruption, and vice. Living according to the law of stewardships or living in temporal equality is the only guarantee of spiritual equality, the only guarantee that the people can live together in righteousness. By no means let us as a church attempt to establish the essential industries of a com-the best wisdom available—that the best results might accrue. It is not a thing to be coerced, nor in any way foisted upon those who do not understand it fully, nor have occasion to impugn the motives of those who are directly affected. It is but common consent, highly developed.

A strongly centralized form of government requires the confidence of the people, for its success or failure is more immediately apparent. Yet those who have created the situation have always the privilege of changing it. It does centralize responsibility, but never relieves the people from their sacred duties: the development of those higher qualities which induce the best leadership and bring the possessors thereof to higher and definite goals.

The conditions of to-day demand new methods of management, the best system, the finest of men. As we respect in their office those whom God has chosen, he will more fully respect them as his servants, and help them to develop the qualities of leadership to keep in advance of those who develop as followers.

munity except by and through the agency of those who are and have been living according to the doctrine of stewardships. Let us rather throw our energies into getting the people to live individually according to this doctrine of stewardships than to throw our energy into getting industries established in our midst by people who are not thoroughly consecrated.

Stewardships Essential

Thorough consecration cannot be guaranteed by any other method than the law of stewardships. Zion is redeemed in the individual hearts of men, as each man becomes willing and does live according to the doctrine of stewardships and consecration, but Zion as a social group or as a collection of individuals can only be when we have a sufficient number willing to live upon a temporal equality as to make it possible to maintain the essential industries to supply needs and just wants of those so working.

As men become willing to use their surplus energy, faculties, and property for the common good of mankind under God's common scheme and in accordance with the decisions of the tribunals and officers appointed to administer and to carry out this scheme, these officers representing all the members will more or less wield an influence upon the direction or upon the industries and vocations into which this excess faculty and property will be directed. Into what industries or occupations will this surplus be first directed? Will there be any sequence of industries that the church will foster? History has already answered the first part of this question. The first occupation that surplus energies, faculties, and property has been used for is the ecclesiastical one, the missionary, the salesman of our gospel, if you please.

This is quite logical. To carry out the scheme of God, we must convert. It was the mission given by Christ to go into all the world and preach the gospel. To carry out the redemption of the race we must seek adherents, so that these adherents may in turn help us to carry the gospel to the rest of the world. There is no doubt but that the bulk of our energies and property will always be toward the missionary effort. Tithing is especially laid aside for that work, and no doubt a great proportion of our surplus property existing after the payment of tithing will be used for that purpose, either directly or indirectly. Many of our members are willing to pay tithing, if they are not willing to live up to the full requirements of God's plan. This money will always be available to keep stewards at work in the missionary field.

After the missionary came the local pastor. Our adherents must be kept alive in the faith and must be worked up to this common scheme of industrial cooperation and temporal equality. This field will perhaps increase in numbers. There will be an increasing number of local pastors working fully under the law of stewardships whether they give full time to the actual church work or only part, working at other work.

The next occupation which seemed to find willing stewards was the field of secular education, as represented in the faculty of Graceland College. Quite natural. These people next to the preachers see the need of propaganda first. They see the need of industrial, vocational, and æsthetic training for the young prior to the possible accomplishment of the Zionie scheme and as a prerequisite to the wise exercise of our individual stewardships.

Historical Order Not Necessary

This historical order of first, ministers, and second, educators, adopting the stewardship plan was not a necessary order, merely a natural one. If we had had the members willing, any ordinary business man who owns his own business, or the ordinary wage earner working for a large corporation could enter the stewardship plan as early in the history of the church as the missionary. In fact, we cannot see that there is any necessarily logical order for the adoption of stewardships for particular lines of business.

You will note that none of these stewardships have involved the use of private property as capital, but the use only of such properties as may be held in common or held in trust for the church. In other words these stewards are using property, the title of which lies in others than themselves. True they may have spent their own money in preparing themselves for these positions, and in this sense they are using their own capital. But in the main these stewards are appropriating every excess energy rather than excess property to the good of mankind. Just the same they are each giving over to the church the equivalent of the excess property which they might otherwise be acquiring and saving up by virtue of their power of excess energies. They are each year giving to the church thousands of dollars worth of excess energy, which, if they were working out in the world, would bring them an income above their needs and just wants, and would allow them to accumulate an excess of property. There is no more reason for these ministers and educators doing this than any man with an excess of property. He like them should use this excess property for the establishment of Zion.

Some Fundamental Activities

Before going to a further answer of our main question under this heading, let us repeat some of the fundamental lines of business of human society, which must work together in order to make Zion independent, to wit, agriculture, raising the fundamentals of life in the way of food, mining, digging from the earth the essential minerals and fuels for industrial life, lumbering, transportation, communication, manufacturing all the fundamentals of human consumption in the way of clothing, food, and shelter, and æsthetic enjoyment of life, financing, banking, systems of distribution in the way of brokers, wholesale houses, and retail stores.

No one of these lines of industries needs to be picked out first for the application of stewardships. A man working in any one of these lines, whether using his own property or some one else's as regards terrestrial title, may adopt the stewardship plan, and he will help redeem Zion. Business conditions of the day may make it easier to start the stewardship plan in operation where the capital is owned by the steward upon certain lines of business than upon others. We have made some progress in the establishment of stewardships with retail stores and a laundry. Also some of our small farmers are willing to so operate. But there is no religious reason why a farmer who owns his own land should work upon the stewardship basis rather than an operator of a locomotive for a large railroad corporation.

We Can All Begin Now

It is true that we are laying some emphasis upon retail store and farming stewardships right now. This does not give the worker in a large packing industry an excuse to wait for farmers of our church to adopt the stewardship plan. The worker in the meat-packing industry should begin now. We realize that we are commanded to buy land. This is not because farming stewardships are to be emphasized over other industries, but because land is the basic wealth, not only of agriculture, but of all business. It is the source of all raw material, mineral as well as agricultural. To begin to be independent, we must have land.

One reason perhaps why we are emphasizing the stewardship of the farmer just now is that the farm is the one industry of our land which is still left in the hands of the many, as the ownership of the land is not concentrated. For example, it would be much easier for us to work out a full stewardship for the farmer upon his own farm, than for us as a church to work out a full and complete stewardship basis for an oil-producing firm. Oil is too much monopolized already. Likewise retail stores are not in such large monopolies or business organizations. We can work out the details of the application of the stewardship plan upon such industries as these better than upon largely monopolized industries, as meat packing. But the reason is one that is characterized more by business expediency than by anything arising out of religious law. These industries, farming and retailing, being more simple in their organization as a working unit than meat packing, offer the better opportunity to work the stewardship plan out upon the working unit as a whole. We wish to emphasize hard that every man, no matter what work, trade, profession, or business he is in, may and should enter upon the stewardship plan.

It will probably take us longer to get industries which are characterized by large monopolies under the full stewardship plan. Yet in time as more and more of the individual personal units of our church membership adopt the stewardship plan, we will be able to work out a system of united action. It will be accomplished as men come forward who are able to work in the meat-packing industry, for instance, and are willing to work under the stewardship plan such an industry. Such will come in its time. We cannot hurry it much, except by conversion of the individuals of the church to the stewardship theory. We must emphasize right here that the first requisite to this second aim is a sufficient number of men of all vocations willing to work on the stewardship plan. This we have repeatedly emphasized. We cannot first secure the land and then find farmers willing to work upon the stewardship plan. We must first find the personnel and then secure the property. We cannot first secure a meat-packing industry and then find stewards. We must first find willing and capable stewards. As these men come forward, the machinery and details of cooperation will easily be worked out. No one need be afraid of that.

The Element of Faith

In fact, the first question and the first difficulty to be surmounted is the question of faith in the stewardship plan. It is not a question as to which of the various essential industries will be put on the stewardship plan first. They will be put on the stewardship plan much at the same time, although not necessarily. As our farmers adopt this plan, we will need bankers to adopt, meat packers to adopt, etc. Some are quite concerned over what business relationships will prevail under the stewardship plan, and are holding back from adopting the stewardship idea. This is an excuse and does not justify failure to act as a steward. As men come forward willing to work upon the stewardship plan, questions and details of business relationships will fall into insignificance. For instance, the relationship of title, the relationship of employer and employee, and the problems arising out of them will be easily solved. When we are willing to work upon the right basis as stewards, the question of who holds the title to the excess property, the question of whether we shall continue to work under a wage system or not, the question as to who shall manage an industry, the question as to what form or shape that management shall take, will become insignificant. The stewardship plan is the very solution of these problems, and that plan is a simple one. Let us see.

We Must All Consecrate Our Surplus

First of all, then, let every man who desires to see these problems solved for himself, and not for the other person, let every man who will, whether he works for himself or for some one else for wages, express his willingness to work upon the stewardship basis. Let him then work up to his maximum efficiency. If he is a workingman and is working for an employer out of the church, he doubtless will work at market wages. He in time will accumulate a surplus. If he is a capitalist, and works up to maximum efficiency, he also doubtlessly will begin to accumulate a surplus. They will then be willing to consult with the common tribunal or judge as to the best disposition of this surplus for the redemption of Zion. If he is working for the church directly, and is merely getting his just needs and wants in the way of a monthly or weekly distribution, he has already consulted the common judge as to the disposition of his excess powers. He has by his own consent already given over the management of his excess powers to the church. But as to the first two mentioned, who have surplus of their own in their own possession, they will after consultation with the common tribunal give part of the surplus to the relief of the poor of the church and of the world and part to our various church programs, as Graceland College and other schools. They will be willing to pay more of their surplus in the way of public taxes for better public schools and for better communities, but a part of their surplus they will want to invest in business enterprises, enterprises which are essential to the growing independence of Zion. Thus the capitalist and the wage earner, both with surplus energy and property, through their consultation with the common judges, the church advisers, will see where they can work together in the development of these industries essential to Zion's independence.

Further, when both are willing to work on the stewardship plan, and do work upon it, they can work out these essential industries of Zion upon any system of industrial relationships. They can work together in any business or industrial relationship, partnership, or corporation, or by one loaning his surplus to the other with security, or without security, or by both merging the title of their surplus so far as this government is concerned in some one else, with or without security. No doubt their business relationships will be secured by the same business security that those of the surrounding world are.

About Those Who Quit

But, says one, suppose one wishes to quit the stewardship plan. Let him quit. We certainly don't want him with us for our own safety, let alone his own desire. But, says one, suppose this particular steward, as the educator, has merged the title of his excess property in the church and then decides to quit, what can he do about his property? Nothing, of course. But let him quit. We shall not still try to use his brains or excess capacity, if he does not want us to. Well, says one, suppose the steward, the title to whose excess property is not all merged in the church, wants to quit. He has an advantage over the other steward who has given title to all. Certainly. But just the same let him quit. We don't want him. The church, the other member, and Jesus Christ have no concern as to the relative advantages and disadvantages of material wealth of the quitters. Our law needs to make no provision for the quitters. They are not necessarily contemplated in the law. Let them quit and let them take whatever advantage they possess under the civil law. The other members of the stewardship plan have the security which the civil law provides against these quitters.

The chief motive of the civil law to-day is to provide security in business relationships. Surely while we live under the laws of our excellent Government, we are not going to discard these securities. Of course, it is quite possible that we may have many disappointments in one another. We will have some swindlers. They must be expected. This is all the more reason for our relationships being entirely founded upon our civic laws, which laws, in turn, have their foundation in our present systems of industrial relationships. In turn, this is all the more reason why we shall need to attempt to work out our industrial cooperation in accordance with our present systems of industrial relationships, whether this relationship be essentially socialistic, paternal, or of the strict entrepreneur type.

God and the Saints can redeem Zion upon any system of industrial relationship, whether the system of wages continues or is disbanded for some other system, whether we continue to have entrepreneurs, or whether the Government owns all the land, whether we hold property all in fee tail, or have some bonded, or some leased, or all held in trust for the church, or part held in trust for the church. God is not dependent upon any form of industrial relationships to carry his plan into operation.

The Matter of Title

Some one will suggest that members will hesitate to enter into the plan if they see it is possible for some to quit with greater advantage than others, or in more particular, if some can quit with property in their own names and others cannot. To the man who is converted, this problem will not arise, only in so far as he wants the church protected. To the man who is converted, it will be of no concern how advantageously anybody quits this scheme, unless this quitter quits after having gained some unjust advantage over the group. The question then goes back to the primary one, a question of faith. Whether a man will be able to get into a position where he can quit with greater advantage or with more property than he would otherwise have, had he not entered the stewardship plan to start with, is a matter for the administrators, the common tribunal. If, of course, they are unwise in their administration, some one steward may be able to secure more property than he otherwise would have had he not entered into the covenant of stewardship; but such will be rare if the common tribunals of the church still continue to be held by men of such character as they have held in the past. But the few occasions that dishonest men are able to do this will not disturb the faithful. Such administrators who habitually allow such quacks to obtain advantage of course will need to be removed. This question is merely a question of proper administration, not a question of basic, substantive law. We need have little fear that if we donate our surplus to the church, some unworthy brother will get the use of it. Stewards who secure the title or use of property already in the hands of the church will of course give the same security that they would be required to give under the same circumstance as between brother and brother. That too is a matter of administration. To those who have already accepted the stewardship theory, our ministers, our educators, etc., this question does not come. They have faith in God and the final triumph of his work.

Further, we have no doubt in our minds that this question as to whether some will be asked to give up all their surplus, and others allowed to retain the title in themselves, will be worked out on a rather even basis, as we grow into the administration of it. The tendency will be as time goes on to merge the title we feel. Yet this is not necessary. We are not attempting to prognosticate the industrial relationships that Zion will finally take on.

Do Not Need It All Worked Out

In other words we are not saying that under some forms of industrial relationships it may not be easier to put the stewardship plan and cooperative effort into practice than under others, but we at present do not need to have these relationships worked out before we start. We can start out in the relationships that our present civil law provides and secures. As we increase the number of men willing to live on the stewardship plan, and sufficient to work out large business units, we will naturally gravitate towards that form of business relationships under which we can work out our industrial cooperation the easier. There is no need of trying to figure out that best form of industrial relationships now. We could better derive them by experience. We can live the stewardship plan now in our present business and industrial status. Let us do that first. We must, before we can work out anything else. As we begin to cooperate we will adopt that form of cooperation that best suits our needs.

We do not have to solve the problem whether we shall have a wage system; do not have to solve the problem whether we shall work as farmers upon land held in fee, or rented. When we begin to live upon the stewardship plan, whether we are wage earners or capitalists, we will naturally gravitate toward a plan of cooperation that will best suit our needs. We might gravitate toward that plan of cooperation which the business world has. The business world itself will change its business relationships to meet new business and social demands. No doubt the business world in time will accept democratic management. We may merely follow the world in the change of business relationships. That too is a matter of administration, and not a matter of organic law.

We do not have to solve the problem of who shall own, whether the individual capitalist, the worker, or the church. We can begin living on the stewardship plan whatever our vocation and its conditions. Some will say that this leaves room for some to magnify their stewardship more than others, implying that the capitalist will be able to magnify his more than the laborer. That is jealousy, and disqualifies the man who thinks that from living upon the stewardship plan. That is also measuring the magnifying of a stewardship in terms of property owned, rather than in terms of service, whether that service is expressed in terms of work, of following orders, or in giving orders. As business becomes more and more controlled, the capitalist will not have any more surplus than the worker in proportion to the service he renders the world.

Furthermore, there is no reason why some form of cooperation in management between worker and capitalist may not be worked out, or some form of joint ownership between all the workers in a given industry as we proceed. The world itself may work out such schemes and we adopt them. We admit that these are complicated problems, but their solution will be easy, once we are living upon the stewardship basis, as described above, the essentials of which, repeated, are, first living upon our needs and just wants, submitting such to a common tribunal; second, in the disposition of our surplus, working together under the advice and consultation of the proper church authorities, yet being free to use our own agency. This "working together" will come gradually. At first to a great extent we will not work together as much as we will later on, as we work out our system of cooperation.

Working out a system of cooperation will indeed be hard. We will naturally progress slowly but surely, if we keep our faith in God and the gospel. For instance in the agricultural industry, we will need to have some common scheme of educating our farmers, making them more efficient farmers. As has been suggested by one who is making a particular study of this problem, we probably will have to have in the church a bureau of plant industry, a bureau of soils, of animal husbandry, of horticulture, and of bee-keeping, of farm engineering of farm management, of agricultural experiments, of farm capital and credit, of agricultural education, and of

The Council Bluffs, Iowa, Institute

One of the most successful events of the kind, from every point of view, was had in the recent musical institute held at Council Bluffs, Iowa, March 19 and 20, under the auspices of the Department of Music. And when we speak of "points of view" it must be admitted that, as regards an event of this kind, there may be many, owing to the various ways in which an institute of this character may function, and the many diversities of opinion.

The branches of Council Bluffs and Omaha constitute what may be properly regarded as important centers of the church's activities. Although situated merely on opposite sides of the Missouri River, they each serve as an important focus of the spiritual affairs of their respective districts. Council Bluffs is at the western edge of the Pottawattamie District, while Omaha lies on the eastern line of the Northeastern Nebraska District. It was for the benefit of these two districts that this institute was held, it being deemed best to choose Council Bluffs Branch and church as the most suitable and practicable for this event.

We must make our profoundest bow to those who planned the scope and character of this institute and to those whose energies and initiative contributed to its success. They planned more wisely, perhaps, than they knew, and the excellence of their initiative was seen in the number of really valuable features introduced. An institute of any kind is, by its very nature, largely educational, and no educational project can be creditably carried out without intelligent forethought and subsequent execution.

The interest displayed in the work of this institute was most gratifying; every one of the services saw a large audience, and the people were eager to listen to and participate in the various features considered. At no time in any of the sessions was there a dull moment, and the large audiences entered thoroughly into the spirit of the instructive features as well as into the enjoyment of the other incidents of the program.

We predict that much of constructive good will come to the music work of these two districts in consequence of the impetus and encouragement received from this institute, and we feel that advanced steps will be taken in the future.

Since Council Bluffs was the "home branch," naturally the lion's share of the burden of preparing for and executing the work of this institute fell to them; and also the larger portion of the choir, the orchestra, the audience, and the numbers rendered were by them. So we do not feel to close this article without a few words of tribute to the musical workers of this highly alert branch. First, they have a remarkable choir, which has already mounted to the numerical strength of fifty voices, an unusually large proportion for a branch the size of Council Bluffs. Under the directorship of Sister May White-Skinner (whom Heaven must have sent there after her valuable musical training and choir experiences at Lamoni), they are singing anthems of a high stand-rural education. Some sort of system of marketing will have to be worked out. We will want to make full use of governmental agencies, also of world agencies, supplementing them only where necessary. Some system of joint buying and joint marketing will be worked out. Some system of advising the Latter Day Saint farmers as to the needs of the church will have to be worked out.

But just because we cannot answer all these questions now, is no reason why we might not start to work on the stewardship plan so far as our present light will let us.

[EDITORS' NOTE: The next article on "The machinery and management of stewardships" will conclude this series. It will appear in an early number.]

ard in a most creditable manner, and they contemplate an early entrance into the field of oratorio. Next in importance comes the orchestra under the leadership of Brother John Perry. This interesting little group of young people, some sixteen or eighteen in number, is doing good service in the Sunday school; they furnished some enjoyable numbers for the various programs. They have an excellent assortment of instruments, quite well balanced and proportioned, and they bid fair to develop into a creditable organization of real attainment some day, if they work faithfully as a body and study diligently as individuals. Incidentally, there is a junior choir and a junior orchestra in process of growth also, for whom much hope is entertained.

We must not leave this article without a tribute to the pastor of this branch, Brother O. Salisbury, not for his musical attainments (!), but because of the splendid support he gives the musical forces of his branch. Brother Salisbury is one of the (too few) pastors of the church who appreciate the great value a well-developed musical equipment may be to a branch. As a result of his appreciation and their efforts, Council Bluffs is becoming one of the most important musical centers as well as branches of the church.

The following is the program as it was rendered.

What About "Musical Institutes"?

In the article preceding this will be found an account of the musical institute just held at Council Bluffs, and it is perhaps timely that we now describe just what an occasion of this kind is.

Upon its organization last spring, the Department of Music desired some plan awakening, throughout the church, an interest in the work of music, as well as acquainting the people of the church more thoroughly with the work of the department. To this end it has sought to conduct musical festivals and institutes at various important points in the church. These occasions, largely educational in their character, yet carried sufficient of the musical to render them enjoyable to everyone as well as profitable to the musical workers in particular.

So far three such institutes have been held: one at Independence, Missouri, last June; one at Davenport, Iowa, February 12 and 13; and the recent one at Council Bluffs, Iowa, March 19 and 20. Two other branches, Joplin, Missouri (May 7 and 8), and Saint Joseph, Missouri (May 14 and 15), have arranged definite dates for institutes, while several other branches of the church are at work on plans for events of their own.

The program of the institute at Council Bluffs will serve to show the scope and character of the work from several angles. Each location where these institutes are held, having their own individual problems, determine in a large measure the nature of the work done.

The experiences had at these institutes and the results already accruing from them make us know that they are an important factor in our broader musical development, and we hope that many other branches will in time find themselves seeking them.

Decorum in Church During the Rendition of Music

[This excellent article, by Sister Audentia Anderson, of Omaha, Nebraska, was read at the Sunday evening session of the recent musical institute at Council Bluffs, Iowa, an account of which preceded this. We commend it to the serious consideration of everybody. Sister Anderson, it will be remembered, was once editor of The Staff and an energetic worker in the musical ranks of the church, although now engaged in another line of important activity. We pray that she may again be found working in the ranks of our musical activities, wherein she was so efficient before.—A. H. M.]

To the thoughtful mind, viewing the history of the past and contemplating the present, it seems reasonable to conclude that one of the great sins of the world is that of selfishness. The word has been so often used, one is apt to bring to the imagination some greedy child who reaches out to snatch the biggest apple, who insists upon using the swing most of the time, or who complacently rides along in his chariot of state drawn by a couple of more or less willing subjects who may have come under his dominion and tyranny. Or perhaps the mind is led to some cold-blooded profiteer who is selfishly appropriating to himself more than his share of this world's goods, or to some ambitious one who spends his time in calculating how best he may advance his own personal interests, power, or influence. These are expressions of selfishness in certain forms, but may we not discover many, many others if we take the pains to analyze conduct in an attempt to determine the motives which actuate it?

Underlying every principle which governs rules of ordinary courtesy and consideration will be discovered one which is higher and more comprehensive than them all. It embraces all others and forms the basis for all detailed or concrete rules of politeness and conduct. It dropped from the lips of the Master in his hours of counseling and teaching his followers; "Love thy neighbor as thyself!" Among his last instructions was the one indicating that upon the proper attitude of a loving consideration for others hung all the "law and the prophets." At another time it was expressed, "Love is the fulfillment of the law."

The old Mosaic law did not attain to the heights of this simple yet all embracing statement. The minds of the Israelites were so restricted by their years of servitude to hard masters, by resentment and rebellion against authority engendered by the oppressions they had endured, that it was necessary to give them definite interpretations in regard to their conduct and attitude one towards another. If a man do thus, or thus, thou shalt do thus, or thus, was apparently needed, because their minds were not sufficiently alive to spiritual thought to be relied upon for the spiritual application of truths presented broadly or in abstract form.

But with Christ came a "doing away" of old things and old constructions. He did not come to his people with the old "Thou shalt" or "Thou shalt not" so much as with the presentation of deep and far-reaching principles which, with simplicity and infinite patience and gentleness, he would repeat over and over, either in statements plain and straightforward or in the imagery of word pictures which was so characteristic of the Oriental mind. These were fundamental principles of conduct and righteousness and he well knew that if his hearers could comprehend their meanings and would strive earnestly to apply them to the events of daily life, they would indeed guide into all truth, and there would no longer be needed the specific, detailed, discriminating decisions and commands common to the law which had governed.

Catching the wisdom of the Christ, in the Golden Rule: "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise," (Luke 6:31) we can all agree that it is not, to-day, being put into universal practice. Indeed, the paraphrase which is often heard recited laughingly, may be construed to be the one which is really given the most general expression; "Do unto others as others would do unto you, and do it first!"

Do you wonder how all this applies to the matter of decorum in church during the rendition of music? You would easily recognize the application were you in the position of the person who renders the music! For how can we explain on any other ground than that of selfishness, of utter disregard of the rights or feelings of others, the manner in which many people conduct themselves during a voluntary, solo, or anthem? They seem to be unaware that there is any connection between the notes of the organ and divine services. They seem to be unable to sufficiently detach themselves from their own personal affairs, recited to their neighbor at such a time, to allow them to sense that the services in the house of God have begun with the opening notes. Continuing audible remarks, nodding and laughing, whispering in penetrating sibilant tones, or busying themselves about books, wraps, or whatnot, they seem not to realize that one of their fellow creatures is pouring out his soul to God in music and praise, which, with all true musicians, is the spirit in which such offering is made.

If the Golden Rule has sway in the heart, if true love and appreciation of our brothers and sisters has been attained and is cherished, it would not be possible for us, through our very love and consideration to show them such marked disrespect as not to listen to what they offer as a result of their hours of thought, practice, and devoted labors. Perhaps few can realize how earnestly our musicians try to select that music which will be an uplift to the people who hear, an inspiration to right living, and a support to the preacher as he tries to wisely instruct or counsel the group before him. None can know how they pray over their music, how they yearn to please the Father, and to be enabled to present their work as a worthy offering to him, in return for the talent he has bestowed! Should not such work and such offering be regarded with all sincerity and appreciation? Should it be ignored, set aside, belittled, by the thoughtless and selfish attitude of those who should listen as it is given? We try to feel that every Saint is striving to overcome every fault in his nature, and it may be that some have simply never thought of the music in church in this light. When once they understand that in order to "do unto others" in the spirit of love as urged by Christ, they should be quiet and orderly, thoughtfully and appreciatively attentive when another is presenting that which is a personal offering to the Lord, surely we will have less of that disorder which we all so deplore in our services!

This brings us to another angle of the situation—the lack of real reverence indicated by such misconduct and indecorum during music. Who would think of fidgeting about, whispering, talking, or laughing during prayer? None but the extremely thoughtless child or the one who has not responded in proper measure to proper early instruction as to what prayer is and for what purpose instituted in the church. Yet God has said, "The song of the righteous is a prayer unto me, and he has also recognized the praise offered by means of the instruments of string, of brass, wood, and wind. This list would include all the musical offerings in our services, would it not? And if offered in praise, do they not voice the prayer which God would recognize? If so, should not reverent attention be given to it, free from the disturbance and disrespect shown by thoughtless conversation and disorder among the hearers?"

These criticisms are not deserved only by the masses, or laity, for even among presiding officers have been noted those who busy themselves all through the voluntary by scurrying around finding the opening hymn, getting some one to consent to open with prayer, determining about announcements, or even plain visiting and chatting, as if they, too, were so taken up with their own individual thoughts and plans that they did not need the attuning to spiritual things, the uplift which comes from following with attentive meditation the music which was being offered! Men and women, leaders in their way, have been guilty of like offense to good taste and manners, and the only charitable excuse for their conduct is to say that they were thoughtless.

Summing it all up, we feel that from the moment the first strains of the voluntary are heard, a quiet and hush should fall upon the congregation. Rustle, noise, confusion, or disorder should at once give way to reverent attention to the holy service of worship in the house of the Lord. Every heart should be lifted in praise and thanksgiving for the blessings of life, every mind centered upon him, and the highest ideals possible to human concept. The church, its mission on earth, its dignity of position as being the environment planned by the living God for the development of his creatures, should be carried to the altar of heaven by the concentration of thought and desire, expressed in earnest, sincere prayer, together with a rededication of personal gifts and powers. As the choir takes its place in the sweet stillness which thus pervades the house of God, and upon the wings of song are sounded forth anew the yearnings and the gropings, the petitions and the praise which mark the progress of the soul of humanity towards its Creator and great source of life, the assembly should be distinctly conscious that through its quiet and intelligent reception of the musical offering being made, it, too, has voiced its best, its truest, and most spiritual desires!

In the receptive atmosphere which has been created, the remainder of the service moves majestically towards its intended ministry, the audible prayer lifting the hearers to the throne of grace, whence flow precious gifts and blessings, limited only by the willingness of humanity to receive! The swelling chorus of united voices in congregational hymns, than which there is no sublimer sound on earth, lifts the entire assembly to a plane of purity and peace. Old strife and perplexity disappear, anxieties and misunderstandings give place to new and holy impulses and desires, and anew the souls of men are drawn tenderly towards their rightful heritage as sons of God and partakers of his love! The words of life, falling gently from the lips of the ordained and consecrated, can hardly fail, in such a setting, from accomplishing their intended ministry—that of enlightenment, courage, healing, and hope!

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Youth and the Law

Among the many interesting matters that are claiming the attention of America's new citizens is that of correct laws and right interpretations of the same in connection with youthful offenders. Such matters cannot longer be considered as being beyond the ken of womankind nor outside the scope of her power and influence to correct, where correction may be needed, for sharing the privileges of citizenship of this great Republic so far as franchise is concerned, she must, and automatically does, share also the responsibilities of its government and conduct.

It is no new thing for women to deeply concern themselves about the welfare of children. Much of the progress that has been made in the years that have past is due to the fact that some women have investigated conditions, have listened to the pleadings of their mother-hearts, and have set themselves about the task of doing what they could to right some of the wrongs that have been heaped upon children—wrongs done in ignorance of their real needs in many cases, through mercenary considerations in others, and in more, perhaps, through a stolid indifference on the part of those who have made, interpreted, and adjudicated the laws.

The work of such women as Hannah Kent Schoff, Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst, Mrs. Theodore W. Birney, Mary H. Weeks, Julia Lathrop, and other women connected with national women's organizations or welfare bureaus, has kept persistently before the American nation, in one form or another, the cause of childhood. Through their earnest and devoted efforts, juvenile courts and probation systems have been gradually introduced into most of our States, and countless children, though started on a road to ruin and crime, have been given a chance to "come back" and to make good.

It now seems, however, that although an immense step in the right direction, juvenile courts are already in need of reconstruction and reorganization. The difficulty seems largely to lie in the inability of such courts to enter properly or efficiently into the work of correction which is needed in every case. Given the wrong home conditions, the wrong neighborhood, the wrong associates, what chance has even a paroled child to overcome his environment? What agency is prepared to step in and correct the influences and conditions which worked the original havoc?

We reprint in this issue an article from the pen of a child-lover, lately appearing in a leading magazine, and bespeak for it a thoughtful reading. Whether or not one can agree with the writer that the school is the proper agency through which wayward children shall be taught proper conduct, one can at least echo the statement that such correction and reformation is a matter of education and not mere judgment or sentence.

As a church to whom God has spoken in no uncertain tones, placing the responsibility for the child definitely and directly upon the shoulders of the parents, Latter Day Saints must concede the rights of their children to receive from them the proper care and training which will result in their being at all times law-abiding members of the community. Our responsibilities cannot be shifted to school, to the State, or even to the Sunday school. In our homes themselves we are laying the foundations for the citizenship body of to-morrow, and every influence for good which we can bring to bear therein, making its impress upon character in the early and plastic years, should be enlisted and conserved, that our church may win the battle against evil and darkness!

Until the time shall come when every home shall be what it should be, and every parent fully awake and keenly sensitive to his duties and intelligently prepared to discharge them conscientiously before God, we must interest ourselves in the advancement of every good project that will help eliminate cruelty, injustice, and misunderstanding towards children whom environment and perverted education have made delinquent. Putting such children in "reform" schools only serves usually to turn loose upon society in later years adults of real criminal bent and untaught, undirected, and ungoverned wills—a grave menace, to say the least.

As women and part of the life-giving forces of the world, to whom child-bearing has a deep and divine significance, the subject of child welfare should lie very close to our hearts. Our love should reach out, not only to those children who have come into our own sheltered homes, but to those to whom fate has not been so kind. A homeless child, an orphaned one, a wayward one, or one whose heritages have been ignoble and base, should appeal to us strongly, and if, by investigation into such subjects as that of juvenile delinquency, the laws which bear upon it, and the sentences meted out, we can find flaws which may be eradicated by organized and persistent effort, let us not flinch at the task before us, but rather work the harder, and ask God's blessings upon our labors!

AUDENTIA ANDERSON.

Passing of the Juvenile Courts

The juvenile court is an anomaly. That the correction of juvenile delinquents was ever intrusted to a court at all can be accounted for only through the fact that the need of more intelligent treatment of children was brought to the attention of the public largely through the incongruous and disproportionate punishments frequently meted out to children under the law as it stood a quarter of a century ago. The fact that the laws were often ridiculous in their application to youthful offenders was keenly felt by jurists, with the result that definite effort to remodel them was undertaken by lawyers who naturally, though illogically, turned to the courts for relief.

Juvenile judges are fast coming to the conclusion that the dual duties of adjudicating delinquency and pervising the delinquent are conflicting, far exceeding any proper power of a court, even under its much vaunted "chancery jurisdiction as parens patriae." Duties of investigation, complaint obtaining evidence, trial, adjudication, sentence, supervision, punishment, and probation are too inconsistent with each other to be placed in any one agency. Very few children are even complained against until, in the opinion of the court or its officers, sentence is necessary. Thus a child is prejudiced before indictment and sentenced before trial, a condition repugnant to every idea of justice. Even now courts attempt to place the duties of investigation and probation in different officers, so that the bias of the investigator will not influence the probation officer; but no way has been found to remove this prejudice from the mind of the juvenile judge.

Moreover, the correction and reformation of incorrigible children is an educational function, not a judicial one. It is just as much the province of education to teach a child good manners as it is to teach him grammar or arithmetic. A court is a tribunal for the judicial determination of facts at issue. One is administrative; the other, judicial. It would take more than human ingenuity to harmonize them in one institution. No court should be burdened by administrative duties. These should be assumed by other agencies. In 1914, Professor Thomas D. Eliot advocated the consolidation of the juvenile court with a "family" or "domestic relations" court. Personally, I believe that the proper institution to supervise the correction and reformation of children is the school.

The criticism of Professor Eliot's contention is that administrative powers in a family court are just as harmful as they are in a juvenile court. Nevertheless, there is a decided tendency either to expand juvenile courts into domestic relations courts or for the domestic relations courts to absorb the juvenile courts. This is partly because juvenile judges have found that they need wider jurisdiction in order to make their courts effective. Parents should often be disciplined; frequently the child is more sinned against than sinning, and in order to prevent further delinquency, it is necessary to punish adults responsible for it. Disease, poverty, vice, crime, unpropitious neighborhood and home conditions, and a thousand and one other things enter as factors of delinquency.

It is but human that judges should aspire to gain control over all these factors in order to reform their wards. Consequently the juvenile courts tend to acquire powers out of all proportion to their dignity, jeopardizing every ideal of individual and social justice. The more sincere the judge, the more likely he is to reach for more authority.

Lawyers dislike the multiplication of courts, and opposition to new ones is developing everywhere among them. The tendency of the bar is to consolidate courts in order to avoid vexing questions of jurisdiction and unnecessary expense of litigation. As a matter of fact, if the administrative duties of domestic relations courts and juvenile courts were placed in official bureaus, properly officered and equipped, there would be no need of this duplication. The purely judicial function of determining whether or not a child is delinquent could just as well be discharged by the courts formerly in existence as they are now by the juvenile or family courts. If the child should be found to be delinquent, he should be remanded to the proper authorities for treatment. In this way, the courts would be left to their legitimate field, and the very necessary correctional work would be undertaken by those who by experience and training would be in a position to do it well. As it is, so far as I know, not a single court is doing this work well, and in my opinion, no court constituted as juvenile courts are constituted, can do it well.

It is therefore inevitable that the administrative work of the juvenile court will be transferred to other more adequate agencies, and there then being no further need of a separate court, the juvenile court will die a natural death. But it will not have lived in vain. Through it, the public has become educated to the need of scientific treatment of children guilty of antisocial conduct, and the very deficiencies of the court have pointed the way to a more intelligent and efficient system.—Herbert M. Baker, until recently, judge of the juvenile court, Greeley, Colorado.—The Survey.

Be Pure in Heart

"Before we can have 'social purity' we must first have individual or personal purity." Such is the keynote of the campaign for purity which Sister Krahl lays down in her preliminary article which appears this week. Reforms must ever come through the effort of the individual, for only so is the mass affected in its intrinsic character. We can legislate by the month, denounce by the year, or command and argue with all the force and eloquence of the human language, and it amounts to nothing until the units are touched and will to put their new convictions into actual, living practice.

How simple and basic, then, the statement, "Be pure in heart." Not a string of "Thou shalt's" or "Thou shalt not's," but the straightforward, positive, all-comprehensive, and all-covering counsel, "Be pure in heart!" To the pure in heart none of the evils of the present day can be attractive. To the pure in heart the very suggestion of immorality is offensive, and the soul is instantly up in arms. The pure mind resents, as a personal affront the coarse joke, the covered allusion, or the open immodesty. It dwells serenely in an atmosphere of light and joy and expansion unattainable (because unrecognizable) by the impure. With this view of the "pure in heart," how hardly shall we qualify to "inhabit Zion"?

Sister Krahl, who since her acceptance of its supervision, has devoted herself assiduously to this division of our women's departmental work, strikes at the root of the matter when she stresses the idea that all factors which enter into the education and development of a child should be based on a true knowledge of facts. Mothers and fathers should themselves first know the laws of life and their relation to humanity, and then firmly establish their children upon the same stable foundation. Our work lies mainly with the parents—trying to get them to understand the need for study of these principles and the grave and crying need for children to be fortified with a saving knowledge of the light and the truth.

To accomplish this, we will need your intelligent cooperation and faithful assistance. Will you give them? A. A.

Social Purity

It has been some time since the Yearbook came into the hands of the women of the church and no doubt all have read the perspective of the social purity work together with other divisions of the work of the department. By way of further introduction we are offering herewith some general ideas pertaining to the viewpoint that we feel should be established and from which this work should be carried on.

It was the intent, we believe, of the coordinating committee in recommending the transfer of this work to the Women's Department to place it more closely in connection with the home—the source of the stream of life, where the greatest responsibility rests for direction and control. Like the stream, ever moving, so is infancy constantly developing into childhood, childhood into youth, youth into maturity, and similar responsibilities must rest upon others who, coming in contact with this developing personality, should guard and keep it, uncorrupted and unstained.

Purity is our normal state, impurity our abnormal state. "God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions."—Ecclesiastes 7:29. The world is far astray from that condition of which Jesus spoke when he took a little child and set him in the midst of the disciples and said, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." The various processes to preserve that normal state of purity in our young, and to prevent if possible the perversion of this principle, is the object of this work.

Social purity in a collective sense is analogous to Zion. It is an aggregate of individuals who, with knowledge of evil and exposure to temptation, have kept heart and soul unstained.

Before we can have social purity, however, we must first have individual or personal purity. For years we have sung, "Let us keep our spirits pure," and we have concurred in the wisdom of the wise man who said, "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he," and we have discerned in the teachings of the Apostle Paul the regimen for the body—all of which points to the discipline of body, mind, and spirit. If the physical or carnal nature gains the ascendancy over the mental and spiritual, we have the beginning of sensual behavior. Life does not flourish well unless the spiritual retains the upper hand. There is no time when we may, with safety, release ourselves from this vigil over ourselves. Every individual is the lonely sentinel at the citadel of his Christian character. Doctor F. W. Foerster, Professor of Education at the University of Vienna, in his work, Marriage and the Sex Problem, would bring forward and revive the old ascetic principle, "not as a negation of nature nor as an attempt to extirpate natural forces, but as practice in the art of self-discipline."

There is a period between youth and maturity when human barks seem to leave their moorings and drift out on unknown seas without chart or compass or ultimate port in view. What mariner would undertake such a perilous voyage as confronts the adolescent of to-day without directions and equipment for his safety and destination? A young man was talking to a pilot on a large steamer. "How long," he asked "have you been a pilot on these waters?" The old man replied, "Twenty-five years; and I came up and down many times before I was pilot." "Then" said the young man, "I should think you must know every rock and sand bar in the river." The old man smiled at the youth's simplicity, and replied, "Oh, no, I don't; but I know where the deep water is."

We are living in an age where the constant appeal of modern society is to the material side of man's nature, setting material satisfactions in the center of life as the great objective. To this spirit may be ascribed one cause for the increasing social laxity and indiscipline of the present generation.

Foerster is opposed to the popular opinion that the sexual oversensitiveness and aberration of the youth of to-day is caused by lack of proper instruction. He contends that the neglect of character training and the prevailing pleasure-seeking atmosphere is wholly responsible. Without the view of life as a whole, he argues, instruction is not a safeguard unless the power of the lower impulses is counteracted by a general and systematic training of the character and a development of the will power; that accurate knowledge will be of little avail if the individual does not possess the power to act in accordance with that knowledge in the hour of trial.

Bigelow in Sex Education says, "The sex-educational movement will be quite inadequate without great stress upon certain ethical, social, and other aspects of sex;" and he defines sex education, in its largest sense, to include all scientific, ethical, and religious instruction and influence which directly and indirectly may help young people prepare to solve for themselves the problems of sex that inevitably come in some form into the life of every normal, human individual.

Galloway, in Biology of Sex, gives us this thought: "Knowledge, even perfect knowledge, will not successfully meet the case. There must come in addition through the sanest sort of teaching, as in all such realms of human character and behavior, ideals, standards of purity, chivalry, regard for others, self-restraint, and all such things, which are better than mere knowledge. But into all these knowledge must go."

We wish to emphasize and urge this broad view which is the only firm basis upon which any improvement in sexual behavior can be permanent.

In the early part of this article we said that during the physical, social, and intellectual progress of the child certain responsibilities must naturally rest upon others coming in contact with the child, such as ministers, teachers, directors, or leaders of the young, in various ways. All should be qualified with a well-balanced knowledge of sex principles to first properly understand the young people about them and secondly to be able to impart the instruction when necessary.

Responsibilities, too, of a serious character rest upon the recreational department of the church. Supervised recreation has a most important place in preserving personal purity. Every branch or group should by investigation ascertain whether its young people have some sort of proper recreation. A survey of several branches in this regard would furnish interesting data.

Every young person can with profit to brain, body, and morals have a hobby, something of interest to work at outside of the regular daily employment. If bodily exercise is engaged in all day, then music, study, or experiments of various kinds should be of interest; or if sedentary work is followed, then a more spirited hobby would be desired, such as athletics, games, and cycling. A few years ago there appeared in one of the magazines an article entitled "7 o'clock, the hour of destiny." The idea was brought out that at that hour the young man looks around and decides how he will spend his leisure time; it is the hour when he may choose to do that which he pleases. His choice will either be recreation (variation at least), education, or religious activities. How important that the large class who choose aimless recreation should be guided into purposeful activities. So the manner in which a young person spends his leisure time regularly, is quite indicative of his character, and if he continues, of his destination.

1. Social purity work is constructive work.
2. Its accomplishment is dependent upon the extent of individual purity.
3. It is synonymous with Zion.
4. Its responsibilities are divided between home, school, church, and society.

The attitude of its instructors should favor:

1. Early training in the home consisting of right habits, with great stress upon self-control, self-denial, cleanliness, courtesy, and the cultivation of a deep, spiritual conscience.

2. General education for a broad view of life.

3. Instruction in sex principles as a part of the general program, with direct teaching up to the age of adolescence (with biological approach for attitude toward sex) and indirect teaching through adolescence.

4. A specialty: music, education, science, etc., etc.

5. Recreation, preferably in crowds.

Purity is power—it is not impossible.

"Think of living—Thy life, wert thou the pitifullest of all the sons of earth, is no idle dream, but a solemn reality. It is thy own. It is all thou hast to front eternity with. Work then, like a star, unshining yet unshining."—Carlyle.

Women as Buyers

Why do women buy what they buy? This question is not to be answered flippantly, and some of the serious answers that would be made would not be complimentary to the training and spirit of womankind. Realizing the importance of this question, some have suggested that there could be more school training in fabrics and workmanship and training also in regard to the relation of health to apparel. More significant than these things, however, is the general spirit. Women who can afford luxuries often delight in advertising the fact, and they overspend. Women who cannot afford luxuries are often afraid of advertising the fact, and they likewise overspend.

The fact that the women direct the consumption of 85 per cent of the wealth of the country puts the matter of thrift and of intelligence in purchasing largely into their hands.—New Haven Register.

Settlement was first effected in Lamoni by the church in 1871, but the Herald Office did not move until 1881. It was named for King Lamoni, in the Book of Mormon, the name, it is thought, being given by one of the Bishopric, who were also members of the Order of Enoch, either Elder Elija Banta or David Dancer.

Getting Acquainted With Jerusalem

Spots of interest in the Holy City are visited by the President and those with him.

E. A. S.: I presume many of our good Republican friends at home are celebrating to-day [March 4]. Brethren Williams and Passman and I celebrated it by visiting some of the places of interest in which Jerusalem abounds. A young Mohammedan man who is studying in one of Brother Passman's classes, being off work to-day, offered to take us around. So we went. He is a "porter at the Holy Sepulcher," so we met him there. But instead of going through the church of the Holy Sepulcher, we went first to the Mosque of Omar, for being Mohammedan Sunday, it would not be open all day to visitors. So we went to the temple area, and putting over our shoes the slippers one must always wear into the mosques, we went in to see this unique and beautiful building. Of course we saw, under the great dome, the rock on which Abraham is supposed to have offered Isaac. We went under it and gazed up through the hole through the great sacrificial stone, through which, it is said, the blood from the sacrificial offerings flowed down into the vault below (its presence being made known by the guide stamping on the stone with the resulting reverberations from the vault) and from there into the Valley of Jehoshaphat. In this mosque one is shown the altars before which David and Solomon worshiped, and the monolithic pillars supporting the dome are pointed out as having once been parts of Solomon's Temple. But that the mosque is a fine old building one cannot deny, with some beautiful and exquisite decorations.

Coming out from the mosque, we started for the Golden Gate. Then we did rather an unorthodox thing for tourists. Some one spoke about the old walls near which we stood, south of the Golden Gate. The guide then took us up on the walls. We climbed clear to the top, and standing in one of the openings of the parapet, while the guide sat cross-legged on top of the wall, we listened to his descriptions of the various places of interest which could be seen in the valley and on the Mount of Olives just before us.

A little to the north lay the Gate of Saint Stephen, through which tradition has it Stephen was led down the road to the little chapel just below us, which marks the spot where the stoning took place.

To the left a bit is the Valley of Kings, or Valley of Blood, where the armies of David and Absalom clashed in sanguinary conflict.

Across from the chapel of Saint Stephen is the Tomb of Mary and the Grotto of Agony. While at the foot of the Mount of Olives is the Garden of Gethsemane.

Down the Valley of Jehoshaphat a bit was the Tomb of Absalom, and below it stands the Tomb of Jehoshaphat. Above these tombs the hill was covered with thousands of slabs marking the graves of Jews, while at our feet, against the wall, lay the Mohammedan cemetery.

Behind the Garden of Gethsemane farther up the hill stands the Russian church, dedicated to Mary, while above that still is a church marking the spot where Jesus is supposed to have stood when he lamented over Jerusalem.

Not far from that are the Tombs of the Prophets, while on the brow of the mount stands a church supposedly erected on the spot where the ascension took place. Over the brow can be seen the palace built by the Kaiser.

What a lot of places of keen interest to be seen from the wall! We stood and looked for some time before climbing down to get a closer and better view of the Golden Gate. Then we passed out of the Old City by Saint Stephen's Gate, saw briefly the chapel of Saint Stephen, and entered the Garden of Gethsemane. There we saw the tree under which Jesus stood when betrayed by the kiss of Judas. We were kindly permitted by one of the Franciscan monks in charge of the garden to pick some violets to send home, and given a souvenir in the way of leaves from the olive trees. Let it be said for the monks who so devoutly care for the garden that it is one of the neatest and best-kept spots in Jerusalem or its environs; and whether or not the trees are the same under which Jesus agonized, yet they are apparently old enough to be the ones, and the spot is probably not far anyway from where the Savior prayed while the disciples slept. And it is not unlikely that they slept leaning against the very rocks which lie in the upper part of the garden as is now pointed out. The present Garden of Gethsemane, with its well-cared-for flower beds, fine old olive trees, and kindly keepers, serves to remind us of Christ's night of agony, vitalizes to us the incident, and enables us to quite accurately visualize the setting of the story as we read the incidents.

From the garden we went to the Russian church, and from there to Mary's Tomb, and to the Grotto of Agony. In this last place, a subterranean dwelling perhaps, we were told Christ lived for a time, and that to this retreat he came after the last supper in the upper room. Whether he did or not, the place reminds us he had to go to some place after the supper, and it may as well have been this as any. And so it serves its purpose; and that it is revered for its probable close association with Jesus is attested by the many precious gifts of jewels and precious things which have been sent by visitors to the shrine.

After leaving the Tomb of Mary we reentered the Old City by way of Saint Stephen's Gate, and visited the Pool of Bethesda. This spot is now in the custody of a strange order of monks, Les Peres Blances, or White Fathers, under whose careful custody some very important excavations are being conducted. The pool itself, once at the surface, and the scene of some of the miracles of Christ, now lies far below the streets of that part of the city. I went down to the surface of the pool, but had to go down several flights of steps to get there. Debris has been piled over the pool (covered many centuries ago) till the monks in some of their excavations have gone through twenty-two feet of debris, yet portions of the old city lie under still greater depths of debris than this. This order of monks do the excavating as they secure the money, and have in their work secured some fine archaeological specimens. The monk who let us through the gate to go down to the pool, and from whom Brother Williams and Brother Passman bought some pictures, was a fine-looking fellow, with clear blue eyes and full black beard, who spoke good English. On the wall of the room in which were kept the pictures, etc., which he sold, were posted transcriptions of John 5:1-9, telling of the pool which when the waters were troubled would heal the sick. These transcriptions appear in eighty-four different languages. So I asked him how many he spoke. He said four. I asked him what ones, and he told me English, German, French, and Spanish. So I put some questions to him in German, and in as good German as he had previously used English he, in answer to my questions, said he was forty-two years of age, had been there twenty-three years, and had learned to speak the four languages by his converse with the tourists. I quite enjoyed the visit to the Pool of Bethesda. The waters were not troubled while I was there, so I carried away with me all the diseases I took. But I had seen the pool.

From there we went to the Via Dolorosa, to see the "stations." Well, we went first past the tower of Saint Antonio and the Palace of Pontius Pilate, as pointed out to us by our young guide. Then we went into a church connected with a convent. I am not just sure of the name of the church, but think it is called the Ecce Homo Church. Here we were told of an interesting bit of excavating done by a Catholic priest in an effort to locate the place of the condemnation of Jesus. It seems to have been successful, and we found the place so interesting that we spent much more time than we had expected to there. The nun who showed us through is an American, and we appreciated her good English. In the present Via Dolorosa there exists an arch, or portion of one, over the narrow street, called the Ecce Homo Arch. This Catholic priest referred to, after careful study of all records he could find, made up his mind that this arch was but one of three which stood together in front of the palace of Pontius Pilate. So by careful excavation he located the old arches, or portions of them, and also the old pavement at their base. The church was built with the old arch, and part of another still standing as they were found, a part of the new edifice, just behind the altar. In the basement the street paving has been uncovered, and the court of Pontius Pilate's palace well authenticated. So it is pretty certain that the arch is where Pontius Pilate stood when he showed Jesus to the crowd and said, "Behold the man!" and hence somewhere not so very far from that arch Jesus stood while Pilate condemned him and then washed his hands to free himself from blame. In the old stones of the court paving can still be seen the cuttings or tracings of the games the Roman soldiers were wont to play in those days. This church marks the first and perhaps the second of the stations.

From the basement where the old street paving is so plainly seen, one can look out and up to the level of the present Via Dolorosa, showing clearly that the old street at the time of Pontius Pilate was much wider and about six feet lower than the present. And here I learned something quite pleasing to me. I think I may have written you of my surprise at the narrow streets, and my failure to comprehend how David could have so sung the praises of Jerusalem the beautiful. It seems that Jerusalem was many times destroyed and rebuilt. Some of the destructions were complete; and when the people returned they made first pathways through the heaps of ruins; then along these pathways they built their houses on the debris and with such building material as they could salvage. So the streets laid out by David may lie, and probably do in many places, far below the present ones, and may be of different sizes so far as width is concerned and far finer in design; and the same is doubtless true of the buildings. It seems that Jerusalem appears in history about 1450 B. C. as an Egyptian post, and a hundred years later was in the hands of the Jebusites. King David stormed it about 1000 B. C. Since King David's time it has surrendered or been captured more than thirty times, and on many occasions was sacked and its inhabitants massacred. At times the destruction was complete, its walls being thrown down and the buildings razed. The last surrender was to General Allenby in 1917. But this skillful militarist maneuvered the Turks out without firing on the Old City. Only some buildings in the outskirts were shot up.

From there we started to visit the remainder of the stations, thence to the church of the Holy Sepulcher; but it was past noon, and we went to Floyd House for lunch which Sister Passman prepared for us, expecting to meet our guide again at 3 p. m. to see the remainder of the stations and the sepulcher; but rain which began while we were eating was, when we were ready to go, coming even harder. It changed to hail and then to snow. So we stayed at the house and engaged in the more prosaic task of answering mail and doing other writing. We were disappointed, too, for we had expected not only to see the church of the Holy Sepulcher, but to visit the Wailing Place, as to-day was some sort of a special day. So these visits are reserved for another day.

I am sending a little souvenir of the Garden of Gethsemane. The olive trees still bear olives, from which oil is made to be sold at fancy prices.

More anon—perhaps the next rain if it doesn't come too soon.

Yours,

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

A meeting was held in London in February concerning the question of Sunday theatrical performances. The result was very much against the opening of theaters on that day. The opinion of both the speakers and the audience was practically unanimous. This was the result of an open meeting, and surprisingly was attended largely by persons connected with the stage. The opinion was unanimous against the Sunday performance.

It might be well said that he who saves a boy is greater than he who taketh a city.

Experiences in Quebec

Apostle Russell encounters some deep prejudice and ministerial enmity.

There are practically three divisions to the city of Quebec in more ways than one.

Upper Town on the heights, where Wolfe and Montcalm ebbed out their life's blood on the Plains of Abraham, where a monument about five feet square at the base and fifty feet high, now marks the deathbed of Wolfe as it stands in a field of about fifteen acres, in close proximity to which stands the provincial prison. At a rough estimate I should judge the old city walls, yet standing in excellent state of preservation, inclose not more than sixty acres of land, thus inclosing about one third of Upper Town, where as a general thing are to be found the residences of what some term "the upper crust," and where the residences and streets are of more or less modern appearance.

Within the walls the streets are very narrow and winding. The residences and stores are alike built tight up to the narrow sidewalk, of very solid stonework, three to four stories high, with steep tin roofs upon which the heavy snows lodge where possible, to slide down later in the form of ice, to the detriment of the passers-by, in fact sometimes to their injury or death.

Lower Town is divided into two parts, in one of which are to be found most of the banks and business offices, while in the other are most of the larger stores, factories, etc.

In church lines they are divided into three parts, French Roman Catholic about one hundred and one thousand, Irish Roman Catholic four thousand, and Protestants about five thousand, with about eighty Hebrews, and for a few weeks one Latter Day Saint; and though no Utah Mormons had ever put a foot within the city that I could learn of, the stench of their polygamous and other evil deeds had polluted the city, by reason of which the way of truth was surely evilly spoken of.

One Protestant minister, to whom I brought a letter of introduction from one of his former parishioners in Ontario, treated me very kindly for a few days and introduced me to two families, neither of whom belonged to his church however; but upon calling at his residence one evening he returned the Marvelous Work and a Wonder with the tracts I had given and opened the door for me to breathe the air on the outside. As we are instructed in Mark 6:11 what to do in such instances, I wended my way to the Burlington Rooms where I was making my sleeping quarters. I pity such French Calvinism.

I visited where I was welcome as often as I felt wise to do so, distributing tracts and lending books where people would accept of such. It was, however, the rare exception and not the rule to accept even a leaflet.

The ministers of Trinity and of the English-speaking Presbyterian churches were certainly very gentlemanly, accepting my literature and visiting very pleasantly. May the Lord bless them accordingly.

Trying a Canon

Understanding there were ministerial guns of different caliber, I thought I would try a canon next. He was very courteous, told me he was interested and I was well read, but as it was Lent he could no longer spare the time to talk, so opened the door, refusing the "Open letter to the clergy" and other literature, saying that he had more reading than he could get over in four years. I will be a little surprised if he reads any after two years, for he may have finished it, or his part of it, in that time.

Not desirous of passing any of them by, I took the advice of a certain ministerial friend to call upon another reverend (?) whom I would find to be "a very nice man." I have since thought that he was not a good judge of men, or he had it in for me and did not wish to take on the task himself.

I reached the new "very nice man" apparently before the phone got connected up, and we had a few minutes' pleasant visit. Then the phone rang; a female voice took the task of answering, and after considerable conversation called my host. When he came to talk to me a few minutes later he was quite a different man. I never heard any man (?) abuse Joseph Smith with deeper heart-expressed hatred than he was pleased to do. He arose quite suddenly and started for the exit. I knew enough to take the hint, and he opened the door. I offered him some tracts but he declared he "would not read such trash," and putting his hand to my overcoat he pushed it and the contents on to the street. Again I thought of what Mark advised.

Thinking I better have a bite to eat, I retired to my rooms, for more than "bread alone" to sustain me under circumstances like these is needed, especially when a person was not always a Latter Day Saint.

No malice had arisen in my soul, but I pitied such blind people and felt I would much rather occupy as the one ushered than the one who ushered me out.

Thinking I would now give the heads of the four thousand an opportunity to learn of the angel's message, I went to see the highest branch of the institution, and from his ruddy complexion I should judge he lived on, what some term, "the fat of the land." He was in some respects a very genial talker, but when it came to religion he told me they have the church and they could not fall, for Christ said so. He said he would not listen to me nor to an angel if such were to come to him, for he would know that such an angel would be cursed.

I tendered him some literature similar to that to others, but he opened the door, refused the tracts, and left me to wend my way on to the sidewalk.

Still Another "Get Out"

I then called to see the Salvation Army, and was ushered into the presence of an adjutant whom I believe would feel humiliated and lowered in his dignity if the Lord himself were to ask for an audience with him. I introduced the gospel message, but he told me they "produced the goods in the Army" and they were the real thing. I asked if the "goods" were the ones spoken of by Mark 16. He told me he had no further time to waste with me, so opened the door and told me to "get out."

Wishing to know the law relative to preaching on the street or Market Square, I went to see a high-up police, who informed me that such was not tolerated. I suggested that others preached on the Market Square and why not I? He offered to bet me money that within fifteen minutes of my commencement it would end up in a big fight and I would go out humiliated. I concluded he would see that he did not lose his wager if made.

I met a French Roman Catholic priest on the street and asked to be shown to some of their head men who could talk English. He accepted my literature, was very gentlemanly, and took me to the Jesuit headquarters, but just at that particular time they were all engaged and I failed to see any.

Having been informed there was yet another minister

(canon) whom I had not visited, I betook myself to his home thinking, from all the good reports I had heard of him, that such a fine man might possibly listen to the everlasting gospel. He was absent, however, and the lady who answered the bell, who I believe was the lady of the house, was very pleasant but would not accept any literature.

As I wended my way down the very narrow winding street I met the good man himself at whose home I had just called, and of whom there appears to be no man in the city more highly spoken.

I accosted him, stated I was a minister who had come to the city on a mission which I had called at his residence to acquaint him with, named the church with which I am identified, made a few remarks showing the distinction between it and Utah Mormonism, offered similar tracts to those accepted by the French Roman Catholic priest, but he very politely refused to accept them on any conditions, stating, "I am a Catholic." I asked, "Are you a Roman Catholic?" He answered, "I am of the English church. There are just the two branches but they are much the same."

He said, "I cannot wish you 'Godspeed' as an advocate of your religion, but I can as a man."

Protestants Disgusted

I attended several services in what is commonly termed "Protestant" churches, most of which would seat from five to fifteen hundred, but none of them was one fifth filled either morning or evening. There were at one time about twenty thousand Protestants in the city, but apparently three fourths of them are gone out, while most of those remaining have become so utterly disgusted with the weather-beaten husks fed to them from the pulpits, that even the noise of the hot-air cartridges fired by the biggest "canon" fails to tickle their ear.

In the province of Quebec the movies run Sunday afternoon, and a chicken fight on the screen has more magnetism for the ordinary human creature who is beginning to use his God-given thinking faculties along religious lines than the shell made in the parson's study which he has proudly marked "T. M. T." with the hope that it will fill both pew and plate. But he has failed to notice that his partner adroitly left the first "T" out of the compound and the shell was "mt" with the exception of a little tear gas which took effect when departed loved ones were spoken of, but which drove the listener into the open air or the movies when mixed with promised brimstone for disobedience.

When talking to a layman of the above-mentioned four hundred, I asked, "Do you read the Bible?" to which he replied, "Faith, I don't bother me hed wid it; it is up ta the father ta attind ta all that, and if we don't go ta church that is nothin' ta him. He'll jist cut uz aff and thin we kin git ta h—l out a that." I thought of the song, "There's nothing too good for the Irish."

There are a few excellent people in that city who are reading our literature, whom I expect to hear from in due time.

It might tarnish the fair name of John Wesley if I were to name the sect the parson belongs to who pushed me out. Or if I were to say that there is a long article of furniture spelled C—h of similar name to him he might not like it.

The Lord, knowing the kind of peoplè I would come in contact with while there, warned me twice through prophetic utterances from my brethren that my life would be in danger while there.

Sojourning at the home of my brother-in-law in Toledo, Ontario, I am presenting the gospel to a few interested people.

Expenses in Quebec being high, the sisters in Cornwall, Ontario, amply supplied my physical nourishment by parcel post.

I hope to try Quebec again in tenting season, bringing with me Philemon Pement who speaks French and English.

Respectfully, your colaborer, R. C. RUSSELL.

A Fine Thing in All the Branches

The influence of the young people's meetings extends far and wide.

First Presidency: I am in receipt of outlines and letters sent out by the committee for the young people of Zion. The papers have been full of good reports concerning the success of the meetings. It truly must have been an inspiration to the community and a source of great satisfaction to those in charge.

In as far as it is possible it would surely be a fine thing to try such a series in all branches of the church. While it might not be advisable to have special meetings at this time, we are making an effort to keep before our young the fact that the future of the work here will soon rest on their shoulders. In our sermons of late we have laid special emphasis on the origin and purpose of our work, giving the young some of the teachings of our church that have made our position so secure and have enabled us to meet successfully all of the various opposition that has been arrayed against us.

Our hope here as elsewhere is in the young, but they have so much in the surroundings to entice them that it is a very hard proposition. Oh, that they might be in an environment where their better natures would predominate, where they might have a fair chance to develop! Their ideals would be oh, so much higher, if they could only come in touch with the spirit that actuated the young in Zion to ask for those special services just closed. There are two young men from our midst who are in the States, one at Graceland and the other with the Boston Saints. Their eyes have been opened by what they see and hear. In their letters to me and others they express their surprise at the wonder and magnitude of the work. They plead with those at home to remain faithful and come up higher. All who have been sent here by the church have tried to impress upon them the very thoughts as expressed in their letters, but they had to go away from here and come in contact with conditions as we pictured them in order to really appreciate them. They had to be shown. There is truly a great need for Zion here as elsewhere.

We become almost discouraged at times with conditions as we see them. We realize our limitations and the great amount that should be done, and at times we are almost overwhelmed. But we will press forward, trusting in His mercy and all will come out in the end.

We read with great interest of the progress of the work in Germany and England.

Yours truly,
V. B. ETZENHOUSER.

About Teacher Training Books

Publishing houses of the country have not wholly overcome the obstacles caused by the war. Our own publishing houses are experiencing difficulties in securing several of the teacher training texts, some being revised, others sold out and waiting on the press for a new edition.

We hope the many students who have enrolled lately will be patient and not lose their enthusiasm. "Difficulties were made to be overcome." The information is worth waiting for. We shall hail the day when our own press can put out every one of the textbooks needed for this course. The present demand, although growing, is not yet big enough to justify our printing these books. It would mean financial loss. This in answer to inquiries.

Repentance

Sermon by Elbert A. Smith in Young People's Zion Builder Services, Lamoni, Iowa, March 14, 1921. Reported by Winsome Smith McDonald.

The text to-night is from Mark 1: 15: "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the gospel."

The Story of Cocklebur Farm

I remember how some years ago when I was a boy living on a farm in the northern part of Iowa there was a farmer by the name of Fancher who owned a homestead, and one spring when plowing his corn he discovered between the rows in a certain place a new plant; at least it was entirely new to him. As that was a new country, plants from the East had not yet moved in to any extent. He became exceedingly interested in this plant and plowed around it very carefully and even hoed it and encouraged it to grow and go to seed. Verily his patience was rewarded, in a way, because it turned out to be nothing but an ordinary, and as we say in Missouri, an "ornery," pestiferous cocklebur, and in a short time it had seeded his whole farm and had spread abroad to other farms. His homestead became headquarters for cockleburs for the whole country. His farm was "Cocklebur Ranch."

If you have never worked on a farm you don't know just how mean a cocklebur is. It is one of the criminals of the vegetable kingdom. It attaches itself to your clothing and rides around until it drops off in some fertile field and starts a new colony of criminals, just like the effect of an evil example taking root in other lives. You can hoe a cocklebur off close to the ground and in a week's time it will be up again. There is only one way to be rid of them, and that is to pull them up by the roots and burn them in fire. I was back there last summer and I took occasion to visit that old place, and it is yet a foul, run-down, unprofitable farm. Some one has to repent for it and sweat and toil and dig up all of those cockleburs and make corn grow in their place.

Well, you say, that man was a fool. But did you boys and girls ever cultivate cockleburs? A young man finds a bad habit growing up in his life and immediately he wants to see what it will amount to; he becomes profoundly interested; he cultivates it with great care, and presently it has seeded down his whole life, and perhaps the lives of some of his neighbors. He should have pulled it up at the opportune time. And so presently with sweat and with tears, and with great exertion of will power, he must root up every one of those cockleburs and make corn grow instead. That is repentance.

Now let us analyze the text. When is the time to repent? The time is now. "The time is fulfilled." Where is the place to repent? The place is here: "The kingdom of God is at hand." Who is the person to repent? "Repent ye, and believe the gospel."

These sermons are to be doctrinal, but they are not given over entirely to the expounding of cold doctrinal principle. We want an appeal to go with them; and if there is one individual in this audience who has that in his life that should be rooted out, the commandment to him on this occasion is, "Your time is fulfilled, the kingdom of God has come unto you; repent ye, and believe the gospel." Do not put it off; attend to it during this very series of meetings.

The admonition to repent comes to us first in the form of an invitation, in Acts 3: 19: "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord."

We are gathered here for a great revival service, a time of refreshing. We may do all that we can, and I thank God from the bottom of my heart for this noble response this evening—oh, how it fills my soul with joy to think you are standing by me. On Monday night when I thought many seats would be empty they are all filled, and you are here to support us in this work; you are willing to do your part, and all that God has given me of strength of body, clearness of mind, or faith of heart, or love of soul, I am willing to pour out on the altar of service in these meetings. Yet when it is all said and done, we must bow and say, "Lord, it isn't very much. We wait for the times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." The revival comes from above.

If we need to repent of anything let us repent, that our sins may be blotted out in this time of refreshing sent from the heavenly Father.

The call to repent comes to us next in warning, where the Master says, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."—Luke 13: 3.

The Nature of Repentance

Repentance may be of a twofold nature; first, there is a worldly form of repentance that consists merely in being sorry when one is caught and about to be punished.

Not long ago in the city of Los Angeles two men kidnapped a young married woman and took her to an old shack and held her for ransom. One of these men drove into Los Angeles and called the husband by telephone and asked him to guarantee the ransom. A telephone operator overheard the conversation, called the police, and when the villain stepped out of the booth two burly policemen waited one on either side of the door. He was caught. You never saw a man repent more quickly than he did. He was sorry. What was he sorry for? He was sorry he was caught. He was sorry he was about to be punished.

The Apostle Paul tells us in 2 Corinthians 7: 10: "The sorrow of the world worketh death." Now what is the philosophy of this? It is simply that when a man's repentance consists in being sorry he is caught, the only effect had on him is to cause him to resolve that he will do the same thing again but will be a little more careful, from which is evolved the philosophy of the world, "If you cannot be good, be careful!" This works death, because no matter how careful a man is the Bible says, "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."—Galatians 6: 7.

That kind of repentance deceives a man and leads him on until eventually it ends in destruction.

There has been a great deal of discussion about deathbed repentance. It seems to me that deathbed repentance has in it these very elements of worldliness. People sometimes think, "This repentance is a good thing. I will wait, and have a good time while I am young. I will accumulate the things of this world, and when I get to be about eight-five years old and about to die I will repent and get all there is out of repentance and get into glory and so beat the game both ways in both worlds."

That is a little like the Jew we heard of. Two Jews were riding on a train, so the story goes. One owed the other fifty dollars, and number two had tried to get it time and again. While they were on the train a bandit came into the car with pistols in his hands to rob the passengers. Number one took out his pocketbook and handed number two fifty dollars, saying, "Here, Jacob, iss the fifty dollars I owe you so long."

So some think they will accumulate all the things of this world and hold them until the bandit of death has his pistol on them, and then repent. It won't work!

But there is a godly repentance which Paul says "worketh sorrow that needeth not to be repented of." (2 Corinthians 7:10.) That is the true repentance, and as we are told in Matthew 3:8, it brings forth "fruit meet for repentance"; that is, it bears in the life of the individual the kind of fruit that is a clear indication that it is a real, genuine, godly repentance. Isaiah gives us to understand that repentance includes ceasing to do evil and learning to do good. (Isaiah 1:16, 17.) We must pull out the cockleburs and plant corn in their place.

We are given to understand, at least by implication, that repentance includes restitution. Zaccheus, as you will remember, was a publican and a sinner. He was a little man, so when the Savior passed through the streets he had to climb a tree to see over the crowd and see the Master. He was a small man, but in some regards he was bigger than a great many Christians, because he said, "If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold."—Luke 19:8.

We received a letter a year or two ago from a district president in the West in which he said he had converted a man who desired to be baptized, but that the man made a confession that twenty years ago he burned his house and collected the insurance. He wished to know what to do about it. We advised that if that insurance company were still in business he should restore the money, together with interest.

Whenever a man can do so he ought to make restitution. Of course, as some have pointed out, there are things that cannot be restored. If you trample a lily into the mire under your brutal foot, you may be sorry for it, and you may try to make it stand upright, but worlds without end you cannot restore it to its natural beauty. If you destroy the purity of a woman or the virtue of a man, you can never restore that which you have destroyed. But God is merciful, and he does not require the impossible of any man; he does require, however, that when individuals repent they shall make the wrong right, if possible to do so. It has a splendid influence on human character.

The Story of a Penny

I remember how when I was about five years old I went into a grocery store, and there on the counter lay a new penny. No one seemed to be watching it—or watching me. I looked at that penny. I was tempted as much as any bank teller ever was tempted by a million dollars. Children do not weigh values. They would rather have a new penny than an old ten-dollar gold piece, and that penny had all the power of the Devil wrapped up in it. I walked past it and I came back and looked at it. I looked around, no one was watching, so I put it in my pocket, and went away feeling that I had "thief" written across my forehead. I tried to rub it off and went home to my mother.

Mothers have a sort of X-ray attachment. They know when you have been swimming, and when you have been in the jam pot, and when you have stolen a penny. My mother looked right through me and saw that penny. Do you know what I had to do? I had to go to that store, and marching in before all the customers, say, "Mr. Groceryman, I stole this penny. I am sorry. Here it is. I will never do so again." I never had the least desire after that to steal.

The Objective of Repentance

What is the objective of repentance? It has a twofold objective. The first object is to get right with God, or as the admonition is, "Be ye reconciled to God."—2 Corinthians 5:20. This is an exceedingly important consideration, to adjust ourselves to God. D. T. Williams says, "When a man's watch is wrong, he doesn't attempt to reach up into the sky and set the sun by his watch; instead he sets his watch by the sun. He could not change the sun, and if he could it would be an ill-advised thing to do, because everyone else might undertake to do the same thing."

Yet the confession of faith of one of the most popular churches made that mistake. That confession said that Jesus Christ was manifest in the flesh that he might reconcile God to man. Some one has reached and tried to set God by man's watch. I am not here to attack churches, but I wish they would correct that statement. If I saw a man attempting to drive down the street with the cart ahead of his horse, I should advise him to turn them about, and that creed has the cart ahead of the horse.

Jesus Christ did not come to reconcile God to man in any sense of the word. He came to set man by God's watch. This is a fundamental thought because it has a great bearing on the atonement of Jesus Christ. Did he come and suffer and die on the cross that a sullen, vindictive, and offended God, looking on, might at last be melted and pleased and say, "Well, perhaps I will forgive, and come down and reconcile myself to man"? Do you believe that? Nothing of the kind, absolutely. There were reasons why Jesus Christ was manifested in the flesh, and one was to interpret God to us. We cannot understand God in the abstract. During all past ages man has attempted to visualize God individually. All the idols that have been were but an effort to make something to look at, to help man's mind to picture and understand the abstract idea of God. So Jesus Christ came to give us an objective lesson.

And there are reasons why he suffered on the cross, not that he should reconcile God to man, but among other things that he should break the hard hearts of men and turn them towards our heavenly Father, and there never has lived a man who came to understand the mission of Christ and his matchless love that it did not have that effect on him. Every man sooner or later will hear the gospel so that he will understand, and for that reason Jesus says, "If I be lifted up I will draw all men unto me." (John 12:32.) Some men will go a long way and receive celestial glory; some men will go part way and receive a lesser glory; and some men will turn back and not receive any; but sooner or later they will all feel the matchless power of the Son of God who was lifted up on the cross.

So we read along this line in 2 Corinthians 5:18-20, "And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself. . . . Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."

That is the substance of my sermon to-night put into a few words, "Be ye reconciled to God." I cannot sound that into your ears with the force I wish I could, but there is another preacher in this room to-night. He has been here during this series of meetings from the beginning, and with His still small voice, though you see Him not, He searches you out, and He whispers into your hearts, "Be ye reconciled to God."

My advice is that you heed that admonition, for Jesus Christ says, "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him and he with me."—Revelation 3: 20. This is your opportunity.

But repentance has another objective. First to adjust ourselves to God, and next to adjust ourselves to our fellow men. This is the very essence of religion, to get right with God and to get right with our fellow men. So some one has very wisely said that it takes three persons to live the Christian religion. Some one may ask, Cannot one man live it? No, not alone. He must first come into communion with his God; that is two; and then he must make himself right with his brother; that is three. That is the eternal triangle, the man and his God and his brother. There must continuously be fellowship flowing from every point of the triangle or a man is not living his religion. If his intercourse and fellowship is broken with his fellow men, it breaks his intercourse with God.

Let us see if that is not true. "Therefore if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee; leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift."—Matthew 5: 23, 24. Here is a man who is trying to get right with God. There is God in the heavens. Here is an altar, and here is the man who has brought his gift, but something is between him and his brother, and the Lord says, "Before you and I can enter into communion you have to make it right with this man, and when you have made it right with him and the triangle is complete, then come back to the altar and give the gift, and I will be very glad to receive it."

That is the very basis of the building of Zion, the establishment of a fellowship that shall include a continuous communion with God and a continuous fellowship with man.

This objective of getting right with God and man under repentance is greatly helped by confession. Whether the confession is private or public depends to a great extent upon the nature of the offense. A young man had done wrong and everyone knew about it, and at our late revival services in Independence in the presence of one thousand young people this young man stood up in prayer meeting and made his confession. I presume there was not a heart in that room but was enlisted on his side, and he had a thousand friends. Confession serves many purposes, and it is a great aid toward the objective in getting right with God and your fellow men.

The Great Story of the Prodigal Son

Now this theme would not be complete, no sermon on repentance is complete without an analysis of the great story of the prodigal son which we have read for our scripture reading. There can be no question that when Jesus told this story he meant that the father should represent God, and the prodigal son should represent any sinner who has need of repentance.

Let us consider then the attitude of the son. In the first place, this young man was absolutely impervious to reason. It did not do any good to advise with him. The experience of others meant nothing to him. He had his inheritance. He intended to use it as he pleased.

In the second place, he fell a victim to the "lure of the far country." That is a high-sounding term. Where is that far country? It may be under the bright lights of New York City (in this century) or in Chicago, or it may be just down town in Lamoni, or just around the corner in any village in some back room where men gather to drink bootlegged whisky or play cards or congregate with immoral women. It is a far country in the sense that it is a long way from your father's house, and it is absolutely a foreign country as compared with the spirit of that home where you were raised by a godly father and where to-night perhaps your mother on bended knees pleads for you at the throne of grace.

In the next place, when he had reached that country he squandered his inheritance. What is our inheritance? It may be money, it may be land, it may be good health, it may be a good character that can be lost, it may be a good name that your father has handed down to you, a name that has been known in the community for honor and integrity for many years, and that you may smirch in a single month by a life of folly. Your inheritance may be all of these things or any one of them. Anyway this young man squandered his inheritance, and then he discovered he had no friends.

When a man squanders his inheritance, the gang with whom he has associated will soon leave him alone, and this young man was left in a pitiable condition. He was reduced to the straits of taking care of hogs. Jesus was a master storyteller. He was talking to Jews, and you know the Jew despises a hog, and so he drew them a picture in which the prodigal became an attendant of hogs, the ultimate degradation. He was even willing and anxious to eat the stuff they were feeding the swine.

And in this condition we are told he "came to himself," or as you young people might say, he "tumbled to himself." It is a good thing for a man to "tumble to himself" and wake up and see where he is and what he looks like to other people. He came at last to himself, to his right mind, and he said, "I have sinned before God and before my father, and I will hasten home." This young man went home repentant and humble. He did not come back like some young men might, saying, "Father, I am back. Bring on the fatted calf. I hope it is in good shape." He came right down in the depths of humility and said, "Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants."—Luke 15: 18, 19. That was the attitude of the son; that was genuine repentance.

Now what was the attitude of the father? The father had never cast the son off. He did not disinherit him. The son lost the inheritance himself. The father had always loved him; and so with God. He did not hate humanity. Jesus did not have to come and bribe the Father; but we are told that "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." (John 3: 16.)

God always loved man. He loved man before Christ came. So the father saw this boy coming a long ways off. There is no eye so keen as the eye of a father or mother who waits a boy returning home; and there is no eye so keen as God's eye that sees into our hearts before others read it in our countenance that we are inclined to return to our Father's house. So the father ran out and met him half way, and greeted him with kisses, and made him welcome, and put a ring on his finger and a robe on him, and said, "This my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found."—Luke 15: 24.

This, the Master wants us to understand, is the attitude of God, and he tells us there is joy in heaven over one sinner that is returned; so you need not hesitate, you need not feel slow about confessing anything you may have done that is wrong, and take the necessary steps that will return you to God and to fellowship with the church. The Lord will by no means resist your advancements; neither will he cast you off.

The Gospel Mirror

There is another beautiful story that is told in James, the first chapter. It is a story of the gospel mirror, "But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves. For if any be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass: for he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was. But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed."—James 1: 22-25.

Here we have a picture in words that anyone can understand. It hardly needs an explanation. A man looks into a mirror and sees himself. He sees defects there that need correction; but if he goes away and forgets to make the necessary change, it has not benefited him. If he does make the necessary change, he has been blessed. It does everyone good to look into a mirror occasionally. No need to stand in front of it too much, but mirrors and soap and water and towels are agents of civilization and righteousness.

But suppose one of the young men of the college football team should come in after playing on a hot afternoon till his clothing was saturated with sweat and his face black with dust turned to mud, and coming into the dormitory he should look into a full length mirror, and should see himself in all his beauty (?), and then should go away and forget all about it, and in the evening go to the banquet to meet with the boys and girls of Graceland, and the visiting team as well. Suppose he should get in, and in the middle of the banquet should suddenly think of the picture in the mirror; he would be one of the most unhappy men on earth.

You people are looking into the gospel mirror during this series of meetings, and in these prayer services such as we had on Sunday, and you are seeing not only the doctrines of Christ, but it is showing you what you are. I do not need to call out John Smith or anyone by name and tell this audience what he has been doing; you know what you have been doing, and when you look into the mirror you see the things in your life that need correcting. Friend, are you going to go away and profit by it, or are you going to go away and forget it? By and by when the marriage supper comes, if you find yourself so unfortunate as to get in there in your soiled clothing, how will you feel then? I will tell you. I know.

Some years ago when I lived in Lamoni, I had a great many chores to do about the place, and one evening I heard that a particular friend of mine, a man from California, was to preach; so I rushed around and did the various jobs of work that had to be done, and being late I hurried off to church and got a seat in the audience under a bright light. In the middle of the sermon I looked down and, lo, I had on my old, dirty, greasy, work coat with the sleeves torn off near the elbows. I spent about the worst half hour I have experienced in my life, and at the close, when the preacher said amen, I got into my overcoat and sneaked out. I imagine that if a man with the filth of this world on his garments should be so unfortunate as to get into heaven in the midst of the pure and the good, there would be such a thing as being in hell in heaven.

You young men do not run that risk when you come from the football game. You get under the shower, and you change your clothing. You put on clean clothing and a clean collar and a clean tie, and you go to the banquet looking like the gentleman you are.

We are all interested in this church. By and by, Jesus Christ is going to serve a great feast when the church and the bridegroom will be united. The church will have on pure garments which are the garments of righteousness, and those who have on the wedding garments clean and white will come in and they will be happy. If men haven't the wedding garments on, no one would need tell them to leave. They will be glad to leave.

The gospel mirror shows us what we are, and it shows us what we may become.

The Tiger and the Derelict

You young people are entering upon what may be to you a terrific struggle, the struggle of life. The forces of good and of evil are struggling within you, and it is a question which will be victorious. Every man has that fight.

I remember reading a strange and weird tale when I was a little boy. It appealed to my imagination. I suppose I should not have read it at all. It was about a captain and crew who were on the ocean in their ship, and one morning they heard the muffled tolling of a bell coming to them over the waves. They were miles from any land, but they could hear the funeral toll of that bell. That appealed to my imagination as a boy. Finally they sighted the hulk of an old ship without mast or sails, wallowing in the trough of the sea. A bell had been rigged up to the stump of a mast, and when the ship rolled it tolled the bell. I can hear it yet.

They drew alongside of this strange ship, and as they did so there seemed to be no life on board, yet they heard a terrible roar, as from some wild animal. I can hear that roar yet! You know children have a wonderful imagination. My little boy said the other day, "Daddy, I see some mighty queer things at night when the lights are turned out. One night I could just see my clothes in the dark, and it seemed as if they just raised up and started for me." Well, I could hear that bell and that roar after I had gone to bed.

They landed on the ship with their rifles and battered open the hatches and went down into the evil-smelling cabin, and there they saw a half-starved Bengal tiger, which they killed. And in one corner of the cabin they found the skeleton of a man, and the leaves of a diary that he had been writing. The story was that this man had been put there by pirates, and the tiger had been chained with a little chain which would break when he grew hungry and violent. So day by day the man wrote his story until one day it came to an end.

That queer tale made a wonderful impression on me. You will say such a thing as that never happened, but hundreds of times I have seen, on the sea of life, the battered wrecks of men in which the beast had killed the man—the beast of appetite and passion and lust and greed. You have but to look around you and see it. It is the business of the gospel of Jesus Christ to kill the beast and redeem the man.

This struggle goes on. You cannot escape it. Under the influences of these meetings you have noble desires. If a bad thought came into your heart you would cast it out; but tomorrow some awful, contemptible temptation may take hold of you and wrestle for your life. And you will think, What kind of a man am I that I should change so? Don't you have those experiences? Haven't I? Don't you have to make the fight? You need not be ashamed. It is the forces of good and of evil fighting for your soul, and that indicates you are a man, a potential man, and both God and the Devil want you. You are a potential good man, and God wants to make you, and the Devil wants to destroy you. That is what distinguishes you from the animal—from vegetables. Hogs are not tempted. Cabbages have no conscience. Pumpkins do not debate right and wrong. It is men that battle between right and wrong.

The Devil told a half truth when he said we should become as the gods, knowing right and wrong, so it has become the province of man to know right and wrong and have the strength to do the right and resist the wrong.

So do not be discouraged because temptations come into your soul. Every man has them. Whittier wrote a poem about the "two voices" that held debate in his heart, one advocating wrong, the other pleading for right. Tennyson wrote of two "moods." The Apostle Paul says, "When I would do good, evil is present with me. . . . But I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind."—Romans 7: 21-23.

But it is the business of the man, it is the crowning glory of the man to buckle on his armor, and struggle, and the more terrific the struggle—the greater the glory. It is the crowning glory of a man to stand up and be a man and put down temptation, and put evil out of his life; he can do that only through the gospel of Jesus Christ.

EDITORS' NOTE: This is the second of seven sermons by President Elbert A. Smith to the Zion Builders, or young people of Lamoni and vicinity. All of these sermons are held in type, and will be published in leaflet form. The third will appear in an early number.

Young People's Meetings

At Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania, April 3 to 17, Elder A. M. Chase conducted a series of services following similar lines to those in Independence, Lamoni, and Philadelphia. The principal subjects taken up were the first principles of the gospel.

At Toronto, Ontario, D. T. Williams was the speaker beginning April 10. Upon completion of the services there he expects to proceed to Kirtland, Ohio, and speak in the temple, April 24 to May 1.

In Iowa, announcement is made that Elder C. E. Wight, of the Lamoni Stake Presidency, will be at Hiteman, April 17 to 24.

At Des Moines, F. M. McDowell, dean of Graceland College and a member of the Lamoni Stake High Council, April 24 to May 1.

At Council Bluffs, Elder John F. Garver, president of the Lamoni Stake, May 8 to 15.

The music at these three special meetings for young people in Iowa will be in charge of Elder Harold C. Burgess.

At Pisgah, Iowa, announcement has been made for a series of services. April 24 to May 1, with Elder John F. Garver as the speaker.

April 8 and 9 a meeting was held in Independence to consider this campaign by the young people. The committee consisted of President Elbert A. Smith; U. W. Greene and M. A. McConley of the Quorum of Twelve; R. V. Hopkins, pastor at Independence; John F. Garver and Cyril E. Wight, of the Lamoni Stake presidency; Walter W. Smith, church historian; A. E. McKim, of the department of publicity; and John A. Gardner, president of the organized classes of Independence.

Provisions were made for the preparation of a pamphlet on organization and methods.

Now, as always, the success of the services depend upon the spontaneous desire of the young people, their preparation in humble, devoted prayer, as well as devoted attendance at prayer during the week of services.

At one service announced for young people, the pastor stated, "We will make our arrangements after the meetings open." This is a grievous mistake. The work cannot be successfully done during the week of services, nor during that week with the preceding week. It requires first a definitely organized effort to see that every home is visited, and every person of suitable age invited, that a pledge is secured of attendance, that tickets are distributed so that we can follow up the attendance. We have some supposed to be excellent business men, who yet neglect repeatedly their responsibility as church officers, and do not plan beforehand, nor see that the plans are carried into effect, and that all things are prepared before us.

But most important of all, there should be a season of prayer before the opening of these special services. It is only as we come into closer communion with God that we can hope to receive the added strength and inspiration that we should.

Let no man fail in this responsibility, nor neglect this splendid opportunity for service.

One Week in the Life of a Missionary

A recent letter from one of our missionaries gives the following account, quite incidentally, of one week of activity. It will be noticed that the letter was written on Wednesday, and hence is not complete as to details for the latter part of the week; It was not written for publication:

"I arrived here Saturday evening, and Sunday we had Sunday school, sacrament service, priesthood meeting, Religio, and preaching service. Monday we had a call to go out in the country eighty-five miles to administer to a sick boy. On our return, we had a puncture, and so did not reach home until nearly midnight. Yesterday (Tuesday), two addresses at the high school, and an address to the parent-teacher association, at another school; preached at night. To-day (Wednesday), three services at the church, with three addresses. Tomorrow (Thursday), the Rotary Club, and an address at another special meeting, and preaching at night. Friday, preaching. Saturday, a fifty-mile trip with preaching again at night, and with three sermons on Sunday."

That would be sixteen addresses in one week, besides attending other services, administering to the sick, etc.

Noted Singer Not Colored

In our issue of March 30 we printed a brief item in the Women's Department quoted from The Presbyterian to the effect that Mrs. Carrie Jacobs Bond, the noted composer, is a colored woman. A sister writes from Janesville, Wisconsin, where Mrs. Bond lived for years, to say that she and others know her parents and that it is not true. We are profoundly sorry that such a statement has been circulated and that we were instrumental in further extending it. Our motives were good, for we considered it a commendable achievement to have thus won the hearts of a Nation, especially if the lady were handicapped as so many colored people are.

"Boost Your Branch Orchestra"

A member of the new Auditorium Orchestra in Independence writes to complain that he believes there is altogether too much lack of appreciation of the work of the church orchestras. He reads much in the church papers about the good work of the choirs but all too little of the faithful, painstaking labor of those who by dint of hard labor, much practice, and sacrifice become skilled enough to serve as players. Further, they often purchase their own instruments and buy their own music.

He concludes, "Have a heart and boost your branch orchestra as well as the choir; they are both doing what they can for the Lord."

The Conflict of Science and Religion

By S. A. Burgess

Truth is a perfect whole; there can be no conflict between its parts. A brief review is made of recent scientific development.

Perhaps as much or more has been heard of the conflict between science and religion than of that other conflict between capital and labor. In fact, there exist more real prospects of a conflict in the latter field. Some would infer that there are radical differences between the way in which we approach religion, and the human faculties which tend to religion, and those which attend to the so-called sciences.

We must remember that science, after all, comes from the Latin scio, to know, and represents the limits of human knowledge. But the term has been so applied to those who experiment or examine phenomena, and adding fact to fact draw a variety of conclusions. Scientists are considered to be those who argue ad posteriori or inductively; in contradistinction to those who infer a first cause, and from it argue ad priori, or deductively. But this conflict reaches much farther than to the church, though it is true those who think little, whether in the church or elsewhere, assume certain things as proven, and then are prone to argue therefrom deductively. We find this is true of certain small thinkers today concerning evolution, as it was of scholasticism in the Middle Ages.

Now human knowledge is of necessity relative. There is only one exact science, and that is the science of mathematics. Even there we find a non-Euclidian geometry, which denies those theorems which we have so carefully learned at high school. It proceeds to demonstrate that the known facts of the world can be as readily explained on other bases, as well as by those axioms which are taken to be proven because they are "self-evident."

The nature of human knowledge indeed opens a wide field, both in psychology and epistemology, as well as in philosophy in general, for it becomes at once apparent that we are not able to perceive the thing an sich, or the thing in itself. A dress looks different in the dark from what it does in daylight. The color changes according to the way the light falls upon it. Our sense of feeling is only an approximation. This can be demonstrated by a number of easy experiments. One to cross the fingers, the first and second fingers, and then with the tips thus crossed pass them on each side of the nose. The fingers will tell us we have two noses, or else that our nose is very badly split. What is the reality of an object? Who can tell?

Of course we have for convenience certain terms that we apply to certain reactions upon the retina of the eye when the object is placed in bright daylight; but the object is still there in the dusk, though it appears different; and we know that it does not appear the same to one person as it does to another.

Next to mathematics we may note the laws of physics. These are by no means as exact as are the laws of mathematics, so we find more divergence of opinion. There is a great furor now at Einstein's theory of relativity, and of the materiality of life. Observation by this theory would indicate that the light of certain stars passing close to the sun during a total eclipse, was deflected. There are some, however, who still insist that it may be caused by a more extensive solar atmosphere than we as yet know of. We know that the light of the sun and other heavenly bodies, in passing through the atmosphere of the earth, is deflected, so that the sun, or any other heavenly body, is actually much nearer the horizon than it appears, and may even be actually below the horizon while it is still perceived by us. The result of such an atmosphere around the sun would be to deflect the light so that it would curve a little towards the sun. The effect of attraction of the mass of the sun upon the mass of light, if light possesses mass, would be similar if not identical. Much of our astronomy and physics have been built up on the assumptions of motion which Einstein brings into question.

Certain laws or theories that were laid down in the physics of ten and twenty years ago are found not to be exact. Some because of antipathy to the rapid progress of scientific knowledge in our age, of the changes that are made in a single decade would reject all science. It is of course quite clear that hypotheses or even theories are not absolute proof. It is also equally certain that they have made and do make decidedly for human progress. It would be as foolish to refuse to study the scientific works of to-day, because that tomorrow the world will know more, as it would be to refuse to study our alphabet because in a few years we shall have gone beyond that. Parents well know how useless schoolbooks accumulate—useless, that is, for later years. But that is no reason why schoolbooks should not be secured for the instruction of our young.

As we proceed we note that chemistry was substituted in the past two centuries for alchemy, yet the elements of twenty years ago are not only now enlarged, but the modern theory of electrons would seem to give some basis for the assumption of the alchemist that base metals might be turned into gold, as the theory of electrons assumes that all atoms are composed of a number of the same kind of electrons, and by their number, arrangement, and motion in the atoms is the substance of the chemical elements determined. It is known now that some atoms do give off something and change from one substance to another. Particularly is this true of radium, but it is also true of other radio active substances. It is suspected that it may be true of still other substances, though much of this is still hypothesis. Yet chemistry, in its study of atoms, and molecules, and their interaction, which follow as a rule certain general laws, has proven of tremendous value to human life in industry and agriculture, as well as in medicine and even in war.

Some would explain life as a series of physical, chemical reactions. Others insist upon a vital principle. The study of biology, of botany, or zoology, is concerned both with physical reactions and also with chemical reactions, as well as with something else that goes to make life. Geology concerns itself in fact with both of these subjects of botany and zoology, under the heading of paleontology.

It is remarkable the amount of knowledge that man has gained concerning the heavenly bodies, their weight and composition, their distance, their movement, and speed, and the approximate accuracy with which certain results are achieved. Yet twenty years ago the galaxy of stars was defined as shaped like a watch, 20,000 to 30,000 light years in diameter, and 8,000 light years thick. To-day these figures are greatly exceeded. Betelgeuse is said to be one million times as large as our sun, with other stars still larger. It is remarkable also what has been developed in the intensive study of the stratas of earth in geology, concerning the record and life of this earth, and the plants and animals which have lived hereon.

But psychology, while concerned principally with the study of the mental reaction of man, has also extended its researches with animal psychology, while eminent students urge that there should also be a department of plant psychology. Experimental psychology naturally concerns itself with material elements, which can be measured. But it leads in the minds of many students, such as Royce, Calkins, Munsterburg, and others, to what they call a psychology of soul, to a something beyond the material element.

What we would emphasize in this brief summary is the inter-relation of one so-called science with another, and how one leads up to another: mathematics, astronomy, physics, chemistry, botany, biology, and psychology. Some would now make a new department and call it humanism for the study of man. Psychology also as a study of man and his mental reactions, including spiritual reactions, attempts more or less an explanation of religion. But it reaches also on down to the animal and plant creation, and we know some psychologists who discuss also the formation of crystals and rocks as a life process. There is no clearly divided line between science and religion. There are different methods of attacking the same problem. James finds pluralism, but in his pluralism he still finds a unity. Other philosophers who have urged the absolute unity of the universe are yet bound to note the pluralism of manifest nature. Monism or unity of nature may be explained as spiritual or as material. It is interesting to note that in the modern theory electrons give after all force as the basis for matter, and matter merely as various manifestations of electrical energy, while Haeckel in his law of substance finds in force both intelligence and matter.

The same intelligence which attacks the problem of mathematics also approaches the problems of religion and religious experience. The same methods have been applied to both. Results have been achieved in both. In physics we note at once the result of force applied in a material way. In religion we note it in the development of character, or in the healing of the sick. Both are subject to the same practical human limitations. One does not look for the same results in chemistry as in mathematics; nor for the same results in physics as in biology; in religion as in astronomy or geology. But considering the limitation of the physical instrumentality in the human brain, and the restrictions therefor upon human intelligence; considering also the methods and tests applied and the results normally looked for, experiments may be made and results achieved in religion as clearly as in any other realm of human knowledge.

Representing, however, as it does the advanced department of human knowledge, reaching beyond this life to the greatest possible ideal of humanity individually, it is not surprising if the tests to be applied in religion are not so easily handled as is the case with chemistry, or the laws as quickly understood. Those conducting experiments in chemistry know that many of them are so delicate that the reaction is not always secured. The utmost care and attention are essential. The same is true of experiments in psychology and in physics. Changes are sometimes so minute as to be ascertained only with the use of magnifying instruments.

Nor does the argument a priori belong exclusively to the realm of religion and metaphysics. Nor does faith belong exclusively to religion. No scientific progress can be made without faith, even though it be in the most material realm, in the preparation of food, or the erection of a building; and no intellectual progress is made without faith.

Again, the advanced work done by the leading thinkers who conduct original research and discover some new law, whether it be general or particular in its application, is always made upon the assumption of certain principles, whether they be hypotheses, theories, or whether they be called laws. A certain attitude is always assumed towards the problem, with the assumption that certain results are to be achieved. The results actually achieved may approve or disapprove this assumption. But whether it be in science or in religion, we first desire to believe; then having that much of belief, faith increases until we make the full test. At last faith becomes knowledge, and from that knowledge there is gained a yet greater faith, which again in turn if sufficiently long continued will become further knowledge, upon which a still greater faith may be erected. This is true of religion (Alma 16:138-173). It is true in the realm of science.

All forms of human knowledge are finite or relative, and are affected by the nature of man and his capacity for observation. General methods of proceeding in thought are similar—the known to the unknown—faith which becomes knowledge, and a proceeding on that knowledge to a yet greater faith.

But each department of human knowledge differs in its subject matter, manner of treatment, and the results which are achieved. There can be no contradiction in truth. Truth is necessarily one. There is contradiction, however, in the various ideas held in each and every realm of human knowledge. There is contradiction in the epistemology or the method of explanation of known things, between men who take their viewpoint from a material standpoint of observation, and between those who study the higher powers of man. Each naturally sees the universe in terms of his own limited knowledge.

The disagreement is between men and their concepts, not between science and religion or any other department of truth.

There is also a difference of ideas, different theories of explanation, and methods of procedure in human thought. These are duly classified in logic. But these methods are applied to any and all fields of human knowledge. Though it may seem to the casual observer that deduction is applied more frequently in some realms of human thought, and induction in others.

There are differences of explanations offered in each field of human observation and study, and other differences between men who have centered their thoughts in radically different fields of human thought. But none of these factors or differences change the fact of the underlying unity of the universe, and of underlying unity in human thought. Especially do none of them contradict the great underlying unity of truth itself. To assume otherwise is to assume a self-contradiction.

Summed up briefly, there may be a conflict between one man's idea of religion and another man's idea of science. Yet, between the truth in either realm, there can be no possible conflict. The results achieved by research in different departments of human knowledge may differ, as does the nature of the research. The results are also limited by human capacity. But that does not mean that they are of but little value.

Faith is just as necessary in one department of human knowledge as in another. Methods of research and experimentation can be tried in one field as well as in another. "Prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it."—Malachi 3:10. "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."—1 Thessalonians 5:21.

While dogmatic assertions and presumptions exist in the case of some men in every field of human knowledge, the pursuit of wisdom and of knowledge is one that brings quickly its own reward of joy and of peace; and of no other thing is this so true as it is of the knowledge which leads man to God. For in the highest sense of each term truth and righteousness and duty and freedom are identical, for true freedom is to be found only in the path of the good and the true. A little learning is still a dangerous thing, but a fullness of knowledge and of wisdom to-day as in the past leads man back, without fail, to God.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

NEW COLLEGE BUILDING COMPLETED

Will be ready for use in a few days. Something about the new building from the Lamoni Chronicle.

The new brick building which has been in course of construction for the past year on College Hill is now completed, and in another week the hopefuls of Graceland will be airing their knowledge storehouses before their superior dignitaries in the classrooms of the new quarters.

The large building which is in dimension 105 feet by 65 feet, is built in accordance with the very latest and best ideas of modern architecture. It is very substantial and commodious and meets in every detail the requirements of a hall of learning. It was erected at a cost approximating $90,000 and is a building of which the boosters of Graceland can be justly proud. It indeed fills a long-felt need. The structure is of brick with steel frame. Large steel columns forty-three feet long rise from the basement the entire height of the building. These are only twelve feet apart and give the frame a strength of endurance which is almost imperishable.

The building is as fireproof as modern science can make it. The frame being of steel, covered with brick, the lath under the plaster, the window casings, the joists, the floor supports, and the doors all being of metal, the floors and stairways of cement, the partition walls of brick over steel framework, leaves nothing but a small bit of finishing woodwork in the rooms which would be destructible by fire.

The building is furnished with a large fan ventilating system with a large power fan located in the basement and circulation connections in every room. This is the most modern and approved method of ventilation and is a very important part of any building.

The building will be steam heated, the heat being furnished by the heating plant already on the grounds, it being adequate to supply all the buildings. The rooms are lighted from one side only, almost the entire east and west sides of the building being windows. The Fenestra steel sash cemented permanently in the walls, the windows opening out instead of sliding up and down in grooves, prevents any unpleasant rattling.

It is the ultimate intention to use the entire building for classrooms, but at present the need for dormitory rooms being so great, the second floor has been temporarily arranged to fill this requirement. There are six large rooms on this floor. The southeast room has been reserved for a reception room and study hall and each of the other five rooms has been divided into three smaller rooms by temporary beaver board partitions.

Each of these rooms is furnished with a built-in bookcase and wardrobe. The cement floors have been treated to a coat of water glass which gives a smooth surface and prevents the cement from dusting. The rooms are light and airy; are painted a light tan with waxed oak woodwork. In each room will be placed four single cots, so that it is estimated the upper floor will accommodate between fifty and sixty girls. Two small rooms on the east side will be furnished for sleeping and reception rooms for the dean of women.

A large hall through the center furnishes ample passageway and connects with toilet and bathrooms at the south end. Sanitary drinking fountains are also installed in the halls on each floor.

The rooms on the first floor and basement will be devoted to classes. There are ten in all—six on the first floor and four in the basement. Light enters from the outside wall only, and there are blackboards on two sides. They are furnished with individual class chairs and suitable desk and instructor's chair which make them very convenient and adequate. The classrooms have connecting doors so that in case of danger of congestion in the halls passage can be had from one room to another without entering the halls.

A wide hall runs the entire length of the building north and south. Through the center of this it is planned to place a row of museum cases. The ones now in use in the college building will be moved and new ones made, so as to accommodate the specimens collected. Class bells in the hall connect with the hall in the other building.

In the basement, besides the four classrooms, are the room in which the ventilating fan is housed, a boy's locker room, and two large toilet and lavatory rooms furnished with shower baths, etc.

At the opening of the school year of 1921-22, it is proposed to restore to the boys their rightful possession of Marietta Hall, this year occupied by an overflow of girls, and with the rooms available in the Herald Office building for dormitory purposes, they will be able to comfortably house and take care of them, while the rooms on the second floor of the new building together with Patroness Hall will furnish adequate quarters for the girls. The added classrooms will relieve the congested condition in that respect.

The grounds around the building are also undergoing some changes. The driveway on the south side of the old college building will be closed up, and a new one built on the outside of the west walk with a turn around the end of the walk connecting with the road on the inside in front of the college building. A turn is also being built on the east side driveway. In the angle will be placed flower beds to add to the attractiveness. The entire grounds are being graded and will be seeded to grass, so that in time a greensward will encompass the entire group of buildings.

The next step in the building program of Graceland will likely be a gymnasium building, which will be placed on the east of the new structure. It will be built of hollow tile with concrete foundation and will contain a gym room, a large assembly hall, a game room, besides locker rooms, etc. The gym room will have a gallery all around with a seating capacity of 1,000. It is hoped to get this building started in the near future.

Looking at the new building, one might wonder why the brick on the north side is not glazed but similar to that on the inside walls and the stone finishing does not go clear around. The reason is this: This wall will some day, it is hoped, form a partition and not an outside. As the attendance increases, another class building similar to the new edifice will be erected in direct line; and between the two will be a large administration building joining the present class building on the north.

The plans of the church architect and those in charge of the educational work, vision a city on the hill which will furnish educational and home privileges for an army of young people of which the fathers of the institution dared not dream.

Meetings of the priesthood, of two neighboring districts in Nebraska, and the Pottawattamie and Fremont Districts in Iowa, were held at Council Bluffs, Saturday and Sunday, April 9 and 10. Doctor G. Leonard Harrington spoke on the Word of Wisdom Sunday forenoon, and gave separate lectures to the men and women in the afternoon, on "Keeping fit." In the evening he spoke on the Word of Wisdom, in Omaha.

S. A. Burgess, of the editorial staff, spoke twice on Saturday and three times on Sunday, all but the Sunday evening service being lectures to the priesthood.

LAMONI STAKE

The two articles, "The Lamoni Stake in action," and "When Lamoni became the church headquarters," were to have appeared as part of the special magazine HERALD on the Lamoni Stake, April 6, but were crowded out because of lack of space. They should be read, however, in connection with that number, to which they properly belong.—EDITORS.

LAMONI STAKE IN ACTION

[The vigor with which the work in Lamoni Stake is pushed by its administrative officials, together with something of the ideal held before the ministry and Saints, with an indication as to their response thereunder are set forth in the following annual report of John F. Garver, president, to the conference of the Lamoni Stake, at Lamoni, Iowa, February 5, 1921.—EDITORS.]

To the Saints of Lamoni Stake in Conference Assembled; Greeting: As is our custom, we undertake at this our February conference, to evaluate the work of the past year, and to look forward in anticipation to that of the year to come.

The Presidency

The work of the stake presidency is continued under the organization one year ago indicated. Daniel T. Williams has immediate supervision of field work, Cyril E. Wight of office work, and John F. Garver of administrative matters.

We had hoped that more of the time of Elder Wight would this school year be available than was the case last, but in this we have been disappointed. His work as instructor at Graceland College in the department of religious education has been quite heavy indeed, the number of the class being double that of last year. It is the expectation that another will be prepared to take up this work another year, so that by June next, Elder Wight should be free for the work of the stake.

This will permit of the carrying out of plans we have had in mind for considerable time, and which we think will admit of more constructive and personal work among the brethren and Saints, both at Lamoni and elsewhere.

Elder Daniel T. Williams and Bishop Carmichael have together been conducting meetings in certain of the branches, and have plans for continuing efforts at still other places. We commend them to the Saints, and bespeak for them the support due the work they seek to establish. They are workmen able and worthy, and God will bless their efforts to the good of his people.

The work of the bishopric continues under the direction of Bishop Albert Carmichael, with the assistance of Elder Alvah J. Yarrington.

From the report of the bishopric to be later submitted to this conference, and by comparison with former data, we are pleased to note the continued increase in receipts it has been late years our privilege to chronicle.

The last full fiscal year reported on by the bishopric was the year 1918, the change in close of the fiscal year previously reported, making the last report to be for the first six months only of 1919. Reverting to this report for 1918, we recall that total receipts for the year, including cash balance of $6,124.43, were $57,573.14. Now total receipts for the fiscal year closing June 30, 1920, the time covered by the report just referred to, and to be submitted to the conference, including cash balance of $4,490.46, were $63,795.17, or, allowing for the difference in cash balance, an actual increase of $7,856, or slightly above fifteen and one fourth per cent.

Again, offerings for 1918 aggregated $2,364.50, tithes $32,810.94, a total of $35,175.44; while for the year closing June 30, 1920, the report shows offerings amounting to $1,768.70, tithes $37,372.79, a total of $39,141.49. The increase in tithing alone, which is perhaps the more just test, is by these figures shown to be $4,561.85, or approximately fourteen per cent.

We spoke of the work of the stake high council one year ago, to say that were these men of the council to be of most worth to the cause as advisers and as leaders of the people in the unfoldment of important developments before us in the work of the church, they must needs grow with the work. We are again referring to these men to say that if they are to hold their places among us, they must grow rapidly, for surely the hastening time is upon us. May God grant they may qualify and perform the full part of each of them required.

The council has been strengthened since last report by additions to fill vacancies incident to the resignations of Martin M. Turpen and Roy V. Hopkins, acted upon one year ago. These new men are A. Max Carmichael and Robert A. Ballantyne. The remaining members of the council are: Jeremiah A. Gunsolley, George W. Blair, Oscar Anderson, Floyd M. McDowell, Gomer R. Wells, David C. White, David Keown, Eli Hayer, John Midgorden, and Francis M. Weld.

The Departments

The work of the Sunday school has continued under the administration of Frank McDonald, that of the Religion under the supervision of Flavius J. Sharp. The opportunities in these departments for good and lasting results are limitless. We trust the Saints everywhere will come to recognize the importance of this part of our church effort.

The Women's Department has been reorganized during the year, Mrs. Susan L. Hayer giving place to Mrs. Ida C. Monroe. An organization has been effected at Chariton, while at Lamoni the work has been reorganized, four groups being formed, each with a leader, a secretary-treasurer, and a friendly visitor. Other localities are to be visited with a view to organization. The women already organized are studying and serving, and altogether are putting forth efforts quite worth while, and calculated to develop into something big in our Zion movement.

For expenses of this department the stake bishopric joins us in the recommendation that an appropriation of $50 be allowed.

The Ministry

We have spoken of the need of development on the part of the stake high council. We come now to the brethren of the local ministry to register anew our conviction as to the need of the fullest possible qualification on their part, that the forward movements necessary unto God's people may be made possible through a leadership worthy the trust imposed.

We are glad indeed to note the growing concern on the part of a large number of these men, men who desire to please God by measuring up to the wonderful opportunities of their ministry. May our heavenly Father continue to inspire them to renewed effort, again and again. And may he bless their efforts among the people.

There yet remain certain unresponsive ones who if they have caught the vision of a Zion worthy and teeming with activity in all things necessary unto the warning of the world and the redemption of God's people, have not yet openly and constructively espoused this good cause. May God lead such to self-searching and to ultimate qualification.

In speaking of the brethren, it gives us much pleasure to observe that the past year, counting recommendations to be submitted to this conference, has added to our ministerial ranks a splendid corps of young men, the most of whom are for the first time intrusted with the sacred things of the priesthood.

The recommendations for this conference, together with prior ordinations since last report, advance for us to additional responsibility five men; and impose priesthood for the first time on twelve others, bringing to us in all the fuller services of seventeen men vigorously engaged in and devoted to the cause.

In addition to these, a few good men of the ministry have during the year moved into the stake, while still others for a time inactive have returned to the work.

The impetus of these additions to our forces, together with the renewed diligence of many of the brethren as heretofore observed, can hardly be estimated. We look forward with hope, feeling the day of our ideal for the ministry of Lamoni Stake is fast approaching. May its sun soon rise to light us clearly in the good way.

In the meantime there is set for your presiding officers the unpleasant task of continuing the purging from our ranks of the few who will not respond. May God give us wisdom divine, steady hands, and hearts of love, that our efforts in this regard may result only as He whose right it is to demand a reckoning would order.

And so by elimination, and by development, may we finally present a ministry worthy—alert, diligent, capable for every emergency and activity, that people by such shepherding may come to be indeed the Zion of God.

Loyalty

In our last report we spoke quite freely concerning unwise and unwarranted gossip, carried over sometimes into the field of open slander. It was our purpose at the time to open up a campaign the climax of which we hoped would be the driving to cover of the disloyal. We are pleased indeed to say this effort has met with a measure of success, far beyond our hopes for the year just passed.

The effort was of course aimed at all gossips; if at anyone more than another, then at those who without regard for the proprieties, and sometimes even without regard for the truth, choose church leaders and policies for their target; and if at anyone in particular, then at men of the ministry who join in with and even in some instances take the lead of this gang of malcontents.

We are persuaded the mutual confidence, love, and support necessary to our success as a people cannot be developed in the midst of the confusion, discord, and dissension growing out of a promiscuous and ungodly flapping at both ends of loose and misguided tongues. This is why we plead earnestly with our people to come away from this thing, to have nothing whatever to do with it, either actively or passively, this evil which so seriously menaces the work of God; and to enter rather upon the godly walk and conversation calculated to develop Christian fellowship and love toward each other, and the brethren charged with the responsibilities of leadership, that Zion's redemption through these well-ordered associations and our good works may be made sure and certain.

In this matter we feel strongly, and shall labor assiduously. As already indicated, we are glad our efforts are in this regard meeting with an encouragement assuring the eventual riddance of this hindrance to our progress, and finally the holy communion and bonds of peace necessary unto the people of God.

The People Responding

Speaking of the people, we are indeed glad to say they are responding to the call to service in a manner that presages good to the cause. We have already noted their answer to demands of that part of the law called temporal. We are pleased to add that our observations justify the conclusion they are in like manner responding to the provisions of that part we call spiritual.

Especially in their desires to be taught and to anticipate both the temporal and spiritual activities before them, are the Saints for the most part commending themselves as worthy. It is now for them to resolve to do, and for their shepherds of the ministry to bend every energy to qualify for the leadership in every advance step requisite and possible. And to this end we feel both the Saints and brethren endeavor.

Success Assured

Remembering it is the great and eternal God of all the earth who calls us, surely may we feel confident of success in the day of our full worthiness as his chosen ones. May we then, in the phraseology of the Apostle Paul, "lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us," that we may with endurance eternal press on "toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus," which is for us at this time, praises be to his holy name, the Zion of his certain promise.

Fraternally,

J. F. GARVER.

LAMONI, IOWA, February 5, 1921.

WHEN LAMONI BECAME CHURCH HEADQUARTERS

Interesting old account of the incidents leading to the settlement in southern Iowa.

Concerning the location at Lamoni, we note that the previous settlement of the Reorganized Church was not considered permanent. In 1868 much was being said with respect to location of a permanent business center for the church. Joseph Smith even expressed to the Bishop the sentiment that he hoped the Lord would give him no rest until he had effected such location. As a result of this, a joint stock company was formed, and a committee appointed to search out a location. The following from the account given in the SAINTS' HERALD for August 13, 1887, is of especial interest:

"At a meeting of the board of directors held at the house of I. L. Rogers, near Sandwich, Illinois, April 4, 1871, the committee on location reported through its chairman, E. Banta, that, after examining various parts of eastern Kansas, northwestern Missouri, and southwestern Iowa, the town of Fayette, in the southwestern corner of Decatur County, Iowa, was selected, and lands purchased there.

"Brethren Rogers, Banta, and Dancer state that when they went into Kansas to examine and select lands, at Topeka they were provided with passes out to Abilene and the Turkey Creek country, where they thought it probable they might locate. Feeling their need of divine guidance they sought it by secret, earnest prayer while at Junction City, which resulted in their minds being entirely changed, they being given to understand that they should not locate in Kansas. In this view all and each of them perfectly agreed. Brother Banta then remembered and related what Brother E. Robinson told him some time previously, that when in Washington, District of Columbia, he had an open vision, saw a large gathering of the Saints in the vicinity of the Iowa and Missouri line in the southwestern part of Decatur County, Iowa, and in that region, and heard them singing the familiar hymn,

"Give us room that we may dwell!
Zion's children cry aloud:

See their numbers—how they swell!
How they gather, like a cloud!

“O how bright the morning seems!
Brighter from so dark a night:
Zion is like one that dreams,
Filled with wonder and delight.

“Lo! thy sun goes down no more,
God himself will be thy light:
All that caused thee grief before,
Buried lies in endless night.

“Zion, now arise and shine!
Lo! thy light from heaven is come!
These that crowd from far are thine;
Give thy sons and daughters room.”

—Saints' Harp, Hymn 939.

“After consulting freely over the fact of the marvelous and sudden change wrought upon their minds in answer to prayer, and also in regard to the vision of Brother Robinson, they, after going out to see the country they had started for, returned and went to Nebraska City, Nebraska, stopped with Brother R. C. Elvin, and attended Wednesday night prayer meeting. During this meeting Brother Henry Kemp, with whom they then had little or no acquaintance, spoke in tongues and gave the interpretation thereof, the first part of which related to the soon coming of Christ, and then turning to these three strange brethren said in substance, as nearly as now remembered by Elders Banta, Rogers, and Dancer, ‘Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you my servants, your prayers have been heard and answered, and if faithful you shall accomplish the desires of your hearts.’ These brethren state that, so far as they knew, Brother Kemp knew nothing of the business they then had in hand. Of this circumstance Brother Kemp wrote us of late:

“I will now give you, as near as I can, what the Spirit said to Brethren Rogers, Dancer, and Banta, at a branch prayer meeting held in the house of Brother Nelson, Nebraska City. While singing hymn 1028, and coming to the latter clause of the second verse, which reads are follows:

“‘Lest we should die when we behold him,
For his glory's brighter than the sun;’”

“the Spirit came upon me in mighty power and I sang the remainder of the hymn through in tongues. At the close of the singing I arose and spoke in tongues, and part of the interpretation was to those three brethren, telling them to be of good cheer, for notwithstanding their faith and patience had been severely tried, God would be with them, his almighty arm would protect them, and his Holy Spirit would lead them to a place where his holy angels would work with them to the accomplishment of the desires of their hearts in righteousness and as a preparation to the bringing to pass the purposes and designs of God as spoken by the mouths of all the holy prophets since the world began relative to the building up and establishing of His Zion in the latter days; and that they (these brethren) should see the literal fulfillment of these words to their joy and full satisfaction.

“I had never seen these brethren before that time, that I knew of, and I was almost, if not entirely ignorant of the work they had an hand.

“‘Yours in bonds,
“‘HENRY KEMP.’”

Only a person who honestly likes boys can expect to understand them. It takes this kind of a fellow to make a good scoutmaster.

During the absence of C. E. Wight, in Dakota, where he was called to conduct a funeral, Elder Harold C. Burgess took charge of the class in Religious Education at Grace-land College.

THE FORUM

The Forum is a department of the Herald intended primarily for free discussion of various questions, especially of a controversial nature, the contributions representing the views of the writer but not necessarily indorsed by the editors or the church at large.

Where Are the Lost Tribes? Is the Earth Hollow?

By W. N. Dawson

“Some ridicule the idea of the earth being hollow and that people live inside of it. I want to say that there is ten times as much proof of that fact as there was in Columbus's day that the earth was round.”

Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, took Samaria and carried the ten tribes away into Assyria and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the River Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes (in Mesopotamia). (2 Kings 17: 6, 721 B. C.)

One hundred and nine years after the captivity by Shalmaneser, Jeremiah the prophet tells us they are in the north country and the Lord will bring them out. (Jeremiah 3: 18, also 16: 14, 15.)

There is no question but that many were scattered and driven or sifted (Amos 9: 9) among all nations, but to say all were thus scattered or driven would do violence to other scriptures. Lehi was of the tribe of Manasseh. He was not sifted among the Gentiles; he was led out of Jerusalem. While he probably was not the chief or representative man of his tribe, he was led out by the Lord.

I believe the Lord could have led the ten tribes beyond the icy circle in less number of days than the years the children of Israel were wandering around in the wilderness. Josephus was a noted historian but was he correct? If compared with the historians of the nineteenth century as regards the great Restoration, it would be a poor thing to go by. Let God be true though every man mistaken (see Romans 3: 4); especially when it conflicts with the word of the Lord. Jesus appeared to the Nephites immediately after his ascension. (3 Nephi 5: 9-11.) He tells them that the Father (God) hath led them (ten tribes) away out of the land. (3 Nephi 7: 15.) That they are not in any parts of that land round about whither I have been to minister. (3 Nephi 7: 24.) That the Father knoweth whither he hath taken them. (3 Nephi 8: 4.) The scattered children of Israel and those from the north countries are to be gathered. (Ether 6: 12.) The Lord is to speak to the lost tribes the same as to the Jews and Nephites, and all are to write it. (2 Nephi 12: 67-73.) Then the lost tribes are to have the scriptures like the record of the Jews or Nephites when they come back.

We are asked, “Why did not some one find land beyond the icy circle if there was any?” “In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established.”—Matthew 18: 16. Then if two or three witnesses can be found, it ought to prove it. “Natives around the Behring Sea have a tradition of an ice-bound big land beyond the horizon.”—North Pole, by Peary, p. 17.

First Witness

Doctor Kane, in 1853, discovered an open polar sea of four thousand two hundred square miles which washed a bold mountainous coast from which no speck of ice could be seen; he sailed for one thousand four hundred miles along its coast. (See Our First Century, p. 537.)

Second Witness

Evidences of previous human occupancy were discovered far north. Abandoned slate houses, in which were found combs of walrus, ivory, fishhook, bone needles, and a number of worked articles of bone and wood, the use of which was unknown to the Eskimo guide. (See Phantoms of the Poles, by William Reed.)

Third Witness

The stretch to the east of Cape Lyon is neutral area, which the western Eskimos have never crossed, nor any Eskimo so far as anyone living knows . . . it was very difficult to get any Eskimo to go with me . . . we visited this Europeanlike people. . . . There are about forty individuals in the group, and there are said to be others like them farther north. . . . These are not Eskimos, but they are Fo'cle men. Some had red hair. (Vilhjmar Stephansson, Victoria Land, SAINTS' HERALD, September 20, 1911, p. 896.)

Some ridicule the idea of the earth being hollow and that people live inside of it. I want to say that there is ten times as much proof of that fact as there was in Columbus's day that the earth was round. Columbus went before King Ferdinand, and the king ordered the most learned astronomers and cosmographers to examine Columbus's theories, then report their opinions to him. This conference took place at that great seat of learning, the University of Salamanca. The report was: "Is there any one so foolish . . . as to believe that there are antipodes with their feet opposite ours; people who walk with their heels upward, and their heads hanging down; that there is a part of the world in which all things are topsyturvy . . . where it rains, hails, and snows upward? The idea of the roundness of the earth."—Life of Columbus, p. 35, by Washington Irving.

Parry in 1819, was the first navigator to pass directly north of the magnetic North Pole, and to have the strange experience of seeing the compass needle pointing due south. (See North Pole, Peary, p. 11.)

Nansen sailed for fifteen days in that northern sea, straight north at a rate of speed that should have taken him twelve hundred miles past the North Pole; the water was warm, thirty-five degrees Fahrenheit. He thought that he had passed the pole and was in the region of the Lena River, September 21. (See Our First Century.) But in that region of the Lena River at that time of the year it is quite cold September 21. Kine, Cook, Peary, and Nansen agree that about the Arctic Circle it was sixty-seven and sixty-eight below zero. At the North Pole, Cook said it was thirty-two below zero April 23, 1908. Peary says it was twelve below zero April 6, 1909. Doctor Kane says there was not a speck of ice to be seen September, 1854. (See Our First Century, p. 537.)

Nansen says, "The air was warm and balmy and springlike, thirty-five degrees Fahrenheit December 21."

"Therefore, behold the days come, saith the Lord, that it shall no more be said, The Lord liveth, that brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but, The Lord liveth, that brought up the children of Israel from the land of the north, and from all lands whither he had driven them: and I will bring them again into their land that I gave unto their fathers."—Jeremiah 16:14, 15. "And they who are in the north countries shall come in remembrance before the Lord, and their prophets shall hear his voice, and shall no longer stay themselves, and they shall smite the rocks, and the ice shall flow down at their presence. And an highway shall be cast up in the midst of the great deep."—Doctrine and Covenants 108:6. "And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear."—Genesis 1:9.

If the water was in one place, then the land must have been in one body also. The Lord God, "he shall command the great deep and it shall be driven back into the north countries, and the islands shall become one land, and the land of Jerusalem [Palestine] and the land of Zion [America] shall be turned back into their own place, and the earth shall be

The Machinery for Stewardship Management

By Max Carmichael

This is the seventh and concluding article on Zionie problems by this author. The responsibility for correct observance of stewardship is discussed.

What will be the machinery which will carry into operation the plan we have discussed?

The Bishop and His Council

First is the Bishop and his council. They will receive tithes, and disburse them into proper channels. The steward will hand in his inventory and income and expense account to the Bishop at the end of the fiscal year. The Bishop will approve or disapprove. If the Bishop approves, then will come the question as to disposition of the surplus. Probably the steward himself has made a charitable disposition of part of it, by way of giving to world relief of poor, or to other legitimate activities. As to the surplus, the steward will probably express his desires as to its disposition. He may want to further his education with it, or he may want to invest it in some business enterprise. He ought to get the expression of the Bishop as to his approval or disapproval. If the steward's desires tend toward the uplift of Zion, he will, no doubt, get the approval of the Bishop. At first the Bishop will not have as much advice to give as to the disposition of the surplus, at least, until definite and certain plans of cooperation are worked out. The wishes of the steward will no doubt receive full approval so long as they tend toward the industrial uplift of Zion. The first probable question of difference between the individual steward and the Bishop may be over the question as to what percentage of the surplus should actually be handed over to the church for common purposes, as the building program of the church, or to the college, or to other church enterprises.

Going back, if the Bishop disapproves of the budget or income and expense account, it means that the Bishop feels that the steward has not lived upon his needs and just wants, that the steward has lived in luxury, has spent money that otherwise might be used for the redemption of the world, has lived above what is necessary to keep him in full physical, mental, and spiritual efficiency, and that therefore his increase for the year is not what it should have been; his tithlike as it was in the days before it was divided."—Doctrine and Covenants 108:5.

The farthest man has ever been north, animals and birds were going still farther north. Where were they going? Young wild geese! Where were they raised? They must have green feed! Why does the compass needle turn five hundred miles from the North Pole and point south?

Peary said two hundred miles from land on the ice a bear had crossed and recrossed his (Peary's) trail, and asks, Who would suppose a bear would venture that far out on the ice? Suppose he had followed the bear tracks, he would have found land near by.

Why is it so much warmer at the North Pole than it is at the Arctic Circle? The farther man goes north, the more plentiful is animal and bird life. These are only a few of the evidences I can bring forth, and they cannot be explained on any other hypothesis than that the earth is hollow.

The lost tribes will have their scripture with them when they come out.

ing would therefore necessarily be lower than it should have been, and that therefore according to the opinion of the Bishop, this steward has not lived on "temporal equality" with his brethren. We would repeat the idea there that living according to one's needs and just wants is what essentially makes temporal equality. Of course, the steward may pay no attention to the Bishop's opinion. He has his free agency. This would mean, of course, that he did not care to live upon the plan of God. If, however, the steward feels that the Bishop's opinion is wrong, either he or the Bishop may carry the situation to the high council. The high council's opinion is final; that is, final in that there is no more appeal. The steward may take the high council's opinion or not. He still has his free agency. He can do as he pleases with his earnings. However, if he does not care to abide by the decision of the high council, he will not be considered as living in harmony with the law.

A Common Tribunal Necessary

The need of a common tribunal such as the Bishopric to look over these inventories and income and expense accounts is apparent. If we are to live upon temporal equality and maintain confidence in our brethren that they are living in temporal equality, we will need to have such a common tribunal to look over these matters and make decision for the body. If any one man is living above his needs and just wants and at the same time claims to be living upon the stewardship plan, some agent for the other stewards should exist which should inform this one steward of his violation. Of course, as said in former articles, the Bishop will take into consideration various matters in determining needs and just wants, size of family, health of family, station of the vocation, and its particular needs in the way of study, clothing, etc. Surely not many errors will be made when the decision must go through the Bishop and his two counselors, and then if disagreement is had, through the high council, which consists of twelve high priests to argue the case and three high priests to give a decision, to which decision a majority of the twelve high priests must give sanction.

The High Council

Or the Bishop and the steward may agree that the steward has lived according to his needs and just wants, and therefore has saved up the proper increase, and therefore paid the right amount of tithing; but the Bishop may disagree with the steward as to the disposition of the surplus. The Bishop may feel that the steward has spent too much of it in certain charitable enterprises, or has not spent enough of it in such, or the Bishop may feel that the line of business that the steward wishes to invest his money or surplus property in, is not a business which will tend to build up Zion. For example, the Bishop might disagree as to the steward investing his money in a billiard hall. In this case again, the matter may go before the high council if the steward wishes, or he may use his free agency and quit the stewardship idea. The high council decision will be final, and the steward may or may not abide by its decision as he sees fit. Much wisdom will have to be exercised by the Bishop and high council in these matters. They will probably give passive or negative advice a long time before they will indulge in positive advice; in other words, they will feel freer to tell what businesses not to invest in, than what business or particular business to invest in. As said above, at the beginnings of things they will no doubt prefer to let the steward make his choice untrammelled with advice in any line of business which will uplift Zion. As, however, the spirit of cooperation grows deeper, and broadens among the stewards in the church, the Bishop will feel more like advising in accordance with such expert

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Can You Come?

We are glad to announce that the plans for our May Institute are progressing satisfactorily, and we are able to tell you of some of them at this time. We hope as you read, especially if you are a field worker, a district organizer, or other officer holding responsibilities in our department, you will be filled with a desire to attend, and will do everything in your power to make it possible.

On Sunday, May 15, our office at the Women's Building will be open for registration, where the visiting sisters will record their names, addresses, and offices, and receive the badges which link them closely to the varied activities of the week. This registration will be a guide to the good sisters and others who are planning so hospitably to care for the visitors, and everyone arriving in Independence for the purpose of attending the week's sessions, should not fail to register at the Women's Building at some time during the day.

In the evening, Brother Walter W. Smith, general church historian, will address us, having for his theme the relation between study and service. This will give the keynote for the meetings of the institute, the objects of which, put briefly, are to broaden our knowledge and increase our capacity for constructive and efficient labor in God's vineyard.

Monday morning's first session will be a devotional one, over which President Elbert A. Smith has consented to preside. It is fitting that we should ask the blessing of the Master upon the efforts of the week, to the end that we may receive benefit which will enable us to benefit others. Recognizing the great value of spiritual attunement at the beginning of our meeting, we strongly urge that none should miss this opening session. Let us fill the room with earnest, consecrated workers intent upon the devotion of the hour.

At 9.30 Sister Frederick M. Smith, our director general, will have a message for the women of the department.

advice as he can command, in order to bring about a larger and concentrated cooperation in the building up of Zion. This will come in time.

Using Expert Advice

Thus the common tribunal will depend a good deal upon expert advice. Already machinery for the giving of this expert advice is beginning to be formed. This machinery is in the form of commissions at present. These commissions are but in their incipiency, and the extent to which they will function, and in what form, and under what methods they will function is yet to be worked out. Thus the educational commission will give advice as to the proper disposition of surplus in the educational institutions of our church. Our financial commission will give expert advice in the proper disposition of surplus in the financial institutions of our country to work out proper Zionite cooperation. Our labor commission will give expert advice as to the labor market, the redistribution of labor, the proper working conditions of labor in our industries, etc. The transportation commission will give its advice, etc. Thus in time we can see our bishopric and high councils acting upon these expert advices, advising and perhaps supervising through these commissions a high form of industrial cooperation.

[EDITORS' NOTE: This concludes the series by this author on Zionite problems. A goodly number of groups are studying the articles and profiting thereby. No doubt they will be put into lesson form later and possibly revised for that purpose.]

While Sister Smith may not be able to come from her temporary home in the West to be present with us in person, she will be there in spirit and her message will be far-visited, full of hope and cheer, and of characteristic interest.

She will be followed by two other members of the executive treating on the present organization of our department and its objectives. One of these speakers is comparatively new to our official personnel having come into the women's work only last fall. She has had an exceptional opportunity however to become intimately acquainted with its functioning power. We refer to Sister Rogene B., wife of Brother Hale W. Smith, of the seventy.

"A round table" and discussion will close the forenoon's session. This will be our general rule throughout the week and we expect the workers to make the most of the opportunities given at such periods. Those are your parts of the program, and we hope you will bring all your problems—the real, perplexing ones—to this convention with you and let us "thresh them out" in the light of the instructions and information there received.

At two o'clock Sister Mabel Knipschild Smith will present the work of the social service bureau, to be followed by Sister Lenore Christy asking, "Who are 'the poor and needy,' and who 'thy neighbor'?" Bishop McGuire will have for us a message from "headquarters" on the proposition of the "aid society" and of making money in the branches. Who will want to miss these addresses, or the opportunity offered afterwards to ask all the questions which have been bothering you so?

The lecture Monday evening will be given by Professor Lewis, of Kansas City, on some phase of social welfare in the teaching of which subjects he is a specialist. We may put our expectations high for this lecture and be assured of no disappointment, for Mr. Lewis has for several years been engaged not only in teaching the theories of real relief, but closely connected with those agencies in his own large city through which theories are put into practice. He is especially interested in children, and his lecture will doubtless be tintured largely by his love for them and his desire to better their condition and environment.

We have given you here, in fair detail, our plans for one day of our institute. The full week's programs will be printed in these columns in another week or two, which will show you that the other days of the session have been as carefully planned and of an equal interest. The lecturers for the evenings, we are happy to state at this time, will be Brother Max Carmichael, superintendent of Lamoni schools, discussing the relations between civic affairs and our homes, Brethren Charles E. Irwin and Floyd McDowell, both of Graceland College, the first using for subject the rural woman and her connection with Zion, and the latter, the responsibility of the adult to the adolescent. One evening we will be given an entertainment by the Oriole and Temple Builder girls, and on another we will be treated to a lecture on "Clothes" to be followed by a brilliant "dress revue," which will be put on by an Independence group of young matrons.

We have not mentioned the many interesting things scheduled for daylight hours—the little playlets, the films on health and sanitation, the address by Mr. Barden, secretary of the local Chamber of Commerce, on "The city beautiful," to be accompanied with slides, the automobile trip to local points of interest to be conducted by Brother and Sister Walter W. Smith, to wind up with a real honest-to-goodness banquet under the management of the famous Laurel Club (for which just slip a little extra "pin money" in your purse as you pack your grip!), nor many other attractive features of the week!

And we have kept for the last the announcement that Sunday morning will close our good time together with a sermon from one of the First Presidency on the connection between women's work and Zion. It has been thought that President F. M. Smith will return about that time, from his trip abroad, and an invitation has been forwarded to him to address us. His associate, President Elbert A. Smith, with characteristic humility and humor, assures us that if the "big fellow" doesn't "fill" the appointment he will "attempt" to do so! (Honestly, sisters, when it comes to making out a program, isn't it just plain hard work to "choose" among the many splendid leaders of our church?)

Watch for other announcements and complete program, and meanwhile, as you decide to attend, just drop a card to our secretary telling us so. It will help Sister Hunt and the local sisters to perfect their plans for our entertainment. (They are hinting of little lunches together in the dining hall, for one thing. Won't that be fine! Perhaps we women will be able to have some of the visits we have desired at conference time but for which there was never time enough!)

Will you be there?

AUDENTIA ANDERSON.

Books

One feature of the program outlined for our May Institute for the workers of our department will be a talk and discussion on the subject of "Local libraries for our church women." This address will be given by Sister Viola Short, who cares for the church library in Independence, and who is also librarian for our department. She will stress the practical features of a well-selected library in the branch, containing books of established authority upon subjects connected with women's work.

Many very desirable and helpful texts are not always to be found in the average home library, and yet there is no mother or home maker, parent or child who should not have access to such texts, and form the habit of using them. The chief value of education or study is to enable the one who studies to apply in an intelligent and efficient manner known principles to experiences of daily life. Modern school systems have for a basis the principles of training the pupils in correct habits of thought and systematic investigation. Not so much the accumulation of facts as a knowledge of where to find information when needed, and its proper application when found, should be one of our educational goals.

The collection and establishment of a well-chosen library is an achievement of which any local may justly be proud. Some locals have made a good start in this direction. A fund left over by a disorganized women's society in Lamoni has been made the foundation of a good Women's Department library in that place. The ladies in one of the divisions of the Women's Department in Kansas City Stake made a nice little sum of money by united effort, and put the amount into books of reference and reading along the lines of their special study—social welfare. A worthy aim for any local would be to add a certain number of desirable volumes each year to the local library, and make it a popular diversion to read and consult them when secured.

It was a pleasure to us, on a visit to a near-by city some months ago, to find among the bevy of bright-faced girls of the branch, one young woman who in the course of a very enjoyable conversation shyly told us of her ambition to specialize in children's library work! Could anything be finer? we thought, and felt to exclaim in our heart, "Truly God works in wonderful ways to bring about his purposes." For had we not felt a great need for some one, qualified and consecrated, to point out to our busy mothers the bright and glad paths among the tangled, weed-grown wastes of modern booklore?

How did she respond to the appeal we made? Can you ask? Had you seen and felt the sweet, strong yet humble spirit of her desires, her opportunities, her hopes, her yearning to be of service to the church she loves, you could not have questioned; and it is with real appreciation we are able to present to our readers, in this issue, the first of her thoughtful little contributions to our columns.

Mothers and relatives too frequently choose for their children birthday or holiday books with little real attention given to contents, relying largely upon the advice of the salesman, or a casual opinion of some acquaintance. Since books are to become real companions, it would be ideal if each child could be well supplied with the right sort. Sister Farrar, whose position in the Nebraska State Public Library Commission gives her splendid opportunities and experiences at first hand with books and their users, plans to give us occasional little reviews of such books as mothers may with wisdom place in the hands of their children, and we are hoping our young sister will find the task pleasant and profitable, to herself and her readers.

"Come, let us read!"

AUDENTIA ANDERSON.

"Books Are Friends"

"Books are keys to wisdom's treasure;
Books are gates to lands of pleasure;
Books are paths that upward lead;
Books are friends. Come, let us read."

In the selection of children's books, the greatest care should be taken, as books become their close friends, and we want our children to have well-chosen friends. As Sir John Lubbock says: "The choice of books like that of friends is a serious duty. We are as responsible for what we read as for what we do."

Happy is the little one who has made friends with the nursery rhymes of Mother Goose, the quaint and charming little people of Kate Greenaway, Beatrix Potter's animals who do human things, and the Child's Garden of Verses. The child of to-day is fortunate in its chance to enjoy the wealth of these and other beautifully illustrated books which should be an early addition to the nursery.

Fairy tales, myths, and legends are every child's rightful heritage. I wish I could make you feel their value to the imagination, which is one of the most important factors of daily life. The fairy tale also gives the child his first idea of right and wrong and thus plays an essential part in his moral development. Fairy tales should be well chosen. From among the many, every child should know The Little Lame Prince, The King of the Golden River, Alice in Wonderland, At the Back of the North Wind, and the Arabian Nights.

Later the child takes an interest in out-of-door stories, especially those of the domestic animals. These books should be full of good colored illustrations to help hold his interest in birds, flowers, and insects. With these books the child learns how to care for his pets, how baby seedlings are formed, and how to make friends with the birds.

Then comes the time for girls and boys to be interested in books that will help them to plan their life's work. We are fortunate to have so many excellent books of occupations for children. Every girl should want to learn how to keep her home neat and tidy, how to make useful things for her room, or how to make her own clothes—yes, to entertain her friends with afternoon teas and parties. The mother should permit her daughter to assume a share in making the home pure and wholesome. Boys should have plenty of good books of biography, useful arts, athletics, and nature study. If these books are introduced to him at the right time, he will take an interest in the things they teach him. Many of the leading men of our country have made themselves fitted for useful careers through such books. The authorized Boy Scout books should form a part of every boy's library, but beware of the flood of literature bearing the name and not the nature of the organization. Look for the official approval before you give any of these books to your boys.

A child's library need not be large. Buy well-selected books, well printed on good paper, with artistic illustrations in colors, in good editions. Better a few such than any number of feet of books having lesser value. The best books for children are those that portray life truthfully, deepen their knowledge of right and wrong, and widen their vision.

BLANCHE R. FARRAR.

Lost Idols of Childhood

The author of Helen's Babies died only the other day, probably without more than a handful of child readers to mourn him, although twenty years ago his passing would have struck sorrow into the hearts of thousands of youngsters. About the only trace that remains of his literary production is the expression sometimes heard in households now, "I want to see the wheels go round," perhaps said without thinking of the little boy of the book who so annoyed his uncle with this cry.

Some of the old nursery classics have worn better than this. Only the other day a boy of the age of four years had his picture in the paper because he could read, and his mother gave out the information that he was deep in the story of Black Beauty. How many children of to-day could be interested in this once popular story of a horse? The obsolescence of the horse may make this tale assume the proportions of a fairy story, but it can never again be as real as it was in the days when the buggy and the carriage filled the place now held by the automobile. Now that the story has been freshened up and made graphic for the movies, perhaps this classic may continue to live, although not as a book.

In an Omaha family that is devoted to the custom of family reading, Black Beauty has been taken down from the shelf many times, yet remains two thirds unread. Even the parents are unable long to maintain interest in its moralizing over the evils of docking horses' tails and the use of the checkrein. The adventures a-hunting, in the fire, and the runaways are still able to thrill, but the autobiography of a motor car or the well-worn school exercise recounting the adventures of a penny would furnish more sustained interest.

Black Beauty, we put you back in your stable on the top-most shelf of the bookcase, regretful that your knees are sprung and your wind is broken, and take down Alice in Wonderland. That still holds its charm in spite of the competition of the movies, but best of all has been the re-reading of The Five Little Peppers. This account of honest poverty in the little brown house and the reward of virtue in a mansion in the city still preserves its spice. It, you see, is about real boys and girls, with a sprinkling of very human grown-ups, dealing with things that never change. Captain Nemo with his submarine, and those other heroes of Jules Verne, are clear out of date, mere amateurs compared to the boy who has his own wireless outfit, but Polly Pepper remains an inspiration to every small reader. You just can't read about the way she helped her widowed mother without wanting to go right out in the kitchen and wash dishes or start sweeping the house.

The books that live for children are, after all, the same kind of books that live for their elders—those which appeal to the emotions and to the spiritual nature, books brimming with real humanity.—Editorial in Omaha Bee.

Three Months' Hard Reading

A Flushing boy charged with disorderly conduct has been sentenced to three months' reading in the public library.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself, standing about the streets," said Magistrate Kochendorfer, imposing sentence. "You ought to get acquainted with Dickens and Hawthorne. Probation Officer Hamill will introduce you to the library."

Now, this is inspiration, ranking in magnificence with the discovery at Sing Sing that prisoners are more likely to go straight if they have a little baseball and less solitary confinement—just like human beings outside the bars.

The guile of a parent who knows his boy is less likely to get into mischief if he spends his spare time reading than if he loafs on the street is never more earnestly exercised than in luring children between the covers of good books. Yet no one, so far as we recall, ever before applied the library method to the reform of wayward boys.

It was Dickens and Hawthorne to whom this lad was particularly sentenced. Let us hope the probation officer will be wise and that Oliver Twist and the Wonder Book will be early introduced, and that they, long after the three months of the court sentence expire, will lead him joyously on.—New York Tribune.

The First Library

Harvard College led the way in America to the first library. This institution was established in 1638. Sixty-two years later, in 1700, a public library was founded in New York City. The following year the Yale library was founded and in 1781 Benjamin Franklin started a subscription library in Philadelphia, the first of its kind in America. The United States library, now called the Library of Congress, was established in 1800, but in 1814 it was burned by the British. In 1851 the institution was again burned. It was rebuilt and now contains nearly 2,000,000 volumes, and is one of the finest in the world. As far back as 540 B. C. the first public library known to the world was founded at Athens. England's first library was established at Saint Andrew's in 1411.—Indianapolis News.

From Their Letters

It grips me in the night—the thought of our wayward boys and girls! Oh, where are they now, what becomes of them—thoughtless, inexperienced, and making mistakes (even immoral ones), often only because of subnormal mental conditions! What are we doing as a church; what measures of pervention using? Is any definite plan being mapped out? Have we not enough good, determined, broad-minded, God-loving people to plan and do something practicable and capable of resulting in good?

I feel impressed that we women will perhaps have to be the ones to take the most interest, and make the initial moves. By observation and a study of facts and conditions, I am impressed that procrastination and the indifference it engenders are the real causes of the lethargy of "good" people on this question. Men, who have had the power of vote, just do not pull away the obstacles, harness their strength, open the road, and carry out and discard the houses of ill-fame, the gambling dens, and other places of allurements, where your sisters and mine, by the thousands each year, are led to destruction! The "good" men just pass by on the other side of the street, to their own safe and guarded homes, putting uneasy thoughts aside with a procrastinating, "Oh, that would be such a tremendous and miserable task, to clean out such places! I'll just go along and mind my own business, teach my daughter and protect her, and forget about the unfortunates!"

Since I was a mere girl I have recognized the indifference of men to these conditions, and have wished and longed for the time to come when women might vote and take part in the management of things outside their homes, in order that such ghastly evils might be eradicated from our fair land, that the helpless and dependent, lonely and unbefriended, subnormal and discouraged, might all get a "square deal" in this world! As a church can we not face this problem, and follow some well-outlined plans for prevention and adjustment of conditions which cause such misery and hopelessness?—L.

You ask if I am interested in juvenile courts. Yes, I am, immensely so, and have done some research work along that line in connection with university studies. When taking the course on "The adolescent," husband and I went to the juvenile court and went over their records for a year. We made graphs of the crimes and the ages of those who committed them, and also of the months when committed, to show whether there were more crimes committed during the school months or when the children were out of school. We took a map of the city showing every street, and by different-colored crayon dots indicated where the crimes were performed, where the culprits lived, and what was the nature of the offense. This showed that they usually worked in gangs, or, rather, I would put it that the "gang" instinct in the boys because of lack of proper direction, had led them into mischief!

In this city there is a problem similar to that found in most large cities. The leading church here appointed social workers, with a trained man in charge, to make a survey to discover the cause of the problem. We turned our data over to help them in their work. The professor in charge complimented us on our findings. The social workers were called together last summer and an eminent authority on sociology and social problems addressed them. Classes were conducted in connection with the university, and I appreciated what I gleaned at the time.

The outline of the May Institute you are planning is splendid—just what is needed. I like it very much. We need work along that line! I am vitally interested in the progress of the Women's Department!—I.

Always, before I go out to organize a group, I suffer everything imaginable, lying awake most of the night before, and my whole being shrinking from the ordeal of standing up before a group and attempting to present this beautiful work in my poor language! Then, when it is over, and they all gather about me, asking questions and seeming so interested and friendly, I come home feeling like a new person! But it is all to do over again next time. Isn't it queer?

I know the Lord is with me, for after I once commence talking I lose all my nervousness, and I experience his direct help. Only, I find that I need to keep studying, for I realize that "the Lord helps those who help themselves." . . . I feel to-day as though I had been made "all over new" for some reason or other!—I.

Was glad to meet the Topeka appointment for you, if it helped you. I had made trips into that district before, so knew the workers fairly well. They have a good organizer there, Sister Hedrick, of Atchison. She had the whole conference at the women's meeting on Saturday afternoon, men as well as women, and there was good interest. I occupied about forty-five minutes on the department work in general, pointed out the changes, new divisions, spoke of budgets for district organizers, need for women to prepare for citizenship. Told something of the group plan of Zion, how they make for effective work in all departments, and that each district may adapt what it can to its own needs. Stressed the aims of the department, explained duties of local officers, such as friendly visitors, home department superintendents, cradle roll, leaders of classes, etc. Urged them to get in touch with the Associated Charities in the large cities of their district. Talked of team work, loyalty, the difference between the way men and women work, and how we can learn from the methods of the former. Emphasized the need for study among women, pointed out what it would do for them, reminded them that the brain centers are best after thirty-five years of age, and all should feel encouraged to use their time wisely in this direction. Enlarged a bit on reporting properly, and showed them how to fill out the various blanks. Finished by giving them the goal: "Every woman and every girl a member of the Women's Department"—Lula M. Sandy.

I will endeavor to grant your request in regard to the May Institute, and shall try to make my work as appealing as possible. Let us not expect that this generation of women will fall over one another in a mad rush to the polls, but at the same time let us make a beginning! The opportunity is finè. I have only one thing to regret, and that is that I am so inadequately prepared! The command to study history, government, and English has had my assent

A Trip Around the Holy City

President F. M. Smith writes another letter from Jerusalem of a trip among historic spots.

E. A. S.: To-day is Sunday, or has been, for it is now night. This morning the usual exercises were had, a sermon by Brother Passman in German, followed by a study hour in the Bible. It has been a lovely day, one of the finest we have so far seen here, so we decided to take a walk in the afternoon. There is so much to see hereabouts that we dislike to lose any opportunity to see. Hence the decision to go. We did not want to go into the city, so we determined to walk around the city, keeping in the valleys. So, leaving the house by way of the Joppa Road, we went to the Joppa Gate, thence down by an easy road into the Valley of Hinnom. Passing the Pool of the Sultan, the road became steeper, and rougher because of the loose stones of various sizes. It is a rugged, rough valley, but picturesque. In following it and keeping near the center of the valley, we doubtless followed close to where the south wall of the city of David ran, for it is now quite generally conceded that the present walled Jerusalem lies farther to the north than did the walled city over which David reigned and which he beahtified.

Passing through the valleys on almost any side of Jerusalem, one is struck by the number of cemeteries. Graves everywhere. And why not? Jerusalem for many, many centuries has been a populous center. Perhaps the tombs in sight represent only a small percentage of the burials which have been in the vicinity of Jerusalem. One sees graves and tombs till little notice is taken of them unless extraordinary or unique.

We passed in the Valley of Hinnom some fine olive orchards.

As we went down the steep, rough road, we saw many people along the way. And we wondered why so many. Well, a little later we found why. Near the junction of the Valley of Hinnom with the Valley of the Kidron, is Job's Well. It seems to be connected in some way with other wells and pools of the city, and when in the spring, after the copious rains of the winter, the various pools are full and overflowing and the brooks are running, this well overflows. And tradition has it that the overflowing of Job's Well in the spring is a promise of a fruitful year. So the people rejoice when Job's Well overflows. When we came to the well, hundreds of people in Sunday garb were grouped for a lifetime, and yet I have made very little progress in that direction.

However, we can but do our best. Regrets prevent progress, and I will waste little time over them. I have in mind to stress the relation of politics and religion; also politics and its influence over the opportunities for home building and its many ramifications. It seems so plain to me, the connection between these lines, that I cannot understand how any mother-hearted woman can fail to see it also.—Dora Young.

Referring to "Exercises to correct constipation" as given on page 108, February 2 issue of HERALD, I wish to state that I have had much experience in exercising for health and building body tissue, and therefore respectfully submit the following criticism:

Exercises Nos. 5 and 6 are, in my opinion, dangerous and should not be practiced. . . . For No. 5 I would substitute raising one leg at a time and throwing it across the body about five times for each, alternatively, until each leg has been thrown across ten times. I can offer no substitute for No. 6.—Charles A. Dial.

around the spot, near pools in the vicinity. Musicians were playing Arabian airs. Picnickers were in evidence. Venders of sweetmeats, roasted watermelon seeds, peanuts, etc., were selling their goods. It was a gala day, quiet but with an apparent but suppressed joy. Job's Well was giving its seasonal promise of fruitful months to follow. And up the valley of the Kidron, on the sides of the hills, scattered through the village of Siloah on the east hill, and up to and even on the great south wall of the city could be seen group after group of people sitting or standing in the delicious sunlight, enjoying an outing, chatting and visiting, while in their ears was the quiet but welcome music of running water in the Valley of Kidron.

From Job's Well we turned towards the north, and went up the valley through which the Brook Kidron runs. We passed and examined briefly the Pool of Siloam, which had once been the scene of some of the miracles of Jesus. Following practically the bed of the Brook Kidron, we passed the village of Siloah, and came to the hillside on which lie the thousands of stones marking graves of Jews. The whole hillside seems covered with them. Interspersed among the graves are numbers of caves, which may even have been excavations for tombs, but most of which are doubtless caves due to erosion. It is quite likely that these caves were the dwelling places of lepers during the times of Jesus, for this hill would in those times have been just outside the walls, considerably closer to the then existing walls than to those of the present.

Our objective was the Pillar of Absalom and the near-by tombs of Saint James and Zacharias; and as we picked our way slowly up the rough pathway, we were commenting on the custom which has prevailed for centuries among the Jews when passing the pillar of casting stones at it in protest against the infidelity of the son to his father. We seemed to be quite unanimous in the opinion that the custom ought to be stopped, the tons of debris and stones which had accumulated around the monument cleared away, and the pillar repaired and put in good condition. Then after we had examined the tomb of Zacharias, looked at that of Saint James, when we stood before the Pillar of Absalom a strange thing happened. We forgot our protest against the custom of casting stones, and by common consent we each gathered a handful or two of stones and indulged in the Jewish pastime of hurling them at the ancient and unique monument, and then all laughed at the strange whim which had so suddenly possessed us.

By this time the sun was behind Mount Zion and a rain-storm was threatening, so we quickened our pace, struck the Jericho Road and started homeward. T. W. and Brother Passman hurried on ahead, while I walked with Alex and Helim, two lads, one an Austrian the other an Arab. The latter is the youngest son of Solomon Nejeam, now blind, who was formerly recognized as one of the best dragomans in Palestine. Helim knows much of the traditions of Jerusalem, and as we passed along the north wall he told us, part of the time speaking in English and part in German, interspersed with exclamations in Arabic to passers-by, of underground galleries and pits and caverns hewed out of the rock underlying Jerusalem.

Well, we got back to the house before the rain, and calculated that we had walked about seven miles or more in our ramble around Jerusalem in the valleys. But though we were a bit tired we felt greatly repaid. Hope to have some pictures of some of the scenes.

More anon,

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

JERUSALEM, MARCH 8, 1921.

E. A. S.: Mrs. Jacobs, an English woman who was in Jerusalem when Sister Jenkins was, has just called at the house. She brought a paper on which is written an account of the death of Brother Rees Jenkins. It was written by Mr. Forderer who was a fellow prisoner with Brother Jenkins in the hands of the Turks, both being taken to Damascus together. I find this account very interesting, and will send it on to you for publication; but I wish first to see Mr. Forderer, and learn what more I can. I have quite determined to visit Damascus and visit the grave of Brother Jenkins, and make what arrangements I can for its permanency and care. The grave was marked by Mr. Forderer with a wooden cross. It should be more permanently marked. It might be well for me to secure a photo of the grave and send it with further account, together with a picture of the hospital wherein Brother Jenkins died.

Yours, FREDERICK M. SMITH.

Good Prospects for Missionary Work in Europe

Apostle Williams believes the outlook bright for prosecution of our work in Europe and Palestine.

I most sincerely hope that my appeal for Germany will accomplish what I had in mind at the time of writing. I sincerely hope it will help in a small way to turn the minds at least of our own people to the application of the Golden Rule to these poor unfortunate people.

In no sense have I turned against France. She has been terribly wronged. The suffering imposed upon the French people should be atoned for so far as atonement is possible. But I do think that the French statesmen are standing in their own light, and as I said, if they push things too far, they will bring harm not only to themselves but to all of Europe.

No, we have not given up our thought of extending our church work into France, for while we were in Basel, Switzerland, we ordained to the office of priest a French Swiss, whom we believe will in a short while be able to secure entry into France. I do not think the French people will respond to our appeal as well as the Germans, the Swiss, or the Dutch, but nevertheless we can and should extend our work there.

We have finally succeeded in registration at Basel. Brother Halb is now residing at our headquarters there. I am convinced that it is from this point that we are to secure open sesame into Europe.

We must before long get into the Balkan States and Russia. We ordained while at Gross Raeschen, Germany, a fine young man who is a Russian, and who can speak fluently four of the principal languages of the Balkans and Russia. I feel that he is going to be of service to us in getting into these lands. Italy is going to be a hard country for us owing to the dominance of the Roman Catholic Church here, but we must get into Italy. Then there is Spain and Portugal and Greece. As I view it, we should have some of our young missionary prospects studying the languages of these countries. We must secure all possible information as to the status of the church in these countries, and what are our privileges and limitations. I do not think that we should send less than two couples to any of these countries. And I am ready as soon as we can possibly do it, to send two couples to France, two to Italy, and augment Brother and Sister Halb with another couple in Switzerland. This should be followed up by sending two couples to Spain. We must strengthen our missionary force in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. Just as soon as we can do it, we should have two couples in Holland. Why, it is a shame that the Utah people have had the whole field to themselves in Europe. I feel that if we had two or more couples in Holland, who could speak Dutch fluently, that we could capture the bulk of the Mormon membership in this country. In the large places in Holland and Germany, their membership runs from five hundred to fifteen hundred. The people know nothing of the Reorganization.

I also believe we should break into Ireland and Scotland. A great change will come in Ireland, and when it does, we should be in position to offer something tangible to these people. We must revive the old missionary enthusiasm in Wales.

And now I come to Palestine. The church should and must if we are to continue our work in Palestine, be prepared to advance from $15,000 to $20,000 to secure headquarters, and make it possible for our missionaries here to care for the converts which will come to us—not in the way of charity but by supplying employment. It would be suicidal to carry on our work and continue giving money to needy people without any return from them. On the other hand, we must be in a position to furnish employment to our members, for when an individual unites with our church, it means social and business ostracism. I feel sure that $20,000 will enable us to carry out our purpose.

In the above, President Smith, Brother Passman, and I are perfectly agreed. And I am sure that in regard to what I have said on the European proposition that Brother Smith and I are in general agreement. . . .

My spirit is cheered over the glorious news of the achievement of the young people in Zion. God permitted me, two years ago, to see what could be done in this direction. That is why I have been so insistent on permitting our young to enter in and occupy. May this only be a foretaste of what we are to experience.

How I would love to give a year or two of consecrated service in this particular field! God bless and encourage our young people everywhere. . . .

I am supremely glad that I am privileged to work for the consummation of the work begun by Jesus Christ. It is a joy to minister to others. Life does not consist in the things we possess. Real life abounds in ministry and service. The only way to know Jesus is through denial and suffering. This you must well know, Brother Sam.

God bless and keep you. May you have strength for your work. May the Divine supply you with spiritual and mental power. . . .

Sincerely yours,

T. W. WILLIAMS.

JERUSALEM, PALESTINE, March 6, 1921.

IN PALESTINE

Most of the people centuries behind the law of Moses.

Left London on February 8, our objective Jerusalem. Made short stops at Lausanne, Switzerland, and Milan and Venice, Italy. Sailed from Trieste on February 17. Reached Alexandria February 24. A very rough passage. Took train for Cairo. Spent three days visiting pyramids, Sphinx, Tombs, and all points of historic interest.

Arrived at Jerusalem February 25. A heavy snowstorm the day previous. Found Brother and Sister Passman in good health and spirits. Next day plucked red poppies from the highest crest of the Mount of Olives, nestling midst stones and snow. Have had hail, rain, and snow, with intervals of glorious Palestinian sunshine.

For days these words have been ringing in my ears: "Your house is left unto you desolate." As one wanders through the skeleton of Israel's glory, he realizes the tragic fulfillment of this Messianic lament. Conditions within the walls are indescribable. Most of these people seem to be centuries behind the law of Moses. Great Britain's mandate in Palestine must prove a Godsend to this people if she can but give them cleanliness, sanitation, and equitable government. Self-determination is impossible and out of the question now. From every indication, the government of Great Britain is making good. It will require statesmanship and time to bring these people under moral and social discipline.

T. W. WILLIAMS.

The Oil City Derrick of March 28 reports that Mexican Federal employees, seeking evidence of a lost race, have uncovered the remains of a city of at least 100,000 inhabitants near San Juan De Teotihuacan, Mexico. This city is dated back by them, from this preliminary examination, 4,000 years. The city was ruined by lava flow, and it is estimated that the city at one time covered fifteen square miles.

Branch Organized at Nauvoo

A new branch at the old church headquarters on the Mississippi.

Of interest to many will be the organization of a branch at Nauvoo, Illinois, March 19, where many years ago the church flourished and where the work has again been established through the efforts of Elders P. R. Burton, our missionary, and J. W. Layton who resides at the Mansion House and who has done much to tell the gospel story to those who visit the historical place here.

The branch organization was made the occasion for a two-day meeting which was attended by many of the Saints from Fort Madison, Burlington, Montrose, Keokuk, and Rock Creek.

Apostle U. W. Greene and Patriarch Frederick A. Smith arrived Friday afternoon from Independence, Brother Greene remaining till Monday and Brother Smith leaving Sunday afternoon for Burlington. Both made short talks to the Religio Friday evening, emphasizing the need of consecrated young workers who have made preparation for work in foreign fields. Brother Smith preached Saturday morning after the prayer service, also on Sunday morning.

The Saturday afternoon business session was in charge of Apostle Greene and District President D. J. Williams. The branch was organized with the following officers: President, Harvey V. Minton; high priest, J. W. Layton; seventy, P. R. Burton; priests, William W. Phillips and August Lee; teacher, Tilphard Phillips; deacon and treasurer, Clyde E. Fusselman; secretary and auditor, William H. Thomas; chorister, Sophie Lee; organist, E. Irene Layton; publicity agent, August Lee.

Quarterly business meetings were provided for, and the following program of meetings was adopted: Sunday, preaching at 11 a. m. and 8 p. m.; sacrament service the first Sunday of each month at 11 a. m.; Wednesday prayer meeting at 8 p. m. From October 1 to April 1 each year the evening meetings will begin at 7.30 p. m. instead of 8 p. m.

The branch membership consists of the following in addition to the officers mentioned above: Flora M. Burton, Effie F. Fusselman, Ida A. Taylor, Agnes Minton, Gerald G. Phillips, Seth A. Phillips, Henry Phillips, May V. Thomas, Claricie Teters, J. Henderson, and Dora Henderson.

Bishop George P. Lambert gave us a short talk on the handling of branch finances, and District President D. J. Williams spoke on the relationship of the chorister and branch president.

Brother Greene gave his illustrated lecture on "The Restoration" on Saturday evening, the house being well filled, many of them outsiders. Sunday afternoon we had a good prayer meeting. Preaching Sunday evening by Brother Greene. One baptism.

Philadelphia Reports Success

Gratifying results from the young people's meetings in Philadelphia.

Philadelphia Saints have just begun their campaign to save the City of Brotherly Love. This seems like a pretty broad statement to make, considering the size and importance of this magnificent town, but nevertheless we feel that the time is quite ripe to institute a program that will be as far-reaching as it will be soul-stirring and with courageous hearts and the spirit of consecration, we are bending to the great task of the hour. Everybody is living in the spirit of his youth here, due no doubt to the Sunday school activities of the last thirteen weeks. In spite of rain, snow, and the recent enticing outdoor days, the captains of our great contest have spurred their forces onward until it is quite impossible for us to accommodate the crowds that have rallied to the respective standards of red and blue.

This enthusiasm and interest made it possible for us to be among the first to institute the special services for the young people which are now being inaugurated all over the country and which are meeting with such gratifying response.

While we haven't the forces numerically that are found in Lamoni and Independence, we have the same spirit and we are but adding another link to the chain that will eventually girdle the earth.

We are grateful to have had the privilege of having Brother D. T. Williams with us. We got into the habit of calling him "Danny" because we simply couldn't help it. He is a cyclone for speed and a tornado for tearing things up, but he has left us with thinking minds and consecrated lives. The first few days of our work were not characterized by any startling happenings other than a wholesome interest, but when the first week was most over there came inspiration from the skies, sure and convincing, and then we went to work in real earnest.

The young people divided up the membership and started a systematic calling campaign until all were reached. Many were touched by their zeal and devotion, and we were rewarded for their tremendous efforts by seeing faces—whole families in fact—of Saints who were almost being forgotten because of their negligence, and I might add, our own as well. Why this important feature of visiting has been neglected we don't know, but we have learned a sad lesson, and from now on it becomes a paramount feature of our work.

A word as to one feature of the advertising. Large cards, announcing each night's subject, were put up all over the church. Sixteen precious truths vital to our work beginning with faith, repentance, baptism, laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, eternal judgment, and continuing on until the last great subject of the final hour—that convincing happy invitation: "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come."

These sixteen cards we used on Easter to form a great cross built upon a foundation of other cards painted to resemble a rock formation on which was inscribed, "Upon this rock I will build my church." A deep purple border was placed around the cross and added much to the setting. Starting from the cross there was traced all over the walls a deep, clinging vine known as southern smilax, and the lighting fixtures and entrances were tastefully decorated also. This together with potted palms, great ferns, and Easter plants in the windows transformed the interior into a great bower of nature. Almost five hundred were in attendance at the Sunday school, and this session was carried right into the morning service which enabled Brother Williams to give a half hour sermon to all our forces.

Saturday evening Brother Walter Lewis baptized five into the kingdom from the results of his work in Camden. Six other precious souls also joined our forces and many more are near the threshold of faith.

The evening service, the final of the series, was an eventful and happy occasion. At 7.30 our talented sister, Mary Kinnamann Sauer, gave us a delightful half hour of organ-music. The spirit of worship came into our midst preparing us for the great invitation which was to follow. Then came the special Easter music of choir and orchestra with its thrilling message of the risen Christ, followed by the dedication of the organ. Brother Paul Craig offered a profound prayer which was wafted to the skies by the inspiring music of the organ as it played a soft accompaniment.

Then Brother Williams gave us his last golden effort of "The message from the skies" after which the old and young joined in giving Brother Williams a Book of Mormon and Doctrine of Covenants, which were gratefully acknowledged. Our pastor, William Osler, also was made the recipient of a fine leather bookcase. While the Saints were busy with their leave-taking the young people stole away to Bishop Zimmermann's and prepared a final feast for Brother Danny, and by the time he arrived the scene was set for a happy farewell.

So with songs ringing in his ears and the prayers of old and young accompanying him, Danny Williams goes forth following in the footsteps of the Son of God, and we feel sure that this young ambassador for Christ will find the same joyous experiences awaiting him in Toronto, Kirtland, and other places to which he will be directed.

We are glad to report success and to note that the happiest results were gained through prayer and visiting, not to mention the welding of the whole through the splendid efforts of our combined choir and orchestra who are becoming valiant in the service of song.

Let us speed the plow, singing as we go forward on the victorious journey. And for the forward movement in Philadelphia and in this district let all the Saints remember us constantly.

Sincerely,
ALBERT N. HOXIE, Press Representative.

Northern California Conference

A spiritual conference indeed has just closed—the Northern California conference—held at San Jose March 11 to 13.

Friday morning at ten o'clock the Religio boosters gathered in an institute meeting to discuss the social activities and theme of that organization. Plans were laid to increase and further the activities in the Religio department. We hope the plans just laid will materialize and advance the Religio department one hundred per cent.

Friday afternoon at two o'clock the Sunday school held its semiannual convention and election of officers. Sister J. A. Saxe retired from the office of district superintendent after twenty years or more of active service in that office, poor health being the principal reason for retirement. First assistant superintendent, Brother T. J. Smith, was elected to the office, while Sister Saxe was made honorary superintendent and counselor by a unanimous vote. A standard of excellence was discussed and approved by the district.

Friday night Religio the and Sunday school departments held their joint entertainment, which proved to be very enjoyable.

The church conference started at ten o'clock Saturday morning. The morning session was devoted to reading minutes, reports, etc., and adjourned until two o'clock in the afternoon. Election of officers took place. The personnel remained the same save the election of Robert Cowden to the secretariate. The conference was presided over by our district president, Brother C. W. Hawkins, assisted by his two counselors, Elders H. J. Davison and A. J. Damron, and Evangelist F. G. Pitt, whose worthy counsel and advice were graciously accepted. The business of the district was transacted in a very harmonious manner, and all present felt the divine power in attendance.

Brother Pitt delivered a wonderful sermon Saturday night. It was plainly seen that the speaker had the Spirit throughout the discourse. A very spiritual prayer meeting was held at 8.30 Sunday morning, while at 9.30 the Sunday school convened.

The choir rendered the cantata, "Light everlasting," at 10.30 under the direction of the district chorister, Christiana Waller, after which a short sermon on the life of Christ was delivered by Brother Pitt. The afternoon was given over to prayer service, and Elder A. C. Barmore preached the evening sermon. This concluded a very spiritual conference, and all those present felt benefited by having attended.

Detroit District Conference

Important resolution on tobacco using adopted.

District conference convened at the Detroit Central Church, March 19 and held over Sunday the 20th. In addition to regular routine of business six of the brethren were ordained to the office of elder; Frank Sweetman, George Booth, Richard Ullman, Israel Titus, of Detroit; Floyd Smith and Robert Orme of Flint.

The city of Detroit has a membership of over 1,000, and the whole district has something over 1,800.

Apostle J. F. Curtis who had just concluded a debate in Flint with a representative of the Christian Church was in attendance at the conference and assisted in presiding.

Order of services was as follows: Prayer meeting at 8.30 the morning of the 19th, followed by the business session at 10 a. m. At 2 p. m. the business meeting convened again, and at 5 p. m. the district Sunday school held their business session. Preaching at 8 p. m. by Elder Grant St. John. Sunday services opened with prayer meeting at 8.30 followed by a Sunday school session at 10.30. Preaching at 2 p. m. by Elder G. R. Kuykendall followed by a joint session of the Women's Department and Sunday school conducted by Brother John Hall, field worker for the Religio. Preaching at 7.30 by Apostle J. F. Curtis.

At the business session Elder Kenneth H. Green was chosen as president. The conference passed off pleasantly and was enjoyed by all.

The district secretary sends the following for official publication:

Inasmuch as the Lord has spoken specifically in section 86:1 of the Doctrine and Covenants regarding the use of tobacco, and we are commanded: "Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord" (section 38:9), and in 119:3, 9 we are further commanded to avoid the use of tobacco and to "be clean,"

Therefore be it resolved:

First, that we look with disfavor on the ordination of any man to any office in the priesthood addicted to the use of tobacco. And if such a man be called he shall be labored with, and if he cease not from the habit, he shall not be ordained.

Second, that no man shall hold office in the district organization who is given to the use of tobacco.

Third, that any member in the district now holding office in the priesthood who uses tobacco shall be labored with by district or branch officers or both, patiently and kindly, in order that he may be persuaded to desist from the use of it.

Fourth, that we recommend to the next General Conference the passing of a resolution, asking for the silence and surrender of the license of any man now ordained, who will not cease the use of tobacco, after being labored with as above stated.

GLAUDE R. KUYKENDALL,
KENNETH H. GREEN,
Press Committee.

Northeastern Nebraska Conference

The Sunday school convention of the Northeastern Nebraska District opened its session at ten o'clock, February 4, at the South Side, with District Superintendent Jay Leeka in the chair. After the usual routine of business the following officers were elected: Superintendent, Jay Leeka; assistant superintendent and librarian, T. A. Hicks; secretary-treasurer, Anna Hicks.

A short time in the afternoon was given over to the Religio, with Sister Grace Wallace in charge. A very interesting address on Religio work under the new system was delivered by Elder T. J. Elliott.

After the Religio session the general superintendent of the Women's Department, Sister Audentia Anderson, introduced some of the new features of the work to be put into operation by the Women's Department, the most important of which was a cradle roll demonstration. We believe the work as outlined by the Women's Department, if carried out, will be a great aid to the future development of the church. The future of our church depends upon the training of the children, for the child of to-day is the citizen of to-morrow.

All ages have admired nobility. Poets have sung and historians have recorded with glowing admiration the noble examples of self-sacrifice and love—both of kings on the field of battle and peasants in the lowliest walks of life. Of these the young have read with throbbing breast, and heroic resolutions to become true and noble; the old have meditated on them with tears. The pages of history are replete with examples of true nobility. We need not go to history to learn of true nobility. Nobility does not require the jeopardy of life. Many are the noble characters in every vocation and profession who devote their lives to the welfare of their fellow creatures. Some of the greatest benefactors of mankind have lived and died unknown outside of their own communities. She who directs the steps of the little ones, imbuing their innocent minds with the germs of nobleness, thus filling the world with noble men and women, deserves as much the diadem of praise as any hero who sacrifices his life that a nation may live.

On Saturday morning at ten o'clock conference convened with District President Carl T. Self in the chair. After the usual routine of business the following officers were elected: District president, T. J. Elliott; secretary-treasurer, Jay Leeka.

The appointment of R. W. Scott as district chorister was recommended to the general chorister.

Brother Elliott chose H. A. Scott and B. M. Anderson as his counselors, which was ratified by the body.

With Elder T. J. Elliott in charge of the work in this district we expect to make great advancement during the coming year.

The speaker of the conference was Apostle U. W. Greene.
JAY LEEKA, Secretary.

Northwestern Ohio District

At Saint Marys over sixty have been baptized this winter; and it is likely more will be soon. Over one hundred in the Sunday school last Sunday. Brethren Hawn and Ulrich began meetings there the first of last December. A new church is needed, and a fund is being raised for that purpose. Only two families of Saints lived there when the brethren started their meetings. At the present time the brethren are holding some meetings in their home town of Bradner, Ohio. It is reported some are to be baptized there.

The dedication of the Sylvania church is set for April 24. Brother G. T. Griffiths is to be present; also Elders O. J. Hawn and E. L. Ulrich. The work at Sylvania was started only a few years ago by Brother Ulrich and wife before they entered the mission field. The most of the members there have been baptized by Brother Ulrich, about forty members. A special invitation is extended to all who can come to bring well-filled baskets and the good Spirit with them.

At Toledo the work is progressing. They have organized two clubs to try to raise money to pay off the church debt. One is called the "Busy Bee" and the other the "Bumblebee." Some question the wisdom of this plan of raising money in our church work. I have been "a preacher on the fence" in this matter. W. S. Hettrick, the branch president, is a fine, humble, spiritual man, liked by all. The Reverend Washburn, of Adventist fame, who held a series of lectures in the Coliseum offered one thousand dollars to anyone who could prove Sunday was the Sabbath. Brother Hettrick took advantage of the opportunity to spread the gospel, as Mr. Washburn's crowds were large. The Reverend Washburn in introducing Brother Hettrick made it very plain and distinct to the people, we are in no way associated with the "Utah Mormons." This alone may have been worth one thousand dollars to us in Toledo. The Reverend Washburn, they said, acted the part of a real gentleman. Many of the members there have been out of work nearly all winter, which has been very trying to some. W. G. Kimball gave a series of Book of Mormon lectures last winter. The lectures were well presented.

Brother C. E. Armstrong had his machine stolen a short time ago. This makes two of the priesthood to lose their Fords in this district.

Always in hope of a more perfect day, I am sincerely yours,
JESSE M. HARDEN.

Successful Campaign at Boyne City

The Boyne City Branch has just closed one of the most successful campaigns in its history. On February 20, Elder Ernest N. Burt, of Onaway, Michigan, preached the first of a series of sermons to a packed house, with about thirty-five standing in the doors and entry, and the meetings continued for four straight weeks, with splendid interest manifested, some nonmembers never missing a service, and sometimes people went away because they could not get a seat.

The last week of our service, three revivals were put on in other churches, but their members continued to come to our services where they had found light and truth. Sunday, March 20, Elder Burt baptized five, and several others have said they will be baptized soon.

At the last service, Elder Burt asked all those who really believed that he had been preaching the things of God, and that it was necessary to do the things that he had told about, to stand up, and about fifty nonmembers stood up.

Every sermon was a gem, many saying they could not tell which was the best, and that they never heard the Bible explained like that before. No expense was spared in advertising. We purchased a space in our triweekly newspaper and ran an ad each issue, with Elder Burt's picture and announcement of the subjects, with little comments and questions, and it surely brought results.

The Saints have been greatly benefited and strengthened by these services, and prize the gospel more highly than ever before.

Council Bluffs Items

Last Sunday was occupied by an all-day musicale of a very high order. Many have expressed themselves inspired to do better work as a result.

We enjoyed the association and assistance of several from Omaha. Had the pleasure of the shake of the hand of Brother Paul M. Hanson and wife, both looking hopeful.

Elder Clyde E. McDonald, of Runnells, Iowa, spent the day here, enjoying the good things furnished by the choir and orchestra. He says that Des Moines is contemplating such a day of service in the near future.

An effort is now under way to organize a junior orchestra for the city. In this city the music, both of the choir and orchestra, is under a music committee of three, with a choir manager over all. Every three months this committee, associated with the branch presidency, makes appointments of choristers and organists for all the missions of the city. This is calling from some of the young quite an effort and sacrifice, but we note that so far all accept their appointments cheerfully.

To-day the sisters of the Women's Department meet in relief and service work at two different places, having the study hour at 2.30 p. m. I understand that the home and child welfare division meets every Tuesday evening for study and consultation.

A Brother Trussel was healed of a cancer a short time ago, and there have been several remarkable cases of healing from other diseases through the ordinance of the laying on of hands of late, for which praise is given the Lord.

Young People More Interested

Elder E. A. Smith: I have read with interest about the work here and elsewhere among the young people and heard what was said yesterday in the morning meeting, and so I thought it would be of interest to tell you about the young people out in the Clinton, Missouri, District, and it is likely true in other districts.

There is more real interest among our young people than I have known among them in the past, and this is especially true at the conferences. We had the largest attendance at Nevada in February that I have seen at any of our district conferences. Two young boys walked seventeen miles, rode four miles on a truck, and twenty-one miles on the railroad, and were at the conference before eleven o'clock.

I have urged the Saints in the branches to help and encourage the young people to come to the conferences and reunions. I believe one reason why the young people are taking more interest than usual is because the older people are beginning to realize that they are real human beings; and that if they are encouraged to help in the work instead of being knocked for some of the exhilaration of youth, it is an easy matter to get them to work. They love to help if we that are older will not hinder them.

There are several promising young men and women in our district that are planning for a career of church work. It is also very evident that the Lord is moving on our young people, and we must not hinder but encourage them in their desire to help. I am trying to encourage them to prepare for the work to which the Lord will call them.

Your brother, EDWARD RANNIE.

Brooklyn Reports Progress

Religio reorganized and the Saints rejoicing in the gospel privileges.

Being a regular reader of the HERALD, I was wondering if the Saints in other places would like to hear from the Brooklyn Branch. Brooklyn being a suburb of the largest city of the world, you will understand that we have the greatest trouble to get people interested in our cause. Still I would like to let the Saints know we are alive, and we expect with God's help to keep alive and grow.

It may be interesting for you to hear of the good time we had last Wednesday, March 30, with Brother D. T. Williams as speaker, Brother A. N. Hoxie leading us in a fine song service. Dear Saints, how I love to tell you of that wonderful message Brother Williams delivered to us, and the impression it has made on the Saints. His most striking statement was that it takes greater courage to live for the gospel of Christ than is needed to die for it. Oh, Saints, how true! How often we have said we love the gospel, we love our brothers and sisters, and we are willing to die for the gospel; but after we think it over we find out that, as Brother Williams says, greater courage is needed to lay ourself as a willing sacrifice, to live for the gospel!

Thursday, our pastor, John Sheehy, called a special meeting for the reorganization of the Religio, for I am sorry to say our Religio was dead. Again a wonderful meeting. After an address from our pastor, we elected officers for the coming season: Ephraim Squire, president; Mabel Harris, vice president; Hattie Hughes, secretary-treasurer, and Anna Truman, chorister. We trust they will be able to bring the Religio to life again.

Friday evening at eight o'clock we again had the pleasure of hearing Brother D. T. Williams, and again the faithful few were well paid for coming to hear him.

On Sunday, a sacrament service and testimony meeting. The church was well filled and we had a very good meeting. In all the testimonies given, you could hear some impression from Brother Williams's preaching.

And now, dear Saints, we assure you that the Brooklyn Branch will live for the gospel. We ask your prayers, and especially for our dear pastor who suffers with sciatic rheumatism, his affliction being doubly hard because of being separated from his family; but he bears his cross without a murmur or complaint. May the Lord bless you all.

ANTHONY KONSTANTIN.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

Won't it be fine to know that there are five hundred registered Scouts under church leadership? Are you going to be represented? Are you going to help us reach this goal by June 1?—Boys Department.

SCRANTON, PENNSYLVANIA, April 6, 1921.

Editors Herald: On April 3 we had with us Elder Daniel T. Williams. A large attendance greeted the brother at the evening service. He was en route to Toronto, Ontario, and could stop with us only one day.

On March 27 one of the local brethren baptized a young man. Two were baptized on the same date in the Archbald, Pennsylvania, Branch.

We will organize a class for the study of church history this week. We now have classes studying the Book of Mormon, The Compendium, Murray's One to Twenty-One, and church history, besides the Sunday school and Religio Quarterlies.

We have a good choir here and the Scranton Brass Band has been reorganized.

E. B. HULL.

OAKLAND, CALIFORNIA.

Editors Herald: On March 20, a rally was held by the Oakland Branch. The church was not sufficiently large to hold the attendance of Saints and friends, therefore a hall was procured which was centrally located, and where arrangements were made for the serving of the meals as well as holding services, so the Saints could spend the entire day and evening together.

The purpose of this rally was to awaken a new interest and renew old acquaintance in this district. Members from San Francisco, San Jose, Sacramento, and Stockton were present; also Brother F. G. Pitt and wife from Long Beach were with us, Brother Pitt being the speaker for the morning service. The attendance in all was about five hundred. A fine instrumental and vocal program was rendered by the young people of the Oakland Branch throughout the day.

Brother Pitt is holding revival meetings in the Oakland Branch all this week and will be in Sacramento next week.

Our dear Brother and Sister J. M. Terry who are laboring in the Seattle Branch were unable to be with us in person, but were indeed present in spirit. A very beautiful epistle was written by Brother Terry and read at our Religio service. Brother Terry says, "You can't imagine how it thrilled our hearts with gladness and gratefulness when we received from your beloved pastor a cordial invitation to be present on this joyful occasion, and just to think an effort was made to obtain passes for our transportation was seemingly beyond the limit of brotherly love. Such love will redeem the church and transform this earth into a universal Zion." Brother Terry was the president of the Oakland Branch for a number of years.

Under the able leadership of Brother J. D. White, the Oakland Branch expects to accomplish much this year, and to this end we ask an interest in the prayers of the Saints.

A letter from T. W. Williams, written at Jerusalem, March 21, states: "It looks now as though we will get away from Jerusalem about April 12 and will sail from Alexandria on April 23, reaching Naples April 28. We expect to spend about ten or twelve days in Italy. Will then go on to London, possibly stopping a few days in Switzerland. Frederick M. will remain sometime in England but hopes to return to America within the year."

We have no doubt Brother Williams means by "within the year," that President Smith hopes to return within a year from the time he left America, as from another source we are confirmed in that opinion.

Elder J. D. Lewis reports that at Kirtland they have made extensive preparations for the series of meetings to begin April 24, with Elder D. T. Williams as the speaker. He writes: "We are entering upon our preparatory services, and hope to have every young person as well as the older ones praying for the success of the coming revival."

Give the boy a chance to express his energy in the Scout program and you won't have to say don't so much.—Boys Department.

Interdistrict Institute

With a view to raising the efficiency and enthusiasm of their workers, the officers and the Sunday school, Religio, and Women's Department of Des Moines District and Lamoni Stake have planned a four-day interdistrict institute at Des Moines church from May 4 to 8.

It will open with a pageant, Wednesday night, which depicts the model home and model Sunday school in contrast to the ordinary home and school, the products of both to be presented. Then follow four well-filled days of real live subjects treated in lectures and discussions.

Here are some of them: What is the best method of training a child to pray—in the home and in the Sunday school?

The Christian Guardian calls attention to the serious fact that in the United States there are no fewer than 30,000 churches of various denominations without pastors. What is the cause of this? Some say the war unsettled men and took them away, but the trouble preceded the war. Others maintain that finance is the explanation, and while this is undoubtedly a serious factor, it does not explain everything. It is probable that the shortage is due to a number of causes, of which one that should not be overlooked is the decay of home religion and the loss of the highest ideals of service for God and man. Parents should see that their homes are places where God is recognized as supreme, and the young people should be trained to see in the Christian ministry the finest way of doing good to those around.—Toronto Globe.

Department of History

Very early in the history of the church the Lord called a man by revelation and commanded that a record should be kept. From that time until this, the historian has been a general church officer, and a careful record has been kept from year to year.

The department is now not only anxious to keep the records but wants to make all its material available to the missionaries and local workers. It wants to cooperate with the Saints in building up a complete historical library so that the entire church may benefit.

The Journal of History is issued quarterly by this department, and in this magazine events are both narrated and interpreted. Every church family and library should be subscribers. Subscription price per year $1.75.

Mothers' Day

A day which should be observed in every church in the land.

May 8, the second Sunday in May, has been set apart of recent years as Mothers' Day, though in fact a true child always remembers mother throughout the year, whether she is living or whether she has passed on before. But it is a just tribute to have one day in the year set aside especially for children and men to remember what our mothers have done for us, how they have suffered for us, going down into the valley of the shadow of death, that we might have life.

Mothers have set aside their own pleasure for the years of our weakness, to nurse and care for us in sickness and in health. When a child is sick it means broken sleep or no sleep for the parents, especially the mother. When a child is well, it requires constant watchcare that self-injury will not be done in all innocence.

But greater than that is the instilling of the ideals of life. A child's attitude towards his father is largely determined by the mother; his attitude towards other women, his attitude towards religion, the church, and God, is in charge of his mother. The mother, by right living and example, can set the very highest ideals of moral conduct before her child, and in a lasting way, that will endure through all the coming years.

Much of our teaching is done by the mother, both before and after the entry into the school years. The teaching of practical affairs of life is largely in the hands of the mother, especially in the earlier years of life. And as many critical students have observed, it is in those earlier years, the years that come before the school age, that our ideals are formed for the great affairs of life, the body and mind made ready, and the foundations of moral and spiritual life made ready.

Then having suffered, taught, and guided the young feet, she makes another great sacrifice, when she not only permits but encourages the child for his or her own good, in the early years of maturity, to leave perhaps the home nest, and go out and make his or her own place in the world. Some women, it is true, do not do so, but seem to interfere and try to strangle the social life of the child, but such is contrary to the true spirit of motherhood, who gives all, and feels herself repaid if a little love is returned.

Surely the boy felt something of the spirit of motherhood, when he asked a neighbor, "Do you not think my mamma is the most beautiful woman in all the world?" She may not have been beautiful in the eyes of others, but to the eyes of love she is always fair.

Chief Red Fox spoke at the church in Saint Louis, the evening of April 17. The church auditorium was filled, and the church parlors were opened into the auditorium, to accommodate the overflow.

Motherhood

It is of interest to note that throughout the Bible the father and the mother are honored together: "Honor thy father and thy mother." "Hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother." "My son, keep thy father's commandments, and forsake not the law of thy mother. Bind them continually upon thy heart; tie them about thy neck; where thou goest, it shall lead thee; when thou sleepest it shall keep thee; and when thou wakest it shall talk with thee. For the commandment is a lamp, and the law is light, and the fruits of instruction are the ways of light." (Proverbs 6: 20-23.) "A foolish man despiseth his mother. Folly is joy to him that is destitute of wisdom; but a man of understanding walketh uprightly."

Many such passages can be found, but one of the most beautiful is in the last of Isaiah, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you, and ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem." All motherhood is honored in that the Son of God chose to be born of woman.

In that great tragedy and glory of life called motherhood, man finds humility and prayer, if not the primitive and eternal verities. In fatherhood he finds copartnership with God.

It is doubtless something of this causes Doctor G. Stanley Hall to intimate that every true mother feels that which is beneath her heart is akin to the divine, and herself in league with heavenly forces.

That which is true of all mothers, that they feel themselves in league with heavenly forces, was doubtless so in a fuller sense of her who was honored in becoming the mother of Jesus. As Hall expresses it:

"Motherhood beams with a very different light. The bud has blossomed and borne fruit. The tree of knowledge of good and evil, and also the tree of life, have been tasted. The intuitions are larger, the quality of innocence loftier. These two sides of womanhood here blended have evoked love and adoration in the world second only to that which Jesus himself has called forth. Religious sentiment here idealizes woman as she is conceived to have come from the hand of God, and many a Protestant envies his Catholic friends their attitude toward the Blessed Virgin. No one has ever asked whether she knew Egyptian, Chaldean, or even could read or write her own tongue. She cannot be conceived as bemoaning fancied limitations of her sex or wishing to make sex a sect, but she triumphs and glories in her womanhood and has been adored all these ages as its supreme type, more generic, nearer to the race, richer in love, unselfish devotion, and intuition than man, so that the Madonna idea which teaches that it is more holy to be woman than to have achieved eminence in any kind of superiority, should teach our own sex a corresponding lesson. The worship of Mary has been of potent influence in safeguarding womanhood from the growing danger that it will decline from its orbit, lose just confidence and due pride in its sex as such, till in lapsing toward mannish ways its original divinity becomes clouded."

"Stand forth, O heart and soul of childhood. Reveal thyself to us more fully. We want thee stark naked, unclothed of all disguises, false tastes, bad habits, partial theories, with the purity of that divinity in thee unshadowed just as thou camest forth into the world, fresh from the hand of the heavenly Father. The norm of thy development is our only

Bishop E. A. Blakeslee Has Passed Away

Word has just reached us that at 4 o'clock, April 21, Bishop E. A. Blakeslee passed away.

Bishop Blakeslee was a son of George A. Blakeslee, who was Bishop of the church from 1882 until his death in the fall of 1890. He was a grandson of James Blakeslee, member of the Quorum of Twelve, in the Reorganized Church, 1860 to 1866.

Bishop Edward A. Blakeslee was chosen as one of the counselors of Bishop Kelley, receiving appointment in 1891, and continued in that capacity as one of the Presiding Bishopric until Bishop Kelley was released, at the General Conference of 1916. Of late years, Bishop Blakeslee was interested in the Sunday school work and was its first superintendent, 1891 to 1895, and when the library commission was first appointed in 1907, he was one of the three members. This commission has been a leading factor in bringing about the closer coordination in the departmental work with the church. He continued to serve on this commission until his release from the Presiding Bishopric in 1916.

In 1913 he was called by revelation and ordained a bishop. In 1914 he was designated by revelation to be the Presiding Bishop of the church. He was chairman of the Board of Publication, Sanitarium Board, and other positions growing out of that office, and the pressure of business prevented his accepting.

As a business man and citizen he was well and favorably known throughout western Michigan, and maintained a favorable reputation for the church which he represented. He held many positions of great business importance, which fully engaged his time of late years.

When We Move to Independence

Let the contributors continue their good work.

Present plans of Manager G. S. Trowbridge are that on May 2 he will begin to have one press, one linotype, and such other machinery as can be spared temporarily from the Herald Publishing House at Lamoni taken down and loaded for shipment to Independence.

Some of the Lamoni employees will attend to this work, seeing to the reassembling of the machines and their proper installation in the new quarters.

The next step contemplated will be the transfer of the editors (or part of them) to Independence, from whence they will turn in their usual quota of "copy" to the machines and keep the production going while the rest of the equipment and the other employees are being transferred. It is thought this can all be completed during the month of May.

The remodeled building is practically finished and affords a most commodious and attractive place for the consolidated plant. Most of the employees who plan to go with the institution have made their arrangements. Some will remain in Lamoni or go to other places.

There is an editorial matter that we hope our readers will carefully consider. There is apt to be a feeling that since we are in the throes of moving we will not care to be annoyed with many letters and articles and other contributions.

We hope nobody will harbor this idea. We shall appreciate if possible more than ever the continued help of our readers in furnishing material from all fields for our pages.

Matter intended for publication apt to reach us before May 18 should be addressed as usual to Editors Herald, Lamoni, Iowa. After that date it should go to Editors Saints' Herald, Independence, Missouri.

We shall endeavor to use all miscellaneous items and timely letters promptly, as usual.

The Women's May Institute

An important series of services. Program is in this number.

The institute announced by the Women's Department to be held at Independence, May 15 to 22 inclusive, is a new departure, which indicates the progress of this work. All of the officers and field workers are invited and urged to attend. The work undertaken will be beneficial to any person who is able to be there.

The meetings during the week are intended primarily, if not exclusively, for the women of the church. And that includes all the women, whether they hold official responsibility in this department or not, as all have the responsibility of the home and of church membership.

We have long hoped to see such institutes held, lasting for at least a week, if not longer, giving opportunity for more information than is possible in our week-end institute or during the work of General Conference.

Many of the meetings, and especially those for the two Sundays and for the evenings, are general in their nature, and the public is not only welcome, but urged to attend, as the women would like to have their aims and desires better understood. Some of the most able speakers in the church have been secured and it is an opportunity and a privilege for anyone who can possibly attend.

We sincerely hope it is but a beginning, and that other institutes will be held, lasting a week or longer in other fields.

A start has been made in the lectures to the priesthood during the last eight or nine years, and in such lectures as the general church historian, Walter W. Smith, delivered to the priesthood at Toronto last summer. No doubt provisions will soon be made for a gathering of the priesthood at other times than at General Conference, so that more intensive work may be undertaken.

Tithing Campaign in Holden

The stake presidency and bishopric of the Holden Stake have sent out a notice to all of the branches and workers through the stake, requesting that the ten days, April 15 to 24, be made a time of tithe teaching and tithe learning, and tithe compliance. Every Sunday school superintendent, every Religio superintendent, every superintendent of the Women's Department, is requested to give ten or fifteen minutes in every session held during that time, to explaining the great need of "Every Member a Tithe Payer." The presiding elder is asked to see that one sermon on tithing be preached on each of the two Sundays within the ten days. This includes the filing of the inventory, as well as the paying of the tithing. Their attention is directed to the article by the Presiding Bishop, B. R. McGuire, in the HERALD of March 30, entitled, "Why the annual tithing report?"

A Preacher Who Practiced

Doctor Frank W. Gunsaulus, for several years one of the leading preachers of Chicago, and pastor of the Central Church there, who resigned, however, two years ago to give all of his time to the Armour Institute of Technology, passed away in the month of March. He was a speaker of unusual power, and at the conclusion of one sermon, on "What I would do if I had a million dollars," Mr. Philip Armour, of Armour and Company, met him and asked, "Young man, do you think you could do all you have outlined in your sermon if you had a million dollars?" Most certainly I do." "Go ahead, the million is yours," Mr. Armour replied, and at once wrote out a check for the amount.

Doctor Gunsaulus was not only ready to preach, but was ready to practice. The ideas he held forth were for an institute where thousands of boys, who otherwise could not secure a technical education because of lack of funds, might be given that opportunity.

Baptism

*Sermon by Elbert A. Smith in Zion Builder Series, Lamoni, Tuesday, March 15, 1921.
Reported by R. A. Wight and Estella Wight.*

"Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ. [Peter is speaking to the assembled Jews on the day of Pentecost.] Now when they heard this, they were pricked in their heart and said unto Peter and to the rest of the apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do? Then Peter said unto them, Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call. And with many other words did he testify and exhort, saying, Save yourselves from this untoward generation. Then they that gladly received his word were baptized."—Acts 2: 36-41.

When we preach on the subject of baptism, it is quite possible that some one may be offended, but that is not our intention. We respect the belief and the feelings of other people; but it is obviously true that when we speak on this subject we must tell the people what we believe. You would not wish us to do otherwise.

I remember hearing a very noted evangelist in a series of sermons. He started the first sermon by saying, "I am going to preach the truth here, if I have to take my wife home in a wheelbarrow." A little later when he came to the subject of baptism, he said, "I will tell you that you must all be baptized; but I will not tell you how to be baptized, because if I said sprinkling, I would offend some, and if I said immersion, I would offend a great many others." He took his wife home in a Pullman car. I did not bring my wife with me. However, I will tell what I believe about baptism, and take a chance on Brother R. V. Hopkins taking his wife home in a wheelbarrow. I am quite sure he would take her that way before he would leave her.

Some years ago I had occasion to visit a minister who was about to lecture on the subject of "Mormonism." In the course of our conversation he said, "Brother Smith, do you people believe the Bible? I have been told that you do not." It is really absurd the fool stories and rumors that get out about Latter Day Saints. Some years ago in a distant city where we lived, my son was telling a neighbor that I had married a couple that day, and he looked at him with speculative eye and said, "Two in one day! How many does that make him?"

One of our apostles was baptizing in Australia. He noticed a commotion on the bank, and when he inquired later he discovered that a man was very busy telling the people that when one of our converts was baptized, he had to say the name of Brigham Young three times while under the water. If one of our converts should do that he might drown. It is about all we can do to say the name of Brigham Young out of the water, without strangling, under ordinary conditions.

Present-Tense Religion

So this minister desired to know if we really believed the Bible. I said to him, "Well, I preach every Sunday night at our church near here and I always take my text from the Bible." Perhaps I should have stopped there, but I did not. I said, "It is possible that we adhere more closely to some portions of the Bible than you do." And he replied, "My brother, that cannot be possible!"

"Well, how about this: 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay their hands on the sick, and they shall recover.'" (Mark 16: 15-20.)

He replied, "I will say this: I believe that the signs did follow."

And I answered, "That is exactly the difference between religion in the past tense and religion in the present tense."

Whatever you may say about Joseph Smith, it is true that he restored the present tense to religious terminology. Everyone else on earth was saying that God used to reveal his will to men, and Joseph Smith stood up to say, God does reveal his will and he does speak to man. Everyone else was saying that God used to heal the people, that he used to bless men, and give them the gift of prophecy; but Joseph Smith said God does heal the people and he does give them the gifts of the gospel. Everyone else was saying that God used to have a church on earth organized with apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, elders, bishops, priests, and teachers; but Joseph Smith stood up and said God has a church on earth with apostles and prophets now.

Joseph Smith was like the prophets of old, of whom Walter Rauschenbusch says in his book, Christianity and the Social Crisis, "They went to school with a living God that was then at work in his world, and not with a God who had acted long ago and put it down in a book."

I like the present tense in religion because I happen to be living to-day. I want a religion that applies to-day and not one that speaks only of the long dead past.

I said to this minister, "Take another text. How about the statement of Jesus Christ in the third chapter of John: 'Except a man be born of water, and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.'"—John 3: 5.

He said, "Well, I believe very strongly in the baptism of the Spirit, but I do not know exactly what to think about the baptism of water."

I left shortly afterwards, because it did not matter what he thought about it or what I thought about it. The question is, What does God think about it? Jesus Christ is not like some preachers. He did not talk just to be talking. He meant something when he spoke of the birth of water and of the Spirit. His commandments are binding to-day just as of old. In that, too, we believe in present-tense religion.

Let the Witnesses Testify

There is one text that Latter Day Saints very frequently refer to: "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."—Isaiah 8: 20.

And another statement: "In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established."—Matthew 18: 16.

Very well; let us summon the witnesses. Let us see what is written in the law. Let us hear the testimony of the witnesses. There are scores of them who testify in the word of God, but we have not time to hear all of them to-night. We will hear from seven of them. And if two or three witnesses in the word of God, and in the civil courts, establish a fact, certainly the testimony of seven unimpeachable witnesses ought to clarify the question under consideration.

John the Baptist

The first of these witnesses that we shall summon is John the Baptist, and it is said of him in John 1:6: "There was a man sent from God, whose name was John." He should be a very good witness.

And John tells us: "He that sent me to baptize with water"—John 1:33. While in John 1:26, he adds, "I baptize with water." This witness which cannot be impeached, a man sent of God, says that God sent him for the express purpose that he should baptize with water and that Jesus Christ should follow after and baptize them with the Holy Spirit.

Peter

The second witness that we introduce is Peter. You will remember that when Jesus departed he told the disciples, "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high."—Luke 24:29. And on the day of Pentecost, as we read in the second chapter of Acts, this divine power rested on the apostles, and Peter stood up and preached to them. So we have as witness a man endowed with power from on high.

And Peter said:

"Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call."—Acts 2:38, 39.

That was a great commandment and a wonderful promise that reached to the end of time. As many as the Lord shall call, even to-day, are commanded to be baptized and are promised that if they will have faith and repent and be baptized that they shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost.

On another occasion this same individual was preaching to the household of Cornelius. You remember the story. The people of the household of Cornelius were Gentiles. On the day of Pentecost Peter was talking to the Jews, but the gospel had at last gone to the Gentiles and they received it. The Holy Ghost came to them and Peter said, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized which have received the Holy Ghost, as well as we? And he commanded them to be baptized."—Acts 10:47, 48.

It is obvious then that baptism followed with the gospel from the Jew to the Gentile and comes to us with all the other teachings of our Lord and Master.

Paul

The third witness that we have to summon to-night is the Apostle Paul. You will remember that the Lord said of the Apostle Paul, "He is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel."—Acts 9:15.

This is especially interesting to us because the Apostle Paul was a chosen vessel to carry the gospel of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, and you and I are Gentiles in the sense of the term as then used. That is, we are not Jews. The Apostle Paul was a chosen vessel to bring the gospel of Jesus Christ to us, and so he should certainly be a satisfactory witness for us to hear.

And he tells us:

"Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection" [or as the Inspired Version has it, "therefore, not leaving the principles," which obviously is correct, because no one would argue that we should leave either faith or repentance. Those will be preached as long as the church stands]. "Therefore, not leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment."—Hebrews 6:1, 2.

He has baptism in the plural. That includes baptism of water and of the Spirit. As Jesus expressed it: "Except a man is born of water and the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."—John 3:5.

This man chosen to be a special messenger to us, epitomizes the principles of the doctrine of Jesus Christ. There are six of them, and one of them is the doctrine of baptism.

And you will remember how on a certain occasion Paul and Silas were imprisoned and while in that condition the earthquake came and opened the door of the prison so that they were loosed, and their jailer came to them in great fear, and while he was in that condition Paul and Silas preached to him the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Let us read a few words from this chapter. It is the 16th chapter of Acts, beginning with the 30th verse: "And [the jailer] brought them out, and said, Sirs, what must I do to be saved?"

That is the very important question that has often come to the lips of man. "What must I do to be saved?"

"And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house."—Acts 16:31.

Right there is where a great many people stop. They do not read any farther, and the gist of their message is that all you have to do is to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and salvation is sure, but the record goes on to say, "And they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house. And he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes; and was baptized, he and all his, straightway."—Verses 32, 33.

Philip

The fourth witness is Philip, "a preacher of Jesus Christ." We find him on a certain occasion taking a journey. And on the way he came to the eunuch, who was traveling in a chariot, and preached to him the gospel of Jesus Christ. The record says:

"Then Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same scripture, and preached unto him Jesus. And as they went on their way, they came unto a certain water: and the eunuch said, See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?"—Acts 8:35, 36.

It seemed that wherever they went and preached Jesus, the subject of baptism came up.

"And Philip said, If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest. And he answered and said, I believe that Jesus Christ is the son of God."—Verse 37.

Under the terms of modern theology that was all he needed to do. The case was ended. But not then—not in those days:

"And he commanded the chariot to stand still; and they went down, both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him. And when they were come up out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip."—Acts 8:38, 39.

You will note in passing that when they baptized in those days they went down into the water and baptized. There can be no question as to the mode of baptism.

Ananias

The fifth witness is Ananias (not the Ananias who told the lie); this is the Ananias who is spoken of in Acts 22:12, as "a devout man according to the law" and a man of good repute. That is the kind of a witness we want—a devout man of good repute "according to the law" so that when he speaks we may know that he speaks according to the law.

You remember the experience of Paul, how he was on the way to Damascus to persecute the Saints, and on the way Jesus Christ appeared to him and he was stricken down and blinded so that they had to lead him to Damascus. And this devout man, according to the law, was commanded by the Lord to go to the house of Paul and tell him what he must do. He did not go there to ask Paul what he wished to do, or what he thought about it. He went there to tell him what he must do. For Paul had been told: "Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do."—Acts 9: 6.

Ananias came to him and told him many things and finally reached a point where he said, "And now, why tarriest thou? arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord."—Acts 22: 16.

That is what Paul had to do to obtain salvation. There was no choice in the matter if he would please God, and he had reached the place where above everything on earth he wished to please God.

Paul said that his gospel "came not in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance" (1 Thessalonians 1: 5), and he did not hesitate a moment. He did not raise a single objection. He did not "tarry." He yielded obedience to baptism and became one of the great evangelists of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Jesus Christ

The sixth witness, and we speak the name reverently, is Jesus Christ our Lord. The commandment in divine writ is, "Hear ye him." That is a very important commandment, and I pause right here to remark that in 1820 when Joseph Smith received his first vision and the heavens were opened and Jesus was pointed out to him, the great command that came to him was, "This is my Son, hear ye him."

No matter what the world may think or say, that is the keynote of our message and has been from the beginning and will always continue to be the keynote. What does Jesus have to say about baptism?

The first glimpse that we catch of Jesus as a man is on the banks of the river Jordan, when he goes down into the water and is baptized of John. And he says unto us, "Take up thy cross and follow me."

And the very last glimpse that we catch of him here on earth is when he is talking to his disciples and saying to them, "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved."—Mark 16: 16.

That is a definite promise. Some one else may make you a promise on some other terms. I do not care for their promises. I care for the promise of Jesus Christ, and he says, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Again, hear ye him: "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things, whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."—Matthew 28: 19, 20.

I want Jesus Christ with me, and he makes it conditional that I shall teach "all things that he has commanded." Most positively one of the things he commanded us to teach is baptism: "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

God

Last of all, and we speak this name with equal reverence, the seventh witness is God. When Jesus was baptized, God said, "I am well pleased."—Mark 1: 11.

Do you wish to please God? It is written we ought to please God rather than men. It is not a question of pleasing your father or your mother, not when it comes to the salvation of your soul and obedience to Christ. It is not a question of pleasing your brother or sister or your friends or your companions. It is a question of pleasing God, and it is a singular fact that the moment of all moments that God chose to open the heavens on high and say, "I am well pleased," was when Jesus Christ was coming up out of the waters of baptism.

The Mode of Baptism

We come next to the question of the mode of baptism. We have established from seven great unimpeachable witnesses that baptism is essential, that it is one of the gospel principles, and that it is commanded of God and pleasing in his sight.

On this question of the mode of baptism the Apostle Paul tells us in the Roman letter, "Therefore, we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life."—Romans 6: 4.

This language is not capable of misconstruction. If you had a little sand sprinkled on your coffin, would you think that you were buried? Well, you would not think anything about it, because you would be dead, but the board of health would say that you were not buried.

It is obviously a fact that the historical mode of baptism was burial in water, a likeness to the burial of Jesus Christ, who was buried in the earth; so in the likeness of his burial we are buried in water that we may come up out of the water new creatures as Jesus Christ came up in the resurrection to a new and glorious life.

Paul continues, "For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection."—Verse 5. He uses another simile that cannot be misunderstood. You do not plant seeds on the top of the ground; you cover them up. You bury them. And then they come up to a new life, just as the candidate is buried in water and comes up a new creature, if he has made a true covenant. This is repeated in more than one place. In Colossians 2: 12: "Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead."

That idea of burial may account for the statement: "John was baptizing in Ænon, near to Salim, because there was much water there."—John 3: 23. It does not take very much water to baptize in some ways, but if you are to bury a man in water in the likeness of the burial of Jesus Christ enough water is needed to cover the body, so when they baptized anciently, they searched about until they found "much water," and there they administered the ordinance.

This was the baptism of John. He "was baptizing in Ænon, near to Salim, because there was much water." You remember the question that Jesus asked the Jews? The baptism of John, "Was it from heaven or was it from men?" (Luke 20: 4.) And they did not dare to answer him. They did not dare to say it was of men, because they were afraid of the people, and they did not dare to say it was of God, because then he would ask them, "Why were ye not baptized?"

Christians should not fear to answer the question: The baptism of John, who baptized where there was much water, was it of heaven? Well, the Bible says, there was a man sent of God whose name was John, and he came doing the will of God.

We have selected these examples because they show very clearly the mode of operation in days gone by in the primitive Christian church. We have already mentioned the baptism of the eunuch under the administration of Philip, how they went down into the water both Philip and the eunuch and when Philip had baptized him they came up out of the water.

There is no question about the method of that baptism. The very origin of the word baptism, baptizo in the Greek, means to plunge, to overwhelm, to cover up, and there is no question either that the historical method of baptism was by immersion.

In support of that we will perhaps pause to read some extracts from history. Mosheim who was recognized as a learned and accurate historian, in writing of the first century, says, "Baptism was administered in this (first) century, without the public assemblies, in places appointed and prepared for that purpose, and was performed by an immersion of the whole body in the baptismal font."

Eusebius, known as the father of church historians, recounts what, so far as I know, was the first case of any other form of ceremonial known as baptism, the case of Novatus about the year 263, of whom he says, "when attacked with an obstinate disease and being supposed at the point of death, was baptized by aspersion, in the bed on which he lay; if, indeed, it be proper to say that one like him did receive baptism. But neither when he recovered from disease, did he partake of other things, which the rules of the church prescribed as duty, nor was he sealed, (in confirmation) by the Bishop. But as he did not obtain this how could he obtain the Holy Spirit?"

This man was supposed to be at the point of death, and he was baptized by sprinkling, but when he recovered he was not admitted to church privileges. The monks of Cressy, A. D. 754, inquired: "Is it lawful, in case of necessity, occasioned by sickness, to baptize an infant by pouring water on its head, from a cup, or the hands?" To which Pope Stephen III replied: "Such a baptism performed in such a case of necessity, shall be accounted valid." This was in the eighth century.

However, it was not until the year 1311 that the council at Ravenna declared immersion and pouring indifferent.

We have then briefly presented before us this consideration, that for at least one or two hundred years after Jesus Christ, immersion was practically the only form of baptism that was known or that was resorted to, but finally there came a time when one and then several were baptized in other ways because of their illness; but it was not until 1300 years after Christ that such baptism was declared legal, and then who was it that said it was legal? A Roman Catholic council and a Roman Catholic pope.

If we are to concede that in the dark ages of apostasy of the world's history the Catholic Church represented God and had the right to change his ordinances, why, then, let us all be Catholics; but if we will not concede that, and all Protestantism rises up in protest against it, then let us go back of the council of Ravenna to the testimony of Paul who says that we ought to be buried with Christ in baptism.

I heard a discussion between one of our men and a very prominent priest. It was very significant. Our elder quoted to him the statement in Isaiah: "They have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant," and he charged the Catholic Church with changing the ordinance of baptism. The priest merely answered, in substance, "Why, of course we changed the ordinance of baptism. We had a right to. We know very well that originally immersion was the form."

What are you going to do about it? If Protestants do not concede papal authority, why do so many Protestants wink at the changes made?

The Question Box, a book by Reverend Bertrand L. Conway, of the Paulist Fathers, is published by the Paulist Press of the Catholic Church and has a preface by Cardinal Gibbons. It says: "The Catholic Church, therefore, as the infallible interpreter of the gospel of Jesus Christ, declares that all three ways of baptizing are equally valid, by immersion, by pouring, or by sprinkling. The present mode of pouring arose from the many inconveniences connected with immersion, frequent mention of which is made in the writings of the early church fathers."

It seems to me very clear that the ancient historical method of baptism was by immersion. In the light of that and the further fact that the Scriptures tell us specifically that when Jesus was baptized he "came up out of the water," there can be no shadow of doubt that he was immersed. He went down into the River Jordan and was plunged under its rolling waves and came up out of the water. Is the servant greater than the Master? If Jesus Christ did that, shall I stand on the bank and quibble?

Where is the occasion for any quibbling or for any question? The facts of the matter are as it is stated, "They that gladly received his word were baptized."—Acts 2:41. If a man receives it gladly there is no question.

The baptism of Jesus is good enough for me. If I were to come to you to-night and offer you your choice of a dozen $100 bank notes, saying, "One out of the dozen is absolutely genuine, it will be taken at any bank in the world, no one questions it; but the others, some say, are genuine, some say not; some banks may cash them and some may not; take your choice," which would you take? There is not a man here that would hesitate for a moment. Why don't men use the same logic in religion. There is no question that immersion is genuine baptism and that it brings with it all the blessings that are promised. Then why should we hesitate? Why not arise as they did of old, who heard the word and were gladly baptized?

The Meaning of Baptism

Last of all, we may consider baptism in its meaning. It is symbolical. From time immemorial man has expressed himself in symbols. You can think, if you take time, of hundreds of symbols that man habitually uses—the flags of nations, the key to the city, the seal of state, the wedding ring, prostration in prayer or in obeisance. There are literally thousands of symbols. Some of them are material, like the flag. When we see the Starry Banner, we think of America. When we see the Union Jack we think of Great Britain. Some of them are ceremonial, as the sign of the cross that some people use, or prostration in prayer, or in reverence before a king. Man habitually expresses himself in symbols. He sees them objectively and they help him to visualize the conception that is in his mind, or that somebody else wishes to put into his mind.

Our heavenly Father speaks to men in a language that they can understand. He speaks to man many times in symbols. Baptism is a symbol, and when the Lord chose a symbol that would stand to man for cleansing, he chose baptism in water. Anyone can understand that. Man has always cleansed his body in water, and so we can understand the symbolism of washing away the sins of the spirit in water. Of course, we know that the water does not actually touch the spirit and wash the sins away, but it is symbolical of the cleansing process that goes on, and for that reason Ananias said to Paul, "Why tarriest thou? Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins."—Acts 22:16. When the Lord wanted to choose an ordinance that would stand for washing and cleansing and for spiritual regeneration he chose washing in water. He chose a symbol that is full of significance and great beauty, but change ruins it.

Baptism a Beginning

Finally we come to consider baptism as a beginning. It is in a sense the door of the kingdom. Jesus Christ himself said, "Except a man be born of the water, and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."—John 3:5. He made

A Tribute to My Mother

By J. E. Vanderwood

"No heritage can be left to man so rich and priceless as the memories of a true and noble mother."

President Lincoln is credited with saying that all he was in this world he attributed to his angel mother. This is a noble sentiment, one that commands the admiration of everyone who loves truth and justice. Yes, it challenges the best there is in us. The one term in the vocabulary of man that comes nearest to God in its sacredness is mother, and yet how indifferent we seem to be; how slow we are to give credit where it rightly belongs. I am, however, thoroughly imbued with the idea that every man who has amounted to anything that is worth while in this world of ours has been blessed with a good mother.

It is a regrettable fact that too frequently we forget to present the bouquets until mother is unable to appreciate them. How much better it would be for each of us to present some of the flowers of appreciation, and bestow some of the fragrant gifts of love upon our dear mothers while they are alive with us, and able to enjoy them, than it is to wait until their last breath has expired and then provide a beautiful casket, a wreath of flowers, and an elegant shroud for her lifeless form. It isn't because we do not love our mothers that we are inclined to be forgetful; it is simply that we fail to remember that mother is rightly entitled to the best there is in us. And so appreciative is mother that she sees only the good in us. How Godlike is mother love!

"This have I learned," said a great philosopher, "that a man can have but one mother." I, too, have come to fully realize this truth, and I therefore wish to pay a tribute of appreciation to my most excellent mother. What I am, and any measure of success I may have attained to in this world, I attribute to the early training of my Godlike mother. The most vivid memories I have are of the lessons I received at my mother's knee. I have had no other earthly teacher to compare with her, because none else could, or would take the interest in me that she did. As I think of her noble, Christlike life, in my riper experience and more nearly complete understanding, I thank God for such a wonderful mother.

Having been born in another country and coming to this land in her childhood, speaking in another tongue, she was beset with many disadvantages. Her opportunities for schooling were few, and therefore her knowledge of the English language and general learning were acquired under great difficulty. But my mother loved books; she was, and still is, a great reader. She has been a profound student of that Book of all books, the Bible. And how my young soul was often thrilled by those beautiful Bible stories that she so frequently related to me. The story of Joseph with his coat of many colors, and the nobility of his life burned deeply into my youthful soul, and the seeds of character were implanted within my life by reason of that teaching. Then in their turn the stories of Samson, the strong man; Samuel, the boy prophet; Danjel, the wise man, and prophet of the captivity; and others too numerous to mention here were related to me. But I must not fail to mention the beautiful story of the friendship of David and Jonathan, and the place it had and still has in my life. I have heard my mother read the Book of books at the hour of family worship when the penitent tears would steal their way down my freckled cheeks, and I would resolve within my heart, "I will be a better boy."

Oh, that I could use the words of a Webster, that I could the door of the kingdom to be through baptism of water and of the Spirit, or the birth of the water and of the Spirit.

You know that Paul tells us in the fourth chapter of the Ephesian letter, there is one Lord, one faith, and one baptism (Ephesians 4:5); but baptism is dual. As there is only one man composed of body and spirit, so there is one baptism which includes the baptism of the water and of the Spirit. Jesus said so. He says in another verse, "Except a man is born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."—John 3:3. That is one reason why I think it is so necessary our people should be taught the fundamentals. I know that some think, "Why should we not go on and confine ourselves to the consideration of the great Zion principles?" But let me tell you, friends, before we have a people ready to enter into Zion, we must have a people who have been born of the water and of the Spirit. They have to go through this fundamental education in the primary principles of the doctrine of Jesus Christ before they can even "see the kingdom," as Jesus Christ intimated in his language, or see Zion, as we might say.

Baptism is the beginning of a new, clean life in Christ Jesus. As the Apostle Paul says, "If we are buried with Christ in baptism, so shall we arise in newness of life."

That is the beautiful thing about it. It gives every man a chance to start a new life. How many times do you hear men say, "I wish I could have another start. I think I could do better. My life is filled with mistakes. I wish I had another chance"?

The gospel of Jesus Christ comes to every man and says, "God will give you another chance. You may wash away your sins and start all over, and if you think you have learned any lesson, profit by it. In addition to that you may have the Spirit of God to guide you and keep you through life."

So in conclusion, we may say, if there are those here who have already been baptized, then it remains only for them to continue in this new life and see to it that they do not crucify again the Lord afresh.

But if there are those who have not been baptized, in the language of the Bible, we say unto them, "Why tarriest thou? arise and be baptized and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord."

Sunday, April 24, found four high priests absent from Lamoni, conducting Zion Builder services. Elder Cyril E. Wight was just completing the meetings at Hiteman, Iowa. Elder J. F. Garver was opening the series of services at Pisgah, Iowa. Elder D. T. Williams was opening his fourth series of services in the Kirtland Temple. Elder F. M. McDowell was beginning a series of services in the church at Des Moines.

There are therefore three series of services for Zion Builders being conducted this present week. The young people at Pisgah have prepared an excellent dodger, under the heading, "What it means to be a Latter Day Saint." They have arranged for ten sermons by Elder Garver. This includes Sunday morning, and a sermon Saturday evening. In addition to the five sermons on the first principles, he is announced to speak on, "Christ the preacher," "The Church of Christ," "Zion the beautiful," and "The Restoration."

Oxford University has extended to women full privileges of membership. As a beginning, the university has conferred the degree of D. C. L. honoris causa (the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law) on the Queen of England. The chancellor, in bestowing the degree, said that she represented the highest ideas of feminine progress and feminine emancipation with the old-fashioned traditions of womanly reserve. It is well recognized that the progress of women does not mean a loss to the race of either old-fashioned or new-fashioned virtue.

be as the pen of a ready writer, and that I might clothe in proper terms my thought as I speak of the richness of the counsel that came daily from my noble mother. When she would see me with my jackknife whittling, she would say, "Son, why don't you make something useful, something that is worth while, instead of simply whittling a stick to a point?" She would then say, "Son, time is the most precious thing God has given us; you ought to try to use it for a good purpose." When I would undertake a piece of work, she would say to me, "No one will ask how long were you doing it, but they will ask who did it. Be thorough, my son; that which is worth doing at all is worth doing well." She would then tell me of a rail splitter who, barefooted, would walk to his work with a book in his hand, a high ideal in his head, and a true purpose in his heart, and how he became the greatest president of our glorious country; how that he became the emancipator of the slave, and the friend of all mankind. She would tell me of a Grant who, by his determination and stick-to-it-ive-ness, had gained the victory and had made the flag of liberty triumphant. Then she would tell me of a Longfellow who was a mighty poet, and with all these stories she would impress upon me the sterling worth of character. How I thank God for such a noble mother!

When I would grow weary of my task, she would tell me of the great inventors, how that many of them had spent years, and often their entire lives in order to produce that that has proved such a blessing to the world. Then she would remind me of the admonition of Saint Paul: "Be not weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not." By this means she would impress upon me the law of compensation, and if possible cause me to see that nothing but good can come of good, and nothing but evil can come of evil. Her council always was, "Son, be true to God; be true to yourself; and develop the highest and the best there is in you." And when I was absent from the parental roof, or when I was surrounded by the base or ignoble in life, mother's prayers would always ascend to God in my behalf, and it is to her teaching and faithfulness that I attribute the measure of success I have had in this life.

Mother didn't have access to books as we have to-day, but she mastered and assimilated what she had. She committed to memory a few books she had, and can yet quote verbatim many of the lessons in her second and third readers. She has been a student of history and biography, and by that means she has gained an understanding of ethics far surpassing many who have had the advantage of scholastic training. It is largely due to the early training of my angel mother that I have been able to fight my way up amidst adverse circumstances and conditions, and reach a measure of usefulness in the church.

There is no heritage that can be left to man that is so rich and priceless as the memories of a true and noble mother. I would indeed be very ungrateful if I did not express my heartfelt appreciation for such a comforting memory. I wish, therefore, to present a few of the flowers of appreciation to her while she is yet with us to enjoy the tribute that is due her and which but feebly expresses that which is due one that has so nobly filled the place of a true mother.

A national budget of five billion means an average of $50 for every man, woman, and child in America, most of it paid indirectly in goods that we purchase. Of this amount 93 per cent, or $46.50 goes for war, past and present.

The Passion Play, it is expected, will be repeated at Oberammergau, in 1922. An effort has been made to repeat it once every ten years, and the last presentation was in 1910.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

THE VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE

[Under the above title there appears the following extract from The Presbyterian. It is of interest concerning the value they place upon the different versions known to them, even though others differ, and prefer the revised version. Of course no other version can compare with that which has been corrected by divine revelation.—EDITORS.]

The recent translations of the Bible have from time to time been the subject of much discussion, especially as to their comparative excellence. The sellers of Bibles, those who view the question from the commercial viewpoint, magnify the new version. In England, the revision approved by the English committee is considered best. In America, the revision approved by the American committee is most highly spoken of. On the other hand, the teachers of literature in our best institutions, almost if not altogether without exception, commend the King James Version.

In making a translation from one language to another, there are two necessary requisites: the translator must secure with the greatest possible accuracy the thought and meaning of the writer in the foreign language, and he must be able to bring those thoughts over into the common language of his own people. We have high regard for the recent translators of the Scriptures in regard to their ability to understand the Greek and Hebrew of the original Scriptures. But we are constrained to say that we are not able to give them a higher place in this regard than we give to Calvin or some of the other Bible students who lived nearer to the Bible times. When it comes to the expression of these thoughts in the author's native tongue, carrying them over in all their shades and substances into the language of the people, then we agree with the verdict of the professors of literature, and give many degrees of preference to the King James version. For this reason we join with those who believe that the omission of the King James version or even its accompaniment with the other versions, does a great violence to the children of our generation. It is a failure to give them the best. The recent versions can never command the attention which is maintained by the King James. There is no finer English and no version of the Bible which more promptly attracts and more strongly holds the attention of the reader, young and old, than does the version of 1611. The new versions are useful as commentaries, but they can never supplant the standard or so-called authorized version. To substitute the inferior for the superior is sure to mean great regret and confusion later.

THE INDIAN CONTRIBUTION

The story of the Pilgrims in their relations with the Indians is largely a story of what they suffered. Nobody considers it of much importance to discover what they learned from the Indians, nor what the Indians did for them.

In the New York Evening Post, Mary Austin, who has written much about the Indians, and with authority, calls over some of the things the Pilgrims got from the Indians. The list is not without interest for us, for we celebrated our Thanksgiving largely in Indian fashion.

Beginning with furnishings of the frontier home, there were "skins tanned after Indian methods, corn-husk mats, corn-husk mattresses, pillows of wild duck feathers, brushes of turkey feathers, birchbark boxes and baskets, basswood bowls, woven willow baskets, and cunningly sewed receptacles of skin. There were chairs backed and seated with the pliable inner bark of hickory."

Then comes the great staple, corn: "The Indian had developed four or five distinct varieties of it, suited to varied conditions of soil and climate. It could be planted in unplowed ground, which could not be done with any of the grains the Puritans brought with them. It could be cultivated in the hill, it could be eaten before it was ripe, it could be harvested and cared for easily compared to wheat or oats, or left standing in the field at a pinch; finally, it could be cooked without milling."

The Indian had not stopped with corn. "He evolved a perfect garden combination of corn and beans and squash; the beans to twine up the cornstalks without other aid, the squash to shade the ground between the hills and keep down the weeds, all to be cultivated with one hoeing."

Not only so, but the Indian had learned to cook his corn, and most of the following names are Indian names: "Hominy, scrapple, succotash, pone, ash cake, buttered pop corn (battered with back fat or hickory-nut oil)."

Our Pilgrim Fathers learned about pumpkin pie from the Indian. The Indian had a dish of "stewed" pumpkin sweetened and combined with dried berries and nuts. Substituting corn meal for pumpkin, they produced the favorite dessert known as "Indian pudding."

The Indian had discovered maple sugar, that was new to our ancestors, cranberries, celery, and oysters. "Imagination halts before the first contact of the Europeans with the 'qua-haug' or hardshell clam, though he was quick enough to adopt clambake and chowder when the Indian made them known."

Buckwheat was one of the things the Indians knew, and they had cakes made much as the tortillas are still made by the Indians of the Southwest. "The Indians made a nut butter, which must have been similar to the nut butters on the market to-day, of hickory-nut kernels pounded in a mortar."

The conclusion of it all is that while the Pilgrim Fathers and mothers were very frequently short of rations they, in fact, had in the very beginnings of their New England life a more varied and much more invigorating diet than their brethren in England, because they so soon accustomed themselves to Indian dishes. Not only did they enjoy what the Indian had worked out, but they made a great contribution to the joy of living in Europe and they handed down to us many of our most healthful and appetizing foods.

If the Indian had contributed nothing more than corn, potatoes, and maple syrup, to say nothing of tobacco, the world would be greatly his debtor. But the Indian has much more than these things to his credit. The snowshoe, the birchbark canoe, the moccasin, to say nothing of blankets, come from him. But that is not all. We learned practically all of the strategy of modern warfare from the Indian. It was Black Hawk who abandoned his British general in 1812 because he ordered his men out to fight in the open in solid formation. Black Hawk said a man who did not know more about war than that could not be general over him—The Des Moines Register, November 27, 1920.

Some one has said that the keynote of boy training is summed up in three words, "Inspire enthusiastic activity." This is exactly what scouting does. It keeps alive the initiative in boys by directing it into useful and harmless channels.—Boys Department.

The Bible in the World quotes Mr. Gladstone as saying: "John Bright has told me that he would be content to stake upon the book of Psalms the great question whether there is or not a divine revelation. It was not to him conceivable how a work so widely severed from all the known productions of antiquity, and standing upon a level so much higher, could be accounted for except by a special and extraordinary aid."

HYMNS AND POEMS

The Saints' Herald

By Rees Jenkins

To the HERALD all success,
Harbinger of righteousness.
Each and every page contains

Some of truth's melodious strains;
Affording comfort to the weak;
Inspiration to the meek.
Nescience also is expelled
Through thy light—doubt is dispelled.
Science, in exquisite strain,

Heralding the truth amain,
Eigh! the golden from above—
Righteousness—the power of love.
Ancient truths now teach—Amen.
Liberty to man. So, then,
Dear HERALD, come again.

Confidence

By Hattie Hughes

When Jesus walks with me
The day is bright and clear;
No darkness do I see,
No danger do I fear.

His presence lights the way
And brightens all the path;
What once were darker days
A holier beauty hath.

When Jesus talks with me,
No other voice I hear
Than that sweet, tender plea
He whispers in my ear.

He bids me courage take;
He says, "Come unto me.
'Twas for your precious sake
They nailed me to the tree.

"My yoke is easy, too—
My burden light to bear;
I'll lead thee gently through;
I'll hearken to thy prayer."

And so with confidence
I walk with him alone;
I listen to the voice
That leads me gently on—

That bids my soul rejoice,
That says, "Come home, come home."
Dear Savior, take my hand
Till traveling days are done.

The American Bible Society voted an expenditure of $1,222,360 this year. This is the largest budget in over a hundred years, and is because of the great demand for Bibles. The society is 105 years old, according to the Federal Council Bulletin, and has issued 140 million copies of the Scriptures, in 150 languages and dialects.

The Forum is a department of the Herald intended primarily for free discussion of various questions, especially of a controversial nature, the contributions representing the views of the writer but not necessarily indorsed by the editors or the church at large.

Word of Wisdom

By A. H. Parsons

"This word being for our personal benefit, the application of the instruction contained therein is a necessity, that the good designed might accrue."

The prelude to the revelation that follows is explanatory of the mind of God as reflected therein, as understood by the one whom the Almighty called to interpret his word and speak for him in these the latter days. The prelude reads: "A word of wisdom for the benefit of the council of high priests, assembled in Kirtland, and church; and also, the Saints in Zion. To be sent greeting, not by commandment or constraint, but by revelation and the word of wisdom; showing forth the order and will of God in the temporal salvation of all Saints in the last days. Given for a principle, with promise; adapted to the capacity of the weak, and the weakest of all Saints, who are or can be called Saints."

I have italicized certain words for the purpose of impressing the meaning of these words on our minds. The word benefit first: act of kindness; a favor conferred, as the Psalmist said: "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits." Burke says: "Men have no right to what is not for their benefit." This word being for our personal benefit, the application of the instruction contained therein is a necessity, that the good designed might accrue.

Its application is to all who are called to be Saints, even though they are weak. "And all Saints who remember to keep and do these sayings, walking in obedience to the commandments, shall receive health in their navel, and marrow to their bones, and shall find wisdom and great treasures of knowledge, even hidden treasures; and shall run and not be weary, and shall walk and not faint; and I, the Lord, give unto them a promise that the destroying angel shall pass by them as the children of Israel, and not slay them."

I italicized the word promise to impress the reader of that which the Eternal One vouches for those who observe all that he has said. Not only in this Word of Wisdom, but in his word found in the Holy Scriptures, his commandments as stated in the above, "walking in obedience to the commandments."

This revelation was given in the early thirties, before conditions as now exist were thought of so far as man is concerned, in many respects. Liquor was pure and much used; it was not the fire water of after years when they began the adulteration. Even tobacco was used as nature developed it, but when man began to mix various ingredients to make it more tempting to the taste of men, it increased its contaminating and destructive influence and power. These have in most cases been relegated to where they belong, and how thankful we should be for victory won, and we should keep the fight on till every boy is made safe from corrupt and designing men who are supplying cigarettes to lead and keep them in bondage. Church discipline has helped many good men to clean up on these two points, and how thankful the men of this church should be for this help. Principles signify a rule of action; something to be governed by in our daily activities, for our temporal salvation.

To be warned and forewarned, is to be forearmed; better equipped for the issues of life, so as to escape the dire calamities that will come upon the disobedient ones.

Liquor, Tobacco, Tea, and Coffee Voted Out

The Church of Jesus Christ, early in its history, "unanimously voted not to support stores and shops selling spirituous liquors, tea, coffee, or tobacco." This action took place at Far West, in the State of Missouri, November 7, 1837. Here the Saints put themselves on record in favor of the Word of Wisdom. No store to be patronized by them which sold these articles. Some of our people would do well to read these actions of the early Saints and ask themselves: Are we walking in the footprints of our ancestors?

Coffee and Tea

Coffee and tea come under the same classification with liquor and tobacco; but there is one redeeming feature about them not found in the others; that is they do not affect anyone but the user, so far as we can discover. It is hard to quit either when once you form the habit of their use, yet they are not good for man. Should he use either? Some good people think they cannot live without them; their strength gives out and they must have a little tea or coffee to help them through their tasks; just like those who form the habit of drinking liquor or the use of tobacco; they must have it; and it actually seems to them that they cannot go farther till they get it, and as soon as taken they feel as though they could do most any kind of hard work that came their way—for the time being only.

Coffee and tea have the same effect upon the general system as the whip to the horse when he is pulling his best without the accompanist. Joseph the Seer said, "Tea and coffee are not named in the word, but they are included in the sentence, 'Hot drinks are not for the body or belly.'"—SAINTS' HERALD, vol. 49, p. 1170.

Who Should Know

Who had the best opportunity to know what was referred to in this word? In 1842, in the month of May, there seems to have been a lingering doubt in the minds of some people as to the real meaning of this text, as we find Hyrum Smith, Joseph's brother, intimately associated with him in the work, making this statement: "'Hot drinks are not for the body or belly.' There are many who wonder what this can mean; whether it refers to tea and coffee, or not. I say that it does refer to tea and coffee."—Times and Seasons, vol 3, p. 800. This, seemingly, should have settled the matter for all time to come, but it has not, and we still have the same questions to answer now as they did then.

Caffeine

Caffeine is a poisonous drug, the active principle found in the coffee berry, and in tea leaves where it is called "theine," which when taken into the system stimulates the nerves and leaves the system with a craving desire for more; and it is with difficulty that one habituated can resist the desire. While it is a slow poison and does not undo the brain power as liquor does, yet it will "get" the person who cultivates the habit, as stated in the Word of Wisdom, and why cannot we heed the warning?

I have had personal experience and know what I am talking about. I still like to smell coffee making at a distance and have no objection to its being close by now, as I have overcome the intense desire for it that I once had. It was said by one of old, speaking no doubt in the name of the Lord, "They hear me, but will not do." I know it is harder to make up the mind to want to do his bidding than it is to do that which we desire to do, regardless of what our heavenly Father has said.

Flesh

Here is another statement which seemingly is hard to understand. Some will not eat beef, chicken, or pork any time of the year and think those who do indulge are committing a great sin. So we are yet in the dark—the wilderness of ignorance. Let us note carefully the reading of the word on this point: "Flesh also, of beasts and of the fowls of the air, I, the Lord, hath ordained for the use of man, with thanksgiving. Nevertheless, they are to be used sparingly." Note this word sparingly which I italicized so that we would not lose sight of the fact as stated.

All to be used with thanksgiving, sparingly. What can that word mean? Sparingly, not lavishly, but frugally, moderately. The word spare was translated from the Latin word parco, meaning "to use frugally; not to be profuse; not to waste." (Webster.) Wisdom was translated from the Greek word sophia, meaning, "intelligent use of our faculties in that we do or say." Webster says: "The right use or exercise of knowledge."

It is hard for a person who has developed an appetite and desire for meat always to stop at the point of "prudence"; hence they make meat their main meal. Others look upon this act as a great sin, and yet they will gorge themselves with the gravy, or the egg of the fowl, so that often I have asked myself, Which is the greater sin? What is the difference between the meat and the gravy, or chicken and the egg? We lose sight of the main thought, I firmly believe; that is, all things were created for man, to be used wisely, prudently, sparingly, judiciously, not extravagantly or injuriously.

Having the power of discerning, judging, and determining between what is true and what is false, between what is fit and proper and what is improper, why should we as people stand so straight that we lean back, or be so weak as to lean forward too much to permit these plain statements to help to stand erect and make effective the Word of Wisdom to the temporal salvation of all Saints? It is not healthful to gorge oneself with meat or chicken at any time, cold or hot weather, but to eat sparingly, prudently, wisely, judiciously, with thanksgiving is wholesome and healthful.

The Season Thereof

This proposition is another hard question for some to solve. They understand that the canning of fruits is a sin and to eat that which has been canned is criminal. Now what are we going to do with this very important question? There are said to be only four seasons in the year, and that if we eat fruit outside of the time when ripe we are not observers of the Word of Wisdom. Is that so? Supposing we forget the common use of the word season, and ask ourselves the question, If we can eat the peach in August or September from the tree and are keeping the Word of Wisdom, and by scientific method are able to take the peach from the tree and keep it as good and wholesome by preserving it for a year or two or longer, would not that peach always be in season? If not, why not? Preserving fruit is of late origin. Forty years ago it was almost unknown. We dried our fruit and preserved it that way in those days.

If a thing is kept wholesome, what is the difference whether we eat it to-day or next spring? The peach is healthful, sound, and why not in the season thereof? If the word season only applies to the condition of the fruit, instead of the time of the year it is to be used, it strikes me we have the solution of this problem. But if it refers to the time of the year only when it should be used, then to conform to the Word of Wisdom, we should not use anything outside of the season of its developing, such as peaches, turnips, cabbage, parsnips, potatoes, beets, cane juice from which we make our sugar, or any other vegetables that we grow.

I hear you say, Why, no. Potatoes will keep all winter, and we could not do without them. That is true. So will the peach if put under proper environments, and it will be just as wholesome so far as man is able to discover as the potato or cabbage or any other vegetables. The word season, as found defined by Webster, as I have applied it, says: "To render palatable, or to give a higher relish to, by the addition or mixture of another substance more pungent or pleasant; as to season meat with salt; to season anything with spices." Third: "To render more agreeable, or less rigorous and severe; to temper; to moderate; to qualify by admixture." "Seasoning: That which is added to any species of food to give it a higher relish; usually something pungent or aromatic, as salt, spices, or other aromatic herbs, acids, sugar, or a mixture of several things."

The use of sugar would preserve the peach so that it would be seasonable any time of the year, thus keeping it from decay, keeping it sound and healthful, hence, why not in the "season thereof"? If we are out of harmony with the Word of Wisdom by canning, where are we if we dry the fruit or corn? Would it make any difference how the fruit or corn was preserved and kept seasonable, if we are to use it only in the growing season or at its maturity? And corn never would be in season as it gets too hard to eat when it matures, unless we crush it.

Shall we not use the words season thereof in the true and common-sense consideration, and let scientific research continue to present to us better methods of helping ourselves to what we need and what is useful for man? By the hand of man the peach is preserved and kept in season all the year around, and why should we dash away the opportunity of helping ourselves to that which would eliminate, to some degree at least, the pressure for cultivating the desire and habit for eating meat, when fruit cannot be obtained unless canned? Decayed fruits are not usable at any time; they are never in season; but fruit preserved is always in season. Often good people use sugar to sweeten fruit in what they call the season thereof, and why should it be any greater sin to put in a little more and cook it awhile so as to preserve it? Who can tell us?

Gospel Saves People

The gospel saves, preserves those who comply therewith, according to the Scriptures, and the question naturally arises, Are they as useful and enduring before the application of the gospel system as afterward? Jesus said, "He that believeth shall never die"; preserved by the gospel and made useful in time as well as for eternity.

The gospel system is an admixture of principles that change the human operations and activities, and make life so grand and sweet that man and woman really feel as though they had entered a new world. Yet man in his normal condition without the gospel can be of great service to his fellow creature and Jehovah, but in no way to be compared with the results of gospel obedience, followed with faithful service. It fits man for higher service and better results by the influence of the divine power working through the Holy Spirit, leading and endowing man with that which is unattainable otherwise.

Madame Curie, to whom is ascribed the credit for the discovery of radium, will soon visit America. A movement is on foot to present to her one gram, less than one twenty-eighth of an ounce, of radium. Yet this small amount is worth $100,000. It is suggested that she desires its use for experimental purposes, in connection with human health. The doctors are helping decidedly to raise the fund, though some suggest humorously it may result in throwing them out of employment; but the fact is the profession of a physician is one that works against itself, continually laboring to banish sickness and suffering from the world.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Our May Program

We are happy to present herewith the program for our May Institute.

With but very few exceptions everyone approached in regard to taking part accepted promptly, which fact betokens not only a splendid spirit of cooperation, but one reflecting real interest in the work of our department.

In connection with the program as outlined, plans are being perfected for a fairly comprehensive exhibit of educational charts, equipment for workers, a sample mothers' library, a baby's proper layette, records of Oriole work, and too many other things to mention here. A bookstand will carry a line of the church publications, for sale.

The executive has appointed committees who will look after the many details which mean so much to the success of a meeting of this kind. Outlines of the main addresses will be printed in advance and be available for distribution among the workers.

Sister Krahl is conferring with the health department heads in regard to selection of slides on subjects connected with the social purity division; Sister Mann is selecting charts, films, and slides to bear on her subjects, and none can afford to miss seeing and hearing that which Doctor Harrington has to present on social disease.

Miss Losh, who will talk on child welfare, is the executive secretary of the children's bureau of Kansas City, whose specific purpose is "to keep pre-school children well and bring them to school age with as few physical defects as possible." The bureau with which she is connected has a few well-defined methods of accomplishing their purpose, all of which are possible of local adoption in our branches. It should be our aim and delight, as women of the church, to see that the children of our branches are at or about par in every way.

Mr. Barden, who will address us on "The city beautiful," is secretary of the Independence Chamber of Commerce, and his talk will be accompanied by slides. Some years ago, when President Smith desired to arouse some pride in regard to the improvement of the town, he took a number of pictures of places which could stand attention of the kind. These have been displayed to our congregations in Independence, in connection with the work being done by the Laurel Club of that place. The Laurels, by the way, have offered an attractive prize for the most artistic picture of a landscape, an attractive nook or corner about the home grounds, or bit of nature loveliness, to be exhibited during our institute. If the weather man plays no more tricks, there should be plenty of opportunity to surprise Nature in some of her most beautiful moments before that time.

Now, let us impress this upon the workers of our department who read this column: If you can possibly arrange to attend this week's session of training in the work of our department, you should by all means do so. It is manifestly impossible for us to reach all of you personally, but we want you to know that every woman who is interested enough in our department to take the trip to Independence, bearing the expenses of travel, and devote a week of intense and serious consideration to our work with a view to carrying back to local or district some of the fruits she has gathered, is most decidedly welcome there! She needs what can be given her at that meeting, and we need what she can give afterwards!

Plan to arrive in time to register at our office some time during Sunday, the 15th, receive your badge, meet the entertainment committee, and form one of the body of "W. D. W." who will have a reserved section of the church at the evening service, when Brother Walter Smith will set the ball rolling for us! A special invitation is extended to all resident and near-by women to attend all of our sessions.

A Woman's Exercise

For some time we have been impressed with the thought that a woman could be induced to take regular physical exercises of value, if they were arranged in such a way that they could be taken in connection with her household labors. It is all very well to give a woman a set of exercises to be taken daily, requiring perhaps ten, twenty, or more minutes, but for her to be able to carry them out, when perhaps her first "alarm clock" in the morning is the crow of a wide-awake baby, with the three-year-old clambering out of bed, a husband anxious to get his breakfast and away, some school children to awaken, and food, clothing, and comfort to be bestowed on the entire "bunch" is quite a different story! Often from that moment until that other, some fifteen or twenty hours later, when she creeps, worn and fagged in body, mind, and spirit, to her couch of rest, there has not been any cessation in the demands made upon her time, attention, and labor.

And yet, who needs the strength and beauty of a symmetrical, vigorous, well-kept body more than just such a being? Who needs to more carefully guard the gifts of health, buoyancy, and elasticity? For the sake of the children she bears and to whom she bequeaths strength or weakness, she should care for her physical well-being wisely, and even in toil try to find that path which will develop and conserve instead of waste and destroy.

With some of these thoughts in mind, we appealed some time ago to Sister Clarke, who has responded with an article found in this issue, in which she has described some exercises which can be combined with household duties. Sister Clarke is the wife of our Brother Charles Clarke, who for years has been, in connection with his brothers, a leading acrobat with the largest circus company of the country. Sister Clarke herself was a most graceful equestrienne, and one who has developed highly her powers and strength of body. For ten or twelve years, however, she has devoted herself to her home and family and thus combines experience of both kinds. We are sure our readers will appreciate her contribution in this number.

Combining Household Duties With Healthy Physical Exercises

1. Dusting. For dusting the skirting board and all low articles, the heels should be almost touching, and the feet at an angle of forty-five degrees. Now lower the body until almost sitting on the heels, but let the weight of the body rest on the toes with the heels off the ground. Keep the body upright and do the dusting. Then rise to an upright position with the weight still on the toes, walk to next piece of furniture, and repeat.

2. Window Cleaning. As you clean towards the top of the window, rise very slowly (as high as possible) on to the tips of the toes, and as slowly descend. Do not bend the knees. The object of this movement is to strengthen the legs from the toes to the hips.

3. In Placing Articles on Shelves, Also in Dusting Walls, Doors, and All High Objects. Rise on the toe of the right foot, extend the right hand forward and upward (the higher the better, even to a very long reach). The chest should be thrown out and the left leg lifted at the back, with the knee kept stiff.

People should not get the habit of working with one hand only but should use arms alternately so that the body is developed evenly. This exercise reduces the stomach and waistline, and aids in developing the chest.

4. Walking Up and Down Stairs. For walking upstairs, keep the body erect and head in good poise, place the toe well on to the step, and as the body is raised lower on to the heel. In descending, step on to the toe and lower the body on to the heel.

Walking in this manner prevents strain on the internal organs, and helps in the attainment of a graceful carriage.

5. For Picking Up Articles. When stooping to pick up anything from the floor, place the feet together, with knees and body as stiff as possible. (Should be quite stiff.) Now bend the body from the hips, pick up the article, and regain an upright position with body erect, chest thrown forward, and the shoulders well back. This exercise strengthens the legs, back, and hips, and aids in reducing round shoulders.

6. Carrying the Wash Basket. In carrying the clothes basket, lift the basket until an upright position is gained, with the elbows pressed to the sides and the forearms at a right angle from the body. Allow the basket to rest somewhat against the body.

7. Hanging Out Washing. Stand with feet together, knees and body stiff. Bend forward from the hips, and at the same time exhale; pick up the clothes from the basket, and inhale as the body regains the upright position.

In hanging the clothes, extend the arms well above the head, at the same time rising on the toes, and taking a good deep breath, filling the lungs with fresh air. As the arms are lowered, exhale.

This exercise, while strengthening and developing the body, enlarges also the lungs, enriches the blood, and imparts vigor to the system.

8. Folding Clothes. In taking the large clothes off the line, one should never lose the opportunity of taking this arm exercise.

Always extend and stretch the arms as far apart as clothes will permit, making sure to take deep breathing exercise, as in hanging out washing.

Extending the arms in any direction is good exercise, but one should remember to keep the chest high.

9. Making Beds. Stand facing the side of the bed, half way between head and foot. Place the right hand on hip, and take the cover with the left hand. Now make a circular swing to the right, lifting the arm well above the head. At the same time step with the left foot over the right foot, which will enable you to bring the clothes well down over the bed rail.

Repeat till all bed clothes are removed. Of course alternate, and reverse the action to suit position of bed.

10. Kneeling for Scrubbing Floors, etc. In kneeling, kneel slowly until both knees touch the floor lightly and together. In rising, sway the body back, and rise with the sway. Do this without the aid of the hands.

11. Sweeping. In sweeping, keep the body erect, chest up, and do the sweeping with the arms.

These exercises may appear very simple, but if faithfully carried out and practiced, they will greatly aid in eliminating a lot of the drudgery of household work.

Child Welfare

What is our responsibility in the matter? When does that responsibility cease?

Our responsibility is not always measured by our desire nor our understanding. But ignorance of the laws of nature and society will never free us from the inevitable results of our neglect, if we fail to seek for light and understanding of the great task before us in the rearing and caring for the children in home, community, and church.

It has been said that nothing illuminates more searchingly the character of a State than the methods it utilizes in the upbringing of its young. Our responsibility then lies not only in doing the best we can, but in doing the best we can learn how to do. Child welfare covers such a wide field of endeavor that every woman should be willing to give some part of her time to some phase of the work.

I like to divide child welfare work into three parts, although one part is not more important than the other. First comes the home, and here we should employ every means to enable us to teach our children the harmonizing traits of character that will make Zion conditions possible. One woman said recently that what little she learned of the management of her children came largely through her mistakes, and she was filled with rebellion at the fact! To avoid serious errors let us accept collectively where we can, and individually where we cannot do otherwise, the line of study outlined by the leaders of our department, and study to show ourselves approved unto God as trainers of children.

Second is the community interest in child welfare work—a phase we cannot afford to shirk nor shun. It has always been said that "charity begins at home." This is true, but it is a very selfish charity if it stays there. Every child is born with a social instinct, and here the need for intelligent guidance is just as great as in the home. The woman whose home cares are not so numerous nor the demands upon her time so urgent can find in community work a task that needs her just as much as the work and training in the home needs the mother.

I often feel my heart swelling with gratitude to the woman who forms a part of my child's social life whether it be school-teacher, Sunday-school teacher, or whoever it may be, for I realize that she is cooperating with me.

Now the third—last but not least—one might think takes us a little farther from home. But let us see if it does. It is an interest in the legislative regulation of employment and laws for preserving the health of our children and citizens. We should know the laws of our city, State, and Nation, and be ready to understand when our help and influence are needed.

Since we are a Government by the people and for the people, we must remember that the Legislature seldom passes a bill on its merits, but by pressure brought to bear by the people. As citizens of this great country, we of all people should be able to use our influence intelligently. In giving our best to all things that have a claim upon us, let us not forget the war- and famine-stricken ones both far and near. Have we not all one Father? And is it his will that one of the least of these should perish?

As for the time when our responsibility ceases, I like sometimes to think that we are all just children grown tall, and if perchance times might come when our impulses are strong and our judgments are weak, may there always be some one near who can feel that her responsibility in our welfare never ceases!

If you ever have paid any attention to "the brush man," you may have been puzzled to discover what it was all about! Long brushes, short ones, wide and narrow, but the home where housework has been simplified has a brush for almost everything. Walls may be kept so free from dust that the decorator will be cheated; radiators so clean that neighbors will be puzzled; floors and ceilings, furniture and bath-room all are kept clean easily and quickly by the use of brushes designed for each place.

LETTERS

A Glorious Ingathering of Souls

Elder Macgregor tells of their successful meetings at Missouri Valley, Iowa, where to date 109 persons have been baptized.

Sometime last October, while conducting the campaign at Council Bluffs, where so many entered the church, a Sister McLean of persuasive eloquence came to our meeting and prevailed upon me to promise that I would go to Missouri Valley, Howbeit we had appointments out for Des Moines, and after ministering there a few weeks and baptizing ten we bent our course westward, purposing in due time to call at Missouri Valley.

A Strange Dream

Now it was while I was laboring in Des Moines that I received a very strange as well as annoying dream. I saw myself constructing a rough box sufficiently large to hold a casket, and yet it seemed that I was to use it for a watering trough.

For a while I wondered whether my days were numbered, and my last mortal remains were to be carried to the "city on the hill." There were some measurements given me in the construction of that rough box which added to my anxiety. It was that of "twenty-nine decimal one." I fully understood the significance of this. It pertained to my approaching gospel birthday in December when I would be twenty-nine years in the church and the "decimal one" would carry me a month beyond into the month of January.

Well, my worries were intensifying as I gloomily looked forward to January. The dream was "getting me" until I slept scarcely three hours a night.

Confiding my worries to Sister Margaret Davis, with whose family I abode while conducting the Des Moines campaign, I received much of consolation from that broad-minded sister.

I wrote also to my lifelong friend, Geordie Skinner of Saint Clair, telling him I thought "the jig was up," and asking for his prayers. From this spiritual brother I received a message of cheer, which gave me a grip on things material, and I moved along serenely, awaiting the inevitable month of January.

But He Survived

Well, January first came and went, and I still found myself on terra firma, which imparted a faint hope that the disconcerting rough-box obsession would pass away in a few days. As the hours came and went, hope increased, and I began to feel myself again.

About the middle of the month a communication from Carl Ballantyne, president of Missouri Valley Branch, urged upon me their desire for meetings. This was supplemented by encouragement from our valiant young missionary, Charles Putman, who had previously held a short series of meetings at this place.

Goes to "The Valley"

Accordingly I wrote the Valley folks, making them the proposition that if they would raise twenty-five dollars for immediate advertising I would be "on the job" by Sunday, January 30. Next day I received the stipulated amount, and accordingly the deal was closed for the coming "rough-box, watering-trough" experience.

I found the Valley Saints a bunch of willing workers, only waiting for the leadership of some one to lead them in the attack upon the strongholds of Babylon, that arch enemy of Christianity who for centuries has kept the world in the blighting bondage of unbelief, chained to the damnable doctrine of papal and Protestant priestcraft.

Not a Valley of Dry Bones

It was a joyous meeting, I assure you, that first Sunday in Missouri Valley. I went there somewhat hopeless of results, since many reports had come to me that the Valley was like that spoken of in prophecy, "the valley of dry bones." However, to fulfill my promise I was there to do my part, purposing to give it a few weeks trial and then away to other points more promising.

A full house greeted my first effort and the campaign was on. Strange to say, the crowd was better the next evening, and increased from night to night until we had to crowd the chapel with chairs. Every nook and corner was filled and the interest was intense.

The class of citizens attending was of the very best. We even had some of the preachers out although invariably one listening seemed to satisfy their morbid curiosity.

God's R-r-r-ripsaw

Everything was encouraging, and the Saints were beginning to dream. One good brother related how he saw the church surrounded by a lot of timber which had to be cut up into lumber. He started in with his bucksaw, but was told to never mind, that God had a man with a big buzz saw to do the work.

Astonishing! I always thought that the "buzzing" boast belonged to the more linguistic sex. "Buzz saw!" What a slam! One irreverent Saint thought the brother must have made an inexcusable mistake. She thought it was a r-r-r-ripsaw!

Things were going nicely, and as the baseball slab man would say, "Everything was breaking beautifully." Saints of former years were shedding their unkempt furs of indifference, while the outsiders were outnumbering them in attendance.

Two weeks after starting, we entered that "rough box," and surely it was a place for the burial of the dead—the old man with his sins. And just as truly it was a "watering trough," a place where the gospel thirsty might quench their thirst, at the waters of baptism.

Baptisms Twice a Week

Seventeen were in the first group baptized, followed by another seventeen a week later. After that it was two days a week, Wednesday and Sunday, and sometimes it was three.

We simply set the days and the people looked forward to them as fixtures.

Those were scenes long to be remembered. How the people flocked to our baptismal service, crowding around the sacred pool, while the great number of impotent folk were awaiting the troubling of the water. With what spirit they sang that song now so familiar to one and all:

"We will follow none but Jesus,
Jesus is the life, the way;
This the path in which he leads us,
This the gate to endless day."

And how courageously they swelled the notes when all together they sang:

"Fearless of the world's despising,
We the ancient path pursue;
Buried with our Lord, and rising
To a life divinely new."

Plenty Opposition

To be sure our success was exciting opposition. The Methodist parson circulated a scurrilous screed of foreign importation, with the request that it should be kept from the Latter Day Saints. But it reached the Latter Day Saints somehow, and in reply we published an open letter inviting the minister to meet the issues in debate. Needless to say the learned gentleman crawled and covered, protesting against the unholiness of debate but nursing the sanctity of slander.

The facts are, gentlemen of his class don't dare meet it.

In the meantime the meetings continued, the interest increasing the more we were opposed.

Services were held every night, Saturday alone excepted. Up to date one hundred and nine have been baptized, covering a campaign of ten weeks. Many others are at the door and the work of God rolls on.

In a demonstrative way I am made to sense that the hastening time is upon us, and what if it begins in this very region, spreading to all parts of the land. At all events there is a striking suggestion in the fact that this marvelous awakening at Missouri Valley occurs in the very locality where many of the old-time Latter Day Saints settled after the exodus from Nauvoo, when the church reached a parting of the ways.

About 175 Baptisms This Year

The last conference year has been particularly fruitful of results in my ministry, the greatest in my experience. Have baptized about 175. Never have I looked forward with such confidence of glorious ingatherings. The churches have lost their grip on the people, while Babylon is surely falling.

Our hour has struck. The day of our deliverance has dawned, and the tolling of that dispensational timepiece that marks the opening of Israel's era, knells with measured tones the passing of that apostate church whose errors of ages are recoiling before the triumphant arms of the army of the Lord.

It would be impossible for me to relate the many incidents marking the conduct of a campaign of such proportions. Suffice it to say that the Lord was working mightily, confirming the word as in days of old and emphasizing the truth in a way that brought conviction to the honest hearts.

Some Reasons for Success

I have been asked as to what were the contributing forces that made for the success of our campaign, and my answer is this: the generous and unstinted support accorded the missionary, giving into his charge the conduct of the campaign. Unhampered and unhindered, he was free to offer his suggestions; and choir, committees, and congregation vied with each other in carrying out the program prescribed.

Everything is working harmoniously. Our meetings are animated with that radiant light reflected from angelic rejoicing over so many who have turned from darkness to the marvelous light. If there is any happier place on earth than Missouri Valley, I should like to know it. It is the joy of returning children who, after groping in the wilderness of ignorance and unbelief, have at last found that light that illumines the way of the people of God.

And what an inspiration has gone all through this region of country. Everybody is calling for the preaching of the word. I am deluged with Macedonian calls. It just seems I could go anywhere and find a people for God. Our nights of failure are over, while the sunburst of opportunity was never so bright. I am constantly being asked when I am going to quit here. God only knows. While he continues to lead suppliant sinners to the water of life, it would be criminal to turn them away.

Happy and hopeful,

DANIEL MACGREGOR.

MISSOURI VALLEY, IOWA, April 16, 1921.

The Des Moines Register recently reports that the Medical School at Iowa City ranks third in the United States, and the Agricultural School at Ames ranks among the first anywhere.

Marguerite D'Alvarez, an operatic contralto, is stated to be the great-great-granddaughter of the last of the Inca princesses, according to a report printed in the Columbus Dispatch.

President Smith in Jerusalem

Experiences with guides and would-be guides in the Holy City.

E. A. S.: What a place for beggars and baksheesh hunters is Jerusalem! The streets in some quarters are lined with persons squatting against the walls, each with his begging cup, and all pleading, or wailing, or whining, or shouting for alms. Some are most pitiful-looking beings, and with their wailing wring from passers-by many milliemes.

But not all the beggars sit on the streets. Some of the shrewdest are fairly well-dressed fellows who hang around mosques, churches, and places frequently visited by tourists, and who suavely attach themselves to you and begin to give you information about various things. Two or even three will thus follow you, and in the end demand pay as guides. Really one must hire or secure a guide to protect oneself, for an ordinarily spoken "No" will not deter them, and sometimes little short of a flogging will detach them from your entourage. One day three boys (for boys ten to fifteen years old pose as guides) thus attached themselves to our small party just after we passed through the Jaffa Gate. I was out for some pictures and had an Austrian Jew, about eighteen years old, carrying my camera case. These lads kept asking us if we wanted a guide. Brother Williams said quietly, "No, we don't need a guide." But they stuck to us. As we entered David Street they were right alongside, and Brother Williams sharply said, "No, we don't want you." That checked them, but not for long; for as we turned into Christian Street, there they were right behind us, still telling their reasons why they should be taken along as guides. This time Brother Williams spoke a little more sharply, and we thought we were rid of them; but as we crossed one of the few open places within the walls, there were those little rascals not far away. I hadn't spoken to them yet, so I turned towards them, and though amused at their persistence and shrewd ways, I said as savagely as I could, "Heraus mit Ihnen!" And one little imp of about fourteen years of age saucily said, keeping at a safe distance (for they are used to being caned or stoned): "But you are an American and I do not speak German." But I jabbered some more German at him, and really succeeded in nonplusing the little rascal for a time. But shake them off we couldn't, and when we finally passed out of Damascus Gate, one of that bunch boldly came up to us and said he wanted to explain some of their conduct—and he did; but he didn't get a millieme from us.

I sometime ago learned that perhaps next to the Wailing Wall the worst place to be pestered by persons wanting baksheesh is around the mosques. So, though I was wanting to go to the Temple Area to do some photographing, I did not care to risk it without some one along who could talk Arabic and protect me from the importunate self-appointed guides and souvenir venders. In Brother Passman's classes are some young men who are native Palestinians, and these boys seem glad to take us around. So yesterday I arranged for a young man by the name of Micheal M. Jownedes to go with me.

We entered the Temple Area from David Street; that is we tried to, but were met at the old gate by a policeman who said the Mohammedans were praying and we would have to wait for fifteen minutes. We did, and then when we entered the area we were met by three or four who would have us believe that they were the real guides or that to them we must pay for the privilege of photographing. And right then the wisdom of having Micheal along was manifest. He laughed in their faces, joked them, and even plucked their beards. At first I feared there might be trouble and even fistcuff; but he knew his business. Not even when he pulled their whiskers did they "flare up," and soon they left us, and we proceeded to photograph. I spent a very pleasant hour or two there seeing and photographing. But I noticed Micheal kept close watch of the camera case. If I walked even a few feet away from it, he would quickly get it and bring it. "These are clever robbers around here," he said; "you must not leave it."

"Would these religious fellows steal?" I queried. "They're all robbers," he muttered. I wonder if he is right. My own experiences have not been such that I could deny his asseveration. Who is to blame? Jerusalem has long lived on tourists, and are most adroit in squeezing the last coin out. The methods of the churches in doling out alms hasn't helped to create independence and self-support. Everyone wants to live in the easiest way.

But Jerusalem is interesting in spite of all its drawbacks. It's a rich field for the antiquarian, and I hope that before many years there can be extensive excavations made, and thus settle many of the disputed points. But who is going to do the excavating? To-day I saw one or two samples of what excavating would reveal. Jerusalem is built on a heap of ruins. The Temple Area is paved, and the paving at present nearly on the level of the top of the East Wall. The ruins of five temples lie beneath the present Mosque of Omar. What a fund of antiquarian knowledge lies concealed in that heap. Even on Mount Zion some of the present buildings stand on rubbish. In the church marking the spot where the House of Caiaphas stood I saw where the floor had in several places been dug up, and several feet below the present floor the ancient one and the old mosaics were found. In a building north of the Damascus Gate, not far from Gordon's Golgotha, I to-day saw where some men a few years ago, digging with picks in the floor, had struck a mosaic. More careful work has uncovered one of the finest old specimens of floor mosaics I have seen. With the exceptions of a few places where the picks of the workmen destroyed small patches, it is in a wonderful state of preservation and shows the whole floor, perhaps twelve by twenty feet, to have been executed as one design. I hope to secure a photograph of it.

Well, enough for this time. FREDERICK M. SMITH.

Fanatics Common in Jerusalem

E. A. S.: Religious fanaticism of extreme type is by no means uncommon in Jerusalem. To attract more than passing notice a religious fanatic or even maniac has to do something quite startling or ferocious. It might be a safe guess that of persons who think they are the expected Messiah, Jerusalem has seen quite a number, while of the "two prophets" who are to die in the streets of Jerusalem I am told that there are some half dozen or so persons now in the city who are expecting that fate to be theirs. I have in the past, as you know, had letters or visits from many different individuals claiming to be "the one mighty and strong," "Baurak Ale," "Saint Thomas," "Saint Paul," and even the Christ. And I am told that in Jerusalem this class of individuals is quite large enough to form a legion; but so far as my experience goes the record was reached when a few days ago I received a visit (since repeated) from an individual who claims to be Moses, Elijah, and the Messiah all in one. Quite some claim, that!

The Plans of President Smith

E. A. S.: Yesterday we were able to make definite arrangements for returning to London. We have booked on S. S. Milano which sails from Alexandria April 23 for Naples. It is due Naples about April 28. From Naples our route lies through Rome, Florence, Milan, Switzerland, and France to London. As soon after reaching London as possible I shall take passage for the States. From London I shall let you know more definitely about when.

To-morrow Brother Williams and I expect to begin a journey which will take us to Haifa, Nazareth, Cana, Tiberias. We plan to be gone about six days.

Yours, FREDERICK M. SMITH.

Account of the Death of Elder Rees Jenkins

The Story of a good Samaritan.

E. A. S.: Some days ago I wrote you about some information concerning the death and burial of Brother Rees Jenkins. It was a brief account written by Mr. Forder, who was taken prisoner when Brother Jenkins was. I am sending you herewith copy of this account. Mrs. Moussa Jacobs had the paper, and kindly permitted me to copy it.

On reading this account I quite determined to visit Damascus, visit the grave, and make arrangements for having it permanently marked; but on making inquiry concerning train service I learn that it has been discontinued between Beirut and Damascus because of destruction of portions of the road by bands of belligerent Bedouins, and that carriage travel is uncertain and risky. I think it best, therefore, to ask Brother Passman to make this trip when conditions are better, and the Bedouins have been quieted or controlled.

Yours, FREDERICK M. SMITH.

JERUSALEM, PALESTINE, March 18.

Mr. Archibald Forder's Account of the Death of Rees Jenkins

Mr. Jenkins arrived in Damascus early in December, 1917, and visited me in my house about the 12th; he was very wet and cold the day he came and told me that he had no place in which to live, neither had he money to buy food with, or pay for lodging. I told him he could come and occupy one of my rooms, and he came the same day; I lent him a bed and blankets, and we ate together in my room, he sharing what I had, although it was half rations. About Christmas he contracted a heavy cold and was in bed about a week, during which time I looked after him, and he got well again, although he never really recovered from the cold. Early in the year 1918 he received some money from America, and was able to care for himself, although he still had my room, furniture, bedding, and other things. So far as I know he was not badly off for food; every morning I made his breakfast for him, as he complained of being giddy when he rose.

For a time he seemed to be better and ate well, going walking every day. In March he had a slight sunstroke which troubled him some, and I insisted on his stopping in bed for several days, during which time I cared for him, as I had nothing else to do. In April he caught a severe cold, for he had very little clothing, and he would go out in the wet for a walk; however, he got over the cold, but was very weak indeed. One morning he complained of headache and burning stomach. I saw that he had fever, which I thought was a result of the cold, so I doctored him with such remedies as I had, and he seemed better, but a day or two later he was down again and had no desire to get up. The fever continued, so I called in an English nurse friend of mine, and together we examined him, and found spots on his abdomen which we feared were typhus spots, so I called in a doctor who pronounced it a case of typhus, but he said all was being done that could be done, and it was best for Jenkins to stay under my care than to go to the Turkish hospital.

For a few days I fed him every hour on milk and brandy, washed him, and did all that was possible for him, and he seemed likely to pull through although very weak. As I was getting very tired with the constant nursing, the doctor suggested sending in a native woman to care for him, but no one wanted to be with a typhus case, and many blamed me for running the risk of getting the disease myself, but I meant to see the case through, no matter what happened.

On about the tenth day some of the neighbors told the authorities that I had a case of typhus in my house. They sent a doctor to see the case, and he ordered Jenkins to be moved to the hospital. I did my best to keep him in my house, but they sent men and had him taken to the hospital which was about two miles out of the city. I went with him, and saw him put in a ward with several others; the long shaking in the wagon tired him and he was much exhausted on reaching the hospital. I bribed the attendant in charge of the ward to let me stay a time and feed him on milk and brandy, and he seemed to pull round sufficiently to recognize me, and to understand where he was. About evening I left him, promising to return early next morning to get what was necessary; meanwhile the attendant promised to look after him and feed him as I had done. Early next morning I was at the hospital, but my patient was not there. He had died during the night and his body had been sent away with others to be buried. No one could tell me where the dead were disposed of, but after several hours searching I found that his body had been thrown into a pit with others and left to decompose. I got men and recovered the body, had a coffin made, and buried the remains in the Protestant cemetery in Damascus. Over the grave I erected a wooden cross bearing the name, and date of decease. The authorities revisited my house and took away all the clothing and bedding that had been used by the patient and burned them, not giving any compensation.

On my return to Jerusalem in November, 1918, I handed to Mrs. Jenkins such few things as I had been able to keep, together with a small sum of money that was left over, after paying the few expenses. I did my best for the poor fellow, for we were fellow sufferers in a strange land, and I am glad that I was able to do my best although things turned out as they did. I feel sure that had Jenkins been left in my care, he would have pulled through, but being a prisoner myself I could not resist the authorities in their action in removing him. He died on May 9, 1918.

When the Herald Office Moved to Lamoni

[Elder W. H. Deam was in the employ of the Herald Office for twenty-two years, and kindly furnishes us with the facts in connection with that move.

In the Lamoni Stake Number, in referring to the Herald Publishing House, we were under the impression that new machinery was secured. Brother Deam, however, corrects that impression in a letter just received, and states the real reason for the purchase of a new engine. Also the reason for the low appraisal of machinery at Plano.—EDITORS.]

Having been in the employ of the Herald Office from March 18, 1872, to June, 1894, a little over twenty-two years, I have a pretty good knowledge of the development of the office during that time. In moving to Lamoni there was nothing new added to the outfit except the 8-horse engine and boiler. I had charge of the machinery. I left Plano the 6th of October, and almost immediately after arriving in Lamoni I started work on the machinery. Brother Blakeslee had purchased the engine and had it there on time. We set up the engine and boiler and then the Taylor press for printing the HERALD, and later the Campbell Complete press for the book printing. The Campbell press had been used in Plano about three years. The old Franklyn hand press was turned in as part payment on the Campbell. I printed many posters on the old hand press.

The reason the first outfit for press and type cost so little was because it was all a secondhand outfit from a country printing office which I believed had failed. The same outfit now new would probably cost about $1,500.

I want to mention the beautiful little engine left in Plano because of its being too small to run both presses at once. It was made by Brother Cyril E. Brown of Fall River, Massachusetts, and I believe was donated by him to the Herald Office. It was a beauty, being all polished iron and brass, and the boys took delight in keeping it shining. But it had one fault—it had no governor, and we had to regulate the speed by the throttle. As the steam went down we would have to open the throttle more, and vice versa.

Brother T. J. Patrick was one of the very early typos with William D. Morton. W. H. DEAM.

Church Dedication at Leichhardt

Dedication of church building at Leichhardt, New South Wales, Australia.

On August 8, 1920, the above branch dedicated its church building to the service of our Lord and Master, it being exactly eleven years to the day since a small band of Saints ventured to organize a branch of which a membership of over one hundred is now the result, with the building of which photo is herewith inclosed.

The branch owes its existence to Elders J. Parkes and J. Thompson and their families who are still among its members.

Special services were held throughout the day, commencing with a sacramental service at 9 a. m. to which the Saints came fasting. A large majority were present and testified to the blessings of the day, the joy of the occasion, and the presence of the Spirit of our Master.

The Sunday school convened at 10.30 a. m. under the superintendency of Brother Leberz. The session included speeches, recitations, and bright singing which were enjoyed by all present.

The afternoon service was well attended at which a review of the history of the branch was given by all the past presidents and Sisters Parkes and Thompson, sr., all telling of their experiences, their joy in being able to attend the services, and thankfulness to God for his guidance and blessings.

The evening service was the official dedication of the church. This service was largely attended by Saints and friends, and added to by a large choir and orchestra who ably rendered the anthem, "Apostasy and Restoration," words by R. C. Evans and music by J. Parkes, sr.; also an anthem composed by J. T. Gresty, together with hymns suited to the occasion.

The honor of handing over the title, deeds, and keys was entrusted to our faithful worker, Brother J. Parkes, sr., who after a few remarks officially, as trustee, handed the deeds and key to Bishop G. Lewis, who responded to the Saints of the branch appropriately, and in turn handed them to Deacon P. Laurie, who promised to faithfully fill his office to the best of his ability. Brother W. J. Haworth, seventy, offered the dedication prayer to God, asking that the building may be a sanctuary to the blessing of the young and old, rich and poor, sick and strong. Bishop Lewis then preached a short sermon. The power of God was experienced by all present at the services held, and blessings were received by many.

Baker-Adams Debate

Some striking arguments and theories.

The debate with Almus Adams of the Church of God and A. M. Baker of the Reorganized Church is now a thing of the past. The discussion was largely attended. Mr. Noah Wheat acted as chairman. Mr. C. Herron moderated for Mr. Adams and the writer acted in behalf of Brother Baker. The following propositions were debated:

Proposition One: "Man is wholly mortal and unconscious between death and the resurrection." Mr. Adams labored hard to show that man was composed of this earth altogether, quoting Ecclesiastes 9:5, "the dead know not anything." Brother Baker proved that this scripture could not be taken independent of all other scripture, for it would prove too much, even do away with the resurrection, as it says "neither have they any more a reward." So it is evident Solomon had reference only to the death of the body, for this same writer declared that at death the body returns to dust and the spirit returns to God (Ecclesiastes 12:7). It was shown that if man were wholly mortal, the things of this earth would satisfy his desires, but man may be supplied with everything this earth supplies and there is a longing desire that has not been satisfied. Mr. Adams thought because the record declared that God formed man of the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, if God intended to endow man with an eternal spirit he would have said so in this account of creation. But it was shown that at the time Mother Eve was made from one of Adam's ribs, nothing was said about breathing into her nostrils the breath of life. Mr. Adams tried to show that the spirit in man was nothing more than air or atmosphere. Brother Baker then brought up several passages showing how we would have to read them if his theory was true. Where the Bible says, "God is a spirit," we would have to read it, "God is wind." In Luke where it says, "Jesus was begotten by the Holy Ghost," Mr. Adams would say "wind." So finally Mr. Adams was told he would have to use his "air pump" upon Mother Eve in order for her to have the breath of life. Brother Baker quoted Zechariah 12:1 where it says God formeth the spirit of man within him. Mr. Adams surely failed to prove this proposition.

Proposition Two: "There is a spirit in man which remains in a conscious state between death and the resurrection." Brother Baker affirmed this proposition for three nights. He proved that man was made in the image of God and that his spirit preexisted with God. That this body is a house in which we live—a tabernacle. Man is of a dual nature—the outward and the inward man—and both men must be fed, not only with bread but with the word of God. To prove the conscious existence of the spirit in the intermediate state, Brother Baker brought up the story of the "rich man and Lazarus, the souls under the altar, Paul going to paradise, the thief upon the cross, and Christ preaching to the spirits in prison. At the close of this proposition the people were very anxious to vote upon it, but no vote was taken.

Proposition Three: "The kingdom spoken of by Daniel 2:44 is yet future and will be established at the second coming of Jesus." Mr. Adams does not believe the kingdom of God has ever been established, but Brother Baker showed from Colossians 1:13-18 that Paul was in the kingdom, also quoted Revelation 1:7 where John was in the kingdom and tribulation. The kingdom suffered violence (Matthew 11:12). Men pressed into the kingdom (Luke 16:16). Also the kingdom was taken away from the Jewish nation and given to a people bringing forth the proper fruit (Matthew 21:43). Mr. Adams is a splendid twister when it comes to the scripture, but with all his twisting he fell down on this proposition also.

Proposition Four: "The kingdom spoken of in Daniel 2:44 has already been established and is now in existence." Brother Baker proved that this "little stone" had to commence to roll in the days of the ten toes—too late now because two of the toes have already been smashed—Germany and Russia. It was proved this was a preparatory work, that Elias must come and that the ensign must be raised for the gathering of the Jews; also a gathering work must be commenced among the Gentiles. (Isaiah 11:10, 11.)

Proposition Five: "The church of which I, Almus Adams, am a member is in harmony with the New Testament in order, doctrine, and practice." Mr. Adams absolutely failed to do anything on this proposition. Brother Baker headed him off in the very start, showing that he had no divine authority to operate—no revelation. He admitted he got his authority from Mark 16: "Go ye into all the world." Brother Baker read it over carefully and said, "Brother Adams, I don't see your name here. You certainly are in a bad row of stumps to go back several centuries and steal the commission of dead men before you have any right whatever to exist as a church." Brother Baker advised Brother Adams the next night his church would have to come out of its hiding if he had to drag it out. Well, he had to drag it out, to the amusement of the congregation. Brother Baker read from their church paper, issued by the Restitution Publishing Co., that they started up just a little while before the Civil War, founded by Benjamin and Thomas Wilson; that during the Dark Ages the truth had been upon the earth. Another one of their tracts was read from, showing there had been a complete apostasy. Mr. Adams denied the editor, Mr. Huggins, as being sound in the faith, although he had written letters to their paper as a contributing editor as "Dear Brother Huggins." Anyhow it was shown that his church was out of harmony with the New Testament organization, having only evangelists, elders, and deacons, and they were all man-made. This was illustrated with a chart representing the body of a man. The eyes were punched out, one limb was cut off, and an old wooden crutch took its place. This represented their evangelists; the other limb was severed below the knee and a cork leg was supplied. This was the church that is going to meet Jesus when he comes—a regular sham. Mr. Adams not only wanted man to be dead, but he wanted a dead church also.

Proposition Six: This was similar to the one above, bringing in the claims of the Reorganization. About all that Mr. Adams could do was to ask for a sign. The usual arguments were made, showing our church to be in complete harmony with the New Testament. No doubt some of the people showed their prejudices on both sides of the questions during the debate, but we believe good was accomplished and are willing to leave the verdict with God.

Two-Day Meetings in Boston

First of a series in the Massachusetts District.

Saturday and Sunday, April 16 and 17, marked the opening of the two-day meetings of our district with the Saints of Boston, made famous for its B. B. B. (Boston Baked Beans), with apologies to Daniel Joy, of Providence, the baker, and S. A. Burgess, who lectured "as one having authority" on "The bean," at Independence.

Boston is presided over by Elder Edward L. Traver, and is quite conspicuous by its ever generous and ready welcome to the entire district.

Boston has solved the problem of holding its young and directing their youthful power and abilities into proper channels of usefulness.

On Saturday at 3 p. m. the initial service was opened by our district president, C. Ed. Miller, assisted by Patriarch Richard Baldwin and Elder Leon Jordan. Susie Sinclair was appointed secretary. Brother Miller elected chairman of the publicity committee and F. S. Dobbins chosen assistant.

President Miller presented for our consideration, "What do you think we should cover in these two-day meetings?" Interesting remarks by E. L. Traver, Richard Baldwin, Lucie Sears, and C. Ed. Miller were offered and summarized, and were to the effect that these movements should be of a local character rather than district movements, that three branches might meet in such meetings until the entire district had been covered.

Doctor W. A. Sinclair gave a wonderful lecture on biology, or the science of living things. He is a very unusual man with exceptional gifts, one who we trust in days to come we shall value for what he really is, for this district should be congratulating itself that he is ours to be enjoyed.

At the evening service on Saturday Herman Chelline, Religio field worker spoke of this department and the period of transition through which it is now passing.

The Women's Department was represented by Lucie Sears, who spoke briefly on "Our girls," the keynote of which was organized play means organized work. She then called upon Eva Toombs, who has charge of the girls at Providence, Rhode Island, who spoke in a consecrated manner on "The great get-together spirit."

Patriarch Richard Baldwin delivered a special talk on our young, accompanied by an outpouring of the Spirit of the Master.

At 9.30 Sunday morning Lucie Sears read a paper from the Attleboro Temple Builders who have as a slogan, "Best service to all." We must be sure to have the right kind of objective, for all of our organized efforts, one detrimental to none but beneficial to all. Beatrice Maguire read a paper, "Just a pillowcase." Child welfare was spoken of by Sister Sears.

Bishop M. C. Fisher represented the financial arm of the church and called our attention to just one possibility of the organized class work, one such class having filed their inventories and paid their tithing.

We met with the local Sabbath school at eleven.

The social service at 2.30 was the most successful service we have ever witnessed. Why? Our district president did not permit any confusion. It was imperative that front seats be filled first and those who came late were not permitted to come to the front or disturb the meeting in any way. The Spirit is very tender, and under this admirable management was in evidence in a wonderful outpouring, many outsiders being present, including one clergyman. The very young arose and performed as only boys and girls can do under spiritual power. The voice of the Master came in power and much assurance through Richard Baldwin, Sister G. D. Sinclair, and Ethel Booth.

The closing sermon was by Richard Baldwin and needs no comment, for this man walks very close to God.

FRANK S. DOBBINS,
For Publicity Committee.

Providence Moves Forward

The work in Providence moves forward with a well-sustained interest in all departments. Our city missionary, E. J. Gleazer, has recently been transferred to Boston, and his going will be felt keenly in Providence. However, the local members of the priesthood are working diligently, and we trust will in a measure be able to compensate for their loss by their increased activities.

We have had several very profitable priesthood meetings lately, at which various phases of branch activities were considered in papers and discussions.

The Providence Branch is conducting four missions now, in East Killingly and New London, Connecticut, Hope and West-erly, Rhode Island.

The women's department meets each Monday in a study class, with Sister Georgie Spinnett as teacher.

The Religio department has taken on renewed activity since the first of the year. Raymond Garlick is superintendent, and is ably supported by Duncan Suttill as boy leader, and Eva Toombs as girl leader. The Religio meets Friday evenings, and provides some very instructive and entertaining programs.

In the Sunday school department the young men's class is organized and is working with good effect. Edmund Brown is teacher and Charles Cockcroft is president. The class recently observed ladies' night, and had an attendance of about sixty young people in the basement of the chapel.

Each Sunday morning the young people meet for prayer service preceding the preaching service. At the young people's meeting Easter Sunday morning an inspiring message was delivered through our pastor, Elder Suttill. Three young men were called into the Aaronic priesthood and one into the Melchisedec priesthood.

Our district president, Brother C. Edward Miller, delivered his series of illustrated Book of Mormon lectures last week. Brother Miller has been working diligently for a long time, going through the district delivering his lectures. His lectures are very instructive and highly inspirational.

On April 6, in addition to the lecture, we enjoyed a short address by Elder William Bradbury, one of the pioneers of the work in this city. It must be very gratifying for those who have seen the work rise from its infancy, pass through "the slippery paths of youth," and become a strong branch of this great church, whose influence radiates through the regions round about.

For the benefit of any Saints or friends in southeastern Connecticut or southwestern Rhode Island, we wish to announce that services are held in New London at 312 Bank Street, at 2.45 p. m. and in Westerly at 4 p. m. 6 George Street, on Sundays.

H. A. CHELLINE,
Publicity Agent.

Progress at Owen Sound

It is some time since I wrote the HERALD, and it seems that the first thing I should do is to express my sincere thanks and appreciation for the inspiring message contained in its pages.

The work in Owen Sound is going strong, so also are the workers. God has wonderfully blessed our work here.

Just one year ago we purchased a church building lot for $1,200, and inside of the year we have raised this amount and our plans are now under way to build the church.

The work for years in Owen Sound was held back because of prejudice, and ignorance of our teachings. Both pulpit and press were bitterly against us. But we have lived to see the walls of prejudice break and crumble away, and just today one of the leading editors of this city spoke to me and asked me if I would give him some news of our building plans, and our prospects for the future. The result was that we had a real nice write-up in to-day's paper—a real boost. We well remember the day when this same man would have been paralyzed with indignation were we to approach him on a matter of this kind.

We have our work well arranged and our priesthood are working unitedly together. We have been requested by the pastor, Benson Belrose, also the rest of the priesthood, to ask all missionaries who expect to visit our branch at any time (and we will love to have them with us) to try to send us word some time beforehand so that we can make arrangements accordingly.

We intend to write all who have ever been members of this branch and who have moved away, to come to our assistance at this time with a generous subscription for our building fund, and we expect a hearty response because there have gone out from this branch some of the best men and women that ever lived—noble and true.

There are at present about fifteen or twenty families of Saints here—about one hundred members; not very many, but we expect to do much.

Wishing the HERALD every success in its new home (when it gets there).

Sincerely yours,

R. J. WILCOX.

Church Anniversary Day in Philadelphia

Planting as well as reviving done in the City of Brotherly Love.

Splendid interest was in evidence at all services yesterday, some of which tested the seating capacity of what is becoming known as "the little church on the corner that's doin' things."

The Sunday school easily led in attendance but the sacrament service was the largest held in months, and afforded much inspiration and encouragement to all who were present.

Another impressive baptismal service was held on Sunday afternoon, and at the close of the evening service an elderly lady presented her name for this ordinance, which will be attended to on Thursday night.

Anniversary Day was observed on Sunday night by the singing of appropriate hymns led by the large choir and orchestra, followed by the special joyous Easter music of the week before, which made an appropriate prelude to the fine discourse of the evening by our pastor, Brother Osler, on the prophetic record, leading up to the restoration of the gospel, closing with a brilliant description of the scenes surrounding the inception and founding of our work.

It is evident that the Saints, and especially the young people, intend to continue in the good endeavor to plant the gospel seed in Philadelphia.

Brother Williams did much planting while here as well as reviving, and it remains for us to keep on cultivating until the real harvest is ready. In the meantime, we are speeding the plow.

A. N. HOXIE.

April 6 at Saint Leonard's

For some time now it has been our custom to hold a short devotional service each evening immediately after tea, each taking it in turn to read, make a few comments if thought fit, and to pray. These short services have brought to us a sense of the continuity of consecration, since we every day present before the Lord the work of the church generally, the mission, and Saint Leonard's, and seek to devote ourselves afresh to the part of the work given us.

At the suggestion of Brother Fry we last evening held a short celebration service, and since we had so enjoyable a time I am sending you the program drawn up by Brother Fry. Elder Daniel B. Sorden in charge:

Hymn 158, "Redeemer of Israel."

Reading, Daniel B. Sorden, "Oliver Cowdery's account of the reception of the Aaronic priesthood." (Church History, vol. 1, pp. 37-39.)

Reading, Pearl Crick, "Promise of Melchisedec priesthood." (Church History, vol. 1, p. 60.)

Reading, F. Henry Edwards, "Organization of the Church." (Church History, vol. 1, pp. 76-77.)

Reading, Gladys S. Sorden, "The Lord's estimate of his church." (Doctrine and Covenants 17:1; 1:5.)

Prayer, Charles Fry.

Hymn 206, (Praises) "The Angel Message."

Comments were made on each section.

There were six adults present, and young Brother "Jimmy" Crick, and as we reviewed the blessings granted a similar number nearly a hundred years ago, our determination to merit a similar outpouring was crystalized, our outlook was clarified, our hopes and our aspirations purified.

Your brother,

LONDON, ENGLAND.

F. HENRY EDWARDS.

Council Bluffs and Vicinity

Organized for Zion Builder Services to be held in May.

The musical institute proceedings have been so fully and excellently reported by Brother A. H. Mills that I will only say of it that it was much appreciated, but left several wearied Saints, wearied even in well-doing, for all did well.

The priesthood gathering of the four districts, two in Iowa, and two in Nebraska, was very profitable. The only objections to it in any wise was that there was too much meeting to enjoy them all. It is true that we can have too much of any good thing, but I am not in accord with the idea that we can be "too good." The visit of Brethren Leonard Harrington and S. A. Burgess was somewhat of an inspiration in itself. Their work was excellent. I anticipate that the proceedings will be more fully reported by the secretary of the meeting.

Sister P. T. Anderson has finally concluded to join her husband in the Scandinavian Mission, and expects to start in about a week. She makes a great sacrifice, but the children who are left behind have made an equal sacrifice, sacrificing father and mother for the gospel's sake. A surprise was executed by the sisters of the branch on Sister Anderson, when about twenty met, brought their good will and a lunch, and spent several cheerful hours in social converse, with talks and music, and the lunch. But the last was equally as good, for the good will consisted in material assistance, as well as well wishes, which will assist the sister to enjoy her extended trip more pleasantly.

Brother J. F. Green of Tabor is improving slowly at the hospital, and is being very satisfactorily cared for. He desires the prayers of all the Saints.

The Sunday schools of the central church as well as the mission are improving. At the Central church the superintendent gave the school over to the immediate control of the boys from the intermediate and junior classes last Sunday. A boy was in charge, another offered prayer, another presided at the organ, another was chorister, and then there was a piano solo with piano accompaniment by two other boys. They did well. A day is soon to be given to the direction of the girls.

The orchestra was well represented at the Riverside Mission last Sunday evening, both at the Religio and church services. This has added interest to the mission work. Improvement is being made in a very perceptible way. In the Belmont Mission a great effort is being made to increase the interest by visiting the sick and afflicted, the discouraged and out of the way, and in the securing of a piano which will be a great improvement, as a help to all the services.

At the Riverside Mission fasting and prayer was engaged in at the suggestion of the one in charge, Brother G. J. Harding, and since that time there has been a noted improvement. The same thing is being suggested to the workers at Belmont Mission. This is evidence of trust in God in a very appropriate and effectual way.

We are informed that a junior orchestra has been organized, and is making marked improvement. The commands of God are being fulfilled by both young and old. The special meetings now being prepared for the branch, especially the young of the branch at the suggestion and under the supervision of the branch presidency, is making great headway—a special report of its progress following, made by the secretary of the organization arranged for these services.

Organization for Young People's Meetings

The "Zion Builders" of Council Bluffs are actively marshaling their forces preparatory to the special meetings which are to be arranged for beginning May 8 and lasting until the 15th inclusive.

It is planned to hold a young people's prayer service every Thursday evening intervening.

Committees are actively at work sowing the seeds of enthusiasm. The territory has been divided into eight groups. Each of these groups is to be presided over by a committee of five, having for its chairman one of our active young men. The duties of these committees are to canvass the district, advertise the meetings, and urge attendance. Also to distribute admittance cards. Some four hundred fifty of these cards are to be issued to the young people between the ages of ten and forty years upon their promise to attend at least six out of the eight services.

The chairmen of these committees met Sunday afternoon at 5 p. m. with the branch presidency, and judging from the seriousness with which each accepted the responsibility placed upon him, (not one declining to act) we cannot but feel they will be successful in procuring the desired results.

The work of these committees is not to be confined to Council Bluffs alone, but is to be extended to Omaha, South Omaha, and all outlying branches in the district.

We have great hopes for what may be accomplished through our special Thursday evening prayer services. We believe these are what are needed to impress upon the young the responsibilities which they must sooner or later assume.

Zion Builder Services a Success

Word from Toronto indicates much enthusiasm over the recent meetings for Zion Builders. In a letter from the committee by J. R. Grice to President E. A. Smith, we note this:

"The Zion Builders of Toronto desire to express to you their kindly greeting at the opening of their services for young people. We feel that our services have been a success and much credit is due yourself and to the two thousand young people of Independence and Lamoni whose prayers we knew were ascending for us daily.

"Brother Williams won the hearts of the young people from the very first, and his sermons were soul stirring to say the least.

"We feel that the young people of Toronto more fully sense their responsibility and that there is a manifest devotion to duty and an intense desire to serve not felt previous to these services. The experiences passed through during preparation awakened a desire among the Saints, thus "Building Zion" in very truth.

"We pledge ourselves to a full consecration and for assistance in redeeming Zion. We wish to 'Answer "yes" when He calls.'"

Colorado Springs, Colorado

Just a few words that you may know the work here has taken a decided impetus. Our little church is now too small for comfort, and we are talking of building or buying larger quarters. Three baptisms recently, all adults, and more to come soon. On April 3 I had the pleasure of uniting in marriage Elder Arthur Morse and Sister Angeline Merriman. At nine o'clock in the morning we repaired to the Cathedral Spire in the Garden of the Gods and there said the words that made them one; very beautiful and picturesque surroundings.

The funeral service of Clifford Smith, who contracted tuberculosis while in Government service during the late war, was held yesterday, April 10. The American Legion gave an impressive military funeral. He leaves a wife, Sister Minerva Gates Smith, a mother, Sister Florence Dickney, and a sister, Dorothy. Brother J. D. Curtis offered prayer and I preached the sermon.

The district decided at last reunion to purchase permanent reunion grounds, and we have found just the ideal grounds; nearly seven acres of grove near Cheyenne Canyon, here in Colorado Springs. The scenery, air, and water are, we think, unexcelled in the world. Brother Tabor, Brother Curtis, and the brethren here after much thought, prayer, and examination of different locations decided that this location is the best we could possibly get.

Reunion is expected to convene August 13 to 21, and we hope to see many of the brethren and sisters from the East and West. Colorado Springs is 6,500 feet above sea level; has a population of about 35,000; sunshine on an average of 300 days in the year; pure mountain air, and the best of pure mountain spring water. Come to Colorado Springs for your vacation and enjoy a feast of spiritual food.

We are all much gratified to hear that Elder Wixom will be in our district this year. In bonds,

WARRINGTON, LANCASHIRE, ENGLAND.

Editors Herald: I am pleased to say that the Lord is good to all in this part of his vineyard. Little did I think when as a boy I played on the steps of the Utah church in Islington, Liverpool, that it would be my lot in life to be on the side of truth and fight for the true principles of Christ, but truly "God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform." Now for fifteen years, after a severe struggle at first, I am pleased to be in the fighting line of the Lord.

Our branch here has gone through some troublous times, almost slipping to zero, but thank the Lord "He guides us with unerring hands," and we are pleased to say now that it is a happy branch. We have a Sunday school of sixty, well officered with Brother G. Shingler as superintendent, and Brother Burley secretary. Our teachers, Sisters Kate and Evelyn Fleming and Olive Chandler, are all alive to their duties; also a sisters' auxiliary class under the able leadership of Sister Smythe, and a Religio under the guiding hands of Brethren Stephen Smythe and Andrew Fleming, jr.

Our branch president, Brother Chandler, is all that can be desired, active, alert, and ready at all times for the furtherance of the Lord's work.

I may say that the fight here has been no easy one. A little over twelve months ago, we were served with a notice to quit our premises or buy. At the time there were only a very, very few active Saints, but the faithful ones who sensed the value of the Lord's work pooled their all, and were able to put £100 down, and so secure their little Bethel; so in the future the young Saints are assured that it is in the power of no man in the world to say, "Get out."

With best wishes to all the Saints of the Lord,

ANDREW FLEMING.

INGRAM, WISCONSIN, April 16, 1921.

Editors Herald: I am longing to hear from some sister of the church. We live in the northern part of Wisconsin and it is very lonely here with no church privileges. We are all very poor, yet try to raise our families the best we can. We have two small ones at home that are anxious to read some of your Sunday school papers. My son is fourteen and daughter, ten. Perhaps some have these papers that do not care for them, and we would appreciate them very much.

MRS. DENNIS HURD.

DAZEY, NORTH DAKOTA, April 1, 1921.

Editors Herald: The past winter has been ideal. No real bad storms, and autos have been able to run for short distances all winter and for the greater part of the time traffic has not been hindered. Very little zero weather. This is in sharp contrast with the winter one year ago, which will be remembered for years by those who had part in it. With fearful hearts the farmers are preparing to seed. Not many are hiring help, or branching out, but are trying to put in what they can without contracting debt. It is almost impossible to obtain credit. Most of the farmers must buy seed, owing to the black rust the previous summer. With the common enemies to fear, such as rust, drouth, hail, and in eastern Montana last year a grubworm and the grasshopper, adding to this the violent storms, it is easy for us to feel it is a time of peril, of pestilence, of famine, etc. Many people are leaving the Northwest, and few are moving in, but will conditions be much better in other parts of the world for any length of time? Most of the farmers sold their wheat the past year for from $1.25 to $1.50 a bushel, which did not pay the cost of production. Judging from the situation in this part of the country, it seems it would be wise for Zion to prepare for a time of famine, even as Joseph did in Egypt years ago.

We have rejoiced much in reading of the revivals or young people's meetings. We feel that if our young people are praying, are working for Zion's upbuilding now while they have time, while the cares of this life do not rest heavily upon them, surely Zion's redemption is not far distant. Here in Dazey there are two churches, Methodist and Lutheran. In the Methodist church when they have regular preaching or prayer services only a few are present. In fact they have almost discarded the prayer service as nonessential. When they have stereopticon views the church is crowded. Dancing and card playing are a great part of the life of the members. We are thankful our church is a place of prayer for the young.

In bonds, MRS. C. B. FREEMAN.

SPERRY, OKLAHOMA, April 11, 1921.

Editors Herald: We have new courage to press on. We had some fine sermons by Elder Hubert Case, which were very much appreciated by all. We have a real live Sunday school; last Sunday there were 102 in attendance—most all children and half nonmembers. Our school has outgrown our church, so we are building an addition which is almost completed. Had a very spiritual sacrament service on Sunday morning and a good sermon Sunday evening by Elder Peter Adamson, sr.

We have a fine band of women who have done a wonderful work the past year. They have helped the poor and put new seats in the church, also linoleum on the floor, installed light fixtures, and have given one hundred dollars on the new building.

We would not forget the Sunshine girls. They have done a lot of good, including furnishing presents for the orphan children at Christmas time; also raised forty dollars for the new building. They have a nice library started, with about forty church books, and are planning on getting all of the church books.

We expect some to enter the kingdom before long.

WARD P. RUMSEY.

NEBO, ILLINOIS, April 11, 1921.

Editors Herald: Recently while down at our county seat, Hardin, Illinois, I had an interesting experience. After transacting some legal business and really as I thought ready to go home, while in the State attorney's office, county superintendent of schools, and several others being present, there suddenly somehow arose the question of some of our past experiences with anti-Mormon polemics.

One Reverend Sages, a one-time Presbyterian pastor, in a lecture said Joseph Smith and Solomon Spalding together got up the Book of Mormon; that Joseph Smith would daily bring home the manuscript and read to his wife and children. Of course Joseph was only eleven years old when Solomon Spalding died—quite young to grow to manhood, court, marry, have a family, and render such assistance to Spalding.

We called attention to the present brilliant record of the Smith family, and their unchallenged sterling characters, in contrast to the epithets of "Old Joe Smith" and the like, many

Library Work

The library work of the church has been delegated to the Department of History, and all inquiries bearing on that line should be addressed to the Historian.

No radical change will be made in methods now in use in the library work. The important thing is to get good books and then to get them read.

At church headquarters an effort is being made to build up complete files of all books and periodicals ever published for or against the church. If you have books or papers that you will give, lend, or sell to the church, write the Historian, giving a list of what you have.

It is also urged that everything appearing in the press either for or against the church should be clipped and sent in. Such clippings develop most valuable historical data. Will you cooperate?

times coming from the ignorant and uncouth. So we preached at least one little sermon in the county seat, to some of our county officials and others, and a lively interesting crowd they were.

The State attorney said he surely wanted to hear us preach, as we were breaking up with good-bys; the superintendent called me to one side and told me he was teaching in a Sunday school Bible class of sixty, and invited me to deliver an address to them, subject to their decision, however. Have not heard yet what they will do but expect to hire the city hall and hold some services there soon. But little has been done in Calhoun County up to the present.

Hoping for our great work a final triumph,

True Religion

God has made all mankind, and desires their equality. All men may find him. The highest intelligence and knowledge is to be found only in the path of religion. True religion is found in service to others.

(Sermon by President Frederick M. Smith at Jerusalem, Palestine, March 13, 1921.)

"God . . . hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us: for in him we live, and move, and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring."—Acts 17: 24-28.

It is therefore quite within the purpose of God that man is upon the earth. Not only are we here to fulfill his designs, but there seem to be definite times appointed for the unfolding of certain of his purposes and the very limits of our habitations are set by his will. Then, as in him we move and live and have our being, it follows as almost axiomatic that our fullest expression of life is found in the widest and deepest possible knowledge of God. An intuitive as well as reasonable appreciation of the fact that it is impossible to have a perfect knowledge of God this side of eternity has made man look longingly into the future beyond the grave. Indeed undue emphasis or expression given to this idea may lie at the root of the error into which the church fell of overstressing escatological aspects of religion and urging its devotees to withdraw from the world rather than to remain in it while not partaking of its evils, and thus reform mankind by eliminating the wrongs and evils. In fact, God may the more quickly be found by searching for him in the midst of the plenitude of his chiefest handiwork, man. For he is not "far from any one of us."

All Men Have Instinct of Religion

It appears, too, from this passage, that there has from the first been implanted in the breast of man the instinct of religion. Hence we can expect that this truth will be evidenced in the natural history of man. And so it is. For no race of men have been found anywhere in the world who are without some form of religion. Everywhere there is evidence of this universal feeling after God. But it does not necessarily follow that each form of religion affords a sure way to God, though in each religion there is quite likely to be some portion of the sum total of truth which connotes eternal life. "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."—John 17: 3. Hence our approach is made to God by the appropriation of all truth, for truth is knowledge of all things.

There is hope in the thought also expressed in the text, that there is always a possibility, not to say probability, that all men who continue to seek God will eventually find him; for if the instinctive proclivity to feel after God is indulged continuously because God is never "far from any one of us," the accident of finding God becomes more than the mere operation of chance.

The unfoldment of man's religious development is not left more to the laws of chance than is his physical development. We shall, therefore, in our feeling after God, find him when we have finally placed our feet on the path which leads to him, and with intuitive or cultivated sense of right and wrong, travel steadily the road towards the highest and completest conception of truth, which is knowledge.

From our text we can also well conclude that religion being determined by God as one of the natural endowments of man, man's development will never be complete without it. This being so, man's fullest expression of life is found only when his religious development has kept pace with both his physical and mental development. There have been among the learned men of the world those who incline to the idea that religions have tended to benight man. And it may be that in the exercise of the God-given instinct to feel after God, some men or some races of men have developed some forms of religion which have clouded the real vision of God and even dwarfed their intellects. But true religion must be intellectual, for we must possess knowledge. It is more than mere form. I am quite disposed to hold that the highest form of intelligence cannot exist without religion. "The glory of God is intelligence."

Neither does true religion place us in bondage. Adherence to mere form may both benight and bind; but the larger conception of our approach to God will bring us wider and wider freedom. It is eternal life that we might know God. And in our restless search for knowledge, so God may be the better known to us, and thus come the closer to us or we to him, we are sure to experience the freedom which comes thereby. "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

It will quite naturally follow, then, from the foregoing, that the fuller life can be experienced only when religion has perfect play in our life. Religion must therefore function in liberating within us those forces which give us our largest expression. And this is set out in the promise of the Savior when he said: "I am come that ye might have life and have it more abundantly."

"God hath made of one blood all nations of men." There is here indication of a fundamental and purposive equality of men which does not find expression in the affairs of men where true religion is absent. The church is society organized for the promotion of religion. Religion thus is the prime function of the church. And the church cannot fully aid in the instinctive feeling after God without recognizing the fundamental equality of men and working therefor. And as it is true that religion can have its fullest expression only when there comes to us that perfect knowledge which constitutes eternal life, so it may be that the fullest expression of equality will be had only under the same conditions. But it is the duty of the church ever to work for as close approximation to that equality as is possible under existing circumstances. The duty of the church therefore can be summed up in the brief expression, To promote religion and equality. This was stated by Jesus when in answer to the question,

What is the greatest or the first law or commandment? he answered: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; . . . and thy neighbor as thyself."—Mark 12: 30, 31.

Equality Misunderstood

Unfortunately equality has been greatly misunderstood. It does not mean that all shall be treated exactly alike, nor have alike, nor be alike. That is impossible, for conditions differ widely, and conditions cannot but modify being, treatment, and having. But all shall have equal opportunity to find God, and thus the fuller expression of life. The great duty of the church, then, becomes that of fostering religion and creating for all men the opportunity to develop to the fullest the faculties and powers with which they are endowed, for these become or are the instrumentalities by and through which they make their approach to God, or feel after him. Equal opportunity to find God, and eventual equality in finding him. It is the purpose of life and the focal point of religion and the goal of all activities of the church. The church, then, as being organized to promote religion, should have always clearly in view two purposes—to point the way to God and create equal opportunity for all men.

Adverting once more to the incident of Jesus and the lawyer who would trap him by questions, it will be recalled that when Jesus had said, Love God, and thy neighbor as thyself, the lawyer, to justify himself counter questioned: But who is my neighbor! Then Jesus told of the man who on the road to Jericho fell among thieves, of those who passed by, and of the Good Samaritan who took the robbed and beaten man to an inn and paid for his care. And then when Jesus asked, Who, thinkest thou, was neighbor to him who fell among thieves, the lawyer said, "He that showed mercy." "Then," said Jesus, "go, and do thou likewise." Of course Jesus did not mean to hunt for a man who had been beaten and robbed on the road to Jericho, but to look for anyone to whom could be rendered service or aid. He at once answered two important questions thereby, Who is my neighbor? and What must I do? It will be remembered that the lawyer, according to the version of Saint Luke, asked the most important of all questions, "What must I do to inherit eternal life?" Here is the goal or zenith of religious experience touched—eternal life, to know God. And yet Jesus answered by the story of a man among thieves. Men, following their own selfish bent, covetous of earthly possessions held by others, took from the other, by force and accompanied by the infliction of even bodily pain and distress, the goods or wealth they coveted. Other men, having the form or pretense of religion—a priest, and a Levite—passed by the then penniless and afflicted man; but another, actuated by true religious motives, aided and cared for him. And Jesus, when he had concluded the story, said: If you would inherit eternal life, you must do likewise. The secret is locked up in one word: Service. He who would have eternal life as a heritage must render service to his fellow man.

Service the Dynamic of Life

To-day the great thing needed by the world is to appreciate the fact that the dynamic of life must be service rather than selfish gain. The thieves acted under the dynamic of gain or selfishness. The single man had what they wanted, coveted, and because stronger they fell upon him and took his goods. The priest and the Levite, looked on him as they passed, and seeing nothing of benefit to them went on and left him in his misery and distress. But with the Good Samaritan the motivation was different. With him the question was not, If I help him will benefit accrue to me? but, seeing his distress, his misery, he gave service where it was needed, even if it cost him not effort alone but money. His question was, Can I be of service?

Without doubt each one of us desires eternal life, and could we have opportunity to ask some one in whom we had confidence we would prone say, How can I be saved? or What must I do to inherit eternal life? Let us make service our standard, our social motivation. Let us look upon our fellow men as being closely allied to our own interests, and learn to show our love of God by serving our neighbor.

And this will become easy when we remember that of one blood hath God created the nations of men, and that all others are searching for God as are we. Then shall we be willing that all shall have equal opportunity with us in rendering service. Then we shall be living and developing true religion. Let us therefore learn to know our neighbor and in service demonstrate our love towards God.

May God add his blessings.

Procedure in Silencing Members of the Ministry

A district president inquires: "When unfortunately it becomes necessary to recall the license of a minister, what is the procedure? Must we immediately prefer charges and appoint a court as set forth in conference resolutions?"

Some of the brethren seem to be laboring under a misapprehension. General Conference Resolution 604 evidently referred to in the question required that in instances where men holding the priesthood were placed under silence, those imposing silence should without delay prefer charges and bring the matter to the attention of a court. There seems to be an impression in some quarters that this is still the rule. However, the brethren should take note that Resolution No. 604 was rescinded by the General Conference of 1917. The following is the action of the conference, appearing upon the minutes of that year:

"The joint council of Presidency, Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric reported the following:

"To the General Conference: We are instructed by the joint council of Presidency, Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric to present the following action by that body:

"The joint council, appreciating the difficulties arising from a misunderstanding or misinterpretation of conference resolution No. 604, recommend that it be rescinded, and the following substituted therefor:

"When any ordained officer or minister is believed to be guilty of immoral or unchristianlike conduct, the usual court procedure of the church adequately protects his interests. However, ministerial or official influence involves also such factors as reputation, ability, etc. Upon the authorities of the priesthood and church officers rests the duty of protecting the interests of the church when necessary by withdrawing representative or ministerial rights, these rights or interests of the individual concerned being safeguarded by appeal through the administrative line.

"Respectfully submitted,

"FREDERICK M. SMITH, For the Presidency.

"JOHN W. RUSHTON, Secretary Twelve.

"INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, March 31, 1917."

"The report was adopted."

—General Conference Minutes 1917, p. 2437.

Certain things will be noted from a reading of the foregoing. First, there is no longer any church rule requiring that one imposing silence should bring the matter to the attention of a court. Where a minister is guilty of, or charged with immoral or unchristianlike conduct, naturally charges are preferred and brought to the attention of a court, and this action automatically places the individual under silence. However, as stated in the resolution, ministerial standing involves many other factors, which may include general reputation, ability, personal appearance, and matters publicly presented in preaching, the general effect of one's ministry upon the church, and so on.

Where a minister is silenced for reasons other than unchristianlike conduct or immoral conduct, there is no provision in the resolutions that the matter should be heard before a court. The whole matter is entirely administrative, and the recourse of the brother silenced lies in appeal along the administrative line; as for example, from the branch officers to the district officers, and from the district officials to the First Presidency, where naturally the appeal ends. (Of course this is only an example. A general officer would not ordinarily be silenced by a branch president, hence his appeal would begin higher up.) This is all that is provided for by the General Conference Resolution. However, in some instances of more or less magnitude where it was felt the Presidency might be prejudiced they have on their own volition referred the matter of silence to a court, which court was authorized to investigate thoroughly and report back to the Presidency its judgment as to the righteousness of the act of silence, as a guide to the Presidency in final action.

We trust that a rereading of the resolution above republished will clarify the minds of those who have been laboring under the impression that it was immediately necessary to bring matters of silence to the attention of a court; and that those endeavoring to analyze this question will not fail to draw the line between administrative and judicial functions. The matter of oversight of ministerial work is wholly administrative, and it is not ordinarily the function of court to either silence an individual or restore him his rights when he has been silenced. A court may consider the ministerial standing on the request of those in administrative authority and report back in an advisory way to the ones referring to them that matter.

The Second Reunion Number

This is the second issue devoted principally to the work at our reunions. It is only a few years since reunions were few and far between, but that day is past. It seems but a few years since many districts were resolving against having reunions, but their value is coming to be more fully recognized so they have multiplied and grown until they form a very vital part of our work.

Elder L. G. Holloway has been a general missionary for the church for the past several years, and is in charge of that department of work in Utah and vicinity, and has had an excellent opportunity to observe reunion work under many different conditions.

John W. Rushton needs no introduction to our readers. We are pleased to have this manuscript, though very brief, on a possible plan of cooperation at reunions.

Alma C. Barmore has labored in America, especially in the West, and also in Australia. For several years his field has been in California. As do others, he brings out several points of value, not only for our reunions but also in connection with our work at other times.

Sister J. A. Gardner has been on the executive committee of the Women's Department for many years and has attended many reunions on behalf of that department. She does not confine herself to its problems, however, but opens up the whole field, recognizing that the value of department work is measured only by its service to the church, which after all is primary. She has been and is willing to serve in any capacity on the executive council. She organized the first Oriole Girls, and was the head of that department until 1917.

She has been treasurer, secretary, and vice president in turn of the Women's Department.

Sister Audentia Anderson has been active for many years in the musical work of the church, conducted The Staff in the HERALD, acted as assistant director at one time of that department, and conducted the conference music. She is at present general superintendent of the Women's Department, and has been for several years editor of that department in the HERALD.

Sister Mina C. Madison is assistant superintendent of the Women's Department; she formerly served as vice president in the Women's Department.

Miss Mary E. Steele is the present head of the Young Women's Department, and editor of The Parthenon in Autumn Leaves. She thus serves as a supervisor in the Women's Department, and also as head of the girl's division of the Religio Department.

Mrs. Alice Mae Burgess was the first head of the Young Women's Department, and the organizer of the Temple Builders. She was editor of the Young Women's Bureau in Autumn Leaves, changing the name to the Parthenon, and of the Temple Builders Manual. As a missionary's daughter, and as a student, she has been in Washington, Utah, Oklahoma, Western New York, and Massachusetts, as well as Lamoni.

F. M. McDowell was the organizer of the boy movement in the church and is its first head. As such he has been vice president of the Religio, and occupies practically a similar position to-day in the revised Religio Department. He is a member of the Lamoni Stake High Council, superintendent of the local Religio Department in Lamoni, and dean of the junior college at Graceland. He is acting as editor of the senior Religio Quarterly, is a member of the Sunday School Consulting Board, and acts in other capacities. He has both the advantages and disadvantages of being a missionary's son.

Eugene V. Closson of Independence is an enthusiast of the scout movement for boys, and is one of the best scoutmasters we have. He is attending Graceland College this year, and hopes to continue the experience next year.

Marcella Schenck has taught the small children for several years in the public schools of Lamoni, has also assisted in the local Sunday school, and has written for our children's papers. Her experience has been mostly at Lamoni and its reunions.

Mrs. M. D. Graham writes from Burlington, North Dakota, and presents the work at that reunion.

Maude C. Halley of Independence presents the work at the Pertle Springs Reunion, the Independence and Holden Stakes.

Mrs. Laura A. Strachan writes from Ohio of the work at the Kirtland reunion, and writes from practical experience with the little folks.

Other manuscripts solicited have not been received, and some have very kindly been voluntary contributors. We will be pleased to hear from others on special factors of reunion work, and if your particular problem has not been discussed, we shall be glad to arrange for a careful consideration. We will have at least one more number devoted principally to this subject. We will be pleased to print other articles from time to time as they are submitted and add to what has been said.

If the result is better planning beforehand, a preparing of all things before us, the selection of a more suitable site, the introduction of better sanitary conditions, better advertising and presentation of the work of the reunion, better organized programs, and more information and a greater degree of spirituality, physical and mental help, the HERALD shall feel it has been many times repaid for the effort.

Cablegram from London reports Charles Fry has been quite seriously ill, but is rapidly recovering.

A Sketch of Bishop Blakeslee's Life

Bishop Edwin A. Blakeslee, we learn from newspaper clippings, died at 8.45 p. m. on April 22. He was especially prominent in banking, political, civic, and business circles in Berrien County, Michigan. As a result of great exertions in the second Liberty Loan drive, in October, 1917, he suffered a breakdown, and on December 27, 1920, he was taken seriously ill and was confined to his home for several months. The past month he was able to go down town for short periods of time. On April 22, he spent most of the day down town in connection with his banking business, and as a result on the way home suffered a stroke of apoplexy. At his home he suffered a second stroke at eight o'clock, and passed away three quarters of an hour later.

His school work included graduation from high school, a two years' normal course, and three years' law and literary course at the University of Michigan.

He was clerk of Galien Township, and a member of the county board of supervisors, of which he was the eldest member. In this capacity, he was a member of a committee which supervised the removal of the courthouse to Saint Joseph, Michigan, and the construction of the building now standing in that city.

In 1896 he was elected to the State senate, and reelected two years later. He was a member of the first board of pardons and paroles in Michigan, serving for seven years, 1900 to 1907.

He continued throughout his life his father's business, G. A. Blakeslee and Company, at Galien, Michigan, even though in 1911 he removed to Saint Joseph, Michigan, and became connected with the banking, business, and civic interests of the city, and became general manager of the A. B. Morse Company. He took an active interest in the promotion of the Edgewater clubhouse, the north side residential district, and the American Tool Company. In 1913 he was elected president of the Commercial National Bank, which office he held till his death. He was the first president of the Saint Joseph Chamber of Commerce, and held that office for three years. He was also appointed a member of the board of public works, and at the time of his death was its chairman. He gave very devoted work to all of the various war drives, Liberty Loan, Red Cross, Y. M. C. A., and Salvation Army, and is credited with much of the success of these drives in this county.

May 18, 1898, he was married to Adeline Graves, at Benton Harbor. To this union five children were born, three of whom, Eleanor, Adeline, and Edwin, jr., survive.

Funeral services were held at the residence, 1.30 Sunday afternoon, and were in charge of Elder E. K. Evans. The address was delivered by Reverend C. J. McCombe, of Benton Harbor. Interment was at Galien, Michigan, funeral sermon by Elder Evans.

The Saint Joseph Chamber of Commerce, through its president, Win T. Mullen, paid the following tribute to its first president:

"The Chamber of Commerce desires to express its sorrow and sense of loss in the passing of our fellow citizen, E. A. Blakeslee. Mr. Blakeslee assumed during his lifetime, duties and responsibilities incident to the development of Saint Joseph, with an intense love for his city, and gave generously of his time, ability, and money in the most unselfish way.

"As the first president of the Chamber of Commerce he was prominent in the work of organization, and during his three-year term of office, Saint Joseph made its greatest stride forward. As president of the Saint Joseph Development Company, and as chairman of the board of public works, he contributed in a large measure to the many undertakings for public betterment. He has been a true, public-spirited citizen and his loss will be keenly felt by all interested in Saint Joseph."

Big Snowstorm Blocks Missionaries

One of the sidelights of missionary work arose on account of the snowstorm April 16. The trains in and out of Lamoni were five and six hours late. Elder Cyril E. Wight intended taking the noon train to Hiteman, but on account of conditions of the roads, the severity of the storm, and the drive to the station at Togo, two and a half miles, that was out of the question, and so took the night train, due at 8 p. m. which was about three hours late at Lamoni, and five hours late at Chariton. That meant that instead of reaching Chariton at 10.45, it was 3.30 a. m. Sunday morning. In spite of difficulties he pressed on to Albia, and from Albia to Hiteman, in time for his opening engagement Sunday evening.

In the meantime, Apostles U. W. Greene and M. A. McColey were expected in Lamoni for consultation with the class in religious education, and were announced to speak Sunday morning and evening at the Brick Church in Lamoni. The storm prevented their coming on Saturday afternoon as they had intended, but did not prevent arriving in Lamoni at the first favorable opportunity, Sunday noon.

Bishop R. C. Evans's Estate

A Toronto clipping sent to us, headed "Wills and estates," states that R. C. Evans left an estate of $5,315, all of which was bequeathed to his wife by will executed December 28, 1893. It includes household goods and personal effects $900; War Bonds, $202; cash, $3,713; motor car five years old, $500; and stock in two concerns stated to be of no value.

It appears, however, from this newspaper clipping that in June, 1918, he transferred to his wife all of his real estate. This includes mortgages of $29,295, and real estate, six pieces of property assessed at $27,685.

Sunday School Training at Graceland

All Graceland students work hard—if they pursue faithfully the course signed up for. But there is not a harder-working bunch of students anywhere than the class in religious education. Their schedule is chock full but President Briggs thought they should have some specific instruction on the Sunday School Department. Superintendent G. R. Wells was asked to furnish six lectures, from April 11 to 15, on the work of his department. He assigned three of them to his first assistant, A. M. Carmichael, who treated ably the psychology of religious education of children, the aims of such religious education, and the materials. Brother Wells followed on the executive side of the work, touching such subjects as, the place of the Sunday school in the church and its functions, coordination, grading, promotion, etc.

It is hoped by those interested in this work that later on such a course may be offered that this training can be given in semester schedule, regular daily or weekly work instead of a few lectures. Later on the college may be able to offer a strong course for training Sunday school officers and teachers, both in class and by correspondence course.

On May 2 the dismantling of machinery at the Herald Publishing House was in operation, preparatory to loading the first shipment to Independence. The Sunday school Quarterlies and two more issues of the HERALD will be mailed from Lamoni.

The Place of the Reunion in the Work of the Church

By L. G. Holloway

Praise and testimony with other customary features, balanced by proper relaxation and recreation make successful reunions.

For many years the church has been holding reunions in different districts and stakes, for the benefit of those who desired to avail themselves of the splendid opportunities offered whereby those who attended might be taught the things necessary to spiritual growth. As time passes by each year shows an increase in the amount of good coming from these annual gatherings. They have become a splendid force for good, and are looked forward to with considerable interest.

Those who have been so fortunate in being able to attend can testify to the wonderful spirit that has come to encourage those who desired the favor of God. Many blessings have been granted to those who have come in humility before the Lord and sought for that spiritual food necessary for spiritual growth. One of the great objects of the reunion is to promote spirituality among the membership of the church of Jesus Christ.

There may be other reasons why reunions are held, but the principal reason is that our own membership may receive much and lasting good from the association provided for in these reunions. Many lives have been touched by that spiritual fire sent by God to enlighten those who sought a spiritual baptism.

Our experience has taught us that some who had been indifferent and cold in the Master's work, after having received of that heavenly gift, and made partakers of the blessings of God, have become valiant workers in the cause of Christ. Many lives have been made anew, and the reunion was largely responsible for the new vision that had come to these who had never up to the time of the reunion taken any active part in the work of the church.

In every well-regulated reunion, where proper arrangements have been made by those in charge, we have the rare combination of all the functions that make for better lives, nobler sentiments, and loftier ambitions. To obtain these results we must combine the spiritual with the social, as well as the recreational. The needs of mankind must be supplied and all the above are demanded by the normal individual.

Sociability Promotes Spirituality

Sociability of the right kind promotes spirituality. That which is true concerning sociability is also true of recreation. We remember the voice of inspiration coming through one of the leading officials of the church, wherein the Lord spoke and commended that which had been given in the recreational activities of one of our largest attended reunions of the church. These activities included games of an innocent nature, such as volley ball, tennis, croquet, and other games of a similar character.

Our experience has taught us that considerable time should be spent in prayer. For our large reunions we think at least one and a half hours should be spent daily in prayer and testimony. We prefer the morning hour for this service. It is at this meeting that Saints are given a spiritual baptism that prepares them for the services that shall follow during the rest of the day.

Study Periods

Following the prayer service should be a period in which some of the important problems now confronting the church can be discussed. Classes may be formed and teachers selected who are well informed on the questions which are to be considered. Usually there is left enough time following this study period for a lecture on the topic that has been discussed in the classes. These lectures should not be long and tiresome, but rather should present in concrete form the important truths found in the lesson.

Generally speaking we do not favor the holding of long services during the afternoon. This time can best be spent in recreational activities. We have known some reunions to devote all the available time to preaching, lecturing, and prayer services, crowding in every possible spare moment from early morning to late at night, without giving any consideration to the recreational feature of the work of the reunion. This is certainly a mistake. If this course is followed from day to day the mind becomes weary and soon very little or no benefit is obtained from any of the services, especially those held in the after part of the day's program.

Must Balance the Program

In the past we have made the serious mistake of not providing features in our reunion program that would interest our young people. We are truly thankful that the church has caught a new vision of our responsibility to the youth of the church, and now are making preparations that will assist our young men and women in becoming useful members in the body of Christ. No reunion committee should overlook or underestimate the immense amount of good that will result if proper arrangements are made for a program suitable to the needs of our young.

Camp on the Grounds

In order that the services may be well attended it is better that as many as possibly can, camp on the grounds. This also assists in the sociability of the reunion—a matter that must not be disregarded. Mankind is gregarious in nature, so for that reason it is far more satisfactory if the larger part can be closely associated together even in camp life.

In some communities the evening service is devoted to missionary activities. To our knowledge we have witnessed many who have come into the church as the result of our efforts in that direction. The reunion has marked the beginning of a new life in the gospel of Christ for many who to-day are rejoicing under the blessings bestowed upon them by the Master of men. It is true the missionary aspect is secondary in importance in the work of the reunion, but we see no reason why under proper conditions it cannot become a real factor for good in the lives of those who love truth and righteousness.

May the reunion continue to grow in power and importance is our prayer.

Cooperation for Reunions

By John W. Rushton

[The following article was especially requested by the editors, and may give a suggestion to some of a feasible plan of cooperation at our reunions. The usual plan is from hand to mouth; simply to take up a collection and meet the expenses, and disregard tithing and interest. We submit the following plan for careful consideration.—EDITORS.]

In each district a cooperative association could be formed on the basis of such institutions, and each member could take out shares of five dollars each, limiting the number to be held by each member, so that no one could hold more than say one hundred such five-dollar shares.

The reunion equipment could be purchased from out of this capital, and even the grounds.

The capital thus subscribed should be remunerated only by a minimum interest, not more than 2 1-2 per cent.

The personnel attending the reunion would be expected either to purchase their lot of ground or could secure it on the installment system by paying rent, or renting it only for the time being. The tents should be rented and all the equipment such as cots, etc., at the regular prices which would have to be paid at any of the stores for such materials. But in our case they should be the very best procurable and the rentals should be honest and reasonable.

The commissariat should run a store carrying all lines which are in demand, as well as the restaurant and all that goes with it. Church literature and everything that the church can supply should be on sale under similar plan. The regular prices should be charged in all of these things so that everybody gets the best of goods procurable at the most reasonable prices.

Then when the reunion is over let the members who have been supplied with receipts or tokens to the amount of their purchases present them to the clerk who will reckon them all up and when the period is finished and the balance sheet made out, the amount of profit accruing from the whole transaction can then be divided as follows: 10 per cent of the gross profits to be paid to the Bishop as tithing, 15 per cent for depreciation, and 15 per cent for reserve, the balance to be shared among those who have used the reunion in proportion to the amount they have expended. I forget to allow for the interest on the invested capital which at 2½ per cent would not be a serious item.

Supposing the profits amounted to $1,000, then it would probably work out as under:

Interest on capital	$100.00
For depreciation	150.00
For reserve	150.00
For tithing to Bishop	100.00
Totaling	$500.00

Which would leave $500 to be divided among the members in proportion to their expenditures.

The uncertain point in this of course is the interest and this is the reason why members should not be permitted to hold too many shares, and so eat up profits in this way, and reduce the amount due to those who really use the institution.

While this may not be very clear to those who have not had experience, it is both clear and simple as well as profitable to all concerned if worked out in a businesslike way. R. B. Trowbridge could be used to work out a scheme for general use in our reunions as he has had experience and understands the movement.

Advertising the Reunion

By Alma C. Barmore

We could have far more and better publicity if we but knew how to go after it.

For some time it has been my duty to act as a member of the press committee at the various reunions which I have attended; and while advertising the reunion to the general public is not a part of that committee's work, yet I have chosen that part of the publicity work of the church as the title of this article. In treating the subject under this general caption I wish to consider several features of reunion work.

It must be apparent to all wide-awake Latter Day Saints that our reunions, in common with other features of our work, have been insufficiently advertised. Indeed, we may truly say the church has only recently arisen, perhaps I should say begun to arise, to the importance of advertising, hence the Publicity Department, as such, is in its infancy.

Let us consider first the advertising of the reunion to the church. Even if we consider the notices usually formal or perfunctory, as published in the church papers as sufficient for local Saints, yet we must admit that something in the way of direction as to how to reach the grounds would be highly advantageous to those who may have moved in from abroad or who may be visitors; this in addition to information regarding reduced rates that may have been allowed to the attendants by the various means of public conveyance. What we usually get is general; what I recommend should be particular.

This kind of advertising is not as common as formerly since our people in many places have secured permanent property for reunion purposes, and, therefore, hold all their reunions in the same place. When reunions were looked upon as missionary agencies and were held in temporary quarters we required more of this kind of publicity. However, it seems to me that since we have fixed on a permanent location there is too much tendency to allow the reunions to repeat themselves automatically; hence the presumption that all know what they need to know.

A Decline of Missionary Spirit?

Further: Why should we forego whatever advantages the reunions may give us as proselyting agencies because they have become gatherings especially for Saints? My observation is that the more churches hold their various services for their own peculiar benefit the more the outside public leaves them to the enjoyment of such benefits. In other words, such a course of action is evidence of a decline of the missionary spirit. Is there not danger that as we use time and expend thought on ourselves as we look Zionward we may forget, in a measure, our obligations to the world?

In addition to such detailed information as the church papers may contain (as I have suggested) for the benefit of residential newcomers or occasional visitors who are Saints, or the friendly stranger who may at the time be "within our gates," there is the notification of the people who live within the attendance area and who may be reached by posters, hand-bills, or through the daily and weekly press. Why should not all our drawing cards be used? Why should leading church officials from headquarters come and go and the outside public know of their coming only incidentally or as ships that pass in the night. "Oh, yes," somebody says afterward, "I heard from Neighbor Jones about that man. Sorry I did not hear of him before. Would have been pleased to have heard him." It will not do to say: "He had a chance to know." Perhaps he hadn't. That excuse will not pass in business. It is business to let people know. In these days counter attractions hinder if we are not definitely "on the job."

Feature People's Preferences

For instance: In the West the people have quite a preference for "that Englishman" (otherwise known as Elder John W. Rushton). If we know that our goods are A 1, why not say so? If we know we have a prime article "made in England," why not let the fact be known? In other words, why not feature Elder Rushton if we know he will be present? Advertising of this kind will make a wonderful difference in our outside attendance, especially at the night services. It may be said that this would give rise to favoritism since one would be preferred above another. In reply it may be said that such a preference already exists; and it is based on a distinction and a difference which the God of nature and of revelation has made. And besides, why should not the servants of God put away petty jealousy and act for the good of the cause? Why should I stand in the way of progress because I am not the biggest pebble on the beach? Why should any other minister?

Such advertising as I have indicated should be done somewhat after the Chautauqua style; that is, a program involving all who may figure as "talent" should be put out. This method would give all an equal chance. It is true of course, as I have already said, the public will prefer certain ones. The same is true of Chautauqua artists; that is, in case they should repeat which is not often.

Again, there is the reporting of the reunion which we include under this head; for there is certainly something in letting the world know what we have done. And just here let me say: We should be more particular about reporting the addresses of those who have been abroad and have given reports of their missionary experiences in other lands. And besides, "addresses" of this kind should be featured more than they are. Why should not our people play on the public ear and eye with men and matters of this kind; other churches do so—why should not we? Further: They furnish the most interesting occasions in their programs of services; and, under judicious management, they could in ours too.

Stick to the Needs

In reporting reunions it is best to keep to news proper. It is our tendency, because of not being well understood, to ring in something relating to our history and doctrines. Sometimes papers will strain a point to print matter of this kind for it is really against their rules (that is why I use the word "strain") but in many cases the presence of such matter causes the whole article to be rejected. This rejection is not because the matter is not meritorious but because it is not news and does not rightly belong to such a report. Very often our people are refused newspaper space through their own fault. We often consider it evidence of prejudice against us but it is really due to our ignorance of the rules which govern newspaper representation. A report of a Methodist gathering does not include a biography of John Wesley or extracts from the Methodist discipline. If it did the probabilities are such matter would either be deleted or the whole report condemned to the W. P. B. We could have the papers everywhere teeming with newsy representations of our work if we were only wise in our methods. It is true that sometimes we fail because we make absolutely no effort. There is, for example, no reason why the missionaries who arrive in San Francisco from Australia and the islands of the Pacific should not have newsy representation in the San Francisco and Oakland papers. Why do they not? Because we do not seek it. So also our missionaries could arrive on our reunion grounds fresh from foreign fields and yet we would make no public mention of the fact. Hence the papers give no notice because they have received none.

One feature about reporting reunions to the Associated Press which is worthy of special mention is the ease with which it can be done. The amount of matter that would easily pass can be written on less than one sheet of typewriting paper and double spaced at that. By using new carbon paper, especially if it is good, one can make eight copies, all of which will be sufficiently legible. I wrote two such articles in reporting the Northern California reunion last year; this made a total of sixteen sheets which I sent to as many papers. So far as I was able to ascertain they were all printed. In some cases I was not able to investigate for the reason that I did not have access to the paper. Personally I know that a number of them were. The two articles were not exactly alike but even if they had been it would have made no difference; for Associated Press news items are often printed verbatim by the various papers.

Sister Eunice W. Smith was in Lamonj April 22 to 24, to meet with the Sunday school consulting board.

The Church at Work, Play, and Worship

By Mrs. J. A. Gardner

This article covers a wide scope regarding reunion work and emphasizes the practical.

The reunion means to me an intellectual, social, and spiritual revival of the church through its working forces in a given locality—not an institute. Since the departments of the church are its working forces I cannot separate them from church work. For that reason the above grouping of activities and what follows in the discussion of "the practical aspects of department work at reunions" is submitted. (Doctor Richard Cabot includes love in his classification of the elements that make for real, true living.)

The Sunday School, Religio, and Women's Departments are directly concerned with the first two divisions, each contributing to the accomplishment of the last. A more complete outline is given which will suggest a division of the activities:

Work

Adult meetings (educational).
Young people's meetings (educational).
Manual training for children, story-telling.
Kindergarten.
Special conferences.
Social service (personal service).

Play

Social affairs for adults.
Social affairs and games for young people.
Games for children.
Calisthenics.

Worship

Prayer service for adults.
Prayer service for young people.
Song service and Bible stories for children.
Preaching.

In the above outline there is provision for the three phases of activities to be carried on in reunion work with children, young people, and adults. The kindergarten if properly conducted includes work, play, and worship for those of that age.

There are some districts which appoint one "reunion committee." This committee secures the grounds, tents, cots, fixes prices, arranges for dining tent, gets big tent up for the opening day, helps each family pitch its own tent, plans the entire program, acts as bureau of information, etc., all without the help of subcommittees. Many a reunion has been "put over" on the shoulders of one or two men! But at what a sacrifice! Young people and older ones stand waiting to put their enthusiasm and energy and talent into some definite work for the church, led by a wise, understanding man or woman. Why not the reunion? What if they make a few mistakes! The gravest mistake is that of the olders ones who do all the work for fear the younger ones will make some unwise move. I wish this could carry to you the confidence I feel in the young people if they are given some definite work to do for the reunion, older, more experienced minds working with them. Give them a plan for advertising the reunion; get them to praying for it and watch your returns.

A Simple Organization

A simple organization of one committee outside of the committee on grounds, tents, etc., is all that seems necessary. That is the program committee with the following members:

The district president.
A Sunday school member.
A Religio member.
A Women's Department member.
One other at large.

From this committee are appointed three chairmen, one over each of the divisions of activity, work, play, and worship.

Also a chairman of kindergarten which may or may not be from their own number.

Work or educational activities should be planned separately for the children, young people, and adults and under the supervision of one man; each age should be considered in plans for play or recreational activities, and one chairman over all; the same is true with the worship or spiritual activities of the reunion. This does not prevent each chairman from choosing as many helpers as he needs, keeping in mind the qualifications necessary for the special work and ages for which he is responsible.

The reunion committee and the program committee should have a headquarters tent where all matters may be referred, one of two members from each of the two committees always on hand. After the opening day the program committee should sit once a day, if only for a short session so that each chairman may have the help and counsel of the rest of the committee, each member of which is equally responsible for the success of the reunion, in the emergencies which arise.

This organization is flexible enough to allow for any sub-chairmen or committees that may seem necessary, and at the same time has not tied the planning and operating forces to a close organization of rules and regulations, many officers and committees.

"Work Which Should Be Done Immediately"

The committee on grounds, tents, etc., or what has always been termed the "reunion committee," should begin work at once if they are not now ready to report. The environment of the reunion grounds has much to do with the arrangement of the program, whether there is room for playgrounds, croquet, tennis, baseball, etc., and children's tent.

The entire working program should be carefully and closely organized so that there will be as few loose ends to gather up on the opening day as possible. There are always some at the best. A complete organization of the working program does not mean a multitude of officers and committees but it does mean that the man or woman who is chairman of work or educational activities has the details of all lectures, classes, round tables, demonstrations, clinics, children's meetings, and social service worked out on paper, has submitted them to the program committee, assigned all work, is reasonably sure of his leaders, lecturers, etc.

It means that the man or woman who has charge of play or recreational activities has his ten days' activities worked out in such a way that a rainy day emergency program may be swung in without the gloom, worry, and disappointment which usually accompanies such a day; that the girls and boys whom he has enlisted are "on their toes" ready to play and help the older ones play, ready to follow their leader.

It means that the chairman of worship or spiritual activities has his plans on paper; a helper to whom he can say, "Will you have a children's chorus ready for the eleven o'clock service Wednesday morning?" or "Will you arrange for ushers every evening?" or "Will you have a corps of young men ready to usher on Sunday evening? We plan to make that young people's night," or, "Will you have a corps of young women (or men) ready to usher on Friday evening? We plan to have that young women's (or men's) night."

It means that an editor has been appointed for a camp paper, time provided for reading it or provision for printing and distribution; that a subchairman on publicity is advertising the reunion in every branch.

It means that the kindergarten leader has her handwork planned; that she is cooperating with the one in charge of the children's meetings. (At most reunions these two meetings are held in the same tent.)

Work on these plans should begin immediately for the time will be all too short to accomplish our ideal.

Time for Department Work

The editor has made it easier for me to discuss this by saying "department work," and not Sunday school, Religio, or Women's Department. For instance, we may have "Play that re-creates" as subject for discussion. The Religio, Boy Scouts, Orioles, Temple Builders, organized class leaders, and mothers all are interested. Or, "Best teaching methods"; the Sunday school, Religio, and Women's Department are each concerned in a discussion on this subject. Some topics will be of special interest to all women, but if advertised under Women's Department meeting, some women will say, "I am not a member of any organization of the Women's Department and am not interested in this meeting." If advertised under "The well-being of your child and my child and our neighbor's child" every mother's interest is attacked.

Suppose the subject to be discussed is, "The responsibility of our citizenship." The meeting is advertised under the Women's Department and the men agree at once that it is the opportune time for a priesthood meeting. This subject should interest both men and women and the discussion be carried on together, for if more men would understand the value of women's work in civic affairs and the power that controls, they would urge the women to work together with them for better administration.

The division of time given below is simply an outline toward which to work. If the church is sending a representative through any of its departments and he is to be present but two days, then move on to another reunion, the time should be arranged so that the educational period would be given over to him.

I am aware that the outline will be considered impractical in some localities but surely from this and others submitted the reunion workers will be able to arrange one that will please them and be suitable to their locality.

6.45-7.30 Spiritual service for young people.

Young men's experience meeting.

Young women's experience meeting.

Joint young men and young women's experience meeting.

Round table on prayer.

Young people's prayer and testimony meeting.

Hike and prayer meeting (starting earlier).

(Repeat.)

7.30-7.50 Physical exercises or drill for entire camp.

8.00 Breakfast.

9.00-10.15 Prayer service.

10.30-12.00 Educational. (The kindergarten and children's meetings should be held in another tent during this meeting or during the prayer service.)

A pastor replied very recently to a request for a young people's prayer meeting, "Bring in a signed petition and we will consider it." In the name of all that is opportune why did he not say, "I'm with you. Come on, we'll have our young people's prayer meeting next Sunday"?

There may be requests for special meetings which will be of interest to only six or eight. If the subject is of sufficient importance to attract the attention of but a few and there is one on the grounds who can lead the discussion or at least direct it profitably, the committee should provide for the meeting. It should not interfere with the regular meetings, since they are arranged for the benefit of the whole reunion. Sometimes from these small group meetings, a conversion to an essential feature of successful church work is made and the work spreads.

The best method for handling such meetings should be determined after the source of the request is known. Those who have a reputation as "hobbyists" should not be permitted to make the reunion their convenience to the discomfort of others, even though "hobbies" are good things, sometimes. If there are several people sufficiently acquainted with the subject to conduct a round table, it may be discussed in that way. If there is one who has studied and others who are eager to learn, a lecture may be given with the privilege of asking questions. The program committee should see that such a meeting leads to something definite if possible.

The program committee may decide to hold special meetings to demonstrate the work of the Temple Builders, Oriole Girls, Boy Scouts, organized classes, etc. All these organizations should have some time during the educational period, but if additional time is desired the committee may provide for it. Please let me emphasize what I believe to be the work of these organizations and others at a reunion, that is, that they carry on their activities from the opening day of the reunion to the closing day and demonstrate their possibilities through their service. This is good advertising.

Instruction or Training Work for Future Needs

The Women's Department is preparing for an institute to be held in May. An intensive program is being arranged for the instruction of their district and field workers. A number of women from distant territories are planning to come. This is a sure step in advance to a definite end and should be considered by all departments of church work. I would suggest one other step; send a worker from this institute into every district which is not represented.

A few days ago I called upon a man who was superintendent of a department of church work in another denomination. He told me that he cared for that department of work in Missouri, Kansas, and Oklahoma. He was a trained man and spent every Sunday and many week days visiting in these States. Three or four trained workers sent to the reunions in these three States in the same way that Chautauqua members are sent, with two days at each reunion, or even one, would create a revival of interest and enthusiasm which would not be accomplished otherwise.

History

The first reunion was held in the fall of 1882, following the decision of the General Conference to hold conference sessions annually instead of semiannually. The Saints felt the need of a spiritual revival. The daily program was preaching three times and one prayer meeting.

This program was not entirely satisfactory to the many department workers, for they recognized the need for a revival in their activities as well. They gathered in groups discussing local plans and problems; mothers found other mothers eager to discuss home problems and difficulties and their remedies. The general officers tried to meet these needs and as a result of their efforts we had the public meetings in the big audience tent at such time as it was not occupied by the regular scheduled meetings, "preaching three times daily and one prayer meeting."

For some time we had this program with a "help-yourself-to-whatever-time-and-crowd-you-can-get-after-that" chance. But there remained the restless, fun-loving, play-seeking boys and girls of the camp who wandered around the grounds or down the country roads and through the surrounding woods. At first periods of recreation were conceded to these girls and boys, and men and women were chosen to direct and help that their play might be a wholesome and satisfying expression of the energy and fire of youth. The older ones looking on have caught the spirit, and now many reunions are glad and willing to plan their programs with a definite time given to the church through its departments in Work, Play, and Worship.

Suggestions for Practical Service

A Welcome Committee. This committee should be sufficiently large so that one or two will always be active in welcoming people who come on to the grounds. They should see that the newcomers are comfortably located, introduced, and taken care of until the committee on grounds and tents has had time to place them. Or if they are there just for the day should see that they have every chance to begin the day profitably. The first impression received by the newcomers will make for their enjoyment or dissatisfaction during their entire stay, whether it be for a day or a week.

This committee should provide for a number to be ready to greet the people as they come near the tent for the evening services. There are many strangers who come out from the near-by town. Boys and girls, men and women wander to the edge of the tent of an evening, hang on the ropes, laugh and talk awhile, stroll away again, receiving only a passing glance. They are not particularly interested in the sermon, only want to see what is going on. Try the handshake and an invitation to come in and if they slip just under the edge of the tent count something has been accomplished.

Ushers. When the welcome committee has met the people at the edge of the tent, the favorable impression is minimized if the visitors are left to find a seat. Although the reunion may be a small one the evening sessions are usually well attended. As suggested in another paragraph, young men and women may be used on special occasions.

Personal Service. The period from 1.30 to 2.30 should be used for some personal service. The reunion affords an opportunity for fellowship, for learning to live together, for helping our neighbor or receiving help, for a demonstration of the social service work carried on by the Women's Department. Every member should visit with another member at this time. The social contact will open the way for closer acquaintance which in time may result in a mutual helpfulness to higher living.

The same condition exists at a reunion as does in a group or community—that is, there is always one third or more who are omitted from the fellowship of the other two thirds. There are those who are left out, who have no "social standing" as the world terms it, while the others visit and fraternize with each other. One section of the camp grounds is usually a social gathering place. A definite effort should be made to overcome this by appropriate methods. A suggestion is offered: Make as many numbered slips as there are young people and adults; let each draw a number; those who receive 1 and 2 visit with 3 and 4, those who receive 5 and 6 visit with 7 and 8, etc. This may be difficult at first, but should be encouraged until there is a feeling of friendliness and fellowship.

Number all tents; have those with odd numbers under 15 meet on one side of the grounds with those of even numbers over 15 and visit with each other; on the other side of the grounds have those even numbers under 15 meet with those with odd numbers over 15. [The number chosen for division will clearly not be 15, but a number depending on the size of the reunion.]

The south half of the grounds may visit with the north half of the grounds one day and the north half with the south half the next day. Each half will no doubt want to have their section of the grounds in company shape for their visitors.

Those whose last names begin with A may visit together, those with B in another group, etc. If only one A he may visit with the B's, etc.

On the first Sunday and last the personal service period may be after the afternoon service since there will be no games on that day. On each of these two days there should be a general social gathering to visit and get acquainted. This should be in or near the big tent.

There should not be so many of these larger gatherings that the time for individual visits, such as one mother with another, two or three young people with other young people or with an older person, one girl with another, or the helpful things that may be found to do, will be crowded out. The Sunday gatherings and two or three of the other large gatherings during the week should be sufficient. The committee should supervise this period carefully so that no one is left out, keeping in mind that this is the time for social or personal service.

Helps. Those in charge of the different divisions of the work should write at once to the offices of the General Sunday School Department, General Religio Department, Women's Department, Health Department, Music Department. The Women's Department has sent out some practical suggestions for work with children at reunions for the last two or three years.

Women's Department

By Audentia Anderson and Mina Madison

A reunion is an occasion for impressing the value of organization to further the many needs of the sisters in their work.

Reunion work varies according to the locality of the reunion and the tastes and development of the people who attend. Some reunions serve their purpose if they result in cementing the people together and unifying their interests and ideals. Some seem preeminently the vehicles by which proselyting is done, attracting strangers in great numbers and putting the gospel principles before them. Some are simply home-comings, where friends and acquaintances meet and mingle, enjoy good times together, and renew their faith through the "preached word." Some are the means of educating the people, where classes are held of progressive nature, where demonstrations, round tables, lectures, and problems occupy the center of the stage, and from whence the attendants go back to their home branches filled with new ideas and materials by which local work is enhanced. Some appear to be but vacations—prolonged picnics at which a maximum of relaxation is attained, fishing, boating, or bathing occupying the attention through many hours.

All of these seem to have their points of advantage. No one seems to have all those we might desire. Therefore it would seem that the ideal reunion would be one where most of them are combined, to the extent that all who attend might find that which is food for them. This is more nearly possible at the larger reunions, especially those ideally situated for some wholesome recreation. The smaller reunion, however, is the one which perhaps needs more of our thought and planning than those which, having become features of successful effort, receive the careful consideration and attention of our most capable leaders.

Know the Needs of the Women

The work of the Women's Department should be given a place in the reunion program commensurate with its importance and the needs of the women who attend. Its work is fundamental, in that it seeks to improve the quality of the homes of the church members by bringing educational advantages to the women who reign therein. That their influence is most marked upon the men and children who come within the radii of those homes cannot be denied. Qualify all the women of the church properly to discharge all the duties which devolve upon them, and few problems would be left. The ramifications of the Women's Department work takes its students into many fields, for the home is but the center of innumerable avenues of contact with the world outside, all of which should be intelligently considered by the home maker. There have been enough of special commissions intrusted to the department to make its work of grave importance to the pastors of branches and presidents of districts. Thus it should be recognized and given favorable place in the plans for reunion.

It is desirable to have a women's meeting very early in the reunion sessions, a stimulating, inspirational one, in which the women might be quickened to a definite realization of their personal responsibilities in the redemption of Zion, the present great effort before the church. With this quickening should come the desire to assist, to arouse from lethargy, overcome mental inertia, and be willing to study, supporting and attending such services as may be planned for their benefit. Much responsibility towards obtaining this result will rest upon the field workers or representatives, who are intrusted with the department work for the reunions, and they should have the full support of the priesthood in order that success may follow their efforts.

The Best Hours

For the presentation of the work of the Women's Department, the early morning hours are not desirable, since most women at reunions have considerable work to do at that time. Getting the breakfast things cleared away, the children ready for their meetings, making the sleeping tent tidy, doing a bit of washing perhaps, or preparing for the noonday meal—all these are apt to prevent a full attendance of women in the forenoon, especially when the sisters are anxious to attend the morning prayer service.

At an afternoon hour, then, there should opportunity be given the women to learn as much as possible about the work of the department. Its organization, function, objectives, materials, purposes, and responsibilities should be brought before them, in order that effective work might later be done in the branches. Too, some definite study should be made possible. Experience has shown that a great interest is usually manifested in those meetings wherein the study of the child, its training, the methods used, the failures made, the lessons impressed, or the ideals of parenthood plainly set forth are the subjects of discussion. These meetings attract both the fathers and the mothers and are of equal interest to those whose duty it is to teach children, such as those who labor in Sunday school or Religio.

Besides the mass meeting of women called early in the reunion at which interest in the department is aroused, and enthusiasm developed for the study offered throughout the sessions, a later one, some evening hour towards the close of the reunion, including a specially prepared lecture or series of talks on some phases of the department work, should be arranged. This should be as highly educational as possible under the conditions.

Special Work

A tent set apart for the use of the women is an excellent thing. Besides the usual furnishings to make it a comfortable rest room, about the walls could be arranged some of the "object lessons" which tell their stories so plainly. A little roped-off space might inclose a tidy, well-equipped, sanitary kitchen, with its accompanying neighbor one of dirt, disorder, and disease. Another corner might display the proper clothing for an infant—well-made, sensible, and hygienic garments. Likewise there could be hung there also a few garments most desirable for women's house wear, which combine beauty with convenience and comfort. A model nursery would be suggestively helpful, too, and there should be plenty of the splendid educational charts obtainable from the Government, which impress many an important lesson in child welfare, proper food, health, or social purity. Such things as these chosen with care and intelligence will teach their silent lessons, and being made available at any time, women may study them during those moments of leisure which most of them find all too rare at reunion times. Where it is possible and wise to do so, there should be included also lectures on social purity given by workers specially trained for the purpose; demonstrations and programs given by the Orioles and Temple Builders, the cradle roll and home department work well explained, and some stress given to the necessity for a proper discharge of civic responsibilities. The connection between the latter and the welfare of home and children should be made plain, that the assembled women may go back to their communities with a stronger sense of their duties and privileges there.

The opportunity given at reunion time for impressing upon the girls and young women who attend, the importance of preparing themselves for the high and divinely appointed responsibilities of womanhood should not be neglected. The refinements and ideals which are included in the work of the Orioles and the Temple Builders are often the sources of inspiration and encouragement to girls deprived of cultured influence in their homes. Reunion time should bring to all girls not only the privilege of coming together in the spirit of pleasure and comradeship, but that of listening to some addresses which will impress them with their need for study along certain lines, and create within them the desire for that study and preparation. Some work of a high class under the direction of the best qualified monitor or leader should be planned and made a feature of the gathering.

Provisions daily for a children's story hour, and another where they may be interested in some hand work, paper cutting, bead stringing, etc., should also be made, a tent, if possible, being set aside for their use.

Induce the Men to Attend

Summing it all up, we feel that one large day meeting, attended by both men and women, in which our work may be explained intelligently, one general educational evening meeting under our auspices, and such regular study hours daily as may meet the particular needs of the reunion under consideration should be the minimum of time allotted to the Women's Department. The time has come when the brethren of the priesthood should make themselves acquainted with the women's work, as a part of their professional equipment. They should be able to explain it as they go out among the people. All the brethren, whether ordained or not, should join the sisters in the study of the child, for it is as necessary to Zion's redemption to have intelligent and trained fathers as intelligent and trained mothers. It is a man's duty to become a successful parent as well as a successful preacher or blacksmith or merchant. Reunion time offers a splendid opportunity for the consideration of many of these problems, since it is usually a time free from the ordinary demands of labor, and one where our common needs and our common objectives may well be held up before the people.

At a reunion any provision may be made for Boy Scouts, Temple Builders, Oriole Girls, etc., which does not directly interfere with the general services. The extent to which the tabernacle shall be used would depend upon circumstances. It is evident that special days cannot be set aside for each and every department, but we may be justified in asking each reunion to set aside a special day to introduce a work of special importance to the whole church. The work of the reunion committee is one requiring both knowledge and wisdom.

Orioles, Temple Builders, and Recreation at Reunions

By Mary E. Steele

There are many things that can be done to blend the interests of the young people.

Surely all will agree that the Orioles and Temple Builders composing the Young Women's Bureau should be given a place on the reunion programs. The importance of these organizations will be more fully sensed when it is realized that all their efforts are toward the development of the girl of to-day into the happy, capable, consecrated woman of to-morrow, multiplying the joys of her girlhood and adding to the religious education she gains through the Sunday school and Religion that which is needed for her development into the intelligent home maker.

The reunion affords excellent opportunity to present to those girls not yet acquainted with or interested in these organizations the many advantages and happy associations offered by this bureau. Impetus may be given the work of the groups already organized by institute meetings, discussion of mutual problems, exhibits, lectures, praying together, and playing together at reunion time.

Young People's Prayer Meeting

Very essential is the spiritual development of our girls, as well as all our young people, and experience is teaching that nothing is more conducive to the individual development spiritually than the early morning prayer meeting for the young folks. Less restraint is felt than when meeting with their elders although such meetings are also invaluable at times for the testimonies of gospel experiences are always inspiring to the young.

Institute and Class Work

For many girl leaders the reunion is their only chance to meet with other like workers for exchange of ideas, discussion of problems, and relating experiences. At many reunions the hour between ten and eleven in the morning is given over to various kinds of class work. By all means a class for girl supervisors, monitors, and Temple Builder leaders should be arranged, at which lectures may be given on the three phases, study, good times, and service to others, and time given for at least one experience meeting, with opportunity for round table discussion of problems. An exhibit of the best record books and handwork or collections in nature study gleaned from the various groups throughout the district will assist greatly in the exchange of ideas, for girls as well as leaders. The district organizer appointed by the Women's Department will no doubt be most widely acquainted and best able to assist the reunion committee in planning this institute and in collecting the exhibit.

That All May Know

That all who attend the reunion may know the scope of this Young Women's Bureau, what is being accomplished, and what we hope to accomplish, surely the girls may be given the big tent for one session. A mixed program may be used to present the various phases of this work, or we hope soon to have ready for distribution at a small price a drama just written by Sister Margaret Davis of Des Moines, Iowa, entitled, "The friendly road," and including both Orioles and Temple Builders.

Recreation

Recreation seems now to be coming into its own in every country and clime since the late war has emphasized its value. "Learn to play! It's nature's great safety valve. It keeps the arteries elastic, which is the medical man's way of expressing youth." Recreation is just as essential at a reunion as at home. Very few reunions but have taken a step forward in this regard by appointing a director of recreational activities for the reunion and allowing time for such events on the reunion program. Why not honor in their calling the Religio girl and boy leaders by selecting the recreational committee from the most wide-awake leaders in your district, with sufficient advance notice given to permit of the necessary preliminary plans?

Recreation for the Girls

The Orioles and Temple Builders will doubtless desire to participate in a certain number of recreational activities as groups of girls.

Hikes combined with nature study and lessons in fire building will be not only interesting but instructive.

A quiet hour in handwork lessons will be enjoyed.

Lay off a baseball diamond of smaller dimensions than the regulation. They will like it.

Swimming, always supervised to make sure the girl who cannot swim does not get over her depth, is one of the best of physical exercises; but, girls, let's have a beach of our own, and let the boys have one of their own. "When in doubt, don't," is a fine rule concerning mixed bathing.

Recreation for Mixed Groups

The first concern of the recreation leader will necessarily be to help everyone become acquainted, so a good "mixer" or ice-breaking evening should be planned. This might be handled easily by planning a "Home town evening" or afternoon, appointing a committeeman from each town represented to get together all the comers from his town, assemble them at a place designated by placard in the big tent, and be ready to take part in the program when called upon to tell why that town is better than the others, what prominent persons came from that town, how its name originated, any historic events which occurred there, and the like. After the program the leader (he will need a referee's whistle) might request one half of the towns to visit the other half, designating for instance that Hoboken is to march over to Bridgeport and visit until the whistle signifies they are to return home, and so on until each town has visited every other if possible. In each instance, of course, the strict instruction must be for each person to speak only to strangers. Procuring autographs of strangers during such a procedure is interesting and effective, and report for the largest number obtained should be called for after the visiting is over. Congregational singing interspersed throughout the evening adds to the pleasure.

For the most part, the recreational and social events at reunions will be much more easily handled in groups than as a whole.

Croquet sets would gladly be brought by those who have them, to add to the equipment, and would please those who do not care for more strenuous activities.

Horseshoe pitching is becoming quite popular again; the outfit is inexpensive and it is adaptable to all ages.

The story-telling hour will attract boys and girls both large and small, and is especially fine for Sunday afternoon, or periods of extreme heat during the week.

Setting-up exercises every morning directed by some returned soldier could no doubt be planned for every reunion.

Twilight sings will be enjoyed by all.

A well-planned program of track and field events is interesting, and large numbers could participate in the following, for instance:

- Pass ball relay.
- Potato relay.
- Sack races.
- Hurdle races.

Baseball, two inning games between different groups such as priesthood versus laity, or Boy Scouts versus Orioles.

Horseshoe pitching contest.

Medley relay.

Fifty-yard dash for the swift.

Peanut race for the cautious.

Then there are so many outdoor games such as "three deep," strenuous and always exciting. Try those listed in your Religio Manual, (extra copies to be had for twenty-five cents from the Herald) or, for a larger assortment, you'll never regret the price of Jesse H. Bancroft's book entitled Games for Playground, Home, School, and Gymnasium, published by Macmillan Co., Chicago, Illinois, $2.40. It will give you details on most of the above games.

Our Girls at Reunions

By Alice Mae Burgess

It is necessary to "draw out" the girl so she will discover a means for self-expression.

What is your reunion doing for the girls of your district?

More and more is the church recognizing the splendid opportunity for spiritual, intellectual, and physical uplift afforded by the district reunion. An institution of universal appeal, in which every age and every class should find some special share and some specific benefit, it offers a wonderful chance for the development and training of the youth of the church.

Perhaps this is especially true for the girls. Boys will get out-of-doors and camp and hike whether they are encouraged to or not, but girls are more of an indoors plant. Educators find that even the modern girl needs not only a special guidance and encouragement to form habits of outdoor living, but also that she needs more "drawing out" to find herself and to venture upon that freedom of self-expression which is so necessary to true and wholesome development.

Special consideration should be given your girls, then, in your plans for reunion work. The future womanhood of Zion is surely important enough to demand a very definite place and share in these training camps of the church.

A Fourfold Opportunity

There are four distinct lines of development that may be offered the girlhood of the church at the reunion: 1. Recreation. 2. Study and training. 3. Worship. 4. Service.

Recreation

The officials of one district make a point of urging their young people to take their vacations at reunion time and spend them on the reunion grounds. Since this is almost wholly an industrial and manufacturing region and the annual vacation is their only opportunity for real physical rest and upbuilding in the out-of-doors, the reunion plans must give recreation a generous place.

There are few reunions which do not now allow some time for athletic sports and supervised play.

Among the activities open to our girls are: 1. picnics, hikes, slumber parties, toasts, boating, and swimming.

2. Organized sports: basket ball, volley ball, hand ball, tennis, croquet, etc. Interest in these games may be stimulated by organizing several teams and holding toward the last of the reunion regular games and tournaments, testing the skill of the players.

Nature Study

Some very interesting nature study can be combined with the recreational hikes, if you have a practical biologist in your midst. Girls will love to know by name the birds they see, and they will find it interesting to bring into camp specimens of plant life to be classified. This will add to the enjoyment of the hikes and picnics, as well as furnishing the girls with a very definite and practical little store of nature lore which will prove an incentive for continued outdoor life throughout the year.

Girls' Meetings

Special girls' meetings should be arranged where the girls may listen to inspirational talks interspersed with music and readings. These meetings may be opened by a fifteen-minute "sing" of popular and old-time songs. This is a good time to help the girls to learn the Oriole and Temple Builders' songs. This singing should be placed under the special charge of a trained leader, who will have a carefully selected group of songs, with the words typed or mimeographed for general distribution. Some very pleasing musical effects can be attained and the girls' chorus thus trained will be able to help in the women's meetings or other general features of the reunion.

Short sessions are more successful—not to exceed 45 minutes; the talks should not be longer than 15 minutes.

There are a host of interesting subjects. Choose your speakers with care, choosing those who you think will appeal to the girls and who have an understanding of girl nature. Sometimes they will prefer to choose their own subject; ask them if they feel they have a special message for the girls of the reunion.

The Young Women's Bureau has furnished a comprehensive list of vital subjects for these girls' meetings. Specific phases of personal hygiene, literary study, social purity, vocational study, mothercraft, or home making may be taken up. Wherever possible demonstrate your theme. Many phases of personal hygiene, mothercraft, and home making can be presented entirely by demonstration. The girls would much rather see a baby bathed properly than listen to instructions as to how to bathe one.

Don't Preach

A series of service talks might be given, inspiring the girls with greater desire to serve individually in the home, and the church, and suggesting definite avenues of service.

Don't preach to the girls; just talk with them. If you sincerely feel the vital importance of your message, have it carefully prepared, and have an understanding love of girlhood in your heart, you cannot fail to impress the girls, and you will be conscious of divine help and commendation in this work.

Dramatic Work

Girls enjoy dramatic work. If some original girl will write a little playlet or pageant especially adapted for our girls, much of the reunion work can be devoted to preparing and producing it. The ideals of the church can be expressed, or the history of the church delineated. The Book of Mormon and Bible furnish many good stories for dramatization. A symbolical presentation of the Oriole and Temple Builder work may be given.

Orioles and Temple Builders

If you have your girls well organized throughout the district into chapters and circles of Temple Builders and Orioles, you will find these organizations will facilitate your work at reunion.

The leaders and monitors should take advantage of this excellent chance to get together in little special meetings of their own, exchanging ideas and discussing their work together.

Worship

Sometimes it is advisable to have girls' special prayer services—where they may enjoy and express more freely the spirit of true worship that is with us in these reunions. Usually, however, the young people meet all together, boys and girls, for services of this kind.

Service

The girls may often perform a definite service for the reunion—help in preparation or serving of food, take care of babies at the nursery tent, tell stories for the little folks, or otherwise supervise their play. This will be splendid training for the girls as well as a real contribution to the success of the reunion.

A Girls' Camp

Some of our reunions have established regular girls' camps with responsible and sympathetic matrons. This enables a girl to come to reunion when it is impossible for her people to come. Beds are furnished for a nominal sum, and the girls have wonderful times together. This is an excellent plan. But the big thing is to see that the work is planned so that the girls get there and that they share to the full in all that is best in the reunion.

The Boys at Our Reunions

By F. M. McDowell and Eugene Closson

"Neglect the boy if you will, but do not mourn when you reap the results of your folly."

Reunion Experiences

Experience has been our teacher in our religious activities as in all other fields. This has certainly been true in reunion work. It is only within the last few years that we have come to understand the great possibilities of reunions in encouraging all aspects of church work and in the general education of our people. So rapidly has the reunion spirit grown that we have found it necessary to consider more carefully the purposes, plans, and organization of all activities concerned. In many places, the attendance has increased beyond all expectations, and with it there has been a growing demand that all of the departments of church work be represented. In many places this has necessitated having two or more activities going on at the same time according to the aims, needs, and characteristics of people concerned. Among all the lessons that we have learned from reunion work, there is none more significant than that of the wisdom of providing for the needs of the young.

The very nature of camp life is such as appeals directly to the young. Consequently, they have been attracted in large numbers. In some instances, their presence has been recognized and their needs met. In such cases, it has been found that the problem of control has been almost entirely eliminated and that the young have become vitally interested in the religious services. If, on the other hand, the young have not been provided for, the opposite has often been true. It would be easy to cite examples in support of this assertion.

Why Provide for the Boys?

The above has certainly been found true in connection with the boys on the reunion grounds. Nothing could be more reasonable than to ask that reunion workers accept boys and boy life as a fact, and not as an evil to be dispensed with. Boys are boys. Boys will be at the reunions. They should be there. Boys are as God made them. Boys are like any other of our national resources. They must be utilized and developed. This can be done only by understanding the laws of their development. Success or failure will depend upon the extent to which we understand and apply the laws of boy life.

Everyone realizes that in all activities of life there is such a thing as point of contact—that point at which salesman and customer, preacher and hearer, teacher and pupil may meet on a common ground. Success depends upon finding this point of contact. Herein lies the whole problem of the reunion organizer and of his success with the boys. It is his purpose to get them interested in the church, and to cause them to live better and truer lives. The justice of his aim we do not question. The big problem for him is method and the point of contact. Fail in these and you lose the boys. Succeed in these and the boys are with you. Since the church of to-morrow will consist of the boys of to-day, this becomes an important problem.

How Shall We Reach the Boys?

Some one has said that the keynote to successful boy leadership may be summed up in three words: "Inspire enthusiastic activity." This applies very well to reunion work. The outstanding characteristic of the boy is activity. The problem of the reunion leader will be the direction, not the suppression, of this activity. Leave it undirected and it will result disastrously to the boy and to the camp. A boy gets into mischief, not because he wants to be mean, but because he wants to be active. Keep him active and you will eliminate a large percentage of mischief. All of this means that the boy's program should be planned for him at the reunion and that he should be kept busy from daylight to dark. Leadership should be furnished for him in all those activities which make for physical, mental, moral, and spiritual uplift. "Neglect the boy if you will, but do not mourn when you reap the results of your folly."

Some Concrete Suggestions

1. Provide capable and devoted leaders for the boys throughout the entire reunion.
2. With these leaders, work out in advance a definite program which will keep the boys busy in all sorts of profitable activity.
3. Wherever possible, permit the boys to have a separate camp on their own part of the camp ground or on separate grounds. This is especially desirable if the boys are organized as scouts under capable leaders.
4. Boy leaders should work out in detail a program for each hour of each day.
5. The boys should be encouraged to join in all young people's services and to a reasonable extent in the services of the older people.
6. Much profitable instruction can be given to them along religious lines at their own camp by their leaders or by others chosen. For example, there could be each evening a camp fire hour at which there could be short talks, sermonets, stories, and community singing.
7. The organization of the boys should provide for such matters as discipline of the camp, sanitation, individual responsibility, etc. As far as possible, see that the boys have their own officers chosen from among their own group.
8. Ample provision should be made for rainy days on the camp. Many profitable hours could be thus arranged for.
9. Above all things, give the boys some responsibility on the grounds. Some of the following things have been tried successfully: The blowing of bugle calls for the camp; the care of the camp flag; running of errands; supervision of cleanliness of the camp grounds, etc. A boy will soon come to feel that he has part ownership in the camp grounds and that the success of the reunion is somewhat dependent upon him.
10. Have the boys give an entire evening's program in the large tent for the adults, or, perhaps better still, let them give an open-air program at their own camp to which their parents and friends are invited. If there are sufficient Boy Scouts on the ground demonstrations of first aid and other items of scout craft have been found very interesting.

11. At least two half days should be devoted to recreation work at which time the boys shall be expected to participate in various sports. A field meet might be arranged at which contests could be held in various lines, such as basket ball, baseball, indoor baseball, volley ball, swimming, etc. Many reunions have found these recreation days very valuable for all ages.

A Few Pointers

"Only a person who honestly likes boys can expect to understand them."

"The boy of to-day is the man of to-morrow. It's up to us, right now, to decide what kind of a man that shall be."

"Give a boy a bad name and he has small chance of living it down. Give a boy a square deal and you have small chance of being disappointed in him."

"Suggestion is a powerful influence. Tell a boy that he is the worst boy you ever saw, and nine chances out of ten he will believe you and live up to his reputation."

"We admire initiative in men. Yet we punish that same quality in a boy. What kind of a man can he make if all the 'pep' is scolded out of him while he is a kid?"

"All men and women were kids once. That fact ought to make us adults more sympathetic and friendly and helpful to the men and women who are kids now."

Children's Playtime

By Marcella Schenck

With proper apparatus there is little trouble over miscellaneous play at reunions.

Among the sights and sounds that linger long after reunion is over are the play and laughter of children. How dull the camp would be without it! Yet I can almost remember a time when it came very nearly being a crime for a child to shout or romp for fear of disturbing the holiness of the camp ground.

We have grown broader than that idea and have begun to see the sacredness of childhood's frolic.

My experience has been with the boys and girls below the Oriole and Scout age. That is, it was supposed to be, but the boys above seven and eight could not quite separate themselves from the scouts, so my principal work was with girls under ten and boys under seven.

Good Old Games Best

We have found the good, old-fashioned standard games the best to use in a mixed crowd that changes so constantly as the ones with which I dealt. We taught many new games, too, out of Bancroft's game book, but on the whole the children are not nearly so ready for instruction as they are to play something they already know, like black man, drop the kerchief, ten steps, and rope jumping. Blindfold games were not a success in a large crowd because the children so often do not know the names of many of the children on the camp. We always found trouble about our circles being too large, and often had to start the second circle under a competent helper.

Our best playtime was just before the evening services, as reunion usually comes in the heat of the summer and it is too warm to exercise much during the day.

I believe above all things that if the proper apparatus is provided for the tots, there is little need of anything further than a survey now and then to see that all goes well, for children with much to play with quite readily amuse themselves. And the apparatus is very simple. A few bag swings and rope swings of which they never tire, two or three big sand piles in shady spots about the camp, an extra volley ball that the big folk won't want, a basket ball for a game of "keeps," a few ropes that the girls can jump or the wee laddies use for driving each other when they play horse, and that is about all you need—unless some one can tuck in a croquet set when he is packing up and give another group a chance to play. There should of course be a play director who has charge of the apparatus to dole it out and see that some one is responsible for its safe return to a certain tent.

Evening Best Playtime

When shall the child play? No sane person can expect a child to attend all the services set aside for the older people. I think, though, the children should be taught that the prayer service is an hour when all play should cease, when the camp should be hushed everywhere, and the solemnity felt even by the children. There will of course through the day be services and a story hour for the children, but some one else will tell you of those. There are each day wee bits of time between all of these when the children gathered wisely at play will be kept happily employed and leave no time for mischief to creep in.

And there must be one evening when the darkness has crept about that the children can enjoy the camp fire, big and blazing high. What is it that attracts the older ones about it? Most of all is it not the inner circle about the fire, eager with their "weanies" and marshmallows, the happy faces bending forward at the toasting, the childish grace and pleasure that your own soul wants to taste again? It gives one the same sort of feeling as he has when he watches the little ones about the Christmas tree. You stand on the outer circle and sing the songs of Zion, but your heart is with your babies that bend about the camp fire, and your thoughts must often creep back to the Christ and the angels and the Nephite children.

I wonder now if I have given any practical helps for the other camp grounds. I haven't said a word about groups "making things" and kindergarten apparatus for the tiniest ones. The big reason is because I have never had charge of that work. The groups I have worked with have been so large and so varied each day, it never worked really satisfactorily. I can conceive, however, of gathering the smaller groups together and weaving baskets, and cutting pictures, painting, sewing, crocheting, knitting, and having a real exhibition before reunion is over.

Arrange a Baby Parade

Oh, yes, and a baby parade! The children gave me that idea last reunion, and I never have had the opportunity to put it into practice. You know how little girls love to wheel the babies about the camp, and you could have your baby promised days ahead if you would. Let's give them one evening just before church to show off all the camp babies below two years of age. I saw the children arrange such an event with a few babies the very last day of my very last reunion, and I just wished we had made a camp affair of it.

If we are really heart and soul in earnest, there are no end of suggestions that will come as we seek to entertain the children, and such an entertainer will be royally entertained herself by the ecstasy and appreciation of those for whom she labors.

Sister Christiana Salyards was in Lamoni for a few days beginning April 22, in connection with the Sunday school consulting board, to work on the new Quarterlies.

Children in the Camp

By Mrs. M. D. Graham

This work should be carefully planned long beforehand; nor should it be shifted to Temple Builders and Oriole girls, simply because they are willing.

The care, comfort, and teaching of the little children in camp during a reunion have not in many districts been given the careful consideration they deserve.

In most instances the whole matter is left until the commencement of the sessions, and then a committee is hastily formed, or the services of one or two sisters called for, and it is referred wholly to them.

The matter should, however, be handled by the Women's Department, and a sufficient time before a reunion be given to formulate plans, prepare programs for daily work or play, and the cooperation of capable women throughout the district be sought to put in practice these plans.

In speaking of this subject, we are speaking from the viewpoint of the small reunion, as in the larger, more thickly settled districts and branches, where the Women's Department has this work fully in hand, you will find most excellent forethought displayed, and model work already being done for the children.

A tent should be provided, or room near at hand if tents are not available, that can be used as the center rallying place for all the activities. It should be as large as possible, so that some of the sessions may be held there especially for the children. Also make it a place where mothers may bring their infants and tiny tots for care during the hours of services, where the presence of a baby often brings discomfort to not only its parents, but the congregation in general. We can expect little ones to cry and be restless, but the mother can never gain as much from the sermons or lectures as she would if she did not have to soothe or amuse a little one. Many times the reunion is the only place where the isolated members can hear a sermon, for many localities cannot be visited by the missionary, and many branches do not have resident elders.

Help for the Mothers

We should endeavor then to furnish for the mothers a season of rest from the daily care and supervision of the children. The direct motive back of our efforts must be the welfare and education of the children in daily Christlike essentials; and on this being carried through in an efficient and wholesome manner, depends the welfare of the church in the future.

The hours for the entertainment of the children should first be settled and groups according to age be formed. The helpers with the different groups should be selected, not in haphazard fashion but according to their fitness to handle children of that group age. The Orioles and Temple Builders should not be burdened alone with this work, because of their willingness to be helpful, but after their own hours of entertainment and work have been planned, consult with them about their desire and fitness to help with the younger ones, and accept their services gratefully.

Services Early in the Day

The time for the children's services and sermons should be placed in the earlier hours of the day, especially the sermons, for the body is rested, the questing spirit of the mind not so fully roused, better attention can be given, and the truths as presented be more fully absorbed. The sermons should not be lengthy, too deep, or too obscure in allusions if a right impression is to remain. Use simple language, cheerful tone, allusions to the obvious things of a child's environment, and moral finely conveyed but not placed so prominently that the child feels reproached and leaves the service with a feeling of restiveness, instead of an appreciation of the beautiful points made and the kindly understanding spirit of the speaker.

The Kind of Lectures

Some of the lectures to the children on the care of the body, body construction, health, and purity can be illustrated by the exhibition of one child, modestly but scantily clothed, so the actions of the muscles, texture of skin, placement of interior organs, and skeletal construction, can be well demonstrated to the little eyes and ears.

In helping to care for the infants, lessons to older children can be given on the reasons for the tender care of the little one's body, speaking of the helplessness, the need of warmth, and cleanliness, and the growth of the spirit as well as the body, arousing the tender feelings of protection and gentleness to one smaller and weaker.

Remember always that the eye is the greatest informer to them, much more so than the ear; for children may be thinking of something else while you are talking, but their attention will be caught by an action, and if it is accompanied by a few simple words, the impression will be deep and lasting.

The active games should come when the echo of the noise will not disturb a service, and different games suitable to group ages should be indulged in. Great outbursts of laughter, screaming, and shouts should not be checked unless indulged in simply to annoy others, for the lungs need exercise as well as the arms and legs, and giving vent to a few shrill yells will often clear a child's system of impulses desiring outlet that if checked would sink in the subconscious, often to come out in actions that are detrimental.

Come Prepared

The group of women who are to handle the activities of the children should come prepared with simple toys, games, and occupations, many of which may be obtained without there being any need of great expense, as enough can be found in the average home to furnish all the amusement and lessons needed. Map and picture making of dissected pictures, spool and bead stringing, teaching color construction, shape and size, little talks of the origin of beads, spools, and bobbins, taking us back to the ruins of Babylon and Egypt, Indian lore, and tribal customs can be touched upon also. Charcoal and impressionistic crayon pictures, paper dolls, whittling, weaving, and many other things may be used for the sitting down occupations.

"Hikes," with nature talks, wading, and lessons on water life, swinging, running, and jumping games, health drills with songs, are some of the ways of occupying the child in re-creation of body forces, construction, and development of imagination.

A place should always be handy where simple remedies may be kept for the cuts, bumps, and small bruises that inevitably come, and where the simple lessons of first aid may be taught at the same time. Lessons in cleanliness, sanitation, and remedial measures could be handled there.

A little planning beforehand will often make the care of young children much easier, and the adult should remember that a child's pleasure in toys, games, etc., come from the fact that they offer him so many opportunities to do things; that his growing body and inquiring mind require activity, and that his play is his work and important to him at all times. He should be taught in his play, so his curiosity about things around him can be satisfied, and he can feel it is all so real that he need not grow up listless, ignorant, and unresourceful.

The success of handling this part of the reunion activities comes from intelligent planning beforehand, and there is not too much time now in which to seek the cooperation of workers in districts if they wish to have a complete, intelligent program prepared.

Tiny Tots at the Reunion

By Maude C. Halley

A nursery should be provided for the babies, simple handwork for the small children, story-telling by one person, and Orioles, Temple Builders, and Boy Scouts given a chance.

It would be difficult to find a subject of more vital importance to everyone than the subject of childhood and its development; and now that we are beginning to make plans for the coming reunions, the question naturally arises, "What shall we do for the children?"

The foremost aim of the educational committees of any reunion is to forward the Great Cause, and incidentally to interest the children that they may feel they are a part of a church reunion and to carry on the function of the Sunday school. With this aim in view it is necessary to classify or divide the children into several groups according to their ages, and to provide suitable instruction and entertainment for each.

Everyone who expects to attend a reunion this year is more or less interested in making that reunion a success; therefore we must be keenly alive to the possibilities of a properly equipped school for the little ones.

Weeks, or even months, before the reunion is to be held, the committee should appoint competent supervisors for each department, who, in turn, may have time to select his or her own corps of helpers or instructors. The question, too, of adequate quarters should be arranged and settled beforehand, thus eliminating confusion on the opening day, or the necessity of moving from place to place during the week. The next need is that of proper enrollment cards and handwork material, followed by plans for entertainment, recreation, final programs, exhibits, and disposition of work. Perhaps the following program for the children's departments may prove successful at such a reunion as is held at Pertle Springs, and with slight adaptations may be made to serve at any of the others.

First, a nursery, with one or two competent women in charge, should be provided for the babies—a place where mothers could leave their little ones while they attended class work or services. In conjunction with the nursery, but separated from it, a really-truly kindergarten for the tots from three to six; and many mothers who stay to observe will find happiness in the beautiful unfolding of the little physical and mental life of the child.

The very well known interest of young children in basketry, weaving, sewing, and the kindred occupations will serve to bring the children to the next grade into closer relationship with each other, and at the same time help to solve some of the lesser problems of the vacation school provided for children from six to eleven. Many charming plans may be made for children of this live, dynamic age.

After assembly the members of the vacation school may march to their classroom, or in fine weather to some shady spot under the trees. Arrange for them a song, and a short game period, which may take the form of bean bag, black man's base, dumb bell relay, or other simple contests in which the boys and girls vie with each other in mild tests of physical endurance or mental alertness. During the game period, with the supervisor in charge, the assisting supervisors or teachers should busy themselves arranging chairs and tables, and preparing handwork material for the day's work. At 10.40 a sharp whistle calls the children from their play to march quietly to work, the girls at one table, the boys at another.

Past experience has taught us that large material, such as baskets, hammocks, or kites are more attractive and less temptation to boys than such things as baseballs or bean bags; while a gingham apron or pillow top done in cross-stitch, or perhaps a raffia basket, make charming work for girls to do.

The first day may be devoted to a simple talk on the theory of sewing and weaving. Place the material in the child's hands and acquaint him or her with the needle and thread, cord or raffia, and the methods of holding and using same either in sewing or weaving. On the second day, review the lesson in theory and begin the actual work. At 11.30 a short blast of the whistle will notify the little workers that all work must cease, giving ample time for putting materials away before the second whistle blows at 11.40. All work should be carefully folded and labeled (tags having been provided for the purpose) before the children are dismissed.

Let the children reassemble for the story period, and if possible have this assembly out under the trees where the children may sit on the grass and relax the tired little muscles.

The story and its manner of telling are important factors of the vacation school. Secure some one person, if you can, to tell a series of stories woven around the life of Christ, David, Moses, or Nephi. The effect is decidedly better than several disconnected stories told by different people. Children respond to moral instruction, but if the lesson is to be effective, it must be put in terms of life, and many beautiful examples of charming subtlety may be brought out that will invariably touch the child's sentiment or imagination and awaken in him a vision of the truth.

After the story is finished, and before the children are dismissed, sing a simple "good-by" song.

Girls from eleven to fifteen years of age should be in charge of an Oriole monitor, while those over fifteen are naturally interested in the work of the Temple Builders. Boys twelve years of age and over should be asked to join the scout camp, or at least be given over in charge of some man skilled in the training of boys, who may direct their activities.

The success or failure of the work depends largely upon the resourcefulness of those in charge; and whether the reunion be great or small, remember that three simple words, coordination, cooperation, and preparation, are the keynotes of success.

H. C. Burgess left Lamoni for Hiteman on Friday, April 15. He assures us that they had some wonderful services there, and that the people at Hiteman were delighted with the effort made by Elder Cyril E. Wight. It seems characteristic of these services for young people that the speakers are quite exceeding their ordinary ability, and are endued with a special measure of power and authority, giving them a spiritual endowment, as well as blessing those who hear. As Elder Burgess was announced to conduct the music also at Des Moines, April 24 to May 1, he remained in Hiteman through Saturday, getting the Sunday music in shape, and then took the train at 4.15 a. m. for Des Moines.

Organization at reunions is not alone enough. All things should be prepared beforehand. Still some of the best organized reunions waste much time on rather inferior programs in the tabernacle.

Children at the Reunion

By Mrs. Lora H. Strachan

To-day's children make the to-morrow's reunion.

That the children who attend the reunions should be given their place and attention has been our interest for the past few years at the Kirtland reunion. Our method and progress has been largely experimental, and we are always looking for suggestions and helps from others who are working in this line.

We began four years ago to grade our children in the "Manual School," as it has come to be termed to distinguish it from the other departments of institute work. We then included boys to twelve years of age and girls to fourteen years, and with the story-telling tried to outline a course of handwork suited to the ages and ability of the children.

However, the introduction of the boy movement and the development of the Orioles and Temple Builders for the girls has enabled us to limit the age to ten years for boys and eleven years for girls.

One of the greatest difficulties we have met with has been the securing of a sufficient number of teachers for the grades we have had. Some would excuse themselves because they have felt incompetent, others because they wished to attend other services of the mornings, and so on, but we are indeed pleased to say that gradually we have convinced them of the importance of the work, until the past two years we have had listed a double corps of teachers and have worked "turns." Several, yes, all, have expressed the pleasure they have experienced in rendering this service. We have surely appreciated their efforts and willingness.

This year we hope to have in this connection a real kindergarten department. We have before us now a double aim, viz: To endeavor to induce the schools of our districts to use more handwork to greater advantage in the early grades of the Sunday schools. This we hope to do by actual handwork with Sunday school lessons and some lectures to those who are interested in the betterment of our Sunday schools.

Secondly: We wish so to interest the children that come to the reunion not only in what we do at the Manual School but that we may be able as it were, to build that bridge that will gradually lead them, the girls, into the young women's department and the boys into the boys' organization, that thereby these organizations may have such an impetus at our reunions that they will grow as they go to their several home branches.

We expect to have a Children's Day at the reunion and a little social meeting.

We love to see the children at the reunion. We wish to help them to learn the meaning of reunions, for we believe that for the reason that they must play our part in the future of the church we must seek to work in them every phase of development that they may be of fine spiritual physique.

Elder Daniel Macgregor informs us that he closed his services at Missouri Valley, April 24. Elder A. H. Parsons is appointed as a high priest to labor in that vicinity in a pastoral way, among these newly baptized members who number 110. Brother Macgregor is the missionary in charge in Iowa, and will proceed to other fields to do his special work of proselyting.

Walter W. Smith, church historian, was in Lamoni over Sunday, April 22 to 24, in connection with the work of his office and the class in religious education. He spoke at the Brick Church Sunday morning on "Revelation," giving a very inspiring gospel discourse.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Let's Chat a While

We feel like telling you a little more of our plans for the get-together meeting in May. Do you mind? We feel so happy over the developments, the way attractive plans materialize, and above all, the splendid cooperation we are meeting with on every hand! The Independence ladies have formed their committees, and the weeks between promise to see some busy times down there.

From present indications it is quite certain that the slender member of the Presidency will represent his big colleague on Sunday morning, the closing meeting of our session. None who know Brother Elbert need any reassurance as to his ability to "fill" this official appointment, even if the official robes might hang a wee bit loose upon his frame! President Smith, in a letter dated at Jerusalem March 22, states that it will likely be nearing the first of July before his work abroad will be finished and he reach home shores again.

Bishop McGuire (whose promise to address our women was characteristic of his lawyer's training and held a little loophole through which he can escape if his important councils with his financial aids demand his entire attention at the time) has kindly forwarded to us a brief statement of his views upon the question of raising money in locals, the holding of bazaars, entertainments, suppers, etc. This statement will be printed and distributed to the workers in attendance at the institute at the close of the Bishop's address, and will form a most valuable addition to the fund of information of a definite nature which they can carry home with them.

Sister Frederick M. Smith, our director general, is preparing a "message" for us. She sends along the good news that her general health is improving. The wonderful air and sunshine of southern California are effecting that which was desired when she sought its healing clime.

How would you like the opportunity of examining a "mothers' library"? We hope you can have that privilege in May, and we feel sure that as you open those carefully selected volumes and catch fascinating glimpses of the treasures there contained, with notebook and pencil you will get busy, and when you return to your home folks, pass on the torch of your enthusiasm to your associates, and here's hoping the fire will burn steadily and persistently until you shall have a mothers' library in your branch, available to every woman therein, and covering as wide a field of women's work as possible.

Have you made up your mind about the present-day fashions—to exactly what point in following them you want your daughter to go, or are willing to go yourself? Have you felt alarmed at the present tendencies? Have you noticed the anxiety which is being expressed through the various women's clubs and educators' assemblies? Did you note the flaying an eastern superintendent of schools gave the mothers, of the Nation, saying they had failed on their jobs, that their children were fast drifting to immorality, free love, and wanton indulgence? Read this, from a meeting of parent-teachers in one of our large cities:

"... And the mothers came. Foreign-speaking mothers, frankly startled by the difficulties they are experiencing in raising their children in a strange land; American mothers wholly unprepared for the information regarding their sons and daughters gained from the classroom, and others recognizing their problems but not knowing exactly how to meet them. . . . Pleading for the return of the old-fashioned mothers, whom the daughters of to-day might call 'cranks,' one of the grade principals told the gathering a few of the things that some of the girls at the schools are doing:

"1. Wearing fancy garters so that they will show.

"2. Rolling their stockings below the knees, a style discernible to all.

"3. Appearing in school differently dressed than when they leave home. A few safety pins transform a dress into any length desired.

"4. Using powder rags openly.

"5. Penciling eyebrows and lashes with ink and fountain pens.

"Without question the mothers declared drastic action to be vital and adopted resolutions favoring corrective measures, including

"1. Putting all high school students to bed at nine o'clock every night except Friday and Saturday.

"2. Spanking them to bed if no other method will get them there at that time.

"3. Adopting uniforms for all girl high school students.

"4. Putting a stop to all dances save those sponsored by the high schools.

"5. Chaperoning all high school parties by some of the parents of students attending.

"For hours the mothers listened to facts regarding their children's welfare from the grade principals, and mothers and teachers discussed problems relating to dress, recreation, rest, and sex hygiene."

At our institute we are to have one evening devoted to the consideration of this question of dress and fashion. To the unthinking this may appear at first a trival matter, and yet how deeply and closely it links up with the question of spiritual growth for our young people, will quickly be seen by those who stop to ponder a moment. None may ever know how heavy may be the penalty exacted from the women of to-day for their grave mistakes in the matter of dress. The daring, immodestly cut or worn gown designed to attract and allure, may be more directly responsible for the conditions of to-day than many of the thoughtless would be willing to admit. As women of the church, as mothers of the future women of the church, the subject deserves our concentrated attention, and we shall all gain much from doing as was advised of old, "Come, let us reason together!" The lecture on dress, the dress revue showing the wise and artistic adaptation of prevailing fashions, and Sister Bertha Mader's talk on "School clothes—the mother's part," will all be helpful to women in solving some of these problems for herself and her daughters.

Have room for just one more hint. Have you thought of the part rural women are to play in Zion's redemption? Have you wondered how they may contribute thereto? Have you wished they had more of the "advantages" of life, less of toil, more of pleasure? Have you pondered over the situation prevailing over the land, with the farms stripped of their young life, the boys and girls going in countless numbers to the cities? And has it occurred to you that to obtain and wear the crown of motherhood, the woman on the farm faces a risk greater in percentage than most battles in war? Physicians and nurses have almost abandoned the rural districts; domestic help is practically unobtainable there. What is the answer the church can give? What will be the message delivered by Brother Charles E. Irwin, of Graceland College faculty, who will lecture before our assembly on these matters? Come and see! We know it will be worth while, for this young brother has specialized in his study upon rural problems with the purpose of helping the church to solve them, economically, industrially, and socially according to the laws and principles given in these latter days.

That's all for this time. Wish we could visit face to face, but that will have to be postponed until the week of our institute. We are really to get acquainted during the noon hours at the dining hall, you know!

Outfits for Graduation

Graduation day draws near; all over the land girls are preparing for the eventful day when their efforts to acquire knowledge will be crowned by the recognition of diplomas and the congratulations of family and friends.

Some one has said, "In youth we learn, in age we understand"; after all the great use of an education comes when we find how to apply it, and as life expands and we come in daily contact with the world we make this practical application of education and take what may be called a post graduate course.

And knowing that the girl graduate has still much to learn and that many of them must of necessity get this learning with greater hardships than they can anticipate, let us endeavor to make their graduation happy as we have endeavored to make happy and comfortable their school days.

Every girl is entitled to as pretty a graduation outfit as possible, and her graduation dress, like her bridal gown to come, should be fashioned after her own idea, made of the material she may choose, embellished with the trimming she likes best, though a wise mother, a thoughtful guardian, will direct this choice to that which is good taste and practical.

Of course there may be those schools and colleges that make it necessary to conform to certain limits in price and in the character of the clothing worn. This is not a hardship, and has proved its worth by the test of time, for it is a number of years now since the innovation of simple frocks, inexpensively made, was introduced.

The present craze for wearing overalls and calico may enter into the graduation plans of some schools, but if it does not and one is permitted to make one's own choice, perhaps you will be interested in the two simple dresses suggested for graduation.

And even if graduation clothes are restricted, these suggestions, I believe, will serve you in selecting the simple white dress that should be in every girl's summer wardrobe.

A charmingly simple frock suggestive of graduation is the one of white net, enchanted by a simple embroidery; and equally pleasing and appropriate for the eventful occasion of graduation and for practical use afterward, is the kimono model of embroidered batiste.—Exchange.

Simplicity for Girl Graduates

The Nebraska State College of Agriculture has put out a circular condemning the extravagant dresses worn by high-school girl graduates. The senior class of Pawnee City high school has taken the matter up through the suggestions offered in this pamphlet and are seeking a simple costume which will do away with the common competition in graduation dresses.

Swat that Fly!

Attention is called to the opinion handed down by the supreme court of Maine concerning the common house fly: "Not only one of the most annoying and repulsive insects but one of the most dangerous in its capacity to gather, carry, and disseminate the germs of disease. He is the meanest of all scavengers. He delights in reveling in all kinds of filth, the greater the putrescence the more to his taste. A single fly may so contaminate the food, milk, or a dish as to communicate a dangerous or even a deadly disease."

Regarding the obligations of a hotel to insure its guests against this pest, the opinion went on: "The accommodations include . . . such sanitary conditions as are calculated to render the surroundings inviting and wholesome rather than repulsive and deleterious to health." The complaint had been that the flies were so numerous and obnoxious that their presence had become intolerable, and that the guest deemed the condition a violation of the obligation of the landlord to provide sanitary and comfortable surroundings.

According to a recent newspaper article, a Merchants'

Association of New York is circulating a Nation-wide appeal to kill the "Easter fly," emphasizing that each of the insects at that date is the progenitor of millions of offspring "due to arrive before frost," many of whom will kill human beings "with typhoid and consumption" and "more of whom will carry diarrhea to babies."

We are reminded, too, that some five or six years ago some one in Cleveland started a fly enterprise, offering ten cents a dozen for the April variety, while in August a quart of the "wild animals" would only bring ten cents.

This spring, doubtless due to the very early warm weather, the flies arrived many weeks in advance of schedule. Housewives should be vigilant in their warfare upon these pests, viewing them literally as the greatest foe to health with which we have to deal. Mend the broken screens and get them put up early. Keep all garbage covered or burn. Clean up all refuse heaps. And ever and always swat diligently! Organize your whole family into a fly crusade, combined to make your home sweet, clean, and wholesome, entirely free from contamination through these death-dealing marauders.

On the Warpath!

Burlington, Alabama, has a policewoman, Mrs. Hulda New-some, who has declared war on "drug store complexions" and announces her determination to forcibly wash the faces of young women who appear on the streets powdered and painted till they are as "grotesque as a circus clown."

"When I see a young girl with a chalky-white complexion, cheeks of brilliant red, vermilion pigment on her lips, and her nose powdered to the 'nth degree, I feel like escorting her to the nearest bathroom and administering to her face a liberal dose of soap and water," says Policewoman New-some. Report of Department of Statistics

Figures and summary report submitted to the First Presidency by the church statistician.

Inclosed herewith please find report of the Department of Statistics for the year of January 1, 1920, to December 31, 1920, also for the three months of January, February, and March, 1921. It will be noted by examining the report for 1920, a net gain of 3,452 is shown. This, added to the net enrollment of January 1, 1920, 92,746, makes a net enrollment December 31, 1920, of 96,198.

In checking up the old branch records incident to the inauguration of the loose-leaf binders for branch records, we have adopted the plan of carrying what is known to this department as an Unknown List or in the terms of an accountant it would be called the loss and gain account. In this group of names we are entering such names as have been heretofore carried on the various branches, but which persons the branch officials were unable, after a prolonged search, to locate. In other words, we treat these names the same as bad accounts in regular business. We propose to count them off the actual membership but retain the membership card. If the person is found and reported to this department, the name will be restored to the live membership record. In this way we hope to keep both the branch and general church records more nearly cleaned of what might be termed "dead stock." During the year of 1920, 2,332 names were carried to this Unknown group. This will reduce the present net membership, December 31, 1920, to 93,866.

The report for the three months of January, February, and March, 1921, shows a present enrollment of 96,788, not taking to account any names which have been carried to the Unknown. During these three months there is a net loss to the Unknown of 357 which added to the 2,332 makes a total net loss of the Unknown of 2,689. Deducting the same from the net enrollment for March 31, 1921, as shown by the inclosed report, leaves a net enrollment of 94,099 names actually carried as live members. From reports reaching us from various parts of the country, many of the branches are yet carrying a great number of names yet to be transferred to the Unknown List. Various branch officers apparently are working hard to locate people whose names they are carrying, without success. This work of checking and cleaning up our church records naturally adds heavy burdens to this department, but we hope the result will justify the effort and expense.

We are pleased to report that with very, very few exceptions there seems to be complete cooperation on the part of those who are expected to supply items for this department and maintain the various records in the different parts of the field. With the present system of reporting direct to the department of all items, we are enabled to give an up-to-date report almost at a moment's notice. We believe that it is but due this department, at this time, to call attention to the fact that a great amount of the work at present required is due to incompleting work of the past. We believe the former system is largely responsible for much of this, as the current work requires but a small portion of the time of those employed. As the various branches are checked up, names added to the general church record which were on the branch record and our numbers put into agreement, the work of maintaining this agreement is simple indeed. There is still much to be accomplished before this department can be said to contain the actual recorded membership of the church. Our priesthood record is very incomplete, and we have in mind to undertake a check-up in this direction at no distant date. It is our aim to make this department a real asset to the church by supplying information to the various departments which may assist them in planning and carrying out the work of the church in all the world.

Zion Builders Attain Success in Hite-man

"We never before had such large attendance and such wonderful meetings."

The services for Zion Builders in our little town of Hite-man, Iowa, are over, it being the unanimous opinion of everyone that they were a complete success. Brother Cyril E. Wight was the speaker and Brother Harold C. Burgess led the singing. The attendance increased each night until the latter part of the week we had a full house, a very unusual attendance, due to the work of the Booster and Publicity Committees, and it seemed as though all the young, though not so many in number, worked together.

The town was well advertised by posters and large signs put up in the prominent places and by the work of the Booster Committee going around and inviting everyone to come to these meetings. Each evening, after the services, about fifty or sixty young people went about, singing songs of Zion to the ones of our number who were sick. It sounded very beautiful as the music floated out on the still night.

We are of the opinion that the meetings were a great spiritual uplift to our own people and did much good among the people who were not of our faith, who composed one half of our audience. We have never had such a large attendance and such wonderful meetings before in the history of our little town, Brother Wight presenting the gospel in such a clear and concise manner that even the children could understand.

Brother Burgess, who also helped in making these meetings a success, is a fine young man and well liked by everyone. Each evening, one half hour before the service, we had congregational singing with a few special numbers, including some beautiful solos rendered by Sister Jessie Watkins of Independence, Missouri.

On Saturday evening we planned a surprise program on Brother Wight (Brother Burgess being "let in" on the secret). We had a full house, and everyone breathlessly watched Brother Wight's face as the Graceland College quartet (composed of Mrs. C. E. Wight, Mrs. H. C. Burgess, George Anway, and H. Arthur Koehler) marched up the aisle of the church. The program rendered by the quartet was very beautiful and enjoyed by everyone, especially Brother Wight. They remained with us over Sunday, and in the evening gave a short concert before the service. At the close they sang "God be with you till we meet again," with the audience joining in on the last verse.

Truly it was a time of rejoicing and everyone hated to see it come to a close but were glad that they had been so successful.

Yours for the success of the work.

ALICE B. WILSON.

Good Report From Kirtland

President Elbert A. Smith: Zion Builders of Kirtland two hundred strong send greetings at close of first day's services, acknowledging presence of same loving spirit actuating Zion young people's meetings elsewhere. Organization and enthusiasm excellent. Canvass of township complete. Good response. Temple filled. Many visitors. Prospects most cheering.

APRIL 26, 1921.

Greetings to Zion Builders: The Presidency is cheered to receive your message and learn of your success. We trust your meetings may be very spiritual and educational and that in the sacred old temple of the Lord you may receive an endowment of the Spirit comparable to the experiences of old.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

Zion Builders of Council Bluffs Prepare for Campaign

Preceding the campaign which starts May 8, the young people of the branch met last week in the first of the special weekly prayer meetings which have been arranged to be held every Thursday evening prior to the campaign. As a preparation for the meeting the evening meal was dispensed with and one hundred ten gathered at the Central Church. A wonderful spirit of devotion to the cause and consecration to service was manifest through numerous prayers and testimonies. Toward the close of the meeting, a prophecy, given by Sister May Rudd, commended the young people for their endeavors and urged them to move forward with the work. The young people have their faces turned Zionward, and we felt as we listened to their prayers and to their testimonies that they were building on the "sure rock" not of outer accomplishment but of inner development.

Friday evening Brother John F. Garver met with the different committees. His talk made the present movement among the young present a more vital as well as general aspect. He cited this as being the hastening time, the quickening time, a time of the outpouring of the Spirit, and a time when Zion would come into tangible existence. The latter condition, he stated, would be dependent upon the younger members of the church, due to their ability to readily adjust themselves to new standards and new conditions.

Elder John F. Garver is to address the young people in the upper auditorium, and Elder J. W. Wight those who will meet in the basement.

Agricultural Notes

Compiled by C. E. Irwin

At last the Supreme Court has established the constitutionality of the Federal Farm Loan Act. Farmers will now be able to borrow money at 6 per cent, thus dealing a death-blow to some private lenders and mortgage loan brokers. About $200,000,000 has been tied up pending the decision of the court. This amount will soon be available.

The Committee of Seventeen, in its report at the Kansas City meeting in February, advocated a plan for the establishment of a national grain-marketing agency controlled by farmers. The plan involves the operation of terminal warehouses, and the maintenance of sales agencies. It is contended that speculation is undesirable in the grain market and that placing the matter under the control of the farmers will thus dispense with this evil. The committee believes the plan will succeed since it has been tried successfully in both California and North Dakota.

Most of us say we appreciate suggestions, but the way one farmer went about collecting them was very unique. He tacked up a box at the entrance to his farm, above which he nailed a signboard inviting criticism of methods, stock, and business. Needless to say he got many contributions.

Why not joint ownership of power machinery on farms? It has been highly successful in many localities where it has been tried. It is but one of the means by which farmers may become accustomed to working together.

What should be the factors in determining the value of farm land? We have just witnessed one of the most important periods of land boom, especially in Iowa. Obviously the most important element in determining the value of a farm is its ability to produce. In the settlement of Latter Day Saint farmers, as they come in from outlying districts, we shall have need of data which will facilitate the choice of soils which are highly productive.

Good roads mean to the farmer:

1. Greater income.
2. Reduced cost of operation.
3. Wider scope of operation.
4. Independence of weather conditions.
5. Saving in repairs on trucks and wagons.

Agriculture is the one industry which will profit most from road improvements and therefore the farmer should push the movement with all his might.

Much as we may deprecate the imperfection of our marketing machinery and proceed to insist that it owes us more for our products than the price indicates, we must acknowledge that the man who produces premium goods, establishes his own market price.

The United States Department of Agriculture has issued a report of a survey of nearly 10,000 representative farm homes. Its purpose was to learn the real problems of farm women looking toward a possible solution. It was found that farm women work an average of 13.1 hours a day in summer and 10.5 hours in winter. Eighty-seven per cent work the entire year without a vacation. A relatively small percentage of homes are modern, and are often poorly arranged. On 7,500 of these farms not more than one child per farm is to be found, above the age of ten years.

Of ninety-three German professors, says New York Times, leading thinkers, who in 1914 signed the Manifesto that certain allegations were not true, there are only sixteen who state that they would sign the same statement to-day. Seventeen have died, so that leaves about sixty who regret their previous position or signing.

A Result of Group Work

Young people's day in Des Moines a success. Priesthood work on the increase.

First Presidency: In making out my weekly and monthly reports, I was interested in the following summary. The following items are for the months of January and February, 1921, as compared with the same months of 1920. Only a few of the principal items are given. All others are in the same proportion.

	Sermons	In charge	Attended	Visits	Ad. to sick
1920	10	25	179	41	31
1921	40	78	422	180	61

These figures are encouraging for more than one reason. Representing the work of practically the same body of men, they show that they have sensed the importance of the work and are correspondingly active. In the second place it is a strong indorsement of the group system which has been employed this year. The work is onward.

Yesterday was a day of blessing. It was set apart as "Young People's Day." Notwithstanding the incessant down-pour, a splendid crowd assembled at the church for the prayer meeting at 8.15. A good meeting was had. The Pan Adelphi Circle of Temple Builders met and tagged all comers at the door, with tags as follows:

(These tags were two inches square, suspended by a cord through one corner. On one side was printed: "Young People's Day, March 13, 1921." On the reverse side: "Use us or lose us.")

The young people took the lead in all the services. At the eleven o'clock hour the time was occupied with three sermonets by three of our young men of the priesthood: Brother Frank Mussel, elder, age 25; Brother William Robinson, priest, 22; and Brother Fred Wilkinson, teacher, 30. All spoke with considerable freedom and power, and gave much food for thought. Their efforts were encouraging to all and seemed greatly appreciated by the Saints. Appropriate song service was had, under the direction of our regular choir leader, Miss Evalyn Rudkin, who by the way, is nineteen.

An excellent priesthood meeting was held at three in the afternoon. Details of this will be reported later. At five a combined choir and orchestra rehearsal, in preparation for a sacred concert Easter night, was held, and indications are that a splendid program will be had.

At the eight o'clock hour, according to previous announcement, the pastor spoke on "The sacrament of marriage." The audience was attentive and responsive. The young people especially seemed to appreciate the counsel given. A degree of freedom was had in presenting the subject which was encouraging. Altogether the day was a profitable one.

Very sincerely,

A. E. WARR.

What Are We Doing Now?

"The future of the church must and will be largely determined by that which we now do."

At present we are not only planning and contemplating our summer's work, but we are getting busy with the tasks that lie immediately before us. While to some degree we are circumscribed with difficulty, we have every reason in the world to be encouraged. There is an apparent upward tendency on the part of the Saints, and we feel assured that the membership will arise as one and blend their undivided energies in an effort to move forward the work of our district as it has never been moved before. The local work needs to be stimulated and strengthened, a greater coordination is necessary if we are to reach the maximum in our missionary work this year. We have confidence that this will be our satisfaction, and that an awakening shall be had among us commensurate with the demands of the hour.

Our district needs to be evangelized. What does this suggest? It suggests activity, ambition, sacrifice! A commonplace, passive desire will not suffice; we must energize up to the point of maximum efficiency; we must spare no effort that is necessary to insure success. It is true that our missionary force for the district is small, but that is the greater reason why we should strain every faculty within us, in an effort to achieve. Nothing short of loyalty to the cause of our Lord, and a willing mind on our part can bring the desired result.

The Spirit of God is working mightily with the people of the church. We see evidences of a new page in the history of our work. The revival movement among the young of the church comes to us as a holy sacrament, a baptism of the Holy Spirit. It revives our courage, and gives us the assurance that when we have done our best, an army of young people will take hold of the work where we lay it down, better prepared to serve than we have been, and will carry it on to victory.

Of course the thing that should above all else concern us is, What are we doing now? The future of the church must and will, largely, be determined by that which we now do. It was said by the Master of Mary: "She hath done what she could." Can that be said of us? If not, we ought to bestir ourselves and make greater strides than we have heretofore made. We have our limitations it is true, but if we do what we can, greater possibilities will arise before us, and we will be able to make greater accomplishments.

The missionary work must be pushed, and that means that all should line up in an effort to teach the inhabitants of our district the grandeur of the gospel of Christ. As we reach out in an effort of this kind we will enlarge our own vision and enrich our own experiences. It is apparent therefore, that while we enlighten others we enrich and ennoble ourselves.

It is indeed a blessed privilege to be a partner with the Divine One, in regenerating the world of mankind. "Go ye therefore and teach all nations" is applicable to the church to-day. We have no time to waste in contending over the trivialities of life; we are enjoined to go forward. There is no place to stop short of the eternal perfection. We feel confident that everyone who has the good of the work at heart, and who has received a vision of the largeness of this latter-day work, will gladly do all in his power to strengthen the hands of the ministry so that the people who sit in the valley of the shadow of death may be enlightened and become partakers with us of the fruits of the gospel of Christ.

May the year that is before us mark an epoch in the church that shall be fraught with victory. Let us renew our slogan, "Twenty thousand converts, with their faces turned towards Zion." Having our ideal fixed, let us strain every nerve, not only to reach it, but to pass beyond it, and in triumph and glory crown him King of kings, and Lord of lords, who alone is worthy of that station.

Very sincerely,

J. E. VANDERWOOD.

BURLINGTON, IOWA, April 13, 1921.

Editors Herald: Brother D. J. Williams, who is district president, Sister Williams, district organizer for the Women's Department, and the district Sunday school superintendent, from Burlington, attended the organization of the Nauvoo Branch March 19 and 20, as also a goodly number from near-by branches. The return trip was made by automobile Sunday afternoon, in company with Brother F. A. Smith, patriarch, who was announced to speak at Burlington Sunday evening. We discovered en route that Brother Smith was a "stick in the mud" (to say nothing of the rest of us), as the car stuck on the last hill before reaching the Fort Madison bridge. By dint of the "heavyweights" (?) walking a half mile or so in the mud, and begging a half gallon of gasoline from a farmer, the remainder of the trip was made without further adventure, arriving at the church at exactly the preaching hour. The sermon Brother Smith delivered on "Faith" was satisfying and convincing, enforced as it was by personal experiences.

Brother U. W. Greene, who had also been at Nauvoo, reached Burlington Monday afternoon, and spoke for us the four succeeding nights, Tuesday to Friday inclusive, following Brother Smith's introductory sermon with more on "first principles"—soul satisfying, forcible, convincing, also supported by much of personal experiences, many of them drawn from his rich fund of experience in the Holy Land. Brother Greene left for Davenport March 26, and Brother F. A. Smith spoke throughout the following week, except Saturday, and again Sunday evening, April 3. His closing words of council and comfort at the morning sacrament service will be treasured by many.

The building fund committee is "doing things." They have inaugurated a series of socials, one each month, and have set on foot other schemes in the hope of bringing the fund to where it will be practicable to begin work this summer. The April social took the form of a Saint Patrick party, an impromptu program being the leading feature of the evening. We are not prepared to say how many of the participants would concede to having displayed Ireland's favorite color in the rendering of the program.

The Women's Department held a bazaar and food sale April 21 to 23, realizing $202 for the benefit of the building fund.

An Easter cantata was rendered at the morning service hour, following a short address by Brother F. A. Smith, both of which met with due appreciation.

The program outlined in the HERALD, as suggestive for April 6, was observed Wednesday evening, when some interesting material was presented.

Elder H. N. Snively spoke Sunday evening, April 10, in the absence of Brother Williams on district work, at Ottumwa. Brother and Sister Snively have recently returned from a winter in California.

CORRESPONDENT.

THE PLAINS, OHIO, April 12, 1921.

Editors Herald: There has been a small branch here for about ten years or perhaps longer, but we have always held services in the schoolhouse.

Last September there was a store building for sale and some of the Saints thought it would be a good opportunity to get a church building very reasonably.

A business meeting was held at which almost enough money was pledged to buy the building where it stood. Then it had to be moved and repaired. But the Saints once having taken the responsibility were zealous in their efforts to have the building finished.

Most of the men in the branch lost their time from work and donated their time also to get it moved on to the lot which had been donated by a brother.

Then some of the missionaries came and they were just as anxious to see it completed and ready for services as the Saints of the branch were.

We surely feel very grateful to our district president, J. A. Grant, and Brother J. W. Davis in helping to get it properly finished, seated, and painted.

Easter Sunday we had our opening conducted by Brother J. W. Davis which was truly a happy day for us all.

We have as nice a little church as there is on the Plains and the best location. It is not very large but will comfortably seat about one hundred and fifty people. It is all paid for and will be dedicated in the near future.

The Saints are all rejoicing and glad we made the sacrifice, for while some thought in the beginning it would be too much and we could not do it, all are glad and say that they have not missed what they gave. We surely feel that the Lord has been with us in our efforts to have a house of worship. To him be the glory.

Your sister in the one faith.

SARAH E. BATCHELDER.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLAHOMA.

Sister Ed. Dillon, district organizer, and Sister Elenor Brown, local president of the Women's Department, went to Red Rock last week and put in a day with the Lamanite Sisters there. Brother R. M. Maloney went to El Reno Sunday and preached morning and evening.

Last Sunday, our pastor, accompanied by Brother and Sister Ed. Dillon, Sister Peattie and son, went to an all-day meeting of the Indians, near Perkins, Oklahoma. A large number of Indians were present, and after their "spread," which was excellent, Brother Dillon and Brother Miller made talks to the Indians, Brother Charles Moore acting as interpreter. Then Brother John Koshiway baptized two Indian women and one young Indian man, after which they were confirmed by Brethren Dillon and Miller.

REPORTER.

The 1921 Acacia is finished and on sale. It is a very creditable production and worth much more than the students of Graceland are asking for it.

A meeting at Manchester, England, brought out that child welfare work has resulted in materially reducing the death rate among children, which in 1895 was 202 per thousand. In 1910 it was reduced to 132, and last year to 97.

Reunion Notices

Nauvoo, at the old historical city of Nauvoo, Illinois, August 19 to 28. The very best of speakers will be present. You should arrange your vacation so as to attend this reunion. It will give you a chance to visit this old historical place, and study at first-hand some of the early history of the church. Reunion grounds are located on the "Flat" near the old home of Joseph Smith, and near by is the "Mansion House," the "Nauvoo House," the William Marks home, and many other places of interest. The Mississippi spreads out on three sides of the grounds and affords fine bathing in the daytime and a cool breeze at night, so you are sure of a good night's rest. The committee are sparing nothing to make this one of the best reunions of the season. A word of warning! Tents! Have you a tent? If not, write to D. J. Williams, 725 Lewis Street, Burlington, Iowa, and order what you want. Do not put this off as you did last year, but do it now, and don't forget the cots. If you are going to a reunion this year, Old Nauvoo extends to you a welcome. P. R. Burton.

It has been decided to postpone the reunion of the Alabama District till Saturday, August 13. Levi Gamet, president.

To the Prayer Groups

I am counting on the members of the groups to remember the sick in an especial manner when called on through the church papers.

Word comes from a brother requesting prayers for his crippled son. Let groups 4, 5, 13, and 22 fast and pray that nothing contrary to God's will may stand between this unfortunate one and his recovery.

God has promised to heal us of all diseases when we approach him with faith sufficient and ask in harmony with right.

Zion Builder Services Not a Fad

They result in new consecration and increased devotion on the part of our young people.

We have received several letters of late which have referred to the meetings, "Gospel sermons for young people," or "Services for Zion Builders," as a fad. Those who are acquainted with its genesis and development well know that it is not in its essential elements a fad, but has been witnessed by a great outpouring of the Spirit of God, the spirit of devotion, and real consecration to his service.

It is quite true that anything, however good, may be made a fad by some, or approached in that spirit by others. But no really good work should thereby be called in question.

It is often to be noted that people make a start on a certain kind of a plan, or emphasizing some particular factor; and soon a great multitude is following the same way, and going to more or less extremes. It probably is quite natural and human that certain factors are occasionally overemphasized.

The movement of the young people of the church, under the name Zion Builders, or any other name, is one of the great signs of the times, and represents a great spirit of devotion, and desire for true preparation and consecration to the service of God, which should not be ignored.

It is quite true that an organization is not the whole thing. The organization is in fact very incidental to the work to be done. But through an organized effort much more can be accomplished than is possible in any other way. It would not do to wait until the date for opening the meetings to begin a proper campaign of advertising. It would not do to wait until the hour of opening to offer our prayers. The need of seeing that all things are prepared before us is by no means limited to the movement to Zion. We should see that all work is carefully planned ahead of time. Nor does that mean hour after hour and day after day to meet in useless committee meetings, going over and over the same plan. The true leader or executive should lead out, and submit definite propositions to his committee, and soon have suitable subcommittees organized.

Yet in the past we have picked up an account of special services and read that the first sermon was urging everyone to come out, and that we should support the meetings. Or it may be "the first week was spent by Brother B—— in working up an interest," and at the end of one or two weeks the interest is secured. When one moves into a new field, no other alternative is possible. But where the work is in an organized branch, this preliminary work should be done beforehand.

Or again, when called to order, the local president raises the question as to what shall be done in these meetings; what is their purpose, and what is their scope? If this were a meeting of a branch president with the heads of the various departments of work, and with leading members of the priesthood beforehand, well and good. Or if it is a preliminary business meeting, well and good. If it were a meeting of the district president and the branch presidents to prepare and organize, well and good. But when it is supposed to be one of the meetings, and the time is spent in discussing, Why are we here, and what are we going to do? there would seem to be a very apparent lack of executive ability, and of preparing all things before us. Officers are chosen for the purpose of preparing definite programs, and seeing that the work moves on as it should, and that the utmost benefit is gained in the time allotted.

Yet important as that work is, and important as it is to the success of a series of services, whether for one day, two days, a week, or longer it is entirely subordinate to the spiritual preparation needed, the prayers for divine guidance, and the spirit of consecration, that we may plan that which is to be submitted, and may have this spirit in its exposition.

The mere holding of meetings is not an end in itself, but only a means to an end, and that end should be better information, to the end, Second, that we may become better citizens of the kingdom of God, because, Third, we have received a new inspiration and a greater degree of his Spirit, and Fourth, to the end that we may with a fuller consecration, be able to render better service to others.

In all of our special services, in all of the work for that matter, in all of the work of the church the best results will be secured by preparing all things before us. By preparing a definite program, the best of which we are now capable, and striving to carry it out, not neglecting earnest, humble prayer, results are achieved.

At these special services now being held for the young people, under the name of Zion Builders, this principle is being exemplified, and results secured. From everywhere that we receive reports, the same story is told. The speakers feel the special inspiration of their efforts, and are endued with a new power, so that they speak as they have not been able to speak before.

We have already set forth the results at Lamoni; we have already set forth in many letters the splendid spirit manifest in the services held by Elder D. T. Williams.

From Hiteman we have the usual story of increasing interest, and that the young people were delighted and inspired by Elder C. E. Wight's efforts.

From Pisgah there comes the same story. Monday and Tuesday nights find an increase instead of a decline, as compared with the previous services.

Everywhere we have been permitted to observe, the results have been a new consecration, increased devotion on the part of our young people, and a great desire to assist as talent and means permit in the work of the church.

Formalism will never solve our problems, but the spirit of consecration and true devotion to the cause of Christ will do so.

Come to the Philippines and Help Us

The cry for missionaries to preach the word of God is world-wide. Next week we will publish a letter from a sister in the Philippines calling for help. We may recall that twenty years ago the church was commanded to prepare tracts—Chinese and Japanese, as well as in Scandinavian, German, and Portuguese.

As to the second coming of Christ, we may note from Luke 12: 40, I. T., that there are three comings of Christ. This is confirmed in the Bible elsewhere. He has already come; he will come at the beginning of the millennial reign, and at its end. The 24th chapter of Matthew in the Inspired Version distinguishes clearly in the 4th verse the three events. First: "When shall these things be which thou hast said concerning the destruction of the temple, and the Jews";

Second: "What is the sign of thy coming";

Third: "And of the end of the world (or the destruction of the wicked, which is the end of the world)?"

We note then that this much-quoted verse, the 32d of this chapter, reads: "And again this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come, or the destruction of the wicked."

If the destruction of the wicked is the end of the world, it is evidently at the close of the millennial reign, not at its beginning. This is at least a possible consideration, and cannot justify our sitting at ease and saying, "Surely our Lord delayeth his coming." For he cometh in an hour that we know not.

Again, we figure too often adding year by year as in the past. With 10 per cent increase each year to the church, it would amount to a hundredfold in fifty years, or amount to ten thousandfold in 100 years. That is to assume that at the end of each year the church is 10 per cent larger than at the beginning of the year, and if this continues for 100 years it would mean 10,000 times as many members.

But expressing it in another way, the conversion of a few in each land will give a tremendous impetus for these few to convert others; and these others, still others. When the priesthood receives the endowment of the Spirit of God, they will move forth with mighty power to the convincing of the nations of the earth of the truth which is in Christ Jesus.

But again, we must remember that there is no promise or presumption that the whole world will be converted. The inference from Holy Writ is quite to the contrary. That the gospel will be preached for a witness does not insure acceptance by all people by any means.

The field is before us ripe unto harvest. Who will go and serve in the cause of the Master?

Our Third Reunion Number

In this issue we offer some more excellent articles written to help make all of our reunions even better. We feel that the success of one group of people will inspire others, and the advice of those whose experience entitles them to advice, is eminently worth while.

Believing that something concerning the writers makes the contributions more interesting, we offer the following:

A. H. Mills has devoted his time for the past twenty-five years and over to music. He was director of the Independence choir for many years, and is a musician of ability and devoted to that department of work. He has been serving the past few years as secretary of the Department of Music, and editor of The Staff in THE SAINTS' HERALD. On behalf of his department work he has visited many reunions in the past five years, especially in the East and Mississippi Valley.

H. C. Burgess is general manager of the Department of Music and is fully engaged at present in Zion Builder Services.

Elder Amos Berve is now president of the Eastern Iowa District, and prior to that was president of the Little Sioux District. Prior to that he was superintendent of the buildings and grounds at Graceland College. This included the purchase of supplies for the dining room, and the handling of that department. He has also had experience for several years in feeding the crowds at General Conference. He has had much experience in buying food in large quantities, and in feeding large bodies of people.

E. A. Kaler was a chef in the United States Navy during the recent World War, and since that time he has continued to labor in that capacity. The plan used in the navy was the cafeteria plan. He was chef at Graceland College for one year, and introduced the cafeteria plan there. He was also chef at the Lamoni reunion, and has acted as chef for several large clubs and hotels since being discharged from naval service. His experience as chef has been almost entirely with the feeding of large bodies of people.

Laura E. Mann, a trained nurse at the Sanitarium, is now acting in connection with the Health Department of the church. Her article is an able continuation of those printed in the first reunion number, and she adds to it a discussion of the question of diet.

Elder Leroy Colbert resides at Chetek, Wisconsin. He is Bishop's agent of the Northern Wisconsin District, branch president, and has been one of the strong bulwarks of the district for years. For a number of years he was superintendent of the district Sunday school association. He is an indefatigable worker and interested in everything that helps to build the kingdom of God.

Howard W. Harder, the general secretary for the Religion Department, is acting as its executive head during the absence of Superintendent T. W. Williams in Europe. Brother Harder is also one of the secretaries in the office of the First Presidency.

Elder C. I. Carpenter was for many years the general church recorder, succeeding Elder Henry Stebbins, whom he was assisting for several years. A few years ago he was ordained a high priest and appointed to the Kewanee Illinois District, of which he is district president. He is well qualified to speak on the plan followed in their reunion.

F. C. Webbe is acting as publicity man for the Kirtland District and in these summer meetings around the old temple.

This completes our third number. We also had several more good articles promised in answer to our original request, and hope to publish them in an early number, so they will be of assistance in reunion work this coming summer, as well as for the years to come.

Duet

By Adam J. Keck

Youth with the violin,
Age at the organ,
And both their souls
Through their instruments flowing
Float on the air:
My own, forsaking its frame,
Meets them midway,
And for one exalted moment
I understand.
Youth is a melody, strong and inspiring,
Age is harmonic, ably supporting.
Here is life in its best expression:
Youth choosing its worthy theme
And throwing its being without reserve
Into its variation;
Age, with its breadth of vision,
Choosing its varied tones
From field of boundless expense,
Weaving its harmony self-sufficient,
Yet lending the whole to soften and strengthen
Youth's overpowering theme.

Laying on of Hands

Sermon by Elbert A. Smith at Lamoni, during the Zion Builder Series. Reported by Winsome Smith McDonald.

"Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son. If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him Godspeed."—2 John 1, 10.

Jesus answered them, and said, My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself."—John 7:16, 17.

That wonderful promise is still in force. If any man will put God to the test and do his will he may know of the doctrine.

Did Jesus Have a Doctrinal Message?

You have noticed of course that the sermons of this series thus far have been doctrinal. We might ask ourselves, Did Jesus Christ come with a doctrinal message? If he did not, then we are not justified in preaching doctrine. But Jesus said, "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me."

He came then with a certain form of doctrine, and he received it from God the Father. There is, it is true, a prejudice in the world against the preaching of doctrine, and we have been told that people will not endure doctrinal preaching—especially the young generation were not interested in it. It seems to me there could hardly be a man so dense that he could look over this audience without the idea percolating into his mind some way that young people are interested in doctrine. For seven consecutive nights in Independence, from thirteen to fourteen hundred young people sat and listened intently to doctrinal sermons, and at the very same time one of the prominent churches in town that does not believe in doctrinal sermons put on a revival for their young people, and a bishop who attended said he could count the young people present on the fingers of his two hands. Another minister put on a lecture against Mormonism and there were eight of his people there and twelve of ours to hear it. He said he had preached for nine years in Independence and had decided that Independence is spiritually dead. Well, his end of it may be, let him say—but ours certainly is not.

Two ministers were overheard talking on a street car after the close of our revival, and one of them said, "I have been attending the meetings held at the Stone Church by the Latter Day Saints and I will tell you that we have got to wake up. Those people have a power with them and they are holding their young people."

It is a good thing to wake up, but it is a good thing also to have something to wake up to. Of course there is a power with the church. Where, outside this church, would you young people go to experience that which you experienced at the morning prayer meeting last Sunday? And I thought in the course of just such a similar prayer meeting in Independence when I saw young men sixteen or seventeen years old stand up and speak in prophecy—not some wild harangue, but an intelligent and powerful declaration of the will of God—I thought, I am glad I am united with a church that can say, "Our gospel came not unto us in word only, but in power and with the Holy Ghost and with much assurance." (1 Thessalonians 1:5.) I am glad of that, because I cannot tell you people that Jesus Christ is the Son of God so that you will know it. I can tell you, but you will not know it for yourselves; but I am glad I represent a church with which God is working and which believes in the spirit of revelation, so that though I may be a thousand miles from you and you alone somewhere the Spirit may speak to you and say, "Jesus Christ is the Son of God and the Savior of the world." We are told that the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy.

The pulpits are offering substitutes for doctrine, little exegeses of sociology and ethics and morals and politics and Shakespeare and whatnot. There is a penalty attached to that, and the penalty is stated in 2 John 9, "Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God." The result is empty and impotent churches. That is our explanation for the fact that ours is a doctrinal message.

Importance of Laying on of Hands

The doctrine that we have for consideration to-night, that of the laying on of hands, may not seem to you at first glance to be of any great importance. In fact, some people seem to consider it as being the least important of the doctrines that we preach, and the least interesting among them, but it seems to me that it is exceedingly important. First, because it is a part of the doctrine of Jesus Christ. As stated in those passages which I have already referred to where Paul enumerated the principles of the doctrines of Jesus Christ (Hebrews 6:1, 2), he names the laying on of hands as the fourth of those doctrines, and you will remember that Christ said, "My doctrine is not mine but his that sent me," and that whosoever "abideth in the doctrine of Christ hath both the Father and the Son."

This doctrine seems to me to be exceedingly important, first because of its origin. It is very ancient so far as practice is concerned. Away back in the days of Moses he blessed and ordained Joshua by the laying on of hands (Numbers 27:18-20), and he did this under direct commandment of God the Father. For some reason God chose to carry this ceremony on down and made it a part of the doctrine of Jesus Christ and a part of the practice of his church.

It is important in the next place because of its significance. We talked to you last night a little about symbolism. Humanity has always expressed itself in symbols so that man might see something objectively that would help to interpret the conception in the human mind. The human being is the only earthly creature that can form a conception of an abstract idea; and even man himself sometimes finds it difficult to do so. Objective presentations help. That is why pictures help so very much in the understanding of any kind of lecture or treatise, or even story. I mentioned some of these symbols, such as the flags of nations, the seal of state, the key of the city. Even to-day we give a distinguished visitor the key to the city—sometimes handing him an actual key, though there is no longer any wall around the city and no gate for him to unlock that he may come in and go out; but there was a time when it was an evidence of very great trust to give any man the key to the city. So to-day we symbolize our confidence in our honored guests. The wedding ring is a symbol that the wife may look at and remember the covenant she has made, and picture her husband though he be far away. Do you not suppose that our missionaries' wives, as they sit in the evening and look at the wedding ring on the finger, picture most vividly the companion perhaps on the other side of the world in mission fields?

We have ceremonial symbols also. In days gone by when men dressed themselves in armor and wore helmets on their heads, when they came into the presence of ladies or into church or among friends, they uncovered their heads as a token that there was no danger of blows in that society. So to-day we take off our hats under similar conditions, a sort of ceremonial symbol. Prostration in prayer is symbolical of humility.

God speaks to man in language that he can easily understand. The human hand is a natural symbol of power. By it man wields the sword, guides the pen, steadies the plow, drives the engine. It is absolutely the only thing in common use by which he applies the will and power of his spirit to material things, and everything on earth that is shaped by man to conform to the conception in his mind is shaped by his hand, so that it naturally becomes a symbol of power. And even it is a symbol of God's power, because we read in language which to be sure is figurative:

"God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran. Selah. His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of his praise. And his brightness was as the light; he had horns coming out of his hand; and there was the hiding of his power."—Habakkuk 3: 3, 4.

And so for good reasons God chose to make the laying on of hands the symbol of power and authority in his church, in many of the ceremonies and ordinances that are connected with the gospel of Jesus Christ.

This doctrine is very important because of its association; it has always been intimately associated with the act of blessing, also with the act of healing and with the act of ordination. So we may say that because of its origin, its significance, and its association it is exceedingly important among the doctrines of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

In Blessing Children

Now we consider in their order some of the ways in which this ceremony was used in olden times. First in the blessing of children. We may say in passing that according to the belief of this church the custom of baptizing little children is both unscriptural and unreasonable. I refer now to little children who are not old enough to understand or believe. Baptism is intended for those who believe: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."—Mark 16: 16. Baptism is also for the remission of sins: "Why tarriest thou? arise and be baptized and wash away thy sins."—Acts 22: 16. Little children have not sinned, neither can they believe or understand the gospel of Jesus Christ; but Jesus himself says, "Of such is the kingdom of God."—Luke 18: 16.

You might as well attempt to gild the rose, or paint the lily, or powder the snowflake, or burnish a sunbeam as to think of baptizing a little child to make him more pure.

Some one may say, "Jesus Christ was baptized and he had never committed any sin"; but baptism is also for those who believe, and Jesus Christ believed and always did believe. Even at twelve years of age he was found expounding the law that he believed. He kept the law that he believed, and was baptized as an example to all his followers, upon whom he made it obligatory to follow in his footsteps.

But when it came to little children, the record says, "He took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them."—Mark 10: 18. About the same statement is found in Matthew 19: 15 where it says he "laid his hands on them, and departed thence."

So it is a scriptural custom in this church that little children are received at the altar, and in harmony with the pattern Christ gave, the elders place their hands on them and bless them. It is certainly a comfort and an incentive to the parents, and a blessing to the children.

In Ordination

Next we may consider the question of the laying on of hands in the case of ordination. We have already mentioned the ordination of Joshua, and the ceremony certainly became a very universal custom in the New Testament church. For instance in the ordination of Barnabas (Acts 13: 2, 3):

"As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away."

Also in Acts 6 there is a record of the ordination of Stephen and Philip and five others: "Whom they set before the apostles: and when they had prayed, they laid their hands on them."—Verse 6.

This will suffice to show the ancient custom, and it is enough to say that in most of the churches to-day ordination takes place with the laying on of hands. We wonder why they do not observe the ceremony in other ways that are indicated in the word of God. For instance—

In the Healing of the Sick

We said last night that we believed in religion in the present tense. We are told by a great many people that God no longer heals the sick, that the day of miracles is past, and we cannot expect these things any longer; but as a church we have never drawn a line anywhere in the calendar of time and dared to say that on the other side of that line God revealed himself and blessed the people, but on this side he does nothing of the kind.

We are told, it is true, that people are becoming so much better and Christianity has progressed to the point where it does not need the things they had of old. That argues an entire reversal in God's administration, and he says, "I am the Lord, I change not."—Malachi 3: 6. Anciently the nearer the people got to their heavenly Father the more communion there was, the more revelation, the more blessing, the more power, the more demonstration, while now we are told that the nearer we get to him the farther away he is, and the less we hear of him, the more silent he is, and the less he gives.

I am reminded of the old story of a traveler who came to an inn and put up for the night. He got his lodging but he fell ill and could not eat his supper or his breakfast. When the morning came the landlord wanted to charge for both supper and breakfast as well as the lodging. The traveler was willing to pay for his lodging but not for the meals he had not eaten, and so they fell into a violent quarrel; but finally they agreed to leave the matter to the first comer to decide. So they told the first man who came all about it, and he said to the traveler, "Give me two pieces of silver." The traveler did so, and the man then took them and shook them by the ear of the innkeeper and said, "Do you hear that?" The innkeeper said, "Yes, I hear it. What of it?" And the man then said, "Well, all the traveler got was the smell of your meat, and all you get is the jingle of his money."

Now if it indeed be true that all we get is the smell of the meat that Peter ate and the shadow of Paul's loaf, then all God can reasonably ask of us is the jingle of our money in the way of service; but the trouble is that is about all the world is giving him so men do not get the blessings they used to have.

I read in John Wesley's journal that on one occasion when he was traveling a circuit in the woods alone his horse became very ill, and he says he dismounted and prayed over the horse; the horse was immediately healed, and he got up and continued on his journey. And yet men tell us to-day that God won't do for us what he did for John Wesley's horse!

I want to give you just a little chapter from my own experience. When I was a boy there was a misfortune came upon me that never can be atoned for in this life; namely, I did not have the experience of a father's companionship and guiding hand after I was five years old; but my mother's brother, whose name was Hartshorn, sojourned with us for some years, and in some ways he took the place of a father to me. I loved him very dearly and do yet. About that time there came into the neighborhood a young woman to teach the country school (my uncle was then a young man) and I was one of the four or five scholars who made up the student body of that school. She had not been there long before I noticed a most astonishing change come over my uncle. It was a phenomenon that I had never before observed. I did not know what to make of it. It seemed as though some one had turned a switch and lighted up an electric light inside of him. He just radiated light. You boys who have had the switch turned on know how it is. You know what this illumination means.

Finally, I discovered the secret. My uncle was in love; and very soon he and the young school-teacher were married and established a very happy home. Presently children came to make the home even happier. A few years passed by, when like a bolt from a clear sky something came that turned off the light from my uncle's soul. A malignant cancer developed on the breast of his wife. There was no church in that section of the country in those days. Twice she had that cancer taken out with caustics and suffered all the torments of hell. The third time it came back, and then they went to a little town called Cherokee where there was a little branch of the Saints presided over by Elder Crippen, if I remember correctly. The Saints there got together and fasted and prayed and she was administered to, and that night that putrid cancer came away. The sore healed up and she lived to be an old woman. God stooped down and turned the light on again in that home.

Thank God, our gospel came not to us in word only but in power and in the Holy Ghost and with much assurance.

During the revival meetings at Independence one evening I was called to go and administer to a young mother who was staying at the home of Brother Lee, only a few doors from our home. She had a little baby five weeks old and for five weeks she had lain in bed threatened with appendicitis and the doctors said she would have to undergo an operation. Brother Richard Lambert and I went from the church, from that great splendid assembly of young people; and with that spiritual power flooding our souls, we went into that home, and as we entered the door I knew positively that woman would be healed. That was on Thursday night, and Sunday morning she came to the church and came up the steps of the altar with her baby for us to bless. Our gospel came not unto us in word only.

When I myself was stricken down with severe illness some years ago and was packed away to California, I did not expect to live, and to tell the truth did not care to live. But just before I left, my mother came and put into my hand a communication she had received, which said, in substance, "The Spirit says to mine handmaiden, Clara C. Smith, her son shall recover and she shall see him return and hear him preach the gospel and prophesy and see him baptize those who are dear to her." I am here to-night in answer to the prediction that came to her, and through the grace of God.

We branch off in this way because the laying on of hands is associated with these wonderful things and we cannot consider it aside from them. So I wish to talk this evening a few minutes on this question of divine healing which is connected with the theme under consideration. Some one may say, "Well, why is it then if the sick are healed, here is so-and-so and there is so-and-so who are not healed? How do you account for it?" God knows why. I do not. Paul wrote (as recorded in 2 Timothy 4:20) that one of his fellow servants he had left sick at Miletem. Why did he not heal him instead of leaving him? I do not know. The fact that some are not healed does not controvert the fact that many are healed, and we read on one occasion that Jesus Christ himself could do no great works in a certain place because the people had no faith. Our faith does not always rise to the level where we can receive these blessings.

We do not believe in a fanatical attitude on this question, one that will make people disregard the law of the land; wherever the law says to call in a physician, or to observe quarantine, the law should be observed. Also the sentiment of a community ought to be respected; moreover we believe in sanitation and in intelligent nursing and proper medication, and for that reason we have a sanitarium at Independence to which people may come and be prayed for and administered to and if they desire be nursed or have medical treatment.

You must also bear in mind that this is one of the signs of the gospel. There are several cults which have arisen whose sole propaganda consists of divine healing, and there doesn't seem to be anything else they preach or believe; but Jesus Christ said:

"Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe."—Mark 16:15-17.

Believe what? The gospel. The gospel is the chief thing. A sign is secondary or subsidiary even though it may be exceedingly important. So do not be deceived simply because somebody preaches divine healing, but find out whether or not they are preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ. That is the fundamental thing to tie to.

Then another consideration, Jesus says these signs shall follow them that believe. Some say, "Well, let us see something of the kind and then we will believe." I never knew a convert made yet by a miracle or an act of healing. How many of the lepers whom Jesus healed were converted? Only one of ten even came back to say thank you. There are people right here in Lamoni who have observed the most marvelous cases of healing right in their own homes, who yet remain outside the fold of God. The thing that converts people is the preaching of the gospel, and when its logic and appeal of love have found way into heart and brain, then these signs follow the believer as a comfort, a strength, and an aid.

The laying on of hands is very intimately associated with divine healing. Jesus Christ himself set the custom:

"Now when the sun was setting, all they that had any sick with divers diseases brought them unto him; and he laid his hands on every one of them, and healed them."—Luke 4:40.

Mark 8:23, 25; Luke 13:13; Matthew 8:3 all record instances in which Jesus Christ practiced the laying on of hands for the healing of the sick, and he said, "The works I do shall ye do also." Also Jesus said, "They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover."—Mark 16:18.

So we find the familiar statement,

"Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him (anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him."—James 5:14, 15.

Here we have the course that is to be pursued in order to receive the blessing of divine healing.

One more instance I will note, and that is the instance of the healing of the Apostle Paul. I told you last night the story of Paul who was on his journey to Damascus to persecute the saints, and on the way the Lord Jesus appeared to him and he was stricken down and taken blind into Damascus. One Ananias came to him, being sent of the Lord, and said, "The Lord even Jesus who appeared to you in the way sent me." The Lord sent Ananias, and the record says that Ananias came and "putting his hands on him said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost." (Acts 9:17.) And immediately the scales fell from Paul's eyes. He was healed and was baptized and received the gift of the Holy Ghost.

For Confirmation and Bestowal of Holy Ghost

This ordinance is practiced for the confirmation of members and for the bestowal of the Holy Spirit. Paul said that there is one Lord, one faith, and one baptism; but it is a dual baptism, the baptism of the water and the Spirit, as Jesus said, "Except a man be born of the water and of the Spirit he cannot enter the kingdom of God."—John 3: 5. For some reason God, even as he chose to associate human instrumentality with the baptism of the water, chose to associate it also with the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and certainly we will admit that all need the Holy Spirit as a guide, because Jesus Christ said it should come to guide us into all truth. (John 16: 13.)

You young people are seeking after truth. That is why some of you are going to college; that is why you are here. Jesus said he would send the Holy Spirit to guide his followers into all truth. Let us see how in days gone by this ordinance of confirmation was attended to and the Holy Spirit bestowed on those who received it. We read:

"Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John: who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost; (For as yet he was fallen upon none of them: only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.) [They had been baptized, but for some reason the Holy Spirit had not come upon them.] Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost."—Acts 8: 14-17.

One more instance:

"And it came to pass, that, while Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the upper coasts came to Ephesus: and finding certain disciples, he said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. . . . [Some one had been going through there preaching and baptizing who had no right to do it, and so evidently did not understand the gospel, though claiming to baptize with John's baptism. They had not heard there was such a thing as the Holy Ghost.] Then said Paul, John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people, that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus. When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied. And all the men were about twelve."—Acts 19: 1-7.

I know it is argued by some that this work was limited to the twelve apostles; that the twelve did lay hands on the people, did baptize with the Holy Spirit, and heal, but no one else had the right; but I call your attention to the fact that Ananias was not an apostle and yet he came to Paul and said, "Jesus sent me that you might receive your sight and be filled with the Holy Ghost."

Why should anyone scoff at this gospel principle? It has been associated with the most holy experiences of humanity. It has a deep religious significance. It is a part of the ritual that God himself established; and as one of old said, "Who are we that we should withstand God?" He chose to make it a part of his doctrine. That ought to be sufficient for us.

Other Revivals Needed

Now just a word in conclusion about the effect of this revival. You are listening patiently, and evidently with a great degree of interest, to the expounding of the doctrines of Jesus Christ, and we are emphasizing those doctrines because of their very deep significance and importance. But consideration of them will be absolutely useless to you unless you avail yourselves of the blessings that follow in their wake. These doctrines are not by any means an end; they are simply a means to an end.

God set up a ladder and you can climb the rounds, faith, repentance, baptism, the laying on of hands, and by and by the resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment, and you will find yourself in the presence of God.

I have heard people say—they said it in Independence—"Oh, yes, this is a wonderful revival, but it will soon be over and the effects will wear off and it will have to be done all over again." Well, what of it? When you eat a splendid Thanksgiving dinner you don't expect it to last all the year, do you? The chances are that by evening your mother will find you prying about in the cupboard for something to eat, and the next day you are ready for three good meals. You come here to be filled with spiritual food, but you will not get that here which will satisfy you forever. You will need to come to the table of God often in many revivals. We ought to have revivals of this sort at least once a year. This is but a beginning; this is but a promise, a little thing, a very little thing compared to what you will see before you die—small to what you will see before you are ten years older. I think I am safe in making that prediction. I tell you this army of young people is going to count for something—but this is not really the army. These are the recruiting officers—we are training a group of recruiting officers here, and we expect you to go out and gather the army.

Up Against a Real Struggle

You will get hungry again, and of course you will have to come to preaching meeting and prayer meeting from time to time, because the effect of this meeting will wear off. Or, to change the figure, you young fellows who play football do not expect that at the first kick you get at the ball you will send it clear down the field and between the goal posts and on over the horizon. When you make a terrific struggle to make a ten yard gain and then probably lose it or part of it, the captain doesn't say, It is no good, boys; we will have to do it all over again. Certainly not; you are up against the real thing; you have to struggle hard, and if you lose a few yards you work the harder to make it up, and go and go and keep going until you make your touchdown.

I will tell you that in this work you are up against the real thing. You may think this religious talk is poetical and fanciful and romantic, nothing in it, but I tell you when you start out to live the religion of Jesus Christ you are up against the real thing.

This gospel demands that you be clean men and women, and it is not easy to be clean in this dirty world, which is getting dirtier every day. This gospel demands that you shall be honest men and women, and it is not easy to be honest in this dishonest old world. This gospel demands that you shall be industrious, and there will be many times when it will be much easier to play than to work. This gospel demands that you shall be studious, and it is much easier to flunk than it is to make your grades. It is easier to get by with your lessons than to get them. This gospel demands that you be true men and women, and when you undertake that job you are up against the real thing; but as the Bible says, If God be for us who can be against us?

When I point out the terrific obstacles you will encounter when you try to live the gospel of Jesus Christ in this sin-cursed earth, when your young blood runs riot with temptation, with passion and desire and appetite, I do not wish to discourage you—I point you to one who is greater than you or I, Jesus Christ, who overcame all of these things and put them behind him, and his desire is to make you like as he was.

May he pour out his Spirit upon you and endow you with his power is my prayer.

The Health of the Camp

By Laura E. Mann, R. N.

A comprehensive survey of all the factors that affect the health of a reunion.

This problem is not really an easy one to write on owing to the differences in climates, countries, and places in which reunions are held. There is probably no problem more important, however, than the health problem.

It seems to me that a health committee should be provided for at the time a reunion is decided upon. They should be wide-awake Saints who will make it their business to get acquainted with all the health essentials so that they can make logical and sane conclusions in the best and most economical manner. A wide-awake physician or trained nurse would be of value to them, and the church health department will gladly give all assistance possible.

This health committee should make a list of their particular problems, covering as nearly as possible every health detail, a considerable time before the reunion is to convene.

If it is to be a healthy camp, the following suggestions will need be followed, as they are hygienic principles, which it is cheapest in the long run not to disregard.

Site

Should be high and dry. Some trees are desirable but they should not be so thick that the grounds are damp, for there should be in the healthy camp abundance of sunshine.

Water

An unlimited supply of pure, wholesome water, which means properly located, water analyzed, and of agreeable taste. Water samples are tested free of charge in most States. Write your State board of health at your capital and they will tell you where to send your sample. Government pamphlets on this subject can be secured free upon request, and others, which will be of invaluable assistance to you, by addressing the Government Printing Office, Washington, District of Columbia.

Space

(a) A large campus should be chosen so that the horses and other animals may be at a sufficient distance that there will be no odor, or they will be an attraction for flies to the camp.

(b) To allow room for toilets and garbage pits to be placed far enough away that they are not a nuisance. The kind of structure of course has a bearing on this subject, as a modern type of toilet, flushed with water each time, may be nearer than an ordinary outhouse.

(c) The dining tent, grocery, and confectionary tents should have room and proper location that they may meet all sanitary requirements.

(d) There should be room so that tents need not be too close to each other. They should have an alleyway at the back so the garbage collector may drive through and collect the garbage.

(e) There should be room enough so that a large, nearly level space may be reserved for the children's playground near which the children's tent may be placed, but a considerable distance from the large tent, so that the peacefulness of older or nervous people need not be infringed upon during services.

The young people should not be forgotten and should also have a playground for volley and various ball games. Particularly should we consider this recreational side of life at the reunions, because for many it is their only vacation during the year.

Station

The camp should be near enough the railroad station to permit those who are financially poor to bring the proper amount of clothing and bedding. There is quite likely to be insufficient covers if the camp is far and luggage transportation high.

Another reason is in the consideration of the ones who are not robust, perhaps reaching their declining years, or of some expectant mother, as it lowers their vitality, and causes harmful fatigue to ride over long, wearisome, or rough roads to camp.

Season

Stove problem should not be forgotten if the reunion is in the early spring or late fall.

Now let us consider in a little more careful detail health necessities. While we live in camp, we must go to church, cook, eat, sleep, rest, and have recreation all in the proper proportion if we are to have or receive the maximum amount of good from the reunion, and as Saints we should study to make possible the maximum results in all our undertakings.

Eating Problem

Let us consider the eating problem by beginning with the kitchen. It should be large enough to hold sufficient equipment, tables, cooking vessels, stoves, and other essentials. Seldom do reunion cooks have enough large kettles, mixing bowls, or sufficient paring knives, spoons, and other utensils. They should have sufficient equipment to cook health-giving meals. I have seen such small stoves used with such worn-out ovens, they were not of any value for cooking, and the cook grieving because she could not change the menu, but had to have every day for ten days the same thing for dinner. How many of us have eaten cheap, boiled meat, often too tough to cut, for dinner and supper every day. As a rule we blame the cook, but we should not.

The cooks should have their stoves, and the dishwashers theirs, and they should be separate so that the dinner may be kept warm and the dishwasher kept heated at the same time. Dishwashers should work on one side of the tent; the cook on the other. The cook should have plenty of shelves and tables. I have never seen one treated fairly in this regard. I have thought it was probably because this getting of equipment is usually left entirely to a man, who is inclined to think, "Oh, it's just camping; we don't need much," so he expects to cook for a hundred with about the same or less equipment than most women have every day to cook for the ordinary family.

Proper meals cannot be provided for hundreds with one little old smoky stove, three or four kettles, and a couple of small benches. If the people who attend the reunion can afford meals at a dining tent, they can better afford to equip a kitchen so they will have healthy, well-cooked, well-balanced meals made possible for themselves and family, than they can afford to skimp on utensils.

Many times sickness that has cost large sums of money and suffering will date back to a reunion for its beginning. I firmly believe that it is much cheaper to prevent sickness than to cause and then try to cure.

The kitchen and dining room should have a level floor, either smooth boards, easy to clean, or sand and gravel. Cement is also good if smooth enough to scrub. They should be fly tight, and all spaces for ventilation should be carefully covered with screening or netting.

Cafeteria style is perhaps the easiest and most satisfactory method of serving; and by this method it is possible to serve warm meals to all. To prevent accidents, I suggest two doors between kitchen and dining room, that those carrying foods will not be in the way of those gathering and washing dishes.

Tables in dining room may be stationary, but there should be room that a waiter or dish collector may pass between tables without accident. (There should be at least one waiter to refill glasses with water, show people to seats, etc.)

Tables should be of smooth, clean boards, easy to wash, or covered with white oilcloth or painted with white enamel paint. Never use tablecloths in camp. Crepe-paper napkins are most advisable. Linen ones should not be used by one at dinner and some one else for supper, as germs and disease are spread by such methods.

Some one should have the task of washing the table with warm soap water after each person eats, before some one else eats in that place, as well as between meals.

Oversight of kitchen, dining room, and serving of meals should be assigned not more than three, nor less than two persons, and one of these should be one whose final word will be the law of the arrangements or work. These women should be counselors at least of the man who is designated manager or buyer.

These persons should be there beforehand to plan details of the work—where shelves, tables, and other furniture and utensils should be located, that things may be as convenient as possible and all the labor and time saving possible for the workers, by careful thought and arrangements be made ahead of time, though this is seldom done.

There are a few men who could make these arrangements and plans, but they are indeed few. But we have no right to expect them to do as well as women in this, because few have had experience at such tasks.

All details of work, as who shall be waiters, who the dishwashers, just how much work ought to be expected of the cook, how the women in charge shall relieve each other, time of serving meals, rules and prices of meals duly printed, who will tend the fires, who carry water for cooking and dishes, who will serve the food, care for trays, receive payment for the meals, and arrange menus should be made before reunion starts. If all the possible problems are looked after, there will still be many more which cannot be anticipated, to be decided during the reunion.

I mention the above because I have witnessed confusion, and extreme overwork of certain ones at almost every reunion I ever attended, and I heard expressions like this: "Well, I supposed that the cook would pare the potatoes, but she says she never does; we hadn't planned on washing only the table dishes, and it makes it so hard on us." And a little questioning reveals the fact that the cook was only hired for a certain price without any arrangements as to what could be expected of her; sometimes they think she should plan the meals, and she thinks they should, and both come unprepared to do it.

I think it should be the women in charge, with the advice and counsel of the buyer, who should make a study of planning meals for a large number of people, for it is quite a different problem than planning for the family meal. Milk for the children—what ages, if supply is limited—should be their problem. They should plan for the children to get the milk they need, and say what amount may be spared for cooking, and for the tables. If in any way the committee doubt the purity of the milk, they should plan to pasteurize it.

Foods

I cannot go into detail about foods in this article, but would like to call attention to some of the errors I have noticed at reunions.

One is the serving of too much meat. I would advise it not oftener than once per day and that at the noon meal. It should be of good quality, not always a cheap boiling beef, as I have seen at some reunions.

Fruits. Fresh fruits seem invariably to be shunned by reunion grocery supply buyers, and I think this a mistake. Fresh fruits and fresh vegetables are much better than so much meat.

Breakfast in the main should be cereals and cream, eggs, butter and toast, milk or water for drink, occasionally bacon, but not together with eggs.

Suppers should be light. By light I mean composed of easily digested food, avoiding having an entire supper of fried foods, as I have seen. I suggest baked, scalloped, or stewed potatoes, with occasionally boiled and fried ones. Pies should not be served for supper, but for dinner.

Besides, I have also noticed a great deal of bread and tapioca puddings, which are the result of a desire to use left-over and dried bread. None of the bread should be wasted, but will be equally as satisfactory used in dressings, meat loaves, etc.—better, some of the time. I have seen these puddings served meal after meal, and only about half or two thirds of it more than tasted. After all, did they save it? Make fewer puddings of bread. Use more fruits and milk.

I have mentioned these errors that those who carry this responsibility may take it upon themselves to have studied and be ready to tell the cook how they want the left-over foods used and at the same time serve the people with a properly balanced meal, which should contain proteins, carbohydrates, and fats, as well as those necessary to provide the mineral salts.

Drinks

Water and milk are best, but I realize that there are still a few Saints who cling tenaciously to their "hot drink" habit to warm them up. If good barley coffee is provided with cream, most of them will take that. Cocoa when properly made with milk is much better than coffee, as it contains nourishment, and much less drug than strong coffee. Instant postum, when served with cream, may often be accepted instead of coffee. I think wherever possible to teach "temperance in all things," the Saints should make every effort to do so. And I think the reunion meals offer a good opportunity, if it is looked for there.

Dish Washing

There should be fly-protected shelves back of the serving tables for clean dishes. When gathered from the dining table they should be carried to a large scraping and sorting table (this not the cook's or the dishwasher's table), then scraped and sorted into piles for the dishwashers. They should be washed in large dish pans with warm, soapy water, placed in another large dish pan and scalded, and if not stacked on drying racks for a few minutes, and then put away, but dried, it should be with sanitary towels. They should then be put away safe from flies and dust until the next meal. Remember, it is very important that they are scalded; more so than in your own home, for germs of diseases go to camp at every reunion. Do not rinse in a tub of greasy, cool water, and dry on dirty towels, the method I have seen followed too many times. If we wish to prevent sickness, we must be clean, particularly about our dishes and food. Remember this. Also that all fruits, apples, plums, grapes, etc., should be washed before eaten, or given to the children. Neglect of this habit is very common, but should be corrected.

Tea Towels

There should be at least one for every three people to be served at your largest meals. I would say where a meal will be served to two hundred, that about seventy towels should be ready. This perhaps seems like a huge number, but when we think, we will remember that a woman washing dishes for a family of five usually uses at least two to dry her dishes; it then seems more reasonable.

If the women in charge are wise, they will have in readiness about three times as many tea towels as the average man would think necessary, or at least enough that rainy days need not hinder sanitary methods. I do not mean to underestimate the good opinion of men, but I do hope to impress on the women that the men are not to be trusted, as a rule, with tea towel or kitchen arrangement plans or problems, for that is women's work. Oriole and Temple Builder girls would have a useful task, if everywhere they prepared sufficient tea towels for reunions beforehand. Besides seeing that tea towels are ready for use, see that there are shelves for clean ones and containers for soiled ones; also that some one washes, scalds, dries, and suns the towels, as necessary, and that there are always sanitary ones for use. This latter means lines outside, and racks and lines inside for use on rainy days.

Confectionery stands should not be allowed on Latter Day Saint reunion grounds unless they are conducted on a sanitary basis, either by Latter Day Saints or nonmembers. I have seen ice cream and lemonade sold and the dishes merely dipped in cold water and rubbed a little with a dirty wet towel. It is possible to buy the sanitary containers, as well as cones, which if properly covered and handled may be sanitary. All fruits or sweets that may attract flies should be covered or screened. Provision should be made for the proper disinfection and cleansing of spoons, knives, and other utensils. Dining halls and stands should not be near where teams or autos are passing because of both flies and dust.

At drinking fountains, sanitary methods should be provided for. No cups for general use should be allowed at the pump or tanks.

Toilets, garbage, sewage, as already stated, should be provided for, and information may be had from the Government. But there should also be camp health rules prepared by the health committee concerning these as well as other subjects of health, and these printed and posted in a conspicuous place where all may read.

There should be a health officer to keep a constant outlook for unsanitary conditions. It might be well to choose a wide-awake physician or nurse for this. There should be a clean-up hour in the morning, and if necessary, clean-up days. Boy Scouts might be delegated to help or assist this health officer.

Where committees are in doubt over any of these problems, remember the health department of the church will be glad to be of all assistance possible.

The Music at Our Reunions

By Arthur H. Mills

"Music will do much, very much, according to the measure in which it is employed, for the greater spiritual life of any reunion."

Throughout the church the annual reunion is an event looked forward to with eager anticipation by many of the Saints in those districts in which they are held. Living in "splendid isolation" where they seldom hear a sermon or see a comrade of "like precious faith," they long for the reunion as an opportunity to feast liberally on the precious food of the gospel and receive a renewal of spiritual grace and strength.

How important it is then that those who have our reunions in charge shall provide well that those who come asking for this bread may not be given stones instead.

There are of course many things that should be done in preparation for reunions, but we propose in this article to deal, in the particular line of our calling, with but one thing—the music of our reunions. Now is the time district officers and musical workers over the church should be planning for the reunions that, during the coming summer months, will be held in many districts throughout the church. Preparation is everything: let those who shall have this work in charge begin preparing now, that their work may be effectual and the music of their reunions be a feature of real importance and not merely an indifferent incident.

Music Should Be Properly Planned For

Too often our reunion managers esteem the music work of reunions as merely perfunctory, or at most a pleasure-giving feature of the reunions. With hearts intent on properly quartering everybody in suitable tents; anxious that the commissary department shall cater acceptably; solicitous that the supply of preachers shall be such that not a sermon shall be lacking—they largely overlook some of the less material elements that contribute so greatly to the spiritual welfare of their reunions.

We confidently state, not from mere theory, but from both observation and experience, that a well-planned and well-executed musical service at a reunion will do more towards creating and enhancing a true spiritual atmosphere than any other one factor. We have repeatedly seen the spirituality of reunions grow under the stimulus of well-directed song efforts, until there was the actual result of the spiritual elevation all were seeking. Therefore, let those who have reunions in hand for this coming season look well to the development of the musical phases of their work.

Much of the planning and preparation for the music of a reunion should naturally devolve upon the district chorister, and this official should, in cooperation with the other district officers (usually with the reunion committee), endeavor to plan for an effective musical service at the reunion of his district; and he should not cease planning and working until the desired end is an accomplished fact. He should begin his planning and preparation in ample time before the reunion, that he may have his forces well in hand when reunion time comes. He should canvass his entire district, directing the various forces of each branch that their work may be in effectual readiness when they shall assemble at reunion time. Then, at the reunion, he should be early on the ground to assemble and organize these forces and carry into execution his well thought out plan of action.

Congregational Singing Most Important

Undoubtedly the most important feature of the musical work of any reunion is congregational singing. Special and incidental music of all kinds should be had at every reunion; but the one very important musical thing that conduces in the greatest degree to the spiritual enlivening of the masses at the reunions is congregational singing. Everybody is drawn out in song, and hearts are made to glow in a sympathetic warmth that finds common response in the breasts of everyone present. Further, the important element of service enters here: it is the congregation itself that serves; and it is an axiomatic law that he who serves begets not only the love of service but receives the joys and rewards that come from the service. Thus, the congregation in servicing partakes of the spirit of service, and receives the actual spiritual elevation that comes to those who serve. Therefore, at every reunion there should be congregational singing; good congregational singing, and plenty of it. Every encouragement should be extended the congregation to induce it to sing, and to function in this most important part of its service.

Preparation for this feature of congregational singing should be had in ample time before the opening of the reunion, and the district chorister should plan for the greatest possible development of it. He should select a list of hymns and songs from the church books, and a copy of this list should be sent to the chorister of every branch with instructions to practice such songs with his branch. In the selection of these songs there should be always a proportion of new songs chosen, that our people may extend their knowledge to some of the beautiful songs not so commonly used. A thorough practice of these by each branch should be insisted on, and the result will be for the good of the branch as well as for the district.

Must Have Songbooks

But it will do no good to prepare elaborately beforehand for congregational singing at the reunion and then expect to produce the desired result if there is not a sufficient supply of songbooks. Congregations can no more sing without songbooks than a carpenter can build a house without tools. We have seen several reunions where the supply of songbooks was scarcely sufficient to furnish the few singers who served on the rostrum as "the choir." The result was lamentable. No reunion should hope to function fully without well-developed song service; and no song service can thrive without an adequate supply of songbooks. Let those be had without fail, and the results will amply justify the expense.

Brother Hoxie's little book, Songs of the Legion, is perhaps a "happy hit" in the matter of affording a convenient, neat little book at a low cost. It is especially suitable for what it was designed: reunions and conference work. It will "fill the bill" of those districts that do not wish to go to the expense of buying the larger and costlier songbooks of the church, or who may not be willing to take the songbooks of the various branches to use at the reunions. It can be secured from the church publishing houses at the rate of fifteen cents per copy.

The Best Time

The best time to function in congregational singing is at the principal services, particularly before the evening service. The congregation should be induced to assemble early and sing for a quarter or a half hour before these services, in the true community spirit, which will always result in stimulating a real spiritual atmosphere for the whole service. Either the district chorister, or a leader especially adapted for this service, should take the congregation and by skillful direction get them enthusiastically active in hearty, spontaneous song, the kind that wells up from the hearts of people who feel within them the spirit of song. Have plenty of books on hand, and with an enthusiastic leader the result is sure.

Every reunion should have a "choir," even if it does nothing more than help lead the congregation in the singing of hymns. But many of our reunions can do more than this and can present, with the material present organized into choirs, occasional numbers in the way of anthems. This is done by the district chorister selecting anthems of the proper grade, having the different choirs of the district prepare them individually, and then unite those choir members present in the rendition of such, as a choir. As soon as the reunion convenes the district chorister should organize "the reunion choir," which should be composed of the members of the several choirs of the branches of the district present, together with those singers of recognized ability competent to sit with the others. After this reunion choir is organized it should come together at regular intervals for practice and the preparation of its work. The individual work of such choirs and their special offerings are of real value in the stimulation of choir development over the district, and they should be had wherever possible.

Right here it may be well to say a word regarding the services of individual musicians at reunions. It is important that the talented ones of the district be induced to come to reunions and render individual offerings. First, pleasure is afforded those who hear these offerings; second, such offerings add beauty and attractiveness to the services; third, by comparison with the offerings of others emulation and endeavor are stimulated; and fourth, those who contribute these offerings thereby enjoy the opportunity of doing so publicly, a chance some of them would not often otherwise have. Hence, there should be at every reunion as many individual offerings, both vocal and instrumental, as possible, that both enjoyment and development may be had. The district chorister should, in ample time before the reunion, make a canvass of the various competent vocalists and instrumentalists of the district, securing their attendance prepared to render their individual portions. These should be employed wherever possible and given place on the programs of the various services.

Good Instrument Must Be Had

One of the very necessary things for the successful rendition of choir and individual work is a good instrument for the reunion, a piano if possible. Too often reunion committees have been indifferent about this, content with "any old thing" that could be secured. Very often the "old thing" is a decrepit reed organ from somewhere in the neighborhood, loaned to the reunion because it was considered "good enough for a reunion" and "you couldn't harm that old box, anyway." Result: the music of the reunion is handicapped at the start. Every reunion should secure for its use a good piano in first-class condition, that those who play and those who sing, and the choir in its work, may have an instrument that will help them and not prove a hindrance.

Try to Have an Orchestra

"If wishes were horses" (or orchestras, rather) we would have every reunion in the church equipped with an orchestra. An efficient orchestra is one of the most enjoyable assets a reunion can have and in the accompanying of congregational singing it is unequalled, since it sustains, in the outdoor surroundings, a congregation as nothing else can. Of course, in the absence of materialized wishes, an orchestra is possible to a comparatively few reunions. But something, even if but little, can be done at most of our reunions. In many districts there are branches where small orchestras are serving. The members of these can be urged to attend with their instruments and music and, together with other competent instrumentalists, these can be assembled together as an impromptu orchestra after reaching the reunion, and with a measure of practice can render service in accompanying the congregation, at least. Let not those in charge be dismayed because the number of players may be small or the service rendered crude. Let these instrumentalists be brought together and into service, and development will come. Therefore, in ample time before the reunion, as in the case of the choir workers, a canvass of the district should be made and arrangements completed whereby those who play on orchestral instruments may be induced to be present and to serve.

The music work of no reunion should be considered complete unless there shall be had special educational work along musical lines. The assemblage of so many Saints from all over the district is too important an opportunity to let pass without an effort to educate and instruct in the music work of the district. Therefore, let those in charge prepare for this important feature. A certain day of the reunion should be set aside as "music day," in which special features of an educational and instructive character may be presented. This day should be entirely devoted to the interests of the musical advancement of the district work; ample preparation should be had throughout the district for it and all musical workers should be urged to participate. At the morning hour there should be a sermon on a musical subject; in the afternoon an "institute" should be held in which papers and addresses on musical topics, by various musical workers of the district, should be given and problems of musical work considered and discussed. Conferences with musical workers may be arranged for, and a "round table" in which questions may be asked and answered is a good thing. The day should close with a musical evening, embodying an entertainment offering the best the district can offer in the way of music. Then let the music workers start right off planning for a bigger, better musical success for the reunion of next year.

Social Side of Musical Work

One feature we will not omit from our list of musical activities at reunions is the social side of music work. Mixed with the musical efforts of every reunion should be had social relaxation and recreation. Social events in which the musical workers may engage, such as excursions, "hikes," "weenie roasts," and the like, help to lighten burdens and bind work more closely together. An occasional prayer meeting for the musical forces, either at the reunion ground, or in the woods, or at the seashore, may also add spiritual grace as well as variety to the experiences of the reunion.

If a reunion is important in the spiritual life of a district (and we presume it is or it would not be held), it is worthy of such effort that everything will be done that is possible for its successful conduct. And music will do much, very much, according to the measure in which it is employed, for the greater spiritual life of any reunion.

Music an Important Feature at Reunions

By H. C. Burgess

The appointments should all be made before the reunion starts and a definite plan of action determined upon.

Music is one of the most important features of reunion work, in that upon it depends to a large extent the success or failure of the various services. Imagine if you can a prayer and testimony service without music, or a preaching service, or a Sunday school session, or Religio, and so on even into the recreational activities. In other words, music is the servant of all. In addition there should be some entire programs in the interests of music, not only in the way of institute work, etc., but also concerts, to which all should be urged to come.

We would like to suggest the importance of congregational singing, and especially should this be featured at the evening preaching services. Get the people together fifteen to thirty minutes before the time set for the service proper to start; see to it that the platform is filled with singers, and the singing accompanied by "instruments of music of the reed and of the string, or instruments of brass in congregations that are large, and as wisdom and choice may direct."

The best way to be assured of a successful musical program is for the reunion committee to appoint some one in charge of that work who is a devoted and consecrated Latter Day Saint, who is awake to the needs of that particular reunion, who is a leader, who is capable, and who will be on the job. This director, or chorister, or whatever he may be called, should in turn appoint others to assist and take charge of certain phases of the work. These appointments should all be made before the reunion starts, and this music committee, if it may be called such, should then get together and lay out a definite program and a definite plan of action.

In this connection we would like to here quote a portion of the 6th paragraph of section 119 of the Doctrine and Covenants, which applies to the tent of the Lord as well as the "house" of the Lord, and covers the general subject of music in connection with our work very thoroughly:

"The service of song in the house of the Lord with humility and unity of spirit in them that sing and them that hear is blessed, and acceptable with God. . . . Therefore, in all the congregations of the people of God, let all strife and contention concerning song service cease; and that the worship in the house of the Lord may be complete and wholly acceptable, let them who shall be moved thereto by a desire and the gift to sing take upon them the burden and care of the service, and use therein instruments of music of the reed and of the string, or instruments of brass in congregations that are large, and as wisdom and choice may direct. Let the young men and the maidens cultivate the gifts of music and of song; let not the middle-aged and the old forget the gladness of their youth and let them aid and assist so far as their cares will permit; and remember that saints should be cheerful in their warfare that they may be joyous in their triumph. Nevertheless, let the organ and the stringed instrument, and the instrument of brass be silent when the saints assemble for prayer and testimony."

Also portions of the 22d and 23d paragraphs of section 110:

"Let your hearts rejoice, and be exceeding glad. Let the earth break forth into singing. Let the dead speak forth anthems of eternal praise to the King Immanuel. . . . And let the sun, moon, and the morning stars sing together, and let all the sons of God shout for joy. And let the eternal creations declare his name forever and ever."

The Reunion Cafeteria

By Amos Berve

Some items to be considered to observe economy.

Organization

Reunions are fast becoming one of the factors in the church for educating and developing the Saints, especially the youth. In order to make this factor of the church effectual, organization is one of the necessary elements to its success. We believe the commission form of government is the most practical for our reunions. The officers of this association (when practicable) should be composed of the executives of the district, who are also the coordinating committee of the district, namely: the district president and his two counselors, the Sunday school superintendent, the Religio field worker, and the organizer in the Women's Department.

The president of the district should be president of this association and have charge of the program work, and when one of the "leading representatives of the church is present" he should be considered one of the presidency. The other departments are: Sunday School Department, Religio Department, and Women's Department. These should be supervised by their respective heads in the district where the reunion is held. Other departments, such as grounds, tent, and dining, should each have its distinct head.

All these departments overlap more or less, and care should be exercised not to infringe one on the other. The duties of the various commissioners should be clearly worked out at a meeting by the commissioners of these departments, and clearly understood prior to the convening of the reunion. Should a misunderstanding arise which cannot be settled by the departments involved, it should at once be reported to the presidency, who may, if necessary, call together the commissioners and settle the misunderstanding.

Police

When located near a city or village, one who has been duly sworn in by legal authority to act as police is quite necessary. This should be done in a quiet way, such action being known to only a few, and never exercised except when unavoidable, and great care should be had in choosing the one so to act. This work should function under the commissioner of grounds.

Dining Hall

This is one of the problems of our reunions. The dining hall should be operated on the cost plan as nearly as possible. Each reunion should have its own paraphernalia for operating. The cafeteria plan is the ideal plan of serving, as the necessary equipment can be had at a moderate expenditure.

Extreme care should be exercised by the chef and cook to furnish balanced rations, so far as possible; yet with the cafeteria plan each individual must largely balance his own rations in selecting for his respective meals, and this is largely true in all cases. The needs of individuals differ, but it has been estimated that an average man at moderate active labor, as a farmer, carpenter, or mason, should have about one fourth of a pound of available proteid each day and sufficient fats and carbohydrates, in addition, to bring the total fuel value of the whole diet up to about three thousand calories. A man at sedentary employment would require only one fifth of a pound of proteid, and other nutrients enough to produce a total of only twenty-seven hundred calories of energy. A woman under similar conditions would need about eight tenths as much food as a man.

A one-sided or badly balanced diet is one in which either proteid or fuel ingredients are in excess. If we eat too much meat and too few vegetables, the diet will be too rich in proteid and may be harmful. Or, if we eat too much pastry and other food rich in fats and sweets, the diet furnishes too much energy and too little building material. The result is injurious to health as well as false economy. Waste from overeating is perhaps not common, except among persons of sedentary occupations. This is largely true in our reunions and conferences, where we do not exercise as we should; and we, especially those who usually labor at heavy muscular work, who come to reunions and conferences, should exercise extreme care in diet.

Economy

The most common errors in food economy are: (1) The needless waste of expensive foods, (2) the use of one-sided diet, (3) waste of food from overeating, (4) table waste, and (5) neglect of value of refuse. Many housekeepers buy the more expensive kinds of meat and pay higher prices for vegetables and eggs out of season from a mistaken belief that such foods are enough more nutritious to be worth what they cost. In point of fact, equal amounts of nutriment could be obtained from other foods at very much lower prices. The result is a great waste of money. The maxim that "the best is the cheapest," as properly understood to apply to high prices, is not true of food. The larger part of the price of the costlier foods is paid for appearance, flavor, or rarity. While often more pleasing to the palate and sometimes more easily cooked or of finer flavor, the dearer articles are no more digestible or nutritious than the cheaper ones. The cost of the amounts of different nutrients required varies greatly with the different kinds of food at ordinary prices. For example, one fourth of a pound of proteid from a sirloin of beef at 25 cents a pound would cost 40 cents. The same amount from a shoulder of beef at 12 cents a pound would cost 19 cents, and from a beef stew meat at 5 cents a pound only 9 cents; yet the actual value in diet would be identical.

The plain, substantial standard food materials, like the cheap cuts of meat and fish, milk, flour, corn meal, oatmeal, beans, and potatoes, are as digestible and nutritious and as well fitted for nourishment of persons in good health as are any of the costly materials.

Dried and preserved fruits form an especially important part of the diet, since they may contain fifty per cent or more of available carbohydrates in the form of sugar, in addition to many characteristics of fresh fruit. In short, fruits are a valuable part of a well-balanced diet and may well be eaten in larger quantities than at present.

Jams and jellies purchased at the retail markets should be avoided, as there is no class of food products, with the exception of spices, so commonly adulterated as jams and jellies. Much might be said about cereals, but time and space will not permit. Suffice it to say, they contain little fat, but consist, on an average, of 10 per cent proteid and from 60 to 80 per cent carbohydrate with varying proportions of water and ash. A careful study of the principal breakfast foods, made under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture, indicates that the nutritive value and digestibility are practically the same as the old-fashioned porridge and similar dishes. The ready-to-eat cereals economize time, and to some extent fuel. This advantage may justify the difference in their cost under certain conditions.

The Commissary at Reunions

By E. A. Kaler

Helpful suggestions for reunion commissary committees and caterers for church gatherings.

Efficiency and satisfaction are the two words which we might term as the guide in the catering trade to-day. Apply these to the commissary and dining departments of our reunions and gatherings, and the same will relieve in a great measure the worries of those in charge.

I am sure those who have been on the commissary committees will agree with me that it is no small task successfully to feed a body of hungry Saints. We find their likes and dislikes are always very pronounced. Just a bit of system and preparation beforehand will allow satisfaction to those who are doing the catering.

Many of my suggestions are from actual experience at reunions and conferences. Having followed the arts of catering and cookery for some time, I find the most common complaint is from those working in the dining halls and tents, that they have to sacrifice the meetings. I do not believe that it is necessary to do this altogether. Some meetings may be missed by those doing the cooking, but the other help can generally be free to go to all the meetings. A system of working hours, of so many hours to a shift, will remedy this. This can easily be worked out with the cafeteria system, which I will describe later.

First must be considered the housing facilities. At some of the reunion grounds, permanent kitchens and dining halls are built. A good plan is a large, airy room, with screening half on sides, and window shutters shaped for rainy and cold weather. Where the reunion grounds are owned by the district or branch, the best and most satisfactory plan is a permanent building. I will not describe in detail the plans for such a building, as such must be built and adapted to the size of the gathering and weather conditions of the part of country built in. Definite and suitable plans may be secured from the church architect.

Be Careful About Location

If dining tents are to be used, be sure that the place selected is one where the ground will be high and dry during any heavy rain. This certainly is one of the disagreeable features of eating in a tent under rainy weather. Flooring is only temporary and expensive, and a high, dry knoll is just as good. Around the base of the tent a small ditch can be made, and a baseboard of plain 1 by 4 or 6 inch siding can be used. Tack common cotton screening to this, and fasten to the top, and be sure that the canvas covering on sides is free to drop during a wind or rain, or the screening will soon blow out.

There are several arrangements of kitchen service that can be used, which will be referred to later.

Three Methods for Service

There are three methods of dining room service, which I will describe, and are the most practicable. In small gatherings of seventy-five people and less, the table service method is best.

Two long tables can be used, and before the meal hour the set-ups of salt, pepper, and sugar, the service ware, bread, butter, condiments, cold beverages, and desserts may all be placed on the table. The guests are then admitted. When all are seated, the waiters will bring a large dish of each kind of food that is on the menu, and serve a portion to each person individually.

For instance, the menu consists of:

	Boston Clam Chowder
Mashed Potatoes		Baked Tomatoes
	Boiled Halibut
	Stewed Chicken
Cold Slaw		Cabinet Pudding
	Beverages

All except the hot foods will be on the table. Waiter (number one) passes each who desires a portion of chowder from the tureen he carries. Waiter (number two) gathers up the empty plates, and waiter (number one) passes the vegetables, etc., continuing till each course is served.

For small gatherings this is a very quick and satisfactory service. It is used in railway eating houses where only twenty minutes are allowed to eat.

Another method is the old table style of catering, where everything is on the table, and the guests help themselves to what they like of each. This is a very unsatisfactory and wasteful method for large bodies, but can be used successfully in feeding crowds of under fifty guests.

Cafeteria System the Best

In the feeding of large crowds of one hundred persons and up, the cafeteria system is the best. These are a few of the reasons:

1. Fewer employees are required.
2. Economy in operation.
3. Smaller garbage waste.
4. Guests fed in short time, and no confusion.
5. The guest selects exactly what suits his or her taste and pays only for the same. For instance, a guest desires only a dish of corn and a glass of milk. Under other systems except a la carte, he cannot do this and there is waste on the caterer's side, and the guest's, with dissatisfaction for both.
6. There is more profit and the books can show a balance on the right side of the ledger, and the Saint will have felt that he has been satisfied within the desire of his appetite and pocketbook.
7. A very important reason, concerning Latter Day Saints most of all: A good many reunions are held in warm seasons. A good many of our people follow the Word of Wisdom, and this system will allow them to select what they believe in eating.

Must Have Balanced Menu

No matter how satisfactory and efficient the service of the cafeteria system may be, it is without value unless it is combined with a well-balanced menu.

The menu is governed by the amount or number of persons to be served, the season of the year, and the facilities to obtain supplies.

During the summer season, fresh vegetables and fruits govern that division of the menu. Canned and preserved foods must of necessity be used in out seasons.

A good midday menu for the cafeteria system for the months of August and September is as follows: (Note.—Increase the number of articles of food served for a larger number of guests, and decrease for a smaller number.)

Four salads, made from vegetables and fruits in season, cabbage, tomatoes, cucumbers, lettuce (late leaf), new potatoes, beets, green corn, etc. Four to six vegetables: new potatoes, corn, squash, cabbage, tomatoes, spinach, etc. Two meats, or substitute of fish will average each midday menu.

Beverages: milk should be the principal one. Cereal and coffee and tea served on request.

Desserts: one pudding, cake, and pastry of different varieties, fruit salad combinations, which may be served as a salad or dessert. Jellos and any number of sweets that are wholesome and attractive may be served. The balance of menus consist of butter and various breads, and condiments, which may be placed on tables.

Below is a sample midday menu, in order, as arranged on cafeteria service tables:

Salads:

Sliced tomatoes and lettuce salad.

Cucumber salad.

Cold slaw.

Pickled Beets.

Vegetables:

Mashed potatoes.

Corn on cob.

String beans, creamed.

Stewed onions.

Meats and Entrees:

English meat pie with vegetables.

Moulded salmon en paprika.

Desserts:

Homemade bread pudding.

Sliced fresh peaches.

Chopped apples a la Waldorf.

Jello with fruit.

Apple pie.

Coconut cake.

Ginger cookies.

Beverages:

Milk (coffee, tea, and cereal beverage on request).

Breads:

White bread.

Graham bread.

Parker house rolls.

Butter.

Relishes:

Sour pickles.

Chowchow.

Homemade relishes.

This menu is governed by the season, and it is a combination of tasty and attractive foods, and offers variety for selection.

This does not come down to fine points and offer proteins, vitamins, etc., in proper order and arrangement for human needs, as I do not believe the people are yet educated enough to appreciate such a menu as a whole, but for those who are appreciative of these facts and wish to follow the Word of Wisdom, they can find their selection in this menu. The time will come when we can serve properly balanced menus.

The menus are food for careful thought, and mean hours of preparation for proper arrangement, and the feeding of our gatherings can be a very successful method of educating our people to eat proper food.

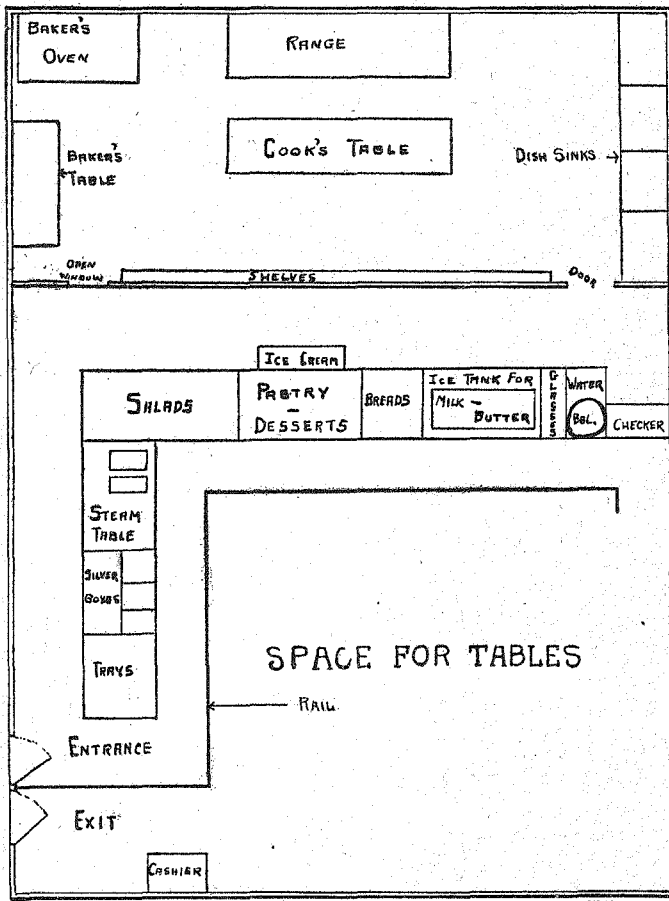

Breakfast menus are of less variety, and consist of the usual cereals and light foods and fruits.

Supper menus are of the same order of the midday meal, with variations of articles under each individual subject.

If a visit can be made to a large cafeteria in operation a much better idea can be secured than I can describe in this article.

Save Time and Labor

The big idea of the system is self-service, time and labor saving. The customer comes into the dining room and enters

PLAN FOR CAFETERIA

This plan may be used for any size arrangement and varied from if occasion demands.

a railed section which keeps each person in his order in single file. From the first table is secured a tray, silverware, and napkins; next is the salad table from which a selection is taken; passing on to the third table there is a steam tank, and selections from the hot vegetables and meats are made in passing. From other tables are secured the balance of other articles on the menu, and at the end sits a checker, who gives you a check with total price of food marked. This amount is paid to cashier upon passing out of dining room.

In a sketch reproduced herewith will be found a plan that can be adapted to a gathering of any size. There are no dimensions given, as the service must be adapted to building used. This includes a plan for kitchen service.

I have dwelt largely and in more detail on the cafeteria system, because it has been proven to be the most practicable system in feeding large crowds. General points only have been touched, as complete details cannot be given in this article.

For information on anything this subject covers, I would be glad to take up details with anyone, through correspondence. Home address, 1221 West Walnut, Independence, Missouri; or through Herald Office.

The Religio at the Reunion

By Howard W. Harder

Brother Harder is general secretary Religio Department and presents a number of practical suggestions based on his experience.

In any consideration of the questions suggested by the heading of this article, we must first define the work of the Religio, and in attempting to do this the writer is extremely conscious of the fact that others have done so and are still doing so and that he may contribute but little to the general fund of knowledge along this line; however, the thought that he may be able to clothe the old ideas in new words and thus accomplish some good urges him on.

Originally the Religio was organized for the purpose of filling a want among the young people of the church, and that want was expressed in the preamble to the constitution which was adopted upon its organization. The organizers felt the "need of a systematic and united effort to do good to others as well as mutually to improve themselves in the principles and practice of morality and Christianity, and also to secure to themselves social and intellectual development." And though the present leaders of the Religio many times have been accused of departing from the "straight and narrow way," we still find ourselves subscribing to the sentiment expressed in the old preamble, in addition to which we desire this development as much for others as for ourselves. It is true that the general methods of work of the Religio have been changed during the past two years; but while these changes have been made, the general purpose of the Religio as expressed in the preamble has been kept in mind, and it is still the goal toward which we are working.

The Religio was organized to work among the young of the church. It is still carried on with that object in mind. Since the definite assignment of the social and recreational work of the church to the Religio Department, some have been disposed to argue that it was not the young people's organization; however, President Frederick M. Smith in an address before the Religio Department at the exposition held during the last General Conference repeatedly referred to the Religio as the department of the young people, the reserve army that is to replace the middle-aged and old in the battle, and an organization of the young people who would erect new ideals and objectives toward which to work, as the older men of the church had done in their younger days. But, while we assert that this is the young people's department of the church, we still are mindful of the admonition of the Lord to those who are no longer young, and we desire to help them remember "the gladness of their youth."

Better Work From Specialists

Why should the work of the Religio have been defined as "recreational and social" when there are so many other organizations within the church supplying the very thing for which the Religio has been set apart? Because this is the day of specialization. The family doctor is no longer called on to perform operations, to fit eyeglasses, to extract teeth, to correct organic disorders. Why? Because there is now a specialist who can be secured to perform each of these different duties; and that specialist, being a specialist, can do his particular line of work better than it can be done by the general practitioner. The parallel holds good. The social needs of the church in the past have been ministered to by each of these different organizations as they were led, but the responsibility for such ministrations was not definitely placed, and as no one of them was a specialist in that line of activity these needs were but poorly supplied. The Religio has been asked to specialize in this necessary work, and in due time it will be a specialist and able to minister to all the social needs of the church not otherwise supplied.

The Religio, being composed largely of members of the church, and acting for the good of the church, should have no difficulty in carrying on its work within the church. Where there is difficulty and a disposition to keep the Religio from performing its manifest work, it is obvious that the members of the branch or district forget they are working for the common good of all. Few cases of this kind have been called to our attention, but it seems to the writer that where such a condition does exist it is simply a case of the hand saying to the eye, "I have no need of thee." Most Religions are Sunday school workers, and most Sunday school workers are Religions. The same is probably true of all the other departments of the church, so there should be no clash.

Two Kinds of Recreation

There are two general kinds of recreation, physical and mental, and it must be apparent that a program which would be helpful to all classes must embrace both. I am aware that in the past recreation has generally been thought of as exercise, physical exercise; but I desire to suggest that mental exercise or recreation is just as important, and of course just as much embraced within the scope of the mission of the Religio. Just as playing baseball or tennis is conducive to the general good health of the farmer or factory worker, so reading a good book or listening to an interesting lecture is recreation to the tired office worker. But I would not stop there. I believe the man or woman who works on a farm or in a factory can be as greatly benefited by mental recreation as can the office worker, though, of course, the kind of recreation supplied might differ in the two cases. Likewise, I am of the opinion that "setting up" exercises faithfully performed will work as great wonders with the office man as with the physical worker, and perhaps greater. However, this is but to say that both kinds of recreation in a sufficient quantity and of the proper quality should be furnished, not only the workers before mentioned, but all classes of our people.

I need not say much in this paper on the subject of physical recreation, as there is so much material already at hand for Religio workers, particularly in the new manual, What Can We Do at Our Religio? In this there are enough practical suggestions and concrete examples given to serve the purposes of physical recreation at any reunion. However, I should like to emphasize the necessity for one afternoon to be set aside for a "Field Day" program. This program should be very comprehensive and should include contests, games, and sports, in a number of which every member of the reunion could take some part. Prizes should be offered and friendly rivalry stimulated to the point where all will enter whole-heartedly into this program. I have attended a number of these field day meets at different reunions and have always found them successful. That is why I wish especially to emphasize the necessity for such a program at each reunion.

Some Mental Recreation

On the subject of mental recreation I desire to suggest some things which could be done at a reunion to furnish the necessary "balanced ration." Some great and successful man has said that recreation without education is wasteful. I do not wish to be understood as being entirely in sympathy with the thought, but I do think that sometimes we are too greedy for some form of pleasure in which we can indulge to our hearts' content without having to "think." Perhaps no one is to blame for that condition among young people, and they can probably be pardoned for succumbing to the desire; but I do believe it to be the duty of the Religio to provide such wholesome, interesting, and instructive recreation as will fill the need I have endeavored to show exists. A certain amount of carefree entertainment may act as a tonic, as, for instance, a good, clean, motion picture comedy; but when one indulges too much he soon finds that he is growing lop-sided in that direction and that he cares only for such intoxication of mind. To remedy this defect in our recreational program at reunions I believe to be one of the duties of the Religio.

To one who has studied English composition and rhetoric, even superficially, there comes a distinct joy when in reading or in a lecture he discovers an allusion to something with which he is familiar, or can pick out the different figures of speech as they are used. Inasmuch as many of our people never have had opportunity to make a study of this subject, I suggest that some person who has studied it, preferably a school or college teacher, get up a half hour talk that will illustrate the figures of speech, etc. Some examples from good literature, particularly the Bible, could be cited, and if the person speaking was properly prepared the whole exercise would be highly beneficial.

All too few of our people have any appreciation of art or even know the names of the great master painters. I suggest that lantern slides of some of the great paintings be secured and used to illustrate a short talk on the subject. Incidents in the life of the artist, the incentive for the work, etc., could be discussed. The same thing could be done with the subject of sculpture. I believe that an hour spent in discussing these two themes would be greatly appreciated by our people and would make for a broader general culture.

Nearly everyone is acquainted in some measure with music, yet I am sure that a very interesting and instructive half hour, or longer period, could be spent in a lecture on the subject. The talk should be especially along lines that would tend to increase appreciation of good music. Many people shudder when they hear the words "classic music" because they do not understand what it really is. Our people may well be taught that the music for many of our hymns was taken from classic masterpieces. The lecture could include a short treatise on the lives of some of our greatest composers, and short extracts from their works might be played on a piano to illustrate some of their moods, characteristics, etc. Let me also suggest that some of the better known descriptive masterpieces might be played on a phonograph, preceded by a short description of the piece and the composer. I believe a short concert of this kind can be made interesting to any person, old or young, who has even a small appreciation of good music.

Pageants Worth While

I believe that each reunion throughout the church could with profit work up a playlet or pageant. This has been done at some reunions and it has always proved to be interesting and educational. "Restoration," given in Independence at the Religio exposition last spring, "The missionary spirit of ancient America," at Lamoni reunion last August, and "A hundred years of Latter Day Saintism," given at the Des Moines reunion last summer, were equally successful. They are not difficult and could be produced by the young people of the average reunion with few rehearsals, though, of course, the principals should have their lines memorized in advance of the reunion. I cite these only as examples. I believe our people should give more time to the writing of playlets and pageants depicting happenings in our church history. There is no better place to stage these than at reunions.

Motion pictures, if a machine can be secured, might well be shown several nights after the regular services. However, care must be exercised in the selection of films. I would not bar comedies, though they should be short and should not constitute any one whole program. Travel pictures are always easy to secure, and likewise are always interesting. Moving pictures of industrial plants, such as those put out by the Ford Motor Company, can be secured at very little cost and are extremely educational and instructive.

On rainy days, and also on other occasions, old-fashioned "spell downs" can be organized. There are a number of games in which this same principle of the "spell down" can be employed. For instance, questions from normal lessons, Book of Mormon characters and names, scriptural passages, etc., can be used. Another exercise that frequently can be made interesting is oral arithmetic. All of these, of course, would have to be arranged to meet the needs of those participating.

Another "stunt" that can be made very interesting is to call for impromptu three-minute speeches from designated members of the assembly on such "impossible" subjects as "Why is a Bolshevik?" "How far is up?" etc. To make this really worth while, it would be well to assign the topics an hour or so before the meeting, so as to give the speakers time to prepare. I have seen this done and the results were remarkable. Some hidden talents may easily be uncovered through such an exercise, and it really is mental exercise to those participating.

There are a great many things that can be done at reunions looking to the mental recreation of the people that I could enumerate here, but I believe I have suggested enough examples to stimulate interest in this form of recreation.

Who Have Charge?

Who should have charge of the social and recreational work at reunions? It is a perfectly natural question, and I believe a perfectly logical answer to be: The Religio field worker. Why? Because this part of the work of the church has been definitely placed with the Religio Department. The field worker, being the only representative of the General Religio Department in the district, naturally should become the leader in all such work at a reunion in the district. Where more than one district is represented at a reunion, the field workers of the participating districts should have joint supervision of this work. I am not saying that the field worker shall be the leader in all these forms of recreational and social activity. The field worker of the Religio should be the one person in the district best fitted to be such a leader, and he should feel that this responsibility is placed upon him and work to discharge it. The musical program suggested above might very well be under the care of the Department of Music; and the lecture on art under the care of a representative of the Graphic Arts Bureau, but arrangements for these things should be made by some one. What I am trying to say is that the responsibility should be placed somewhere and that I believe the field worker is the logical person to bear it.

In thus writing, I am assuming that all districts have so coordinated the work of the church that the social and recreational part of it at meetings of the membership of the district has been turned over to the supervision of the Religio field worker. Where this has not been done, it should be. Logically, also, the field worker should be a member of the reunion committee.

Let me say in conclusion that the Religio has a definite goal toward which it is working. That goal has been fixed and approved by the leaders of the church, and though the general method of approach has been changed, the objective still remains the same. The goal of the Religio at the reunions is to make them measure up in a social and recreational way to the high spiritual standard that is everywhere recognized as having been set. We believe the responsibility is ours, and we accept it.

The Financial Plan in Kewanee

By C. I. Carpenter

No charge for tents or cots; no one asked for anything; no public collections or announcements concerning finances, and they have money left over.

We have purposely avoided advertising our system of conducting our reunions in the Kewanee, Illinois, District, because it is not deemed practicable by other districts.

In the first place, we have looked upon these gatherings in our district as primarily of and for the Saints, and have made a special effort to make it possible for the poor, those who ordinarily would be deprived of the benefit of the reunion, to attend and be on an equal footing with the most well to do. This is one place where we have tried to be "equal in temporal things," that we might be "equal in obtaining heavenly things," and that "the manifestations of the Spirit might not be withheld."

In order to make this possible we have no dining tent, but everyone provides his own meals in his own tent, and transients are cared for by invitation by those who are camping.

To further encourage the poor and those with but small means, some, when recommended by their branch presidents and the reunion committee approves, have been helped to reach the place of meeting and return.

No charge is made for the use of tents or cots, but everyone understands that it is our reunion and each one contributes to its support according to his ability without regard to what he has used.

Our treasurer does not ask anyone for anything. No public collections or announcements are made concerning finances, and thus far our needs have been met, and a small amount has been left each time after all bills were paid.

We do not sell refreshments of any kind, nor do we allow any concessions upon our grounds for private sale of any kind of goods for financial gain.

Believing it to be God's way, we depend entirely upon the freewill offerings of the Saints to meet all our demands. The people have responded cheerfully to this method, and the Lord has abundantly blessed the efforts of those who have sacrificed that others as well as themselves might enjoy the privileges and the benefits of the reunion.

How long we shall be able to continue under this system, we do not know. This will depend upon the spirit and the willingness of the Saints, but the past two years have been a success under this plan.

Governor Miller, of New York, started his campaign last fall on law enforcement, insisting that even in New York City the law concerning prohibition must be obeyed. Since inauguration he has continued his efforts, and secured the passing of enforcement bills to strengthen the hands of State officers in New York. He stands strictly for law enforcement.

An Unusual Method of Financing a Reunion

By Leroy Colbert

In the Northern Wisconsin District they furnish everything without cost except the meals, and the price on these is very low. And they have a successful reunion, too.

For some time the writer has intended to write an article on the Northern Wisconsin reunion, feeling that the Lord has marvelously blessed and inspired us as a committee in the piloting of his work from the date of its birth—July, 1909, unto the present time. We have worked toward two ideals; first, to own our reunion home and have a clear title in the Bishop's hands; second, to minimize cost to visitors and make it a ten-day home to all, yearly, getting all to see their interest in it.

Our first reunions were held under circumstances such as most of our reunions are enjoying to-day; namely, using other public grounds and buildings not particularly adapted to our work, and from our first session we began to figure to own our grounds. Our first years were hard, struggling with new problems to solve each year as it grew.

At our second reunion gathering, 1910, our attention was called to the parable of the oil and meal. Our cook (an outsider) reported that the flour never got less, and has advertised far and wide that she made hundreds of loaves, pies, cakes, etc., from a single sack of flour. It took three (150 pound) sacks of flour to feed the camp for the entire ten days.

At our 1912 gathering we determined to buy and equip a reunion ground. A committee was elected to investigate; a location was in sight. Brethren J. A. Gunsolley and F. A. Smith were counseled as to it, and had suggested it was a good site. The tract was at once bought, that it might not get out of our grasp. In 1913 it was approved by the gathering, the owners (Leroy Colbert and Orlando Colbert) donating one half acre (five rods wide from Main Street of the city of Chetek to waters of Lake Chetek); later selling the balance to the reunion at cost. The writer was one of the committee to go ahead and construct an auditorium and dining hall, to be ready for the following reunion of 1914. Everyone was willing to push and contribute. Though the whole district numbered less than five hundred members, we moved out, determined to the end to complete our program.

The season of 1914 finds us "tenting on our own camp ground," with buildings up and painted.

This year we purchased the entire equipment of the Lake Chetek Chautauqua, which included tables, cots—single and double—dishes, etc. The first years we charged twenty-five cents for cots single, and fifty cents for double springs. Charge on tents to play even. Each time our reunion committee met we prayed that we might be divinely guided to arrange the affairs of the district. More and more we have been impressed to minimize costs to visiting Saints and get it by contribution in the spirit of love of helping.

The last year we ever charged for tents, cots, springs, or tent floors was 1916. Feeling that each wanted to help we decided to give free all of the above, and donated help.

To supply the finance for the change, we arranged for what we call the "Roll of Honor," or dollar collection. That is, each person feeling so disposed gave $1, the name of each being recorded—a historical as well as a financial record thus being kept.

To pay for our grounds, we have our business session at our gathering each year. At this meeting each one subscribes the amount he or she wants to pay the coming year. This has worked out excellently, and we find we have paid about $4,000, and have hardly felt it. We allowed no one to pay over $50 per year the first two years; thereafter not over $25.

We have built our own refreshment stand, and run it for the good of campers. It usually nets us $25 to $60 profit. Our plan of its construction is of value to other reunions, and will be submitted to any committee upon request, free of charge. In one minute it can be closed, ready for night. In the same time it can be wide open for business at close of any service.

The Saints try to furnish vegetables as much as they can, and arrange a variety for our tables.

We have one chicken dinner, the last Sunday of each year. Members furnish one chicken. One dinner ticket is given free with each chicken; usually we have charged fifty cents for this, which has put us across any possible deficit. In 1920 by vote we charged only thirty-five cents, and netted over $100 for the dinner.

On closing our books each year we have a surprise to know how we have come out. In 1919 we had over $100 to the good. I called two or three (Brother McDowell being one, also the committee) to help ascertain. All we can say from our investigation is, it was there. In 1920 it seemed that 20 cents for breakfast, 30 cents for dinner, and 25 cents for supper would not let us out even, as we gave good meals. When we closed, we were surprised again to find we had as much to sell out of the kitchen as my invoices showed that I had taken in.

Each of our committees has its work. One in work kitchen has entire and complete charge of every detail, hiring help, buying everything, tickets, etc. One has entire supervision of stand; another of tents; one of grounds. We work as one unit, and the work moves on.

We are happy to say, "Brother McGuire, here is a deed for the most beautiful spot within the limits of the city of Chetek, and this is the most beautiful in the district. Cement walk from depot platform to and past our grounds, fully equipped from tents to kitchen; electric lights throughout buildings and grove of pines, which covers it to the water's edge. Insured for several thousand dollars."

It has been purchased by the Saints of Northern Wisconsin by yearly subscriptions, by sacrifice, by much donation of time and labor; it has been paid for in full. The property belongs to this church. It is our yearly reunion home, where God meets with us yearly, each year recognizing us as his children.

The only cost to visitors is for meals. Baggage to and from depot—free. Families camping too poor to eat at dining hall are provided with equipment, and food furnished them at cost from kitchen; also kerosene for stoves; milk, ice, etc. And in some cases we have helped them from our receipts.

Reunion of 1921, June 24 to July 5. Tents, cots, springs, floors, free. Further announcements later.

What They Do at Kirtland

By F. C. Webbe

This publicity man both describes and entices regarding his favorite reunion.

The Kirtland reunion is a success because it cares for the spiritual, mental, and physical needs. It seems settled that Kirtland is the regular place for the district reunion. Of course the temple is the chief attraction but has not been fully used except the first floor auditorium, where last year we received a Pentecostal blessing. This room promises to be inadequate in size.

The upper auditorium, which is fitted for lectures, study classes, etc., the seats being supplied with desks, is not used as much as it should be. Here on week-day mornings different subjects are studied at the same time, giving one the choice of any subject. We suggest a class in chalk or illustration, so coming teachers will portray to the young in a more effective way than by word only. Visual impressions on the young mind are lasting.

Baseball, lawn tennis, and other games are provided for the afternoon. In the evening the grounds are lighted and general games indulged in.

Music is a feature. Orchestra, choir, and songs, also outside the building, with other entertainment. In the auxiliary tent there are speeches, etc., and moving pictures of an educational sort.

The temple is surrounded by beautiful scenery: hills, valleys, woods, and streams. It is an ideal spot for outdoor play. Hiawatha or some Indian production could be put on each year, making a regular attraction to the town and city not far distant.

It is the custom to make one trip some afternoon to Lake Erie, five miles away. One evening is given over to a "trip around the world," featuring costumed characters, making speeches from a stand for the purpose.

A dining room is to be built and a place provided for campers to get supplies reasonably. Sanitary arrangements will be better. Good water should be provided and the camp drained against flooding in a storm.

Some seats should be scattered about the grounds. Many people will visit the temple from nearly all States in the Union and Canada.

The street car line is three miles away. Everybody comes by auto. We should establish a zone of quiet with speed limit for the occasion, and autos should head into curb, making it easy for anyone to get out. The Boy Scouts help the chief of police in their work. A good back stop for ball games should be erected for safety. We are about one hour's ride from Cleveland.

The work of the reunion should be church work. The departments should be only incidental to that end. The reunion committee should not simply give over time to some department, and then everybody go off and forget it. Due preparation should be made that the work in the general meetings should all of it be such as appeals to the whole body, and presented in a way to make it most successful. Many of the subjects which are put on as part of a department attract but few, but would interest the whole assembly if put forward definitely as part of the church work as it is. The work of the departments should not be ignored, but we should have reached the time when they can be handled more effectively, in the general meetings, as their work covers the whole church, results being our desirable end or goal, but not simply time assigned.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

THE AVERAGE MENTAL AGE

Your actual age may be much more than your mental age. Seventy per cent of an extensive survey were about age fourteen mentally.

In connection with the draft in the recent World War many volunteer and drafted men went under a severe physical examination. For the first time it was recognized that mental ability had much to do with the making of the soldier. In an effort to determine for what positions the men were fitted, and what their probable reactions would be in the stress of the battlefield, a considerable corps of psychologists were drafted.

Reports were secured in some 1,750,000 men. Of these, 70 per cent were found to be at a mental age of fourteen years or under. It must be remembered, however, that only pure intellect was estimated, and no reference is made to experience which may be gained by the age of forty. The Melbourne Age (Australia) comments on this, and states that it is a query if other nations would average any better, if as well. Fourteen years for an average mental age is surprisingly low. We quote:

"To toil mechanically, to behave decently, to beget a family—not much more is required from the man who recognizes no further duty to himself and to society. Further proof of humble intelligence is seen in the docility with which the public year after year submits to political injustice and anomaly. Masses of people are temperamentally placid. They are content to chew through life the cud of their state school education. The world may pulsate with vital interests and burning questions, but they remain unmoved. Like Gallio, they care for none of these things. Admittedly, reading is epidemic. But facts stored in the memory do not mean mental strength and agility. Capacity to read is not synonymous with capacity to think. Much of the modern reading is doing immense harm. Hobbes, the famous philosopher, said that if he had read as many books as other men he would have been as ignorant. Knowledge is being more widely diffused; brain capacity is not thereby being enlarged. Tennyson pithily expressed it—"Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers."

The article continues to comment upon modern conditions in the increase in general age. Older men count the present days degenerate. Young men expect wonderful intellectual activity in the next two decades. This was so of the years of the past. But actual intelligence has fluctuated but little according to recorded history. In the past ignorance blinded the possibilities of intelligence, so a few stand out. To-day intelligence is more generally developed. Against the background of the past, the slightest eminence was visible. To-day most men can read and write, and possess a high general average of knowledge. To meet conditions to-day, it takes many Napoleons and many Nelsons, because of the size of armies and navies. And the same is true of industrial life.

Some changes have arisen, as in the political arena. The political arena was once the only fitting place for the nation's great men. But to-day, that condition has changed.

"Modern democracy has driven them forth. Democracy is fickle; men must compromise and grovel to win its favor. Though despising themselves in the process, they do it to escape the humiliation which every defeat produces. The able man must depend for his opportunity on a preselection committee. He realizes it as he weighs up his life's prospects. Other safe and lucrative careers are possible; formerly the favorite career was the political. To-day the risks are too great, the means too contemptible. Everyone is on the bridge, or at the helm, shouting orders to the statesman. The little men are crowding in, the big men are steadily drawing out. They will not surrender to leading strings held by small groups of still smaller-minded people. The fact is an occasion for regret. In no other sphere are there such possibilities for doing permanent good over so wide an area. Statesmanship has always been the greatest work in every generation; it should be the greatest work to-day."

Another effect is that in the past England used to have her ruling classes. The phrase is always offensive, but it is now archaic. Once it stood for something.

"It stood for men who were from youth trained to govern; men who took the science of statecraft seriously, and learned it thoroughly. They have gone, leaving no equivalent. The qualifications required in the modern politician—and presumptive statesman—are insulting. He has no training; often enough he has little education, and his mind is innocent of history and economics. But he has made money, and has friends on the committee, or he is garrulous and has curried favor with his mates in the trade unions. On these grounds he is deemed competent to guide the destinies of a nation.

"The great statesmen of other days are not to be explained on the ground of educational and social advantages. Their success was due less to intellectual greatness than to moral earnestness. They had high aims which they pursued in the spirit of Nelson's battle cry, 'Victory or Westminster Abbey.' Abraham Lincoln is immortal, not because he was powerfully intellectual, but because, having political ideals—true or false is immaterial—he would not abandon them, not by one hair's breadth. . . .

"For the first time in history there has been set up a standard of mass mentality. It makes no allowance for the dominating personality, but in these days, when so many men are taking part in the corporate, widely ramified life, the dominating personality must be content with a less spectacular position. To have our mental level placed at the age level of fourteen may be wounding to our vanity. But we need not be unduly discouraged. At no time has the level been higher. Compared with any former generation our really great men are not fewer."

NEW MORMON INVASION OF ENGLAND

The Mormons, I am told on indisputable authority, are planning a fresh invasion of this country with the idea of carrying on a new proselytizing campaign. For some time past the sect has been losing ground in America, and the elders are turning to this country to swell the ranks of the depleted congregations.

During the war I believe the number of Mormon missionaries in England was very small, but now their ranks are increasing. There are fifty-nine missionary elders and five lady missionaries at work on this side, in addition to the local priesthood, and in the near future this number will be largely augmented. To most people Mormonism and polygamy are synonymous, and indeed till 1890 the polygamous teachings of Salt Lake City were openly practiced. But in that year the opposition of the United States led to this particular part of the church and doctrine being at least nominally abandoned.

A Reorganized Church

The public mind is against unjustly to confuse the original church of Latter Day Saints with its discredited offshoot in America. An elder of the Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints, as the present-day members of the original church style themselves, calls my attention to the fact that this body has no sort of sympathy or community of interest with the dominant church at Salt Lake City.

The creed of the Reorganized Church expresses explicit belief in marriage as instituted and ordained of God, whose laws provide for but one companion in wedlock for either man or woman. The Reorganized Church has several congregations in this country, and about ten branches are situated in and around Manchester.

The members are growing, and my informant tells me that the members of the community strongly resent the imputations which are cast on their doctrines by uninformed critics who make no distinction between them and the Mormons of Utah. —The Manchester Evening News, March 15, 1921.

BIBLE STORIES IN SCHOOL

The following clipping on "The Bible in school," was received from Elder P. H. Philippin. The first was printed in The Advertiser, of London, Ontario, for March 25; the other appeared in The Free Press, for March 31. The selection of certain texts or stories of the Bible for young children would have much to commend itself to careful consideration. One cannot read the whole Bible at once. Presented in the light of an introduction for young children, it might not be far amiss. But when a body of ministers get together to select texts of the Bible for the use of the community, they will quietly exclude certain parts, and therefore appear to withdraw from them their seeming sanction. That is one grave trouble with the so-called Christian world to-day. They do not accept the Bible as a whole, but claim that much of it has been done away with, or referred only to that day in which it was written.

The question of Bible teaching in the public schools comes up as regularly and perennially as taxes. Opinion, both lay and clerical, is so polyphonic, or rather babelous, that nothing ever gets done; a clatter of voices arises every now and then, and the schools go straight on, something like the Austrian Empire before the war, stable because of manifold deadlock. Some of our ministers have warmed up a little over an elementary teacher instructing the children that much of the Bible is mythology. There is a big book in the library by the expert mythologist, J. G. Frazer, The Folklore of the Old Testament, whose very title is frightening. Some of the parsons remarked that not only teachers, but some ministers regard the Bible as a compound of fact and fiction (these words both in their best sense). As for the other learned professions, perhaps, the lawyer is considered quite beyond redemption, and a poet long ago described the typical doctor as one whose "studie was but litle on the Bible." It is very well known that a large body of the clergy in Great Britain now take the Bible as a library of the literature of ancient Israel, with an appendix in late Greek (canine Greek, Swinburne called it), varying much in literary, philosophical, and religious or spiritual character, as well as in moral authority. Numbers of ecclesiastical scholars, such as Bishop Henson, Dean Inge, etc., are quoted as disbelieving in the Virgin Birth. The great encyclopedias have all gone over to higher criticism, if they were ever anywhere else. "Encyclopedie" in France is a synonym of rationalism. "Modernism," as the Roman Catholics call it, is rife enough in their church, too, but kept down by rigorous authority. Yes, it is plain, as the local pastors said, that the London teacher's view is by no means isolated or new.

But it is the general opinion of the community that religious instruction in school should not be tinged with the peculiar tenets of any sect or school of religious thought. Modernism may be widespread and spreading, but medievalism is even more generally held, and is just as respectable. Teachers have no right to instill either the one or the other, and thus offend serious and sincere convictions. If the book of Jonah be read in class, there is no call to explain it, either as fact or as myth. For the school child, as such, the important thing is the story and its style; let him get the historical discussion himself, at home or at church.

Might it not be a good thing to have a learned committee representing all sects and shades of religious opinion, Roman Catholics and Protestants, Jews and Unitarians, old-timers and modernists, and let this committee draw up a small volume of readings from the Bible and other books suited to the moral and spiritual needs of school children, with perhaps also an amount of commentary, literary, historical, moral, and philosophical, to be used by the teacher? Such a committee might be able to agree on a fairly extensive ground and draw up a book or canon of great use, not only to school children, but to the community at large. With general relaxation and obscurity of moral standards in these days, the people seem to be in need of some authority that all might respect without question. A select Bible with commentary jointly indorsed by the leaders of all important varieties of religious opinion might be a great help.

The Bible in School

Editor Free Press: In your contemporary's issue of Friday evening last occurs an editorial under the above heading, in which the suggestion is made that "a learned committee, representing all sects and shades of opinion," be appointed to draw up a small volume of readings from the Bible and other books suitable to the moral and spiritual needs of school children, with, perhaps, also an amount of commentary—literary, historical, moral, and philosophical—to be used by the teacher.

It further says that "such a committee might be able to agree on a fairly extensive ground and draw up a book or canon of great use not only to school children, but to the community at large." The reason for these suggestions being apparently the "general relaxation and obscuring of moral standards in these days, the people seem to be in need of some authority that all might respect without question."

Now, while it may be generally conceded that such a committee might draw up such a small volume of Bible readings as suggested above, suitable to the moral and spiritual needs of school children, it is to be feared that any commentary, whether literary, historical, moral, or philosophical, upon such readings by the teacher would serve but to intensify and perpetuate the existing diversity of opinions on the Scriptures, for is it not a fact that all religious schisms, ancient and modern, have their origin in the commentaries of the learned upon the revealed word of God? The statement that "the people seem to be in need of some authority that all might respect without question," is tantamount to the saying that the people are and have been without any "authority that all can respect without question." And yet we have the Bible—the acknowledged Word of God—the most wonderful and most popular book in all the world. What higher, better, or more legitimate authority can the world produce or give to us? What authority can or will the people respect if they cannot or will not respect the Word of God?

Not only have we got the Bible; we have also every commentary of the learned which has been deemed worthy of preservation, upon the teachings of the Bible by authors of medieval and modern times, but we are still as far from the desired "unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God" as ever. The secret of the whole controversy is that notwithstanding the very plain teaching of the Scriptures that "it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps" (Jeremiah 10:23), and that "no prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation" (2 Peter 1:20), every man continues to claim the absolute right to say positively that the Bible does not teach nor mean what it says, but something else, which "something else," by the way, varies with each individual as much as does the disposition of one with every other who privately interprets the sayings of the Scriptures.

This theological, religious, or Biblical controversy from beginning to end is a reflection upon the intelligence of the Almighty, for it is equivalent to the charge that he did not know enough to make himself understood without human interpretation, but in his Word he teaches of a way of holiness in which wayfaring men though fools shall not err therein (Isaiah 35:8); and when the Savior of men was about to ascend to his Father, he gave promise that "when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak; and he will shew you things to come" (John 16:13): Again, "The Comforter which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."—John 14:26. That this Spirit of truth, the Holy Ghost, was given according to the promise of the Master is established beyond question by the teaching of the New Testament; but that this same Spirit of truth, the Holy Ghost, is not performing his office work now as he did in the original apostolic times is equally certain; otherwise all Christian people would "speak the same thing," for we would all "be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment" (1 Corinthians 1:10), having but one source from which to receive instruction, or interpretation of God's Word.

What has driven the Spirit of truth from his office and office work? The commentaries of man and their traditions, privately interpreting the Scriptures, making thereby the commandments of God of none effect. Jesus taught his disciples that God was being worshiped in vain, because the people were being taught the commandments of men for doctrine. (Matthew 15:6, 9.) This useless worship of God, by the people, will continue until God is allowed once more to be his own interpreter through his own chosen medium—the Spirit of truth, the Holy Ghost. "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine."—John 7:17. Why not get back again into the old path! Let the Bible be read in the schools, and in the home also, on its own merits. Leave the learned commentaries to the moths. Let the old Book stand on its own merits; trust the interpretation to the Spirit of truth. Let us as a people call upon the God of our fathers in earnest prayer that he will verify his promises to us through his Son Jesus Christ, then shall we enter into "the unity of the faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God."

The use of the Panama Canal has greatly increased. It was opened in August, 1914. For two years the tonnage passing through was less than five million. In 1917 and 1919 it increased to seven and a quarter and seven and a half million tons. In 1920 it had increased to 11,236,000 tons. The traffic of January, 1921, excelled every previous record made in number of vessels, tons carried, tolls levied; in fact, each of seven different previous high records was broken, with an average in gross tonnage of 1,383,778 tons, and carrying a cargo of 1,177,000 tons.

Remember we must have a report from every Boy Scout troop under church control by May 15. Won't you help a good movement by getting your report in early?—F. M. McDowell, Lamoni, Iowa.

What's being done for the boys in your branch? Why not organize a Scout troop and secure for it a fine loose-leaf record book free of charge. Be sure to complete this organization before May 15.

"Except Ye Become as Little Children—"

"Some of the spiritual aspects of child welfare" is the subject of the lecture which will, on Monday evening during our May Institute, be given to our Women's Department workers and the public audience by Professor William A. Lewis, of Kansas City.

This gentleman may be new to our audiences, but his subject is not new. It has lain close to all the mothers' and fathers' hearts of us, ever since we were touched by the Savior's words, "Except ye become as little children ye cannot see the kingdom of heaven." This statement being true, what more vital subject can we study than that of a child—analyzing its nature with a view to emulating the spiritual excellencies we find there? How can we "become as a little child" if we do not know what qualities a little child possesses which we lack? How can we be helped to recognize the essences in those little minds which are identified with the eternal forces of the universe—those which make possible the "kingdom of heaven"?

The lecturer for the evening mentioned above is a man who, qualifying and specializing for work among humanity, seeking to find the ills and errors of society in order that healing and correction may be applied, has gradually come to see more and more the grave necessity of shielding, molding, and conserving the child life of our Nation, and with that vision has glimpsed also some of the divine elements which enter into that life. From the innocent eyes of the babe pressed so close to your breast in your happy, sheltering home, you fortunate mothers form your ideas of paradise and its angelic hosts. Is God less close to the child of the unfortunate mother, who has no chance to give it the advantage your child enjoys, no chance to dream the happy dreams which make your life a joy, and who knows instead but sordid toil, the never-ceasing struggle against odds over which she has no control? Ah, no; his love reaches out to all, to enfold all close to his sheltering and understanding care and protection, but it is through human agency he must bring the material blessings to those he would succor. Through human love his own reaches out to touch with infinite pity the needy everywhere, and we have come to know that the word applies not only to those in need of physical comforts, but (and even more particularly) to those who are in need of saving grace, in need of the divine perceptions which point out a clear path, in need of vision and will, and power to love as he loves!

Child welfare should be ever in the minds of those who are desiring the kingdom of God to come to this earth. It should be the object of our earnest efforts, for none other is of greater value. Convert a man or woman, and before the ministry of grace can bring about definite development in his or her life, there must take place the purging from the soul the accumulated habits of wrong thinking and wrong acting. Convert a child, direct it rightly from the early years of its plasticity, and you gain years in the work of transformation.

We may be able to gather from Professor Lewis's lecture somewhat of the connection between the proper nourishment of the body and the building up of the soul; between milk inspection and discipline; between civics and Sunday schools. Mr. Lewis is president of the Social Workers Conference, an organization of three hundred members in Kansas City and vicinity, and participates in spending three quarters of a million dollars annually for the poor of that city. We hope to have his message in a form to pass on to our readers at a future date.

The City Beautiful

One of the features of the coming institute for our Women's Department workers will be an address by Mr. A. E. Barden, secretary of the Independence Chamber of Commerce. This organization is back of a movement general throughout the city, looking towards improvement of civic conditions, and it is gratifying to us to know that this group of civic officers has, ready at hand, among our people an organization pledged to a support of such measures.

The Laurel Club, composed of Latter Day Saint women, has existed in the past for the purpose of giving bazaars, fairs, socials, programs, and other forms of entertainments which would yield a return in money which they spend in "good works." More recently, these sisters have done less along that line, and more along those of pure sociability, filling a need all must recognize, becoming an agency by which pleasant groups of people were brought together in wholesome pleasure and enjoyment. Of late these women decided to sponsor an organized effort towards attaining "the city beautiful," and they have already launched several worth-while campaigns. A general clean-up of yards, streets, parkings, and gardens has been one result. A little survey of conditions as they exist revealed the fact that considerable work could be accomplished along this line, and to make the task popular the club obtained from a local nurseryman, an attractive discount on seeds, bulbs, shrubs, plants, and trees ordered through its secretary.

Mr. Barden's lecture will be accompanied with slides, which teach in a visible and concrete way some of the possibilities of the project, and the principles which may result in a "city beautiful." The work the Laurel Club is doing is but one of the steps towards civic improvement that are due in the center place, and closely linked are many things which affect the health, happiness, and culture of the citizens, which things are engaging the attention of the local Chamber of Commerce.

No town, city, or hamlet in this broad land of ours should be content to have unwholesome, unattractive, or unimproved places in its environment. There are too many agencies through which expert direction and advice may be obtained. The State universities, the county organizations, and the United States Government are always at hand to supply the needed examination of conditions, the trained counsel demanded by those conditions, and somewhat of public funds intended for use in accomplishing the desired results.

For simply the expense of car fare and personal entertainment while doing the work, some of the State universities will send into any local which unitedly asks for such assistance, a scientific investigator who will examine the source of water supply, the garbage disposal, the sewerage, the source of milk and food supply, the condition of public restaurants, groceries, butcher shops, hotels, etc., the wells and cisterns, and all other portions of the local environment which make for the welfare of those who dwell there. As a people living in an age of enlightenment and advanced science, there is little excuse for any group of us not being well, for having unsanitary and unwholesome conditions about us, which hinder our giving to the world the best and most efficient return possible to us, either individually or collectively.

Mr. Barden's address will be helpful to our workers, by disclosing somewhat of the processes by which each of us may improve home and community surroundings, and he will bring a distinct message to all of us. We should be eager to learn, in order that we may not only profit ourselves, but help others to better living.

Is It Anything to You?

Recently we heard a woman say that she did not expect to vote; she felt that it would not do much good, that things were about as bad as they can be, and politics were "rotten" anyway! Well, we "labored" a little while, and feel that we helped some, for we were able to show the sister that the welfare of the little ones in her home was affected, and quite seriously too, by the direction in which the popular vote of her town should run.

Self-preservation, it is said, is the first law of nature. If that is true, we only react normally to that law when we seek to bring about those conditions which will safeguard our lives—"preserve" them, physically, mentally, morally, and spiritually. It is not a thing beneath us then, that we shall consider the welfare of our home and the ones therein whom we love. It is not unworthy our highest and most altruistic motives that we should strive to understand the things that are needed for our best development, and then strive equally to bring those things to pass in the social environment in which our lives must be spent, for only so can we render back again to the social life about us the highest of which we are capable.

For our children we should very jealously desire the best conditions obtainable. We should not feel that we can safely trust all the decisions which affect those conditions to the politicians, or those men who, from motives perhaps commercial or ulterior, are unable or unwilling to serve the public as the welfare and good of that public demands. Of this we may always be sure—the "enemy of souls" is no stranger at the ballot box, even if we may be. With his supporters who, wrapped up in their selfish purposes, may not even recognize the master they serve, he may always be counted upon to be alert to his interests, awake to his opportunities, and unflagging in his zeal to put those measures across which spell success for him.

Shall the forces of good not be equally energetic? What else did God mean when he said: "Honest men should be sought for diligently, and good and wise men ye should seek to uphold"? Surely, of all people then, we should be able to regard our franchise as a God-given privilege, an agency through which his will may obtain in the land, and earnestly strive to exercise it in all probity before him.

Brother Max Carmichael will talk to our workers concerning the close relation between civic affairs and our home interests. Those who have had the pleasure of hearing this earnest young man need no new assurance that his message is a definite one. An educator, a man closely in touch with many of the children and youth of the Saints, he is in a position to know well some of the most vital needs of our homes. Will he say to us, as a noted educator recently did to a group of teachers, "The mothers of this Nation have fallen down on their jobs!" Will he say, as did the governor of one of our States, that in the homes of the people themselves are sown the seeds of irreverence and of disregard and disrespect to law and order? Will he say, as a recent editorial in a leading newspaper insisted, that this Government sorely needs the touch of the womanhood of the country in order that interests more nearly concerned with our happiness, culture, and efficiency may be conserved.

Let us all be there to hear Brother Carmichael's message, as well as the one which Sister Dora Young will give to us on some phases of our newly acquired privilege of the vote. Some day we will give Sister Dora a little paragraph all to herself, for she has consented to direct the studies of our women in citizenship, and you will be hearing from time to time her little message of warning, hope, and instruction.

Does the vote mean anything to you? A. A.

One of Time's Changes

Some things have changed from what they were
When all the Fairest of the Fair,
Whom Fame has rank'd among the "beauties,"
Were skillful in domestic duties.

Our Modern Misses scarce believe
That ladies used to spin and weave;
Or that gay Princesses of yore
Wrought the rich garments Princes wore.

Since Fashion has with Folly met,
The stars of Industry have set—
Pleasure and Profit have disbanded,
And Labor, like Grim Want, is branded.

'Tis strange as foolish, but 'tis got so
Who are not idle, would be thought so!
And Ladies, too, have grown so common,
No wonder if they plunder Mammon!

Now who, beneath proud Fashion's peal,
Will dare draw music from the Wheel,
Or regulate the kitchen when Eliza stops to wield the pen?
March 15, 1842.

ELIZA.

Previous to the organization of the Latter Day Saint women of Nauvoo into a society to work as an aid to the church, The Times and Seasons gave no hint of the state of mind of the sisters except in the accompanying poem.

The writer is no doubt Eliza R. Snow, whose poems in these little old volumes are many. She was, besides, one of the charter members of the organization of women above referred to.

Our readers will enjoy reading between these lines, and making comparisons. One imagines also that spinning and weaving and similar despised arts were renewed afresh upon the arrival of "Eliza" and other misled women, in Utah!

The little poem was published in The Times and Seasons for March 15, 1842, in an issue which also commenced Joseph Smith, jr.'s editorial career, volume 3.

A Journey to Jericho

President Smith and party visit the tropical region of Palestine.

E. A. S.: Last night about 6.30, we returned to Jerusalem from a trip which was full of interest and which was much enjoyed by all of us. On Wednesday morning, the 23d, Brother and Sister Passman, Brother Williams, and I left Floyd House about 8.30, bound for Jericho and the Dead Sea. The conveyance was a three-seated carriage, something like the light wagons in America termed democrat wagons, with a top. It was drawn by three horses, for the road between Jerusalem and Jericho has some heavy grades and plenty of rough places. On the whole, however, the roads are good and well laid out. In the main it follows the road built by the Romans, and is still called the Roman Road, though modern engineers have in many places relocated portions of it on easier gradients.

Sister Passman had packed two large baskets with provisions, and as we had blankets with us we were quite independent, and left with the intention of staying away two days at least, and three if we felt like it.

The road we followed skirted the walls of Jerusalem, passed around the Mount of Olives, through Bethany, and down the valley to the east. As we passed through Bethany nearly every young lad within hailing distance wanted to know if we wanted to see the "Tomb of Lazarus," and most of them asked for baksheesh.

Soon after leaving Bethany we began to see more and more of the flowers with which Palestine abounds in the spring. In spots the fields were ablaze with a riot of color. I have seldom seen a finer display or assortment of wild flowers.

As we passed down the steep road from Jerusalem, I kept my aneroid in my hand most of the time, and as we passed through Bethany I noted it indicated about two thousand feet, which later I found to be about right. But it dropped rapidly, and soon I had the rather novel experience of seeing it indicate sea level while we were still in the mountains. By the time we reached Jericho it was showing some nine hundred feet below sea level. And as we went lower it became perceptibly warmer, so that by the time we reached Jericho it was hot.

Some four or five miles before we reached Jericho, we met some British troops. It was a regiment of light or mountain artillery, and the guns were carried on mules. The soldiers were East Indians. We guessed they were en route to Jerusalem to assist in welcoming Winston Churchill, the colonial secretary, who was expected to arrive in Jerusalem the next day.

About a mile or so before we emerged from the hills, the driver said we should get out and walk, for the road was very steep, and so it was. But we enjoyed the walk, for the scenery was beautiful. The roadway was high up on the side of the Wadi Kelt, a precipitous narrow valley, through which ran a small stream of water; and as we rounded the bend in the road from which we caught our first general view of the Jordan Valley, we stopped to admire the wonderful scene. Perhaps you, too, are always affected by these first views from heights of an outspread valley. They always fill me with the emotions accompanying great display of nature's beauty. This time there was added to that the fact that we were beholding the Jordan Valley. But by this time we could see the wagon waiting for us at the bottom of the hill, so we hurried on, determined to see more on our way back.

We reached Jericho a little before noon, but after a small purchase of provisions at one of the stores, we drove through the town about a mile north to Elisha's Spring, as it is called from the incident mentioned in 2 Kings 2:19-22, or Sultan's Spring. Here we stopped for lunch, eating where we could hear and see the water as it left the pool of the spring and ran down the valley. Near us, to the west, lay the hill on which the ancient Jericho stood. Not far from there, also, is said to be where Jesus passed his forty days of meditation and fasting.

After lunch, we returned to Jericho, passed through the village, this time driving east and south, and in about an hour stopped on the banks of the Jordan. We didn't stay long, perhaps a half hour or so, long enough to look around a bit and take some views. Then we drove south, down the Jordan bottoms, and in about another hour reached the Dead Sea. Here we made another short stay, going to the beach, picking up some small shells and some pebbles, taking some views, tasting the water and taking some pictures of some of the huts and their occupants. Then we returned to Jericho and went to the "Jordan Hotel" for the night, eating supper in our rooms from our own stock of provisions. After supper we took a walk through the village. It was a beautiful night. The moon was at full, the air balmy, and we walked nearly half way to Sultan's Spring. As we passed through the northern outskirts of the village, we heard some boisterous singing, but on listening closely we discovered the singers were on the move. We could not see them for they were too far away. It was a group of young Bedouins returning to their homes, probably east of the Jordan, and for a long time we could hear them as their voices grew fainter and fainter in the distance, their strong, clear, but rather high-pitched voices reaching out through the clear, still night. In places the air was fragrant with orange blossoms, while palm trees and banana trees outlined against the sky bore additional evidence to the subtropical climate of this village some nine hundred feet below sea level. On returning to the hotel Brother Passman bought at one of the little stores some oranges which we ate in the open air. They were delicious. Even Brother Williams, with all his devotion to California, admitted that he had to come to Jericho to learn what real oranges were. Whether they were exceptional or not, I do not remember of tasting any better.

In the morning, the 24th, we spent an hour or two looking around the village, taking some views, and about nine o'clock began our return journey. We drove two or three miles, and part way up the first steep grade of the road, near where an open conduit carries water down from the Wadi Kelt, and beside what was probably an ancient tower guarding the pass, we stopped and cooked breakfast. Before we passed on, we stood long and gazed at the beautiful scene spread before us. The mountains of Moab to the east, the Jordan Valley stretching away to the north, the north end of the Dead Sea lying to the south and east, and Jericho, a beautiful green oasis before us, all made a picture we shall long remember, and one from which we turned reluctantly.

For another half mile or so we walked; while the wagon went on ahead. But we stopped frequently to look over into the wild steep valley of the Wadi Kelt. Besides, climbing a steep old Roman road at six hundred feet below sea level does not make one so short of breath as does a similar climb in Colorado.

The return drive we made slowly, stopping to take pictures and to pick wild flowers. At one place while Sister Passman was picking some especially fine flowers, Brother Passman and Brother Williams went over into a near-by field to get some snapshots of some young men "plowing" or scratching the ground. The boys were using the native wooden plow, each having a pair of small cattle pulling the plow. The pictures were taken, but not till after the boys had secured the baksheesh they demanded for the privilege.

About four o'clock, a little way east of Bethany, we stopped again and cooked supper, staying there perhaps an hour. I forgot to say that about one o'clock or so we stopped for about one half hour at the Good Samaritan Inn to feed the horses and water them.

After supper we drove on to Jerusalem, reaching the house about 6.30 or 6.45 p. m. We all agreed it had been a most pleasant trip, one we shall long remember. On reaching Jerusalem, we found the populace in a state of suppressed excitement or curiosity. Winston Churchill was expected in from Cairo, accompanied by Sir Herbert Samuel, high commissioner of Palestine. We walked down to Jaffa Gate to see the crowds, and when we left there at 8.30 o'clock, the crowds were still waiting for the train, and had been since before four.

Monday Brother Williams and I expect to start on a trip to Haifa, Acre, Nazareth, and Tiberias. Will return probably Saturday.

Yours,
FREDERICK M. SMITH.

An Indian Becomes Probate Judge

James Irving, full-blood Sioux, rose by sheer merit to honorable public position.

*"Vote for a Real American for Judge of Probate.
James Irving, Candidate."*

This was the striking feature, together with a cut of Mr. Irving, on the cards passed out to practically every voter in Pipestone County, Minnesota, last fall when Mr. Irving was making his canvass for election.

To some it was taken as a joke that an Indian would aspire to the important office of judge of probate in a county where there were no Indians residing save those boys and girls who were in attendance at the Indian Industrial School located near the city of Pipestone.

Mr. Irving from years of experience realized the value of advertising and kept his name before the public for three months or more, so to the surprise of many was elected over his opponent, a minister and lawyer, by eight hundred and forty majority. Advertising pays, especially when the article advertised is not misrepresented, and I am sure that Mr. Irving will fulfill the expectation of his many friends.

Born on the Yankton Reservation, Dakota Territory, a full-blood Sioux, he had from childhood a desire to become something more than a Government ward. He attended the mission and Government schools on the reservation until he was about eighteen years of age. It is an old saying that "where there is a will there's a way," and this has been exemplified in Mr. Irving.

Leaving the reservation, he chose printing as a profession, but the thirst for more knowledge soon found him at the Illinois College of Law in Chicago.

Later he matriculated in the University of Oregon law school, but being without means to complete his course he accepted a position in the Government Indian School, occupying there eleven years, coming to Pipestone and acting as teacher in the Indian Industrial School for five years.

Leaving the school, he became editor of two papers in the county, occupying that position until elected last fall.

Mr. Irving is a member of the Indian Rights Association and an officer of the Society of American Indians, being elected the second time at the late convention at Saint Louis as vice president of education. Mr. Irving owns his home in Pipestone. His wife, a Sioux like himself, with two bright little girls, gave a very interesting interview when I had the pleasure of a call recently.

Mrs. Irving was painting china when I called and later played nicely on the piano. I had the pleasure of presenting to them a copy of the Book of Mormon, a history of their people.

Farewell to Lamoni

This is the final issue from the Herald's home of so many years.

The town of Lamoni was established to be the business headquarters of the church, and as such is of great interest to the church. The Herald Office Buildings here, both the old and the new buildings, have housed the general officers of the church and the local stake officers when that department developed as well as the publishing interests of the church. Lamoni has been built up as the headquarters of the church.

Those who are well acquainted with its people will at once recognize the remarkably devotional spirit shown. This spirit has always been one of "the church first." It probably never has considered the SAINTS' HERALD as a Lamoni publication, but as belonging to the whole church. It has loyally supported the church and its work.

The people of Lamoni have always recognized Independence as the coming central place. At one time Lamoni was the seat of the First Presidency in fact as well as in name; the headquarters of the Presiding Bishopric; many of the Quorum of Twelve walked its streets. Here its first presiding patriarch spent the greater part of his life, and here was his home when he passed away. As the headquarters of the church, here were located many of the leading officers of the church of other quorums, as well as the office of secretary and recorder, and other departments of church work. Here its first church historian lived and died.

It is naturally with regret that the people of Lamoni have seen those whom they love, singly and in groups, move away. First, some fifteen years ago, the First Presidency and Presiding Bishopric, then gradually members of the Quorum of Twelve were either released or passed away, and others were chosen, until no member of that quorum resides in Lamoni. The same is true of the leading members of other quorums.

Yet the offices still remained, until the past four or five years, when in rapid succession the church secretary, the church recorder, and within the past year the presiding patriarch and church historian have removed. Finally, at last General Conference, the headquarters were officially changed to Independence. Since then the church library has been dismantled, part of its books being taken by the church historian, a few left with the Lamoni Stake offices, and the balance transferred to Graceland College. And now, last of all, the publishing interests of the church are moving away, and this will be the last issue of the SAINTS' HERALD published in Lamoni.

Some of its recent employees are going with the publishing house; others being released have sought employment elsewhere.

To Lamoni the loss is not only of this industry which has made the town the principal mail office between Saint Joseph and Des Moines, but it has meant through all the recent years the passing of those who are well remembered as neighbors and friends.

A year ago the president of Lamoni Stake moved that Independence be made the meeting place for the General Conferences. This is quite typical of the disposition shown, of consecration to the service of the church. Though personal regrets have in the case of a few individuals brought a feeling of deep disappointment, the truth is that the spirit of Lamoni is manifested in a devoted prayer for the progress of the church, and a hope that this move will mean an immediate step forward in administration, and in results accomplished by the church as a whole.

Lamoni still remains a college town. Graceland has grown, and is growing, and we all hope will grow decidedly stronger in the near future. The Children's Home and old folks' homes still remain as church institutions. Those interested in the welfare of Lamoni also hope to see the present Herald Office Building made of commercial or industrial use to the town, but at present it will be used as a dormitory of Graceland College.

It is with profound regrets and heavy hearts that many have left and now leave, but with the hope that personal sacrifice is going to mean added good to the body as a whole.

Next Year's Course in Religious Education

The work being done at Graceland College by the group of young men and women preparing for missionary and other church work holds so much promise for the good of the church and its work that it appears wise to issue a call for another class to enter Graceland College next fall. The preparation will be not alone for foreign service, but for domestic as well, the ratio to be determined after the applications are in, showing the material available for the next course. The preparation will require at least a year of intensive study along special lines. The great demand for qualified workers requires speeding up in preparation. This course of preparation carried on in Graceland will include:

1. A thorough study of the doctrine and beliefs of the church and methods of presenting them.
2. The language, history, geography, customs, etc., of the foreign country to which the missionary is to be sent, or courses in American political history, political science, economics, or sociology, for those expecting to do local work, with particular reference to the problems of Zion.
3. Certain academic studies to meet the needs of individual students.
4. Elementary sanitation, hygiene, first aid, simple nursing, etc.
5. Recreational leadership, Scouting, Oriole and Temple Builders work.
6. Sunday school, Religio, and women's work.
7. Other incidental subjects closely related to the work to be accomplished.

The selection of the young people to make this preparation is highly important. The qualifications of those selected must be such as to assure the highest degree of success possible. These will include:

1. Consecration and call to the work of the church and intense interest in the welfare of the church and the prosecution of its work.
2. The necessary education and general intelligence; a high school education or its equivalent. Successful church and missionary work is in most cases the best equivalent. Systematic reading courses and travel experiences function as developers of intelligence.

3. Not over thirty years of age, with general good health and physical fitness.

As above indicated, the number is limited, and those desiring to enter the course should apply at once by writing to the president of Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa. From those applying, selections will be made by the general church authorities for admission to the course.

Since the establishment of this course, many of the conference appointees and church workers have spoken to me about young people qualified for the course. Such should write to President George N. Briggs of the college, so application blanks can be forwarded.

Owing to the present financial situation, those applying who are not under missionary appointment should be prepared to finance themselves either wholly or in large part.

This work of preparation for church service is highly important, and all interested in the progress of the church work should assist in securing a group of workers in the course whose qualifications are exceptionally good. All who have taken the courses thus far, deeply feel the responsibility and importance of the work, and are earnestly working to meet the divine approbation; and the standard for next year's class must be raised rather than lowered.

May God bless our efforts.

FREDERICK M. SMITH,
President of the Church.

The Work in Europe and in Palestine

President Smith and Apostle Williams have found a wide field of labor which will require the energies of many consecrated workers.

The last of July, 1920, President Frederick M. Smith and T. W. Williams sailed for England. It was the expectation at that time that President Smith would return in October and that Apostle T. W. Williams would proceed to make a survey of the fields of possible labor throughout Europe and the Near East. Matters had arisen in England which made President Smith's presence necessary if not imperative. Apostle T. W. Williams urged upon President Smith the value to the church of his joining in the complete survey, even if it should take five months.

Arriving in England, every district was visited, as well as practically all of the branches, and meetings had with the Saints in their various conferences. The opportunity for work in England and Wales especially, and also in Scotland and in Ireland, proved to be so great as to warrant a much longer survey than had first been intended. We have rather neglected our opportunity in that field. As a result, recommendations were made to the joint council, and by them approved, which included the purchase of a mission headquarters for Europe and the East, so that Saint Leonard's was purchased; this includes provision for class work to be held there, as well as mission work, and, for the care of the whole field.

A second recommendation was made that additional ministers be sent there at once, so Apostle J. A. Gillen and four others of the missionary force sailed in January. Undoubtedly in the near future, as rapidly as the church can find the men and make the arrangements, others will be sent to England and other parts of the European field. The work should be developed at once in all parts of England and Wales, was the conclusion reached, and in the near future extended into Scotland and also to Ireland.

In the meantime, after four months spent in Great Britain alone, in making a careful survey, President Smith and Apostle Williams proceeded to the Continent and spent two months in a survey in France, Germany, and vicinity. To state that they were astonished at the opportunities before us there, also in Holland and Switzerland, would be expressing it mildly.

It is quite natural that the church should desire to know the result of their labor, but it is quite clear that it is a matter of courtesy that particular recommendations should first be presented to the joint council. A recent letter from Brother T. W. Williams, published in the HERALD, on April 20, 1921, will give part of the results of their survey. It is not a small task to make such an investigation. Conditions existing in the country, character of public buildings, characteristics of the people, all enter in as well as the laws governing religious worship in each nation.

Returning to Great Britain for conference with the newly arrived missionaries, they then proceeded in time to take ship for the Holy Land about the middle of February, where they have spent nearly two months in a survey.

Naturally that country appeals to every follower of the lowly Nazarene, and more to a student of antiquity, with a love of the beautiful. To visit the home of the founder of the greatest religion the world has ever seen, the land where walked the very Son of God, means that it is not surprising that having once entered there, they should consider adequately the possibilities of our work, though it consume considerable time.

In the first place, conditions are so radically different from those with which we are ordinarily familiar. Jerusalem has been destroyed and rebuilt. Those familiar with its present status well know that it is now a city of very narrow streets which would not be considered even a respectable alley in America, being but little more than wide enough for a pavement, the passing of any beast of burden rather crowding its narrow way. The sanitary conditions and manner of living, as reported for many years by many travelers, are at a very low state.

The multiplicity of beggars has been again and again emphasized, not only in the letters from these, our brethren, but from other writers as well. The extent to which they are supported by various missions of other churches, and by travelers, is close to pauperization. There still remains the antagonism of the Jews to any kind of Christians, and the antagonism of the Arabs and Mohammedans also.

As a result of the investigation made, they have reached certain conclusions which have been reported to the joint council for their consideration, but have not as yet been acted upon. They take the form of definite recommendations. These are, in substance—

First: that as soon as practicable suitable mission headquarters shall be secured in Jerusalem. We have at present no adequate quarters there either for living purposes, or for conducting church activities. There is a need of headquarters with suitable buildings and grounds, for the work of the church.

Second: An early increase of our missionary force by at least two more missionaries and the wife of each. Brother Harry Passman and wife are already located there. The work should be augmented by at least two more couples.

In addition, the people there are very poor. Those who are converted are at once thrown out of employment because of prejudice. This means we must provide for them—either support them by gratuity, or establish some form of industry giving them adequate employment. Naturally the recommendation is that we establish an industry, as the alternate course would mean simply pauperization.

As has been previously stated in our columns, other points in the Near East have been visited and a preliminary survey made. A visit is being made to Italy, where they expected to remain some ten or twelve days to make a survey. This it was not found possible to do on the earlier visit to the Continent. Letters already published indicate a further visit planned to Basel in Switzerland, which appears to present a favorable location for a continental headquarters. Then they expected to return as rapidly as possible to Great Britain to Saint Leonard's the mission headquarters for Europe and the Near East. Certain problems there still await consideration and settlement, after which President Smith will return as soon as possible to America, possibly the latter part of June or early in July.

Another very important part of their work has been the searching out of young men who may later be available for missionary service. It is very evident that a native-born citizen will make a more ready appeal in any land than would missionaries from another land, who, it may be, would speak the language of the country with difficulty, and also have to learn to adjust themselves to new conditions.

With this fact in mind they have suggested that four young men from Jerusalem, five from England, and ten from Germany, come to this country, and be associated with the church in Lamoni, and take studies in the religious education class, to fit themselves for better service in their homeland, and with the prospect of taking up missionary work later.

These names are, however, only presented by way of recommendation to the joint council. They are suggested but have not as yet, with a few exceptions, been acted upon by the joint council.

It cannot be doubted that the work done the past year has been of tremendous importance for the church. It was a necessary preliminary to our foreign missionary work that these lands be first thus visited. A great work awaits us. People are hungry and thirsty for the word of God. Who will go and feed them?

Secret Orders

A brief survey of what is involved in membership in the orders prevalent to-day.

We have been asked many times concerning whether as members we should belong to secret orders or not.

There are a number of mutual aid societies which have just sufficient ritual to hold their membership, but which are primarily mutual insurance companies. As to these the answer is the same as to other forms of life insurance. Under the plan given the church we should see provided all that is covered by the best possible policy of life insurance.

As to secret orders in general, it is doubtless quite true that there is an interrelationship between them. The ablest and strongest and most ancient are the Masons. The antiquity of this order is a very interesting study to a student. Many books have been written concerning it down to and including the password, secret signs, and lectures. This is confirmed from Masonic circles, as the Iowa Masonic Library for January, 1921, urges that every Mason carry his receipt for dues with him as an evidence of membership, since these other details can be learned by nonmembers. Some, however, insist that the exact pronunciation of the password differs so from State to State that no one can learn in this way and be admitted to a lodge. That, however, is of but little importance. No honorable man would desire to enter in any such way. Yet this means the substance can be learned by a careful student.

There was a reorganization of the Masonic work in England about 1717. But practically all students agree that the list of grand masters goes back to remote antiquity. Some state that the work of the first three degrees and some of the work of the higher degrees is patterned after Solomon's Temple, or is based upon conditions alleged then to have existed, and therefore that the order cannot go back to remote antiquity. But in the higher degrees this is seen to be a mistake, as what are called the "pillars of Enoch" are disclosed.

A good deal of literature on the history of the order is written by Masons. George Oliver makes it the foundation of the priesthood. He is quoted as saying, "The hope of salvation through a crucified mediator has been one of the foundation stones of Freemasonry ever since the fall."

Singleton and Mackey, while discrediting many traditions, still report many existing in the Middle Ages, running back to Enoch and to Tubal Cain, and including many other worthy ancients who are alleged to have been members. These men, and also Churchward, Pike, and others, would make secret orders of to-day successors of the ancient mysteries, and the ancient mysteries to be the holders of all the secrets of religion and science. It cannot be doubted by careful students that it is fundamentally religious, and draws many from services of the church.

Objection is made on the grounds of the oaths. In the earlier degrees they include such penalties as the cutting of the throat from ear to ear, or the opening of the left breast, the tearing out of the heart, the cutting of the body in twain, and the bringing forth of the bowels.

But it is claimed by some Masons that these oaths are archaic and have but little meaning to-day. Yet later oaths in the higher degrees are even stronger in form. Other Masons have insisted that these oaths have full validity to-day, both as to the oaths and penalty. Still it is quite true that many honorable and honest men have joined that order.

Some will point to the covenants in these oaths, as "To keep a secret in my breast as they were in his before communicated to me the secrets of a brother, murder and treason alone excepted, and these left to my sound discretion and judgment." Particularly is this true when later we find the same pledge made without any mental reservations whatsoever, and with the added promise: "finding a brother in trouble, I will help him to the extent of my power so far as to extricate him from his difficulty, and this without any regard to whether he may be right or wrong."

The covenant is made in the higher degrees, not only to keep secret the mysteries of the degrees, but also to aid a brother of this degree against not only all cowans (outsiders), but also against all brethren of lesser degree.

We would especially urge upon our young men to consider carefully before undertaking such obligations. While it is quite true that many honorable men belong to secret orders, and many good men have belonged to the Masonic order; while it is true that they are urging boys to belong to the DeMolay, a junior lodge, and so helping some to better living, and while they also help to care for the orphans, this latter has as a rule been limited to their own membership. There are splendid men also in the Roman Catholic Church, but that is no reason why true Latter Day Saints should join the Roman Catholic Church. The difficulty is that one must join, in theory at least, blind. And the vast majority do so. They are not only physically blinded, but also intelligently blinded as they do not know to what they are about to swear.

Because such an organization may do good and there are good men belonging to it, is no reason for us to join. To the church of God belongs all the truth that can be found in any other religious organization; and that which is more, inspiration of to-day. It is true that men of this order have urged educational work, and have helped the children of their members to secure educational work. Some of their leaders urge that more attention should be paid to the spiritual aspects of that work—either study out its ancient history, or study the meaning of its symbols, making the effect practical in life. But these are not sufficient reasons for members of the church joining, as all of truth that belongs to any other religious organization is to be found with us and added to that the inspiration of God.

We also have the testimony of men who have belonged that they did not find the Spirit of God in these meetings.

The claim of an economic organization helping its members financially also does not apply since we have that in the church. The church does good to all men, but especially those of the household of faith.

In the third place we have to consider the consequences of entering into such obligations which may interfere with the covenants we have already made with our heavenly Father in the waters of baptism to take upon us the name of Jesus, and ever remember him and keep his commandments which he has given us. We have seen in one case in the church where men of that order, occupying prominent places, and otherwise good men, have been turned aside to assist wrongfully one who was an offender. There is no objection to giving proper aid to an accused person. But in this case the effort was carried to the point of trying to prevent the evidence being heard at all, and trying to exonerate one found guilty, after the church had proven guilt.

It is a serious question for young men to ask themselves, Do they want when the call comes for devoted service to have to give a divided allegiance? It may be a man has belonged for many years, and has not found the necessity for that divided allegiance. With others the case has been different.

Fourth: Leaving out for the time being the penalties of the oaths, which become even stronger in the higher degrees, we are confronted directly with the statement of the Master, "But I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven, for it is God's home; nor by the earth, for it is his footstool; neither by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the great king; neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black."—Matthew 5: 38.

A Master Mason read this passage to us, and asked: "Does that refer simply to profanity? I once thought so, but I am convinced now that such is not the case." ("Neither shalt thou swear by thy head.")

As a church we have also, "God does not work in secret combinations."—Ether 3: 93. Also the Inspired Version, Genesis 3 and 4. "Swear to me by thy throat and by the eternal God." "Master Mahon" and "Lamach."

2 Nephi 11: 93-107; Helaman 2: 152, 155, 156; Ether 3: 87-89, 91-98; 2 Nephi 11: 93, 94. And we would emphasize again the fact that God does not work in secret combinations.

Some have claimed Jesus was a member of the Essenes or some other order. But he himself said plainly, "I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort, and in secret have I said nothing."—John 18: 20.

The church with its broad attitude of toleration does not attempt absolutely to prohibit. The General Conference has, however, adopted the following:

"No. 593. That we discourage members of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints from holding membership in any society or order which requires the taking of oaths or the entering into covenant or obligation to guard the secrets, purposes, or doings of its organization."

We are not attempting here an exhaustive analysis or to discuss in an analytic way, or more than touch upon the history of secret orders, though we have studied many volumes in the past fifteen years. Probably all of us have friends belonging to such organizations. But there appears to be no reason why a true member of the Church of Christ should desire to affiliate with any other religious or semireligious organization. And there appear to be many sources of danger in a divided allegiance, and the taking of covenants before altars, which have not been sanctified of the Lord.

To do so is a direct violation of the commandment, "Swear not at all; . . . swear not by your head." Finally there is the direct assurance that the Lord does not work in secret combinations. The work before the church is so great that it deserves and should have our best devotion of time and of effort.

Herald Publishing House

As a corporation the institution has been legally dissolved and all titles transferred to the Presiding Bishop.

THE TRUE LATTER DAY SAINTS' HERALD was first published in Cincinnati, by a job printing house. In 1865 a small plant was established at Plano, Illinois. This was the beginning of the Herald Publishing House. Later it was removed to Lamoni, still maintaining the same name, and under this name has developed to the present status. In 1907 the old building built in 1881, and added to ten years later, was burned down, and the present office building erected in its stead. A few years later, in 1911, the First Presidency, Presiding Bishopric, and Board of Publication joined to incorporate the Herald Publishing House, with headquarters at Lamoni, Iowa. The name has combined with it much of historic interest.

THE SAINTS' HERALD, first THE TRUE LATTER DAY SAINTS' HERALD, has been the official publication of the church since 1860. Though the business has greatly expanded that name has been applied to it as being distinctive. It will readily be seen that the word Herald in and of itself has no distinctive significance in connection with our work. It has, however, come to be recognized as the name under which the Board of Publication has done business for the last fifty-five years.

In the meantime, in Independence, private individuals had undertaken the publication of Zion's Ensign. In 1900 this was taken over by the church, and the Board of Publication instructed and authorized to secure the transfer of its property and plant. Since that date the Board of Publication has conducted the two plants, one in Lamoni, the other in Independence. Other publishing interests have been taken up by the church, but have not been under the immediate supervision of the Board of Publication, elected by the General Conference.

With the move to Independence there is proposed a new organization with a new name. At this writing the name has not been determined. Quite rightly it has been referred to the general authorities of the church for consideration. In the meantime the Board of Publication, on April 27, adopted a resolution to dissolve the Herald Publishing House. Legally this was the dissolution of the corporation though the Herald Publishing House has an existence much longer than that of the corporation. The assets were transferred, subject to all indebtedness, to the Presiding Bishop, to be held in trust for the interest of the church.

At first glance this might seem to be an attempt to abolish the Board of Publication, but being appointed by General Conference they still continue. What has actually been done is only to transfer the legal title to the real and personal property. The publishing interest of the church still continues under the board. The question however still remains as to under what name the publishing interests of the church will henceforth conduct business and under what form.

It may be then that this will mark the passing of the Herald

Publishing House, not only as a corporation, but as a going business concern. If so, its passing will be viewed with regret by many of our readers, as well as those who have worked for its success in the years that are past.

The Resurrection and the Eternal Judgment

Sermon by Elbert A. Smith in Zion Builder Series, at Lamoni, Iowa. Reported by R. A. Wight and Estella Wight.

"And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshiped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years. And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night forever and ever."—Revelation 20: 4-10.

Thus far we have considered four of the six fundamental principles that Paul names in the 6th chapter of Hebrews. These four are principles that we have to do with in life: Faith, repentance, baptism, and laying on of hands. The remaining two of the six have to do with the life beyond: The resurrection and the eternal judgment. The two last named are intimately associated. While they should have had two sermons we shall endeavor to treat them in one.

We are told, "The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by his actions are weighed."—1 Samuel 2: 3.

I presume that the theme of eternal judgment is not popular in polite society. It would not be a favorite topic at a card party or a dance or almost any other festive occasion; but God is not always in good taste as judged by our standards.

Weighing a King

You remember the old story of King Belshazzar who made a great feast in his hall and gathered around him a thousand of his nobles with their wives and painted concubines and drank wine out of the sacred vessels that his father had stolen from the temple in Jerusalem. Right in the midst of that feast God dragged into the festal chamber some balances, and he threw the king into one balance and put a king-sized weight in the other side of the balance, and the weight went down like a plummet and the king went up like a rocket. I imagine that is about the way the average king would "weigh up."

Of course, this was altogether invisible thus far, but at that juncture there did appear something that was visible—a hand inscribing a writing under a candle on the wall where all could see it. "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin," which being interpreted, among other things said, "Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting. Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians."—Daniel 5: 27, 28.

That was the end of King Belshazzar. When God gets tired of the folly of a king, it is very easy to remove him from the palace and set him to sawing wood in Holland or to brooding with the seagulls on Saint Helena.

If a king could not escape being weighed in the balances, do you think that ordinary people like you and me can hope to escape? God is a lord of knowledge, and by his human actions are weighed. Every man, sooner or later, will be weighed in the balances, and fortunate will be the man concerning whom it is written, "Thou art not found wanting."

Judged Now

It is true in a sense that we are judged every day and every moment. If you put your hand into the fire, you are judged and sentenced and punished immediately; but fortunately if you take your hand out and repent and put healing lotions upon it, nature immediately begins to forgive you and starts the process of healing. If you do a mean, contemptible deed, the sin is just as visible in your face as is the scar upon your burned hand. As Emerson says, "The gods we worship write their names upon our foreheads." The results are visible in the soul.

So we may say that to a certain extent, at least, we are judged and punished or rewarded as we journey through life. Some people think that is all there is to judgment. But if so, there should be some sad injustices done; and those who think that deceive themselves by believing that if they hire a physician or a lawyer or bribe a judge and escape punishment here upon this earth, the whole matter is ended.

A Day Set for Judgment

But of course our theme to-night has to do particularly with the final great judgment, and that there is to be such an occasion is clearly set forth: "He hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained."—Acts 17: 31.

I heard a little story at one time about a man who was drowning, and another man risked his life to save him. Some years later the man who was saved was being tried for murder, and when he appeared in court and glanced up to the bench, he saw that the judge was the man who had saved his life. The prisoner cried, "Do you not remember me? You risked your life to save my life, and you certainly cannot take it from me now." But the judge on the bench replied, "Then I was your savior; now I am your judge, and I can only judge you by the law and the evidence."

Jesus Christ came and gave his life to save us, but in the great day that God has appointed, when he judges us, he tells us that we shall be judged out of the things written in the books, and he himself said, "My word shall judge you at that day." So we ought at least to familiarize ourselves with the word of God that we may be prepared for that great judgment.

The statement then is clear and plain that God has appointed a day in which he will judge the whole world, and this is borne out by the 20th chapter of Revelation, as we have just read, where John says he saw a throne with God upon it and he saw the dead, small and great, from the ends of the earth, from the bottom of the sea, all of them come and stand before that throne; and the books were opened and the book of life was opened, and the dead were judged out of the things written in the books; and every man was rewarded according to his works. We have it very clearly established then from the word of God that there is to be this great judgment day that awaits all mankind.

Characteristics of the Judgment

It might be interesting to us to consider some of the events that lead up to that great judgment day. They are monumental events, and the first one that we notice is the second coming of Jesus Christ.

You remember what the Lord said when he was bidding his disciples good-by and telling them that he was going away to leave them, going to prepare a place for them? He said, "I will come again."—John 14:3. Some people have considered that his coming would be simply a spiritual affair—that whenever he came into the heart of a repentant sinner, that was the second coming of Jesus Christ; but the scriptures indicate in many places very clearly that his coming is to be a personal one, quite as much so as when he was here before.

For instance, we read:

"And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight. And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."—Acts 1: 9-12.

There can be no question that his departure was personal. The angels took pains to testify that he should come again in precisely the same manner. We are told elsewhere that every eye shall see him, for he shall be revealed in the clouds of glory with the holy angels to take judgment on the earth and to reward every man according to his works.

Quite immediately associated with the second coming of Christ is the resurrection of the dead. I wish to read some passages so that there will be no error made in quoting them, because we might lose some of the force. You will notice the beautiful sentiment of the prayer that was offered this evening of thanksgiving that we are permitted to look beyond the cold marble that marks the resting place of our dead.

We are told:

"But I would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first."—1 Thessalonians 4: 13-17.

We have then the definite statement that Jesus is coming and that the dead in Christ will rise at his coming. And the statement is made in the 20th chapter of Revelation already read in your hearing, that those who rise and have part and are blessed in the first resurrection which is called "the resurrection of the just" will live and reign with Christ for a thousand years. Then the story goes on immediately that the rest of the dead will not live again until the thousand years are ended.

So we have two resurrections, just as it is stated in Acts 24: 15, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust; and in Daniel 12: 2 where it is said that some shall rise to everlasting life and some to everlasting shame and condemnation.

There are then the following great events leading up to and preceding the final judgment: The second coming of Christ; the first resurrection, the millennial reign; the resurrection of the wicked; and then comes the time that John saw, when all shall stand before the throne of God and be judged out of the things that are written in the books.

Characteristics of the Judgment

I wish you to consider to-night some of the characteristics of that great judgment. John tells us that he saw the dead both great and small, from the king to the peasant, rich and poor, stand before the throne of God. In that day there will not be a man so powerful that he can resist the summons that goes out from that tribunal: "Come ye into court!" And there will not be a man so insignificant that he will be overlooked. All will be searched out and brought into that court that all may be judged according to the works done in the flesh. I don't mean to say necessarily that all this will occur in a single day or at a single sitting; but there is to be a judgment. All men must pass under it. God is to be their judge.

There is one thing that is greatly encouraging to us, that judgment is to be absolutely just. Here in the civil courts in this land we undertake to administer absolute justice. But some of the courts are corrupt, and those that are not corrupt can never do any more than approximate justice, because our laws are imperfect, the evidence may not be true, and the judge may not have absolute wisdom in his mind; so all we can ever hope to do in this life is to approximate justice. Certainly if the record of injustice done in the name of justice in the courts of the land is ever written, we will be astonished.

Here is a little leaf from a single court record: A man was murdered in the Carnegie Steel Works, there being one witness to the murder. All of the employees of the plant were lined up and this witness passed down the line to identify the murderer. As he walked he stumbled, and one of the men by the name of Andrew Tosh laughed. It made the witness angry and he pointed at Andrew Tosh and said, "There is the murderer!" And for sixteen years that man served at hard labor in the State penitentiary, and when the false witness finally confessed, all the State could do was to pardon Andrew Tosh for a crime he had never committed, and all that Carnegie could do was to pension him in his old age. No power on earth could restore the lost years or wipe out the shame and degradation and the despair that he had suffered because of an error in an attempt to administer human justice. Thank God, when we stand in that great judgment day there will be no mistakes made.

The Basis of Judgment

We might consider next the basis of judgment, because that is exceedingly important, and I think that our people have a little different idea from almost any other people on this question of the eternal judgment. At least we have a different idea from any that I have ever found in the creeds or have ever heard preached from any other pulpit.

It is stated in the 20th chapter of Revelation, as we have already read, that we shall be judged and rewarded every man according to his works; but I do not think that is absolutely the only basis of judgment. I believe that God does not necessarily have to read our record and pass upon our works. We read:

"I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts: and I will give unto every one of you according to your works."—Revelation 2: 23.

God looks into the heart. We ourselves can put a man under the X ray and look right through him and see his heart beat. I have done it; but we cannot tell whether his heart is black or white. We can look through a man's skull to his brain, but we cannot tell what he is thinking about.

But God looks through the individual, and no matter whether we wear the robe of the righteous or the cloak of hypocrisy, fat or lean, tall or short, rich or poor, he can look in the heart and see what a man is, and know what he has stored up in the way of character.

I tell you the only safety deposit bank on earth in which you can deposit your riches to be sure that they will be available on the other shore, is your own immortal soul.

I wrote a little story once about a collector. Perhaps I had better tell you a little of it. It ran like this: Once upon a time there lived a man who had a passion for collecting paintings, and having excellent taste and a long purse he accumulated a great gallery of splendid paintings; but he was a thin man and one cold day the fog got too close to his ribs and he took cold and died of pneumonia. He could not take his paintings with him. They were sold at auction and scattered abroad.

At the same time there was a man who was a connoisseur of wines; and having a deep cellar and wide resources he accumulated a great stock of rare wines and availed himself freely of their privileges. But being a very fleshy man and very red in the face, one day his too abundant blood broke through upon the too small area reserved for brains and he died of apoplexy. He could not take his wines with him. His sons drank them up, cursed him, and went out to hunt for work.

At the same time there lived a woman who had a passion for collecting rare gems. Having great wealth, she accumulated diamonds, rubies, pearls, emeralds, sapphires, moonstones, and gems of every name and hue; but while she was gathering the gems the years were departing. There were no children. Her husband left her. The cat died. Finally the poor old lady passed off into eternity and her gems were sold and scattered in ten kingdoms, but not one of them in the kingdom of heaven.

At the same time there lived a man of limited resources, who one day looking into the mirror when he was exceedingly angry was disturbed by what he saw, and he set himself to acquire the virtue of patience and an even temper. When he had attained that, it pleased him so much that he went on all the rest of his life collecting virtues: wisdom, temperance, honesty, purity, charity, and humility. Finally when he died the community awoke to the fact that a really great man had lived among the people; but no one quarreled over the estate, because he took it with him.

Peter says:

"Add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity."—2 Peter 1: 5-8.

And he says if you will do those things, you shall be neither barren nor unfruitful and there shall be administered unto you an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our God.

The only way to be sure that you are going to be taken care of on the other side is to become a collector of virtues; and I like the idea, as Brother Joseph used to say, of the "abundant entrance" into the kingdom of God. He said he did not want the door opened grudgingly to let him slip in sideways; he wanted the guardian to throw it wide open and say, "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Theological Blunders

When we come to consider this question of the eternal judgment, we are reminded of some of the theological blunders that have been made in the name of God and in the name of justice, and one of these blunders was the old doctrine of predestination. The old creeds used to say:

"By the decree of God for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestined unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death. These angels and men thus predestinated, and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed, and their number is so certain and definite, that it cannot be either increased or diminished."

That was in the creeds in the year 1820 when Joseph Smith said that the Lord told him that the creeds were an abomination in his sight.

Not many years ago a well-known minister in the East wrote to me and said, "You people say that at the time when Joseph Smith was supposed to have received his revelation the creeds were wrong. I challenge you to name one creed in force at that time that was wrong in one fundamental point." And I turned to the creed of his own denomination and found in it this very statement of predestination, and it was there for forty years after Joseph Smith had his vision. I printed it in the HERALD and I never heard anything more from the reverend gentleman.

I do not wonder that the Lord said that the creeds were an abomination in his sight. That old relic of Calvinism was twin brother to the old Mohammedan idea, as Clarke tells us in the Ten Great Religions:

"Accordingly, when God—so runs the tradition—I had better say blasphemy—resolved to create the human race, he took into his hands a mass of earth, the same whence all mankind were to be formed, . . . having then divided the clod into two equal portions, he threw the one half into hell, saying, 'These to eternal fire, and I care not'; and projected the other half into heaven, adding, 'and these to paradise, and I care not.'"

There is another theological blunder, and that is in thinking that men are to be judged by their profession only. I am afraid that a great many people proceed on that theory, feeling that if the profession is made and the name is inscribed on the church books all will be well in the day of judgment.

I am going to tell you another little story from real life. It received Nation-wide publicity some years ago: the case of Henry Clay Bates, of Virginia, the scion of an old aristocratic Virginia family. This young man had a beautiful wife and a little boy; but he became enamored of a dissolute girl in the neighborhood. And one day he took the wife riding in his automobile, and getting out of the machine in a secluded spot he secured a shotgun which he had hidden and shot her to death. He was tried in the courts and sentenced to be hanged. He appealed the case to every court in the State and even appealed to the governor to secure a pardon, and was denied; and at the last moment having exhausted every resource and when they were about to set the death watch at the cell, he called for a minister of an orthodox church, confessed Christ, was given assurance of forgiveness, and said, "I die happy."

Modern orthodox theology sends him straight to heaven where he has a perfect right to climb up next to the great white throne and sit down between John the Beloved and Stephen the Just; but his poor unfortunate wife did not have a moment to make her confession; she did not belong to any church and never had accepted Christ, though she was a good woman, so modern theology would send her straight to the bottomless pit in company with Jezebel and Judas Iscariot.

Why should any minister representing any church go to that cell and tell that man that by simply confessing Christ he would enter immediately into the realms of the blessed? And why is that thought apparently so generally accepted? That man is to be judged by another standard. He is to be judged by his works, and his works may send him a long way from heaven for a long period of time.

Another mistake of modern theology is in dividing humanity simply into two classes. We are told there is to be one heaven and one hell. If you don't get into one you get into the other. There are just the two places. One place of supreme glory and everlasting joy and bliss; and one place of endless torment, to which no preacher ever goes to bear the message of salvation and life, because there is supposed to be no chance for repentance after this life.

I want to ask you how you would attempt to judge humanity on that basis. Supposing for instance that we had a line of men reaching across this room from wall to wall, standing here for judgment. Against yonder wall stands the meanest man who ever lived. I don't know who he would be. I have met some mean men. And there against the other wall stands the best man that ever lived. This line of men is graded all the way down from the best man to the meanest. Now tell me where you will put your hand down in that line and say, All on that side go to heaven and enter into endless bliss, and all on the other side go to hell and suffer endless torment. It seems to me that it would be exceedingly unfortunate for this man who was so unlucky as to miss heaven by the thickness of my hand; and it would be very fortunate for the other man who got to heaven by the same narrow chance. Why, if God were to pass judgment like that, I believe there would be men there with courage to rise up and say, "You may be a God of power, but you are not a God of justice; for we did better than that on earth; in our high schools and colleges we tried to distribute rewards according to merit, and in our police courts we tried to punish according to crime."

Fortunately our God is not that kind of a God. There are many degrees of glory and many degrees of punishment. For instance, as we are told:

"There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead."—1 Corinthians 15: 41, 42.

Look into the heavens some night and observe the stars from the most brilliant star in the heavens to the dimmest one that you can see on the far horizon and you will realize something of the great variety of rewards that God has to give to those who come within the range of men who are saved.

Why, Jesus said:

"In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you."—John 14: 2.

And I like to think that those many mansions will be so arranged that each one will precisely fit the individuality of the one who is to inhabit it, using that figure of speech.

If there is anything that makes us homesick and melancholy it is to ride through the suburbs of some city like Chicago and see endless miles of tenement houses inhabited by working men and each one precisely like its neighbor. I don't see how a man knows when he gets home at night.

I like to believe, and it is scriptural doctrine, that God has a great variety of mansions and glories, and every man will receive absolute justice and he will get exactly what he has worked for and what he is fit for. On the other hand God has a variety of punishments. It must be so because the Lord himself in speaking of a certain city, to his disciples, said, "It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah, in the day of judgment, than for that city."—Matthew 10: 15. In the day of judgment, then, it will be more tolerable for some than it will be for others.

In fact if we are to understand this matter at all, we must learn to draw a sort of a line between salvation and reward. Jesus Christ came and brought us salvation. It is not and never was and never will be within the province of any man to save himself. Christ came and made salvation possible for us. In that sense, Jesus did it all, but when it comes to the question of rewards every man will get according to his works. It is up to each individual, as we say, to determine what his reward shall be.

I think Paul makes that very plain;

"For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; every man's work shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire."—1 Corinthians 3: 11-15.

If we are to approach the day of judgment with any degree of equanimity at all, the time to begin preparation is now. And let no man feel that in the course of living this life he can get through under false pretenses and receive that which he desires in the world to come.

The Other Unwise Builder

Edwin Markham has this modern parable:

"But there is flying through the world the story of another builder, a foolish eye-servant, a poor rogue. He and his little ones were wretched and roofless, whereupon a certain good Samaritan said, in his heart, 'I will surprise this man with the gift of a comfortable home.' So, without telling his purpose, he hired the builder at fair wages to build a house on a sunny hill, and then he went on business to a far city.

"The builder was left at work with no watchman but his own honor. 'Ha!' said he to his heart, 'I can cheat this man. I can skim the material and scamp the work.' So he went on spinning out the time, putting in poor service, poor nails, poor timbers.

"When the Samaritan returned, the builder said: 'That is a fine house I built you on the hill.' 'Good,' was the reply, 'go, move your folks into it at once, for the house is yours. Here is the deed.'

"The man was thunderstruck. He saw that, instead of cheating his friend for a year, he had been industriously cheating himself. 'If I had only known it was my own house I was building,' he kept muttering to himself."

We are building the homes that we are to live in, and if any man shirks at any time during life, he will wake up presently to find out he was cheating himself.

The high school student or the college student who imagines that he is sliding through college and cheating his teachers and his father and mother, will find out when he goes out into life that he was cheating no one but himself; and so those who have attempted to live under the banner of Christ but have not lived in harmony with his religion in the day of judgment will find they have built the house that they are destined to live in.

Now may God help us and bless us and aid us in this work is my prayer.

Biblical Scenes on Plates Found in Michigan

Possibility of finds once declared fraudulent being proven genuine.

Some ten years ago Mr. Daniel Soper and others were interested in opening mounds in Michigan. They found some engravings on copper, slate, and other substances. Elder Rudolph Etzenhouser was very much interested in these finds, and prepared a brochure and exhibited samples of some plates and photos of others.

The position taken by the church is very clear. It is quite possible that such finds will be made from time to time, but the truth of the Book of Mormon record does not rest on any particular find, as the Kinderhook plates, or these plates in Michigan. But such researches when proven valid have only tended to confirm the record of the Book of Mormon.

The Ohio State Journal for April 22, 1921, contains an article describing these plates and the mounds in Michigan from which they have been derived. The photographic work is by a Catholic priest of Detroit, Monsignor Savage, and Daniel E. Soper, who has continued his work in research.

These plates almost invariably show scenes with which every student of the Old Testament is familiar: The creation, the story of Moses, the judgments of Solomon, the tower of Babel, the confusion of tongues, and other Biblical tales. Accompanying these is what appears to be a written language, and certain signs which it has now been suggested represent the word "Jehovah."

Daniel J. Ryan, vice president of the Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Society, commented very favorably upon the plates, as well as the accurate drawings of pyramids and palm trees. He is quoted as saying:

"It would take a lifetime for one man even to begin to unearth this wealth of historical stuff. At first I will admit that I was skeptical of the Egyptian or Jewish connection. However, I am convinced that they are genuine. A hoax or deception could not have been conceived on so large a scale and with no apparent motive."

We note the comment that Mr. Ryan is one of the men who induced Professor W. C. Mills to tell Elder Etzenhouser that these cuts were a fraud. It seems that Mr. Ryan has now changed his opinion. Another feature that is held to prove their genuineness is, that the finds are hardened copper; the hardening of copper is a lost art, and belongs to antiquity. In addition, there was a great collection of stone pipes and clay pipes, Egyptian and far eastern heads.

Mr. Tussing, an attorney of Columbus, Ohio, and amateur archaeologist, made the comment:

"One thing is certain. Here was established a civilization of white people, for these faces are those of white people, who had attained a high degree of culture, and most important of all, who believed in the one true God. It is easy to conceive of them in this Middle West. It is easy to construct in one's mind the idea of this people flooding the country occupied by Michigan and Ohio, with a regular traffic in copper and flint. Copper ornaments and weapons found in the mounds here in Ohio must originally have come from Michigan, and the flints in Michigan undoubtedly came from Ohio."

This factor of the hardened copper is a very interesting one. The cuts certainly show ancient characters, and are decidedly similar to those shown in the code of Hammurabi. The scenes are Biblical and Egyptian. We have not personally sufficient evidence on which to express even now an opinion. But the passage of time appears to add to the possibility of their genuineness as ancient records. If so, they bring a strong confirmation to bear on the record of the Book of Mormon.

The export price of wheat in November, 1919, averaged $2.31 a bushel. The price paid the farmer was $1.70 a bushel. In November, 1920, the export price of wheat averaged $2.61; the average price paid the farmer was $1. This represents an increase of margin of exactly $1 a bushel. The export price rising 30 cents; the price paid the farmer falling 70 cents. This represents 200 million bushels exported, and 100 million bushels purchased for delivery. Twenty per cent of this, according to the Washington Star, is represented by increased railroad rates, and this money was taken between the American farmer, and the starving millions of Europe. It is profiteering from charity, according to the Washington Star.

During the war Mrs. Louis Reed Deizmiller, New York's only woman commissioner of markets, organized an emergency food league which supplied 300,000 families with fresh produce through direct dealings with farmers.

Evangelizing the World

By J. E. Vanderwood

"As we make progress in this matter we have the greater need for the Zionite condition."

It is indeed encouraging to review the work of the church for the last two decades and see the strides that have been made along practically every line. Not only has the church grown in numbers of membership and in actual wealth, but it has grown in its intellectual and spiritual aspects as well. Its representative force, quite generally speaking, has a broader understanding, and hence a better concept of the needs of humanity. I believe we are beginning to sense more fully the meaning of the Master's language wherein he says, "The truth shall make you free."

For example, we used to hear a good deal said about "the fullness of the gospel," but in the minds of many this simply meant one's concept of the external ordinances, and fundamental principles of the gospel, which in reality may have been very limited. To-day we seem to have enlarged our concept so as to make it include the truth we have not yet discovered, so that in our development of the idea we are able to see that all truth, be it scientific, religious, philosophic, or connected with any other relation of man, is properly included in the term "fullness of the gospel." By this I mean that we have discovered that there is truth to be found outside of the church. We are also beginning to learn that only as truth is applied to the life of man does it become of value to him. In other words, only as my life responds to the truth that is discovered by me am I able to gain a greater amount of truth, and only as I live the truth is it of value to me.

Of course it would be idle for us to sit still and delight ourselves in the fact that we have in a measure discovered the truth; we must get busy and pass the good news along. We will soon discover, to our entire satisfaction too, that the thing we possess will be increased as we use it. We are beginning to learn that whatever we have, be it material wealth, intellectual powers, scholastic training, deeper insight into the problems of life, or whatever it may be, is given us to be used for the good of the group and not for personal aggrandizement. Service to others was the keynote of the ministry of Christ.

When Much Is Given, Much Is Required

We have learned that accomplishments only spell responsibility; that the more we gain the more there is required of us. Unto whom much is given much is required. So we are confronted with a dual problem, namely, the evangelizing of the world, and the redeeming and building up of Zion. In order to achieve either of these ends, consecration and sacrifice must be blended and our mental and material resources must be drawn upon to the uttermost. The secret of Christ's wonderful power rested in the fact that he energized up to the maximum degree. He spared no effort in making preparation for service, and he constantly kept the human in tune with the Infinite. If we are to approximate his work we too must energize up to the maximum in gaining the essential qualifications, and then in utilizing them as well.

No Half-Hearted Effort Will Suffice

It requires no argument to enable us to see that a half-hearted, commonplace effort will never evangelize the world. No; that work will require men and women who are willing to lay down their lives for those who are less fortunate than themselves; it will require brains that have been well trained and enlarged; it will require an unlimited expenditure of means, and it will require a faith that is undaunted. In reading the touching appeals that come from the pen of our beloved brother, T. W. Williams, we are able to get an idea of the magnitude of the work before us. The missionary work then demands that we shall be loyal to the trust that is imposed in us. We must be true to ourselves, true to our fellow men, and true to God. We must learn that life does not consist in having and getting only, but in giving the very best there is in us for the good of others.

The work of evangelizing the world consists in an effort to enlighten, regenerate, and redeem mankind. As we make progress in this matter we have the greater need for the Zion condition, for therein we discover the process whereby the united body of believers may work together for the removing of the corruptible, and the establishing of the sublime characteristics of social and economic life. It is therefore obvious that the missionary work of the church and Zion program must go hand in hand, and that either one without the other as its ally would be incomplete. The charge given by Christ to the Judean ministry, namely, "Go ye therefore and make disciples of all nations," is applicable to the church to-day. So also is the other charge, "The harvest is great, but the laborers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth more laborers into the vineyard." The course of Zion demands it; it requires loyalty; it requires consecration; it requires a heart and a willing mind, and we should remember that "all are called to the work."

There is and there can be no room for strife in the church. We cannot afford to divide our energies, for we need the united life of the church. We must stand as one against sin and for truth; nothing but loyalty to God and loyalty to the church can make us victorious. We must understand that it is impossible to get something for nothing. Therefore, if we evangelize the world and redeem Zion we must pay the price. We have no place for an Ananias who will keep back a part; we need a Paul who will count all things as dross for the excellency of the Spirit of Christ.

How Much Can I Give?

We ought never to ask, How am I going to get by? but we ought always to ask, What am I able to contribute? What can I do to speed the day when the kingdom of this world will become the kingdom of God and of his Christ? The Master teacher said that that which Mary did should be told of her wherever the gospel is preached, and this is the reason he assigned: "She hath done what she could." Can this be said of you and me? If it can, then we are in a fair way of accomplishing the task that is set us of evangelizing the world and of establishing Zion.

We should remember then, "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things he possesseth," but it does consist in the uses he makes of them. When I come up in the final judgment, it will not be a question as to whether I did more or less than some one else that will be taken into consideration; but it will be a question as to whether I have done what I could, that shall determine my condition before God.

If I have done what I could, God can require no more of me, but if I have failed or neglected to do what I could, I will be like the man who got into the wedding feast without the necessary wedding garment. I will be speechless—there will be no possible excuse that I can make. It remains, therefore, for you and me to say what the verdict shall be in this matter.

I have confidence in the men and women of the church that they will rally to the cause as they have never done before;

JEWS OF THE WORLD ARE GOING TO PALESTINE

"The movement back to Palestine is a reality," says this speaker of the Zionist movement.

The Jews of the world are going back to their land by the thousands, according to Doctor A. S. Juris, speaker for the Zionist movement, who spoke at Odd Fellows' temple Sunday night.

"Already there are 100,000 Jews in Palestine, and 10,000 have come in from Europe, hundreds sail by every boat from European seaports," according to Doctor Juris.

"I have recently come from Vienna, where three boatloads of Jews sailed for Palestine every day. There are already fifty colonies of Jewish farmers there now, working on the roads, getting the land ready for occupancy.

"The tool campaign is the biggest thing they have on their hands just now. They have no stone-crushing machines as you have in this country, so they are working in primitive fashion, with pickax and hammer.

"Jews all over the world are collecting tools to send them, so that work may go on faster. The rebuilding of Palestine is now under way.

"The movement back to Palestine is a reality. It is no longer necessary to say, 'I am a Zionist,' and 'he is not a Zionist,' for we are practically all Zionists.

"The Jews are unpopular largely because of economical jealousy, because he does not till the soil, and because of his original treachery," said Juris.

"Well, the Jew will soon withdraw from the economics of other countries into his own land, he will till the soil, and he will win the regard of the world."

Doctor Juris speaks very little English, and his conversations with Americans are carried on through an interpreter. His address Sunday night was in Jewish.—Des Moines Register, April 26, 1921.

PALESTINE, WAR, SCIENCE

There was the ancient prophecy that Palestine will be delivered from the Turks when the waters of Egypt should flow into it. When the Egyptian expeditionary force started out to conquer Palestine they planned to fulfill the requirements of the prophecy. The plan was to start from the region of the Suez Canal and to march across the Sinai desert, following the route taken by the ancient kings of Egypt and Assyria. To some closer home they proposed to follow substantially the course taken by Moses when he led the chosen people out of Egypt, according to some authorities.

Exodus 17 recounts the threatened rebellion of the Israelites on account of the scarcity of water. "And there was no water to drink, wherefore the people did chide with Moses and said, 'Give us water that we may drink. Wherefore is this that thou has brought us up out of Egypt to kill us and our children and our cattle with thirst?'"

The route across this desert, the eastern half of which is almost waterless, was followed by Napoleon's army. But those forces were small compared with a modern military force, and especially do I have confidence in the young of the church, that they will arise in the strength of Jehovah, and will triumphantly carry to its completion the work that has been so nobly begun. May it be said of each of us, as it was said of Mary, "She hath done what she could."

and the few scattered desert wells which sustained the earlier forces were not equal to the needs of the British expedition.

To the east, regarding the Sinai desert as an insurmountable barrier, lay the Turkish troops. The water supply of the canal district is furnished by an open aqueduct which takes water from the Nile not far from Cairo. Seventy miles down this open ditch aqueduct the water supply main for the expedition was placed and at Kantara a water plant was located. The open ditch water, by this time very much befouled, was sedimented, filtered, and treated with chlorine. After that it was pumped to the troops through a twelve-inch water main laid on the surface of the ground. As the troops advanced this pipe was lengthened. Finally it was 147 miles long. Counting the 70 miles of flow in the ditch, Egyptian or Nile water was carried 220 miles across the Sinai desert into Palestine, thus fulfilling the old prophecy.

The surface waters of Egypt not only carry the germs of typhoid, cholera, and diarrhoea, but they are infested with snails, and these transport a kind of tropical liver trouble that causes much sickness in that section. The water first was passed through screens to remove the snails. After that the gross dirt was settled out and then it was passed through pressure filters of a type widely used in this country. Finally it was treated with one part chlorine to each million parts water.

The attacking troops found the desert no barrier. They remained healthy. Palestine was redeemed.

There are many American communities with high typhoid death rates, because they do not take the precautions to supply their people with pure water—precautions taken in Palestine which made the success of the expedition possible.—The Omaha Bee, March 13, 1921.

AMERICAN ZIONISTS ANNOUNCE BREAK WITH WORLD ORGANIZATION

NEW YORK, April 19.—The Zionist organization of America through its president, Judge J. W. Mack, to-night announced severance of negotiations with Doctor Chaim Weizmann, president of the World Zionist organization, for the raising and expenditure of a fund for the benefit of Palestine.

Judge Mack declared the break came as the result of failure by Doctor Weizmann to recognize demands of American Zionists "for safeguards with respect to expenditures." The American organization would not cooperate with the Keren Hayesod bureau, recently organized by Doctor Weizmann to raise money in this country, he added.

American Zionists, the judge said, wished the Palestine fund to come entirely from donations, whereas Doctor Weizmann desired to pursue other methods.

Judge Mack announced his organization will soon undertake another campaign to be known as the Palestine donation fund.

Meetings of small groups can well be arranged at the reunion, at such a time as not to interfere with the general meetings or the general activities of the reunion. It is not necessary that the tabernacle shall be used for each and every group meeting, but small group meetings may be held in the children's tent. When only a small group are interested in a subject, we can well arrange an opportunity for them to get together in a place sufficiently large, and sufficiently small for the occasion, so that those who are especially interested may attend these special group meetings.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Local Reporting

We present in this issue a local report recently received, just to show in tabulated form that real work is being done by our sisters. That most of our locals can duplicate the activity reflected, we feel sure, and it is one of the most encouraging signs that the sisters are understanding better the matter of systematic and regular reporting. None of us desire to report, or put on paper, anything which exists only on that paper, but it is a well-known fact that the work of women in the past has been given freely, with little thought or attention being paid to the fact that it is, in reality, a part of the whole, and as such should be carefully and accurately recorded.

When during the recent war it was desired to compile for certain reasons those figures which would represent the actual amount of Red Cross and other patriotic work done by church organizations of women, we found that owing to the fact that our own women had not well learned the lesson of systematically recording and reporting their organized activities, our General Women's Department could not respond with figures at all commensurate with the amount of work actually done by Latter Day Saint women.

Since we are now a department of the church, so recognized and allowed so to function in all places where our church is organized locally, we should feel that, to be fair and just to the whole body, we should perform faithfully every duty devolving upon us, one of which is consistent, periodical reporting. The general body exists only for the locals, anyway, and it exists that life and vitality and activity may be expressed locally. Its mission is only to direct the forces inherent in the women of the church, to guide them in their desires to serve, and to encourage and suggest to the end that a real and actual service may be rendered. To do this intelligently, your cooperation in the matter of reporting is required, for only through this channel are we made acquainted with the needs and the conditions we are supposed to meet and supply.

Some of our organizers write that they are discouraged in this matter, that they write to the locals time and again and cannot get either reply or reports. Surely, if this is the case, there must be something wrong somewhere, for no local leader or secretary would wish to change places with an organizer under such circumstance. To be responsible to the general department for the work of the various locals in her district, to put herself wholly at the service needed therein, to consecrate time, strength, and means to the end that her sisters might be helped and encouraged to enter intelligently and whole-heartedly into the responsibilities expected of them by the church, and then to have her efforts meet with little or no response, cooperation, enthusiasm, or support, would be disheartening to say the least, and, on the part of the local women, is unfair and unjust.

We are hoping that this little plea will enter into the consciousness of all who have been thoughtless or negligent in this regard, and that from now on regular and intelligent reports will be sent to your organizer. It should be a delight and a pleasure to you to make those reports, to see how your local is growing, to record from time to time your splendid achievements and note the advancement made. Only accurate reporting can adequately show these things, and the leaders in any movement can well attest its value.

We feel quite sure it is only needed to remind the sisters in this way of its importance to secure for the future a better and more intelligent cooperation in the matter of reporting. By the way, you have not forgotten the request made by the historians, have you? It is that when you report to your organizer, you send a duplicate copy of it to our office. You see, the organizer's report is only made annually, and is a summary. The historians feel that from your local work, as detailed in your report, they can get a splendid idea of the rapidly developing work of the women in the church. This will not mean much extra work for each local secretary but will mean much to the general historians.

A "Thank You"!

Some weeks ago, the Women's Department was presented with a most handsome table cover, the embroidery on which was the work of our Brother Richard Bullard, who has, of late, found in needle and thread an antidote for insomnia, and, in his skill in their use, an avenue through which he could make financial contributions to the church he loves which would otherwise be denied him.

Artists of all ages have reveled in the manipulation of lines and color, and have used them to express their sense of beauty or other aspects of soul and thought life. It is perhaps not so usual to find them using the needle and floss as the brush and pencil, but the former has this advantage over the latter, that its product usually has a utilitarian value as well as artistic, although we know that in the case of the Japanese, embroidery is often framed as painted pictures and panels might be.

Brother Bullard conceived the idea of making this large table cover to be donated to the Women's Department and used in the furnishing of its offices hoped-for, and inviting the Saints whom he met in his missionary travels to contribute small sums towards its cost, all money raised in excess to be given to the church, for auditorium or other worthy purposes. He reports almost $125 having been contributed in this manner, and so the executive of the Women's Department feel to say a most hearty "Thank you!" to everyone who has given his "bit" to make this gift possible, and who has thereby expressed his interest in, and support of, the work of our department.

Especially do we thank the good brother whose loyal interest in our objectives inspired the thought of which this beautiful cover is the concrete form, and the good sister who, he says, contributed the work of making the lovely lace which surrounds the same. Some day, we hope to welcome, in a reception room or office, furnished in accordance with the dignity and worth of our field of church work, those who have shared in the presentation of the lovely table cover in evidence there!

Build as Unto God!

I would say to the young mothers, the time of care and responsibility is upon you. The Master has given unto your charge these little ones that you may guide them, may build their bodies, educate their minds, and fit them with "brain and brawn" to battle with the world and its complications.

The women of the church are standing ready to aid you with the studies of proper foods and proper care for these precious bodies. There are many good books to aid you, and you will need great knowledge in the task that is ahead of you.

Stay with your children, go with them, or allow them to go with you all through their young years, up to the time they say to you, "The old home ties must be changed—for there is some one else!"

Guide them spiritually, from the cradle, for the time will come when their feet will wander into by-and-forbidden paths. Even so, sometime, somewhere, those children will come back into the paths of the good and true, and memories of a mother who has been prayerful and faithful will guide them through life.

I once saw a picture that made a great impression on my mind. A mother had gone with her son to the "parting of the ways." He was starting out into the world for himself. She had led him to the brink of the river—so wide one could not see across; and there were stepping-stones straight across and by-paths leading from it. This dear mother stood on the bank with arms outstretched toward that loved son who had been the very breath of her life, and watched him go from her, with an anxious, longing look of wonder upon her face—an uncertainty as to which path he would choose!

So I say to the young mothers, Build well, that you may look back over your past lives and feel no regrets nor fear of retribution, knowing you have done the best you knew how to shape to the divine pattern the lives of the children intrusted to your care.

Margaret Widdemer has beautifully written:

If I could only follow, little son, little son,
Your way by hill and hollow
'Til your long road's done!
You have so many things to meet
Where I can never, never guide your careless feet. . . .
Will they know you true and kind,
These stranger-girls you find
When you journey from your mother
Where the world's roads wind?
But I can only strive to build you strong and wise
Before your path leads far from me,
And childhood dies!

If I could only find you, baby girl, baby girl,
When colored world-lights blind you
And world-dances whirl!
But you will only laugh to stand
And greet the careless hour
When Love shall take your willing hand and show the world in flower. . . .

Will the man you love that day
Keep you safe and glad and gay
When you journey from your mother
Down the old, new way?
But I can only strive to build you fair and true,
Before you pass too far to heed
My love for you!

You Are the Spring

You are the spring to me. The mayflower's breath
Hidden in green.
The lure of trout streams and the first
Magnolia's bloom.
You are the gay, all gently blue and so alive
With golden sun.
To me you are the glory of the spring.
Each budding thing
Cries out in your dear voice.
I find you all about me whispering.
Until there comes Within my heart a joy
So tensely deep
It wraps itself in silence.
Only spring
Can fragrantly express you.

A Baptism in Palestine

"Much water" for baptism is not easily found, but a suitable place was located and the ceremony performed.

E. A. S.: Yesterday we had another experience quite typical of Palestine. It was a trip made for the purpose of baptizing. There are three persons whom Brother Passman considers ready for baptism, so the matter of place to administer the ordinance was being considered, and to those who believe in immersion, that is not a trifling question here. A place had been found near the Pool of Siloam; but one of the candidates, a young man of eighteen years (Job Nejeam), seemed not satisfied with the selection. We asked him if he had a preference and we learned he had. He wanted to be baptized in one of the pools near the Spring of Ain Fara.

Tradition has it that near this spring is where Elijah was resting when fed by the ravens. Yesterday was a holiday, and Job did not have to work, so we decided to make the trip to Ain Fara then. It was too hard a trip for the two other candidates, who are older men, so we arranged for a small party to go. The place lies some seven miles east and north of Jerusalem, reached over a road which is really only a trail; too rough, too narrow, and in places too steep for a carriage.

In the party were Brother and Sister Passman, Brother Williams, Job Nejeam, Alexander Klein, and I. As the trip had been arranged somewhat hurriedly and as the day was a holiday, we were somewhat doubtful about securing donkeys; but while Sister Passman was arranging and packing a lunch, Job and Alex went down to the Jaffa Gate and soon returned with six donkeys in charge of an Arab donkey boy. So about ten o'clock the "caravan" started for Ain Fara. Passing through the northern part of Jerusalem, we skirted Mount Scopus on the north, and took the trail leading to Anata, a small village lying about half way to our destination.

Anata is a poor village inhabited by peasants and shepherds. It is very old, and its chief fame lies in the fact that it was the birthplace and for a time the dwelling place of the Prophet Jeremiah. It is difficult to describe, for the peasant villages of Palestine beggar description. The houses are built without any attempt at regularity of streets, either in direction or size. Stone is used in construction, because stone is ever present and abundant. The houses of Anata are mostly one story, with the characteristic domes which form roof and ceiling. No chimneys are seen, for the smoke from the open fires is let out through a hole through the wall just below the dome. Few houses have more than one window, but the door is usually open. On our way back, Brother Passman and I stopped for some pictures which we may send on later.

Anata is about half way to Ain Fara, and from Anata the trip was made without undue incident. It proved that Brother Passman and I had drawn the slowest donkeys, so he and I usually formed the rear guard; and when the donkey boy wasn't behind us, our "speed" was quite slow indeed, for we simply couldn't manage those shrewd beasts, and they would take their own gait. About the only way we could keep within sight of the rest of the party was to dismount and chase the donkeys ahead of us. It was really interesting to see how lively they would become under those conditions.

The last three quarters of a mile or so was made down a steep, rough trail into the narrow gulch called Wadi Fara. I had noted the barometer readings as we journeyed, the indicator rising from 27 inches when we left the house, to 28.8 inches when we reached the bottom of the valley, where the spring is. Those readings show the springs to be some 1,700 feet lower than the house, the former being about 1,000 feet above sea level, the latter 2,700 feet.

As we followed the winding trail down into the valley, past the ruins of the Russian Convent which the Turks destroyed in the time of the war, we heard merry shouts from below, and when we reached the spring we found a large party of young girls from the Hebrew school. They, in charge of their teacher, had walked from Jerusalem to spend the day, and they were having a happy and busy time of it.

We found a place under a fine large willow tree where we deposited our things, while the donkey boy herded the donkeys into a safe place. Tourists are always surrounded by curious natives looking for baksheesh, and we were soon the center of attention for several ragged, hungry-looking men and boys. One old man pompously demanded money for the privilege of resting under the tree; but Job held an altercation with him in Arabic (of which he told us the meaning later) in which he said we were not going to pay any money and asked the old man what he was going to do about it. The old fellow quieted down with an "As you like," and didn't bother us any more except to hang around looking or waiting for food or baksheesh.

Leaving two of the party to care for the things, Brethren Passman, Williams, Job, and I went a couple of hundred yards farther down the stream to where there was a secluded pool suitable for baptism, and there Brother Passman administered the ordinance. It was a pretty sight. Above on each side of the narrow gulch towered the cliffs. The pool lay amidst the huge boulders which have fallen from the cliffs above, while into and from the pool-ran the waters from the spring above, with a pleasant murmuring. An occasional deep note sounded from the throat of a frog, and birds flitting among the trees leafing out in the warm valley gave utterance to notes of song which blended almost unnoticed into the whole setting of the scene. I took some pictures of the baptism which I hope to send on later. The ceremony was soon over, and Job seemed happy, for he had been waiting for some weeks. Job is a fine lad, one I want to see soon in Graceland and getting ready for the work he seems capable of doing.

Returning to the willow tree where we had left the things, Sister Passman soon had a tablecloth spread over a large flat rock and on it the lunch. We "fell to," occasionally shooing the Arab youngsters away when they got too close and too thick. These Arabs were peasants from a near-by village.

The lunch over, the things packed up, we took a last refreshing draught from the spring where it comes bubbling from under a large rock, and started up the trail on the climb back home. For the first three fourths of a mile or so, no one rode, so steep is the trail. The sun was hot, and no one suffered from chills on that climb. But the varying views were fine, and I frequently stopped to admire the wild beauty of the narrow valley. The Jordan Valley lay not far away, and in the bright sunlight the green-lined banks could be clearly traced. Behind the river rose the always beautiful mountains of Moab, in a blue haze which softened the lines. Glimpses of the Dead Sea were caught on the return trip, while from the higher points could be seen the road to Jericho as it wound its way past the Good Samaritan Inn. Jericho itself could not be seen, being hidden by the intervening hills.

Once up the steep incline, the party mounted the donkeys. It was not long till Brother Passman and I were again forming the rear guard. Our donkeys were getting slower. By the time we reached Anata the rest of the party were on ahead, we only catching occasional glimpses of them. We lost some more time at the village by stopping for some pictures. I herded the two donkeys while "Harry" got on the roof of one of the houses for one picture and climbed up into the cemetery for another. By the time we started on we were quite alone. The nearer home we got the slower became the pace. We rode, we walked, we pushed, and part of the way I quite dragged my "mount." They are small brutes, but wonderfully strong; when mounted on that diminutive cousin of the Missouri mule I kept wondering how one would look mounted on a Kansas jackrabbit. The comparison doesn't hold good as to speed, perhaps, but as to the size and the ears, yes. If one can imagine a rabbit-eared turtle, perhaps the comparison would fit better.

Whenever the mule boy was behind my donkey, that donkey seemed to understand what the boy said, for he usually said it accompanied by some persuasive motions that resulted in more speed. What he said sounded about like what an Iowa hog says when he is asking for breakfast. I tried to imitate it, but I must have spoken a dialect, for the donkey paid no more attention than as though I was singing a psalm. Perhaps he thought I was. I tried the persuasive motions; but I only made an ass of myself, for I got no increase of speed. My antics afforded amusement to Brother Passman, though they were quite without effect on the mule. He, too, may have been laughing at me for all I know, though his indifference to my desires for more action appeared to me like stubbornness, not to say mulishness. The only way I got more action was to get off and walk and drive the donkey ahead. But even that played out, for near the last of the return trip I couldn't even get him to hurry that way. I really fear that shrewd beast was working to have me carry him, and if he had had a few miles more he'd have worked it or else I'd have abandoned this ship of the rocks. As it was, when Brother Passman and I reached Floyd House, the rest of the party had been home an hour. That was all right, for they had supper ready.

The trip was enjoyed by all of us, however, and gave us another good chance to see Palestine country and customs. The country through which we passed is agricultural and pastoral. Grain was growing in every place where soil enough existed to plow and sow. Rocks abound everywhere, and on many of the hills the rocks are so thick that one wonders how anything can grow; but almost everywhere one can see goats and sheep grazing, each herd carefully guarded by one or more shepherds. At this time of the year grazing is at its best and the sheep and goats are in good condition; but later as the grass dies and dries up from lack of moisture, the grazing is poor, and the animals have a tough job getting enough to live.

It is interesting to see these shepherds attending their flocks, for the same methods are employed that have existed for centuries.

There are two more baptisms to perform, but they will probably be attended to at some point more easily reached.

Yours, FREDERICK M. SMITH.

JERUSALEM, PALESTINE, March 29, 1921.

Jerusalem

By T. W. Williams

A few unvarnished facts about the situation in Jerusalem, a state of affairs which may be an asset or a liability.

Its curse: Blindness, physical and spiritual.

Its heritage: Filth, immorality, degeneracy.

Its menace: Rabbis, priests, and false religions.

Its drawbacks: Ignorance, fanaticism, superstition, prejudice, intolerance.

Its dangers: Racial hatred and conflict.

Its needs: Anglo-Saxon supervision and guidance.

Its salvation: The gospel of Jesus Christ:

A great number of the people, not only of Jerusalem but of Palestine and, for that matter, of the entire Near East, is afflicted with ophthalmia in some form. Sore eyes are infectious and sometimes epidemic. Defective vision and blindness seem to be the rule, perfect eyesight the exception. One person in twenty has sore eyes. One person in every hundred is blind.

There is a prejudice against medical treatment. Mothers take comfort when their children have ulcerated and mattery eyes, thinking it makes them less susceptible to the influence of the "Evil Eye," the hobgoblin of the land. Ophthalmia is the scourge of the Near East. A blind man is venerated.

Blind beggars line the streets and swarm like flies in places where tourists gather. The people generally are extremely filthy in their habits and appearances. Many of them look as though a bath were something to be avoided like small-pox or leprosy. A dozen people attending church in a closed room will furnish a greater variety of odors than an apothecary's shop or an undertaking establishment. I now know the origin and use of incense.

The streets of Jerusalem within the walls are insufferably dirty and unsanitary. One wonders how people live at all in such surroundings. Progressive inhabitants, of whom there are some, aver that things are vastly improved since the Turks were ousted. England is doing her best to civilize this land. One notes the evidence of her influence in many ways. May she succeed. She has a man's job. It is still a long, long way to cleanliness and wholesome living.

Polygamy flourishes among the Mohammedans. Girls eight and nine years of age are taken in marriage. Necessarily this degrades and debases womanhood. It makes a chattel of the wife. She lives to serve "my lord." It relegates women and girls to ignorance and servitude. It has a brutalizing influence on the home.

The whole appeal of the churches here, whether Mohammedan, Aramenian, Catholic, Greek, or Roman, is to superstition and idolatry. The most uncanny, imaginative, and extravagant claims are made in an effort to lure and hold the people. They employ every artifice to overawe fanatical devotees. The priests of each religion seek to outdo all rivals in miraculous phenomena and in the possession of sacred shrines.

In the face of this revolting blasphemy and religious perversion if one were not grounded in the concept of true religion he would become fanatic or infidel. To a mind not given to sheer fanaticism the extremities to which the devotees of each religion seek to outdo all others sickens and disgusts. Sites which may have been sacred in the ministry of Jesus Christ are prostituted to degrading religious purposes.

One leaves these nauseated and depressed. It is blasphemy. It is paganism. We might expect such from Mohammedans, but Catholics outdo the heathen. The so-called holy shrines become mere stalls for the collection of religious baksheesh. What Mecca is to the Mohammedans so Jerusalem is to the Greek and Roman Catholics. Each holy place under their control becomes a mockery instead of a religious memorial.

Millions of Greek devotees believe that just before Easter each year the patriarch of the church at a given hour enters the Tomb of Jesus in the church of the Holy Sepulcher, and that thereupon holy fire issues from a cleft in the rock above the tomb. This fire is passed out through a small aperture where the assembled fanatics fight like maniacs in their wild desire to be the first to light a candle and carry it back home. Pilgrims travel long distances to witness and participate in this superstitious tragedy. Whether the patriarch carries a concealed candle or possesses a handy box of matches deponent sayeth not.

The Catholic Church used to foster this humbuggery but during recent years has been content to leave this grandstand play to the Greeks. They have equally effective methods to charm and delude the people. The identical incidents in the life of Christ and the exact spot where they transpired are clearly indicated to tourists with baksheesh. It is said: "A fool and his money are soon parted."

We had pointed out to us the holes where the three crosses stood at the crucifixion of Christ, the identical spot where Jesus was buried, the various stations which marked the route from the court of Pilate to Calvary. One of these is indicated by a depression in one of the large stones of one of the buildings which line the narrow street and was caused, we are assured, by Jesus where he placed his hand as he rested while on his way to the cross. We saw (?) the place where the blood from the body of Jesus trickled down the cross and through a crevice in the rock dropped on the face of Adam, who, wonder of wonders, happened to be buried just beneath. We were in the grotto or cave where Mary fled with her child before going into Egypt, and as proof that this was the identical spot, a cross is pointed on the floor indicating where three (just three) drops of milk fell from the breast of Mary as she was nursing Jesus. And this passes for Christianity! Is it any better than the heathen? Is it as good?

The rabbis appeal to the prejudices of the Jews. They stimulate racial solidarity and isolation. The old slogan, "Jerusalem for orthodox Jews," persists. Samaritans are still dogs. The Gentiles are without patronage of Jehovah. Heretics are reminded that stones still abound. Christians are despised and ostracized. A Jew who espouses Christianity loses caste with his countrymen. Henceforth he is an alien. He is anathema. He is made to sense the truth of this statement: "They persecuted me—they will persecute you." He can neither buy nor sell with Jews thereafter. He must thereupon become an object of charity or move to other parts.

Last Sunday evening after services I talked with a young Jewess who is investigating our claims to Christianity. She said, "I do not know which is right—Judaism or Christianity. Should I become a Christian, my father would kill me. He has told me so!"

A young man said to me that should he join the church he would immediately lose his position. No Jew would employ him. He could not go into business. If he did, he would be boycotted. This approaches to blood atonement. The intolerance from which the Jews have suffered in all lands and in all ages instead of showing them the injustice of such methods only intensifies their hatred.

Judaism rejects Christianity. To the orthodox Jew Jesus was a pretender—an impostor. He was a man like other men. All his claims to divine Sonship were blasphemy. Like Master like disciple. The ascendancy of Christianity means to the faithful the overthrow of Judaism. Messiah is yet to come. His coming is to the Jews. He will establish the kingdom of David in Jerusalem and will destroy their enemies. They are still the favored people.

There is a persistent and intensifying antipathy on the part of the Jews against the Arabs. The Arabs on the other hand hate and fear the Jews. The only thing which prevents open warfare and the extermination of one or the other is the presence of the English army of occupation. For the safety of all concerned, England's mandate should continue. A very intelligent Arab said to me: "If the English army would withdraw from Palestine, there would be war between Arabs and Jews immediately, and we would exterminate the Jews root and branch." I said, "Is it not then a good thing that England has her army here?" He said, "No; this thing must be settled sometime, and the sooner the better."

For many years some Latter Day Saints have been emphasizing prophecy and reciting scripture which presage the return of the Jews to Palestine. Our people were elated, and rightly too, when General Allenby marched into Jerusalem at the head of the allied forces. We have noted with absorbing interest the growth and development of the Zionist movement, and the unqualified support given thereto by Great Britain, the United States, France, and Italy.

Let me say: the return of the Jews has nothing to do with Christian expansion. It does not further the preaching of the gospel in all the world. It is an organized anti-Christian movement. It is anti-Christ. The orthodox Jews are our enemies, as are the Mohammedans or the Catholics. We have nothing in common with the upholders of Judaism. Just to the extent that Judaism is supported by the Jews, to that extent is it more difficult for us to evangelize among the Jews.

Every organized Jewish movement for the furtherance of Judaism is a challenge to Christianity. A Jew who comes to Jerusalem imbued with the rabbinical ideas is well-nigh impervious to Christianity. The Jews are coming back to Jerusalem as Jews—orthodox Jews—not as Christians. The return of the Jews will not help Christianity. It will not further our evangel. It may be fulfillment of prophecy; so also was the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. It is no indication of the extension of the kingdom of God.

True, God may have a purpose in the rehabilitation of Palestine. He may be interested in the Jews coming back to Jerusalem. If so, what is his purpose? It can be none other than to afford the emissaries of his church an opportunity to fulfill the statement made in the Book of Mormon, "which is to shew unto the remnant of the house of Israel what great things the Lord hath done for their fathers: and that they may know the covenants of the Lord, that they are not cast off forever; and also to the convincing of the Jew and Gentile that Jesus is the Christ, the Eternal God, manifesting himself unto all nations." To conserve this purpose we must institute and prosecute a definite, well-organized, and vigorous missionary campaign in Palestine and among the Jews. We must turn the tides of anti-Christ to further Christian purpose, else the return of the Jews will prove a hindrance rather than a blessing. The return of the Jews means nothing to us as a church unless we can convert it into an asset rather than a liability.

We should be impressed with the following facts:

Propaganda and missionary work in Palestine and particularly in Jerusalem is wholly different than in other places.

Conversion to our faith means social and economic ostracism.

We must meet the combined opposition of heathendom and so-called Christianity and Judaism.

It means the world against the Church of Jesus Christ.

We must carry on educational work. We must institute a school. We should develop industry and be able to supply employment for our people. Promiscuous charity will require an ever-increasing outlay of money with inconsequential returns. It will not only make heavy and continuous draft on the church treasury, but it will also degrade the converts. We should help these people to help themselves. Here is an excellent field for us to make a practical demonstration of the social program of the church, and I know of no other thing which will give us entry to the Jewish mind more than this.

We do not need preachers so much as we do teachers. If we are to play our part here, we will minister to the minds and bodies of the people. We will change their environment, establish schools, develop industries, and give demonstration of practical Christianity.

It is a difficult field. We need men and women of resolute purpose, and unconquerable will. It will require workers who can close their eyes to offensive things and who can bore down and find pearls beneath the rubbish heap. We need pioneers who can and will love these people, not for what they are, but for what they may become. We need leaders who can organize and train men and women, boys and girls, to work. We need nurses to minister to the people and teach them how to care for their bodies. We need these things much more than preaching. The gospel of Jesus Christ is to make real men and real women. This can only be done in the Spirit of the Nazarene.

To carry on such a program will require the expenditure of considerable money, but when other churches are spending fortunes to buy diamond rings to adorn the statue of the Virgin Mary, surely we can well afford to spend to our capacity in vindicating the ministry of Jesus Christ by reestablishing his church in the city and among the people who crucified him two thousand years ago. It is for us to lift the banner of Jesus in Palestine and compel consideration of his claim, not only by heathen, but also by Jew.

A Call From the Philippines

This sister points out a tremendous missionary problem, but wisely concludes not mere numbers is required to solve it.

If I were granted this morning any one wish I might desire, I believe I would call for a legion of Latter Day Saint ministers and their wives to come and teach the people in the Philippine Islands how to live. If the church only had a chain of ministers to encircle the universe, what a great blessing it would be to humanity! I am hoping against hope that that time is not far distant. Never, until coming to the Orient, had I anything like realized what the church had before it. At home, in our little branches there is a constant cry for a regular pastor, and I admit we do need them, but oh, how much worse these people need the gospel preached to them! We who have the angel's message know what we should do and can improve day by day through the knowledge we already have and the guidance of the Holy Spirit, but here it is different. These people have no pattern or example to work from, and no goal in their range of vision to which they can attain.

This group of islands has a population of nearly ten million people, and there is China with its four hundred million souls, and Japan, India, Ceylon, and Russia that have not as yet heard the angel's message or even the story of Jesus of Nazareth. "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness to all nations; and then shall the end come." It seems that there is a tremendous undertaking before the church to send ministers out to preach the gospel to these hundreds of millions of people, in a short time, does it not?

Not long ago I heard a Latter Day Saint say, "Why, it is absurd to think that the coming of Christ is anything like near at hand. The end of the world and Christ's coming is not to be until the gospel shall have been preached in all the world, and there are China, Japan, Russia, India, and most of the islands of the sea whose inhabitants have not yet heard the gospel, and it will take several generations for the Chinese Empire alone to be taught the doctrine of Christ."

This brother was honest in his belief but he was looking at this proposition in a business way and perhaps judging the people by the slow progress they have made in the past few centuries under seemingly favorable conditions. Take the people of the Philippines for instance: Spain has been trying to teach them Catholicism for nearly four centuries and the majority of them claim to be "Christians," but I doubt if one tenth of those who profess to be Catholics could give you the fundamental principles of the doctrine of that church. And there is Hongkong, China, an island eleven miles long and five miles wide which the British have had about four hundred years, and the Chinese in Hongkong are still Chinamen in looks, actions, and belief. Many wonder at the futility of the efforts to Christianize the Orientals. To me it is no wonder, for they have not found that which helps them spiritually any more than that which they already have, so why change? The teachings of Mohammed and Confucius show them how to treat their fellow men, so why should they change their belief merely to please the white man?

I believe that when the Orientals are presented with a religious belief that they can see is better than that which they now possess, that they will grasp it as a hungry man grasps a morsel of food. We cannot expect these people to take a white man's word as to Jesus dying to save them, and this is the main theme of the missionaries sent to this country. These people want proof, a knowledge that Jesus died for them, and when they can be made to realize that it is their privilege to know for themselves, the gospel will mean to them what it does to you and me. As yet they have not had a fair opportunity because they have been taught more by precept than by example. I long to see their starved souls fed.

Missionaries sent to the Orient by the different churches have done a noble and unselfish work, and those who have chosen to give their lives trying to better humanity will certainly be rewarded for their efforts. But so far as I can see, their success has not been in the religious world but in the physical. The people have been taught sanitation to a certain extent, and how to care for their sick, their children, and their homes, along with religious belief, but the latter seems to make the least impression on them. They are anxious to avoid getting diseases, to have their children get an education, and to have good homes, and the training they have had along these lines seems to stay with them, but should all the missionaries leave a locality where they have been working, thinking they had the work established, in all probability their religious belief will go with them. At any rate, if they return in a few months they will find their followers doing homage to heathen gods.

I agree with the brother that it would take man many generations to teach the gospel to China. Apparently it would take ages, judging from what has been done in the past by man, but "with God all things are possible." To-day the church has, I believe, only a few more than three hundred missionaries in the field. Gideon had only three hundred warriors when he went to battle against the great Midianite army, but God was on his side and he won. How much more important a spiritual warfare to place the gospel before the world! God will certainly be with his people, and though the ministers are few now, no doubt their numbers will grow, and even if their numbers should never be very great, surely they will be given strength, power, and wisdom to present the gospel to all nations for a witness. I have faith to believe, as given to Brother Joseph Lambert in the way of an inspired impression (in SAINTS' HERALD of December 15, 1920), that if we will do our part in every way, the Lord will do the rest. A very consoling thought to me is that one and God are the majority. Are we with the majority, and will we stay there? This is the question.

Far-Reaching Effects in Des Moines Meetings

Good Zion Builder Meetings that present problem of making the good permanent.

The young people's meetings are going well. The interest is intense. Of course the crowds are nothing to compare with Independence and Lamoni, except in quality and interest. We had rain for three nights in succession. Last night was the only clear night we have had since Sunday, and we had the largest crowd since Sunday.

The song service gets better every night. We have a little book printed for the occasion. Copy inclosed. Brother H. C. Burgess has an irresistible appeal, and makes you say, "I will sing because I must." In addition to congregational singing he has tried out some special number work with good success.

What shall I say of the sermons? I cannot describe or adequately express in words what they have meant to the young people of Des Moines. Brother F. M. McDowell has thrown his whole soul into them. Forgetting formality he has imagined himself in the classroom and has talked to us heart to heart. He has been wonderfully blessed. I have heard him many times before, but never have I heard him preach as he is preaching this week. Even he does not sense the far-reaching effects of his sermons. I am in close touch with the young people and can feel the throbbing of their hearts in response to the challenge he has brought us. Our next task is to make the good permanent.

Very sincerely, A. E. WARR.

Misrepresentation in School Corrected

"When as a boy I was called a Mormon I often prayed for power and opportunity to tell them the truth. . . . My prayer was answered."

Have had some interesting experiences as well as some very sad ones during the past week. Last week I wrote of having had a very pleasant experience in that I was permitted to explain before the class in religious administration at the local college the economic system of the church. Since the meeting, and in fact during the time it was in progress, one of the teachers in the high school took it upon herself to explain the defects of Mormonism and to establish the thought that the Latter Day Saints of Cameron were just the same as those in Utah, very much to the humiliation of five or six Latter Day Saint students who chanced to be in her class.

On Wednesday of last week she began her tirade again, seeking to establish as a fact that the two churches were all the same by saying I had said in the class at the college that we still sent one tenth of our increase out to Utah.

I asked one of the brethren to go with me to the president of the school board, to which he gladly consented. The president, a very fair man, suggested at once that we go to the professor with him and explain the matter. To be sure we were ready to go. When as a boy I have been called Mormon and heard the teachers paint the character of Joseph Smith black, and I have prayed for power and opportunity to tell them the truth of the matter and make them apologize for their doings. Truly on Friday my prayer was answered for I had the thrilling experience of sitting in the office room of the high-school building and, with the president of the board, professor, and several teachers as an audience, telling the difference between the two churches, and protesting against any teacher who was hired with money produced by Latter Day Saints together with others, humiliating any child because of his particular religion. And better still of hearing the president of the board say to the teacher in question, "You will go before your class and correct your statements regarding Elder Budd and his church?"

I told her if she would make the correction before the class, it would save me the trouble of putting a correction in the daily paper and thanked her very much for the kindness, at the same time handing her copies of "The church in court," and "Open letter to the clergy," with the remark, "If you will read these I am sure you will never again fall into the error of classing Latter Day Saints with Mormons."

She would not tell me who told her of my statement at the college (of course I knew it was her husband) and said she was probably mistaken as to the statement being that we were sending money to Utah. I meet with that class tomorrow and will ask the privilege to make a statement, at which time I will tell them plainly that we do not send money to Utah and will try to do it in such a way that will lead them to ask questions that will permit me to explain in brief the difference in the two churches. Then I expect to place in the hands of each teacher in the public school and college, as well as the different ministers of the town, a copy of "The open letter," and "The church in court," either through the mail or by a personal call.

(From letter by R. S. Budd, Cameron, Missouri.)

The Responsibilities of a Stewardship

Another of the letters being sent out by the Lamoni Stake Bishopric to the membership of the stake.

A stewardship carries with it the responsibility of saving. As stewards we must of necessity comply with the commands of God in order to make a success of our stewardship. Improvidence and squandering are sins—increasing or saving is a virtue. Read Matthew 25: 2, 8, 9; Luke 12: 20; Matthew 6: 19. What has God told us about these things?

We are told, "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." This does not mean that we should not save. The Master is telling us that one of the things not pertinent to true life is to have in "abundance." It would be perfectly right to say that "a man's life consisteth partly in the needs and just wants of the things which he possesseth." Our abundance, or surplus, should be paid into the Lord's treasury. The Lord tells us in Doctrine and Covenants 42: 9 "that every man who has need may be amply supplied and receive according to his wants." Note also that the Lord does not say that he "owns" these things, but "possesseth."

The virgins in Matthew 25: 2, 8, 9, were called "foolish" because they did not provide themselves with oil. The wise ones were commended for being provident—saving.

The foolish farmer in Luke 12: 20 was not condemned for his desire to secure big crops, but he was condemned for attempting to place all his fruits and his goods in his barns.

He was not willing to give his partner, God, his share. The Master draws this lesson from the parable. "So shall it be with him who layeth up treasure for himself and is not rich toward God."

The statements in Matthew 6: 19, where the Lord says, "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth" does not forbid saving, for the Lord adds these significant words,

"where neither moth nor rust doth consume." It has been well said that "moths do not bother things that are worn, nor do razors rust when in constant use. Only that consumes when hoarded, heaped up, and kept idle, not doing the purpose of Providence, not contributing to the welfare of men"; hence Jesus says, "Your riches are corrupted, and your garments moth eaten; your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last day."

The Lord tells us in these last days to "be frugal" (Doctrine and Covenants 119:9)—a positive command. During the late World War the United States needed means with which to prosecute the same. A campaign of saving was started. The American people who were the most wantonly wasteful awoke to the fact that they must curtail their expenditures and save. Grim war faced them, and the absolute necessity for saving was very apparent. The Nation went to work with a will and the result was stupendous as well as amazing. The people as a whole heeded the call to cut out all luxuries—to be careful with their resources and to be contented with their bare necessities. And what was all of this for? That the rights of humanity might be maintained.

Every Saint knows that we are engaged in a warfare far greater than the one just passed. "We wrestle not against flesh and blood but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." We are engaged in a great spiritual warfare, and Christ our Leader is calling on us to "be frugal"; to labor six days in the week and give an honest day's toil; to take out of our gross income enough to amply supply our needs and just wants, and out of the net increase pay first the tithe and then the surplus, if we have any. If we have no tithe nor surplus and desire to aid, we can do so by making an offering. Our method of saving should be consistent. The United States Government insisted on our observing meatless and wheatless days, yet at the same time the Government asked us to contribute vast sums of money to waste in "smoke," and what was still worse, to aid in destroying our American manhood through the use of tobacco. About a billion dollars a year was wasted on tobacco. Surely we cannot afford to follow such a precedent!

The World War has taught the Saints how to economize. Let us not forget our lesson. It showed us how our savings could be wrongly used as well as wisely used. Can we not remember this?

To do this successfully experience has taught us that we should manage our individual and family finances on the budget basis.

Every family should learn how to make a budget and make every exertion to live within the amounts allowed for expenses. The United States Government recommended the budget for the American family during the late World War as the surest means to teach the family how to be frugal. The success of our work depends on our being not only thrifty but frugal.

Zion will be redeemed by those who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow or its equivalent—by those who give an honest day's toil and who live within their means and save. There is no royal road to the redemption of Zion. It must be done by hard work and frugality. The Lord does not wish us to be stingy, neither does he wish us to be spendthrifts. Let's not be led astray by any sophistry and think that we can do God's work in any other way than by honest toil.

Let us never forget that we must be honest in every detail of our lives; honest in our work; honest in paying out debts. Zion must have men and women whose word is as good as their bond—honest through and through. The bane of the world is that so many men are trying to get something for nothing, following the quick-rich methods of the world. Every Saint should see to it that he always gives an equivalent for what he gets. No Saint would wish to be swindled out of his possessions. Let us do unto others as we would that they should do unto us, and see to it that whatever we purchase we give for it that which it is worth. If we owned 100 acres of land worth $200 an acre and we had a chance to sell it we would want its value, so if we try to buy land in Zion, let us give the owner what it is worth.

Our enemies to conquer are ignorance, poverty, and crime. Improvidence is the father of poverty—dire need. To be wasteful indicates a weakness not worthy of a Saint. The true follower of Christ can be neither wasteful nor stingy. He must be a normal man, not abnormal. In all the idea of saving, the great thought should predominate that it is not so much for self, but for the glory of God, for the purpose of advancing his kingdom here on earth.

Our economic program before us means much. Missionaries must be sent out to all the world. Lands must be purchased. Manufactories must be established; in fact, every activity useful to make "the church of God independent of everything under the celestial heavens" must be provided for. To prepare a place for the gathering of God's people means material aid in the form of money, and this means frugality on the part of the Saints; thus a saving—a saving not for the sake of saving, but for Christ's sake. Hoarded money is useless—it may be a positive injury. It has been said that "no swimmer can stay under the water long and live. What holding the breath is to inhalation and exhalation in the respiratory system, saving is to earning and spending in the economic system. It may be wise, indeed necessary, at times to hold one's breath, but to hold it too long is fatal. So it is with saving. To save for the sake of saving is hoarding. That process makes misers—and misery. Saving atrophies the soul of him who saves that which should be spent or given."

In Mark 4:19, the Master forewarns us that we may become unfruitful through the "deceitfulness of riches." In Mark 10:23, 24, he tells us how hard it is for the rich to be saved. "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of my Father! And the disciples were astonished at his words. But Jesus spake again and said unto them, "Children, how hard is it for them who trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God! It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. And they were astonished out of measure, saying among themselves, Who then can be saved? And Jesus, looking upon them, said, With men that trust in riches, it is impossible; but not impossible with men who trust in God and leave all for my sake."

How much shall we earn? The answer is, All we can earn in righteousness.

How much shall we save? All we can save in righteousness—to the limit of our right to save.

He who withholds the payment of his just debts is robbing his creditors. This is not saving; it is robbing. God, our partner, asks for a tenth of our increase. To try to save this one tenth for ourselves is wrong—a sin—for we are robbing God. (Malachi 3:8.) Neither can we save by not fairly recompensing the one who labors for us, for "Behold, the hire of the laborers . . . which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth: and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of sabbath." (James 5:4.) Our missionaries go out in the great harvest fields and "reap." Keeping back the Lord's tenth is taking away the "hire" of those who so reap. We are robbing God.

How rich should we be, or how much should we be allowed to save? The ideal condition is where there are no rich and no poor. He who has anything more than his needs and just wants is that much rich. He who has any less than his needs and just wants is that much poor. The will of God is that none should have any more than his needs and just wants, nor any less than his needs and just wants. As every man's needs will necessarily vary, it follows that no set amount will measure what a man should have. (See Doctrine and Covenants 51:1; 42:9.)

The law provides for a man to hold title to enough property to supply his needs and just wants. This law like all other laws has its exceptions.

Riches in itself is not wrong. It is the viewpoint we have toward riches that makes it wrong. Riches held as a stewardship—held as a trust under the law of the land, to be accounted for both in time and eternity—is not wrong.

That the right or wrong of the matter is determined by the attitude of the person towards his riches or poverty is clearly set forth in the following: "Woe unto you rich men that will not give your substance to the poor, for your riches will canker your souls: and this shall be your damnation in the day of your visitation, and of judgment, and of indignation: The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and my soul is not saved! Woe unto you poor men whose hearts are not broken, whose spirits are not contrite, and whose bellies are not satisfied, and whose hands are not stayed from laying hold upon other men's goods, whose eyes are full of greediness, who will not labor with their own hands."—Doctrine and Covenants 56: 5.

In our saving then we must see to it that we are:

- (a) Not greedy.
- (b) Not idle. (Must labor with our own hands.)
- (c) That we pay for what we get and "not lay hold upon other men's goods."
- (d) That our hearts must be broken and humble.
- (e) Our spirits contrite.
- (f) Our appetites governed.

Every man seeking the interest of his neighbor, and doing all things with an eye single to the glory of God. (Doctrine and Covenants 81: 4.)

Sincerely yours,

LAMONI STAKE BISHOPRIC.

Agricultural Notes

Compiled by C. E. Irwin

The best kind of a partnership that can be found is the partnership between the farmer and his son. This will be none the less true when we undertake to work out our Zion program in agriculture. Unless the boy can see a future in the farm plant, however, we'll not be able to hold him. So long as we permit the city to outbid us we shall be forced to allow the migrations cityward to continue.

Nor is it solely a problem of the farm boy. Indeed the farm cannot hold its own as an institution if girls and young women are imbued with the idea that farm life is a thing to be endured. They will leave perhaps even sooner than will the boys. Moreover, we have perhaps been a little partial to the boy, failing to take proper account of the problems of the farm home.

There is, then, another partnership relation which should be emphasized—the partnership between the mother and the daughter.

In this connection, in thinking further of our Zion program we are making bold to suggest that the Women's Department will find the rural district a very fruitful field, provided representatives are assigned to that field who know rural life.

The club work is one of the most interesting features of our agricultural program. Practically all the States have taken some steps in this direction. In Minnesota, Virginia Scanlon, of Belview, won second place in the junior live stock show and earned $625 for her prize beef steer.

It seems that after all it is true that the greatest incentive to the farmer to improve his stock is to see that his children are profitably doing what, perhaps, he had always regarded as impractical and unprofitable.

Can't we get in touch with Latter Day Saint boys and girls who have done some of these things in club work, so that we can report real, live experiences of our own people?

For that matter we would appreciate it very much if we could receive the experiences of adult farmers among our people. Somehow they would mean more to us if we could feel that the items we read in this column were the experiences of our "ain folk."

If you think your experiences are too commonplace, just write us your ideas about the greatest of all projects—Zion.

We've said it a good many times already, but it is still worth while to remember that we need to get together; and it applies with peculiar emphasis to the farmers of Zion.

Don't you know, the more we think the thing over, the more we are convinced that if any step is to be taken forward it will be taken by those who hope to benefit by such forward-looking programs. In other words if the farmers want a share in Zion, in all probability they will have to work for that share. The best way to work for that share is to work together.

Hens are helping to lift a good many mortgages nowadays, and they will continue to do so if they are given reasonable care.

Money can be made from small fruits. The area is decreasing every year, and this means that the price will keep getting better. A splendid opportunity awaits the truck farmer of the church in that Kansas City and Independence afford a fine market for the product.

In fact the advantages of this section of the country have been too much overlooked by us. A comparison of the soil characteristics reveals the fact that there is not the difference that the prices indicate. The price of Iowa land as against the land of Missouri found in the Holden and Far West Stakes throws the weight of evidence very much in favor of the latter when we consider the inherent qualities of each.

Nor are we so sure that the Lord has not had a hand in the matter. He is at least willing to give us an opportunity to work out our scheme. Our concern, therefore, is not in regard to the part the Lord is playing in this matter but rather what has been our attitude in regard to carrying forward the program.

The factors of immediate importance so far as the agricultural program is concerned are:

- (1) A thorough study of the soil characteristics of the stakes and their specific requirements regarding fertilizers.
- (2) Preliminary organization work among our farmers so that they may begin to feel the power of union.
- (3) The selection of men of practical experience to begin working upon special problems; such as the problems of dairying, orcharding, markets, etc.

In case you farmers wish to make this column a sort of a clearing house for agricultural ideas, address your communication to the AGRICULTURAL COMMISSION, Lamoni, Iowa.

Council Bluffs Items

The Riverside Saints under the leadership of Brother G. J. Harding honored Arbor Day by planting trees on the lot purchased for the erecting of a church building in the future.

The people of the church are quite active in seeking to create an interest in the meeting to be held from May 8 to 15. The young men and women appointed on committees are making a great canvass for those who will attend. There is one thing that has been very apparent since I have been here, and that is the younger members have shown the greater activity in church work. In the missionary efforts of last summer, the younger members were in great evidence, doing the greater part of the work in distributing literature and notifying people of the services. This is a very commendable feature of the conditions in this branch at the present, and we trust the coming services may only increase the interest in both old and young. Brother John F. Garver is to speak to the younger element and Brother J. W. Wight to those who will occupy the basement.

Elder Henry Castings of Des Moines spent part of last Lord's Day with us in worship. Sunday night Patriarch

F. A. Smith sermonized for us on Zion, the place and people. He gave a very effective talk, especially on who the people of Zion are and how to become Zion.

The good work being done by the sisters in their visitations is much appreciated. Some are found in a destitute condition, and the branch has voted to the Women's Department two hundred dollars for that kind of work. It is understood that this kind of work will be taken care of by the deacons, or under their supervision in the future.

Effort is being made by the branch to purchase a piano for the use of the Belmont Mission in the near future. An effort is being made to build up a choir at this mission, and I learn that quite satisfactory work was done in this line under the supervision of Sister Weaver. CORRESPONDENT.

Montrose Acquires the Spirit

Membership of the branch increased fifty per cent. The whole town astir.

Brother P. R. Burton just closed a very successful series of meetings in this place, which had been conducted for the past five weeks. These meetings were well prepared for by the local Saints, not only in the way of prayers, but through handbills and posters and thorough advertising in the paper. The meetings opened immediately after an attempted revival on the part of the Methodist Church here, and at a very suitable time for the people of the town to be in the church habit and for them to have fresh in their minds the things told them at the other meetings. Brother Burton, aided by a wonderful degree of the Spirit of God, was able to bring to the packed houses that came to hear him every night, our great gospel message with such clearness and frankness that it was a marked contrast to the Methodist meetings which had immediately preceded. People who had been awakened to the need of religion by these first meetings, now came to our church and found the truth and came into our church, much to the displeasure of the Methodists.

Committees were organized to take charge of the different phases of the work—some to take charge of the music, others to watch for the comfort of those in the building, others to act as a reception committee, and others to act as a tract committee. These all did their duty splendidly, and about seven hundred tracts were handed out at the door, which have gone a long way toward enlightening the people here in regard to our work. Their main objection seems to be the question of the difference between us and the Utah church. Brother Burton made this point very plain, however, in one of his Sunday sermons, much to the satisfaction of the audience. Not only did Brother Burton talk each night, but also went among the men on the streets and talked to them, and met the men in one of the barber shops at their own request to explain to them why the world has so many churches, and the difference between us and the Mormons. Fully half of this town believe that we have the true gospel, and there remains a great work for this community.

Twelve were baptized during these meetings, which makes a total for Montrose of fifteen within the past seven months. This almost increases our membership by one half.

The Saints have been brought to a great unity of the faith, and each one is striving to do all he can for the onward progress of the work. Sister Ida Holmes, who joined the church about four months ago, is giving her talents to the church in the way of short stories, two of which have appeared in the Stepping Stones so far. The Sunday school is growing by leaps and bounds.

Brother Hield, who is superintendent of the Montrose schools, was placed in charge of the young people, while Brother Joseph Reed took charge of the adult class. We were exceptionally pleased to see three of these fine young people baptized, also several adults, including the bringing of one entire family happily together in the gospel work of God. Brother Reed, moved by the power of service, preached for us his first sermon Sunday night, he being a priest, and we feel there is a great future for Montrose. We are all determined to push forward, and to live sermons by our lives until Brother Burton returns again to us this summer for another harvest. CORRESPONDENT.

Prepare for Musical Work at Reunions

By Sarah Barney

Weeks prior to holding of a reunion, work should be done to make the music a success.

I have been reading with a great deal of interest the articles in our church papers concerning the reunions and how to make them profitable and interesting as well as everything else conducive to our welfare spiritually, physically, mentally, and morally. I am particularly interested in the musical part. At our last reunion held in Bellingham, Washington, last August, I was invited to give a talk on that subject.

I spoke particularly of the duties (as I see them) of a district chorister, as we seem to have had them from year to year, in name only, in the dozen or more years I have lived here in Washington. A new one is appointed each year. "He springeth up as the grass" to accept the nomination, and that is the last we see or hear of him (or her as the case may be) until next reunion. My idea of the duties involved would be for the district chorister to get in touch with every branch in the district, either personally or by correspondence; find out just what material, either vocal or instrumental, or both, is available; have each branch secure the same music, selected by the district chorister and thoroughly practice some weeks before reunion time. Having all music learned, the work of preparing it for each service is reduced to a minimum, and we have material ready for solos, duets, trios, quartets, and choruses.

I would like also to see a "Children's Day"—perhaps you do have it elsewhere—with an entertainment by them at say from 6.30 to 7.30 or 8 p. m. All music on that day given by them with a special sermon for them. Children throughout the district could learn their own music upon the same plan as the grown-ups. In this way they grow accustomed to facing the public, and real talent can thus be found and brought out.

Music is essential in our homes, in our churches, and at our reunions. Cultivate the best—simple, if we must. There is much good, simple music. Music does much (one way or the other) for the speaker. I have wondered sometimes how one can preach any kind of a spiritual sermon after listening to some of the music (?) given at times, but I believe there is a promise that they shall not be hurt by certain articles of food and drink. Let us hope that holds good in music also. The Lord has commanded us to cultivate the gift of song, and it is a beautiful way to worship him. Let us give our best, and remember that

When dark shadows fell upon the world and hearts were fainting,

The angel message came to us and made our hearts rejoice;
So sound it far and wide; its truth will e'er abide,
Bringing joy and peace to all who hear its voice.

When the Savior in his glory comes and finds us waiting,
Will our lamps be ready, trimmed to light us on our way,
In Zion to abide, there at the Savior's side,
When the glory dawns on that millennial day?

Reminiscences of Nauvoo

In Peoria, Illinois, about the year 1890 or 1891, I attended a lecture given by Judge Blodgett of Chicago, under the auspices of the Illinois Historical Society. I think the title of his lecture was, "Early recollections or reminiscences of Illinois." In the course of his lecture he referred to the Mormons or Latter Day Saints and their troubles at Nauvoo.

He indicated his belief that the leaders and rank and file were mostly honest, but having suffered much persecution in Missouri, they were naturally sympathetic and willing and ready to listen to any tale of woe told by anyone claiming to be persecuted. So they were easily hoodwinked and taken in by the tales of certain so-called border ruffians, who frequented the borders of Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri, who stole horses, cattle, hogs, etc., and when about to be caught escaped into another near-by State. Some of this stolen property found its way and was traced into Nauvoo, and some of the border ruffians proclaimed belief in the faith of the Saints and joined the church, thus gaining their protection, etc., but bringing discredit and persecution on the church.

He also spoke of his recollections of Joseph Smith. He said Mr. Smith in his travels to and from Nauvoo to Kirtland stopped at his father's house (I presume a tavern). He described Mr. Smith as being tall, of a commanding appearance, hazel eyes, and auburn hair, and the last man you would ever think of trying to deceive anyone. This last statement he made with great emphasis.

He also told of a young Methodist Episcopal preacher who felt it his duty to "beard the lion in his den," so, calling on Mr. Smith, he took him to task for teaching present-day revelation, etc., reading the statement in the last chapter of Revelation, viz, "If any man add to or take from, etc." Then Mr. Smith with oratorical force said, Young man, it does not say that God shall not add to, etc., but "if any man." This is not man's work, but God's.

I give the above solely from memory, but being deeply interested in history of the church, his statements were deeply impressed upon my mind, and the above, though not verbatim, gives the substance of his remarks relative to the church and Joseph the Martyr. I now recall that he also said that it might be because of boyish recollections, but he really thought Mr. Smith was the most handsome man he ever saw.

ROCK ISLAND, ILLINOIS, April 27, 1921.

Editors Herald: The Sunday school is doing good work here, with Thomas Willetts as superintendent. The Religio is a power for good, and we have heard that the Rock Island Religio is one of the best in the church. We are trying to be the best.

We have some of the best people in this city one can find. They love one another, and Christ has said that by this shall all men know us. Leonard Stiegel is superintendent of the Religio. There is so much interest the young people cannot stay away, but are there before the meetings begin—no trouble about getting people to attend.

The orchestra is a great help in Sunday school, Religio, and preaching services.

We have received much encouragement from such men as Apostles Aylor, Greene, Hanson, also from Elder Amos Berve and others who have dropped in to give us a word of encouragement.

On April 17 four were baptized. Brother Oscar Okerlind, our missionary, is with us. He baptized one last Sunday and is holding meetings this week. He is always working, and his aim is like that of our branch: "All for Christ." He will labor for some time in Rock Island and Moline. We certainly appreciate having some of the officials with us. Brother Arthur Mills was with us, and we shall see many fruits from his labors.

H. J. ARCHAMBAULT.

CAMERON, MISSOURI, April 25, 1921.

Editors Herald: Some three months have elapsed since the readers of the HERALD have had any news from Cameron, but there have been many interesting things happening; in fact many more than we will attempt to mention at this time.

In January the First Presidency borrowed our pastor, R. S. Budd, and sent him to Nowata, Oklahoma, to do some special work there, that being his field of labor previous to his locating in Cameron. We presume he enjoyed the chance to return and spend a short time working among old friends. During his absence the work here was cared for by the local brethren. We were fortunate in having as speakers during his absence, J. W. Roberts, of the stake presidency, Apostle Paul M. Hanson, and Richard D. Weaver. Later Apostle U. W. Greene came and gave his second illustrated lecture to a large audience in the theater.

Bishop J. A. Koehler made us a visit during February and delivered an excellent sermon on education.

One of the speakers in March was Elder John C. Constance, of the Delano Branch. Brother Constance presented the message in a logical way and it was greatly appreciated by all.

On March 16 we began a series of revival services, Evangelist Ammon White being the speaker. From the opening of this series to the close the meetings were attended by large audiences of interested listeners. Many evenings the seating capacity of our church was taxed to its limit. Brother White is a deep thinker and logical reasoner, and with his vast experience coupled with the marked degree of the Spirit which attended was able to present the gospel in such a plain, forceful manner that although only a few were baptized many were practically convinced. We hope the seed sown will bring forth fruit in the future. Besides the thirty sermons he preached while here Brother White was kept busy during the day with his patriarchal work.

Our orchestra which has made marked advancement for the short time they have been practicing together, rendered valuable assistance to the services with their musical numbers.

The following statistics taken from our pastor's report for the quarter ending March 31, 1921, will give the readers an idea of the progress being made:

	1919	1920	1921
Membership of Branch	177	186	211
Membership of Sunday School	133	108	145
Membership of Religio Department	107	109	110

Average Attendance Sunday School	97	86	129
Average Attendance Religio Department	70	59	93

Although we have not been advancing by leaps and bounds we feel that we are steadily climbing the ladder round by round and that the advancement that is being made will be permanent.

A Little Prayer

Where'er thou be
 On land or sea,
 Or in the air,
 This little prayer
 I pray for thee—
 God keep thee ever,
 Day and night—
 Face to the light—
 Thine armor bright—
 Thy 'scutcheon white—
 That no despise—
 Thine honor smite!
 With infinite
 Sweet oversight,
 God keep thee ever,
 Heart's delight!
 And guard thee whole,
 Sweet body, soul,
 And spirit high;
 That, live or die,
 Thou glorify
 His Majesty;
 And ever be,
 Within his sight,
 His true and upright,
 Sweet and stainless,
 Pure and sinless,
 Perfect knight!

THE NATIONAL COST OF EDUCATION

United States Commissioner of Education, P. P. Claxton, is reported in the daily press to have stated that the amount spent in 1918, the last year for which we have complete report compiled, shows that the United States spent for public education, primary and secondary, $762,000,000; for normal schools nearly twenty and a half millions; for higher education in colleges, universities, professional and technical schools, $137,000,000; a grand total of $919,729,258.

In fifty years, 1870 to 1920, we have paid for primary and secondary schools, that is, the grammar school and high school, nearly twelve and a half billion dollars; for normal schools $291,000,000; for higher education, including both tax supported and privately endowed colleges and universities, $1,804,000,000; a total of a little over fourteen and a half billions for fifty years.

These figures, however, he divides, stating the amount paid for salaries in the primary and secondary school was for 1918 only $402,298,516. The amount in the universities and technical schools and normal schools is nearly ninety and a half millions, or a total of less than $493,000,000. In other words, allowing for defective return, and being liberal we spent for all purposes for education in 1918, not over one billion dollars, and for salaries not over half a billion.

Yet the Government return shows for 1920, $22,700,000,000 spent for luxuries. This appears to be an amount greater in one year than has been spent for education in all the history of the United States. These figures are divided—face powder, cosmetics, perfume, etc., $750,000,000; furs, $300,000,000; soft drinks, $350,000,000; toilet soaps, $400,000,000; cigarettes, $800,000,000; cigars, $510,000,000; tobacco and snuff, $800,000,000; jewelry, $500,000,000; luxurious service, $3,000,000,000; joy rides, pleasure resorts, and races, $3,000,000,000; chewing gum, $50,000,000; ice cream, $250,000,000.

The source for these figures is not given; nor is the manner in which some of the larger figures as three billion for joy rides, and three billion for luxurious service are determined, indicated. But making every reasonable allowance, the comparison is a remarkable one.

Special comment is hardly necessary with a comparison of these figures; especially when we consider the need of proper education. H. G. Wells, in the Saturday Evening Post, states that with a world state and the abolishment of war, a person could easily give one quarter to a third of his life to education and preparation and continued studying after the finishing of school work. That would mean more efficient teaching, better schools, and more attractive schools than we have to-day. We might even spend as much on education as we now spend upon an airplane a bombing plane, or a big gun. Of course, this would seem like hopeless extravagance to some people.

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION

One of Roger W. Babson's special business letters with a remarkable appeal.

The need of the hour is not more factories or materials, not more railroads or steamships, not more armies or more navies, but rather more education based on the plain teachings of Jesus. The prosperity of our country depends on the motives and purposes of the people. These motives and purposes are directed in the right course only through religion. Legislation, bounties, or force are of no avail in determining man's attitude toward life. Harmony at home and peace with the world will only be determined in the same way.

Religion, like everything else of value, must be taught. It is possible to get more religion in industry and business only through the development of Christian education and leadership. With the forces of evil backed by men and money, systematically organized to destroy, we must back with men and money all campaigns for Christian education.

We are willing to give our property and even our lives when our country calls in time of war. Yet the call of Christian education is to-day of even greater importance than was ever the call of the army or the navy. I say this because we shall probably never live to see America attacked from without, but we may at any time see our best institutions attacked from within.

I am not offering Christian education as a protector of property because nearly all the great progressive and liberal movements of history have been born in the hearts of Christian educators. I do, however, insist that the safety of our sons and daughters, as they go out on the streets this very night, is due to the influence of the preachers, rather than to the influence of the policemen and lawmakers. Yes, the safety of our Nation, including all groups, depends on Christian education. Furthermore, at no time in our history has it been more greatly needed.

We insure our houses and factories, our automobiles, and our businesses through mutual and stock insurance companies, but the same amount of money invested in Christian education would give far greater results. Besides, Christian education can insure what no corporation can insure—namely, prosperity.

As the great life insurance companies are spending huge sums on doctors, scientific investigations, and district nurses to improve the health of the Nation, so we business men should spend huge sums to develop those fundamental religious qualities of integrity, industry, faith, and service, which make for true prosperity. I repeat, the need of the hour is—not more factories or materials, not more railroads or steamships, not more armies or navies—but rather more Christian education. This is not the time to reduce investments in schools and colleges at home, or in Y. M. C. A. and similar work in China, Japan, Russia, or South America. This is the time of all times to increase such subscriptions.

Elder J. F. Garver, who was scheduled to preach during the week's series of Zion Builder Services at Council Bluffs developed diphtheria just before time of departure. As we go to press, on the 7th, we learn of this sad development. Elder D. T. Williams has been secured as speaker.

THE PRINT PAPER SITUATION

The following statement gives a typical situation that affects all our church periodicals.

Cost Still Advancing

Four years ago the price of newsprint paper was less than 2 cents a pound. During the first six months of 1920, the lowest price for paper bought by The Register, in quantities of nearly a carload a day, was 4½ cents a pound.

The price fixed by the manufacturers for the first six months of 1921 is 6½ and 7 cents a pound. The advance over last year's price amounts to nearly $1,000 a day. This advance is more than the total price paid for paper four years ago.

Paper is the biggest item of expense in newspaper making. Its cost has advanced 350 per cent in less than four years' time.

Freight Rates Just Advanced

Freight rates are a big factor in paper prices. Raw materials, such as wood and coal, are bulky, and along with the finished product must be shipped long distances. Freight rates advanced just a short time ago about 30 per cent—costing The Register an increase of $20,000 a year.

Coal Prices Are Still High

It takes a ton of coal to make a ton of print paper. Coal prices are still at their highest point.

Postage Rates Increase Next July

Four years ago Congress passed a new law whereby postage on newspapers is based on the distance carried. This new law provided for increases in postage rates each year for four successive years. Effective July 1, 1921, another of these increases goes into effect.

Wages Are Still High

Labor is an unusually large item, both in manufacturing paper and in making newspapers. Because of the years' time required to become a skillful worker, newspaper employees are among the highest paid in any line of work. And wages in the newspaper business are still at the highest point.—Des Moines Register Circular.

The recent extension of the franchise in Sweden now gives that country more women voters than men.

HYMNS AND POEMS

Zion Builders

By Elbert A. Smith

(Tune: "Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled.")

Far as human greetings go
Let all Zion Builders know
One great tide begins to flow—
'Tis the tide of Youth!

Let each man his weapon scour;
This the people, this the hour;
Jesus leads to grace and pow'r,
Victory and truth!

You who read of Enoch's band;
You who dream of Zion's land;
Strong of heart and thews!

You whose fathers loved and bled,
Stained her soil with living red,
See fair Zion's drooping head,—
Send her joyous news!

Tell her you have heard her plea;
Pledge yourselves on bended knee;
Zion, Zion shall be free,—
Zion shall be great!

Let one object be your goal;
Let one purpose stir your soul;
Jesus stands to call his roll,—
Zion must not wait!

When Life Is Done

(Given by inspiration to J. L. Williams. Especially appropriate for program feature with lesson 7 on first principles in current Religio Quarterlies.)

When life is done
And one by one,
Its many mysteries I've been shown;
I'll know that death was but the gate,
To greater joys that there await,
Than earth has known;
When life is done.

Chorus:

I'll know, I'll know when life is done,
Immortal life will then be won.
And on that bright and golden shore,
We'll meet again to part no more;
And on that bright and golden shore,
We'll meet again to part no more.
When life is done and I'm called home.

When life is done
My spirit gone,
To join the happy host above;
In that sweet land of paradise,
A fairer world will greet my eyes,
Where all is love;
When life is done.

When life is done
And I'm called home,
To meet the loved ones gone before;
We'll dwell in loving ecstasy,
From pain and sorrow e'er be free,
Forevermore;
When life is done.

Kin

By J. W. Gilbert

Why do I love so much this forest glade?
Why do the crooked limbs and deadened leaves,
The jagged peeling bark and curling vines
Vibrate upon the tablets of my soul
In waves of deep emotion? Whence this joy
If I but contemplate the varied whole?
For thrills my heart when rustling leaves
And snapping twigs and pliant cushioned moss
Gives answer at each tread. I'm with my own.
I feel the kinship in the leaf-strewn mold,
The stately trunks and overhanging boughs,
The dancing sunbeams and the flooding light—
The unity I feel. I'm one with them—
My fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers. They Have borne and nourished me. I'm of the earth—
Am differentiated cosmic stuff.
I, once, diffused through them, was gathered out—
The essence of their several elements.

My grand ancestors with a string of "greats,"
Gave chase, sought food and recreation sweet,
E'en lived and reared their young 'neath branches high
Or climbed for safety—even lodged in trees.
And in each one for generations past,
Hath memory garnered well each joy, each thrill,
As forth they sallied in the chase, or climbed
In swaying branches, frolicking on high,
Or gamboled on the green in mirthful play—
Plucked luscious fruits, regaled their hunger, and,
In sun-kissed flowery dells, did woo and mate—
Evolve the ruling passion of the race.
Nor wasted was a single joy, but all
Their bright delights, enthusiasms, loves,
Were stored in psychic tablets of the soul—
Their nature-gifts to us bequeathed. In us
The gist of all the cycles of the past.
Ah, thus it is I love these fastnesses.
The forest hath impressed her motherhood.

Give me work to do,
Give me health.
Give me joy in simple things.
Give me an eye for beauty,
A tongue for truth,
A heart that loves,
A mind that reasons,
A sympathy that understands.
Give me neither malice nor envy
But a true kindness
And a noble common sense.
At the close of each day
Give me a book
And a friend with whom
I can be silent.

The Restoration

Sermon by Elbert A. Smith in Zion Builder Series at Lamoni, Iowa, Reported by R. A. Wight and Estella Wight.

I have two texts, the first being found in Isaiah 29: 14:

"Therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvelous work among this people, even a marvelous work and a wonder: for the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid."

The other text is taken from rather an unusual source. It is from the writings of Sir Oliver Lodge in his book called Science and Immortality:

"This is the lesson science has to teach theology—to look for the action of the deity, if at all, then always; not in the past alone, nor only in the future, but equally in the present; if its action is not visible now it never will be and never has been visible."

That is strikingly in harmony with the theory we have been preaching for nearly one hundred years: that we should not look back alone to the Isle of Patmos for revelation, or forward to the pearly gates, but should look for the revelation and manifestation of God now—as much as at any time in the history of the world.

The Apostasy

There is no question that Jesus Christ came here and organized a church. Well, some people question it, but Christ himself said, "I will build my church" (Matthew 16: 18), and it is very clear that he did organize a church. It is equally clear that following the death of the Master and his apostles there presently ensued a great and complete apostasy. It had begun in the days of the apostles. It progressed until there was scarcely a vestige left of the gospel, and the church of Christ had been replaced by another. There is plenty of scriptural warrant for this statement. The prophets predicted it. I have not time to-night to read the predictions, but if anyone here should be taking notes he may refer to Isaiah 24: 1-6; Amos 8: 11, 12; Acts 20: 28-31; Timothy 4: 3, 4; Revelation 12: 1-6, and many others might be referred to. The Apostle Paul says that for three years he ceased not day or night to warn the people of the great apostasy that was coming.

The fact that it did actually occur is attested by history, both ecclesiastical and secular. We have but to read the record of the Dark Ages to recognize that the light of literature and art went out and the world became unspeakably corrupt; and if such a thing were possible, the church was worse than the world. The church stooped to sell license to commit sin in the name of God, and the price was fixed according to the degree of depravity and turpitude of the crime. This sale of "indulgences" was what aroused the righteous indignation of Martin Luther.

That there was a great apostasy is admitted by all Protestant churches—otherwise there would be no need for Protestant churches. If there were no great and complete apostasy, so that authority to represent God was lost, we ought all of us to be Catholics. Every Protestant spire that reaches towards heaven is a testimony that there was an apostasy—otherwise on top of that spire there would be a cross of gold. All Protestants, then, are agreed that there was an apostasy. It was so complete that the church that started out as representing Christ was not to be found on earth.

Reformation or Restoration

We might then ask ourselves: What was the way of recovery out of that condition? We have our choice between two propositions; that is, we may decide which one appears the more logical to us. We cannot affect what actually occurred, but we can decide which is the more logical, reformation or restoration.

I think that I can put this up to you young people so you can see about how the choice lies; and I believe that the illustration I use will find warrant in scripture, as I will show you a moment later. Suppose that one of you young men prior to the late war had espoused a beautiful girl and had taken her to be your companion. You were then away overseas for a term of years. While you were gone, for some reason or other, conditions became so unendurable in the community that your bride removed herself to a distant place of hiding, and in her absence a wanton, degraded creature came in and occupied your home.

When the time for your return drew near, which would you be for, reformation or restoration? You would be all for restoration. It would not satisfy you to have some clergyman go in and attempt to induce that creature to leave off the worst of her ways and then you come back and recognize her as your wife. You would say, "Give me back my beautiful bride that I have espoused."

John tells us in the 12th chapter of Revelation that he saw a beautiful woman, which all agree represented the church, clothed in the glory of the sun, representing the authority and power of God, having the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars; but he saw there was a monster that made war against the woman, and she fled away into the wilderness and was gone.

In the 17th chapter of Revelation he says that in her place he saw a degraded woman, clothed in scarlet and purple, with a cup in her hand, filled with iniquities, seated on a beast, and written on her forehead was "Mystery, Babylon the Great, The mother of harlots and abominations of the earth." This thing had come in and taken the place of the pure church that Jesus Christ had left on earth as his bride. Now, when the time begins to approach for him to come again, which will appeal to him, reformation or restoration?

The Reformation

Let us take up for a brief moment a consideration of the Reformation. There is no question that the reformers were very brave and some of them very noble men. They did a splendid work of preparation; but still it is true that there ensued and there still remains endless division and confusion upon that question, and Protestantism to-day seems to be doomed to failure. Every effort to consolidate and unite ends in failure.

It is true, too, that the reformers themselves seemed, many of them, to look forward to something infinitely greater than they had been able to accomplish; and they did not claim to have revelation or to be sent of God to restore the ancient order.

We might briefly note some statements made by some of them. For instance, in a sermon that John Wesley preached on "The signs of the times," he says:

"The signs of the times we have reason to believe are at hand, if they are not already begun, are what many pious men have termed the latter-day glory. . . . And yet the wise men of the world, men of learning and renown, cannot understand what we mean by talking of an extraordinary work of God. They cannot discern the signs of these times. They see no signs at all of God arising to maintain his own cause, and set up his kingdom over all the earth."

Roger Williams, identified with the pioneers of the Baptist Church, said:

"I conceive that the apostasy of anti-Christ has so far corrupted all that there can be no recovery out of that apostasy till Christ shall send forth new apostles to plant churches anew."

Alexander Campbell says:

"Since the full development of the great apostasy foretold by the prophets and apostles, numerous attempts at reformation have been made. . . .

"Society, indeed, may be found among us far in advance of others in their progress toward the ancient order of things, but we know of none that have fully attained to that model. . . .

"The practical result of all creeds, reformations, and improvements and the expectations and longings of society warrant the conclusion that some new revelation or some new development of the revelation of God must be made before the hopes and expectations of all true Christians can be realized or Christianity can save and reform the nations of this world. We want the old gospel back, and sustained by the ancient order of things."—Christian System.

We say amen to these statements. We do want the old gospel back, sustained by the ancient order. We say that God has arisen to maintain his cause, and has sent apostles anew.

The Restoration

Let us consider next the Restoration. It too was foretold in prophecy. Many scriptural references might be given, but time will not permit us to read at length to-night. We may cite you to the one already quoted from Isaiah 29, and you will do well to read it all, where the Lord says:

"Therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvelous work among this people, even a marvelous work and a wonder: for the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid."

The context shows that this was to be done at about the time when the Holy Land was restored to its fertility, and about the time when a sealed book (the Book of Mormon) should come forth and be given to the world by an unlearned man (Joseph Smith). While in Revelation, John says:

"I saw another angel flying in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come."—Revelation 14: 6, 7.

Why should it be necessary for any angel to bring the gospel back again to earth in the hour of God's judgments if it had always been here, and why did the Master say that this gospel should be preached in all the world "for a witness to all people," and then should "the end come," if it had always been preached? Would it be any sign of the end when it went abroad in the last days if it had been preached for centuries?

Let us tell you the story of the Restoration: First we will have to understand to a degree the condition of confusion and disagreement that existed in the religious world in the beginning of the nineteenth century. When I think about it I am reminded of the old story of the Japanese mirror.

According to the story there was a young Japanese peasant who went to the city for the first time in his life, and passing a shop he looked in the window and there he saw a mirror, the first one he had ever looked into. Looking into it, what do you think he saw? He saw, or at least he thought he saw, the spirit of his father. He saw a man there looking exactly as his father looked as he remembered him.

Being very reverent toward his ancestors, he took all the money he had and purchased this mirror. Taking it home he climbed up into the attic and built a little altar and put the mirror on the altar. Every day he went up and made an offering and worshiped and communed with the spirit of his father. Everything would have gone very well, only he was a married man, and his wife, like a few women, was curious. She wondered why her husband went into the attic every day.

So one day when he was out in the field she laboriously climbed the ladder and went into the attic and looked into the mirror. What did she see? Why, she saw a young, and as she thought a very handsome woman, and immediately she said, "The perfidious wretch! I know now why he comes up here each day! He comes here to meet with that woman!"

So down the ladder she went, and when the husband came home there was trouble. He swore he saw a man and she swore she saw a woman. So to settle the matter they sent for a very old witch who lived in the neighborhood, who climbed the ladder with many groans, finally looked into the mirror, and came down and said, "You are both fools. It is an old, old woman in the mirror, and there is no cause to be jealous." And then all three had a quarrel.

Now each one saw something; but no one of them had any toleration for what the others saw. If there had been some one there who understood the situation,—the man who made the mirror, for instance,—he could have put them in possession of the absolute truth; but, as it was, they went on with their quarrel.

So in these latter days men looked into the mirror of truth, and one man looking into it said: "I see absolutely nothing but predestination. A man is born to go to heaven or to hell and that is all there is to it. He can do nothing about it. I am a Calvinist."

And another man looked into it and he said, "I see absolutely nothing but free grace. All any man has to do is to believe in Jesus Christ and he will be saved."

And another man looked into it and he said, "I see cathedrals and monasteries and altars and candles and beads and monks and robes and incense and rites and pomp and ceremony. I am a high church man."

And another man looked into it and said, "Thou art mistaken. I see no cathedrals, no monks, no ceremonies, no rites. I see nothing but a patient awaiting for the spirit. I am a Quaker."

And so they quarreled. So it was at the beginning of the nineteenth century, in the year 1820, when a great revival fostered by leading denominations was held in the State of New York in the vicinity of Palmyra. For a while all went lovely and many were interested, and among them was a young man, or a boy, fifteen years old, named Joseph Smith. (I suppose that many of the churches wish to God that they had never held that revival.)

Joseph Smith became most profoundly interested in religion and desired the salvation of his soul. But unfortunately, when the revival ended it broke up in confusion and strife, with a quarrel over the converts, and he was pulled here and pulled there, and told, "Here is the truth," or "There is the truth," until he was at his wit's end. But he happened to read in James, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him."—James 1: 5.

Not finding any time limit on that promise, he said, "I will go to the One who made the mirror and he will tell me the absolute truth." So he went out into the woods and kneeled down and prayed. It was a beautiful day early in the spring, and he tells us that scarcely had he begun to pray when he was seized upon by the power of darkness; but he remembered the reason for his prayer and called upon God to help him. Immediately the darkness was rebuked and removed and a great light shone down from heaven and he saw two personages, and one of them said, pointing to the other, "This is my beloved Son; hear ye him."

That is the keynote of all our message. What does Jesus say on any given subject? "Hear ye him." And so in our "epitome of faith" we say that in all matter of controversy the word of God should be the end of dispute. If Jesus says, "Why tarriest thou, arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins," that settles the matter. If he says that he set in his church prophets, apostles, evangelists and teachers, etc., for us that is the end of the controversy.

Three years later this young man received a visit from an angel who told him many things, among others that his name should be had for good and evil among all the nations of the earth; that the time was coming for the Jews to gather back to Jerusalem; about the coming forth of a sealed book; the establishment of the church, and many other things. In 1829 the priesthood was restored. April 6, 1830, by divine commandment the church was organized and began its work of preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Religious Concepts of the Restoration

Before my time is gone, I wish to enter upon a consideration of some of the great religious concepts of this movement that we call the Restoration. I want to examine eight of the great religious concepts that Joseph Smith and his associates preached to the world. Every religious institution is judged by its religious ideals and concepts, and every religious leader must be judged by the religious concepts he preaches to the world.

Continued Revelation

The first of these I wish to notice is the idea of restored revelation. You can hardly imagine what a strange thought that was, because the religious world was absolutely a unit on one thing—if they did not agree on anything else, they agreed on this one thing, that revelation had ceased. They were still pointing to the closing chapters of Revelation, where it says no man shall add to the words of this book, when John, of course, had only the book of Revelation in mind, the Bible not being in existence when he said no man shall add to this book; also no man may add to the revelations of God, but God himself may add at any time if he sees fit.

So it was a strange thing when a boy came out of the woods where he had gone to take God at his word and said, "I have had a revelation." The very first man (a minister) he told it to said, "It is of the Devil. God doesn't speak any more!" If the religious world had said, We will judge that revelation and see whether it is from God or the Devil, that would have been a logical position; but when they said, "God speaks no more at all," it was an illogical and unscriptural position to take. It seems strange that one hundred years later Sir Oliver Lodge, president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, should have to stand up and say to these gentlemen:

"Gentlemen, this is the lesson that science has to teach to theology—to look for the action of the deity, if at all, then always; not in the past alone, nor only in the future, but equally in the present; if its action is not visible now it never will be and never has been visible."

The message of this young man was out of harmony neither with science nor religion. God says, "I am the Lord, I change not."—Malachi 3:6. He is in harmony with the great laws of nature that go on forever without deviation. This, then, was one of the first concepts presented to the world by this people—an unchangeable God speaking to his people and blessing them as of old.

The Second Advent of Jesus

The next concept that I wish to notice is the idea of the second coming of Jesus Christ. Latter Day Saints were told early, even before the organization of the church, that there must be a work of preparation for the coming of Christ. That is why they sometimes called themselves Latter Day Saints, and the church the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, because they believe that these are the latter days, immediately preceding the return of our Lord and Master. There were few, if any, then who believed that Christ would come again in person. It was all to be spiritual, and the only coming of Christ that ever would occur would be when he came in spirit to any individual who wished to receive him.

But I want to read to you some things that show a most striking change that has occurred in sentiment since that great concept was presented to the world by Joseph Smith. During the late war there was published what was called a manifesto, appearing in the London Christian World and quoted in the Chicago Herald for December 6, 1917. It was put forth by some of the greatest of the British ministers, representing Baptists, Methodists, Congregationalists, and Presbyterians, such men as G. Campbell Morgan, A. C. Dixon, and others. I have not time to read all of it, but this manifesto, which attracted world-wide attention at the time, says:

"First—That the present crisis points toward the close of the times of the Gentiles.

"Second—That the revelation of our Lord may be expected at any moment, when he will be manifested as evidently as to his disciples on the evening of his resurrection.

"Third—That the completed church will be translated, to be 'forever with the Lord.'

"Fourth—That Israel will be restored to its own land in unbelief, and be afterward converted by the appearance of Christ on its behalf.

"Fifth—That all human schemes of reconstruction must be subsidiary to the second coming of our Lord, because all nations will be subject to his rule.

"Sixth—That under the reign of Christ there will be a further great effusion of the Holy Spirit on all flesh.

"Seventh—That the truths embodied in this statement are of the utmost practical value in determining Christian character and action with reference to the pressing problems of the hour."

Here are three important events that they predict: The return of the Jews; the soon coming of Christ in person; and the millennial reign. But what seems strange to me is that an obscure and unlettered boy should have anticipated them by a generation. Well did Isaiah say that "the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid."

When the cataclysm came and war was poured out upon all the earth, when the Jews began to knock at the gates of Jerusalem and the proclamation was about to go out from Great Britain, and America, and France that Jerusalem should be reserved for a national home of the Jews, their seers began to see. How about the boy who saw it in futurity?

The mail to-day brought me a most remarkable clipping from a Des Moines newspaper. There has been visiting in the United States, Bishop Nickolai, of Serbia, who is said to be described by the Archbishop of Canterbury as the greatest living church man in the world. Last Monday he lectured in Des Moines. Here is the report of his lecture taken from the Des Moines Evening Tribune for March 14:

"You have heard the history of the end of Babylon? of the old Greece? of Pompeii and ancient Rome? Well, you can read the signs of a dying empire on the bodies of the European state to-day. . . . It is curious, to-day, to note how much talk there is of the world's end in every European country. The press is full of it (shamefacedly, but irresistibly), as are the mouths of men. Religionists pray for Christ to come again. From the common people you will receive the direct, open assurance that Christ will come again, ere long. It is most curious. In one section, an interesting state of mind exists. Conviction that the Son of Man will soon reappear on earth is absolute. They say he is now 'in the clouds,' and speak of him as the 'aerial Christ.'"

A Scriptural Form of Doctrine

The late Doctor Talmage said, "I wish we could have a creed made up solely of scriptural texts." When Joseph Smith wanted to present his theology to the world, he went directly to the 6th chapter of Hebrews where Paul names the six fundamental principles of the gospel. Jesus Christ said that he sent Paul to be an especial vessel to bear his name to the Gentiles. So you will find in our epitome of faith, this statement: "All men may be saved by obedience to the laws and ordinances of the gospel. We believe that these laws and ordinances are: faith in God and in the Lord Jesus Christ; repentance; baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost . . . resurrection of the body . . . eternal judgment." The six principles named by Paul.

It seems a little strange to me that of all the church builders no one thought to adopt this particular statement of faith which is easily defensible by the Scriptures and so absolutely adequate to all human needs, because it takes a man at the very moment when faith comes into the heart at his mother's knee or under the sound of the preacher's voice, on through the ashes of repentance and the waters of baptism and regeneration and the spiritual birth, to the resurrection and eternal judgment, and so into the presence of God himself.

The Scriptural Organization

The next great concept was that of a scriptural form of organization. We are told in 1 Corinthians 12: 28 that "God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers."

If God set apostles and prophets in the church, who had the right to take them out? And we are told in Ephesians 4: 11-13, that Christ "gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ; till we all come in the unity of the faith."

We haven't yet become perfect or reached unity, and the work of the ministry is not done.

Well, some one may say, "Why, sure, we have apostles and prophets in our church."

"Where are they?"

"Why, Paul and John and Isaiah and Jeremiah. We have them; they are right here in the Bible."

But as Danny Williams says, "They are dead." Why do you draw a line between apostles and pastors? God set both in the church. You are satisfied with dead apostles, but you want live pastors. You are not satisfied with a dead pastor. You don't have to take up a collection for Peter and John; yet you say that you want a live pastor. Well, we are just like you, only more so. We want live apostles. Somewhere this young man got the great religious concept of a church organized on the divine pattern with all the officers of the New Testament church—and behold, it was accomplished.

A Return of the Gifts and Blessings

The next great concept was that of the return of the gospel gifts and blessings such as you will find in Mark 16: 16-18 and 1 Corinthians 12: 7-11; the gift of wisdom, of faith, of prophecy, of speaking in tongues, of miracles, of healing of the sick, and so on; and I suppose that if I were to call upon witnesses here in this audience, seventy-five per cent of the audience would testify that they had either seen or experienced personally to their satisfaction and conviction some of these great spiritual blessings that the apostles enjoyed of old.

A Restored Priesthood

The next concept we notice was that of a restored priesthood. Absolutely without doubt Jesus had an ordained priesthood, and a man not ordained had no right to go out and represent him. This went on until the apostasy set in. But if I try to trace my priesthood back to-day and say I was ordained by so-and-so and trace it back and back and back, shall I be satisfied if it ends with the Church of Rome and the Vatican? Certainly not. Others may if they wish.

Jesus says, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you and ordained you."—John 15: 16. We stand for a restored priesthood. A man cannot get a seat in the Senate by reading the Constitution of the United States, and he cannot get the right to administer in gospel ordinances by reading the Bible. He must be called and must be ordained. Priesthood was restored. We do not trace our authority back to Rome.

The Book of Mormon

Another religious concept was that of the Book of Mormon, strangely misunderstood. Ingersoll said on one occasion that the Christian God was ignorant of the existence of America until Columbus told him of it. I wonder if that was true. One half of the world he blessed, centuries on end, with revelation and with blessings and with his Bible and with his law. What was he doing for the other half?

Archeology shows us that civilization was extremely ancient in both North and South America. Was God one sided? Could he see only half the earth? Or was he partial? Did Ingersoll tell the truth? The Book of Mormon comes and gives us the history of the people who lived on the American Continent. It makes another witness, and it shows that God was not partial but that he was blessing the people here even as he did in the Old World.

Zionie Ideals

Last of all we come to what we might term, Our Zionie Ideals—the eighth and last of the ideals or religious concepts we have noted—the idea of a Zion. Jesus Christ said that prior to his coming there should be war and pestilence and famines poured out on all the earth; and he told his disciples, as you will find in Luke 21:36, that they should pray that when that time came, they might "escape" from those things. Escape where? The answer is, In Zion, the city of refuge.

But there is something that is infinitely more interesting than the mere idea of safety. The social theories of Jesus Christ have never been worked out in any community. I mean any modern community. Individuals have shaped their lives after the divine pattern to a certain extent; but there is not a community anywhere under the shining sun, and has not been in modern history, where the social ideas of Jesus Christ have been fully worked out. Men have emphasized the fatherhood of God, but they certainly have not emphasized in practice the brotherhood of man.

Jesus Christ calls for brotherhood; and one of the ideals that this church had from the very beginning was to build a community where the brotherhood of man would prevail. I don't suppose the world would believe it; but that was the secret of all their efforts in gathering at Nauvoo; and Independence, and in Kirtland. The church was not a year old until the Lord told them to begin to gather and to try to work out a community in which there would be neither rich nor poor, but where all would be equal and all be true servants of God. A people was to be prepared. There was to be a place prepared for the coming of Christ.

The aim of that gathering is brotherhood. The principles involved are love and consecration and stewardship and justice and equality in temporal things as well as in spiritual things. The results will be blessing and joy and power.

I am glad that we had this very high ideal. Some people think that idealists are crazy; that they cannot be trusted. When you find a sane idealist, you have the sanest man on earth, because he does not stake his destiny on a passing moment, but he looks to the eternal future. Jesus Christ was an idealist. For his ideals he went without a home. He wore one single garment. He ate the wheat out of the field. For his ideals he suffered stripes. He let men spit upon him. He wore the thorny crown. He hung upon the cross. I am glad that we have an ideal. If the world tells us that it cannot be worked out, Jesus Christ says it can. He died for it.

Galileo was an idealist who saw the lamp in the cathedral swinging to and fro, as you see yonder lamp swinging, and he had a picture of the earth revolving on its axis. He stood up and said, "The earth moves." The ecclesiastics said, "You are mistaken." And they made him recant, but when he got up from his knees, he said under his breath, "It does move," and to-day everyone knows that he was right.

Columbus was an idealist who dreamed of a new earth and struck out over uncharted waters to discover America.

John Brown was an idealist, a hair-brained idealist who dreamed of a free negro. He went to Harper's Ferry and died. All men said, What folly! But in a few years there were thousands and hundreds of thousands of men marching and they were singing, "John Brown's body lies a-moldering in the grave, but his soul goes marching on."

The fathers of this country were idealists who founded a republic on the principles of democracy that had never been tried out, and staked their all on the ideal of political, religious, and intellectual liberty.

We are idealists who have a vision of Zion. Young people, you have something to live for. You have something to work for. You have termed yourselves Zion Builders. You have an ideal that is worthy of the ambition of any true man or woman. It calls first for personal, individual regeneration and for individual preparation; and in the last analysis it calls for group cooperation and righteousness and the building up a society that need not be ashamed when Jesus Christ comes.

Whence Came These Concepts?

I wonder where an ignorant boy like Joseph Smith got these great religious concepts. How do you answer that question? The world tries to answer by burying him under slander so deep that they hope he can never emerge. They may bury him; but the great religious concepts that he taught rise up like giants amid the ruins of old creeds and outgrown theologies that have fallen by the way.

We answer that question by saying that he did not get these concepts from his own wisdom, but that God gave them to him, as he said, "Behold I will proceed to do a marvelous work among this people, even a marvelous work and a wonder: for the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid."

Church Headquarters of the Past

Lamoni long held the heart of the Reorganization. May she continue the strongest stake of Zion, growing in spiritual, intellectual, and material power.

The church, in its history of a hundred years, has possessed in order a series of headquarters, where were to be found the principal officers of the church, associated with a large number of the Saints. In order, we may note: Kirtland, Independence, Far West, and Nauvoo. Around each of these places are clustered many memories of the past.

For the Reorganization, Plano was perhaps the first in the nature of a permanent establishment, but as early as 1880 Lamoni had been selected, and the move was soon after made. For some twenty-five years Lamoni was the central place of the church. Slowly at first, and more rapidly later, the general officers have moved to Independence, until there remained only the Herald Publishing House. Doubtless there will still remain permanently the Children's Home, the two old folks' homes, and Graceland College as a growing and expanding institution. Lamoni will become preeminently the college town and the university city of the church. Lamoni is already a stake and one of the gathering places for the Saints. It is a place around which are gathered many permanent memories.

As is stated in the HERALD of April 6, Joseph Smith identified this territory as the place of his home, as seen in a vision in 1853. There was the place where he did his great work for the church, from 1880 to 1905. In the preceding twenty years, the church had been small, though his efforts were earnest. It was not until 1873 that the Quorum of the First Presidency was filled. Lamoni will live in the memory of the work of Joseph Smith and W. W. Blair. There Alexander H. Smith spent the best years of his life to its close. His son, and successor as presiding patriarch, Frederick A. Smith, has spent many of his best years there.

In the southeastern part of the county, at New Buda, and what was afterwards Pleasanton, there was an early settlement of members of the church, some of whom returned from Utah as early as the sixties. This is true of James and William Anderson. There resided also the Gurley family, while E. C. Briggs, W. H. Kelley, Joseph R. Lambert, and J. W. Gillen made their homes and headquarters in Lamoni. To Lamoni belongs also the memory of the splendid work done by Heman C. Smith in the Quorum of Twelve and as historian of the church. It is also the boyhood home and home till his death, of James E. Kelley. It is the boyhood home of Frederick M. Smith. As the headquarters of the church, around the old Herald Office cluster many stirring memories.

To the old Herald Office Building belongs the memory of Joseph Smith, W. W. Blair, E. L. Kelley, Alexander H. Smith, Henry A. Stebbins, Heman C. Smith, Frederick M. Smith, R. S. Salyards, and others.

To the new Herald Office Building belongs the memory of the work done here by Elbert A. Smith, Heman C. Smith as historian, Frederick A. Smith as presiding patriarch of the church, C. I. Carpenter as church recorder, and others.

These memories belong to the past, as do also many memories of Graceland College. To the future belongs the greatness we believe and hope for this latter institution. It is stronger to-day than it has been in the past. It appears at last to have found a president and leader who will leave upon it a permanent impress for good.

The headquarters of the church are fully established in Independence. All of the general officers of the church now reside there. Surely it is an advantage, if not a necessity, that the publishing house be located in the same city. The general officers can now be united and prepare for more effective service. With our eyes to the future we see the coming glory of God—the splendid possibilities of the work of God—the converting of the nations of the earth—the preparing of a people for his coming.

But we pause and consider for a moment the centers of the past. Around them cluster memories; around some of them little more than memories.

Independence again has come to her own as the central place of the church. Far West has given its name to one of the stakes of Zion. Nauvoo, dedicated by the blood of its leaders, treasures memorials.

What shall be the future of Lamoni? It has been the headquarters of the church for a longer period, both legally and in fact, than any other place. It has held the heart of the work of the Reorganization. We sincerely trust it may not only go forward and become the great university city, but that it may also continue the strongest stake of Zion, growing in spiritual, intellectual, and material power; a place of comfort, blessing, and of peace for the people of God.

The Herald in Independence

With this number the SAINTS' HERALD makes its first appearance as a publication from Independence, Missouri. For the first few years it was published in Cincinnati, Ohio; then for some fifteen or sixteen years we had our own press at Plano, Illinois. Finally it has been published in Lamoni for nearly forty years. Though published in Lamoni, it has always been recognized as the publication of the whole church, rather than as local to that city. Now it doubtless has found its permanent home, as it is now established at the central place, toward which it has so long been moving.

The move was inevitable with the moving of the general church offices, for it is inevitable that the publishing home shall be where the headquarters are located; and for the Saints hereby to keep thoroughly in touch with the church movements as a whole, this closer association was necessary.

But the HERALD still continues to be a periodical, not of one place, but of the church as a whole. It still continues as the official organ of communication with the church at large. In a sense it is local, because the general offices are localized. But in a broader sense it is general and belongs to the whole church, and seeks the support of the whole church, both in contributions—articles and letters—and also in subscriptions.

John W. Wight Passes to His Reward

Another of the great stalwarts of the church has been called to rest, as Elder John W. Wight passed away at Council Bluffs the morning of May 14. His health had been seriously affected for several years, and a year ago his life was nearly despaired of while he was at the Sanitarium, but the Lord has spared him for a splendid work since then.

At Council Bluffs, he was engaged in the special services there, the week of May 8 to 15. He was preaching on the first principles of the gospel at overflow meetings for the older members, held in the basement of the Saints' church at that place. He was taken suddenly ill Thursday night at the church, called for Elders D. T. Williams and H. C. Burgess in the morning, and they wired his son Cyril, who arrived shortly before his passing away.

We feel sure that he went as he would prefer to do, while on the firing line, giving the best service of which he was capable for the cause of the Master.

In his many years of stalwart service for the church, Brother Wight has endeared himself to many. He was the son of Lyman Wight, and hence an uncle of Heman C. Smith and H. O. Smith.

The fourth volume of the Church History shows that he was reported as enrolled in the Fifth Quorum of Elders at the conference of 1885. The conference of 1886 appointed him to labor in the Little Sioux District, where he continued for two years. He then was sent to Australia in 1888, and evidently was soon placed in charge. He sailed with C. A. Butterworth on the 3d of June, 1888, and remained six years. As he was born on the 8th of August, 1856, he was then in the thirty-second year of his life. He was baptized on the 7th of October, 1864, at eight years of age.

Before going to Australia, he was ordained a seventy, on the 12th of April, 1888. After his return from Australia he was called to the Quorum of Twelve, on April 12, 1897. He labored in that capacity for sixteen years, in various fields in America and for one year in Australia, but especially in the Mississippi Valley. On the 20th of April, 1913, he was ordained a patriarch, in which office he continued until his passing away.

He has served the church in many capacities, and devotedly for many years, and now has been released from duty here, ending a life of devoted service.

He was always interested in the work of the young people, in their prayer services, Sunday school, and the Religio. He served Graceland College as trustee for some nine years. He also acted for some years as a member of the revising committee for both the Sunday school and Religio Quarterlies.

The funeral was held in Lamoni May 17, with Elder John F. Garver, who was just released that day from quarantine, and D. T. Williams in charge. President Elbert A. Smith preached the funeral sermon. This was reported and will doubtless appear later in our columns.

Mrs. Clara Smith, H. O. Smith, and F. A. Smith also came from Independence for the funeral.

The young ladies of his Sunday school class attended in a body as honorary pallbearers. The class in religious education also attended in a body, and six of their members acted as pallbearers.

The Brick Church was crowded, for the hearts of many were made sad by his leaving.

Moving Delayed News Items

Owing to the fact that the Herald Office started to move May 2, and part of the machines were taken down and shipped the morning of the 4th, our copy for the May HERALDS was turned in unusually early. As a rule we turn in copy about a week ahead of time. But there was the necessity of getting as much of the HERALDS printed as possible before May 1. The inside sixteen pages were turned in three weeks ahead of time. Therefore there is material in this issue which was received early in May, and would normally have appeared in the issue of May 11.

May 3 final copy had been turned in for the issues of the 11th and 18th. Much of the copy had already been set by May 1, but the last manuscripts were being set on that date. By May 5 we had prepared at least copy for the present issue, and sent it to Independence to be set by the Ensign Publishing House, leaving only a few pages to be turned in later.

We expect from now on to be able to handle everything in regular order.

Unsigned Editorials

Some slight question has arisen with regard to unsigned editorials in the SAINTS' HERALD. It was for many years the practice of the editors not to sign their editorials. There are several advantages in the practice. It seems more modest not to, rather than for the editors to repeat their own names so frequently. But owing to the fact that responsibility should be personally assumed, the custom arose of signing each editorial. Objection was then made to that course of procedure, but it still has been largely followed. Certainly all editorials of either of the editors in chief, President F. M. Smith and Elbert A. Smith, of recent years, have been personally signed. We believe that all of the editorials by the assistant editor have also been personally signed. The associate editor is responsible for nearly all unsigned editorials.

Owen R. Lovejoy, general secretary of the National Child Labor Committee, states that twelve hundred boys and girls employed in various industries and attending the continuation schools will be examined and their physical condition compared with what it was when they received their working papers. No scientific figures are as yet available showing definitely the effects of various kinds of industrial employment on boys and girls fourteen to sixteen years of age. The effect both physiologically and psychologically should be determined.

A church in Dover, Delaware, has entered into covenant by its members to fast one meal a week and give the money so saved as offering for the famine relief in China. The family gather around the bare table and engage in prayer, emphasizing even to the young what it must mean to those who must gather daily around a bare table in the famine area.

An International Conference of Child Welfare will be held in Brussels, July 18 to 21. Questions considered will include, first, "Juvenile delinquents and juvenile courts"; second, "Abnormal children"; third, "Social hygiene of childhood"; fourth, "War orphans"; and fifth, "An international organization for child welfare."

British Mandate For Palestine

By T. W. Williams

The draft of the British Mandate for Palestine has been made. All that is now lacking to make it operative is ratification by the Council of the League of Nations.

The preamble provides, among other things, the indorsement and putting into effect the declaration of the British Government originally made on November 2, 1917, and adopted by the other allied powers, in favor of the establishment in Palestine of a home for the Jewish people, it being clearly understood that nothing should be done which might prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.

Recognition is also given to the historical connection of the Jewish people with Palestine and to the grounds for reconstructing their national home in that country.

The British Government will exercise as mandatory all the powers inherent in the government of a sovereign state, save as they may be limited by the terms of the present mandate.

The mandatory shall be responsible for placing the country under such political, administrative, and economic conditions as will secure the establishment of the Jewish national home, and the development of self-governing institutions, and also for safeguarding the civil and religious rights of all the inhabitants of Palestine, irrespective of race and religion.

The mandatory shall encourage the widest measure of self-government for localities consistent with the prevailing conditions.

An appropriate Jewish agency shall be recognized as a public body for the purpose of advising and cooperating with the administration of Palestine in such economic, social, and other matters as may affect the establishment of the Jewish national home, and the interests of the Jewish population in Palestine, and, subject always to the control of the administration, to assist and take part in the development of the country.

The Zionist Organization, so long as its organization and constitution are in the opinion of the mandatory appropriate, shall be recognized as such agency. It shall take steps in consultation with His Britannic Majesty's government to secure the cooperation of all Jews who are willing to assist in the establishment of the Jewish national home.

The administration of Palestine, while insuring that the rights and position of other sections of the population are not prejudiced, shall facilitate Jewish immigration under suitable conditions, and shall encourage in cooperation with the Jewish agency close settlement by Jews on the land, including state lands and waste lands not required for public purposes.

The administration of Palestine will be responsible for enacting a nationality law. There shall be included in this law provisions framed so as to facilitate the acquisition of Palestinian citizenship by Jews who take up their permanent residence in Palestine.

The mandatory shall be responsible for seeing that the judicial system established in Palestine shall safeguard (a) the interests of foreigners; (b) the law and (to the extent deemed expedient) the jurisdiction now existing in Palestine with regard to the questions arising out of the religious belief of certain communities.

The administration of Palestine shall take all necessary measures to safeguard the interests of the community in connection with the development of the country and shall have full power to provide for public ownership, or control of any of the natural resources of the country or of the public works, services, and utilities established or to be established therein. It shall introduce a land system appropriate to the needs of the country, having regard, among other things, to the desirability of promoting the close settlement and intensive cultivation of the land.

The administration may arrange with the Jewish agency (Zionist Organization) to construct or operate, upon fair and equitable terms, any public works, services, and utilities, and to develop any of the natural resources of the country, in so far as these matters are not directly undertaken by the administration. Any such arrangements shall provide that no profits distributed by such agency, directly or indirectly, shall exceed a reasonable rate of interest on the capital, and any further profits shall be utilized by it for the benefit of the country in a manner approved by the administration.

All responsibility in connection with the holy places and religious buildings or sites in Palestine, including that of preserving existing rights, of securing free access to the holy places, religious buildings and sites, and the free exercise of worship, while insuring the requirements of public order and decorum, is assumed by the mandatory, who will be responsible solely to the League of Nations in all matters connected therewith; provided that nothing in this article shall prevent the mandatory from entering into such arrangement as he may deem reasonable with the administration for the purpose of carrying the provisions of the mandate into effect, provided also that nothing in this mandate shall be construed as conferring upon the mandatory authority to interfere with the fabric or the management of purely Moslem sacred shrines, the immunities of which are guaranteed.

The mandatory comprehends the right and duty to maintain order and decorum in holy places, religious buildings, and sites which shall be subject to the provisions of such laws relating to public monuments as may be enacted by the approval of the mandatory.

The mandatory will see that complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals, is insured to all. No discrimination of any kind shall be made between the inhabitants of Palestine on the ground of race, religion, or language. No person shall be excluded from Palestine on the sole ground of his religious belief.

The right of each community to maintain its own schools for the education of its own members in its own language (while conforming to such educational requirements of a general nature as the administration may impose) shall not be denied or impaired.

The mandatory shall be responsible for exercising such supervision over missionary enterprise in Palestine as may be required for the maintenance of public order and good government. Subject to such supervision no measures shall be taken in Palestine to obstruct or interfere with such enterprise, or to discriminate against any missionary on the ground of his religion or nationality.

English, Arabic, and Hebrew shall be the official languages of Palestine.

Such, in brief, is a digest of the mandate which comes before the council at its next meeting. There is no question but the document will be passed with only slight amendments.

It would seem that despite the avowal of the document that "no discrimination of any kind shall be made between the inhabitants of Palestine on the ground of race, religion, or language," the mandate does provide for facilitating the efforts of the Jewish people to establish a national home. It is this feature which is arousing strong opposition in Arabic quarters. Unless England, France, Italy, and the United States retract, no change will be made in the above provision. It will be necessary therefore for the English Government for some time to maintain an armed force to insure peace and tranquility.

People freely express disappointment that the United States did not accept the mandatory, but now that England has assumed the responsibility, the only thing to do is to rally to her support.

No objection can be taken to the liberal and comprehensive provision for freedom of speech, rights of religious expression, and the privilege to maintain educational institutions and to carry on missionary effort. Would that we had such liberal provisions in all other countries of Europe and Asia.

It will be well for our people to keep in touch with developments in connection with this Palestine Mandate, for just as soon as it has been indorsed by the council, the Zionists will institute intensive operations in colonization and development.

The Religio's Part in the Building of Zion

By Mrs. M. A. Etzenhouser

Lecture delivered at the Religio Exposition, April, 1920, by Sister Etzenhouser, Religio field worker in the Utah District.

Doctor Victor Vaughn in his medical book, In Commemoration, has said that "religion must teach sanctity of the body as well as that of the soul, that ignorance is sin and knowledge is virtue, that parenthood is the holiest function performed by man, and that to transmit disease is an unpardonable sin. Teachers must know hygiene as well as mathematics, and capitalists must recognize that improvement in health and growth in intelligence increases efficiency in labor."

All of this is now being recognized by the church, and the forward movement made during the last General Conference marked an epoch in the advancement of the church that perhaps has never been paralleled before in all of its history.

The church has been going through a period of transition, a change from the individualistic stage to that of the socialistic stage. It used to prepare people to die and go to heaven; it now hopes to prepare them to live more abundantly, to make a heaven on this earth by bettering conditions here. James Bissell Pratt, Ph. D., has said in his book, The Psychology of Religious Belief, that "every advance in thought necessarily demands a corresponding advance in religious conceptions or religious imagery. And the religion which lacks adaptability to the new thought of the times, the religion which remains rigid, inelastic, fixed in its traditional formulations and bound forever to the dead past, must inevitably go to the wall."

Education for Redemption of Zion

The Religio's part in the building of Zion is twofold: educational and recreational. In the educational phase we hope to train the young people of the church so that they may understand that the mission of the restored gospel is to make religion a living, vital, pulsating force, that will help to purge the world of its dross, and give it a better conception of true values. "Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven" was the prayer of our Savior, and it is our hope that with God as their helper the youth of the church may do their part in helping to answer that prayer. To be able to do that, they must study the needs of the hour. They must take the position that social and economic justice is the pressing business of Christianity; we cannot be neutral, for the struggle is now on.

Too often, perhaps, has Christ been portrayed as the meek and lowly Nazarene; we have sometimes failed to see in him the great social reformer speaking in a voice of thunder against the social evils of the day. His righteous wrath must have been magnificent to behold, when he scourged the money-changers out from the temple. Could language be more scathing in its rebuke than when he called the hypocritical, self-righteous Pharisees "ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, ye whitened sepulchres which indeed appear beautiful on the outside but inside ye are full of dead men's bones"? And again, "Ye pay tithe of mint, and anise, and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. . . . Ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within ye are full of extortion and excess." He rebuked those who oppressed the poor, he condemned those who gave short measure, he was not "bound forever to the dead past," but expended his energies in trying to make better the conditions of the present. He was indeed "the man of the hour" and of all time to come, whose great vision of social and economic justice has not yet been realized in spite of the great strides made in civilization since his times. It was and is so far above us that it is like a glimmering light leading us to the heights of human achievements of what might be possible with God's help.

Christ taught that religion was more than fasting and prayer. "My Father worketh hitherto and I work," was his statement, and his promise to those who would follow after is "that greater works than these shall ye do." Society has become more complex; individualism with its attendant evils has been running rampant, and the need for social reform is even greater than it was during the life of Christ. Religionists must be awake to the needs of the hour. They must study the problems that are confronting the world. "Greater work than these shall ye do," because the need for such work shall be greater, and must be met by the followers of Christ.

"By their works shall ye know them." When John was in prison and perhaps filled with doubts, he sent to ask Jesus, "Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?" Jesus might have answered and reminded John of his baptism, when the Holy Spirit descended in the form of a dove and a voice was heard proclaiming Jesus as the Son of God, but he did not. He said, "The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached to them." By his works he had proclaimed himself the Son of God. And that is the crucial test which every professed follower of Christ shall be put through. May we not be "weighed in the balances and found wanting?"

Christ gave us a vivid word picture of the judgment day:

"When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats: And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the king say to those on his right hand, Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: For I was an hungered and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger and ye took me in: naked and ye clothed me: I was sick and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. . . . Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

"Then shall he say to those on the left hand, Depart from me ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his angels: For I was an hungered, and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty and ye gave me no drink: I was a stranger and ye took me not in: naked and ye clothed me not: sick and in prison, and ye visited me not. . . . and these shall go away unto everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal."

In this picture of the judgment day, again we see Christ as the great social reformer, with his finger on the throbbing pulse of humanity, his ear ever turned to hear the cry of the downtrodden, and his hand stretched forth to relieve the sufferings of the world.

"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly of heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light."

In this age of turmoil and distress, when people are running hither and thither seeking relief from the stress and evils of our complex society, what a solace it would be if the church could solve the problem for those who would come to Christ through the church. The yoke can be made easy and the burden lightened if everyone who has taken upon himself the name of Christ will, through prayerful, consecrated, diligent study, acquaint himself with the underlying principles of social and economic justice, the laws of association which control human behavior, and have in their heart that love of God which so characterized the work of his Son while here on earth. The young people of the church should, through the department provided for them, study these living, vital questions and so prepare themselves to enter into the work of redemption.

If our young people everywhere could keep before their eyes the Zionite ideals, and under proper leadership prepare themselves to make their contribution for the good of the whole, if each local could be, as it were, a preparatory school with that ideal in view, we could more readily make our adjustments to Zionite conditions when the time of gathering comes, and be one grand whole working together, instead of a lot of units fighting each other.

Recreation

The second phase of the Religio's part in the building of Zion is that of recreation. If we would do efficient work, we must play. Recreation is a fitting companion of work. Work tears down the tissues of the body, while recreation rebuilds those tissues through the process of re-creation. Nervous breakdowns, mental disorders, damaged posterity are largely caused from the need of relaxation. Life has been too strenuous; we live at too high a pressure; there are too many lines in our faces; there are too many deaths from degeneracy of the heart, arteries, and kidneys. In the building of Zion we must take into consideration a psychological adjustment as well as social and economic adjustments. Nature's remedy is rest, relaxation in sleep, play, sport, and laughter.

Every activity of man is based upon his instincts; these may be directed or to some extent inhibited, but to refuse any expression is fatal. Hundreds of years of living in forests, hunting, fishing, climbing, running, and swimming have made their impressions on the race. The passion of every boy for a bow and arrow, a sling and a gun, is natural. To throw, to run, to strike at something is part of our inheritance from the race. To recognize these natural tendencies and provide proper means for their expression should be an important function of the Religio Department in every branch of the church.

The complexities of life have balked our dispositions; we must get back to nature in our recreational activities. We may give expression to our instinct for play in baseball, football, racing, running, coasting, skating, motoring, flying, sailing, and fast riding. We may respond to that craving for outdoor life by fishing trips, by camping in the woods, cooking our meals over the sputtering blaze of the camp fire, sitting around the crackling fire at night with the smell of smoke in our nostrils, watching the flickering blaze casting gruesome shadows, the twinkling stars above, and everything quiet all around, only the voice of the story-teller as he draws vivid word pictures of pioneer days, or tells of past heroes, and hunting trips, perils by water or by land, which makes the blood of your ancestors surge through your veins, leaping as it were for expression along lines in which they traveled for so many generations. A few days of relaxation in the woods, camping by mountain or stream when you are weary from the stress of life, is better medicine than is contained in any position prescribed by man.

If we will provide healthful amusements, fatigue will be lessened, antisocial outbreaks will be less frequent. Crime and moral lapses are said to be largely caused from living at too great a tension. There will be less bridge craze, dancing craze, and moving picture craze if we can relieve the stress of life by providing a more natural outlet. Man's life will be lengthened, and his years of usefulness extended, when we realize the value of relaxation that is afforded through recreation.

Recreation has an economic value; man should be at his best when he is fifty, and should be able to make his contribution to society for many years after that. Society is being robbed of that which rightly belongs to her, when she refuses to conserve the lives of the middle-aged and those older whose lives are rich in experiences, and hold so much of value to the race. "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy" is more true now than when it was written. Because of the complex social condition, there is the greater need for provisions to be made for relaxation.

Play has more than one aspect. It should not be considered merely as the working off of surplus energy; it is also a preparation for life. All group games, such as baseball, football, basketball, etc., have great value as socializers, because they teach teamwork, cooperation, recognition of others' rights in the game, and your own limitations as set by the rules of the game. To stay in your place and play into the other fellow's hands, that he might make the home run, or touchdown, has a great social value that cannot be measured.

A study of the psychology of play shows us that such nations as are noted for their group plays, are also noted for their cooperation in business. Great Britain for hundreds of years has been training her youths in football and other group games. An analysis of the situation shows us that the same element of cooperation that was necessary to make football a success has been carried over by the youths of Great Britain into their business relations, and she is noted the world over for her successful corporations and cooperation. The British as a people have played together, recognizing each other's rights. They can also work together, recognizing each other's rights in the game of life. The great cooperative stores of Great Britain are known the world over. Other nations have tried the same plan, but have failed to meet with the same success. America has tried it but without any noted success. We have been a Nation of individualists, every man for himself, but we are awakening to a realization of our folly, and the great American national game of baseball will have its part in our economic redemption if we make it universal instead of merely a game for experts with the rest of the Nation lookers-on.

China is the antithesis of Great Britain. In China a child always plays by himself. This has been going on for ages, and has made its mark in the characteristics of the race. Authorities tell us that there is not a single successful corporation in the world that is wholly Chinese. There are great corporations in which part of the stockholders are Chinese, while the rest belong to other nationalities who were the real power behind the throne when it came to the cooperative functioning of the business.

We have tried to give you a vision of what we hope the Religio Department of the church may accomplish. The two aspects of this department are study and recreation and their contribution to the preparation necessary for the building of Zion. In the study we have tried to impress the necessity of becoming acquainted with such subjects as will make for social betterment. This cannot be taken up everywhere, but only where competent teachers may be engaged. Where this cannot be done, the Religio has provided Quarterlies for the continued study of the Book of Mormon as heretofore.

The recreational features should be encouraged in every local throughout the church, remembering that there are many sides to this question. I have found three definitions of play contributed by different authors:

First. Play is the working off of surplus energy.

Second. Play is the living over again, by each individual, the past experiences of the race.

Third. Play is a preparation for life.

In the recreational features of our Religio work we should keep all of these definitions in mind, recognizing their worth and giving them proper place according to the needs and ages of those with whom we are working.

With the broader view that we have, or should have, of religion, we can agree with Doctor Victor Vaughn, whom I have before quoted, that "religion must teach sanctity of the body as well as that of the soul, that ignorance is sin and knowledge virtue . . . that improvement in health and growth in intelligence increases efficiency in labor." With this idea before our minds, we can catch the vision of what the Religio can accomplish, and see the part which she may play in the building up of Zion.

The Order of Bishops has been in session since May 7, considering the problems of their department of work. Later the results of these meetings will be apparent. No General Conference this spring gives an opportunity to them for more constructive work than ever before.

Miss Glow Salisbury, daughter of Elder O. Salisbury, is credited at Graceland College with saving the lives of three girls who were in swimming on May 10. One was going down for the third time, and two for the second time, when she took control of the situation.

Ronald Storrs, the military governor of Jerusalem, has forbidden the setting up of drinking bowers throughout Judea. He has also objected to the attempt to destroy the unity of the city by using corrugated iron and stucco within its walls. No buildings may be demolished without express permission. He also objects to such modern innovations as an attempt to run a tramway in the city and out to Bethlehem and the Mount of Olivet.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

THE ANNOUNCEMENT OF 1920

Elder Wixom reviews the Restoration in the April 6 services in Santa Ana.

The Santa Ana Daily Register gives half a column in the issue of April 8, to an account of the celebration of April 6 at the local church. From it we clip the following, as part of an interview with Elder George H. Wixom:

"Since the great apostasy of the Christian church, many reformers have come forth to do what they could to restore the church to its ancient beauty and perfection, but all were willing to admit that man in his own strength and power could not do this," says the Reverend Wixom.

"On this point the Reverend Roger Williams, the founder of the First Baptist Church in America, said: 'There can be no recovery out of that apostasy till Christ shall send forth new apostles to plant churches anew.' This same thought is advanced by the Reverend John Wesley, the founder of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in his seventy-first sermon.

"The startling announcement was made to the world in 1820 by Joseph Smith, a mere boy of fifteen, that he had seen a vision and that he had been called by the Lord to do a great work. Like Joan of Arc, his words were given little credence at first, but he persisted in his testimony that God had spoken again from heaven and that the time had arrived for the organization of the Church of Jesus Christ which would be in every respect the same church that was taken from the earth at the time when the apostasy of the primitive church became complete. The work of the reformers helped to keep the spark of faith alive in the human breasts and their great work will not go unrewarded.

Organized in 1830

"The church was organized in harmony with the ancient pattern in April, 1830, and by 1844 more than 100,000 members were pledged to this faith. The history of this religion has no parallel in American events. In spite of the most bitter persecution like that endured by the early Christian church at Rome, it has prospered in the midst of adversity, and to-day it challenges the attention of the entire religious world.

"Joseph Smith was killed by a mob at Carthage, Illinois, in 1844, and in the confusion which followed, one Brigham Young led a faction to Utah where in spite of the plain statement made in the Book of Mormon that 'There shall not any man among you have save it be one wife,' he instituted polygamy and many kindred evils for which the true church has suffered in reputation from that day to this, although in no way responsible and always bitterly opposed to Utah Mormonism. The courts, both State and Federal, have declared the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ to be the legal successor to the original church in doctrine, faith, and practice. A discerning public has come to recognize more and more the clean record and just claim of this church for a fair hearing and consideration."

WHICH VERSION OF THE BIBLE?

I am much interested in your articles, especially in what our neighbors say about our schools. Some of them are much in favor of having the Bible read in them, and others much opposed to it. Those in favor of it speak of the Bible as though they thought there was only one kind of Bible in existence and that one is the only one that should be read, not only in our schools, but also in our homes; and whoever is opposed to it is apt to be called unpatriotic, un-Christian, un-American, or some other unworthy name, but we should not judge too harshly as they may have good reasons for their opposition.

The Bible is a religious book, it being the only rule of faith for many persons, and our school laws prohibit religious reading in our schools; thus, the Bible, as well as other religious books, is prohibited, either with comment or without it. Our school laws are all right, just as they are, and do not need to be amended or made over, and we, as law-abiding citizens, should obey them, as we should obey any of our other laws. But, if the Bible were allowed in our schools, the question is: Which version would you prefer? As there are many men of many minds, there are Bible versions of various kinds, each differing from the others; and if they were all allowed, the reading would make strife and discord.

It might be interesting to consider some of these various versions. Leaving the avestas of the Hindus, the Vedas of the Persians, and the Koran or Mohammedan Bible, we will notice the better-known versions. The first of those is the Jewish or Hebrew Bible. It is a grand old book, perhaps the oldest in existence, containing all the books of the Old Testament, but none of the new, as the Jew does not believe the Christian religion. It gives the history of the human race from the beginning, also the law which Moses received from God on Mount Sinai, the psalms of David, the proverbs of Solomon, and the history of kings, judges, and prophets. One book in it, Ecclesiasticus, contains fifty-one chapters.

Next in order is the Catholic Bible. This might be called the unabridged, as it contains all the books of the Old Testament, and also all the books of the New Testament. The books of the New Testament were written by the apostles in the first century of the Christian era. The King James Version seems next. It is an "abridged" (or shorthand) edition of the Catholic Bible, translated and copied from it in the sixteenth century.

When translating it from the Latin into German, the translator cut out and excluded from the Old Testament seven books, containing one hundred thirty-seven chapters, by his own private judgment publicly expressed. Perhaps paper was scarce and he had to Hooverize a little. This is the version used by Lutherans, Adventists, and other denominations.

Next comes the real American Bible. It is thoroughly American, first, last, and all the time; being made in America by two Americans, Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon, at Fayette, New York, in the year 1830, nearly eighteen hundred years after the New Testament was written. They were digging in the ground (so the story goes) and found two gold plates, with unknown writing upon them. Then an angel came and translated the writing for them and the result was the "Book of Mormon" or Mormon Bible.

Article 8 of the Latter Day Saint, or Mormon (which is the same), faith reads thus: The Bible is correctly translated, is the word of God, and the book of Mormon also is the word of God, thus placing it on equal terms with the Old and the New Testaments. Some people might prefer it because it was made in America, but it looks to me like sacrilege to call such a thing a Bible, but tastes differ, as well as versions, as there are many man of many minds; many birds of many kinds; many fishes in the sea; many men who don't agree. Which version would you choose?—J. C. S., Arcadia, Michigan.

The above extract from the Michigan Business Farmer contains several inaccuracies, so far as they affect us especially, there being an error in ascribing the Book of Mormon to Sidney Rigdon. Sidney Rigdon had nothing to do with it until sometime afterwards, so they were not digging in the ground; nor did they find two gold plates; nor did the angel come and translate the writing for them; nor is it the "American version of the Bible; nor were the plates they or he were digging in the ground. The Book of Mormon was published in 1830, but the plates were found some seven years earlier. Hence there were a few mistakes in one paragraph alone. The last paragraph does not quote correctly Article 8, of What We Believe.

But if the word of God was given by the inspiration of his Holy Spirit, what is wrong with associating it with other works given of God, in connection with the Book of books?

The American version of the Bible would rather be the Inspired Version, which was corrected by the inspiration of Almighty God. The question is, Which version would you choose, those which are founded upon texts, only 1,100 years old, or the Hebrew Old Testament or original document, and only 1,600 years old, or less, or the Greek New Testament, and that evidently showing signs of changes that had been made, or a book which was corrected by divine inspiration and restored as it was at first? REGULATING THE DANCE

The dance business has simply got to be regulated, says everybody. But how? The unsupervised public dance hall is called one of America's great social problems. It appears in the reports of vice commissions as well as recreational surveys. During the war the Government found the dance hall standing squarely in the way of its fight against venereal disease. The public dance hall, says an authority in the Survey, must be supervised. It must pay a license fee, but also it must be divorced from politics. (Don't laugh!) For the second violation of the license conditions, the license should be forfeited. Boys and girls with sportive tendencies should be reported to their parents. It must have more police—that is to say, supervisors. The jazz orchestras must be restrained. The hall must be brightly lighted. It must be situated (in Cincinnati, this is) a certain distance away from any church, school, or public library. The hall must close at eleven o'clock p. m. Women without escorts must not be admitted (this is in Lansing, Michigan). The matron must know what dances are harmless and what are dangerous—a sort of 2.75 per cent test, you see. Minneapolis will not permit an alien to run a dance hall. Honestly, if the thing were not so tragic all this would be a theme for the comic muse,—municipal authorities running here and there, trying this and that, to keep within bounds a business whose largest profits depend on its breaking out of bounds.—Epworth Herald. TEACH YOUR CHILDREN TO BE KIND TO ANIMALS

One of the most important things to teach children is to take good care of their household pets; to remember to feed them and to give them water to drink at regular times if possible.

We are only doing right if we treat every living creature as we would wish to be treated ourselves. If you drive a horse, think how you would like to be treated if you were the horse. Treat your dog and cat as you would like to be treated if you could change places with them.

Kindness on the farm—gentle treatment of cows; good bedding, good food and a stall large enough to lie down in, for the horse; shelter for the swine; proper food and care of poultry all repay the farmer in dollars and cents. Try it.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

The Director General's Greeting

Greetings from Mrs. Frederick M. Smith, Director General of the Women's Department, to the Institute at Independence: It is with pleasure that I address you thus by proxy from sunny California—sunny when it is not raining—and note the progress which our women have made, when at this time, during what might almost be called a mid-conference session, we are permitted to take the initiative in an institute, the educational and inspirational opportunities of which will be appreciated, I am sure, not only by the women, but by the general church in every department of its work.

Even though I am forced to be absent from you at this time, by the necessity for rest after continued years of service, I feel that I have been mercifully remembered with the compensations of the Spirit. I am not alone in having felt this comforting influence during trying times. A merciful God recognizes the especial needs of his children with an increasing abundance of his power, the gift of pervading peace, and a closer communion with the Master, which would indeed compensate for the services and sacrifices rendered, even if that service had not brought its own peculiar joys and recompenses.

I feel assured that you who attend this institute will be insistently pervaded with the power of the Most High; for the "endowment of the Spirit" has been definitely promised to those who, with loyal sacrifice, "with humility and full of love," shall have contributed to the great upbuilding of Zion.

My text for the few minutes which I shall occupy this morning is the often quoted plea from an address by Mrs. Sewall, of Indiana, before a national association which was celebrating the opening of its doors to women:

"Let's do away with stag parties and smokers for men, and pink teas and gossip for women, and all gather under one roof in equal partnership to discuss our common problems."

Mrs. Sewall's words typify the new attitude that the women of the country are taking on their entrance into the varied opportunities which are being opened to them with renewed rapidity since the passage of the national suffrage laws. There is a common interest being manifested by the men and women of to-day, or rather an interest in common subjects, that is indicative of the new place of women. It is no longer a question of women's problems, exclusively, or of men's problems. The problems of society to-day are of equal appeal to both sexes, and may logically be met only by the intelligent cooperation of both men and women, together, "in equal partnership," for the eternal advancement of society.

With these ideas becoming more and more widespread throughout the country and the world, and with the conditions such within the church in this transition period that the members are exerting themselves to the utmost with the definite ideal of the actual upbuilding of Zion constantly before them, we of the church cannot afford to neglect the lesson suggested by Mrs. Sewall's statement which I have just quoted.

There has been in the past, and I have learned this from various sources, a tendency that each of the departments of the church was striving for its own interests, for the glory of its individual achievements, and to secure every good and progressive thing for itself before any other department might initiate the measure. In speaking as I do, I refer not to the Sunday school and Religio alone, although these two are frequently considered with the Women's Department, probably because they were originally auxiliary societies and were taken over as departments at the same time, but to the numerous departments of church work, such as the college, with its normal training, its missionary training school, etc., the library interests of the church, the department of history and museum, the publicity department, the Sanitarium and health board, and all the larger activities of the church.

It would seem, in the reconstruction which must necessarily accompany the new Zionite movements, and which have in fact already begun to alter the organization of the various phases of the church work to a greater extent than is probably supposed by those not thoroughly conversant with the "inside workings," that each department should receive the respectful consideration of the others. Without this cooperative working out of their problems, the functioning of our splendid organizations will be hampered by the constant overlapping of interests, the unnecessary duplication of machinery, such as reports, budgets, etc. The confusion which has been reported from various quarters during the last few years, is due not only to the growth of the church, and the development of all divisions of the work, but to the failure thus to cooperate.

Personally, I should favor at this time an entirely new coordinating committee of the church, composed of members from the leading quorums, with the representatives from the various departments of the work. To some this idea might appear premature; but as a member of an institute which is discussing our present and future problems, and as Director General of the Women, looking forward to the ultimate adjustment of these "common problems," it is not perhaps out of place to speak of it.

Concerning the changes which are occurring in the organization and purposes of the various departments, it is not possible to talk of reconstruction, of readjustment, of the "partnership" to which we look forward, without recognizing that the women and men who take part in this reconstruction must be intelligent and thoughtful, trained executives and specialists, as well as consecrated and devoted to the larger ideas of service. But this is not an impossible ideal.

Among the women, it has come to be understood that domestic life, the care of the house and the training of the children, while a vital and inestimable part of a woman's life, no longer comprises her entire existence. Women whose children are grown or in school a large part of the time, and young matrons whose efficient methods of home care are enabling them to devote considerable time to outside interests, studies and activities, are fast becoming specialists along the lines which they have chosen to investigate. And for the future, the modern methods of education, where even in the grade schools our girls are taught by domestic science experts the use and care of the labor saving devices and methods which inventive science has supplied, promise a class of young women and matrons within the next ten years, whose minds will be alert, not only to the problems of women, but to the problems of the community, of society, of humanity at large.

It is fully understood, that according to our church books, our women must work in conjunction with the priesthood. We as a church are so constituted that certain responsibilities, such as the collection and disbursement of funds, our modern relief and service work, etc., are intrusted to certain authorized groups of men; but these men have found and are finding that our trained and consecrated women are among their most valuable assistants.

In order to more intelligently use these women, it is necessary for the priesthood to give careful attention to the problems which arise from the women's participation in new fields of endeavor, and in the work for which they seem especially fitted by nature and training. The men, however, are facing these problems in the present, with special instruction and discussions of their work and its relation to the church laws in their priesthood meetings, which are becoming more prevalent all over the church. You have noticed, in all probability, the reports from the President of the church abroad, from Apostle T. W. Williams, and members of the priesthood in the Old World, wherein they speak of the establishment of priesthood meetings throughout England and on the Continent for the more intensive training of those who have charge of the work.

Consequently, while Mrs. Sewall's suggestion does not apply literally to our church people, since our men do not indulge in the habit which gives rise to smokers, and our women are as a rule unusually free from the dangerous vice known as gossip, we can still meet together "under one roof," and in the interests of the Zion for which we all strive, discuss in amity, and with the guidance of the influence of the Spirit, "our common problems."

May this institute prove a blessing to those who listen, and may they return to their labors with a widened comprehension, a broadened knowledge, and a strengthened consecration to the service of the Master.

What Can We Do About It?

In this issue we are permitted to share with our readers a portion of a letter from one of our organizers who is specially interested in juvenile offenders against the law. In connection with that, read what Doctor O. F. Lewis of the Prison Association of New York had to say at a meeting of city officials of the State:

"Juvenile delinquency can be reduced in every city through the study and understanding of local conditions, through the development of attractive and constructive substitutes, and through the team work of local forces.

"Good, clean, constructive recreation is one of the best crime substitutes, and let us never forget that, in trying to combat delinquency, substitutes are necessary, for, for the multitude of beginners in delinquency, delinquency is attractive. If this were not so there would not be so much of it. We cannot secure it by simply prohibiting it, or solely by saying 'Thou shalt not!'

"Cities are constantly getting larger, city life more intense. Streets are becoming increasingly the playgrounds. Are we to continue to endure solely the reign of commercialized amusements for our children? Is it not time to make possible the proper demands and gratifications of youth in 'our town'?"

The heart of a true man or woman will ever beat in tender sympathy for the child who never had a chance, the child who is the victim of ignorance or neglect, and the child who is unsheltered, unguided, and untrained. Let us hope that as we turn our attention to the ills, the errors, and injustices which darken the lives and blast the characters of the "least of these little ones," there will arise a better understanding, a clearer insight into their real soul-needs, and a more active sense of our personal responsibility for their well-being.

American women have never shirked their plain duty as they have seen and understood it, and because of that we may feel that the day of happier universal childhood is just ahead. Will we help in this reconstruction? A. A.

About Delinquent Children

In reference to the juvenile court work of which I was writing, the records which we examined show that most of the "crimes" were merely offenses. The majority of the "petit larceny" was merely cases of children stealing flowers or some such small matters. In my opinion such cases should never come before a court.

The thing which will perhaps be most interesting to know is that they are working to take the juvenile court out of politics and put it under the supervision of the education system. The officers of the school will look up the delinquents of the school and investigate the causes which led to their delinquency. A normal child loves to learn. If a boy or girl hates school, there must be a reason back of it, and one in which the school should be interested. Perhaps the child is what is called a "motor-minded" type and is being unwisely forced to take up certain phases of school work for which he has not a capability to learn. This kind of a child, if placed in a trades school, will become interested and the problem of his delinquency will be solved.

We have also the below-normal child, who is usually a delinquent. He should be placed in special classes if he is only slow or slightly retarded or what is called a "high grade moron." If lower in the scale of intelligence than this, he should be placed in a special school for the subnormal child—that is, if he is capable of learning at all. Those still lower in the scale of intelligence belong to the imbecile class, and should have institutional care and attention. The judge of the juvenile court told us that eighty per cent of the recidivists were subnormal. This was ascertained by giving them mental tests, so is authentic. Those committed to the courts for their first offense were not so tested, so he cannot report on them.

We found that the most frequent offense was immorality, and that the peak was reached with boys at the age of eleven, while the girls charged with this offense were nearly all fourteen or fifteen years of age. The judge told us the charges of immorality, especially against the young boys, were based more upon sex curiosity than real immorality as we understand it. This was caused by the lack of proper sex instruction. The judge added that one of the problems of society lies along the lines of satisfying this curiosity in a legitimate manner. He could not propose just how it could be done, he said, but a way must be devised that will be effectual, if we are to safeguard the youth. The cases brought to the court often implicated one girl of fourteen or fifteen and four or five boys ranging in age from nine to eleven.

The cases charged against girls were usually incorrigibility or immorality. When the court had the names of the boys and girls implicated and the case could be proven, it was charged as immorality; when no positive evidence was at hand, it was incorrigibility. When given a mental test these girls were found, in a majority of cases, to be subnormal. The judge put the figures at eighty per cent below normal, and the other twenty per cent are called "border line" cases.

These subnormal, immoral girls are the real problem of society. They have a weakened power of inhibition, their instincts are strong as those of a normal, and they become a real menace to young boys and those older who would take advantage of them. A man who is supposed to be normal and sometimes even of fair social standing will cohabit with a subnormal girl, but one rarely finds that the opposite is true.

What to do with this subnormal girl is the problem. She is found everywhere, working as housemaid, or nurse girl, or clerk, or waitress in hotels or restaurants. She is perfectly capable of making a living in a humble way, and so public opinion will not consent to her being placed in an institution upon public expense. Her looks do not betray the fact of her mental lack, and so she walks the streets, ogles the boys, and leads many astray.

I am very much in favor of doing away with the juvenile court as a political institution, and of enlarging the functions of our educational system so as to take better care of the delinquent child. The old saying, "Weeds are plants out of place," certainly fits the delinquent child in a large measure. He is a child out of place. Forced into an educational institution for which he is not fitted, he soon shows lack of interest in its work, and then it is our duty to investigate the cause back of it and set in motion remedial measures. In other words, we must put the supposed "weed" in its rightful place, and it will be quite often found that the menacing child becomes a useful citizen.

I am sending you a report of the Women's Relief Society of the Utah Church. They have a wide scope. It will interest you to note their large membership and the amount of money in their treasury. You will notice that their work lies principally with the sick and the unfortunate as well as their missionaries' families. I do not know whether they work under the direction of the ward bishops or not. I have been told that they never refuse aid, if the applicant is worthy. They are careful not to foster pauperism. An unmarried prospective mother who came to us for help told us that the Relief Society of the Mormon Church would take care of her, for that was their custom, even for those who were not members of their church. I mention this just to show you along what lines they work.

More another time.

Women's Department Institute

"It is woman's program now to bring to the community that wholesome social life which has always belonged to the home, but which cannot now be consigned alone to it."

"It is not for ourselves we labor, but for others all about us, and those who come after us."

"Children learn best by example and they open their hearts best to those who show them that hearts have doors."

"It begins to seem almost like General Conference." It does, indeed, and you, wherever you may be, are wishing that you might be with us in Independence this week, and we are wishing that not only every Women's Department Worker might share with us this "golden week," but that every mother and girl in the church might partake of the wonderful spirit of good which is present with us in all the institute services. In the early morning prayer meetings, out of the hearts of those who have labored—some in almost isolated conditions, others in the midst of branches—in the work of the Women's Department, have come to us testimonies of God's blessings and approval of our work which shall be a reservoir of strength and encouragement for future labor.

They are here in numbers—the Women's Department Workers—from Nova Scotia, from Canada, and from eleven of our States, considering together the great problems that lie before all the women of the church, of the Nation, and endeavoring to arrive at some beginning in the untangling of the network of religion, community life, and politics which has its center in the home. The Nation is waiting, watching, to see what women will do with the problems now in her hands, and largely in her control.

Because she is not yet fully recovered, although in much better health than previously, our director general, Sister Ruth Smith, was not able to be with us, but she sent us a message of good cheer and encouragement, as well as suggestions for the carrying on of the work so dear to all of us.

We have also missed Sister Lydia Wight who was unable to be with us because of bereavement in the family of her husband. We trust before the institute closes to hear from her some of the good things she has prepared for us.

In his address Sunday evening, the first service of the institute, Walter W. Smith outlined to us very clearly the relation between study and service.

In her report Monday morning, Sister Audentia Anderson, our general superintendent, outlined the objectives and essential points in the program of the Women's Department. Some of the problems she placed before us are: Proper recreation for our young people; reclaiming those who have made mistakes; child welfare, not for our own child, only, but those of the community, town, and Nation; how far shall we enter into civic life; what shall we do about the prevailing dress of to-day, especially of our high-school girls; how bring our children to the highest possible standards of health physically, that they may attain to the highest standards mentally and spiritually.

These are some of the serious problems which together we are facing this week, striving to learn how best they may be met. One thing Sister Anderson most earnestly sought to impress is that we must cooperate, we must forget every thought of self, and in humility labor only for the good of the work we are seeking to do, and the glory of God. Gossip must find no place among us, neither jealousy nor petty strife.

In considering the task before us, experts have been called to our assistance—men and women who have made a special study of certain of these problems. Among those who have given us assistance thus far are: Sister Mabel K. Smith, on social service work; Sister Lenore Christy, on hospitality to those from whom we expect no return; Bishop McGuire, on the temporal law, as applied to the Women's Department; Professor William A. Lewis, head of department of history and sociology in Junior College, Kansas City, on the spiritual aspects of child welfare; Sister Anne Roberts, on the growing need of the cradle roll work; Sister Rogene Smith on the importance of birth registration, also on the machinery of organization; Miss Rosamond Losh, of the children's bureau in Kansas City, on child welfare; Sister Dora Young, on citizenship; Brother Max Carmichael, on relation between civics and home; Sister Bertha Mader, on school clothes; Sister Laura Mann, on health questions.

Demonstrations of various lines of work, such as reunions, class work, friendly visiting, under the direction of such women as Mina C. Madison, Maude Peak Parham, Vida Watson, and Etta Hunt, have been especially helpful, also.

Some of the interesting things, aside from the discussion of our problems, have been: "A glance into the history of the Women's Department," given us by Sister Pearl Gardner; a lecture by Albert E. Barden, secretary of Chamber of Commerce of Independence, on "The city beautiful"; and special musical numbers which were greatly enjoyed.

In the dining hall, where the workers of Independence serve noon meals to the institute attendants, are a number of booths depicting the work of different bureaus, with instructive literature for distribution.

We expect to give you a more complete account of the lectures and helps in following issues.

F. W.

Watchman, What of the Night?

It is with great pleasure that I am permitted to send a greeting to you, my sisters of the Lincoln Branch, on your annual home-coming day. I trust I may be able to say some things which will kindle a flame of holy fire and enthusiasm in your hearts, that you may enter with a renewal of consecration into the task which is before you at this time—that of organizing yourselves for service.

Organization is a first essential to any achievement, be the thought a planet or a flower. Expression through material must needs have a working, functioning organization, or there is none. Thus we must recognize the need for the church organization, for our department organization, and, in fact as truly, the need for a local organization.

Years ago, when our department was first organized under the name of "Daughters of Zion," there were those who felt that it was not proper to take such a step. They felt that the women of the church should not presume to carry on any work independent of the men, the priesthood, and that it was unbecoming to attempt to teach or scatter the good seed of better living abroad in such a manner. In the wake of this criticism came the gentle word of the Lord: "Behold, if my servants and my handmaidens of the different organizations for good among my people shall continue in righteousness, they shall be blessed, even as they bless others of the household of faith."

Since that hour of the Lord's approval, many have been the comforting and inspiring messages that have come from the throne of grace to the tireless workers, and we feel a constantly increasing measure of the fulfillment of that promise to bless.

But we must not lose sight of the requisite for the blessing: "If they continue in righteousness." The latter word is defined as "right-doing" and in that sense we feel we must qualify if we would obtain the promise of the Lord. Constant in well-doing, should be our watchwords, and to the measure with which the sisters heap up their good works shall be matched the measure of their joy.

The church is to-day entering in upon a wide, wide field of accomplishment. Much of that which has been promised and prophesied in the past is being fulfilled about us to-day. The world shows infallible signs of the pouring out of God's judgments, and we chosen ones, who have been warned and instructed, and with whom the Lord has plead in love and yearning—are we to reenact the many scenes of old, when, unfaithful and unrepentant, Israel, with closed eyes and ears, plunged along to their doom?

Rather, shall we not turn with greater enlightenment, greater enthusiasm, to the study of that which God has given us, and try to put it into practice? Shall we not try to read the lessons of the hour, some of which are traced in letters of blood, agony, and suffering? We are told, "When ye see these things coming on the earth, lift up your hearts and rejoice, for the coming of the Son of Man is nigh!"

What shall we do to be ready when the watchman shall announce that great day of coming, when, as light streams from the east to the west, the glory of the Son of Man shall flood the earth? In the cry of old, sincere and from the heart, "What oh, what shall we do to be saved?" the answer is ever and always: "Except ye DO—" Except ye shall do the will of the Father! Oh, how slothful we are! How easily we drift along from day to day, from the glory of sunrise to the quiet of starlight, and think of any- and everything, except to have time for the half hour's soul-communion we all so sorely need—face to face with God and our own great eternal now! We urge and we haste; we fill the days with worry and stress, straining after many foolish bubbles, hugging to our breasts many vain delusions, glittering and fragile toys, which turn to disappointment in our grasp! Can we not rouse from our lethargy, rub the mists of tradition from our eyes, and turn our gaze to things of life, learning to live in calmness and serenity, without one iota of doubt, worry, strife, or unworthiness?

What is before the women of this church? Is it a light task, think you, to bring up children "in light and truth"? Is it an easy thing to "set our homes in order"? Is it a trivial responsibility to plant in the hearts of the young that consecration and holy zeal which will cause them to turn with joy and place their all—their life, time, talents, strength, and service—upon the altar of God's church? Ah, mothers know that ideals are not so easily reached. They know the disappointments and the heartaches! They know the difficulties and temptations which beset and ensnare, and they know how hard it is to offset the allurements of the world and implant instead a sincere love for the things of God! Mothers have their gardens of sorrow, where they face disillusionment and vain regrets, and gaze with quivering lips upon beautiful, shattered dreams! Mothers wonder if, given another chance, they would not try so much harder to understand these young souls intrusted to their care, and more earnestly attempt to qualify themselves to guide, surely and safely!

What other important work in life is approached so carelessly, so gayly, and with so little preparational knowledge as that of wife, home maker, and mother! Typists take their months of study; musicians sit for hours daily at their instruments; mechanics pass through long months of apprenticeship; but wives and home makers are enthroned over night, the results of a summer frolic or a moonlight stroll! Susie falls in love with Jimmie's broad shoulders, or fancies she does; Jimmie falls in love with Susie's saucy dimple, or fancies he does. Off to the preacher or the justice of the peace! "Peace, peace, when there is no peace." The divorce courts cry, "Incompetency! Inefficiency! Instability! Insincerity!" and the wrecks and ruins lie all about us, while little children sob for the parents that have gone out of their lives!

Shall our precious girls approach marriage in this fashion? Shall they know nothing about the comfortable and sensible discharge of its duties? Shall our women continue to commit sins against the health of their families by ill-chosen food, poor preparation, or unwise combinations? Shall our mothers turn their backs upon those studies which will give them an insight into the minds of their little children, that will unlock for them the magic doors of love and confidence, that will carry them into the joyous fields of sympathetic comprehension and cooperation? Shall they remain ignorant of those principles and laws which are most fundamental and vitally important in the rearing and training of the souls and bodies intrusted to their care?

Nay, nay! Our dear sisters have imbibed too deeply of the wonderful Spirit of truth and light, that intelligent Spirit of God which bids them "study all good books," to "become acquainted with countries, histories, peoples," which brings research and analysis into their lives, which opens for them the alluring portals of philosophy and spiritual vision, which lays bare the mysteries of science and earthly achievement, and which, at the highest and last, can only again emphasize that last transcendent command of our Savior: "Love one another, even as I have loved you!"

The Women's Department of the church, recognizing the fundamental truth of this last commission, in love and humility, in kindness of heart and purity of purpose, are banding themselves together to "work righteousness" and to "bring about much good in these latter days." They see the possibilities which lie before them in united organization, with oneness of purpose. They are finding in mutual service an outlet for those impulses which are most like Christ's, for only in loving ministry can he truly be found. They are seeking earnestly the best gifts—those of faith, of courage, of inspiration and intelligence. By these efforts shall their blessings be measured, and in uplifted and spiritual homes shall Zion be established.

In the wonderful prayer service of last Easter morning was the beginning of the endowment of God's priesthood in these latter days. For us, the membership, the endowment lies just ahead, and the privilege which is before us now, to assist in the actual building of a beautiful and much-needed assembly hall for the Saints, is but the opening wedge of opportunities which shall come to us, and through which we shall obtain a foretaste of the heavenly spiritual delights. Unless we sacrifice we cannot enjoy. Through sacrifice we are purged of our selfishness—the greatest hindering weight with which humanity is hampered in its struggles towards the light! Wonderful things are just ahead of this church, if only we can move out in faith upon the sure promises of God, try him, and show by our works—yes, and by our treasure—that we have conquered the arch enemy of souls, have put self and selfishness behind, and have learned to truly value those priceless joys which, though all unseen, are still the most real and most powerful forces in the universe—the pure delights of the spiritual kingdom of God!

Ancient Scenes Visited

Tombs of Lazarus and home of Mary and Martha visited in Bethany and vicinity.

E. A. S.: To-day is a fine spring day as weather goes in Palestine, but I found it pretty hot for the walk we took. It was to Bethany and return. Ever since we came to Jerusalem we have wanted to make the trip, but not till to-day did we take the necessary time. The present village consists of some forty houses (hovels is a more accurate term), inhabited by Moslems who live in primitive condition. It is situated on the southeast spur of the Mount of Olives.

In and around the village are numerous olive, fig, almond, and carob trees. These, with small gardens, inclosed by loose stone walls, and watered from the rather good water supply Bethany has, enables the poor dwellers of the present village to eke out an existence with which they seem satisfied. Of course there is always the supply of baksheesh from tourists and visitors, and one's experience in Bethany needs be only a short one to convince him that all the inhabitants are baksheesh seekers; and they do not hesitate to tell you how much they want—always about three times as much as they really expect to get.

The two "attractions" of Bethany which furnish the excuses for baksheesh asking are the tomb of Lazarus and the house of Mary and Martha. It is quite unlikely that either place pointed out at present is the real place claimed to be, but they answer the purpose of satisfying curiosity and furnish an income for at least a portion of the inhabitants.

The caretaker at the tomb of Lazarus not only furnishes candles with which to light your way down the dark and slippery twenty-six steps twisting their way to the small room called the tomb, but he will obligingly sell you one of David's sling shots or a ring from Mecca. And at a word water for drinking will be brought by a modern Martha, for which baksheesh is expected. An old lady brought us some in an earthen jug, quite similar to what have been used thereabouts for centuries. She wanted a shilling (five piasters) for the courtesy, but was finally quite satisfied with two piasters. I tried to get her to give us a rebate for the paper cup I furnished but she rather scoffed at the idea. A cup of any kind is quite unnecessary for them. Some natives present, after we had been "refreshed," raised the flaring-mouthed jug to their lips and drank freely.

From the tomb we were escorted to a near-by place indicated as the ruins of the house of Mary and Martha, where more baksheesh was required. Near it, however, is a place we were permitted to see without fee—the ruins of the house of Simon the Leper, so-called.

When we went to Bethany we followed the modern road called the Jericho Road, which is a well-constructed, broad automobile road; but returning we followed the ancient road, merely a well-worn trail over the rocks, and which doubtless is the road which Jesus frequently used on his frequent journeyings to and from Bethany, for Bethany was a favorite resting place. He perhaps frequently went a shorter but steeper way over the Mount of Olives. It is quite likely, however, that the road over which we returned was the one followed by Jesus and his admirers when he made his spectacular entry into Jerusalem. On our way we stopped to examine another tomb said to be the tomb of Lazarus, in the corner of a field owned by a group of Franciscan Friars. This may not be the real tomb any more than is the one shown in the village, but it at least comes nearer answering the conditions of the incident of the grave.

When we were at the edge of the village, being warm and thirsty, we stopped where we saw some young girls drawing water from a well. So we went to the well to get a drink. The girls were small and lithe, perhaps nine or ten years old. The smaller of the two couldn't have weighed over fifty pounds, yet she quickly filled a five-gallon tin with water, and by the help of a boy near by she placed that can of water on her head and easily and gracefully walked off with it. It was from this little girl that we got our drink, and though she didn't ask it we gave her baksheesh.

But we had been followed to the spot by two lads, about eleven and twelve years of age. With us was Halim Negeim, and through Halim (an Arab) we began asking some questions. We learned that the two little girls were not yet married, that the youngest of the boys (eleven years) was not, but that the other boy (twelve years) had been married for a year, his wife being fifteen years. He said he expected to have five wives by the time he was grown. The boy's left hand had been shattered by a bomb from an airplane.

Coming back we skirted the walled city, and leaving Jericho Road near Herod Gate we struck off to the right, returning to Floyd House through the northern part of the city. I was glad we made the cut-off, for we passed a Palestinian gypsy camp. The tents were low, crude affairs, made by stretching gunny sacks sewed together over short poles. An adult cannot stand erect in one, but that makes little difference. No chairs or tables, for everyone takes a seat on the ground. Cooking was by small fires in the open, and apparently quite primitive. The children were filthy, unkempt, sore-eyed, and very scantily clothed. One can surely see a great variety of individuals in and around Jerusalem.

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

JERUSALEM, PALESTINE, April 12, 1921.

President Smith Makes a Trip to Ain Fara

President Smith expects to reach London about May 15.

E. A. Smith: Yesterday we made another trip to Ain Fara for the purpose of baptism. You will remember I wrote you about our previous experience in making a trip there for that purpose. Well, this time, by planning a bit further ahead we secured better animals, and the going and the return trip were made more comfortably and expeditiously. Those baptized were Halim Negeim and a Mr. Schapiro. The latter is a convert from Judaism.

Ain Fara is said to be one of the places made famous by John the Baptist, one to which he resorted because there was much water. It is highly picturesque, and we all enjoyed the visit, as this time we found it unoccupied. You will remember that on our first visit, it being a holiday, we found the narrow valley quite alive with a lot of visitors. I said we found it quite unoccupied. This is not quite correct. A family of Arabs lives near the spring, in a cave in the side of the cliff. It is one of those shiftless baksheesh hunting Arab families, filthy, sore-eyed, ill-kempt, poverty-stricken. The family consists of an old man, a woman, a girl about ten, and a boy about five or six. It seems to be the practice of this filthy family to hang around visitors to the spring and pick up odd bits of food and baksheesh. The whole family came down to "welcome" us. We saw they expected to stay; so Brother Passman entered into an agreement with the old man that for a consideration of five piasters he and his tribe were to go away out of sight and stay away till we were gone.

But in ten minutes the children were back and in another ten minutes the old woman was there, too. One of the party, a switch in hand, made for her and the two children. The children fled precipitately, but that old hag just laughed. Afraid of a switch in a white man's hand? Not she! Her lord and master was an adept at wielding a club, and her laugh of scorn did justice to the croakings of the witches of Macbeth. She perched on a stone wall near by and poured forth a torrent of words. I couldn't tell whether she was praying or swearing, except that her gestures were not those usually accompanying prayer. She was bound to get more baksheesh. Well, she got left. As she didn't seem to be afraid of a switch, a happy thought struck one of the party, a quart cup of water was seized and the contents dashed into the ugly face. I never saw surprise and disgust better shown in facial expression than was reflected on that old hag's face. A switch she was used to; but water ough! the horrid stuff, and right in her face, too! The cup made a hasty trip to the creek, and before the hag could wiggle off the stone fence another cup of water was scattered well over her "gown."

To all appearances the "gown" was quite as unused to water as was the wearer, and the "delicate" fabric may be irretrievably ruined, for all I know. At any rate, the surprised termigant as she stood by the fence shaking her bony fists, was quivering with rage. She was nonplussed. Water was a new weapon against which she was at a loss to know how to defend. In the meantime the cup had been hastily refilled, and a third time its contents were dashed at the invective sputtering hag. The water went to its mark, and spattered her from head to foot. Then she fled. Be it said to her credit, as she did so she looked back over her shoulder and laughed. It had been a "clean" fight, and she had been worsted. Its "cleanness" was her undoing. Later, when we were breaking camp, after lunch (the "fight" had occurred while we were preparing lunch), the family came out of their retreat, and when a half piaster was handed her as a "peace offering," she accepted it with as much grinning pleasure as though no drop of water had ruffled her serenity or spoiled her beautiful garments." It makes me smile every time I recall the horrified expression on that old woman's face when it was splashed with water. Water, of all things!

We have arrangements made to leave here the 18th, sailing from Alexandria the 2d. Expect to reach London about May 15.

Yours, FREDERICK M. SMITH.

Zion Builders of Pisgah

[In a personal letter to President Elbert A. Smith the success of these meetings is shown in the revival of the church members both young and old, and in the baptism of twelve young people.]

President Elbert A. Smith: I am glad to report to you that the Zion Builder Services by Brother John F. Garver at this place have indeed been a success. Brother Garver won the hearts of the people, young and old, right from the start, and a full house has greeted him at every session. The young people were alert and on hand with their orchestra and choir. The music and song were inspiring and the speaker seemed to be much more than himself, and made the remark that in all of his ministerial experience at no time or place had he enjoyed a greater degree of the Spirit of the Lord than he had during these meetings. This good Spirit was enjoyed by all that attended these meetings, and so expressed by many, it reaching to the nonmembers. The result has been that twelve young people have been added to the church. Two were baptized during the week and ten yesterday.

We had an all day meeting yesterday. The Saints were asked to fast from breakfast till supper, which thing they did willingly, and received the rich reward, the power from on high. The order of the meetings yesterday was Sunday school and preaching in the forenoon, baptism following the preaching service; then the sacrament and confirmation meeting continued with testimony. This meeting was surely a feast of good things. The Lord spoke to the Saints through Brother Garver, admonishing them to be more humble, and not forgetful of their promises, and that there were many more good people in this vicinity that would come to the church. A short intermission after this meeting for supper, then Religio and preaching in the evening, and at the close of this Brother Garver expressed himself like this, "Surely this seems to be the closing of a perfect day." This leaves us rejoicing, and it is the unanimous expression of all of the Saints that we must arrange to have Brother Garver come again, so you may look for an application like that sometime during the summer. I have never seen the time when there was such a demand for preaching and the people so anxious to hear the word as now.

Yours for success,

JOSEPH W. LANE.

West Duluth, Minnesota

The Spirit bears witness in Minnesota, as many are baptized.

Editors Herald: We are all very happy, for we realize that we have indeed been blessed. Brother and Sister Kress came to us on the 3d of last November, and since then thirty-three of us have been baptized into the faith. Brother Kress went to Pine River, and baptized three there, and expects more to follow later. The people there were hungering for the gospel, even as we were here.

We had a very spiritual sacrament service last Sunday. There were two prophecies given, and many beautiful testimonies. We rejoiced, every one of us, and did not enjoy seeing it come to a close, as we would have liked to have had it last long.

We have two thriving Sunday schools, also our prayer meetings, and Sunday preaching services are very well attended.

Brother Kress is planning on going to Carlton this week, as he expects to baptize some there. If it were possible for him to preach in a few different places at the same time I am sure he would do so, for he is very ambitious in the service. Sister Kress plays the piano, and leads in singing. She is wonderful. We would indeed feel lost without her.

I must not forget to mention our young people's Religio. We surely do have great times there, as Brother Kress tells us we are all young until we reach 100, so we old married people march right along with the young folks. We have had some programs, and surely have had the spirit of mirth amongst us on those occasions.

I will also write of how we came into this faith. We first heard Brother Kress at the schoolhouse near our home, here in Fairmount Park. He didn't say very much at that time, as there were other speakers to take up the time, but what little he said just went where it was needed. I noticed that there before us stood a minister who was genuine, I felt that he was no hypocrite, as the most of them have appeared to me to be. There was that deep faith and that noble spirit of sacrifice, which touched me as I had never been touched before. I felt that there was a man who knew he had the true gospel, and meant every word he said, so I longed to go to a preaching service where I could hear more of it. My husband would not go, so I would try to forget it; but I could not. So I prayed to God one evening to show me if that was the true religion, and if it was, to open the way to me that I could go.

I had a spiritual dream where Christ came to me, and I was in his service, and when I awoke his Spirit was still with me, and I prayed, "Oh, Lord, where thou leadest, there will I follow. In thy service I long to be," and then I was happy.

A few days after Brother Kress came, and asked if we would come to the meetings; I told him how it was. He said, "Well, ask Mr. Stark to come along," and I said I would, but I did not think he would come. I told him if not, I would come just the same. I took a neighbor with me, and we were both very much interested. Now that neighbor and her husband and family are all in the faith.

My husband was very much against my going to these meetings, but I went, no matter what he said to me, and finally got him to attend the meetings against his will. At first he would have none of it, but finally got interested in spite of his fight against the truth, and my prayer was answered. He, too, entered the faith. I did not expect it so soon, as my husband and myself were Catholics, and way back on both sides our ancestors were all strict Catholics. My husband was a Knight of Columbus, also, but when the gospel of Jesus Christ comes into our lives, all other creeds are swept away. That proves how weak they are—when the creed of a lifetime is swept away in a day, when the gospel of the kingdom comes our way and we give it a chance.

So now we are all happy and at peace with God, Jesus, and all the world, it seems, although there are many enemies on all sides.

God is love, and he has given it to us with his glorious gospel, so that we love our sisters, brothers, and even our enemies as ourselves.

We hope to meet you all, sisters and brothers, in that city of love and peace—Zion.

Brother Kress just baptized a young woman and a young man this morning, and will have more to baptize on Saturday. He has also been called to Wright, Minnesota, to baptize there.

We are certainly being blessed here.

MRS. ROBERT STARK.

Mission Work Among the Maoris

Elders Savage and Loving take a missionary trip into the back country of New Zealand, among the native Maoris.

With the beginning of the year Brother Savage and I took up work among the Maoris in earnest. A little had been done among them during the close of 1920, but the housing problem kept us tormented so that we disposed of it by building small houses for our families.

The Maoris are a branch of the Polynesian peoples, having come to New Zealand some five or six hundred years ago. Their language is similar to that of the other islands where Brother Savage has done mission work. We have made some long and interesting journeys through the back country, preaching and distributing literature to them. One advantage is the young people are able to talk and in many cases read English. But in order to reach the older people, it is essential for us to learn to speak Maori.

A brief sketch of our mission work may prove interesting. Leaving Rotorua per motor we went to Waratapu, about twenty-five miles. At this place we left the road and struck in to the Waicato River, where we called at a Maori Mormon home and were kindly received and cared for two days by Martinga, who has been a member of the Mormon Church for over thirty years. This man and family listened quietly to our words and although all the little trick arguments for polygamy were to him worth something, still, the succession in our church presidency was a bright light to his soul. The possession of Kirtland Temple and the monogamic law of the church were other grand fingerboards on the road which challenged his admiration.

On Monday we left with good wishes and an invitation to come again, and headed for the village of Ohaki, where we had been told a "tangata moe punarua," or polygamous man, lived.

We found the polygamist yoking his team for the road. He invited us into the wagon and we got up. We lost no time in letting our purpose be known, and after a fair hearing we were shown a short cut to the village of Titoki, which we took, feeling that our garments were clean of his polygamy.

At Titoki we found that all the men had been away two days pig hunting, "Lamanite fashion." The women invited us to preach, which of course we did, afternoon and evening. When about half through the evening service, the men came filing in, having returned from the pig hunt, and a good meeting was recorded.

Crossing the Waicato River in a canoe next morning, we traveled up through a large estate owned by an old Scot who met us in the midst and protested our presence because he had been financially hit by a Mormon years ago; to which I replied that if I were to treat him to the deserts due a Britisher who had ill used me under the British flag years ago well his head might be in danger, but seeing that we had never met before, the least we could do was to treat each other as men. This proved effective and the old man later showed his manliness.

We traveled on to a native camp and stayed over night, sitting up till midnight talking to another member of the Utah Church.

Going on to Taupo we had a busy week end, preaching in Waipahihi and Taupo four times. At the former place the old chief called the people together at 7 p. m. by means of the village bell. We had a good audience, and Brother Savage gave a very fine sermon in the Maori language.

Leaving Taupo on Monday morning, we walked nine miles to Iruanui, announced a meeting and got a hall full of people by about eight o'clock. Going on to Moki the next day, we arrived about noon, secured a hall, announced a meeting, distributed two hundred tracts from house to house, and had about forty out in the evening to hear the word. The next day we returned home by train after having walked over one hundred miles in two weeks and made many friends to the cause.

I feel that the day has come for the church to exert herself to reclaim the Lamanites, and it certainly gives me pleasure to read of the work among the Lamanites in the United States. We hope to be able to get some literature prepared in the Maori language ere long.

In gospel bonds,

A. L. LOVING.

The Saints at London, have installed a pipe organ, and the occasion of installation was attended with a program of some twenty members. Miss Marjory Alford, church organist, "first woke the sleeping music in the new instrument," according to an item in The Free Press.

Better Times Now

A veteran tells of when he endured many hardships for the sake of the gospel.

In years past my heart was in the gospel work and I labored diligently for the building up of the kingdom of God. I recall one time in my early missionary work that I started for a place seventy-six miles distant, carrying two grips and having but fifteen cents in my pocket. It was out among worldly people.

The first night I slept on the floor with a chair for a pillow, and no bedding under me nor to cover me. When I got to West Branch, Michigan, I found many friendly to the gospel.

But much of my traveling has been done under difficulties. I have slept in sawdust piles, with an umbrella over my face to keep the frost off, have slept in barns and endured many other hardships, but I was ever praying that the time might come when the missionaries would not have to do those things.

We older ones cannot do as our younger ones can now, but our hearts are in the work. I am now seventy-four years of age.

Faithfully,

A. E. BURR.

From the British Isles

Apostle Gillen finds excellent outlook.

Bishop Fry has been critically ill, but is greatly improved.

Dear Brother Elbert: At the outset I desire to say that I am not in a good frame of mind to present anything relative to the work of the districts because of the fact that Brother Fry has been critically ill. To put the matter squarely before you, I will say that there was a time when he was very near the point of death. Because of the peculiar conditions surrounding his sickness we were quite at a loss to understand what was the best course to pursue.

It seems that he was stricken with a very severe attack of peritonitis, as a result of which great suffering ensued and the question of life and death was considered. To make the situation more complex, the doctors attending urged an immediate operation, which brought heavy responsibility to Saint Leonard's, and particularly to Brother Sorden, Brother Edwards, and myself. In the nature of things we could not have access to the wishes of the members of his family, in consequence of which we were pressed to the point of almost desperation, the doctors stating that they would not be responsible for his life if we would not consent to an operation. We asked the question at once, "Will you be responsible for his life if we do consent to an operation?" to which they replied that in the nature of things they could not do this. To our minds this made the chances equal from the physician's point of view, and we chose to deny them this privilege for the time being, at least. We are glad to state, however, that there were some wonderful responses to our administrations, which I trust will finally result in his complete recovery, although he is not beyond the danger point as yet.

With reference to the work in the British Isles, I have to say without hesitancy that I have enjoyed it equally with or beyond any of my missionary experience. To put it plainly, the demands as well as the opportunities are such that I would be loath to leave the British Isles at least for a time. The Saints have responded most wonderfully in every district so far, and I feel that wonderful results will follow our labors. I am sure that there is a better day for the British Isles, and, as is the case with the American Saints, our people here are ready to respond to consistent leadership.

There is an idea now prevailing—as in America—that the young should come into their place and take up the activities of the church while they have vigor of mind and strength of body. There are a number of young people in the British Isles who are willing to consecrate their services to the church, and to my way of thinking we will be held responsible if we fail to provide opportunities for them. This opinion, I am sure, is shared by President Smith and T. W. Williams. With these conditions before us, it makes the work in the British Isles very interesting indeed, and I hope and pray that we will be enabled to comply with these demands in a way that will enhance the work of the church in this country and finally redound to the honor and glory of God.

I presume you will feel like lambasting me for not writing oftener, but the facts are that I have been busy night and day endeavoring to respond to the calls made upon me, which have precluded the opportunity of writing. I hope to be able to give you a complete resume later.

We expect President F. M. Smith about May 15 when we will gather up the fragments and resolve them into something concrete.

Have enjoyed good health since I came here, and as I stated I am enjoying the work immensely.

With kind regards to all the members of the office staff, I am,
Yours sincerely,
JAMES A. GILLEN.
LONDON, May 18.

Later: The doctor says that Brother Fry shows some improvement. This is indeed a relief. I came from the Sheffield District in response to a wire from Brother Sorden; but will return as soon as I feel that Brother Fry is out of danger.

I desire to say that both Dan Sorden and his wife have endeared themselves to the people; both he and his wife have gone beyond our expectations. He certainly found a jewel in his choice for a wife. James E. Bishop is doing good work in Sheffield District. The people surely love him—a good man.

If I get time may write something for publication later.

J. A. G.

A New Type of Service Successful

Ten days of preaching and program work combined brought excellent results at Centralia, Washington.

We feel that the Saints will be interested in the series of services held in Centralia for ten days ending April 25. The services were under the auspices of the Twin City Religio. It seems that it was at our February conference that our Religio superintendent, Sister Jesse Ward, received the inspiration. Anyway, the first we knew about it was immediately after the conference.

A meeting of the executive officers of the Religio was called and the proposition of holding a ten-day series of preaching and program work was discussed, and arrangements made for bringing the same to pass. Word was sent to the members that special services were about to begin, and considerable enthusiasm was worked up. The meetings were prepared for by hard work and prayer. Then arrangements were made for securing the services of one of our district missionaries, Elder George Brundage.

As to the nature of the services, each evening, beginning at 7.45, we had a half hour of program work, followed by a sermon by the missionary. We certainly were fortunate in getting Brother Brundage. I am sure everyone enjoyed the preaching, and I know for a fact that many were caused to rejoice because of the spiritual food given them. Personally, I feel that the most important part of the service is the preaching, but we cannot forbear boasting a little about the programs. Especially were the little folks well trained. One evening was occupied by our male chorus, who filled the time allowed by singing quartets, solos, etc. Another evening was occupied by our branch artist, Brother George Davis, who is quite expert with the brush. Brother Davis says he likes to have a little more time than he was allowed if he is to paint masterpieces. While he daubed the canvas, he was accompanied by our orchestra, composed of a violin and two organs.

I do not mean that both organists played at once, but each, Sister Lula Premo and Sister Melva Ward, played us some very good solos, interspersed with a few violin numbers by the undersigned. The meetings were positively successful.

The newspapers were very liberal with us, printing all we asked them to, which included the program for each evening. We get the same privileges as the other papers and there seems to be no prejudice. Along with newspaper publicity we had some large banners painted by Brother Davis. Some were hung inside the building and some outside. Those inside contained invitations to return and there were also some pertinent gospel reminders.

Considerable credit is due Sister Lula Premo, who was very diligent in training the young people; and to Sister Jessie Ward, who in reality staged the whole affair, of course in conjunction with our branch president, Elder Leonard Rhodes, and we are glad to include Sister Blanch Davis, who very ably conducted the music. Brother Brundage went his way to-day, accompanied by the prayers and love of the Saints. We hope he will return soon. We love him for the message he brought us.

Yours in bonds,
O. L. OPPELT, Publicity Agent.

Farewell Reception to Bishop May

The Saints present him with a gold watch and chain on the occasion of his parting.

[The following is an epitome of an account received from Elder W. R. Armstrong, of Manchester, England, of a reception held in that city for Bishop Roderick May. Elder Armstrong was one of the counselors of Bishop May, as bishop of the English Mission.—EDITORS.]

It may be of interest to you to learn that upon April 1, 1921, a company of Saints met in the southeast Manchester [England] meeting room for the purpose of giving to our retiring Bishop, Roderick May, in a tangible form, a token of our love. This faithful brother has labored in our midst persistently and consistently for ten years, and many of us felt that we could not allow him to depart from our shores without some recognition of the work he has done and the energy he has displayed in spite of the fact that he has passed his seventieth year.

When the members of the reunion committee heard that our brother was released from office, they felt some recognition of his labor ought to be made. Accordingly our mission secretary, Elder Frank Edwards, got to work with typewriter and circular, and at length sufficient money was collected to procure a suitable present. Together with subscription came a number of letters of appreciation, all of which tended to show the high esteem in which our departing brother was held.

The selection and purchase of the present was made by Elder S. F. Mather and Brother Robert Baty, our late patriarch's son.

High Priest Joseph Dewsnap presided at our social gathering, and during the evening pianoforte solos were rendered by Brother Gordon Mather, vocal pieces by Sister Maud Walker, Brother W. Hall, Mr. Britton, Sister A. Stead, and recitations by Elders S. F. Mather, Joseph Dewsnap, Edwin Maloney, and W. R. Armstrong, and an impromptu and amusing talk by Apostle Gillen.

The chief event of the evening was the presentation of a handsome gold Waltham lever watch with chain, to which was appended a George V sovereign. This was handed to Bishop May by Elder Mather, who said in part:

"The giving of this present is an unexpected honor and I have had much to do with the procuring of it. I will try to express myself in a few words which will not be commensurate or adequate to the labor performed, despite little faults and failings which are common to all.

"I remember quite well the coming of our brother to Manchester more than twenty years ago, and his advent ten years later when he was installed as bishop of the British Isles. There are others more intimately acquainted with our brother who could say what that coming to our land meant in sacrifice.

"There is one thing I like to see inside the church as well as outside, namely, the proper recognition of service faithfully rendered.

"I have noticed quite recently, too, that in spite of advancing years, our brother has displayed remarkable activity."

In conclusion Elder Mather said he hoped that our brother would experience joy in the eventide of life and that amidst his duties at Independence he might have a luminous vision of our faces.

He then told us that it was mainly owing to the untiring energy of our brother, Robert Baty, that we were able to hand over to our brother this present, for the goods were only delivered on that day. Brother Mather then handed the gift to Brother May. It bore our brother's monogram on the back, and inside the following words were inscribed: "Presented to Bishop R. May by friends in the British Isles Mission."

In reply Bishop May expressed his appreciation of the gift received, and stated that when he came to England he had a good Elgin watch, but that since coming, it had had to go, and he had obtained an inferior watch, which was not of much use. He discussed his labors in the church from the time he was ordained a priest in 1877, at London, Ontario. He referred to his work as stake bishop at Independence, and the circumstances surrounding his coming to England at the request of Bishop Kelley and President Joseph Smith.

Upon the retirement of Brother W. R. Armstrong from his duties as secretary of the mission, after twenty years of service, Brother May referred to gold as among the first fruits that we could receive—the best metal known among men, and expressed his appreciation that his own gift was of that metal.

In conclusion he referred to the effect of such meetings as this, in drawing the church closer together; "the Lord knows no boundary line, and we are moving forward to better times." He hoped that the work might be built up better than ever before. He was not acquainted with the work of those preceding him, so went to work at a disadvantage. Few knew the struggle he had and he hoped the Lord would be with the work of the church henceforth.

Elder Dewsnup, in bringing these formal proceedings to a close, wished Brother May well on behalf of the Manchester District.

How Lamoni Received Its Name

An old settler recounts his memories of those days.

[In connection with the Lamoni Stake Number, the question was raised as to the origin of the name "Lamoni" as applied to the town. There seemed to be a consensus of opinion that Elijah Banta was the one who suggested the name, and that appears to be confirmed upon further investigation.

We have written to a number of the old-timers, and quite uniformly they give Brother Banta the credit. The letter from Brother W. Hudson below is the most complete statement we have received from anyone. It should prove of interest, not only to the citizens of Lamoni, but also to the church.

It is interesting to note that the original intention was to make a junction at Lamoni, with different branches of the railroad from that town. The reason that it was not done was because David Dancer asked more for his land than the railroad was willing to pay.

A letter from W. H. Deam adds another sidelight in that he states that each of the 100 lots given to the committee was worth $100, while the land was purchased probably at an average price of $15 an acre. The coming of the railroad made a considerable increase in land values. So according to Brother Deam, the committee suffered no financial loss in turning over 120 acres of land and receiving in return 100 town lots, though it would seem that the railroad gained on the real estate transaction.—EDITORS.]

Your letter of inquiry is before me and I will endeavor to inform you as best I can. It's been a long time ago—in the fall of 1879.

The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad was building the road, and was missing the township of Fayette, where most of the Saints owned the land, and a number of the Saints appointed a committee to wait upon the officials of the road, and got them to turn the survey and come to the present situation by promising them one hundred twenty acres of land, eighty acres north of Main Street and forty south of Main. The eighty we bought of Frank Drummond, the forty from the Order of Enoch. The company was to build the road where it now is, and Lamoni was to be the junction. The committee was to furnish right of way for both lines, and the railroad was to deed one hundred average lots to the committee. But when the lots were surveyed, or a portion of them, the railroad kept the best lots to the railroad. So the committee protested, and the railroad company deeded a block to the committee. Then when the junction affair came up, the railroad wanted the land much cheaper than Brother Dancer asked (he was the owner), so the railroad threw up that scheme and used the present site, and we were released of purchasing the right of way on the other line.

Now as to the committee, the names were as follows: Order of Enoch, David Dancer, E. Banta, J. R. Smith, Noah Riggs, George Adams, Samuel Bailey, W. Hudson. I was the secretary of the committee, as I now remember.

Now as to the name, as I remember, "Lamoni" was proposed by E. Banta. There was a post office one and a half miles south called Sedgwick. The old settlers wished this to be the new town name. The postal department adopted it, as did the railroad company. This was done in the fall of 1879, and Lamoni was in a cornfield.

Valentine White, of Independence, Missouri, put up the first dwelling, and there was born to him the first child.

Any further information I can give, command. I was in Lamoni twenty-two years.

Yours truly,

W. HUDSON.

Council Bluffs' Zion Builders Active

Their slogan is, "Every home visited." Their minds are filled with thoughts of service. Some interesting experiences had.

This has been a very active week [May 1 to 7] with the Zion Builders of Council Bluffs. Through thorough and systematic effort, every Latter Day Saint home in this city, Omaha, and surrounding branches have been visited by enthusiastic and well-posted committee workers. With every person between the ages of ten and forty, who promised to attend five out of the seven meetings, was left a printed ticket admitting him or her to the upper auditorium during the campaign.

Various experiences are being had in connection with this work. One of our young sisters who is rendering undivided service in this campaign, while reading one evening, discovered the page of her book to be perfectly blank, but immediately the following words appeared on the page:

"Zion Builders"

- Z Stands for zeal.
We should be zealous in our warfare;
Be zealous therefore and repent."
- I Stands for initiative.
Initiative is the power to lead.
- O Stands for one.
We should be one as God and Christ are one.
- N Stands for need.
What do we need?
- B Stands for Bible.
We need the Bible.
- U Stands for unity.

In unity there is strength.

("United we stand; divided we fall.")

- I Stands for inflexibility.
We should be inflexible in our purpose.
- L Stands for love.
We should love one another as Christ loves us.
- D Stands for doer.
Be doers of the word and not hearers only.
- E Stands for earnest workers.
Earnest workers for the Master.
- R Stands for render.
- S Stands for service.
Render service.

More Statistics

Constant change in the figures showing enrollment.

First Presidency: We are pleased to report to you the following changes in the general church records which may be of interest to you, showing the gains and losses for the month of April, 1921.

We have received reports of 404 baptisms, also gained 18 new names in checking up of old records hitherto not reported to this office, making a total of 422. We have received reports of 159 deaths, found 42 deaths entered in old branch records unreported, received reports of 7 expulsions, and found 4 expulsions indicated in old branch records not heretofore reported, making a total loss of 212 or a net gain of 210 for the month, added to the net enrollment for April 1, 1921, present membership 96,988.

We previously reported to you a loss from the records of 2,689 names carried to the loss and gain account. During the month of April 204 names were carried to this account, 2 names were restored, therefore leaving a net enrollment of 202 carried to the unknown, added to the 2,689 would make a grand total of 2,891 carried to the unknown. This deducted from the net membership above indicated would reduce the number to 94,107, this being the number really carried upon our records now as the number of members in the church.

Judging from reports from branches in all parts of the country, a great many more names will be deducted from this number when the branches have undertaken and completed their work of checking up the names carried upon their records.

Sincerely,

DEPARTMENT OF STATISTICS,

F. A. Russell.

Kirtland Has a "Revive-All"

And the young people found happiness in great profusion from earnest service.

A few lines by way of report regarding our most recent experience in gospel activities in this old historic spot. There are folks among us who doubted that in this old and settled community there was much chance of stirring up interest, except that latent hostility which fires up at every aggressive move of God's army. Well, and again, well! for it has been again demonstrated that the fire of service may be fanned to a living, mighty flame by the zeal and works of Zion's children when they are given leadership and the word, "Go forward!"

For some time past there has been portent of an awakening to spiritual opportunities among the young people of Kirtland—the Sunday school reflected it (note their recent Christmas offering of $800); the Religio has shown it, with an attendance very nearly reaching a hundred, our limited chapel accommodations undoubtedly stunting our growth in numbers; again, the young people have been much in evidence in those services usually considered peculiarly belonging to the "old folks."

A train of circumstances, certainly more providential than accidental, allowed us the privilege to entertain Brother D. T. Williams as he passed through here from his successful meetings of like kind in the Eastern States. The young people had previously organized and accomplished some preliminary training and so were ready, with a little intensive instruction, to go about the serious part of the work. "Serious!"—it was a joy, judging from the expressions and interest of the teams that went forward by jitney and afoot to personally invite everyone get-at-able in the township and near-by communities to "Stop, Look, and Listen to Danny Williams."

Telephone poles bore the same sign at crossroads and along the way, as did many store windows in Willoughby, to supplement a generous-sized advertisement on the local paper's front page. Across the street before the temple every tourist and passing motorist read the big banner, "ZION BUILDERS 'REVIVE-ALL' SERVICES."

At every house visited a program of the services with topics and song texts was left, with the invitation to come and learn about our belief, whatever might be their own convictions. In many homes the offer of the visiting team to sing one of our good gospel songs was gladly acceded to. So the glad news was carried far and wide, for at the majority of places some one of the Angel Message series of tracts also was left.

Never since the early days when this beautiful locality harbored a most beautiful gospel demonstration, has this old place had such a thorough canvass! Never since those early days has the old temple been so filled with neighboring folk or been the scene of so much spiritual interest to them.

Elder Daniel T. Williams became plain "our Danny," and how those young folks did love to work in the lines laid down for them, and how, when physically tired and weary at the end of a day's "missionarying" the teams would greet Danny's cheery query, "Are we happy?" with the lively response,

"Of course we are!" Never did this seem so appropriate as on the opening of his sermon following the ten baptisms that were a part result of the effort. "Are we happy?" What a question, as one looked over the sea of faces lighted with smiles of appreciation, joy, holiness, thanksgiving!

Of course the young people had to do something to show their new champion and exponent of gospel "happiness" an evening of innocent fun with a musical program and "eats" and a series of cartoons by our own John Collins, depicting "Our Danny in action," from the time he went to work in the mines till the most recent date of his offering advice on the dancing question, "The straightest road to hell!—Do you like me now?"

To sum up, we believe lasting good has been accomplished. Future results will prove this. The experience to the older ones who sat by and rejoiced to see the younger generation engineer this occasion is refreshing, and to all it is like a good book well read—not to be set away on a remote shelf, but to go to again and often for the rich experiences therein. May they evoke the spirit of emulation and service in our youth and we see many going forth in like happy manner to convince the world of the gladness of Zion's message!

Kirtland Services

(From letter of J. D. Lewis to First Presidency.)

Dear Brother Smith: Our young people's services closed Sunday evening. All were loath to have Brother Williams leave. The Sunday services was a fitting climax to the series.

At 8 a. m. young peoples' prayer service; 9.30 Sunday school; 10.45 sacrament service; 3.30 p. m. preaching, subject, "The sphere of service"; 8 p. m. preaching, subject, "Why I am a Latter Day Saint." Brother Williams states that he has never met a more enthusiastic group of workers than he has found in Kirtland.

Both young and old responded nobly. The same spirit that characterized our preparatory services was in evidence throughout the entire series. Brother Williams was greatly blessed in enunciating the principles of the gospel.

Prior to the commencement of the services we selected forty-two young people and divided them into six groups, appointing a captain over each group. These groups or teams canvassed the entire township, visiting over five hundred homes, inviting everyone to attend the services and leaving a program at each home. When kindly received the captain would inquire as to whether they would like to have them sing, and in nearly every home they were met with a hearty response.

On Saturday, April 30, at 6.30 p. m., Brother Williams led six young souls into the waters of baptism, and on Sunday evening he baptized three more, a man and wife and their son. These people are held in high esteem in our community. On our return from the baptismal service Saturday evening, we immediately went to the chapel, where the young people had prepared a nice program and refreshments. Brother Williams was made the guest of honor. After remarks of appreciation, all returned to their homes feeling happy.

On Sunday evening, at the close of the evening service, about one hundred young people came to our home desirous of being with Brother Williams as long as possible. They sang the songs of Zion until a late hour, closing with "God be with you till we meet again," and invoking the blessing of the Lord upon our efforts. Brother Williams won the hearts of our young people. I would suggest that special services of this kind be held at least twice a year.

Our young people do not expect to cease with this effort, but are planning on a systematic campaign of distributing tracts and other church literature throughout the township each month.

We desire to express our gratitude to you in concurring with our request of having Brother Williams come here in the interests of our young people, as we feel great good has been accomplished.

Our Spiritual Inheritances

Sermon by Elbert A. Smith in Zion Builder Series, Lamoni, Iowa. Reported by Winsome Smith McDonald.

"Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus. To Timothy, my dearly beloved son: Grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord. I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers with pure conscience, that without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day; greatly desiring to see thee, being mindful of thy tears, that I may be filled with joy; when I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice; and I am persuaded that in thee also. Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands. For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God; who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began. But is now made manifest by the appearing of our Savior Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel."

I have read the first ten verses of the first chapter of the second epistle of Paul to Timothy. And in connection with that wish to use this, "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him."—Rome 8: 16, 17.

Importance of Material Inheritances

The importance of material inheritances has long claimed the attention of humanity. They are considered so very important that a great deal of our litigation is taken up with the question of the passage of material property. Many family quarrels result over the division of inherited property.

The matter of inheritance is directed by many and very ancient laws. The English laws go into great particulars; so did the Roman laws, and even in the most remote antiquity men had laws and rules governing the passage of property from father to son.

These things are important, yet we are reminded that all material inheritances are ephemeral. They are subject to decay, and the proverbial moth and rust, and thieves that break in and steal; they are subject to fire and destruction, and if not so subject they are at least subject to alienation. Hundreds of men who were wealthy a year ago are poor to-day because there has come a change in values.

These things are also of an external character; they are attached to the man: money to put in his pocket, a coat for his back, land under his feet, and a roof over his head—very important things but no part of the man himself; kept only by deed and aid of police.

Spiritual Inheritances

But our spiritual inheritances have to do with things that are eternal, that do not change: thoughts, doctrines, ideals, principles which are true and the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. And no man can take them from us, because our spiritual inheritance is a part of ourselves, a part of the soul.

The Apostle Paul took his inheritance to jail with him, and it made him so happy that at midnight in bonds he and Silas sang hymns and rejoiced. Bunyan took his inheritance to jail with him and wrote Pilgrim's Progress. The Puritan fathers brought their inheritance to America with them. They could not bring very much in the little sailing vessels at their command, some clothing, some seeds, a little food, some weapons, some tools; but they brought another cargo, a spiritual inheritance with them adequate for a great nation for hundreds of years.

Inheritance of Nations

The spiritual inheritance of nations seems to be the predominating thing in governing their destiny, and each has its own particular inheritance. France has her literature, her art, her political ideals that have come down from the revolution, and many other things that distinguish her from all other nations. There is only one France and it is not her geographical lines that most distinguish her from all other nations.

Great Britain has her inheritance of law and order and ideals of human liberty that distinguishes her wherever she plants her colonies. For centuries she wrested privileges from the crown and handed them to the people.

Germany had her special spiritual inheritance. She had her ideals of unremitting industry, of stolid endurance, of frugality, of extreme thoroughness, which made her very great in the industrial world, almost supreme in the scientific world, and very terrible in war; but her inheritance was mixed, and added to it were the theories that came down from the Hohenzollerns and her war lords and military essayists that brought in their train ruin for the nation.

America has a spiritual inheritance that differs from all other nations. We draw, it is true, from the religious reformers of Germany, from the political reformers of France, from the great ideals of our British forefathers, but also it was said in the blessing pronounced on Joseph's land in the book of Deuteronomy that Joseph's land should inherit the "good will of him that dwelt in the bush." (Deuteronomy 33: 16.) We understand that to mean the good will of the God who was revealed to Moses in the burning bush. When the delegates came together in Philadelphia on that memorable occasion to draft the Federal Constitution, there was an unseen delegate who did not represent any colony; and George Washington did well when he said on the opening day, "The event is in the hands of God."

Inheritance of Families

Then there is a spiritual inheritance of family; and frequently the thing that distinguishes a family from generation to generation is the ideals handed down from father to son, or from father and mother to the children, distinguishing the family infinitely more than anything inherited in the way of houses or lots or money.

Perhaps the most extraordinary illustration of that kind is found in the case of the family of Abraham who was commanded to go from his own country and land into another country where God said he would give him his inheritance. In that country he received land that was infinitely small compared with the territory of the United States; but God gave him another inheritance, spiritual, invisible, an inheritance of law, literature, and religion, that has been of the most tremendous importance in shaping the history of the world.

The fundamentals of all civil law are contained in the law Moses gave. The literature that came through the children of Israel as we have it compiled in the Bible has influenced humanity perhaps more than anything else ever written. The religious ideals, beginning with the great proclamation of the ideal of one great God, creator of all men, the great I AM, that came through Moses and continued on through the greater revelation of Jesus Christ, another Israelite, the son of David—these things constituted the inheritance of father Abraham's family. They were not given to him simply because he was a favorite, but that through him all the nations of the earth might be blessed; and to-day all are indebted to that people.

The Source of Inheritance

We might ask ourselves the source of our spiritual inheritance. Of course it occurs to our minds immediately that there are different sources, according to the nature of the inheritances. Jesus said to the Pharisees, "Ye are of your father, the Devil, who was a murderer from the beginning."—John 8:44. That is the source of the inheritance of any man who deals in hypocrisy and deceit; but on the other hand, in the text I have read to you this evening we are told, "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God; and if children, then heirs; and joint heirs with Jesus Christ."—Romans 8:16, 17. Also, "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variable-ness, neither shadow of turning."—James 1:17.

So we must remember that all good things that come to us as Latter Day Saints come from God. Yet it is true that they come to us in many instances by way of our fathers and mothers. You will notice that according to the scriptural reading of the evening in the year 65 A. D. the gospel of Jesus Christ had already passed down through three generations, from Lois the grandmother, to Eunice the mother, and then to Timothy, the young man; and no man can tell now how much of this was due to the love and prayers and the godly life of Lois the grandmother and Eunice the mother.

Timothy was a fortunate man to have two good women back of him; and if to-night, young man, there is a mother somewhere praying for you, and perhaps a godly grandmother as well, you cannot afford to ignore the spiritual inheritance that passes down to you in connection with their prayers and their example.

I do not know whether Timothy's father was like the man whose little boy said he was sure "papa would never go to heaven because he couldn't leave his business long enough." Timothy's father is not mentioned in this connection at all, but many of us as Latter Day Saints realize there is a spiritual inheritance that comes to us from our fathers as well as our mothers. It is even to-day as it was in days gone by, and if you were to call a roll of names in the church that continue on the records of the church from generation to generation you would be surprised at the number of them that are familiar in your mouths—where for generations the gospel has come down from father to son. In almost any congregation you will find a large percentage of people of that kind who have thus received the gospel as their spiritual inheritance. I wonder to-night how many there are here who have a father or a mother or grandparents who loved the gospel before them. I would like to see your hands. [Many hands were raised.] I see there are many of you; and those of you who have received the gospel, whose fathers did not receive it, have this consolation—possibly you may start a line that will run for generations to come as servants of God.

I preached at one time in the city of Nauvoo, and at the close of the meeting an old man came to me and said, "You are the fourth generation I have heard preach here in the city of Nauvoo, and you have all preached the same gospel. I heard you, I heard your father, David, your grandfather, Joseph the Martyr, and your great-grandfather, Joseph the patriarch."

Some people say that Joseph Smith started the church and kept it going that he might exploit it and grow rich. Do you know what Joseph Smith got out of it? I will tell you. He got out of it the undying hatred of many people. He got an assassin's bullet in his heart. He got six feet of ground in an unmarked grave on a hillside overlooking the Mississippi—unmarked by monument in any way, and only perhaps a dozen men know its exact location, because even yet some one might desecrate that grave if its exact location were revealed.

What did my father have to leave me? A lot in the city of Nauvoo that I had to redeem because it had been sold for taxes. What have I to leave to my children? An equity in a cottage—if we get it all paid for; and the chance to borrow money to take them through college. But I am not complaining; most missionaries' sons have to do that, and I have never wished to use my influence to get anything I did not wish the missionaries to have.

No, there is something else that has held the family to the church. There is something else that holds you to it. I want to tell you for a moment to-night my own personal experience. They say that personal testimony has a place in preaching. My father's activity in the church came to what seemed to be an untimely and tragic end early in life; and when I was five years old my mother and I were thrown upon our own resources. The church never gave us a dollar to live on, or a dollar for my education, because it did not have money to give at that time. We were compelled to go to a place where there was no branch, no Sunday school, no prayer meetings, no preaching, and in that environment I grew up. Not one of my younger early associates ever gave a rap for the gospel of Jesus Christ as we believe it. But there was something that followed me. There was a spiritual inheritance. I did not have much that my father left me. I had the Bible he preached from, the hymn book he sang from, some of the songs he wrote, some of his manuscript poems, some of his paintings; and those things I pondered, also my mother's teachings.

But that is not what I started to tell you. Early in my life, I could not have been more than six years old, I had a strange experience. I remember the circumstance. I stood on the open virgin prairie sod where apparently no man had ever plowed or sown since the dawn of time, with the sun shining on the green grass and all around me the sweet williams and phlox, and other wild flowers. Perhaps those flowers helped fix it in my mind, because I always loved flowers, especially wild flowers. Standing there, just a little boy, there came into my mind the most vivid conviction imaginable that when I grew to manhood it would fall to my lot to take up my father's work where he laid it down and carry it on. That conviction and that feeling never left my heart, never.

As the years passed by, there came a time when I found myself seated at the editorial desk in the Herald Office as associate editor of the SAINTS' HERALD, with Brother Joseph Smith. More than thirty years before that time my father sat at the editorial desk in Plano in exactly the same position. There came a time when one evening in the council chamber I found myself associated in the First Presidency as counselor to Joseph Smith. He had already become blind, and the thing that touched me most that first evening was that every few moments he would reach out his hand and put it on my knee as though to be sure I was there. Thirty years before my father sat in the same position.

You need not tell me God does not foreshadow to us our work. I have never been called upon to do an important work that it has not been foreshadowed to me by spiritual inspiration; and I am positive that there are young people here who have received a similar conviction that in days to come God has a work for them to do. Those who will heed that conviction and prepare themselves will find but happiness and joy.

Do I regret the spiritual inheritance that came to me? Never for a single moment. I would rather come here and preach these sermons for you at your invitation and have part in these services than to own all of Decatur County. This means infinitely more to me, because I am helping to educate souls for eternity.

Our Latter Day Saint Inheritances

Now what is our inheritance as Latter Day Saints? We are heirs of "the great Restoration." I dwelt on that Friday night. I do not need to speak on it to-night.

We are heirs to a system of splendid moral principles. I know some people won't believe that; but let me tell you, the church must not be judged at all by the heresies introduced in Utah. This church from its beginning has had the cleanest of moral principles.

Men were taught the purity of family life, "Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart and shall cleave unto her and none else."—Doctrine and Covenants.

Men were taught to be temperate. "Strong drink is not for man," the Book of Covenants says. Long years before prohibition was dreamed of by most other people, our church had prohibitory laws. In the early thirties, in Kirtland, Ohio, and in Far West, Missouri, and in the early forties in Nauvoo, Illinois—in all three of these places the church had laws absolutely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor, while at that time ministers of popular churches were indulging in the social glass without shame.

Our people were early taught they should be industrious: "The idler shall not eat the bread of the laborer," the Book of Covenants says.

Our people were taught to be law abiding: "He that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land."—Doctrine and Covenants.

Our people were taught to be studious. I know there has been a great deal of misunderstanding in the world and in the church as to our attitude on the question of education, but let me tell you that wherever the church went in its early days in Kirtland and Far West and Nauvoo, the first thing they did was to establish schools. The Nauvoo University was just getting on its feet when Joseph and Hyrum were killed. To-day we have in Independence the Institute of Arts and Sciences struggling along; and here in Lamoni we have Graceland College, and you are grateful for it.

We have inherited something more than a system of morals. We have inherited the pure doctrines of Jesus Christ. Moral teachings are not enough; they are not adequate. Most men find themselves sooner or later enmeshed in sin. They are compelled to say, "I would like to do good but I cannot." I believe many in the world are exactly in that condition to-day. Men have their moments of aspiration, when the good in them rises up and they want to be that which they are called to be but they cannot. God must reach down and take man by the hand and cause him to stand. He did it in the person of Jesus Christ. The instrument Jesus uses is the gospel—"it is the power of God unto salvation."

Systems of morals and ethics are no more adequate to the needs of the world to-day than talcum powder is equal to the cure of cancer. The work of the missionary is the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ. I am very glad of these revival services, and that the young people are taking an interest in the fundamental principles. While I have stood for education, I have feared at times that some of our young elders would go out with the idea that it was their business to preach sociology, psychology, philosophy, whatnot, instead of the powers and principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ that go to the root of the situation, the regeneration of man. It is our work to preach these principles, and I am profoundly glad to see how pleased the young people are to hear them.

We are heirs of the primitive New Testament church organization. We are heirs of the ancient gifts of the gospel with the power that accompanied them. I thought that preacher in Independence said well when he said, "I have been attending the meetings at the Stone Church, and the rest of us people have got to wake up because there is a power with that church, and they are holding their young people." The greatest power with the church, aside from the logical appeal of the gospel, is the Spirit of God that comes into the hearts of the people. Why, haven't I seen young men, many of whom were naturally atheistic? They were skeptical from the ground up, and as they went through the colleges and universities, they whetted their wit on the hone of logic; and they built for themselves an armor of unbelief that you could not break with a sledge hammer. But one day when they sat in a prayer service, Jesus Christ stood and looked at them, an unseen presence, and their carefully built armor fell away, and they said, "Lord, it is enough; I believe; help thou my unbelief." Have I not seen that thing? And so have you. Perhaps some of you have experienced it as well.

Did you notice Paul's statement of the things that have come to us? He says we have not been baptized by the spirit of fear. You haven't heard me preaching the terrors of hell in order to drive you people into the church. You never do hear our people preach that. He has not "baptized us with the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind." (2 Timothy 1: 7.)

There is another thing, however, that Paul mentions here. He says something about our being heirs of "gospel afflictions." I wonder if there is still affliction for us to suffer. Our fathers suffered a great deal for this gospel. Some of them laid their bones down in the soil of Missouri and some in Illinois. Well, some people are dying for the sake of the gospel to-day. Charley Lake went to the Island Mission knowing that he would never return. He had the seeds of death in his body; but he said, "I would rather go over there and die in the harness than to stay here to rust out." So his wife buried him on a lonely island, where there was not one white face upon which she could look. Clyde F. Ellis and his young wife went to the Island Mission and she died there, as much a sacrifice for the gospel as were any of the Christian martyrs; and Clyde F. Ellis, with that burden of desolation, stayed on there for some months, until we could send help, and then he got in a boat and sailed for home, leaving the bones of his wife there, for he could not even bring them with him. About a month ago I heard him say, "I would hate to go back; it would be hard; but if it is ever necessary and God ever wants me, I will go."

We aren't all of us required to lay down our lives, but sometimes we suffer affliction in another way. In the city of Toronto, we have some school-teachers who were doing their work well in the public schools; but some one happened to find out they were Latter Day Saints, so started a war on them before the board of education. The daily papers took it up, and they were advertised as followers of Brigham Young and believers in polygamy. Do you think it is any pleasure for a man to be dragged out of the seclusion of his home and thus advertised before a great city? It did not cost a cent to get all that publicity against them; but it cost us one hundred and fifty dollars to get a few inches of paid advertising in reply to clear up the case and show our true position.

You do not know when you will be called upon to suffer similar misrepresentation; but, young people, you have this consolation at least: Emerson said, "I would advise any young man who wants to develop character, to espouse an unpopular but true cause." You most certainly have the unpopular and most certainly the true cause, so all that remains for you to do is defend it and develop character. When you go out on the football field and get smashed and bruised and bumped around, you do not complain; you say it is developing your manhood and your muscle. Go out and suffer a little bit for this gospel of Jesus Christ—it will develop your character.

Last of all, we are inheritors of the great Zionie Ideal. You have named yourselves Zion Builders. You are up against the problem of the ages. We have a dual problem. We have our missionary problem first—to go out in all the world and make converts. And then the Zionie problem, to build a community that will represent the spirit and genius of the gospel, to which people may come when converted—a community in which justice and equality and righteousness prevail, in which there shall be no poverty or crime and a minimum of sickness. Men have long been striving to establish that kind of a community. There has been a never-ending desire for it. It has been a vision, but there is always one thing that defeats man's efforts.

Did you ever hear the old Russian fable of the carrot? An old woman had been so exceedingly selfish in life that she never gave a thought to anyone but herself. She died and went to hell and lay in torment for a thousand years. And then she called to the Lord and said, "Lord, it is too much. Give me some avenue of escape."

The Lord looking down said, "Can you recall any absolutely unselfish act you ever did?"

She thought a moment and said, "Lord, there was one thing a long time ago. A hungry man asked me for a carrot, and I gave it to him."

The Lord said to one of the angels, "Go and bring the carrot."

But the old lady said, "No, that was a long time ago, and the carrot is long since lost."

"No," the answer came back, "the witness of a good deed is never lost."

So the angel brought the carrot and held it away down, and she took hold of it and he began to lift her up. As he lifted her up out of hell, a great many other lost souls took hold upon her garments and her feet, until there was an endless chain being lifted up almost into heaven. Then the woman became frightened and said, "Let go! this is my carrot." When she said that, the carrot broke and they all sank back into hell.

So every time when humanity has tried to raise itself out of the hell of poverty and affliction and excessive labor that has bowed man down since the curse was placed on him, selfishness has come in and ruined it all.

We have many social schemes of reform and social re-establishment, but every one has this defect, that it proposes to build a regenerated society out of unregenerated man. It won't work. Only the gospel has the power to regenerate men. And we must build society with regenerated individuals. So, I say, we have one thing at least back of us, and it is the all-important thing, the regenerative power of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Some one says, "We are such a small people to undertake such a tremendous task!" How many people sat with Jesus Christ in the upper room when they partook of the Passover? There were twelve—and one a traitor. He laid on the loyal ones the work of evangelizing the world. Cæsar on his throne would have laughed had he seen and heard them, but the time came when they converted the emperor of Rome—though it was a sad day for the church.

Look at the people we are gathering. Then look back a few years to the time when a General Conference could have been seated in this middle row of seats; and yet those people were singing,

"Give us room that we may dwell!
Zion's children cry aloud.
See their numbers—how they swell!
How they gather, like a cloud."

They had faith. They had vision. If we have half the faith they had, what can we not accomplish in the next fifty years, with the people who are rallying to our standard? Yet, as I said the other night, "I do not look upon you people as an army." I look upon these young people as a corps of recruiting officers. They are come to be prepared for their work. They are going out after volunteers. They are to raise the army of the Lord.

In view, then, of the glory and beauty of our inheritance, should we not defend it and safeguard it? The first thing to do is to assert our claim.

If a man bears the reproach of his father's name—there is some reproach attaching to the name of Smith—he wants his father's inheritance. Mine wasn't much, but I wanted that little lot in Nauvoo and I secured the service of a good lawyer to perfect my title.

You people have a name. You can't escape from it. The world will fasten it on you. At the best they will call you Latter Day Saints, and at the worst they will call you "Mormons." They have you spotted. You can sneak around and hide if you want to, but it won't save you. You might just as well stand up and take the name of Christ and claim your inheritance and get all there is coming to us in this religious business.

I think we certainly ought to safeguard our inheritance by retaining a proper advocate. You know that the Devil is a shrewd lawyer. He talked Adam and Eve out of their estate in the Garden of Eden, and he can talk you out of your inheritance, too, if you listen to him. But we have a better advocate, "an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the Righteous." (1 John 2: 1.)

I must bring this sermon to a close. I am exceedingly well pleased with the way these young people's revivals have developed. They show to me that God is working with us. Six months ago no one thought about such a thing; these revivals just came on us like a gentle dew from heaven.

Some of the things that I have observed among the young people seem to be very encouraging. Did you hear those little boys testify this morning at prayer service? And yesterday, when I was going down the street, a little boy about eleven years old stopped me. He said, "Mr. Smith, what is your sermon subject to-morrow night?" I have had little boys stop me to ask the time of day, to ask how the ball game came out, or to borrow a match to light a cigaret, but never before did I have a little boy ask me what I was going to preach about to-morrow night.

A little later a twelve-year-old girl said to me, "Brother Smith, I have been to every meeting. I took my notebook along the first night, but I got so interested that I just sat with my mouth open all evening and never thought to take a note." I think I ought to write that down and have it framed in a golden frame and hang it over my desk, and if I ever get jealous of the superior education or attainments of other men (which I have never been), I will look at that inscription and say, "Thank God for this one thing, he helped me preach the gospel of Jesus Christ so that little children could understand it." And if that be true, there won't be one of you older people who, when you get up to the judgment seat, can say, "Brother Smith, I heard you preach in Lamoni, but I didn't know what you were talking about."

I have not hesitated to give you all I had to give. I have tried to reach your sense of reason through logic; and I have appealed to your emotion on occasions, but never have I tried to arouse an emotion in you that I did not feel myself. You cannot kindle a fire with a torch that is not itself burning. No preacher can arouse enthusiasm unless he is on fire with enthusiasm, and so all I wish you to feel, I have felt.

I have delivered the message as best I could. It is yours now. It is yours to determine what you will make of it. I know that, following these efforts, there are many filled with enthusiasm who will immediately want to be assigned some great task. And Brother Garver will not have a special task to assign to each one of you; but my advice to you young people is this: Go on with the work of preparation, and when God is ready for you he knows where you are. He knew where to find little Samuel in the dead hours of the night. He knew where to find Joseph who was sold into Egypt. He knew where to find Joseph Smith at fifteen years of age, uneducated and obscured by poverty, even under the most plebeian name man ever bore, the name of Smith. He knows where to find you.

We used to have a motto in the Student Society, the pioneer in the work of the young people. The motto was, "Get thy spindle and distaff ready and the Lord will send thee flax!" There was not a member of that society who got his spindle and distaff ready that God did not give him more flax than he could spin. Who has seen a man among us fitted, and who is at his work, but what had more tasks coming to his hand than he could possibly do? Get yourselves ready. Go on with your preparation, the training of prayer and study, and when the right moment comes, God will give you your work.

Pursuant to the reorganization of the elders' quorum in England, it has become possible for them to meet much more frequently than heretofore. The elders in the Manchester District now meet monthly on the third Sunday. They are taking up seriously the work before them, both in the church and problems in the world at large, and are open to suggestions. Their purpose is to have every elder fitted for the largest possible service to the church.

To Our Subscribers Abroad

As has been previously announced in our columns, the Saints in Canada may remit by personal check, bank draft, or send currency directly to the Herald Publishing House for any of the church periodicals, or other church publications. In remitting, send the price as published: $2.25 for the SAINTS' HERALD; $1.50 Zion's Ensign; $1.75 for the Autumn Leaves, for example. But send in your orders directly to this office.

The question has also been raised with regard to other points. In Australia the Gospel Standard is publishing regularly the subscription price of the various church publications, and all remittances and orders in Australia should be sent to the Gospel Standard Office. They will take care of forwarding them. They can thus save the Australians the present high rate of exchange.

In England arrangements have been made to send all orders with remittance to Brother Charles Fry, Saint Leonard's, 19 Amherst Park, London, N. 16. Remittances can be sent from any part of Great Britain, or for that matter, from the European Mission, and Brother Fry will take care of the order for you and save you the present high rate of exchange. All orders should be sent to him, and remittances made payable to him.

No arrangements have been made so far as affecting any other field. But remittances can be made at any of these points as indicated.

Catalog of Graceland College

The catalogue of Graceland College appeared as the May 6 issue of the Graceland Record, a weekly published by the student body during the school year.

The Graceland Junior College course is extended so that it includes now, not only a liberal arts course, and a teachers' course, but also scientific courses in preparation for work in medicine, engineering, law, commerce, and dentistry. There are also offered a public-speaking course and a secretarial course. The cultural work and preprofessional courses for the first two years differ but slightly in their general outlines. As a second factor, the preprofessional courses offer few electives; in the liberal arts course, much of the work is elective but with strict limits.

The course in religious education is strengthened. The existence of such a course does not constitute a sectarian college. Twenty-five years ago there were no credits allowed for college courses in Bible study or the study of religion. Fifteen years ago there still was very little offered even in philosophy, and comparative religion was a new subject rarely offered. But in the recent years conditions have changed, and college credits may now be received for work done in comparative religion, Bible study, the psychology of religion, and other like topics.

The extension department is being placed on a stronger foundation, including both the usual subjects, and also the religious normal training department. If one can attend Graceland in person, he should by all means do so; but those who cannot should certainly take advantage of the opportunity for extension work. In either event, address the president of Graceland College.

The register of students shows ninety-nine in the junior college, with thirty-eight in religious education and fifty-three in the academy. This means that the college department is decidedly the strongest.

Since 1915 the class each year has left some monument to its memory. This was started in 1913 by the class of 1898 donating a sundial to celebrate its fifteenth anniversary. It was hoped then that each of the earlier classes in turn

The Zionist Movement

By T. W. Williams

The English Government

On November 2, 1917, Arthur James Balfour, foreign secretary for Great Britain, wrote Lord Rothschild who was then the representative head of the Zionist Movement, as follows:

"His Majesty's Government view with favor the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of the object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country."

The Right Honorable George Barnes, M. P., and member of the War Cabinet, speaking for the British Government on July 14, 1918, said:

"The British Government proclaimed its policy of Zionism, because it believed that Zionism was identified with the policy and aims for which good men and women are struggling everywhere. That policy is the policy of the allies in this war. It is the policy to which we are pledged; it is the policy which we believe accords with the wishes of vast numbers of the Jewish people, many of whom have cast wistful eyes to Palestine as again destined to be their national home."

The French Government

On February 14, 1918, the French minister of foreign affairs, M. Stephen Pichon, in a letter to Mr. Nahum Sakolow, of the Zionist Organization, confirmed the position taken by the English Government and congratulated Mr. Sakolow on,

"the generous devotion with which you pursue the realization of the aims of your coreligionists, and of thanking you for the zeal you show in making known to them the feelings of sympathy which their aims arouse in the allied countries and especially in France."

On July 24, 1918, M. Tardieu, high commissioner of the French Republic in the United States, speaking in Paris, said:

"You know with what sympathetic interest the French Government has followed the progress of the Zionist ideal. The French Government has given proof of this interest since the spring of 1916, when the improved situation in Palestine first allowed us to consider the future. If there is any nation which can naturally understand the cause of the Jews and the Jewish ideal, surely that nation has always been the French nation."

The Italian Government

On May 9, 1918, the concurrence of the Italian Government with the British and French Governments support of Zionism, was given by the Italian ambassador, in London, as follows:

would in like manner perpetuate its memory by some memorial. The only effect so far appears to have been that the graduating class each year, beginning in 1915, has donated an immediate gift. Graceland is now completing her twenty-sixth year. The first class, that of 1898, has already presented a memorial. The classes of 1899 and 1900 will soon celebrate their 25th anniversary. They should make a point of meeting for the commencement week exercises, and presenting a suitable memorial for their class to Graceland.

The strength of a college does not lie in its building. It does reside within the spirit of its students and graduates. Graceland is proud of some of its graduates. May they continue worthy of that pride.

S. A. BURGESS.

"I have the honor to inform you that with reference to your representations His Majesty's Government is pleased to confirm the declaration already made through their representatives in Washington, the Hague, and Salonica, to the effect that they will use their best endeavors to facilitate the establishment in Palestine of a Jewish national center.

(Signed) "IMPERIALE."

United States Government

On August 31, 1918, President Woodrow Wilson, on behalf of the United States, sent the following message to Doctor Stephen Wise, for the Zionist Organization:

"I have watched with deep and sincere interest the reconstructive work which the Weizmann Commission has done in Palestine at the instance of the British Government, and I welcome an opportunity to express the satisfaction I have felt in the progress of the Zionist Movement in the United States and in the allied countries since the declaration by Mr. Balfour on behalf of the British Government's approval of the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people and his promise that the British Government would use its best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of that object."

Zionism Takes Form

The effect of the Balfour letter, coupled with hearty indorsement of the other governments, was remarkable. It was world-wide. With the Jews, what had hitherto been only a wish or desire now became a certainty. The Zionist Movement, which hitherto had been largely one of sentiment and agitation, now found opportunity for practical purpose.

Beginning of Zionism

As far back as 1862 Moses Hess wrote his book, Rom und Jerusalem. In this work he outlined the Jewish persecutions throughout the world and gave as his thesis that persecutions would continue, that therefore the Jews were likely to remain strangers wherever they dwelt. He urged that "emancipation was difficult to reconcile with Jewish national feeling," and proposed a Jewish nationality. His project received scant attention in England and America. The Jews in these countries were prosperous and not subjected to the indignities offered their less fortunate brothers in Europe and Asia.

A Living Nation

Doctor Leon Pinsker, of Odessa, published in 1882 a pamphlet, Auto-Emancipation. This was translated into Hebrew and most of the European languages. He urged the Jews to help themselves. Dealing with the exacting and cruel Russian pogroms, he said:

"Neither miracles from above, nor the kindness of Gentiles, nor the progress of nationalism would solve the Jewish problem. They could only become a living nation by beginning to live as a nation and strive for the realizations of their national aspirations."

Arthur Ginzburg, Hebrew writer and philosopher, took the position in 1889 that Palestine as a home for the Jews must also be a new moral center for spiritual inspiration and guidance. His views met with general concurrence by leading Jewish scholars.

Chovevi—Zion

A movement was organized about this time in Russia, called "Chovevi-Zion" (Lovers of Zion), which rapidly spread throughout southern Russia and thence to western Europe. The Jewish people of England responded and, led by Colonel A. E. Goldschmidt, a constitution was adopted. Its expressed objects were:

- (a) To foster the national ideal in Israel.
- (b) To promote colonization of Palestine and neighboring territories by Jews, by establishing new colonies, or assisting those already established.

(c) To diffuse the knowledge of Hebrew as a living language.

(d) To further the moral and material status of Israel.

A magazine called Palestine was edited by Doctor S. A. Hirsch. In 1892 the organization began to purchase land in Palestine. Its international action was in the hands of a central committee at Paris, a committee at Odessa, and an office at Joppa for the purchase of land and to negotiate with the Turkish authorities for facilitating Jewish colonization. By 1897 a half dozen colonies had been started and a number of buildings erected. This organization went on the rocks. It was a beginning. It paved the way for larger things.

As Old as the Dispersion

Zionism or Jewish nationalism is as old as the Dispersion. The idea of a return to Palestine has been a world-wide ideal. It has been expressed in prose and poetry. It has been couched in prayers, in supplications, among the Jews in every nation where they have been scattered. God's promises to Israel were never forgotten throughout the centuries.

In 1873 Perez Smolenskin proclaimed a civic and social nationalism, rather than religious. The title of his work was "Am olam" (an eternal people). He affirmed that the Jews were an eternal people and must keep an "eternal ideal" constantly in view. The ideal was expressed in one word, "Zion." It stood for Jewish culture, connoted the Hebrew language, and betokened the ultimate physical good—Israel as a separate nationality.

Herzl, the Genius

It was Theodor Herzl, the Jewish genius, who gave to Zionism the vivifying touch and thereby "monopolized" their hopes and ambitions. It was the Dreyfus affair in Paris which focused his attention and led to a study of the Semitic problem and gave him his cue in his now famous work, Der Juden-Staat. Speaking of his book, he said:

"My pamphlet will open a general discussion on the Jewish question." He added that the newly formed society "will then find out for the first time whether the Jews really wish to go to the promised land, and whether they ought to go there." So clearly had Herzl outlined the injustice done to his countryman that the Sultan of Turkey in May, 1896, dispatched a secret emissary, the Chevalier de Newlinsky, to Herzl, with the offer of a charter for Palestine in return for the cessation of the European press campaign against him because of the Armenian massacres. Herzl refused to be a party to such an unholy bargain. Had he so elected, he was powerless to deliver.

The Founder of Zionism

Herzl may in fact be called the founder of Modern Zionism. Others paved the way and sowed the seed. He crystallized agitation and desire into definite purpose. He gave solidarity, life, and action to an hitherto disorganized movement. He commenced the publication of Jewish State, and within ten years he was able to bring the Jewish aspirations into the sphere of practical politics.

He possessed a fascinating personality, by means of which he gathered around him all classes, embracing philosophers, students, business men, statesmen, the oppressed and dissatisfied as well as the optimist and enthusiast. His most difficult field was among the western Jews, many of whom were in easy circumstances and high positions, and who more or less were assimilated into the country where they lived. Strictly orthodox Jews stood aloof, fearing that Herzl's plan would encroach upon strictly Jewish ideals. They granted his genius but questioned his inspiration. He did not measure up to their ideas of a Messiah. It was Herzl, nevertheless, who affirmed that a return to Zion would be preceded by a return to Judaism.

First Zionist Congress

Herzl issued a call for a Zionist Congress in 1897. A Zionist Congress was held in Basel, Switzerland, in August of that year. That we have an idea of the scope and character of this congress, and the versatility of the Jewish race, let me quote from the pen of that publicist and ardent leader, Mr. Sakalof:

"I still see that odd motley gathering—rabbis and university professors, medical men and engineers, lawyers and literateurs, mathematicians, chemists, bankers, merchants, tradesmen, university students, agriculturists, bookkeepers, clerks—all professions and occupations. Orthodox Jews, moderate conservatives, Chassidim, reformers, freethinkers, Ashkenazern, Sephardim, Galician Straimlech, and Parisian top-hats, German preachers, Lithuanian rectors of Yeshiboth, capitalists and socialists, philanthropists and Bettelstudenten, from Polish plains and Swiss mountains, from Lithuanian Ghetti and Vienna 'Rings' speaking Russian, Polish, German, English, French, Italian, Spanish, Hungarian, Arabic, Dutch, Bulgarian, Serbian, Danish, Yeddish, and Hebrew. All had come there united by one will, unfurling one banner, forgetting at once all their differences, all their communities' petty questions, all their family worries, all their personal troubles; inspired by one idea, devoted to one great cause, reasoning, arguing, discussing, with a power of conviction and enthusiasm, as if this question of a home for the nation were the most personal, the most vital question to every one of them."

Max Nordau's Eloquence

The second congress was characterized by a significant address by Max Nordau. In burning and eloquent words he attacked the anti-Semitism of the Gentiles, and castigated the "rich and cultured" Jews who preferred to remain in Babylon. The fourth congress was held in London. The fifth and sixth were held in Basel, Herzl presiding at all of these gatherings.

It was the cherished wish of Herzl to influence the Sultan to grant a Jewish charter to Palestine without compromise. During 1901 he visited Constantinople twice, but his efforts were fruitless. It was at this juncture that suggestions came to abandon the Palestine idea and attempt colonization in Egypt and Uganda in Africa. Lord Cromer advocated the former scheme, and Joseph Chamberlain, then colonial secretary, the latter one. This was the first expression of sympathy by any European government. Coming from Great Britain it was enthusiastically welcomed by a section of the Zionists and by all with gratitude.

No Compromise

Doctor Herzl in a masterly address presented the proposition to the congress. He made it clear that this was in no sense an alternative to Palestine and that East Africa could not be Zion. The proposition was turned down by all the Choveva Zionists. In April, 1904, a modus vivendi was found which took cognizance of the Palestinian work of the Inner Actions Committee, and at the same time directed that a committee of inquiry be sent to Uganda. Unfortunately Doctor Herzl died quite suddenly on July 3, 1904.

The committee reported unfavorably. The "Sabbath" Congress was held in Basel, in July, 1905. Max Nordau presided. Twenty-two countries were represented. The congress declared: "The Zionist organization rejects either as an end or as a means colonizing activities outside of Palestine and its adjacent lands." This action resulted in a split, and the formation of the Zionist Territorial Organization with headquarters at Berne. The two groups or movements were known as Political Zionism and Palestinian Zionism. The former group held that it was wrong and unwise to forward colonization before full political guarantees had been secured. The Palestinian Zionists were impatient for what was called "practical" work in Palestine.

Jerusalem University

In August, 1907, the Eighty Congress was held at The Hague, under the presidency of Wolffsohn. A new constitution was adopted. At the conference of 1911 a decided movement developed to reestablish Hebrew as a living language. In September, 1913, a congress was held in Vienna. It was turbulent. The Zionists as a body were discouraged. It was a triumph, however, of practical over political Zionism. The chief feature of the congress was the adoption of a project to establish a university at Jerusalem. This for the purpose of bringing educated people to Palestine and thereby establishing friendly relations between Arabs and Hebrews and resulting in sending students throughout the world as enthusiastic Palestinian apostles.

Subsequently the Inner Actions Committee went to Copenhagen and then to New York. A Provisional Actions Committee was organized under the chairmanship of Louis D. Brandeis, Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States. His Jewish Problem and How to Solve It, proved one of the most striking Zionist pamphlets extant. He urged that Zionism is not incompatible with patriotism and that American Jews may well affirm that.

Distinct Nationality

"Jews are a distinct nationality, of which every Jew, whatever his country, his station, or shade of belief, is necessarily a member. Let us insist that the struggle for liberty shall not cease until equality of opportunity is accorded to nationalities as to individuals. Let us insist also, that full equality of opportunity cannot be obtained by Jews until we, like members of other nationalities, shall have the option of living elsewhere, or of returning to the land of our forefathers."

Zionist Program

The first Zionist Congress adopted the following program:

"Zionism strives to create for the Jewish people a home in Palestine secured by public law. The congress contemplates the following means to the attainment of this end:

"1. The promotion of suitable laws of the colonization of Palestine by Jewish agricultural and industrial workers.

"2. The organization and binding together of the whole of Jewry by means of appropriate institutions, local and international, in accordance with the laws of each country.

"3. The strengthening and fostering of Jewish national sentiment and consciousness.

"4. Preparatory steps towards obtaining government consent where necessary to the attainment of the aim of Zionism."

Democratic Organization

The Zionist organization is a democratic electoral system. All Jews become members on payment of one shekel, shilling, franc, or mark each year. Each member who pays dues for two successive years is entitled to one vote. A group of two hundred such members has the right to elect one delegate to the Zionist Congress. There is an "Inner" or "Greater Actions Committee" of not less than twenty-one and not more than sixty members. Out of this committee the congress elects an executive committee of six. The congress elects a chairman of this executive committee. He is also president of the congress and the recognized head of the organization. The members form societies in each country who are controlled by Zionist federations of not less than three thousand members. Active Zionist leaders carry on the Herzl traditions and Basel program of practical politics. The Mizrahists represent the religious element and seek to make Judaism the dominant thought. The Holland and Russian Zionists belong to the group as do also many of the Germans.

"Pig and Plough" Zionists

The others are known as the "Pig and Plough" Zionists. These are the agricultural, scientific, nonreligious Jews. Their chief adherents are students and radicals and intellectuals. There is and will be friction between these irreconcilable groups. The secularists seem to be in the majority. The religionists urge that a Jewish Palestine without Judaism is unthinkable. This cleavage is the most disturbing element in Zionism to-day.

National Fund

The Jewish National Fund was instituted in 1897 and comprehends donations and endowments, two thirds of which is devoted to the purchase of land and one third to its maintenance and cultivation. A Jewish National Fund was established in 1901 as a Limited Liability Company with control vested in the Zionist Congress. Under its memorandum only seventy-five per cent can be invested in Palestine, and the balance must be reserved in cash or realizable securities. Its bankers are the Jewish Colonial Trust, Ltd. It meets the needs of three fourths of the Jewish population of the world—six million in Russia, one million in Galacia, two hundred and fifty thousand in East London, and three million in the United States. The total Jewish population of the world approximates fifteen million.

In consequence of the war, Jews all over Europe are reduced to beggary and must emigrate or starve. The Zionist fund amounts to over twelve million francs. Up to 1914 the capital of the National Fund invested in Palestine amounted to about seven hundred and eighty thousand dollars. During 1917 the revenue exceeded two hundred thousand dollars.

The Zionist Organization has internal troubles which are ominous and threatening. We will have more to say along this line later.

The Angel of Revelation 14

By G. J. Waller

Elder G. J. Waller answers the inquiry of one of his brethren concerning Doctrine and Covenants 85: 31, and points out that though it is the same angel, the time is different.

I promised sometime ago to write you my views of the question brought up by you in your letter of November 27, with regard to the restoration of the gospel by an angel in this dispensation.

You will remember that you interpreted paragraph 31 in section 85 of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants as meaning that the fifth angel referred to in paragraph 31 was the one who restored the gospel and that said restoration would not take place until after the millennium. Your conclusion was therefore that our interpretation of verses 6 and 7 of chapter 14 of the book of Revelation was not correct.

To prove that the gospel has been restored in this dispensation as foretold in Revelation 14: 6 and 7, I will refer you to section 108, paragraph 7, Doctrine and Covenants. If you will read this paragraph you will find that it distinctly states that the Lord has sent an angel with the gospel. This angel has appeared unto some and has committed the gospel unto man so that it might be preached in all the world and that the world might be warned from the mouths of God's servants that the hour of his judgment is at hand. This settles the matter from the word of God, which says that the gospel has already been restored in this dispensation, by an angel sent from heaven.

If you will now turn to section 110, paragraph 20, you will find that it is stated there that Moroni was the angel who had restored the gospel. In section 26, paragraph 2, further information is given on the matter, and the angel Moroni is again mentioned as the one revealing the Book of Mormon, which contains the fullness of the gospel.

In the latter part of paragraph 3 of the same section in speaking of the gospel of peace, the Lord says, "which I have sent mine angels to commit unto you." These passages to which I call your attention remove all doubt as to whether or not the gospel has been restored in this dispensation by an angel, as they tell us specifically that it has.

Now about reconciling these statements with what is given in paragraph 31, of section 85, my understanding is this: that the Lord in speaking of the fifth angel as the one "who committeth the everlasting gospel" wants to let us know that this is the same angel, namely Moroni, who committed the gospel. The use of the present tense instead of the past tense is what no doubt causes the difficulty, but sometimes the present tense is used in speaking of past events, and in introducing the fifth angel the Lord simply refers to him as the would in like manner perpetuate its memory by some memorial. The only effect so far appears to have been that the one who holds the keys or has the authority to commit or restore the gospel.

In section 7 of paragraph 108 it is made clear that the angel who restores the gospel is not the one who announces directly to the world that the hour of God's judgment is come but that this is done by men to whom the gospel is committed and who are sent forth with this proclamation to the world. The hour of judgment of which these men were to warn the world is the eleventh hour, at the close of which Christ comes in judgment upon the world.

After the gospel is proclaimed, we are given to understand, in paragraph 25, section 85, that God's judgments are to be poured out upon the world. This hour of judgment precedes the millennium and is confined to this world and results in the downfall of Babylon, which event is also proclaimed by an angel. Turning again to paragraph 31 of section 85, I note that when the fifth angel sounds his trumpet that his proclamation is to be to all people, both in heaven and earth, and under the earth. The proclamation when the angel restores the gospel is confined to the nations, tongues, and people upon the earth.

The proclamation as given by the fifth angel is to reach all people both in heaven and earth and under the earth, at which time every knee is to bow and every tongue confess as they hear the sound of the trumpet, saying: "Fear God and give glory to him who sitteth upon the throne, forever and ever, for the hour of his judgment is come."

The hour of judgment here referred to is, I understand, the time spoken of in the book of Revelation, chapter 20, verses 10 to 15; the judgment referred to being the great and last judgment. This comes after the millennium and after the conflict between God's people and the forces of the Devil, as described in Revelation 20: 7 to 10.

The fifth angel, as you will notice from paragraph 32 of section 85, is followed by another angel, the sixth angel, who proclaims the downfall of the forces of evil and of Babylon, Babylon in this instance including not only spiritual wickedness upon the earth, but also "under the earth." (Section 85, paragraph 31.) When, as stated in Revelation 20: 14 and 15, "Death and Hades are thrown into the lake of fire," then the complete downfall of Satan and his power is brought about, and the downfall of Babylon is complete, as indicated in the proclamation of the sixth angel, which says, "She is fallen, is fallen."

My understanding is that the angel Moroni not only restores the gospel in this dispensation, but makes the proclamation referred to in section 85, paragraph 31, which as I have already explained is after the millennium. The angel who makes the proclamation as given in Revelation 14: 8, with regard to the downfall of Babylon, before the millennium, apparently is also to make another proclamation, and that is at the time of the great judgment day of the Lord, when the complete downfall of Babylon is to take place, this downfall extending to wickedness everywhere.

I have written the above quite hurriedly in my office and have been interrupted many times through having to answer business telephone calls, and what I have given has also been taken down by a stenographer who is not familiar with the Biblical language used in several places.

I trust, however, that I have written sufficient and set the same forth in such a way as to give you some idea of how I reconcile the paragraphs (31 and 32) in section 85, brought to my attention by you, with other passages of scripture. All truth which is God's word should harmonize, and since I joined the church I have spent much time in studying God's word and have so far not run up against anything that I have failed to harmonize to my own satisfaction.

When I was young in the church, I thought that I had found something that indicated an oversight on the part of Joseph Smith. What I refer to is found in section 2, paragraph 6, of the Doctrine and Covenants, where the Lord says that: "The knowledge of the Savior was to come to the Nephites and the Jacobites and the Josephites and the Zoramites and also to the Lamanites, the Lemuelites, and the Ishmaelites." When I read this I noticed that the descendants of Sam were not mentioned and I wondered why, for a time. On turning to the Book of Mormon, however, I found that Lehi in blessing Sam said that his children should be numbered with Nephi; this settled the question, as you will readily see.

I shall be glad to hear from you in reply to what I have written, and if I can be of any further service to you by giving additional information, I shall be pleased, if I can help you.

The Boston Religio recently celebrated "Family night" by the rendition of a play entitled, "The rise of the Reorganization," in five scenes, each participant working out his own part after reading the church history for that period.

Call for Administration

Mrs. A. G. Waggoner writes from Turin, Alberta, Canada, that she is located thirty-three miles east of Lethbridge, and twenty miles north and two miles east of Coaldale. Her mother, sixty-seven years of age, has a broken hip, and has been crippled since last June, and desires administration. She was administered to in June by Elder Burr, at Coutts, but has not had that opportunity since. She also writes that there are many of her neighbors who she believes would be interested in hearing the gospel, and that it would do good to have the difference pointed out between our church and the Mormons. Her daughter shortly after baptism was administered to, and received almost an immediate blessing, and has been entirely healed.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

This Wonderful Period

[In clearing out the editorial desk, the following clipping was found, without date or item of publication. It presents so much of truth that we are reprinting here. While the millennium is not here, we certainly look for its coming, and the past century has been the most wonderful within historical times.—EDITORS.]

There never was such a wonderful period! We never before knew so much or could do so much. We never experienced an age of equal comfort. No part of yesterday was as glorious as this hour.

The hundred years behind us are jammed and crammed with achievements that outbalance the sum total of progress since the signing of the Magna Charta.

The average mechanic enjoys luxuries that Midas, with all his wealth, could not command. The college freshman has more real information in his little finger than the erudition of the foremost scholar of the Renaissance. We have done more to put existence on a sane, logical, and definite basis than did all of our ancestors.

A mere hundred years ago even the scientist thought that the atmosphere was simply space—gas was only a smell.

The first microbe hadn't disclosed his identity.

Metchnikoff's announcement of battling hosts in every drop of human blood would have earned him a padded cell.

The best illumination George Washington could secure came from tallow dips, lighted by a spark from flint and steel.

Every piece of fabric was woven by hand.

The only horsepower was four-legged, and wore a tail.

The steamboat was still building on the ways of Fulton's brain, and the wheels of the steam engine had only moved in Stephenson's head.

It took Benjamin Franklin two weeks to send a letter from Boston and get a reply from Baltimore.

Abraham Lincoln's angular frame never reposed in a Pullman berth.

Garfield called a twenty-day "liner" an "ocean greyhound."

It is hardly a year since the father of antiseptic surgery was gathered to his fathers.

Electric light, trolley cars, bicycles, automobiles, department stores, skyscrapers, ten-cent collars, tinned salmon, airships, penny newspapers, appendicitis, and power cranes are still infant ideas.

Thirty years ago electricity had never been hitched to a wheel; gunpowder was the most powerful explosive; subways weren't considered within possibility.

"Impossibility" is now an old-fashioned word with a definition, but not a meaning. Almost every dream of the past is a reality to-day.

The magic cities and the fairy kingdoms of your grandmother aren't half so wonderful as the world in which you live.—The Cincinnati Post.

Present-Day Inventions Foregleams of Messiah's Kingdom

The above is surely not exaggeration! What thanks should be rising from all our hearts to God, the Giver of every good and perfect gift! How energetic we all should be to rightly use present blessings and opportunities for our own good, for the good of our families and neighbors—all men!

Thinking people cannot help wondering why so many blessings have been crowded into our day. There is but one answer, and remarkably few seem to realize it. Some are disposed to say that all of these blessings come as a result of another onward step of Evolution! Is this reasonable? Do we see signs of excessive wisdom in ourselves or others? How many people do any of us know personally who have ever invented any great, wonderful, or useful article of the many which go to make up our wonderful day?

Examining carefully the personality and history of individuals through whom present-day blessings come, we may well be astonished. We find that very few of them have been men of great education, and many of them are by no means great men in any sense of the word, except in the one particular of their invention. It is by no means sure that the prodigies of to-day are any more numerous than those of previous periods, but our facilities for knowing about them have increased a thousandfold.

Through the printed page the knowledge of an invention, carried before the civilized world, becomes a stimulant to others, furnishing, perhaps, a connecting link for another invention. Many of our great inventors tell us that they merely stumbled on their invention. Our successful air-brake patent, for instance, is merely the development of the cruder thought that water, hydraulic power, could be used to operate brakes. A still brighter mind caught the thought, and realized that air would serve the purpose better.

As an illustration of the fact that mental illumination may be along some one particular line, we remind our readers of "Blind Tom." He was noted for his wonderful skill in playing any tune that he might hear. He had no education; in fact, he was almost idiotic, incapable of receiving an education. But he had an ear for music which made him famous. Can we claim that we or others of our day stand so high intellectually as to be able to look down upon some of the bright minds of the past? Have we many Shakespeares, many Byrons, many Saint Pauls, many Ciceros? Have we many Solomons? or are there many who could compare with Moses?

We must look in another direction if we would rightly understand and properly appreciate the meaning of the wonderful inventions of our day. They are coming to us because we are living in the dawning of a New Dispensation! They are the foregleams of an epoch so wonderful as to be beyond our most vivid imagination. Evidently God has been gradually lifting the veil of ignorance from the eyes of human understanding. Gradually he has allowed us to see the power of steam—gradually to learn how to apply it. Later he lifted the veil in respect to electricity. Now its marvels are enlightening the world.

Shortly chemistry will be accomplishing wonders for us—no doubt making unnecessary the mining of coal. From the air that we breathe and the water that we drink, we shall doubtless shortly know how to separate the elements necessary to furnish us the light and the heat indispensable to the world's progress. Everything is getting ready for the millennium! Not only is it coming, but it is here! We are not, indeed, enjoying its full blessings yet; but what we are enjoying is a foretaste of them.

All of our hearts should be attracted more and more to the Lord in thankfulness for his wonderful mercies. More and more we should be studying his divine Word, the Bible. From it we should be coming daily to a clearer understanding of the divine character and plan. This alone will chase away our ignorance and superstition, and bring us love, joy, and peace.

The blessings of God now coming to the world will center in Christ's sacrifice at Calvary. During the past eighteen centuries his redemptive work has been the gathering of the church, and now it is to mean the blessing of all the families of the earth, as the Scriptures have promised. Yea, the

The Work of an Elders' Quorum

By John Bailey

Written by and read to the elders' quorum at Manchester, England, February 20, 1921.

There are two questions that we might ask relative to the above subject. First, "Why 'elders'?" Second, "Why 'quorum'?" And it would appear that the more we know about these questions, the better fitted we will be to carry out the object and design for which they were brought into being.

The origin of the word elder seems to be lost in antiquity, the first mention of it being found in Genesis 50:7, where Joseph called the elders of his house and the elders of Israel together on the occasion of his taking the body of his deceased father up to Canaan. No doubt it goes much farther back than this, for if we are to accept the thought that the sons of God as referred to in Genesis 6:2 meant the priesthood, then without doubt elders were among those referred to. The word elder doubtless has more than one meaning. Young's Analytical Concordance gives the following instances where this word is used: 1st. Great, translated from the word "gadol"; 2d. Old, aged, bearded, "lagen"; 3d. Great, from "rab" (Genesis 25:23: "And the elder shall serve the younger"); 4th. Gray-bearded, "sab"; 5th. Aged as to days; 6th. Greater (the older shall serve the younger); 7th. Elder, aged person, "presbuteros." Under this last we can find the references that refer to the elders as we know and understand them. Evidently there were not many young men numbered among them at one time, and even now a man is usually getting on to full manhood by the time he is ordained to occupy in this office. This to me seems to be a wise provision, because it would appear that the eldership form one of the largest, if not the largest "cog" in the wheel designed by God to bring about the accomplishment of his great purpose, even the salvation of the human race. It therefore necessarily follows that wisdom and prudence must be found in those holding the position. The world at large, even the religious portion of it, knows very little about the specific duties attaching to the office of elder, for, although the word is used repeatedly in the Bible and New Testament, yet, as far as I know, there is no mention of the duties that attach to the position. Therefore, as a church, we occupy a unique position, for in the Doctrine and Covenants (which we accept as the revealment of God's mind and will to this day and age) we get an elaborate delineation of all the duties, privileges, and prerogatives attaching to the position.

The priesthood is, we are informed, divided under two heads: the Melchisedec and Aaronic. The elder belongs to the former of these, which again is divided into two, the high priests and the elders. The high priests, the apostles, and the President of the church are elders, but all elders are not high priests. The difference would appear to be that the former have general oversight of the church, while the elder is the one to whom the church looks to maintain, build up, and look after the church in its local organizations. The elders have not the full rights of the Melchisedec priesthood but are appendages to it. However, chisedec. The Melchisedec priesthood holds the right of presidency, and has power and authority over all the offices in the church, in all ages of the world, to administer in spiritual things."—Doctrine and Covenants 104:3.

"The office of an elder comes under the priesthood of Mel-

"The power and authority of the . . . Melchisedec priesthood, is to hold the keys of all the spiritual blessings of the church; to have the privilege of receiving the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; to have the heavens open unto them; to commune with the general assembly and church of the First-born; and to enjoy the communion and presence of God the Father and Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant."—Doctrine and Covenants 104:9.

The slightest consideration of the height and depth of any one of these privileges is sufficient to make even the best of us feel the grave and solemn obligation that rests upon us; while, if we gave to this matter the due weight of regard that such a position demands, I feel confident that we would be far better qualified than we are to fulfill the duties devolving upon us. As no officer less than an elder can have these privileges, it necessarily follows that it is to him we look to take charge of the local organizations, as it seems fairly obvious that unless an elder is presiding, the full blessing of our gathering together is not accomplished. Hence we read in Doctrine and Covenants 17:9: "The elders are to conduct the meetings as they are led by the Holy Ghost." It appears to me to be unwise for any officer of the Aaronic priesthood to perform the duty of presiding when an elder is available.

Too much dignity and importance cannot be attached to the office of an elder, and we are warned not to treat lightly the things of God. We are instructed in section 17:13: "The several elders composing this Church of Christ are to meet in conference once in three months, or, from time to time," etc. While no doubt this may have special reference to our quarterly district conferences, yet it seems capable of extension and is applicable to such gatherings as our special meetings. The object of gathering together is to "confer." What about? Well, as to how best we can prosecute the work intrusted to our hands. What is this work? The salvation of the human race! Therefore, any matters coming within this category are subject matter for our discussions.

That such discussion is necessary is, I think, fairly obvious. Isolated effort is hardly likely to accomplish any great amount of work, but united effort is sure to make its influence felt. The elder stands as the representative of the church; therefore he should speak with no uncertain voice. We must, therefore, be agreed as to what is essential for bringing about the best results. We can reach this agreement only through conferring one with the other. The declaration of the word of the Lord is a most serious business; therefore, the Lord exhorts us to lay aside all levity when standing to declare the word of the Lord unto the people. (Doctrine and Covenants 85:37.) How many times are we presented with the spectacle of an elder essaying to declare the word of the Lord, when according to his own admission he has nothing to say, yet proceeds to occupy the rostrum for forty-five minutes or more?

Brethren, this ought not to be. The words of the Apostle Paul are applicable: "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of God." The Lord had a specific object in organizing this church. If the work could have been done by any other religious denomination, then this would not have been necessary. It behooves us therefore to bring out this specific object. In section 32:2 the Lord says: "Open your mouths and they shall be filled, saying, Repent, repent and prepare the way of the Lord, and make his paths straight; . . . repent and be baptized every one of you, for the remission of your sins; . . . and then cometh the baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost." "This is my gospel, . . . and upon this rock I will build my church." Again: "The elders . . . of this church shall teach the principles of my gospel which are in the Bible and Book of Mormon, in the which is the fullness of the gospel; . . . and these shall be their teachings, and they shall be directed by the Spirit; . . . and if ye receive not the Spirit ye shall not teach."—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 5.

How often do we hear sermons delivered and not one word along the lines indicated in the foregoing quotations? Speculative theories and ideas may be all right in their place, but evidently the proper place is not the pulpits of our church. The Lord knew exactly what would be required to bring about the redemption of mankind, and he so inspired his servants in past ages that they wrote and recorded the things in the books. "To the law and to the testimony" is the standard of appeal. Might we not therefore be "beating the air" or even worse, by advancing speculative theories and ideas that are outside the principles of the gospel as contained in the standard books of the church?

Let us ever remember that the obligation that rests upon us is a solemn one, and also remember that our time is short, therefore we have none to waste. "Hearken!" "Wherefore I the Lord, knowing the calamity which should come upon the inhabitants of the earth, called upon my servant Joseph Smith, jr., and spake unto him from heaven, and gave him commandments, and also gave commandments to others, that they should proclaim these things unto the world."—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 2. "Remember, brethren, those commandments have been passed on to us, and it is with us that the responsibility now rests. Hence we see the paramount importance to "organize yourselves; prepare every needful thing." "Seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study, and also by faith." "Teach one another words of wisdom."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36.

"Also, I give unto you a commandment, that ye shall continue in prayer and fasting from this time forth. And . . . [another commandment] you shall teach one another the doctrine of the kingdom; teach ye diligently . . . that you may be instructed more perfectly in theory, in principle, in doctrine, in the law of the gospel, in all things that pertain unto the kingdom of God, that is expedient for you to understand; of things both in heaven, and in earth, . . . things which have been; things which are; things which must shortly come to pass; things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and the perplexities of the nations; and the judgments which are on the land; and a knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms, that ye may be prepared in all things."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21.

What a scope! Where shall he be taught these things? We must have some kind of organization. Hence the quorum! Section 104: 41 informs us that "the duty of the president over the office of elders is to preside over ninety-six elders, and to sit in council with them, and to teach them according to the covenants."

It would appear from the foregoing that primarily the responsibility for teaching us rests upon our president. But the responsibility to learn rests upon us. The first time we find the word quorum mentioned is in section 104: 41, and there are one or two questions regarding this that demand our attention. Why the quorum? Have all the members to be present before we can transact business? Or can we have a quorum of the quorum? If so, how many to constitute the same? Do all elders by virtue of their ordination become members of the quorum? Are they amenable to the same for

Musical Institute at Joplin, Missouri

As the fourth event of its kind in the church since the organization of the Department of Music, there was successfully conducted at Joplin, Missouri, May 8, 1921, a musical institute for the benefit of the Spring River District. Although not as large as desired, there was some attendance from other branches throughout the district, and we are confident that the work done at this institute will bring its results in all the branches of this important district.

Elder A. C. Silvers presides over this district, succeeding Elder Charles Fry, now in England. Immediately upon his accession to the chief office of this district, Brother Silvers showed his desire to advance the musical work of the district, and to his efforts is due a genuine measure of the success of the institute.

This institute did not differ greatly from the other musical their conduct and deportment? Has the quorum authority to issue and withdraw licenses? The quorum having just been reorganized, it behooves us to see to it that we make good use of our opportunities. The composition of its presidency may seem strange, new and untried; but let us give our president a chance to accomplish some useful work, or in other words let us, as members of the quorum, "make good," and if we each do all in our power to forward the work of God which has been intrusted to us, we shall soon see the fruits of our labors and have joy in the harvest.

A Priest

An excellent little selection easily translated into our own terminology.

To sum up in one sentence the titles of a . . . priest:

He is a king, reigning not over unwilling subjects, but over the hearts and affections of his people.

He is a shepherd, because he leads his flock into the delicious pastures of the sacraments, and shelters them from the wolves that lie in wait for their souls.

He is a father, because he breaks the bread of life to his spiritual children, whom he has begotten in Christ Jesus through the gospel.

He is a judge, whose office is to pass sentence on self-accusing criminals.

He is a physician, because he heals their souls from the loathsome distempers of sin. . . .

The priest should be like those angels whom Jacob saw in a vision, ascending to heaven and descending therefrom on the mystical ladder. He is expected to ascend by prayer and to descend by preaching. He ascends to heaven to receive light from God; he descends to communicate that light to his hearers. He ascends to draw at the living Fountain of Divine Grace; he descends to diffuse those living waters among the faithful, that their hearts may be refreshed. He ascends to light his torch at the ever burning furnace of Divine Love; he descends to communicate the flame to the souls of his people. . . .

But the priest, like Moses, stands before God to intercede for his people, and before the people to advocate the cause of God. He not only ascends daily the altar to plead for the people and to cry out with the prophet, "Spare, O Lord, spare thy people, and give not thy inheritance to reproach"; but every Sunday he mounts the pulpit to vindicate the claims which God has on his subjects.—From The Faith of Our Fathers, by Cardinal Gibbons, pages 379, 386, 384.

institutes held at various places throughout the church. There was just as much enthusiasm, fully as much desire to advance, and the Saints of this district have just as much talent (developed or latent) as in any district of the church. The older rank of the Saints of the district have come to their present spiritual state through the same path of tribulations as have Saints everywhere else. The younger generation have just as much intelligence as the young of other sections of the church. Consequently, there is ample hope for the future musical development of this district, if intelligent direction and faithful effort is had on the part of many.

Very much of the credit of this successful institute must be given to Sister Walter W. (Nellie) Chrestensen, the chorister at Joplin, whom Elder Silvers placed in charge of the preparation for it. A busy little mother, and the wife of a church missionary, she has the full quota of tasks that usually enthrall the average housewife. Yet she labored faithfully, persistently, intelligently, although often amid discouragements. The measure of her success was ample, and her credit was great.

The program, which follows, will exhibit more as to the character of the work done than we may fittingly comment. We therefore restrict our further comments to the statement that all of the exercises were of a high spiritual order, and the Saints were strengthened in their appreciation of the place music holds in our church and our lives.

We were confident several years ago, when we began "plugging" for better and greater musical activity at our reunions, that our efforts would eventually bear fruit. Now we are beginning to see the harvest, at present small, but which in time will be abundant.

We have reports concerning two of our important districts and their preparations for musical work of a high merit for their coming reunions, and we must tell you about them. One district is in the extreme east of the country, the other in the extreme west; but both are preparing for musical work that will greatly enhance the success of their reunions.

First, the New York and Philadelphia District is stepping grandly to the fore for their first reunion. The Saints of this district have purchased a fine tract of land, about twenty miles from Philadelphia, called "Deer Park." This was at one time an amusement park which didn't "pay," and now the Saints have acquired it and will make it pay in another direction. Included in the grounds are some very useful buildings, among which is a fine pavilion seating about a thousand, which features will give the Saints of this district a most fortunately equipped reunion location. They are preparing for an epochal time in their first gathering.

Brother Albert N. Hoxie, the general director of the Department of Music, and who cares for the musical work of the district as its chorister, is preparing for a wonderful demonstration of the power of music at this reunion. Here is the "bulletin" he issued to the musical workers of the district as to their expected work:

Deer Park Reunion Bulletin

I wonder how many realized the importance of the announcement given on Saturday and Sunday, that the musical forces of this district would bring, as their special gift to the reunion, two beautiful musical offerings: "The Holy City," and "Olivet to Calvary."

Is it too much to ask you to give the next twelve Saturday nights to this preparation? When I say that over three hundred visitors wended their way to Deer Park last Sunday, let me ask you how many do you think will visit our little white-tented Camp of Israel to hear our music and sing the songs of Zion with us?

We can little realize what an important feature our music is to be in this great gathering, the first we have had in many years in this district; and if we can go, fully prepared to perform our part, I venture to predict that our valiant singing host will not only bring the harmonious strains of music into the assembly of Saints, but unity and spiritual accord as well.

Therefore, the next twelve Saturday nights and without the necessity of further announcements, we will ask everybody to kindly be on the job, to lend enthusiasm and impetus to what I consider the most important step we have ever undertaken.

What's the answer? Here am I?

Sincerely,

ALBERT N. HOXIE.

The other reunion to demonstrate the great value in musical activity is the reunion of the Northern California District, to be held at its accustomed place at Irvington, California. Sister Christiana Waller, the district chorister, has also planned for an epochal musical demonstration for her district reunion. Here is her letter of instructions to the branch choristers of this district, outlining the preparation all must engage in for the work of this reunion.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 6, 1921.

Dear Sister: My aim in writing this letter is to let you know just what had been planned for the coming reunion of the district, at Irvington, in August.

As the various departments in our church are increasing the scope of their work, we of the musical department of this district must also catch a glimpse of the grandeur and magnitude of the work that we are engaged in, and lend our talents, efforts, and time to the perfecting of the whole. We must keep active and do our best at all times, so that our effort may increase the interest of others, and be the means of contributing a little beauty, joy, radiance, and encouragement to the cause.

As our leader, Brother Albert N. Hoxie, is anxious to have all the districts have a musical festival, and as it seems difficult for us to assemble except at a reunion, I have planned something which I think will interest all music lovers. A cantata, "Hiawatha's wedding feast," by S. Coleridge Taylor, with orchestral accompaniment, is to be rendered as the main feature. I know you will all enjoy the study of this composition. It might interest you to know that a young Scotch girl just from Glasgow visiting at our home was the means of inspiring me as she related how this composition had been so beautifully rendered in Salonica by people of all nations gathered there doing their bit in the World War, while she was an ambulance driver. Immediately I caught the spirit of it, and thought how splendid it would be if our district could render it. So we find that by doing our bit from day to day, there come across our pathway those who encourage us by relating their experiences, and we are led on to higher grounds through their joy and happiness.

The following list of anthems are for our Irvington reunion: "There is an hour of hallowed peace"; "Hark, hark, my soul"; "Praise the Lord"; "Thy will be done"; "The God of Abraham praise"; "God is love"; "The wonders of thy love"; "Fight the good fight"; "Savior, when night involves the skies"; "The twenty-fourth Psalm."

The cantata, "From Olivet to Calvary," by Maunder, will be rendered at one of the Sunday morning services.

With all good wishes for the success of the work,
Yours very sincerely,
CHRISTIANA WALLER.

A Fine Pipe Organ at London, Ontario

Word comes to us in letter from Brother William Pycock, pastor of the branch at London, Ontario, that the Saints there have recently acquired a fine pipe organ for their church. The instrument has been installed and is giving excellent service. From the brief description given, we believe the Saints have an exceptional instrument and are to be congratulated on their acquisition.

We have written for full particulars and a complete description of the instrument, and we hope to be able to give a full account of this momentable acquisition to our musical assets at an early date.

Every Child Musical, Declares Music Critic

A particularly informative and brightly written little book on how to cultivate the musical sense is Putting Young America in Tune, by Henriette Weber, music critic of the Chicago Herald-Examiner. Concomitantly with the how Miss Weber emphasizes the why, impressing upon parents and educators the immeasurable advantages they can give the young lives in their charge by furnishing them with the key to the world of music.

The book deals chiefly with what can be done in the home, the average unpretentious American home, toward accomplishing this great end, and so will serve as a comfort, guide, and inspiration to that ever-growing host of mothers who realize what music is coming to mean in the everyday life of the individual and the social group and who want their children to be within its charmed circle.

Miss Weber begins with the reassuring assertion that every child is potentially musical and that the unfortunate who in later life "can't tell one tune from another" is made and not born. Several chapters are devoted to how much the wise mother can do toward feeding and developing the native musical sense in the early formative years, even if she has little or no training in the art herself. The possibilities for stimulating the feeling for rhythm, pitch, time, and harmony afforded by the sounds of nature and by little home devices will intrigue the imagination of the dullest mother.

In her discussion of music teaching, Miss Weber's verdict on the child who dislikes to practice is that he is not being taught in the right way. At the door of the fetish for mechanical exercises, the drilling of technicalities to the end that the "piece" may be perfectly "rendered," she believes many musical deaths must be laid. The new way of teaching music, she points out, subordinates these externals to cultivating the musical sense, the teacher concentrating on music rather than on notes.

An interesting chapter is devoted to the strides made in recent years in the teaching of music in the schools, especially in the matter of piano and violin classes, and band and orchestra training.

In her treatment both of school music and private lessons, Miss Weber insists that the best results can be achieved only by intelligent cooperation from parents and a linking up with music in the home.

The final chapters open up a vista of the musical development awaiting this country. Its sources are many and varied, including the ever-growing community music activities, the church, the school, the public library, the woman's club, the movie, the municipal administration. But the wellspring of all is the increasing desire for music manifest especially since the war among all classes of the people.

The May Institute Has Become History

Our "golden week," with its wealth of experiences, its visions of broader usefulness, of work yet scarcely touched, is a matter of history. Please God, it is more than that, for our eyes have seen a wonderful vision, our hearts have felt new life, which we shall carry with us in our separate fields of labor through the days and weeks and months to come. Freely we have received; freely also will we give to all about us, that they, too, may glimpse the vision of the fields of usefulness about us, white already to the harvest. Far away in the distance, heaven bends to touch the horizon of our endeavor as Women's Department workers.

What was really the best thing on the program? Let's glance at it again. Besides those mentioned in last week's column, we had the advice of an expert on the subject of dress, Miss Evelyn Hansen, of the Chicago Art Institute, who demonstrated her ideas on living models; our energetic, undaunted sister, Rosa Teir, on organization and budgets; Miss Kelley, a social service worker of Kansas City; Sister Lula Sandy, on public address; Sister Grace Krahl, also Doctor G. Leonard Harrington, along lines of social purity. From Graceland College, we had Professor C. E. Irwin, who addressed us on "Zion and the rural woman," and Professor Floyd M. McDowell, on the "Responsibility of adult to adolescent." We were glad to have with us the latter part of the week Sisters Lydia A. Wight and Vida E. Smith, who spoke especially about "girls."

More than this, there were all the department workers, and Sister Hunt, organizer in Zion, who spoke on various lines of activity. There was a concert of music, and special music numbers at other services; the presentation of Young Women's work by Orioles and Temple Builders, and the sermon Sunday morning by Apostle Paul M. Hanson on woman's work in the redemption of Zion.

Nor would we forget the automobile trip, in charge of Brother and Sister Walter W. Smith—about one hundred and fifty people in twenty-four cars visited the Girls' Parental Home, and the McCune Home for boys.

The sisters of Independence, Sister Fred Koehler in charge, with a corps of faithful and efficient helpers, served noon meals in the dining hall every day free to our institute visitors, and Friday evening the Laurel Club served a banquet.

Brother Richard Bullard presented us, as a gift from himself and other friends of the cause, two hundred fifty dollars.

Booths in the dining hall, illustrating proper and improper methods of child care, sanitation, health, etc., with their literature and posters, were veritable funds of information.

But all this does not begin to tell you of the inspiring testimonies and helpful experiences that were brought out through round table discussions. Neither does it bring to you the sound of many voices singing the songs of Zion, selected with particular care to harmonize with the principal subject of each service. And woven all in and through the services, the wise counsel, earnest appeal, sympathy, and consecrated service of our general superintendent.

Who can forget that last afternoon of good things, when Sister Anderson related a vision given her at the last General Conference held in Lamoni, wherein she saw a number of sisters, herself among them, very busily embroidering a wonderful garment of white satin? As it neared completion, a robe of marvelous beauty, it seemed to clothe the form of the President of our church, and she understood that he represented the church of Jesus Christ on earth; that the robe was the righteousness of the Saints, the haste of the sisters being due to the near approach of the Bridegroom, when the church is to put on her beautiful garments. "You should go out with renewed courage and consecration, conscious that you would not fail. Dissension and discontent and antagonism should never enter into your service in any way, and may you overcome them in the spirit of the Master. Bear with us as an executive if in any way we do not measure up to the requirements you would like to have. As sisters, we have much to do with the perfecting of the robes of the righteousness of the Saints."

And then Sister Vida's closing prayer: "We thank thee for life and the pursuit of happiness, for all the great blessings of life. But more than anything else among these, we thank thee for the blessed association of these, thy people. And we pray, O Lord, that we may profit by this association, that we may be drawn together by the love of Christ. Wilt thou grant unto us the Spirit that thou hast promised, that we may work together for the redemption of Zion. Accept our gratitude, and grant thy blessings, in Jesus' name."

You ask: What was the best? Ah, the best to me, to my neighbor here, my neighbor there, was whatever visioned to my eyes, to her eyes, the broadest aspect of our work, and sealed within my heart and hers that unselfish love and fervent consecration which characterized the service of the Master.

Makers of History

Our department historian has found a great pleasure recently in poring over the old records which contain references to the work done by women in the early days of the church. She has sent to our desk several quaint bits which we are glad to give to our readers from time to time, one of which appears in this issue. It is a report of the work done during the first year of their organization, and when we consider that American money in those days had a much greater purchasing power than it has at present, we must admit that a considerable amount of work was done. For instance, where could we to-day purchase a cow for $14? Five hundred dollars' worth of clothing and provision distributed among the needy represents a far greater amount of materials actually handled and labor done than the same sum would indicate to-day.

The little lesson, however, we wish to draw from this story from the past is that we, to-day, are also making history. Our various little groups of women everywhere are doing those things which may, in later years, come to the knowledge of other struggling groups, and will play their parts in encouraging, enlightening, and instructing. We are born into certain environment, we grow, learn, develop, spend our little day in effort, hope, achievement, and then we pass on, leaving to those to come after some heritage for good or ill as our lives may have been. Is it not well to work, then, with a thought to permanency, to doing the thing that will encourage and uplift, to expressing at all times the divinity of our souls, that force inherent within all which impels upward?

We have not time or space now to enlarge upon the thoughts which come crowding, for we wanted to say, for the benefit of the dear sisters whose contribution to our departmental work lies along the paths of history and record, that as you women of the locals plan your work, build and shape your present until it passes into the immortal past, will you not try to faithfully mirror that work in your reports and records, and send them on to our historians? Some day there may arise in our midst one whose leadings are to delve into our records and from them write the book of our achievements, drawing its lessons of truth to the surface for the good of those who come after, and molding into one beautiful whole the many diversified efforts which express to the Creator our yearnings and urgings towards him.

That each of us may do well the part possible for us in such an endeavor, let the secretary of each local, the monitor of each circle or chapter of our young girls, keep faithful record of their doings, their work and plans, their pleasure and their study, for all these things are significant to the student of history, demonstrating as they do the thought back of the activities, the motives, and the advancement made by the units which comprise the group so recorded.

Remember the most recent request made by our historian, viz, that as each local secretary makes out her quarterly report to her district organizer, she shall also send a copy of that report to the general office in Independence, Box 255, Women's Department. It will reach the historian, and from it she will be able to glean many facts important to her in her work.

May we here present a little poem to be found in our Year-book, and ask that its wide significance may sink deep into each heart, to the end that, as women of this commissioned church, we may, unitedly, build our daily lives as very temples of the Lord, dedicated to his service and glory?

Builders of the Future

To keep the heart of mankind clean and pure;
To keep my own heart, too,
Pure, kind, and true;
That is the task laid on me, and on you.
Not only for our quiet lives are we Constantly, watchfully, to be Custodians, but of that more great
Life of the world. Not some obscure, grim fate
Decides the world's fair destiny, of ours;
Our wills, our hopes, our visions are the powers
That shape our futures, and the world's as well.
Let us, then, greatly build the invisible
House of the world's soul, as we build our own;
Each thought, each act, a stone.

The first annual report of the Female Relief Society of Nauvoo; being a correct statement of the receipts and disbursements of the society from its organization, March 16, 1842, to March 16, 1843, to wit:

Shingles	7.50
Various articles of clothing, provisions, etc., etc.....	77.02

An apology is due to the members of the society for our delay in presenting this report. We would only say it was unavoidable in consequence of circumstances beyond the control of the treasurer, Mrs. E. A. Holmes; which rendered it impossible for her to make satisfactory returns at an earlier period.

We hope the ladies of the society will feel encouraged to renew their exertions knowing that the blessings of the poor are resting upon them; we feel assured from what has passed under our personal observation that many, during the inclemency of the winter, were not only relieved but preserved from famishing through their instrumentality. More has been accomplished than our most sanguine anticipations predicted, and through the assistance and blessing of God, what may we not hope for the future?

By order of the president.
ELIZA R. SNOW, Secretary.

NAUVOO, June 30, 1843.

This article from Times and Seasons, volume 4, also speaks for itself. Note what a glorious first year's work. "Labor" was not "branded" (see Eliza's poem) after all, think you? There is a difference of a few days in the dates of this organization as given by President Smith and Eliza Snow. Also there is a difference of one word in the name chosen. Our women in this era of the work are following Sister Anderson's lead in using the word female instead of ladies, when referring to this so-

The Common Fly

Article printed by the Red Cross Society.

The deadliest living thing which carries disease lives in your home and eats your own food—the house fly.

Probably the fly has been responsible for the killing of more people than all the wars of the world, and is more dangerous than any known single disease, because the fly is almost an exclusive carrier of a great many diseases. Living on filth, the fly, filth covered, comes to your home and your table to spread the germs of disease. The result is an appalling number of deaths which may be charged up directly to the fly. A single fly may kill your baby, or your husband, or your wife, or you.

This is the time of year when the fly puts in his appearance, and now is the time that the community should be organized to drive him out as far as possible and keep him out. A safer and healthier town or city will result. If the fly were many times larger, he would be hunted with guns as any other dangerous beast. Life-size, he does not appear so deadly as he really is.

Get rid of open dumping grounds in the city.

See that vacant lots are kept cut down and free from weeds.

Do not allow garbage to be stored in open containers, or disposed of in a way that will make it accessible to the fly.

Keep your houses well screened.

Use a fly swatter, and use it enough to keep the home free from those flies that get in despite screens.

Keep meat and other food in the home and the store protected with screening so that flies cannot light on it.

Watch your sewerage so that there is no open drainage. Keep barns and outhouses cleaned and frequently disinfected.

Cooperate with the rest of your neighbors in fighting the fly menace.

It is as necessary to do these things for the safety of your baby and the health of the community as it is to keep dangerous, unlabeled poison out of reach.

society of that bygone day, it being, as she says, quaint and typical of them and their language at that time.

Farm Opportunities in the Stakes

The good services of the bishopric of the Far West Stake are at the command of Saints desirous of finding better agricultural opportunities.

Our people are entitled to all the privileges and benefits of the organization which came into existence through the guiding inspiration of the latter-day work. It is with the hope that we may be able to help those who shall hereafter move into the regions round about to avoid the mistakes and disadvantages of single-handed efforts that we address this message to the Saints everywhere.

In some instances our people have become the prey of unscrupulous speculators and consciousness men whose only object is to profit by selling their holdings, and who willfully employ misrepresentation and deceit.

Each year there are an increasing number of the Saints heeding the injunction to have all things prepared before them and are moving along the lines which entitle them to the blessings and direction of divine wisdom.

The Bishopric of the Far West Stake feel that they are better able to give information concerning farm opportunities within the stake than any other person inasmuch as they have at their service an organization of competent and trustworthy judges of these matters. We are studying the field and are on the lookout for the service that we may be able to render. We have acquaintance with the men you have to deal with, and in a general way know what the conditions are in the several localities; or we can get specific information through sources with which we are acquainted on short notice.

Of course, one cannot hope to buy an improved farm that has the buildings and fences all prearranged to his special tastes; but one who is not too particular and who is in a position to act when opportunities are presented may be able to purchase at very reasonable prices farms in the finest agricultural region in the United States.

These opportunities come and go. We cannot control them. One must act quickly to profit by them. Good farms are procurable at fair prices at all times. Use the machinery created for your service when you have need.

We are at your service. We will give all the information available and render such assistance as the circumstances of our work will allow. We would like to have some confirmation of the character of those who wish to locate. To have friends, we must be friends; some personal tastes must be sacrificed to others' feelings. A hearty welcome awaits those whose companionships are desirable.

Anyone who is able and wishes to locate under favoring conditions should get in touch with the Bishopric of the Far West Stake.

Address:

BISHOP J. A. KOEHLER,
517 North Twenty-second Street,
SAINT JOSEPH, MISSOURI.

From Denver, Colorado

At last the weather seems to have settled down to real spring. The season up to the last few days has been very freakish, cold, and dreary, with frequent frost. Most of the fruit is killed.

Last year the city council passed a daylight-saving ordinance to which all the churches conformed, ours with the others. This spring when the ordinance was put into effect, there was so much objection to it, on account of none of the surrounding country having the same time, that the mayor concluded to put the matter up to the voters for their decision, and last Tuesday at the city election the ordinance was repealed by a two to one vote, and we are again happy.

Yesterday morning, Colonel Hutchinson of the Boy Scout movement gave us a talk which was appreciated by all who heard him, and many of us have a better understanding of this movement than heretofore. He paid a high compliment to our scout teacher, Brother Floyd M. McDowell.

We are anxiously waiting the coming of our new district president, Brother Wixom.

Sister Louisa Fishburn, district Sunday school superintendent, is making a tour of the district in the interest of that department.

Brother Said has at last left the hospital, and we are hopeful he may soon be able to return to his home and the ministry. He has suffered long and borne it with patience. May God continue to bless is our earnest prayer. S.

North Dakota

The work in this State has grown considerably in the last nineteen years, or since we became acquainted with the work here. Many have moved Zionward, but many still remain.

This time of year we are looking forward in fond anticipation to our annual reunion which this year is to be held in Denbigh, on the main line of the Great Northern, commencing July 1.

The fast trains do not stop at Denbigh, but those coming on such trains will notify Thomas Leitch or the writer ahead of time, so we can meet you at Towner and convey by auto.

By a recent letter from Brother Leitch, he quotes from a letter from the Presidency, stating that Brethren F. A. Smith and M. A. McConley will be at our reunion, and in addition we expect Brother Swen Swenson, a former missionary to Dakota, William Sparling, and J. E. Wildermuth, our missionary, to be with us. We expect to have a good reunion with the Lord's help, so you had better plan to come and help make it such.

As I write, we are having a heavy downpour of rain which is more than welcome to this thirsty land, for of late years we have had very little moisture. This continued downpour has thoroughly soaked the ground. WARREN MCELWAIN.

Far West Stake

The Sunday school and Religio institute provided for in April did not materialize; an unusually heavy snowstorm made it impossible for Brethren McDowell and Carmichael of Lamoni, and others, to attend. We shall have the institute some time in the fall season.

The fifth musical institute of the stake was held with the First Saint Joseph Branch, May 14 and 15, A. H. Mills in charge. It was a decided success and helped the cause of music in the stake. The reception by the First Choir, the Sunday morning prayer meeting, rich in the blessing of God, the round table, the anthems, solos, orchestra renditions, and other numbers, with the general spirit of interest and good will, were all features of this commendable gathering.

Those who "worked up" this institute deserve special mention—Brother Mills and Sisters Elma Scott, M. E. Dobson, and Edna Christiansen. Cool weather prevented larger outside representation. Cameron did quite well. Music as a power for good in church services will doubtless be more highly developed in all branches, city and rural.

We deeply regret the death of Brother A. C. Jensen, sr., and daughter Emma (Sister Hansen), of the Bedison Branch. Both were active workers. Brother Jensen's home was the center of our work in that region, his family and sons' families forming the bulk of the membership. The deaths of these dear people are a distinct loss to many.

It is not too late to say also that in the recent untimely death of Brother George W. Best, of Saint Joseph, the church lost a worthy servant and its people a very helpful brother. He was a member of the high council, and an old resident of the city. Unusually sociable by nature, he made many friends to our cause. It was always his habit to present its merits to his many acquaintances. He was stricken suddenly, being run down by a switching engine. His widow and daughter survive him.

Brother J. W. Roberts has just closed a series of services in the Third Saint Joseph Branch. He moves on into other continuous service.

Brother V. M. Goodrich began a special meeting at Trenton, May 22. The purpose is to strengthen our cause and to hold what the services of Brethren Proffit, Rogers, White, and others have built there. We hope to secure appointment of a man to fill the vacancy caused by reappointment of Brother Keith Rogers and wife to Arizona, to meet an emergency there.

Bishop Koehler is meeting with the Order of Bishops at Independence. The consultations by the bishops and counselors touch items of vital consequence affecting financial, social, and economical developments of the body.

May we say that the recent sessions of the Women's Department institute at Independence were interesting and noteworthy. The programs, which featured the various departments of women's work, were very competently arranged and executed. We consider this among the best institutes held by the church in recent years. Absence of General Conference permitted concentration upon special lines. Intellectual comprehension, clearness in presentation, power to assimilate and make practicable were in evidence. It is deeply gratifying to note growing and widely disseminating efficiency in evidence among our women. It is noticeable that the devotional features connected with our church services are leading to practical doing, based upon clear-cut study and intelligent solution of practical problems. On numerous occasions we have been deeply impressed by the unfolding powers of the church. This institute gave a clearer insight into the rich endowment of our nature and the great variety of features by which it may be enriched under the divine direction. Some of our stake representatives were present—more should have been—and we have good reason to look for this department to loom up in Far West. Organization and work are already in evidence.

Brother H. O. Smith has been taken from the stake by reappointment to the Northwest. Brother R. D. Weaver will conduct a young people's meeting covering a period of about three weeks in an adjoining district. Demands are very heavy; workers are few. Some of our local brethren have promised to help outside of their branches. This is as it should be; there is great need for well-equipped, earnest men in the local ministry. We have some and must have more.

While engaged in general service at Independence, the stake president devotes week-ends to service at various points in the stake. He was with the Delano Branch May 22. He will alternate with Brother E. F. Robertson in the city work. This will permit both to visit various branches.

Stake reunion at Stewartsville, August 19 to 28. Prices of tents, etc., given as soon as items are available. Prepare to come. Don't forget the rule to have tents up and everybody ready for the opening session. Promptness promotes success. It is desired the branch workers bring their texts and be prepared for institute and other programs designed to develop our local branch workers in harmony with progressive movements in the general church. Department work, for children, young people, for all will be provided.

It should be understood that it is not necessary to reside in the very largest centers of the church to insure intellectual and spiritual development. One may or may not be useful and advance, even in the larger branches. Demands for service and opportunity to work are always in evidence in the moderately sized branches. The general progressive program of the church is designed for all, having in view the growth of all the people. All depends upon the interest and activity of the member himself. If any member of the body, anywhere, will study and work according to the progressive program now being extended for all he will find himself fairly abreast of the general forward steps of the church.

The Saint Louis Bulletin states that ten have been recently baptized in the font there.

Eastern Montana Battling On

Four successive years of crop failure, yet they intend to hold a reunion and reach their friends with the gospel.

We do not see many letters from this district, but we are alive and trying to promulgate the gospel work in this part of Joseph's land, though we labor under trying conditions.

Owing to crop failures the last four years, the Saints of the district have many of them been unable to help in the gospel work as they should have liked to do, and they are so scattered that long distances must be covered when anything is done, thus making the expense greater. We were unable to hold our annual reunion last year for this reason, but this year the conference decided to hold a conference and reunion July 1 to 10.

Since the system of enrolling scattered Saints upon the nonresident book has been established, we have gotten the names of many Saints of whom we did not know. We have been glad to hear from them and believe there will be many new openings made for the preaching of the gospel in this district by their efforts.

To those who plan to attend conference and reunion this year, we suggest that it will be to your interest to write the committee regarding tents and board, and if possible to bring anything such as vegetables, it will be credited toward board, etc.

Elder Page will be in charge of the store from which the groceries will be sold at cost to those wishing to live on the grounds.

Let us all try to make this reunion a success by our attendance. What a time of rejoicing it will be to those who have not been to a gathering of God's people for years, to meet in a prayer service and feel the same spirit they felt long ago, and feel the assurance that God is still watching over his people and admonishing them to move onward and upward toward the redemption of Zion and the gathering of his people. We will return to our homes feeling that a great event has taken place in our lives—one long to be remembered.

Since coming to Glasgow the gospel has been preached here by the elders continually. We have a Sunday school and Religio, and a branch was organized over a year ago. Elders Bronson and Page, assisted by Brother Joseph Sandige, a priest, have been holding a series of meetings for some time with fair attendance, and no one going from thence can say that our position has not been made plain to them. We feel that there are some here who will have the courage of their convictions and step forward and accept the gospel of Christ.

Let us have reports from branch officers without fail a few days before July 1. Ever praying for the welfare of the Saints, especially those scattered in this district,

EARL WILCOX,

Secretary of District and Reunion Committee.

Where Are the Lost Tribes?

This brother believes it a pleasant diversion to speculate, but offers the suggestion that we could find more important topics.

I have been reading several articles speculating as to the whereabouts of the lost tribes of Israel. Much has been written by different men on this disputed subject. It seems to be quite human to speculate on things that seem not clear to us. And there are so many people who see only the cold letter in the scriptures, so that they forget the inner meaning entirely.

I remember a few years ago, when a gentleman by name of Dalton, then living in Utah, had a book printed in which he makes the statement that this earth is connected with another smaller globe, or rather with two globes, one in the north, and one in the south. The one in the north is the abode of the lost tribes. He goes into detail as to the mammoth animals that were a few years ago found embedded in the ice in Siberia. It is altogether an interesting book.

A friend a few years ago gave me a book to read, called The Smoky God. This is an intensely interesting account of a Norwegian who, with his father, was whaling in the north and was drawn into a vortex, and taken out of his course, until they finally landed in a country extending through the entire earth. I must confess this book was so interesting that I could not rest until I had finished it. I saw a copy of it in a bookstore in Los Angeles not long ago.

Then we have the revelation by Joseph Smith, wherein he speaks of the ice melting and a highway being established over the sea. While every man has the right to his own opinion, yet we invariably find that much valuable time is lost in useless speculation, and the point in question is as obscured as ever. The best thing for us all to do is to keep on earth with both feet and not to cross bridges until we get to them. Let us do our duty every day, and the future will take care of itself. For myself, I am content to wait until the lost tribes get here. I can then ask them where they have been all this time.

But there is an unexplored country which fairly beckons us to come and speculate to our heart's content, and that is ourselves. Man, know thyself, was the cry of the ancient Greeks. What do we know about our possibilities, and our destiny? Do we know what to eat and what to drink and when to work and to what part in life we are adapted? What do we know of the chemistry of our bodies? And how far have we delved into our spiritual possibilities? To me, the discussion as to the whereabouts of the lost tribes is like the learning of so many dead languages; you cannot use the belief gained. Let us study ourselves first and it will take us a lifetime. Above all, let us study the plans of life, as laid down by the great Jesus: love thy neighbor as thyself. This is the hardest of all tasks, but it can be done.

Your brother in the search for truth,
JOHN F. RABE.

Massachusetts Ministerial Conference

An annual affair productive of much good to many more than the ministry who attend.

The twelfth ministerial conference of the Massachusetts District was held under the auspices of the quorum of elders of the Eastern Mission, at Attleboro, Massachusetts, April 30 and May 1. The subject was "The kingdom of God," and the thoughts gleaned, the impressions made, and the beautiful Spirit of the Master which pervaded the gathering of God's servants and handmaids will long be retained, and the good done cannot be estimated. All of the good things which were said cannot be told, but suffice us to say that great interest was shown and it was evidenced that a study of the subjects presented will be continued by the priesthood.

The spirit of the occasion was greatly enhanced by the pleasant surroundings, which showed the zeal and united spirit of the Attleboro Saints. Their church has been newly decorated throughout and a new lighting system installed, with a new enlarged choir section. One of the special features was the fine singing of the Attleboro choir.

Elder W. A. Sinclair was chosen to preside, assisted by Patriarchs John Smith and Richard Baldwin, Elders George Robley, and Edmund J. Gleazer. Secretary, Elder H. W. Howlett; chorister, John P. Pilling; organist and press committee, Earle Bradshaw.

The first speaker was Brother Sinclair, on "What constitutes the kingdom of God?" John Smith, formerly of Lamoni, Iowa, spoke on "What constitutes the church of God?"

Sunday morning the priesthood met in quorum capacity, there being twelve elders, six priests, five teachers, and six deacons present. There were three baptisms. At the sacrament service the Lord spoke to us three times by the spirit of prophecy, including a message to Brother Richard Baldwin, who is to part from us soon for his mission in the British Isles. Brother Baldwin addressed us on, "How shall I become a member of the kingdom of God?" Elder Gleazer's subject was, "What is required of the members of the kingdom of God?" The closing sermon was by Elder John Suttill, his subject being, "The rise of the church of God in our day."

The accompanying anthems of the choir in all the services were greatly appreciated.

TAYLORVILLE, ILLINOIS, May 2, 1921.

Editors Herald: The Central Illinois Saints will be glad to know we are to hold a reunion at the Beautiful Manners Park, just at the edge of town in Taylorville, on August 26 to September 4. Those expecting to camp should get their names into the hands of the local solicitor.

We are to be congratulated on getting such a beautiful park in which to hold our reunion. We extend an invitation to our sister districts to help us make this a reunion that will go down in the history of the Reorganization as one of the best. We are in line for some of the very best help as speakers. We expect an apostle, a bishop, and a patriarch, as well as other good men, of our own forces.

We are planning on Lincoln Day to go en masse to visit the monument of that wonderful man.

The park has all modern equipment for making it an ideal place, gas, electric lights, plenty of shade, and water for bathing near by.

Marshall T. Jamison, of Springfield, is the tent man. We want all our members to begin now to arrange for this spiritual gathering. We shall advertise one fast day for the good of the reunion. M. R. Shoemaker, of Beardstown, is district president, and will be glad to help you in any difficult problems. Trusting we may meet you at the reunion,

C. E. HARPE, for Publicity Department.

Bishop Fry Has Recovered

President E. A. Smith: Since my last letter to you I have journeyed into the shadow vale where my feet approached the dark river into which they would have stepped except for the Lord's interposing hand which lifted me up and set me again in the field of service.

The illness of which I made mention rapidly developed into a most serious condition, before which the physician stood helpless. A specialist was called in consultation and the decree issued that an immediate operation was the only hope of saving life, but this I vetoed until our appeal for divine aid should be fully and fairly made.

Brother J. A. Gillen, in answer to our call, journeyed all night from the north, reaching me Sunday morning, April 17, and his prayers were intense appeals for the Lord to stretch forth his hand and heal. That afternoon the priesthood met in regular session (I had been appointed to address them) and came to my room where earnest prayers were offered up, followed by administration, at which time I was conscious of a distinct change in my condition, since which time recovery has continued without relapse.

The physician fully agreed with me that a power higher than man's had brought me out of the danger. I acknowledge the goodness and mercy of our heavenly Father, not forgetting the earnest efforts, faith, and prayers of the several brethren by whom I was borne and upheld before him for his blessing. Brother D. B. Sorden stood by me as a brother day and night, and Sister Sorden also did a noble part, so that I lacked nothing. I am just beginning to be about the house and was permitted to go out into the sunshine for the first time to-day. I am already looking after office work with Sister Pearl Crick's assistance, and expect to be in full service soon.

The brethren of the ministry are all busy. A general coal strike in its third week shows no signs of settlement, and the wheels of progress as well as of industry are gradually stopping. More trains are being taken off each day, factories are closing down, and coal is being doled out by the pound to private families, while starvation is now facing thousands of women and children, until great appeals are appearing in the papers for donations to save them. Appeals for help to our office from our own members are increasing, and we know not yet how we shall be able to meet them all. The evils which are falling upon the world come by man's own hand; they are his own doings. Zion must arise and show by example how men can live in peace and prosperity.

With sincere regards for all Saints in the homeland,

CHARLES FRY.

SAINT LEONARD'S, LONDON, April 29, 1921.

AMHERSTBURG, ONTARIO, May 17, 1921.

Editors Herald: Amherstburg is still on the map as a branch of the church, and we are still trying to spread the gospel by means of tracts and right living that the honest in heart may hear and believe. Brother Stanley Gower was recently baptized into the fold by Brother Carl Nicholson, and as he is leaving on May 28 for his native home in Morecombe, Yorkshire, England, we ask on his behalf an interest by the Saints of that part that he may be helped and strengthened to let his light shine in his home district.

On May 11, Brother Roy Jones was ordained to the office of deacon, and Brother A. Airriess to the office of priest, under the hands of the president of the branch, Elder J. L. Fryer.

On Sunday, the 15th, we greatly appreciated a visit from the district president, Elder Larkey, who spoke to the Saints with great liberty and to their profit morning and evening, devoting the afternoon to priesthood meeting.

We were encouraged and strengthened to live as one of old said: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

WEIMER, ARKANSAS, May 23, 1921.

Editors Herald: A few words from the good old State of Arkansas. We met in Fisher on the 13th for district conference. We had a good attendance and fine interest. The interest of the Sunday school was taken up by Miss Lara Emde who is a faithful worker in that line. The reports show the Sunday school work is building up in this district, as well as the gospel work. Four were baptized on the 15th. Brother J. T. Riley and myself continued meeting the following week. Two more were baptized on the 19th and one more on the 22d.

I came to this place to preach a few sermons. Brother A. Ziegenhorn, of Fisher, has been preaching here once a month for quite a while. He is a fine young preacher, liked by everybody, and we anticipate a fine work for him. The Saints of Fisher did their part well in caring for all the visitors, and on Sunday spread a bounteous dinner which fed about two hundred people. Many good people are coming into the church in this country. So may the Lord bless his work.

E. A. ERWIN.

YALE, OKLAHOMA, May 20, 1921.

Editors Herald: The work is progressing here, not by leaps and bounds, but slowly it is moving along, and we look forward to the time when many will accept the gospel. We have about sixty enrolled in our Sunday school, of which we are very proud.

Less than a year ago we were holding services in the homes of the Saints and could hardly get a place for an elder to preach when one happened along.

The Lord inspired us to build a church of our own; we went to work in faith, and in less than six months had our church and are now out of debt.

I was ordained to the priesthood in September, 1920, at the Red Rock reunion, and since that time have been very busy. I am president, in charge of the group of Saints here, and can say that I am doing what I can for the betterment of the work. I preach on Sunday nights when there is no elder present, and it is very seldom we can get one in here. I have more calls for preaching than I can fill.

I am now preaching every Thursday night at Fairview Schoolhouse, between Oilton and Drumright. Brother and Sister Nagel, also a young Sister Sanders, live there. Brother Nagel, his two young sons, and Sister Sanders were baptized at the Red Rock reunion by Brother Walter Chrestensen. Since preaching four sermons at the above mentioned place, I have baptized a Sister Irwin and her little boy.

When I was over the last time, I preached on "The divinity of the Book of Mormon." There was a Baptist minister and a Pentecostal minister present. The Baptist preacher was holding a revival, and he had to give way on account of my appointment. When I announced my meeting for the following Thursday night, he arose and said that he thought I ought to stay at home and let some one preach that would preach out of the Bible and not out of the Book of Mormon. I said, "That is all right, brother, but I was not preaching out of the Book of Mormon. I only quoted you some passages from the Bible proving there was a book to come forth, and the fact that you do not believe it, does not make it false. What are you going to do with all the prophecies before your eyes? If you can prove that the Book of Mormon is not true, come on with your proof."

Then the Pentecostal preacher got up and said that he thought I should stay at home and let the Baptist brother preach all the week. One of our sisters spoke up and said, "Leave it to a vote." There were about sixty people present and only eight of our own faith. We left it to a vote and every hand went up for me to come back and preach. Then I said, "All in favor of this brother preaching all week and me staying at home, make it known by the uplifted hand," and not a hand went up. I announced meeting for the next Thursday night.

I believe there are honest people there who want the truth. The time has passed when the people will look upon us as impostors if we present the truth in a friendly way. The time has arrived when the Lord has set his hand again the second time to recover Israel, and the honest in heart are being gathered in. Pray for me that I may ever be faithful and retain the Spirit of the Master in presenting this gospel.

W. A. SLOVER.

More News From Philadelphia

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, First Branch reports as a result of a nine weeks drive by the Sunday school an increased enrollment of nearly one hundred per cent, and attendance three times as great as before. During the nine weeks 649 different persons attended, 300 of whom had had no previous connection with our work.—EDITORS.]

The First Philadelphia Sunday school is enjoying a period of development and prosperity such as has never before been experienced in the history of the organization.

Early in the year, the superintendency resolved that the attendance and membership were hardly befitting a school with such unlimited possibilities. As a result, four months later, the membership is nearly doubled, the attendance tripled, and the enthusiasm still running high, with the sky the limit. The story of how much things were made possible is indeed an interesting tale and may prove helpful to other Sunday schools who feel they are in a "rut," so to speak, and need some reviving influence. For the benefit of those who desire to construct a Sunday school of greater proportions, let us suggest the employment of the following material:

1. A leader of the type of Albert N. Hoxie.
2. Two sets of twins, preferably of the opposite sex, but with an inexhaustible supply of "pep" and ingenuity.
3. A commodious building, or buildings (you may need them).
4. A good supply of cards, stationery, etc., with some one of your number capable of manipulating them properly.
5. A Sunday school, as a nucleus (however small), but with a membership divisible by two.

With this material a "Red and Blue Contest" was launched in Philadelphia January 31. The Sunday previous the school had been divided into two teams of equal numbers, designated as the Red and Blue. Captains Le Roy and Alonza Stone were appointed leaders of the Red side, and Captains Sadie and Ella Cameron were appointed leaders of the Blue side. Under the leadership of these four twins, the school set itself to the task of building up its depleted forces. At the outset it was agreed that the losing team should treat the winning team to ice cream and cake, and the winning team would reward the losers with a humble spread of crackers and cheese.

A scale of credits was designed so that, for every visitor brought to Sunday school, the person instrumental in bringing him secured five points for his team, and when the visitor had attended either five Sundays of the nine over which the contest extended, or four consecutive Sundays, twenty-five additional points were credited to the team. In addition to this, two points were given each member every Sunday he attended, and also two credits for punctuality.

It is not difficult, however, to be on time in our Sunday school, as the orchestra commences its overtures promptly at nine o'clock, one half hour before the opening of the session, and it is indeed enjoyable to be favored with the wonderful music which Brother Hoxie brings forth from the little company of fellows, consisting of James Hockman, Walter Panting, Louis Hamilton, Ernest Foster, Elmer Merz, and our organist, David Weissen.

It is scarcely believable that, despite the weather conditions, which most surely were not of the best at that season of the year, in the period of nine weeks a total of 13,122 points was accumulated by the teams, and of these, 3,143 (23.95 per cent) were earned by twelve persons whose names are deserving of mention: Charles Thumm, 420; Sadie Cameron, 373; Florence Greenwood, 351; Ella Cameron, 299; Esther Wilson, 244; Edna Starzman, 227; Jennie Casson, 220; Robert Davenport, 199; Paul Rhinehardt, 195; Herman Thomas, 185; Ruth Seivers, 165; Hazel Weinberger, 165.

The Red side finished with a total of 6,429 points and the Blue side with 6,693, or a difference of 264, demonstrating the energy which both teams exerted. The contest was instrumental in enrolling 85 new members, so that at its close the membership numbered 319 as against 234 at the start. The enthusiasm exerted such an influence over the further development of the school, however, that at the present date the membership very closely approaches 400.

In the same spirit which prevailed among their ranks during the nine weeks of friendly rivalry, the Red side prepared a feast of ice cream and cake for the Blues, and the Blue team supplied the Reds fresh crackers and the finest of cheese, in addition to which an entertaining sketch was rendered by the "Miles of Smiles Club."

One of the very gratifying features of the contest was the exceedingly large attendance which characterized each session. The average was 300, and at the service on Easter Sunday, the last day of the contest, the attendance reached 437. During the nine weeks there were no less than 649 different persons who attended our school, about 300 of whom had had no previous connection with our work. It will be a source of great wonderment, therefore, if the results of the contest are not reflected in an increased branch membership.

The Commoner states that wheat prices differ 100 per cent from the wholesaler and retailer, quoting the Chicago Tribune. Many articles have been written concerning the retailers of late, and the slight decrease made by them in prices, compared with the heavy decline in retail prices.

A writer in The Christian, published in London, England, asks why, in the labor crisis, England did not seek God's help on bended knee. In the days when Germany appeared to be gaining, during the late war, it states the king called the nation to prayer, and the tide was turned.

A School-Teacher in Toronto

[The school board of Toronto appointed B. H. Hewitt to the regular staff of teachers. The following letter shows the result of prayerful, consistent effort, and also the fair view evidenced by the Toronto school board. When they received the proper evidence they acted fairly upon it.—EDITORS.]

The appointment of Brother B. H. Hewitt to the regular teaching staff in the Toronto public schools is a moral victory, for it proves that one with God is in the majority. This appointment has come after a long, hard fight, and the results will reflect throughout the Dominion of Canada.

Brother Hewitt, after having served six months on the occasional staff of teachers in the public schools of Toronto, applied for his appointment to the regular staff, and, in making out his application, signed his religion (because of lack of space) as that of a Latter Day Saint.

When his application came up before the management committee of the board of education, they immediately confused the brother as a member of the Utah church and branded him as a Mormon, and the committee refused to pass his application, referring it back to the chief inspector for further information. Some of the members of the board of education, having been through Utah, volunteered the information that they had seen with their own eyes the name of Latter Day Saint on the temple at Utah, and, not knowing there was a difference between that faction and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, immediately vouchsafed the information that they were one and the same organization.

One of this board of management committee is a reporter on one of the local papers. This paper came out with an editorial headed, "No place for Mormons on a public school staff" (Evening Telegram, February 10, 1921). Being publicity agent for Toronto, I immediately went down and interviewed this Mr. Wemp, who is the reporter for the Telegram and also a member of the board of education. During my interview with Mr. Wemp, the chief editor of the paper came out and, after having been introduced, declared with a loud voice that Mormons might be good people, but that the public was averse to having their children taught by one.

Having put the evidence before these two persons of the fact that the brother was not a Mormon we left, and that evening another editorial appeared against us.

At a consultation of the president of the branch and the city missionary, we decided to combat the attack with publicity, and accordingly inserted advertisements in the Telegram, Star, and Toronto World, amounting to over one thousand lines, in which we offered one thousand dollars reward to anyone who could in any way connect the Reorganized Church, to which B. H. Hewitt belonged, with the church at Salt Lake City, Utah. Needless to say, there was not an acceptance of our offer.

Unmolested these advertisements would have gone far towards producing the desired results, but the enemy was active in this city.

The trustees were each and every one interviewed in their homes or offices, or anywhere they could be found, and the truth of our belief was set before them. In every instance it was found that the trustees had been supplied with the book published by the late R. C. Evans, entitled, Why I Left the Latter Day Saints. You can imagine how this act by some of the so-called Christian Brotherhood increased our labor tenfold. However, we continued to supply literature to combat the effects of this evil. We secured the facsimile of a letter sent from the office of the United States Embassy in London, showing clearly that the fact that there is no connection between the Utah church and us is recognized in both Washington and London.

Notwithstanding this, at the next meeting of the management committee, two weeks later, they refused to appoint the brother, even though the chief inspector had returned the verdict that he had examined the teacher and could find nothing wrong with his qualifications nor anything objectionable in the teachings of the church of which he was a member. They again referred him back. After this came a tirade of abusive editorials from the Telegram.

There was also a letter which had the appearance of having been solicited from Nephi Jensen (the elder in charge of the Mormon Church in Toronto), in which he defends the brother in question and sets forth his views as to why a Mormon should be eligible to teach the same as any other denomination and tries to make it appear that the brother he is defending is a member of the same faith as his.

Another angle to fight against. We tried to answer this letter, which took up two columns of the Telegram, but could not get as much as one line of free advertising space in which to reply.

Bishop I. A. Smith had visited Toronto, bringing with him some cuts, also the information that the general church would stand back of us and would help us bring this battle to a successful termination. Fortified with this information, we again went to press in the same papers as heretofore mentioned and used over 650 lines, occupying two columns, nearly the full length of a page, in all three newspapers.

In these articles we used the cut from the Embassy office, also an extract from the minutes of a meeting of the London, Ontario, Presbytery, in which they clearly state that they recognize the fact that there is no connection between the church in Utah and the Reorganized Church.

I was privileged to attend the meeting of this board the next day. There was a deputation of three from the church, and the spokesman, Bishop A. F. McLean, was granted five minutes in which to set forth the difference between the two churches. At the conclusion of his remarks, Trustee (Reverend) Powell, arose and said, "The church which you represent does not sanction or practice polygamy?" Bishop McLean answered, "It does not." The deputation withdrew but I stayed, being seated in a different part of the room, and when the appointments came up, Trustee (Reverend) Berliiss arose and declared that we had accused the board of groping in darkness and that he had no fight with the Reorganized Church, because he knew that faction did not practice polygamy. He also stated (and rightly, too) that the application was only signed Latter Day Saint, and that perhaps if the full name had been inserted the controversy might not have arisen.

My summary of the case is that the full name of the church should have been inserted by Brother Hewitt, but also that the board of management committee of the board of education would have surely rejected the brother if the church had stood quietly by and had not gone to press—stating facts and challenging them to prove why one of our members was to be disqualified from teaching because of his religion, which is, if anything, something to be proud of.

At a meeting held some little time later, the application was passed without even a debate, and the brother is now regularly appointed to the teaching staff.

This I consider a victory of right over wrong, even though the wrong be large numerically and have back of them the strongest newspaper in the city. Yet, in spite of this, right triumphs.

"I feel that my cause is in hands of divine Providence, that I am an instrument in his divine plan for the welfare of the Indians. I only hope that if I am called that I may have the strength, faith, wisdom, and blessing from above, to do my and well wishes of all friends of myself and the Indians. So do not wish upon me the position alone, but with it the strength, faith, wisdom, and blessing from above, to do my full duty. Then I know the Indians will receive some relief and become a power among the people of the land."—Thomas L. Sloan.

The sectarian press of England continues to be full of a discussion of the question of church union. It fails to take up any religious discussion, without a rediscussion of the Lambeth Conference.

Those desiring reservations please address: E. H. Bennett, 409 Logan Avenue North, Minneapolis, Minnesota.

Northern Wisconsin, June 24 to July 5, to be held on our own grounds, Chetek, Wisconsin. Tents, beds, cots, floors, and straw free. Meals: breakfast 15 cents; dinner 25 cents; supper 20 cents. Floyd McDowell of Lamoni, R. V. Hopkins of Independence, and W. A. McDowell of Plano will be present; also a nurse. This is your reunion. Don't be a slacker. Be on the job. You will miss something if not. Leroy Colbert, secretary.

Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, June 17 to 26. Beautiful grounds have been secured. Be sure to notice that we are not to have the same grounds we had last year. The State road goes through that and it is likely that it will be under construction. The ground this year is to be near the Saints' church at Gibbs, a suburb of Coeur d'Alene, Idaho. Take the Electric Railway, Inland Empire, from Spokane to Gibbs. Ask at the post office for the grounds. Or, if you will write to me the date you plan on coming, we will meet you. Be sure to bring your bedding unless you have made other arrangements with the committee. A dining tent will be on the grounds, but we are asking all who can to do their own cooking. Good, dry wood will be on the ground. The tents will all be provided with one pair of double bed springs and one stand. The cost will be $6.50 each. Should you wish two sets of springs, please order at once. We are meeting with some difficulty in securing tents, so it will be necessary for you to order at once to be sure of a tent. Of course there will be a few extras for transients, but don't plan on one of these. The outlook is most promising for a splendid reunion. We have the promise of one of the Bishopric and at least one of the Twelve. W. H. Kelley is already in the district and will add much to the success of our reunion. Don't spend all your money on your body. Use some of it now on your soul. There will be spiritual food for its upbuilding at this reunion. J. A. Bronson.

The State of the Church Finances

The policy of the Presiding Bishopric is to keep the membership of the church informed as to the actual financial condition of the church and to make known the financial needs, believing that when the Saints know what is necessary, they will be willing to do their part and that they will find pleasure in the doing.

When the General Conference of 1920 passed the budgets for the fiscal year, July 1, 1920, to June 30, 1921, of $640,296.56, we called their attention to the fact that this was about $100,000 in excess of what we expected to receive from tithes and freewill offerings.

Even so, little difficulty would have been encountered in meeting this deficit had business conditions remained stable, for our receipts for July, August, September, and October, 1920, were in excess of the same months of 1919, as will be seen from the inserted table.

The increase for these four months was $24,489.66, but at this point, November 1, 1920, the financial depression struck the country, prices were shattered and thousands of men thrown out of employment. The effect of this depression has been felt in our church finances, and the comparative statement of the five months ending April 1 shows that during this period instead of an increase in receipts, as in the previous four months, there was a decrease of $99,480.27. Had the increase in tithes and offerings been maintained for the fiscal year, we would have had sufficient in the operating fund to meet all requirements, but as it is, on July 1, 1921, there will be a deficit of about $100,000.

We have gathered in about $250,000 on the Auditorium fund and over $80,000 on Christmas offering, so that our final report for the year will show a handsome increase in net worth of the church, but these special funds cannot be used for operating expenses such as for the missionary families, aid, Saints' and Children's Homes, etc.

The Order of Bishops has been giving careful and earnest consideration to the financial problem during its sessions the past two weeks, and is agreed to a policy of rigorous curtailment of all unnecessary expenses.

They are confident, however, that the members of the church do not wish the effort of the church to spread the gospel (so much needed at the present time) to be in the least abated, and are satisfied that the membership can be depended upon not only to pay their tithing on their lessened increases, but knowing the conditions, that they will freely offer of their surplus to extend the Master's work.

In view of these facts your financial representatives are undertaking their duties for the coming fiscal year feeling assured that the progress the church has made will be fully maintained.

The Men Who Have Made the Herald

To note the salary received has not been and is not now a fair criterion of one's ability who works for the church.

With the HERALD now established in its new headquarters, and again published on its own presses, it is well that we consider for a moment something of its past history.

Its list of editors, including associate and assistant editors, has been published and republished. Its list of managers has also been set forth in a column. Although these men have contributed greatly to its success, the HERALD has not depended on them alone.

In the early days in Plano, the press was for several months run by hand. The editor, as well as other workmen, furnished part of the power. The result has been possible only through this spirit of sacrifice and devotion. Its subscription list is smaller than that of other religious publications. It has not been and is not, nor has been probably at any time, supported through subscriptions as it should be. Yet it is lower in price than are the publications issued by the sectarian churches.

How has this price been made possible? By the devotion and sacrifice of the men who have worked in the mechanical department, in the business office, and in the editorial office. These men and women have, as a rule, worked for less, and many of them for very much less than they could have secured in secular employment. This is not a theory or an assumption. Time and again men have left the Herald Office and secured employment elsewhere, and have at once made good, receiving a remuneration two, three, and more times as much as the Herald Office has ever paid them. We have seen these men come back with a courage, reliance, self-confidence that speaks of work well done.

It has been a pity at times, the conditions under which the work has been done, which has meant not only financial sacrifice but grief of the spirit for some of its workmen. Members of the church who have never worked under such trying conditions, and who would not make a like self-denial, have been liberal at times with criticism.

As we write, we personally are inclined to doubt if the Herald Publishing House has ever had an employee who was worth less than he or she was paid. That there have been some worth less than others is doubtless true. There have been some who, figured on the close basis on which the Herald Publishing House has conducted its work, appeared to work at a loss to the church, but this is because of the small amount allowed per unit of production.

We have time and again noted on the part of others not informed, and on the part of even those who have the management and supervision of its work immediately in charge, the disposition to value a man's work and ability by the remuneration that he has received. A greater mistake could not possibly be made, or one more unfair towards these men and women who have worked on a minimum basis in order that this important work of the church might be carried on. Their pay is no criterion of their worth from a worldly or financial point of view.

This is a tribute to these men and women, who through the sixty years past have made possible the regular appearance of this paper, and who also have made possible the publication of a church paper at such a low price. It may be that they have not always rendered the best service of which they were capable, because it is difficult to work at a high pitch, under conditions which at times become depressive, if not destructive of real efficiency.

The normal reaction, if a man is told that he can quit when he wants to, and "we can easily fill your place," is to quit, and go elsewhere where he knows he can receive a better remuneration. He knows that his place can be filled if they will pay a sufficiently high price for the service, and are willing to wait until the new man learns how to do the work. He knows that his place cannot be filled immediately at any price. His special knowledge, acquaintance with the church doctrines, and its work, makes him invaluable. He knows, however, that in time, by waiting long enough, and paying a sufficiently high remuneration, that they can secure some one to meet the mechanical needs of the situation.

Yet we know these men, realizing the meaning of the work, knowing that their actions would be misunderstood as a surrender, have gone on and performed the work before them because of their desire to assist in this great work as a whole. Their willingness has caused them to suffer financial loss, and perhaps depression, because of quite natural personal feeling.

As we dictate this editorial we recall men who have given of some of the best years of their life to this work on a missionary basis. There have been a few whose technical skill and knowledge of the work of the church, knowledge of the special problems confronting our publishing interests, and ideals could not be duplicated though we should pay $200 a week. We also know that sometimes, when some of these men have left, it has not been because of a decrease of interest.

So, to some of our late associates, as well as these men and women who in the past have made the Herald Publishing House a possibility, we extend in passing this vote of thanks on behalf of the church.

S. A. BURGESS.

Sadness marks the close of the school year at Graceland College. Orley Reneau, a very popular member of the student body, an officer in the Victorian, and on the editorial force of the Graceland Record, was drowned on May 22. Some of the college students were swimming in Grand River, a few miles east, and he seemed to be stricken with cramps and sank. His body was under water twenty-two minutes in spite of strenuous efforts to locate it, and resuscitation was impossible.

F. M. McDowell delivered the baccalaureate sermon for the high school at Lamoni on May 22.

The recent state legislature of Nebraska passed a bill allowing parole to men convicted of assault. This will be submitted to a referendum vote at the next general election.

Einstein and Zionism

Doctor Einstein as a Jew is specially interested in the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

A great deal of interest has been aroused by the fact that Doctor Albert Einstein, promulgator of the Einstein theory of relativity, which has created so much discussion in the past few years, has come to New York, not on scientific work, but with other Jews, to urge Zionism.

He came with Doctor Chaim Weizmann, the president of the Zionist World Organization, and who is the discoverer of trinitrotoluol (TNT) and head of the British Admiralty laboratories during the war. Their purpose is to arouse America to the importance of the Zionist movement.

Doctor Einstein wishes particularly to interest the American Jews in the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. When it is established he expects actively to associate himself with it, as will other Jewish scientists and scholars. The foundation stone was laid in 1918, and the site has been greatly extended.

They also plan to raise a fund of one hundred million dollars for the work of assisting half a million Jews to move there at the rate of fifty thousand per year. This would make the next ten years of special significance in the history of the Jews and Jerusalem, and would make the Holy City the gateway to reaching them. There are already about 100,000 Jews in Palestine, under the administration of Sir Herbert Samuel, himself a Jew.

In the last six months more land has been placed under cultivation than in a like period in modern days. It is estimated the wheat crop will be four times the quantity required for local consumption. Thousands of tons of barley will be exported. A real survey of the possibilities of that land has not been made in modern times, but a preliminary investigation indicates it is well able to support the population there. At present the price of food is extravagantly high, and the world depression has made itself felt.

According to the Brooklyn Daily Eagle the Zionists have already created some forty Jewish agricultural settlements—16 each in Judea and Galilee, and 8 in Samaria. It has also formed 25 cooperative agricultural settlements in which farmers cultivate nationally owned land.

The money for the Palestine government loan, the hydroelectric, and irrigation scheme, and for other work, will be raised in the United States, Great Britain, and on the Continent. Three fourths of the Jewish people of the world to-day are politically incapacitated and financially ruined, according to leading Zionists. Therefore the burden falls on a small group.

Ensign Employees Give Reception

On the evening of June 2, all the newly arrived employees of the Herald Publishing House from Lamoni, with their families, were invited to attend a reception given by the "old employees" of the Ensign force at Independence. It was a beautiful evening and the meeting place a delightful spot on the lawn of Brother and Sister G. S. Trowbridge, he being the manager of the newly consolidated publishing plant.

It was frankly an occasion for getting acquainted, and was highly successful from all angles. With some changes in the personnel taking place at this time, it is not possible to give an accurate number of the employees of the new plant, but the gathering was impressive in its numbers as well as in the spirit manifested.

Simple games were indulged in, which had the effect of much general social exchange, and refreshments were served. A program had been arranged, consisting of an address of welcome by Pastor R. V. Hopkins, who from his long residence in Lamoni has a very warm spot in his heart for the people at and from that place. Bishop McGuire extended a warm welcome in behalf of the Board of Publication, and President Elbert A. Smith, in his genial manner, claimed to have served the Herald Publishing House for the longest period of years. He began his affiliation with the office in Plano, at the age of two, when he helped fold HERALDS and assisted his father in writing editorials. Later he moved to Iowa, and the Herald Office followed him. Finally he moved to Independence and the Herald is still following him. In 1892 he entered the employ of the office at Lamoni, where he became acquainted with Clara Cochran, who later became his wife.

He reviewed a little of the history of the publishing house, beginning its career in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1860, then moving to Plano. From Plano it went to Lamoni, and evidently has made its last move now, to Independence.

When the move was about to be made, the name by which the new institution was to be known was the subject of much discussion, and he admitted he was one of those favorable to a change, but was now in favor of retaining the old historic name of Herald Publishing House, which probably would continue to be the name used to designate the new plant.

There were appreciated readings by Mrs. Orrin Moon and Frances McGuire, and a pleasing violin solo by Miss Emma Snead. All joined in a familiar hymn, and a benediction by S. A. Burgess closed a happy evening and marked an interesting step in the development of the publishing interests.

The Steel Worker and the Minister

There has been much discussion in the religious press and elsewhere concerning the Interchurch Movement, and the report of its special committee on the steel strike. A minister of Boston attacks this report, and has in his turn had the shortcomings of his position pointed out.

One matter of immediate significance has been pointed out by several; that is, that this committee, as is stated by F. M. Martin, editor of the Expositor, representing denominations employing 115,000 ministers, deprecates the fact that 72 per cent of the steel employees get less than $2,024 a year; while they knew 90 per cent of the preacher employees of their churches get less than that amount, and 50 per cent of their own employees receive an average of $750 a year—or less than half the minimum of $1,575 specified by the Government as a minimum for family subsistence.

Of the 191,000 employees of the steel company, 30.4 per cent (skilled workers) average $2,749, 31.5 per cent (semi-skilled) average under $1,952, and the remaining men, 38.1 per cent of unskilled, average under $1,466. As compared with these wages for skilled, semiskilled, and unskilled labor, of the ministers of these various denominations, only 7 per cent receive a salary equivalent to that drawn by 30 per cent of skilled steel workers; and these are mostly of the bishops or directors. Only 9 per cent receive pay equal with the semiskilled workers; and the remaining 84 per cent are drawing from one third to one half less than the unskilled steel workers.

But, as has been pointed out by others, the fact that ministers are underpaid does not justify the underpaying of skilled or unskilled laborers.

The Saturday Evening Post adds that preachers belong to that saving remnant who place duty before every other consideration. Their treatment is therefore all the worse, for, despite this fact, the representatives of the church should be decently housed, clothed, and fed. Either the Government figures are misleading or many ministers are being shamefully underpaid.

On What Basis Shall Churches Unite?

It is absolutely necessary that there be divine guidance—but how can they receive it by denying present-day revelation?

The reunion of the churches is constantly to the front. Recently Doctor S. Parks Cadman spoke on this subject, which at some length appeared in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle of January 24.

He insisted that there was a necessity for different ideas concerning the differences with regard to doctrine. It is not necessary to wait until there is an agreement on doctrine before there is union, so long as Protestantism can agree on the fundamental facts of Christ and Christianity. There are now 218 separate denominations, all based on different interpretations of the Bible. There is something good in each one of them. It is useless to continue to harp on the evil of the times, or to stir up old quarrels. The present time possesses all we have of opportunity. To secure necessary progress, there should be a corporate union of all branches of the Christian church, as essential to the advancement of Christ's kingdom. Much of it must be left to the gradual evolution under the direction of the Spirit of God. We must get away from over-assertive individualism and be coordinated for the welfare of the church.

The church must first of all set its own house in order before she can reasonably expect to be able to bring peace and harmony to the divided work. Division gives comfort to her opponents and sorrow to her friends. Yet ideas once held as fundamental are now impotent, while the main stream of thought is flowing swiftly towards a renewal of oceanic power in combination. Since we are most efficient wherein we agree, and least efficient or nonefficient where we disagree, let the church inwardly and outwardly be what Christ intended it to be. Dwell on the constructive truths and forces which consolidate Christianity; and give no prominence to tribal cults and covenants, or that which emphasizes sectarianism.

Unfortunately "reunion" is loosely used to cover a variety of meanings, from complete absorption to mutual tolerance.

Finally to a question Doctor Cadman answers: Would it not be better if the Protestant churches were united in one and called the Protestant church? It cannot be done. Reunion is the thing desired, not absorption.

Yet Doctor Cadman says he can find no biblical authority or conclusive evidence that the apostles ever gave any directions for the after government of the church, but that the church evolved.

He places practically all hope of progress solely in human understanding, and ignores, as do so many others, the absolute necessity that in the church of Jesus Christ, that Jesus Christ be permitted to have some say-so in its organization and direction. The Master prayed most earnestly for the unity of the church, that they should be one, "even as we are one." His prayer was that they should be one on the basis of truth.

We might heartily agree with Doctor Cadman and others that we should put to one side our personal peculiarities, our overemphasis of our own individuality; that we should proceed on the basis of the fundamental truths of Christianity on which we can agree. We are also inclined to agree that it is not necessary that men be fully developed to the extent that they agree on every point of doctrine before they can cooperate in the church of Jesus Christ.

It follows of necessity where there is creed as wide as all truth, there will be individuals in different stages of development. But to this there must be added, and it is absolutely essential, that there be divine guidance in the way of truth, if our cooperative effort is to be made as effective as possible for the truth which is in Christ Jesus.

Independence Graduates

A goodly number who are equipped for better service to the church.

The Independence Sanitarium graduated its annual class of nurses at the Stone Church in Independence May 31. There were also four graduates in normal religious training and one in kindergarten work, by the Independence Institute. The address was delivered by George N. Briggs, president of Graceland College, and was in a particularly happy vein.

He described the needs of educational survey, pointing to the failure of Russia through lack of education; and the failure of Germany through scientific education wrongfully directed, as it lacked in the moral element. Our own educational system is far short of what it should be, but every people receive the system that they desire and for which they have prepared themselves. We have gone on many an intellectual joy ride and they have all ended in a smash-up. Moral education is a necessity, said the speaker, and we should labor for the sake of service and not for what we can get out of it.

This theme of service was also emphasized by Bishop J. F. Keir in presenting the diplomas.

The names of the graduates from the nurses' training school were: Margaret Lucile Batton, Iowa; Agnes Fay Franklin, Missouri; Hazel LaJune Hawley, Missouri; Ruby Jane Hendrix, Tennessee; Ellen Agnes Jepson, Minnesota; Cleo Christine Larson, Missouri; Myrtle Ruby Miller, Missouri; Ruth Marie Russell, Minnesota.

The graduate from the normal kindergarten-primary department was Gladys Irene Teeter, of Missouri.

From the normal religious education department graduated Dona Clark Haden, Etta Duckett Hunt, Lida Budd Robertson, Samuel Albert Thiel, all of Missouri.

Bishop's Number of Herald

It is planned to devote most of our space in an early issue to a summary of the work done and proposed by the church in a financial way.

Pursuant to the announcement of Bishop McGuire of a policy of keeping the church informed as to the actual financial condition of the church and its financial needs, we expect to issue a special number of the SAINTS' HERALD, June 21. The preparation of this number will be in the hands of the Presiding Bishop and his associates and office force. A review will be given of the work of the church during the past year, and of the work before the church, requiring our support. Aside from its financial aspect, this number should prove a valuable review of the work of the church and of its economic aspect.

Over a year ago the Bishop had prepared a cut provided for the analysis of the tithes and offerings and how used, showing the amount that has been under the general division of expenses of former years: real estate, interest, educational, administrative, aid to the poor and needy, elders' families, and expenses. Each of these was to be subdivided so as to give the analysis of for what purposes the church money had been spent. The editors of the HERALD prepared an analysis of the Bishop's report with an editorial and submitted it to the Bishop, but doubtless on account of the pressure of other work, no reply was received. We take great pleasure in announcing this special number and trust it may be the beginning of carrying into effect the general policy of keeping the members of the church informed, not only annually, but at more regular intervals in short statements from time to time.

President Smith to Return Soon

President F. M. Smith has engaged passage to return to the United States. He sails on the Rotterdam, which leaves Plymouth, England, June 9, and will arrive in New York on the 17th. Brother Roderick May and wife, Sister Pearl Crick and her two sons, will sail June 3, on the Kroonland. We have an interesting summary of the present situation in the European Mission for publication next week.

Newspaper Attacks

From time to time a book, magazine, or newspaper article is written, making an attack upon the church. From time to time these clippings are sent to our desk, and we are always glad to receive them. But we call special attention to the fact that the historian's office is anxious to secure everything published for or against the church. We would urge our readers, therefore, throughout the world, that they send to his office any publication which is of interest from a church point of view.

Subjects Being Discussed

Another Call for Near East Relief

Again we have an appeal for help in the Near East. Last year America sent 750 tons of clothing, but this supply has been exhausted, and the clothing worn out. Last winter there existed demands which they were unable to meet. In one instance, men nearly naked were clothed in empty flour sacks, and forced to go out and be in snow. All they are asking for is cast off clothing. Bundle stations are open only one day, and this announcement will probably be too late, but parcels can be sent to the Near East Relief Warehouse, 549 West Thirty-Ninth Street, New York City, New York.

To Punish Religious Libel

Glad Tidings announces that the legislature of Michigan is considering a new law governing libel, prohibiting the libel of a people in the name of religion. Possibly the genesis of this law is because of the attacks made upon the Jews. There appears much reason why such a law should be put into effect, as there should be a sufficient defense as in the case of other violations of the law of libel or of slander. It should be extended to include slander. When a man willfully misrepresents a people in the name of religion, and grossly and persistently misrepresents the religious belief and practice, as has been the case with some of our opponents, a law requiring that they make good their assertions would be only simple justice. If wrong, they should be corrected. It is the gross misrepresentation in the name of religion to which we object.

The Meetings at Holden

As usual the special services for young people—Zion Builders—held at Holden, Missouri, May 29 to June 5, with Apostle J. F. Curtis as speaker and Elder H. C. Burgess in charge of the music, are reported as a great success, with continued and even increasing interest.

Sunday, June 5, was Independence Day, and about seventy-five young people made the trip there and back in trucks. They arrived in time for Sunday school, but on account of the long trip before them left at the close of the singing at the evening service. In the afternoon services were held in the park at the Old Folks' Home and several were baptized.

Problems Meeting at Independence

At the monthly problems meeting at the Stone Church, President Elbert A. Smith spoke on "Fundamentals." The church of God is founded on the rock. (Luke 14.) We receive a kingdom, which cannot be moved (Hebrews 12). The "Rock" is the fact that Jesus is the Christ. (Matthew 17.) If that fact be taken away, we have no foundation left, and our house falls with the first storm. The discourse was reported and will no doubt appear in our columns later.

Financial Developments

The Order of Enoch purchased a tract of land lying immediately east of Enoch Hill in Independence the last of May. This tract will be divided up into lots to provide additional homes.

It is reported that the Order of Bishops during the recent session voted that the Christmas Offering for 1921 should be used for the purpose of providing homes (inheritances) for worthy ministers of the church.

Holden Young People's Meetings Inspiring

The following report was received in a letter to the First Presidency from W. S. Macrae, May 30:

"The young people's meetings started with a full house and a fine spirit Sunday. The 8 o'clock prayer service was spiritual and the evening service of song and the sermon seemed to reach the hearts of the people. The unassuming manner and humble earnest appeal of Brother Burgess gets results. Already we love him. Aside from reaching our own young people, over two hundred and fifty personal letters to those not of the church have been sent out to young people in reach of the church, and a number are attending.

"The sermons by Brother Curtis are clear and effective."

Through a letter from T. W. Williams from Naples we learn that the passage from Alexandria, Egypt, to Naples, Italy, April 23 to 28, was a very rough one, and both of the men suffered from seasickness which Elder Williams describes in very graphic terms. They have visited four continents and sailed on six seas and kept their balance, but the usually smooth Mediterranean was too much for both of them.

As the HERALD goes to press with this issue, the equipment and machinery from the Ensign plant is being moved to the new building. Most of the Lamoni equipment is installed and in operation, and with the carpenters and electricians busy it should not be long ere a condition of normalcy is attained.

Ideals of Judaism

By T. W. Williams

"The mission of the true Church of Christ is to enlighten the Jewish people and convert them to the Messianic teachings of Jesus of Nazareth."

A movement which commands the attention of the peoples of the world—civilized and uncivilized—and which has received the official indorsement of the leading nations of the world; namely, Great Britain, France, Italy, and the United States, must possess merit. We are justified in considering the ideals of Zionism.

It was Disraeli who said in his novel, Tancred, "The race that persists in celebrating the vintage, although it has no fruit to gather, will, in time, regain its vineyards." This trite aphorism clearly enunciates the mental attitude of Jews throughout the world during the two thousand years of exile and persecution.

Can Wait Yet a Little While

The Honorable Herbert Samuel, high commissioner of Palestine, referring to the unconquerable Jewish purpose to once again establish a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine, said, "We have waited two thousand years; we can afford, perhaps, to wait two years more."

Lord Beaconsfield, in his novel, Atray, published in 1833, put the following words in the mouth of his hero, a Jewish nationalist leader:

"You ask me what I wish; my answer is, The land of promise. You ask me what I wish; my answer is, Jerusalem. You ask me what I wish; my answer is, The temple, all we have forfeited, all we have yearned after, all for which we have fought, our beautiful country, our holy creed, our simple manners, and our ancient customs."

George Eliot, in her novel, Daniel Deronda, thus characterizes the Jewish ideal:

"There is a store of wisdom among us to found a Jewish polity—grand, simple, just like the old—a republic where there is equality of protection. . . . Then our race shall have an organic center, a heart and a brain to watch and guide and execute: The outraged Jew shall have a defense in the court of nations as the outraged Englishman or American, and the world will gain as Israel gains. . . . Let the torch of visible community be lit. Let the reason of Israel disclose itself in a great outward deed; let there be another great migration, another chosen of Israel, to be a nationality whose members may still stretch to the ends of the earth, even as the sons of England and Germany, whom enterprise carries afar, but who still have a national hearth and a tribunal of national opinion. . . . Let us help to will our own better future, and the better future of the world—not renounce our higher gift, and say, 'Let us be as if we were not among the populations,' but choose our full heritage, claim the brotherhood of our nation, and carry it into a new brotherhood with the nations of the Gentiles. The vision is there; it will be fulfilled."

Ideals the Same To-day

Disraeli, Beaconsfield, and Eliot wrote in the last century. The ideals of Jewry are the same to-day as then. I know of no better way to present these ideals to the HERALD readers than by quoting from recognized leaders and writers among the Jews.

Herbert Samuel, now high commissioner under the mandate of Great Britain, in addressing a great Zionist gathering at the London Opera House, Sunday, November 2, 1919, said:

"For my own part, one of my main interests in this Palestine problem arises from the fact that I see there an opportunity to help in some small and humble degree, as each of us may, in his own measure, to establish a community which shall be an example to the world, which shall be a living object lesson of those wise social reforms which some of us here have given our lives to promote. It is because I see there also an environment from which high ideas in the sphere of morals have sprung in the past and may spring again. And I feel sure you will agree with me that our efforts should not aim merely at reproducing a bygone day; we do not seek to make Palestine some wonderful archeological restoration which will arouse the amused interest of mankind. That would be to make Palestine no greater than a toy.

"I see in the past only a guide to the future. I look back only for the sake of looking forward. And looking forward, I see the possibility there in Palestine, some day, of agricultural villages where now there is a desert—where in the morning the Jewish cultivator will go out to his labor and come back in the evening happy in the work he has done; where fruit orchards and vineyards and cornfields will fill the land, with herds of cattle in the lowlands, and flocks of sheep upon the hills, where water power from the highlands will bring electricity to hundreds and hundreds of industrial establishments in the towns and villages, to provide for the needs of the population and for a flourishing export trade. I see industrial districts, well planned with their parks and their gardens, in the bright atmosphere of the Mediterranean climate, undefiled by smoke. I see the ports of Haifa and Jaffa full of a busy commerce, and Jerusalem even more than ever a spacious and beautiful city. In that environment I see a healthy population, with the natural intelligence of the Jewish people cultivated by a highly developed system of education centering in a University of Mount Scopus once more able to breed sages and scholars, poets and philosophers, musicians and scientists.

"This is an ideal worth working for—with time and effort and sacrifice it is surely not unattainable. We may feel privileged to live in a day when such an effort is being planned. The world has passed through the greatest ordeal in all its history. Never has there been a war on so vast a scale, bringing within an equal space of time so terrible a toll of death, of wounds, of famine, of speechless sorrow. It may be perhaps that this is the time that has been foretold: 'And there shall be a time of trouble such as never was seen since there was a nation even to the same time, and in that time the people shall be delivered.'"

Palestine to Be the National Center

Doctor Chaim Weizmann, than whom there is none greater or more devoted in the Zionist movement, says:

"The modern world sets the Jew the problem of maintaining some sort of distinctive existence without the external props of territorial sovereignty and a political machine, and the Jew sets the modern world the problem of finding for him a place in its social structure which shall enable him to live as a human being without demanding that he cease to be a Jew.

"The Jewish nation has stood from time memorial for the loftiest of spiritual ideals; its life through two thousand years of exile has been one long tribute to the supremacy of the things of the spirit; the record of the Zionist movement itself is proof of the power of an ideal to stir the Jewish people today to new life and heroic effort.

"The persistency of the Jewish people through two thousand years of dispersion is due to its capacity for organizing a group life of its own, under whatever external conditions, on the basis of a spiritual ideal—the idea of the eternity of Israel is bound up with the eternity and universality of the God of Israel. This idea, carrying with it as a corollary the belief in a future restoration of the people to its homeland, has supplied in the Jewish struggle for existence the place of the more concrete expressions of nationality.

"It was in Palestine that the Jews lived as a nation, and produced the highest fruits of their genius. The memory and the hope of Palestine have been bound up with the national consciousness of the Jewish people through all the centuries of exile, and have been among the most powerful forces making for the preservation of Jewry and Judaism. The task of Zionism, then, is to create a home for the Jewish people in Palestine, to make it possible for large numbers of Jews to settle there and live under conditions in which they can produce a type of life corresponding to the character and ideals of the Jewish people.

"When the aim of Zionism is accomplished, Palestine will be the home of the Jewish people, not because it will contain all the Jews in the world, but because it will be the only place in the world where the Jews are masters of their own destiny, and the national center to which all Jews will look as the home and the source of all that is most essentially Jewish. . . . Palestine will be the home of Judaism, not because there will be no Judaism anywhere else, but because in Palestine the Jewish spirit will have free play, and there the Jewish mind and character will express themselves as they can nowhere else.

"History justifies the faith of every conscious Jew that the striving of his people after full self-expression will be fraught with advantage to humanity in its progress towards higher and higher reaches of culture and civilization."

The avowed purpose of Zionism is well expressed in a publication entitled, Zionism and the Allies, as follows:

"The object of Zionism is to establish for the Jewish people a home in Palestine secured by public law. It is clear that the realization of this program will benefit the Jewish people and will not prejudice the rights of Jews in any country outside Palestine, nor will it injure any other nation in Palestine."

In 1895 Herzl published his famous pamphlet, the Jewish State, and in 1897 the first Zionist World Congress was held at Basel, which proclaimed as its program: "Zionism strives to create for the Jewish people a home in Palestine secured by public law."

A Nation in Exile

A pamphlet entitled, Palestine and Jewish Nationalism, contains a very comprehensive statement of the purpose and ideals of the Jewish people:

"Deep down in the roots of his being, bound up with the very sense of his Jewishness, there is the conviction that until the Return takes place, his nation is in exile, because, however satisfactorily he and millions of other Jews may adjust themselves to their different environments, the life of his nation cannot be properly lived except in Palestine.

"This it is that explains why for so many centuries the Jewish love of Palestine has found its most characteristic expressions not in political effort for the recovery of the country, and not even in pilgrimage (though these have not been wanting), but in constant prayer for the restoration of the temple as the symbol of the restoration of the full Jewish life; in the elaboration and study of religious rites which cannot be performed outside Palestine; above all, in the attitude of mind expressed in the Rabbinic saying that the Divine Presence is itself in exile and will be restored to its home only with the restoration of Israel.

"The Jewish love of Palestine, then, as it has persisted through centuries of estrangement between the people and the land, is peculiar in its selflessness and its spiritual quality. The Jewish love of Palestine comes naturally and almost inevitably to be regarded as something purely religious, as a feeling which has for its object not a particular piece of territory, but simply a 'spiritual Zion.'

"Palestine is a symbol for the realization of their religious and ethical ideals. The Return does not mean a physical restoration to the physical land, but merely symbolizes the establishment of the kingdom of God and the empire of righteousness—Judaism knows nothing of a New Jerusalem which exists only in heaven. Judaism spiritualizes the material, but for Judaism to spiritualize is not to dematerialize. The material remains material; but it derives a spiritual value by virtue of its being regarded as the necessary basis of an idea. Body is body, and spirit is spirit, but in life the two are necessarily interdependent, and if it is the spirit that gives meaning to the body, it is the body that gives to the spirit the possibility of expression and activity.

"What Palestine means to the Jews can be understood only in the light of this Jewish attitude to the problem of body and spirit. In the course of centuries of exile, Palestine has become spiritualized—but spiritualized in the Jewish sense. It is the actual, physical land that matters, though its geographical position and its physical features are absolutely unknown to millions of those who pray for it.

"If once the masses of the Jews were to abandon their belief in the future restoration to Palestine in favor of a belief in a 'spiritual Zion', to be realized in the world to come, the principle of Jewish cohesion would be gone, and the Jews would soon cease to exist as a distinct human group. But on the other hand, if the spiritual ideal which is associated with Palestine in the mind of the Jew were removed—if her love of Palestine became simply the desire for a country with so much milk and honey, so much natural wealth, so many harbors, so much scenic beauty, then Jewish nationalism would equally be a dead thing and the 'Jewish people' an empty phrase. It is the combination of the material and spiritual element, each indispensable to the other, that gives its specific quality to the Palestine sense of the Jewish people.

"The feeling of exile is a feeling of national incompleteness; and instinctive recognition of the fact that in the national life the elements of body and spirit are not developing side by side and cooperating as they must do for its full self-realization, because the material basis, the national land, is lacking, and whatever spiritual development takes place without it can be nothing more than a semblance of life.

"The ideas of the Jewish God, the Jewish way of life, the Jewish people and Palestine are inextricably bound together, are in fact but different facets of our central principle.

"'Palestine for the Jews' means 'Palestine for the world,' not because he wants Palestine to be anything but distinctively Jewish, but because he feels that the more distinctively and truly Jewish it is, the greater will be its influence on the world in the direction of establishing a truer understanding of the right relation between body and spirit, between the individual nation and the divine idea of human brotherhood.

"There is a gulf fixed between the restoration seen in the prophetic visions, and the restoration for which Jewish nationalists are working here, and now. That complete fulfillment to which the prophets looked forward is and must remain a distant ideal, and one to which human effort can stand only in the relation of blind groping, not in that of conscious and well-calculated endeavor. It is in its very nature catastrophic, a sudden and complete reversal of things as we know them. To work for its realization would be like working to bring about a volcanic upheaval. Zionism is concerned with matters of human calculation and effort, with things that are, humanly speaking, attainable by a gradual evolution.

"Zionism is a concrete, practical attempt to reestablish a Jewish national settlement in Palestine, and an idea which derives from the prophets and can have its ultimate fulfillment only in the fulfillment of their vision.

"The relation between the Jewish people and Palestine must be recognized as the relation between a nation and its national homeland. . . . Zionism cannot renounce all claim to ultimate political independence, its fundamental postulate being that the Jewish people are to have the opportunity of complete and unfettered self-expression.

"Politically and economically, the Hebrew nation in Palestine will move along lines determined by its own needs and circumstances, and the path which it takes will have no direct bearing on the position and the problems of extra-Palestinian Jewry. But in the realm of the spirit, in ideas, in religion, in ethics, it will exert a profound influence on the Jews of the world. They will turn to it perforce for a truer understanding of what Judaism essentially is, and of how far traditional Judaism requires adoption, and how it can be adapted to modern conditions; they will look to it in large measure for their preachers and their teachers; its scholars will help them to a deeper insight into their national post; its ports will give them a new vision of their national future; they will send their sons and daughters to its schools and universities, to come back with a quickened Jewish consciousness and a healthy pride of race. By virtue of a conscious individuality of outlook which will give their language, their history, and their customs a value in their own eyes and in those of their neighbors, they will gain a new sense of dignity and of self-respect, and will meet their fellow citizens on equal terms, knowing that in the commerce of ideas they can give as well as receive.

"The Jewish nation, alike at its center and at its circumference, will help to show mankind that a nation's life is best lived, not in isolation and conflict, but in community and co-operation, that nationality is essentially a thing of the spirit, not bound up with and fettered by political machinery, but working freely in the hearts and minds of men, and expressing itself in the effort of different human groups to approach the same summit by different roads, each striving upwards along the path marked out for it by its own character and spirit.

"A national home is a very different thing from a national state. A nation is not born in a day, nor is a nation rebuilt in the twinkling of an eye. Only then will our nation be a complete and solid edifice again when we have carried back to the land of our fathers a civilization of our own. When we have established a moral code; when we have established our own traditional institutions; when we have once more introduced our fine, our great ancestral tongue—Hebrew."—James de Rothschild.

What Zionism Is

From the foregoing we gather that Zionism:

- (a) Is identical with Judaism.
- (b) Is a restoration, so far as possible, of the language, customs, ceremonies, rites, and creeds of ancient Judaism.
- (c) Proposes the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people.
- (d) Presupposes the rebuilding of the temple and the reinstatement of temple services.
- (e) Provides for a Jewish moral code—its own traditional institutions—a "civilization of our own."
- (f) The ultimate Jewish state.

It follows that the attitude of the church of Jesus Christ must be identical with that of Jesus Christ two thousand years ago. Jesus told the Jews that Judaism had been fulfilled—that Christianity must take its place. For this they rejected him. As a result, they have a heritage of two thousand years of persecution and suffering. They return unrepentant and with the old vision. The mission of the true Church of Christ is to do its utmost to seek to enlighten the Jewish people, to convert them to the Messianic teachings of Jesus of Nazareth. This is our opportunity. Will we enter in and occupy?

The last of January the committee having charge of preparing copy for a teacher's edition of the Holy Scriptures (Inspired Version) met in the general office building in Independence. The committee consists of President E. A. Smith, Apostle P. M. Hanson, R. S. Salyards, A. B. Phillips, and J. W. Peterson. The task is proving a much greater one than was at first supposed and the committee is still in session. All except President E. A. Smith are giving their full time to the work except of Sundays. On account of reunion work they expect to adjourn in the near future till September, when they will again meet and continue till their work is completed. They hope this will be before the close of the calendar year.

The Order of Bishops were in session in the office of the Presiding Bishopric at Independence from May 8 to 25. They discussed many matters of importance to the work of their department, especially the law of stewardships.

How Are We Teaching Faith?

By Gomer J. Reeves

"Let us then labor with our mights and be on fire with our message, creating and developing faith in the hearts of the children of men."

Men to-day must be on fire with their message. No matter how splendid a message one may have, if he lacks fire he will never accomplish much. He may be compared to an engine that is on the track, filled with water and coal waiting for the most essential thing to give it power and life, which thing is fire.

The problems of to-day, confronting the ministry, are vastly different than they were one hundred years ago. When the gospel was first restored the people were interested in the welfare of their souls, but were at sea as to the correct plan of salvation. To-day there is but little genuine interest in religion of any kind, to say nothing of doctrine. As a rule, if people are religiously inclined to-day, they readily accept the doctrine upheld by the church which they enjoy attending most, although in most cases that doctrine is seldom taught.

The masses cannot see the necessity or benefits of what they understand the gospel to be, hence are not interested in what we have to offer. Men to-day want a practical religion, or, in other words, something which sectarianism does not have to offer.

Our aim must be first to convince men of the great need of a temporal and spiritual salvation, and after their conviction they are ready for indoctrination. Chances are that they will then accept the doctrine with but little hesitation.

Why not teach doctrine first? Doctrine acts like a medicine; no man who thinks he is well can be induced to take a dose of quinine. He must first be convinced that he is ill and has need for such a remedy.

Convince as to Need of Faith

An agent trying to sell an automobile must first convince his prospective buyer that he has need for a machine. The agent may demonstrate the automobile and satisfy the customer that it is a first-class machine in every respect, but the man is not yet in the market. We are all salesmen, representing the greatest institution on earth, but we must first create a market for our ware, then be ready to supply the demand.

The question arises, How must we start? With the first principle of the gospel, of course, but not in the way we have long been in the habit of doing it. The average sermon on faith might assist a member of the church to understand the principle more thoroughly, but would never, worlds without end, develop faith enough in an unbeliever to carry him over to the second principle.

That ancient and ineffective method of teaching faith which we have so long stereotyped, no doubt has for its source Paul's letter to the Hebrew saints. Smith says the argument of the epistle is such as could be used with most effect to a church consisting exclusively of Jews by birth, personally familiar with and attached to the temple service. The eleventh chapter is only a summary of the works accomplished by faith, preceded by a definition of the same. It was not intended to develop faith in a nonbeliever, but we have picked it up as a cudgel with which to strike our first blow to convince men of the truthfulness of the gospel, and so we go on in the style of Paul:

Have faith in God.

Without faith ye can do nothing.

By faith Abraham offered up his son.

By faith Enoch was translated.
 By faith Noah builded the ark.
 By faith Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt.
 By faith the walls of Jericho fell down.
 By faith the harlot Rahab perished not.
 By faith are we justified.
 The just shall live by faith.
 Without faith it is impossible to please Him.

Faith Must Be Cultivated

Faith is like religion; it can never be driven into man. It must be cultivated and developed. Paul says that it is the assurance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. Therefore, if faith is assurance and evidence, before we can ever hope to create faith, we must first give to those we would teach some assurance of our hope in the gospel and some evidence of its divinity.

To make a long succession of statements to skeptics, such as we have just mentioned, is nothing more to him than preaching a dead faith. James says if a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit? This is just what we have done. We have asked them to be filled with faith and have given them only bare statements for their meal.

We must create faith by teaching the plan of God and prove its divinity by showing its past and present execution. In many of the best sermons along this line the word faith has never been mentioned. One reason why men to-day lack faith is because they have never received a correct idea of God, his plan, his character, personality, and attributes. After this is done it is necessary that they be given a knowledge that the course of life which we are taking through the gospel is in harmony with His will.

When, then, will be the final result of such a faith? When we begin to have faith we begin to draw near unto God, and when that faith is perfect we shall be like him. Because he is saved we shall be saved also, receiving the end (reward or object) of your faith, even the salvation of your souls. (1 John 3: 2, 3 and 1 Peter 1: 9.) This salvation is temporal as well as spiritual.

Foundation of Religion

Faith is the foundation and beginning of our religious career, but it is not the end, for faith matures into knowledge. "For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face; now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known." "Now I ask, Is this faith? Behold, I say unto you, Nay; for if a man knoweth a thing, he hath no cause to believe, for he knoweth it. . . . Faith is not to have a perfect knowledge of things; therefore if ye have faith, ye hope for things which are not seen, which are true. . . . Ye cannot know of their surety at first, unto perfection, any more than faith is a perfect knowledge." But when we know as we are known (by our Creator) is our knowledge perfect? "Yea, your knowledge is perfect in that thing, and your faith is dormant."—Alma 16: 140-150.

That practical religion which the world is looking for includes the building up of Zion, but first we must create faith in the Zion movement in order that it may be established. Then, when Zion is fully redeemed, our faith will be turned into knowledge, for Zion shall then be to us a known and living reality.

Let us labor with our mights and be on fire with our message, creating and developing faith in the hearts of the children of men, that it may be made perfect through the knowledge of our redemption, and that they may pluck the fruit of the tree of life and be fashioned like unto our Redeemer.

Design, Volition, and Destiny

By J. E. Vanderwood

"Our destiny is determined not so much by the design of the Creator as by our own volition."

Just recently, in addressing a gathering of the ministry, a brother in alluding to the designs of the Almighty, said: "I use that term with a little hesitancy, lest peradventure it might convey to the minds of some the Calvinistic idea of predestination." I, in my mind, analyzed his statement, and immediately this thought presented itself to me: Why hesitate in the use of such excellent terms when the truth of the matter is considered? And I immediately took my pencil and made this note: "God designed us all for the very best; if we fail to come into our own, it is not God's fault; it is our own." At the close of the address I drew the brother's attention to the thought herein expressed, and he very heartily concurred with me in the matter. Since that day I have given it some thought and have made some research along the lines of this issue, and I have learned that the entire universe bears witness to the truthfulness of this idea.

First of all, we are confronted with the idea of God as the creator, the designer, if you please, of the universe. There is some scripture also informing us that when God made the heavens and the earth and all that appertaineth thereto, he pronounced them good. Here then is our premise: God is the designer of the universe, and if we should say that he designed one man to be a perfect man and another man to be an imperfect man, then we would be forced to admit that God is unjust; but if we take the position that he is just, then we are forced to the conclusion that he designed all men for the very best and endowed them with the blessed privilege of choosing for themselves. "See, I have set before thee . . . good and . . . evil," is the word of scripture. The thought is: If you rightly use the things I have supplied you, if you always choose the good, nothing but good can come to you; but if you improperly use the things I have created and choose to do wrong things, then sorrow, suffering, and misery must be your reward. You get exactly what you choose; you are bound by nothing but your own choice.

People have erred and do still err because they have reached conclusions before they have considered the whole problem. They practice error because they fail to learn the whole truth, and herein it is demonstrated that often "a little learning is a dangerous thing." It would be very improper for us to say that God would take away from man his free moral agency, because this would be entirely out of harmony with his divine characteristics. We should remember always that God designed us for something divinely greater than a mere machine, therefore he must, in the very nature of things, permit us to be free moral agents. The volition of man, then, must be associated with the design of God in order to fully reveal the finished product. There is but one solution to the problem. The Calvinistic theory of predestination is incorrect; it is a travesty on justice; it is a libel on the character of God. I wish therefore to present the truer and more sublime attributes of Deity in the blending of the volition of man with the design of the Creator.

God, I say, designed all mankind for the very best. There is, and can be, no respect of persons with him. That is to say, that within the organism of man, his soul, there is potential beauty and excellence. Many of us, it is true, are handicapped by reason of our hereditary influences, or by our long-continued traditional customs, and hence many of us have failed to come into our own; but God did not intend that it should be that way. This has come to us as the heritage of our forefathers, as an outgrowth of their volition, as the logical sequence of what they chose to do or not to do. But this is not a legitimate excuse for us to fail to come into our own; because there is yet within us that intrinsic value, that potential beauty and excellence, that is awaiting the revelation and manifestation of the character of God. It is well here to observe that, to a great extent at least, I am what I am because I have chosen to be just that and nothing else. If we would will better, we would be better. We are precisely what we will to be. The fundamental reason why we have not achieved greater heights and aspired to nobler purposes is that we have failed, or refused, to properly use our volition. Remember always that I will be what I will to be—nothing more, nothing less.

Volition is one of God's noblest gifts to man. It involves more than many of us have been wont to suppose. There is nothing in the universe that is not included in this idea. Herein is the great problem of life. God designed man as his crowning work; he endowed him with faculties that are divine. He then environed him with a mighty universe wherein is an abundance of all things, and said unto him, It is yours; make use of it. You may find therein everything that is needful for you, and if you will apply yourself aright and learn the lessons I have outlined for you, you will be able to come into your own; you will reach the end for which you were designed. But if you misapply the things I have placed within your reach, or refuse to properly use the means I have placed at your disposal, then you must of necessity take the consequences. You will fail to come into your own just as surely as you misuse, or fail to properly use, the means that I have placed within your reach. Remember, the universe is open to you; there is plenty and to spare; you have your volition, you can be just what you choose to be, so it is for you to determine what your destiny will be.

Some one says: "I have no chance. I am a failure in life, and I am not to blame, because I couldn't help myself." This is a very convenient excuse or apology for the person who lacks the moral courage or the mental stamina to exercise his volition, but it will never do for real men and women. It is only the shiftless who say, "I couldn't help myself," and I answer, "Oh, yes, you could, if you would only will to do so."

The greatest difficulty with most of us is that we are generally willing to follow the lines of least resistance. We are what we are because we are mentally, morally, and physically too lazy to be anything else. I don't wish to be harsh in this matter; but I would very much like to quicken your latent faculties, your potential powers and possibilities, so that you would arouse from your slumbers and begin to ascend the heights before you, and thus eventually come into your own. We fail because we are unwilling to pay the price that must be paid if we would obtain the very best.

Not only did God design man for the very best, and then environ him with a fullness of all things that he might become a worker together with his Creator, but when man failed to respond to the life that was open to him, when he shut himself out from the tree of life, God sent his Son in the person of the Galilean carpenter, that he might give unto the world an example of life, something real and tangible. This man Jesus gave us a real example of life; he demonstrated to us the truthfulness of our premise, that God designed all men for the very best. He responded to the law of the universe and thereby came into his own. He presented to us the life beautiful. Let us not lose sight of his example, for he came to earth with every handicap that a man is heir to, but in spite of this fact, and not because of it, he triumphed, and revealed to the world the type of character that is excellent and ideal. Hear what he is saying to us: "The works that I do ye shall do also; and greater works than these shall ye do, because I go unto my Father." Now if we are not accomplishing this work, it is not God's fault, it is our own. How are you using the most sacred trust God has placed in your keeping?

Esau's exercise of his volition caused him to sell his birthright for one mess of pottage; but Jacob exercised his volition and purchased for himself a birthright for that same mess of pottage. God designed both men for the very best, but they chose to do differently. Their volition determined their destiny. What was true of them is also true of you and me. If I choose to sell my birthright, I must take the consequences. That which I will comes to me. I ought always, therefore, to will to do the right thing under every circumstance. We make a failure of life only when we become too idle or fearful to attempt. The man who, in the parable of Jesus, returned the pound without having used it, tells the whole secret. He was a coward; hear him, "I feared thee, because thou art an austere man." Fear will paralyze and weaken the ablest of the able. We fear because we are yet destitute of love. When once we become the fond possessors of the spirit of divine love we will no longer fear to attempt.

Shakespeare has said:

"Our doubts are traitors, and
Make us lose the good we oft might gain,
By failing to attempt."

But the beloved disciple has said that "perfect love casteth out all fear." When we learn that every act must and will receive a just compensation, we will no longer hesitate nor fear to do right.

Emerson has said: "Man is timid and apologetic. He is no longer upright. He does not say 'I think,' 'I am,' but quotes some saint or sage. He is ashamed before the blades of grass or the blowing rose. The roses under my window make no reference to former roses or to better ones; they are what they are; they exist with God to-day. There is no time to them. There is simply the rose; it is perfect in every moment of its existence. Before a leaf bud has burst, its whole life acts; in the full-blown flowers, there is no more; in the leafless root, there is no less. Its nature is satisfied, and it satisfies nature, in all moments alike. There is no time to it. But man purposes or remembers; he does not live in the present, but with reverted eye laments the past, or, heedless of the riches that surround him, stands on tiptoe to foresee the future. He cannot be happy and strong until he, too, lives with nature in the present, above time." This, if it be rightly understood, expresses the whole matter. We fail because we are out of harmony with the order of the universe. When we, like the rose, learn to function as the Creator has designed we should function, then, and not until then, will our life become a revelation of the Divine. We will be just what we will to be.

Our destiny, therefore, is determined not so much by the design of the Creator as by our volition. We may make life beautiful and useful, and thus enter into a condition of at-onement with God, or we may will to follow the lines of least resistance and thus degenerate into the base and bestial.

Brother, sister, comrade, friend, it is your privilege to enter into the highest and best if you will; you were designed for just that. Yes, you can be, and should be a prince. But you too may fail to come into your own, because you, like Esau, are willing to sell your birthright that you might satisfy some temporary physical appetite. It remains then for us to determine what our destiny shall be. God has designed us for the very best. If we fail to come into our own it is not God's fault; it is our own.

Farm Loans

By D. R. Baldwin

"It would savor of extreme folly if the church does not take measures to finance her own cooperative members."

It is cheering news that a "church rural credit program" is contemplated. In the light of recent business stagnation by refusing credit to those offering gilt-edged security, which spells financial ruin for otherwise prosperous thousands, it would savor of extreme folly if the church does not take measures to finance her own cooperative members.

Of course so big an undertaking cannot be completed with a single stroke, and it is sure to be bitterly opposed by those of usurious tendency; all of which is good evidence that a start cannot be made any too soon.

In response to your call for discussion by farmers of the functions of the Farm Mortgage Association as compared with the Federal Land Bank, which they are trying to put out of business, one of the first things we need to do is to figure out to your readers the results of the two systems as briefly and clearly as we may. So we will illustrate it with the following:

$3,000 Federal Land Bank system: 6½%, 5½% interest, 1% amortization.

$195 annual payment, 35½ years' time.

$6,922.50 liquidates the debt.

$150 reinvested in the associate bank.

$3,000 Farm Loan Association at 8% interest.

$240 annual interest payments, 35½ years' time.

$8,520 interest paid out, plus $3,000 principal.

$11,520 required to liquidate the debt.

These figures show that the former system lets the farmer out $4,597.50 ahead of what the old system does.

One half of this margin would save the financial life of many men that at present are losing their homes.

There are other features worthy of consideration. The Federal system is much more nearly cooperative, and the expense of conducting is very small. I quote the following extract from a personal letter from Honorable Daniel G. Oshea, of Spokane, Washington, president of District Number Twelve, of the Federal Land Bank, comprised of Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Montana, under date of January 5, 1921:

"The Federal Land Banks have been in operation only a comparatively short period. They began organization in 1917 when war was declared. Since that time conditions have been abnormal. The work of organization is always the most troublesome and costly. After the organization be out of the way and normal times be experienced, such as prevailed prior to the great war, the Federal Land Bank can operate on a very small margin of expense. I would hesitate at this time to say just how small the margin may be, but there is no doubt that it could be less than one half of one per cent."

The business of this bank has now been held up for more than a year, extra expenses incurred, and no money loaned; but in the face of all this, the Federal Land Bank of Spokane has on hand a net profit of $91,867.

Anyone may see that the figures in the beginning of this article are conservative. First: The Farm Loan Association

OF GENERAL INTEREST

The Higher Criticism

Much of the so-called higher criticism grows out of the author's historical hairsplitting.

[A. H. Sayce, of Queen's College, Oxford, England, in his great work The "Higher Criticism" and the Verdict of the Monuments, published in London, says]:

"Twenty years ago [he wrote in 1893] little was left us of what had been handed down as the earlier history of man. Historical criticism had been ruthless in its iconoclasm. First one portion of ancient history had been relegated to the land of myth and fable, and then another. The destructive method of Niebuhr had been accepted; the constructive side of his work, in which he had attempted to substitute a new history of his own for the history he had demolished, was rejected. Narratives, the historical truth of which had been admitted by the earlier critics, were eventually condemned; whatever did not satisfy the most stringent requirements of criticism were expunged from the pages of history. . . .

"It was based on and supported by certain general assumptions. One of these was the unlikeness of the ancient oriental world to the Greek and Roman world of the classical age. The inferiority of the ancient oriental world in culture and education was assumed as a matter of course. It was taken for granted that no literature worthy of the name existed before Herodotos and Aeschylos, and that the idea of composing a history of contemporaneous events was a Greek invention. Writing, if known at all, was confined to the few, and was used chiefly for monumental purposes. That there was a literary age in the East long before there was a literary age in the West never entered the mind of the critic; or if it did, it was dismissed with contempt. Anything, therefore, which seemed to imply the existence of such a literary age, or which appealed to it for confirmation, was at once ruled out of court. The very fact that the authenticity of a particular narrative presupposed a widely ex-would require several renewals within this long period, each calling for extra commissions and time.

Second: Eight per cent interest is their very lowest consideration, and in the Northwest it often reaches ten per cent and more, plus commission.

Farmers are much encouraged since the United States Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of the Federal System and since Congress is helping to finance it. J. J. Oshea, bank director, and business partner of his brother Dan, stoutly affirms that had the court decided against the Federal Land Bank, the Farm Loan Association would have "cracked interest skyward, to fourteen per cent at least."

A real cooperative credit bank could successfully handle a large volume of business in so central a locality as Independence without a very large capital and surplus. Acting as a clearing house between the entire cooperative membership, the commercial paper it would naturally handle would go far towards financing its members.

Ninety-five per cent of our Nation's great commerce was handled without money before the war. Commercial paper, including the modern checkbook as handled by clearing houses, has taken the place of legal tender money, and the business of the world is done on credit.

There is no moral necessity of the members of a cooperative church depending on the crazy freaks of a private credit trust for a chance to do business. We should have long since outgrown the crippling system.

tended circle of readers and writers in the time of Moses was considered sufficient for its condemnation. Whatever ran counter to the dominant assumption had to be explained away, philology notwithstanding; and so the 'pen of the scribe' in the song of Deborah and Barak (Judges 5:14) became the 'marshal's baton.'

"There was yet another assumption by which criticism was largely, if unconsciously, biased. This was the belief in the limited geographical knowledge of the eastern world.

The existence of regular highroads, and the possibility of transporting large bodies of men to distant localities, were held to be among the dreams and fancies of an uncritical age. That Babylonian armies could have marched into Palestine in the days of Abraham, much less that Babylonian kings could have established their empire there, seemed wholly impossible. The documents in which such statements occurred appeared self-condemned.

"Still more prevalent was the assumption that the language and statements of an ancient oriental writer must be measured by the standard of a modern European. An exactitude was required of them which would not and could not be demanded of many writers of history. A single error in detail, a single inconsistency, was considered sufficient to overthrow the credit of the whole narrative. And it sometimes happened that the error or inconsistency was of the critic's own creation, due to a false interpretation or a mistaken combination of the narratives before him. But even where this was not the case, it was expected an ancient oriental annalist should express himself with the sobriety of a western European and the precision of a modern man of science.

". . . A good deal of the historical criticism which has been passed on the Old Testament is criticism which seems to imagine that the compiler of the book of Judges or the books of Kings was a German scholar surrounded by the volumes of his library, and writing in awe of the reviewers. What may be called historical hairsplitting has been the bane of scientific criticism. It has been mainly due to a want of sympathy with the age and writers of the documents which are criticised, and to a difficulty of realizing the conditions under which they lived, and the point of view from which they wrote.

". . . Time after time statements have been assumed to be untrue because we cannot bring forward other evidence in support of the facts which they record. The critic has made his own ignorance the measure of the credibility of an ancient document." (Pp. 13-16.)—Apostolic Review.

The institute of Women's Department at Independence has been declared to be the best ever held by that department, and one of the best that has yet been held in the church. The interval between conferences allowed an excellent opportunity. It was not nearly so well attended as it should have been, especially by those from a distance. But it is a splendid start and provides a good basis for future planning.

PASTORAL

Painful Pulpit Mannerisms

This observer notes some habits of modern pulpiteers that should be overcome. He well argues that the presentation of the gospel of Christ demands our very best.

To one who went to Boston to hear great speakers in the International Council it was a painfully disappointing visit. It would be unfair, of course, to expect to find to-day the peers of Beecher, Storrs, Webster, Gough, and dozens of other kings of pulpit and platform who molded American current opinion by the spoken word. There were some who really made fine speeches, and several held the attention of their auditors throughout their discourses. But there were none of whom it could be said that they did charm and thrill and captivate audiences.

What was painfully apparent, however, was the mannerism or the automatics of many speakers who really and painfully spoiled otherwise fine and lofty utterances, and estranged instead of attracted the hearers. For example, this man would emphasize almost every word he said by a nod of his head. That man would jump at every sentence to strengthen his sayings, raising himself on tiptoe; tall men were guilty of it as much as the short fellows. Some few speakers would shake their heads up and down, right and left, even drawing a diagram of a half moon to show how earnest they were.

Most speakers did not know what to do with their hands. Some would put their hands in their pockets for safe keeping. Others would put one hand in pocket, and gesture with the other, and vice versa. Some found relief in putting them behind, like a handcuffed convict. Others would clasp them in front, like a young society lady making her debut. Some would put the thumbs under their vest near the armpits, like "Frank" just out for a vacation and meditating how to spend it. Some speakers, as they warmed up to it, would walk on the platform, changing their position quite often, like a boy on a grand stand, bent on seeing every movement of Jolly Polly. Not a few remained during their discourse like a country horse hitched to a post, standing on three legs before a grocery store.

Many had monotone voices, like the preacher of whom a good sister said: "I love to hear Mr. — preach; he always puts me into nice sleep." Most had no color (feeling) in their voices, as if rattling off a mass of statistics to a stenographer. Nine tenths of the speakers mistook mechanical force for nerve energy or magnetism in the voice. In a word, what an English poet said of the preachers in his own country is true of preachers in America: "They make the best and preach the worst."

Can any person bring forth a convincing argument why a preacher should not give as much time to the manner as he does to the matter of preparing his sermons? When will theological seminaries who aim to train preachers cease glutting young theologues with a mass of theology, sociology, and other "logies," and give so little time to homiletics, that branch of rhetoric which teaches making and delivering sermons? Do you blame the people if they stay away from church rather than hear the wearying discourses of half-fed and poorly paid ministers of the gospel? Every sermon should be an oration. Pulpit oratory is not simply attractive, but wanted by the people.

The masses need true oratory in pulpit and platform to stir them to action. The good sisters and sluggish drones in the

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Looking Backward

Again at home and at our desk! The eighteen days which have intervened since last we touched these keys have been crowded full of interest and enthusiasm, and we feel they have left an indelible impress upon us.

The first institute devoted exclusively to the work of the Women's Department has passed into history, and looking backward over its events, we can but feel that the hand of God was over us for good and blessing. It seems marvelous that so ambitious a program as we attempted was carried out almost exactly as scheduled, with no delays, no insurmountable hindrances, and with only two omissions, both of which were caused by circumstances beyond control. The illness of Sister Hunt on Saturday prevented us from hearing her message in regard to a mother's study, and because of being called back to Lamoni to attend the funeral services of our aged Brother J. W. Wight, Sister Lydia Wight was not permitted to explain the "Home and Child Welfare Bureau" of our departmental work.

To attempt to give, in a brief editorial, an adequate survey of the many good things experienced during the week, is futile, and we must content ourselves with a glance or two at some of the outstanding features of the occasion. We are glad to tell our readers that most of the addresses delivered were taken in shorthand, and will be available for use in our columns in the near future. Doubtless the outlines, or summaries, of some of them, are already in the hands of our organizers and workers.

Our institute reporter, Sister Flo Sterrett Whittemore, has conveyed to the readers not only of the HERALD and Ensign, but also of the Independence Examiner, notes and sidelights of the institute. This sister came from Idaho to attend the sessions, combining therewith a visit to her old home, and we were the gainers because of her ability and willingness to serve. Our appreciative thanks are due her for the efficient way in which she discharged her duties with pencil and tablet.

The program as published in the HERALD of April 27 was carried out with but very few changes. The message from the director general was read by Sister Nina Smith, because it was not possible for Sister Ruth to be with us in person. This message has already been printed in these columns.

The prayer service of Monday morning was in charge of Brother Roy V. Hopkins, assisted by Bishop James F. Keir, and was of a highly spiritual order. Owing to Brother Elbert A. Smith's absence in Lamoni in connection with Brother Wight's obsequies, this change was made, also the one Sunday morning, when Brother Paul M. Hanson gave us the sermon on "Woman's work in the redemption of Zion." Brother Hanson is an earnest supporter of our women's work, and wherever he travels an interest is created in it, his counsel to churches who say that their minister's preaching is good enough, are millstones around his neck, arresting his growth as an effective preacher. Religion of Jesus Christ has terribly suffered in every generation, and more so in this, at the hands of "tame" preachers.

Finally, if any occupant of the pulpit doubts the validity of this obloquy, let him lose no time to do these two things: First, procure a phonograph and preach into it; and then listen to your own sermon or speech. Second, stand before your wife, or before any fair and impartial critic, and preach as earnestly and seriously as you would before a congregation, asking her beforehand to tell you what are your mannerisms and automatics which detract from, and often destroy, your sermons and speeches. Then you will repent in dust and ashes as I have done.—N. W. Whitman, in the Christian Work.

the sisters being ever along the line of their affiliation with this important department in the church. His message was inspirational on our closing morning, and contributed its full share towards the success of our institute as a whole.

Another change occasioned by Sister Wight's absence for a few days, was when, by her arrangement, Brother A. Max Carmichael gave the address on school curricula. This was forceful and timely, and we will be happy to present it to our readers at an early date.

On Thursday forenoon, Mrs. Estella Kelley, representative from the Provident Association of Kansas City, talked to us on "Modern methods of relief." She was formerly a Red Cross worker, has had many years of experience in relief work, and is thoroughly up to date.

The lecture on "Dress: its lines, color, and texture," by Miss Evelyn Hansen, from the Art Institute of Chicago, was extraordinarily good, and appreciated by a "capacity" house. She was assisted in her illustrations of proper and artistic clothes for various types of women by members of the "Mothers' Club," of Independence, a group of young matrons who have for their protege, the Children's Home of Lamoni. These young women acted as models upon whom Miss Hansen displayed house dresses, sport clothes, evening attire, street wear, school garb, etc. The lecture made a decided "hit," with men as well as women, for the speaker was frank in her criticisms, and seemed to hit everybody's particular mistakes in dress. A charming setting was given this lecture by the half hour's program which preceded. This was musical and literary in its nature, and all participants, as well as the ushers for the evening, were arrayed in colonial and other period costumes, making quaint and lovely pictures for our memories.

The automobile trip on Friday afternoon was cleverly managed by Brother and Sister Walter W. Smith, the itinerary including visits to the Jackson County Girls' Home and the McCune Home for Boys. These institutions are situated on beautiful sites, several miles apart, and some distance from Independence. The autos made quite an impressive procession, and the throngs of visitors wandered through the interesting buildings, over the well-kept grounds, and listened eagerly to the explanations made by the obliging matrons and superintendents. We were accompanied on this trip by Probation Officer Lavelle, who later, at our banquet and again following Doctor McDowell's lecture on adolescence in the evening, talked to us of the childhood and youth which come under his observation. He told us that of the five thousand youthful offenders who had come before the Juvenile Court of Jackson County last year, less than ten per cent had been attendants at Sunday school or church. "Talk of your foreign missions," he exclaimed, "I can find all I can do and more, right here in this one county."

We have called attention to the changes made in our program, but cannot enlarge upon any of its many excellent features. We feel that great credit is due the many individuals who had a share in its presentation, some of whom devoted much thought, labor, and energy to its success. To Sister Hunt's fine organization of women throughout Zion is due the ease and efficiency with which the physical needs of the visiting sisters were met. The groups accredited themselves notably, and have added to their already well-established fame for hospitality. It was a satisfaction, too, to see how many of the local women availed themselves of this unusual opportunity for self-improvement. Some of them attended every session, with unabated interest.

We must not close without mentioning the very beautiful banquet served on Friday evening in the dining hall, by the members of the Laurel Society. Each lady took a table for eight under her charge, furnished it with her own linen, china, silver, cut glass, and flowers, which gave a most charming aspect to the whole affair. Two hundred partook of the toothsome and satisfying viands, and enjoyed the festive and happy environment. It was remarked that it was the prettiest affair of its kind ever given there, and many there were who echoed one brilliant young man's observation, "Well, I'll say that Mrs. Laurel is a pretty fine cook!"

We hope to have for your enjoyment later, a description of the exhibits in the hall. These booths were erected under the direction of Sister Maude Halley, to whose efforts and energy much credit is due. Sister Lydia Wight, Mabel Smith, Laura Mann, Mary Steele, Anne Roberts, and others, also put considerable work upon their parts, and all should feel a gratification in the general result. A book stand, in charge of Sisters Pooler and Laurence, became quite a commercial center, the institute workers purchasing freely of the many books and pamphlets displayed.

As we look back, we have perhaps but one outstanding regret in connection with the whole affair. That is, that it was not possible for all our workers to be present. Seventeen organizers out of ninety, and eight field workers out of fourteen was our record, we believe. We feel that if it had been possible to have had a perfect attendance of all our prominent workers, our future labors would have been greatly decreased, for we feel sure that few obscurities in regard to our work remain in the minds of those who attended this institute and took advantage of its varied opportunities to acquaint themselves with the many phases of our departmental activities and responsibilities. We hope, when again an effort of this kind is attempted, no one who is consecrated to service in this field shall be denied an opportunity to attend.

One other regret is that so few of the priesthood were present. We could but feel that our work would gain an immeasurable impetus could our leading men, our district and stake presidents, our financial officers and branch leaders have listened to the many splendid addresses and explanations, and witnessed the many enlightening presentations of our work, our ideals, and objectives. Some of our women are greatly handicapped in their local work because of lack of vision and sympathy on the part of the church authorities with whom they should labor. Some men, even of the priesthood, still seem to view this department as a sop to pacify the ambitions of women; a toy with which they may amuse themselves, whilst the real work of the church is being done!

Whatever of good we have gained, whatever lesson we have learned, may the fires of our devotion never dim! Instead, may we bring new fagots to the flames, renew our consecrations, and never concede discouragement or failure. Too many sweet children, too many eager youths and fair maidens are reaching out their hands to us for guidance, for counsel, for help, and for freedom from traditional error! We must not fail them now! Let us apply ourselves all the more earnestly to the needs of the kingdom, and with intelligent endeavor, assist in saving the fruitful grain of the harvest.

AUDENTIA ANDERSON.

Report of Social Purity Division

Since receiving this commission, my work has consisted chiefly in preparing for its responsibilities, since it was a new field of service for me. I have been studying the existing social problems, and the attempts that are being made to meet them, principally those in educational lines.

Through cooperation with the Health Department some excellent lectures given by Doctor Harrington have imparted valuable instruction on social purity work. These lectures were given in localities adjacent to Independence. We hope they may extend into further territory before long.

By request of Sister C. J. Hunt, organizer in Zion, I addressed the council of women on this subject. I also addressed the Holden stake conference held at Marshall, Missouri.

Through the clerical assistance of the department, I have secured from every State in the Union a complete set of the social hygiene literature issued by them. I find upon examination that very much of it is the propaganda of the United States Public Health Service on Venereal Disease, treating largely upon how infection is contracted, both by the innocent or unwary, and the guilty; of both the steady and intermittent progress of the disease upon the body, and its ultimate fatality; and of hope which is held out to those who receive medical attention immediately after infection.

There is also other literature of a high moral and instructive nature, some of which we expect to classify and recommend to our women.

The department has permitted me to secure a short correspondence course in eugenics, which will be pursued as soon as the necessary textbooks are available. This we hope to use among our instructors as a beginning of a real study in race betterment among our own people, at least.

Our country is fast becoming a close rival in its sensuality with the ancient nations. The amount of infidelity and divorce is unparalleled and the parenthood of the next generation is threatened with standards based upon a materialistic plane only.

The plans for the future work of this division are as follows:

1. To see to it that every mother is qualified to (a) tell the story of life to her child; (b) explain the physical changes that come at puberty; (c) become informed in regard to the entire adolescent period that she, and the father also, may better understand their children at such times.

2. To have at least one man and one woman instructor in every district and stake.

3. To urge local cooperation with the local recreational department to further the interests of proper recreation for the young.

4. To secure lantern slides and films on educational features of this work.

5. To possess certain other facilities for demonstrations in nature study for a better understanding of the laws of sex.

6. To obtain books of a scientific nature; urge the establishment of local libraries along this line.

7. To study latest methods of handling the social-sexual problems, as set forth in such magazines as the American Social Hygiene Quarterly.

8. General sex education for all.

Statistical

Herewith the amount of social purity literature sold in the first three months of the present year: Need of Sex Education, 5 copies; For Our Daughters, 5; The Heart of the Rose, 29; John's Vacation, 13; Chums, 14; The Young Man's Life Question, 11; The Parent's Part, 10; total, 87. (From Secretary Brook's report.)

Very sincerely,

MRS. D. J. KRAHL, Supervisor.

The Women's Department--A Western Viewpoint

It was suggested that I might give a few minutes consideration to the Women's Department of the church, which has grown to be such an important part of the work of the church.

The work of the women in the home has always been important, but it has been helped in many ways these many years by the thoughtfulness and consecration of committees of women appointed to work out helps for us, that the women may be educated and efficient.

That we may go about any business in life in an intelligent manner, study of our subject is necessary. As I walked along a down-town street this week I saw a window full of books on electrical subjects, and two placards set forth in a pleasing manner the good, the necessity, of studying a subject of which you intended to make practical use. Of course they wanted to sell their books, but one was immediately struck by the reasonableness of the proposition. And we will find it greatly to our advantage to be continually studying some good and useful thing.

In the Religio Quarterly is a lesson on "Education" which I commend to you for your intelligent study. The church "ministers to the spirit, the body, and the mind of her children." We have only to take hold with a will and we may fit ourselves for duties at home and abroad, inside and outside of the church.

The editor says, "To educate is to develop or discipline by systematic instruction or training"; and "the Book of Covenants plainly teaches that the Lord desires to have his people improve every legitimate opportunity for the cultivation of the mind." There is another lesson the same month on "Service." That might be considered after the lesson on "Education," for he says, "Any education or bit of knowledge man may possess which is not used for the good of his fellow men is a worthless asset." That is the object of the consecrated man, the consecrated woman—first to learn, and always to give out.

The Lord says, "Come, let us reason together, that you may understand. . . . Now when a man reasoneth he is understood of man. . . . Even so will I, the Lord, reason with you that you may understand."

A writer says, "Intelligence is the ability to learn," and "a certain amount of intelligence is necessary that we may accumulate knowledge." The Doctrine and Covenants says that "intelligence is the glory of God." Having accumulated knowledge, the thing to do is to put it into practice. And judgment, intelligence, is needed in putting it into practice. A happy thing is that we "learn to do by doing." Volunteer for the work that needs to be done; do not allow yourself to be pressed into it unwillingly. Live and learn and work—put your knowledge into practice.

"To a very great extent efficiency is dependent upon energy. Now energy is partly physical and partly mental." "Ill health is distracting; its influence upon thought and judgment is profound." Our Health Department gives us much that can be turned to good account. Study the Word of Wisdom. And the word to the elders upon one occasion in regard to proper rest and sleep is enlightening. The Lord says, "What I say unto one I say unto all." His word having once gone out is for the everlasting good of his people. Study his word and "all good books."

An important part of the Women's Department is the Young Women's Department: the Oriole Girls and the Temple Builders. Perhaps some may say, "I do not know anything about either one of those organizations." Why not? What concerns a part of the church ought to concern the whole. And if we would send for the pamphlets published by the Women's Department, the book of the Oriole Girls, the Temple Builders' book, and the Centennial Yearbook we would learn what the women are trying to do for the young people and themselves.

The book of the Oriole Girls is "dedicated to every girl."

"Grow as the trees grow, your head lifted straight to the sky,
Your roots holding fast where they lie,
In the richness below."

Read the story of the Orioles and the Snowball Bush. The Temple Builders have for ideals,

"Self-discovery; self-development; service."

Their beautiful booklet is full of things the older girls may learn, and the whole teaching is towards a better, truer living, better homes and healthier children for the next generation than we have yet had.

The Parthenon in Autumn Leaves keeps us in touch with the Oriole Girls and Temple Builders. In one number "The art of living with others" is discussed, and these topics considered:

Unnecessary criticism of others;
Fretfulness or grumbling;
Quick temper;
Self-will and stubbornness;
Being exacting;
Intolerance;
Discourtesy.
Selfishness;
Untidiness;
Boisterousness and loud voice—

Practical things, and they touch us where we live, all of us.

The work of the Boy Scouts does not come under the supervision of the Women's Department, but is an important part in the great work of building strong bodies and strong minds.

The vision is large and we ought to have an army of young people and men and women to believe in it, and to carry the work forward, not haltingly, but with rapid strides.

HORTENSE SELLON CRAMER.

Your Attention, Please

Sister Mary Steele, supervisor of our girls, desires us to call everybody's attention to the fact that many letters intended for her department, reach her only after long delay, owing to the fact that some people are still addressing them to Sister Gardner, Sister Thompson, Sister Gunsolley, or Sister Somebody Else. It would seem that since more than a year has passed since we established a general office to which all correspondence should come, regardless of which department or bureau it is intended to reach, the people throughout the church generally should not still need reminders in this connection.

However, let it again be widely and definitely understood, that all letters of inquiry, report, or business, should be addressed to Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, Box 255, Women's Department, Independence, Missouri. And please, also tell everybody you know, that the Orioles and Temple Builders are parts of the Young Women's Bureau of the Women's Department! Sister Steele says some people do not seem to know that fact, and consider them as separate and distinct organizations.

And by the way, don't you want a copy of "The friendly road" drama for use at your coming reunion? It illustrates the work of these two departments of girl activity, and is well adapted for presentation out of doors. In fact, part of the play has its setting in a reunion with trees for scenery, and girls' games and happy activities for motives. Write Sister Steele about it—and remember! Box 255, Independence, Missouri, Women's Department!

'Nother thing! We have been working diligently all through the months of the past year, to perfect as nearly as possible our "equipment" for our workers. This includes pamphlets and leaflets of instruction and suggestion for workers along the various lines of our activities, cradle roll, home department, young women leaders, local Women's Department leaders, organizers, social purity workers, etc. We hope to add to this from time to time as our department develops and progresses, but even now, these "envelopes" contain much that is helpful and enlightening, and we have had some very complimentary comments regarding them.

It has been decided to offer to send one of these collections to any missionary or other church official who would like to have one and will take the trouble of sending us his name and address accompanying request. We have been very glad to forward these materials and literature in the past, to several forward-looking men who have found that an intelligent comprehension of the ideals and objectives, methods and machinery of the Women's Department is a distinct asset to them in their labors for the church. We desire that all others who feel similarly shall be supplied, and will gladly send upon request.

Address Women's Department, Box 255, Independence, Missouri.

One other announcement. Happily we arranged, a short while ago, for the church publishing department to handle our publications which are for sale. These include our yearbooks, Oriole and Temple Builder manuals, our three leaflet courses, and some of the social purity books and pamphlets we are recommending. Orders for these may be addressed directly to the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri. Accompany orders with money to avoid delay.

Gift to the Department

On Friday forenoon, Bishop Richard Bullard appeared before the institute assembly and formally presented the department with a check for $250. About half of this was contributed by various Saints among whom the brother has labored and a list of whose names was submitted with the check. The balance is a gift from the brother himself, all of which he has earned by the sale of table covers, runners, dresser scarfs, and the like, which he has embroidered in his moments of leisure or insomnia.

This gift is most appreciated, for the desires of our executives have ever been far in advance of their facilities, so far as finance is concerned. Had we had the means, the invitation to attend our educational meeting, for instance, would in many instances have been accompanied by the money for carfare, for we feel that it would have been greatly to our interest to have every organizer present. Had we the means, we would be sending into every district of the church distinct educational matter—exhibits which would drive many a truth straight home; slides, by which information much needed throughout the church could be disseminated; films, through the use of which many lessons of life could be imparted; books and libraries, from which our women may obtain many a pearl of wisdom and counsel!

Is it wrong to wish we had many others who could and would express their interest in our work so practically and tangibly as has our good brother? Is it wrong to wish some good fairy would open other doors of opportunity for us, so that we may really take some full-measured strides in this time of hastening?

At any rate, we express anew our deep appreciation of Brother Bullard's handsome gift, and greatly desire to use it to the best advantage possible.

A. A.

Heard in Passing

"Well, your institute is quite a success, isn't it?" We wish we could convey along with the above words, the accent or circumflex which attended their utterance!

We smiled at the brother, knowing full well that he did not mean to be patronizing, but amused at his evident surprise. We replied by telling him a little incident related to us not long since by our director general, Sister Frederick M. Smith.

Sister Smith had had a little auto accident, in which the occupants of both cars had suffered some jolts and jars. Sister Smith, with characteristic coolness in emergency, took the name of the owner of the other car, its license number, names and addresses of bystanders, hurried a hysterical young woman into a drug store and called a physician who examined her and pronounced her frightened rather than hurt, etc. Then, after all details were carefully attended to, Sister Smith called upon a lawyer friend, told him what had happened, what she had done, and placed her case in his hands.

He looked at her, undisguised admiration mingled with amazement in his glance, and said: "How did you happen to think of doing all those things in the excitement of such a moment?"

And she replied by asking, "And how does it happen that perfectly fine and splendid men can assume that women have no brains?"

"I was so tired this forenoon that I thought I should stay home and rest this afternoon, but I couldn't bring myself to stay away, and now I am so glad I came, for I just wouldn't have missed what I heard this afternoon for anything," said a western organizer.

"Well, I have had one great eye-opener, that has paid me for coming," said another. "I had an idea that I was the only organizer who was overwhelmed with a sense of her own inability and unpreparedness for her work. It has done me a world of good to hear the other sisters tell of their timidity and occasional discouragements, and I have found in their zeal and persistency a lesson for myself."

"This," said a prominent church official who was seen occasionally in our meetings, "is the most educational thing of its kind the church has ever pulled off. I wish everybody might know about it, and get an idea of its magnitude and success."

"Outside of the business meetings of the General Conference, I consider this institute the best meeting our church has ever had. Its condensed and concentrated efforts have resulted in a most intensive training along the many phases of Women's Department work, and the attendants here have caught clear and definite visions of the possibilities which lie ahead," said a mid-west organizer who has been in close touch with church work and development.

"I am glad you started things out with that prayer meeting on Monday morning, and that experience meeting on Tuesday. It seemed to bring about just the right feeling, which has continued all through the sessions, and will accompany each of us home," remarked another. "I am so glad I came. I am going back with much encouragement and just full of enthusiasm and purpose!"

"My notebook is filled up, and I don't want to miss these good things!" worried another, and seemed relieved when we told her there were tablets for sale in the dining hall.

"Wasn't Sister Teir just a 'scream' in that playlet where she took the part of the slovenly, discouraged woman with the sick child. Her hair wadded up with a wisp hanging down beside her dirty face, that dirty torn dress and apron, and the way she took the latter off and turned it over when she wanted to 'slick up' for the 'friendly visitor' who called!" "And did you notice how she wiped the spoon the visiting nurse asked for, on her apron, and then got out that dirty dish towel to put on a finishing touch to it!" "And how she drank out of the cup from which she gave her sick child a drink!" "And those dirty little children she shooed from the room when she heard the nurse coming!"

Such were some of the comments on the "Friendly visitor" playlet put on Wednesday morning. Needless to say, Sister Teir's realistic playing of her part did not tend to diminish her popularity with the visiting sisters, who began to ask concerning the possibility of getting this "live-wire" field worker for their coming reunions!

"It has been my good fortune," said one of the lecturers, "to come in close contact with a number of your young people who have been in my classes. I have found them splendid students, all of them of a fair degree of intelligence and some of them away above the average. But with them all, I have noted an unusually fine moral background, a quality of spiritual vision and insight not ordinarily found in the youth of to-day."

LETTERS

Viewing the Masterpieces of Italy

President Smith is much impressed by the wonderful excellence of the artists whose originals he has been privileged to study in Italian cities.

E. A. S.: Brother Williams and I reached here last evening or about 4.30 p. m., coming from Milan, where we had stopped the night before. Our stay here will be short, however, for we shall go on towards London to-morrow evening, going via Brussels, Ostend, and Dover.

At Brother Halb's we found a number of HERALDS and Ensigns which we had not previously seen, and we spent some time "posting up" on the church news the papers contained.

In one of the HERALDS I saw a letter from me to you about Rees Jenkins's death and grave, and my statement that I intended to go to Damascus, etc. Well, we did not take that trip, for several reasons which I can better explain later; but when things are a bit more settled, Brother Passman will make the journey and see about the grave.

We left Jerusalem about the 18th of April, going to Cairo, where we stopped for a couple of days, then to Alexandria, from where we sailed the 23d on the steamer Milano. I think I wrote you about that trip, which for about two days was very rough, so much so that Brother Williams and I were both driven to our bunks, I missing two meals and Brother Williams four. But from Syracuse to Naples the trip was splendid. I shall long remember the trip past Sicily, through the Straits of Messina and past Stromboli. It was dark soon after passing Stromboli, and when daylight broke we were within sight of Vesuvius. I shall long remember the sunrise that morning. One look out the porthole was enough to banish all sleep, and for many minutes I watched the brightening east and the succession of mountain peaks, then dressed and went up on deck to enjoy the glorious morning. It was a sight to a prairie-raised person to see Vesuvius in the morning sun, the column of steam and smoke ascending from the crater. And then came the Bay of Naples, one of the prettiest in the world. To see it in the clear morning light enhanced its beauty.

The city of Naples itself is not so attractive as some other Italian cities, but near it are Pompeii and Vesuvius, and you may be sure we greatly enjoyed our visit to both.

We left Naples on the 3d for Rome, where we were for six days, then to Florence for two, thence to Milan for one night, then here. Of some of the instances of the visit to Naples, Rome, and Florence, I hope to write more specifically later when I see some of the pictures I hope I have gotten. As an amateur photographer yourself, I know you will understand that expression. In my memory of the visit to Rome and Florence, one thing stands out prominently—Michelangelo. Of course I had read of him, and of course I had seen descriptions and copies of some of his work, but to fall under the spell of his work one must see the originals. While I saw in Rome and Florence many of his works of art, four of his masterpieces have impressed me especially, and their influence will, I am sure, leave its effect upon me the rest of my life: Saint Peter's, his marbles of "Moses" and

"David," and his painting of "The holy family." Of the influence upon me by those masterpieces I hope to tell our people somewhat, later.

How happy I should be if I knew that somewhere among our people was budding genius holding promise of approximating the excellence of Michelangelo, Raphael, or Donatello. I saw many so-called masterpieces by other artists where there was almost faultless execution, but where the conception was awry; but when one looks upon a work of the great master sculptor and painter, one's keen enjoyment is never marred by incongruities nor bald fanaticism; he can rejoice in seeing a splendid concept faultlessly executed by an errorless technique. And more fixed than ever has become my conviction that those of the "impressionistic" school are working on a wrong basis, and their influence on art has not been wholesome.

It may be, of course, that the present impressionists are occupying an extreme position from a correct principle; but I am heartily glad that in sculpture at least there is to be found the exquisite detail so characteristic of both painting and sculpture of the old masters. I imagine I can here hear some "artist" grunt, "You don't know what you are talking about." Perhaps I don't; but art should be for the layman as well as the artist, and it is the duty of the artist to portray his concept clearly to the observer, layman or artist, and art should be as unequivocal as literature. This demands detail. Glittering generalities in writing without doubt have their counterpart in painting, but their field is clearly limited in literature, and no one thinks of eradicating perspicacity in writing as one of the niceties of literature. From this you can readily deduce, if you do not already know it, that I have no use, or at least little use, for a diffused focus lens, which has come into photography through the contaminating influence of the impressionists. Any softening effect necessary in a photograph can come as nature renders it in landscape—by distance.

All I'm trying to say here, though I may have been awkward in saying it, is that I have rejoiced in standing before the masterpieces of Donatello, Michelangelo, Raphael, Leonardo da Vinci, Fra Angelico, and others, to see the infinite and exquisite detail, and regret that more of it does not appear in present-day art, and to hope that sculpture and architecture may not suffer from the contamination of the impressionistic influences as painting has done.

What a center of art Florence has been, and is, at least in her abundance of old masterpieces. We were there only two days, and they were about as busy ones as I ever put in. We ran through a few of the largest and best of the galleries, stopping only before the masterpieces, and I was busy one day with my camera trying to secure a few records of the typical Florentine architecture.

In Rome we found our time far too short to see all we might wish, for it is rich in historic ruins and buildings, but by dint of vigorous work and constant going we saw one of the catacombs, the Coliseum, the Pantheon, Saint Peter's, the Forum, and several of the churches. But one of the visits which stands prominently in memory is that (in fact two) to the church of Saint Peter of the chains. According to the tradition of this order of priests, Peter was at one time in prison and chains in Rome, and miraculously these chains have, in a good state of preservation, come into the possession of the order, and now are carefully kept in the gilded altar of the church. It is a fine old church; but it was not for the chains nor the building we went to see it, but because in this church stands Michelangelo's "Moses." And what a masterpiece it is! By signs and various signs I managed to make it known to the Italian priest in charge that I desired to photograph "Moses," and got his consent; so the next morning early I was on hand with my camera. I made two exposures, and am hoping both will prove good. This visit and one later made in Florence to the Accademia to see "David," by the same sculptor I hope to tell the people at Independence about sometime.

Well, in a few hours now we shall be at Saint Leonard's

BASEL, SWITZERLAND, May 14, 1921.

A Visit to Naples and Vesuvius

The past few days have been crowded full of wonderful experiences. As I write, three things stand out, Pompeii, Vesuvius, the Bay of Naples.

Pompeii? How can I describe it? Think of your own town or city suddenly overtaken with poison gases—snuffing out all life, followed by an avalanche of ashes covering the highest buildings and topped off with a coat of plaster of paris. Then imagine, if you can, your city thus covered for nearly two thousand years and remaining in a state of complete preservation and then the cap taken off. Rip Van Winkle pales before the actual experience.

We climbed to the very top of Vesuvius. We descended into the crater. We looked over the abyss. We heard the seething lava beating against the shores—the thundering explosions of gas and steam. The earth shook under our feet; the sulphuric fumes choked us. Here, indeed, the bottomless pit. Our trip up the mountain was entrancing and glorious. There were three laps: first electric, then funicular, and last the cable. The last half of the climb was along a lava bed and at an angle of fifty-five degrees.

Suspended in the air on this last lap, one has a remarkable and unobstructed view of the entire landscape—a panorama of islands and mainland, of valleys and hills, towns and villages; but, transcending all, the wonderful Bay of Naples, circled by the city like a necklace of diamonds, the various islands like inlaid pearls. An entrancing scene. A supreme moment. The experience lingers like a baby's laugh, a mother's lullaby, or love's fond caress.

T. W. WILLIAMS.

George M. Hinkle at Far West

Statements which indicate he was not a traitor to the church.

Samuel J. Hinkle is very anxious that wider publicity be given to a letter written by his father to W. W. Phelps. This letter was republished in the Journal of History for October, 1920, and Elder Hinkle feels that it should be given a wider publicity before the church, in justice to his father, George M. Hinkle.

After the exodus from Far West, though George M. Hinkle was expelled from the church, he states that George M. Hinkle still remained true to its teaching. He had previously been wealthy, but through his association with the church he was left poor. In 1853 he located a few miles south of Pleasanton, Decatur County, Iowa, but soon after moved a few miles north. He never united with the Reorganization, though not opposing it. He was very much opposed to the position taken by Brigham Young and those who followed him. He passed away in 1861, before the Reorganization was thoroughly established in his vicinity.

In the History of Caldwell and Livingston Counties, the statement appears: "Doubtless this officer was actuated by the noble motive of desiring to save the lives of scores if not hundreds of his brethren in his actions."

Again, "Colonel G. M. Hinkle was a Kentuckian and personally brave and fearless. He did not fear danger for himself but for his brethren, and his course it must be admitted was certainly for the best."

These are statements from the historians of the world, but quoted in our Church History, volume 2, pages 262 and 263.

The letter from George M. Hinkle to W. W. Phelps, of which an extract follows, appears to have been first published in the Messenger and Advocate for August 1, 1845. This whole letter was published in the Journal of History. We are only extracting here those parts immediately pertinent to the action taken by him.—EDITORS.

"There is one point upon which I wish to address the Latter Day Saints through you, in order that the honest-hearted and ignorant-minded may be corrected, and the malicious-hearted slanderers put to shame. It has been the theme of many, since I left Missouri, to calumniate and vilify me for the course which I, as the acting colonel of the militia of Caldwell, pursued in the surrender of the citizens of Far West, Caldwell, etc., to the authorities of Missouri. Those vilifiers have stated it, and vociferated its repetition throughout the length and breadth of our happy land, and the newspapers of the day have thrown it upon the wings of the wind, and no doubt it has gone to the Old World, and there been listened to and credited—especially by those of your faith—that I, as a base wretch, after having the confidence of the church, yet in that critical moment of their perils in Missouri, when they in and of Far West were besieged by between three and four thousand men—the story is, that I, there and then, betrayed 'the heads of the church' into the hands of the military authorities of Missouri, and that, too, for a large sum of money. And then, as if they intended to heap disgrace upon me, after insult and injury, they said I turned state's evidence against them; also that I informed on many of the citizens of Far West and had them arrested and delivered up to the court of inquiry to be punished. And many such like reports have been put in circulation by my enemies to do me injury; all of which, before God, I declare to be as false as Satan himself.

"Now, sir, you are the man who knows more about it than any other man belonging to your church. You know that you, John Corril, A. Morrison, and myself, were appointed by Joseph Smith to go and confer with the commanding officers of the Missouri militia, and effect a treaty if possible, on any terms short of a battle. You know that we went and risked our lives with a white flag, when only a few hours previous the bearer of one (Charles Rich) had been fired at on the same field; and we did this to obey the order or request of Joseph Smith. Our object was (at least I felt so) to prevent the effusion of blood, which we all saw must inevitably take place unless something could be done immediately. Were you not present, sir, at that trying scene when the eyes of our enemies seemed to flash fire when we approached, and I received from the hand of Major General Lucas that unhallowed paper, narrating to us the terms upon which the lives of our families and friends could be saved, viz: 'Give up your leaders—your principal men—as hostages to be tried by civil law. Give up all your arms of defense, and all leave the State forthwith.' He also read to us that generous—no, that execrable—order of Governor Boggs, authorizing him to exterminate us, or drive us from the State. Now, sir, I appeal to your candor: Did I, at this critical moment, say to General Lucas, or to any of those with him, 'Give me a sum of money [Judah like] and I will comply'? If you answer in the affirmative, then query, Were you and the others of the delegation to go partners with me in such an unhallowed speculation? What! thus to betray our friends—our brethren—into the hands of their implacable enemies in the hour of their peril—and that, too, for Missouri gold!!!! Or if I did, as has been reported by men high in authority among you, winked at by all, and not contradicted by any—at least so far as I know—did I take the price and snugly lodge it all in my own pocket, without dividing with any of you? You know I did not make that treaty alone. Nay, you well remember that yourself and the others with us, by authority or request of Joseph Smith himself, agreed to the disgraceful terms. We then urged all to submit. But did I not then and there oppose that part of the order requiring us to give up our arms and immediately leave the State, urging that if any had offended by breaking the law, we were willing and even anxious that such should be punished to the extent of justice, or the magnitude of the crime, but to give up our arms and leave the State would be virtually throwing away our most sacred rites as citizens of a republican state, and that we would as soon give up our lives? Did he not become enraged and say that Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Lyman Wight, P. P. Pratt, and G. W. Robinson must be given up, and no other terms would do? Did he not give us half an hour to consult our friends? When the facts were laid before Joseph, did he not say, 'I will go'; and did not the others go with him, and that, too, voluntarily, so far as you and I were concerned? My understanding was that those men were to be taken and kept till next morning as hostages; and if they did not, upon reflection and consultation with the officers in the camp of the enemy, during the night, conclude to accept of the terms proposed to us, but choose to fight, then they were to be kept safely, and returned to us in the city next morning, unharmed, and time given us to prepare for an attack by the militia. During this whole interview and transaction, were not thousands of troops drawn up near the city, ready to fall upon us, provided those demanded as hostages refused to go? And when Smith and the others had given up, without any compulsory measures from us, did not General Lucas demand our arms, but on reflection agree to let us retain them till next day, inasmuch as it was then about sunset? Were we not advised next day, by word sent expressly from Joseph Smith to us, to surrender? When that intelligence was received, did I not draw up the forces under my command, and explain to them the nature of the whole affair, and then request all who were in favor of surrendering, to make it known by marching three paces forward? They made a very slow start, but finally all came forward. We then marched out with slow and solemn step into a partial hollow square of the enemy, faced inward, grounded arms, and marched away and left them. The town was laid under martial law and guarded. Then the authorities commenced taking others as prisoners, and kept them under guard to be tried, as they said, by civil law.

"No man ever knew me to complain of, or inform on any one. Uniformly when questioned by those seeking victims, I told them that all I knew to be guilty of breaking the law had fled from the city the night before the surrender. When the court of inquiry held its session in Richmond, I did not turn state's evidence, but was legally subpoenaed, as you know.

"Therefore, as to my course of conduct there, even under trying circumstances, while retrospectively I have no cause to regret. And during the time I was a member of that church, before God and all men I have a clear conscience, and am willing to give an account of my course at any time."

In the conclusion George M. Hinkle enters a most emphatic denial of the wrong which, it seems, as late as 1844 was being repeated against him. He called on W. W. Phelps to see that the misstatements were corrected.

Stewardships--Giving

The twenty-first of a series of letters by the Lamoni Stake Bishopric, addressed to the Saints of the stake.

We have learned in our former letters that God, through Christ, has made everything; that all is his. In this letter we wish to show that

God Is the Giver of All

Everything we have is a gift from God. We paid nothing for them. God never buys nor sells. He only gives. Owning all things and being perfect, he needs nothing. All the giving we can do does not benefit God one iota. It neither enriches nor impoverishes him. Giving does enrich those who give and those who receive.

What Has God Given Us?

"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son."—John 3: 16.

"He, himself, giveth to all life and breath and all things."—Acts 17: 25.

"He . . . gave us rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness."—Acts 14: 17.

"God giveth us richly all things to enjoy."—1 Timothy 6: 17.

"And he that spareth not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not also with him freely give us all things?"—Romans 8: 32.

"Do we not all depend upon the same, even God, for all the substance we have; for both food and raiment, and for gold and for silver and for all riches which we have of every kind?"—Mosiah 2: 32.

"Every good and perfect gift is from above and cometh down from the Father of lights."—James 1: 17.

Wisdom is one of these "good and perfect gifts." (See Daniel 2: 2; Proverbs 2: 6.)

Riches or wealth is another. (Deuteronomy 8: 18; 1 Samuel 2: 33; 2 Chronicles 1: 12; Ecclesiastes 5: 19; 6: 2.)

The land is another. (Genesis 12: 7-15; Genesis 24: 25.)

Also flocks, herds, silver, and gold. (Genesis 24: 25, etc.)

The Motive of Giving

Giving is an expenditure, but distinguished from all other expenditures in its motive. Giving includes not only the result obtained by the motive, but it includes that which goes before the gift as well as that which follows.

Do we give to get a return? If so, it is no true gift; it is an investment. True giving invariably brings returns, either in this life or in the hereafter or in both, but "the test is not whether the gift brought a return, but whether the giver sought a return."

We pay our taxes and get our equivalent in protection in life, property, education, etc. A true Saint should count it a privilege to bear his portion of the cost of his Government. Paying taxes is not a matter of choice; we must give whether we want to or not. Not so with our responsibility in our church affiliations. We are on a higher plane—we give because we love to give. The end of all such giving is to be abundantly enriched by the blessing of God.

True giving then means the giving of oneself with his gift.

"There is no true alms which the hand can hold;
He gives nothing but worthless gold
Who gives from a sense of duty.
But he who gives but a slender mite,
And gives to that which is out of sight,
The thread of all sustaining beauty
Which runs through all and doth all unite,
The hand cannot grasp the whole of his alms,
The heart outstretches its eager palms,
For a God goes with it and makes it store
To the soul that was starving in darkness before."

It is much more than a duty—it is a joyful privilege. It is a partnership with God. It is being "like-minded" as God. It is patterning after the Christ who gave himself as a ransom for the world. It is listening to his pleadings,

"Who giveth himself with his alms feeds three, Himself, his hungering neighbor, and Me."

This is the "unspeakable gift"—himself.

Giving a Part of Your Stewardship or Responsibility A Right Way and a Wrong Way to Give

"As Jesus taught his disciples, he said unto them, Take heed that ye do not your alms before men to be seen of them; otherwise ye have no reward of your Father who is in heaven. Therefore, when thou doest alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory of men. Verily, I say unto you, They have their reward. But when thou doest alms, let it be unto thee as thy left hand not knowing what thy right hand doeth. That thy alms may be in secret; and thy Father who seeth in secret himself shall reward thee openly."—Matthew 6: 1-4, Inspired Translation.

This command is clear to all when we remember what the Master has told us—what he meant by the term "hand." In Matthew 18: 9, he says, "A man's hand is his friend." The whole thought is that we should give unostentatiously—not boast to others. If we do, we get our reward here from the applause of our fellow man. Better wait and get our word of commendation from the Master.

Whether we give directly to the unfortunate among us, or whether we do it indirectly by paying our tithing, surplus, or offering to the church bishopric, it should be done quietly and with humility. Giving is primarily commanded as a means to develop our character; secondarily to aid others. He who gives boastingly fails lamentably to be "rightly exercised" by the act, and it availeth him nothing only the empty applause of men.

Giving is not only a command, it is more—a privilege. "Let each man do according as he hath purposed in his heart: not grudgingly or of necessity, for the Lord loveth a cheerful giver."—2 Corinthians 9:7. The wrong way to give is "grudgingly," through "necessity." The right way to give is cheerfully; give because we love to give. "But the liberal deviseth liberal things; and by liberal things shall he stand."—Isaiah 32:8. Liberality should characterize our giving. "He who soweth sparingly shall also reap sparingly, and he who soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully."—2 Corinthians 9:6. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. . . . Let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."—Galatians 6:7, 8.

Our giving should be systematically in harmony with the law given us governing giving. It should not be done in a haphazard manner. The time, place, and manner should be as definite as possible.

Again, giving should be done proportionately. Paul tells us to give "as he may prosper." (1 Corinthians 16:2.) He further states that he does not mean "that other men be eased and ye burdened." (1 Corinthians 8:13.) He does not wish us to give until we are poor. "Now therefore perform the doing of it [the giving of their substance to aid the church work]; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have. For if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to what a man hath, and not according to that he hath not."—2 Corinthians 8:11-13.

Giving—When to Give to the Individual and When to the Church

Evidently the Lord intended that the act of giving should be comprehensive enough in its activities to develop fully the character of the giver and to render needed assistance to the receiver.

Some claim that all giving should be by the individual himself, and not through any organization; others desire to have all giving done through the organization. Both positions are extreme. Generally speaking, the dispensing of aid should be through some competent organization, such as charitable institutions, etc. In our church it should be through the bishopric.

Whether or not the individual should himself render the necessary assistance immediately, or first investigate as to the needs and then aid, or leave it to the organization properly equipped to do such work, cannot be answered by a general rule. Every case must be decided upon the facts presented. Are the needs immediate? Has the person giving enough to supply these immediate needs? Is there an organization for such purpose readily accessible? Is the relief to be temporary only, or to extend over a period of time? Is the relief to be spent on consumable goods, or is it for a genuinely productive purpose?

Wisdom requires that a thorough investigation of each case, as time and condition will allow, be had. The properly equipped organization for this purpose no doubt is in a far better position to do this work effectively than is the individual; hence the wisdom of God in providing for this very necessary work in the office work of the Bishopric of the church.

"Ye yourselves will succor those that stand in need of your succor; ye will administer of your substance unto him that standeth in need; and ye will not suffer that the beggar putteth up his petition to you in vain, and turn him out to perish. Perhaps thou shalt say, The man has brought upon himself his misery; therefore I will stay my hand, and will not give unto him of my food, nor impart unto him of my substance, that he may not suffer, for his punishments are just. But I say unto you, O man, whosoever doeth this, the same hath great cause to repent; and except he repenteth of that which he hath done, he perisheth forever, and hath no interest in the kingdom of God. For behold, are we not all beggars? Do we not all depend upon the same being, even God, for all the substance which we have; for both food and raiment, and for gold, and for silver, and for all riches which we have of every kind? And behold, even at this time, ye have been calling on his name, and begging for a remission of your sins. And has he suffered that ye have begged in vain? Nay: he has poured out his Spirit upon you, and has caused that your hearts should be filled with joy, and has caused that your mouths should be stopped, that ye could not find utterance, so exceeding great was your joy. And now, if God, who has created you, on whom you are dependent for your lives, and for all that ye have and are, doth grant unto you whatsoever ye ask that is right, in faith, believing that ye shall receive, O then, how had ye ought to impart of the substance that ye have, one to another? And if ye judge the man who putteth up his petition to you for your substance, that he perish not, and condemn him, how much more just will be your condemnation, for withholding your substance, which doth not belong to you, but to God, to whom also, your life belongeth; and yet ye put up no petition, nor repent of the thing which thou hast done. I say unto you, wo be unto that man, for his substance shall perish with him; and now, I say these things unto those who are rich, as pertaining to the things of this world. And again, I say unto the poor, ye who have not and yet have sufficient, that ye remain from day to day; I mean all you who deny the beggar, because ye have not; I would that ye say in your hearts, that I give not because I have not; but if I had, I would give. And now, if ye say this in your hearts, ye remain guiltless, otherwise ye are condemned, and your condemnation is just; for ye covet that which ye have not received. And now, for the sake of these things which I have spoken unto you; that is, for the sake of retaining a remission of your sins from day to day, that ye may walk guiltless before God, I would that ye should impart of your substance to the poor, every man according to that which he hath, such as feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, visiting the sick, and administering to their relief, both spiritually and temporally, according to their wants, and see that all these things are done in wisdom and order: for it is not requisite that a man should run faster than he has strength."—Mosiah 2:28-44.

Here we have one of the very best revelations on this question. The prophet is here speaking of those who, if not immediately helped, will "perish." Immediate aid should be given to such, either by the individual appealed to or he should, if not able or if thought best on account of conditions prevailing, immediately inform the properly organized body to relieve the necessity. The individual cannot excuse himself for doing nothing by putting the blame on the beggar, for the good and sufficient reason that we, unworthy as we are, are constantly begging God for his aid, and he is graciously granting it.

The inspired teacher sums up the whole matter by saying, "and see that all these things are done in wisdom and order . . . therefore, all things must be done in order." God's house is a house of order. The needy poor must be taken care of, but this "care" must be inductive to a betterment of the needy individual, both spiritually and temporally; otherwise, harm will accrue.

Stewardships—Giving—How Much?

"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son."—John 3:16. This represents the highest degree of giving. The giving of his Only Begotten was without doubt the greatest demonstration of God's love. Any true father would far rather suffer than see his offspring suffer; would rather give himself to die than his son. In giving his Son, he gave himself and more.

We are told to be "like-minded." We cannot estimate the greatness of the gifts God has given. As said by a writer, "We have no instrument of precision sufficiently accurate to measure God's capacity for giving. The nearest approach to an analysis is the table of cubic measure outlined in the sixteenth verse of the third chapter of the gospel according to John:

Its height: the source, the motive of all true giving is love. "For God so loved that he gave."

Its depth: the test of all true giving is its cost. "He gave his only begotten Son."

Its breadth: the scope of all true giving is the world. "For God so loved the world that he gave his . . . Son."

Its length: the end and outcome of all true giving is life. "That whosoever believeth in him should have everlasting life."

Here is the divine standard of all true giving. If any of the four dimensions be lacking, it is not giving like unto God's; indeed, it is not true giving at all.

Giving requires a royal giver. Giving must include one's own self, or it lacks the essential element of giving. "Giving is the unselfish outpouring of oneself in substance." The very first thing to give is oneself. "First they gave their own selves."—2 Corinthians 8: 5. He who has given his life—consecrated his entire being—fully determined not only to die for what is right, but also to live for the right, finds no difficulty in complying with the law of

Systematic Giving

To give systematically means to have a system to govern your giving—an orderly, well-regulated method of giving, preceded, of course, by a well-ordered method of saving. Briefly, we have learned that this systematic saving and giving is governed as follows:

First: Make a yearly budget in which we are allowed enough to supply properly our needs and just wants. The Presiding Bishopric has provided a budget book for those desiring to use one. Send to them, or to our publishing house at Independence, for this book. The cost is only forty cents. This book contains much valuable information on the making of a budget, etc.

Second: In this budget book, keep an account of what you receive and what you expend during the year, living economically, frugally, yet not stingily, being amply supplied.

Third: At the end of the year, balance your receipts and expenditures and see what you have gained.

Successful Interdistrict Institute

Lamoni Stake and Des Moines District join in excellent series of services for departmental workers.

The Lamoni Stake and the Des Moines District met in an interdistrict, departmental institute at Des Moines, Iowa, May 4 to 8.

The Lamoni Stake was represented by the following locals: Centerville, Chariton, Creston, Davis City, Evergreen, Hite-man, Lucas, Lamoni, and Melrose. Des Moines District by Boone, Des Moines, Rhodes, and Runnells. The Fremont District was also represented by the district Sunday school superintendent, Mrs. Jessie Vance. Mrs. Vance is a very active worker and proved a help to us in the institute.

The Women's Department was splendidly represented by Audentia Anderson, and her efforts highly appreciated. In addition to Mrs. Anderson's lecture and round table discussion, there was a special meeting arranged for Sunday afternoon, at which time Mrs. I. A. Monroe, of the Lamoni Stake, addressed the women. We have reason to believe that all participating in these meetings returned to their homes feeling more determined than ever to coordinate their efforts in the solution of our great problem, the redemption of Zion.

The work before the Women's Department is of vital importance and we feel God is blessing them in their efforts. We pray his continued recognition and approval upon them.

The lecture by Max Carmichael on "The teacher and his opportunities" emphasized the fact that they are many and varied and if we are to take advantage of them we must have our powers trained, our vision broadened, and our devotion deep and unselfish. It was also made clear that the responsibilities of the Sunday school teacher in training the young minds is fully as great as that of the missionary, but at the same time is not recognized as much as it should be.

The discussion of the question, "How to hold the pupil in the school," disclosed the fact that the responsibility lies largely in the hands of the superintendent and his teachers, and not as some are continually contending, that the parent should compel the pupil to attend the sessions.

If the school is worth while, teacher acquainted with the pupils, other conditions such as light, temperature, building, etc., together with the general tone of the school are favorable, the pupil will usually want to come.

The observation that in many, many of our homes the habit of prayer has not been established in the child, the consideration of its value in religious training and its influence on people's lives, brought us face to face with the question, "Shall the Sunday school train the child to pray?" We feel that this is one of the most important tasks of the school and should be entered upon immediately. Prayer is the foundation of all religious teaching and living. How can we accomplish the work before us or build the structure without the foundation?

The lecture by G. R. Wells on the subject, "The aims of the Sunday school," made clear to the minds of the workers the necessity of trained powers and devoted lives.

The enthusiasm expressed in the activity of our institute sessions and the consecration manifested in the early morning prayer meetings, evidenced to us a deeper devotion in the lives of our workers and a stronger determination to train for service than we have witnessed heretofore.

Perhaps one of the most outstanding features of the entire institute was the pageant, "The ordinary home and church life versus the ideal." We are sure everyone who witnessed this could discern the great difference between the ordinary and the ideal and had aroused in them the ambition to attain the ideal.

Saturday noon found the workers ready for a little recreation. All went to Grandview Park. The activities here were baseball, volley ball, weiner roast, etc. A very pleasant afternoon and evening were enjoyed by all.

Brother John Dowker delivered a most splendid sermon appropriate for Mothers' Day on Sunday morning.

The closing meeting of the institute Sunday night was given to a lecture on coordination. C. E. Wight was the speaker.

We feel that the institute was a great benefit to all who attended and will result in a great amount of good.

The matter of holding another joint institute was by motion and vote referred to the heads of the departments and presidency of the Lamoni Stake and Des Moines District to be decided upon and referred to the stake and district conference for action.

MISSOURI VALLEY, IOWA, May 8, 1921.

Editors Herald: In regard to the dream I had the second night Elder Macgregor preached here in Missouri Valley, he is badly mistaken in the meaning of the dream; also this sister he refers to, telling him that I must be mistaken; I do not believe I am. They are both mistaken.

I will relate the dream in full, as it was given to me the second night he preached here in our church. I live just across the street west of the church. I saw all around my place old dead timber, and the desire of my heart was to work this dead timber up into wood. While thinking, two strangers appeared in my presence, and they were beautiful to look upon. One of these men did all of the talking. He spoke about the Book of Mormon. Said it was a true record from God. The thought came to me that I would get my little bucksaw, and get one saw apiece for the two strangers, and we three would start in and saw up this dry timber. The man who did all of the talking said No, that he knew a man in the neighborhood who had a big saw, and we would get him to do the work. This is all he said, and they started to leave me and went southeast. I started to follow them. I went a few steps, and a beautiful garden opened up to my mind's eye—most beautiful to look upon. From where I stood, the ground rose gradually.

The plants were set in rows like corn, and the leaves on these plants were as large as a man. While looking at these large, thrifty plants, these two men disappeared, and I awoke.

BEAVERTON, WISCONSIN, May 5, 1921.

Editors Herald: We have felt a message from Beaverton would not be amiss, and will tell you about the efforts which have been made to make us successful.

The departments of the church are represented in the branch, and everyone is endeavoring to put his shoulder to the wheel, which means progression. Beaverton, the Mecca of Central Michigan District, is making advancement.

The Sunday school, under the efficient superintendency of Brother W. E. Harder, is certainly coming to the front, and the interest of both old and young is shown by attendance and attention. Likewise the Religio, which is truly proving its mission—a place for young people. President H. Shrock is an enthusiastic, earnest, and faithful worker. With such a leader, we are falling in line to make the world better, and, with the help of the programs, small attendance is a thing of the past.

Life is what we make it. So it is with the church work. The activity and interest of the Saints show they truly are imbued with the spirit of the gospel.

How we enjoyed Brother Ellis's preaching for the last three weeks! The choir met about one half hour before meeting to sing the joyful songs of Zion; then he would preach a good old gospel sermon. He was here in February and stayed a short time, preaching to good, attentive congregations. The people were getting quite enthusiastic when he was called away by the sickness of his son. However, upon the return of the speaker, the crowds did not diminish. Towards the latter part of the series, two precious souls were led into the waters of baptism. Many young people attended the meetings. Truly we can sing, "Come, let us go to the house of the Lord."

We are continually commenting upon the fact that the training of the girls will benefit the women of to-morrow. Here is where the Orioles come in. Under the mentorship of Sister Fultz, they are kept busy carrying out the plans designed in their manual.

A normal training class for teachers is being enrolled and will soon hold its first session.

As a home without a mother is void, so a branch without a Women's Department is incomplete. Our leader, Sister D. Clingerman, keeps the sisters occupied in the different phases of that department. Just now we are studying the last lessons of relief and service work.

Yours for the ultimate success of Zion,

MRS. E. M. NICHOLS.

BEVIER, MISSOURI, May 9, 1921.

Editors Herald: District President F. T. Mussell was with us May 1, and Brother Alex Miller, of Hiteman, Iowa, preached for us May 8. Brother Miller has charge of the Bureau of Mines, Mine Rescue Car No. 7. They instruct classes in first aid work in the many coal mines of the country. Brother Miller's headquarters are at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

Chorister D. E. Jones is rehearsing some anthems for the June conference of the Northeastern Missouri District, which will convene at Bevier about the middle of June.

The past two Sundays have been very damp, and the number out not as large as usual. Sunday school and Religio are alive to the work. Each year sees an increase in the amount of Christmas offering. The minimum this year has been raised considerably without any limit to the maximum.

Sister Ruth Hicklin is back from the Sanitarium improved in health.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO, May 25, 1921.

Editors Herald: Early Sunday morning, the 22d, there arrived in Colorado Springs our newly appointed district president, the genial and enthusiastic George H. Wixom.

Southern California's loss is our gain, and we hope the Saints of Eastern Colorado District will stand solidly in support of our brother in all his work in his new field.

Brother Wixom spoke here both morning and evening, his morning message full of optimism and good cheer, even though he must have been weary from loss of sleep en route from the coast. The following are some of the thoughts he tried to drive home in his aggressive way: Stand for the right regardless of anyone else; think right and you'll be right; thoughts are things—they either make or unmake. He quoted one as saying that it is no disgrace to have an enemy, but it is to keep one—change him by love. We have not faith unless we demonstrate it in our lives. Our message is positive; the ministers of our church have no time to preach a negative message. Have faith. Be cheerful and optimistic—hell is full of pessimists; heaven is full of optimists. It isn't fear we want, it is faith.

He asserted that the Bible is interesting—not dead, and urged people to read it in a connected way, and be students of it. He pleaded for the support of all in his work here. We are informed that his evening discourse upon the subject, "At evening time it shall be light," was well received by the large audience.

Yesterday Brethren Curtis, Rich, and Wixom devoted their time to the reunion problem, looking over the grounds which we hope to buy for permanent location in Ivywild, near the mouth of Cheyenne Canyon.

Brother Wixom left to-day for Denver, and later expects, with Brother J. D. Curtis, to hold some meetings at Wiley, Colorado.

Our pastor plans to begin tent meetings in edge of business district here about June 18 on a vacant corner lot; we understand now that the Campbellites are trying to secure this lot for meetings. There may be a little excitement if they start to follow us up, for it might end in a debate. These Campbellite debates are good convert getters for us.

TABERVILLE, MISSOURI, May 7, 1921.

Editors Herald: The Saints at this place have been enjoying a feast of good things, as Brother Lee Quick has been here and held a series of meetings for us. His sermons were certainly inspiring, and our little chapel was filled to overflowing almost every night. The Saints surely feel cheered and strengthened by his coming among us, and a number of outsiders have had the scales taken from their eyes.

As a branch, we felt that we have been neglected by the missionaries, partly because there are so few in this (Clinton) district, and partly because we are situated eight or ten miles from the railroad. However, Brother Lee has at last given us a real missionary effort—the first for a long time, five or six years, I think. With his large gospel chart representing "The Lord's vineyard," and the kindly way in which he showed up the origin of the other churches, together with a "thus saith the Lord" from the Bible, he certainly made many friends.

While there the superintendent of the Taberville high school requested him to make the address to the graduating class at the commencement exercises, which he did to a full house (most of them being not of our faith) in the Methodist Episcopal church here. Everyone seemed pleased with his talk, and many favorable comments were made.

Desiring to keep the best part of this letter till the last, we are glad to report that he baptized nine precious souls into the kingdom of God while here. One of the number baptized is a very promising young man and a nephew of Sister Rose Hayes Roberts, who will be remembered as a former Graceland student. He is a great-grandson of the lady who sheltered and fed Brother I. N. White and others when they first brought the gospel to Taberville thirty-five years ago.

While we feel that the work here is on the upward move, with our little Sunday school of earnest workers, our mid-week prayer meetings, and preaching or prayer services every Sunday at our chapel, yet there is room for improve-

ANACORTES, WASHINGTON, May 25, 1921.

Editors Herald: There are just seven of us in this place; and two cannot meet with us though they are doing what they can to aid the work. We have a little Sunday school organized and doing nicely. It is true a few were frightened away by our name, but the rest are intensely interested; so much so that they prefer our school to their own.

The nice weather, with picnics and auto parties, has taken a few also, but we still have an average attendance of about eighteen.

We have our midweek prayer meetings and all get much strength from them. The Lord blesses us with his Spirit, and the gifts are not lacking.

We are studying the Book of Mormon and trying to fit ourselves for whatever is before us. Satan is trying to hinder us, but the Lord has promised us the victory if we are faithful.

Boy Scout Contest a Success

We are pleased to report the following results of the Boy Scout contest which closed May 15:

1. Nearly twenty new troops were organized under church leadership. Each of these will receive a valuable loose-leaf troop record book as a prize. The significance of this many new troops can hardly be overemphasized. We are presenting a list of these troops in another article. "Is your name written there?"

2. The first prize for the best set of pictures goes to Troop 1, of Lamoni, Iowa, of which A. E. Bullard is scoutmaster. This troop will have a choice of a large American Flag, or a bugle. Second prize goes to Troop 5, Fort Madison, Iowa, W. E. Sandford being scoutmaster of this troop. They will have a choice of either a large American Flag or an official troop flag. We are glad to mention that Troop 6, of Independence, is a close third.

3. For the article entitled, "Why am I a Scout?" the prizes are as follows: first prize, Harley Lorange, Troop 1, Lamoni, Iowa; second prize, Erwin Hutchinson, Troop 17, Sioux City, Iowa. No third prize will be offered.

4. For the best stories telling of Boy Scout life, first prize, Charles F. Church, jr., Troop 1, Lamoni, Iowa; second prize, Floyd Engstrom, Troop 1, Lamoni, Iowa.

5. For the Scouts reporting the largest number of merit badges, first prize, Dudley Smith, Troop 6, Independence, Missouri, who reports a total of 42 merit badges; second prize, Herman Bucy, Troop 2, Lamoni, Iowa, who reports 12 merit badges earned since the opening of this contest; third prize, a tie between Sam Brown and Kelley Anderson, both of Troop 2, Lamoni, Iowa, each reporting six merit badges earned since the opening of this contest. Each of these will receive the third prize offered at the opening of the contest.

It may be interesting to our Scouts to know that the troop committees of Lamoni have offered prizes to the local scouts for the most merit badges reported June 1, 1921. The results of this contest are as follows:

A Statement From the Bishop

The policy of the Presiding Bishopric is to keep the membership of the church informed as to the actual financial condition of the church and to make known the financial needs, believing that when the Saints know what is necessary, they will be willing to do their part and that they will find pleasure in the doing.

When the General Conference of 1920 passed the budgets for the fiscal year, July 1, 1920, to June 30, 1921, of $640,296.56, we called their attention to the fact that this was about $100,000 in excess of what we expected to receive from tithes and freewill offerings.

Even so, little difficulty would have been encountered in meeting this deficit had business conditions remained stable, for our receipts for July, August, September, and October, 1920, were in excess of the same months of 1919, as will be seen from the inserted table.

The increase for these four months was $24,489.66, but at this point, November 1, 1920, the financial depression struck the country, prices were shattered and thousands of men thrown out of employment. The effect of this depression has been felt in our church finances, and the comparative statement of the five months ending April 1 shows that during this period instead of an increase in receipts, as in the previous four months, there was a decrease of $99,480.27. Had the increase in tithes and offerings been maintained for the fiscal year, we would have had sufficient in the operating fund to meet all requirements, but as it is, on July 1, 1921, there will be a deficit of about $100,000.

We have gathered in about $250,000 on the Auditorium fund and over $80,000 on Christmas offering, so that our final report for the year will show a handsome increase in net worth of the church, but these special funds cannot be used for operating expenses such as for the missionary families, aid, Saints' and Children's Homes, etc.

The Order of Bishops has been giving careful and earnest consideration to the financial problem during its sessions the past two weeks, and is agreed to a policy of rigorous curtailment of all unnecessary expenses.

They are confident, however, that the members of the church do not wish the effort of the church to spread the gospel (so much needed at the present time) to be in the least abated, and are satisfied that the membership can be depended upon not only to pay their tithing on their lessened increases, but knowing the conditions, that they will freely offer of their surplus to extend the Master's work.

In view of these facts your financial representatives are undertaking their duties for the coming fiscal year feeling assured that the progress the church has made will be fully maintained.

The Isolated Saint

Those who are isolated have special opportunities, but fine discrimination is required.

The isolated Saints evidently suffer from the additional disadvantage of not having an opportunity for regular communion with their brethren and sisters. We cannot justly neglect the assembly of ourselves together. At the same time a man's integrity depends upon himself. Those living isolated are living under an equal obligation to keep the law of the gospel, for by their lives they set an example to others as a light placed on a hill, which cannot be hid. This refers to their family life, personal cleanliness, in dress, in speech, and also in thought and appearance.

Those who have taken upon them the name of Jesus are under a special responsibility. The world will naturally judge the church by the kind of members with whom it comes in contact. In taking upon us the name of Jesus Christ we assume at once a responsibility as his representatives, showing the results of the gospel of Jesus Christ in the manner of our lives. John, in Revelation, speaks of them as those who have received the mark of the Lamb—a new name, a white stone on which the new name is written.

Those who are isolated should of course strive to keep in touch with the teachings of the church by reading the church publications, and trying to get in touch with church services when opportunity offers. But our heavenly Father is not any farther from us when isolated than if we dwell in one of the central places, even though our brethren are more remote. He can still hear and answer our prayers, and bless us by the presence of his Holy Spirit.

The homes of such scattered members offer also a basis from which the missionary may engage in work for the conversion of souls, providing always it is a home indeed, and indeed a tabernacle of the Spirit of God.

Then comes a new question. Those who are scattered naturally feel a desire to bear their testimonies. Yet when we enter church services of others we must remember we are there as guests, and should keep order. Services called by others are not necessarily opportunities for us to make public address, unless that courtesy is extended to us. If the church is misrepresented, or we ourselves are misrepresented, in a courteous manner a request may be made for opportunity to make a proper correction. But if refused, we can by our examples set to others a pattern to observe law and order, by keeping orderly ourselves.

These meetings may offer a splendid opportunity, but to do so requires fine judgment. Some of our young men have found such opportunity in the Sunday school class, but always in accordance with the lesson, in presenting the features of the lesson, discussing them in an orderly way. So presented, people are usually willing to hear what the word of God has to say on the subject. Of course it is well not to attempt to wander too far from the subject presented before us by the lesson, unless it be clearly the wishes of those present. We must remember that by our example the work of God will be judged by our neighbors, and if we make ourselves disagreeable, we will bring the work of God into disrepute.

There are times for all things. It requires wisdom to tell when to speak and when to keep silent. We do not want to be backward. We want to let our lights shine, and let others know of the good tidings we have received, but as a rule such times will not be found in meetings called and held by others unless by invitation or consent. Opportunity may be found around the quiet fireplace. It may be found in the study of the Sunday school lesson, providing we keep before us the lesson to be taught, and in a quiet manner present the word of God, using the text set forth for the lesson.

We have known of men coming into a great business office and calling clear across the room, "Hello, Brother Blank, how are you?" and sitting down and talking for half an hour or longer. This creates a disturbance in the office, and brings up matters foreign to the work in hand, and takes up in an objectionable way the time of a worker. It reminds us of the farmer who said he did not mind one of his farm hands praying so much; he believed in religion, but he did not think he should do so much of it on his employer's time.

One of the best testimonies we can bear is our manner of life. So far as our oral testimony is concerned, our best opportunities are always to be found when we have willing listeners. Keeping their attention is an art. Progress is not made by expressing our own opinions at inopportune times. Those who are isolated have as much need to pray for divine guidance and wisdom as have their more fortunate brethren who are gathered in an assembly of the Saints. If anything, they have need of the greater wisdom, since the whole responsibility rests upon them.

It is a wonderful thing to consider that by our baptism we are born into the family of God, and our neighbors will judge that family by our manner of life. It is a great responsibility, as well as a splendid opportunity to show others by our good works what manner of men are the children of God.

The Value of a Diploma

One should consider the sort of school offering the diploma and what education is really represented.

As to the value of education, with the natural unfolding of the powers of man, and their full utilization, there can be no reasonable question. At times, it is true, some little by-play arises in various objections, erroneously, which by proper training we find more or less discredited.

A diploma is a representation of work accomplished, and it is well at times to note closely just what the diploma says, and what it means. The fact that one has completed any course of study does not necessarily mean that he has digested what he has received, and is able to use it. After all, that is what is essential—how much has been made a very part of the man. A diploma rarely indicates those who have thoroughly mastered, even according to school standards, the work before them, and those who have barely completed the requirements.

One school board turned down a woman who shortly afterwards became the county superintendent of schools. The same board turned down a man of exceptional natural ability, who afterwards became a leading factor in state department of education, and the head of his department of work. They also rejected the offer of a third man, who afterwards succeeded brilliantly in another place, and received even a measure of national fame from his work. In fact, that is true of both men. With each one, at the time they did not possess a diploma as a college graduate. The same board in rejecting these people, employed a man grossly incompetent in every sense of the term, but who possessed a diploma, with a degree of B. D. A very easy investigation proved that this represented only two years of college work, very poorly performed. These who had been rejected had completed three years of college work most acceptably, but since they were senior colleges they had not yet received their diplomas. Each one of them was much better prepared by natural ability, by training, by educational standards, than was the man who was accepted.

Again, we have heard all colleges condemned most severely because of some one who had graduated from a business college after finishing the eighth grade, or from a normal school, which at the best did not represent more than one or two years of college work. We have heard sermons preached about the awful tragedy of an education, when the only college attended was a business college, less than one year's work above the eighth grade.

Again, we have heard "learned" discussions over the value of teachers. One music teacher was said to be better because she had been to Germany, ignoring the fact that outside of the very few of the very highest masters, other work can be better given in America than abroad. It takes years of training and of unusual talent before one can get an appointment with these few experts, and then usually only for operatic work. Financial gain to be secured has drawn many of the able teachers to this country. The mere fact that one has studied abroad is not conclusive.

On the other hand, another teacher was strongly urged because she held a diploma and a degree of B. M. This is no final criterion for comparison, since in Europe no such a degree is recognized or given. It is a recognition, however, for a certain amount of work successfully accomplished. A great deal depends upon the school from which it is received.

Degrees have their value. One sometimes wishes that he had more of them; but only that thereby in certain quarters where they are fully understood, recognition might be given for the work in which we are all most concerned. But after all, for the test of the church, the question is, What do you know, and what can you do? Not, What have you so far received? Preparation is only a means to an end, and that end is the ability for better service.

Let Us Pay Our Tithing Now

The past two weeks the bishops have had an advertisement in the HERALD including the effect of the financial stringency on the church finances. The immediate question now is to cover the great deficit before the end of the fiscal year.

We appreciate very much the effect of the financial stringency on our membership. From certain rural districts the report comes in that there is not a single inventory filed by a farmer but what shows a heavy loss for the year. One farmer reports a loss of $30,000.

Some of our men have been out of employment. This has represented a great loss and has also gone heavily on their families and them.

Profits for the past year will be small. Business men have had to charge off losses on account of falling prices. There are but few who have not been seriously affected by financial conditions the past six months. But on the other hand there is a great deal of tithing which has never been paid.

There is also the subject of self-denial and consecration. The Bishop has called for a season of self-denial the last of the present month, during which he asks that our people, which includes the minister, the office man, the bishop's office force, in fact, includes every officer and member of the church, shall live on the least possible amount and turn over the saving to the church by way of a special consecration.

We present this appeal with the utmost confidence in the church membership and their desire to support every good work of the church, according to their ability.

The present work is to pay the debts of the last year, and then we shall face the new year with its problems with a clean slate.

A great work lies before the church. May we move forward with faith to its performance.

Activities of Some Church Leaders

The baccalaureate sermon at Graceland College was delivered by Elder Paul M. Hanson on June 5. His sermon has been reported and will appear at a very early date.

U. W. Greene, of the Quorum of Twelve, has been called East on account of church business requiring his presence in Washington. After completing this business he will probably remain in the East to attend some of the reunions.

By later advice we learn that President F. M. Smith will be detained in the East for two or three weeks after his arrival in America. Some pressing business requires his attention in New York City and Washington. By attending to it before returning west, an immediate trip east is saved.

R. C. Russell, after an active day in Independence June 5, left to attend the commencement exercises at Lamoni, Iowa, expecting to go from there to missionary work in Canada, which will keep him fully occupied for the next several months.

The committee on "Teachers' Edition of the Inspired Version," expect to adjourn June 23. The pressure of summer work requires their attendance elsewhere. Paul M. Hanson will continue his special work as an apostle. Arthur B. Phillips is in charge of the missionary work in the East; R. S. Salyards, who returns to his work in the Far West Stake, fortunately has been able to return to Saint Joseph, Missouri, or other branches of the stake each Sunday. J. W. Peterson will return to missionary work in western Iowa.

G. S. Trowbridge, general manager of the Herald Publishing House, was called to Saint Louis, June 4, on business, and returned on the 11th.

Patriarch Hyrum O. Smith left Independence on the 10th to be in attendance at four western reunions. He will attend the Western Montana reunion at Race Track; Eastern Montana at Glasgow; Portland, at Portland, Oregon; and the Washington and British Columbia, at Bellingham. He carries a dictating machine with him for recording patriarchal blessings, which is a very satisfactory method, though it gives him much extra work in doing his own transcribing.

Bishop Israel A. Smith was in Chicago, Illinois, and Lamoni, Iowa, on church business the first ten days of June.

Bishops B. R. McGuire and F. B. Blair were called to Lamoni on June 9, on church business.

The Sunday school consulting board is in session in the Battery Block and expect to continue to meet for two weeks. The great importance of their work would justify a longer session, but circumstances at present do not permit. They are giving very careful consideration to the work of the church in religious education.

Subjects Being Discussed Improvements for Independence

At a recent election, the citizens of Independence, Missouri, voted to spend $165,000 on an enlargement and improvement of the existing sewerage system and to provide additional equipment at the municipal electric plant. In commenting on the situation, the Independence Examiner says:

"Independence did a good day's work last Wednesday when she announced to the world that the money for necessary improvements was always forthcoming. Instead of being advertised as a town satisfied to run along in a rut, she announced that she was not afraid to go ahead. This advertisement at this particular time was worth a lot to Independence. In addition to this the town is going ahead in many other ways. Many new homes are building, the demand for building sites is good, plans are ready for new business houses, business is good, the streets are being put in shape. The water situation is being pushed as rapidly as possible, and right now there is a considerable talk among heavy taxpayers advocating the purchase of some centrally located tract to be made into a playground for the public, including a community house, swimming pool, tennis courts, baseball grounds, and camping site. Not very many sites are available and those which may be had are very expensive."

Art Work Popular

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur McKim have returned from a five week's trip in the East. While on their trip they visited most of the large cities in the East, and Mrs. McKim, who has originated several lines of teaching for children, made contracts in various large cities for series of pictures in art which she will furnish to the papers.

This is the third year that Mrs. McKim has supplied some of the papers with their art illustrations. Her first series was that of "Quaddy Quilties," the second the "Mother Goose Quilties," and this year she had a series called the "Dolly Folks Furnishings." The Quilty series the child could make week by week as they were placed in the paper and when the last one was finished she would have a quilt completed. The Dolly Folks Furnishing series when completed makes a completely dressed doll.

Mrs. McKim is a graduate of the Independence High school, a former teacher in the Kansas City schools, and a former student in an art school in New York City. She expects to go to the western coast this fall to sell her work to the western coast papers.

The Mother Goose series is running now in the Saint Louis Times.—Independence Examiner.

Good Work in Law School

In order better to qualify themselves for service to the church, a number of the Independence Saints have been studying law in the Kansas City School of Law the past year. Among them were Bishops J. A. Becker, J. F. Keir, and R. T. Cooper, the latter carrying off two of the six prizes offered freshmen. The school annual also carries a leading article by Brother Cooper. The total enrollment of the class was about one hundred and seventy-five. Others of the membership enrolled from here were Kenneth I. Fligg, Clarence C. Franklin, and Mary O'Reilly.

Auto Is Like a House

Alvin Knisley, a missionary of the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church, who lives at 127 South Park Avenue, expects to leave in a day or two for the Jackson's Hole country in western Wyoming, to spend the summer in carrying on the missionary work of his church. Mrs. Knisley and their son, Laverne, eleven years old, will accompany him on his travels.

The Knisley family will make the long trip in one of the most commodious motor vehicles that ever traveled out of this city. He has spent several weeks working on the body of the vehicle. It is his own make throughout. The body is twelve feet long, and five feet seven inches wide. In addition to comfortable seats for the family it is equipped with a fireless cooker, a water heater, a sliding kitchen table, several sets of large drawers for clothing and bedding, and a folding bed, and even a little toilet room. The car has a good sized door and several large observation windows. The family expects to make a rate of about one hundred twenty-five to one hundred fifty miles a day, being in no particular hurry. They will use the vehicle till the weather becomes too cold. Knisley can stand lots of cold weather, having been born in Canada. He has lived in this country a number of years and has been a citizen of the United States two years. Earlier in his missionary life he traveled on a motorcycle, later in a Ford runabout, and now is preparing to travel in a machine that is a residence on wheels.

"While I was building the machine," Mr. Knisley said, yesterday afternoon, "a great many people came to my house to see it."

The interest in this house on wheels has been especially strong among traveling missionaries of the church and their families.

The motive part of the vehicle consists of a Stanley steamer and the machine is equipped with Baker water aube boilers.—Independence Examiner.

A rather amusing item in the Chicago Tribune states that in a certain city in Illinois five young women agreed not to keep company with young men who smoked cigarets, and pledged their influence to stop the habit. The young men have formed an organization not to keep company with girls wearing skirts knee length. The ban has been placed on the half socks, on low-cut dresses, rouge, and even on silk stockings.

A surprising clipping from one of the newspapers states that three millionaires committed suicide last year. The idea that all people need to make them happy is wealth is a delusion. Added to this, there has been decline in value, and this has unmade a large part of the war millionaires.

The Rotarians of Omaha are standing sponsor for the Boy Scouts of that city, helping the boys to become more self-reliant citizens.

The Choice Seer

By Gomer T. Griffiths

The Lord desires that his people shall sustain by confidence and prayers those on whom he has placed responsibility in caring for the great work of redemption.

There are some among us who have assumed the position that the gathering or the building up of Zion cannot be accomplished by those who have been and who now are in authority in the church and upon whom God has placed the responsibility of regulating and directing the affairs of his kingdom upon earth. The argument is adduced that the particular work of the gathering and the establishment of Zion is to be done by the Lamanites, and that those who at present constitute the authorities of the church, together with the membership, are only to assist in this important work.

This argument is predicated on the supposition that Joseph Smith, the Martyr, and those associated with him in establishing the church in these last days were Gentiles, which accounts for the failure of these authorities to establish Zion in the past for the reason that the ones who were to perform this task should be literal descendants of Israel. Therefore, the contention is that the Lord will raise up a man from among the Lamanites who is to take the initiative in this matter, and the rest of the church are only to assist him and his people (the Lamanites) in the accomplishment of this gigantic and wonderful achievement.

Were it not for the abundance of evidence contained within the three standard books of the church which have been adopted and reaffirmed time and again by the church for its constitution and government, which proves the fallacy of this theory, many might be persuaded to accept this inconsistent and nonsensical doctrine.

Who Are the Remnant of Jacob?

Those who advance this theory place much emphasis on the statement found in the Book of Mormon, Nephi 10: 1-3, which reads as follows:

"But if they will repent, and hearken unto my words, and harden not their hearts, I will establish my church among them, and they shall come in unto the covenant, and be numbered among this remnant of Jacob, unto whom I have given this land for their inheritance, and they shall assist my people, the remnant of Jacob; and also, as many of the house of Israel as shall come, that they may build a city, which shall be called the New Jerusalem; and then shall they assist my people that they may be gathered in, who are scattered upon all the face of the land, in unto the New Jerusalem."

The mistake is made in concluding that the remnant of Jacob here mentioned has reference only to the Lamanites, and that they are the only remnant of Jacob that shall have part in this work. But in this same quotation it is quite clear that many of the house of Israel shall take part in building the New Jerusalem, and it is very evident from Nephi 9: 49 that there are many remnants of Jacob. In addition to this, it is also true that there are others besides the Indians who are remnants of the house of Joseph, or, in other words, the descendants of Ephraim and Manasseh, of whom it is written that they should become a multitude of nations.

As proof of this we have but to read the following statement from Genesis 48: 25, Inspired Translation:

"He [Manasseh] also shall become a people, and he also shall be great; but truly his younger brother [Ephraim] shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations."

Ephraim a Multitude of Nations

From this statement we ascertain that the seed of Ephraim, especially, were to become a multitude of nations. And inasmuch as Alma 8: 3 shows that the Lamanites were descendants of Manasseh through Lehi, and were but a small portion of the seed of Joseph, and that the greater blessing would fall upon the head of Ephraim, whose seed would become a multitude of nations, is it to be wondered at that in the patriarchal blessings given in our day the great majority of those so blessed are designated Ephraimites by lineage, though some are of Manasseh and other tribes?

This clearly shows that many members of the church of different nationalities, namely: Irish, Welsh, Danes, Germans, English, and others, are pronounced Ephraimites or Manassehites by lineage, which demonstrates the fact that Jacob prophesied truly when he said that the seed of those two lads would become a multitude of nations in the midst of the earth. Therefore the Lord did not have to reach out very far to find material from among the Ephraimites and even the Manassehites, exclusive of the Lamanites (all of whom were Israelites), to establish his kingdom upon earth and effect the gathering and the building up of Zion, and the salvation of the Gentiles as well as the Israelites. For America by this time had become the mecca for all nations, many of whom were Ephraimites and Manassehites.

Joseph Smith of Joseph's Lineage

Joseph Smith, the Martyr, was the choice seer of the loins (or lineage) of Joseph of Egypt (and therefore an Israelite) of whom it was predicted by Joseph that he would be the instrument in the hands of God in establishing his kingdom upon the earth in these last days, as the following quotations will show:

Inspired Version

"And again, a seer will I raise up out of the fruit of thy loins; and not to the bringing forth of my word only, saith the Lord, but to the convincing them of my word, which shall have already gone forth among them in the last days; wherefore the fruit of thy loins shall write, and the fruit of the loins of Judah shall write; and that which shall be written by the fruit of thy loins, and also that which shall be written by the fruit of the loins of Judah, shall grow together unto the confounding of false doctrines, and laying down of contentions, and establishing peace among the fruit of thy loins, and bringing them to the knowledge of their fathers in the latter days; and also to the knowledge of my covenants, saith the Lord. And out of weakness shall he be made strong, in that day when my work shall go forth among all my people, which shall restore them, who are of the house of Israel, in the last days. And that seer will I bless, and they that seek to

Book of Mormon

"For Joseph truly testified, saying: A seer shall the Lord my God raise up, who shall be a choice seer unto the fruit of my loins. Yea, Joseph truly said, Thus saith the Lord unto me: A choice seer will I raise up out of the fruit of thy loins; and he shall be esteemed highly among the fruit of thy loins. And unto him will I give commandment, that he shall do a work for the fruit of thy loins, his brethren, which shall be of great worth unto them, even to the bringing of them to the knowledge of the covenants which I have made with thy fathers. And I will give unto him a commandment, that he shall do none other work save the work which I shall command him. And I will make him great in mine eyes: for he shall do my work. And he shall be great like unto Moses, whom I have said I would raise up unto you, to deliver my people, O house of Israel. And Moses will I raise up, to deliver thy people out of the land of Egypt. But a seer will I raise up out of the fruit of thy loins; and unto destroy him shall be confounded; for this promise I give unto you; for I will remember you from generation to generation; and his name shall be called Joseph, and it shall be after the name of his father; and he shall be like unto you; for the thing which the Lord shall bring forth by his hand shall bring my people unto salvation."—Genesis 50: 30-33.

him will I give power to bring forth my word unto the seed of thy loins; and not to the bringing forth my word only, saith the Lord, but to the convincing them of my word, which shall have already gone forth among them. Wherefore, the fruit of thy loins shall write; and the fruit of the loins of Judah shall write; and that which shall be written by the fruit of thy loins, and also that which shall be written by the fruit of the loins of Judah, shall grow together, unto the confounding of false doctrines, and laying down of contentions, and establishing peace among the fruit of thy loins, and bringing them to the knowledge of their fathers in the latter days; and also to the knowledge of my covenants, saith the Lord. And out of weakness he shall be made strong, in that day when my work shall commence among all my people, unto the restoring thee, O house of Israel, saith the Lord. And thus prophesied Joseph, saying: Behold, that seer will the Lord bless; and they that seek to destroy him, shall be confounded: for this promise, of which I have obtained of the Lord, of the fruit of thy loins, shall be fulfilled. Behold, I am sure of the fulfilling of this promise. And his name shall be called after me; and it shall be after the name of his father."—2 Nephi 2: 10-29.

Hence, who can deny, in the face of the evidence contained in the above quotations from the Bible and Book of Mormon, that Joseph Smith the Martyr was the choice seer that was to be the instrument in the hands of God in setting up his kingdom upon the earth, as the predictions regarding the character and the work he was to perform are identical in both books, even his very name being given. In the Bible his name is given as "Joseph" and it states that it would be after the name of his father, and all who are familiar with church history know that the name of the Martyr's father was "Joseph" also.

The Book of Mormon states that he would be named after Joseph of Egypt and also that it would be after the name of his father. Both statements agree that the writings of Joseph's loins (the Lamanites) and the writings of Judah's loins (the Jews) would be joined together in the latter days, and it is the consensus of opinion throughout the church that the Bible and the Book of Mormon are the writings here referred to.

Decision of Joint Council

In this connection we call the attention of the reader to the decision rendered by the joint council of the First Presidency and Quorum of Twelve, in May, 1865, when the following resolution was unanimously adopted: "Resolved, That the First Presidency and the Quorum of Twelve declare to the church that the choice seer spoken of in the Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 2, is Joseph Smith, the Martyr," and this decision has never been annulled.

The preponderance of evidence given above as taken from the Bible and Book of Mormon, and that which we herewith present from the revelations given in these last days, not only prove that Joseph Smith the Martyr was of the chosen seed, but that those upon whom the Lord conferred the priesthood and who were associated with him in establishing the latter-day work were also of the house of Israel by lineage.

"Therefore, thus saith the Lord unto you, with whom the priesthood hath continued through the lineage of your fathers, for ye are lawful heirs, according to the flesh, and have been hid from the world with Christ in God: therefore your life and the priesthood hath remained, and must needs remain, through you and your lineage, until the restoration of all things spoken by the mouths of all the holy prophets since the world began. Therefore, blessed are ye if ye continue in my goodness, a light unto the Gentiles, and through this priesthood, a savior unto my people Israel. The Lord hath said it. Amen."—Doctrine and Covenants 84: 3, 4.

It should be especially noted that these men were "lawful heirs according to the flesh."

"Behold, I say unto you, The redemption of Zion must needs come by power; therefore I will raise up unto my people a man, who shall lead them like as Moses led the children of Israel, for ye are the children of Israel, and of the seed of Abraham."—Doctrine and Covenants 100: 3.

Literal Descendants of Abraham

The statement here given, that these men were literal descendants of Abraham, is both plain and emphatic.

"For unto you (the twelve), and those (the first presidency), who are appointed with you, to be your counselors and your leaders, is the power of this priesthood given, for the last days and for the last time, in the which is the dispensation of the fullness of times, which power you hold in connection with all those who have received a dispensation at any time from the beginning of the creation; for verily I say unto you, The keys of the dispensation which ye have received, have come down from the fathers, and last of all, being sent down from heaven unto you."—Doctrine and Covenants 105: 12.

Is it not a fact that the Lord used the descendants of Israel to establish his work among his own people and among the Gentiles in the days of Christ and the apostles? Was not Peter the instrument by whom God transferred the gospel from the house of Israel to the Gentiles? Was not Paul an apostle to the Gentiles, and does he not say that he was of the tribe of Benjamin? In view of this, may we not expect God to use the same method in establishing his church in these days as he did then? Is it reasonable to suppose that our heavenly Father would send from the courts above those who were literal descendants of Israel, namely: John the Baptist, and Peter, James, and John of the apostles (Doctrine and Covenants 26: 23), to confer the holy priesthoods upon men who were not literal descendants of Israel, to establish his church and bring to pass the restoration of the house of Israel and the redemption of Zion? As a matter of fact, the foregoing evidence proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that he did use those of the chosen seed to accomplish his designs in these last days.

Not Necessarily a Lamanite

However, there are some who would have us believe that the seer referred to in the Book of Mormon is a different person than the one spoken of in the Bible, and that he was to be a Lamanite, basing their conclusion on what is found in 2 Nephi 2: 46, 47, which is as follows:

"And there shall arise up one mighty among them, who shall do much good, both in word and in deed, being an instrument in the hands of God, with exceeding faith, to work mighty wonders, and to do that which is great in the sight of God, unto the bringing to pass much restoration to the house of Israel, and unto the seed of thy brethren."

But the argument used in support of this position is far-fetched and erroneous, for the reason that it is not said that this mighty man that the Lord would raise up from among the Lamanites was to be a seer, prophet, or apostle. Moreover, he would not be brought forth until after the gospel had been introduced to the Lamanites through the choice seer. In this regard, Joseph Smith, the choice seer, received the following commandment in relation to the Lamanites: "And now, behold, I say unto you that you shall go unto the Lamanites, and preach my gospel unto them; and inasmuch as they receive thy teachings, thou shalt cause my church to be established among them."—Doctrine and Covenants 27: 3. This commandment was in keeping with the inspired predications made in the Bible and Book of Mormon (see Genesis 50: 30 and 2 Nephi 2: 18), that a seer would be raised up and would carry the word unto the seed of the loins of Joseph, or the Lamanites. We are thankful that hundreds of the Lamanites have received the gospel and many of them have had the priesthood conferred upon them, who are preaching and baptizing among their own people. But this great and mighty man that the Lord was to raise up from among the Lamanites has not yet made his appearance, notwithstanding the fact that the church has been in existence ninety-one years. "O consistency, thou art a jewel!"

Must Be President of Melchisedec Priesthood

It is an indisputable fact that the man through whom the Lord is to direct the gathering and the building up of Zion (New Jerusalem) must be the president of the Melchisedec priesthood and of the church, a prophet, seer, and revelator, and a literal descendant of Israel, and the only one who can receive commandments and revelations which have to do with directing the gathering and the establishment of Zion.

"But, behold, verily, verily I say unto thee, No one shall be appointed to receive commandments and revelations in this church excepting my servant Joseph Smith, jr., for he receiveth them even as Moses; and thou shalt be obedient unto the things which I shall give unto him, even as Aaron, to declare faithfully the commandments and revelations, with power and authority unto the church."—Doctrine and Covenants 27: 2.

"O hearken, ye elders of my church, and give ear to the words which I shall speak unto you: for, behold, verily, verily I say unto you, that ye have received a commandment for a law unto my church through him whom I have appointed unto you, to receive commandments and revelations from my hand. And this ye shall know assuredly, that there is none other appointed unto you to receive commandments and revelations until he be taken, if he abide in me. But verily, verily I say unto you, that none else shall be appointed unto this gift except it be through him, for if it be taken from him he shall not have power, except to appoint another in his stead; and this shall be a law unto you, that ye receive not the teachings of any that shall come before you as revelations, or commandments; and this I give unto you that you may not be deceived, that you may know they are not of me. For verily I say unto you, that he that is ordained of me, shall come in at the gate and be ordained as I have told you before, to teach those revelations which you have received, and shall receive through him whom I have appointed."—Doctrine and Covenants 43: 1, 2.

"And I have sent forth the fullness of my gospel by the hand of my servant Joseph; and in weakness have I blessed him, and I have given unto him the keys of the mystery of those things which have been sealed, even things which were from the foundation of the world, and the things which shall come from this time until the time of my coming, if he abide in me, and if not, another will I plant in his stead."—Doctrine and Covenants 34: 4.

We gather from the above quotations that no other person, whether he be Jew or Lamanite, can receive the keys of the mystery of the things which have been sealed, which were from the foundation of the world, and of the things which shall come from this time until the coming of the Lord. It is emphatically stated that if the one who was then occupying in the prophetic office should be removed he would have power to appoint another to occupy in his stead, so that this office may be perpetuated until the consummation of all things, which includes the restoration of, not only the Lamanites, but all the tribes of Israel to their rightful inheritance.

Revelation Given to Proceed

In view of the right and prerogative of the one occupying in this holy position, the Lord gave a revelation directing the Presidency and Bishopric to arrange for the gathering and to make a commencement to lay the foundation of the city of Zion, or the New Jerusalem. We can depend upon it that there never will be a gathering or a city of Zion built which will be acceptable with God, except it be done through the direction of the president of the church and those whom the Lord has authorized to act with him, namely: his counselors, apostles, and bishops. Anyone who teaches contrary thereto is not sound in the faith and is guilty of teaching erroneous and false doctrine.

We should never lose sight of the decree of Almighty God, to the inhabitants of this generation, that through Joseph Smith and his posterity the kindreds of the earth should be blessed, as is recorded in Doctrine and Covenants 107: 18 as follows: "And as I said unto Abraham, concerning the kindreds of the earth, even so I say unto my servant Joseph, In thee, and in thy seed, shall the kindred of the earth be blessed."

It is also to be observed from Doctrine and Covenants 104: 18 that the inherent authority, the Melchisedec priesthood, is by virtue of lineal right, and if Joseph Smith had not been of the chosen seed he could not have occupied in the office of presidency. For this order has obtained from the days of Adam and must continue as long as the Lord has a church on the earth.

"The order of this priesthood was confirmed to be handed down from father to son, and rightly belongs to the literal descendants of the chosen seed, to whom the promises were made. This order was instituted in the days of Adam, and came down by lineage in the following manner."

United Faith Desired

In conclusion may we say that we believe we have presented sufficient evidence, from the three standard books of the church, to explode the preposterous theory that God is to raise up a mighty man from among the Lamanites, who is to come from South America (as some claim), to direct the gathering and the building of the New Jerusalem; and also have dissipated the inconsistent notion that Joseph Smith the Martyr and those associated with him in the priesthood were not of the chosen seed of Israel.

What the Lord desires of his people to-day is to double their diligence in his service and to uphold and sustain by their confidence, faith, and prayers, those upon whom he has placed the great responsibility of carrying on the work of redemption to its final victory. If all will act accordingly, Zion will arise and shine and blossom as a rose in the due time of the Lord.

That elephants and mastodons once roamed the coastal plains of Texas has been demonstrated by the finding of the remains of a gigantic specimen of the Pachydermata family, with tusks more than twelve feet long. The exact size of the enormous beast cannot be ascertained as yet.

The Sabbath Question

By James D. Schofield

"Can you tell me how Christ can 'redeem us from the curse of the law' and the law still be in force?" asks this writer, in a letter to an inquiring Adventist.

— — —: In your letter you cite my attention to several passages of Scripture as to why God gave the "statutes and judgments that were not good," but in this you have plunged yourself into a dilemma. You are jumping here and there, calling my attention to isolated passages, and the texts that you refer to are irrelevant and do not prove what you try to make them prove.

Whatever the cause that led up to the giving of that "fiery law" on Mount Sinai, the stupendous facts remain just the same that that law was the law that was the "ministration of death." Whatever the "sin" or "rebellion" against God, because they failed to comply with the requirements he placed upon them, he virtually said: "I will give them a law and judgments whereby they shall not live."—Ezekiel 20: 25. God said, "I will cause all her mirth to cease, her sabbaths and her solemn assemblies." God said it, sister, (see Hosea 2: 11) and the term sabbaths refers to the weekly sabbaths, that I have pointed out to you in former letter. Yes, God sent a famine in the land to hear the word of God; but what was that word? It was the gospel. "This is the word by which the gospel is preached unto you."

If your logic amounts to anything, it is this: Because they failed to hearken unto the Lord is because "all her sabbaths and solemn assemblies were to cease," and your very next sentence is: "But he said he would restore all these things when they repented and hearkened unto him." Is this the case with you and your sect? Have all these things been "restored," either by vision of your late prophetess or by general conference enactment? Do you practice circumcision ("circumcision profiteth if thou keep the law") that was a part of the Mosaic polity in connection with this system of "sabbaths," "solemn assemblies," "mirth," etc. Have your "jubilees," "feasts of trumpets," and your "offerings," according to the law, been "restored"? You remind me of a piece of poetry I once learned:

"You wired in and you wired out,
Leaving one still in doubt;
Whether the snake that made the track,
Was going south or coming back."

Was the Law Perpetuated?

To "restore all these things," is to argue for the perpetuity of the law, embracing circumcision, offerings, sacrifices, and everything enjoined in the Mosaic law. I called your attention to Deuteronomy 5, where Moses said that this old covenant or agreement was not made with the fathers, gave you the scripture that said that the ten precepts were the "added law" (see Deuteronomy 5: 22 with Galatians 3: 19); also that this law was only local for all Israel" (see Malachi), the "ministration of death, written and engraven in stone," that Paul says we are free from (see Romans 8), but you ignore them and make no effort to reply. You did not deny that it was the ten precepts that were not good. Special attention to this please: "The law was added because of [now note the words, because of, as some other law besides the ten-commandment law had been transgressed] transgression till the Seed [Christ] should come." It was the ten-commandment law that was added, and when the Seed came the old law expired by limitation. (See Galatians 3: 19; Deuteronomy 5: 22.)

With the foregoing thoughts before you, are you still going to have "all these things restored"? "How enduring are God's laws and commandments; they stand fast forever and ever."—Psalms 111: 7, 8. Yes, David said that; but I deny that he referred to the ten commandments as the basic principles of the whole Mosaic polity, as that whole system was "faulty," "for if that first covenant [the Horeb covenant] had been faultless, then no place should have been sought for the second." Can you not see the higher law reflected in the Psalms and the writings of the prophets? "The two great commandments in the law," were not in the Decalogue. "On these two [the greatest of all the commandments ever given, yet not written with the finger of God nor engraven in stones,] hang all the law [the statutory enactments, the ten precepts, and the whole thing] and the prophets," says our blessed Lord. Can you not see this law as described by David in Psalms 19: 7: "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul"?

Can you not see it portrayed in Romans 8, where it says, "The law of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death," placing the gospel law in contrast with that old law given on Mount Sinai? Can you not see from reading the Acts of the Apostles that the gospel is the "doctrine" of Christ? "He that transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ hath both the Father and the Son."—2 John 9. For "doctrine of Christ" see Hebrews, sixth chapter. Not a word said here about the ten precepts, yet a man or woman keeping within the confines of this great saving law, or the gospel, has "both the Father and the Son."

You want to know if Christ came to "abolish or to destroy the law." He came to "abolish," and to "fulfill" the law. I will give you the scripture for it:

"Having abolished in his flesh, the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances; for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace."—Ephesians 2: 15.

"For there is verily a disannulling [abolishing] of the commandment going before for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof."—Hebrews 7: 18.

"For the law made nothing perfect." (See verse 19.)

You essentially gave Webster's definition of the word fulfill, but there is no way for you to construe fulfill to mean to perpetuate or to continue. That word fulfill stands related to the prophets just the same as it does to the law. "I am not come to destroy [that is to say, "To do away with the good they have accomplished"] the law or the prophets." The prophets under the law are to be continued if the word fulfill means to "continue" or to "perpetuate." If the whole system remains just the same, Christ must keep on coming to "fulfill" every requirement prescribed in the law.

Now, I want to call your particular attention to Hebrews 7: 7: "For if that first covenant had been faultless, then no place should have been sought for the second"; and note Hebrews 9: 1-14, where the old covenant is contrasted with the new. Verse 4 of this chapter mentions the "tables of the covenant," or the ten precepts. See chapter 8: 13, "Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away." What could be plainer?

Now for the old covenant: "And he declared unto you his covenant, which he commanded you to perform, even ten commandments; and he wrote them upon two tables of stone."—Deuteronomy 4: 13. Who was this covenant made with? Moses. "The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day."—Deuteronomy 5: 3. Read it, sister, and please explain here if the ten precepts are not the synecdoche, or where a part stands for the whole, the ten precepts being the basic principle of the whole thing. Shed a little of those "precious rays of light, shining from the throne" the late prophetess had in her writings on the sabbath question.

Law Added Because of Transgression

You say that you have "about all the light you need on the sabbath question," so explain here a little, please. Also a little light here: I maintain that the ten precepts are the added law. "The law was added because of transgression till the seed should come."—Galatians 3:19. The law, then, expired by limitation. Well, Moses, you tell this intelligent body what this added law was: "These words the Lord spake unto all your assembly in the mount out of the midst of the fire, [Adventists are afraid of fire] of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice: and he added no more."—Deuteronomy 5:22. The law was added because of transgression (see Galatians 3:19). Like Paul, contending with the Judaizers of his time, I am fearful lest I am "bestowing" labor in vain upon you. (Galatians 4:10, 11.) "Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law? Do ye not hear the law?"—Galatians 4:21.

The very thing that you contend for—the Sianitic covenant—Paul says to "cast out." The two covenants are here contrasted. Of the Sinaitic covenant we read: "Which things are an allegory [a description of real facts]; for these are the two covenants, the one from the Mount Sinai [the ten precepts] which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar."—Galatians 4:24.

What, then, becomes of this old covenant, represented as the bondwoman? "Cast out the bondwoman and her son."

You say that Christ came not to destroy the law or the prophets, "but rather to fulfill or meet their design." Well, if Christ "fulfilled the law," does the law remain just the same? Is it not in the very nature of the case a different law? There was "a change in the law." If the word fulfill does not mean to "accomplish" to "complete," to "make an end to," then I do not understand the term. If I agree to build or promise to build you a house, and actually carry out my part of the stipulated contract, I have fulfilled my part of the contract. I do not keep on building the house. The promise has been "fulfilled." Christ enlarged upon the law; the old law dealt only with the overt act. Now, it is different in this respect: A man may desire and watch for the execution of the evil desires he has developed, and is therefore guilty of the crime, though he may never have committed the deed. "Christ is the end of the law." It is no longer operative; he put an end to it—it was a "curse," therefore "blotted it out." (Colossians 2:14.)

Whence Come "Moral Law" and "Ceremonial Law"?

Please tell me where you get such terms as "moral law," and "ceremonial law." You say, "The moral laws are such as grow out of the nature of things which cannot therefore be changed, such as the duty of loving God and his creatures. These cannot be abolished, as it can never be made right to hate God or to hate our fellow man." Oh, no, sister, you are mistaken; every duty enjoined, every obligation incumbent upon us, grows out of the two great commandments in the law; they are in the law, but not in the ten precepts. On these two "hang all the law and the prophets."

Now, sister, is there anything in the Decalogue that says for us to love our fellow man? Is there anything in the Decalogue that enjoins us to love our neighbors, to love one another, or a man to love his wife, etc.? "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy soul . . ." and the second is like unto it, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Our whole duty to God and man is defined here, yet these two great commandments are not in the Decalogue. See the point?

Can you please tell me how Christ can "redeem us from the curse of the law"—blot it out, and yet the law still be in force? I claim that the law as a whole was abrogated in Christ—not just a part of it. And if there are commandments in the New Testament enjoined upon us like unto those in the Mosaic polity, in the rewriting and the giving of a better covenant or law, they are only obligatory so far as they are comprehended in the gospel. The gospel is the law of life in Christ Jesus. Everything else is inferior to it, and as the moon borrows her light from the sun, all the light reflected in the types and shadows of the Mosaic economy was borrowed from the gospel—its fundamental principles were operative from creation—one system of salvation from the fall of man till now—one gospel for all time. "Though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you, let him be accursed," says the apostle. (Galatians 1:8.)

Your late prophetess indorsed Millerism, and Adventism is the result of Millerism. Mrs. White says: "In the great disappointment of 1844 they were not mistaken in the event, but only as to time." If ever a system was demonstrated to be a humbug, and a deception of the deepest dye, it was Millerism and later Adventism. In your sect that had no organization till 1858 you have no apostles, prophets—oh, yes, you have had two false ones; one said that the Lord would come in 1843, and the dear Sister White said God removed his hand from the figures and saw that the time was 1844. Miller said he would come in 1844, and the late prophetess never made a prediction that ever had a literal fulfillment; after a thing had been settled in general conference her visions were always in harmony with the decisions of the body—you have no seventies, no high priests or pastors, no gift of tongues, no prophecies, no interpretation of tongues, no healings; you do not believe in baptism for the remission of sins; in fact, you have nothing like the ancient church had to show that you are right. You do not practice the laying on of hands for the reception of the Holy Spirit. "Every plant that my Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." (See also 2 John 9.) Upon this platform I stand. It is safer than Moses and the law.

I just received a marked copy of a paper entitled America's Prophetical Weekly, or "Signs of the Times" and a number of clippings showing the immorality and the immodesty of the latest fads in the dress fashion; showing also that crime is on the increase, the climax being that the preachers are teaching that the ten commandments have been done away, crime the result. Selah. If there is an institution on earth that has encouraged lawlessness, riots, fishing on Sundays, a disregard for law and order, it is the Seventh-day Adventists. They do it by trying to break down Sunday observance and a disregard for the same by their teaching that it is a creation of the pope and no sacred day at all. It is very true that immodesty is to be deplored wherever found. But who set the example years ago when it was commanded by vision of the late Mrs. White that the Adventist sisters should wear short dresses or bloomers above the knees, one of the most shameful things ever conceived. Some refused to comply, and those who did make themselves so conspicuous as to attract so much attention, were hooted at till it was finally abandoned. This was probably some of their persecution. With advancement and civilization by the Christians at large, Adventists can see no good in any of it, hence they have developed a sect that is a breeder of narrowness and exclusiveness, and are ever ready to point out the inconsistencies of others and the bad they can see everywhere. God pity them and open their blind eyes to see the glorious light of the gospel.

This brother believes we are too faithless regarding the promises of the Lord.

"Is there no balm in Gilead? is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?"—Jeremiah 8: 22.

In one of the recent issues of the paper we all love so well, because of the truth it contains, THE SAINTS' HERALD, I read an article, with much pleasure, on "Divine healing," and as I read it, the cry of my heart went up to God. O God! hasten the day when the eyes of thy people will be opened, and made to see, that from the days of old, even unto the present time, God has always had a remedy not only for sin, but for sickness and diseases also. And this being so manifest, seemingly in amazement and wonder the prophet cried (as the Holy Spirit cries to-day), "Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?"

There is a certain class of people (Russellites) who very zealously indeed claim, "We must fill up the cup of Christ's sufferings." And they quote the words of David when he said, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes" (Psalms 119: 71), and thereby claim that the day of divine healing is past, that sickness and disease are God's agents to purify us and fit us for future glory. Let us hear what the word, from whence cometh our faith, says: "So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." But "how shall they hear without a preacher? And how shall they preach except they be sent?" "For no man taketh this honor upon himself, but he that is called as was Aaron." There are many preachers endeavoring to preach the word who know nothing whatever of how Aaron was called.

Disease, sickness, and adversity are some of the temporal consequences of sin, some of "the works of the Devil," which "Christ came to destroy." (Read Job 2: 7; Luke 18: 6; 1 John 3: 8; Revelation 21: 4.)

Disease is often a judicial infliction, in consequence of sin, and the promise of immunity therefrom is promised in repentance and reformation. (Exodus 25: 25, 26; Deuteronomy 7: 15; 28: 45-47.) Yet evidently some of God's dear children are at a loss to know why these things be. And like Asa, "In their disease he sought not the Lord, but to the physician."

Truly did the Psalmist say: "It is good for me that I have been afflicted." And why? Because in the sorrow of his affliction and bereavement, he sought the Great Physician "who healeth all our diseases." In his extremity he turned his face and heart heavenward and heard a still, small voice, saying: O thou afflicted and tossed with the tempest, "incline your ear, and come unto me: hear, and your soul shall live." (Isaiah 55: 3.)

Too often we, like the Psalmist, have our hearts set on something that does not glorify God, and with headstrong wills we pursue our own courses, oh, so diligently! We are so busy we have no time for prayer, no time for reading God's word, to find therein the very panacea our hungry souls so much need and yearn for; no time for meditation or anything holy; and so we go on, day after day, captives, "whom Satan hath bound, lo, these many years," until God in his mercy, seemingly after trying every precept and promise, has to stop us in our mad career downward by putting forth his hand and breaking family circles, or by laying us on our backs upon a bed of sore affliction, and thus making us look even unto him who said, "There is a way that seemeth right unto a man; but the end thereof are the ways of death."

But is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Who can heal the awful wounds inflicted by our sins, carelessness, and negligence? Yes, thank God! But "who hath believed our report [or doctrines]? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? . . . Surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows: . . . and with his stripes we are healed." (Isaiah 53: 1, 4, 5.)

Do you believe it, dear reader? Is there really a balm? Is there truly a physician who can heal soul and body? Yes, you say, I believe Jesus died, shed his precious blood, and gave his life a ransom for my soul, that I might have eternal life. If you believe a part, why not believe the whole? "To the law and the testimony." "If we receive the witness of man, the witness of God is greater." And "he that believeth not God hath made him [God] a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son."

Jesus not only died for our sins, shedding his blood that we might have eternal life in which we so much rejoice, but the same night in which he was betrayed, he took bread and broke it and said, "This is my body, which is broken for you." Methinks I can see him that night, closed in that upper room with his disciples, when he said, "With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you." And he took the three loaves wrapped in a clean napkin, after the manner in which the Jews kept the Passover, and as he unwrapped them, he took the loaf and said, "Take, eat: this is my body which is broken for you," etc.

Let us look at that Passover Lamb for a moment in passing, that Lamb, "the first-born," examined by the high priest, and if without blemish it was sealed or branded unto the sacrifice. Pilate said, "I find no fault in him," and taking the scourge he branded him. While the death angel was passing over Egypt, visiting every home from the king's throne to the lowest hovel, with death, those who put their trust in "the blood on the door posts," were safe from the death angel. While they feasted upon the roasted lambs, and gained physical strength for their hasty departure from Egypt, so Jesus, this antitype, gave his blood for our life, and his body, free from blemish, full of the strength of his early manhood, for our body, so full of weakness and disease, that we might by faith and obedience to "the principles" of the gospel be made partakers not only of life eternal, but may receive health and strength and comfort by the same.

The plan of redemption, as shown by the above, is a plan of substitution. If the Israelite did not furnish an acceptable lamb, that night he must suffer the death penalty. Yes, he took my place and made his soul an offering for sin, and in his body he was bruised and wounded, bearing our diseases and sicknesses, and "by his stripes we are healed." (Isaiah 53: 5.)

Paul instructs us to "put off the old man and put on the new, which is renewed day by day in righteousness and true holiness." "Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?"

Jesus said, "Ask and believe that you may receive." And how many times have we prayed without the least expectation of receiving what we were asking for? For us to ask for a needed blessing at the Lord's hand and not expect to receive, is to mock God. If your child, being in need, should ask for something to eat, and when you have gladly prepared a meal for him he would refuse to come to the table, and say, "I'm afraid father doesn't want to give me anything to eat," what would you think? You would say, "I'm afraid my child is losing his mind." And yet how many times we have done that very thing!

Please pardon me for speaking of myself in telling a little personal experience along this line. Ever since I was a boy, I had to wear glasses until six years ago. My eyes were very bad, especially the last few years, when I wore my glasses constantly. Then one day after receiving a special outpouring of God's Spirit, and answer to prayer, something seemed to say to me, "The Lord who answers prayer is also able to heal your eyes, if you trust him." In gratitude of heart for the blessing just received, I looked up and said, "O Lord! not for my own convenience, or comfort, but that I might be better able to read thy word, and render thee better service, wilt thou not heal my eyes?" And a voice seemed to say, "Ask and believe. While you ask, are you believing? Now, just now, Jesus does the thing you have so earnestly besought him for." (Did not Jesus upon one occasion ask, "Believest thou that I am able to do this?" Then said, "According to your faith be it unto you.") And I answered, "Yea, Lord, for thy glory I believe thou doest this work even now," and at once I took my glasses off, jammed them down into my side pocket, arose from my knees, and went to my work as street car conductor. You may ask, Did your eyes feel any different? No! but "the just shall live by faith." "And this is the confidence that we have in him, that, if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us. And if we know that he hear us, we know that we have the petitions [not the answer in full, but the promise of it] we desired of him."

When Daniel prayed, and the Lord heard his prayer, God sent the angel to tell Daniel, but the prince of Persia (the Devil) withstood him twenty days. (Daniel 10: 12-14.) For four or five days it was a mighty battle of faith. I claimed the promise. The Devil said, You don't feel any different. At times I could scarcely see to punch my transfers, but finally the victory came, and my vision cleared up in a wonderful manner. I have never had to wear glasses since, and my eyesight is excellent. "Faith is the victory that overcomes the world."

The power to heal the sick and the power to forgive sins were so closely associated in our Lord's ministry that the one was often used to confirm and establish the other. (Psalms 103: 23; Mark 2: 5-10.)

Miracles of healing next to his divine teaching were the most conspicuous features of our Lord's earthly life. And when leaving he said, "As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you," "Go heal the sick, preach the gospel," etc. Isaiah 53: 4, 5 is quoted by Matthew as an inevitable evidence that

PRODUCTION AND WASTE

At a recent meeting of the Research Committee of the Commission on the Church and Social Service in New York, Mr. Walter N. Polakov, a well-known engineer, read an illuminating statement concerning the waste in industrial processes. As reported by the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, Mr. Polakov said:

"It is appalling to see copper ore brought from Arizona to New Jersey for refining, shipped from New Jersey to Connecticut to be turned into brass fixtures, reshipped to Michigan to be fitted on automobiles and furniture, and finally shipped to consumers. It is almost incredible that we are wasting annually, up to 100 million tons of coal, which means about 100,000 miners working all the year round underground to produce coal which is burned for no purpose whatsoever. A survey of industrial plants throughout the country in all the industries would show that hardly 60 per cent of our means of production are constantly used and that, while used, they are operated far below the possible efficiency. Our statistics show that nearly half our improved farm land is not under cultivation; that during the past twenty years we did not increase crops per head of population by any fraction of a bushel; that little France, on an area smaller than Texas, produces alone nearly half as much wheat as the United States. There could be no end of quoting and substantiating examples of our waste and inefficiency that may sound to some like a fairy tale and to some like a speech of a prosecuting attorney. . . .

"Bituminous coal, even of poor grades, can be distilled at low temperature and yield fertilizer and ammonia, benzol (a superior substitute for gasoline), tar (the basis of most of our dyes), medicines, chemicals, and perfumes, and a surplus of gas. After these commodities are extracted, 1,400 pounds of smokeless, dustless, odorless, and tough artificial anthracite are left out of every short ton of raw coal.

"If the 400 million tons of coal annually burned raw for power production in this country were so treated, the following products will be obtained.

1,200,000,000,000 cubic feet fuel gas,
4,000,000 tons ammonium sulphate,
1,000,000,000 gallons crude benzol,
3,600,000,000 gallons tar.
288,000,000 tons artificial anthracite.

(These figures may need slight revision with reference to any particular grade of coal or any particular process.)

"The use value of all these commodities will be nearly four billion dollars, instead of two billions, which is the worth of Jesus was the promised Messiah (Matthew 8: 17) and considered these miracles of bodily healing as a fulfillment of that prophecy that he who bore our sins, however, bore our sicknesses also. If this quotation has no reference to our physical ailments, pray tell me where is the connection and explanation?

Miracles of healing are among the "signs" Jesus said "should follow them that believe." (Mark 16: 18; Acts 5: 15, 16; 9: 17.) But you say, "I don't believe in signs." If you don't, you fail to believe one promise Jesus made, for it was he who said, "These signs should follow them that believe." Why do you believe the sixteenth verse of the same chapter? Read it. "Let God be true and every man a liar." "Blessed is the man that maketh the Lord his trust." (Psalms 40: 44.)

the raw coal, and thus about two billion dollars would be added to our national wealth in the form of wages and profits. Private concerns are slow to realize all these advantages because of the need of large investments and new franchises. Municipalities, by underwriting such integrated multiple-production plants can serve the urban and suburban population with enormous economy."

The waste of natural resources is not merely a scientific, but a moral, question.—The Religious Digest, April, 1921.

WATCH THE MORAL ATMOSPHERE

It is high time that we teach business concerns that it is even more vicious needlessly to expose the morals of their youthful employees than it is to leave their bodies unprotected from dangerous machinery. The one ought to be made no less a crime than the other. But as yet the subject has been given no practical consideration whatever by the business world, nor by the parents who furnish the sons for that business world. Employers will hire the purest and finest of Christian lads and then subject them to great risks. Often they place them side by side with drinking, swearing blackguards, or with moral lepers who give them day by day their first lessons in low ideals. It is very rare, indeed, that even Christian business men seem to feel any responsibility whatever for the moral atmosphere and ethical safety with which they surround their employees. Often the lowest of standards maintain in factory and even in office. Cursing and blasphemy are heard continually, and in some places betting runs rampant. In some large factories, race track and other gambling is regularly and almost openly conducted by the "bookmakers." Yet to these very concerns must come, as a matter of wage necessity, the boys from Christian homes. Here is one of the greatest fields for moral reform in America to-day; and the church should create a public opinion that will bring pressure to bear to make our boys and girls, who go out into industry, as safe ethically as the law now requires them to be made safe physically.—Herald of Gospel Liberty.

GIVING "COLOR" TO SOVIETISM

Along with animism, Mohammedanism, and other non-Christian cults pervading or invading Africa, comes sovietism. Witness this recent official call issued to natives in the heart of Africa: "I. W. W. Local No. 123 will meet to-night in the second house on the jungle side of the kraal. Subject of lecture: 'Superiority of the soviet over capitalistic society,' to be followed by unveiling of Lenin portrait. Members will come prepared to sing the first and second verses of the 'Internationale.' Admission by red card only." By the time Protestant denominations are ready to undertake the evangelization of Africa in earnest, that continent will be in a condition to test their missionary mettle keenly.—The Baptist.

"Things are rather quiet in Jerusalem," writes Elder Harry Passman on May 5. "All the Jewish shops are closed and fear permeates the atmosphere. The streets are deserted after sundown and an attack is expected momentarily.

"In the quarrels which occurred May 1 at Jaffa, over 200 Jews have been wounded and 43 killed. This is only the beginning. The Arabs insist that they will continue to murder until England changes the tone of Balfour's declaration. Martial law is enforced, and Jaffa is flooded with soldiers, while Jerusalem has very few guards. I have written a news item on this and sent it to the HERALD."

THE SEMINAR

Sermon Outlines

By J. E. Wildermuth

Elder Wildermuth, of North Dakota, uses in his missionary work sermon summaries like the following, printed on a duplicating machine, distributed daily to the people in the towns where his services are held.

BAPTISM

Text: Mark 16: 16. Bible lesson: Romans 6.

Why?

Because Jesus was baptized. Also the other apostles and early Saints received this ordinance.

Is it necessary to salvation? Jesus said so. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." (See text.)

Peter commands it, saying: "Repent and be baptized, every one of you."—Acts 2: 38. Also see Acts 10: 48. And he also said: "Baptism doth also now save us." (1 Peter 3: 21.)

What For?

By three Bible witnesses it is for the remission of sins or to wash away sins. (Acts 2: 30; Mark 1: 4; Acts 22: 16.)

We must first have faith sufficient to repent of our sins, be sorry for, and stop them. And then, if we believe the gospel of Christ, we have the promise of a remission of our sins by baptism.

When?

When should we be baptized? Does it make any difference when? Yes, for Jesus said we must first believe the gospel. (Mark 16: 15, 16.)

Should babies be baptized? No; for they cannot first believe the gospel. Jesus took them in his arms, put his hands on them, and blessed them. He paid the Adamic sin, for he said: "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." (Matthew 19: 13.)

How? What Mode?

Follow the example of Jesus. He was baptized but once and in one way. All other kinds of baptism have been invented by some man since Christ. John was baptizing in the River Jordan near Salim because there was "much water" there. Jesus came and was baptized of him. (John 3: 23; Matthew 3: 17.)

Jesus said, "born of water." (John 3: 5.)

John used "much water" when he baptized. (John 3: 23.)

Philip and the eunuch "went down into the water." (Acts 8: 38, 39.)

Jesus "came up out of the water." (Matthew 3: 16.)

Paul said: "Buried with him by baptism." (Colossians 2: 12.)

He also said: "Planted together in the likeness of his death." (Romans 6: 5.)

Even the earth had to be baptized by immersion; by the flood, in the days of Noah, and Peter said: "The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us." (1 Peter 3: 21.)

By Whom Should We Be Baptized?

Does it make any difference? Yes, or our baptism will not be accepted of God. (Acts 19: 2, 3.) These people had been baptized, and by the same kind of baptism as John taught, but the man who had officiated was not authorized of God, for he had only preached a part of the gospel. He left out the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost (see verse 6). So Paul baptized them again.

Jesus went to see a man "sent of God." (John 1: 6; 3: 34.)

The Far West Stake Holds a Musical Institute

On Sunday, May 15, at the church of the First Saint Joseph, Missouri, Branch, there was held a musical institute for the benefit of the music workers of the Far West Stake.

We do not mean to infer by the above heading that the Far West Stake has done a particularly unusual thing, in the holding of this institute, for it has not. This was the fifth of its kind held in this stake, and the music workers there propose to hold other institutes at regular and not infrequent intervals.

We fervently wish every musical worker of every branch in every district throughout the church could have been there, to have seen how a successful musical institute may be profitably conducted; to have witnessed the life and inspiration that may flow through an event of this kind, as well as the evident substantial growth that has been had and which will continue to be had in this stake.

This institute was unquestionably an epochal one for the Far West Stake, for it not only marked the great progress of the past, but it outlined the strides and possibilities of the future. It furnished incentive to those who desire to travel the road of progress, and it evidenced the harvest all may glean who persist in that course.

This institute was also a markedly successful one from much more than a merely musical standpoint. From the early prayer service of Sunday morning to the closing strains of the night's program and the parting adieus of those who attended, there was a marked presence and power of the Holy Spirit. Many minds were fired and many hearts made to glow by the presence of this most welcome Guest. It directed the efforts of all along lines of intelligence, which is the real expression of God's glory; and it bore effectual witness of the acceptableness of the work with the Father.

We must speak in high terms of the great musical development that has been had in this stake within the last few years, and of the spirit of progress that is had in so many of the musical workers, particularly those of the three branches in Saint Joseph. If this progress is continued and this spirit is not allowed to wane, what may not be expected in the future!

Many workers contributed to the success of this institute, but several deserve more than passing notice. Sister Elma Scott, the stake chorister, and her associate, Sister Minnie Scott Dobson, had principal charge and direction. Then there was Sister Edna Christiansen, the organist of the First Saint Joseph Branch, who had to do a "heap" of playing and accompanying, as well as assisting in plans and counsel. Again, there was Harry Tilden, who had charge of the orchestral development of the program, and who was as relieved as anybody when it was all over and everything had gone so well. These, and others, did those vital things that determined the success of the occasion.

Brother R. S. Salyards, the stake president, deserves a passing tribute. He is an ardent advocate for the musical development of his stake, for he knows the good it will do his people. He is an enthusiastic supporter of the musical workers who labor to accomplish those things, for he recognizes them as fellow laborers in a glorious cause.

We must not close without a word as to the character of the Sunday afternoon session, which was almost entirely institutional and educational. Such sessions frequently have a tendency to be "dry," but this one certainly was not. All of the things presented were of a high order, intelligent, timely, and instructive. We secured three of them for our column, and have reproduced them (slightly condensed) for the benefit of our readers, and they follow immediately after this article.

The program follows, and it will show more fully as to the high character of the various numbers rendered.

Orchestral and Band Work at Guilford, Missouri

In the year 1915, desiring to encourage the musically inclined young people of Guilford and vicinity, I issued an invitation for a meeting. Ten young men and four young women responded and a band was organized, parts assigned, committees appointed, one to draft a constitution and the other to secure a place for rehearsal, and everybody "got busy." The writer was chosen to instruct and conduct all musical work. In the course of a few weeks an abandoned Methodist church was secured for practice, and all went well and many an occasion was made more enjoyable by the music rendered by these willing workers. All such services were given free and we received much support from the business men of the town.

But the cruel war broke our ranks and shattered our hopes. Some were soon in far-away France, responding to the army bugle, and we were never able to again rally our forces.

During this same period of time, several who were interested in the violin succeeded in securing an instructor to come to Guilford, give instruction, and these by this time had mastered their instruments sufficiently so that we could then organize an orchestra of twelve pieces, five violins, two cornets, two clarinets, one cello, one baritone, and one mellophone. Six of these were Latter Day Saints.

This was in 1917. The Chautauqua committee finding they were about to run behind financially began to wonder what they would do. Our orchestra volunteered to put on the musical part of an extra day's program if the committee would furnish the lecturer for the two programs of the day and pay for the music used for the occasion. This proved such a success, both financially and musically, that our forces were enthused; several felt the call and began to prepare for service.

Winter now came on and somewhat checked our enthusiasm, but we kept on talking orchestra and music until we could count sixteen members, the majority of whom were Latter Day Saints. We had been meeting in private homes for practice, but now we concluded to have our rehearsals in the church. This move caused a few nonchurch members to desert us, but we continued with determination to make it a church and Sunday school orchestra, which we have succeeded in doing.

In the winter of 1918-1919 we again talked band, and in the spring we succeeded in organizing and getting Brother D. F. Gifford, of Saint Joseph, to come once a week and instruct us. Brother Gifford had to leave us too soon, however, to take up other work on account of the high cost of living. Although we felt badly at losing him, we continued our work through 1920, and with the beginning of 1921 Brother Samuel Twombly was chosen as our pastor, who, being much impressed with our efforts, proceeded to organize the musical department of the branch, placing in it all of the local musical activities. Music was ordered for both choir and orchestra and the eleven o'clock hour of the second Sunday of each month was given us to use as we wished, which we have done very profitably.

We are convinced that music will be one of the leading features in the coming great events of the church, and we as a people must learn to heed the instruction of the Lord in regard to music. (Doctrine and Covenants 119: 6.) May God bless our efforts to the honor and glory of his work here on earth.

WILLIAM T. ROSS.

The Third Branch Orchestra

The Third Branch Orchestra had its inception in the year 1918. To begin with, there was a piano, a violin, a cornet, and a guitar. We must mention the untiring efforts of our pianist at this time, Sister Jones; and the Sunday school chorister, Sister Ruoff, who worked diligently under difficulties that at times seemed insurmountable. These faithful few rendered service at the Sunday school sessions, and in the year 1919 we had an addition of five instruments. We continued to struggle along under discouraging circumstances, but ever with a persistent effort towards a fixed purpose and ever with a desire to render service. In the year 1920 four more instruments joined with us and we secured Mr. Dallas Gifford as conductor, and oh! if I could only express at this time our feelings of pride and hope when we were able to secure such a competent leader. May his praises be sung in the highest for the kindly and untiring efforts he exercised in promoting as far as possible this untutored, inexperienced, yet energetic group.

We always had with us a hunger and a thirst to advance, and we are going to work, work, work until the thing we desire shall be accomplished. We have had our joys and our sorrows; our hopes and our fears; but the thing most encouraging is the fact that God saw fit to recognize our efforts with approval and a promise of greater success if we would continue to render our services in love and unity. We have great encouragement at the present time from our pastor, Brother V. M. Goodrich, and in this we are all rejoicing.

Now we have set our faces Zionward, and great are our hopes and aspirations. We are individually seeking to perfect ourselves on our instruments. We are nearly all under competent instructors and are studying to show ourselves "approved." At present the orchestra entire is under the direction of Professor Raze. The following instruments and players comprise our orchestra: First violin, Fred Turnbull, Lois Turnbull, Marvin Turnbull; flute, Thomas Hale; clarinets, Vera Stanford, Merna Liggett; saxophones, A. N. Brown, Mrs. A. N. Brown; cornet, John Ruoff; tenor, Mrs. Turnbull; trombone, Samuel Woodside; drum, Julian Mason; piano, Clover Webb.

MRS. MAUDE BROWN.

Choir Development in Far West Stake

In visioning the choir development of the Far West Stake we wish to review the work accomplished to date. We started out beautifully. Our first effort was Gillett's "The light everlasting," which we sang at the First Saint Joseph Branch with sixty-five voices, and later repeated it at the Second and Third Saint Joseph Branches. At the following reunion, in August, we gave it with the full support of the First, Second, and Third Saint Joseph, South Park Mission, Maple Grove, and Stewartville choirs. These efforts were followed by miscellaneous programs or a cantata at each succeeding conference or reunion, among them Maunder's "Olivet to Calvary."

I am sure not one who took part on these occasions can but say that it proved a source of real joy to participate in these programs. We were benefiting some one else as well as ourselves, and above all, we were using the talents God has given us in his service. And did it not thrill everyone with a desire to gather our choirs together and work to accomplish greater things? Of course, and that is our aim.

We might submit to you a plan which we believe would work out well in the advancement of this department. We could have probably three or four groups of say twenty or more voices each, who would be preparing themselves to give a program, possibly at Guilford, the Alma Branch, Cameron, or wherever opportunity should be given. To make up these groups we could select four or five voices from Stewartville, a few from Guilford, Ross Grove, and other points, always, of course, being careful to have a well-balanced group, also using caution that the voices blended well. We would be careful, too, that the voices for each group were close enough together so that a general practice could be called whenever deemed necessary.

We have no doubt but what our calls for service would be numerous and we would find ourselves going all over the stake rendering well prepared programs; helping to work up real congregational singing; creating a desire in the hearts of all our choir members to cooperate; and soon we would have groups all over the stake. In the smaller branch is where we could be of real service. I will guarantee that Brother Weaver, Brother Twombly, or any of our stake missionaries would welcome us an evening while they were having special meetings, and quite likely through our efforts in song we could attract the outsider to hear a sermon that might be the means of making him a member of the church.

Then, by working with these different groups, who are growing, developing all the time, how easy it would be to call them all together to work up something bigger, that we could carry to some of the larger points in the stake, although something of this kind taken to the smaller branch might carry much weight in arousing interest among the outsiders. Our officers in this stake want to see it prosper and grow, as do all of us, and I feel sure that the musical forces can be of great service. I am also confident that the musical forces of Far West Stake could constitute one of the most promising assets in the church. *

Our reunions are where we could be brought together for a big "sing." We would have our groups giving us special numbers; combining the voices for an evening's program; and last, but not least, a real background for the congregational singing, which Brother Mills, in his article on "Music at our reunions," says is "the most important feature of the musical work of any reunion." We are quite sure to have everyone on the camp grounds singing, because with the zeal and "pep" of the background, the congregation can't help but sing.

For our conferences, it would be best to make a combined effort entirely, as the services are few and time much more limited than at the reunions.

I feel that by working in this manner we would soon have every choir member in the stake interested, and beginning to understand that he really has a mission to perform. We are all well aware what a power music exerts over the human race. Our missionaries need us, to prepare the hearts and minds of the people for the message they have to give.

So choristers, choir members, let us begin now to take a greater interest in our work. Let us give to our branches the

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

A Plea for Childhood

I can assure you that it is with a great deal of hesitancy that I approach the subject this morning, but I do not wish to be a slacker, so I am going to do the best I can. This is a subject in which I am very much interested, and have been for a number of years.

The cradle roll, as has been said, may have suffered some during the transfer from the Sunday school to the Women's Department, but we feel that we are beginning to see our way quite clearly, and hope (although there are now some who do not yet see the wisdom of the change) in time all will be satisfied with the work and feel a great deal of good is being accomplished. I feel that it is more than we were doing before, because it is including more of real child welfare work than it did before.

The work of the cradle roll department could be done better locally if we had persons who could give their full time to the work. When one has home duties, she cannot always give as much time to any outside work as she would like to give. This, of course, is true of all departments.

The baby is the most important creature in the world, but it is really the one who is most abused. This is not because we wish it that way, but because of thoughtlessness and ignorance. Our duty is to help the innocent baby who cannot help itself, and the work of the cradle roll seems more wonderful to me the more I study it for it appeals directly to the mother of the baby. It should appeal also to the father—I think sometimes the cradle roll workers forget about the father. He is just as much interested in the baby as the mother, and we should always consider him and try to help him to see and know his duty.

The true wealth of our Nation is in its babies. They are worth more than the skyscrapers in our cities, and our huge corporations. The baby is more important than all. We could correct all the evils of society and clean up politics—which the women are going to help to do—and cure all the diseases in the world, and bring in the Golden Age, if we would only begin with the baby, and give it a perfect chance. I believe you will all agree with that. If we really started with the baby, we could do all these things. It would take time, but it takes time to do anything worth while.

Some countries are beginning to realize the importance of properly caring for and shielding the baby. You heard Professor Lewis last night speak of the different countries who were taking up this kind of work. The baby is appreciated, recognized as a distinct asset. In France they are offering a premium for large families. For the third child they offer $60, and for the tenth child and over, $140. The price increases as the family increases, but the money is given only to the French mothers.

Of course America has not done anything just like this, but I read the other day of a Saint Joseph banker who was building a row of houses to rent and announced that he would rent his houses only to people with children. Whenever a child was born in one of his houses he refunded the rent for that best that is in us, and encourage those among us who are gifted, to develop their talents. In some of our branches we have no one who is competent to take charge of the music, so we want to develop to that stage where we have a conscientious chorister and choir, even though it be only a quartet, in every branch. Do your very best with what you have—and to the larger choirs, keep working, intent on growth and development. Make your work attractive, and by cooperation of choir member and chorister, and they in turn with the stake chorister, our vision will unfold itself before us and we will realize as never before what an acceptable service means.

month to the lucky tenant. That's a start in the right direction!

One mother recently stated that when she first came to Independence and was trying to rent a house, she was asked if there were children in the family. As there were, she found it very difficult to get a place in which to live. It would be a very good idea if a few more people would build houses to rent to families with children. The object of some countries in trying to popularize large families, is believed to be that they may have more soldiers to protect their countries in case of war. While we are not advocating caring for children because we wish to raise them to be soldiers; we do wish the children we have might be given a fair and adequate chance in life.

The New York State Federation of Women's Clubs, in their recent twenty-sixth annual convention, went on record as favoring birth control. After a long and spirited debate they adopted the following resolution, 149 delegates voting for and 97 against it:

"Whereas, one of the primary necessities for family, and therefore for public, health is an intelligently determined interval between pregnancies, to be secured by regulating the inception of life and not by interfering with life after it starts; and

"Whereas, the lack of knowledge as to how to secure such an interval frequently results in serious disaster for mothers and babies, and indirectly or directly for the entire community, be it

"Resolved, that the New York State Federation of Women's Clubs urge the speedy removal of all barriers, due to legal restrictions, tradition, prejudice, or ignorance, which now prevent parents from access to such scientific knowledge on this subject as is possessed by the medical profession."

The existing law classes the teaching of the scientific facts on this subject with the circulation of obscene matter! An amendment to this law will come before Congress at its next session. It is said that seven of the eleven members of the Committee on Public Health in the Senate are favorable to it.

As one of the vital reform movements of the present day, this is most interesting, both to men and to women. Every Congressman is anxious to know the attitude of the voters in his constituency upon this question. Women's clubs that have not gone on record for or against this important measure should do so before the bill is presented. I am not advocating this; I am only reading it so you may know what women's clubs are doing in the world, and that this is to come before the Senate. Women should think about it, and be prepared to act wisely if they are called upon to cast a vote in the matter.

During the year 1919 the birth rate in the United States passed all records. Two and a half million babies were born that year, but 40 out of every 1,000 in Brookings, Massachusetts, died; which was the smallest percentage of deaths in any city. El Paso, Texas, lost 245 to every 1,000, but it was for Kansas City, Kansas, close at our doors, to have the highest infant death rate of any city in the United States last year.

Perhaps you remember that the Kansas Legislature made the following appropriations about two years ago: $25,000 for the health of hogs and $8,000 for the health of bees, while giving but $7,500 for the health of babies. Doctor Lydie Vilbees, who for years had worked successfully to diminish the infant mortality, resigned. She felt she could not go on with her work without the help she needed. The result is not encouraging, for Kansas City, Kansas, ranks highest in the death rate.

Our own State, Missouri, ranks first in the mule market, but thirty-second in schools. However, in Missouri nearly all the child welfare laws passed, so we are hoping for better things soon. When the women wake up to these facts, something will be done.

You parents know that you would give up anything for your babies, but Lowell says: "The love for one, from which there does not spring the love for all, is a worthless thing." So, our love for our own child should lead us out to love all other children. All should benefit by our love, and we should do all we can to help the children of any country or community.

The child is such a tiny thing in the beginning, we do not always think of what it may be later on. We do not know the future. Perhaps many may be thrilled by the sound of his voice in later years, or by the music that may come from his finger tips. There may be many who may be influenced by the high ideals that emanate from the life he may live. It may be like the little spring, away up in the mountain—so small that it may be drained by a single ox in one day—but it steals its way down through the mountains until it reaches the broad, beautiful river, and then stretches away, a thousand miles, through the farms of the country, and finally it reaches the ocean! No one knows how much the influence of a child may expand, nor how far it may reach. How important that it shall be started right!

We are not training the boys for boyhood, but for manhood; and the girls for womanhood; and when we are called to lay down the work that we are now trying to do, we want these tots who are growing up about us to be able to take it up and do it much better than we have been able to do it.

This world needs, most of all, intelligent motherhood. Why, we are just waking up in this wonderful twentieth century to the fact that we must have training in order to become efficient mothers. We have long recognized the fact that it takes training to enter other professions in life, but it was thought that anyone could be a mother, and could raise children without any particular study or training. Now the Massachusetts State Federation of Women's Clubs, after twenty-six years of service, along many lines, has this year claimed Mothercraft as its latest child. Where might we not have been had they taken up mothercraft first!

All mothers and girls should study mothercraft, for it is knowledge they will need most surely and often. I have had the pleasure of studying this, this winter in our Institute here, and it was good to know there were a number of young girls also in the class. I am sure they enjoyed it very much, for they got splendid grades in their examinations.

Some cradle roll superintendents express themselves as being timid about approaching mothers concerning this work of the cradle roll. I don't think they should, because there are so many benefits to be gained that the mothers are beginning to realize it and be grateful for them.

One cradle roll superintendent, in talking about this, said she was asked what benefit the cradle roll was, anyway. And she answered that she didn't know! Of course, if she didn't know what benefit it was to the mothers, it couldn't be very much benefit to them! We don't want a person to refuse to take up this work just because she does not understand it, for we believe if they accept the office in all sincerity, and make it their business to find out all they can about the work, they will qualify to do it, and can see its benefits. It is impossible for anyone to know too much about babies and children, and the things that make for their welfare.

So we think a cradle roll superintendent should make some definite study of child welfare that she may be a real help to the mothers. She should start at the beginning, and then try to go on each year, so she will really see at the close of each year where she has made improvement and progress. When she looks back she can see that she has accomplished some good, and be able to do better work the next year.

I think it is a good plan to start a Mothers' Library in the branches. You know we have a great many good books on the subject of child training, and it is not possible for us to have them all, but if we can only get hold of two or three of the best and place them where all the mothers can read them, encourage them to do so, and try to work out some plan by which we can add to our collection, it will really be a great help to the mothers. I was glad to hear Sister Salyards speak this morning of its being important that the mothers now have some training along the line of reading and using a library. If we have books for mothers where they can read them, it will result in much good for the children, and therefore a commendable thing for our child welfare workers to accomplish.

There are many good articles in the magazines, also. A few years ago there wasn't to be found very much that was helpful along this line, but to-day nearly all the best magazines take up the subject of mothers and babies. If we form a club of mothers and take a certain number of these magazines and have them passed around among our members, all would have a chance to read, and we could discuss them at our meetings. The cradle roll superintendent could see that this was done.

Of course this takes work, but anything takes work if we are going to accomplish much good. As the superintendent reads these magazines, I think it would be well if she marked the good articles. Mothers are very busy people, and find it hard to take a magazine and ascertain just what they want in the few rare minutes they have. If the articles were marked so they could be found readily, it would be much easier for the mothers. Yes, this takes time, and time is one thing we haven't very much of. That makes me think of the story of a wife. Her husband asked her if she expected him to furnish her all the money she wanted. She said, "No, dear, I don't; because there isn't that much in the world." That's the way I think about time. There isn't enough time in the world to do all we want done. This brings me to the subject of who to appoint for superintendents of our cradle roll. They must be people who have some time to give to the work. I used to think they should also be mothers, because it seemed there isn't anyone who understands the babies' problems like a mother; but when we ask a mother to take up this work, she will nearly always say, "I don't see how I can. My babies take all my time and strength. I cannot leave them and go out and make visits." We cannot urge them to do this, either, because we always teach that a mother's first duty is to her children. And then we go to older mothers who have raised their families, and find that they will usually say, "Get one who is younger. They can go out and do so much better than I can." I like the thought expressed by Sister Salyards, that the elderly women make good counselors, and I would suggest that we use them in that way as much as possible.

So we have to fall back on those who are not mothers, and we find a great many of them do wonderfully well along this line, if they are willing to make a study of the subject. Of course there are still plenty who say, "Oh, yes—they haven't any children, but they can tell us just how to raise ours!" Well, we know "experience is a dear teacher." The Bible says the foolish will learn no other way, but it doesn't say the wise cannot. Let us try to be wise!

In doing church work we should seek to understand what is most needed, and then find out where we are best qualified to work, what work we are best fitted to do, to meet those needs. Some people are fitted for one department, and some for another. It happens that I am very much interested in the home department, but it seems I never could do home department work. I tried it two or three times, but never made any success of it. So I think we should each try to find our place, and then prepare for service there, for we cannot serve well without preparation.

As organizers and local leaders, try to find somebody who is fitted for cradle roll work, and is willing to conscientiously try to prepare to do it well.

J. G. Holland says what the world most needs is men, in his little verse "Wanted."

"God give us men. The time demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and willing hands.
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking."

He thought that men, true men, were what were wanted most. Then Ingersoll, in speaking of woman's love, says, "The one thing in this world that is constant, the one peak that risers above all clouds, the one window in which the light forever burns, the one star that darkness cannot quench, is woman's love.

"It rises to the greatest heights, it sings to the lowest depths. It forgives the most cruel injuries. It is perennial of life and grows in every climate. Neither coldness nor neglect, harshness nor cruelty, can extinguish it."

"A woman's love is the perfume of the heart. This is the real love that subdues the earth; the love that has wrought all miracles of art; that gives us music all the way from the cradle song to the grand closing symphony that bears the soul away on wings of fire. A love that is greater than power, sweeter than life, and stronger than death."

It is obvious that we cannot have these true men so much wanted and needed in the world without having true and trained motherhood, with that wonderful love that Ingersoll speaks of. With such a motherhood I believe we can get the men who will be true men in every sense of the word. Let us dedicate ourselves anew to the service of motherhood and childhood.

Katharine Haviland Taylor, in speaking of heaven, says:

"I am too little for a great eternity,
I want in my to-morrow, things I see—
And things I've seen—that faded all too soon.

"Instead of angel voices I would hear a spoon
Beating upon a table; see a laughing face,
Warm, glowing, living—without, please God,
Death's cold, set trace.
Instead of golden streets, I'd stand within
A doorway I know well. Is this a sin
To want my kitchen door, sagging of stoop;
To want, instead of heaven's host, a group
Of little folk, all hot and tired from play?
If so, please pardon me, dear God, but—
Short was yesterday!

"I am too earth-bound for a great eternity,
Sometimes I almost laugh at plans I make. I see Myself in heaven wearing apron, checked;
I see the sky above the barn, cloud-flecked;
The chickens strutting proudly in the yard.
Then little folk around me, hungry, tired;—
How their small, careless touches my heart fired!

"Again, at heaven's bedtime, I would see
All that made heaven pale by earth, turning to me,
Small buttons, lisping prayers, the big frog's cry—
I want these, more world things, past stars and sky.

"I want to end my days beyond, as I did here,
Tired from hard work for all I held most dear;
In heaven's night to bend above small beds,
To straighten covers, look on tangled heads.

"A foolish woman, I, perhaps, but mine, I would the way
I traveled, loved, and lost in a
Too short yesterday!"

High Mortality Rates Challenge National Conscience

In the United States in 1919 one mother died for every 135 babies born, and every eleventh baby born died before he was a year old. That these rates are excessive is shown in "Save the youngest," a bulletin issued by the United States Department of Labor through the Children's Bureau, and just revised to compare the latest rates for the United States with those for foreign countries.

Six countries are shown to have a lower infant mortality, and 16, in a group of 17, a lower maternal mortality, than the United States. Not only do we lose more mothers in proportion to births than practically any other civilized country, but we apparently lose more on an average each year than the year before. Whereas in other countries there has been a decrease in the death rate from childbirth, the rate in the United States rose from 6.1 per 1,000 births in 1915 to 6.2 in 1916, 6.6 in 1917, and to 7.4 in 1919. Moreover, in this country there is no appreciable decrease in the proportion of babies who die from causes largely connected with the care and condition of the mother.

Experience has proved, the bulletin points out, that thousands of deaths of both mothers and children could be prevented every year by public measures for the protection of maternity and infancy. In New York City, among 4,496 mothers who were supervised by the New York Maternity Center Association before and after the birth of their babies, the maternal mortality rate was less than one third the rate of the United States, and the rate for deaths in early infancy was less than half that for the city as a whole. In other cities of the United States and in foreign countries the institution of infant welfare measures has been followed by greatly decreased rates.

Measures which have proved successful in preventing this waste of life among mothers and babies, include the following: Prompt and accurate birth registration, health centers, public health nurses, special clinics, trained attendance at childbirth, adequate hospital service, education of the mother in maternity and child hygiene, and education of the general public in the significance of a necessity for maternal and infant health.—Children's Bureau Bulletin.

Greetings to the Women's Department Workers Institute

"Large streams from little fountains flow;
Tall oaks from little acorns grow."

Dear sisters, these words come most forcibly to me at this time when (at the earnestly persistent request of Sister M. H. Siegfried) I am sitting down to pen you a word of loving greeting in memory of the days when I once met and labored with you. Then we were a small, feeble band; to-day you are a mighty host. But, my dear sisters, may you never forget this one great, immutable fact, that "All truth dies in the mind when it is not carried out in the life," and that each one of you may go from this meeting prepared to incorporate into your own life the grand truths you will have heard in this assemblage is my earnest wish for you, and that these truths may take deep root in your hearts and so control your lives that the redemption of Zion may be hastened, is my prayer.

"The race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong."

Life is one grand struggle, from the cradle to the grave, but blessed is that man or woman who with Job can say, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," or with Washington Gladden:

"And fierce though the fiends may fight,
And long though the angels hide,
I know that truth and right
Have the Universe on their side;
And that somewhere beyond the stars,
Is a love that is better than fate.
When the night unlocks her bars
I shall see him—and I can wait."

But, sisters mine, as the little fountain needed the dews of night and the rains from heaven that it might become the large stream, and the little acorn needed the moisture of both dew and rain, as well as the life-giving nourishment of the soil, that it might become the mighty oak, so do we need the faithfulness, humility, and patience that only the Spirit of God can give us, that we may run successfully the race set before us, and this we can have only by living very near to Him, learning of Him, and nourishing by faith and prayer His truth; for if it lack this nourishment it will wither and die and our life will never be as a stream to bless those with whom we come in contact, or as a grateful shade of a tall oak for the weary and worn traveler who meets us on the dusty highway of life.

May God bless and strengthen each one of you, and help you to go forward in faith, is my prayer.

Lovingly your sister, M. WALKER.

From Far Away

We have made quite a nice start for the year here in Balmain. We have secured the services of a young brother in the church who is in his fifth year at the university, studying medicine. He is teaching our "Food and the body" lessons, and we are all very much pleased with his methods.

Then we have a class studying the "Child care" leaflet course, and another studying under a professional teacher, using the Mothercraft Manual as textbook. We have only had two lectures, so far, but the attendance has been splendid. A few strangers have come in and joined us, and Miss Benjamin, the instructor, thinks it is a wonderful idea for the church to take up the work of teaching its girls along these lines. Miss Benjamin will be visiting Europe next year, so we feel we are fortunate to have secured her at this time, as she is in great demand, being the only teacher the Workers' Educational Association has here. Through this class we have the advantage of the use of a library from the university, of about fifty books, and we are looking forward most eagerly to its arrival.

Last year we had a tutor in English, from the university, and a library of one hundred choice books, which we thoroughly enjoyed. We deferred the continuation of our English course, however, until next year, in order to have our present work under Miss Benjamin. Fortunately, she has studied our textbook for two or three years, and was delighted to find a place they could be purchased, for she had searched Sydney for them without success.

I inclose one of the circulars advertising the first lecture of our course. Miss Benjamin, it is needless to say, is a Jewess, but if she is like our teacher of last year, also a Jewess, she will be very broad-minded and liberal in her attitude, and we are all very hopeful.

We have recently held a bazaar, and though we had shocking weather, we realized nearly seventy pounds, and everybody is pleased.

Message From the Sunday School Department

To the Women's Department Workers in Institute Session: The Sunday School Department greets you as fellow workers for better home and community life. Interests of all departments are interwoven. No department can be more interested in your success than is ours. It is the kind of product the home sends the school that makes our work easy or hard. Your training, that makes parents more efficient, at the same time gives our schools better teachers and officers. Conversely, our training of young persons for better teachers also makes them more efficient trainers of their own children when they found homes of their own.

Will mail to your field workers explanatory matter later.

LETTERS

A Summary of European Conditions

Apostle Williams tells how the work looks to him at date of writing, May 22.

President Smith has engaged passage on the Rotterdam, which leaves Plymouth on June 9. Brother Roderick May and wife, Sister Crick and her two sons sail June 3 on steamer Kroonland.

Brother and Sister May have spent ten years in the British Isles Mission. They stood by the work during the trying and crucial days of the war. They have reached that age when they should be released from the arduous duties of foreign missionary work. Bon voyage and a happy reunion with loved ones on the other side.

Since January 1 there have been over forty baptisms in this mission. Brethren J. E. Bishop and Nephi Dewsnup are doing excellent work in the Sheffield District. Brother Fry has well-nigh recovered and is applying himself to the organization and extension of his particular work. Brother and Sister Sorden are fitting in nicely. Sister Sorden, who only recently united with the church, is winning her way into the affections of the Saints, young and old. Brother Sorden did a mighty clever thing when he accepted her application for missionary appointment. She is the "mother" of Saint Leonard's. The panicky times incident to the present industrial crisis have prevented the opening of school. This is now deferred until September 1.

Brother F. Henry Edwards is indispensable. His thorough consecration, his genial and amiable nature, endear him to the people. He is a student and is well informed in regard to all phases of church work.

Good word comes from the Manchester District. The ministry is alert and the work is growing apace. Some thirty-five baptisms are reported. Brother Chandler, of Warrington, has baptized twenty. Brother Joseph Dewsnup is the president of the district and is an indefatigable worker. He has been ordained an high priest.

Brother J. T. Norton has been elected president of the Birmingham District. Brother James Bishop has been selected as president of the Sheffield District. Brother John Judd has been reelected president of the London District. Conditions in the Wales District are not good. An effort will be made to revive the work there.

The Saints of the London Branch took upon themselves the putting of our London church house in shape. The place has been renovated, painted, papered, and rearranged. We expect to make a special effort to build up the work here.

Brother Gillen has been moving around through the mission and getting acquainted with the Saints. We hear nothing but excellent reports of his work. He has preached over seventy times since his arrival in the mission.

MAUDE PEAK PARHAM.

Brother Jacob Halb, of Basel, Switzerland, has been sick, as also Sister Halb. We found them depressed and somewhat discouraged. We left them feeling better in body and revived in spirits. Brother Peter Anderson, of Denmark, reports progress and expects a number of baptisms shortly. Brother Passman reports that the recent riots have necessitated discontinuation of all public meetings in Jerusalem.

Brother Karl Green reports a number of baptisms in Hannover, Germany. The building there is too small to accommodate the crowds who attend. He reports baptisms and increasing interest at various other points. Brother Kippe is tracting and translating betimes.

The miners' strike is having its effect everywhere in Great Britain. Many of our people are suffering as the result of unemployment. People are going hungry in many places. Each day sees more people idle and increasing distress.

Sincerely, T. W. WILLIAMS.

Temple Activities Increase

The season for visitors at Kirtland Temple is now at its height, and many of all classes visit the historic spot.

The time of year is now open in the which temple activities are on in full, the weather is favorable, and many are taking advantage of weather conditions. Surely the "Old Landmark" is a great place for missionary work. On Sunday last there were present at one time during the afternoon a class of young women, all Jews, who were out for an educational "hike." They wished to learn the history of the church here. This was willingly granted them, weaving into the lecture enough of Jewish history to cause them to promise to return. My soul delights in the work in which I am engaged. It affords one such great opportunities to meet all kinds of people; the broad-minded, narrow-minded, the biased and unbiased, and affords one that which I call a golden opportunity to disabuse the minds of the thousands of the erroneous idea they have of the work, the name, the position of the church. They so often confound this church and its founder with the institution in Utah. It is my delight to inform them of the glaring differences existing between them. Not long since I was asked by a minister what excuse we had for an existence as a church. I sized him up and replied as follows: "Sir, we have no excuse for our existence; we exist as a church by necessity, not as an excuse." It was demanded that I explain, which I was extremely glad to do. I took them back to the revival at Manchester, New York, the visit of the angel to Joseph, and the wonderful expression of the heavenly personage regarding the condition of the then existing creeds—calling their attention to the fact that creed revision had been going on from that particular time until now, proving the statement of the boy, for boy he was, to be true. One of the reverend gentlemen (?) replied in a very rough and boisterous way: "Well, sir, you want us to believe that we are the ordained ministry of an apostate church?" My humble reply was, "Gentlemen, I have given you the references, stated to you the facts as I know them, and shall leave you to figure that out for yourselves."

The temple work is on. Many bright minds are here from day to day and seemingly the better class is on the increase.

May God add his choicest blessings to all the faithful in Christ.

Very respectfully, A. E. STONE.

The Races Clash in Palestine

Elder Harry Passman tells of the outbreak at Jaffa on May 1 and of the sanguinary results.

On Sunday, May 1, at Jaffa, Palestine, between the hours of twelve and one noon, quarrels arose between the Arabs and the Jews in the vicinity of Neve Shalom and the house of Kaluzim, which is near the French Hospital, and these quarrels were fiercer and on a larger scale than those which occurred last year in Jerusalem. The Arabs were well organized and ready to take advantage of the first opportunity that presented itself. The Arab police of Jaffa added fuel to the fire in every conceivable way.

Mr. Feinberg, manager of the house of Kaluzim at Jaffa, makes the following statement. (Kaluzim is the name given to young men and women idealists that migrate from Russia and Poland.) On Sunday at about 12.30 a few Arabs started to throw stones at the house of the Kaluzim. Mr. Feinberg locked the doors and the inmates hid themselves. About five minutes later a number of Arab police came and shot through the doors and windows. Iron bars were broken from the windows and the doors were caved in. The officers entered, followed by a crowd of Arabs. Shooting started again. Five were killed and twenty-five injured, the furniture stolen, and the house destroyed. The injured were taken to the French Hospital at Jaffa. Two of the injured died shortly after arriving at the hospital, and three are in a critical condition.

In the districts of Neve Shalom and Maadon Borakof at about one o'clock, the Arabs started to throw stones into the Jewish shops, and before many minutes passed it had spread to all parts of Jaffa. The shops of the Jews were plundered and all goods stolen. The Arab police aided by Arab civilians used guns, sticks, swords, knives, and stones, and a real battle was entered into. In the neighborhood of the seashore, twelve were killed and forty-five wounded. Two of these died upon reaching the Hadasee Hospital, and seventeen of the injured are in a very dangerous condition. About eighty were brought to the gymnasium, which was soon converted into a hospital. The total dead are twenty-six among the Jews, three dead and twelve injured among the Arabs.

The English governor called in all the Jewish and Arab police and demanded that they turn over all weapons and ammunition, except the Arab police that were guarding the prisoners. Most of the Arab police removed their numbers from their shoulders so as to avoid detection. Their sympathy was with their own countrymen and they fought on their side regardless of the oath of office. There was practically no cavalry at Jaffa. Soldiers were summoned from Saraphend at once, and they arrived at 3.30, one hundred and fifty cavalry and three armored motor cars equipped with machine guns.

General Deeds and secretary of Chief Justice Beutovitch arrived at sunset. The battle had stopped, but the passion was tense. General Deeds assembled the chiefs of the Moslems and questioned them in the presence of the governor of Jaffa. Mr. Beutovitch appointed a commission of inquiry.

Monday morning, at 4.30, shooting was heard near the seashore in the district of Jamin. Some Arabs made an attack, and two Jews were injured and one killed.

Mr. Deeds and Mr. Beutovitch made a trip to Televiv to console the frightened population. (Televiv is a suburb of Jaffa.) They said the trouble was over, and they need not exercise any more fear. At this juncture shots were heard from the vicinity of the railroad station. The good effect of the speech was lost. At 9 a. m. the Arabs assembled near the government house and requested that those interned be released. Just at this time four more armored cars appeared, and the crowd was dispersed. Forty Jewish shops were looted and all goods taken. Most of those injured are of the Kaluzims. Two of these shops were owned by American citizens, and in addition to stealing the goods, one of these gentlemen was robbed of one thousand pounds in cash; then he was beaten and acetic acid thrown into his eyes. He was taken to a Jerusalem hospital.

Additional reports on May 3. Until midday the number of Jewish wounded passed two hundred, with the killed totaling forty-three. The well-known Hebrew author, Brenner, was slaughtered at his residence, together with the members of his family.

Martial law was proclaimed. A man-of-war battleship is expected to arrive at Jaffa to-day, and will disembark about two hundred sailors and marines for the protection of the city.

Jerusalem is in a state of dread. Practically all the Jewish shops are closed, and after sundown the streets are deserted. The Arabs announce openly that England will not be permitted to establish a national home for the Jews in Palestine, and they will back this up with war and bloodshed. Christian Arabs cast all Christian teaching to the winds, when the question of Jewish occupation arises, and murder is permissible and justifiable in an event of this kind. An outbreak is expected at any moment here, because there are practically no guards on the streets, nearly all soldiers having been sent to Jaffa.

The report of the committee of inquiry is as follows. On May 1 a labor meeting in the Jewish suburbs of Jaffa was disturbed by a group of Jewish communists (emigrants from Russia). The latter were driven back into the mixed Moslem-Jewish quarters of the town from which they had come. (The house of Kaluzim is located here.) This is where the trouble started.

HARRY PASSMAN.

Wheeling Branch Anniversary

This old branch celebrates its thirty-eighth anniversary and rejoices in the valiant men it has produced for the church work.

On May 22, 1883, Elder G. T. Griffiths organized the Wheeling Branch, starting with about fourteen members, he being the first branch president. At that time he was the only missionary for eastern Ohio, West Virginia, and western Pennsylvania. On the 22d of this month the Wheeling Branch was favored with the presence of Brother Griffiths to hold special services on the 38th anniversary of the organization. The 11 a. m. service was occupied by him in reviewing the work of those years, and the changes wrought. He spoke of the difficulties that confronted the little band in securing a place in which to worship, and how the Lord assisted them to overcome them. The records show about 500 baptisms since then, although the present membership is 218. The organization of the branches at Moundsville, West Virginia, and Bellaire, Ohio, in 1919, drew heavily from the membership of the Wheeling Branch. Not half of the original members are now living; the others have passed on to their reward. Scattered in many States are to be found Saints who have in the past been identified with this branch, and are largely the product of the church and Sunday school of this place. Among them are F. J. Ebeling, for many years an active missionary, and now president of the Kirtland District; Joseph E. Ebeling, now president of the Colorado Springs Branch; Matthew W. Liston, active missionary in Michigan; John F. Martin, now missionary in the Wheeling District; Elder James Craig, of Glen Easton, superannuated missionary; L. D. Ullom, missionary and Bishop's agent for a number of years; Myron E. Thomas, and others. Besides there are many former members of this branch who are scattered in various cities and localities. It was here that Apostle Josiah Eills died at the home of Elder G. T. Griffiths, who was shortly after called to fill the office made vacant by his death. Six different men have occupied as president during the 38 years since the organization of the branch. They are G. T. Griffiths, A. M. Teagarden, L. D. Ullom, O. J. Tary, O. L. Martin, and L. A. Serig, the latter being the present incumbent.

Four of the six are still living. A. M. Teagarden and O. L. Martin have gone to their reward, to which end time is rapidly bearing us all. Let us each renew our diligence and build faithfully on the solid rock of eternal truth and righteousness, that our work may stand the final test that shall be applied to the work of every one.

O. J. TARY.

Evangelist F. A. Smith has been holding some successful meetings at Stewartville, Missouri.

"Ebenezer," the Gospel Car

Elder Pement tells how he decided to procure a gospel car for work in eastern Ontario.

The name "Ebenezer" for a gospel car may provoke a smile and seem very antiquated to-day. But associated with the event in which Samuel makes use of that name are memories which, in a manner, seem to have some connection, by way of help received from the Lord, in our experience now, as well as at that time, and has furnished the reason for calling our gospel car Ebenezer. (Read 1 Samuel 4, 5, 6, 7.)

The writer wishes to give briefly some trying field experiences in attempting to carry out the instructions of the church in carrying the beautiful gospel to the untouched regions of eastern Ontario, together with some of the difficulties encountered by the way, and what he believes to be an heroic attempt to overcome such difficulties in securing means to carry on the work more effectually. For let it be thoroughly understood by those who have never come here, as it has been burned into the consciousness of those who have been on the ground—that eastern Ontario is a most difficult field to plant the seed of the kingdom of God in the hearts of the people.

About the middle of last March Apostle R. C. Russell instructed the writer to carry the angel's message to the small surrounding towns, villages, and country places out of the town of Cornwall, Ontario. He had received an invitation to call upon a family about forty-eight miles away (and even such invitations are scarce), and the best he could do was to arrive at the station about 8 p. m. Mr. Thomas lived about two miles in the country, and the mud was nearly ankle deep. But luck (if there be such a thing) for once seemed on our side. A man was going past the house and would give us a ride. Joy and thankfulness reigned within at the realization of not having to carry two heavy satchels of books and a heavy bundle of tracts. On arriving at the home of our friend, we found him in the throes of moving away—having sold his farm. We knew that our stay must be a short one, but we could stay for the night, at least, and we were very kindly received.

The next morning we had a fine talk with both these good people, and the gospel message was appreciated. But we had to go. Mr. Thomas was very sure that no church would be shut against such message as we had to impart to the people, and told us that we would get the church in Winchester of which his wife is a member; he does not belong to any church. But he had not had our experience or he would not have been so confident. To be brief, the minister turned us down, fearing we might cause division among the members of the church, in which he was absolutely right; but it seems to me that it would be better to have the division take place now rather than on the judgment day. However, that will be his funeral.

Having been shut out of the church, I sought another place and found an opera house which I could have for five dollars a week. It was a grand place to hold meetings. I began to get ready to open up, when the town policeman appeared on the scene and informed me that, as there was no fire escape at the back I would not be permitted to hold any meetings. I asked if it was used for any other purposes. He said yes, for card parties, picture shows, and for politics, but I could not have any meetings until I saw the reeve (or mayor). Well, the reeve was interviewed, and the lid was clamped on by the subterfuge that if the place were a licensed hall I could go on, he at the same time telling me that it was not a licensed place. Not being able to get any place to preach, I sought a schoolhouse near by and was told that that could not be had as the people had churches to go to. Consequently I had to move on.

I had left my bundle of literature at the station the night previous, and had now five miles to walk to get that, and some books as well. The roads were sloppy, and the vehicles were very far apart on that particular day; it seemed so to me at least. The upshot of the adventure into this region was that I had to carry my two satchels of books for the biggest part of five miles, and it seemed that my arms would pull out of their sockets. I had to let them down about every hundred yards. I finally came to a piece of road, running through a swamp, in which the mud was about as deep as my rubbers would allow me to walk in without wetting my feet, and about three quarters of a mile long, with scarcely a place to set my satchels down except in the water and mud. What was I to do? Rest I had to, and place to rest was scarcely to be found.

I can assure the reader that many things ran through my mind, some of them about as follows: Why is it that the gospel has such a difficult time in reaching the people? Why are there so many drawbacks in the message of life? Am I not a fool to struggle in this way, separated from all that I hold dear in this life, and my efforts for the good of my fellow man so little appreciated that I am looked upon with suspicion and as though I were unclean? I finally asked myself: For whom would you continue to work in this way? Is there one in the world? And I broke down and wept as the Spirit of God came upon me, and I said, Yes, there is one only; I'll do it for Jesus Christ alone and for no other. Immediately there came over me a sense of comfort and relief. I was considerably strengthened, and went on cheerily through the mud and slush, occasionally resting where I could find a place to let my burden down.

At last I reached the station. I deposited my satchels in the depot, and asked how far the village was from the station. One and three quarters miles, said the agent. I was awfully tired, but I did want to see what could be done in that village; and being relieved from the load I had carried so far, I felt that I could afford to go and see. I went, and found a little hamlet of about one hundred people. There were two churches and an A. O. U. W. Hall, and the latter I could get by paying two dollars per night. I finally got the man to come down to one dollar per meeting, and would have started in to advertise the meetings, but there came a heavy down-pour of rain, rendering the already bad roads almost impassable, and as the success of the meetings would largely depend on people coming from the country, I decided to wait till a more propitious time to make a break there.

I accordingly returned to Cornwall and decided on a more definite course of carrying on the gospel work, in the which a better system would obtain, whereby I could be more independent of the prejudices existing against us, and not be so continually under obligations to those who do all they can against the restored gospel.

I set to work to think out a plan whereby I could equip myself with the proper means to carry out effectually a program of active, aggressive, and efficient labor, that would enable the people who are free enough to go where an opportunity is offered to hear what we have to present. I thought of a motor truck with which I could carry my tenting outfit, consisting of tent, seats, platform, charts, blackboard, and other accessories. Then I wanted a balopticon, and screen, and views to represent the restored gospel, Book of Mormon, archæology, and biblical subjects; in short, an outfit that would enable one to work in a workmanlike manner, and which would command the attention of the public as well.

I simply wanted such an equipment that I could load up and proceed to a town, secure a place to set my tent upon, and do so, and tell the people: Here I am with the gospel of salvation. Come and hear. And those who have unoccupied edifices and will not allow God's word preached in them could keep them for the moles and bats for all I cared.
