The desire to attend college increased as the pupils advanced in high school work. One third of the freshmen hoped for higher education; six sevenths of the seniors gave an affirmative answer to "Do you wish to attend college?"

As to the ideal size of the American family, the majority answered five persons. Only one boy suggested ten children, and very few spoke of fewer than two.

This would seem to indicate a very serious substratum beneath the frivolity that so many see, or think they see. Such a test would indicate ideals and attitudes of a generally high average character. Such attitudes pursued would, of course, be motivated and become habits. The real ideals of life—those for which we hope—stand the stress in the sudden hour of trial and, after all, determine the path of life.

Blue Pencil Notes

Prayer meeting, preaching meeting, and the various devotional services have an important place in our religious life.

It is worth while, however, to consider just what their place is. In the past a great many people have thought and some seem still to think that religion finds its expression almost entirely in such services. They seem to feel that religion is a thing for expression on Sunday and perhaps Wednesday evening.

As a matter of fact, our religion should function all the time. It should run through all the days of the week and enter into all the affairs of life.

The religion of a Latter Day Saint should be in evidence wherever he works, in the garage, in the factory, in the store, in the mine, or on the farm. Or if the member be a woman, it should be in evidence in her housekeeping, in her motherhood, in her work as a teacher or nurse or dressmaker, or whatever it is that engages her attention.

Our religion should help us in our work always to do the square and honorable thing, to do the righteous thing, to do our work well and faithfully and creditably, to maintain Christlike relationship so far as possible with all persons with whom we come in contact. In that way we may become the salt of the earth by example as well as precept; not only save ourselves, but others. In that way we will be preaching the most powerful of discourses.

We need to come together frequently on Sunday and in prayer services that we may establish right relationships with God and receive from him new determination and spiritual strength for the very purpose that we may go out during the week and function as Christians ought to do in their work in organized society. The prayer meeting and the preaching meeting are not an end in themselves, but are a means to an end, to fortify, equip, and develop men and women to actually demonstrate the philosophy of Christ.

What Some Others Are Doing

There has recently come to our desk a clipping from The Daily Oklahoman concerning the work of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church. This newspaper item states that they have a membership, throughout the world, of less than 200,000. They are looking for a visible, personal return of our Lord, for which no date is set. In view of this fact, special preparation is needed, the keeping of the law of God not conformative to the world and its pleasures and fashions, the practice of Christian temperance, including abstinence from intoxicating liquors, tobacco, tea, and coffee. They uphold religious freedom and are opposed to coercion.

As part of their work they state that they have 6,955 missionaries scattered throughout 108 countries, preaching in 127 different languages; 45 publishing houses printing in 99 languages; a sale of literature for 1921 of over $5,600,000; 97 colleges and academies. For 1920, the tithing paid was over $7,000,000; for foreign missions, over $3,000,000; for all other funds, over $1,400,000, making a total of nearly $12,000,000 for the year, or a per capita contribution of $63.92. It must be remembered that these are not the figures of a large organization, but of one which numbered in 1863 only some 3,500, and to-day is less than 200,000.

The census report on religious bodies for 1916 gives information concerning their organization and shows the great increase in the preceding decade in foreign mission converts. There was a gain of 50,000 members throughout the world in the preceding decade, but only 17,000 in the United States. The contribution per member in the United States was $37.40, a membership of 79,000 contributing nearly $3,000,000.

Though they report some 1,420 missionaries, 777 ordained and licensed missionaries, the Government reports that this includes many local elders and others who cannot be included in the missionary lists in comparison with other churches, and as the result of careful investigation for the purpose of comparison, the number of missionaries was fixed at 582. No matter which figures are taken, if over 6,900 are now engaged in mission work, the number has greatly increased in the last five years. Also, if the figures of 192,000 members are correct for 1921, it shows a gain of more than 50,000 for the five-year interval. It is interesting to note that a very large percentage of their members are females, 67.1 per cent of those in the United States being girls and women.

The money is raised by special offerings, by contributions of 20 cents a week for missionary purposes, by special collections five times a year, and by a tithing system under which each member is expected to contribute one tenth of his income.

This item is printed for information, but it is also printed for self-examination. What are we doing as a church in comparison? In 1916, their 79,000 members in the United States contributed for church purposes nearly $3,000,000. This included all contributions for church purposes, whether local, general, or foreign. It meant an average of $37.40 each. If this newspaper item is to be accepted, this pro rata has been increased to more than $60 for 1921. What are we ready and willing to do individually for missionary work? Others are sacrificing; others are alive to the grave necessity of increasing the work in foreign missions. What should we do to-day as individuals and as a church? S. A. B.

Kansas City Stake Number

Our next issue will be a special number devoted almost entirely to the church work in the Kansas City Stake. This will be of special interest to many more than those acquainted with the personnel of workers in this division of our church territory. The photographs of various prominent workers will be especially valuable, and the information imparted concerning the stake and interests will be another valuable contribution to the list of magazine numbers issued by the HERALD.

H. W. Savage, who was ordained a seventy at the conference of 1915, and who has been under continual appointment to New Zealand since the conference of 1916, states in a letter to the First Presidency, dated March 18, that he is now returning to America on account of the ill health of his wife. They will sail from Auckland April 25 on S. S. Niagara.

Religious Instruction of the Young

By A. Max Carmichael

A review of the situation and valuable suggestions concerning our responsibilities to our children.

"I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." It is intimated in our own peculiar philosophy that Christ, existing in the beginning, created bodies and all earthly things and breathed into them the breath of life.

For thousands of years man struggled in the early part of our world's history to better conditions, and yet in the meridian of time Christ, our original Creator, came that we still might have life, and that we still might have it more abundantly. Something was yet lacking.

This statement of Christ's is a significant one when we contemplate that life and life more abundantly is the aim of all living creatures.

Even the one-celled being, the amœba, is constantly after more abundant life. In its response to situations in which it finds itself, it is constantly after more abundant life.

The kitten which plays is after more abundant life.

The puppy which plays is after more abundant life.

As a little child reaches after the unknown sunbeam and struggles to feel it and touch it, it is after more abundant life.

A young man who betakes himself to the city to enjoy that which might be typified by the white lights, is after the more abundant life.

The young woman who dares to try out the worth of certain conventionalities in her relationship with the opposite sex, is after the more abundant life.

The young man and young woman who betake themselves to the altar to be united in the bonds of marriage are after the more abundant life.

We betake ourselves to the house of prayer, there to think upon God and commune with him, that we might have the more abundant life.

Abundant Life Is Passed On

Man, more than any other animal, seems capable of passing on the accumulations of the more abundant life to each succeeding generation. Let us compare man with the dog in this regard. In the growing life of the individual dog there is a reaching out after more abundant life, but the dog is unable to accumulate situations which affect life and make it more abundant and pass the responses to these situations on to the next generation; but man is capable of passing on the learned responses to new situations to each succeeding child, and that child in turn to react quickly to the new situation.

Did you ever stop to think what might become of us if we should wake up the next morning and be as our forefathers were 1,000, 3,000, or 6,000 years ago and knew no more of life than they did? We would not know enough to turn on a faucet for water. We would not know how to turn the wick of our stove in the morning to get breakfast. All of these are the social heritage that has been passed on to us by our forefathers in their effort to obtain the more abundant life.

Christ came that we might have the more abundant life. Man is attempting to pass on this abundant life by a process of education. He feels that each succeeding generation should have this more abundant life in as concise and quick a form as possible and hence he is making great effort to pass it on to each succeeding generation.

Press and Communication Present-Day Facilities

There are two things that man has done which have enhanced his ability to pass to succeeding generations this social heritage which he has accumulated. These two things are the invention of the printing press and of facilities for rapid communication. There are no two things of any more importance in giving the power to man to pass on to each succeeding generation that which he has learned than the printing press and such facilities for rapid communication as the telephone. Man seeks then to increase the efficiency of the life of his child by passing on to it through books and other means of communication the social heritage of the race. Man's aim is to pass on those life processes which he has learned, and make more efficient the life of the child.

Education then is a prerequisite to an efficient life for our youngsters. It is a necessary prerequisite to the religious life of our children. Books, speech, communication, schools have made a higher type of religion possible. Man, as an individual and as a group, is capable of living a higher type of religion to-day than he was one hundred years ago; and is far more capable of living a higher type of religion than he was at the time of Christ's advent. The educative process is a part of and a necessary factor in the growth of religion, both in the individual and in the group. We can't expect to have religion except preceded by an educative process.

Education Without Religion

It is true that all education does not have a positive religious aim and it is quite true that all the social heritage that is passed on by man may not have a religious aspect. In fact, it is all too true that the social heritage passed from man to man may have in it an irreligious aspect. It may tend to be anti-religious, the opposite of religion. It therefore behooves us as adults wishing to pass on to our children the best that we have in religion, to see to it that all education has a religious aim, and is controlled by and diffused with a religious aim. It behooves us, then, to take into consideration the present status of educational agencies.

Our friend, Brother F. M. McDowell, has at various times with boldness brought before us the educational value of the motion picture and the tendency that that very agency has to educate in the wrong direction and to depreciate religion, but he has also pointed out the fact that this agency may enhance the process of educational and religious growth. There is one other educational agency, about which it is a shame to have to say what I am going to say, but that educational agency has fallen far below that which we should expect of it in infusing its policies with religion, and that agency is the family. It is a shame that so many families do exist without religion, and that the policies of discipline in the rearing of children within so many families do not partake of a religious aspect.

But what have our schools been doing about passing on the religious heritage of the race? Many schools that we can think of since time immemorial have been doing a lot towards influencing the race religiously. In fact, our schools have had a wonderful success in this regard. In the early part of our Christian history it was considered impossible to separate educative process from the religious process, and our Catholic forefathers combined the educative aspect of the children with their religious training. Our Catholic friends have a good argument in favor of the continuance of the parochial school. Their statement that the religious and educational process is one and the same thing is undeniable. Our own Protestant churches have practically acceded to this statement in their attempt to establish colleges in which the religious aspect can be made a part. I think that one of the greatest functions of our own Graceland College is to teach religion six hours a day and every bit of religious truth that they can possibly get across the educational counter.

To the Chinese We Are Queer

But the break from the Catholic Church during the sixteenth century and the increase of denominationalism and the further separation of the state from the church during the three centuries following has necessitated that our schools should be founded and controlled by the state. As a result our public educational institutions have not dared to touch upon religion and have left it completely out of the school program. And it is a singular and interesting comment upon our situation to-day to learn that the Chinese, for instance, seemed to feel it rather queer that we, as a nation, can separate our education from our religion. A man by the name of John Dewey, whose philosophy has affected the program of our schools considerably in the last twenty years, was invited by the Chinese Government to go to China to lecture upon education, I have understood. He gave his lectures on education without mentioning religion. That seemed rather queer to the Chinese. Professor Dewey's course in this matter has made it rather hard for the missionaries in China. You can see the reason. A man of the influence of John Dewey, talking about and telling to the Chinese children the social heritage of the Caucasian and not including in that heritage the religion that we have would be, indeed, singular.

Teachers Must Avoid Religion

It must necessarily be concluded then that something has been lacking in our education. It is that very thing, the religious atmosphere and tone about all truth. To teach that Columbus discovered America in 1492, outside of its relationship to God's evident world purpose, is to throw away from that fact its most wonderful aspect. Yet our public-school teachers are asked to leave out the religious aspect in teaching this fact. As a result of this separation of education from religion we have had to depend upon the church to supply the deficiency. I must say that I am sorry it has failed as it has. Do you know that the Sunday school movement is but about one hundred and fifty years old? In our own particular church it is only sixty years old. Do you know that the Boy Scout movement and the Camp Fire movement, which can be made one of the best forms of religious education, are but a few years old? These agencies have had a very hard fight for their existence and they are still having an exceedingly hard fight for their existence. There are several reasons for this. There are several reasons why our pastors and our missionaries have not responded as they should to these religious educational agencies.

One of these reasons is the old trite thought that these agencies are authorized neither by the Bible nor by God. The second objection is another frayed-out one, that we Latter Day Saints are copying after the world.

The third is that the efforts of evangelism in the last four centuries have been centered around the saving of the adult. It has been felt that just so long as we could get the dying man to utter with closed lips the words, "I believe in Christ Jesus," he suddenly becomes, through some mystic, presto change, an angel. Just so long as we have continued to do that we have felt that we have increased the religious status of the world.

Individualistic Teaching

Up to date, too much of our religious training and effort has been individualistic; we have been teaching and striving after a personal salvation, a salvation of the person in which we are compensated in some heavenly atmosphere by some mysterious and sudden process for the ills that the good Lord has placed upon us by putting us into a fallen state upon earth. Our efforts to save our children have been of the individualistic style. We have said, "Young man, you need but come to the altar and say, 'I believe,' and walk steadfastly therein, and you will be saved unto eternal life, a place where sin and sorrow can exist no more."

The fourth reason has been that our leaders have failed to recognize that the advancement of the race lies in the child more than in the adult. Death serves two purposes. In the first place, it takes from the earth the man whose growth has stopped, and whose religious ideals have become static, and second, death necessitates reproduction of the race and hence brings to us children who are possessed with a new impetus to carry life on to an ever new station of advancement.

The fifth reason is that our leaders have failed to recognize that religious growth varies in its nature and quality at different stages of the individual's life and at different stages of the racial development. The old theory was, Bring the child in the house of God and set him down before the priest of the Most High, and let the priest teach him as he would adults, and he will thereby imbibe religion. This very idea shows the failure to appreciate that the process of religious growth varies in its quality and in its rate of acceleration at each stage of the child development.

Another reason is that pastors and missionaries are prone to measure their work in the terms of the number of conversions and baptisms they get rather than in the rate and quality of religious growth in the community which they serve. We measure our work in the converting of delinquents by the number of formal adherents rather than in the rate of growth in them religiously. To too many of us conversion is an act, not a process.

And the next reason is that our pastors and missionaries have not been child-conscious. They have not been of the Babe Ruth type who passes by his friend adult in order to speak to a child standing near by. They have not been child-conscious.

Importance of Teaching Children

My first urge is that every pastor and every person interested in religion should be urged to take more thought upon the importance of the religious education of our children.

It is to the shame of our ecclesiastics that the lack in our present educational system has been noticed more by our educators than by them. Our school teachers have recognized that their educational aims and methods lack something very vital.

There have been various attempts to remedy this situation and I would like to acquaint you with a few of them. One of the first public attempts to remedy this situation was by the State of North Dakota and the State of Colorado. In these States, the State Sunday School Association and the State Teachers' Association got together and outlined a course of study for religious education and planned that if a child should take this course and pass examination upon it, proportional credit would be given him in the high school towards a diploma. A principal of the town of Lakewood, Ohio, saw a little more light and carried the matter farther. He persuaded his school board and a church of that community to get together so that a course of study could be outlined. A teacher in the high school was chosen to teach this outline and full credit was given therefor. As a result of bringing these two experiments together, practically every State in the United States of America now permits such courses to be taught and carried by the pupil in academic work.

I am unacquainted with the situation in other countries in the world. I wish I were better acquainted.

Gary System Includes Religious Education

There have been some other attempts. One of the most notable is the Gary system of education, a part of which includes religious training. You know that Gary is a town that sprang up suddenly, due to the interests of the steel business. The superintendent of schools of that town inaugurated a system wherein the children were permitted part of the week to go to the various denominational churches and there receive instruction at the hands of various denominational authorities. The city of New York, on account of lack of room, took up the idea of the Gary system, because it economizes building space, and in various boroughs of that city inaugurated that system, as a result of which the various denominations of that city got together a comprehensive program to be given during the week days to the children as the children came to them.

All of these attempts are in their experimental stage. They are not perfect by any means. There are many angles to the administration of such schemes, but the principle back of them is good; and my second appeal is that we encourage these schemes and make them a part of our system. Our church people should everywhere advocate a new allocation of the total amount of the child's time spent upon religious education. We must be cautioned to use tact and judgment in this advocacy, however. No doubt, that if our pastors should advocate these schemes in their various communities, outsiders would have suspicions that we as a church were trying to take some undue advantage. We must be candid and open with the pastors of other churches in this advocacy.

We Should Be Ready for Week-day Religious Education

But what I am afraid of is that one day some of our pastors may find such a movement to have our children dismissed from the public school to go to the church for religious instruction started in their community and they will suddenly realize that they themselves are unprepared to conduct this week-day religious school and that they have no one in their parish that is capable of helping them. Thus we may find ourselves at a disadvantage compared with the rest of the churches in the community.

Let us be prepared and trained, that we may with credit be in the van in advocacy of the re-allocation of the child's week-day time in favor of religious education.

We can give a pastor credit for one development along this line. A pastor did think of the possibility of using vacation time as a good time to teach religion and so we had a good pastor establish what is called a vacation Bible school. This movement has increased in popularity and in number quite fast. It has had its greatest rate of growth in our Eastern cities.

As an example of this proposition, I remember reading of a superintendent in some town in Iowa, who this last summer gathered about ninety children together into the public-school building for a daily vacation Bible school for about four weeks. He had two teachers to help him. The three of them ran the school.

Brother Walter W. Smith, at present historian of the church, while pastor of the church in Philadelphia, carried on the vacation Bible school with great success for several summers. The influence of the church was thereby extended to many outside of the church, and actual missionary work was accomplished. The excellent work of the school was known throughout the entire group of Sunday school workers of the city of Philadelphia. We have understood that the branch in Omaha, Nebraska, has used this scheme. Many administrative difficulties may be in the way, which may seem to make the further carrying out of this project by our large city branches an impossibility, but these administrative difficulties should be overcome. We must look to a further use of the vacation for the religious instruction of our young and our adults.

But too many obstacles seem to appear in the way of our increasing the total time the child has under religious education by the two methods so far mentioned. There is still another way left open to us which is entirely within our own control as a church. This method is the increasing of the number of hours the child is under religious instruction on Sunday. We have no outside agencies such as the public school or the necessity of working for a living, to keep us from using our Sundays more extensively for our children.

Extending the Value of Our Services

The most of our children are at least in Sunday school an hour. Possibly they may go to Religion, either on Sunday or during the week. Such children are then under religious instruction from an hour and a half to two hours a week. If they are members of the Boy Scouts or Orioles, they are under religious environment another hour during the week. In some of our country churches where the whole family comes, the children are generally found in church during the preaching service. This gives them another hour, so that perhaps if all of these conditions exist coextensively, the pupil finds himself under religious tutorage about four hours a week. But in our town churches, we generally find the children going home after Sunday school and not staying to the eleven o'clock service.

The reason for this is plain. The preaching service is directed to adults. The problems discussed in this service are adult problems. They are the problems of theology and life in which adults are interested. The junior and adolescent knows that the preacher is not talking to them and so they accommodate the preacher by going home and leaving him with an audience to whom he can talk. By the way, a good many of our pastors would worry a great deal in getting up a sermon ten minutes long for children.

This goes to demonstrate that the services of the church need to be graded. We suggest at least three divisions. There should be separate services for juniors or the elementary division, of the ages ranging from three to eleven; the adolescent or secondary division, of ages from twelve to twenty-two or twenty-three; and third, the adult group, from twenty-three and above.

There has been a greatly extended use of the graded church during the past few years. Many of the large sectarian churches are developing wonderful junior churches in which the juniors have a distinct part. In many cases the juniors have their own board of directors. The assistant pastor is assigned to the task of running the Sunday school and junior church.

In our large centers our own church has followed this idea. Junior meetings have been in operation for the last three years in Lamoni. They are now a settled part of the program of that branch. In Independence likewise junior meetings have been held for several years. In Zion they have been under the general supervision of the superintendent of Sunday schools. Only recently have we had the division of the services in the three divisions recommended above. This has been in Independence. It was found there that the adolescents from twelve to twenty-one attended neither junior meetings nor the adult meetings. Arrangements were made to have a meeting especially for adolescents. As one of those in charge said, "We divided 250 by 2 and got 500." That is, a meeting of children sometimes totaled 250 and was divided and made into two services, one for children under twelve years of age and the other for those above that age. The response has been excellent and the attendance more than doubled. The great advantage of these meetings is that they allow a larger time for participation in the services by the children. A larger part of the program is given over to active participation by the children. It has solved the problem which exists in every church, that is, that it is impossible to reach the minds of all the children simultaneously, especially when the needs of the five-year-old and the needs of the fifteen-year-old are considered. As the range is narrowed, the possibilities are greater.

Our Problems

The problems in administering this threefold division of the church are:

- 1st. To get the church membership converted to the need.
- 2d. To secure attendance.
- 3d. To secure the kind of leaders we need.
- 4th. To provide programs and literature. The general church authorities must get behind the solution of these problems, especially the latter two.

We must extend the number of trained workers we have. If we are to increase the number of hours that the children are under the religious instruction of the church, the church must see to it that the instructors so provided are most certainly better trained than the parents themselves. The biggest problem that these meetings have had is the question of providing suitable curricula or programs. Ministers conducting them have had to search around with a very great deal of pains to find material.

They have been under the necessity of finding material which would appeal to the interests of the children, whether such interests are worthy of being fostered or not. Quite recently some of the larger churches were busy in getting out courses of study and suggestions for junior churches. It is up to us to do the same. Not only must we revise our present quarterlies, but an increased provision should be made for these further meetings of our children. It cannot be done unless the general church budget makes provision for this movement. The Sunday school as now situated cannot do it alone. The general church must get behind it.

The extension of this idea of grading church services and the extension of the use of the class methods means that we must have a great change in the church architecture of the future. Every church should have from two to three auditoriums or places for general gatherings, one for each of the divisions. These auditoriums should be surrounded with classrooms, at least six to every auditorium. A church building without classrooms is entirely without justification in the future.

Does the World Need the Church?

*Synopsis of sermon by C. B. Hartshorn, broadcasted by the Central Radio Company,
Sunday evening, March 26, 1922.*

I am reluctant to confess that a vast majority of the people we meet with from day to day think that they could get along very well without it. Their actions and speech indicate that religion is all right for the other fellow, but too restrictive and inconvenient for them. This psychology is not new. Centuries ago the great Roman Empire succumbed to it. Still farther back in history, we find that proud Babylon drank the cup of iniquity to its bitter dregs. Sodom and Gomorrah, in like manner, abandoned themselves to carnal and selfish purposes, and one by one these peoples were destroyed and supplanted by a new and better civilization.

The church is a stabilizer. It is so recognized by governments and thoughtful men in all walks of life. Transportation and tax laws have been modified to favor the church, because they have recognized that the church is the greatest of all social benefactors. The clergy has been exempted from war service because its contribution to society is regarded as indispensable, or, at least, of sufficient value to warrant the Government in a policy of conservation in their behalf. There are many men who do not make any personal effort to help the church or pay one cent towards its maintenance, yet who feel very kindly towards it because its influence is a means of protection for their property, caring for the needy and preventing crime, thus reducing their taxes. Men of perverse minds whose natures have been corrupted with evils, nevertheless in their sober moments do not fail to recognize the benefit which is wielded by the church in making society a better place for their own children.

The nations having the least religion are notoriously backward in their civilization. Central America, the Balkans, and the Orient furnish us examples of war, unrest, and retrogression, which I believe are unquestionably the result of their irreligious attitudes. But we need not go so far from home for our comparisons. The community or town which does the most to support the church is not the one which is notorious for lawlessness. The thorn in America's side has never been her large cities where godlessness, vice, and corruption abound. In these festering spots are we most apt to find those who are willing for others to be good, and thus make it safer and better for them and their children, if, in so doing, we do not interfere too much with their opportunities to gratify their fleshly desires. Walt Mason one time described the situation in a verse which he styled

The Preacher's Troubles

The preacher preached of Adam's fall and after church met Brother Gall, who said, while threatened with a fit, "Say, Parson, stick to Holy Writ. Jack up old Moses and his men or Daniel in the lion's den. The people living now on earth don't care a pewter nickel's worth about the folks who cashed their strings a million years ago, by jings! We worshipers who pay the freight would have your sermons up to date. Next Sunday morn the preacher rose and talked of modern joys and woes. He roasted crooks and all their tricks and took a poke at politics. He jarred the shady business man who does things on the fire-sale plan, and after church met Deacon Hunks, a merchant prince with lots of plunks, who said, "You'll have to come down off your perch, or men who now support your church will seek some other synagogue to hear the old-time decalogue. The preacher, downcast, sought his lair and fell into his easy chair, and said, while staring at the wall, "It's sure hard work to please them all."

It is a sad commentary upon our present-day civilization that so many well-educated and refined people make religion a matter of convenience. A Sunday school boy was once asked to define a lie. His answer was, "It's an abomination in the sight of the Lord and an ever present help in time of trouble." The philosophy which this implies sounds suspiciously like it had been borrowed from adult teaching.

In the foregoing we have used the word church very largely as a synonym for religion. But what is religion? Christ said (Matthew 15: 8, 9), "This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoreth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me. But in vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." Thus, ac-ording to the greatest authority on religion that the world has ever known, there is a "vain" form of religion which we would do well to avoid. We may say that religion is living true to one's highest ideals. Some one has said, "Live to bear watching, then never mind who watches you." But religion is more than a matter of personal conscience, for conscience is a creature of education and may become so blunted to the finer things of life and so indifferent to the welfare of others that but little religion would be exhibited, even though one were living true to the dictates of their conscience. "Pure religion," says the Apostle James (James 1: 27), "is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." It requires doing something for others and the keeping of one's character above reproach.

A colored man once came to his pastor and said, "Pa'son Brown, I'se got religion—sure nuff religion."

"Is that so?" replied the minister, "I'm glad to hear it, Sam. I suppose you are going to join the church now."

"I sure am, Pa'son."

"And I suppose that you will be kind to your family?"

"I sure will."

"And that you will help the widows and orphans?"

"Yes, sah."

"And now, Sam, I suppose you will pay all your debts, too?"

"Now lookee here, Pa'son," replied Sam, meditatively; "that ain't religion; that's business."

God pity the man who cannot take his religion into his business. It is of these modern Pharisees that Christ would say, "In vain do ye worship me." True religion has never been at a discount. Wherever it has been properly exhibited and understood, it has been appreciated and admired. Christ himself hated hypocrites and sham religions. "Faith without works is dead." "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." (Matthew 7: 21.) Those who are dead spiritually, as well as physically, should be buried. Religion is an antidote for the poisons produced by sin if taken in large enough doses. It is an emetic, and the dose should be increased until it makes us vomit up all the toxin which we have taken into our system. It should make us so sick and disgusted of iniquity that sin will ever thereafter be repulsive to us.

A doctor one time told me that he quit going to church when he left Sunday school, not that he had anything against religion, but he was too busy to give it his attention. "The golden rule is my reli-

What Are the Facts About Evolution, Etc.?

By Ralph W. Farrell

"If the error is taken out of the theory of evolution there is no fight to make against it."

Must we live it over again—this siege of infidelity which we thought was broken when the Darwinian theory was exploded? Will the church itself live to see members in her bosom denying the divinity of Christ, which divinity includes his virgin birth? Will there arise among us persons who will say that certain passages in the Book of Mormon should be excluded? Are the waves of crass materialism ever to lap the foundation stones of the church? And if such conditions do come, what will be the cause or causes? The answer is plain: False education, ignorance, or sin; for all or any one of the three is sufficient to darken the mind and sow the seeds of apostasy—for the word apostasy means, falling away from truth.

The constitutional teachings of the church, along this line, are easily and plainly stated:

Bible: Now the birth of Jesus Christ was in this wise: When his mother Mary had been betrothed to Joseph, before they came together she was found with child of the Holy Ghost. (Matthew 1: 18.)

Book of Mormon: And he said unto me, Behold, the virgin whom thou seest is the mother of the Son of God, after the manner of the flesh. (1 Nephi 3: 58.)

Doctrine and Covenants: Wherefore the almighty God gave his only begotten Son, as it is written in those scriptures which have been given of him. (Section 17: 5.)

Bible: Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself:

gion," he said in a sort of afterthought. Further discussion of the matter proved that he could not even quote the golden rule, yet he had a general idea that it meant doing good to others. I commended him on his ambition to live by the golden rule, doing unto others as he would that others should do unto him, but I called his attention to the fact that he was undertaking a stupendous task in a single-handed manner. In order to carry out this great principle enunciated by the Christ, one surely needed the help of the church and the environment and encouragement of religious people. These furnish the tools with which to do the work required by the maxim. Perhaps it is possible for one to live the golden rule without the help of the church, but we might almost as well talk of the sculptor making a beautiful statue out of the marble block without the aid of a chisel.

handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have. (Luke 24: 39.)

Book of Mormon: Nevertheless, in our bodies shall we see God . . . and the graves must deliver up their captive bodies, and the spirits of men will be restored, one to the other. (Second Nephi 6: 7, 29.)

Doctrine and Covenants: They were strangers and pilgrims on the earth, but obtained a promise that they should find it and see it in the flesh. (Section 45: 2.)

Bible: Christ died for us. (Romans 5: 8.)

Book of Mormon: For it behooveth the great Creator that he suffereth himself to become subject unto man in the flesh, and die for all men, that all men might become subject to him. (2 Nephi 6: 10.)

Doctrine and Covenants: that they may do it in remembrance of the blood of thy Son which was shed for them. (Section 17: 23.)

Bible: And the Lord God formed man out of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul; the first flesh upon the earth, the first man also. (Genesis 2: 8, I. V.)

Book of Mormon: . . . after the Lord God sent our first parents forth from the garden of Eden to till the ground, from whence they were taken. . . . (Alma 19: 82.)

Doctrine and Covenants: By these things we know that there is a God . . . and that he created man male and female; after his own image and in his own likeness created he them. (Section 17: 4.)

Bible: For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. (1 Corinthians 15: 22.)

Book of Mormon: Behold it was appointed unto man to die; therefore as they were cut off from the tree of life, they should be cut off from the face of the earth; and man became lost forever; yes, they became fallen man. (Alma 19: 87.)

Doctrine and Covenants: Wherefore it came to pass, that the Devil tempted Adam and he partook the forbidden fruit, and transgressed the commandment, wherein he became subject to the will of the Devil because he yielded unto temptation; wherefore, I the Lord God, caused that he should be cast from the garden of Eden. (Section 28: 11.)

It must be a cardinal belief of a Latter Day Saint that Jesus Christ was not begotten through the natural processes of man; that there will be a literal and material resurrection of the body; that Jesus offered an infinite atonement; that Adam was our first parent and was formed by God out of the dust of the ground; that Adam fell from grace. Therefore, any teaching that militates against these truths must be out of harmony with the three books of the church and therefore out of harmony with the will and mind of God.

A Dangerous Doctrine

Our object, then, will be to give reasons for the belief that evolution, as it is commonly interpreted by a large number of persons, is a dangerous doctrine and one that has a tendency to undermine the faith of young Latter Day Saints. Our thesis will be hastily written, poorly constructed, and time and space will afford of our only skimming over the surface of the subject; but we ask for it the careful consideration of those who need it, and we feel that if one soul is saved from falling into the meshes of this great devouring delusion, Evolution—as interpreted by many—we shall be amply repaid and to God will belong the honor and the glory.

It is easy to confuse the question by the use of such expressions as these: "Everyone believes in evolution"; "God works through the process of evolution"; "Why all this talk against evolution?" These glib rejoinders savor somewhat of crocodile logic. If they were true in the absolute, and left nothing else to be said, why, then there would be nothing else to be said. But persons who have heard this talk about the "missing link," about man descending from monkey, about a "gas god," etc., know that there is something more to be said, and they know that these changing theories of men have taught many things which are far from truth.

No fault is found with the word, as such; and its first definition, as given by the Century Dictionary, sounds plausible and simple and harmless: "The act or process of unfolding, or the state of being unfolded; an opening out or unrolling." So we hear of the evolution of the flower, etc. Let it be understood, then, that it is against a certain theory or doctrine to which the term evolution is applied, that we join issues that we oppose. It is this certain so-called scientific theory, indorsed by Lamarck and Darwin, that is against plain Bible truths, that we examine in this paper and at least attempt to rebut. This rise and spread of the doctrine of evolution, in the form given to it by Darwin, Huxley, and Spencer, is one of the striking phenomena of the last half of the nineteenth century. Evolution is opposed to creationism, or the view that all living things have been created at some time substantially as they now exist. This latter view is supported by the Bible narrative.

No Reproduction of New Species

In the first chapter of Genesis, containing only thirty-one verses, the author quietly states nine times over that living creatures were commanded to reproduce each "after his kind." Naturally, to the nonbeliever in the word of God this statement holds no special significance; but we do not understand how a Christian can exchange a plain Bible teaching for a changing theory, teaching that every living creature is a link in a long chain connecting it with ancestry of another kind, and moreover had a tendency to produce offspring of another kind than its own. And we want to state here, without fear of being successfully contradicted, that that there is not a single instance of the reproduction by one living thing of offspring of a different species. Even the mule is sterile. God has set a barrier against the mixture or confusion of species by cross breeding, by ordaining the sterility of hybrids. Mr. Darwin labored in vain to explain away this great fact. He could not find one link connecting species, to say nothing of hundreds. In the coral reefs, be they six thousand or six million years old, the insects which built them have not altered in the least in that period. All the efforts of breeders have not succeeded in making the horse specifically different from the noble animal described in the Book of Job four thousand years ago. The sheep has not become a goat, nor the goat a sheep, by all the pains of the shepherds since the days of Abel. And yet Haeckel, with the dogmatism of a scientist, tells us that "with a single stroke Darwin has annihilated the dogma of creation."

Evolution and Growth

In this great universe of ours there are two distinct methods of working. One is a method of evolution, a method that perfects nothing, but looks back over a series of failures and looks forward with a big question ever before its eye. This method of evolution is found only in human affairs and nowhere else in the universe. The other is a method of creation. It is that of an Omnipotent and Allwise Being, who works after the counsel of his own perfect will, who has no need to experiment, and with whom failure is impossible. By this latter method the universe was made. "By the Word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth." (Psalms 33: 6.)

It seems hardly necessary to remind the reader of the difference between evolution and growth (which may characterize a creature). Evolution is the development of a thing or set of things into something else. Growth is the development of an organism into itself; i. e., its maturity; first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear.

Doctor Urquhart has expressed it so much better than we can, that we will quote a few statements from his concluding paragraphs in Organic Evolution Cross-Examined, pp. 145-147:

If animals had been evolved we should have found the strata occupied at first by animal remains of one form only. Then by and by we should have seen them diverge from each other by small variations. The difference would have become more marked, until perfect distinct forms were reached. . . . But this is not what we do find. There are wide differences in the forms from the very first; and some of the earliest continue to the present hour unchanged. "The new forms," says the late Duke of Argyll, "always appear suddenly," from no known source. . . . The usual way of evading this great difficulty in the facts of geology, is to plead what is called the imperfection of the record. But this plea will not avail here. There are some tracks of time regarding which our records are as complete as we could desire. In the Jurassic rocks we have a continuous and undisturbed series of long and tranquil deposits—containing a complete record of all the new forms of life which were introduced during these ages of organic life. And those ages were, as a fact, long enough to see not only a thick (1,300 feet) mass of deposit, but the first appearance of hundreds of new species. These are all as definite and distinct from each other as existing species. No less than 1,850 new species have been counted—all of them suddenly born—all of them lasting only for a time, and all of them in their turn superceded by still newer forms. There is no sign of mixture, or of confusion, or of infinitesimal or of intermediate variations. These "Medals of Creation" are all, each of them, struck by a new die, which never failed to impress itself on the plastic materials of this truly creative work.

And Doctor Gustave Galey, director of the Institute Metapsychique International, comes before the public, in his work, From the Unconscious to the Conscious (Harper & Brothers, 1920), and tells us some interesting things which may well have a place in this article. On page 9 he says:

It is not difficult to show that neither the Darwinian nor the Lamarckian hypothesis enables us to understand the origin of characteristics that constitute a new species. Let us take the Darwinian hypothesis first. Natural selection, considered as an essential factor of transformism, has grave obstacles to overcome, obstacles of principle and obstacles of fact. . . . In order that any given modification occurring in the characteristics of a species or an individual, should give to that species or to that individual an appreciable advantage in the struggle for life, it is evident that this modification must be sufficiently marked to be utilizable. Now an embryonic organ, a modification merely adumbrated, appearing by chance in a being or a group of beings, can be of no practical use and gives them no advantage. . . . It is impossible to attribute to natural selection the transition from reptile to bird.

The Hunting Hymenoptera

And again, from pages 16-19:

One cannot even conceive by what mysterious series of adaptations an insect, accustomed to larval life, underground or in water, could succeed in gradually creating for itself wings for an aerial life, closed to it and doubtless unknown.

Here Doctor Galey refers to the imperishable work done by Henri Fabre in this direction of showing that neither Darwin nor Lamarck explained the origin of the instinct. From the Life of Fabre, we shall have occasion to quote later in this article; but Doctor Galey will give us, in his own words, the discovery which Fabre made concerning the hunting hymenoptera:

The larva of these insects requires a motionless and living prey; motionless, because any defensive movements might imperil the delicate egg and afterwards the tiny grub developing in one part of the caterpillar; and living because the grub cannot subsist on dead matter. To realize this double necessity for its larva, the hymenopteron must paralyze the victim without killing it. If the insect acted from reason this operation would need extraordinary knowledge and skill. It would first have to proportion the dose of poison so as to administer just enough to paralyze without killing; and further, still more important, it should have a knowledge of the anatomy and physiology of the caterpillar and an infallible sureness of action to strike at once on the right spot by surprise, for the prey is often formidably armed and stronger than the aggressor. The poisoned sting must therefore be directed with certainty on the motor nervous centers, and there only. One, two, or several stabs are needed, according to the number or concentration of the nerve-ganglions. This function, so unerringly exercised by the insect, had not been learned. When the hymenopteron tears its cocoon and emerges from underground, the parents and predecessors have been dead, and the insect itself will perish without seeing its progeny or its successors. The instinct cannot therefore be transmitted by example nor by training. It is innate. How can the origin of this instinct be explained by any of the classical factors of evolution?

Instinct, we are told, is but a habit acquired little by little and transmitted by heredity. Fabre laid himself out to demonstrate the impossibility of this concept.

So Doctor Galey comments as follows:

To consider the insect attentively is to be convinced of the emptiness of ancient and modern theories on the creation or the evolution of species. The insect, appearing in the first ages of terrestrial life, and showing in all cases the essential stability of its species once they have appeared, bears strong testimony against the concept of continuous transformation. The chasm which separates the perfect insect from its larva—an abyss in which the Darwinian and Lamarckian theories are hopelessly lost—is testimony against its evolution by the classical factors of selection and adaptation.—Page 29.

Foundation of a World-wide Religion

Now it becomes us to go back and quote a few words from the introduction to Doctor Galey's work. The introduction is written by J. D. Beresford, who says:

Just as our forefathers opposed and sneered at the coming of Science, so these representatives of the great materialistic age resent and combat the greater promises of our own time. For them Charles Darwin is still the splendid discoverer of man's origin and they dread the coming of the finer and more inclusive theory of Being which will turn Darwin's Descent of Man and The Origin of Species into interesting relics of an old and superseded mode of thought. . . . If Doctor Galey's theory is, as I believe, a true one, it must inevitably revolutionize our knowledge both of biology and psychology, and may, at the same time, lay the foundations of a world-wide religion. . . . And we must remember that Doctor Galey comes before us backed by the authority of the practical scientist and scholar.

Jean Henri Fabre was born in 1823 and died in 1910. His work on insects ranks as the finest and most painstaking study of its kind ever produced by man. Perhaps he has done more, excluding the inspired writers of the Scriptures, to call man back from Darwinian infidelity, than any person who ever lived. From his Life by Abbe Augustine Fabre (published by Dodd, Mead & Company, 1921,) I quote.

Mr. Fabre said: "I wage war boldly upon those ideas I believe untrue; but God preserve me from ever doing so upon those who maintain them." (Page 285.) He speaks of Darwin's theories thus: "Facts, as I see them, disincline me to accept his theories." (Page 285.) And on the following page,

Darwin is quoted as referring to Fabre as the "inimitable observer."

Continuing the theme, Fabre writes:

Nowhere does the theory of evolution come full tilt against so immovable an obstacle. Darwin, a true judge, did not fail to recognize this. He greatly dreaded the problem of the instincts. My first results in particular had left him anxious. If he had known the tactics of the Hairy Ammophila . . . and other predatory insects, which have since been investigated, his anxiety, I believe, would have become a frank avowal of his inability to get instinct to enter the world of his formula.—Page 288.

And Fabre asks this question, which grew out of his forty years' study of insects:

Is the world subject to the fatalities of evolution, from the first albuminous atom which coagulated into a cell, or is it ruled by an Intelligence? The more I see and the more I observe, the more does this Intelligence shine behind the mystery of things. I know I shall not fail to be treated as an abominable "final causer." Little do I care! A sure sign of being right in the future is to be out of fashion in the present.—Page 351.

"A Sovereign Order rules over matter. This is what the sloe weevil tells us in its humility," says Fabre. (Page 349.)

That Fabre believed in a certain order of evolution, we do not deny. His words are quoted here to prove that his experience with the work of God confirmed his faith in Deity and furnished reasons, to Fabre, for disbelieving the evolutionary theories of Darwin and Lamarck.

No Evolution in Animals

The fact that evolution is the method which obtains in human affairs, is very easily shown and not denied by thinking Christians. It seemed to be this fertile source of information which Herbert Spencer (First Principles, chapter 14,) studied so intensely that really fixed in his mind the theory that evolution applied everywhere. But it does not. Why was it that Mr. Spencer overlooked the fact that in marked contrast with the evolution of human society is the fact that the lower animals have developed no changes, in their natural modes of living? The birds have not improved in nest building, ants colonize precisely as they did hundreds of years ago. The wasp stings his prey to-day no differently than he did in the dim past. Man, being imperfect, makes mistakes; but the humbler order of living beings perform without experiment; and when we pass the line of human affairs we strain our eyes in vain for a scrap of evidence to show that the process of evolution ever had a foothold.

If the error is taken out of the theory of evolution, there is no fight to make against it; but if it is a path that leads to infidelity, or agnosticism, as was the case with Darwin, the other side to the story should be heard and studied carefully. If belief in

Closing a Successful Series

The series of study outlines on psychology, which have been appearing weekly in our columns, is concluded with the present issue. The article this week, "The psychology of work," as well as the one appearing last week, entitled "The psychology of prayer," were written by Sister Glines as additions to the questions gleaned from Mr. Betts's text, and are well worth a most thoughtful reading.

Much of human happiness is dependent upon the mental attitude towards life and its events and experiences. Many people miss the joys of life because they dwell upon its adversities. Too few remember to look up and out, to lift their thoughts from the lower to the higher planes where there is plenty of room, plenty of beauty, and plenty of courage born of faith and hope. Too many regard work as a misfortune, and spend precious moments and vitality in wishing for leisure, for means or affluence, wrongly thinking these could bring happiness.

A thoughtful author says: "We must distinguish well between work and toil. That is toil which is done solely for the common necessity, into which no love enters. Again, that is work which is done for love—that is to say, for the higher necessity. That we should at the same time derive a living from it, adds dignity and worth. But the work is sufficient unto itself; it is a certain worship of beauty—the beauty of industry it may be—and flows freely from the heart. There is no heart, no soul in toil. But though there be dire necessity, we work none the less in love; and should love go out of it, on the instant it becomes toil. . . . All honest work is dignified by the way in which it is done. We may buy and sell worthily, just as we may preach and write unworthily. . . . Half-heartedness is the bane of any good work. He alone who puts his heart into it will do anything worth while. . . . Every sane man finds work his good friend, and esteems it above all as the means of employing his faculties and expressing himself in at least some degree. . . . There is a good genius for every man—it is his mental attitude! . . . Most men work for a living; some truly great men have blessed the earth by living to work."—Stanton Kirkham.

Looking back over our lessons in psychology, are we able to determine wherein and to what extent they have helped us evolution must be built on a shattered belief in the account of creation as given by Moses, then Bible believers should lift a voice against evolution. If belief in the theory of evolution weakens belief in the fall of man, divinity of Christ, literal resurrection of the body, and the corroborative teachings in the Book of Mormon, then Latter Day Saints should oppose evolution. If such is not the case (but we affirm that it is), let the teachings of evolution be harmonized with the Scriptures—let the matter be made plain. Come out in the open, Mr. Evolutionist, and frankly state that you are a believer in evolution and doubt the account of the nativity, fall of man, et cetera, or, that you are a believer in evolution and can show that it does not contradict the teachings of the Word of God.

in solving daily problems, deciding procedure, and guiding us in our efforts towards a nobler womanhood and motherhood? Do we understand better the variations of conduct and mental reactions? Do we more easily recognize types, and thus are better able to influence permanently? Are we more charitable, more loving, more appreciative than we were before?

If we have made some definite progress in some direction towards God and towards a clearer understanding of his great love and power, we will feel richly rewarded for the moments or hours we have spent upon these lessons. If, through our broadened perceptions, we are able more correctly to interpret any of life's experience, we shall not have worked in vain, and the results, shown in our daily labors, can only be estimated in eternity.

A Tribute to a Faithful Sunday School Superintendent

We who have watched you through the years, weaving, strand by strand, out of the kind, creative powers of your heart, mind, and hand, the work of God; feeding his lambs in patient and loving tenderness—we, beloved sister, desire to speak to you. We desire to tell you, face to face, a faint part of our appreciation, for our hearts are stirred in love and gratitude to you, dear heart!

Can we in some way make you understand our thanks to the Father for you, our appreciation of the beneficent influence of your example—ever assisting us and our young upward and forward on the difficult path towards light and purity?

We have seen you weaving through the years your patient strands of loyalty, endurance, and duty, weaving in gentle continuity, ever persisting, ever conquering! We have seen the light of service glowing steadily, warmly, in your gentle eyes, a light tended by your calm, vestal heart, revealing a divine and maternal compassion and love. Its rays have nourished and inspired us, and encouraged us to respond to your beckonings towards the heights.

You have taught us to rely upon you, to draw renewed streams of strength from your sweet character and charitable wisdom. We look eagerly to the opportunities of the present and future when we may be permitted to again work by your side, to learn from you, and to benefit by the unselfish generosity of your devotion.

Lift up your head and rejoice, dear friend of ours. Our response to the debt we owe to you is voiced in ceaseless pleadings from the very heart of us, that God in heaven will be very kind to you, that you may be comforted and cheered through every trial, and be blessed in all your ways.

Leadership

The Leader Working Out Her Plans

One of the first things a Leader must consider is how to coordinate the work of the Women's Department with that of the other departments of the church, and, particularly, with that of the presiding officer or pastor of her group or branch.

Having found out what is expected from your organization and made your general plans in regard thereto, you are then ready to submit these plans to the presiding officer for his suggestions and approval. It is well to do this at the first of the year, and before real work is started. In this way, the officers are aware that you have a program towards which you intend to work, they know what it is, what scope it covers, and are in a position to give you their best support and cooperation.

Organization involves two elements—work and workers.

They must be combined. The task must be modified to suit the worker and the worker modified to suit the task.

Let us first consider the work itself. Work out your plan by laying out your work. Some things you will find to be fundamental and basic, others incidental. We should concern ourselves primarily with that which is fundamental rather than incidental. In other words, let us try to separate the important from the unimportant. Having accomplished this, make a clear note of it. Write it down, and keep it before you. Immediately things must begin to happen. Do the most important thing first, the next important next, and so on. Have a rapidly moving program. The real leader finds rest only when things are in motion towards her goal.

Keep on your desk notes calling attention to unfinished business, meetings to attend, important matters that should be considered. Look them over each day. Get them done! Scratch them off your list. Always you may be sure there will be more to follow! Good management is the art of direction and regulation—the art of directing activity in a systematic and purposeful manner.

Keep yourself in good physical condition, for it is impossible to do a big job continually without vitality or energy. Remember that energy—physical and mental energy—is the basis of all leadership.

To do your work you must have helpers, women trained or in training for some particular tasks or parts of the whole. Decide how many helpers you are going to need. Do nothing yourself that you can get others to do for you. The good leader is not the one who does all the work herself, but rather the one who delegates many tasks to a force of willing helpers about her. The successful executive is she who avails herself of the values hidden in the faculties of others. Gather around you women that are capable, more capable than yourself, in various specified directions—specialists, class leaders, born teachers! Put them to work. Cultivate the faculty of picking out good workers. Learn to read character at sight, that you may immediately recognize the ability and talents of those with whom you associate.

Look over the women of your group. Select the best material for the work to be done. Ask her to accept the position of responsibility. Talk to her of your hopes, your plans, your need. Show her that here is special opportunity for her not only to help you, but to advance and develop herself in lines harmonious with her gifts. Offer your help in getting started. Be enthusiastic about the work. It is contagious. You cannot get others to be enthusiastic if you are not yourself, any more than you can give measles without having them.

Then consider your next project, and proceed to fill your ranks in the same way, until you have surrounded yourself with a strong organization of workers who will give you ready service and will work in harmony with you and share your enthusiasm.

People must be properly started in their work. Some few get a good grasp on a new job quickly and move right out in the performance of their duties. Others must be started, aided, encouraged, and sometimes even helped by special plans from their executive, in order that good work may result.

Do not be afraid to encourage, stimulate, instruct, and assist. Be quick to recognize talent and ability, and be careful not to repress either. Notice also ambitions, either worthy or unworthy. There is no room in our department for petty jealousies. There is plenty of work to be done, and room for all who are willing to do it in a good spirit.

Try always to get the other person's viewpoint. Learn to concede the minor things even while steadfastly holding to the more important. The real test of effort is the getting of results. Keep your eye on results. Great achievement is the result not of great genius but of great concentration in work, says Mr. Edison—and who could know better than he?

One writer gives three reasons for failure: 1st, unwillingness to work; 2d, practical help was needed and not given; 3d, either too little or too much to do. See that none of these reasons apply to your workers.

As leaders, let us all strive to show our fitness for our task, by doing our work supremely well.

LULA SANDY.

Two New Books of Interest

Social Work, by Doctor Edward T. Devine (Macmillan), makes clearer the relation between everyday efforts to help others and those large social movements in industry, education, and other departments of life and thought to which they are essentially related. Mr. Devine, former editor of Charities and Commons, now The Survey, has been one of the leaders in American work in this field, and is the editor of the Macmillan Social Welfare library. Social Work is the first of the series.

The book is intended for the general reader as well as for use in the classroom. Doctor Devine gives the background for social work, the relations between social theory and applied sociology. His book indicates that "applied" or "practical" sociology has attained a development which must interest many people, other than those who are in social work.

As Doctor Devine says in his preface, he attempts "to look at charity and correction, at social work, public and voluntary, from a detached point of view; with sympathy and understanding, but with a more critical and more inclusive vision." The parts of the book are entitled: 1, introductory, including a specially important chapter on the standard of life; 2, poverty; 3, disease and disability; 4, crime; 5, improvement of conditions; 6, general considerations, including studies of methods of organization and coordination, finances, preparation for social work, and the future of social work.

The Labor Movement and the Church, by Reverend John McC. Wilson (The Stratford Co.), is a short study of the ideals of the labor movement in their relation to Christianity. The author says that the labor movement has been strong just in proportion to its carrying the Christian ideal into practice, and that, to succeed, it must become entirely Christian.—Omaha Bee.

Juvenile Delinquents Need Scientific Study

"A much larger proportion of mental defectives is to be found among delinquents as they appear in court than in the ordinary population, perhaps ten times as many," says Doctor William Healy, Director of the Judge Baker Foundation in Boston, in a report just made public by the United States Department of Labor through the Children's Bureau. But Doctor Healy points out that individuals mentally normal are misdoers quite apart from matters of mental capacity and that many feeble-minded people live decently and do their work well. Determining the causes of criminal tendencies and "deciding treatment that is tremendously influential at the formative period of life," Doctor Healy says, "vastly outweighs in importance . . . any decision of a criminal case that may take weeks in court or perhaps fill pages of the newspapers."

The report, entitled "The practical value of scientific study of juvenile delinquents," declares that all delinquent children need scientific treatment, and that mental tests alone do not suffice to give a true picture of the child's personality without study of his home, companions, play, employment, special temptations and bad examples, quality of schooling and other conditions of environment, taken together with his whole mental life, his lack of knowledge or his misinformation, his habits, secrets, grudges, and ideas.

This report is one of a series issued by the Children's Bureau with the purpose of furthering discussion and development of juvenile court standards. Scientific work in juvenile courts, it declares, is a natural expression of the modern demand for results, since imprisonment alone does not check crime. Numerous examples of cases are given in which complete scientific study, including that of social environment, aided to change the career of a so-called "born criminal."

While this form of study is not confined to the usual technical limits and while its consideration is recommended to "aid the everyday judgments of any who wish to deal understandingly with juvenile delinquents," "it is not to be supposed," Doctor Healy says, that it can be carried out "by anybody except some one with interest and training," and he concludes that if lack of scientific students impedes progress more workers must be trained in this field. And if the expense deters from individual studies in the courts, it must be considered what the cost of diagnosis amounts to in the light of the heavy cost of a delinquent career.—Children's Bureau Bulletin, United States Department of Labor.

More than one half of the girls and women that reach the women's court in New York are considered below par mentally.

Psychology

Text: The Mind and Its Education, by George Herbert Betts. Herald Publishing House, $2.10, postpaid.

LESSON XX

The Psychology of Work

Whenever one has finished any given task, a day's work, a year's work, a study course, or an allotment of activity of any sort, whether it be physical or mental, it is beneficial to take an inventory of oneself. Unless there are some things of practical and lasting benefit derived from work, unless one is made more efficient for future activity, unless one's horizon has been broadened from the pursuance of the study course just completed, then the work performed has been of no avail and consequently time lost. Believing that one's temporal salvation and one's final fitness for eternal salvation are determined largely by the work one does, the motive behind it, and the spirit carried into it, we have appended one lesson on "The psychology of work" not found in the text.

The teachers of all times have stressed the value and significance of work. Paul, in one of his letters to the Philipians, admonished them to "work out their own salvation with fear and trembling." Paul realized and wanted them to realize that it was through work that man would fit himself for salvation. James teaches that "faith without works is dead." He understood not only how fundamental was faith in the accomplishment of merely temporal ends, to say nothing of the kingdom of God, but he realized that under normal conditions the measure of one's faith is the work which results from it.

In one of the lessons from the text, you have learned that the only way by which we may know another individual is by his acts, his outward expressions. A person is as large as the thing he does, but no larger. One's own doing is the expressed side of his life. This is the only side that can be read by other individuals. One's physical, mental, and spiritual development and efficiency are directly due more to the work one does than to all other things combined, not forgetting, however, the important factor of one's inheritance, over which he has no control. To the keen observer one's trade or profession is easily determined for the reason that what one does—one's work—settles down all over him and the marks of his calling are unmistakable.

In personal development there is no substitute for work. Neither luck nor brilliancy is a substitute. Many children are started to school too young, or at irregular times other than regular entrance periods, or are permitted to go spasmodically, their absent days being too many under ordinary circumstances. If the child is too young to comprehend and keep up with the class, he soon begins to get listless, inattentive, and disinterested. If the child is permitted to attend irregularly and without promptness and punctuality, he is forming habits which in all probability will dominate his later life. When a child has been allowed to loaf through a school course, his attainments are not what they should be, and besides the habit of loafing has been confirmed; the school and the home turn out a loafer and not a worker, one whose tendencies are toward tramping and not toward productive, independent citizenship. Parents should cooperate so closely and so intelligently with the teacher in the school that there should never, under normal conditions, be a failure in the school life of the child so far as is concerned the accomplishment of the work allotted for his grade. The failure on the part of a child in school work is indicative that that child's parents and teacher have not worked together. Because of this lack of cooperation, the child has not been made to do the work that should have been done. This is the beginning of his loafing habit. No one knows where it will end.

Not only in the schoolroom should children have their tasks, but such home tasks as they can do should be done by them. Play and work periods should be systematically arranged for and not done spasmodically, or at the whim of either the parent or the child. The child reared in the home where every member, who is old enough, has his particular tasks and has been trained to do them cheerfully, regularly, and well, will become the individual who will appreciate and properly evaluate work, not as drudgery, but as the means whereby he can forge out his own particular manner of man. There is positively no substitute for consistent, persistent hard work at something that needs to be done.

1. Suggest some of the things children can do in the home.
2. At what age should children be started to school? Give reasons for your answer.
3. Why do some people regard work as drudgery?
4. What are the advantages and disadvantages in working one's way through school?
5. What are the harmful results of a mother paying her child to do errands or light tasks for her?
6. Why is work hard and play easy to a child even when the latter requires the expenditure of more energy?
7. In the light of the sixth question, how could a parent get a boy to clear the brush from a lot without the parent's command?
8. Should children do home studying during the school year? Give reasons for your answer.
9. Why do so many people dislike to study?
10. What is most conducive to mental lassitude?

LETTERS AND NEWS

A Testimony Through Prophecy

In a letter from G. R. Kuykendall, the substance of the testimony of Elder Tomlinson, who was for several years a general missionary of the church, is reported as follows:

"I know that this church is true and that Joseph Smith was a true prophet of God," says Elder Tomlinson. Now follows his reason for knowing it: "Several years ago, when I was a young man, I was attending a prayer meeting of the Saints. An elderly lady entered whom I had never before seen and knew nothing of. The Spirit of the Lord rested on me and I knew that I was to deliver some message, but I resisted the Spirit. It then left me. I felt condemned and prayed the Lord, stating that I would do his bidding. The Spirit returned; I prayed for strength. I then turned loose of the seat, which I had been clinging to, and I knew nothing else till I was standing beside this lady. I delivered the following to her: 'Thus saith the Spirit, from the time thou was baptized by my servant Joseph, I have watched over thee and I have led thee here to spend thy remaining days with my people, and the days of thy mortal life shall soon end.'"

The above is the substance of what the brother said he delivered as a message of the Spirit to the above mentioned sister. Now come the substantiating facts:

After the service had ended, some of the Saints approached the lady and asked her if she was, or ever had been, a member of the church. She stated that many years ago, when young, she had been baptized by Joseph the Martyr, but had married an outsider and had moved into other parts away from the church, had reared her family in the faith of some other church, and had been entirely out of touch with the Latter Day Saint Church all these years. Her husband had died, her family was gone, and she had come to this town. After arriving there she heard of the little meeting place of the Saints, and largely out of curiosity had come to their place of worship. She was looking for work. They secured a place for her as a housekeeper. Her health was good and she was quite strong for months. One day while at work in the home she dropped dead, just eleven months after the time the message was delivered to her.

The fact that the brother knew nothing of the woman nor her past that she had been baptized by his servant Joseph, was indeed a very strong testimony that Joseph was a prophet and servant of God. And the statement, "Baptized by my servant Joseph," indicates that still, following his death, he was yet considered by the Lord his servant—not a fallen prophet, not one who had once been his servant, but spoken of then as being at that time as his servant.

Let Us Sound a Call in Zion

Eva Fern Brown, a sister of Independence, Missouri, writes: "We are the people of whom it is said, 'Be in the world but not of the world.' Those who are of the world are blinded to the truth of God's work, taking a little here and a little there and calling it a whole and in their blindness seeing it as such.

"Then let us sound a call in Zion and buckle on our armor to war against the foe that becomes more daring in these the latter days and pray mightily to our God for victory, for the fervent prayers of the righteous will avail much. Let us sound the call through Zion that the way of the Lord, who comes quickly, may be prepared.

"Those who are of the world are dwindling in unbelief and doubtfulness. Though their homes are made desolate by the flood and though the waters lay waste their crops, yet when the word is preached to them they heed not.

"It seems to me we should set aside a day for fasting and prayer for the souls of the world and those who have strayed from the flock. Also if the ancient prophet could pray for the Gentiles who would occupy this land and scatter the remnant of his people, then we too, the Gentiles, should pray for those whom we have scattered."

Are We Gathering in Haste?

In the HERALD of March 8 is a very interesting letter from Brother Thomas Whipple about the gathering and cooperation. He expresses a desire that others write on the subject. I heartily agree with what the brother has said but feel like adding a few more things that he did not refer to.

Several years ago I was talking to a brother about the gathering, and he told in substance the following story: "When I was a young boy the missionaries would come to my father's home and advise us not to be in a hurry about going to Zion; it would not do to rush things too fast. Now I have grandchildren, and I still hear the same story: Don't hurry; you will crowd things too much."

I lived in the Northeastern Nebraska District for thirty-two years, from 1877 to 1909, and during that time five branches disappeared. Having been in close touch with the work during that time I knew what had become of most of them, and I know that ten per cent of those who moved away is all that ever moved into the stakes. That does not look much like rushing things, and it is a fair assumption that a far greater number was lost to the church.

I moved to Independence in 1909, and during that time the net increase to date has been about 200 per year, and of that number more than an average of fifty per year have been children who have been baptized; and that city being the most attractive place in the church for gathering it does not look much like rushing things.

Many times the question is asked, What is the matter? Why don't we do something and not talk so much about it? There can be many answers given by different writers and preachers, so I will give my version of what the trouble is. One of the great hindering causes is that our hearts are right, but our heads are wrong, or in other words we do not pull together. The boys playing baseball and basket ball can teach us a good lesson. They know that if they do not do good teamwork the other side will beat them. In 1909, at the April conference at Lamoni, in answer to earnest prayer, revelation 128 in Doctrine and Covenants was given, which provides for the organization of colonies and agricultural and industrial associations. Thirteen years have passed by and that revelation has not been complied with. In the light of what we have not done, would it not be appropriate for us to stop singing, "We thank thee, O God, for a prophet to guide us in these latter days"?

Several years ago the church recorder's report to the General Conference indicated that about 34 per cent of the membership was absent from branches. In one district where I presided for three years I made a directory of those who were not near enough to branches to attend the services and the number was 60 per cent of the membership of the district. The loss to the church among the isolated ones is great and that is especially true of the young people, the flower and hope of the church. Many thousands of our people who are scattered and are deprived of church privileges have abundant financial means to come into the stakes and form colonies and be no expense to the church in any way. All they need to get them to come is an invitation from those who have the right to do the inviting.

Suppose we had a few of those colonies in the stakes and had a real storehouse like Joseph had built in Egypt, a place to store the products of the farm, and they could bring their tithes in of the things that had been produced, more tithing would come in than now and it would be more useful than money. Not only could those in the colonies send in the products of the farm but from more than one hundred miles away. Those products could be used to care for the poor and missionaries' families.

When the Bishop sent out his budget blank to missionaries' families in the springtime, it could contain questions like these:

How many dozen eggs a month will you need?

How many pounds of butter a month will you need?

How many bushels of potatoes will you need?

How many bushels of apples will you need? And so on with anything that could be used in the home. If such a policy were inaugurated, it would save many thousands of dollars for the church that could be used in some other useful way. And that same principle could be extended to all that wanted to purchase at the storehouse.

As a body we are big spenders and small producers. The only way to get wealth is to produce it by labor, and we need more people on the land to produce what we need. It seems to the writer that it does not take some wonderful genius or a superman to do those things. Just a few men of good business sense and judgment ought to be able to revolutionize our whole economic system in a very few years. We have a large band of loyal people who will follow their leader, who will start for somewhere and get there by a not too devious route.

When General Sheridan's troops were defeated at Winchester and he took his famous twenty-mile ride and met his retreating men, he said, "Boys, we're going back"; and defeat was turned into victory. We are not whipped. We are only confused, and need some one to wave his hat and shout, Come on, boys; victory is just over the hill. It is not so much a question of the people being too fast as it is of the church collectively being too slow. The people are impatient. They have been patiently waiting for a long time.

May the things of Zion that we have worked and prayed for soon come and bring joy to many hearts both in and out of the church, because many thousands are waiting patiently for us to demonstrate that the social and economic ideals of Jesus Christ are the best to live under.

EDWARD RANNIE.

Pauline Hancock reports from Lees Summit, Missouri, that Brother Ammon White preached the morning sermon there on March 19. In the afternoon a program was given which was followed by a young people's prayer meeting, presided over by Brother White and Brother Depuy. About twenty-five young people were at this meeting and nearly every one took part, also a few of the older people. This meeting seems to have awakened a new interest among the young in that place.

William Spargo, of Wigan, England, reports that they are holding their own in the work there. Arthur Smith, the president of the branch, baptized four and they are sure of more to follow. They have a good staff of officers working in harmony. Sunday school and Religio are proving interesting and instructive.

New Mission House at Honolulu

On March 25 Elder G. J. Waller left this city for New Zealand and Australia; he will be gone about three months on business for his company, but expects to visit some of the churches in these two countries.

The mission headquarters in Honolulu was transferred on March 22 from the Waikiki section of the city, to 827 Young Street. This is about one mile from the central part of the city.

Our church owns ground through the entire block from the new mission house to our church building on King Street. This gives us a large plot of ground between the two buildings for our outdoor activities. The yard is being fixed up for tennis, basket ball, etc. We also have a large tent that will be used in the yard for special functions when needed.

Our church building is being beautified by a coat of paint, the work being done by the members themselves. In remodeling the mission house, one half will be used by the pastor as his home; the rooms in the other half will be used by the members. One room is being fitted up as a reading room and the young people's club room. Another room will be used by the older members, including the Women's Department, as their work room, rest room, and assembly place.

We have a fine band of young people that we desire to take care of, giving them recreation privileges as well as spiritual instruction. We believe the new mission home will answer all our requirements along this line.

There is another building on the grounds that is the home of our church nurse and her husband. This feature of our work we find most essential, as our nurse visits the homes of members where there is sickness, the same as a district nurse visits in the cities in the States. Patients are brought to her home for special treatment when necessary. By this method large doctor bills are avoided.

The old mission house has served its day. It has sheltered many of our missionaries in days gone by. Its yard was a beautiful tropical garden, and many church functions were held here. We sold the place with some regret, because of fond remembrances connected with the place. But the work of grouping our buildings, so that our activities might be centralized, was deemed necessary at the present time, hence the fitting out of the new mission near the church.

We are planning for great things for the future. We have not lost the old mission house entirely, as one of our members bought the place, and we hope to have a Chinese Sunday school established here in the near future. Years ago such a school was in this place, and the present owner was at that time one of the scholars. We trust that the way will open up whereby many other features may be established for the benefit of the Saints and the spread of the gospel work in Honolulu.

E. B. HULL.

"G. E. Harrington conducted a meeting of two and one half weeks," writes N. R. Hickie from Weir, Kansas. "Good attendance of outsiders. Much interest, more by outsiders than for twenty years. Two baptisms and others almost convinced."

Mrs. M. Walker, of Lamoni, formerly editor of Autumn Leaves, Zion's Hope, and Mothers' Home Column in the HERALD, recently passed her eighty-eighth birthday. Mrs. Walker is still alert in mind and active in body for one of her years, being up and about the house and able to attend to minor household duties. She is a marvel to those who know her, especially in the light of her past active life.

Independence

In common with the rest of the Middle West, Missouri and region around Independence has suffered somewhat from excessive rains, though immediate damage from floods has been negligible, as Independence is high and dry. The amount of precipitation has been a smaller factor than the continued cloudiness and the frequency of the showers. Many farmers have been prevented from sowing oats, and spring plowing has been at a practical standstill. Gardeners have been able to do some planting, but germination and growth are slow.

Easter Sunday was bright till noon, with showers afternoon and evening. Services at all the churches were in commemoration of Easter. The various choirs rendered sacred cantatas as announced last week, and reports are that they were well attended and highly successful.

At the Stone Church a few extra flowers marked the day. The annual custom of the school was observed, and as a result between two and three bushels of eggs were brought in by all departments as a gift to the Sanitarium. The morning sermon by Elder Walter W. Smith was well received. As it was reported, it will no doubt appear in the church papers soon. For the Easter anthem the choir rendered in an acceptable manner the "Hallelujah Chorus" from "The Messiah."

In the evening a large choir of some ninety voices rendered the "Seven last words of Christ." Bishop James F. Keir gave the introductory remarks. Bertha F. Burgess, soprano; Evan Fry, tenor; and Clarence Resch, bass, were the soloists. This was especially well rendered, for the choir recognizes that technique alone is not sufficient, but spiritual feeling and expression are also essential.

On Friday evening the Religio at the Stone Church rendered "A hundred years of Latter Day Saintism" with a thousand people in attendance. Walnut Park young people put it on last fall. Next Friday evening the Stone Church Religio program will be radio selections broadcasted from the Central Radio Company, of Kansas City and amplified for the audience.

A reception and banquet was held at the Chamber of Commerce rooms uptown on Monday evening (10th) in honor of the basket ball team of the Y. K. T. class. About one hundred were present and a pleasant evening was spent. The team had a record of ten games won and two lost. It is planned to organize a baseball team soon. In addition to toasts to team and officers of the class, there were two readings by Beatrice McNamara.

Four members of the Quorum of Twelve have been in Lamoni for several days on church business. They are Gomer T. Griffiths, John W. Rushton, J. F. Curtis, and T. W. Williams.

An athletic association has been formed under the auspices of the Religio, with R. V. Hopkins as president. They have secured the use of the Walnut Street property at Walnut and Scott Avenue; also will fix up tennis courts on the W. N. Robinson property at Lexington and Fuller. All summer sports will be provided for and proper supervision maintained. The management of grounds will be in charge of the executives of the Religio and captains or leaders of various organized groups who combine into teams. General dues of fifty cents a month will be charged, two months in advance being collected to furnish a working capital.

Static conditions were so bad Sunday evening that no radio sermon was broadcasted from Kansas City, but plans are being made to use next Sunday evening at 8 to 8.45.

The speaker at the Stone Church next Sunday morning will be Elder R. V. Hopkins, and in the evening Elder J. W. Rushton.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium during the week ending April 15: Mrs. Hazel Kiefer, Mount Washington, Missouri; Mike Monce, Sugar Creek, Missouri; Mrs. Della Mae Hollis, Englewood, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Mrs. Eben Miller, Mrs. Ella Emmert and Baby Emmert, Mr. A. E. Terryberry, Mrs. Isabelle Arnold, Mrs. Frosty Smith, Master Vernon Closson, Mrs. J. A. Hininger, Mrs. Don Jones, Miss Mary Lynn Jacobs, and Mr. Charles N. Galland. X-ray patients: Mary Jones, Kansas City, Missouri; and George F. Millard, jr., D. T. Waits, J. Rodger DeWitt, C. F. Savage, and E. H. Berkemeier, of Independence.

On Tuesday evening, April 11, a small meeting of the young people of Zion was held at the Stone Church to consider a proposition for the erection of a young people's building on a lot donated by W. N. Robinson. Brother Robinson also proposed to assist in the erection of a building when the young people are ready and to donate a dollar for each dollar donated by the young people from their own personal, individual earnings.

The reunion committee has decided on July 27 to August 6 as the dates for the Independence reunion. They have been investigating various sites and find several good ones available, though final decision has not been made as yet. A number of assignments have been made in caring for the various features of the reunion, such as young people's activities, educational work, etc., and some of the speakers have been selected. It will no doubt be the best organized and most efficiently managed reunion held in this section, because of having available more talent and more people who will attend.

Kansas City Stake

As has been previously announced, the young people's meetings commenced on Thursday, April 6, at 7.40. Two of the church's able young men are in the lead in presenting the gospel story, Brother Floyd M. McDowell as speaker, and Brother Harold C. Burgess in charge of singing. Owing to the demise of the father-in-law of Brother McDowell, he was unable to be present on Thursday, the first night, but Brother T. W. Williams of the Twelve filled the appointment and was able to please the capacity audience present with a splendid discourse. Brother McDowell occupied on Friday and Sunday nights, measuring up to the expectancy of the splendid audiences, in the masterly efforts made.

On Saturday night, a reception and mixer was held in honor of Brother McDowell in the parlors of the Central Methodist Church. Owing to what amounted to a severe wind and rain storm, the attendance was not as large as expected, but about four hundred braved the elements and were present. A brand new departure in entertainment was a radio telephone concert. A talk to the young people by President Tanner, a solo by Elizabeth Hitchcock, and a cornet duet were enjoyed by radio from the Central Radio Station, 529 Grand Avenue. Other selections were heard from as far away as Chicago.

The gathering was addressed by President F. M. Smith, President Briggs of Graceland College, F. M. McDowell, and others. Refreshments were served. It was a big success in a social way.

Arrangements for the consolidation of the Armstrong and Grandview churches were had more than two years ago, at which time they were to be provided with a suitable building at or near the present Grandview meeting place. The entire abandonment of the Armstrong church building depended upon its disposal, which has just recently been done.

The last meetings were held Sunday, April 9; Sunday school at 9.30, preaching service at 11, Stake President Tanner delivering the discourse. Bishop Blair turned the key over to the new owners, a colored Methodist congregation.

Thus passes one of the historical meeting places in Kansas City, Kansas, as it was built in the early eighties. This congregation has been the clearing house for a good many years—several missionaries have preached their first sermons here, finally to be sent to various localities in the interest of the one gospel. A goodly number of the local ministry obtained their schooling in their labor of love with the Saints at Armstrong. Whatever regrets or feelings of sadness may be had in leaving the sacred spot to others, the fact that it has filled its mission nobly and well nullifies any misgivings entertained, and encourages to greater activity as they occupy new quarters. A new building is the order now at the present site of the Grandview church, which is located at Fourteenth and Central on the Kansas side.

The popular girls' rooming place in Kansas City Stake, known as Temple Hall, at 1406 East Ninth Street, Kansas City, Missouri, near Central Church, happens to have room just now for four girls. A competent Latter Day Saint matron is in charge, and working girls who want the association of friends of like faith find it here under a wholesome atmosphere. Board and room are furnished at nominal rates.

Council Bluffs, Iowa

The regular priesthood meeting is held on the first Sunday of each month at 3 p. m. The study of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants is engaging the attention of the priesthood. Elder O. Salisbury is the regular teacher.

The pastor and family are on a visit, expecting to be absent about three weeks.

Elder T. J. Elliott, of Omaha, was the speaker in the forenoon of the 9th. He emphasized in a very efficient way the necessity of prayer and fasting. The sermon on the evening of the same day on the subject of coming out of the world or Babylon, by Elder Milo Burnett, was much appreciated.

The Pilot Class had their class social at the church last Thursday evening. Report is that there was a good attendance and an enjoyable time. The Bright Star Class of the Religio expect to have their class social at the home of Doctor Burton on Tuesday the 11th.

The Temple Builders and Orioles are showing some interest in their work that bespeaks progress. A special effort is being made in behalf of the Sunday School Department at the Belmont Mission, and those who have made the effort have enjoyed their work.

The choir are about ready to render their Easter cantata on the evening of the 16th, feeling that it will be a treat to those who attend. On the same day at 11 a. m. Patriarch F. A. Smith will begin a two-week revival service, occupying each night except Saturday. The Saints are looking forward to this event with fond anticipation, and the prayer meeting of the 12th will have as the special subject of prayer God's blessings on this series of services.

The Brighamite elders are persistent in introducing themselves as being representatives of the "original church," and boasting of the great work Brigham Young has done. They met with a retort to the first that the courts of the United States had decided that the Reorganized Church was the true successor to the original church, to which they replied that we were not willing to take the word of the Lord for this, but when inquired of there was no evidence produced that God had made the decision in their favor. To the last an admission was made that surely Brigham Young had done more than any man in the United States in having a large number of wives and a large progeny, but so far as doing more for the social and spiritual welfare of the people that was but one of his boastings and falsehoods.

Two-day meetings have been arranged for each branch of the district except Council Bluffs, and at each is to be a session of institute work of the departments.

Saint Thomas, Ontario

Sometime during the summer of last year a young missionary, laboring near Saint Thomas, Canada, was asked to come to that city and preach a funeral sermon. He did so, and from every quarter most favorable remarks were heard concerning his ability as a preacher.

Saint Thomas Saints immediately got busy to try to have him conduct a series of sermons in their branch, and on Sunday, February 19, Elder C. W. Clifford (for he was the missionary) arrived to open the services which we believe are destined to do much good.

Services are held each week night in the Saints' church, Monday and Saturday evenings excepted, and on Sunday evenings in the Columbia Theater. The Thursday night's service is given over entirely to a study of church history and is proving most interesting and instructive, Elder Clifford proving a most efficient instructor.

The church is situated so that it serves only a northeastern section of the city, but the opera is situated on the main street in the very heart of the business section.

An extensive newspaper advertising campaign is being carried on together with billboard advertising at the theater for the theater service, and no expense is being spared to attract the people's attention. Splendid congregations are attending the meetings.

Elder Clifford is indeed a popular missionary, his congenial manner winning him the respect and admiration of not only the Saints but many outsiders whom he is meeting. His wonderful ability as a preacher is the daily topic of conversation.

Assisting the elder in his missionary work while here is his talented wife, who is doing much to help the musical part of the services. The Saints appreciate the assistance given the meetings by the local press, which is proving very fair and willing to publish anything we ask them.

Seattle, Washington

On last Sunday evening we listened to a nice sermon by Brother D. S. McDole who is ever ready to lend a helping hand.

The night of the 11th found us in the hospitable home of Brother Samuel Pope, of New Westminster, and on the 12th we journeyed by interurban to Vancouver where we met with the earnest band of Saints there in a busy day's service. Our sturdy associate, Brother S. S. Smith, was with us.

The principal service of the day was the organization of the Vancouver Branch, composed of seventy-five charter members. The business passed very smoothly, resulting in the selection of Brother Isaac McMullen as elder, with associate officers.

The outlook for a prosperous work there is good. We hastened home on Monday on account of severe illness of my beloved companion. At this writing she is somewhat improved, yet not well. We wish to note the great kindness of the Saints to us in the affliction of my companion, willing to minister in any way possible.

Brother S. S. Smith remained at Vancouver to continue the services, to help on in the work. He will visit Chilliwack to carry out order of conference in an ordination, also to visit Brother Henry Stade who is still afflicted with paralysis.

Brother Harry Butterfield, of New Westminster, is in the fish business. An idea of the immensity of the business may be gained from the fact that he employs over fifty men, and in one month caught and cared for twelve tons of fish. They market as far east as New York. Brother William Johnson, of Vancouver, is closely associated with him in the business.

Brother John Hartnell is still under affliction, disabled for much business.

Our sacramental service was very spiritual from the beginning. Many were melted to tears. All were encouraged in the good cause. Our willing Brother F. W. Holman preached the evening sermon, following an interesting session of Religio, under the care of Charles H. Powers.

We spent Sunday evening with the Everett Mission and found them in new quarters. They have it in mind to build a small church if possible and we hope it may be. They now occupy a house given without rent by Mr. and Mrs. Evans, as yet nonmembers. Their Religio is progressing nicely under the care of Sister Ruby Nichols as superintendent, with associate officers. They announced a box social, the proceeds to be for the building of a church. J. M. TERRY.

WASHINGTON, OKLAHOMA, March 23, 1922.

Editors Herald: Last October R. E. Miller and Joseph G. Smith came here and held a ten-day meeting. There are ten Latter Day Saints here and we had not had a meeting for four years. Some of us were reading the HERALD and Ensign, while others seemed indifferent. The fires were burning low, but when we sat under the sound of the voice telling of the Good Shepherd, the fire was again kindled and we now rejoice in the gospel.

It did seem good to be in a meeting of our own, and as mother said when Brother Smith sang "The gospel ladder" and those other songs, the stillness of heaven seemed to settle down over the little crowd and they seemed amazed.

The gospel seed has indeed been sown here. The good of that little meeting will never be known. Several wanted to know when we open the doors of the church, and some ask when the men are coming back and why they didn't leave an appointment. I feel sure that if we ever have another meeting, there will be some baptized.

We were in hopes that we could have another meeting next summer, but where are our missionaries now? How can we, without a preacher? We want one that has been sent of God. We could all pay our tithing, but there are so many reasons why we don't. It seems that the missionary part is so necessary that we ought to give two or three dollars a day to get Brother Miller and others where God wants them. We can if we try. I am willing if the rest are. May God help us to show our faith by our works.

We were sorry that Brother Smith could not stay with us. We hope that when his health is better, he can return. We all like him, he was so sympathizing. I hope the one that takes his place will be as good. I want to help in this Lord's work, but I know I can't unless I am humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity.

In reading the last words of Moses to the children of Israel, the thought came to me that I could help in teaching the children the Bible, so I asked the Saints what they thought about meeting once every two weeks and reading Bible stories to the children, singing and playing with them, and once every month having prayer meeting. They were willing. We have had four meetings and they enjoy them so well that we are now having them every week.

I found the little book, The Gospel Story and Footsteps of Jesus, was just what I needed, but I want more books. I aim to get the children that can read to read some books and help tell the stories, but I don't know what kind of books to get. I will be pleased to hear from some one that understands what I need for children from five to fifteen years of age.

I take the HERALD and mother takes the Ensign. We read each other's papers and surely do enjoy them, for they are laden each week with food that makes our souls grow and makes the tears flow and the Spirit burn within us. The more we have, the more we want. So may the good sermons and the testimonies and good news keep coming. It makes us feel encouraged to read letters from the missionaries whom we know, and the papers seem better when we see their names.

Let us as Saints live right and demonstrate our religion in our homes with our children; then our light will shine out to the world and it will help more than to try to prove that others are wrong.

May God help us to see ourselves as he sees us. Hoping the way will grow brighter for the church in every way,
MOLLIE CROSS.

MOUNDSVILLE, WEST VIRGINIA.

Editors Herald: I am surely pleased with the HERALD and Ensign and have often wondered how the Saints can keep pace with the church and not know what the church is doing and the progress it is making. It makes me feel that I ought to do more when I read of the efforts the missionaries are putting forth and the success they are having.

We have had Brother John Martin with us holding services for three weeks, have had good interest, the result of which is that three precious souls were baptized. Two of them are very promising young men. One was chosen teacher of the Bible class at our last Sunday school business meeting. His wife is taking charge of the Zion Builders.

We have some good earnest workers here, with the exception of a few whom we are trying to arouse with labor and patience. Brother Schaion is president of the branch and is alive to his duty.

Our sisters have been organized. Sister Blanch Martin and Sister Deanie Winship came from Wheeling to organize them. They are doing fine. In such a short time they have over fifty dollars in the treasury. It is surprising what can be done with united effort.

As I read in the British Isles Number of the HERALD, I saw faces of many with whom I labored in the latter-day work. It made me feel a little homesick, and I felt in my heart that I would like to spend two years in the mission field there.

Many old ones who were dear to me have passed away since I left my native shores. Others are just waiting the call. I saw the picture of Brother Henry Greenwood, senior, who has been one of the pillars of the work there in England, and two others, Joseph Dewsnap and James Baty, who have gone on before. We regret to part with them.

The death of Brother John Bailey came with a severe shock to me. He was a capable man for any position and quite young and loved by all. This brother was my bosom friend. We labored together summer after summer, delivering tracts and preaching on the same subject that the tracts treated. Where we labored the hardest in the past and made the greatest sacrifice is, to-day, the sweetest to my soul.

In those times we had a small organ that Brother Bailey loaned us each Sunday. Brother Albert Hall was the organist, and a great number of the Sunday school would turn out with us. These are sweet memories of the past.

Other photos appear whose faces are familiar: W. R. Armstrong, J. W. Rushton, Joseph Dewsnap, jr., J. Schofield, T. Taylor (Smiling Tommy), J. E. Meredith, and Ed Maloney. May God bless the labors of these brethren.

THOMAS MILLS.

EROS, LOUISIANA, April 6, 1922.

Editors Herald: A few lines from the South, where I am in the land of flowers and influenza. I have administered to thirty-five persons with the influenza in the last ten days.

Yes, the Lord said to Joseph Smith, March 7, 1831, that in the last days we shall hear of wars and rumors of wars and the whole earth shall be in commotion and men's hearts shall fail them and they shall say that Christ delayeth his coming until the end of the earth and the love of men shall wax cold and iniquity shall abound and there shall come an overflowing scourge of desolation and sickness over the land.

Brother Heman Fuller, president of the Eros Branch, has been going almost day and night to administer to the sick and look after their needs.

All of the above conditions that the Lord spoke to his servant and prophet, Joseph Smith, in Doctrine and Covenants 45: 4, are now in the blaze of their fulfillment. Yes, we are in one of the most momentous days since Jesus Christ was on the earth. What are we going to do, Saints? There is but one thing for us to do and that is to live pure and good lives and keep the whole law of God and build up Zion, so that the Lord can gather us home out of the scourge that is now on the earth. So may the Lord help us to do that.

The Lord is blessing his people in their troubles. Brother Heman Fuller and myself visited a home where five were in bed with the influenza. The mother of the house was in a dying condition. We administered to her and life came instead of death. I believe all the Saints are recovering health without the loss of one.

Notwithstanding the sickness we have had a good meeting. Four were baptized and a fine man ordained priest. The prospect for this branch is brighter than I have seen it for some time. We have some fine people here if they can only keep faithful. James Phillips has been branch president for the past year. He has done some good work. Brother J. T. Riley was with us for a few days and went to western Louisiana. I will remain here and try to open up some new places. So may the Lord bless his work everywhere, and we will soon build up Zion and be gathered home.

Your brother in the great gospel work,

E. A. ERWIN.

Twelve Baptized at Wellston, Ohio

Just closed a meeting at Wellston, last night. Large crowds were present after the first few nights. The Saints were built up in the faith, and expressed a desire to live closer to the Lord. Twelve were buried in baptism to come forth to walk in newness of life and to take the gospel law as their guide through life. I leave to-day for Limerick to begin a meeting at that point to-night. The work in Southern Ohio is making some progress and we hear the cry, Come over into Macedonia and help us. There is much to do in the Master's cause. My time is all promised until about September 1. I am weary but no time for rest, as the fields are white for the harvest.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

J. D. SHOWER.

Educational Program for Reunions

To All District Departmental Representatives

Looking forward to the time when the Saints and friends in your district shall be together during the reunion season, the Sunday school, the Religio, and the Women's Departments have decided to unite their activities. We have agreed upon the measures which we feel will be advantageous to you in your reunion work. These measures are as follows:

- a. A common study period every day.
- b. Uniform lesson texts.
- c. The same field workers to represent the three departments.

In explanation of the above, we will say that the time for common study period each day may be decided by the reunion committee.

We recommend as uniform texts a series of pamphlets known as "The American Home Series." These may be obtained from the Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

Following is the list of pamphlets with prices indicated. We have arranged three optional series.

- Series I. No. 3. Parenthood and Heredity, 15 cents.
- No. 4. The Roots of Disposition and Character, 15 cents.
- Series II. No. 8. First Steps Towards Character, 15 cents.
- No. 14. The Government of Young Children, 25 cents.
- Series III. No. 17. The Religious Nurture of a Little Child, (years four and five) 20 cents.
- No. 20. The Government of Children Between the Ages of Six and Twelve, 25 cents.

In order to coordinate more closely and save expense, we have decided to concentrate this year in one field worker who is able to give you assistance in all three departments.

We suggest that you immediately get in touch with your district president and arrange with him to get this information into the hands of all branch officers in your district and urge the members everywhere to club together and order these pamphlets at once so that all may be prepared with their study material by the time it is needed at reunion. This entire set of pamphlets, thirty-seven in all, should be in every local church library and can be had at a nominal cost.

National Hospital Day

The Presidency and Bishopric are pleased to call the attention of the Saints to the general observance of National Hospital Day by all hospitals throughout the United States on the 12th day of May. This day is the anniversary of the birth of Florence Nightingale. This year is the second annual National Hospital Day.

We hope that the Saints will make a special effort to become acquainted with the work being done by our own hospital, The Independence Sanitarium, and to learn of its needs now and what is necessary for its future progress.

Daylight Pictures Possible at Last

Probably the greatest forward step in the line of visual education is the perfection of equipment, to be used in connection with a regular stereopticon, and which produces very satisfactory pictures on the screen in a room which is flooded with light.

Old difficulties in the use of stereopticon pictures in the classroom have been entirely eliminated by the new Victor Stereo-Screen, a distinctive and scientific daylight classroom appliance.

This new schoolroom fixture is portable and collapsible and when not in use may be folded and placed in corner of room where it will not cover extra floor space.

The "Trans-Lux" Screen on which lantern slides are projected is the greatest screen invention of the century. Pictures on this screen are perfectly defined and intensely brilliant.

Stereopticon is fitted to shelf attached to the Stereo-Screen, permitting teacher to control operation of the stereopticon while instructing the class.

In using the Stereo-Screen in the classroom, necessity of pulling shades, setting up equipment in the rear of the room, hanging screen, and attending to other details involved in preparing for visual instruction lesson is eliminated. It is more practical than the blackboard.

For visual presentation in the classroom there is nothing that can supplant the Stereo-Screen for projection purposes. Children are permitted to write notes (while pictures appear on the screen), something heretofore impossible when the room was darkened, and furthermore, strict discipline is maintained, a condition which did not exist when room had to be darkened to permit projection of slides.—Victor Visual News.

A History of Minnesota

(A Book Review.)

By William Watts Folwell; published by the Minnesota Historical Society, Saint Paul; 1921; 533 pages; the first of four volumes of the history of Minnesota, and covers some phases of the history to 1871, including Indian affairs, territorial policy, preparation for Statehood, and the Fort Snelling Reserve. Principally, it deals with the first settlement and the period of the territory, leading up to statehood which occurred in 1858.

Better Bibles for Less Money

Effective at once we have concluded to make a flat reduction of 10 per cent in the sale price listed in our catalogue of Oxford Bibles, Holman Bibles, and International Bibles. This is made with the hope that we will have our prices sufficiently low to enable us to furnish all of our people and others interested with the Bibles which they need.

We have received suggestions from some quarters that people are able to buy Bibles cheaper from other concerns than from us, and we believe this reduction will remove and reverse this condition.

President Smith's Daughter Honored

Sister Alice Myrmyda Smith, the daughter of President F. M. Smith and Ruth Lyman Smith, has been admitted to Leland Stanford University. This is considered quite an honor, since the number of girls is strictly limited to five hundred and they have a waiting list of fifteen hundred. Selections are not made entirely on the order of application, but more on the quality of recommendations.

Near East Suffering Acute

Both from Russia and the Near East distressing reports continue to come. The children are compelled to eat bread made from flax chaff and sawdust, that have no appreciable food value. The result is a very serious loss of life in the Near East. If only seed could be secured they could be on their feet by midsummer, but the committee has not at present either seed or the means to secure seed. If means are put in their hands in New York, the seed can be secured at once in Constantinople.

Topeka Newspaper Publishes Bible as Serial

The Topeka State Journal is the first daily newspaper in the United States to begin the publication of the Bible in serial form, in accordance with the recent suggestion of Doctor Charles M. Sheldon, of Topeka, editor in chief of the Christian Herald. The four gospels will be published in weekly installments of about 3,000 words. Doctor Sheldon is author of In His Steps, and numerous other books dealing with practical Christianity.—Exchange.

The State Teachers' College, of Warrensburg, Missouri, announced that they are looking for a record enrollment for the summer school. Several hundred dollars have been spent in securing the best educational talent to be had in the educational world. "Some of the noted speakers who will give open lectures this summer are: Doctor A. E. Winship, veteran editor of the Journal of Education, Boston Massachusetts; Miss Katherine M. Cook, of the Bureau of Education, Washington, District of Columbia; Macy Campbell, director of rural extension in Iowa; and several others.

At Wellsburg, West Virginia, Saturday evening, April 8, about one hundred participated in a farewell surprise party for Elder John F. Martin, who has been in the Wheeling District about five years. He is leaving to take up a new charge at the Temple, Kirtland, Ohio, where he will receive the thousands of people who visit it yearly. At the reception, an excellent program was had; the Women's Department served luncheon, and his friends wish him success in his new field. Sister Bertha Zonker writes that he has just closed a series of meetings with good interest and three were baptized. Sister Zonker speaks also of her sorrow for the loss of her baby on November 15, but feels that she has more need to live righteously now.

CENTRAL CHURCH, KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI

This is a strictly down-town city church and the headquarters of all stake services. Stake offices are in the parsonage next door.

Kansas City Stake Number

ELDER JOSEPH A. TANNER
President Kansas City Stake

IN THE selection of Joseph A. Tanner as president of the Kansas City Stake, July 8, 1916, by the First Presidency, subsequent events prove that inspiration and God-given wisdom were employed. He has measured up to the requirements of a leader in his presidency and pastorate. Naturally of a judicial mind, his constant aim has been that the rights of his charge might be maintained. No one has sought advice or counsel in vain. None have failed to be comforted, if they sorrowed. Likewise none have come to him with grievances without a respectful hearing and an attempt to correct error, when it existed. He also is relentless in following up and overtaking the willfully careless or evildoers. As a father in Israel he is kind, loving, cheerful, saintly; is not disposed to levity, but can laugh at a good joke; believes in prevention rather than cure. He is a man among men.

Brother Tanner has come up from the ranks, laboring first in a local way in Northeastern Missouri, afterwards as pastor of the Saint Louis and Chicago Branches, eventually taking the pastorate of the Central Church congregation in Kansas City and continuing for several years prior to the organization of the stake.

He was born at Saint Louis, Missouri, March 22, 1866; was baptized October 5, 1879, by Elder James McDiffit. He was married to Miss Sarah J. McAllister on November 11, 1886. He has held the offices of priest and elder; was ordained in 1900 to the office of high priest, and in 1903 a member of the General High Council of the church; and in August, 1916, was ordained to the Kansas City Stake presidency.

Stakes and Cords of Zion

"Lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes."

The term stake as applied to an organized body of worshipers in a particular district is peculiar to Latter Day Saint terminology. It is in fact unique in that particular. True, it is used by the people of Utah, more commonly called Mormons, but it belongs in fact properly to the nomenclature of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Our Utah friends use it, but it does not belong to them.

The Reorganized Church having been designated by the civil courts and recognized of God as the true successor to the "old church," as it is termed, falls heir to the terminology of the "old church"—the church presided over by Joseph Smith the Martyr—just as truly as it fell heir to the property of that church, represented in the Kirtland Temple. The term is ours by right; the Utah people have appropriated it, as they have done many other things.

The use of that term appeared early in the history of the church. It is used in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants in section 68 in a revelation given as early as November, 1831. Of course it is understood that the expression is figurative but it is a very pleasing and suggestive figure, when we trace out its meaning, and had its origin at least as far back as Isaiah.

In Isaiah it is written:

Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities; thine eyes shall see Jerusalem, a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken.—Isaiah 33: 20.

Here Zion, the Zion of that time and land, namely Jerusalem, is compared to a tabernacle, a tent, supported by stakes and cords. In like manner the Zion of our day, the potential New Jerusalem, the Zion of our time and land, has her stakes that are to her a support.

The figure reappears further on in Isaiah:

Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitation; spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes.—Isaiah 54: 2.

The figure, thus sanctioned by biblical usage, is carried down to our own times. Indeed God himself uses it in modern revelation just as he did when speaking through Isaiah. The expression loses none of its picturesque force now when most men live in houses. We tent often enough to catch its full significance. So to-day wherever we have a large body of people gathered and organized after a certain prescribed form it is spoken of as a stake—stake of Zion.

Of late years we have been attempting to lengthen the cords and strengthen the stakes of Zion. We have driven four stakes: One at Lamoni, Iowa, one at Far West, Missouri, one at Kansas City, and one at Holden. With the reorganization of the Independence Stake into three stakes, and the reorganization of the Lamoni Stake presidency, added strength should come to the stakes of Zion. These communities of Saints "round about" must prove a source of great strength to Zion, supporting and strengthening her, bound to her by the strong cords of fellowship and love under the gospel administration.

But some one may say, "We do not yet have Zion." Surely we have Zion in the process of making. Rome was not built in a day. Neither are heavenly cities built in a day. Several centuries were consumed in building and perfecting the city of Enoch. We have Zion in process of erection. In erecting a tabernacle one of the first steps taken is to drive a few stakes and stretch a few ropes so that when the tent is erected it will have immediate support. And as the process of erection goes on, other stakes are driven and other cords fastened in place.

Every member of a now existing stake should endeavor to strengthen that stake, that it may stand, and be a support to Zion. Are the stakes ready for the strain? Will they be uprooted, or will they stand firm? Let all unite to drive them deep into the soil and establish them permanently. The strength of the stakes is the strength of the people, spiritually, and, we may add, financially.

Let the officers of the stakes work zealously and wisely and all the people support them in their labors, that we may "lengthen the cords and strengthen the stakes of Zion."

ELBERT A. SMITH.

Blue Pencil Notes

Some men keep the clock half an hour fast so that they may be sure to get to appointments on time. Then they always "allow" that the clock is thirty minutes ahead of time; so there is no hurry, and they get to the appointment late. The joke is on the man, not on the clock.

Some men subscribe to very high ideals in theory. In practice they "figure" that perhaps the ideals were a little too high so they discount them and really live below others who make no profession. Don't blame the ideals or the profession; blame the queer psychology of the man who, in the vernacular, "kicks" himself through life in that way.

Bryan says he would rather know the Rock of Ages than to know the age of rocks. His choice is good—if one must choose. There seems to be no especial reason why man should not know both.

When at last a jury was found that would acquit Arbuckle, the kind of jury that would acquit Arbuckle felt bound to go on and say that he acted at that fatal party in a very "manly way," which is quite in harmony with the ideas of manliness very likely to be entertained by a jury that would acquit Arbuckle. The Kansas City Star very truly says that if his conduct at that orgy was "manly," the ideals of manliness that we have cherished are upside down.

There is a very active propaganda being carried on designed to convince the public that prohibition is a farce. Strangely enough the liquor forces are responsible for it, and of course they can hardly be considered disinterested. Back of it all, if you look, may be seen the portly brewer, the red-faced saloon keeper, the white-aproned bartender, the spewing drunkard sprawling in his own excreta. No wonder the public is suspicious of arguments and statistics coming from such sources.

Independence people at the recent spring election had an opportunity to make comparisons with former elections under saloon rule. The Independence Examiner for April 7, made the following comment:

With more than five thousand people voting there was not a fight on the streets or at the polling places. It is not hard to remember when every election day was a terror in Independence. Crowds blocked the streets in front of the saloons, and there were fourteen saloons, and drunken men were noisy and fights plentiful. Gangs of repeaters were rushed in from outside the city and were voted.

The Reverend Frank Norris, of Fort Worth, Texas, preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, April 9. Here is a part of his comment on New York night life:

Fascinating, thrilling, wonderful, brilliant, defying all laws of God again and again, is Broadway as I saw it after midnight. The cry of the wickedness of Sodom reaches to heaven. Talk about bloody Nineveh and bestial Babylon, of corrupt and decadent Rome! It is all true of New York, this great metropolis of the world. Right in the midst of the brilliantly lighted section of Broadway speak-easy joints flourish openly and liquor is sold apparently under protection. The honky-tonk of the western mining camps was a respectable paradise compared to the shows on Broadway, but it is only fair to say that not the shows but the low ebb of public sentiment should be blamed. The more suggestive, the more vicious, the more degraded, the greater the applause from the packed audiences composed of both men and women. I heard the house roar with laughter when a man in a woman's bedroom ordered her to get into something "soft and clingy," and the piece de resistance of the performance was a game of "strip poker" between five young women who took off most of their clothing on the stage while maintaining a running fire of suggestive conversation of which one gem was a girl's statement that she felt "so expensive." But the big craze is the dance—dancing to the strains of the most sensual music; jazz, a mixture of the Indian and the Hawaiian in dance halls crowded to suffocation, not starting until 10.30 o'clock at night and not quitting until "closing time," which is a movable hour. There was no rhythm, no grace, no elegance, no culture—there was not room for a newspaper between the dancers and what they were doing was not dancing. The story of Broadway is the story of undermined national health, decaying morals, absent modesty, of damned souls and wasted money.

Dean Thyrea A. Amos, of the University of Pittsburgh, speaking before a convention of university women in Kansas City recently declared it to be her conviction that it is most unjust to berate young people for their follies inasmuch as the young people have merely taken that which adult society has given them and are making the best of it—or the worst of it. She is reported to have said:

No student or young boy or girl invented jazz; wrote the sex play; the obscene song; no student created the immoral film, and no student created the coarse fashions in dress. These are the gracious gifts of society. It is cowardly to attack our adolescents who have innocently fallen heir to the harmful gifts of society. This is the age of "triumphant salesmanship," and society has allowed itself "sold" on the matters of vulgarity in music, dress, and the stage, and then turns upon the young people in order to shift responsibility from its own shoulders.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

Credit for Kansas City Stake Number

Through the untiring efforts of Elder W. S. Brown, secretary of the stake and official correspondent, who has collected, collated, and very largely written the material presented here, we are able to offer this number of the HERALD to the church. Only lack of space has prevented further elucidation of many points only briefly suggested here.

Kansas City Stake

Ninety years ago Parley P. Pratt and others walked about fifteen hundred miles from the State of New York, much of the way through snow knee-deep, to the western border of Missouri and the then western border of the United States. They were sent by the Church of Jesus Christ on a special mission to present a new gospel to the people of this new country, more especially to the Lamanites, whose camps lay on both sides of the Kaw River where Greater Kansas City now stands. Of the Lamanites those on the west of the Kaw, where Kansas City, Kansas, is, known as the Delawares, were found to be hospitable. Chief Anderson, sachem of effort made by the church to present the gospel in Kansas City. But there was inestimable good done, though failure to do all that was anticipated at the time was experienced, for upon this effort that cost untold suffering and privation, all that the church represents to-day in Kansas City is deeply indebted.

As we compare conditions now with then, when we sum up the net results we find where the sharp cliffs and deep ravines, the marsh and morass, the wooded hillsides and grassy dale, the river and rivulets, the glades and prairies, that in which the contour of the ten by fifteen miles of country as it then existed has been scarified by the onward march of progress, contested on every side by great obstacles which have been overcome at great cost until now a beautiful city covers as a mantle from end to end and from side to side this spot of terra firma. It now teems with commerce, its arteries of transportation radiating to all points, not failing to mention interurban service, street cars to every section, and the car that jostles to and fro in the streets, all for the convenience of its inhabitants and incidentally lining the pockets of the owners.

From the few straggling settlements and the population represented at the Indian reservations in 1831, there are now more than 450,000 souls gathered from every corner of the globe: British, Scandinavian, Slav, Hun, Teuton, Swiss, Greek, Spanish, French, Italian, Mongolian, Hindoo, Syriac, Arab, Turk, Portuguese, Mexican and other Lamanites, African. "The Great Commission" was to go into all the world and preach the gospel, but the matter is reversed here; all the world has been brought to us; so the matter of long train rides and ocean voyages may be substituted by a short hike to the next block to warn our neighbor (which does not lessen the force of the commission). The preparation made by those early pioneers, a mere handful of people, by undaunted courage and dint of perseverance paved the way for their successors to enter in and finally to establish the Lord's work, that there might be a parallel development with the growth of the city. If the fourteen regular meeting places of the church, the 2,500 members that worship in them, and those who have worshiped and passed to their reward since P. P. Pratt preached that first sermon on the Kaw, saying nothing of those who have heard and been made better but never obeyed, and a property valuation of about $75,000 furnish a parallel in development, may we not expect a proportionate growth in the future as the opportunities that are at our feet find a response in these 2,500 members, and the utilization of the property aforementioned?

The church apprehended the great opportunity set forth when it advised better organization among the ranks of this two and a half thousand, so it ten tribes, greeted these missionaries cordially, and though somewhat prejudiced against men on missions of this character, upon meditation called a council of the tribe, heard what the missionaries had to say, became very much interested in the Book of Mormon, which rapidly enthused the whole settlement, and no telling what would have been the extent of good done had it not been for the interference of the sectarian missionaries and Indian agents from the Missouri side, which made it necessary for Brother Pratt to change his field of activity, finally going back to Jackson County, Missouri, to labor among the whites. This was the first might know them when it saw them and successfully handle the work and more efficiently enter into the duties that real opportunities demand.

Acting upon this advice the Kansas City Stake was organized more than five years ago and results are fully up to expectations, as the officers attest.

Among the stakes of the church, the Kansas City Stake holds a unique place in this, that it is wholly metropolitan—the suburban corners hardly smack of the rural. Things religious are therefore carried on in a citified way, as well as those of commerce.

ELDER C. D. JELLINGS

One of the presidency of the Kansas City Stake.

Sociological conditions are vastly different than in rural communities, as a study of my former statement will divulge. To get our message to all the people of the stake is our aim and problem. The democracy that exists in the rural community exists within the borders of the stake, but is dealt out through the teller's cage and the office of the bank president, the sanctum of the editor and publishers, his linotype operator, the chief of the manufacturing concern, and his various helpers.

The head of the merchandising establishment and his floor manager, the captain of hostelry and caterer and his bell hop, the palatial home of the exclusive wealthy, the less pretentious abode of the common laborer, and the hovel that shelters the poorest of the poor, the permanent citizen and the itinerant, hence the absolute necessity of a metropolitan education to meet all on common ground, of being "All things to all people," in order to profit by this democracy—to win souls to Christ. So for the past few years our officers have been getting ready, sharpening sickles, filing saws, (these for the modern machine, remember,) so there may be no lost motion, a start made on high and continued all the way up the hill. The problem can be worked out.

To assure you that it can we respectfully refer you to the accompanying photo of the men who man the machinery. Here is delineated determination, courage, intelligence, character. The stake has confidence in them because they merit it. Chief Tanner says study, then more study. Preparedness, greater efficiency, better teaching, better preaching, better home condition; as Parley P. Pratt waded through snow and faced the blistering wind and shook hands with Chief Anderson with frosted fingers, so they will have to wade through the intricacies that surround the metropolitan mode of life to reach the hearthstone and the heart and intelligence of the dweller within. This appeal has not been unheeded, for every auxiliary, both in the men's and women's departments, spiritual and financial, has responded with zest and such willingness as to assure one that our presence will be felt in this great city. Our members are increasing. A better understanding upon the part of the membership of that which is required of them, is noted.

The meeting places are distributed through the stake where most convenient for the members; that is, it would be hard to locate in the stake where one would be inconvenienced in attending church. Our large gatherings, however, meet at Central Church, Ninth Street and Lydia Avenue, in Missouri, where conveniences are such that more than one meeting can be held at a time if necessary, where the spread may be made around which all may gather to replenish the inner man and renew acquaintances, the social feature thus being extended. Thus the Kansas City Stake stands out like a stalwart youth fully determined with the help of God to do her bit, to increase the membership of the church, and so to care for those already within the fold that all may have an entrance into the kingdom of God.

An unusual but entirely practicable feature of the Kansas City stake conferences is the holding of quarterly conferences on Sundays and Monday evenings, instead of on Saturday and Sunday. It works out better for the many business men, who find Saturday a very busy day.

Organization of the Kansas City Stake

As to the organization of the Kansas City Stake, General Conference made provision for it in April, 1916, so a mass meeting of the Saints of Greater Kansas City met at Central Church for organization on July 8, 1916, at the call of the First Presidency, Frederick M. Smith and Elbert A. Smith, who were made presidents of the meeting. They placed in nomination for stake president, Elder J. A. Tanner.

Brother Tanner stated his choice as first counselor to the president, Elder Seth S. Sandy, both of which nominations were approved by the body. A second counselor was not chosen. The following were nominated as standing Stake High Council: E. S. Wilcox, J. O. Worden, D. E. Hough, John Jellings were appointed an auditing committee, and Belle R. James was appointed stake chorister. May 26, 1917, the resignation of Bishop J. F. Keir was accepted and Richard Bullard was appointed his successor, neither of whom chose counselors, which lends a lonesome atmosphere, but in the case of J. F. Keir his appointment was understood to be temporary so did not call helpers. On the same date the appointment of George Jenkins as stake missionary was ratified by the conference and Earl F. Audet elected to succeed Belle R. James as stake chorister.

Bishop J. F. Keir was elected bishop, but chose no counselors. W. S. Brown was elected secretary. T. B. Dunn was appointed recorder. Provision was made for the stake presidency to be the president of the nucleus or Central Branch. The presidency were ordained on Sunday the 9th. The high council were ordained the 25th of July, 1917.

Subsequently John J. Shimmel was nominated for member of the high council, which was approved by the body, and on same date F. S. Anderson and C. D.

Scouts, Men's Progressive Club, and business men, will be found under separate headings. The following resignations in the high council are John Tucker, who accepted a counselorship to Bishop F. B. Blair, December 1, 1918; Edward Tucker, on account of ill health, July 6, 1919; and Daniel E. Hough, on September 6, 1919. The following brethren were nominated and elected to the office of high priest and members of stake high council; C. D. Jellings on March 2, 1919; Paul Pugsley, May 4, 1919; Robert Winning and H. W. Goold, February 1, 1920. This completed the stake council. Stake President J. A. Tanner continued with one counselor from the organization of the stake until the 18th of May, 1918, when he nominated Elder Thomas J. Elliott as his counselor, which was ratified by stake conference.

ELDER HUGH W. GOOLD

A member of the Kansas City Stake High Council.

Brother Elliott continued as counselor until about the first of June, 1920, when he was transferred by the First Presidency and Quorum of Twelve to Omaha, Nebraska. This created a vacancy in the stake presidency which continued until the 21st of November, 1921, when he nominated Charles D. Jellings as a counselor, which was ratified by stake conference, which automatically created a vacancy in the council.

The secretary and recorder work has been done by several since the organization of the stake. First the resignation of W. S. Brown was accepted as secretary and T. B. Dunn as recorder, so that a secretary could officiate in both offices and attend to such other clerical duties as would be in the president's and bishop's office. Sister Mildred Crandall accepted the position in November, 1918, continued until May 16, 1920, when C. I. Bath succeeded her and continued until November 21, 1921, when W. S. Brown was again elected.

Patriarchal Work in Kansas City Stake

The work of the patriarch in the stake has been performed by several of that order. William Lewis was appointed to the stake and labored therein for about a year, commencing in May, 1918. His incumbency was cut short by his demise, since which time the stake has been served in this capacity by Patriarch Frederick A. Smith, Ammon White, I. N. White, and probably others. We await the time when we may be favored by the presence of one of the fathers of the church in our midst.

Kansas City Stake Missionary Work

When we consider that Greater Kansas City covers an area of more than one hundred and fifty square miles and that the population numbers above 450,000 it would seem that one lone missionary would become lost in so great a metropolitan territory, yet this has been the situation the greater portion of the time in the Kansas City Stake. However, it has been favored by men who were very capable as missionaries. The first one occupying was Elder George Jenkins, who was appointed May 26, 1918, and labored for one year operating the stake tent in various localities and holding special meetings in some of the churches.

In May, 1919, Elder Joseph Arber succeeded Brother Jenkins in the missionary department and labored very zealously for more than two years, when about the middle of June, 1921, he was called from his labor here to the other side by the One who holds the destiny of mankind in his hands. During the last year of Brother Arber's labors he had as helper Elder Amos T. Higdon, who succeeded in the missionary work at the demise of Elder Arber. During the period of missionary work Brethren W. H. Mannering, George Jenkins, Keith H. Rogers, and Ammon White have labored in special efforts in various localities. Brother Amos T. Higdon has taken up the work in a very systematic manner and is very popular, and he has been able to get material results from his efforts.

Amos T. Higdon, Stake Missionary

Amos T. Higdon, son of Jesse T. and Nancy E. Higdon, was born June 19, 1883, at Winchester, Kansas.

When he was five years old his parents moved to Fort Scott, Kansas, where he grew to manhood. He was baptized September 9, 1901, by C. P. Welch, and confirmed by Abner Lloyd and C. P. Welch. Ordained to the office of priest November 8, 1903, by James Moore, A. A. Goff, and J. T. Higdon. The following January, under appointment of Apostle I. N. White, he entered the general missionary force. Since that time he has labored as missionary in Southern Kansas, Southern Illinois, Clinton, Missouri, District, and Western Colorado. In November, 1920, he was transferred to the Kansas City Stake. He was associated with Elder Joseph Arber in that stake until the Lord saw fit to take Brother Arber to the other side, since which time he has labored mostly alone; however, at this time Elder George Jenkins is associated with him.

The Lord has blessed our brother in telling the gospel story, and many have come into the church as a result of his labors. Besides the protracted efforts that have been held by our brother in the stake, he has met the members of the Utah Church a number of times and been able successfully to refute their claims to the extent that several who were thinking of uniting with them have since united with the Reorganized Church.

Brother Higdon was ordained October 22, 1911, to the office of elder and to the office of seventy April 15, 1920, by Apostle Myron A. McConley and Gomer

T. Griffiths, and is a member of the Second Quorum of Seventy.

Brother Higdon was married August 6, 1906, to Miss Zola Sutton, to which union was born one son. Sister Higdon passed from this earth life February 9, 1910. On April 27, 1913, he was united in marriage to Miss Vinnie D. Barnett. Two children have been born to them.

Kansas City Stake Bishopric

At the organization of the stake the work of the bishopric was placed in the hands of James F. Keir, counselor to Benjamin R. McGuire, as it seemed the conference was unable to decide upon a man to fill this important place. Brother Keir chose no counselors. He served until May 26, 1917, when he was released. His services were very much appreciated, but owing to his general bishopric work he was unable to look after the work of the stake longer.

KANSAS CITY STAKE BISHOPRIC

On the right is Frederick B. Blair, bishop of the stake; on the left is Frederick S. Anderson, and in center John Tucker, counselors in the bishopric.

At the above date Richard Bullard was elected as stake bishop. His long period of service in this department enabled him to take hold of the work as a veteran and through his resourcefulness he was enabled to shape the affairs of his office to the extent that there was a more liberal response of the people in regard to tithes and offerings and stake expenses. However, Brother Bullard longed for other fields, and at the expiration of one year, on May 18, 1918, the stake acceded to his resignation. At the above date Frederick B. Blair was elected bishop for the Kansas City Stake, which office he continues to hold. Brother Blair had the advantage of his two predecessors in that he was able to take up his residence in Kansas City, which has kept him in close touch with the membership of the stake. Being disciplined in business, he at once set out to organize a corps of helpers stationed at each of the churches. He immediately arranged a schedule through which tithes and offerings might be received as separate items from stake expense items, which latter were requested to be paid by the members of each church in a way that would not interfere with the regular tithes. Incorporated in this expense fund a building fund was arranged for. He proposes to build a new church edifice each year. So far a very commodious church property has been built in Mount Washington and nearly a duplicate of it erected for the Saints in Quindaro. By the purchase of a business property at Twenty-first and Belleview Avenue, a comfortable little church has been built for the Second Kansas City congregation, which will serve them better than for any time in the past, as it is modern in every way. By the purchase of an additional twenty-five feet of ground the Grandview, Kansas, Saints have now a lot large enough so that they expect to begin soon the erection of an edifice which will be representative of the faith of the church on the Kansas side. The Armstrong and Grandview churches are to be united and will worship at the new place.

The membership of the stake was above 1,800 when the stake was organized in 1916 and has grown until now the number is in the neighborhood of 2,500 members. There has been a record made in regard to the payment of moneys into the stake treasury which shows an increase in revenues out of proportion to the increase in membership. The following figure for a quarter in each instance proves this: For three months in 1916 there were receipts of $911.80, with disbursements of $699, and during the quarter ending November 21, 1921, the receipts were $11,214.39, including a balance on hand of $3,400 and the disbursements were $10,534.89.

Frederick B. Blair

Frederick B. Blair was born November 9, 1868, at Sandwich, Illinois. Baptized September 18, 1887, at Saint Joseph, Missouri. Was married to Besse Cobb at Little Sioux, Iowa, January 1, 1895. Ordained a bishop December 4, 1917. He was manager of the Herald Publishing House for several years, and also of the Lamoni Electric Company. He has been a member of the Board of Publication of the Church for twenty-five years, and is now vice president and manager of the Lamoni Electric Company.

Brother Blair has chosen John Tucker, a business man, as one of his counselors. Brother Tucker is very popular, and with very few exceptions can call the membership of the Kansas side by their first names. He also has in the help of Frederick S. Anderson as counselor a very exemplary and hard-working young brother.

It is the policy of the stake bishopric to help people to help themselves. As a result there are none who are entirely dependent upon the church finances who live in Kansas City.

John Tucker

John Tucker was born June 6, 1874, and was baptized January 25, 1891, and ordained a high priest and high councilor of the Kansas City Stake on July 25, 1916, from which office he has since resigned to take up the work as counselor to Bishop Blair, being ordained February 16, 1918.

He has held the office of priest and elder and has been a worker in the various branches on the Kansas side prior to the organization of the stake for several years. He is now pastor of the Quindaro Church.

Frederick S. Anderson

Frederick S. Anderson was born January 3, 1881, at Wabash, Ontario, Canada. Removed with parents to Cave Springs, Elk County, Kansas, in February, 1896.

Was baptized June 27, 1897, at Cave Springs, Kansas, by Otto Baumgartel and confirmed by the same elder. He transferred his membership to Second Kansas City, Missouri, Branch January 2, 1905. Was ordained a deacon May 4, 1914, by J. A. Tanner and W. R. Pickering. Was ordained elder and stake bishop's counselor August 18, 1918.

Since his identification with the work in Kansas City, Brother Anderson has labored in Second and First churches in some official capacity in Sunday school, Religio, and other church work which by his close application has fitted him for the responsible position he now holds. He is progressive and has a clear insight into the needs of the stake in a financial way.

For several years he has been with the post office department in Kansas City, Missouri, and is now assistant superintendent of mails. He was united in marriage October 7, 1908, to Susanne Lewis.

Central Church, Kansas City

This church is located on the corner of Ninth Street and Lydia Avenue. It was purchased when Kansas City was a part of what formerly was known as the Independence Stake, which then comprised a number of counties, some in Missouri and some in Kansas.

It has always, since purchasing it, stood out as our leading church in Kansas City, and no doubt was secured with a view that it should be a central and headquarters church for our work, hence the reason for placing a pastor over it and having him in charge all the time.

At the organization of the Kansas City Stake, it was designated as the center place, the chief branch, and the stake presidency was directed to preside over it and to direct and prosecute the work from this point. It has always been their headquarters, and the stake presidency and stake bishopric offices have been established on the first floor of the church parsonage, while the church caretaker lives on the second floor.

This church consists of a main auditorium, a lecture and primary room, a gallery, and three parlor rooms, also a kitchen and tower room, making it a very convenient building and most suitable place for stake and departmental work.

For this reason all the stake conferences (with but one exception) have been held in this building. It is made the chief place for stake choir work, for stake orchestra work, for the Women's Department work, for stake Sunday school conventions, etc., and it is the Men's Progressive Club's headquarters. It is also used for any large gatherings the stake may have. The quorums of the elders, priests, teachers, and deacons all make this church their headquarters and chief meeting place.

There have been as many as five meetings going on at one time in the building.

When the stake was organized it was with branches, but later the work was consolidated and branches eliminated, and the stake made compact by making it one unit instead of a number of units, thus causing the need for a central place. There are no branch business meetings held any more; all business is done by the stake conferences, and while these conferences are growing and taxing their headquarters to capacity—which indicates larger quarters some day—and as in time Central Church may pass out, having outlived its usefulness, it will be a lingering and pleasant memory to think of its past service to the church, and also to the Kansas City Stake.

Kansas City Stake Churches

Central Church is located at Ninth Street and Lydia Avenue, at about the center of the stake east and west, and is presided over by the stake presidency, Brother J. A. Tanner being pastor.

The Second Church is located at Twenty-first Street and Belleview Avenue, accommodates the Saints in the west side of Kansas City, Missouri, and is presided over by Francis A. Evans.

Fourth Branch is located at Forty-third Street and Garfield Avenue and serves the South Side Saints. The pastor is J. O. Worden.

The Bennington Church is located at Thirteenth and Bennington Streets, in the eastern section of the city, and serves the congregation who live in the vicinity of Sheffield and Centropolis. The pastor is C. A. Selbe.

The Mount Washington Church is located at Independence Avenue and Crescent Street, and serves a suburban membership in that locality. The pastor is Hugh W. Goold.

The Montgall congregation worships in a rented hall at present at 2820 Guinott Avenue. This is in the extreme northern part of Kansas City in what is known as the East Bottoms, but is easily reached by regular transportation. Several families of Saints live in this locality. The pastor is Joseph Curtis.

Malvern Hill Church is located at Forty-third and Hudson Streets in Rosedale, Kansas. The membership live in that part of Rosedale and in the south-western part of Kansas City, Missouri. The pastor's name is W. O. Hands.

The Argentine Church is located at Thirty-seventh and Powell Streets, in the extreme west part of Kansas City, Kansas, and serves the membership in the west end of that suburb. The pastor's name is Walter L. Gates.

East Argentine Mission serves the Saints of the east and south part of Argentine and at present holds its services at 1708 Metropolitan Avenue. W. S. Brown looks after them.

Armourdale Church is located in a rented hall at the corner of Feree and Miama Avenue, Kansas City, Kansas, and accommodates the membership of what is known as Armourdale.

Armstrong Church is located at 732 Cornell Street, the only church of any denomination in this immediate locality. It is close to the Rock Island and Union Pacific Railroad yards and serves the Saints of what was the city of Armstrong, now a part of Kansas City, Kansas. The pastor's name is Joseph A. Harrington.

Grandview Church is located near the corner of Fourteenth Street and Central Avenue. The membership who worship here live near the place, and it is in the western part of Kansas City, Kansas. L. W. Hays is the pastor.

Chelsea Church is located at Twenty-seventh and Garfield and is in the northwestern portion of Kansas City, Kansas. The pastor is C. D. Jellings.

Quindaro Church is located near the corner of Hutchings Street and Quindaro Boulevard in the northern part of Kansas City, Kansas. The strongest membership on the Kansas side worship here. The pastor is John Tucker.

In addition to the fourteen congregations the stake is operating under the group system: That is, the city is arranged in about thirty groups with, when possible, an elder, priest, teacher, and deacon in charge. Meetings are thus taken to the homes of the Saints, which plan has proved very satisfactory, as the attendance has doubled at midweek meetings.

The Men's Progressive Club

In August, 1920, President Tanner and Bishop Blair sent out a letter to a number of young men and teachers of classes and others interested in young men of Central Church, asking them to attend a supper to be held at Central Church for the purpose of talking over certain questions they had in mind.

At that supper the idea was brought forth for providing some sort of organization by which the young men of the church residing in Kansas City could be made to feel at home, aid given them in finding employment, places to board, socials and meetings arranged so that they might get acquainted with each other. At that meeting arrangements were made for another meeting at a date two weeks later.

On that evening officers were elected, and authorized to proceed to draw up a constitution and by-laws. Brother Frank P. Hitchcock was elected president; Floris Hands, vice president; Roy Howery, secretary, and Guy F. Mintun, treasurer.

These officers proceeded as a committee to draw up a constitution and by-laws to govern this organization. The constitution and by-laws were presented to the body on the second Tuesday evening in September and adopted by the body. The officers who had been elected were sustained until the following election. The constitution provided for an assistant secretary and F. S. Anderson was elected to this office. Floris Hands resigned as vice president and Seth S. Sandy was elected to fill his place.

The principal purposes of the organization, as set out in the constitution, were to promote the social, industrial, and spiritual welfare of the members. The social, by means of entertainments, banquets, addresses by prominent men, etc. The industrial welfare by an employment department, and the spiritual by a combination of social and industrial betterment and brotherhood. Brethren Tanner and Blair were made part of the executive committee which consisted of the five officers and these two brethren. Along the line of social work several banquets were given and also several lectures were arranged. Judge Porterfield, Apostle John W. Rush-ton, Chief Red Fox, and President Frederick M. Smith have given lectures under the auspices of this club.

The employment department, because of the time required and the ones in charge not having time to care for it properly, has not yet met with the success desired. Considerable cooperation has been given the bishop, however, along this line, and considerable good accomplished by bringing before the club members the need of an endeavor along this line.

In July, 1921, James H. McVay was elected president, L. E. Fusselman, assistant secretary, and Ray Lloyd, treasurer. The club numbers two hundred members.

In November Joseph R. Lloyd was elected president, and Doctor Charles Sandy was elected vice president; Charles Allen, secretary.

Institutions

A girls' hotel and home was established when Bishop Blair came to Kansas City and became bishop of the stake. He saw the need of a hotel for girls, where our girls from out of town who work for a living could have not a mere room, but a real home.

The residence building located one door east of Central Church at 1406 East Ninth Street was fitted up and was named Temple Hall and was in charge of Sister Margaret Madden, matron. This was in December, 1918.

Temple Hall has proved a success, except that it is not large enough to take care of those who would take advantage of its accommodations. At present Sister Viola Dawes is in charge as matron, having accepted the place some two years ago. The hotel is filled to its capacity. To girls who desire a place with home comforts and genial surroundings with motherly care, Temple Hall should be very attractive.

Greater Kansas City offers many inducements in the way of business enterprise, there being no doubt openings in all of the lines of merchandise handled in the city, but our observation is that only those succeed in business who thoroughly understand the lines they handle and have capital to carry them over any dull period that might occur. Not only is overhead expense greater in the city than in the country, but it costs more to do business from every viewpoint. This is for those who may think of engaging in Kansas City.

Historical and Biographical

We have not come to the conclusion suddenly, but with considerable candid thought, that things God-appointed are done with eternal fitness.

No mistake has been made in the men selected for His work. They are filling positions no others could fill at that particular time. What was true with the great call of Joseph Smith, jr., is true with all, to the last official ordained in the church. That the appointment of the officers of the Kansas City Stake has been influenced by the Spirit and unerring judgment of omnipotent mind we therefore conclude.

The work in hand needed particular talent. "By man is man blessed." One of the curtains of Zion needed men to maintain the highest standard of the great latter-day work.

The historical narratives that follow will introduce to you the brethren who are laboring in the most important offices in one of the most important fields of the church—Greater Kansas City—consecrated ground, hallowed by the sacrifices, hardships, and privations, closely following the organization of the church in 1830.

Seth S. Sandy

Seth S. Sandy was born October 25, 1882, in Kansas, near Lynn, Washington County. Baptized at the age of eleven years at Blue Rapids, Kansas, by Arthur Smith. At age of eighteen years he began teaching school and taught for three years in the same county in which he was born.

He was united in marriage to Gertrude M. Dhority, December 22, 1903, and shortly afterward moved to Kansas City, Missouri, and entered the employ of the MacMahon Plumbing and Heating Company as bookkeeper and continued with this firm nearly eight years. At the beginning of 1913 he became president of the MacMahon Company and still occupies in that capacity.

He has been in church work in Kansas City for the past eighteen years: was ordained a deacon in 1906; an elder in 1908; a high priest and counselor to President J. A. Tanner at the organization of the stake, July 8, 1916, in which capacity he has served until the present time.

Brother Sandy has served both the Religio and Sunday school in the past in various offices, and has been a close student of church affairs in Kansas City. He is very popular with the Saints and owes his present responsibility to the capacity for hard work and stick-to-itiveness. What is said in regard to his success in church work applies to his ability as a business man, as the MacMahon Company does a large business both in the city and surrounding country, specializing in the equipment of schools, colleges, hospitals, factories, office buildings, and power plants. The firm employs from twenty-five to seventy-five men and does an annual business ranging from $250,000 to $500,000.

Missouri, by V. M. Goodrich. He was married October 11, 1911, at Saint Joseph, Missouri, by V. M. Goodrich to Jeanette Brooks. Was ordained priest February 20, 1912, at Saint Joseph, Missouri, by V. He is interested in the musical affairs of the Stake and has served as choir leader of the Central Church for some time, his duties terminating at the conference November 21, 1921. Brother Pugsley has been employed for several years by the Woolf Brothers clothing house, occupying a position of trust for that firm.

William O. Hands

William O. Hands was born May 22, 1870, in the town of Fayette City, Pennsylvania. His father died when he was three years old. The burden of his rearing fell on his mother. He was converted to the religion of Jesus Christ while attending a series of meetings in the Kirtland Temple and was Brother T. W. Williams's first candidate in baptism. This was in July, 1889. He has occupied as a priest, elder, and high priest in the church, and for several years as a member of the general church Standing High Council. His work in Kansas City has been among the various branches, occupying as first pastor of the Third Kansas City Branch in what is known as the northeast bottoms, since disorganized. He married Bertha F. Mills June 5, 1895, and has a family of five children.

Boy activities have always interested him. He was teaching a boys' class when a representative of the Boy Scouts of America came to Kansas City in 1910, and was the first scoutmaster to qualify from this part of the country. He has been in continuous service as a scoutmaster, occupying in all the offices up to scout commissioner, introducing the Scout program in Independence. The largest troop and best trained boys in scouting was the troop of Latter Day Saint boys at the Stone Church, and for several years Brother Dudley and Brother Roy Smith were the highest Scouts in this vicinity, holding the Eagle Scout badge. Tirey J. Ford, who gave his life in France and for whom is named the Tirey J. Ford Post in Independence, was one of the best Scouts in this group in 1911 and 1912. His work as civil engineer and surveyor brought him in close touch with wild life in the woods and mountains, so he was just full of stories of animals and birds and snakes. These interest boys and are a help in entertaining them around a camp fire, and when a meeting drags a little. The Scout program is varied and helpful from the knots of the tenderfoot, signaling, swimming, first aid to injured, on through the ten or more merit badges, and the scoutmaster is helped, along with the boys. The opportunity of association with virile young America is found at its best in giving this leadership in the Scout program, but thousands of boys are denied this help because men fail to see that these boys will soon be men and need now the personal touch of a good man.

He closes with these words to boys and young men. He has always held in high esteem the virtue of women. He has constantly paid his tithing and has closely observed the Word of Wisdom. He has been honest with all men, both in and out of the church. He tries to carry a cheerful countenance and extends to those he meets the good, strong grip of Christian fellowship.

Quorums in Kansas City Stake

The First Quorum of Elders of the Kansas City Stake was organized at Central Church July 25, 1916. This was by order of the First Presidency and the Kansas City stake conference. Ten elders formed the nucleus of the organization. W. S. Brown was elected president. He has chosen as counselors Thomas C. Lentell and J. W. Stobaugh. J. J. Emmett was elected secretary and J. W. Stobaugh treasurer. E. W. Lloyd was later elected treasurer. These officers have continued until the present. The quorum has gained in membership until it now numbers thirty. The quorum members stand as a minute-men organization, subject to call without notice. Their chief labor is in filling speaking appointments at the several churches, administering to the sick, and making social and friendly visits. However, there are five church pastors among them and several group pastors.

First Quorum of Priests

The First Quorum of Priests of the Kansas City Stake was organized August 27, 1916. It chose as its president, J. H. Paxton, he choosing as counselors A. L. Lightfoot and H. L. Rushfelt. This quorum formerly existed as the Seventh Quorum of Priests, whose activities were in Greater Kansas City. The organization of the stake on July 8, 1916, necessitated a new organization for each auxiliary. The Seventh Quorum was first organized July 20, 1908, with Harvey Sandy president, and C. W. Mills secretary. Brother Sandy continued as president until the new quorum was organized on the above date. On November 24, 1918, Brother Paxton resigned as president and Bishop F. B. Blair was chosen by the quorum to succeed him. Brother Blair chose no counselors. Brother C. W. Brown has been continued from year to year as the quorum's secretary and treasurer. Brother Blair continued as president until August 15, 1921, when he resigned and was succeeded by Brother H. W. Goold who chose as his counselors Ross H. Moore and W. H. Rhoads. The quorum is composed of about forty members, mostly young men whose chief activities are in visiting the homes of the Saints, assisting in group and other church services. There are several good speakers among them who are competent to fill speaking engagements throughout the stake.

First Quorum of Teachers

The First Quorum of Teachers of the Kansas City Stake is a continuation of the First Quorum of Teachers of the Independence Stake, formerly the Fourth Quorum of the church, and was first organized October 11, 1908, at Central Church, by Bishops Roderick May and B. J. Scott. Officers elected were A. Milotte, president; E. E. Kinney and Ray Lloyd, counselors, and C. E. Van Ette, secretary. The membership was made up of men from the two Kansas Cities. Brother Van Ette resigned as secretary February 14, 1910, and was succeeded by F. O. Thomason, who resigned January, 1913, and W. C. Rambo was elected in his stead. In August, 1914, Brother Milotte because of failing health resigned as president, and E. E. Kinney was elected in his place, who chose as counselors Jerry Fisher and J. R. Lloyd. The name of the quorum was changed March 26, 1917, from the First Quorum of the Independence Stake to the First Quorum of the Kansas City Stake. About this time Brother Rambo resigned as secretary and G. A. Willis succeeded him, and continued until May, 1920. On February 22, 1920, Brother Kinney resigned as president and L. E. Fusselman succeeded him, who chose as counselors F. O. Branham and W. C. Rambo. Brother Fusselman being advanced to the office of priest was succeeded as president by Charles Priest, who has chosen as counselors F. O. Branham and Walter Ingoldsby. J. R. Lloyd serves as secretary. The ranks of the quorum have been continually drawn upon as material for quorums higher up. There were originally twelve members which number is now increased to twenty-one.

Quorum of Deacons

The Quorum of Deacons was organized shortly after the organization of stake in July, 1916, with Robert Clow as its first permanent president, being ordained August 25, 1917. Counselors to Brother Clow were Theodore Gerber and Ralph Shepherd, who were ordained May 26, 1918. Their secretary was Frederick S. Anderson, until he became associated with the bishopric in August, 1918. These officers continued until during the spring of 1921 when Brother Clow resigned because of removal from the stake. At the recent stake conference Robert Crayne was elected as president but has as yet chosen no counselors. There are about twenty deacons in the stake and all the extra men meet with the quorum. They serve the churches of the stake in the usual deacon's capacity; in most cases are caretakers of church premises. Wherever possible they also act as church and group bishop's solicitors.

The Women's Department of Kansas City Stake

Foremost among the founders of the Women's Department in Kansas City we find the names of Sisters Amy Wells, Jessie Mitchell, and Lula M. Sandy, who conducted the work by holding monthly meetings and studying the child welfare leaflets as provided by the general association. During the afternoon hour of the great day (July 8, 1916,) when the Kansas City Stake had its birth, the Women's Department, or what was known as the Woman's Auxiliary, came into existence. It was organized by Sister Frederick M. Smith, president of the General Association, Sister M. A. Etzenhouser, general vice president, acting as chairman. The following officers were chosen to direct its work. Sister Lula M. Sandy, president; Sister T. T. Grabske, vice president; Sister S. S. Sandy, secretary; Sister Alma Warren, treasurer. The supervisors appointed later by these officers were: Sister Amy Wells, educational supervisor; Sister Maggie Robertson, child welfare supervisor; Sister Alice Berg, young women's supervisor; Sister Helen Smith, relief and service supervisor.

These officers took their responsibility seriously, and after conferring with the officers in charge of the stake work, plans were laid for educational classes for the women of the stake and as a result the Kansas City Stake Culture Class began its work September 14, 1916, with an enrollment of eighty-eight women which was increased later to 108.

Educational work covering six branches of study were open to the students: Sex hygiene, child welfare, psychology, first aid to the injured, story-telling, English, and a lecture course of twenty lectures. Class meetings were held from 10.30 to 3 o'clock on Thursday twice a month. All branches of the stake were represented except two and the stake officers were in charge of the class.

A part of the hours were devoted to the lecture program. The speakers for these programs were drawn largely from civic workers of our city, and a few were members of our own church. The lecture course began with one of welcome by Brother J. A. Tanner and was followed by Brother Walter W. Smith, on "The need of education."

Professor Nowlin, of Northeast High School, spoke on the "Art of story telling." Doctor Adaline Soule spoke on household management. Miss Caroline Spaulding, a social worker at one of our large department stores, gave an illustrated lecture on textiles. We learned of the Big Sisters' Movement from Mistress K. B. Shaw, and all about our own city public library from the city librarian, Mr. Purd Wright. Mr. Biggar came from our largest furniture house with a wagonload of beautiful rugs and gave us a lecture on "Oriental rugs." At Christmas time we had Christmas stories by Sister Walter W. Smith. Professor Cowen spoke on "Music and its need"; Mrs. Chase on "Food values"; Doctor Soule on "The city charter"; and Miss Anna Gilday, the city's best woman speaker, spoke on the "Woman movement."

MRS. LULA M. SANDY

Organizer of the Kansas City Stake Women's Department.

Besides this series of lectures a special program was given at each quarterly conference that kept the work continually before the people. Sister F. M. Smith, Sister Helen Smith, and Sister Madison were the speakers for 1916 at these conferences.

A beginning was made in the girls' work this year. Several Oriole circles were organized and some activities carried out for these groups.

The relief and service department made a beginning also, along relief and service lines, and a desire was shown to cooperate in all work with the bishop of the stake.

September of 1917 found the officers of the Woman's Auxiliary actively engaged in organizing their class work again. These officers have changed but little. Lula M. Sandy was given charge of the work again with Sister Harry Paxton as assistant. Sister S. S. Sandy was retained as secretary and Sister T. T. Grabske was elected treasurer. Sister Amy Wells continued in the educational department, Sister Berg in the young women's. Sister D. J. Kennedy took up the relief and service department and Sister Belle Scott the child welfare. Sister Sandy was forced to divide her time between the work of the Kansas City Stake and the general Women's Department of which she was now president, and so the work this year was often left largely in the hands of the other officers.

The conference programs were continued and Sister M. A. Etzenhouser, Brother Keir, Brother Tanner, and Sister Mollie Davis were the speakers on these programs.

The culture class continued its work, meeting now each week. Miss Lieberman spoke on "Physical culture," Sister McKim on "Domestic art," and Doctor Hoxie on how to feed children.

Because of war conditions and restrictions, a change was brought about in this work. Before half the year had passed, the class was busy with Red Cross sewing and so the balance of the year was spent.

A storehouse was opened also in 1917. In it were placed all the discarded garments that could be brought together. Some of the workers gathered these things up. Others searched out the needy members in every branch and found out their needs, while still others cleaned, pressed, and made over these things for distribution among the poor and needy. Garments that were secured in one branch were distributed in another, thus doing away with a sensitive feeling that is often found in such work. The girls' work progressed a little this year, for eight Oriole circles were working throughout the stake.

MRS. FREDERICK B. BLAIR

Assistant organizer in the Women's Department of the stake.

Nineteen eighteen saw the work badly crippled, for some nine of our promising women workers entered the business world and so were lost to us for a time.

The conference programs were continued. J. A. Tanner, Mrs. Chase, Mrs. Nan Sperry, spoke on these programs. The class work continued on a smaller scale and F. B. Blair, Sister M. A. Etzenhouser, Sister Glines gave their help as speakers. Classes were had in social service, Bible research, and child welfare, the class work being conducted in fall and spring classes. Sewing for the Belgian relief work was the prominent feature of the day's duty.

The officers who kept the work alive through these trying years were Sister Harry Paxton, President; Sister Johnson, vice president; Sister Price, secretary, and Sister T. T. Grabske, treasurer. The same supervisors with the exception of the young women's department, Sister Roy Newkirk caring for that work.

Unit 36 of the American Red Cross was conducted through the relief and service department, the women meeting one day each week for the work. Still the regular work was not neglected. Each item of work such as collecting goods for the storehouse and visiting the sick was recorded. Over twelve hundred visits were reported and something over seven hundred and fifty garments collected for the French, Belgians, and the storehouse.

In 1919 a few changes were made in the officers. Some of the old workers were back again and some new ones had moved into our midst. Lula M. Sandy was appointed the organizer by the general association. Sister F. B. Blair became her assistant. Sister Price looked after the records and Sister C. D. Jellings cared for the funds.

Sister Kennedy and Sister Newkirk were continued in their departments. Sister Paxton took up the educational supervision and Sister Massey the child welfare.

Plans were laid for a regular monthly lecture course, and by the close of the year a fine program had been carried out. President Smith spoke on "Work of the women." F. B. Blair on "Practical things the women can do." Mrs. Bullock on "The work of our city hospital." Mrs. Rebecca Porterfield on "Police work." Miss Shilling on "Food problems." Doctor Clara Towne on "The child problem." Doctor Harrington spoke twice on "Mental hygiene." Miss Myer on "Physical care of children." Brother Calvin Rich on "Courtesy in the home." During the years 1919, 1920, and 1921, we find the organizer pushing the work of the Women's Department by occupying the eleven o'clock hour on Sunday morning in many of our churches, speaking for the work, and more and more interest being shown. During the summer months the officers in a body visited seven of the churches with a view to finding out their particular needs and meeting it in class work. In September the culture class again resumed its work. Classes were had in child training, Bible research, character reading, psychology, and physical culture.

The early part of 1919 was very active with Red Cross and Navy work, and as we finished our refuge work through this department we were not only complimented on our work, but also thanked for the promptness with which we met our obligations. The cooperation of stake branches was the one thing that made such service possible. The sociology class of 1919 was a success, visiting, relief and service work active throughout the stake. This department of the work became more interesting as the influence of the Christ spirit through the medium of service is reflected in the friendly cooperation of those consecrated to the service of God through their love for humanity.

In addition to the organizing of two Oriole circles, the organizing of our older girls into chapters of Temple Builders was undertaken. Twenty-three girls were initiated and several chapters began their work. Some educational work was planned for them and hikes and parties for recreation.

In 1920 there was little change in the offices. Sister Lula M. Sandy continued in charge with Sister F. B. Blair assistant. Sister Frank P. Hitchcock was placed in charge of child welfare, and other officers and supervisors were continued.

A new plan of class was tried. Work this year was organized under the group plan in order to reach more women. Thirteen classes were organized and 209 women enrolled in these classes, most studying two subjects.

Bible research, food and the body, child welfare, English, normal training, character reading, public speaking, home nursing, social service, home dressmaking, mothercraft, domestic science, and citizenship were taught.

Many men enrolled in these classes, thereby becoming members of the Women's Department. Eleven of these classes continued throughout the year with an average attendance of 151. Many women and men gave their services each week as teachers. Among them are Brother Tanner, who has always given this department his full support. Some of these teachers went regularly to their classes, some eight and nine miles every week.

Council meetings were held by all departments for the trading of workers, and the coordinating of the work. Teachers and leaders of groups were given help with their work. The monthly lecture course was continued. Brother Roy V. Hopkins, Walter W. Smith, J. A. Tanner, Audentia Anderson, Miss Ann Gilday, Myron H. McConley, Doctor Harrington, Mrs. McBride, Mrs. R. R. Weeks, J. W. Rushton, spoke on these programs. Through these lecture courses we were able to keep in touch with all civic work that was being done in our own city and yet concentrate on our own church work. At the conference held in August the Women's Department was granted a budget of $133 for the year to carry on their work. The home department and the cradle roll department were transferred this year to the Women's Department, so we took them over, reorganizing where necessary. Sister J. R. Lloyd was placed in charge of the home department and very soon had gathered around her thirteen group workers as her helpers. This department is keenly alive and has now 176 enrolled in it. Sister Jessie Tucker, our cradle roll worker under the Sunday School Department, was retained and soon gathered around her seventeen assistants to help in her department. At the close of the year she reported 148 babies weighed, measured, and reported to the church headquarters.

The social service work was linked up close to the group work, with a friendly visitor in each group, the department well organized and a better understanding of the work had. These friendly visitors gathered for class study each week in a class conducted by Mr. Whitson, the president of the Provident Association of Kansas City, and the record shows that eight hundred and sixty-eight calls were made by these visitors and sixteen families cared for during the year. The organizer, Sister Sandy, reported to the 1920 conference the work of this splendid year and included thirty addresses or lectures given throughout the stake as her particular contribution to the year's work.

The young women's department initiated thirty-nine Temple Builders and continued to build up a department. Three council meetings of leaders were held and instruction given. A splendid donation to the Sanitarium was a part of this year's work: 23 service cloths, 25 hot water bottle shields, 41 large and 22 small pillow slips, and 28 glasses of jelly.

The year 1921 opened with no important change in the officers. Interest in class work not so good as last year. Yet a fine spirit is displayed in the work. Some did not like the group classes of last year and a large stake class was opened again at Central Church for all who wish to attend. Class work all day Tuesday, from ten to three o'clock, every week, with five subjects for study, Bible research, normal training, social service, recreational leadership, and household management.

Some of our groups retained the plan of 1920 and have their own class in their group. Normal training and Bible research seem the most popular studies in these groups.

A class in mothercraft for all the younger mothers is busy with Sister Charles Sandy at her home twice a month. They are continuing their work of last year in this subject.

The class in public speaking was also continued and meet at Central Church every Thursday night. Other class work is being planned as this goes to press.

Splendid reports are coming in from all over the stake, from our friendly visitors, sick calls, care of the homeless, and other services.

The social service class, which is a part of the Tuesday class at Central, has a larger attendance than that of any previous year and good progress is being made.

The young women's department are still busy with their good work. Ten visits have been made so far by the supervisor, and eight new Oriole and Temple Builder clubs organized, two leaders council meetings held, and eleven Temple Builders initiated. A lecture course was also provided for our girls during the spring months. Doctor Harrington, Roy V. Hopkins, and Sister Pearl Gardner spoke at these monthly meetings. The lectures are now being continued this fall, and Sister Samuel A. Burgess spoke to the girls at a recent meeting. Three stake parties have been held for the young people and much active work is done by them. One chapter gave a social recently and raised money to put a new roof on the home of an old invalid sister. Bundles of clothing have been made for needy children, the materials being taken from the wardrobes of the girls themselves. Some of the chapters take swimming lessons at the Y. W. C. A. Socials, hikes, weenie roasts were popular in the summer. We have tried to make the Women's Department a real school; a workshop wherein plans might be tried out and character building of a high order take place. Working with this aim in view we have tried to sense the needs of our women and supply that need in education, that growth and development might be had along economic, moral, and spiritual lines. Every woman for the Women's Department is our motto, and every girl finding her place in our work is our aim.

Biographical Sketches of Our Stake Workers

At the organization of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Kansas City Stake the president elected was Sister Lula M.

MRS. ROY NEWKIRK

Supervisor of Young Women's Department.

Sandy. Sister Sandy was practically unknown to the greater portion of the Saints in the stake up to that time, with the exception of those attending Central Church and readers of the church papers. For the past fifteen years Sister Sandy has contributed articles and stories to our church publications.

At the time of her election to the leadership of the women in the Kansas City Stake she was filling the position of child welfare supervisor of the General Association of the Woman's Auxiliary of the church. She was therefore familiar with the cardinal features of the Women's Department and was able to vision the task thus given her. Being naturally an indefatigable worker she soon was able to adjust herself to the requirements of her new position, successfully organizing her forces for service and winning the confidence of the stake at large so that in 1917 the stake convention reelected her to the position she had been filling, also, at the General Conference that year she was elected as president of the Woman's Auxiliary of the General Association. During the year 1918 and the greater portion of 1919 Sister Sandy engaged in business activities in Kansas City, always observing and learning, gathering knowledge that has later assisted her in handling of business affairs in the women's work. In 1919 while still employed in business she again took up the stake work, being reappointed in 1920 and 1921. Her work as organizer has brought her into close touch with all the locals in the stake, where she has been doing active service, such as has never been done in the Kansas City churches before. She not only fills appointments for speaking to the women of the church, but has also been active in the civic work of Kansas City. Public speaking has been her special work, having completed her course at the junior college of Kansas City this past year. She also has been teaching classes in public speaking, character reading, and child welfare.

During the summer just past she has assisted the general association in field work, attending two reunions, Spring River District at Pittsburg, Kansas, and Clinton District at Rich Hill, Missouri, being equipped with the ability to meet the needs of the women's work at these reunions. She makes these experiences assist her in further service.

In view of the foregoing the stake has been very fortunate in securing the services of so efficient a worker official as Lula Sandy. Her motto is "Service" and her ambition is to get all of the women of the church enlisted in some line of service.

Assistant Organizer

Sister Frederick B. Blair has been with us only since 1919. We have found her a consecrated worker whose advice and help are above the average. She has supported the work all along the line, and is keenly interested in its success. Her work among the young mothers, mostly in the Sunday school, is worthy of note, and she has helped to draw many of them into classes in the Women's Department, where mothercraft is taught.

Treasurer

The keeper of our funds is Sister Charles D. Jellings, one of our younger women and wife of one of our most successful stake presidents. The work of the treasurer is only a small part of what Sister Jellings contributes to the Women's Department. She is a Temple Builder leader who gets results, a teacher of household management, and a splendid student. She balances our expense accounts with our budget and keeps expenses down.

Child Welfare Supervisor

The Child Welfare Department is represented by Sister Frank Hitchcock, a woman most interested in her task. Her special work these last two years has been the enrolling of the teachers for classes in child training, encouraging child study, and substituting for absent teachers, etc. She has been a worker among us for a number of years.

Young Women's Department

Since 1918 Sister Roy Newkirk has had charge of our young women's department and "this is the work of her heart." She has a kindly, sympathetic way of conducting her work and is getting good results. Nineteen leaders of the Oriole and Temple Builders clubs form her council, and work under her direction. She is devoting all of her time to the girl movement, visiting our different churches and gathering the girls into this work. In 1920 she did splendid work at the Pertle Springs reunion, where she had charge of the girls' work.

Again in 1921 she was chairman of the committee for the girls' work at the same reunion. Her success speaks for her work, for to-day she has about two hundred girls working in her department.

Social Service Supervisor

Our social service director, Sister D. J. Kennedy, is a consecrated doer of the word. She has had charge of her department since the middle of 1916. With her corps of seventeen assistants she cares for the needy, cheers the discouraged, visits the sick, and administers to the comfort of many. All work in her department is coordinated with the bishop. She gets splendid results from her helpers, not only in active work and visiting, but also along educational lines, so that they may qualify for their great task. Each year they study the theory of social work in a class set apart for them, and before long we will have many who will be trained social workers, and be able to realize that inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto me.

Cradle Roll Supervisor

Our cradle roll department is now under the direction of our new supervisor, Sister Moats, better known to us as Miss Wise. She has as her assistant Sister Jessie Tucker, and together they are carrying out the work of this department. Sister Moats comes to us with a splendid training for her new work. She is one of our Red Cross nurses who served in France and has qualified for just such a position.

Clinics for weighing and measuring our babies are being arranged. Cooperation will be had with the city workers in this line.

Home Department Supervisor

Sister J. R. Lloyd, one of our younger sisters, is keenly alive to the educational and spiritual aspects of our work. She is an experienced home department worker. The early part of 1921 she served as secretary to the stake. Since taking over the home department in January, 1921, she has organized it and now has fifteen active workers covering the stake. Her aim is everybody in the stake a home department worker who is not a regular attendant at church services. The enrollment of this department is now 250. Sister Lloyd is also an active worker in her own local church and gets results in her work.

Kansas City Stake Sunday Schools

The Kansas City Stake Sunday School Association was organized July 8, 1916, the Sunday schools of Greater Kansas City forming the association, the names of which are as follows:

Central, Second Kansas City, Bennington Heights, Fourth Kansas City, Mount Washington, and Englewood in Missouri; Malvern Hill, Argentine, Armstrong, Grandview, Chelsea Park, and Quindaro in Kansas. The first officers were David H. Blair, superintendent; R. H. Loosemore, assistant superintendent; James W. Stobaugh, secretary; Sister H. L. Loosemore, home department superintendent; Sister James H. Stratton, cradle roll superintendent; Sister D. H. Blair, normal department superintendent; Amy Turner, treasurer; C. L. Munro, member library board. The best talent in the stake was thus chosen to supervise the new organization. It will be noted that each department of Sunday school work was provided with a good leader. However, at its succeeding convention held on March 6, 1917, several changes were made in the official staff, James W. Stobaugh being elected superintendent, with W. O. Hands as assistant; Amy Turner became secretary and Alma Warren was placed in charge of moneys. J. W. Gunsolley was elected member of the library board and Jessie Tucker was elected cradle roll superintendent.

A committee of three reported on a standard of excellence adapted to the needs of the schools of the stake.

The third convention occurred February 19, 1918, at which provision was made for a course of study for the coming year, the character of which would be helpful to officers and teachers in promoting greater efficiency in handling the schools of the stake.

Change in the personnel of the officers is noted as follows: Ross Moore became superintendent, with J. R. Lloyd as assistant; Amy Turner heading the home department, and Harvey Sandy filling the new office of member of gospel literature board. Amy Turner subsequently resigned and Nena Young was appointed to fill the unexpired term.

About this time, March 9, 1919, the association changed the order of assembly to that of mass convention; also it indorsed the plan of coordination as adopted by the previous General Conference of the church. Under the coordinating plan the presidency of the stake, J. A. Tanner, S. S. Sandy, and T. J. Elliott, by virtue of office were the nominating committee, and at the succeeding meeting placed in nomination the following: C. D. Jellings, superintendent; Earl Moore, assistant; Nena Young, secretary; Alma Warren, treasurer; Sister F. B. Gerber, home department superintendent; Mae Fouche, member library board; Sister C. D. Jellings, cradle roll superintendent; Harvey Sandy, member gospel literature board. Subsequently C. D. Jellings resigned on December 15 and James W. Stobaugh was appointed to fill the vacancy.

The personnel of the department has changed considerably during its existence. We note that James W. Stobaugh continued as superintendent until September 15, 1920, when at his request he was released and J. R. Lloyd was appointed his successor, who has continued as superintendent until the present time, and Alma Warren has also continued as secretary and treasurer.

On August 30, 1920, the library, cradle roll, and home departments were, pursuant to General Conference action, taken from the Sunday school and placed in charge of the Women's Department.

There has been gradual improvement in the work of the Sunday school under stake management. The membership has gradually increased until it numbers now 1,333.

As to accomplishments in the stake, conventions and institutes have been held at various times throughout the entire stake. During the years of 1920 and 1921 a series of institutes was held in the evenings, in which we grouped the schools nearest together and held the institutes in such a way that they were convenient for the workers of any locality. All of the Kansas City territory was covered with these institutes; quite a number of our best workers have taken a very active part with us in these. Since the organization of the stake the following schools have been organized:

North Montgall, Armourdale, East Argentine, and Heathwood. We have lost two schools; Englewood was taken into Independence Stake in 1919, and on Sunday, April 9, 1922, Armstrong was consolidated with Grandview.

In the matter of organized classes, almost every school in the stake has one or more organized classes; some of the smaller schools having two or three classes organized.

A good percentage of our Sunday-school teachers are either graduates of the old normal course or are students in the new course as put out by Graceland College. The class of work being done in the stake at the present time is above that of the large number of other schools visited by our superintendent outside of the stake.

Department of Music

Soon after the organization of the Kansas City Stake it was apparent that a competent leader for the Department of Music was very much needed, as when large meetings were held there lacked organization among the singers and those who played various instruments in furnishing the kind of music that was really expected of the talent that existed. To remedy this condition the stake in making its canvass for an efficient chorister found in Sister Belle Robinson James one who could qualify and who consented to act in that capacity. She was made the choice for that office by conference action on November 11, 1916.

Sister James's services in getting cooperation among the musicians of the stake met with some success, but as she did not have the time to devote to the work, all was not done that she desired. Her effort was very much appreciated. However, on account of her personal affairs interfering with her musical work, she thought it necessary to resign, which resignation was accepted by the stake February 17, 1917, when Brother Earl F. Audet was elected to succeed her. He continued the work that had been started by Sister James and was able to make some headway towards organizing the singers of the stake into a stake choir. As his home and his daily work were in Independence, he could not devote the time to the musical interest that he desired. On May 17 the conference accepted his resignation and elected Brother E. C. Bell, of Saint Louis, as chorister. It was found that operating or conducting a musical enterprise at such great distance was a physical impossibility so that his resignation was accepted on August 30, 1919, and Sister Bernice Griffith, the incumbent, was elected to succeed him. Sister Griffith's musical education commenced in her early teens. She has natural musical talent, both in voice and piano.

She has been privileged to receive instruction from some of the best musicians. It is useless to say that she capitalized every opportunity afforded her in her musical study. She finally took up teaching in both branches. Her close application to her work made for efficiency so that in stepping into the office of stake chorister she was at home. She has the happy faculty of winning cooperation and has been able through perseverance to bring a respectable number from the various churches to the conferences and other large gatherings. The seating capacity of the choir loft at Central Church was necessarily increased to accommodate about one hundred people, which has proved on several occasions to be too small. Her present endeavor is to have uniform music furnished for the entire stake. Sister Griffith has with such singers as could perform been of material aid to the missionary efforts in the stake, often conducting two choruses during the same period.

The instrumental music has hardly kept pace with the vocal. Several attempts have been made by various churches of the stake to organize orchestras, and with some success. As with the vocalists, so with the orchestras, it was hard for them to remember that there were no boundary lines between churches and that the interest of the whole stake was their interest. Am glad to state that what might be termed clan-nishness in this respect is more rapidly giving way now to the genius of real stake work.

The first endeavor to solidify the various orchestras was by Arthur H. Mills, who was placed in charge of this department on February 22, 1920. His effort met with quite a liberal response, there being a nucleus formed by him for an orchestra that it is hoped will be second to none in the church. Owing to other pressing duties, Brother Mills resigned May 16, 1920. Brother Lester Fowler was appointed his successor and has continued with some success until the present. He recently has had as helper a Mr. Helmstadt, a man of wide experience, a splendid conductor and director, which has had a tendency to bring a greater number of the players together for practice than formerly. It is not unreasonable to suppose that a fifty-piece orchestra may eventually be a reality.

The Religio Department

The Kansas City Stake Religio Society was organized July 8, 1916, with C. D. Jellings as president; James E. Cleveland, vice president; Sister G. F. Liddle, secretary; Amy Turner, treasurer; Sister D. H. Blair, normal department superintendent; J. W. Gunsolley, temperance superintendent; Sister John Tucker, gospel literature superintendent; Sister J. A. Harrington, librarian; and Sister Frederick Gerber, home department superintendent. This convention was held at Central Church, Ninth and Lydia Avenue, with F. A. McWethy, president of the Independence Stake Religio Society, in charge. Just previous to this convention the Kansas City Stake had been created as one of three in the division of the old Independence Stake and provision for the organization of the Kansas City Stake Religio was provided for at the Annual General Religio Convention held in April, 1916. The changes in officials were: James E. Cleveland resigned as vice president, John Zahnd succeeded him. Eola Fouche elected treasurer, Amy Turner resigned. Myrtle Gerber elected vice president, John Zahnd resigned. Minnie Swanson elected secretary, Eola Fouche resigned. The personnel of the department continued very much unchanged until on February 9, 1919, it adopted the coordinating plan, under which the following officers were elected: Paul Pugsley, president; Jack Nestor, vice president; Tyra Lloyd, secretary; Minnie Swanson, treasurer; Walter L. Gates, librarian; Sister Frederick Gerber, home department superintendent; J. W. Gunsolley, temperance superintendent; Mrs. Bartholomew, normal superintendent; Phoebe Tucker, gospel literature superintendent; Bernice Griffith, chorister; W. O. Hands, second vice president and boy movement director.

Subsequently the work of the society was enlarged to include as one of its principal activities the social and recreational department. The name of the chief officer was changed from president to field worker. Brother Pugsley continued in that office until November 21 when Frederick J. Cleveland was elected his successor.

Boy Scouts in Kansas City Stake

Nearly every Latter Day Saint boy of Scout age in greater Kansas City is or has been a member of the Boy Scout organization. Most of them have been members of Troop 7, which is known in Kansas City as a Latter Day Saint troop, because the large majority are Latter Day Saint boys and have a Latter Day Saint scoutmaster.

Troop 7 is in good standing among the ninety or more troops of the city. For a time we had two of the only three "Eagle Scouts" in the vicinity. These were Dudley and Le-Roy Smith. We also had more "Life" and "Star Scouts" than any other troop in the city.

To the uninformed it may be explained that an Eagle Scout is the highest honor that can be attained in Scoutcraft. The Latter Day Saint Scouts have given programs in most of the churches of the stake. These generally consist of Scout activities, such as knot tying, first aid, signaling, scenes in camps, story-telling, etc. They generally attract considerable interest and are very helpful to the boys.

We need more scoutmasters within our own church. There are a lot of our boys under outside scoutmasters. There ought to be a lot of our men as scoutmasters over boys not in our church bringing them to our services. There is a scoutmaster school every Tuesday evening at Scout headquarters where our men would be welcome, which is free and intensely interesting. The leaders are men well fitted to help teachers hold the interest of their Sunday school classes.

Over two hundred boys have been members of Troop 7 during the past twelve years; many of them have made a high mark in the world's work. Is there a man whose heart would not swell with pride at the thought that he has helped so many boys to lead cleaner and more useful lives, to feel that at just the right time he was prepared to keep the interest and direct the activities of such a bunch of growing manhood?

Troop 7 now numbers about twenty boys. Ahead of us are a lot of things to do. Every member is getting ready for the round-up in Convention Hall May 20 when all the Scouts of this city will put on a Special Scout Show. This is well worth the time for everyone interested in boys to see. We will have a place in the boys' parade May 1 and field day May 30. These are all big events and fill a necessary niche in every boy's life.

Finally, the only thing that keeps so many of our boys out of the benefits that Scouting gives is the lack of men who are willing to devote of their time to the young boys of our church.

Here is an opportunity for our men to keep young and active and at the same time help our parents to make better citizens out of the coming men. Best of all is the genuine pleasure given by this association with a live troop of boys, teaching them games, about trees and birds, how to catch snakes that are harmless; and how safely to destroy those that are dangerous.

All these things help us to keep young and better enjoy our life while we are living.

An Important Omission From This Number

Lack of space prevents the printing in this number of an interesting and timely article in connection with Kansas City Stake entitled "Kansas City resources." This is in type and will appear next week. It covers in detail a number of important factors concerning our metropolitan stake and will be of interest not only to those outside the territory but will furnish convenient reference to those who reside therein.

LETTERS AND NEWS

Saint Louis, Missouri

The Saint Louis Saints desire to have it known that our church will be dedicated on May 14, and we expect to have a series of meetings following, to continue for two weeks, and wind up with the district conference on May 27 and 28. We are also requested to invite all Saint Louis Saints, wherever located, to be present at this time. Plan to take your vacation at that time, or if contemplating a visit to old friends or relatives, arrange the visit to come in May. Make this event a real home-coming and we assure you a hearty welcome. Don't forget the date, May 14.

Easter Sunday was celebrated by very appropriate exercises in our Sunday school, and the morning sermon by Elder C. Ed. Miller on the resurrection was so aptly and interestingly illustrated that even the children were interested. At night the theme, "Immortality," by Brother Archibald, leaves no doubt in the minds of those who heard this wonderful sermon. "The best I ever heard," one person remarked. An unusually large attendance was an encouraging feature at the services; and the anthems rendered, as well as the Sunday school music, were full of life and hope. E. B.

Independence

As a result of the city election, Bishop B. J. Scott, who has been acting as pastor of Walnut Park, was elected by a large majority as city marshal, which places him in charge of the entire police force. He has the power of appointment of the police officials, subject to ratification of the mayor and council.

Henry C. Smith, church architect, who has been of late spending most of his time in work in Kansas City, was elected as one of the city council on the Republican ticket. Elder A. K. Dillee, of the South Side, is a hold-over member of the city council.

Local observers report that the fruit crop is safe so far in spite of recent frosts and cold weather. All varieties of apples are in bloom, with petals falling from some peaches.

A recent wedding of interest to many was that of Elder C. B. Hartshorn and Miss Zaide Rodger, both of this city. Elder Hartshorn has an important executive position in the office of the Presiding Bishopric, is one of the superintendency of the Mount Zion Sunday School, and a faithful worker in various other local affairs. Sister Rodger is the daughter of Brother and Sister J. B. Rodger of this city. The happy couple are spending their honeymoon in the Ozarks.

Sister Jerome Wagar, of Bantry, North Dakota, asks that her grandson, two years of age, in a hospital at Dugby, North Dakota, suffering from a relapse from influenza, be remembered in the prayers of the Saints. She would also have the Saints pray for herself.

The Sunday morning sermon by Pastor R. V. Hopkins was along pastoral lines, he making a definite appeal for the higher life. He took occasion to deny some rumors current as to immoralities prevalent in our midst.

The sermon in the evening, by Apostle John W. Rushton, was preceded by a half-hour program by about one hundred children, in charge of Mrs. J. T. Westwood, piano accompaniment by Mrs. A. L. Sanford, and including a stringed orchestra of about eight children. Some excellent renditions were offered. The sermon, on sin and its consequences, was as usual, eloquent and forceful.

Next week will be Boys' Week throughout the country, and all the churches are making efforts to have a large number of boys at at least one service during the day. They will be given a place of honor next Sunday evening and the sermon will be on "The twentieth-century boy."

Mrs. Frederick M. Smith arrived Wednesday morning to attend the funeral of her sister, Mrs. P. A. Silsbee. She left her two girls in California and may not make an extended stay at this time.

An East Indian by birth, a prominent Syrian by experience and training, endowed with the usual name given all who take upon them the priesthood of the Mohammedan religion, Mohammed Allah, recently visited general church headquarters and was given a hearing by the joint council. He learned of our work through a Brother Hamilton, of Saint Louis, who as a soldier heard this man lecture in England and through conversation induced an interest in our church. In spite of protests by would-be friends en route, he continued till he reached this place, so he might at first hand investigate our claims. He was favorably impressed and will continue his investigations.

When Mrs. Audentia Anderson was in Independence the first week in April, she tendered her resignation as superintendent of the Women's Department, principally because of her continued absence from Independence, while all reports, records, and files are here. She has served for two years and felt it wise that a change be made, so Sister Dora Glines, the second assistant superintendent, was appointed to fill the vacancy. Mrs. Anderson has written an excellent editorial of appreciation for support and setting forth the above facts, but owing to the Kansas City Stake number this week, the regular Women's Department column is crowded out, but will appear next week.

Sharing honors with the Federal Reserve Choral Club and the Haydn Male Chorus of Kansas City, in a recent choral concert in the Federal Reserve Bank Auditorium on the twentieth floor of the building, the Auditorium Orchestra, of Independence, directed by Elder R. T. Cooper had a prominent place. The concert was directed by John R. Jones, a noted leader of community singing in this section of the country who has always taken much interest in our musical aggregations. The Auditorium Orchestra played four selections and gave support to vocal selections. Gomer Watson was concert master and Miss Pauline Becker accompanist. There were in attendance a considerable number of prominent people from other cities as well as a goodly delegation from this city.

The radio sermon sent out from Kansas City on Sunday evening was by Elder Hyrum O. Smith. The musical numbers consisted of two solos by Frank Criley and three numbers by a male quartet. Next Sunday evening the sermon will be by Elder Ralph W. Farrell on "The new day," and the music is to be furnished by a double quartet. The newly equipped studio makes possible the broadcasting of all sorts of music, and this is being developed.

The radio program at the Religio was beset with so many interferences of various kinds that it was spoiled for the large audience at the Stone Church, though many other points phoned in their appreciation of both the quality of the program and the ability to hear clearly. Some of our best singers and players participated. Probably another attempt will be made later to provide a similar program.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium during the week ending April 22: Mrs. Tina H. Winters, Mount Washington, Missouri; Mrs. Helen Ostertag, Kansas City, Kansas; Mrs. John Powell, Lees Summit, Missouri; Baby Anna Ruth Baker, Levasy, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Herman Lukens, George Carson, Miss Myrtle Grapes, Ralph Wittmann, Baby Woodrow Farrell, Mrs. Agnes Jepson, Miss Julia Surface, Mrs. Elizabeth Stevens, and Henry Webb. X-ray patients: Mrs. E. E. Kirby and F. A. Inman, of Independence.

New Children's Day Program

An entirely new and specially written cantata for Children's Day observance has just been published and is now on sale at this office at 10 cents each copy or 75 cents a dozen. It is best to order a dozen copies for effective work in putting on the program.

The title is "Zion redeemed," and the motif is distinctly and pleasingly Latter Day Saint. The author is Mrs. Mollie Davis, of Independence, and this was chosen as the best of a large number of entries in a contest in the Pen and Ink Club. It will be tried out under the auspices of the committee in at least one of the Independence Sunday schools this year, but to meet the demand for something for other schools is being published now. Most of the music is selected from our church songbooks, and the balance is familiar music to new words.

Sunday school committees should order at once to give ample time to prepare for Children's Day, the second Sunday in June.

Life Is Not Things

"A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." (Luke 12: 17.)

The Master had been called upon to judge between a man and his brother, that he divide the inheritance. It is remarkable how frequently there are dissensions on this ground, the dividing of the inheritance, and sometimes over very trivial items. We have known heirs to refuse to give keepsakes to friends of the departed, even though these heirs were not directly related by blood and the total amount was not one tenth of one per cent of the estate, simply because it had not been plainly designated in the will, although the wish had been expressed.

The Master recognized that he was not the officer of the civil law to decide these questions of property, nor could he confuse his mission by being brought in question for such actions. But this would not prevent two members of his church from submitting such a dispute to one or more of their brethren for adjudication and arbitration and settlement to avoid going to law, such action being taken by common consent or agreement between the parties concerned.

So the Master replied, "Take heed and beware of covetousness; for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." This was followed by the parable of the rich man whose crops exceeded the capacity of his barns, so he decided he would pull down his barns and build greater, rather than to share his produce with others. But God said unto him, "Thou fool! This night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided? So shall it be with him who layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God." (Luke 12: 22, 23.) A man's life does not consist in abundance of things.

The happiness of a baby does not depend on being kept spotlessly clean, having a trained nurse, and kept in a special room in a crib. A baby will thrive better with mother love though compelled to shift for himself much of the time, and even though he wriggles over to the coal bucket and, quite naturally, samples its eatability. A child's life does not consist in being dressed up and kept quiet. His happiness lies in freedom of movement and being permitted to play next to Mother Earth. A child's life does not consist in the multitude of perfect toys, but rather in imagination and play with even the simplest make-believe toys. It is questionable if a too perfect toy has anything like the educational value that the makeshift has.

We have been happy as a child in a log house with a dirt floor, watching the wonderful moon rise between the cracks. The happiness of childhood does not depend on a multiplicity of things.

That which is true in childhood is also true of those older in years. Millions of dollars and indigestion do not make for as great happiness as is known by the hard-working but adequately paid laboring man. Women who are first housekeepers, whose house must be kept just so, and who are so burdened with things that church services must be neglected and there is no place where a live boy can sit down or stand, may succeed as custodians of things, but fail as mothers.

Likewise one whose things must be kept in such order that there is no place for a husband, may prove a lover of beautiful things, but not be a good wife.

So also the man who is so burdened with his possessions that he cannot treat his family with consideration and has a grouch over every extra dollar of expense for shoes, may possess many things but fail as a father and husband and as a citizen as well. Life does not consist primarily in things.

Nor do we in this discredit in the slightest degree the value of good clothing, of a good, well-kept home, of pleasing surroundings for work; but these things should be secondary and not primary in our lives. A man may well be rich; he should be rich; but should be rich first towards God and towards his family, and not first to seek to lay up treasure for himself. "Seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God, and to establish his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." (Matthew 6: 38, Inspired Version.) So the Master taught his disciples.

This same lesson was again repeated when the rich young man came asking what he should do to be saved. He was referring to the law of Moses, the ten commandments, "All these have I kept from my youth up." What then should the answer be? The answer of the sectarian world would be, "We will be glad to accept you on your own terms." He was a man of wealth, a man who had kept all of the ten commandments, but with the Master it was not so, for he answered, "If ye would be perfect, go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor and come and follow me." He told him frankly that he had too many things. His heap of things was so high that it shut off his vision of the kingdom of heaven. His first need was to reduce his heap of things that his heart might be turned fully to the kingdom of God.

"But," one will say, "that would drive him away." Yes, the young man went away sorrowful, but the Master had given him a chance for redemption. Though he turned to his disciples and pointed the moral, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God." It is easier for a camel to go through the little gate of the city, called the needle's eye. To do this the camel must have the things, its burden, removed from its back, and then, on bended knees, crawl through.

The Master calls for the consecration of the man's whole self, even though that involved first of all a sacrifice, a dedication, a setting apart for others of some of his multitude of things.

Then, when the Master was about to go up to Jerusalem to be offered up, Mary brought a pound of ointment and anointed his feet and wiped them with her hair. One of the disciples, Judas Iscariot, asked why this ointment was not sold for three hundred pence and given to the poor. Three hundred pence would represent the earnings of a laboring man for a year or more. The silver that would go to make three hundred pence would perhaps be worth fifty or sixty dollars in silver to-day; but that is by no means the test. In purchasing power it would represent the earnings of a laboring man probably for more than a year. Perhaps if we should give it a value to-day of $1,000 it would be nearer a fair comparison.

Judas later sold the Master for thirty pieces of silver. This was less than thirty silver dollars in metal, and represented only about two fifths as much as the value of the ointment. This gives us another measure of comparison. But it is striking to think of the Master of life being sold for less than one half the value of the ointment used to anoint his feet.

Jesus, at the time, approved of the act of Mary, and declared that it was in token of his burial. "For the poor have ye always with you, but me you have not always." He recognized the expression of love beyond the material value of the ointment, yet it was not a small sacrifice.

It is right that we should conserve the treasures of earth; it is right that we should consecrate them to the service of our Master. It is right that we should provide for our family, "for he who careth not for those of his own household is worse than an infidel," but our thoughts should not be first to lay up treasures for ourselves. Our first seeking should not be the things of earth, for "A man's life consisteth not in the multitude of things that he possesseth," but rather should we "seek first the kingdom of God and to establish his righteousness and all things will be added."

The Lord's Supper

A Feast of Brotherhood

The Lord's Supper is not only in remembrance of the sacrifice made by our Lord, is not only an opportunity for a renewal of our covenant, but it has also come down to us as a love feast agape as signifying that we are all of one family and all of one blood as we partake of the flesh and blood of Jesus in the bread and wine. Symbolically, we become one with him and with each other.

So we are reminded of his wonderful prayer in the Garden of Gethsemane when he plead with the Father that "they may be one even as we are one, thou in me and I in them, that we may all be one."

Whosoever comes to partake of these emblems, bringing with him a little ill will towards a brother, a desire to discredit him, to hate him in any way, a desire to restrain him, with a feeling otherwise than of open-hearted brotherly love, partakes, in a sense, unworthily, bringing the spirit of disunion to the feast in which we pledge ourselves as one.

There is a long history in comparative religion of this significance, how it became, through the ages, corrupted; how its spirituality and symbolism were lost sight of, and only the truth of the common brotherhood sometimes remained.

Now that we have restored the true inward meaning of that feast, its symbolism, let us not lose that which even the savages held, the knowledge of our oneness under God, that we are all one family or brotherhood by the blood which Jesus shed for the suffering world.

It is stated that only seven per cent of the people of America go beyond the grammar school in school work. They rely for the balance of their education upon reading. Therein we see the importance of a free press, and if the people of the country are to be equally informed, it must be through a press having national dimensions.

Suggestive Reunion Program

The Joint Council of Presidency, Twelve, and Bishopric at a recent session appointed a general reunion committee consisting of Elbert A. Smith, Paul M. Hanson, and B. R. McGuire. This committee in consultation with the heads of the Sunday School, Religio, and Women's Departments have formulated a suggestive program for the use of reunions.

The program is purely suggestive and is offered in the hope that it may help those in charge of local reunions. It may be adapted to local needs, conditions, and talents.

8.30 to 9.30 a. m. Prayer meeting. (Where housing and other factors permit, separate prayer services should be held for adults, young people, and children.)

9.45 to 10.45 a. m. Study hour. (Graded classes should be furnished for different ages. The visiting field worker representing the departments will assist in this work. The heads of departments have addressed letters to local district officers and reunion committees suggesting texts for study.)

11.00 a. m. Preaching meeting. (The sermon at this hour should feed and instruct the Saints. If possible, at the same hour a sermon for the young people and a sermonet or Bible story for the children should be provided.)

2.00 p. m. Activities of Boy Scouts, Orioles, etc., demonstrating their work.

3.00 p. m. Recreational.

8.00 p. m. Missionary doctrinal sermon. (To be preceded by a half hour of congregational singing.)

A Conference of Renunciation

The conference at Washington for disarmament has been referred to by several as a conference of renunciation. It was probably first so designated by Count d' Alte, of Portugal, as here the great nations have abandoned their deeply cherished national policies and advantages once thought essential. America renounced her opportunity to win the race in naval armaments. Great Britain renounced her mastery of the sea; France her natural desire and right to remain a first-class naval power; Italy the position as a naval power to which her skill might well entitle her; Japan a position in the Pacific corresponding to the importance of her merchant marine. America and Japan renounced their right to fortify portions of their own territory, and the four chief naval powers of the Pacific renounced the right to attack without first consulting with all of the others. All of the powers except China renounced the opportunity of commercial and political gain in the Far East, and most of them even existing rights and spheres of influence.

The treaties were first to limit naval armament between the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan; second, they were to control the use of submarines and gas in warfare; third, the United States, Great Britain, France, and Japan relating to insular dominion in the Pacific, and with this a declaration reserving America's right in the Mandate territory, a treaty between nine powers relating to the policies and principles to be followed in China.

The Cost of Publication

Despite complaints against the increasing cost of periodicals and other publications, the fact remains that there has been very little, and practically no profiteering. Prices have not been increased in comparison with the increased cost of publication, including wages, paper, ink, and machinery.

But it must be remembered that an essential part of publication is the distribution, the getting of the printed matter to the readers, and in this field the Federal Government has interfered so as to very greatly increase the cost through increased mailing rates. We have discussed this increase in earlier issues, together with the zoning system. This increase has been met in many instances by printing periodicals long in advance and sending by express or freight, or some other method. But in many cases, this cannot be successfully resorted to. The result has been that many periodicals have gone to the wall. Others have found their way difficult, and all have been forced to raise the price.

As the result of these conditions, an American Publishers' Convention has been called, and for the first time, all of the publishing interests will be represented. Their interests are diverse. Doubtless, now they have started, they will continue to work together to consider the best interests of their business. Their immediate problem is to secure a reduction of mailing rates by asking Congress to remove the last two increases of 1920-1921. This would still mean that postage rates will be 175 per cent in excess of pre-war rates, but it will be at least an adjustment.

The war taxes have been taken off of other industries. The publishers, therefore, appear to be consistent in asking that this excess war tax be taken off their business, especially when this tax is not on the product, but on the process of the business.

The national board of fire underwriters state that matches and smoking material were the greatest cause of fire for the five-year period ending December 31, with electricity second, and stoves, furnaces, pipes, and defective flues following as third and fourth. For the five years the loss has been over $1,600,000,000 in the United States, which naturally places a considerable burden on the community.

Homes for Children

We recently published an item from our own Children's Home asking for those who were able and willing to adopt one or more children. Now we note from a recent Omaha editorial that the Nebraska Children's Home Society is conducted without an institution. It has no home, but it seeks to find homes for children. It does not take care of homeless children in a dormitory maintained by charity. It does seek to find foster parents who will adopt homeless children into their homes and make them at home in every sense of the word. In twenty-eight years, this society has aided seven thousand boys and girls and found permanent homes for over two thousand.

Its work to-day is taking little children, outfitting them with proper clothing, boarding them for a short period until a home can be found. After finding them homes, they supervise their care in these homes until they are twenty-one years of age. This they are able to do at an average expense of $137.50 per child.

We understand that this is the total expenditure, not the annual expenditure, per child, and we are glad to note that they not only find homes, but supervise the care of the children in these homes until the children are of full age.

This latter is certainly not of less importance than the caring for and outfitting of the children, nor the work of finding them homes or adopted parents. It is, in fact, a most vital part of the work of this or any other society which undertakes to secure the adoption of homeless children, not to depend alone on letters of recommendation, but to maintain the point of contact throughout infancy.

The Wireless Telephone

The use of the wireless telephone has undergone a most remarkable increase within the last few months. The Outlook states that a year ago less than fifty thousand wireless telephone receiving sets were in use. To-day there are from six hundred thousand to a million, and the number is rapidly increasing.

This is the reason that there has been necessary a prescribed wave length for different kinds of service and restricting certain wave lengths to certain service. It would seem to be apparent that as the number of sets increases, not only the wave length, but also the time of sending will have to be subject to some regulation. At present, transoceanic radio service is assigned the longer wave length of six thousand meters. Amateurs and technical and training schools are confined to 150 to 270 meter wave length, from 152 to 300 meters being exclusive for amateurs.

A Samoan in the Arctic

A Pacific Islander learns to prefer the cold climate to the heat.

Some have at times wondered how the South Sea Islanders would be able to endure our winters if they ever came to Zion. They dwell in a climate that is warm all the year around, and in comparatively recent times they wore no clothing, for they needed none to protect them from the temperature.

But this question is now fully answered in an article in a recent book by Stefansson, in which he states that a Samoan who came to the World's Fair a few years ago, proceeded to San Francisco with the idea of returning home. He saw a ship about to sail and slipped aboard, not realizing that but few ships leaving that port go to his islands. In this case it happened that the ship was starting on a three-year trip to the Arctic.

The first winter he suffered severely from the cold, not knowing how to protect himself, but the next winter he was amply clothed, and liked the Arctic so much that he made his home there. He engaged in trade there and accumulated considerable wealth. He was finally asked why he did not return to his own islands, and remembering that when he left a man could be hired for five cents a day, he decided to do so. But arriving a year or so later, Stefansson met him again in San Francisco and asked him what he was doing there. He replied that he had intended to go back to his islands, but remembering that conditions had changed the price of labor, he had gone back north. While he had been staying in San Francisco, he had missed so much the winter of the north he knew he would no longer be happy in his islands where there is no winter.

If this Samoan can dwell permanently in the Arctic region and enjoy it, there appears to be no reason why the South Sea Islanders could not dwell in Zion and be happy.

The world crop summary for 1921 shows a wheat increase over 1920 of 65,000,000 bushels. The amount, however, is only 2,000,000 in excess of the world average for 1914-1918 of 2,450,000,000 bushels.

The corn crop was 72,000,000 less than 1920, but a decided increase over the average for both 1914 to 1918 and 1909 to 1913, as it was a total of over 3,500,000,000 bushels.

The oat crop was 500,000,000 bushels less than 1920, and 200,000,000 bushels less than the five-year average, 1914-1918. The crops, therefore, were quite comparable with those for previous years.

The Miracle of Progress

By Walter W. Smith

A sermon delivered Easter Sunday, April 16, 1922, at the Stone Church, Independence, Missouri; reported by Howard W. Harder.

And the women entered in, and found not the body of the Lord Jesus. And it came to pass, while they were perplexed thereabout, behold two men stood by them arrayed in dazzling white apparel; and they were amazed. And as they were affrighted, and bowed down their faces to the earth, the angel answered and said unto the women, Fear not ye: be not amazed: for I know that ye seek Jesus, the Nazarene, who hath been crucified. Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here; but is risen, even as he said. Remember how he spake unto you when he was yet in Galilee, saying that the Son of man must be delivered up into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again. Come, see the place where the Lord lay. Behold, the place where they laid him! And go quickly, and tell his disciples and Peter, He is risen from the dead: and lo, he goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him, as he said unto you. Lo, I have told you. And they remembered his words. And they departed quickly from the tomb with fear and great joy, and ran to bring his disciples word.

I have read to you a paraphrase of the story of the angel's reception to the women at the tomb as found in Matthew, Mark, and Luke.

If I were to tell you how I feel, after listening to the worshipful music this morning, I could do no better than to quote the words of Saint Ambrose who said, when he heard the music in the Cathedral of Milan, "My emotions were moved, my tears ran down my cheeks, the truth distilled in my soul, and I worshiped God."

"He Is Risen"

This is a most auspicious occasion. The message is one of the opening flower, the bursting bud, the early dawn, with all its promise. And if I paraphrase what I have read to you this morning again and try to reduce it and get out of it a text that would be short enough to confine my remarks to for the brief period I have before me, I should further cut down the story which I have read and make it read like this: "Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is risen from the dead: and lo, he goeth before you."

Whatever Christmastime may bring to us by way of promise, whatever any other season or any other holiday or any other festival may mean to the Church of Christ, Easter morning means to us a promise of progress and triumph. He is not dead. He is risen. He is not among the dead, but he is among the living and goes before you. Christ said to his disciples while here, "I go to prepare a place for you." He said again, "If I be lifted up, I will draw all men unto me."

The hour of the crucifixion was the hour of deepest anguish to the infant church because their discernment was too small, their experience too limited, their faith too weak, and their courage all but gone, and they said to one another, "We thought that it had been he who should have redeemed Israel." But on Easter morning, when the faithful women came to the tomb they received from the messengers of God the assurance that the promises that he had made were fulfilled, and the miracle of the resurrection of the dead had been accomplished, and that all that was promised of God, both in nature, in the consciousness of man, and in the revelation of God, should all abundantly be fulfilled.

Miracles Because Mystifying

This miracle is not new to man, though in the light with which Eastern morning illuminates it, it perhaps has not always been viewed. People seem to think it a strange thing that a miracle should be held as a perfectly rational and scientific thing. The only thing about a miracle that is mystifying is the fact that we do not have an adequate explanation for it. That it exists, no well-informed man will care to question. Do you know that in biology we have a continuous miracle? Do you know that every step of progress made in a blade of grass and in the development of the mammoth oak, the beautiful Easter lily, and all the rest of the flowers or plants in the field, all bear testimony of a continuous miracle, the miracle of life?

Science accounts for a great deal of this. In the theory of evolution there is developed a most splendid history of the sequence of the rise and development, the progress and unfoldment, and development of that which is. What wonderful progress has been made in the field of living things! Do you know, beloved, what the Easter lily at one time looked like? Once upon a time the bulb of the Easter lily was an article of food in the Orient. It was a large, luscious bulb, and was cooked and eaten like a potato, and the blossom on the lily was very small. It was a beautiful, white, inconspicuous, little flower, and of little consequence. Transplanting it into a new environment, cultivating under better conditions, and selected for another purpose, the splendid blossom is now produced, which sometimes measures four and six inches, and even eight inches long. In fact, it is so large that we have now christened it with another name and now call it the lilium longiflorum, meaning of course that it is the lily with the long flower.

How was each step in this wonderful development made? Does any man know? We pass it over by saying selection and cultivation. We have another name for it. Men say this is all brought about by change in germ plasm; but no biologist, no scientist, no chemist has told us yet what that is. It is the miracle by which that which is wrapped up within the possibilities of the plant is unfolded, and we do not know how. Why is it that sometimes in a field of perfectly yellow corn there will be a white ear? Does anybody know? No; they simply say it is change in germ plasm. But why when thousands of grains of corn, many bushels of corn, were planted in one field, why should there be one grain as yellow as all of the rest that should defy all of the rules of heredity and make white corn? It is the miracle of progress. It is God's own way of taking out of the things that he put here on the earth the things that he determined in his own will would eventually be made.

Miracles in Flowers

Look at the things about us, how they progress under cultivation. I see some of the ladies wearing sweet peas this morning. Just think what a cheap, common, ordinary flower the pea is; but under the evolution of life just see what beautiful flowers have developed! Pass by the roadside sometime and gather a wild rose—just a common, ordinary, five-petaled, wild dog-rose, and compare it with the magnificent American Beauty and see what a miracle has been wrought. Nobody knows why. No scientist can tell how. Scientists know the change is made and they have catalogued it because it is quite generally known. Sometime, somewhere, about every once in so often, and that is about as often as you can tell when it is going to happen, nature will strike off from its normal paths and make a new path for itself. It is the miracle of physical, biological progress.

Pass over from the biological field into the field of the development of reason and see what man has done. All the knowledge we have in the world is the result of experience, excepting of course that which belongs to the spiritual field which comes to us by revelation, and by the way that is experience, too, after we get it. But all we can purchase as the result of our own thought depends upon our experience. Suppose each man had to have all these experiences anew for himself. It certainly would be like marching up to the top of a hill and marching down again. Each man would go up the same hill everybody else travels. Intellectuality, purely human reason, culture and refinement have no such experience; each generation builds upon the last.

We all anticipate, we look, we yearn, we long, we labor, we strive, but every man in reasoning out and in thinking always figures that the obstacle which the other man was unable to surmount is his particular task, must be mastered; he must overcome what the other man could not overcome. Human progress, civilization, invention, culture, is the challenge to the race, the unsolved problem lying before us all, for each to overcome.

Biological Development

How has the race progressed? Now, in a biological sense, let me tell you. A Herefordshire cow in 1066 weighed six hundred pounds on the average. There might have been some that weighed six hundred twenty-five pounds, but there were thousands of them under six hundred pounds. How do they compare with our twenty-eight-hundred-pound Herefordshire steers to-day? What is the cause? Development. Change in germ plasm.

But while nature has been building fine stock, beautiful flowers, and wonderful food for man, what has man been doing? What about the reasoning power, the knowledge, the accomplishment, the equipment, the wonderful mind development throughout the last thousand years? Each generation is helped more or less, according to the amount of strength put into it. But suppose we feel that the bridge is closed at the other end. What would be the use of trying to cross? You know, every man feels that what the human soul can do is an unmeasured affair, and that what can be accomplished is determined not by what somebody else has done, but by what I will do, hence the other end of the bridge being open, every man tries to bridge the gulf.

Literature speaks to us in the terms of miracles, for human reason, finding the road more difficult than it cares to negotiate, has attempted to solve the problem by a miracle. How many of you remember reading any great literature that did not have a miracle in it? Go back to your Shakespeare. How about the miracle in Hamlet—the ghost? And how about Macbeth? and how about Sir Walter Scott's Ivanhoe? All through the ages, among every race, in human intelligence, the gulf is always bridged by every great man by a miracle. It has been the line of human thought. Dickens, in "The Christmas carol," Longfellow, in "King Robert of Sicily," Tennyson, in the "Idylls of the King," and all the rest. When they have reached the limit of human reason they have bridged the gulf. Every man that is worth while, in thinking about things does that, and it is a miracle—the superhuman, the unusual, the thing that every man wishes would happen, and longs, and looks, and prays, and labors for, and if he successfully accomplishes, can do what in his own power was impossible.

Shall we deny to the spiritual world that great and wonderful and more powerful realm than either the intellectual or physical world—shall we deny this great spiritual realm a miracle? Why, the very center, the very core, the very meaning of this latter-day work is in the miracle which is true in nature. That which every wise man has looked for in the spiritual field is ours to enjoy.

Life Is Participation

What is life but participation? It is a marked and limited life that the flower lives, but what is it doing to participate? Why, it is making the element over into green leaves, white flowers, and making chemical reactions that are very beneficial. What is intellectual life and thought and reason but participation in the thought, activity, feelings, and longings of others?

What is spiritual life but thinking the thoughts of God; willing the things that God would will; feeling as God would feel under those circumstances or under a given situation; actually having the mind of Christ? That is what it means to be spiritual. In this great spiritual realm there must be some power of regeneration, otherwise we would go as in accordance with the law of all things. A ball lies still or rolls just according to whether it is moved or left alone. This would not be untrue in the spiritual world. No man can rise higher than himself if it were not for the fact that when he comes to the place where his soul yearns for that which is greater than his own resources can supply, God's promises are realized in the soul of man, the promise of regeneration, the miracle of spiritual rebirth.

When we live our life all through, marked in its physical experience by the miracle of life's own development, marked in the intellectual life by the great gap that has to be supplied by the superhuman, are we to feel strange when we enter the field of spiritual development and find that here we are participating, not in physical things with materials, but in spiritual relations that exist between ourselves and God and ourselves and our friends, are we to suppose that here in this field we are to be left to accomplish, that after this great life of adjustment and participation has come to its full fruitage, that then we are to lay our bodies down, failures and unsuccessful, which have run their course like a candle blown out in a twinkling? It is not true of a plant. This plant, the lily, perpetuates itself, and as soon as spring comes and another Easter is born, another crop of flowers like this comes again and again and again, and each crop richer and better and longer and whiter and more worth while.

Human Thought Persists

Do human thoughts die? Oh, no. Socrates, Plato, Aristotle were laid in the cold embrace of death hundreds of years before our Lord was born. Did their thoughts perish with them? No, they did not. Every modern thinker, every great reasoner, every man who has any degree of intelligence is influenced by the thoughts of these great men that live on and on, recurring in every generation. These thoughts being taught to the children, they are forced into action and are developed into manhood. Are we to believe that when this end comes we shall lay our bodies in the cold embrace of death and nothing further happen? Why, it would be a miracle if a man could believe that way. He would have to defy all the experiences of the race in every field of human experience. Every man, no matter what his religion may be, has the hope, the anticipation that the experiences he is now having may ripen into something better according to the promise of God, so that as our bodies are laid down the message of Easter is that that miracle anticipated is realized, for Jesus is not dead. He was laid in Joseph's tomb three days ago, but this morning we celebrate the rising from the dead. When the women came with their poor, weak faith, supposing that he who would have redeemed Israel was still there, they stood in the empty tomb and the angel said, "Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is alive. He is risen and goeth before you."

Never in all the experiences of the race has there been such a beautiful opportunity as is presented to the church of Christ to-day. All our past can easily be forgotten in the successes that lie before us. All our defeats, all our failures, all our disappointment, heartache, and all the rest can easily be buried with the past, and we can rise on Easter morning with the promise, "He is alive. He is risen and goeth before you."

Where cannot the church of Christ go? What cannot this church accomplish? Will you tell me any limit that any man or set of men can set upon the possibilities of the risen Christ? Some one has said, "If God be with us, who can be against us?" Certainly when we feel and sense and appreciate the fact that the whole of the Christian experience is a worshipful attitude towards the miracle of his existence, incarnate in flesh to show us what to do, died like man that he might rise like God, now who can be afraid, who can be discouraged, what is there that can turn us aside or hinder our success individually, collectively in groups, or as a church? Beloved, if we could only sense the full meaning of the miracle of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, the company that is housed here under the sound of my voice could go out and convert the world.

Did you ever view the situation that confronted the church of Jesus Christ when they began to celebrate Easter? Will you go with me just for a moment back to Rome? The Romans were pleasure lovers. We talk about a pleasure-loving world today. We do have some respect for life, but the Romans, when they got too sated to be excited at seeing two bulls fight each other, put men into the arena. They trained gladiators to kill each other in order that they might have some excitement. In that kind of an age and that kind of a time the church of Jesus Christ, without prestige, inhibited by every law, prohibited everywhere, actually went into Rome and held its meetings in basements, cellars, tombs, and graveyards, because there was a vision in the souls of those men of the risen Lord. They had gone out to conquer the world and Rome was a small matter, a mere bagatelle. They were not worrying about Nero, nor all of his armies, nor the whole Roman Empire. They were set on fire with the individual knowledge of Jesus Christ resurrected from the dead, and had gone out to sanctify and cleanse the world for him. They took Rome, of course, and all of the rest of the western world, but they did not succeed altogether. But look what they did accomplish. In a few hundred years they conquered the world and became the state religion of all the western nations.

What could we do? We have had just about the same length of experience now that the Christian church had when they began their work of proselytizing. When the Christian church had had one hundred years of experience they were not as large as we are. The church of Christ made practically no progress until nearly all of the men who had seen the Lord were dead. It was a small and rather insignificant sect of the Jews at first and at the end of the first one hundred years had not gone very far, but when the Christian church actually realized their mission to preach the risen Lord and the miracle of his recovery from the dead and the meaning of that to each individual and the church in general, everything else took secondary place and they went out and conquered the world. I am living, hoping, longing, praying, that I shall see this church do the same thing. There is no reason why it should not. It is our mission, it is our opportunity. This is the message of Easter to us to-day.

The necessary conclusion is that adult education must not be regarded as a luxury for a few exceptional persons here and there, nor as a thing which concerns only a short space of early manhood, but that adult education is a permanent national necessity, an inseparable aspect of citizenship, and therefore should be both universal and lifelong.—Plato's Laws.

Self-Denial

By James F. Keir

As we further the cause of Christ through self-denial we shall find great joy in service.

"If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me."

He who holds himself in leash by self-denial develops a strong will. To give way to every appetite and to satisfy every desire weakens the will and, at the hour of trial or temptation, he who does so is an easy victim.

There must be virtue in self-denial, for the Lord would not require of his children the observance of that which is unprofitable. "In private and public expenditure, carry into active exercise the principle of sacrifice and repression of unnecessary wants" (self-denial).

Jesus denied his flesh the thing for which it hungered in order that he might be made spiritually strong and made equal to the big task before him. We are often made to marvel as we see the fervor of his followers who have caught the spirit of self-denial and consecration.

A few days ago a sister called at the office and, in talking over their financial affairs, I learned that her husband earned seven dollars a week and his board; that in addition to this they had an income, though somewhat uncertain, of $25 a month, and that from this they were paying one tenth as tithing. I told her that she was doing more than the law required, for God has asked for one tenth of our increase, not one tenth of our income, to which she said: "Yes, but I promised the Lord I would do this and both my husband and I find much pleasure in doing it and the Lord has surely wonderfully blessed us." Who am I that I should say to her, "Don't you do it"? My reply to her was, "Sister, whatever you have promised God, that thing do."

The Poor Young Man

The next one is not the rich young man who went away, sorrowing when Jesus said to him, "Sell that thou hast and give to the poor," but it is a poor young man who went on his way rejoicing because it was and is his happy privilege to be a "laborer together with God." Such a spirit of self-denial and consecration is seldom seen.

He lives in a large city, works at a nominal salary, and is about thirty years of age, quiet in his manners, a man of few words, but that the interests of "seeking first to build up the kingdom of God" (by self-denial) is very close to his heart, is evidenced by what he has done. He has given to

His generosity was so noticeable by those who belonged to the same branch that one sister made bold to ask him how he did it. His answer could have been made in two words, "self-denial."

His interest in the Master's work is so intense that he lost no opportunity to save, that he might give. Instead of boarding or taking all of his meals at a restaurant, he prepared many of them in his own room.

Surely in the great day to come, when to his inquiry, "When saw we thee an hungered and fed thee, or naked and clothed thee, or in prison and visited thee?" there shall come the approving reply of the Master: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of these, the least of my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

May more and more of us catch the spirit of these Saints, being assured that as we practice self-denial and give the Lord's work the benefit of it we shall find great joy in our service.

The Twelve Write Concerning the Sanitarium

Various members of the apostolic quorum commend the work and ideals of our church Sanitarium, thus recognizing National Hospital Day.

An Institution Worthy of Support

By Gomer T. Griffiths

It is with pleasure that I herewith call the attention of my friends to the fact that I am a booster for the Sanitarium and expect to always be one.

The Sanitarium is provided with competent physicians and a corps of faithful nurses to take care of the suffering ones who seek assistance within its walls. Many hundreds have been benefited through its peaceful influence and the wonderful care they have received from the hands of those who have taken great delight in ministering to their wants.

The spiritual atmosphere is of the highest order, as the majority of the physicians and all of the nurses have faith in Almighty God and depend upon the Lord to assist them in their endeavors to minister to the unfortunate ones through the ordinance of his church.

It is to be hoped that all of God's people will take an intense interest in this institution and give liberally of their means to support it. I wonder why it is that some of our people whom the Lord has blessed with an abundance of this world's goods do not feel disposed to endow this splendid hospital and thereby help make it what God designed it should be when he commanded his people to provide a place especially for the afflicted and distressed of his children. However, many outside the church take advantage of the peaceful environment and the wonderful and splendid service rendered by the physicians and nurses.

Wake up, Saints, and send in your contribution. Your money cannot be spent in a more helpful and worthy cause.

Our Sanitarium Part of the Christian Ministry

By John W. Rushton

In the program of activities which should characterize the social efforts of the Christian church, our Lord deliberately selected the outline given in the prophecies of Isaiah which included the healing and comforting power applied to all who in sickness, deformity, and distress of body and mind, needed the help of God. Following this lead the Christian church in all ages has been the leading power in seeking to alleviate suffering and distress; and the healing art has been associated with the priestly function among all peoples.

It is eminently fitting that in the event of the restoration of the gospel of Jesus Christ there should be special emphasis placed upon the function of "healing the sick." In the development of the church activities attention is given to the effort to discover essential virtues in the herbs, roots, and barks to be administered in reverence and faith in such healing work.

From such a small germinal commencement did our Sanitarium grow, and its work of disseminating comfort, healing, and sympathy is known throughout the area of church experience, and many poor victims of the ills to which humanity is subject have had occasion to thank God for such a gracious ministry of spiritual, pathological, surgical, and comforting combination.

There cannot be a child of God and member of the church anywhere but must feel deep gratitude for the privilege of joining in this work which throughout the world is doing so much to reduce the existing amount of misery, and bring to men, women, and children not only "healing in its wings," but also such knowledge of the truth that epidemics, disease, and various defects which have handicapped our race in the struggle for existence shall be abolished.

Through this particular agency we also find ourselves related to all peoples who are striving to do Christ's work, and for this occasion at least theological and ecclesiastical differences are put aside as we unite in prayers, gratitude, and sympathy with the whole Nation and consecrate some token of our thanks which shall make the National Hospital Day a reminder of a duty we owe to God in serving suffering mankind.

The Healing of the Sick Belongs to the Church

By T. W. Williams

One of the essential things which distinguish civilization from barbarism and savagery is humane and scientific care of those who are mentally and physically sick.

Instinctively we think of a hospital or sanitarium in connection with the church—one is incomplete without the other. The care and cure of the body is as much the part of the divine plan as the conversion and rejuvenation of the soul.

The altruistic purpose of any community must be measured by its interest or indifference to the remedial agencies available for the alleviation of pain, the maintenance of health, the preservation of mental poise and power.

It would seem unnecessary to emphasize the need of a sanitarium. God has done this. As early as 1906 the full direction was given to the church:

"It is the will of the Lord that a sanitarium, a place of refuge and help for the sick and afflicted, be established by the church."

This is instruction as well as command. It has never been canceled or amended. The call for action is imperative to-day as in the past.

If we would strike out of the record of the life of Jesus all those passages which have to do with his efforts to alleviate suffering, cure disease, and cast out of men's minds and bodies discordant spirits, it would rob the story of much of its pathos and inspiration. Jesus Christ still leads because no other has ever approximated to him in sympathy and service.

Religion consists in ministry for others. The one thing which stands out in the history of the great World War as an evidence that barbarism has not wholly swamped civilization is the record of magnificent hospitals at home and abroad. So long as we have a physician, surgeon, or a "Rose of No Man's Land," so long will civilization abide.

We have in the multiplicity of other cares well-nigh forgotten the word of the Lord relative to our Sanitarium. Our contribution to the erection and maintenance has been niggardly and wholly inadequate. It is not too late to make amends. We still have time to demonstrate our faith by our works. Let the entire church membership be aroused to the needs in this direction and let the Independence Sanitarium become an institution to which we can point with commensurate pride as an evidence that religion is for this world as well as the world to come.

A Testimonial

By J. F. Curtis

In order that the readers of the HERALD may know more about the work of the Independence Sanitarium and its importance to the missionary and his family, permit me to say that I have been very closely associated with this institution for several years and know that it has been of great benefit to many of our missionaries who have gone there for care and attention. This is also true of the members of the missionary's family.

I have been personally acquainted with those who have had this institution in charge and I wish to speak a good word for the doctors and splendid group of nurses who so kindly care for those who are afflicted and distressed.

This institution has been and still is doing a great work that is much needed to be done. The Sanitarium should receive the support of all who are in a condition to help, so that its work may be extended to those who are in need.

They Give Their Life Service That We May Live

By R. C. Russell

As we gather around the remains of a fellow traveler ere we view, for the last time in mortal shroud, the beloved form of one whom we most dearly loved, it appears to me that the greatest praise attributable to their memory, is, "The world was made better because this noble being lived in it."

How many of us can say from actual experience that were it not for the Sanitarium and the ever-watchful, tender, skillful care administered to us while there, by physician, nurse, and elder, under the fatherly care of the Great Creator, our lives would have long since passed away?

Having been twice a patient in the Sanitarium I believe I should be a judge of the worthiness of its existence.

Some people are very timid about placing themselves in a sanitarium, but not so in my case, for coming in as I did in both instances from the rigors and hardships of frontier missionary labors, it was truly a veritable paradise for my weary mind and body, and though I had been treated right royally by my friends with whom I had labored, yet the combined sacrifice and skill of both physician and nurse far surpass that which could possibly be rendered in the home that is unprepared to care for the sick and suffering.

My greatest regrets are that I am not wealthy in the coin of the realm, for if I were I surely would come to the assistance of what I believe to be the most noble institution of our church—the Sanita-

OF GENERAL INTEREST

Kansas City Resources

[The following was prepared for the Kansas City Stake Number of last week, but space limitations prevented its use.—EDITORS.]

Kansas City is the heart of America.

Kansas City has no waste territory—no deserts, lakes, oceans, mountains. No international boundary lines restrict its sales possibilities from extending in every direction.

Kansas City is the clearing house for a vast agricultural region; a rich oil and mineral territory; an empire of beef and pork and other provisions.

Kansas City, to-day, is America's city of greatest industrial opportunity.

Kansas City is truly the heart of America, located as it is in the center of the continent, on the Missouri River at the mouth of the Kansas River.

The products of this territory pass through the Kansas City market to all parts of the world, and Kansas City sends back into the territory in return the manufactured products, necessities, and luxuries manufactured here or assembled from all parts of the world.

Kansas City is as far west as raw materials can economically be shipped for manufacture, and as far east as the finished product can be economically obtained for the great west and southwest territory. It is an ideal location for economical distribution, enjoying as it does substantial advantages in the matter of freight rates to this territory. It is actually several days nearer to this territory so far as freight transportation is concerned, and one day nearer in express and passenger service than other large markets serving this territory. Its natural geographical location and railroad facilities make it possible to serve this territory to better advantage than any other large market.

Kansas City ranks tenth as manufacturing center of the United States.

rium; and that is not in the least throwing a shadow upon our other institutions. To those who are financially able to contribute to the maintenance of the Sanitarium, I certainly would say, You cannot more nobly serve God in any manner, after having met your church obligations, than by donations to the one great institution where we alleviate the pains and ills of our fellow sufferers.

Once a patient at the Sanitarium I cannot see how a person can be anything but an ardent booster for its increased development in equipment and care of the needs of those who are so nobly sacrificing their youthful lives that we might continue to live.

Being limited for space, I must draw this article to a close with a "Long live the Sanitarium." Then let those who are able record their well-wishes for their fellow beings by freely assisting the continuity of such a noble institution.

ucts of Kansas City are well and favorably known throughout the world, a considerable foreign business being enjoyed.

New plants in addition to present plants represent an expenditure of several million dollars, including a seven-million-dollar plant for the manufacture of corn syrup, glucose, and other corn products, a million-dollar open hearth steel plant, a steel wire plant, and a steel fabricating plant—a splendid testimony to Kansas City's manufacturing possibilities.

Kansas City is the greatest wholesale and distributing center of the Southwest.

Kansas City has long been known for its large and well-equipped wholesale market. Practically every line of importance is jobbed, including dry goods and clothing, millinery, hats and caps, shoes, hardware, furniture, groceries, and drugs.

In 1919 the sales of the wholesale and jobbing houses amounted to more than $785,000,000 and covered practically every line. Many large eastern houses have established branches in Kansas City, either in the form of manufacturing plants, assembling plants, or distributing houses. These plants cover many distinct lines. Recent examples are the National Cloak and Suit Company which has just completed a $2,800,000 plant, the Reigal Sack Company, of New York, manufacturing burlap sacks, and the Pennsylvania Tank Car Company, for the manufacture and repair of steel tank cars.

The great live stock producing area of the West and Southwest has made Kansas City the second largest live stock market in the country. More than 8,000,000 head of live stock were received at the Kansas City stock yards in 1919, and more cattle were sent back to the farms for feeding and breeding than from any other market, and it is the second largest meat packing center, more than 5,300,000 animals having been slaughtered in the packing houses the same year. Buyers come from nearly every State in the Union, because no other market offers such liberal supplies, incomparable qualities, and excellent distributing facilities.

Kansas City is the second largest horse and mule market in the United States. The stock yards have been rebuilt at an expense of $2,500,000, furnishing a stock yards plant second to none.

It is the third largest city in the country for grain and grain milling, more than 105,000,000 bushels of grain being received in Kansas City in 1919. It is the largest primary winter wheat market in the world. It has a flour milling capacity of 22,000 barrels daily, including the largest flour mill in the Southwest, with a daily capacity of 7,200 barrels. Thirty-eight grain elevators have a capacity of 25,000,000 bushels, of which 21,000,000 is public storage which carries an extremely low insurance rate. The total flour output for 1919 amounted to $42,000,000.

In this connection it is pertinent to state a very large sample grain market is maintained, giving every opportunity to get samples of all kinds of wheat and other grains for buying purposes.

Kansas City is the principal headquarters for oil development and refining interests throughout the midcontinental field. More than fifty per cent of the total production in the country is found in this territory. There are several refineries having direct pipe line connection with oil fields. The output of Kansas City refineries amounted to $41,000,000 in one year recently.

Kansas City is credited with being the largest distributing point in the country for farm tractors and agricultural implements, more than $90,000,000 worth having been distributed in 1919. It is also one of the largest distributing centers in the country for automobiles and accessories, the sales last year being more than $75,000,000.

Coal for industrial or domestic consumption is easily obtainable, Kansas City being practically in the center of the coal production of Missouri, Kansas, and Iowa, being at the very door to the rich fields in these three States. In addition coal is also shipped from other States.

Fuel oil is available from the midcontinental field within two hundred miles of Kansas City, which produces approximately fifty per cent of the crude petroleum of the country. A number of Kansas City refineries have direct pipe line connection with the oil fields, eliminating any possibility of a shutdown due to interruption of car supply. Electric power and light is furnished by the Kansas City Power and Light Company on the Missouri side and by the municipal power and light plant on the Kansas side.

The cost of the plants is in the neighborhood of fifteen million dollars and they are of the most efficient kind.

Water is supplied from municipally owned and operated plants on both sides of the State line. There is an ample supply, the pumping capacity being two hundred and fifty million gallons per day.

American labor predominates in Kansas City, only eleven per cent of the total population being of foreign born parentage. Workmen are well paid and operate under exceptionally good conditions, much attention being given by employers to the comfort and welfare of their employees.

Kansas City is one of the largest railroad centers in the country, with thirteen main trunk lines and numerous branches radiating in all directions. As an evidence of its importance as a railroad center, a fifty-million-dollar terminal system has been built, which includes a six-million-dollar passenger station, the pride of the city from a transportation standpoint. The main freight stations of all the railroads are closely huddled together in what is known as the West Bottoms District, to which there is a downhill pull, a very great advantage in the distribution of outgoing less carload freight. In the matter of freight rates Kansas City enjoys a very substantial advantage over other large markets in reaching the particular territory to which it is the gateway, as well as being several days nearer so far as freight service is concerned, and one day nearer for express and passenger service.

The retail establishments in Kansas City are high class and find a large and immediate market not only among the 450,000 people in Greater Kansas City, but in the territory surrounding the city for a radius of fifty or more miles. The retail district is made easily available to this large rural population through several electric interurban railways operating into the adjacent territory to all important points contiguous to Kansas City. This territory has an enormous purchasing power. The retail stores are the equal of those in any other city. Large, well-selected stocks and courteous treatment are responsible for the upbuilding of great mercantile establishments in all lines.

It also furnishes the people of this territory fine attractions in the way of opera, concerts, and all other up-to-date entertainments.

Kansas City is equipped with hotel facilities for properly handling the thousands of visitors coming in daily. There are fifty hotels in the down-town district, with a total capacity of four thousand rooms, all of which are first class. The usual hotel facilities are supplemented by a large number of family hotels located in the residential sections of the city, where hundreds of families live the year round.

Kansas City has eleven theaters and fifty-eight moving picture shows, of which there are no finer in the country. Convention Hall, where the larger conventions are held, as well as the many fine musical programs, has a seating capacity of 13,500 people. The most rapidly growing territory in the United States to-day is the West and Southwest. The population of Kansas City's trade territory is about 17,991,754 people.

Kansas City stands fifth in bank clearing among American cities. It is the reserve city for Federal Reserve Banking District Number 10, embracing the States of Nebraska, Wyoming, Kansas, Oklahoma, Colorado, the north section of New Mexico, and the western section of Missouri, a total area of 539,649 square miles. In 1900 the bank clearings were $775,000,000, while in 1919 they were $11,222,743,324. The total bank transactions amounted to $17,248,220,088 in 1919. The sixty-seven national and state banks showed a total capital, including surplus and undivided profit, amounting to $36,425,942 on January 1, 1920.

A new twenty-story, $3,500,000 building was recently finished for the Federal Reserve Bank.

The Kansas City schools enjoy a national reputation. By comparative tests only two cities show a quality of work superior to that of Kansas City and these require eight years in which to do what Kansas City does in seven. The public school system embraces eighty-four elementary schools, two trade schools, nine special schools, five junior colleges which include a teachers' college and an intensive business school of college rank. The school property is valued at more than eleven million dollars, placing Kansas City first in per capita value of school buildings. The newer buildings are unsurpassed in educational adaptation and equipment. In addition to the public school system there are thirty-two parochial schools, six private schools, ten business colleges, a law college, a medical college, a dental college, an optical college, and an engineering college. Also a fine arts institute and conservatory of music.

A distinguishing feature of Kansas City is its residential sections, which compare with the finest of larger and older cities. It is a city of beautiful homes. Thirty-six per cent of the people own their own homes. It is a well-known fact that persons owning their own homes are better satisfied, more inclined to take an interest in neighborhood improvements than otherwise. A large number of home owners is made possible through the operation of numerous building and loan associations, which lend money for home building at low rates of interest. Kansas City enjoys a very favorable climate, which unquestionably contributes in large degree to Kansas City's rank in health among the cities of America, it ranking twelfth in cities of over 200,000 population.

Kansas City claims to lead all other cities in America in the beauty and extent of its park and boulevard system. For more than twenty-five years it has been engaged in laying plans for the beautification of the city through the building of parks and boulevards, and its efforts have resulted in some eighty miles of boulevards, including the famous Cliff Drive. To-day one of the distinguishing characteristics of the city is its park system and recreation centers, there being more than three thousand acres of parks with thirty separate parks scattered throughout the city. Forty supervised playgrounds with more than eighty tennis courts, twenty basket ball, baseball, and hand ball courts provide places of recreation and amusement for all classes. During the year 1919 the city park board spent or appropriated for proceedings under way, $1,601,500. Swopè Park, containing 1,334 acres, is the third largest park in the country.

A Change in Executive Officers

Upon the occasion of our recent visit to headquarters, a very happy change was effected in the executive of our department, whereby Sister Dora Glines becomes general superintendent.

Sister Glines brings to this work the accumulated experience of years of executive and educational responsibilities, which, added to her natural ability and devoted consecration to the church and its commissions, makes her preeminently qualified to direct the work and study of the sisters. Her vision of the efforts that must be put forth before we shall all reach the high planes God wishes us to occupy, includes a clear realization of many of the steps whereby that desired place may be reached, and it only remains for each and every one of us to support her loyally in every possible way.

There is every reason to believe that a much more rapid progress than heretofore is about to be made by all divisions of the church. A close and sympathetic understanding is being built up between the leading officers of the several departments and the priesthood in charge of the whole, which promises close coordination and cooperation in the execution of common purposes. Joint work at the coming reunions, in which field workers will represent the Sunday school, Religio, and Women's Department, will be but a step in this direction, and we trust the effort will receive the most enthusiastic and whole-hearted support of all district and reunion officers and members.

Personally we rejoice in the progress that is being made, even while we regret that it was necessary for us to ask release from the duties of an executive officer in this department. Our residence at some distance from the "center in Kansas City, some of which are manufacturing and wholesale concerns while others operate only a sales office. This is an excellent indication of Kansas City's possibilities as a manufacturing and distributing center. Many excellent factory sites are available in various sections of the city, either with or without trackage, and at reasonable rates. It has a well-organized Chamber of Commerce with a membership of six thousand representative business men. Its industrial department is well organized and prepared to furnish trustworthy information on the industrial situation.

Kansas City has in the Kansas City Railways Company a system of city transportation considered the very best in the United States. Their lines extend through every part of the city, with universal transfer privileges. Each suburb of the city is therefore reached on a single fare. For instance, you can ride from Maywood, in the east part of the stake, to the end of the Argentine Line in the extreme west part of the stake, a distance of eighteen miles, for the minimum fare.

Those who desire to locate near the industrial centers where church privileges are offered would do well to consider that on the Missouri side the large industries along the Blue River are nearest the Bennington Church and those on the Kansas side along the Kaw River which includes the elevators, mills, railroad shops and yards, soap plants, packing houses, and stock yards are nearest the Argentine, Armourdale, Armstrong, and Grandview Churches. The localities in which the other churches are located are residential districts, with the exceptions of Central Church, which is strictly a down-town church.

place," with attendant over-heavy burden of correspondence, made it inadvisable for us to hinder the rapidly developing work of our department by longer retaining a position so handicapped.

We bespeak for Sister Glines a continuation of the same splendid and appreciative cooperation which we have sensed at every step of our two years of service on the executive committee. The kindly letters of encouragement which have found their way to our desk have been one great source of strength, and we feel sure the fine sisterhood of our church will accord to our successor the same meed of appreciation and support.

It will be our pleasure for a time, however, to continue to meet our readers in this column, and we hope the quality of our contact here will but be improved by the lightening of responsibilities in other directions. We would that our sisters would feel this department of our church paper more entirely their own, and contribute liberally of their best thought and inspiration for the benefit of others who scan the printed word herein. Many pearls of thought may here be exchanged, and who can measure the good they may accomplish in this day when so much of adverse and unkindly thought is projected upon the world?

Shall we not be "valiant in testimony"?

Mothers' Day

In 1907 Miss Anna Jarvis mailed a note to a friend inviting her to spend the second Sunday in May at her home to commemorate the date of her mother's death. It was then she disclosed to her friend her desire to see a day dedicated to all mothers.

Miss Jarvis worked incessantly from then on, towards the attainment of her ideal—the setting aside of a special day on the calendar when all mothers—including hard-working women, unlovely, bowed in form, and uninspiring to artists—might be revered.

The next year found the movement prospering, and was an extremely busy time for little Miss Jarvis. No one can realize just how busy she was. When the great day arrived, she was too ill to carry out all of her plans for its celebration. To those who knew nothing of the strenuous efforts she had put forth, it was amazing that so wide publicity had been given to her idea. Had she so desired, she could have told of thousands of letters written to men prominent in public life, clergymen, influential leaders of the business world, and others whose interest in the matter she was desirous of gaining. She could have told of her experiences when she visited reform schools, asylums, and other institutions, and could have told of personal pleas to senators, judges, and professors, and of immense sums from her own private income expended in advancing her project.

In all her vigorous campaigning for the establishment of such a memorial day, however, not a penny did she ask of anyone. Cooperation, approval, and a sympathetic reception for her plans were the only contributions she asked. She met all kinds of unforeseen hindrances and obstacles, but through it all she was hopeful, and very proud and happy when she finally succeeded in getting her project before the United States Senate. We, of Nebraska, are proud to know that it was our Senator Elmer J. Burkett who presented the resolution.

At first he was met with jeers and sarcasm, his voice becoming drowned in an ocean of laughter; but the good man continued to talk until his earnestness compelled serious attention. Although it was slated for a later date, the words of the kindly senator had their effect, and when the vote was cast, the little woman of the East realized her dream had come true!

Now the celebration of Mothers' Day has become international. In England, where Miss Jarvis went herself, she was able to make such an impression that our English friends were easily persuaded to join America in dedicating the second Sunday in May to mothers. Also in the German Empire and Switzerland, as elsewhere, Miss Jarvis and her message were kindly received. A part of her program is to visit prisons, where wardens and matrons are always glad to welcome her for the cheer and kindness she bestows.

The white carnation is the badge of devotion that has been chosen to be worn on Mothers' Day, as it is emblematic of the mother's attributes. Its whiteness stands for purity, its form for beauty, its fragrance for love, its wide field of growth for charity, and its lasting qualities for faithfulness—every one of them virtues of a true mother.

All motherhood is honored in that the Son of God chose to be born of woman. Mothers themselves should feel the sanctity of their mission, and attempt to wear their crowns in all worthiness.

Strangely, mothers themselves have had but a small part to play on Mothers' Day. It is a "pedestal" day for mother, when her children bring, if not garlands, then potted plants and hot-house flowers and spring blossoms! But isn't there something for mothers to do on Mothers' Day? May it not mean to mothers something quite as lovely as it means to their children? Why not make it "examination day" in home government? Of all the brands of democracy for which the world is to be "made safe," the home is likely to have the smallest share. There is a saying, "God could not be everywhere, so he made mothers." Here is a little story written for children, but it fits in here.

Once upon a time an angel came to earth to spend a day roaming about in the cities and gardens.

Entering a garden he spied a beautiful rose, and he said, "Surely that is the most beautiful thing in all the world! I will take that!"

Then beyond the rose, he saw a baby's smile, and said, "That is the most beautiful—I will take that!"

But beyond the rose and the smile, he saw a mother's love, spread out like a great blossom of heartsease above all the sorrow and pain and weakness of the world! He said, "That is even more beautiful! I will take that, too!"

Returning to heaven, he stopped just outside his home to inspect his treasures. He found that the flower had withered, the smile had faded away, but the mother's love was as fresh and as fragrant as when he had plucked it on earth!

And as the gates of heaven opened to receive him, he marched down the golden streets, holding aloft his precious prize, and, as the angels, big and little, trooped after him, he shouted, "Behold, this is the one thing I found in all the world that will last all the way from earth to heaven—a mother's love!"

The King Is Dead! Long Live the King!

As we cast about in our minds for a caption to this little article in which we wish to call your attention to a new course of study, the above words came into our minds as illustrative of the ever-moving currents of our interests. We confront change and a new order of things at every turn of the road. The past is quickly put behind us, and we face the future with confidence and hope.

Our psychology lessons are but over, and we turn with delight to the new series, the introduction to which appears in this issue. Sister Young has put her whole heart into the work of outlining this most splendid text on civics, and the results, as offered to our students in pamphlet form as well as through these columns, cannot but engage the interest and attention of all those who desire to be, in fact as well as name, good citizens of this good Republic.

We feel sure it will be a joy to journey with Mr. Ashley and his capable interpreter, through the chapters of this book, obtaining a general view of all social relations and a more specific one of those in which we are most nearly concerned. With the vote in her hands, the power to add her quota of conviction and influence to the community total, and the great desire that that vote and power shall be used for the highest and most ideal progress of humanity, woman will be content with no less than an intelligent conception of all questions and principles involved. She may have been called perverse; truth is, she has a mind of her own, and is not willing to be harnessed and her power directed only in channels of another's choosing. She is determined to think for herself, to express herself, and to wield the power that is her own in her own way. Can we blame her?

We heard a man of considerable political influence say that he believed that the woman vote of this country represented a more thoughtful survey of conditions, causes, effects, than that of the men, for the reason that the vote, newly coming to women, did not find them bound by traditional viewpoints. They were attacking their problems with fresh and unbiased minds, and, not having inherited their convictions, were studying assiduously to discover their own.

Many conditions which we decry to-day should be changed—must be changed before "righteousness shall cover the earth as the water covereth the deep." Indifference to the means by which these desired ends may be reached is reprehensible in those who have pledged themselves to this latter-day effort to establish that righteousness. None of us can afford to sleep upon our rights, our civic rights—least of all mothers and women, who suffer most because of the evils that are in the world to-day. Whichever way we look, it is the "woman who pays"—in shame, broken health, grief over children gone wrong, or helpless indignation over the palpable injustice of many present-day laws and customs. It is time we investigated many of these things—time we trained the battery of woman brain power upon vexing problems, and the armed force of feminine votes to more just and holy solutions.

To make our influence thus felt, and to be able to exercise it wisely, let us enter with enthusiasm into the work of preparation for service. Let us study our Government, its laws, usages, needs, machinery, administration, and institutions. Let us know the whys and the hows. Let us learn the what-to-do and the when-to-do! And having thus orientated ourselves, let us move fearlessly in the direction which our faith and reason indicate is the right one, asking divine help in choice, and leaving in God's hands the harvest. He is interested in this Nation—even more than we can be, and we may be sure his will will be accomplished. Our concern should be to be found on his side in its accomplishment. A. A.

A Study of Civics

Introduction

In The New Civics Mr. Ashley has a happy way of leading us to see our duty towards the group as well as the duty of the group towards us. Long before we have finished reading its almost four hundred pages we have discovered that the author's standard of civic life is expressed in the thought that "Citizenship is a bargain between each citizen and all citizens; and the fate of a nation depends upon the manner in which the bargain is kept."

The lesson outlines, included in this pamphlet, are merely intended as timesavers to the busy home-keeper who chooses to become either a leader, or a member of a class in citizenship. They follow the text closely in order that the discussion of each point may be found in the assigned lesson. Where classes have access to a public library it might be well to enlarge upon the outline in order to give opportunity for full discussion.

In the text, each chapter is followed with a set of constructive questions and a very helpful list of books and magazine articles bearing upon the topic. The "Suggestions for Reading and Discussion" in the pamphlet refer to material commonly found in our homes. The number of references to articles in the periodicals and books of the church, indicates that the church, too, is interested in social welfare.

It may not be possible or advisable for every class to make an intensive study of each consecutive chapter. In such cases it might be well to select for the winter's study the chapters best calculated to interest the majority of the class. The remaining chapters would furnish excellent home reading. Sometimes it is well to choose chapters best suited to the current topics of the times. For instance, if a city election is approaching, study "City government" in chapter X. If the Nation is preparing for its Congressional primaries and elections, concentrate the study upon chapters VI and VII. When the public schools have aroused enthusiasm concerning "health week," let the class seize the psychological moment for the discussion of "Public health and welfare," in chapter XIV.

This method will materially help tie the study of citizenship to life. It will drop its abstract and meaningless form, becoming vitalized by its relation to the activities of our national and community life.

Dining Room

"Why does it matter where we eat, if our food be nutritious and wholesome?" Is there anyone who would put this question to us in all seriousness? If any, they are few who do not choose agreeable surroundings while they partake of food. We are told that one can digest his food much more readily in a place where his mind and muscles can relax and where he feels the joy of comfort and beauty. Though it is usually crowding the room too much to attempt it, yet many times we find country homes in which the kitchen is used for a dining room as well as a kitchen. If this must be done let the good housewife attempt to arrange it so that the table sits as far as possible from the stove and sink, and where there is a view of a pleasant lawn, a garden, or something to counteract as far as can be the disagreeable points in the other surroundings. But in summer, one should get out of the kitchen, at least for the noon meals, when the heat is most intense. The cheer of a cooler room, a table with some flowers to refresh us, and with a change of view for even that short time, would repay most of us for the trouble of preparing another room.

The furniture of the dining room should be in harmony with the other things in the room. The simpler styles are best and more easily kept looking well.

The appearance of a table has a great influence upon our appetite. If one doesn't believe this, think of some of the small restaurants and hotels, with their soiled linen, heavy china and plated silverware(?) which makes one fear to use it in acid foods, for fear of the strong metallic taste! Compare with this a neat dining room, with white linen, dainty china, and silver shining. These need not be expensive dishes or silver, but may be tastily decorated, or plain white china, and silver that is properly prepared for use. Even plated ware, if properly cared for, is not disagreeable. Eggs are one of the most injurious foods in their effect on the appearance of silver, but this can be avoided if the silver is put immediately into cold water, after the meal, and within a few minutes they can be easily washed. If this is done, it will save many hours of difficulty in a lifetime.

The walls of any room are better tinted than papered, but if one uses paper let it be plain or simply figured. If plain, a favorite border for dining rooms seems to be fruit or leafy designs. The common finish for woodwork is varnish, which leaves the beautiful grain of the wood exposed—one of the most delicate and wonderful designs in nature—resembling that dainty tracery of the frost upon our windows on a winter day. The floors, like those of the kitchen, are best varnished, or if it is a soft wood floor, paint may be used. The ideal dining room floor, however, is varnished or waxed, with rugs to break the spaces.

There should be light enough, both natural and artificial, to make the room cheery day or night. The artificial lights should be centrally located and high enough not to interfere with the view.

Pictures should be hung where the light falls upon them, so they may be seen plainly enough to be appreciated. If the floor is varnished, one may use either small rugs or a large one. The use of small rugs, especially in summer, gives a cooler appearance to the room and makes it much more easily cleaned. The color should be in harmony with the wall decoration—not the same shade, but one which forms an agree-

HEALTH DEPARTMENT

Edited by G. Leonard Harrington, M. D., Church Physician

Can Decay of Teeth Be Avoided?

(Third of four articles.)

How shall this question be answered? If one considers the number of people suffering from this disease, and the number of dentists there are to treat it, it would almost seem unavoidable. Yet it is avoidable. This is a strange paradox, unavoidable yet avoidable. Teeth were not made to decay, but to do their work, free from disease, the same as other organs of the body.

Humanity has been and is afflicted with any number of diseases, yellow fever, diphtheria, typhoid, malaria, tuberculosis, cancer, smallpox, and many others. None of these are so common as tooth decay. In some localities ninety-five per cent of the school children are suffering from this disease. If all the people suddenly decided to have their teeth put in healthy condition, there are only enough dentists to care for thirty per cent of them.

Through the discoveries of great scientists and the organization of our health departments, a good many diseases have been rendered preventable. Some still seem unavoidable; among these is tooth decay.

It has been demonstrated that this disease rests largely with the individual. One's habits, diet, and mode of life are the principal factors involved. As civilization has advanced, so has tooth decay. If it cannot be prevented entirely, it can be greatly lessened. It is known that the mosquito bite will cause yellow and malarial fevers, that drinking impure water and unsanitary conditions will cause typhoid, that direct contact and lack of fresh air and neglect of colds will cause able combination. The draperies should not be so heavy as to exclude the light, and the color scheme should be carried out in these, as well as in the rug.

A fern or growing plant is pleasing in the dining room, and adds much to the artistic atmosphere of any room. If flowers are used for table decoration they should be short-stemmed, so that the view across the table is not obstructed. There is a cheeriness and delicacy about flowers, which is much to be desired in its influence upon those surrounding the dining table.

The custom prevailed in years past of leaving on the table, the linen as well as the articles most commonly used, and after replacing the dishes, the table was covered with a cheesecloth, or other thin cover, to prevent the contact with dust, and the dining table was thus ready for the next meal. This saves much time for busy housewives and in some cases is to be recommended, but the connection of the dining room with other rooms, the use made of it, and such other things as might prevail, should influence one in using this method. Often one may see articles laid upon a dining table, such as combs, hats, and other objectionable articles, which makes it inadvisable to have the linen from which we eat, left on the table.

China is best kept in a closed cupboard and care should be taken to dust dishes before using—especially if they are not in everyday demand. Unpolished silver and cut glass are displeasing to the sight and disagreeable to use. The final appearance of the dining room should be harmonious and orderly.

tuberculosis, that contact with many contagious diseases will produce them. Through the elimination or modification of the causes, many of these diseases are becoming unnecessary. In one of the large cities of Canada through the work of the health department in the last ten years, two thousand fewer people per annum die than if the former rate had been maintained. It has been said that one third of all poverty was caused through sickness, that the vast majority of chattel mortgages are the result of sickness, that sickness is the deciding factor between contentment or worry over the family finances.

The object of this article is to get the people interested in the lessening of tooth decay, and hence the elimination of the far-reaching troubles and expense that arise therefrom. Many people of middle age say, "How I regret that I neglected my teeth when young!" At middle age one appreciates the necessity, the comfort, and the health value of sound and efficient teeth.

In the previous articles the prenatal influence and the care of children's teeth have been pointed out. The rules laid down are simple and easy to follow. In the two following articles the influence of mastication and mouth cleanliness on the teeth and the influence of diseased teeth on the general health will be considered.

Our hope for the prevention of tooth decay is in the children and the coming generations. At present the idea should be, that when children leave school, they will not only be mentally fit for the battle of life but physically as well, with sound and healthy teeth.

The Influence of Mastication on Mouth Health

The only part of your digestive tract that is under voluntary control—control by the will—is the mouth, comprising the lips, cheeks, tongue, teeth, and palate.

We can exercise these parts, on the one hand vigorously, or on the other hand indifferently, just as we please.

The infant, nursing, uses these parts with the exception of the teeth, which he substitutes with his gums, and he has to work vigorously for the food he obtains.

This muscular activity produces the necessary flow of saliva to complete mouth digestion, so that the succeeding stages may not be hampered by a faulty beginning. Whether the child be breast fed, or bottle fed, he should have to work with his mouth to obtain the food. Spoon feeding is not desirable, as this very important muscular effort is largely abandoned and the flow of digestive juices diminished.

The appearance of the teeth usually indicates that the child should be given some solid foods, and in order to continue the habit of mouth activity and vigor, some of that food should be of a consistency that will make mastication necessary. Soft pappy foods tend to induce bolting. This may be overcome by having a goodly part of the meal consist of the articles of food such as will require vigorous mastication and also by instruction to chew the soft foods.

The child who has been induced from its earliest days to exercise mouth vigor will be less liable to have underdeveloped jaws, irregular teeth, narrow nasal passages, enlarged adenoids and tonsils, providing always that the food was balanced as to the child's needs.

The important considerations in arranging a dietary have been outlined in one of the previous articles of this series, and while a proper dietary is an essential, its beneficence can be not only greatly lessened, but made positively harmful and productive of serious ailments by failure to observe thorough mastication.

The habit of mastication then not only makes the food more digestible for the stomach, etc., but actually has a retarding

Additional Program for Reunions

The nature of the themes used in the separate prayer services of the children and young people, the specific stories or biographies or topics used during the class hour or as subject matter for the sermonets for the children and young people will depend upon the following factors:

First, the religious capacities and needs of the people whom we are trying to serve. It is because the capacities and needs of people vary as they grow that it is being urged that the services should be divided according to the age of the attendants.

Second, the specific opportunities or situations which the reunion environment creates will serve to denote the specific problems the attendants of the reunion will meet.

Third, the length of time which we have to present the instructional, expressional, and recreational activity we wish to have observed.

These factors will vary in the different reunions. Nothing but general statements can be made here. Local workers would, in any event, have to adapt these suggestions according to their needs and capacities. Our stories, prayer service, and sermonets, expressional activity, and recreational activity must be intensified and full of spice.

Aside from the regular study hour already provided for (see communication in SAINTS' HERALD, April 15, 1922,) we propose to divide the entire congregation into three main divisions.

I. ELEMENTARY GROUP.

This group will consist of all children under twelve years of age.

II. YOUNG PEOPLE'S GROUP.

This group will comprise all those between the ages of twelve and twenty-four.

III. ADULT GROUP.

This group will include all those over twenty-four years of age.

These three main divisions may be subdivided as conditions warrant, the matter of further subdivision to be left to those in charge.

We advocate for each of these groups:

1. Graded instruction.
2. Graded programs of worship.
3. Graded expressional and recreational activities.

I. For the Elementary Group we offer the following:

1. Graded Instruction:

The Bible in Graded Story, Book I, The Good Shepherd, price $0.80; Book II, The Good Neighbor, price $1.10, by Baker and Baker.

If the grade is subdivided, other volumes of this same set may be secured.

effect on overeating from which so many of us suffer to-day.

With proper food and exercise this habit of mastication will in a great measure prevent the contraction of pyorrhea, or as it is called to-day periclasia, as well as ulcers of the tongue and cheeks. It will help to keep clean, not only the teeth, but the soft tissues of the mouth, and will prevent the formation of that thick, ropy, sticky saliva. Just try thorough mastication of your food for one week and judge the results for yourself. Try it also with the little ones and note the change.

2. Program of Worship:

- (a) Junior prayer meetings.
- (b) Sermonets. Under this head we recommend, Story Sermons for Children, by Howard J. Childley, price $1.35; or Margaret T. Applegarth's Missionary Stories for Little Folks. First Series for Primary, Second Series for Junior. Price $1.75 each. The expression of personal virtues, such as obedience, reverence, kindness, helpfulness to man and animals, cleanliness, etc., may be encouraged. The child's concept of God may be bettered. You may lead him to see God's kindness and care, to see God in nature around him.
- (c) Junior song service.
These should be held at the same time that the other grades are thus engaged.

3. Expressional and Recreational Activities.

- (a) Simple dramatization of Bible stories.
- (b) Playlets Miss Fresh Air, Visiting Nurse,* Mimic Mothers.*
- (c) Handwork, such as weaving, clay modeling, muslin blocks, paper cutting, paper folding, paper chains, sewing cards.*
- (d) Games. (See Orioles' Manual and Religio Manual.) Pictures could be used to illustrate your subject matter. These could be used especially in the lower ages. Any of the Wilde Bible pictures from the Wilde Company, 120 Boylston Street, Boston, or a roll of primary pictures, about two feet by four feet, used by the Standard Publishing Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, entitled, The Graded Primary Picture Roll ($1 a quarter), could be used. A good help in the way of interpreting nature for children in terms of God would be a book by Cobb, entitled, God's Wonder Land. For the interpretation of religious art to young folks a book by Frederica Beard, Pictures in Religious Education, Price $1.75, could be mentioned.

Along the line of dramatization we would mention a book by Elizabeth E. Miller, The Dramatization of Bible Stories, price $1.25, or a book by Benton, Shorter Bible Plays, $1.25.

II. Young People's Group.

1. Graded Instruction:

- (a) How Jesus Met Life's Problems, by Harrison A. Elliott, price $0.90, will be found exceptionally suitable for this course.
- (b) The Religio Quarterly Course for Zion Builders may also be used. For advanced young people we recommend:
 - (1) Christianizing Community Life, by Ward Edwards, price $1.15.
 - (2) Marks of a World Christian, by Daniel F. Fleming, price $1.15.
 - (3) The Meaning of Service, by Harry E. Fosdick, price $1.25.
 - (4) The Church and the People's Play, by Henry A. Atkinson, price $1.35.
 - (5) The Problem of Youth in Social Life, by Presbyterian Board of Publication.

2. Program of Worship.

- (a) Sunrise prayer meetings.
- (b) Vesper devotional exercises.

(c) Experience meetings.

This group would perhaps be interested in instruction involving the carrying over of their personal virtues into social expression, or Zionic ideals of the church, choosing vocations with the religious aspect, the right choice of recreation; loyalty to the group; to the church; proper qualities of leadership; biology interpreted in terms of God; a study of religious art or architecture; stories of great hymns; a rapid survey of the people of any one book in the Bible or Book of Mormon. The reunion environment offers a good opportunity to philosophize upon recreation, its justification, and place in the young person's life.

(d) Separate preaching services.

(e) Lectures adapted to young people.

3. Expressional and Recreational Activities:

(a) Dramatization of the following playlets:

1. "Every girl's quest for happiness." *
2. "The friendly road." *
3. "The house beautiful." *

(b) Basketry.*

(c) First aid in hygiene.

(d) Games: Baseball, tennis, croquet, quoits, hikes, swimming, story-telling.

(e) Wiener and marshmallow roasts, watermelon parties.

III. Adult Group.

1. Graded Instruction:

- (a) See instructional course in SAINTS' HERALD, April 15, 1922.
- (b) Six lessons in household management.*
- (c) Six points for men in regard to sex. By Doctor G. Leonard Harrington.*
- (d) Short course in social purity, by Mrs. Grace Krahl. Adapted from The Community and Its Youth, by Doctor T. W. Galloway; Problems and Principles of Sex Education, by Doctor M. J. Exner, price $0.20; Christianity and Amusements, by Richard Henry Edwards, price $1.25.

2. Program of Worship:

- (a) This should comprehend a well-defined arrangement for preaching, prayer meeting, song services, and special lectures.
- (b) Reminiscences. An hour may be profitably and pleasantly spent by recalling past experiences.

3. Expressional Activities.

- (a) Dramatization.
 1. "A friendly visitor." *
 2. "Cradle Roll." *
- (b) Beautifying the grounds and maintaining sanitation.
- (c) Assisting in preparation of meals.
- (d) Inspection tours.
- (e) Games: Baseball, basket ball, volley ball, tennis, quoits.

Books and pamphlets referred to above may be secured from the Herald Publishing House. Those marked (*) may be secured by writing direct to the Women's Department, Box 255, Independence, Missouri.

One evening of the reunion may be set apart for an entertainment. We suggest the following program:

I. Gloria Patri.

II. Invocation.

III. Orchestral or instrumental.

IV. Reading:

1. "The dream of Pilate's wife," Edwin Markham.
2. "The story of the other wise man," Henry Van Dyke.
3. "The mansion," Henry Van Dyke.

(These are suggested readings which are applicable to the theme of the evening. The last two may be abbreviated if considered too long.)

V. Special music arranged by district chorister.

VI. Lecture, "How Jesus met life's problems."

(This lecture should be based on the book bearing this title. The one chosen to give the lecture should have ample time for preparation.)

VII. Pageant, "One hundred years of Latter Day Saintism."

(This will be found in Autumn Leaves, May, 1921. If this pageant has been given, other selections may be made.)

VIII. Song by congregation. Number 137, Zion's Praises.

IX. Benediction.

$500 Tithing From a Nonmember

A certain man who prefers to be nameless in the reports of the Bishop and who encounters considerable prejudice in his own community because of his interest in our work, recently sent a check to the Presiding Bishop for five hundred dollars as tithing.

He has for some time been contributing liberally to the work of the church, though not in such large sums as this. He is much interested in our organization, and the work we are doing, and our ideals.

It is encouraging to have such support from a nonmember, and causes us to wonder if the same degree of loyalty is manifested by all our own members.

Seven Baptisms at Humber Bay

We have just closed a very successful series of services, lasting about two months, in charge of Elder Joseph H. Yager, missionary, the attendance averaging about seventy.

Seven persons have already been baptized, with a number of others interested, and we look for a further ingathering in the near future. The Saints have also been strengthened, and much prejudice removed from the minds of the people in our locality.

Elder Yager has also been instrumental in arousing quite an interest among the young of our branch, having assisted in organizing a ball team for the boys, and purchasing a tennis outfit for the girls. We look for some real enjoyable times for the young folks, as well as the older ones, this summer, and Brother Ernest Rowett, our branch president, as well as Brother Edgar Smith, our Religio superintendent, seem to be anxious to get going and show some good results in this regard, which we feel certain will result in good to all, by drawing our people closer together and enjoying some real good times in the way of recreation.

Good Friday in Detroit, Michigan

During the Lenten season the council of churches here, fourteen in number, have a committee of one hundred in which to arrange for special services throughout Lent. One of the large theaters here was engaged, and Doctor J. McNeil, of the Presbyterian Church of New York, was engaged to give noon hour services. The interest seemed to grow with the days, for this man is one of wonderful ability.

After two weeks with Doctor McNeil, the Reverend Doctor Rice, of this city, continued. The talks were twenty to thirty minutes in length, and had to do with questions of present moment.

Good Friday drew near, a meeting was announced to be held from one to three o'clock in the Capitol Theater, capable of holding five thousand people. The mayor of this great city of 1,200,000 issued a proclamation that all stores close for three hours. The effect was wonderful. Business of all kinds stopped. Large department stores were emptied of their thousands; stock exchanges were quiet, and one felt as though a miracle was being performed. To sixteen places that had been provided rushed the down-town multitude to hear of the sufferings and death of our Lord. This great busy city, in its mad rush, stopped to think and listen.

I was in attendance at the Capitol Theater. Five thousand entered in less than twenty minutes and an overflow meeting was provided for in the Madison Theater just across the street. It soon was packed. Radio was brought into action and the result sent broadcast. The crowd was an inspiration. The song service was a revelation and the story of the cross was very feelingly told. Thus ended three hours of as great a service as has been my privilege to attend, and my silent prayer was that it might be but a preparation when power would be given God's servants to present more so than now the glory of the angel message, and his near approach.

I have been laboring here since the 6th of March. Brother Matthew Liston has been looking after the singing and doing some of the preaching. Under the present money conditions it was thought best not to do any advertising, but just have a revival among ourselves. So we arranged for two weeks at the First Church, but at the end of that time the interest was so good we were invited to stay another week. When our three weeks were up, we went to the East Side. The Saints there have a nice little church in a splendid location, and they are well looked after by Elder Blakeslee Smith, grandson of Bishop George A. Blakeslee. The Saints all love him for his earnest devotion to service.

The Sunday school has an enrollment of one hundred ten, and its superintendent, Brother Lenton, is a live wire.

The interests of the Religio are cared for by Bert Cooper. He seems always alert to the care of the young people, and is of the strictly English type. With this combination of splendid young men, I believe the East Side Branch has a wonderful future.

Easter Sunday was the closing day of our services and was a splendid climax. The First Church Sunday school had provided a program taking up the entire morning. At this session we were permitted to baptize two. Three babies were blessed, and altogether it was a splendid service, showing the strength coming to the church through the work of the Sunday school.

The East Side Sunday school also had a program and candidates for baptism. So that the numbers there could witness the baptism, we arranged to meet at 3.30 o'clock, and again we entered the water, baptizing three more. One of the brethren baptized in the afternoon was a Filipino. He, with his wife, an American, was attracted and became interested in the church through the work of the Religio. They were in attendance at our preaching services, and all rejoice to see them become one with us. They sing and play very nicely the Hawaiian music. He and others of his countrymen have given the Religio some splendid evening entertainments. May more of his brethren of the flesh see the glories of the angel message.

Thus closed six weeks of splendid interest, with five baptisms and others near the kingdom.

Faithfully,

WILLIAM I. FLIGG.

Utah Reaction

A missionary laboring in a field where there is a large population of Utah Mormons reports that recently he distributed seven different kinds of tracts printed by the Reorganization. He makes this comment on the reaction of the Utah people:

"Out of seven different kinds of tracts distributed here, they have so far chosen the tract, The Bible Versus Polygamy, as the one to try to reply to. So they must be six times more concerned about polygamy than the other issues between us."

Lamoni Stake

Lamoni people were given a musical treat on both evenings of April 16 and 17. In art and beauty it is believed that these numbers have not been surpassed by anything that has been brought to the community; and there is the added satisfaction that they were produced by our own people.

Cantata: "Olivet to Calvary," by Maunder

The chorus work was done by the Lamoni choir under the able direction of Miss Mabel Carlile; Miss Florence Thompson, organist; and Miss Belle Patterson, pianist. Mr. George Anway, now of Independence, but for a number of years prominent in Lamoni musical services, was the tenor soloist; Mr. James R. Houghton, baritone; Miss Lena Wells, soprano. The introductory address was by C. E. Wight.

Every seat was filled Sunday night at the Brick Church, and the soloists seemed inspired to do their best before the attentive audience. So clear and beautiful were the solos, so well modulated and yet powerful the choruses, that it all seemed to bring again not only the message but also the spirit of the great sacrifice of the Master. Though the cantata is a long one, the time seemed to have passed as if it had been only a few minutes.

Concert by James R. Houghton

On Monday evening in the Brick Church a large audience listened to a concert of songs and selections from grand opera. It was given by Brother James R. Houghton, a graduate of Graceland in the class of 1921. All of the selections were in English but one, which was in Italian; and all were especially well chosen and suited to the occasion, receiving generous applause. Brother Houghton has been at Iowa City since his graduation from Graceland, specializing in voice in the department of music. His development since leaving here has been remarkable, and his recognition at the university undisputed as a success. The university is now sending him to different parts of the State to give such concerts as he gave the Lamoni audience.

Holden Stake

MARSHALL. The services Easter were begun by a lively Sunday school session. The eleven o'clock hour was occupied by Elder Levi Phelps with a sermon on the atonement. An excellent program was given in the evening to an audience of 125. The feature of the program was an Easter tableau, of which some pictures will be made.

SEDALIA. April 2 was a profitable day in all the services. The Spirit was present in admonition at the sacrament service. Sister Lila Mount, who graduated from the business college here, has a position with the Kansas City Journal. She and her mother will make their home in Independence.

BATES CITY. We appreciated a visit and two splendid sermons by Brother F. A. Smith recently. Provision having been made at the Holden conference, Mark Ford was ordained priest, and James Ford and Wesley Ballenger deacon, by Brethren Smith and Bailey.

KNOBNOSTER. A splendid young lady was baptized April 2, and others are expected soon. The priesthood have formulated a program of local and missionary activities with special provision for appointments at schoolhouses in the country. A tract fund has been provided for and a systematic distribution of tracts arranged for.

Brooklyn, New York

We enjoyed a few days of pleasantness and two good sermons from our district missionary, Brother A. M. Chase, some Sundays ago.

Our little church presents a very neat appearance, both inside and out, now that the painting and decorating have been completed.

Brother Clark, of Ringling Brothers' Circus, is with us again this season. He is quite well known to the Saints throughout the States, as he loves their association and always seeks the place of worship.

Brother Mesle, of Sherrill, New York, preached two very interesting sermons for us recently. Brother Mesle comes to the city about once a year and we always make good use of him. Willing cooperation is a pleasure to all of us.

The men of the priesthood are making visits to branch members. Attendance is much improved at all services. A full house last sacramental Sunday. Prayers and testimonies were given without hesitancy and were of a high order.

We saw once again, only recently, the healing power of God through administration, when hands were laid upon the head of Sister Valentine's boy, a youth of fourteen, who was suffering greatly from an abscess in the ear. No operation was needed and the boy is now in his usual health.

The Women's Department is starting on another year's work with some new officers while others were continued. A. Beardsley is leader.

We are reminded that this department is a part of the Lord's work and a very important one.

Brother and Sister Milligan, of Philadelphia, occupied the pulpit both morning and evening, March 12. Sister Milligan, district organizer of the Women's Department, talked to us in the morning on the "Home," more particularly about the relation of food to the home. Brother Milligan preached in the evening from the story of Jonah. It was a very fine discourse; his logic and nicety of connection all the way through appealed to us in a way that will not soon be forgotten.

Brother T. W. Williams delivered two wonderful sermons on February 26, in the church. One who has never had the experience cannot realize what the joy of home-coming must have meant to Brother Williams, as he greeted Miss Statue of Liberty a few days before, after an absence of many months in Europe and Asia. At times loneliness almost overwhelms us, but release is sure to follow, which gives one a keen sense of happiness, a real foretaste of heaven.

CORRESPONDENT.

Burlington, Iowa

We have had the pleasure since last report, of a visit from Brother Daniel T. Williams, as he passed through en route to Taylorville, Illinois, for a series of Zion Builder services. He spoke for us Wednesday evening in his usual forcible and convincing manner. Our only regret was that the visit could not be prolonged.

Also, Brother R. L. Parker, of Des Moines, passed through in connection with his work on the Des Moines Register, and spent a little time with our pastor, Brother D. J. Williams, with whom he had labored some years in the Des Moines District. Brother Parker also spoke for us one evening; a clear, direct appeal to the membership.

The Sunday school rendered an attractive Easter program Sunday, during the morning service hour. The work of the committee was well rewarded by the results, especially in the rendition of the group numbers.

The morning hour of Sunday, the 10th, was given over to special prayer and social service, in accordance with request through the HERALD, and was much enjoyed.

CORRESPONDENT.

Seattle, Washington

Two precious souls have lately entered the fold by baptism.

The morning Easter service was listened to by a splendid audience. The music was excellent and appropriate. The sermon was a presentation of witnesses to the resurrection of Christ, consisting of those on both continents and that of latter-day witnesses.

The district presidency in keeping with power invested in them by the conference have chosen as a reunion committee in connection with the presidency, the names of George Steele, Deck Obrist, Jesse Ward, and Harold Premo, all of Centralia, Washington, and the time of the reunion August 11 to 20. It is hoped to have a splendid reunion.

Brother S. S. Smith is at New Westminster, where he will hold a series of services following their Easter service. Brother Samuel Pope writes hopefully of the work in that place. He has presided there for a number of years.

We hear good reports from our new branch in Vancouver. They are moving ahead in good order under the leadership of a corps of faithful officers.

Our young people gave an impressive program in suitable costume Sunday evening representing scenes at the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ—the lamentations of Peter, the comforting words of John and Andrew and Philip and Cleopas, and the doubting of Thomas. It was well rendered and worthy of special notice, containing as it did a splendid sermon. We have promise of something else of the same nature soon.

Independence

The joint council of Presidency, Twelve, and Bishopric have been continuing in daily session and many committee meetings, laboring diligently to solve the problems of the church apparent to all. While they have made no official announcements as to progress, the statements made by various members of the council in their public utterances lend confidence in the triumph of the cause, in spite of difficulties. There is no evasion of the fact that the financial depression current throughout the world is affecting the church and necessitating rigorous retrenchment in every possible way, but if faith and confidence persist in the hearts of the Saints, we are assured there need be no misgivings.

The theme of the sermon by Apostle R. C. Russell at the Stone Church on the morning of Sunday the 30th was built around the present situation and the spiritual demands being made upon us. His plea was for that steadfast spiritual attitude that would cause us to gravitate en masse to the prayer services as a means of strengthening our resolutions and helping each other. Whether as a result of the appeal or not, the afternoon prayer service was largely attended and characterized by many fervent testimonies as well as devout prayers.

The service in the evening was in honor of Boys' Week, beginning on that date, with a sermon by Apostle T. W. Williams and a special program by the platform-assembled group of boys. Other churches in Zion observed the day in a similar way.

The Stone Church Sunday School (Mount Zion) continues to be largely attended, the average being around 1,300, and the officers constantly worried over the problem of providing places for everybody. The superintendent, A. L. Sanford, has been spending practically all his time during the sessions since the first of the year in the departments, beginning with the junior, which has about twenty classes. He is now working with the beginner department. It may be observed that the successful superintendents throughout the church are proceeding on the ideal that every possible method should be considered and improvement made in the religious education of our children. To this end they by personal observation acquaint themselves with the situation and can therefore proceed more intelligently.

The Religio attendance is large and the programs good. Last Friday evening the boyhood of Lincoln was portrayed in motion picture films, and the vocal numbers which failed to reach us by radio the previous session were given in person. Next Friday evening Doctor M. T. Runnels, of Kansas City, will give a James Whitcomb Riley program.

The Religio, through the athletic organization recently effected, is spending some money preparing baseball and tennis grounds for the young people and others who want to play. Membership tickets at 25 cents a month are issued to all under eighteen who are not employed.

Next Sunday the sacrament service will begin earlier at the Stone Church—as soon after 10.45 as possible, and with some additional changes to be made in the system of serving the emblems, it is hoped to have adequate time for the expressional side of the service. There have been times when all the time of the service was required to serve the large audience with the emblems. Recent changes have cut that in half, and it is expected to reduce this somewhat.

The Saints are making many inquiries about the reunion to be held here July 27 to August 6. Many will spend their vacations on the grounds, not only to their own benefit, but thereby helping many others by their presence.

The radio sermon from the studio of the Central Radio Company, at Kansas City Sunday evening, was by Elder

R. W. Farrell, on "The new day," with musical program by a double mixed quartet, arranged for by Frank Criley, who is in charge of the musical part of these programs. Next Sunday evening Elder T. W. Williams will be the speaker.

Arthur E. McKim and wife, who have been in the South and East have returned. Sister Viola V. Short, librarian of the general church library, is also back at her desk.

The Saints of the community were shocked to learn of the death of Brother Charles Brackenbury, of Lamoni, who had been brought to the Sanitarium only recently suffering severely from diabetes and complications. He passed away the morning of the 29th, at the age of forty-eight, having lived in Lamoni about twenty-five or thirty years and was well known to many throughout the church for his work as photographer. He has many relatives here.

In a recent declamatory contest in the high school, in the finals Miss Fern Peterson, daughter of Elder J. W. Peterson, and her cousin, Miss Pauline Roberts, also a member of the church, were given first and second places.

On the back of the personal card of Bishop B. J. Scott, recently elected city marshal, appears this: "My pledge: Impartial enforcement of the law. Motto: It can be done. Ideal: A cleaner, safer, and more beautiful Independence."

Bishop C. J. Hunt, whose home is here but who is acting as bishop of Holden Stake, has been assigned a traveling commission to visit western Iowa and eastern Nebraska in the financial interests of the church. It is but a temporary appointment and upon his return he will take up his stake duties. Elder I. M. Ross will be in charge of the department in the absence of Bishop Hunt. The Saints of Holden Stake gave a farewell dinner in his honor, with a eulogistic program.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium during the week ending April 29: Mrs. Julia Yuhes, Sugar Creek, Missouri; Mrs. J. M. Pugh, Lees Summit, Missouri; Mrs. Helen Young, Kansas City, Missouri; Mr. W. D. McGuire, Mount Washington, Missouri; Mrs. Genevieve Webber and Baby Webber, Englewood, Missouri; Charles Brackenbury, Lamoni, Iowa; Mrs. Mae Rowlett, Mound City, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Betty Caroline Langdon, Mrs. Myrtle E. High, Mrs. Myrtle Evans, Miss Frances Montgomery, Mrs. Pearl Redford, Mrs. Martha Strodman, Mr. Lee Nickles, Miss Alta Mae Schafer, and Mrs. Anna Major. X-ray patients: L. H. Davis, Mount Washington, Missouri; Agnes Hill, Mount Washington, Missouri; Adaline Burnett, Council Bluffs, Iowa; Mrs. F. A. Millard, Kingsville, Missouri; Mrs. A. J. Yarrington, Lamoni, Iowa; and Pauline Siegfried, Miss A. Bryant, E. H. Berkemeier, A. N. Evans, and Mildred F. Darrow, of Independence.

IOWA CITY, IOWA, April 17, 1922.

Editors Herald: The Iowa City Mission was visited Sunday, April 9, by Elders Amos Berve, of Cedar Rapids, and J. A. Gunsolley, of Lamoni. We met for sacrament service at 2 p. m. Brother Berve conducted same.

At 8 p. m. we met and were given a very pointed discourse by Brother Gunsolley with much food for spiritual encouragement as to the church and individual problems confronting more or less each member of the mission. Following this we took under consideration with Brother Berve the prospective plans for further development of an organization in Iowa City. We propose a definite plan first, and then concerted action.

We wish to urge those who intend to be in Iowa City for the school year 1922-23 to get in touch with L. E. Travis, 17 East Market Street, who is presiding over the Iowa City mission. Respectfully, CHARLES A. BENCE.

JAFFA, PALESTINE, March 11, 1922.

Editors Herald: My brother, Frank C. Clark, of Clark's Tours, Times Building, Broadway, New York, was to start his cruises to the Mediterranean again, so a couple of good friends of mine were coming over and were to remain some months with me. Mr. George was taken ill and he and Mrs. George were ordered off to Florida.

Then it was getting near the time for my brother's ship to come, the S. S. Empress of Scotland. It was his seventeenth cruise. I was detained through business here at Jaffa, so feared I would not be able to go up to Jerusalem in time to see him. Well, with urging and pushing I got through and back home in time.

They were to be in Jerusalem on January 27, but I was told it was too stormy even to land at Haifa. The next day was fair, so I felt sure they had arrived. Well, the tourists had, but he and Mrs. Clark had not. Then they told me he had met with an accident and broken his knee. I cried out to God to help my dear brother with all that responsibility on him. I went back to the house and asked Brother and Sister Passman to pray for him. That evening was prayer meeting, so all offered special prayers for him.

Next day, I went to Haifa and got there quite late but was able to go on board. He knew me, but people had not been allowed to enter, so I only stayed a few moments. Mrs. Clark said he had been unconscious ever since the accident until the day before I got there. That was the day I heard of it and the day we all prayed for him. I will always be grateful to my heavenly Father for hearing and answering us. May he continue to bless, and let it be a means of drawing my brother into the fold.

His right arm was broken and the left leg terribly mashed, so that the doctor had said it was broken in two places, but Mrs. Clark went on shore at Cadiz and found an X-ray machine, which proved the bone was not broken. He could already move the left leg when I saw him.

My only dear son, Albert, was coming in December but could not get his passport until too late. Now he is waiting for my brother's ship to return before he leaves. I ask your prayers that he may be directed whether to come or not. I dread his taking the trip alone. It seems to me the whole family should come if he does.

MARY J. FLOYD.

CHRISTCHURCH, SYDENHAM, NEW ZEALAND.

Editors Herald: I have started business in the above mentioned city, Christchurch, and that is why we are located here. We were sorry to part with the Saints in Dunedin, having been in that city for close on to fifteen years. We were one of the families present at the formation of the Dunedin Branch. Brother and Sister Hall and Brother and Sister Leberz were the other two.

Since then the branch has had its ups and downs and we still kept plodding on, doing our best for the good of the cause. Brother and Sister Leberz went back to Australia over two years ago and that depleted the branch to some extent as the brother held the office of priest and was at the time the presiding priest of the branch. It greatly discouraged us at the time but still we kept on with our meetings.

Brother A. V. Robinson was sent down to us from Auckland on a flying visit (express at that) and when in the midst of holding good meetings and interest he was called up to Temuka, one hundred and thirty miles from Dunedin, to administer to Brother F. Whaler, who had a stroke. I am pleased to say that our united prayers, together with the Lord's appointed way, enabled Brother Whaler to get about again and he is slowly gaining the use of his right hand.

From there, Brother Robinson was summoned home to Auckland just after he had obtained good interest in Temuka. So it looks as though his labors in the south island of New Zealand have been in vain. Though it is strange, yet I read of other places having similar experiences and wonder why.

We are isolated now from church privileges, but we intend to keep ourselves alive to our responsibilities. Our three children are members of the church and for this we are thankful and with God's help will direct them in the paths God desires we should.

I hear that Brother and Sister Leberz have arrived back in Auckland so the branch there will be strengthened again. As Auckland is a port call from America to Australia, the Saints there are able to meet with Saints traveling to and fro. Naturally it makes us in the south desire to pack and migrate farther north.

Christchurch is the city of the Canterbury Plains and unless you take the electric car up the Cashmere Hills, you would not see much of it. These hills are situated on the south side of the city and a person can obtain a grand view of the city and plains, especially on a clear day.

The water supply is very good, for all one has to do is to sink a pipe into the ground a few feet and a beautiful flow rushes out. The street curbs are always full of clear water and the River Avon, winding like a snake through the city, adds another beautiful asset. The banks are kept trimmed down to the water's edge and much boating is enjoyed on the river.

The weather is wonderful and we appreciated it very much, for in Dunedin it is very erratic and one was never sure what the day was going to bring forth.

Your brother in Christ,

J. C. BRADLEY.

EDMONTON, ALBERTA, April 14, 1922.

Editors Herald: Brother J. D. Stead has just left here, having been with us for the past three months holding services on Sundays at the home of Brother Frank Lambert, during his absence from home covering that period.

That the meetings were not better attended by both outsiders and members was their loss, for he certainly did not fail as a true shepherd to feed the flock. If God's servants are held accountable for their teaching to his sheep, I wonder if the responsibility will not be laid at the door of those who are forgetful hearers and not doers of the word.

He preached twice at Onway, April 9. I wish that I could record that it was to a full house, but it was a plain and convincing sermon to the few who wanted him to make the effort. There were some who said if they had known what he was to preach about and that he was different from the regular preachers they would have come, but we are classed as "Mormons" by the religious ones and the balance are "fed up" on religion of any kind. So it takes more than a notice of church services to entice them out.

We will continue to have our Sunday school during the summer, though our ranks are somewhat broken. Brother Lambert will be absent part of the time. Some others of our members who are few at most, will not be in the neighborhood the coming months, but as we were long alone here, we are not used to large numbers and our disposition is still to be loyal, faithful, painstaking servants, whether we are few or many, realizing that our individual responsibilities are ever the same in the eyes of the great Judge who has required as our reasonable service consecrated, unceasing, diligent, and prayerful effort, not in spasmodic fits, but day in and day out ever holding the high ideal and seeking to attain to its lofty requirements.

Yours in sincerity,

A. S. NEWCOMBE.

Died March 3, 1922, at Escatawpa, Mississippi. Leaves eight sons and two daughters, who were all present at the funeral. Her husband and one son have preceded her. This mother lived to see all of her large family grown and members of the church she loved so well. She leaves also nineteen grandchildren. Funeral from the Saints' Church, in charge of Lester Smith. Sermon by Alma Booker. Interment in New Cemetery. Sister Miller has been a subscriber to THE SAINTS' HERALD since 1882. She has enjoyed reading the many good things it contained, and especially the developments of the church. She at one time took Brother Alma Booker, wife, and little son into her home, insisting it was to be their home while they were upon that mission. This was for almost a year and she refused to receive any compensation for the service.

MCDOWELL.—Simon McDowell was born September 11, 1854, at Biloxi, Mississippi. Baptized a good many years ago. He was a good Saint and no man in the church was more prompt in paying tithes than this brother. He esteemed it a pleasure to give his mite to the Lord. Died of black smallpox, December 22, 1921. His immediate family and Alma Booker and wife attended the burial. Sermon from the Saints' church at Mobile, April 9, 1922, in charge of Alma Booker. Sermon by W. L. Booker.

Of four children, the sons, Joseph and Ebenezer, had gone on before, the daughters, Mamie and Jessie Sharp, with four grandchildren and other relatives remaining. Baptized by Columbus Scott in Indiana forty years ago, remaining true to the faith. Services at Lone Rock church, in charge of D. T. Williams; sermon by J. F. Garver. Interment in Lone Rock Cemetery.

BROWNLEE.—Edgar Dalas Brownlee, son of Walter and Anna Eliza Brownlee, was born July 14, 1854, in Wheeling County, West Virginia. Died March 30, 1922, at Hagerman, Idaho. Grew to manhood in Missouri. Married Alma E. Sargent, April 10, 1884. Leaves wife, seven children, one stepson, a sister, and a half brother. Funeral from the Hagerman chapel. William Glauner in charge.

Autumn Leaves for May

The young people's magazine for May begins with an article by Hallie M. Gould on "Forty-four years of darkness," portraying strikingly the noble fight a blind brother in the church is making in trying to live a normal, happy life. It is a very inspirational account.

A very happy combination of text and illustration is found this month in the account by President Frederick M. Smith on "Cloud effects in Palestine," being one of his series of "Lights and shadows of Palestine." Seven of his superb photographs are shown in decorative panels, and though the reduction for the printing process has detracted from the original qualities, the effect is still good.

Another Graceland College contest story appears, being a humorous sketch by Harve Elefson, of Lamoni.

Apostle T. W. Williams concludes his series of three articles about Bournville, near Birmingham, England, where a most successful social experiment has been worked out.

The interesting serial by Grace Baughman Keairnes, entitled "A reasonable service," is concluded in this number. A new serial will be started, so we are informed, about mid-summer of this year—a fine one by Marcella Schenck.

A most valuable lesson in basketry, with two excellent illustrations, both by Lenoir C. Woodstock, appears in The Parthenon.

Sister Vida E. Smith, editor of The Religio Department, bids her readers good-by as editor. No successor is announced.

No superintendent of the Sunday school has attempted what A. Max Carmichael is doing so well in analyzing certain quarterly lessons. Since he is limited as to space, he is devoting his attention in this issue to the intermediate lessons, and teachers in other grades may well apply his principles and methods to their special needs.

The cover design is an appropriate drawing by W. W. Kearney, illustrating a poem on "When spring returns," by his wife, Ermina Perkins Kearney.

The Empty Gun

Trite as the saying is about the "empty" gun being the most deadly—often as the explanation "He didn't know it was loaded," has been given to account for a tragedy—the carelessness continues. Hardly a day passes that some one is not fatally shot with a supposedly empty weapon. The foolishly fatal business goes on as if no warning had ever been uttered.

We once knew of a father who instructed his children never to point any kind of a gun, at anybody. Doubtless the rule seemed rather foolish to the young folks, but he insisted upon its observance, repeatedly reminding them when they forgot, and trying to impress upon them the need of making this a habit. In later years these children acknowledged the value of the rule.

It would be advisable, we believe, for parents and teachers to impose such a rule and, so far as possible, to convince boys and girls that it is much the safest way, (unless in sheer self-defense) never to aim a gun at any person. Such a habit, thoroughly formed, will check the tendency to "play" at shooting somebody with a weapon which has been put away loaded.—Boston Traveler.

As a supplement to The Gospel Standard of March 1, 1922, is issued a song entitled, "All the way he leads me," with words and music by inspiration through Elder J. W. Barkus, patriarch, of the Australian Mission.

Playground Sentiment in Lamoni

Considerable local discussion has been had in Lamoni over the advisability of establishing supervised playgrounds, resulting in an indorsement of the idea by the branch.

The Lamoni Chronicle of recent date contains two columns of information and discussion of the subject, principally quotations from the statements of those who have developed statistics and other facts on the subject, of which the following is typical:

"When Chicago appropriated its first $1,200 for playgrounds, there was widespread opposition and ridicule aroused by such a 'frivolous expenditure of public money.' This was less than twenty years ago. To-day Chicago has millions invested in its wonderful playground system. Is it paying? A study of juvenile delinquency by Allen T. Burns, shows that the presence of recreation centers in Chicago's south side was coincident with a delinquency within a radius of half a mile, amounting to practically 30 per cent. Chicago's voters prefer to invest in playgrounds rather than in reformatories and jails."—From The American City.

A fine concert was given by the Sabbath school at Jonesport, Maine, in the evening on Easter Sunday. The musical part of the program was conducted by branch chorister, Brother Herbert Rogers, and the rest of the program was ably carried out under the direction of Sister Alva Stevens. Both Brother Rogers and Sister Stevens deserve much credit for their faithful work. About five hundred and fifty people witnessed the program, many being unable to get into the church, which was filled to its utmost capacity. The orchestra accompanied all choruses.

THE INDEPENDENCE SANITARIUM

Hundreds of persons have grateful recollections of the part this institution has played in their lives. It should, through the developing interest and support of the Saints, continue to function not only as an institution, but as the center of a thoroughly efficient, widely appreciated Health Department.

The Sanitarium Number

Elder G. Leonard Harrington, Church Physician

All who know Doctor Harrington appreciate his wholesome personality and high ideals. The following letter sent us by a well-known missionary some time ago will throw a little personal light on the general reputation of our brother, for the benefit of those who do not know him intimately. A pleasing tribute is also paid to other Saints who try to live up to their ideals.

While traveling on one of the transcontinental trains in Oregon, I happened to be thrown into company with some people who resided in Kansas City. I soon learned that one of the men was a physician of national fame who at the time was associated with one of the leading medical institutions of that city. After visiting with him for a short time I asked him if he was acquainted with any of the physicians of Independence, Missouri.

To this question he replied that he was. I then mentioned the name of our church physician, Doctor G. Leonard Harrington, and he informed me he knew him very well. He stated he was one of the few men engaged in the medical profession that had a brilliant future before him. That he was not only a man of remarkable talents in his chosen profession, but above all he was a man of sterling integrity, whose word could be depended on under all circumstances.

Without knowing my church association, which he must have guessed, the doctor asked me what we as a church intended to do with Doctor Harrington.

G. LEONARD HARRINGTON, M. D.
Church Physician

I replied that we had made him our church physician and desired that he should be one of the best in his profession. In this he seemed to take pleasure, as he knew Doctor Harrington had a great ambition not only to be a physician, but he wanted to be one of the best, and our church had made no mistake in placing confidence in him.

He not only paid a tribute to the integrity, honesty, and ability of Doctor Harrington, but he also stated that he had found all the Latter Day Saints employed in his institution to be honest, sincere, and conscientious workers, and wished he could have no other kind of help.

He had found that they had been trustworthy and anxious to do their work well. He had found by experience that they could be trusted in every detail to carry out the wishes of their employers.

The conversation drifted to other subjects and I was made glad to know that men of prominence were able to recognize in some of our people that which indicated honesty, integrity, and mental attainments.

EDITORIAL

National Hospital Day

May 12 is Hospital Day this year. It is for this reason that we have several articles printed this week dealing with our own Sanitarium and that a group of commendations from members of the Quorum of Twelve were printed last week. The Sanitarium deserves our support. We all hope to see its usefulness increased and multiplied.

The Sanitarium

At different times and by different persons the Sanitarium at Independence has been criticized, and there are persons who are quite sure that it is not being run as it should. Those who are in charge of the institution and responsible for its activities are quite aware that the work of the Sanitarium is not all that it should be, and that it comes short of being what is suggested for it in the document responsible for its creation; but towards the real Sanitarium of that revelation we hope we are steadily working. Necessity has compelled a hospital for the care of those afflicted with acute diseases, cancer, and other virulent maladies, and in yielding to the demands pressing upon us it may be that the accomplishment of the full ideal has been delayed; but all the modern world has hospitals, and we should have been negligent of our duty, not to supply our own needs to the fullest extent possible under the conditions. It is our purpose to have a hospital where advanced skill is practiced and where the light of scientific medicine illuminates our health problems, our workers always guided and inspired by the benign Spirit of Christ.

The quiet sanitarium, the place of rest and refuge for those weary in mind and body, a place most favorable for the exercise of proper faith in the healing of the sick, which was seen in the vision, has not yet been fully established. Towards its final establishment we must ever strive while we keep the standard of our hospital high. Let this side of our community service have a fuller expression, which can only be had by hearty cooperation and support.

Divine healing is an important part of our church belief. Yet the Health Department of the church holds that it is better to teach the coming generations so that they may remain Divinely Well rather than that they should get sick and be Divinely Healed.

The Sanitarium Established by Revelation

Divine healing has been taught by the church since its inception. In that teaching we antedated modern healing cults, such as Christian Science and the celebrated Emmanuel Movement, by many years.

The promise of healing is pretty well set forth by James, together with the ceremonial procedure: prayer, laying on of hands by the elders, and anointing with oil. He writes: "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil, in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up."—James 5: 14, 15.

The foregoing passage is supported by others too numerous to mention. Jesus himself set the example and commanded his disciples to do likewise:

They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover.—Mark 16: 18.

He sent them out to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the sick.—Luke 9: 2.

These are not isolated passages. There are many others that might be quoted. The disciples actually entered upon this work:

And they cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.—Mark 6: 13.

Very early in the history of the restored church in modern times this work was renewed. The first recorded miracle was performed in April of 1830, only a few weeks after the organization of the church. Newell Knight was relieved of demoniacal possession under the hands of Joseph Smith. (Belief in demoniacal possession and old-time "casting out of devils" has been largely abandoned by modern thought; but so recently as 1921 Doctor Montague Lomax before a conference of churchmen in London announced his belief in the old idea, and stated that he had been consulted by people who were evidently victims of "discarnate entities." His announcements were reported in the Church Times, www.LatterDayTruth.org of London, and later in the Literary Digest, December 3, 1921.)

Ezra Booth, a Methodist minister, visited Joseph Smith at his home in Kirtland in 1831 and described how he there witnessed the instant healing of a member of his party, a Mrs. Johnson who had been crippled by rheumatism. Hayden published an account of this healing in his History of the Western Reserve, pp. 249, 250. (See Church History, vol. 1, p. 90.) This record was made, evidently with considerable wonder, by an opponent of the church, and by an opponent was recorded and published.

Lucy Smith, mother of the Prophet, tells how she suffered a severe fall, striking on her head, resulting finally in complete blindness. After great suffering she was healed, and thus records the incident:

I called upon the elders, and requested them to pray to the Lord, that I might be able to see, so as to be able to read without even wearing spectacles. They did so, and when they took their hands off my head, I read two lines in the Book of Mormon; and though I am now seventy years old, I have never worn glasses since.—Joseph Smith and his Progenitors, pp. 208, 209.

Faith in divine healing has not departed from the church. Indeed, there is no evidence that it has diminished or that wonderful incidents of healing are more infrequent than formerly. Within the past week, a very well-known member of the church in Independence, Bishop Ellis Short, came near death's door from strangulated hernia. A skilled surgeon, experienced from treating many such cases, made an examination and declared that human science could do nothing short of an operation to reduce the strangulation. He telephoned the Sanitarium to be prepared instantly for an operation, and summoned an ambulance; but in the meantime Elder Walter W. Smith and two other elders whose names we do not have were called in to administer, and when the patient reached the hospital, after a hurried trip of a few blocks, the surgeon discovered that the strangulation had entirely disappeared, the excruciating pain was gone, and there was no need for the operation, which on account of the age of the sufferer might have been of doubtful issue at best. The surgeon, with other witnesses of the incident, regarded it as a genuine and very remarkable case of divine interposition in answer to prayer, as did Bishop Short himself.

The writer had an aunt, now deceased, who when her children were small fell victim to a dreadful malady—a cancer developed on her breast. Being an "isolated Saint" she took recourse to physicians and the cancer was three times removed, but always returned. Finally she visited the church at Cherokee, Iowa, where the Saints fasted and prayed for her, and she was administered to by Elder Crippen.

That night a "mass of corruption," as it was described, sloughed away from her breast, the wound healed rapidly and permanently, and she lived to rear her children to maturity and see them happily married.

Testimonies might be multiplied. Nearly every member of the church is a witness. Moreover, we have never limited divine healing to functional disorders, as was done by the Emmanuel Movement, and by similar movements abroad. A committee appointed by a conference of the medical and clerical professions, held at Chapter House, Saint Paul's, London, in 1910, reported back to a similar conference in 1911, after considerable investigation: "The committee are of opinion that the physical results of what is called 'faith' or 'spiritual' healing do not prove on investigation to be different from those of mental healing or healing by 'suggestion.' . . . They are forced, however, to the conclusion, after the most careful inquiry, that 'faith' or 'spiritual' healing, like all treatment by suggestion, can be expected to be permanently effective only in cases of what are generally termed 'functional' disorders."—Spiritual Healing, pp. 15, 17. Published by Macmillan and Company, 1914.

"Divine healing" that is limited to functional disorders and has no power beyond suggestion is not divine healing in the fullest sense. Suggestion calls in play powers resident within the spiritual and physical being of the patient, and may do great good; but divine healing calls in play also powers outside, above, and beyond the human, and there is no reason to suppose that if it is indeed divine it will pause eternally abashed and impotent before organic troubles.

We do not presume to set limits to the power of God to heal. Yet, unlike some who have made healing the sum total of their gospel, the one thing on which they build, we regard it as but one of the many important things believed by the church and itself a "sign following the believer," sustaining his belief in things even more important—divorced from the gospel to which it was to be a witness it is not of eternal value. Nor have we taken a fanatical stand. We do not flout public opinion, or refuse to obey civic laws touching health matters, or disregard sanitation and hygiene, nursing and medication. A sanitarium is not inconsistent with our ideas touching divine healing.

Moreover, it is to be borne in mind that not all may rise to the plane of faith and the proper mental and spiritual attitude necessary to miraculous healing; nor is it probable that any one of us can always at all times maintain that level. Those "who have not faith to be healed" are not forgotten; they are to be nursed and treated in a proper way and by friends, i. e., those who are friendly to them not only individually, but who are also friendly in a spiritual way. One who has made religion a very important part of his life and thought could hardly receive successful treatment from nurses and physicians who hold his religion in contempt, even if they do not maintain an attitude of open hostility.

It was not, therefore, at all out of harmony with our belief that we should have been told in 1906: "It is the will of the Lord that a sanitarium, a place of refuge and help for the sick and afflicted, be established by the church, at Independence, Missouri."—Doctrine and Covenants 127: 1.

Many lives have been blessed by the institution established in accord with that revelation. The writer among others is greatly in its debt—a debt not recorded upon the ledger or to be paid with money. To help the distressed is its mission. Prayer and faith have their hourly work in the institution, as well as the scientific work of consecrated nurses and physicians.

But it may not be out of harmony with the revelation to believe that the Sanitarium may perform a much broader and more helpful work. Why may it not serve in years to come as a base of operations from which the church physician and the Health Department may teach the Saints the laws of health and right living so that sickness may be minimized? To be restored by divine healing is a splendid thing; but to keep divinely well is better than to be divinely healed.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

Our Present and Future Sanitarium

We hope to see a steady growth towards an ideal Sanitarium.

The Revelation

At the conference of 1906 President Joseph Smith made the following statement:

One morning after waking, before I left for the conference, I passed a period of three hours, and I never expect to be happier or more contented in the Spirit than I was during that three hours. Certain matters were presented to me, and among them, and principally, was this: We appear before the world as advocates for what are called signs of the gospel, the gospel signs, the accompaniments of the gospel economy as instituted by the Christ. A great deal of comment has passed among our elders, and among our membership, very largely, in our large branches, as to why it is that there are not more persons healed by the administration of the oil and the laying on of hands than there are. My observation leads me to the conclusion that there are a great many more healings occur than are taken notice of, or than we are given credit for, while there are a great many that are lost as a matter of course.

The thought which was presented to me was this: that we ought as a people to take this kind of a step, to establish here . . . what might be called a sanitarium or a hospital—call it whatever word you like—that shall be under the supervision of some earnest, upright, and spiritual-minded officer of the church; and that this Sanitarium shall be a place where our sick who may not be properly treated at their homes may be treated by the laying on of hands, by the nursing as provided for under the law, and by such careful treatment as medical knowledge within the provinces of our own membership may give, and thus see whether or not we may try the spiritual forces for which we have been so long contending, and at last put our hands and our sacred honors in juxtaposition and say to the world, "We are willing that it shall be given a trial, an open trial." And I was assured, in that three hours of spiritual exaltation, that there would be a fulfillment of the prophecy that the faces of Jacob's children shall not wax pale.

To me this is one of the things that shall mark the hastening time. And we surely are sufficiently strong to give this matter our careful consideration. Nothing venture, nothing have. If we do not put ourselves to the front, and make up our minds in this regard, we will be struggling along for a while yet.

There followed a season of fasting and prayer and in the revelation received before that conference adjourned the following was given referring to the Sanitarium:

1. It is the will of the Lord that a sanitarium, a place of refuge and help for the sick and afflicted, be established by the church, at Independence, Missouri, as my servant, Joseph Smith, has already stated to you. This should be done as soon as it is found to be practicable and without unnecessary delay. The presiding bishop and his counselors and the bishopric of the Independence Stake should take counsel together in locating and establishing this sanitarium.

2. It is also expedient that they should be assisted by the advice and counsel of one of my servants who is acquainted with the laws of health and the practice of medicine, and who may have charge when the institution is established. It is in accordance with the instruction given to my servant, Joseph Smith, that my servant, Joseph Luff, who has been giving his attention to the study of medicine and has been preparing himself for usefulness in this direction, be associated with this sanitarium as a medical director and physician and be put in charge, that he may be an assistant to those who seek the aid of this institution of the church, in his spiritual office and his calling as a physician, with those who from time to time may be called to administer in laying hands upon the afflicted and sick, where they may be removed from the influences and environments unfavorable to the exercise of proper faith unto the healing of the sick. And this my servant Joseph Luff may do and retain and exercise his apostleship.

It will be noted that this was to be a place where the Saints could receive the careful nursing not always possible in their homes, as well as the benefits of medical knowledge, and at the same time to be especially a place where the efficacy of healing by the laying on of hands might be shown. It should be a place of spiritual supervision, not neglecting, however, the care possible through medical knowledge. But it was to be a place where we might try the spiritual forces for which we have been so long contending and "put our hands and our sacred honors in juxtaposition and say to the world, We are willing that it shall be given a trial." It was therefore a place where proper faith might be exercised removed from unfavorable influences and environment.

The Sanitarium as It Is

Thus steps were taken to establish such a sanitarium. Of course it was not possible, nor is it as yet to-day, to complete an ideal institution with modern provision for all kinds of human illness, but it was possible to make medical provision in a general way and provide a plan for nursing and administration. This purpose was doubtless carried out in the start. But very soon the use of the building as a city hospital for Independence developed. Medical facilities have been greatly increased, though, of course, the spiritual aspect has not been lost sight of, as the sick are surrounded by those of faith, and administration to the sick is facilitated. The Sanitarium has thus become to-day a place primarily for the care of those who have undergone surgical operations, secondarily for the care of those who are suffering from serious diseases, and sometimes from contagious diseases.

Along with this, Doctor Harrington, the church physician, and in charge at the Sanitarium, has been trying to do what his facilities would permit in mental hygiene and psychoanalysis. He has also from the Sanitarium organized the public health work of the church, placing stress upon preventive medicine rather than upon the cure of disease.

In the third place, a number of patients come to the Sanitarium for X-ray examination in addition to those on whom the X-ray is used for a diagnosis preliminary to an operation.

The Work to Be Done

We therefore note that we have fields to be covered: First, that of operative medicine or surgery and care after operation. In this department, great development has been made. Second, the treatment and cure of serious illness, including contagious diseases. In the Sanitarium such cases are cared for in so far as space permits.

These two fields are those usually covered by hospital work, and it is this field of curative and corrective medicine for which nurses are trained as a rule in most hospitals.

Third, tubercular cases require a sanitarium rather than a hospital. They need fresh air, good food, and rest. At present our Sanitarium is not prepared to care for such cases and do justice to the patient. For it a separate unit is needed.

Fourth, psychopathic work, the care of nervous and mental disorders, would require a separate unit, though, as stated, much has already been attempted in this way. Such a unit is needed both in fairness to those requiring such care and on behalf of other patients.

Fifth, we may consider the delinquent child. Physical deficiency is, as a rule, at the base of most nervous and mental trouble. A child can often, if not usually, be helped and cured if the case is taken sufficiently early. School children notoriously suffer because of remediable physical defects, many of which are followed by a mental deficiency leading to moral delinquency. Thus we note one per cent mental deficiency; 5 per cent tubercular; 5 per cent defective hearing; 25 per cent defective eyesight; 10 to 20 per cent deformed feet, spine, or joints; and 50 to 75 per cent with defective teeth; and 15 to 25 per cent malnutrition. For the proper care of these cases a separate unit quite apart from the other hospital unit is necessary, but the good that can be done is not small.

Sixth. There is a field of preventive medicine. Under this we may include regular examination of those who are believed to be healthy, instruction in hygiene, sanitation, and physical education, including as well the work of the public health nurse. This department is to prevent illness rather than to cure, and thus comes quite rightly within the province of the true doctor, as one who teaches. As it includes the correction of defects in infancy and also where needed in those older in years, it in some ways includes the preceding provision for delinquents, though in fact both should properly be considered as separate departments or subdivisions. To carry on this work successfully requires public health nurses and physicians who are especially trained for this work, as it is often easier to diagnose a fully developed illness than it is to locate tendencies and thereby prevent future illness.

To those who have the work of the Sanitarium in charge there appears immediately a need for development, as our means and conditions will allow in all of these departments: Separate facilities for the care of tubercular patients; second, a separate building for the care of mental and nervous disorders; third, another separate building apart from the other units, for the care and cure of delinquent children; fourth, the public health work, which is yet in its infancy compared to the possibilities before this institution and the church as a whole in learning the laws of health, how to live to avoid sickness of all kinds and to reduce to a minimum the danger of contagion.

It cannot all be done at once. We should strengthen what we have, then move forward towards the ideal, taking up each unit as we can and making it effective.

The Lord evidently intended that we should use

The Sanitarium, the Center of Our Health Work

By G. Leonard Harrington, M. D.

Prevention of disease the prime function of the Health Department.

The real work of the Health Department is education in regard to physical and mental health. In other words, the prevention of disease is the prime function of the Health Department. This line of attack on physical and mental distress, so prevalent, is supported by the Word of Wisdom, which teaches laws that when followed will prevent many of the burdens people are now laboring under.

One of the very important objectives of the Health Department is to develop a corps of workers associated with the Sanitarium, trained in health matters. From this corps members will go out to reunions, district conferences, and other gatherings, for the purpose of lecturing, giving demonstrations, etc., and of holding private conferences for the purpose of helping individuals with special problems.

Another vital function of this corps of trained workers should be to give instruction to the members of the religious education class at Graceland College. It is hoped that the women of the religious education class will come to the Sanitarium and do practical nursing in the Sanitarium, and at the same time study the theoretical aspect of nursing; that the men will take a short course in preventive medicine; and that those who are going to certain fields will be instructed in the disease conditions found in those respective places.

Missionaries recognize the great help medical training is to them in presenting their message. To help physically or mentally a stricken person or people certainly builds up a beautiful, friendly relationship, through which spiritual information can be well given.

Some school authorities are having the pupils examined regularly. If the adults of a community are going to be healthy and able to accomplish worthwhile results in life, the school children must be properly supervised. Not only must the school children be studied and helped, but the preschool age children must be looked after. At the present time, the Health Department is conducting examinations and instruction periods for the preschool age Latter Day Saint children in Independence. One of the Independence schools which has seven eighths of its pupils made up of Latter Day Saints showed a very high percentage of physical defects. This survey was made by the United States Public Health Service. To correct this situation is an important task of the Health Department. Definite plans are being made to attack this problem next year.

There is a close cooperation between the Women's Department and the Health Department. Classes are going to be formed among the Friendly Visitors, not only for the purpose of helping the Friendly Visitors to assist in correcting health irregularities, but also of assisting the Friendly Visitors to recognize health irregularities, physical and mental, long before a stage is reached in which little help can be extended.

Then, too, the Health Department wishes to cooperate with the priesthood. President Frederick M. Smith, on a number of occasions, has made the statement that he hoped to see associated with the elder, priest, teacher, and deacon in the groups, a nurse and a social worker. Certainly the level of the family can be raised by the efforts of the spiritual workers being supported by those trained in the laws of health, physical and mental.

The Sanitarium is the natural center about which the Health Department can carry out the suggested methods. It is very strongly hoped that the church as a whole will support the Sanitarium and its activities, not only in its present effort, but in all future work that it wants to accomplish.

It should not be difficult for any student of social science to recognize that extravagance breeds poverty. When wealth is spent on unnecessary things, like one or two billion dollars on tobacco, or seven hundred fifty thousand on cosmetics, it takes from industrial employment a number of individuals, as well as consuming so much wealth that there is left comparatively little for serious propositions like education.

Knowledge of Nursing of Benefit in the Home

By Mrs. J. W. Chapman, R. N.

At some time in our young girl's life comes the happy thought that some day she may have her ideal realized, that most sacred vow of wife and mother. I feel sure that with this contemplation there come to us hours of serious thought as to our preparedness and, no doubt, many times in our prayers do we petition our divine Parent for wisdom and guidance that we may properly nourish and guide the lives of the little ones that may be intrusted to our care.

Here I am reminded of an experience while at our Sanitarium. A mother came to me asking about our training school for nurses. She related to me the program her daughter had outlined: a high school course, Graceland College work, the nurses' training course. I inquired as to what special work she was desirous of preparing for. She unhesitatingly replied, "Motherhood." I am sure that we all feel the importance of preparing ourselves generally for the most sacred, highest station in life that woman can attain to, that of motherhood.

To a wife and mother, nurses' training will prove of much value. The nurses' training course will be of much value in the home because of one's having obtained the knowledge of things pertaining to health and disease; thus, we prepare ourselves to intelligently prepare for and keep fit the body wherein the spirit dwells.

Nursing is an art, and it requires study and preparation as much as any painter's or sculptor's work; for what is a piece of canvas or marble compared with the body, the temple of God's Spirit?

The Spirit of the Sanitarium Appeal

By John R. Green, M. D.

We must be on the positive, definite side in our institutional program.

The splendid response throughout the church to the appeal of the Sanitarium for standard equipment and beautiful buildings and grounds is founded on the teaching of the parable of the city built upon the hill as a monument of high ideals and correct living. It is the rallying of the forces in the positive Christian warfare; the outpouring of that spiritual and mental phenomenon that so marvelously built up in the early forties, on the great American frontier, a body of workers in the early church who filled her ranks because they believed themselves right as opposed to the narrow religious doctrines of that day.

The whole-hearted response to the call of the hospital work is as it should be, because in the past we have been content to put in operation a hospital which could merely do the actual work necessary in meeting humanitarian and sanitary needs without representing the higher ideals of the church in leadership. The church cannot afford to offer an apology for any of her institutions, because we are forced into a position of defense, and this means defeat in the long run for man, whether in war, or in commerce, or in social relations of individuals, tribes, or nations.

The terrible Hindenburg army was successful so long as he kept the offensive position, but when counter attacks began, and swift, fresh American armies began to surround him, the retreat and dissolution began. "These Americans were too fast for us," they said. So our hospital must be on the positive side, and always too swift for the decay of a contented incompetency. Many a bank has had a fatal run on its deposits because of a mediocre management in permitting the mental depression of doubt to become current, while its competitor has remained secure by always demonstrating the positive security of its loans. So our hospital is now as secure as the rock of Gibraltar when a united church stands hopefully and enthusiastically in its support.

Every community has its pathetic examples of careers, blighted because of an uncharitable defense. "She is not much to blame," they say. Defense is always either willfully or unconsciously uncharitable and blundering. Andrew Jackson, the victorious Indian fighter, inspired terror in his political enemies. He smashed the old Second United States Bank, and made war on Nicholas Biddle, its president, in particular, by his very positive methods. "I tell you, sir, she's broke. . . . The bank's broke, and Biddle knows it," he said. So the greatest bank on the Western Continent was ruined by the positive stand of one outstanding, threatening man. But the brilliant military and political success was wilted when a few Washington women placed him on the defensive over the trifling question of the right of Peggy O'Neil to dominate Washington society. Every advancement in the history of the church has been through men like Andrew Jackson, who have stood unanimous for a positive program of efficiency and beneficent aggressiveness for the right by supporting all of its institutions to the limit in a proper, workable degree.

Every phenomenon of nature teaches this principle of necessity of the church being dominantly in the lead by creating and maintaining strong hospitals and colleges, and other institutions for basic human needs. We can be like the finely feathered creatures with our institutions and avoid either responsibility or accomplishments, but the keynote of success is the qualities of fearlessness and the strength of the lion. Jacob knew this when he conferred the supreme blessing upon Judah. The lion was Jacob's visualization of the kind of successful, positive influence that Judah would wield. The lion is king and ruler of beasts because of physical powers unchallenged, mental acuteness undismayed. "Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise. . . . From the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he crouched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up?"

The hospital is a very new institution in the long-time struggle of the race upwards. It is true that elements of the modern hospital have developed now and again over a period of four thousand years, but the splendid modern hospital has an age of only half a century. The Christian and civilized world at large has perfected hospitals to a very desirable degree, and our church has this heritage which she must honor by keeping this standard at its best. We do not retract on one good principle which has grown out of four thousand years of human experience, but modern revelation adds still a greater responsibility which we must uphold.

The best ideals of preventive medicine come to us not in the revelation of racial experience, but are contributed to greatly by the genius of prophetic vision which directed a sanitarium to be built in the church: a place where true physiologic rest may be secured; a place to conserve the vital organs of the body before they are impaired beyond the limits of safety; a place fitted with scientific laboratories, and at the same time in the atmosphere that is spiritual and quiet and mentally pleasing.

The appeal of the Sanitarium is for the moral and financial support of every person in the world who cherishes these ideals: first for the rugged necessary hospital equipment, and then for the finer higher things which come as the contribution of our church to the world's progress.

Factors in Healing

By Paul M. Hanson

"Our aim should be to bring the advantages of our Health Department within the reach of all possessing moderate means."

Clear instruction relating to what should be done by the church for the sick is given by James in the following language:

Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord:

And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.

It is evident the above language was not intended to exclude other factors bearing advantageously in the direction of recovery of health. In the Mosaic law, divers injunctions and prohibitions were given to Israel with the understanding they were indissolubly associated with prosperity and health, and to the church in latter days has been given the Word of Wisdom and words of counsel; all of which discloses that no fragmentary view of the scriptural provisions must be emphasized to the exclusion of other valuable therapeutic agencies.

The Lord commends this treatment that was given to a man who was "wounded" by thieves:

But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he saw him, he had compassion on him, and went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. And on the morrow when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee.

Paul referred to Luke as the "beloved physician."

The Lord said to the church in 1906:

It is the will of the Lord that a sanitarium, a place of refuge and help for the sick and afflicted, be established by the church at Independence, Missouri.

It means much to have an institution where the spiritual forces of the church are present to a marked degree. Man is a spiritual being—often more than his body is in need of health.

It is a part of Zion's ideal to have an institution supervised by consecrated, conscientious, and skilled physicians—a "place of refuge and help for the sick and afflicted."

Our aim should be to bring the advantages of our Health Department within the reach of all possessing moderate means. Trustworthy medical aid is most important, and should be within the reach of all in need. The best medical care is none too good. A proper and generous support by the church and public of our Sanitarium means the building up of a much-needed institution.

The Ideal of the Sanitarium

By Walter W. Smith, Church Historian

The history of the development of hospitals would carry us well into medieval history, if not into the history of the ancients. The modern hospital is, however, the direct development of certain hospitals established during the Crusades, when European Christians were trying to recover the Holy Land from the Mohammedans. The hospitals of this age were crude and simple and ministered chiefly to the needs of the soldiers engaged in the Crusades. When the Crusades were abandoned, or had accomplished their purposes, the hospital, like many other institutions developed during the Crusades, was kept up, either to minister to the needs where local conflicts of soldiers made it necessary, or in populous districts and cities where it was made to minister to necessities of the civilian population.

Just as the Crusades were essentially a religious enterprise, the hospitals were essentially a religious institution in their beginning, conducted by a religious order called Hospitalers. When the hospital was transferred to civilian population and made to do service in time of peace, it was for a long time still under the direction of the church, conducted at first by monks and later by orders of Sisters of Mercy and Sisters of Charity, as most of the hospitals and infirmaries of the Catholic countries are to-day, and most of such institutions under Catholic influence in our own country.

The idea of the hospital having gained acceptance in Europe, it was carried to America by the founders of the Colonies, and has been greatly developed and improved, until to-day nearly every town and city has some sort of hospital, sanitarium, or infirmary. It is now an essential institution of civilized society, and is a mark of culture and care. The hospital is now carried on by the city, state, and Nation, by groups of physicians and surgeons and other interested citizens, and by the various churches, and philanthropic associations.

While the hospital had gained acceptance in America very early, in fact from the very beginning of the Nation, it was not undertaken by our church until a comparatively late date. This is partly due to the fact that in nearly every neighborhood there was some sort of ministration of this kind already provided for. Thomas B. Marsh, one of the Quorum of Twelve, was designated as physician to the church in an early day. Just what his ministrations as such were, we are not informed, but so far as we know no hospital, infirmary, or sanitarium was established for the central or organized care of the sick, but from the very beginning of the church the idea of healing and care for the afflicted was given great consideration. Direction was had as to the care of the sick and ministration to the afflicted, and even the preservation of health by those who were well.

It was inevitable that there would be conflict between the thought of divine healing and scientific care of the sick. There were from the very beginning of the church medical doctors and surgeons among the Saints, both those who had been converted who had previously acquired the training, and those of the faith who studied and equipped themselves for this kind of service to the Saints. The conflict between the thought of healing as a result of the prayer of faith and the healing that might come from skillful care and surgical operation and medication, was an age-old conflict and has been waged wherever Christianity has attempted to make permanent progress among men. It was the same conflict that was waged by the priests and monks of the Middle Ages against free public schools or schools at all conducted by anyone other than the ministers of the church.

Nearly every good and wholesome activity has been at some time claimed by the churches as their particular preserve, not to be infringed upon by seculars, nor to be improved upon by the inventions and learning of men. The hospital has had this fight as well as the school, but in our church it was even a more subtle conflict. We had been directed what to do for the sick and afflicted, and even though this direction included the care of those sick who were not healed by administration, it was still considered by many to be a sign of weakness of faith in God and a mark of disrespect to his ministers, that anyone should employ the physician or surgeon in the pursuit of health.

As the church grew and experience demonstrated the need for more scientific care for the sick, it occurred to many that a godly man was more desirable as a physician or surgeon than one who had no regard for the religious feelings of the people. It also became apparent that there was nothing to hinder the sick from seeking the Lord's aid, both by prayer through the elders of the church in administration, and the ministration of medical care, advice, or operation of a physician, who had dedicated himself to the service of humanity in the healing art. It was found that even the doctor could profit by the prayer of faith in his work, and that all were dedicated to God and the service of humanity if all were truly his children. A great many young men and a few young women took up the training for service as physicians and surgeons, and some not so young and even at the direction of the President of the church, took up the study of medicine and the care of the body.

In 1906 the Lord directed the establishment of a sanitarium at Independence, Missouri, and in doing so indicated that Joseph Luff (also a member of the Quorum of Twelve, just as was the first physician to the early church) "had been preparing himself for usefulness in this direction" and should "be put in charge."

It was discovered at the opening of the Sanitarium that only one physician with hospital experience was available and that he had only eighteen months' experience, while at present we have men with an aggregate of more than one hundred eighty-five months of hospital experience outside of our own institution, and not counting army experience.

In an institution of this kind more than a physician was needed. There was need of the skillfully trained nurse. A careful survey of the field revealed the fact that we indeed had too few among us who had such training. It was evident at the outstart that we should have to begin at once the training of nurses, so that with the establishment of the Sanitarium there was opened a nurses' training school, so that now instead of having to employ nurses not in sympathy with the law of God relating to the healing of the body by faith and prayer, we have a corps of trained nurses not excelled in devotion by any other group of church workers.

Of course since we had no hospital and no body of trained nurses, we had no out-patient workers, no trained and organized workers guarding the health and hygiene of the community. Now we have a fine group of trained workers devoted to the service of God in the care of the health of his people.

We have come to the time of development and expansion of the work of the Sanitarium. The first period was a period of preparation and establishment; now is the time of expansion and development. With a large body of physicians and surgeons consecrated to the work of God as restored in the latter days, trained and equipped for the most skillful service in preserving and restoring the health of man, and with a large body of trained and registered nurses, whose lives are dedicated to the preservation of the health of the people and the care of those who are already unfortunate in being sick, and with a large body of devoted Saints, the whole Church of Christ, back of this institution organized and established by the will and commandment of God, the Sanitarium will undoubtedly grow and develop and presently begin to fulfill in a higher sense the purpose which was in the mind of God when he directed its establishment. This is our task, to develop and perfect the most complete institution in the world for the care of the sick and afflicted. Our object is not realized when we duplicate the myriads of hospitals and sanitariums already organized and serving humanity, but just as our church is the complete expression of the will of God, so shall our Sanitarium (and others yet to be organized) become the greatest and most complete health restorer in the world. This must be the place where the greatest skill attained by men and women in the care and healing of the body shall be dedicated to the preservation and restoration to normal condition of the bodies, minds, and souls of men, assisted by the prayer of faith and administration of the ordinance of the gospel of Christ, without conflict or disparagement. Here indeed will be the place for truly divine healing of the highest and most effective order. What greater task can God have given any group of men and women? What more noble service could be asked? While they give their services, let us give them our undivided support.

Research funds in the United States have been very greatly increased in the past ten years to a total annual income of more than eighteen and a half million dollars. Of this the Rockefeller Foundation represents more than eighty per cent. Of our branches of research specified by the donor, medicine ranks next to general research work with more than ten times the amount of income for biology and natural history, which rank third.

Spiritual Ideals That Are Translatable Into Service

By John W. Rushton

"The history and development of medical science runs parallel with the history of our progress morally and religiously."

A church is the expression of religion. Religion is the divine energy at work in human life—"the divine life in the soul of man." (Scougall.) The expression of this divine energy or life of God is defined in an illuminating reference to the life of Jesus in the New Testament. "He went about doing good." A church, therefore, to be worthy of its high calling, must become the organization through which collective goodness is expressed; it should be the agent which is either originating or coordinating every social activity which is "going about doing good," purposely active in applying the remedial influences of energetic goodness to alleviate and remove all the ills and evils which spoil and hinder human progress.

It is in this light of the broad and vital meaning of religion that hospitals should be appreciated. They are institutions for the charitable relief and support of those who are so unfortunate as to be unable to meet their own needs. Though in our own day we have narrowed the meaning to medical hospitals, infirmaries, and dispensaries, yet the essential meaning is still vital—the application of skilled help in loving sympathy by these able and willing to the healing and comforting the sick, in body, mind, and spirit, and distressed. The two oldest hospitals, at least in London, Saint Bartholomew's, established in 1547, and Saint Thomas, 1553, were originally religious foundations. This intimate relationship between the church and hospital is still maintained, and wherever the influence of the Christian spirit has been disseminated, the healing of the sick, the giving of sight to the blind, the restoration of the powers of expression in body or mind, the casting out of evil and the force of organized goodness have been the chief characteristics of the church's mission.

This close relationship between the evangelical and medical activities has been recognized. The romance of missionary adventure and conquest is inextricably bound with that of medicine, so that to-day medical science is appreciated as one of the most valuable expressions of social Christianity.

Nearly all of the foreign missions, where men and women spend their talents and life itself, in the heroic attempts to enrich those portions of our race which still linger in the periphery of civilization, combine the sacred office of the minister with that of doctor, surgeon, and nurse, so that indeed the Son of God is elevated on the "wings of healing." What a wonderful chapter has been written by those intrepid men and women, who, in the spirit of consecration and noble selflessness, have carried the blessings of our Christian civilization through religion, hygiene, sanitation, education, and the ideals of self-respect into the shadowy places of racial origins. Surely in the new canonization which history unfailingly bestows upon the children of men who are worth while—Doctor Livingstone, Father Damien, Doctor Lockhart, Doctor Paton, Doctor Grenfell, and the innumerable host from all denominations, societies, and countries, who have thus ministered, will be included in this constellation of the highest magnitude.

The history of the development of medical science runs parallel with the history of our progress morally and religiously, for all the features of truth which science has gathered up in her toilsome and sacrificial pilgrimage from ignorance to the shining dominion of knowledge have been sacramentalized by loving sympathy and devoted service to the healing and alleviation and prevention of disease. Indeed, medicine has been not only the handmaid of religion, but the splendid servant of industrial, commercial, and explorative enterprise, and the ministrant of tender sympathy in the bloody shambles of political and geographical cataclysms, reducing the ineffable horrors of "man's inhumanity" to an unbelievable minimum. Names as Lister, Simpson, Ross, Cond, and Dakin are representative of many whose labor and sacrifice have contributed much in this way and will stand out with increasing luster as time passes. It is not straining the truth to say that whenever the "coming of the kingdom" is foreshadowed and the foundations of "the city of God" established, among the helpful agencies through which spiritual forces find expression, medical science, skillful nursing, and fully equipped hospital service, together with educational facilities, will constitute the upholding arms of the church.

In these latter days, when God has put forth his hand to lead men back to a forgotten ideal, and to woo humanity back to the neglected Christ, it is very consoling to see that special mention is made of those two important auxiliaries to the church—education and medicine. We cannot be loyal to God and neglectful of man; we cannot nurture a successful church and starve the educational and medical institutions. We must worship God by helpfully, skillfully, and sympathetically serving humanity. We cannot strain our energies to build an elaborate temple for mystical sacerdotalism, while our important, though humbler institutions for the production of efficient and remedial service are allowed to languish and become moribund.

Our church Sanitarium stands as a monument to the fact that our spiritual ideals are translatable in terms of remedial service and is the organization through which the healing influences of the gospel of Christ may find their most effective expression. To make it what it should be we ought to have every equipment which modern science has dedicated to the healing of the nations. We should aim to make it the useful ally of church and college in preparing our young men and women who are qualifying for missionary work at home and abroad. For in all churches it is realized that those who go into the lands still lying in the shadow of ignorance, the need for applying a knowledge of hygiene, sanitation, and the elementary rules of a healthy and normal life, is at least every bit as essential as knowing that baptism is immersion in water, and that the laying on of hands is a church sacrament.

It is more important to stress the social significance of these ordinances than the theological and ecclesiastical import. The cleansing and sweetening of life and its willing submission to divine control are at least suggested as the spiritual content of these familiar features of our ceremonialism.

May we appeal to the faith, vision, and sympathy of all who love the "Lord's appearing," whether in the pulpit or in the prayer service, in the display of intelligence, through science or art, industry, politics, or social sympathy, it matters not how the Lord shall appear—let all who look for and love his revelation, contribute of their means so that our Sanitarium in Independence shall be placed in a position to be still more effective in the work of healing to which it has been dedicated. To accomplish this in the most effective way the facilities for research, experimentation, and laboratory work, the equipment in the X-ray room, operating theater, and for each of the wards must be increased and modernized.

The doctors, surgeons, nurses, and humblest servants who are seeking to bless suffering mankind are worthy of our cooperation in tenderness and earnest sacrifice. Surely God will not overlook these gifts which are devoted to the wounded, maimed, distressed, or deformed of his children, and every one of us must face the impulse to help. If we cannot do more than consecrate of our means in money or gifts, we have the opportunity, and never was the need so urgent as now.

While money is required to maintain any institution, the big thing required is proper understanding and appreciation of all the factors that enter into the control of that institution. To this end this Sanitarium Number is issued.

A University of Health

By T. W. Williams

"Such an institution should receive the generous and enthusiastic support of all right-minded people."

One of the delusions of many so-called religious people is that primarily, and practically always, sickness and disease are the direct result of satanical machinations or divine displeasure. The law of cause and effect play a very insignificant part in their theology. A conviction which persists and stands well out after a trip to the Orient is that superstition and fanaticism are a menace and a curse to the human race. Such are born of ignorance and fear. The more ignorance the more miracle. The more superstition the more devils there are roaming around seeking whom they may devour. We of the Occident are not entirely free from these enemies of civilization and progress.

One of the main things which differentiates the Christian religion from that of all others is its virile affirmation that reaping must always follow sowing: that the seed we sow determines the nature of the grain we will reap; that the character of the crop depends not only on the seed but on the nature and cultivation of the soil, the moisture and heat, and all other agencies which enter into the evolution of the plant. Christianity postulates no miracles which revoke or modify the cosmos of the world.

All the remedial measures which God has instituted have to do with men's adjustment to the divine and natural order of the universe. The gospel is not instituted to change nature or nature's God. It does not start out with the idea that God is wrong or his order chaotic. It presumes that the evils of the world are artificial and man made. The terms of the gospel are preventive and remedial. The preventive are prior and superior to the remedial.

God has established a divine sacrament whereby those who, as a result of the violation of the laws of mind or body, are suffering, may, through application of the terms of this sacrament, be healed and liberated. This is legitimate and praiseworthy. It is, however, a case of extreme unction and to be applied only when it is impossible to apply the regular order. The gospel is first preventive and second remedial. The remedial should only be called into requisition when it is impossible to apply the preventive.

In other words, if Latter Day Saints would comply in spirit as well as letter with the Word of Wisdom, the laying on of hands for the healing of the sick would be well-nigh obsolete. A religion which keeps men from getting sick is far more important than one which only proposes to heal men after they have become sick. Health is the normal state. Ill health is abnormal.

In the East men depend on incantations and ceremony for relief rather than sanitation and right-living. A doctor is looked upon as an enemy and a hospital a place to be avoided. Here in our own land we find people who affirm that consultation with a doctor implies lack of faith in God. And one who goes to a hospital for treatment is supposed to be gambling with life. It passes understanding how any Latter Day Saint with the Doctrine and Covenants in his hand can give credence to such heresy.

Every agency which makes for the health of the human family is divinely ordained. A physician who has given years of study can, if he is fully consecrated, become God's instrument in saving people from their sins. A hospital conducted on the large philanthropic lines suggested by Jesus Christ can become a sanctuary where men cannot only deposit their crutches and bandages but where the vicious habits which have bound them body and soul may be thrown off and they may be regenerated physically, mentally, and spiritually, and may go out into the world to become a blessing to the race.

The four gospels are recitals of the many interpositions of the remedial power of the Almighty exercised for the benefit of the mentally and physically sick. But let it be understood that this was practically the only way in which Jesus could reach those people. His ministry was of such short duration that he did not have time to inculcate the higher laws of prevention and have them become operative. Three years and a half is entirely too short a time to reverse the entire purpose of a race and expect to reap the benefits of revolution. But his entire teaching had to do with the preventive rather than the remedial.

It is true that Jesus came to save his people from their sins. This must not be construed to mean that the saving grace of God was only to be applied after sin had been committed. The gospel is intended to prevent sin. It is likewise instituted to prevent the results of sin, which are sickness and disease. Man does not come by chance. He is the product of law. His weal or woe is determined largely through his own actions. God placed man on this earth for a purpose. He intended that man should live under the most favorable circumstances. Health and longevity are in keeping with his law. Disease and sickness are the sequence of a breaking of that law.

The laying on of hands for the healing of the sick is a divine ordinance. At most this principle is remedial and transitory. It is administered only when certain symptoms are in evidence. It is significant that the one passage in the Scriptures which emphasizes and amplifies this sacrament is associated with sin. Speaking of the application of the laying on of hands for the healing of the sick, James says: "And if they have committed any sins they shall be forgiven them."

Sickness is not always evidence of personal departures. It is an almost invariable evidence that some one has broken the divine law. Health is the normal state. Sickness is always abnormal. God never intended for men to be sick. It is not necessary that men should be weak or sick or afflicted in order to fulfill the divine purpose. The real work of the church is to keep people well—to prevent them from getting sick.

A hospital to most people is the court of last resort. A hospital suggests to them a life and death struggle. Having violated all the laws of health, and when some crisis has culminated, then recourse is had to some extreme unction along medical or surgical lines. This is to a large extent a misunderstanding of the real function of a hospital or sanitarium.

Every community needs a health department. This health department should be primarily concerned, not with the curing of sick people but in preventing people from getting sick. To do this there must be medical supervision of the entire community. Laws must be enacted which will conserve the life and health of the community. Information must be disseminated whereby the people will know how to preserve their health. Agencies must be employed to compel people to preserve the general health.

A hospital or sanitarium is indispensable to every community. Such an institution should receive the generous and enthusiastic support of all right-minded people. It is purely in keeping with the law of healing as indicated by Jesus Christ himself. Despite all our precautions, sickness will ensue, accidents will occur. The home is seldom equipped for caring for the unfortunate. Relatives are not the best nurses. The hospital when properly equipped is run on the most sanitary and wholesome lines calculated to the needs of every patient.

Then again there are many people in a community who are not in position to meet the expenses incidental to a sojourn at the hospital. Our religion suggests, aye, impels us to become our brother's keeper. This, then, our cry: Let us enthusiastically boost for the Sanitarium and make it one of the best if not the best institution of its kind in all the land.

The value of knowledge and ideals concerning disease prevention is of as much importance as to know how to cure those who are ill.

The Sanitarium and the Missionary

By J. W. Peterson

A challenge to match sacrifices with the missionary family.

The missionaries who have been cared for at the Independence Sanitarium can see inspiration in the revelation ordering its establishment, especially those who have had care in other hospitals.

The peaceful association of kindred spirits helps very much to win the battles often too hard for one alone to win. To feel that one is at home in his own sanitarium with our heavenly Father's watchcare over a building of his own ordering, is certainly conducive to rest. This, one does not often realize in other hospitals. Many times one's faith is taboo and he is under a restraint that is not conducive to recovery. One's every associate is uncongenial and unsympathetic. Mostly the nurses are not God-fearing and the doctors quite the reverse. Should one desire administration, there is nothing conducive to good results. But in the Sanitarium, each department aids the other, and the doctors, nurses, and all the management are genuine, good, God-fearing people. One coming from other hospitals feels, when he has arrived at the Sanitarium, like going to sleep, and waking up next morning is much improved. One's mental attitude half wins the battle. Under such surroundings a patient can scarcely help exercising his faith to the uttermost. The contrast to one coming from another hospital is quickly observed.

One is surrounded by a host of sympathetic friends and consecrated workers. Doctors Harrington, Green, Keown, Messenger, and McGraw are all members of the church and recognized authorities in their line.

Many missionaries and their families have reason to be thankful that the church is able to maintain such an institution. I wrote "able," but that is not wholly true. It is not quite able to longer continue as it has. The free treatment accorded to the poor and to the missionaries is a problem with which other institutions of the kind do not have to deal. This problem makes it necessary to supply the deficit out of the church funds. But owing to the stringency of the times the church does not have the means to do that. Already many missionaries are released to their own resources, for lack of funds. It would not be wise to put money into the Sanitarium and drop out some scores of missionaries. This week has in it, National Hospital Day (May 12), observed throughout the Nation. Other churches and other societies will be endowing their hospitals. How much pride our people take in their own noble institution will be shown in the amount subscribed.

Failing or neglecting to support the Sanitarium, must it be closed and our sick be sent to other institutions? A committee asked me to write a missionary's view of the Sanitarium and help the Saints to see its needs.

What if it should fail? Does the reader know that he may not be the next to require care in that institution? Or, if not the next, he may require it sometime. Do the Saints desire to see the doors closed for lack of funds? Or, if closed only to the poor and the missionary, what then? Do the members of the church desire to keep these representatives one hundred per cent fit for service, or not? It is enough that these men give up everything else. Let us not require their health also.

Here is a chance for others to match sacrifices with the missionary and his family, especially the latter; by giving a few dollars to a very worthy institution. Many a Saint, looking into his own heart, will not find many credit marks for sacrifice, I fear. Nor can the giving of a few quarters each month be called a very great sacrifice. It is a duty. The unnecessary spending, by thousands in the church, would make a great sum. And not only that, but there is condemnation coming for such a course. Why not reverse the order and lay up treasures in heaven? I am challenging the membership to match sacrifices with the missionary families.

Pure and undefiled religion is to care for others. One may not be able to feed the sick, afflicted, or needy near their own door, but by aiding the Sanitarium the same thing is accomplished. At the judgment day would it not be very regrettable to find that we were very shy on pure religion? Helping the Sanitarium is one good way to develop unselfish service, to lay up treasures in heaven, and to practice pure and undefiled religion. Why not relieve the church of this financial burden and save the tithing in the hands of the Bishop for missionary purposes?

Some may say, Why this extra burden? Why not be a burden bearer yourself? Can we go care free and not answer to God for neglecting the sick? Here is one thing God has said: "Woe unto him that is at ease in Zion." All must assume their burdens who are connected with Zion. I am convinced that most Latter Day Saints are willing to sacrifice along with the missionary arm, but they are sometimes negligent. It is so easy to let dimes and dollars slip away for things we could very well get along without, if we did not have the money. One good way is to spend it for God's work before a chance for unnecessary spending presents itself. If it is only a small amount at a time, yet if oft and continuously repeated will soon become a large sum.

If the sisters and brethren in each branch would once a month make a special effort to set apart an offering for the benefit of the Sanitarium, sending the money to the proper authorities, there is no doubt that a much greater joy would come to them than from spending a like amount for personal but unnecessary satisfaction. Many could give much, and all could give a little. No one would miss the money. And the tithes and offerings need not be diminished in the least. Why not transfer one's spare dimes to a good cause? When I said the sisters and brethren could well give some attention to this work, I did not mean the Women's Department only. They have enough to do. I mean all who have pure and undefiled religion, either auxiliary or otherwise. The Sanitarium is designed to be the health center of the church. What possibilities are open to it when it reaches out to all the branches of the church? But it cannot grow if it is not fed.

There have been wrong impressions created concerning the Sanitarium. Perhaps mistakes have been made. But even they furnish a warning against similar things in the future. One can scarcely see how the present management could do better with the very limited means at their disposal. However, with increased help greater improvements could and would be made.

Many of our girls are getting a training there that will enable them to earn an independent living. If we could train a hundred girls a year, that would mean a large sum coming into the hands of worthy members of the church. The tithing these girls would be able to pay would be considerable. True, they do not get much money while in training, but they are being put in a position to earn a good living and help the church in tithing, to say nothing of service to others. The loving service they render while in training is worth much to themselves and to others. But at present the institution is not able to give many this opportunity. The work is quite exacting, but that is good training also. The moral training is worth all the effort to any girl. As long as Sister Mann is at the head no mother need fear that any good girl will go wrong.

For one, I have only praise for the institution and all its workers. And I greatly desire to see it succeed to the uttermost. It is a part of God's work. I hope that the good Spirit will greatly impress every good Samaritan who reads this so they may assist in the good work. I also hope that those who are not good Samaritans will feel ill at ease until they decide to assist in this matter also. And if there still be some whose heart may not be touched by the affliction of their brother, we hope that sometime the loving service of the Sanitarium at Independence, to themselves or their friends, may cause them to realize how needful is this institution.

God foresaw its need. It is a plant of his making, dwarfed and badly nourished, yet capable of much more good than it is doing. Shall we develop its possibilities?

Four Times a Patient in the Sanitarium

By Edward Rannie

Inasmuch as others have told about the service the Sanitarium rendered for them, it affords the writer much pleasure to tell of his experience in that institution.

I have faith in the institution because God commanded its erection, and also in the doctors and nurses connected with it or who go there to render service to the sick. So when going there I have felt that I could unreservedly place myself under their care and obey their instructions.

It has been my good fortune to have been a patient four times for operations, which have saved me from much physical suffering and kept me in a condition so that I can continue my work as a missionary. Whenever it has been my good pleasure to go there as a patient it was my firm conviction and a well-settled fact in my mind that the doctors and nurses knew more about my body and how to care for it than I did. Therefore I cheerfully obeyed the rules and did whatever I was told to do.

All people who go to a hospital must learn how to go. The first and most important lesson is to be obedient and avoid being cranky with the nurses and to be patient in one's suffering. Do not think that a nurse is an everlasting, imperishable machine, and that you are there to test her power of endurance, and that you must call her for every foolish whim that may come into your head. Be thoughtful, considerate, and kind, remembering that she travels many miles to serve the sick. Do not add unnecessarily to her burdens. They are just everyday girls, perhaps away from home their first time, and they need your sympathy and not your frowns.

If we would think less about what we think are mistakes of doctors and nurses and give thought to the great service that they so cheerfully render us we would not complain so much about them and the Sanitarium.

Our present Sanitarium is only a beginning of what our heavenly Father wants us to do for the sick. When he gave the revelation commanding its erection, it is strongly suggested that he wants the institution to grow and become of great service to the people. It should be the aim and purpose of the management and all the Saints to work together and make it the very best institution of its kind in the entire Nation, and at the same time to make it possible for the poor as well as the rich to get its bene-

4. What is government for?

5. Of whom should leadership be expected in national government—of everyone connected with it, or of a few prominent officials?

6. Are you and your associates rather finding fault with our Government than helping it with constructive criticism? If so, are your neighbors justified in regarding you as something of a Bolshevik?

7. Should government officials have as much freedom of expression of opinion and activity as the officials of any successful business?

8. Explain these expressions: Magna Charta; Parliament; Bill of Rights; Social Criminal; and the term social in its narrower and in its broader senses.

9. Find in the Doctrine and Covenants a reason for studying civics. (Section 90, paragraph 12.) DORA YOUNG.

Prayer

We are at prayer when least we know—
A silent moment 'mid the glow
Of April on a wooded hill,
A footstep pausing by a rill
To hear that liquid ripple spill
Its music through the silent places—
A light of love on little faces,
A thought, caught up from life's dark stream—
The loveliest prayer
Is when we dream.

You thought to pray was just to kneel
Within your closet, and to feel
The spirit of communion sweep
Your spirit to that vasty deep
Of His immortal realm—but men
Pray best so often where they are ten
Or twenty, or a struggling host,
And prayers are little deeds of love
That lift up like the Holy Ghost
To realms above!

We are at prayer when we make life
Less bitter with the human strife
That poisons and corrodes us so
With actions mean and small and low,
We are at prayer when through the drift
Of shadow and of care we reach
A loving, helping hand to lift

To lives around us, to beseech
The sunlight for them and the cheer
Of a more favoring atmosphere,
And putting hate and anger by,
Bring heaven a little bit more near
And Christ more nigh!

SOME SANITARIUM VERSE

By Ethel I. Skank

Our Sanitarium

With night for his covering, earth for his bed,
And naught for his pillow but stones,
Our Jacob of old dreamed a wonderful dream;
A wonderful vision was shown.

What cared he for hardships, with heavens unveiled
And angels descending to view?
What pain or distress but requited can be
By blessings from heaven like dew?

With ills that were many and suffering keen,
With the knife of the surgeon to dread,
A patient lay pondering; peace filled her soul
As she realized where she'd been led.

'Twas our Sanitarium wherein she lay,
And devoted her nurses, she knew.
So self-sacrificing—a blessing themselves
From heaven—these nurses so true.

The superintendent, beloved by them all,
Directing with firmness and love;
And by her sweet ministries brought to their hearts
The spirit of peace from above.

Not the least of these blessings, God-sent, we believe,
Was physician and elder in one.
When skill and efficiency join hands with faith
A blessing of heaven is won.

And what of the elders, ordained of the Lord,
Who willingly came at a word?
What blessings and miracles under their hands
Had been received from the Lord.

The patient took courage; what ill could befall
With the bounties of heaven outheld
To all who would trust him, his blest will to do?
Or what that was best be withheld?

Ah! our Sanitarium! Would you might feel
The Spirit by which it is blessed;
And how the good Lord blesses all who trust him
And gives to each that which is best.

My Bit of Blue

As seen through a west window of the Sanitarium. The "bit of blue" was revealed above the sash curtain where the nurse carefully kept the shade raised for my especial pleasure.

To my snow-white bed, whence I cannot stir,
Comes a glimpse of the great, wide world.
And 'tis mine, all mine, to admire, to love,
Sunny hillside or grass, dew-pearled.
And atop is my bit of blue.

There are wind-tossed trees where the birdies dwell
So secure in their precious homes.
Happy households they with their fledglings wee
And their bursts of merry tones.
And a-top is my bit of blue.

'Cross my bit of blue skim the chimney swifts;
And a great, black crow flaps by;
It is high, so high sails the light-winged hawk—
Wondrous airships of my sky,
Peace-planes of my bit of blue.

On the blue sky sea sail the white cloud boats,
Bearing angels methinks away
From this house of love where they minister
To the suffering ones each day.
Ah! I bless my bit of blue!

Find your bit of blue in this wide, wide world.
It is yours; none can say you may.
Find refreshing vales or the sun-kissed slopes
That will cheer you along life's way.
Find, oh, find your bit of blue.

The Tinkle in the Glass

One of the most pleasant sounds to be heard in the Sanitarium is the tinkle of the ice in the glasses of water being carried to the patients any time of day or night.

I hear a tinkle, tinkle in the glass,
A pleasant tinkle, tinkle as they pass—
These white-capped nurses, true and good,
Who're bearing relief to those who would
Enjoy the tinkle, tinkle in the glass.

Oh, the tinkle that I hear like distant chimes,
It carries me away to other times
When more of joy and less of pain,
When more of sunshine, less of rain
Had given life more rhythm and more rhyme.

I love the tinkle, tinkle in the glass,
The jolly tinkle, tinkle as they pass—
These white-capped nurses, true and good,
Who're bearing relief to those who would
Enjoy the ice that tinkles in the glass.

Waiting to Get Up

After several weeks of lying prostrate, the desire to get up, to sit up, or even to have a "back rest" became very great. But day after day the desire was denied. Finally this note to my much-loved nurse, Mrs. Vesey, found its way to her:

There are patients that are easy,
There are patients, Mrs. Vesey,
'Twere a joy to give your very best of care,
But the patience I am tracking,
Is the patience that is lacking,
When the doctors fail to say the word, "Up, there."

Every day in vain I listen,
Every day the teardrops glisten
When the doctors fail to say the magic words.
But you just wait, the time is coming
When you'll hear the silent humming
Of the most patient "shout" from patient ever heard.

(In a few days I was permitted to sit up. No thanks to the jingle, however.)

History of Sanitarium Nurses' Training School

By Laura E. Mann

[We are sorry that the time allowed us in getting together material for this number was so short we could not secure a picture of Sister Laura E. Mann, principal of nurses' training school and writer of this article.—EDITORS.]

In the year 1909, the month of October, the Independence Sanitarium began its "service to God and humanity," with Jennie Weed, now Mrs. Jennie Young, and Mary Weise, now Mrs. Mary Moats, in charge.

The first pupils to enter the school were Clara Haberlein and Ina Cockerton. They entered June 10, 1910; others followed, but out of the class Ina Cockerton was the only one to graduate. This she did on October 1, 1912. Though she has not had the best of health, she has always been active in the interests of the school. She served in the Army during the late war and is a woman of the highest quality and character, and one whom we are glad to hold in esteem as our first graduate nurse.

The next class graduated June 4, 1914, and consisted of four members: Elsie O. Barnett, Florence (Young) Smith, Mae (Tudor) Crenshaw, and Bernice (Russell) George.

This class is all married except one, Miss Barnett. She has served as a private duty nurse, hospital superintendent in two different institutions, public health worker with the Red Cross, and army nurse during the war, besides taking a post course at Grace Hospital, Detroit. She is now doing private duty nursing.

Two of the nurses that married have not only been home keepers, but have also been active in public health nursing, mostly with the Kansas City Visiting Nurses Association. Mrs. George served a short time as public health nurse in Independence, under direction of Doctor Harrington.

Mrs. Smith has wielded a good neighborly influence with her neighbors, as have our other married nurses, though she has been in poor health most of the time.

The members of the 1915 class were Leah Veale, Ethel (Kelley) Elliott, Harriet (Miller) Christy, Gela (Cook) Moorman, Lillian (Shirk) Wilson, and Drucilla Messenger. All this class served as private duty nurses for longer or shorter periods.

Miss Messenger has the honor of having been sent to France during the late war. Miss Shirk also served in the Army and after the war married a physician. She resides in New York.

Miss Kelley served as private duty nurse and also in connection with the Children's Home at Lamoni a short time. She married and later died, in March, 1919, making the first loss by death in our ranks.

The class of 1916 consisted of Mabel States, Eva (Shinn) Dearth, Minnie Vesey, Stella Roberts, and myself, Laura E. Mann.

Miss Shinn has married; Miss States and Miss Roberts served in the Army; Miss States has since served at private duty and has for the last two years attended Graceland College. Miss Roberts has done private duty service and was for a few months connected with the church Health Department and served in Holden, Missouri. Her health failed and she was forced to several months' rest. At last hearing concerning her she had resumed private duty service.

Mrs. Vesey has three children, whom she supports. But she has been a very active nurse. She has served at private duty, as home hygiene instructor in the Red Cross, and as assistant church nursing director and home hygiene instructor in connection with the church Health Department.

With the exception of about five months of private duty and six months as home hygiene instructor with the Red Cross, I have served the church directly, either in the Sanitarium or Health Department. I entered training January 4, 1914. [Sister Mann is superintendent of nurses at the Sanitarium at present.—EDITORS.]

There were three in the 1917 class: Bertha (Thorpe) Evers, Elizabeth (Giles) Anderson, and Mabel Wells. Miss Wells served at private duty and also in the Army. The last I heard from her she was doing private duty in New York. The other two served at private duty and married. After marriage Mrs. Anderson served as public health nurse with the Kansas City Visiting Association about one year.

The 1918 class was composed of Myrtle Radmall, May (Richards) Cook, Elizabeth J. Paxton, Edith Troughton, Flossie (Guthrie) Dickens, Ruth Gregory.

Myrtle Radmall served at private duty and as home hygiene instructor in connection with the church Health Department, and Red Cross at Lamoni, Iowa. Also she instructs the hygiene classes of the religious education class of Graceland.

Mrs. Cook served at private duty, took a post course in psychoatrical nursing at Johns Hopkins Hospital. She returned and took a course in Roentgen technique and has since been employed in connection with the X-ray department of the Sanitarium. She has served the institution, including training, about six years. She also gives valuable assistance in the school as one of the instructors.

Miss Paxton, except for two months of private duty, has served in the Sanitarium since November 1, 1915. Since graduation she has either served as night superintendent or day assistant to the principal, altogether nearly six years.

Miss Troughton has served at private duty and taken a post graduate course in peditaries and contagious diseases in Philadelphia, and is this year completing a kindergarten course, as a preparation for a course in occupational therapy, a new field of service in which nurses seem to be in demand.

Mrs. Dickens served at private duty a short time; went to Saint Louis and served as public health nurse under the Saint Louis Visiting Nurses Association. She married, but still follows the nursing profession considerably.

Miss Gregory has done private duty and institutional service in Saint Louis. She is not a member of the church, but has been always held in the highest esteem among our nurses.

In 1919 Margaret Wiley, Idella Neff, Birdie P. Sterrett, Blanche Remington, Myrtle (Phillips) Taylor, Sadye (Butler) Katschkowsky were the graduates.

Miss Wiley and Miss Neff work with the Kansas City Visiting Nurses Association, Miss Wiley among the Mexicans of Swope settlement, Miss Neff as a school nurse.

Miss Sterrett served at private duty a short time, contracted influenza, and died February 10, 1920. We feel that her life was contributed to the nursing cause as truly as ever a life was given to a cause. The words of their class song, which she mostly composed, give a picture of her real character and the life she lived.

Miss Remington served at private duty, and as industrial nurse with the Standard Oil Company, and is now a public health nurse in Saint Louis.

Mrs. Taylor served at private duty a short time as night supervisor in the Sanitarium and is now industrial nurse with the Standard Oil Company. In the meantime she married, and she also keeps up her home besides serving in her profession.

Mrs. Katschkowsky served at private duty before marriage and does so occasionally now.

The class of 1920 consisted of Irene Pope, Bertha Keairnes, Dana (Watts) Ellis, Ina Martin, Laura Martin, Carmean (McClean) Kinsello, Henrietta Dahl, and Victoria Blackburn.

Miss Pope served in a physician's office in Lees Summit and at private duty nursing.

Miss Keairnes at private duty and as head nurse at the Sanitarium a short time.

Mrs. Ellis served at private duty and institutional work in Saint Louis and in February married Elder Clyde Ellis and has since gone on a mission with him to the South Sea Islands.

Mrs. Kinsello and Dahl have served mostly at private duty nursing. Misses Ina and Laura Martin and Miss Blackburn all three do public health nursing in connection with the Kansas City Visiting Nurses Association.

The class of 1921 consisted of Ruby (Hendrix) Pace, Ellen Jepson, Ruth Russell, Margaret Batton, Cleo Larson, Faye Franklin, Ruby Miller, and Hazel Hawley.

Misses Batton, Russell, and Miller are all contemplating starting service with the Sanitarium. They have with the rest of the class been doing private duty. Post courses are also contemplated by some of these nurses.

The class of 1922 is composed of Lettie A. Ralston, Helene Fleet, Vida Sutterfield, and Carrie Russell.

Just what they will do to add to the general good that is being done by this body of professional women is yet to be seen. Of course we are hoping and expecting them to assume their part of the world's work and responsibility with an even greater determination to serve than have the previous graduates, for we believe that in many respects the training school has been improved and they go forth better trained and better equipped at a time when the world is giving trained nursing service a more hearty welcome. It is also more confident, though expecting a greater service, which expectation they share with us.

Summary

Total number of graduates, 47.

All have done private duty nursing.

Seven served in the Army.

One was sent to France.

Eight have held important positions in hospitals.

Twelve have done one or the other, public health or industrial nursing.

Two served in the Red Cross as home hygiene instructors.

Four in the church Health Department.

During the war and in the influenza and typhoid epidemics all worked to the very limit of their physical endurance.

Two have died: Miss Kelley and Miss Sterrett.

Seventeen have married.

An alumnae association has been maintained by them which affiliates with the District, State, and National American Nurses Associations.

To stop with data of the graduates of the school would be telling only a part of the real story of the nursing at the Sanitarium, for those that have been in charge know well another part. Perhaps to a very large extent it is due to their efforts that all but two of the Sanitarium nurses passed the State Board Examinations successfully. Miss Ethel Kelley never took it, and Miss Birdie Sterret died before an opportunity came. We have no doubt of their ability to have passed, and as a total result we are proud of this fact concerning the Sanitarium nurses.

As nearly as I have been able hurriedly to gather the data, the women who have contributed service to the school were in rotation as follows:

Miss Jennie Weed was first in charge, with Miss Mary Weise assistant. Miss Weed stayed only a few months and then Miss Weise became superintendent. Miss Mary E. Howell followed her, and at Miss Howell's resignation Miss Elsie O. Barnett took the position temporarily, and served a few months only. Miss Olive W. Cook succeeded her, but only stayed with the institution about six months, and Miss Sarah M. Rodgers, who had come as her assistant, became superintendent. At her resignation Laura E. Mann, who was assistant, became superintendent. When she resigned, Miss Paxton, who was assisting her, became superintendent until Miss Rodgers returned to the school a couple of months later. Miss Rodgers resigned again June 1, 1921, and Mrs. Loma (Dixon) Johnson and her assistant, Carmean McClean, took charge for one month, until July 1, 1921, when Miss Laura E. Mann with Miss Elizabeth Paxton again took charge.

Others have served as night supervisors and are Drucilla Messenger, Myrtle Taylor, Minnie Vesey, Cleo Larson, Henrietta Dahl, Lillie Ralston, and Ruby Miller. Their terms were short.

Those nurses who have served from one to three or more years are: Mary E. (Weise) Moats, Mary E. Howell, Sarah M. (Rodgers) Chapman, Laura E. Mann.

These are the women who have in the true sense of the word carried on the work and brought the school up to its present state of efficiency. Two other nurses who have rendered long and perhaps equally valuable services are Mrs. May (Richards) Cook and Miss Elizabeth J. Paxton.

Mrs. Cook has been in connection with the X-ray and laboratory departments and has been loyal and earnest in the interests of the school, teaching the subjects assigned her willingly and cheerfully.

Miss Paxton has served as assistant, always doing her portion with anxiety and interest for the good of the school. She finished training during the first influenza epidemic, and after this epidemic the institution was awarded one thousand dollars by the Red Cross. She was directly in charge at the influenza building and perhaps if credit on this earth can be fairly given it should in this case be to her and the loyal nurses of the school who assisted her.

There is one other woman who should have honorable mention: Miss Maude Miller, who served during the fall of 1913 and spring of 1914 as instructor for the training school. With the exception of this year the various courses are assigned to the physicians who practice here and the superintendent and her assistants.

During the past year thirty-eight courses or subjects were taught and all the instructing was done without charge, excepting the chemistry course, for which we paid thirty dollars and for four suppers.

During the first semester classes were held from one to five in the afternoon and in the evening, daily—except Saturday and Sunday, and also from ten to twelve, three forenoons of the week.

To lessen the load and also to take advantage of bettering the course, we are endeavoring to affiliate each year with Junior College, Kansas City, which provides at public expense a twenty-week preliminary nursing course for beginners, under expert instructors.

In order to do this we must require all candidates to have at least two years of high school education.

We are also affiliating with Mercy Hospital in Kansas City, to provide our pupils with training in children's diseases. These two provisions added to our already good training in medical and surgical diseases with our obstetric department, and the emergencies which come to us from the surrounding community and Standard Oil Company give an excellent variety of cases which gives our institution opportunity to rank high as a training school; and with enough support in a financial way to employ efficient and sufficient registered nurses for instructors and supervisors, we see no reason why our school has not the opportunity to be listed among the very best. As one proof that we stand for higher and better education, we ask for candidates and would like them to be prepared with a high school education, college education also, if possible, to keep our ranks filled, for in training as well as after the finish of the course we have opportunity to serve God individually and collectively. Shall we fail because the church will not supply the candidates? Shall we fail because the public will not supply the finance? Shall we stop now, while the school is but begun? Would it not please God more for us to continue educating women for service, and make that education better and better by the proper support, that a greater and more far-reaching service may be rendered? Is not the proper care of the sick and prevention of disease one of the greatest proofs we can offer to God that we are a religious people?

Ideals of the Nursing Profession

By Mary Weise Mouts

Service is the keystone from which all ideals radiate. There are several factors to be considered in forming that keystone: earnestness of purpose, intense interest in humanity, cooperation, intelligence, education, vision, adaptability, and observation, which are all very closely interlinked.

It was the service to humanity rendered by the good Samaritan that has made his act unforgotten during the ages since. It was the ideals visioned by Florence Nightingale that inspired her to accomplish the great work she did during the Crimean War, and later, in establishing training schools where others might catch these ideals and prepare themselves to render ideal service.

In order to give ideal service, there are obligations, duties if you prefer, to humanity (the patient); to the attending physician; and finally, those to self.

I shall discuss the duties to "self" first; for unless one is physically fit she is not capable of rendering the best service; therefore she must live right, paying proper attention to the laws of health. Her moral code must be of the highest, else her influence will not be such that will be a true service; then, too, she must be in tune with the Great Server of all mankind, from whom she receives her strength. No really good nurse can dispense with knowledge; she must be trained in the art of caring for the sick, therefore it is essential that she study diligently and unceasingly all things pertaining to that profession.

Her duty to the physician is one of responsibility during his absence; his eyes in observing symptoms, both physical and mental; his servant and assistant in obeying orders for the best care and recovery of the patient.

Her duty to the patient is one of loyal service, given in such a way that the sick one is assisted to a recovery of health.

The ideal nurse must many times be the peg that fits either round or square holes; hers must be the trained mind and skilled hands to meet many emergencies; her strength, capability, and serenity must be an anchor during the storm of illness. She must "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good," and "study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth"; which in her special sphere is service to humanity.

The ideals of the nursing profession are especially well presented in the following Nightingale Pledge:

"I solemnly pledge myself before God and this assembly to pass my life in purity and to practice my profession faithfully. I will abstain from whatever is deleterious and mischievous, and will not take or knowingly administer any harmful drug.

"I will do all in my power to elevate the standard of my profession, and to hold in confidence all personal matters committed to my keeping, and all family affairs coming to my knowledge in the practice of my profession. With loyalty will I endeavor to aid the physician in his work and to devote myself to the welfare of those committed to my care."

Influence of Nurses' Training on Character Building and Religious Instinct

By Elizabeth J. Paxton, R. N.

Jesus is our wonderful pattern for religious living, and as we become efficient in our care of the sick we are weaving into the fabric of our character the greatest of all virtues: love. The tender compassion of our Savior for all the sick and suffering, which eventually must be, if it does not already exist in her motives, is the incentive that keeps the nurse at her post of duty doing the disagreeable tasks that come to her at times during long, tedious hours; and in this beautiful sacrifice on the altar of service she finds the key to true happiness, forgetfulness of self, and thereby inheritance to eternal life.

In living this unselfish life she unconsciously but surely makes for herself a character in which is found humility, honesty, and purity. Humility in that she must do humble tasks and obey the instructions of those in authority; honesty or truth, the foundation of all virtue, must become a part of her life, because into her hands is put a precious life whose welfare depends on her strict and honest attention to the smallest details; purity must come to her as she comes to a greater realization of Nature's laws in the human body. As she obeys Nature's laws she obeys God's laws, for they are one and the same.

The girl who will conscientiously go through her three years of training will have that priceless possession, a Christ-like character, as a reward.

A God-Ordained Institution

Hearing that you were arranging for a Sanitarium number I felt I should contribute my mite in its interest. Having been under the care of Doctor John R. Green for two weeks as the result of an accident while in my field, I must say that I received the best of care under conditions that were most favorable. The nurses were surely "angels of mercy" in their wonderful mission.

When I remember the early morning service of songs and prayers before the day's cares were taken up, the influence of that devotion could be felt throughout the day in that God-ordained institution. May it ever be sustained for the benefit of our suffering ones. As I have labored in some of the large branches of our district in Michigan, telling of the Sanitarium and its noble purposes, I have advised the department of women's work to provide sheets, pillowcases, napkins, cotton cloths, etc., that are always much needed there as a means of help, thus showing our interest in the upkeep of such things as are in constant demand, and so lighten the burden of expense in that direction.

Wishing you Godspeed in your mission of mercy to suffering humanity, I am

Faithfully,
WILLIAM I. FLIGG.

LETTERS AND NEWS

Independence

National Hospital Day, which is the dominant theme of this number of the HERALD, is being observed extensively in Independence, not only as a day, (May 12,) but on Sunday, the 7th, a speaker at each church in the city and Kansas City Stake used the subject as a basis for an address to the Saints.

On the 12th, from 12 to 8 p. m., the Sanitarium will be open to visitors and all are invited to attend. At 3 p. m. all mothers of children born in the Sanitarium are asked to bring them to the institution.

On Wednesday evening of this week each prayer service in the thirty-eight groups of Independence is to be visited by a speaker and a nurse to give short talks on the Sanitarium and its needs.

The sacrament service at the Stone Church was a forward step in administration, a few changes in the system of serving the emblems saving considerable time, to the advantage of the expressional side of the service. Yet the same problem exists here as is met with in other communities: the proper distribution of the time to the members who zealously occupy to the exclusion of many others who could and would if permitted. It seems as though this is an excellent opportunity for the manifestation of our development, which implies complete control of ourselves that the Spirit may operate fully.

The Sunday school attendance ran over fourteen hundred, and almost fourteen hundred were served with the emblems in the upper auditorium alone, with a young people's service practically filling the basement at the same hour.

Bishop B. R. McGuire has been in Colorado on a business trip for the church the past few days. He will likely return this week.

The members of the joint council spent the latter part of the week in fasting and prayer and meditation, with several prayer services made up of their own members; a part of their effort was to acquire divine light for their trying duties. Brethren Rushton and Griffiths took prominent part in directing the sacrament service, and T. W. Williams was the speaker in the afternoon at the monthly problems meeting, using as a subject, "Foreign missions." He spoke forcibly and convincingly in favor of an extensive foreign mission policy, carried out as quickly and thoroughly as our means and willingness to sacrifice to its success will allow. He reaffirmed his statement published in the HERALD some two years ago, that it is time for many large communities to give up their presiding officers in favor of thousands of others in foreign lands who hunger and thirst after righteousness. He would not disrupt the local work, but create a situation whereby the Saints would support and honor the other local men, who with less experience might serve efficiently if the situation demanded.

In this connection the decision of the Joint Council to use the 1922 Christmas offering for foreign missionary work is interesting.

A James Whitcomb Riley program was the feature of the Religio last Friday evening. Doctor Runnels was a good interpreter of Riley, but the building was too large for his voice to penetrate the area well. Next Friday evening there will be a debate on "Resolved, That the world is getting better." T. W. Williams will affirm and J. F. Curtis deny.

On Sunday evening an appreciated organ recital was given by Robert Miller, organist at the Stone Church, assisted by George Miller pianist, Emma Snead violinist, George Anway vocalist, and the choir. The speakers of the hour were Doctors John R. Green and G. Leonard Harrington, in a plea for wider appreciation of the real ideals of the Sanitarium as a center of the activities which should and will characterize a health department of value to all Saints.

The committee has arranged to hold the reunion of Zion on the newly acquired church property known as the golf links, in south Independence, sometimes called Gudge Park. It is a pretty spot, well kept, and three minutes' walk from the street car line. Some necessary accommodations will be installed and everything done to make the place ideal for a reunion. Very satisfactory prices on tents have been secured and will be announced in an early number of the HERALD.

The radio sermon was delivered Sunday evening by Elder F. J. Lewis, on "A living faith." He was supported by a male quartet under direction of Frank H. Criley.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium during the week ending May 6: Mrs. Violet Starbuck and Baby Starbuck, Mount Washington, Missouri; Mrs. Anna Dumsky, Sugar Creek, Missouri; Mr. Thomas L. Crenshaw, Blue Springs, Missouri; Mr. Orville Hartley, Lees Summit, Missouri; Baby Anna Ruth Baker, Lone Jack, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Mr. Ellis Short, Mrs. Emma Atkinson, Miss Frances Barnhard, John Pennell, J. wisely and rightly all human knowledge. To knowingly violate the laws of health and then call for administration hardly seems to be sensible. Not to inform ourselves as to the laws of health is not wise. Sickness involves a violation of the law of God. Matthew 9:2; John 9:2; James 5:15. Luke was the beloved physician. Thomas B. Marsh was called to be a physician to the church as early as September, 1830. (Doctrine and Covenants 30:4.) Joseph Luff was called by revelation in 1906 to be a physician to the church (127:2), and later G. Leonard Harrington has been appointed and set apart for this work.

A Place for Divine Healing Through Faith

But seventh, there is a need for a sanitarium as provided for in the revelation, a place where the sick may be removed from influences and environment unfavorable to the exercise of proper faith unto the healing of the sick; a place to demonstrate the efficacy of divine healing. At present the elders are always welcome for administration in the Sanitarium. Every morning the nurses hold a short devotional service, usually with an outside speaker and a couple of hymns. Those in charge feel the need of divine help, but they also feel at times the need of a quiet place more favorable to the exercise of a more devoted faith.

As citizens of the community, as citizens of the world, we have a responsibility to do our share in providing hospital facilities. In the work of the hospital, whether for operation, for the cure of contagious diseases, a sanitarium for tubercular patients, an institution for the care of delinquents, for those requiring attention for the cure of nervous and mental maladies, and even in the field of public health and preventive medicine, while there is a possibility of leadership in some respects, we are still offering what is offered elsewhere in the world.

But in the Sanitarium as originally provided, a place for the healing of the sick through faith, a place conducing to the exercise of faith and combined therewith attention to the ordinary laws of health, hygiene, and sanitation, there is a distinctive work for this church.

It has been well suggested that these various functions of the hospital are part of our general community and national life, that we cannot afford to lag behind in any particular, but that we should deliberately take them up one by one, concentrate upon each for a time until we have a representative institution; then proceed to another; so that as a people those who work there and the rest of us should be willing to sacrifice to make this work and its surroundings beautiful and efficient. That is true, but it is also true that with all science can do for us we must also greatly increase our receptivity for divine grace. And we must also learn to keep the law of God to keep well.

The Future Sanitarium

In the Sanitarium of the future we look for one in which will be shown the best that medical science can provide for every department, for the cure and prevention of physical illness, nurses trained and training for work in the home as well as in the hospital and sanitarium, the work fully organized under the health department, and these doctors and nurses inspired and blessed by the Spirit of God in their labors. But especially will we expect to find that which is set forth first in the plans for the Sanitarium, a place where with reasonable care facilities are given for the administration to the sick and where the blessings of divine healing will be received in greater measure than at present or at any time within the recent past. As a part of the church it will function in accordance with divine command for the healing of the sick, and it will also be open to every advantage of any knowledge that our students can possibly bring to bear.

Our Limited Knowledge

Though we are wondrously wise in many developments of science, it is as a drop in the ocean compared with what we do not know.

When a charter was asked for the first railroad to be operated by steam, in England, a member of Parliament protested against the bill, and declared that ruin would follow the use of such an instrument, that the cows, filled with terror, by the awful monster, would refuse to give down their milk, and that thousands of people would thereby suffer.

When it was proposed to send a ship across the Atlantic Ocean by means of steam, a presumed mathematician figured out that if sufficient coal were placed in the ship, it would sink at its dock. In fact, it was absolutely proved scientifically and mathematically that a ship could not possibly cross the Atlantic under steam power.

The only flaw in the reasoning was that just about that time several ships did cross the Atlantic under steam.

It is also related that in 1830 a clerk working in the patent office at Washington, resigned because everything worth while had already been invented, and he did not believe there would be sufficient work to justify his wages.

When we think of the development of the world since 1830, it seems astonishing that anyone should be so shortsighted. Instead of its being the end, it was rather the beginning of the most wonderful century in the history of the world, one which brought forth greater inventions and mechanical improvements than had the whole previous two thousand years. Space would forbid an adequate picture at that time, and of the remarkable changes which have occurred in every department of human knowledge.

It would seem that when men contemplate such facts as these, they would be very slow in attempting to say of any effort in the physical field, "It is impossible." While it is true that we know more about the laws of nature than did our forefathers of a hundred years ago, those who are best informed, not the ignoramus, are, above all, impressed with the grave limitations of our knowledge and of the fact that we cannot say of any event in the physical world that it is impossible. Great as our present knowledge is, it is still but a drop in the ocean compared to that which we do not know.

Judge Not Unrighteously

For judging is the measure of man.

"Judge not unrighteously, that ye be not judged; but judge righteous judgment. For with what judgment ye shall judge, ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again." (Matthew 7: 2, 3.)

It is rarely that we realize that our judgment of others is so often not a judgment of the man whom we criticize, but rather of ourselves. It is as though we said, "If I were in his place, I should be guilty of such and such things." It is remarkable how often this fact may be observed, so it is not at all remarkable that those who are quick to condemn others, quick to accuse others of falsehood or dishonesty, will soon find their own motives called in question.

Human memory is fallible. Our brother may have forgotten the instance to which we refer, but our memory is also fallible, and we, too, may not remember with certainty.

Again, how many are able to pass through life without being once in a position which could be misconstrued or misunderstood? There will be opportunities for wrongdoing; there will arise conditions in which a man or woman could have done wrong, if he chose so to do; but even the law of the land recognizes in such cases that there must be not only opportunity but also disposition.

How much rather, then, should the Saints of God consider first of all character, those splendid men and women who are tried, proven, and found worthy, of God, those who hold so high their privilege and obligation as sons and daughters of God that nothing could tempt them aside from the path of righteousness.

There are evil men, persons who would be glad to create circumstances which would appear to indicate wrongdoing. Such attempts have been made in the church in days that are past; they may occur again. It behooves us to judge righteously and ac-

ording to the truth, and that includes not only the outward acts but also the character and disposition of the individual.

Again, we have been surprised many times to note a strong accusation brought against another when the very evidence that is produced would condemn also the accuser. We should never judge another with a stronger judgment than we are willing to face ourselves. "Judge not unrighteously, that ye be not judged, but judge righteous judgment."

The Value of Right Habits, Right Attitudes, and Knowledge

Good attitudes and habits are considered of more importance than knowledge.

Some two years ago, the General Sunday School Association appointed a Consulting Board. Those who have been members and have attended its various meetings consist of Floyd M. McDowell, of Graceland College, who has a Doctor of Philosophy degree; A. Max Carmichael, superintendent of schools at Lamoni, who has also done considerable post graduate work (these men are also the heads of the Boy Movement and the General Sunday School Association respectively); Mrs. R. S. Sal-yards, who has been a close student for many years, and editor of many of our Sunday school quarterly lessons and to whom certainly the accuracy of fact and the importance of knowledge make a deep appeal; Mrs. Walter W. Smith, who has been taking summer school work for many years and engaged in institute work in Philadelphia and now in Independence, Missouri; and S. A. Burgess, the associate editor of the HERALD.

Certainly all of these are people to whom the value of knowledge would make a very strong appeal. There are some who feel that the tendency and emphasis is placed too much on the value of abstract knowledge.

But it seems indeed significant and has been indeed a source of surprise to note that, after this board had held repeated meetings stating the aims of each of our present five quarterlies and for a sixth, a young people's quarterly, after they had attempted to evaluate these aims, duly considered content and then laid aside and had restated the aims, some being restated three times after being revised, critically analyzed as to value of answer and content, when this evaluation had been thus tested and worked over, they had listed for each a list of habits, a list of attitudes, and a list of knowledges and then had arranged a collection of habits, attitudes, and knowledges in the order of their importance, doing this critically for the ages represented by each quarterly. It was indeed a source of surprise when the work was completed, to discover that the most stress had been placed upon habits for three of the quarterlies and that the most stress was placed on attitudes for the three remaining quarterlies.

Nor was this all, because a further checking revealed that first in importance habits was placed three times and the second in importance, attitudes was placed three times. That meant that for the Sunday school student of religion from three to twenty-five years of age, knowledge was placed last in importance, right habits and right attitudes being in each case of primary and secondary value.

Of course, in fairness we recognize that upon right knowledge is founded better habits and better attitudes.

Some psychologists will place habits also before attitudes, yet it is clear that many habits are in a sense at least, the outgrowth of right attitudes and we do not progress simply in one way alone. With wider knowledge our attitudes become more nearly correct; and again, with right attitudes, there are inculcated better habits. It is doubtless true that for much of education right habits come first psychologically, but it is true also that in importance for education, right habits and right attitudes are more important than right knowledges, by no means minimizing the importance of accurate and right thinking. As the Master has stated, if we continue in his work, then we shall know the truth and the truth shall make us free.

Daniel F. Lambert Passes

For the past few years Daniel F. Lambert has been in failing health, and during the past few months his condition has been recognized as critical. Yet this did not lessen the sorrow of those who have known him best when the news was received that he passed away the morning of the 9th.

Brother Lambert was born on November 15, 1850, and was baptized May 27, 1864. In August, 1869, he was ordained a teacher and the following November an elder. His brother, J. R. Lambert, in his autobiography in the Church History, paid him a high tribute and states that his younger brother Daniel was instrumental in reinteresting him in the work of the church.

Then, in those earlier years they labored together as missionaries, beginning in January, 1873. In December he went with John H. Lake to Farmington. As the result of his labors that one year several were baptized both in Hancock County and in Iowa. At the April conference, 1873, he was ordained a counselor to the president of the Second Quorum of Elders, and the Church History reports him as still holding that office in 1877. In the fall of 1874, after locating his home in Harrison County, Iowa, he was clerk in the semiannual conference at Council Bluffs. In August, 1877, he reported the Forscutt-Shinn debate in shorthand, this report being afterward issued by the Herald Publishing House as a tract.

In 1884, he was appointed by the General Conference, with W. C. Cadwell and Alice Cobb to prepare and furnish Sunday school lessons. In the fall of 1885 he was appointed on a committee with Henry A. Stebbins and Rudolph Etzenhouser to collect the resolutions of General Conference. He was at one time assistant editor of the SAINTS' HERALD, doing much of the necessary editorial work. In May, 1901, he was chosen as assistant historian and so continued for nearly ten years as an assistant to Heman C. Smith. As such, he was one of the editors of the Journal of History from its beginning until the middle of the fourth volume; in other words, from January, 1908, through the April issue in 1911.

He also served on the revising committee of the Sunday school and a few years ago spent much time alone laying the basis for a concordance to the Inspired Version of the Scriptures. This latter work was at the request and appointment of the Board of Publication and authorized by the General Conference.

Aside from his church work he was also much interested in educational matters. He taught in the public schools of Lamoni for twenty-five years in various capacities, including superintendent, and so taught many who are prominent in the work of the church to-day. He was also on the first board of trustees of Graceland College.

For many years he was editor of the Lamoni Independent Patriot and was well and widely known as an orator of ability.

The Dedication at Saint Louis

(Editorial Correspondence.)

On May 14 the Saint Louis Branch presented their new church edifice to be dedicated to the service of God. President Elbert A. Smith and Bishop B. R. McGuire came down for the day, President Smith preaching a soul-stirring sermon on, "The word made flesh," presenting Jesus as the hope and ideal of the whole world and urging the Saints to dedicate their lives to Christ.

Bishop McGuire presented the edifice to God in a very earnest dedicatory prayer which brought the tears to the eyes of many. He spoke at night on the Lord's Prayer—"Thy will be done."

The service was well balanced, from the prelude and invocation to the benediction and postlude, and was completed in less than an hour and a half. So the large audience which crowded the auditorium and church parlors was not wearied.

The music was decidedly inspirational, especially the dedicatory anthem, "How beautiful are thy dwellings," and the dedicatory hymn which beautifully expressed the spirit of the hour:

Behold Thy Temple

Dedication Hymn—By Palmer

Behold thy temple, God of grace,
The house that we have reared to thee,
Regard it as thy resting place
And fill it with thy majesty.

When from its altar shall arise
Joint supplication to thy name,
Deign to accept the sacrifice,
Thyself our answering God proclaim.

And when from hence the voice of praise
Shall lift its triumph to thy throne,
Show thine acceptance of our lays,
By making here thy glory known.

When here thy ministers shall stand,
To speak what thou shalt bid them say,
Maintain thy cause with thine own hand,
And give thy truth a winning way.

Now, therefore, O our God, arise;
In this thy resting place appear,
And let thy people's longing eyes
Behold thee fix thy dwelling here.

When Oliver Cowdery, Peter Whitmer, Parley P. Pratt, and Ziba Peterson were sent by revelation to the Indians, they passed through Saint Louis in December, 1830. About then the work was established there, though at first the number of members was small. After the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith in 1844 it became a sort of gathering place, especially for those who came from Europe. To them in 1863 came the news of young Joseph coming forward to take the presidency of the church, and in 1864, Henry Cuerdon and William Anderson, of Montrose, Iowa, came and organized the branch on February 7 with seventeen members.

Of these there were present only one survivor, Elder Noah N. Cook, but there are some twenty-four or twenty-five who have been members for more than fifty years, and of these fourteen were present at the service.

For nearly twenty-five years the branch met in various halls, but in October, 1888, moved into a small church building at 2516 Elliott Avenue. This was dedicated in 1891 by Joseph Smith, J. W. Gillen, and Joseph Luff. It was sold in 1900 at some gain over the cost of erection. A stone church was purchased at Glasgow and Dickens Streets at an initial cost of $3,500 and a total cost at dedication, May 20, 1906, of $7,000 to $7,500.

This in turn was sold in 1917 for $10,000, though it would cost many times that to have reproduced it. The present building was purchased at a bargain, fully equipped, for $20,000, but stands to-day at something over $25,000. The church is one of the best equipped we have, with pipe organ, auditorium, study, parlors, office, nursery, Sunday school auditorium, kitchen, beginner room, primary room, separate classrooms, and several pianos. It represents a steady gain in value for this branch.

One of the first Sunday schools since the Reorganization was the Zion's Hope Sunday School, of Saint Louis, organized early in 1863. This school gave the name to our first church Sunday school paper, Zion's Hope. It is undoubtedly, we believe, the oldest Sunday school in the church. Saint Louis has also been very active in the Religio Department and has always supplied one or more of the general officers of that department since its organization in 1893.

The present enrollment of the branch is 493. Many have gone out to greater service in other branches.

The day was a notable one in the history of the Saint Louis Branch and the church as a whole.

Elder Russell Archibald, who has been pastor over twelve years out of the past thirty and is now acting in that capacity, and C. Ed. Miller, of the missionary force of the church, will conduct a series of services leading up to the district conference May 27 and 28.

S. A. BURGESS.

Jews May Use Unfermented Wine

The following item, taken from Current Opinion, brings up an interesting question, as it has been urged that fermented wine was the only proper sacramental beverage, according to the Bible, especially the Old Testament. It now appears that it either was an inaccurate text or else a too hasty examination of the text that caused this conclusion to be reached. The decision is stated to be that of the Rabbinical Assembly of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York City.

One of the long and fierce controversies of the early days of the prohibition agitation was whether the Old Testament commended the use of fermented wine and the New Testament enjoined its use in the sacrament. Many books and pamphlets have been published on the subject. The controversy has pivoted on the question whether the Hebrew words yayin and tirosh, in the Old Testament, and the Greek word oinos, in the New, meant unfermented wine or fermented wine, or both. A few days ago the Rabbinical Assembly of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York City met and after an eight-hour discussion reached a unanimous decision that it is proper for Jewish families to use unfermented wine for all religious purposes. This action followed the reading of a paper by Professor Louis Ginzberg, an authority on the Talmud, in which he demonstrated to the satisfaction of his hearers that the centuries-old custom of the Jews of using only fermented wines is due to an error of one of the Jewish codifiers of a Book of Customs, the author of which was Rabbi Abraham Klausner. Either the codifier, says Professor Ginzberg, did not have the original text before him, or he examined it too hastily."

History of Northeast Manchester Branch

In the April number of the Journal of History there appears a short article by Fred Topping, giving a sketch of the history of the Bradford, the Northeast Manchester Branch in England.

The work there was started by a man named Clark, was continued by Elder Armstrong and others, and a branch was organized by Joseph Dewsnup and Henry Greenwood. They were fortunate in securing a building formerly occupied by the Christian Brethren. In a few years it was found that money expended towards improvements was practically wasted so arrangements were made to secure the land and erect a good brick building. By close sacrifice and self-denial, by gathering small amounts, they have paid for the building, installed a baptismal font and electric lights.

Many of the old-timers have passed away, those who bore the burden of the work in this time of building, but quite an army of young people have grown up to take their place.

A Form of Godliness but Denying the Power

There is a decided movement in the religious world towards a recognition of the fact that religion means human effort and service to man. Perhaps it is not surprising that some former ministers would carry it still farther and reject all supernaturalism, reject the Bible as divine, and simply present what they call a new scientific religion. This is one of the unfortunate aspects. It is quite true that a man should not cover his evil deeds with a cloak of religion. It is quite true that the personal interest in the brotherhood of man, which is to us an immediate responsibility, is by far the most important. The best preparation we can make for a future life is to deal justly with all men here. It is a most vital and essential part of our religion.

But to exclude entirely the fatherhood of God, to reject the word of God in the name of religion, to reject the immortality of the soul, is, of course, to make a mistake scarcely less on the other side. We note that some ministers are, however, now assuming that attitude, though it is not yet general.

Our Relationship to Christ

By Hyrum O. Smith

Radio sermon broadcasted from studio of the Central Radio Company, Kansas City, Missouri, April 23, 1922.

About two thousand years ago there was born into this world an idealist. Others, perhaps, have been born before and since, but this man enjoyed the unique distinction of having his advent heralded through prophecy. These prophecies were worded in such a way that not only was his advent foretold, but the importance of his work and the effect it would have upon the world were plainly made known. An effort was made, too, to impress upon those who might hear or read what their relationship to this coming man should be.

The first statement to which we shall refer is found in the forty-ninth chapter of Genesis and tenth verse, and reads:

The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh¹ come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.

According to the accepted chronology this was uttered about seventeen hundred years before the birth of the man to whom the language refers. This means that for seventeen hundred years a reigning house was to rule over Israel, but upon the advent of this wondrous man all of these seventeen hundred years of allegiance should be immediately transferred to him. It would be difficult to express in so few words a more weighty message than is conveyed here, and one that would impress the reader with a greater sense of the importance of this personage that was to appear some time in the world's history.

A Deliverer From God

Our next prophecy is found in Deuteronomy 18: 18, 19, and reads:

I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him. And it shall come to pass that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him.

Instinctively we feel that our spiritual salvation must come from above, that man cannot raise man higher than himself, and if we are to be prepared to meet God, the plan through which this shall be accomplished must come from God. In this prophecy of the man that should come this instinct is appealed to, and we are assured that the message this man shall deliver will be from God. Again, we instinctively feel that we must render account to God for the deeds done here in the body, and this feeling is appealed to in the language:

And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him.

This, we believe, is one of the strongest and most potent of all the influences that act as restraints upon the lives of men. Take it away and who can imagine the result? Thus our responsibility to God is appealed to and we are told that as we react to this man's message so will God require it of us when we stand before his throne. Certainly we should approach his message with fear lest we should reject that which has come from God, and thus meet with his condemnation.

Results of Accepting Christ

Not only are we told to look for this man, but we are told, long before he came into the world, the results of accepting his message socially, spiritually, and morally, also the attitude that men would take towards him, and what they would say of him. This is found in Isaiah 9: 6, and reads:

Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace.

"His name shall be called Wonderful!" Among all the sons of men, not one has ever occupied the place that Christ occupies to-day in the hearts of men. We do not have to turn to the testimony of his followers for certificates of his character. Some of the grandest eulogies of his character are found from the pens and lips of those who considered him a mere man, with no claims to divinity. John Stuart Mill, one of the most philosophical of infidels, has this to say of him:

Above all, the most valuable part of the effect on the character which Christianity has produced by holding up in a Divine Person a standard of excellence and a model for imitation, is available even to the absolute unbeliever and can never be lost to humanity. For it is Christ, rather than God, whom Christianity has held up to believers as the pattern of perfection to humanity. It is the God incarnate more than the God of the Jews or of Nature, who being idealized has taken so great and salutary a hold on the modern mind. And whatever else may be taken away from us by rational criticism, Christ is still left; a unique figure not more unlike all his precursors than all his followers, even those who had the direct benefit of his personal teachings.

Men have undertaken to assert that Christ is not historical; that all the history of him and his sayings was the work of some man's imagination; his doctrines were the result of other minds, but Mr. Mill sets this claim aside by stating, following the above quotations:

It is no use to say that Christ as exhibited in the gospels is not historical and that we know not how much of what is admirable has been superadded by the tradition of his followers. The tradition of followers suffices to insert any number of marvels, and may have inserted all the miracles which he is reputed to have wrought. But who among his disciples or among their proselytes was capable of inventing the sayings ascribed to Jesus or of imagining the life and character revealed in the Gospels? Certainly not the fishermen of Galilee; as certainly not Saint Paul, whose character and idiosyncrasies were of a totally different sort; still less the early Christian writers in whom nothing is more evident than that the good which was in them was all derived, as they always professed that it was derived, from the higher source. . . . But about the life and sayings of Jesus there is a stamp of personal originality combined with profundity of insight, which if we abandon the idle expectation of finding scientific precision where something very different was aimed at, must place the Prophet of Nazareth, even in the estimation of those who have no belief in his inspiration, in the very first rank of the men of sublime genius of whom our species can boast. When this preeminent genius is combined with the qualities of probably the greatest moral reformer, and martyr to that mission, who ever existed upon earth, religion cannot be said to have made a bad choice in pitching on this man as the ideal representative and guide of humanity; nor, even now, would it be easy, even for an unbeliever, to find a better translation of the rule of virtue from the abstract into the concrete, than to endeavor so to live that Christ would approve our life.

Eulogy of an Infidel

It would be difficult to find a greater eulogy, perhaps, and it seems that Mr. Mill has left nothing that can be said or desired by the followers of this meek and lowly person around whom the hopes of millions cling, and of whom it was said by one of old to those who rejected and crucified the Savior:

This is the stone which was set at naught by you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved.

But it remained for another infidel to utter, or pen, the most impassioned eulogy of the man Jesus that can be found in all literature. Ernest Renan, educated for the Catholic priesthood, but losing faith in that church, and all forms of Christianity, turned to the belief that Christ was only a man, the greatest of all men, having no valid claims to divinity, and wrote his life of Jesus, the materials for which were obtained by a visit to the Holy Land, and much of the work done on the historical locations described in the gospels. After finishing his work, so far as the description of the travels of Christ and the narration of his death, he said this:

Rest now in thy glory, noble initiator. Thy work is completed; thy divinity is established. Fear no more to see the edifice of thy efforts crumble through a flaw. Henceforth, beyond the reach of frailty, thou shalt be present, from the height of thy divine peace, in the infinite consequences of thy acts. At the price of a few hours of suffering, which have not even touched thy great soul, thou hast purchased the most complete immortality. For thousands of years the world will extol thee. Banner of our contradictions, thou wilt be the sign around which will be fought the fiercest battles.

A thousand times more living, a thousand times more loved since thy death than during thy pilgrimage here below, thou wilt become to such a degree the corner stone of humanity, that to tear thy name from this world would be to shake it to its foundations. Between thee and God, men will no longer distinguish. Complete conqueror of death, take possession of thy kingdom, whither, by the royal road thou hast traced, ages of adorers will follow thee.

Mr. Renan does not commit himself to a belief in the divinity of Christ, but he interprets the "most complete immortality" to mean that Christ lives in the lives of men in the "infinite consequences" of his acts. He voices the sentiment that to live that we may live again in the flesh is not the highest ideal of immortality, but to live so that the world may be better because of our lives is infinitely better and more noble. And the man who thus lives purchases the most complete immortality.

Victory of Christ

Men often live for the present without regard to the future, but Christ did not so live. If his achievements are to be reckoned by the successes he attained while living in the flesh his life would be counted as a failure, and defeat would be his portion, but he lived for the future as no other man has ever lived. He had no place to lay his head so far as earthly possessions were concerned; he was laid in a borrowed tomb, not having earned even the poor privilege of owning the ground in which he found sepulcher. But he attained the most complete victory of any victor. Another has said:

Now how do we account for this victory, this wonderful victory, emerging out of a defeat apparently so absolute and so pathetic? The reason, I think, is to be found in this truth of which I have been speaking to you, that Christ lived in and for the permanent, lived in and for the eternal. He did not try to command the mood of the moment, he did not seek immediate success. If he had done so he never would have been crucified. If he had sought immediate success he would have attained immediate success; he never would have been crowned with the crown of thorns. He would have been crowned with the crown that is perishable, the temporary crown we all so much seek, the crown of the world's applause.

But building as he did for the eternities, he missed the immediate victory to gain the enduring victory. He built not for the day or for the generation or for the century, but for all the centuries and for the eternities that are yet to be, and hence his victory enlarges with the "process of the suns" and his empire extends with the increase of the years. He laid his foundation upon the rock—the permanent rock of his Father's will—and hence time's demonstration of the truth of his saying, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away."

No wonder the prophet, looking down through the vista of future years, exclaimed, "His name shall be called Wonderful" and "of the increase of his government there shall be no end." And no wonder the great Napoleon, when comparing himself and others with the Christ, made the statement: "Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne and myself founded great empires; but upon what did the creations of our genius depend? Upon force. Jesus alone founded his empire upon love, and to this very day millions would die for him.

Precepts of Christ

As to the effect of his work among men the prophet portrays an ideal condition, and we are forced to admit that the carrying out of his precepts would produce the result foreseen. The prophet continues his description of the Christ (Isaiah 11: 5-9):

And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.

What are the precepts taught by this wondrous man that would produce this ideal condition? Perhaps the foremost of all is that which is known as the "Golden Rule." "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." This has been deemed impractical, and from a human standpoint or view, perhaps it is, and yet where it has been tried, and rigidly adhered to, it has brought results that have been astounding. Mr. Nash, of Cincinnati, Ohio, has introduced it in his business of making clothing, and has resulted in curing all industrial ills so far as his establishment is concerned; it has brought results in eliminating selfishness from his workers to a marvelous degree, and the astounding spectacle has been presented to the world of men and women voluntarily turning their jobs over to those who were the unfortunate victims of the prevailing conditions industrially, that they might have work for a season and thus tide them over a period in which otherwise suffering would be the result.

One of the fundamental doctrines of the Christ is "forgiveness of trespasses." This has been tried by Judge Lindsey, of Denver, with the boys, and by Judge McLellan, of Chicago, with the adults, and strange to say, it works. Criminals brought before these judges are told that they are forgiven of their sins, and that that forgiveness stands as long as they behave themselves, and that whatever penalty is imposed upon them for a violation of the law stands in abeyance unless they forfeit their right to forgiveness by a repetition of the crime. Thus they hold within their own hands the execution of the sentence. According to the testimony of the police in the district in which this policy has been put into operation the result is that crime was reduced fifty per cent in one year.

Conference Idea Indorsed by Christ

The principle of arbitration, or "conversations," in the settlement of difficulties is taught in the eighteenth chapter of Matthew. In effect Christ said to his followers, "Let's get together and talk it over." What wondrous results have followed the carrying out of this rule in the dealings between nation and nation, between employer and employee, between capital and labor only the records of the past can disclose. It is certain that where men have let this rule with the golden rule govern their actions wondrous results have come. And yet we spend our money, increase our taxes, and burden ourselves with debts to send men to the legislatures of our States and Nation with the hope of relief, and here has been, on the statute books of God, a solution of the whole gamut of troubles, but we will not put them into operation.

Another wondrous utterance of this wondrous man is found in Matthew 5: 44: "But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you." Even Mr. Ingersoll stood in reverence before this command. The only criticism he could make was that it was more than humanity could accomplish, and yet it has been done, and results have been as wondrous as the command. It is perfectly obvious that if this could be carried out the conditions presented in the vision of Isaiah would be fully realized, and all enmity would be removed from between man and man and from between beast and beast. We cry out against evil, and yet evil is within our own hands to control, and we persistently refuse to apply the remedy.

In the poem called the "Crooked house" the person is represented as seeing in vision that which represents her life work in the form of a house built of logs. Everywhere her eye turned she could see trees of wondrous beauty in the forest, but when she turned to view the result of her life work, not knowing that it represented her work, she cried out:

And this is the work of a madman's brain,
I said. Yea, builder was surely insane,
For there are so many beautiful trees
He might have selected as well as these,
So gnarled and knotty, and bent and brown,
And I cried in terror, 'Twill topple down.

This certainly represents the lives of many of us, and all because we do not heed the warning given so long ago, even two thousand years before Christ came into this world.

And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him.

Our Present Troubles

By Edward Rannie

We have brought most of our difficulties on ourselves, and can remedy conditions by obedience to the law.

God and Jesus Christ are always right. They make no mistakes, either in what they teach or in what they do, and when we fail to accomplish a task that has been allotted to us it is because we have failed to be obedient to their instructions. Unless we do what God commands us to do he is under no obligations to keep his promise to us.

When the Jews were in great trouble just before they were taken into captivity they did not seem to comprehend what was the cause, and wanted to know of the Lord what they had done to bring upon them so much sorrow. The Prophet Jeremiah speaking for the Lord told them:

Because your fathers have forsaken me, saith the Lord, and have walked after other gods, and have worshiped them,

Is not God requiring it of us to-day? And will we ever escape from the thralldom of sin and evil until we hearken to the words of him who spake as never man spake? His is the only complete remedy. When shall we apply it?

On every hand are beautiful things that we might add to our lives that would make them more enjoyable to ourselves and others, and yet we choose the crooked and gnarled logs to build our spiritual and moral structure. We admire the beautiful and good in Christ, and yet fail to imitate him in the things we do. How can we escape the consequence of our refusal to obey him and hearken to his words? Will we not have to answer to God for our refusal, especially when he has taken so much pains to tell us of him, and what his words will do for us? Other idealists have come into the world, but none heralded as he was for two thousand years before his birth. Strive as we will we cannot find a purer or greater example of goodness. Ernest Renan closes his Life of Jesus with these words which cannot be gainsaid:

Whatever may be the unexpected phenomena of the future, Jesus will not be surpassed. His worship will constantly renew its youth, the tale of his life will cause ceaseless tears, his sufferings will soften the best hearts; all the ages will proclaim that, among the sons of men, there is none born who is greater than Jesus.

and have forsaken me, and have not kept my law.—Jeremiah 16: 11.

They did not discern that their troubles came as the result of disobedience, so they cast their prophet into jail and otherwise persecuted him. Then followed their long years of suffering in servitude in a strange land, and for nearly two thousand years they have been outcasts and persecuted in all lands because they did not pay heed to the teachings of Jesus.

In 1832 (Doctrine and Covenants 83: 8) the Lord said to the church:

And your minds have been darkened because of unbelief, and because you have treated lightly the things you have received, which vanity and unbelief hath brought the whole church under condemnation. And this condemnation resteth upon the children of Zion, even all; and they shall remain under this condemnation until they repent and remember the new covenant, even the Book of Mormon and the former commandments which I have given them, not only to say, but to do according to that which I have written, that they may bring forth fruit meet for their Father's kingdom, otherwise there remaineth a scourge and a judgment to be poured out upon the children of Zion; for, shall the children of the kingdom pollute my holy land? Verily, I say unto you, Nay.

Our people failed to pay heed to the above instructions and in about a year commenced the bitter persecution which finally resulted in their being driven out of Jackson County. The fathers, mothers, and children spent the winter across the river in Clay County. God alone knows of that winter of sorrow and suffering, all because they were disobedient children. In June, 1834, (Doctrine and Covenants 102: 2) the Lord reiterates the same rebuke and tells them it was because of their disobedience and that they would continue to suffer until they learned obedience.

In 1841 the Lord told the Saints that if they would pay attention to his voice and also to his servants, that they would not be driven from Nauvoo and would be blessed in their work. (Doctrine and Covenants 107: 13.) Oh, what sorrow and misery and woe came to the church because of disobedience. Think of the great scattering that resulted and the migration to Utah with all its shame and torment to thousands of people and the trials and heartaches it has entailed on the Reorganization—all because of disobedience.

In 1909 (Doctrine and Covenants 128: 1, 5, 6) in answer to fasting and fervent prayer the Lord told us to establish colonies and industrial institutions as a part of our work in the gathering. We have been disobedient to that command and as a result of our disobedience thousands of our people remain in poverty and do not have the real comforts of life. About one third of the membership are outside of branches where they are deprived of religious instruction, and as a result we lose many of our members. This is especially true of the children who have no way of getting the good that comes from religious instruction and social life in a well-ordered branch.

The Spirit saith further unto the church assembled and at large: In order that the temporal affairs of the church may be successfully carried on and the accumulated debt of the church in its respective departments where debts have accumulated may be properly met and in due time discharged, the church is instructed, both as members and as the body at large, to avoid the unnecessary building of houses of worship or places of entertainment or otherwise expending the tithes and offerings of the church in that which may not be essential unto the continued onward progress of the general work; and both in private and in public expenditure carry into active exercise the principle of sacrifice and repression of unnecessary wants; and thus permit the accumulation of tithes and offerings in such amounts as may be needful to properly discharge the existing indebtedness of the church as a body. And the Spirit counseleth the church in this regard.—Doctrine and Covenants 130: 7.

The Lord here instructs us to repress unnecessary wants, and if we would examine our expense accounts we would find that with most of our people the unnecessary wants are the heaviest burdens we have to carry—enough to pay the expense of our entire missionary force. This is not only true of our private affairs but the elimination from the church of unnecessary expenditures would save us many thousands of dollars that could be used for wiser and better purposes. The Lord has warned us in recent years definitely in this regard, yet we are slow to hear and prone to believe our wants are necessary, when often they are but selfish desires. When we persist in this attitude we harm ourselves and hinder others.

At the last General Conference we voted a budget that was one hundred thousand dollars in excess of the largest amount that had ever been received by the church in one year, and this was done by the people in the face of the coming business depression which it did not need a seer to see, just men of ordinary business judgment, and then we added a five hundred thousand dollar drive for the Auditorium to make our burden a little heavier.

One of the vital principles connected with the latter-day work is equality and in every home and from every pulpit it has been talked about, from the humblest to the greatest, and the Lord has told us if we do not practice it the "abundance of the manifestation of his Spirit shall be withheld" (Doctrine and Covenants 70: 3), and we all know that it is not practiced. It is only a dream that every man has, and like a hungry man that dreams of getting a good square meal, he wakes up hungry. Perhaps our failure to carry out that part of God's law is the cause of our lack in spiritual insight and our doing so many things according to our own wisdom. This reveals our shortsightedness and our failure to do things that would suggest that the wisdom of God was attending our efforts.

What is the remedy for our present troubles? It is useless to point them out unless we suggest some way to correct them. We will not accomplish anything by hurling railing accusations at each other, and, figuratively speaking, throwing bricks at the other fellow.

First let us all admit that we are under condemnation, that is, the church collectively. If we were not we would not be in our present financial troubles, because success comes through obedience and God does not withhold his blessings from his obedient children. It is the disobedient who suffer his condemnation.

Second: We do not all have the same responsibility. That will be measured according to our opportunity and ability to do things, and it will be in about the following order, the general officers, the missionary force, the balance of the priesthood, and then the people.

Third: We need to get more God and Christ into our work. We are doing our work too much after our own wisdom. We should search the three books and find out what Jesus teaches and put his instructions into practice. We should let the fads and fancies of the world go by. They will never get us anywhere and will only bring us remorse and bitter disappointment. Jesus is the true vine and we are the branches. If we have spiritual life it will be because we cling to the vine, and if we do that we will be a distinctive people, and we will be recognized among men because our acts will reveal the fact that we have been with Jesus and learned of him. Jesus is our only spiritual leader, and without him we can do nothing. Our every thought and act should be controlled by his teachings, the only ones that have brought success and happiness.

The Nephites had nearly two hundred years of peace and happiness. They eliminated poverty and had no poor among them and it was because they lived according to the teachings of Jesus. We cannot attain that condition on any other terms.

Fourth: We should always be in a repentant condition: every evening look back over the day's work, and where we have failed to come up to the standard set by Jesus regret it and feel humiliated because of it and make a new start the next day.

The challenge of to-day is for a church membership fully acquainted with its faith and its task. This implies such a knowledge of the church and the kingdom as gives personal assurance and ability to push forward the Christian advance with enthusiasm and determination.—Kingdom News, page 7.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Uniting for the Common Good

How can the Women's Department become a real asset to our church life?

A story was told by President Roosevelt in connection with his visiting an asylum at one time. After the superintendent had shown him all through the institution, Teddy asked, "Aren't you afraid that your life is in danger here? What if these people should combine and plot against your life?" The superintendent laughed and replied, "Don't you know that fools never unite?"

This illustration may seem a bit crude, but it expresses what I want to convey. The only way the women of this branch or any other branch of the church will ever be able to make their influence felt is by uniting their efforts for the common good. Never was a truer statement made than that "united we stand."

I do not wish to underestimate the good that can be done by individual efforts? One of the finest examples of service the Bible produces is that of Dorcas, a real woman going about doing good. She was a friend to all who needed help, and the Bible rightly pays such a woman a fitting tribute. I like to meditate upon the beautiful picture we have had given of her, but I often think how much larger and more beautiful the picture might be if there were more characters like Dorcas, unitedly working towards a common goal.

In the social life of women their first influence was felt in the home. After that they broadened a little, by doing kindly acts of service for an immediate neighbor when sickness had entered the home. So we first find her kind services were those of nursing, or where she went at the call of sorrow. Upon these occasions opportunity often came to comfort with messages of the Christ, thus beginning the work of women missionaries. Too much tribute can hardly be paid these early women.

The next step in social progress was the group life. Here we find ourselves to-day, and, as we glance backward, we may sense that our growth, our evolution has been very slow. However, the march of progress does not come by looking backward. We are to focus our vision upon the future, where we see that our next upward step must be unionization—federation.

Many times we are made painfully conscious that we are not occupying in our rightful place—that of being the light of the world. Other women and other groups of women have marched ahead of us in some lines of endeavor. City life to-day is largely influenced for good by women's federations. This is as it should be: Chambers of commerce look to women's clubs to take the lead in many things that pertain to civic uplift. Why should not our priesthood have a corresponding body of women helpers?

Our circles have meant much to each of us. I believe that we should encourage community and neighborhood life by our circle meetings, and use them as a means to an end. A maximum amount of service can be given when every individual is cooperating and working toward a given goal. I do not wish to disparage what our circles are now doing, but I do wish to urge a closer federation that we may become more keenly interested in the possibilities of our local women's council. I wish we might make our monthly union meetings something so worth while that all the women in the branch, whether circle members or not, will want to come.

Most of us sense, to some degree, the large part we play in our home life, but do you not think that when we occupy as we should, we will also play a large part in our local church life? Please understand that this is not meant egotistically. I would not suggest such a thought, but I do say, and I sense the responsibility as I say it, that we should each try to give greater service to the church. This must not be to the neglect of our homes or children, but in some way or another, we should economize and plan our time so that we can do our full duty to all.

Nor should we be content when we have enlarged our field of church endeavor and given our full measure of service therein. Our civic life makes a demand on all right-thinking people. That crime and wrongdoing walk our streets undisguised is as much our fault as that of anyone else. Christ loved the Pharisee and the publican as well as his own brethren. Sometimes I wonder if our conception of religion is so narrow that when we appear before the judgment bar it shall be said of us, "I never knew you!" Should not our concept of Christ and of a Christian life be big enough to include love for all people and all classes? Sinners may love their kind; saints love their brethren; but Jesus loved all the world!

Harpist

Spring hugs her harp close,
Glad to have the old instrument back
Strung with new strings.

With slim fingers,
Pallid and green
From long staying indoors,
Spring runs over the strings
That stand between heaven and earth,
And touches chords of an old song
That she had half forgotten.

I hear Spring
At her harp of rain and earth,
Trying to remember
The lovely arpeggios!

Farm Women Fight Harmful Publicity

Protests by farm women against being called overworked and downtrodden have followed steps taken by the American Farm Bureau Federation for a national organization of women on the farm.

"Farm women in numbers are beginning to realize the harmful effect of this old-fashioned publicity," declared Mrs. Izetta Brown, of Kingwood, West Virginia, a leader in this movement.

"The farm women, who have awakened to their own possibilities, say quite frankly that they want to start a campaign of optimism about country life. They don't want to be pitied, nor patronized, just understood—and, if possible, a little idealized! They would appreciate it for a change."

For the first time the movement is general all over the United States for farm women to join the farm clubs of various sorts, Mrs. Brown reports.

"By working in clubs in various communities the farm women have learned the value of organized effort in improving country life conditions," she said.

"I know of one little community of about seventy-five families in West Virginia, where the school-teacher and others had talked for years about piping running water into the schoolhouse from a spring just up the hill. The first year after the farm women organized into a club they saw to it that the spring water was piped into the school.

"There is something easy to be done in each community that will improve living and social conditions and each little success is leading the enterprising farm women on to higher ideals.

"They are realizing their power in bringing about better school conditions for others' children, and each time anything is done to make the boys and girls happier and more contented, the mothers know they are increasing the chances of holding the children on the farm.

"I think that is the keynote of the rebellion against the 'down-trodden and overworked' publicity. The mothers realize that only too often the children get the city folks' point of view when it is expressed as deprecating farm life."—Omaha Bee.

Suggestions for Reading and Discussion

"Citizenship does not simply include that which is political; it must deal with all of the group relationships, such as those of a neighborhood, community, nation, and other social groups. A course in practical citizenship includes much which might be found under more technical headings of: sociology, public health, economics, political science, and ethics. In short, it would include everything that would facilitate better group living."

A Legitimate Triangle

Written concerning one of my special nurses, Mrs. George, a bride of two months:

The honey was still dripping from their silver honeymoon
And the stars of love still shining in their eyes.

'Twas then I met the lady whom the other's heart had won
And—forgive me, please, and call it no surprise
When I say I sought to win her, neither failed I at the task.
Ah! But wait till I explain ere you despise;
For I am but her patient in the Sanitarium,
A lady patient as you may surmise.

ETHEL I. SKANK.

"We can get an opening for meetings at Smyrna, Iowa, and have a church to use through some of my friends if we can get an elder to come," writes M. B. Oliver, Box 207, Derby, Iowa. "I am still in the faith. There are no Saints in this locality except at Lucas. I have been blessed since coming here, both physically and spiritually. And I have been blessed in telling the gospel. More and more as the years go by I rejoice in God's blessings."

Elder Charles B. Woodstock, who has for several years been superintendent of schools at Pisgah, Iowa, has accepted a similar position at Mondamin, Iowa. The Mondamin schools are well equipped, and managed by a progressive board of education. The success of Brother Woodstock in unifying the community interests at Pisgah has occasioned a favorable and State-wide reputation that is very gratifying. He delivers the baccalaureate sermons at Little Sioux on May 14 and at Pisgah on the 21st. Elbert A. Smith is to deliver the baccalaureate sermon at Mondamin.

Bootman-Glendenning Debate

Soul-sleeping the principal contention of our opponent.

The New Edition of the Inspired Version

The committee reports progress and that type is being set for the index.

The work of preparing a marginal reference Bible with notes and topical index requires a greater amount of labor and care than might be supposed by anyone who is not conversant with the many details necessary to the construction of such a work as is desired in the present prospective edition. Some of these details are set forth here in order that the plan and scope of the work when issued may be more clearly understood.

It is estimated that there have been compiled approximately 70,000 scripture citations. These citations are arranged under 6,170 topical headings, and are selected with a view to forming something of a digest of the contents of the Bible, at least so far as would be practicable in a work of its size. The topical headings are arranged in alphabetical order, and many of these topics are divided with subheadings which are also alphabetically arranged. Each heading and subheading is numbered consecutively, beginning with number 1 for the first topic of each letter of the alphabet. For instance, AARON is the first topic, and is numbered A1. AZARIAH is the last topic under A, and is numbered A376. The first topic under B is BAAL, and is numbered B1.

The citations are arranged in the order of the books of the Bible, hence the first citation would be in Genesis and the last one in Revelation if these books should contain texts on the subject being considered. To complete the reference system, however, the text in Revelation (or wherever the last reference may be found) will contain a marginal citation to the first text cited, thus constituting an endless chain reference system, one citation being placed on the margin of the page opposite each text referred to. Figures, instead of letters, are used at the proper word in the text to indicate the citation on the margin which relates to it.

The topical index also contains a cross reference system intended to enable the student to more easily find topical matter closely related to any given subject. This system consists of topical numbers placed after the topic and inclosed in parentheses. The example which follows cites only the first reference under each heading, but otherwise shows the subject as it will be found in the work to be issued.

References to other versions of the Bible will be made in footnotes in cases where they support the Inspired Version as distinguished from the Authorized or King James text, and also when they tend to make more clear the meaning of an obscure word or phrase. A large number of versions have been examined in this work. The completed work will not be ready for the press for several months but nearly half of the index is already in type.

A. B. PHILLIPS.

Believing that you would be pleased to hear how the debate came out, and knowing that many of the Saints were interested, if you will grant the space I will endeavor to pass on to the readers of the HERALD a few of the positions that were taken by my opponent as well as some of those that I used to defend our position, and also to overthrow his.

My opponent was of the Christian Adventist Faith, and we discussed church propositions. In our proposition he failed to follow me in any of the arguments that I made, not even on church organization. And in establishing the time of the Restoration, he would not touch the dates at all, but said that it made his head swim to bother with dates.

I quoted over seventy-five passages of scripture on the setting up of the kingdom of God, and he never touched one of them. But he was well supplied with mud; that was his argument, and that was all that he did have. He had Bays, Shook, Traum, LaRue, and R. C. Evans. I had all of his thunder, and I happened to be a little better acquainted with the characters that had borne the testimonies and the authors of the books than he was, so he did not bother us very much with his mud. He used David Whitmer's address, but I had that also, and I was able to prove that John A. Snider was the author of that, and that it did not have David Whitmer's indorsement to it.

In every speech he made he brought in the soul-sleeping doctrine, for that is about all he did present on his own proposition. He did nothing else but stay with that mortal soul theory for four straight nights, and he used some of the weakest points that I ever heard any man bring out on that proposition. Here are some of his references:

"For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast: for all is vanity. All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth? Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better, than that a man should rejoice in his own works; for that is his portion: for who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?"—Ecclesiastes 3: 19-22.

"For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun. Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works."—Ecclesiastes 9: 4-7.

There were other references but these were his strongest arguments. Most of them were from Solomon, and I compared Solomon's life to that of Brigham Young, and then compared their writings. That had a good effect, for some of the Brighamites help him get his books, so I have been informed, and when my opponent said that he had rather belong to the polygamist church, some of the Brighamites clapped for him. So I compared Solomon's life and works to those of Brigham Young, and it won with the good people.

When he read Ecclesiastes 9: 5, "The dead know not anything," I used in rebuttal 2 Samuel 15: 11, "And with Absalom went two hundred men out of Jerusalem, that were called; and they went in their simplicity, and they knew not anything."

I will here give you a few of the references that I used in the defense of the consciousness of the spirit after death.

"And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell."—Matthew 10: 28.

"And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom: the rich man also died, and was buried; and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame. But Abraham said, Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented."—Luke 16: 22-25.

This is sufficient to show that the spirit of both the good and the bad are conscious after death. That is the position that was taken by the Son of God in this parable. But my opponent took the position that this parable referred to the Jew and Gentile, that the Jews could not be saved. But I replied to that by reading Ephesians 2: 11-22:

"Wherefore remember, that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands; that at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world: but now, in Christ Jesus, ye who sometime were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ. For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us; having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances; for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace; and that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby: and came and preached peace to you which were afar off, and to them that were nigh. For through him we both have access by one Spirit unto the Father. Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; in whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord: in whom ye also are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit."

This scripture is very plain, and shows conclusively that through the cross both Jew and Gentile were brought to the kingdom of God 1900 years ago, so away goes the theory of the Christian Adventists that Jew and Gentile are forever separated, and no salvation for the Jews.

I will not ask for your valuable space to give all of the quotations in full, but will just give the references where they are: 2 Corinthians 5: 1-9; Philippians 1: 21-24; Matthew 17: 1-13; 1 Peter 3: 18, 19; 4: 6; Revelation 6: 9, 10; 19: 10; 22: 9.

My opponent took the stand that there is no living entity in man but there is a spirit in man, that it is not alive, that it is only the breath of life, only air. I quoted Job 32: 8; 2 Corinthians 3: 16; Romans 7: 22; Ephesians 3: 16; Acts 7: 59; Luke 23: 46; Zechariah 12: 1. There were many other references used but these will suffice for this time.

I had the writings of several of his brethren and he denied that Miles Grant, William Sheldon, and J. J. Brewer were his brethren in the church. But I had written to their publishing house in Boston and had the written statement from the publishing house that these men were emphatically, in their day, representatives of the Christian Adventist Church, and the writings of those men were recognized by the church as teaching of the Christian Adventist Church.

When I read the letter from their publishing house he said no more about Grant and Sheldon. But I did, and I had Brother Lambert's book, What Is Man, and that alone is all-sufficient to meet one of those men with, that is, on the immortality of the soul question, for it is fine on that.

The chairman told Brother Gentry, the branch president of our church at Weiser, that Glendenning was not in the debate as a debater but only a preacher, and did not meet any of my arguments.

We made many friends and the following day I baptized three. We are perfectly satisfied to leave it in the hands of God from whom we received all of our light and power, and to him be all the praise and glory. We may have to meet a representative of the non-progressive branch of the church founded by the founder of Bethany College if he will sign fair propositions. They have been after me for the last six months. But they have not signed the two church propositions yet and that is all that I care to sign. They have engaged the service of Jesse F. Love of Georgia, the debate to be held in Caldwell, Idaho, commencing on May 21, if the propositions are signed.

Brother R. C. Chambers was my moderator and he was a valuable asset to me and of great assistance. He had charge of the singing and helped me in my use of the books.

Laboring and praying for the victory through Christ, I am yours in bonds.

Tells how Joseph Smith was accused of being a dumb prophet.

Have read the statement of the brother who said he had taken the HERALD ever since it was published by Isaac Sheen in Cincinnati, Ohio, and that he was eighty-five years old and could read without the aid of glasses. I, too, received the first HERALD published by Brother Sheen but have not taken it continuously since then, though I have most of the time. I am now nearly eighty-four years old and have been reading the church papers for the last three or four years without the aid of glasses either day or night.

Now I wish to relate some reminiscences of the past. First, that I heard the gospel preached in February, 1861, by Apostle James Blakeslee and was baptized by him on July 15 of the same year and was ordained an elder in 1862 under the hands of Samuel Powers and James Blakeslee.

Next, I wish to relate my first meeting with Joseph Smith. It was on Christmas Day, 1863, at the house of Bishop I. L. Rogers. I shall always remember how cordially and familiarly he greeted me and called me by my given name and continued to do so as long as he lived. I was intimately acquainted with him from our first meeting until he died. I lived near him in Illinois and in Lamon, Iowa, and also in Independence, Missouri, and I attended his funeral when he died.

I want to relate an incident that happened away back in the seventies. I don't just remember the year but at that time he was accused of being a dumb prophet by some of the members of the church because he was not continually giving revelations but was advising the church to live up to what they already had. Of course hearing such accusations by members of the church naturally disturbed my mind some, so I made it a subject of prayer and attended a prayer meeting one Sunday afternoon at Plano, Illinois.

During the meeting Brother Joseph got up in prophecy and said the time would come when some who seemed to be pillars in the church would fall away. I then had only to wait until the prophecy came true, then I would know whether he was a dumb prophet or not. I wondered who he had reference to, but in course of time, Jason W. Briggs, then president of the Quorum of Twelve, and Zenos H. Gurley, one of the Twelve, asked to withdraw from the church, and while these things were being talked of, Brother Joseph and I were walking along one of the streets in Lamoni. I made this remark to him, "If you would just give up your position to Zenos and let him run the church, he would be all right."

Joseph smiled and said, "When the Lord tells me to do it I will, and not before." Joseph was certainly a great and good man and I believe was a prophet of the Lord.

Now while I have never received any outward manifestations from God I have had given me to believe that the Angel's Message is true, and as Brother Charles Derry once said, "Whatever men may think or say, I know that the church has made me what I am." On account of my limited qualifications I have never been able to accomplish much but have striven to overcome self and live so that I would bring no reproach upon the church.

A brother in the new and everlasting covenant,
CASA GRANDE, ARIZONA. VALENTINE WHITE.

Society Island Letters

From letters to the First Presidency the following are extracted.

Sister Ethel Hanson (sister of Paul M. Hanson) and Miss Tevaite Petis (Sister Tevaite) are leaving on this steamer. A lovely reception was given them last evening and the Saints freely expressed their appreciation for the good work done by Sister Hanson. As Sister Ethel has been closely associated with us during her stay in these islands, I take pleasure in saying a few words of praise for the good services she has rendered to the church. She has never flinched from duty, never hesitated to go when the opportunity afforded, though many times the voyage was a hazardous one and very unpleasant, but in her quiet, unassuming way she has forged ahead despite the many handicaps, administering to hundreds, and both by example and by precept taught a high standard of life. May the Lord reward her abundantly for the willing offering she has made.

PAPEETE, TAHITI, April 19, 1922.

We arrived safely at Papeete on the morning of March 15 and were met at the wharf by the missionaries and Sister Hanson. We came at once to the mission church where the Saints were assembled to greet us in the usual way—through singing and speaking.

A few days after we arrived, we, the foreign missionaries, met and counseled concerning some of the matters pertaining to the mission—missionary work, etc. Among the things discussed was the printing of the mission paper—Te Orometua—which we have decided to have printed in America at the Herald Publishing House according to the suggestion of the Board of Publication, inasmuch as our equipment here is inadequate, thereby relieving one of the missionaries for ac-

The work is still onward and progressing in these islands. Elder Clyde Ellis has brought with him a spirit of encouragement and good will that should make for unanimity and greater activity among the island force. I believe that under his supervision the work is going to be much more successful than ever before.

As president of the Papeete Branch, I have been doing intensive work towards building up of the local work, and believe that results are beginning to accrue. The choir has been a success, and I intend to get the music for the church hymns, since they are beginning to get acquainted with notes. I have a gospel literature box made, divided into three parts, Tahitian, French, and English. Above the divisions I have printed the words: "A rave na i te hoe," "Prenez-un," and "Take one,"—all meaning the same.

I have also had made a news bulletin board, on which is published the news as it comes to us day by day. I believe this is the first opportunity the native has had of learning the news as it comes to us over the wireless each day, without having to know French. I am doing my best to educate them along spiritual and mental lines. Of late, I have been giving lectures to the priesthood, similar to those given to the religious education class in Graceland College. The men seem to enjoy them fully, as well as the public speaking lectures.

Brother Merchant has been giving physiology lectures to the men, with considerable interest. I might also mention that the Religio has been a decided factor of success, under the splendid leadership of Elder F. V. Elliott.

Owing to sickness, both of my wife and of myself, I have not been able to do as much as I would like to have done, but now that Sister Almond is able to get about again I expect to do more.

Sincerely,
FRANK B. ALMOND.

Return From British Mission

From Steubenville, Ohio, Elder James E. Bishop writes the Presidency of his return from England.

I desire to report my arrival in the United States, and to my home where I found all well.

I landed in Boston Friday the 28th about 11 a. m., and was met by Bishop Fisher. He prevailed on me to stay in Boston over Sunday. I preached on the street with Brother Gleazer in Stoneham Saturday night. If opposition is any sign of prospective success then we should have a large church in Stoneham by and by, if they are persistent. Several members were there and the enthusiasm, etc., that I have imbibed from that lion-hearted Tom Taylor, of England, was manifested in my speech. Bishop Fisher found two preachers in the crowd and introduced them to us. We talked them (without being unfair) out of the crowd. Brother Gleazer put their underhanded work in boycotting the movie hall owner, squarely before them and offered them the terms of a public discussion. I think Gleazer is worth his weight in gold.

I preached at Boston Sunday morning and evening, dividing the evening with a Mr. Barsom who claimed to know much about the church. His recital was very dramatic and impressive. I hope it is all true. A young woman whom I made acquaintance with en voyage came to the morning service and in the evening brought six others with her. They all enjoyed the service. She resides in a suburb of Boston. I made her acquainted with Bishop Fisher and his wife and others. Perhaps if the social influence of the church is thrown around her she may respond. Teaching is necessary but the personification of right is much more effective.

Yours very sincerely, JAMES E. BISHOP.

Sherrill Institute a Success

After the Religio institute sessions here in Sherrill, New York, April 29 and 30, arranged and carried out by our field worker, Doctor P. L. Weegar, of Buffalo, we feel enough of a gust of encouragement and enthusiasm to carry out a pledge to write the HERALD. Syracuse, being a part of the Sherrill Branch, turned out well and did their part. Doctor Weegar puts his whole soul into his work. Our institute was a treat from start to finish and very encouraging. Brother G. W. Robley was with us and ably assisted with the program. We had twenty-five out-of-town members, and several friends in Sherrill came for the first time. Before the evening sermon by Brother Robley we had a musical program. Just before the sermon our Lamanite friend, Elsie Elms, sang in her own tongue the song she sang last year for an Edison record. Elsie is very ambitious to excel as a singer, and is making good progress. She is also trying to "find herself religiously" as she calls it.

Two weeks ago last Sunday my husband and I were privileged to meet with the Fulton Saints, having stayed in Syracuse over night and driving into Fulton Easter morning, a beautiful morning. Two young people were baptized and confirmed and an Easter sermon preached, after which about thirty of us ate together, and an enjoyable time was had. After a pleasant fifty-mile ride home we participated in our own Easter exercises in the evening.

The work was started here seven years ago under considerable excitement, and much persecution. Due to loss of the only hall to be had in the place at that time where Brother Mesle was preaching to about seventy-five regularly, we feel we lost what we never can gain. Meeting in homes for somewhat over three years brought the gospel to a few who would not go to church but lost to us many who drew the line on going into homes. A few months, part of the summers of 1918 and 1919, we met in a tent, which Sister Sarah Taylor allowed set on the rear of her lot. Friends have been raised up to help introduce and further this work, some of whom never come inside the church doors, which of course is a mystery and sorrow to us, but we keep on trying to keep the work going amid very trying and perplexing circumstances. The ministry of other churches have done their best to keep their people away from us. We have gained children to our Sunday school for instance and then through pressure brought to bear from enemies to our work have lost them, five so far this year. Some there are in the place who still insist on calling us Mormons and impugning our motives, hurting us all they can, but we have many friends among those who seldom attend church.

Since November, 1919, we have enjoyed our chapel. We feel we owe a debt of gratitude to several who helped to make it possible, and to Brother Luff who came to us for the opening, giving us some grand sermons and also some real hard work with his hands, assisting Brother Bishop in making a concrete floor to the basement and a baptismal font. Brother Robley assisted also in the meeting which followed the opening, and has met with us quite often, encouraging and helping us ever since.

We remember with pleasure the visits of Brethren Bond,

Chase, Stone, and Phillips. Brother Phillips was with us the Sunday night we had to give up our hall to be used for the enlarged post office, and for three Sunday nights in succession he preached in three different places where we met, driven here and there, ending up later in meeting in homes. Brother Angus made us several visits which were very enjoyable, and helped us in winning some Scotch friends who have now returned to Scotland. We relinquished Brother Bishop to go across the water, to labor, with a great deal of regret. We who can labor at home with our companions should do little complaining,

Yours in gospel bonds,

Young People's Meetings in the Northwest

The young people "out where the West begins" are zealous in good works and looking Zionward.

We want the readers of the HERALD to know that "out on the breast of the beautiful West," on the broad prairies of North Dakota, among the rocky, snow-capped mountains of Montana, in the beautiful orchards of Washington, amid the scenic mountains and crystal lakes of Idaho, there are scattered here and there several bands of earnest young Zion Builders. And valiant soldiers of the cross they are, filled with zeal, which is seasoned with wisdom, having their loins girt about with truth, having put on the breastplate of righteousness, their feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace, having the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit.

Be it known to the inhabitants of Zion, that these bands of earnest young workers are equipped, trained, and ready, when the time is right and God's wisdom shall direct, to come marching home to Zion with a power and determination that all the opposing powers of earth and hell cannot resist. And in the meantime they have consecrated of their talents and their service in the spreading of the gospel in the communities where they live.

It has been the blessed privilege, and a blessed one it is, of the writer, during the weeks and months just past, to speak to these young people at various series of meetings held by them in the branches where they live: Spokane, Washington; Coeur d' Alene, Idaho; Fargo, North Dakota; and in company with Elder George W. Thorburn at Deer Lodge and Anaconda, Montana.

There are other branches and bands of young people between and around these places, which we have not been able to reach this winter, but which we are sure are equally as zealous in the Master's work.

I thank God that the day has dawned when the young people are being given an opportunity to give expression to their religious, social, and recreational instincts within the ranks and under the supervision of the church. I have sometimes thought that some of our good members have failed to appreciate the activities of the young. Hope I have been mistaken, but while under that impression I have been so unkind as to think that such souls must be just a little bit diseased. This disease (if there is such) I fear is caused by poor circulation and a lack of exercise in the regions of the cerebrum. It is a rather serious disease and somewhat contagious, but the remedy is very simple: Just open the windows of your brain, get out into the sunshine of youth, and ventilate your soul. The result is inevitable. If directions are followed, the cure is the natural result. If there be any who haven't the capacity for this remedy, God pity them; their case is chronic.

We young people who live "out where the West begins" have noted with interest the activities of our young coworkers in Zion and other places, and your faithful work has been a source of great strength and encouragement to us. May God speed the time when the borders of Zion may be enlarged and her stakes strengthened, so that we shall all be able to serve the Master under more favorable conditions, looking forward to the great day of His glorious coming.

[Received too late for use last week.]

Throughout the United States, National Hospital Week is being observed, and it is fitting that the friends of the Independence Sanitarium should speak a good word in its praise.

My personal experience with the Sanitarium is such that I can say that nowhere in the wide world can those who need medical or surgical assistance receive greater consideration than that given in our own church institution.

They are greatly in need of one or two additional wards, and the necessary equipment to put them in first-class condition, thus enabling those in charge to give special assistance to those who may be in need of treatment. There is a personal satisfaction in knowing that the church is amply provided with a Sanitarium where every patient is satisfied, and where they will receive careful, scientific treatment according to their necessities.

The Independence Sanitarium is deserving of an endowment fund of five hundred thousand dollars, which would make possible increased facilities from time to time as may be needed, and to provide for at least twelve free beds where those who need to take advantage of them might be supplied gratuitously.

My observation and experience in foreign lands has taught me that we need medical missionaries whose wives should be trained nurses, for their ability to relieve the sick and diseased creates an open door in every part of the world for the gospel of Jesus Christ, and our own church Sanitarium at Independence should be fully prepared to meet this demand in the years to come.

Zion Builder Meetings in Spokane

Our meetings are a thing of the past materially, yet we feel sure that they are still with us spiritually.

Our forces were well organized and a considerable work was done in way of advertising the meetings, especially among the Saints, also among the outsiders, and this proved to be quite a success.

Brother Eli Bronson was the man of the hour and proved to be equal to the occasion; the old line of staple goods with a new line of salesmanship which we all enjoyed.

Brethren Jott A. Bronson and Carl Crum were the advance agents, being on the ground a week before, making arrangements, Brother Bronson taking general oversight, getting out advertising matter and preparing for the publicity campaign which was kept up every day during the three weeks of meetings. Brother Crum took an active part in the arranging for the music, preparing a pamphlet of special songs which proved to be a help in the meetings.

Brother Jott was the question-box manager during the meetings, answering all questions from the outside and cracking some nuts from within.

To say that the meetings were a success is putting it a little below par; we feel that they were more than that. A goodly number of outsiders attended and a lot of Saints were brought out of "the dumps." We hope to repeat the experience at an early date before the effect dies out.

At our last session of Religio the young senior girls gave an entertainment which proved to be a success and was enjoyed by those present. They have been requested to reproduce it at the Coeur d'Alene Religio. As we are in debt to them we have accepted the invitation.

Everything is moving along in nice shape in Spokane. Brother Gray, our branch president, has gotten us going so well that he is going to leave and make his abode in the sunny South where the oranges grow.

Holden Stake

HOLDEN. Special service was held Sunday, 23d, at the eleven o'clock hour, Bishop C. J. Hunt preaching his farewell sermon. He will travel in western Iowa and eastern Nebraska for a few months in the interest of church finances, supporting the general missionary division of the work. Before coming to Holden six years ago, he spent twenty-four years in his special line of church activities in western Iowa. During his temporary absence, his counselor, Elder I. M. Ross, will be in charge of the Holden stake bishopric work.

After the morning sermon, the weather not favoring a gathering on the beautiful lawn of the Holden Home for the Aged, the congregation assembled in the lower auditorium, where well-filled baskets of Johnson County's never-failing products, which had been prepared by the ladies, were spread on temporary tables. Bishop Hunt and his wife were made guests of honor. Conspicuous on the tables was a large cake, prepared by Miss Arlene Weir, with the word Hunt engrossed.

Elder Ross was master of ceremonies. Toasts on the general and local work of Bishop Hunt in the stake, were by President D. J. Krahl and F. A. McWethy. Robert Dillon spoke for the Sunday school and Ferguson Dillon represented the Religio Society, after which Bishop Hunt and his wife feelingly expressed their appreciation of the confidence and good wishes so generously bestowed.

The many friends of Brother D. J. Krahl will be pleased to know he is improving in health. He attended the sacrament and prayer service and bore a splendid testimony to the goodness of God.

Doctor John R. Green, of Independence, attended the 11 a. m. service Sunday and outlined the work and needs of the Sanitarium. We feel sure his visit will bear fruit for that worthy institution.

Doctor Emory Thompson, of Holden, also spoke briefly.

Brother F. A. McWethy went to Columbia, Missouri, Friday, to a meeting of the Farm Bureau.

Elder C. F. Scarcliff, accompanied by a load of musicians, conducted a service at the home of Brother G. I. Davis, northwest of Holden, Sunday.

BATES CITY. The continual rains have greatly interfered with our regular services for several weeks. Elder W. S. Macrae, of the Holden stake presidency, was with us Sunday, 23d, and spoke for us both morning and evening.

Brother and Sister Frank Ford have been quite sick. Sister Ford is able to be up again, but Brother Ford is still confined to his bed and a substitute is taking his place at the Oak Grove high school.

Brother and Sister Redfield, recently of Knobnoster, have rented a farm near Bates City, and are with us in church services.

LEXINGTON. The Lexington group is alive and working. Every department is doing good work.

The "Mission Cash Store" was sold and a profit of $645 was made for the building fund. The church building is used every evening in the week except Monday and Saturday. The Religio is taking care of the recreational interests of the young by having an evening a week set aside for recreational purposes—the meetings are held in the basement of the church. The last meeting held had an attendance of 84.

The Summit Mission gave a very worshipful Easter program—excellent scripture lessons and music. The mission is growing in interest and members through the untiring efforts of Ivan Beebe, who is in charge, and E. E. Fender who is pastor of the Lexington group.

The choir and orchestra are doing excellent service for the church, and making development.

E. E. Fender was called home for a few days.

GRANDVIEW. Elder J. W. A. Bailey recently held another series of meetings with good attendance and interest. Two ladies were baptized. The minister of one of the churches circulated a tract misrepresenting the church. These misrepresentations were refuted by Brother Bailey and a letter embodying same sent to the minister. It was charged that the church had a "Blue Book" containing secrets which were kept from persons till they became members.

Many of the citizens witnessed the baptism and the confirmation which followed. The Spirit was present and the service was very impressive.

The Sunday school gave a lovely Easter program at the eleven o'clock hour.

The junior choir under the leadership of Sister Edgerton is doing good work, and an Oriole circle has been formed.

MARSHALL. Elder Levi Phelps has charge of missionary work and spoke to a good audience Sunday night (7th), among whom were a number of nonmembers. Mission work was the theme of the day's services.

WARRENSBURG. There is increased interest and attendance in all church and departmental services, the Sunday school and Religio leading. The increased attendance at the Religio is due to an interclass contest for new members, visitors, collections, and class deportment. The local priesthood are inaugurating a missionary campaign, and those owning cars and other conveyances are cooperating by furnishing conveyance to the places of meeting. Brother Will Patrick is transportation manager.

Brother I. M. Smith is giving a series of Sunday morning lectures on "Food and food values in the light of divine revelation and modern science." We consider these discourses of fundamental value. He has made an exhaustive study of the subject.

Brethren Hunt and Ross of the stake bishopric were with us recently and conducted a service in the interest of their department.

Students who contemplate attending the summer term of the State Teachers College in Warrensburg please write to the pastor, Fred A. Cool, 317 South Street.

Kansas City Stake Young People's Meetings

The special meetings held in the interests of the young people at Central Church came to a close on Sunday night the 16th. There was an attendance of above five hundred at each of the nine services, which is about a capacity audience. The slogan for the series was "Awake; put on thy strength," which seemed to be prophetic of the results obtained, as a sure-enough awakening has taken place and strength has been put on beyond expectations.

entious activity along any line assures permanent effect, then the effort of the young people of Kansas City will bear fruit for years to come. The effort was as well organized as any I have ever seen. In point of regular attendance the series excels any I have ever known."

The psychology of the meeting was in the subjects used, the spirit in which they were presented. The duration of the series was just long enough. Some expressed themselves as being filled to capacity with the material offered and had to have time to digest. Those attending have received more than they put in. Brother McDowell won the love of the young people at the very beginning, which grew as the meetings continued until the closing sermon, when he very tersely told them what must be done to carry out the work of a Zion Builder. The subjects discussed were, first, our heritage; second, our church and its philosophy; third, a glance at the world about us; fourth, the social teachings of Jesus; fifth, the ideals of Zion; sixth, the Zion Builder's recreation; seventh, the Zion Builder's education; eighth, the Zion Builder's religion; and ninth, a society of Zion Builders.

The music, in charge of Brother Harold C. Burgess, was also an inspiration. A leaflet containing eighteen hymns adapted for this kind of service contained such as, "Come thou fount," "If Jesus goes with me," "Brighten the corner where you are," "The old, old path," etc.

The advertising was arranged by a committee especially appointed to do that work and consisted of a letter invitation sent to each young person in the stake. Cards with the slogan, "Awake, put on thy strength," also hand art cards entitled, "Responsibility," "The harvest—ye are the harvesters," etc., done by one of the young sisters of the stake, were placed about the church building, also in the church buildings throughout the stake. The young people are much better fitted for their various tasks, spiritual and secular, than before the meetings were held.

Abiding in Christ

Only the Spirit can make alive. Only the Spirit can beget men and women from the dead. Words spoken, prayers uttered, acts done in the energy of self alone, have no power of spiritual germination. If this be true, how many of our works are dead works! Except the Spirit speak through us, pray through us, work through us, there will be no quickening in those about us.

The sermon delivered in pride of intellect or rush of mere human eloquence may excite the intellect, arouse admiration, or stir emotion, but it cannot transmit life, and naught but life begets life, for it is the Spirit that quickeneth. "Like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." (Romans 6: 4.)

The statement is here made that our Christian walk in the new life should be like as Christ was raised from the dead. Christ was as to the body dead. That dead body could not of itself rise, move, breathe, or stir. It was in itself utterly powerless. Hour after hour passed and it lay in the tomb in the grasp of death with no power of itself to rise but waiting the touch of God, the Father. Then came the mighty quickening of the resurrection by which God raised him from the dead.

Now in this manner is the believer to walk in the new life. He is to realize himself to be dead unto sin. When we have been buried with Christ in baptism and resurrected to walk in newness of life, the sin is all washed away by the blood of Jesus Christ who hath power to cleanse us from all of our sins, and through the laying on of hands we receive the divine power of the Spirit, that happiness beyond which our tongue cannot express is the happiness that we receive.

We then begin to walk in the Spirit and talk in the Spirit. We then have a greater desire to get others into the kingdom of Jesus Christ that they may receive the divine power of the love of Jesus Christ within their never-dying souls. As it says in the Book of Mormon, he that is warned should warn his neighbor, that we be free from the blood of all men, that their blood be upon themselves.

Only the Spirit can beget men and women from the deadness of sin. As Christ says, "Without me, ye can do nothing." Self alone will cause no quickening in those about us. The sermon delivered in the pride of intellect arouses admiration and stirs emotion, but it cannot transmit life, and naught but life begets life, for it is the Spirit that quickeneth.

So we, the children of God, must keep in constant touch with Jesus Christ or we will have nothing but self, and self is a very weak mortal to transact the work of God. Alone we will fail every time and be made to feel our weakness before all present in the audience. It is by virtue of our union with Christ that we have received the gift of the Holy Ghost. It is only as we abide in him, as we press closer and closer to him, as we daily, by communion in prayer, continuously look to him for divine help that never ceases, that we walk in the light as he is in the light and have fellowship one with another, that the blood of Christ may cleanse us from all sin and make us fit subjects for the Holy Ghost to abide with us from day to day, to guide us in all of virtue's paths which lead in the straight and narrow way to eternal life where we will be permitted to meet Christ in all his glorified state. There the weary are at rest and the weak ones cease from troubling—a glorified state of peace and happiness where we will be permitted to help sing the songs of the redeemed and mingle with all of God's holy and redeemed Saints.

Oh, my dear brothers and sisters in Christ, let us come up higher every day. Let us put on the whole armor of God and stand as bold soldiers for Christ, our Redeemer.

ISAAC TRUE.

The Motive for Service

In the Toronto Globe of April 6, 1922, under the above caption, editorial expression is given to some ideas that will be of interest to those who believe that in building up Zion the incentive of pecuniary profit may be eliminated. The editorial is in part as follows:

"It is sometimes argued that public operation of railways and other utilities must fail because the incentive of profit is lacking; as if money were the only spur that would cause men to make the best use of their faculties. The doctrine is wholly wrong. Mr. Edison has no doubt made a handsome profit out of his inventions, but we believe that his chief incentive is delight in the work. There is more public spirit than cynics are willing to admit. Even the capitalist is not always moved merely by the desire to amass money. Many rich men are perhaps more interested in the excitement of the game than in the gain.

"There are many who delight in their work. It does not follow that they are wholly indifferent to salary, nor should we expect men to do good work for poor pay. The best work may be produced when there is freedom from sordid anxiety about household expenses.

"There would be fewer labor disputes if the spirit of pleasure and pride in work could be fostered. Of course, the duty does not lie on one party alone. If the spirit of service is to animate the workmen it must animate the employer also; if work is to be considered more than wages, service must rank higher than profit; if slacking ought to be discouraged, so ought the attempt to earn dividends on watered stock."

Independence

Mothers' Day was generally observed in the churches in Zion by special program features in the Sunday school and a sermon morning or evening. Elder T. W. Williams was the speaker at the Stone Church on that theme and the prayer service in the afternoon was dominated by that subject.

The prayer services throughout the groups in Zion were attended by a speaker and, in most instances, a nurse who addressed the audiences concerning National Hospital Day, May 11. A large number of ladies were organized into a tag day committee and were on the streets of the city on the 12th. The funds thus secured were to provide free beds and children's ward at the Sanitarium. Over $800 were raised in this manner. Pledge cards were printed and circulated on Wednesday evening and at the Religio sessions in the various churches on Friday evening providing for pledges for Sanitarium funds. A large number of people visited the Sanitarium on Hospital Day and a picture was taken of children who had been born in the Sanitarium, together with their mothers.

On Sunday afternoon the Quorum of Twelve met with the priesthood of Zion, a general meeting to organize all who would respond into a local missionary campaign which will include preaching, tracting, singing, assisting in various ways, and transportation. This is to be followed up by a meeting Tuesday evening where more definite steps will be taken in this effort to press into service every available local man who will volunteer his services.

The Sunday evening service at the Stone Church was given by the Religio Society in honor of the graduating class in the local high school. Of the ninety-two members of the graduating class this year, forty are members of the church. These were seated on the platform surrounded by young church members of other grades in the high school. On the program were Mrs. William Erickson, a member of the church and of the local board of education. She is the first woman member of the local board, and it is said that only three other women preceded her in the honor in the State. Principal of the high schools, R. B. Finley, spoke at length on the value of higher education, arguing that the test of education is citizenship.

His time being limited, Elder Walter W. Smith very briefly summarized the attitude of the church on education by saying that the first school building in Independence was erected by the Saints and that the first public building in Far West was also a school building. He further said that the first free public schools in Illinois were at Nauvoo, Illinois, established and maintained by the Saints.

Elder J. W. Rushton spoke in his usual eloquent manner on the future of education. The president of the student body, Morris Filson, in response to Principal Finley's address, gave him much credit for the success and wholesome outlook of the present class. He confirmed a statement made by Mr. Finley concerning the calling of the various members of the class into consultation as to their future plans for schooling. Mr. Finley, asking the young man as to his personal plans, ventured he could easily guess what he intended to do, for it seemed that every other one whom he had interviewed planned to attend Graceland College.

President F. M. Smith left Saturday night for California, accompanied by his wife, who is returning to be with their two daughters who are in school.

The joint council sessions are continued, but plans are completed for an early adjournment, probably on Tuesday.

President Elbert A. Smith and Bishop B. R. McGuire were in Saint Louis over Sunday, the 14th, attending the dedicatory services of the church at that place. Elder S. A. Burgess and family and G. S. Trowbridge were also in attendance.

An interesting feature of the Religio program Friday evening was the debate on, "Resolved, That the world is getting better," affirmed by T. W. Williams and denied by J. F. Curtis. They were judged by high school debating standards and three members of the graduating class of this year in the high school were the judges. The decision was two to one in favor of Elder Williams. It was an enjoyable and interesting occasion, punctuated by considerable humor for the audience.

The radio sermon from the Central Radio Studio in Kansas City Sunday evening by Elder T. W. Williams was accompanied by excellent vocal numbers directed by Frank Criley. With the installation of a new sending apparatus which has wonderful power and versatility no doubt there will be entire satisfaction in sending out these Sunday evening programs. Many calls are received during and following the sending of these programs, complimenting the participants on the quality of their work. Nonmembers say that they are interested in the sermons, regardless of church affiliation. With the constantly increasing number of those who are owning receiving sets, the audience which listens to these programs is increasing rapidly. Those who are within a radius of several hundred miles and have equipment of fair radius should be able to receive these programs without difficulty. They are sent each Sunday evening at 8 o'clock and may be received on a 360 meter wave length. The HERALD editors will be glad to hear from the various ones who hear these programs and may print a list of such later on.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium for the week ending May 13: Mrs. Julia Sanders, Pleasant Hill, Missouri; Jenny Doughty, Sibley, Missouri; Mrs. Georgia Crawford, Leeds, Missouri; Mrs. Hazel D. Kiefer and Baby Kiefer, Mount Washington, Missouri; Mrs. W. D. Stietzel and Bishop F. B. Blair, Kansas City, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Earnest Curnutt, Mrs. Velma Cogan, James Stewart Fudge, and Miss Margaret Maloney.

The Independence Sanitarium, through its board of directors which consists of the members of the First Presidency and Presiding Bishopric, has bought a substantial interest in the Independence Drug Company, located at the corner of Lexington and Union Streets. The business will continue under the same name, with John Feldhahn as manager. Brother Feldhahn was formerly of Lamoni, Iowa, and is a graduate of the Kansas City College of Pharmacy.

Lamoni Stake

Elder Joseph Luff was in Lamoni Thursday. His visit here was made to preach the funeral sermon of Brother Daniel F. Lambert, who was well known to Saints all over the church. Brother Lambert's decease, which occurred Tuesday, will be regretted by those who knew him.

Brother Leonard Holloway is home for a short time from his mission field in Ohio. The religious education group at Graceland were fortunate in having him to lecture to them last week. The Saints are always glad to see him, for his deep spirituality, for his vigor, and for the strength that he brings to the meetings.

Due to the pressure of secular duties, Lamoni people are very busy for the time; but class work in both Sunday school and Religio continue as strong as ever. Then, too, the very busy time attendant upon the finishing of the work of the school year occupies the attention of many Lamoni people. Many special events of educational and church interest are in preparation.

Graceland College News

On the evening of Friday, May 5, the students of the junior college and religious education groups, together with the faculty, met in the basement of the new building for one of the most auspicious and splendid events in a number of years—that of the annual junior college banquet.

In the lower hall, where flowers and branches suspended from above filled the air with fragrance, and the blaze of light shone brightly over the rows of long, white tables, Graceland's domestic science department served the dinner, and the college orchestra played one beautiful selection after another between courses.

After the dinner, the program was as follows:

Toastmaster, President G. N. Briggs.

"From lands afar," by Harold Dewsnup.

"Before and after taking," by Richard Hartnell.

"Looking backward into the future," by Hazel Putnam.

Introduction of the speaker of the evening, by Professor Lonzo Jones.

Address, by Doctor Edwin Diller Starbuck.

The preliminary speakers delivered themselves well, speaking of the significance of the college and educational movement in America generally, and of the associations, ideals, and influence of Graceland particularly.

In introducing the guest of honor and speaker of the evening, Lonzo Jones spoke of Doctor Starbuck in eulogistic terms as "The intensive scholar," "The inspiring teacher," and "The human friend." The introduction promised a speech from a great scholar, a loyal citizen, and a Christian gentleman. The guests were not disappointed.

Doctor Starbuck was asked not to deliver a formal address, but to give a talk, heart to heart, from the fullness of his experience. He gave attention to the relation of religion to some of the disturbing philosophies and facts of science which are tending to disturb to-day the faith of men.

In such a short time he could touch only one phase of his subject matter, and chose particularly to set forth evidence in support of the validity of intuition as a means for the guidance of our lives, in religious as well as in all other experiences. His talk was so full of good and reassuring things that it would have taken a shorthand reporter to get them all.

His first quotation, from the poet Lannier, "Happily, we know somewhat more than we know," indicates the course of his thought. He said that there are more things in our knowledge than we can analyze, measure, or reason out. We find a large percentage of our judgments based in things too imperceptible for discrimination, which judgments are in most cases fairly accurate. Everything depends in the human being upon the little, infinitesimal things in environment to which we react. We can discriminate a little further than conscious perception can reach. The human being is a marvelously sensitive being; his judgments for right or wrong are influenced by imperceptible things; and it is the "atmosphere" of the home, the community, the church, and our religious experience that makes us what we are. "Out of the heart are the issues of life." "As a man thinketh, so is he." Our tragedies and successes in this life are neither sudden nor cataclysmic in the finding of their causes, but are the results of imperceptible but endlessly repeated accumulations of sensations and experiences. The small college can build "right folk," people who are in touch with the divine and in concert with the hope and progress of humanity. The church can build them, the home and the community build them, and it is all of these that it shall take to produce the true and free citizen of the future.

He said that many men are busy trying to interpret the inner life of religion, and further investigations are tending to establish the validity and social necessity of Christian and religious experience. It is the finesse and thoughtfulness in human living that bring satisfaction, comfort, and peace. He looked forward to the day when man, standing free before truth and God, should see "the light that shall be so bright that all shall see it—so strong that nothing shall dim it."

As religious folk, the guests felt that God had touched one more man, to whom was given the power to see through prevailing darkness into the deeper meaning and light of truth.

Doctor and Mrs. Starbuck shook hands with all the students and faculty after they had arisen from the tables. Graceland feels very fortunate in having had such a man to speak on such a subject at such a time.

Kansas City Stake

Women's Department. Sister Oxendale's food and body class gave her a birthday surprise on Friday, and on Saturday her Oriole Girls surprised her with a fruit shower.

The Malvern Hill household management class is well attended. The normal training classes at the Fourth Church and also at Central passed an examination in normal training recently. The Oriole Girls of Central gave the program at Religio May 5, and had a box social afterwards.

The public speaking class is well attended and splendid interest manifested. Sister Lula Sandy lectured to them on the collective and individual personnel of the work.

At the Fourth Church those in charge will conduct a vacation Bible school, beginning immediately after the public schools close. They will meet each Tuesday and Thursday afternoon. They will have as instructors Sister J. O. Worden, Sister Tyra Lloyd, and Sister J. E. Wickham.

Stake Missionary Amos T. Higdon just closed a series of two weeks' meetings at the Malvern Hill Church. Quite a number of those not of our faith were in attendance but the interest was not considered sufficient to continue longer.

Central Chicago

On April 2, Central Chicago celebrated the organization of the church by an all-day service, that being the nearest Sunday to the date of April 6. The first service of the day was the priesthood prayer meeting at 8 a. m. Sunday school followed at ten o'clock and then a sermon by President John Cooper on organization and early days of the church, its successes and failures. At the close of the service a basket dinner was enjoyed by all present.

At 3 p. m., sacramental service was held, at which time those recently called to the priesthood were ordained, viz, Gene Keir to the office of priest, C. A. Oliver to the office of teacher, and Arthur Sherman to the office of deacon.

In the evening we had the pleasure of listening to an able discourse by Cyril E. Wight. Attendance was good at all services of the day and a splendid spirit prevailed.

Easter, April 16, was celebrated by appropriate exercises by the Sunday school and assisted by orchestra and choir.

The auto race which has been in progress for some time, was won by young ladies' senior class; Roy Cheville, teacher.

Los Angeles, California

The Easter services were well attended. There was a special program during the Sunday school hour and an Easter sermon by the pastor, David E. Dowker. The choir did exceptionally well under the leadership of Sister Dorothy Rush-ton. "Hark, hark my soul," by Shelly was the anthem sung.

In the afternoon nearly two hundred and fifty friends and relatives gathered at the church to witness the wedding of Sister Bertha M. Ball and Brother Clarence O. Eddy. Sister Ball is a granddaughter of Patriarch W. A. McDowell and a graduate of Graceland and is prominently connected with the work here. Brother Eddy is our organist. Brother Dowker officiated.

We were cheered by the presence of Brother and Sister E. H. Fisher, of Boston, who have been visiting their relatives in this city and Long Beach.

With the cooperation of the other branches of this district we were able to purchase a 40 by 70 tent for the missionary services we are about to hold. Brethren Alma C. Barmore and W. A. Brooner are here to engage in an extended series of meetings. The Saints and friends responded well and we will be able to equip this tent in the most approved manner. We plan on making this the biggest campaign ever undertaken in this city.

Our Bishop's agent, Brother Henry F. Backer, was seriously injured when his auto was struck by a Pacific Electric freight train. The brother is in the hospital and his present condition is remarkable considering his injury.

Our pulpit has been filled of late by the following brethren: Doctor A. W. Teel, E. H. Fisher, A. T. Gray, and A. C. Barmore. They have brought to us some wonderful sermons, and the Saints have been built up as a result of their timely counsel.

Perry, Iowa

We have just closed an eight-week series of meetings here, resulting in a great blessing to the branch. The meetings were in charge of Brother J. A. Dowker, district missionary, whose messages and leadership in song aroused a lively interest in the cause, encouraging the Saints and convincing the seekers of truth.

The fundamentals of our church were faithfully and scientifically presented from night to night, attended by the Holy Spirit's power. The trumpet made no uncertain sound. The speaker's arguments were unanswerable, his logic convincing, his presence and fellowship among us winning. Brother Dowker is a true missionary.

That we might be improved spiritually and materially, he labored night and day with his hands as well as with word and song. As a result a much-needed improvement in the interior of our chapel might be noted. The platform was enlarged, the ceiling part of the rostrum raised, a new pool installed, and a new pulpit (a present from Brother Dowker) takes the place of the old one, making our church building far more effective and presentable.

One was baptized in the new font as soon as it was finished and we have reason to hope that others will follow in the near future.

During the meetings and in the work of repairs, the leader had the loyal support of the branch president, Brother Kibby, and the willing workers of the branch. The "blest tie that binds" seemed a good deal stronger than ever before.

During the last week of the meeting a surprise reception was given Brother Dowker at the home of Brother and Sister DeSart—an action of social fellowship for the Saints and friends of the branch. Another surprise was inflicted upon the guest in the shape of a few useful presents to bespeak appreciation for his tireless labor of love in our midst. The prayers of the Saints and the best wishes of many others attend our brother as he turns his face toward his home in Independence.

E. F. PARTRIDGE.

Rockford, Illinois

The work is progressing nicely here. A greater interest is manifested by the outsiders as well as the members. Where a year ago we were meeting in a private house, now we have a hall rented for two hours Sunday morning and two in the evening.

Our Religio, which was organized about a year ago, then finally dropped, was reorganized about three weeks ago. The lessons are just what we need in order to make us more efficient workers in this wonderful work. They show the earnest and untiring effort of the editor and his associates.

The first Sunday in April was our sacrament and well attended. We enjoyed a spiritual feast.

Some time ago we had with us, Brother Wight, who spoke to us on stewardship, explaining many things and giving us a desire to do all in our power to bring about conditions so we could all live on this plan.

NELLIE STEVENS OTT.

San Francisco, California

We had splendid services here Easter Sunday. The Sunday school gave a very creditable entertainment in harmony with the occasion. Our speaker at the eleven o'clock service was Elder R. E. Crone, who delivered a very fine discourse on the crucifixion of Christ and his resurrection. Three were baptized after the service, two adults and a young girl. They were confirmed in the evening, after which our pastor, Elder E. E. Hartsough, addressed the congregation.

April 23, the three oldest male members of the branch, Bishop C. A. Parkin, John A. Saxe, George S. Lincoln were in the pulpit. There were also in the congregation the three oldest sisters, Sister J. A. Anthony, Sister C. A. Parkin, and Sister John Saxe. These six people have all grown old and gray in the service here in San Francisco, having helped hold the fort during the last forty-five years, and they are still able to do their share in carrying on the work, preaching the word, and testifying concerning its truth and wonderful power. Their hearts are young and they still desire to live as long as they can be useful.

All is going well with the Saints here. Our meetings are well attended. The preaching is good, spiritual, and instructive. There are always nonmembers and strangers at our services, so we continually hope for recruits. Our Religio is doing fine and the Women's Department is doing a splendid work. We have a good choir which adds much to the services and is quite an attractive feature.

GEORGE S. LINCOLN.

Burlington, Iowa

The branch here was saddened by the death of Brother H. E. Jarvis, Wednesday, April 19. The funeral service was held in the chapel at Burlington Saturday afternoon, April 22.

Until twelve years ago, Brother Jarvis was a member and faithful supporter of the Burlington Branch, having been for number of years, branch clerk and bishop's agent. At that time his work as assistant secretary of the Chicago Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company made it necessary for him to move to Chicago, to which place his office was transferred.

Brother Elbert A. Smith was the speaker at the funeral service, and addressed us twice on Sunday. He said he could imagine that he had dropped off nineteen or twenty years, and was back in his pastorate here. He will always find a welcome because of those years of association.

Brother Orman Salisbury, of Council Bluffs, was also in Burlington over Saturday and Sunday. With his customary zest and interest in the affairs of all our departments, he addressed the Sunday school in the morning, and by request took charge of the men's class, both at Sunday school and Religio.

The Women's Department held a sale the 20th to 22d, inclusive, realizing returns of about $125 for the benefit of the building fund.

Denver, Colorado

The Denver Branch has had some very enjoyable treats of late, among which was a sermon by Doctor Longacre, of the Iliff School of Theology. There was a large congregation present to hear him, and his sermon was fine. Among some of the good things he said is this:

"Your faith and hope should be in God. God is not dead; just as truly as he has spoken in the past, so he speaks today."

The Denver School of Religious Education presented our Sunday school with a beautiful banner as a token of our standing among the very best Sunday schools of the city.

A new departure in Religio programs which has resulted in a greater interest in Religio work: The programs are in charge of different families, or societies. One of the best of programs was executed recently by the Holmes family; another by the Boy Scouts. Each one seems better than the former one.

Brother Walter Menzies, one of the few charter members of the Denver Branch, is improving from serious illness.

We have the promise of a sermon soon by Doctor Dunleavy, of the Denver University. Brother Hale W. Smith, who is attending lectures at the university has created quite an interest among the leaders of Methodism. He was invited to the home of the president of the university and spent several hours enlightening him as to our belief and practices. Results were good.

Council Bluffs, Iowa

The Women's Department met last week at Sister W. T. Spanswick's home in their monthly meeting, and listened to a talk by a Mrs. Johnson, who has charge of the poor of the city.

The art committee met Easter Sunday to consider advanced work of that association.

Tuesday, April 11, the Bright Star Class of the Religio met in their class social at the home of Doctor Burton. A pleasant get-acquainted meeting was held and a short program was rendered, followed by a light lunch. These class socials are held once in two months.

The late hailstorm did great damage in parts of the city, bearing testimony that it is after the testimony of the servants of God relative to the hour of God's judgments, when the powers of the heavens are shaken.

The revival meetings held by Patriarch F. A. Smith were much appreciated, and much encouragement was given to both members and ministry.

The reunion committee met last Sunday afternoon and partially arranged for the work of the departments for the coming reunion, to be held in August, the place not having been decided upon as yet. We have information that the Southern Nebraska District will not cooperate with us in reunion work this year.

Elder B. S. Lambkin was brought to the hospital in this city last Sunday afternoon, he receiving a serious injury from the kick of a horse. We learn that on the morning of the 3d inst. he was operated upon. Operation was a very serious one, and results are uncertain.

The Brighamite elders have been making quite an active canvass in the city, visiting several of the homes of the Saints. The success they have sought has not been secured, so far as we can learn.

Dallas, Texas

We are trying to be a firmly united band and I believe we are doing good for it seems that most of the Saints are willing at all times to give a reason for the hope they have. The Saints here are living in all parts of the city, and it is a good way to scatter the good seed and we find in the words divine that when you are warned you should warn your neighbor. I believe if all the Saints would practice talking and living the gospel in front of their honest-hearted neighbors that we could bring more into the fold. We shall have done our part then, I think. We should not be selfish of the gospel. We should try at all times to put people to studying and try to teach them about it.

As a branch we have very much to be thankful for. The Lord has spoken to us of late and warned us to be faithful and inasmuch as we were that our church walls would be enlarged. This is very encouraging to us. It makes us feel the responsibility of talking and teaching the gospel to the honest hearts who are out of the fold in this wicked city.

We have our regular services. Our Sunday school is progressing nicely. We have an average attendance of about thirty. We have succeeded in bringing several children of outsiders to our Sunday school and when they receive their quarterly it is a good way of getting the parents interested by helping the children get their lessons.

We have had two more added to our branch lately.

MRS. JOHN S. BRADFORD.

Hutchinson, Kansas

Our little branch is being blessed very greatly in answer to the united prayers of the Saints here that the Master would send more laborers into the vineyard.

Brother A. H. Thompson, of Alexander, Kansas, has moved his family here, which is quite an assistance, he being a teacher; Sister Thompson's ability along the musical line adds considerable to our branch.

On Easter Sunday we were permitted to officiate in the ordinance of baptism at the Young Men's Christian Association pool and six were at this time added to our number.

Brother Ed E. Mettlen has recently been ordained to the office of teacher and will be, as he now is, a great help to the branch. There are now five members of the priesthood living in Hutchinson and all seem anxious to see the work go forward.

We have already effected a new opening at Madora, Kansas, ten miles from here, in a union church, and are planning now to hold a series of meetings in that place for a week or two; and then every Sunday regularly.

We hope to have a place for each of our ordained men to occupy at least once each Sunday.

The reunion will be held here some time this summer, which we feel will be a great help to spreading the gospel.

The Master is blessing the efforts here and he will everywhere if an effort is made. We desire to call into activity all who live in or around here, that they with us might enjoy the blessings which come from service to God and our fellow men.

Brother S. W. Simmons has been here and preached for us. We secured an Apostolic Church in which to hold services. They treated us shamefully, only letting him preach three sermons and then they got mad and locked the doors.

The Devil got busy while Brother Simmons was here. An unknown tongue was given to which no interpretation was given. Brother Simmons said it was the best imitation he had ever witnessed. While he preached people were continually interrupting with their "Amens," and "Bless God," and others continued to "talk in tongues."

These are the conditions our people have to meet. Here is a warning to the young of the church that have been called to the ministry and are expecting to carry this angel message to the world. You will have these evil powers to meet and you had better be ready to meet them when you start. In Matthew 24: 24 Christ himself said, "For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders: insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." In the second epistle of John 1: 9 to 11, we have this writing: "Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son. If there come any unto you, and bringeth not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him Godspeed; for he that biddeth him Godspeed is partaker of his evil deeds."

These are pretty good scriptures to meet them with and 1 Corinthians 14 is a bitter dose and a death blow to them, for Brother Simmons used it. An article will appear in the EN-SIGN by Brother S. W. Simmons. Watch for it.

Auckland, New Zealand

In accordance with appointment by joint council during the last part of 1921, we are at last in our new field. It was a rather trying task, selling off our furniture and effects in Victoria and packing the balance and transferring it five hundred miles to Sydney by train and one thousand miles over the sea to New Zealand. We (my wife, daughter, and myself) are now trying to get rested and settled preparatory to getting to actual work.

We were very kindly given money and clothing by the Victorian Saints at a "send off" before leaving, and during our sojourn in Sydney the Saints treated us liberally as true Saints alone can treat one. We arrived at Sydney well-nigh worn out but found a veritable rest home with Brother and Sister A. W. Ferrett and family.

After recuperating whilst awaiting the departure of New Zealand steamer for a period of eleven days, on March 30 we embarked and after a record smooth trip landed in Auckland, April 4. We were met by Elder A. V. Robinson, whom we were able to identify among the waiting throng, having labored with him formerly.

At present we are staying at the home of Brother Smith, waiting the clearing of families of Saints from 31 Eden Terrace. We are not here long enough to give any definite impression of the conditions, but can say it is a very beautiful place. We expect to meet with the Saints for the first time to-night, April 6, in celebration of the ninety-second birthday of the church. A program has been arranged.

Wichita, Kansas

Our Easter program was well attended and enjoyed by all. Cottage meetings are being held at the homes of some of the Saints. Good interest is being manifested and it is hoped that the honest in heart of this city may be gathered out and enjoy the fruits of the gospel.

We are sorry to lose Brother and Sister Kemp, who are returning to Springfield, Missouri, their former home.

Brother C. E. Harpe was called to Lamoni suddenly May 10, but it is hoped he may soon return.

We welcome Saints in our midst at any and all times. Brother E. A. Curtis, at 1738 South Wichita Street, is our pastor.

OSCODA, MICHIGAN, April 23, 1922.

Editors Herald: I came here, March 21, and started a series of meetings in the Township Hall in Au Sable, with a fine attendance, the crowds increasing every night. One night the moving picture show did not run on account of the people coming to the meetings. Eight members have united with the church, and others are about ready for baptism.

On Sunday, April 16, a Sunday school was organized with a membership of twenty-seven. On April 18, the ladies met and organized a Women's Department with eight members present. All are rejoicing in the latter-day glory and encouraged to do all they possibly can for the advancement of the work.

We had the promise of the auditorium in Oscoda, which is just across the river, in which to hold meetings, but when they found out about the success we had in Au Sable they raised the price so high we could not afford to get it. Then the Swedish church was promised us, but at the last moment they refused, so we cannot get the gospel before them at this time.

It is too cold to hold open-air meetings or we would do that, as many of the Oscoda people are anxious for meetings, but are powerless to obtain a place. Many of them were so interested they walked to Au Sable to meetings and three of those baptized were Oscoda people.

I came here five weeks ago. Brother George Burt, of Beaverton, came up and stayed about eleven days and confirmed the new members. We hope to come back when it warms up and hold open-air meetings in Oscoda.

Your brother in Christ,

CLARENCE E. GRIMM.

LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA, May 11, 1922.

Editors Herald: Elder W. A. Brooner and I held a rather lengthy series of services at Guernsey, California, during the latter part of the winter. No one was baptized, but we made a number of friends to the cause that we are sure will embrace the work if the interest there is followed up. One man and his wife in particular expressed themselves as favorable to our teachings, and that if they ever identify themselves with any church organization it will be the Latter Day Saints. They also believe our work can be established in that place if we continue our efforts. During the period of the services we made our home with Brother Joseph Flory and family, who proved themselves true Saints and assisted us in every possible way. We shall long remember our stay with them.

Guernsey is between Tulare and Hanford. The papers of the latter place gave us much publicity, especially the Hanford Journal. This paper published a number of sermon reviews exactly as they were written, and they were quite lengthy, too.

At the close of these services we went north as far as Santa Rosa on account of Sister Barmore's state of health. She underwent surgical treatment and was in the hospital for two weeks while I was there. Remained there altogether three weeks. On our way to and from Santa Rosa we stopped at Fresno, Modesto, Oakland, San Francisco, Guernsey, and Tulare. We enjoyed ourselves in visiting with and preaching to both Saints and friends.

We arrived here Saturday, April 29. Have been busy preaching here and there in this district ever since. The Los Angeles Branch, with the assistance of the other branches of the district, has purchased a splendid tent and general missionary outfit with which we shall begin operations in this city next Sunday, May 14.

With prayers for God's servants and people and the success of his work, I am,

Your brother in Christ,

ALMA C. BARMORE.

The Des Moines Branch recently held a series of young people's meetings, using local talent as speakers. The attendance was good and the interest excellent.

The Fruits of the Spirit

Address by Elbert A. Smith at the Stone Church, Independence, Missouri, March 19, 1922. Reported by Howard W. Harder.

I understand this term, "the fruits of the Spirit," to be a figure of speech denoting those attributes of the Christian character that are developed in our lives by the life of the Spirit of God in cooperation with our spirit. Fruit, as we know, is grown, developed, and matured. It is sustained by and is the result of an inner life. The fruit of the apple tree is not manufactured and cannot be and is not put on the apple tree; it grows from within. It, however, can be developed by a process of cultivation. Man has taken the wild crabapple and cultivated it and developed it until we have the Jonathan and the Baldwin.

The fruits of the Spirit are not developed in a moment. I am quite in agreement with an extract from a book called, The New Program of Religious Education, by George Herbert Betts, author of The Mind and Its Education.

Religious experience like any other form of experience is a gradual growth, a process of evolution in the life. Hence, spiritual growth obeys the same laws that govern in other phases of the life and in other forms of human experience. A full, rich, religious consciousness and sense of personal acceptance and spiritual well-being may therefore be attained by the normal growth process, providing right nurture and guidance are provided.

We have never as a church embraced the idea that conversion is instantaneous. Of course one may change his mind or his direction instantly; but when we think of conversion as a transformation of the soul into the likeness of Christ it is a life operation, and this development is wrought out by "natural laws in the spiritual realm," as Drummond would say. In other words just as we collaborate with God in an orchard we collaborate with him in developing the fruits of the Spirit. He seems not to will that any of the things that grow should come to a perfect state without the aid of man. He gave us the bitter almond and left us to develop the peach. He gave us the little wild daisy along the roadside and waited for Burbank to develop the Shasta daisy. He gives us in our spiritual natures the raw material of emotion, the clear processes of reason, and permits us with the aid of his Spirit by a process of cultivation to develop the fruits of the Spirit that he has set down as being characteristic of Christ.

I. THE DUAL NATURE OF MAN

In doing this we have to reckon with the fact that man is of a dual nature. The Book of Doctrine and Covenants, section 85: 4, says, "The spirit and the body is the soul of man." And in section 90: 5 a statement is made, "Spirit and element, inseparably connected, receiveth a fullness of joy."

Two things, then, go to make up the soul of man, spirit and body. If we are to believe the statements that are made here the spirit is incomplete and never can have a fullness of joy without the body: hence, the resurrection, when the spirit will be permitted to inhabit a glorified body that can fully serve the true spiritual purposes of Christianity. It takes the two men, body and spirit, to make a complete man.

This is an important thought that long has been overlooked. Science has reckoned for generations with the body only and has not recognized anything excepting matter. Science has not reckoned with anything that could not be weighed in the balances and cut with a knife or analyzed in its component parts, seen with the eye and handled with the hand. Science has not reckoned with spiritual forces. Religion on the other hand for too long ignored the body and attempted to deal only with the spirit of man. The body was a thing to be gotten rid of shortly and permanently and was to be endured only until we could pass to a better state. Religion too often has, as James said, conferred spiritual blessings on the spirit, but has ignored the needs of the body, sending it away naked and hungry with a prayer for blessing.

There has come a change and a reaction that may be set forth in this selection from the American Magazine for January, 1908, by Ray Stannard Baker:

Just as the church is beginning to discover that man has a body as well as a soul, the medical profession is beginning to discover that man has a soul as well as a body.

Elwood Worcester, founder of the Emmanuel Movement, writing in Century Magazine for July, 1909, says:

At the background of all my thinking lies the philosophical doctrine of the essential unity of human nature—which came to me first through Fechner—namely, that man is not a mere animal organism, neither is he a mere intelligence served by organs; that body and soul together constitute the integrity of human nature; that no good or evil can come to a man which does not affect the whole man, soul and body.

In the book called, Who Is Jesus? by Walter B. Murray, on page 124 there appears a diagram so strikingly in harmony with the Book of Covenants statement that I have noted it down. He has a line drawn and he writes above the line, "Soul of spirit," and below, "Body of matter," which together constitute "created man." Then he goes on to say, "The soul is of the spirit, or spiritual, and the body is of matter or material, and the two together, soul and body, make created man."

The Body

Now this being true, as it is, and in harmony with the Book of Covenants, in developing our Christian life we have to reckon with both body and spirit. On the one hand we have the body which is dependent on mechanical contrivances to get about and to perceive things. We are conscious of the things we know through the aid of mechanical contrivances. We are dependent upon physical contrivances and to keep these in working order and regulated and maintained we have a process of eating, digestion, assimilation, and so on, that aligns us with the animal. We eat oats with the horses, wheat with the fowls, and corn with the hogs. The structure of our skeleton and the arrangement of our organs all resemble similar arrangements in the animals.

All this puts us, on one side of our nature, on an animal plane, and when the body is the dominant partner in this partnership that goes to make up the soul we are sure to live on an animal plane and the fruits we produce will be the fruits of the flesh and will be sensual and we will be seeking to gratify those desires that spring up out of our animal natures.

However, there is this exception, that man, being more ingenious, will devise more means of self-gratification than the animals could possibly think of, and as a result will sink lower in the scale of degredation than animals can possibly go.

Let me quote you an extract from a book by Doctor James Foster Scott, "By sinking to a depth of infamy far below the level of any examples to be found among the brute, the unchaste members of the human family have transmitted the filthy venereal diseases through the ages, while the lower animals are exempt."—The Sexual Instinct, page 83.

The Apostle Paul in Galatians 5:19-21 says, "The fruits of the flesh are manifest, which are these; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, strife, murder, drunkenness, revelings, and such like."

Those are the natural fruit where the body is the dominant partner in the partnership of body and spirit.

When a man gorges himself with food until he looks like a stuffed pig, he is doing it in obedience to the behest of the body. The same thing is true when he makes himself a human sewer and becomes a drunkard. When a man leaves the security of his own hearth and the sanctity of his own bed and goes out to cohabit with harlots he is yielding to the behests of the body. To be safe a man ought always to keep a strong spiritual grip on himself so that in the time of temptation there will be no question as to who is the master.

The Spirit

Paul said that he was conscious of a warfare within himself so that when he wanted to do good, always temptation was present to do bad. That old struggle stands out prominently to-day in all our modern psychology and it is plain that many of the ills of the flesh are due to this struggle that goes on between the intellect and the conscience on the one hand and the powerful forces that come from beneath.

The struggle must be fought; but the spirit must be the victor if we are to live the Christian life, because if we are allied to the animals on one side of our nature we are certainly allied with God on the other side. The spirit can rise up and to a certain extent perceive God and commune with him and receive his revelation and aspire to be like him, to be good and true. We can perceive good and evil and make a definite choice between them.

So the question in every man's mind should be, "Which shall I bear, the fruits of the flesh or the fruits of the Spirit? Which will be the dominant partner in my make-up, my body or my spirit?"

Affirmative Religion

To destroy weeds in an area of ground and keep them down all summer is a negative and unprofitable task, but to plant that area of ground to some kind of fruit and cultivate the fruit is an affirmative and profitable task and at the same time it keeps the weeds down. We cannot be satisfied with a negative religion which says, "Thou shalt not," and which is concerned only with avoiding evil habits and resisting temptation; we want a constructive and affirmative and progressive religion that by good deeds and good thoughts keeps the bad ones out.

Along that same line in the book previously mentioned, The New Program of Religious Education, Betts says of the normal child:

He comes into the world a child of God, he has committed no wrong, his moral record is clear; but he has planted in his nature seeds which, if allowed to grow and bear fruit, will yield a harvest of sin and evil. On the other hand, he has other seeds planted in his nature which, if carefully nurtured from the first and brought to fruition, will crowd out or keep down the seeds of evil and will bear a harvest of spiritual good will and responsiveness to God and fellow man.

So if you wish to keep evil out of your life, to keep out the fruits of the flesh, the best way to do so is to cultivate the good fruits of the Spirit. When life is full of those things there is no room for the other. So, as I have said, we want an affirmative, a constructive religion, and in this the Spirit of God is promised to be our helper.

II. WHAT ARE THE FRUITS?

Proceeding now to a consideration of what the fruits of the spirit are, we have the Apostle Paul's list in Galatians 5: 23, "But the fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. Against such there is no law."

Peter tells us in 2 Peter 1: 5-8: "Add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity; for if these things be in you and abound they make you that ye shall be neither barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ."

And from the Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4 we have this: "No man can assist in this work except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity, being temperate in all things whatsoever shall be intrusted to his care."

I believe that while these various statements set forth the fruits of the Spirit, the very best exegesis of the fruits of the Spirit is found in the life of Jesus Christ himself, for the statement is made of him that the word became flesh and dwelt among men, full of grace and truth.

III. OUTSTANDING FRUITS OF THE SPIRIT

I come now to a consideration of some of the outstanding fruits of the Spirit, those particularly summed up in that text from the Book of Covenants: "No man can assist in this work except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope and charity, being temperate in all things whatsoever shall be intrusted to his care." I notice first of all that the fruit of humility is mentioned, "Except he shall be humble."

Humility

This word humble, I believe, has its origin in humilis, on the ground, and humus, the ground or earth, and it has the same root as the word humanity. Humility keeps us a little bit close to the earth. It keeps us close to humanity. It is the trait that binds us to humanity. A preacher, whether he be the president of the church or one of the twelve apostles, or a seventy, elder, priest, teacher, or deacon, who really wishes to defeat his work as a minister, (if we can think of anyone wishing to do that,) can do it the quickest and easiest by getting the "big head." I do not know of anything that will spoil a man's work in this church any quicker than getting the big head.

I do not believe that humility means we shall crawl and cringe, but that we shall have a fair and just conception of ourselves and our own abilities. It is almost as harmful for a man to depreciate himself and his abilities as it is for him to overestimate them. A man ought to have a fair and just conception of what he can do and also of his dependence upon God to help in his work.

"Except a man shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope and charity." Notice this word hope. Hope is the source of our courage and optimism. Brethren, we have too many pessimists in the church, and if there is anything in the statement, "By their fruits ye shall know them," then when you follow the trail of a man who has gone through any district in the church telling the people that everything is on the rocks and gone to ruin, and you see that the fruit of his effort is to discourage the Saints and that there is a cessation of tithing and of constructive work you can judge that man by his fruits. Jesus went around giving off strength. He did not go about undermining people's faith and courage and hope. One definition of a pessimist is a man whose fondest hope is that his worst fears will be realized. I say we have had too many pessimists. What sort of preachers are you going to be, you elders, priests, teachers, and deacons? When you go out into the groups and branches are you going to give off a miasmatic fog of doubt, suspicion, rumor, and discontent, or will it be your business to encourage and build up and strengthen and fortify, so that when people come under your ministry they will have greater faith and labor with more zeal and determination?

Sometimes we hear people say, "Well, things are in bad shape; this man does this and that man does that—the President of the church or the Bishop.” If we were dependent alone upon President Smith, Bishop McGuire, or the Quorum of Twelve, I would be a pessimist too—they are human. But if Jesus Christ is the head of this church and if he had this church in mind when he said, “Upon this rock I will build my church and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it,” then I have every reason to be an optimist and to have hope. Without hope, the statement is, no man can assist in building up this work.

Faith

Then comes the fruit of faith. Faith, I believe, can be developed, cultivated, and brought to a higher degree in our lives. If humility binds us to man, faith binds us to God. You are here this afternoon because you have faith in certain principles. If you lose faith in those principles your ministry will very soon come to an end and you will be among those of whom the apostle said: “You ran well for a season; what did hinder you?” Fruit is something that may be cultivated. The gifts of the gospel are given to us, but the fruits are things that we must develop by our efforts. Alma has this to say of faith: “Even if ye can no more than desire to believe, let this desire work in you even until ye believe in a manner that ye can give place for a portion of my word.” Sometimes we hear people say, “I wish I had faith.” Well, they have the starting point, the desire to believe.

I have heard some of our men laud doubt. They tell us that doubt is the mainspring of action, that it is the root of progress. I cannot altogether agree with that thought. The statement is made that no man can assist in this work without faith. If doubt were such a blessed principle Christ would have said, “No man can assist in this work except he shall be full of doubt.” Doubt has no program. Atheism does not come to us with anything to believe. It gives us no program in life and nothing to live for—neither incentive nor objective. But the message of God comes to us with a plan of life and with a goal towards which to set our course. Doubt at the worst is destructive, and at the best it is only negative. A negative never gave the world anything.

It is true perhaps that when Luther doubted the excesses and vices of Catholicism he did a good thing, but it was belief and faith in a new vision of righteousness and virtue that made him a reformer. Not doubt but faith made him a great reformer. Never doubt of old error, but always faith in new truth leads on.

You may have heard the old story about the German philosopher and scientist who doubted everything until finally he doubted his own existence. And at last the only thing that he could get his feet on and say, “I do not doubt it,” was the fact that he doubted. He came to the conclusion he could not doubt that he doubted. That is the logical conclusion of doubt. It will doubt everything in heaven or on earth excepting itself.

Love

Now we are coming to the very climax of the whole matter. The Book of Mormon tells us that charity is the pure love of Christ. Love I take to be synonymous with charity, and the Book of Covenants is in harmony with Paul who says, “Now abideth faith, hope, and charity, but the greatest of these is charity.” Charity is the mother of all our Christian graces. No man can be a successful missionary who does not love the people to whom he preaches. He need not tell them that he does not love them; they will find it out. And the same is true with you priests and teachers as you go about ministering and visiting the groups. If you cannot love the people to whom you minister you cannot assist in building up this work.

That is true; that is fundamental. I used to see what I thought were exceptions to this rule. I saw a notable man in a certain city and knew that he was not humble, that he was not full of love, and yet he seemed to be assisting in building up this work. He seemed to be for a time and made a great show, but when I visited that country two years ago and saw the wreck that had followed in his wake I knew that he had not assisted in building up this work. The fruits of his work in his ministry are still there and I doubt if they will be eradicated in this generation.

Some one has said that love is blind. Love is the only thing that sees. It is hatred and suspicion that are blind—hatred, jealousy, and suspicion. I have often seen two men in the ministry who were very good men. I could work with either one of them, but strange to say they could not work together at all. That is so common a phenomenon that it is distressing. Knowing each of them I knew that they both looked through a fog of suspicion and neither one recognized the other.

You perhaps have all heard the Irishman's story: “As I was crossin' London Bridge to-day I met Mike. I said, ‘Hello, Mike.’ He said, ‘Hello, Tim.’ I said, ‘I'm not Tim.’ And he said, ‘I'm not Mike.’ And we took a good look at each other and sure enough it was naither of us at all.”

Two men in a quarrel see each other through a fog and neither sees the man that the other is.

You have got to have a sympathetic viewpoint to understand a man and see him at all. They tell a little story about Charles Lamb who was one day dining with a friend, and upon seeing a certain man he said, “How I hate that man.” The friend said, “I didn't know that you knew him.” Charles Lamb replied, "I don't; I can't hate a man that I know." And you cannot know a man that you hate.

IV. WHAT PLACE IN THE GOSPEL ECONOMY?

Last of all, and in conclusion, what place in our economy do these fruits of the Spirit have? I think I have dwelt long enough on their place in the individual life. We are going to be judged by our fruits, as individuals, and not alone by the doctrines we preach, but by the fruits we bear. If it were incumbent on Jesus Christ to make the word flesh among the children of men it is incumbent upon us as his children to do the same thing and this is especially important in our ministry.

I have a little poem written by one of our men, Brother Ernest A. Webbe, of Kirtland, Ohio, that I will read to you in part:

Had I all tongues that man and angels seek
To send abroad an ever pleasing din,
And be my bearing gentle not, nor meek,
I but proclaim my weakness and my sin;

Like some great bell, melodious of sound
That sends a warning, reverberating clear,
Until the day its brazen lip is found
Riven and rift, its voice henceforth a jeer!

A sounding brass and cold, the note that mars
And jangles on the spurning atmosphere;
So must our brooding, shaping characters
Round out the words that on our lips appear.

In our collective lives the fruits of the spirit are absolutely essential. If you see a little branch that is torn with division, you may be sure that the fruits of the Spirit have not been developed in the members of that branch. The fruits of the flesh are there; envy and contention and strife. If you see a little branch where they are united and happy and peaceful you may know that the fruits of the Spirit have been developed. Zion is only a little branch on a large scale. That is all. You cannot take quarrelsome and contentious members from little branches and bring them here and have their characters transformed. If contentions and divisions and suspicions will wreck and ruin a little branch, as they do so often, they will wreck and ruin Zion almost as easily; but if humility and love and faith and hope and charity will unite and build up a little branch they will do the very same thing for Zion.

I do not believe that we need such wondrous additional revelations in order to build Zion. What we need to do is to learn the A B C's of Christianity. Just the little simple lessons of learning to live together peacefully in harmony with the golden rule that requires that I shall do unto you as I want you to do to me. I think myself that the redemption of Zion waits and waits and waits until we learn these lessons.

In conclusion I am going to repeat a little experience. Some weeks ago I had a day of despondency. The first letter I read in the office was from one of the Twelve who had been in the field adjusting difficulties in a small branch and he reported that the branch was torn and divided with slander and backbiting and suspicion and that even when they came together in their sacrament and testimony meetings every man who got up to testify gave another man a dig. And the next letter I read was from a district president a long way off. A couple of elders had been in Independence for a while and when they left they went to that district and spread strange and groundless rumors broadcast and greatly shook the faith of the Saints. And about the next letter was from a brother and sister that I had known for years and trusted and loved and they said, "Please take our names off the church record."

So I went home that night despondent and discouraged. I was a pessimist for a few minutes. I knelt to pray. I told the Lord in simple language, "Lord, I feel discouraged. The way looks dark. When branches are torn with dissension, when elders are sowing the seeds of discord, when Saints are falling by the way and asking that their names be taken off the Lamb's Book of Life, I feel discouraged." Then the Spirit came to me with this thought: "Those things are not your business. It is true your business is to promote peace; it is your business to tell the truth and try to destroy evil rumors; it is your business to help people to stand and preserve their membership in the church. But if people will quarrel and if they will fall by the way and if they will go out of the church, that is not any of your business in the sense that you must not permit it in any way to affect your life. All that I demand of you is to live your life as nearly as you can in harmony with the Christlike ideal as you are able to perceive it."

I arose encouraged, determined that I would at least try to do that. That is all I can do. Will you all join with me in that resolution?

May the Lord bless you with his Spirit and keep you in his prayer.

Zion the Pure

A tremendous responsibility is upon us. Enoch, we learn, walked and talked with God (Genesis 7). Abraham was called the Friend of God. Other men came into close communion with him from Father Adam down. When we feel exalted in our own conceit, it is well to examine ourselves and remember these men and that Enoch's city was found fit to be taken to the bosom of God, so Zion fled.

Zion is the pure in heart; Zion is washed and clean outwardly, but that is not enough. Zion avoids the pathway of sin, the overt act of evil, yet that is not all, for Zion is pure in heart. Think not on that which is unlovely, but seek all that is beautiful and true.

Among the wonderful promises made to Enoch and confirmed in Melchisedec who belonged to the priesthood after the order of the Son of God, as set forth in Genesis 14: 30-32, there is clearly declared the power to stand in the presence of God.

The Master, when he was here, told his disciples (John 14: 23), "If a man love me he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him." This is also confirmed by John in Révelation 3: 20: "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." This is a great privilege which may be ours, and without the sacrifice of any real joy or happiness that this world has to offer, but rather through fulfillment of the purposes of God in this life as well as in our religious service.

God has called us to be partners and associates with him, but if he is to sup with us, if he is to make his abode with us, it will require greater wisdom on our part and deeper understanding than we have yet shown. It will also require purity of life. There is no place we can go from his presence, yet we cannot see him except by the Spirit of God.

This is of tremendous import, both for our intellectual preparation, for surely it takes men of wisdom and of knowledge to be friends of God and walk and talk with him, men who are devoted to his service and who are willing to sacrifice the best things of life for the sake of making right preparation; but it also requires a clean heart, clean hands, and a right life.

The World Needs the Gospel of Christ

Church union is only possible through a return to Christ. All efforts in that direction reemphasize the need of sending the message of Christ abroad in all the world.

For more than a year, the religious press, especially in Great Britain, has been filled with a discussion of the Lambeth Conference of the bishops of the English, or Episcopal, Church. We have made reference to this conference, and of the movement towards church union, in the columns of the HERALD from time to time.

It now appears, by a letter from the Bishop of Zanzibar to the Church Times, of London, that the address, or appeal, was not intended as a basis for union, but rather as an ideal to be achieved. For this reason, exact theological statement was subordinated to the spirit of the document, its principal purpose being to lay the foundation for union.

He and others think we would do well if we could reach that basis within twenty-five years. For too many of the older men, it might require too much of a change of habit and thought. The churches of to-day are not yet ready for the descent of the spirit of unity. "Reunion, if and when it comes, will appear as a gift from above, and that a miraculous gift." But it will not come until the people of earth are prepared. God helps us, when we seek to cooperate with him, to carry out his will.

This is the position that we, as a church, have long taken. Union must come on the plan laid down by God and not in a spirit of charity, falsely so called, of compromising the things of God; nor does this mean that it shall be our ideas, but the spirit of revelation to all.

The English church, according to the bishop, has sinned heavily, particularly towards the working man. It has lacked the spirit of fellowship. It is more vital to bring some of the so-called masses to the table of the church of England, than it is to admit free churchmen. It is more vital, in other words, that the various churches should seek the widow, the orphan, and those who are in need of help individually, than that a few, in the name of the church, should form a union of church classes. He lays at the door of the church the sin of class pride, usury, and the like, and that too many prefer the present sinful world to the fellowship of Christ.

The world to-day needs the prophetic voice giving forth thunderbolts against riches, land owning, usury, and showing us the sort of ideals of Christian fellowship which the early church deliberately deserted.

Still, matters are not as bad as they have been, and it is impossible that genuine penitence should be in vain, and the fact that a few have seen this vision and ideal will influence the next generation.

In another column, we publish a brief extract from his letter which shows a deep insight into existing world conditions. A complacent self-satisfaction upon our part is not sufficient. The world is hungering and thirsting for the truth of God and for the vision of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is time that we went forth as a church with some of the unselfishness and denial of the early church, and that those who cannot go should deny themselves in order to send the message of peace abroad throughout the world. The world to-day is suffering for a demonstration of Christian fellowship. You may call it stewardship; you may call it an economic solution, but it will involve a denial of the flesh pots of Egypt

I've Heard Sir Arthur Conan Doyle Lecture

By James E. Bishop

"Save for the personal touch, we found nothing not had years ago."

Just a few days before the evening of the lecture I learned of it, and with T. W. Williams and John Schofield we took a brief respite from our ministerial cares and went to hear this man of international repute give his lecture on "Proofs of immortality." He is well known as a man of letters and has the degrees M. D., and LL. D. His acceptance of spiritualism is one of the great events in modern philosophy.

We went into the Birmingham Town Hall on January 20, after we had had a little adventure with a lost ticket, which caused T. W. much consternation. We were lucky to find the ticket, as it was dropped in the middle of the road where many people were crossing on their way to the hall.

We soon found the large hall crowded, and ere long the soothing strains of the large organ began. Such tunes as the "Lost chord" and the "Rosary" were offered. As one's apperception as well as perception is very important in any offering, the psychology of those tunes was apparent. We determined to keep prejudices aside and hear the man.

Presently he with the chairman and a few others came to the platform. In a few moments the chairman arose to make the introduction. He seemed overwhelmed with the importance of the occasion, or else he wanted to make a four-hour speech in as many minutes. Too many of these lengthy and over-anxious introductions spoil many a speech. He called attention to the piece the organist had played and suggested that the soul of Sir Arthur Sullivan was reaching down from heaven and grasping hands with the hand of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. If it had been said with a little touch of humility it would not have sounded so crass.

We were glad when the speaker arose. We saw that he stood well over six feet and that he was big in proportion. His head was full and round. His voice was deep and clear, and we concluded that whatever his mentation was, his appearance was suggestive of the dominant type.

He began by referring to the many happenings that were seemingly increased because of the war, which suggested an agency outside of man. He quoted several scientists who were on record as to the genuineness of the phenomena. Then he said, "I see a journalist has explained matters; he says we are all liars." This bit of wit and his deportment suggested that there was a man before us who was calm, collected, and able to speak with assurance and homeliness—one sure of his ground.

He told of many experiences in seances. Said he had seen his son's face (who was dead) and heard a baritone voice singing. He suggested that these could not be hallucinations, as they were shared by others at the same time. He showed several pictures that he claimed to be photographs of spirits of the departed.

He has investigated phenomena of this kind for over thirty years. At first he was disbelieving, but gradually the evidence became so strong that full conviction came to him, and after that incident with the war he and his wife decided that the best good they could do was to devote their lives to the task of bringing the hope of immortality home to humanity.

He trounced the old theological idea of sin and pronounced his belief in the goodness of man. He said that there was sin and the worst sin of all was the sin of pride. This caused one to lose his friends, and if he did not change his attitude, lose all the fellowship possible for him, and his spirit would go through the eternal world dreary, forsaken, and without friendship.

On the question of religious sects he said that in the next plane of life people belonged to the same sects as they did here, only that there was a dropping off of the points that cause differences and better cooperation on the great principles on which there was agreement. But there was an eternal progression, and finally all differences vanished in the wonderful conception of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. In application he said that the spiritualists did not care what sect a man belonged to. He has seen good everywhere. If you are a Roman Catholic, be one, but for goodness' sake do not go in a circle: make progress.

They were not against Jesus, for he taught the most beautiful morality that has ever been taught.

The conditions in the other world were beautiful, and those who had tasted of that life would not come back to this condition under any circumstances. The spirits were happy and they were engaged in the pursuits that they had learned of the arts and the sciences in this life. In referring to the objection that spiritualism had not given any constructive thought to the world, he said, "All that we get here is simply the overflow from them." All of the inspiration of the saint, philosopher, and scientist came from that source, for they all admitted that when their best work was done they were in a sort of an ecstasy.

He referred to the objection that was made to seances held in subdued light and said that mediums could not give the reason hitherto. All that they would have been able to say would be that they secured better results that way. But now they knew the reason to be that ectoplasm was the basis of this phenomena. This stuff was soluble in white light; it stood red light, and like a photographic negative it worked better without any light.

Sir Arthur claimed that we have a second or etheric body. And when the mother saw her son with his wounded face flash before her, that was her son's spirit after it had been liberated from his physical body.

He quoted the New Testament and urged the clergy who were against them to use the New Testament instead of the Old. He referred to Peter's quotation of Joel in the Acts and read the nine gifts mentioned by Paul, and suggested that the clergy had better go to the sources of their religion and learn their lesson better before attempting to correct others.

It was a privilege to hear him and we concluded that it was foolish to use the old weapons on them. They have been told that this is the work of demons, but they believe that it is of God.

He told of an interesting talk with Mr. McCabe. Mr. McCabe is a materialist and seems to think that Haeckel has summarized human knowledge in his Riddle of the Universe, which I believe he translated.

Mr. McCabe said that this world is good enough for him, with its beautiful sunshine, etc. Sir Arthur replied by calling attention to the awful things in it. He spoke of an old man that he knew who worked fourteen hours a day on an elevator. Every time he met him the man would say something about the weather, yet he was never out in the weather and had very little opportunity to enjoy the sunshine. He then remarked, What a blessing it would be if the clay that held that spirit in bondage would break and allow that spirit to soar aloft to the regions of the blessed. It was very interesting to hear this parry recited, because we have the extreme extrovert and introvert in action. The result was, of course, that neither one was converted, and so far as we know there was no compromise.

We have tried to epitomize as much as we remember without offering any criticism, but if we may be indulged we would like to say something.

It seems clear that modern spiritualism is adjusted to meet the demands of modern knowledge and intelligence. Its weakness can only be detected through the manifestation of the gift of the Holy Ghost. We appreciate the fact that the gift of the Holy Ghost is offered to those who are obedient to the principles of the gospel.

It is too apparent that this movement leads to extreme subjectivism and introversion. The old man referred to by Sir Arthur is the product of certain definite causes that are known to the scientific world and are controllable if men in high and low places were honest. We can appreciate most highly the work of the Lord in this latter day in giving up a philosophy that keeps our feet firmly upon the earth as well as having our heads in heaven. So long as man is in the earthly tabernacle his physical needs have to be supplied, and the matter that Sir Arthur referred to and the many investigations he has made and the miles he has traveled are based upon the possibility of his having time free from physical toil to do it. Leisure is the result of overproduct of the needs of the physical man; philosophy is made opportune by the possibility of leisure. What the world needs is a religion that will begin to realize heaven now. To do that is the purpose of God and is our opportunity.

Granting that these auditory and visual experiences are valid, it remains that the conditions surrounding them lead to hallucination and delusion and to a general weakness of the nervous system. The fact that a few well-organized individuals show no signs of such weakness would not disprove the general law.

The argument surrounding ectoplasm is suggestive, and if we knew more about it undoubtedly we could say that this is the very crux of the problem. The miracles of Jesus were worked in the broad daylight. The manifestation of the day of Pentecost was in the third hour of the day which would be 9 a. m. in our civil time. Is there any connection between the darkness and the subdued light that is necessary for a seance and the symbolic statement "the power of darkness"? And is there any connection between the failure of a seance to materialize in the light of day with the symbolic statements, "I am the light of the world," and, "If any man will come after me I will give unto him the light of life"?

In this connection a few statements from the Doctrine and Covenants are interesting:

And the light which now shineth, which giveth you light, is through him who enlighteneth your eyes, which is the same light that quickeneth your understandings; which light proceedeth forth from the presence of God, to fill the immensity of space. The light which is in all things; which giveth life to all things; which is the law by which all things are governed; even the power of God who sitteth upon his throne, who is in the bosom of eternity, who is in the midst of all things.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 3.

The glory of God is intelligence, or, in other words, light and truth; light and truth forsaketh that evil one.—Ibid., 90: 6.

When light forsakes an object that object is in the dark.

The Savior taught:

For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reprov'd. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God.—John 3: 20, 21.

The statement that all the good that men have wrought in the world is the "overflow" from the spirit world is an assumption, as much so as the belief that knowledge has its origin in rationalism, empiricism, or criticism, and perhaps more so. We believe that God is the source of all power, and he has also told us, "Verily I say, Men should be anxiously engaged in a good cause, and do many things of their own free will, and bring to pass much righteousness; for the power is in them, wherein they are agents unto themselves."—Doctrine and Covenants 58: 6.

Save for the personal touch, we find nothing in the lecture that was not set forth years ago by F. W. H. Myers in his Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. Some leader in the present-day world of thought, suggested that Myer's work was, in the realm of the psychic, what Darwin's work was in the realm of biology. And Darwin had this to say about his work:

The new edition of the Descent of Man has turned out an awful job. It took me ten days merely to glance over letters and reviews with criticisms and new facts. It is a devil of a job.—Darwin and Modern Science, preface, p. 16.

What the world needs is a philosophy that will revalue the facts of human experience and synthesize all the good that has been, is now, and that which can come in and give a living expression of it in some group or groups.

The theory of Doctor Hall, of the phylo and ontogenic aspects of psychic life, which denies the objectivity of God, the Holy Ghost, and spiritistic manifestation, is in the discard. This classification of such phenomena as telepathy, communication from the dead, etc., given by Doctor John Edgar Coover, of Leland Stanford Junior University, is much more reasonable. (See Delineator, December, 1920.)

1. Legerdemain or collusion, such as the performances seen on the stage and in the seance rooms of many professional mediums.

This class is perpetrated by fraud and is of chief interest only because it throws light on the astounding credulity of human nature.

2. Sensory and motor automatisms associated with subliminal impressions and subliminal elaborations, such as are found in the ouija board, table rapping, automatic writing and speaking, phenomena of the nonprofessional medium.

This class is where the store of the subject's experience is drawn upon in such a cryptic (deceptive) way as to lead him and his observers to the most extravagant conclusions.

3. An unexplained residuum.

This class embraces the unknown in the field of the subliminal, the subconscious, the unconscious, the co-conscious.

It would be well for every philosopher to tell his followers frankly that there was an "unexplained residuum" in his philosophy, then some would not be so foolish as to think that his "sweeping generalizations" and "inductive leaps" was the "open sesame" that unfolded the "mysteries of eternity."

Admitting the claims of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and Sir Oliver Lodge and a multitude of others that have had singular experiences, I think we are taught about as follows:

1. The facts of experience indicate that there is a power exterior to us that impinges on our consciousness.

2. The communications received suggest that the communicator is familiar with the life of the departed and with the life of the one communicated with.

3. The conclusion, then, is that the spirit of the departed friend or relative is the communicator. Admit this and the case for immortality is clear.

The mind loves rest, quiet, and peace. Anxiety is regarded as an enemy. William James said, "Indecision is hell." On these higher levels of experience anxiety is always keener and sought more to be avoided than on the lower levels of living. "Short cuts are always" indulged in. Modern religion seems to be trying to make "soothing syrup" of theology. We have been taught that we can get to God in an instant, in a twinkling of an eye. Thus the great processes of growth and refinement are beclouded to the vision. So our spiritualistic friends, in order to avoid the annoyance of the thought of the possibility of interference and "cross-wires" on the other side, drive themselves to the fallacy that there is no Devil, "therefore I am safe in my little seance and can eat good spiritual food out of the hand of God." The logic of the situation is this: that love and hate are relative terms and that they must by the very compulsion of consistent thinking find their basis in personage. It is interesting to note how in many cases the Book of Mormon anticipated modern tendencies, and this one is not the least, "And behold, others he flattereth away, and telleth them there is no hell; and he saith I am no Devil, for there is none." That is just like him. He is a liar from the beginning.

As we look out on the world and see what a mess things are in, we are constrained to say, Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly, and save thy truth and thy people. Amen.

Common good binds a state together, private gain rends it in pieces.—Plato's Laws.

Bible Marking

By R. W. Farrell

Arguments for marking your Bible and suggestions as to methods.

A great deal of confusion exists in the mind of the young preacher over the problem of sermon preparation and sermon preaching. I wish to handle only one phase of the matter in this article. Many a person has approached me with the query, "What shall I do?" And it is to answer this question, from my own viewpoint, that I ask for a small space in the HERALD.

No secret is made of the fact that no two persons agree in their method of work—and I see no reason why they should, except on fundamentals. There are a few universal laws governing the situation, however, and these we should obey. A man must study, if he wishes to improve, study to become a workman that needeth not to be ashamed. I have not found anyone who really denies the truth of this statement. But there are many persons who are not willing to do their best—they are mentally or physically diseased; out of joint more or less. It is a most common complaint—probably everyone is affected in degrees.

The next essential is to know how to use the knowledge obtained through prayer and study: to know how to speak to others these "words of eternal life" which have been learned from the Source of all wisdom. It is of this phase of the subject I write, under the head of "Bible marking."

Most People Like a Marked Bible

With some there is an aversion to making any sort of mark on the leaves of a Bible. This, however, is the exception rather than the rule. We know the value of emphasis; we know the necessity of classifying. Bible marking is practically that and nothing more. When we consider the large field of literature there is before us in the sixty-six books of the Bible, we see the need of some system that will fix in our memory or before our gaze some of the precious words that so extensively enrich the Word of God. There are swamps in the historical writings which we do not care to enter very often. In some manner these places should be walled off—indicated by some method. Then the rich spots should be made to stand out before us. Each book has some important teaching. How difficult it would be to find the "evidence" you need—say in the book of Esther or Job—if there were not some mark of distinction to call attention—your attention—to it. There is so much to be said in favor of marking as against the practice, that time need not be taken to defend this way of focusing attention.

I have found that it never does any good to make fun of anything. And there is a big question, now in the minds of many persons who think sanely, whether or not sarcasm ever really has rightful place in the life of the human animal. We have heard men scout the practice of missionaries who seem to have a set list of sermons which they preach wherever they go. I think that there is a side to this question which has not received sufficient support. It is this: Important evidence in defense of some great truth should be repeated wherever that great truth is being defended. Strong evidence should not give place to weak evidence. For example, an elder uses the first two verses of the sixth chapter of Hebrews whenever he is defending the six principles of the doctrine of Christ. If he is delivering a sermon (or lecture) to persons outside of the gospel, why should it be considered a thing censurable for him to go over much the same line of presentation, or deduction, that he used in other places under like conditions? I believe that he should do so, the desire in his heart always being, Let me give my best at all times. The great lectures (such as Conwell's "Acres of diamonds," Bryan's "Prince of peace") are planted and nourished on this very principle. And to the orthodox we can cite the example of Christ who repeated his Sermon on the Mount to the sheep of the American fold.

The danger, then, is not in repeating great sermons, but in ceasing to cultivate the mind as the years pass; in ceasing to improve these great sermons so they may become greater sermons. The skeleton of a well-prepared lecture cannot be thrown away. A growing mind will be busy thinking new thoughts, grasping new illustrations, and in hundreds of ways enriching itself with numberless experiences, so that when its owner is called on to meet emergencies of various kinds there will be instant response to the demand. So, possibly, some of our brothers, though they have been led by the Spirit to repeat their lectures to new audiences, have failed, nevertheless, in this—they have not continued the work of laying up in their minds the things of eternal life, as the Lord commands. They have been satisfied with the old and have neglected the new. They have brought forth from their storehouse things old, but have failed to bring forth things new. They are not censurable for doing the former, but rather condemned for not doing the latter.

This discussion could be extended with profit.

Tendency to Stereotyped Sermons

A marked Bible tends, naturally, to stereotype our discourses. But we have already discussed this aspect of the problem, and have only to add that never—never should a preacher cling so tenaciously to any line of reasoning that the office work of the Holy Ghost be made of none effect. To argue against this principle is to argue for death. God cannot bless with power a mouthpiece that refuses to speak the message put into it by the Spirit. To be sure, a talkative man can talk, and if his memory is good he can struggle to the end of his lecture, but the fruit which he desires, the conversion of souls, will not be forthcoming.

Feeling the insistent need of something not furnished by the marginal space of his Bible, the preacher has made use of a notebook. Here he entered dangerous waters—not that a notebook is harmful if used properly. One of the dangers has been that the Bible became only a mere reference book used in the study, and the notebook became a substitute for the Bible. The temptation has been too great for some to resist—the temptation to paste verses of scripture in the leaves of the “blank Bible” and eventually abandon the public use of the Book itself. Thus the preacher became a man of “one book” with a vengeance, and that book a poor, incomplete, notebook. I think that this extreme is decidedly injurious. On the other hand, the keeping of a notebook, wisely prepared, is advisable; but the really vital and important quotations needed in the routine work of delivering sermons and doing effective fireside preaching, should be deposited in the Bible itself.

The New Edition of the Bible

The committee has been working over a year preparing the new edition of the Inspired Version of the Bible. When completed our Bible will be the most valuable edition ever put through the press, and it should be in the hands of every member of the church. The marginal references will make unnecessary many hand markings which would otherwise be needed. And the topical index will furnish the result of many months of careful study by the committee. But the need of individual touch will remain. I would suggest, then:

That every lover of the Word of God should now purchase a medium-priced Bible (if he does not already possess one) and begin his work of making this Bible a part of himself, as it were. Then when the teacher's edition is printed the result of careful marking and other additions can be readily transferred to the Inspired Version. I would further advise that prospective buyers secure from the Herald Publishing House the present edition of the Inspired Version, for one cannot become too familiar with the wonderful readings of this volume.

I further suggest that we have our new edition and the Book of Mormon bound together. This would give us a splendid margin for our Stick of Joseph and make the two records literally “one” in the Lord's hands to bring about the purposes for which they were ordained.

My method for marking, in brief, is this: Use ink. Different colors are valuable. Use great care that you do not overdo. As a rule this is the case with beginners. A light circle round the numeral of the verse, or a faint line is sufficient for much that we need to indicate. I repeat, the thing must not be overdone. And in connecting common references there is danger of weakening the memory, which seems to be always looking for an excuse for relaxing on the job. But the advantage is in fixing location of texts. One familiar with a marked Bible will know just what part of the page a certain statement is found on. Important words are indicated by circles or underscores. Letters or figures call attention to marginal information. In the margin different important readings of various versions should be given, and especially should the Greek and Hebrew variations be noted. (A valuable book of reference for this is Young's Analytical Concordance.) The Word of God is a splendid interpreter of itself, and the student should be on the lookout for these essential words and terms which throw light on passages of scripture. These explanatives should be connected with the verse they help explain.

Making the Bible Meaning Plain

Our first and chief aim is to make plain to the common people the meaning of God's word. We should also be able to defend it against all attacks. This latter process demands a deeper preparation. For example, we note on our margin that the word everlasting comes from a Greek term meaning age-lasting. The word immortal may mean, in the original, incorruptible. God is both immortal and incorruptible, but man's body is corruptible, while his spirit is deathless so far as its consciousness is concerned. These bits of knowledge, which can be picked up easily by a student, are important. They help make plain to the honest investigator the way of life. Such works as What Is Man? (by the way, a masterpiece,) by Brother Joseph R. Lambert, will furnish valuable points for our margins.

Put your notebook in your Bible. This sounds impossible, but it is not. Secure onion skin paper and makes notes and outlines of sermons on it and paste the sheets between the leaves of your Bible. You will be surprised to note how much material you can get into the book without bulging its covers. The tremendous advantage of this system is that the Bible is always before you, as it should be, when you are preaching. (For this suggestion I am indebted to Brother John Bailey.)

rough treatment, every decade. I know we have boasted of the number of Bibles we have used up in strenuous days of preaching; but those days of old "pound and yell" are past, we trust. "Let your moderation be known unto all men." Give the people time to think between your important thoughts. Avoid the fantastical interpretation of scripture. Do not unduly spiritualize the word, neither become too materialistic. Sift carefully the opinions of men, remembering that their name is legion.

Such, in brief, are some of the things I have learned by experience and observation. They are passed along for what they are worth.

A Personal God Versus an Impersonal God

By C. Edward Miller

The Philadelphia Presbyterian Board of Publication issues a forty-six-page book entitled, The Mormon God Is Not the God of the Bible. It is aimed principally at the Utah Church, and denies the personality of God.

The writer says: "In John 14: 7-11, Christ tells his disciples that those who have seen him have seen the Father also, and that if they had known him they should have known the Father likewise. Now all the disciples did know Christ so far as his form and general appearance were concerned, but it is intimated that there was a sense in which some of them did not yet know him, and when they should come to know their Master in that sense they would then know the Father as well. He that hath seen me hath seen the Father, and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? The words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself, but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works."

The wisdom and power of God exhibited in Christ are a faithful representation or image of God. Not the fleshy image. The writer seems to abhor the very thought that God has personality. He is a true convert of the creed which teaches that God is a being without body, parts, or passions—a fine definition of nothing.

See what a tangle our friend gets himself into when he makes the following statements: "It is wonderful that the infinite and eternal God should allow himself to be brought within the bounds of time and definite space for the purpose of accomplishing human redemption, and it is especially wonderful that this should be brought about through the manifestation of God in the flesh. The point of the mystery is that God would or could take so low a position as that involved in human limitations." Notice the parts I have placed in italics. God lowered himself when he came in the person of Christ, in the form and flesh of man. To make the matter still more emphatic, the writer says: "God can, however, assume a form, as in the case of Christ—'God manifest in the flesh.' Only one of the many or infinite number of ways in which he can manifest himself—but he lays aside much of his glory in doing so."

The Presbyterian Board of Publication wishes the world to understand that God the Eternal Father came in the person of Jesus Christ, took a low position, circumscribed himself, laid aside much of his glory when he came as the Christ, was killed on the cross, resurrected with a body of flesh, and of whom it is said in Revelation 1: 18: "I am alive forevermore," and therefore is perpetually in an inferior position than what he previously occupied before he took upon him flesh! The resurrected Christ is God resurrected. "He has laid aside much of his glory in doing so." Now, where has our friend maneuvered to? On page 34 he again commits himself very positively and says: "It remains to notice those passages of scripture which refer to God as though he possessed the members of the human body. As God condemns all representations of himself in the human form, it clearly follows that we are not to think of him as being in that form. (He can take that form for a time, as exemplified in the case of Christ; but that, as we have seen, was a 'mystery' although at the same time one of the evidences of infinite power)."

The pictures of Christ extant, in art glass windows, books, oil paintings, etc., are divinely prohibited, then, for Christ was God in the flesh, has ascended to heaven in that form, will return to the earth in that form, and says he is alive (resurrected in that form) forevermore. God now eternally has a form. Christ said, after his resurrection, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." So apparently God, with a form, body, parts, and passions, is not circumscribed because he dwells in a tabernacle, of which man is the image.

Here is another tangle the writer gets into. He says: "God is a spirit," and the explanation of this statement in Christ's words also: "A spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have." The inference of course is that as God is a spirit he has not flesh and bones, but as Christ has flesh and bones, therefore he was not a spirit! As Christ was resurrected with flesh and bones, therefore he is not a spirit, but is God. But God is a spirit and as Christ is not a spirit, therefore Christ is no longer God. He did lower himself surely, as the writer said he did!

When R. B. Neal was running the Sword of Laiban, one of the Campbellite debaters sent in an article telling how he met some of the Josephite elders with this question: "Is God a spirit?" Answer, "Yes, of course." "Why did Joe Smith then take

The World Needs Christ, but Will It Find Him?

The world is aware of its need of Christ: the Christ of Galilee, the Christ of Calvary. It does not desire to hear what we, theologians and preachers, have to say about him: it longs to see him manifested in a corporate life. It wants to study him, not our theories about him. And, in fact, we are far more nearly agreed about the sort of corporate life that would manifest him than about any theory of his personality. Can we not, then, "get down to" the thing that comes first?

But how, and where, are we to begin? The English habit is to call a conference, talk it all out without too great attention to detail, pass some resolutions, and form a committee! Not this way does our path lie. Special retreats for clergy and laity would help greatly. But, even so, the conductors of the retreats must first arrive at some practical policy. Is it quite impossible that a few kindred spirits should get together, and, bewailing their present un-Christlikeness, remain before God until some new light from on high illuminate their minds?

Is the Spirit gone so far from us that he can no longer hear us? Is the Christ so little willing to be seen by men that he can refuse to use those who place themselves unreservedly at his service?

Some time before the Lambeth Conference met I tried to persuade a leading bishop, of great influence, to try to induce our leaders to "scrap" the agenda paper in favor of such a quest as this. He saw my point; he sympathized; but he "turned it down" as quite impracticable. And no doubt many of your readers will agree with him in his opinion, and say that, even leaving out the bishops, it is quite impracticable.

But is it? It is impracticable only if we are not alive to Christ's claim. It is impracticable only in the measure that we are faithless. It is impracticable only in the degree that we away John 4: 24 in his inspired Bible? About that time the Josephite is looking for a hole to crawl into." We will do a little questioning. "Is God a spirit?" Answer, "Certainly." "Is the Devil also a spirit?" Where's that knot hole?

I neglected to note where I obtained the following splendid statement on a personal God:

The human mind can conceive no higher form of being than personality raised to the nth power. It would seem that a God who is impersonal must belong to an order of being lower than that of man, whose supreme distinction is that he is a person—a being who consciously thinks, feels, and wills. A blind, unintelligent, passionless force may be great beyond our power to comprehend, yet such a force must be ranked lower in the scale of being than a person who is a spring of thought, feeling, and volitions.

What God thinks, how he feels, and what he purposes are the essential substance of revelation. The vehicle of revelation is the constitution of the universe, the order of nature, and all the millionfold expression of human life in childhood and youth, in fatherhood and motherhood, in ideals and achievements, in aspirations and endeavors in all the varying drama of human experience.

cling to the established social order. In other words, such a true conversion as I picture is as practicable, and as much to be expected, as any individual conversion from sin to righteousness—neither more nor less. When we despair of an ordinary sinner's conversion, we may rightly begin to despair of the conversion of the leaders of the church, bishops, priests, and lay people. And, should it prove that most leading Christians cannot bring themselves to seek that conviction of sin which is necessary to such a conversion, are there not some few who feel the call? It is true, as The Church Times' leader referred to above points out, that successful movements come from below. Here, then, is a path open to some few people: people who, from below, will get together and bind themselves to set in motion such a movement as will supply what is lacking in the bishops' efforts after reunion. The bishops' appeal is a call from the highest authority. It has, let us say, no power of moving the multitude. But what I have ventured to suggest may well carry a whole multitude, some day, towards the goal to which the bishops have pointed.

There is a real danger lest some of us lose our confidence in institutional religion just because our present institutions hide Christ from the world's eyes, if not also from our own. And it may be that, in order to save institutionalism from condemnation, some of us must be prepared to strike out along new paths, if haply we may find a way of manifesting Christ our Master. When we consider the questions that occupy the attention of most rulers in religious bodies of all kinds, questions so often petty and earthly, due rather to personal claims or failures than to sheer zeal for the Christ life, it is a great temptation to cut the bonds that bind us to such bodies, and to seek the larger life of brotherly love. We are inclined to lose patience with "things as they are." Advisers warn us not to be impatient; and in no case to despise the small things that make up our ecclesiastical life. They comfort us as we groan over the rapid passing of the years, and our small progress in the direction of a corporate expression of the Christ life. They seek to turn our thoughts from the question, What would Christ have done? to the more common-sense problem of what, in our circumstances, is strictly practicable. But are they altogether right? Is it not possible that the Christ would have us believe that "with God all things are possible," and in that belief break away from slavery to human tradition into the freedom promised to his sons?—Bishop of Zanzibar.

The above are but a few extracts and a summary of this letter which show a deep insight into existing conditions, especially as affecting the church of England. It is well worthy our consideration, not alone to note where others are failing, but to note also their awakening to their present conditions. It may pay us to examine our own selves to note where we stand to-day individually. A complacent self-satisfaction is not sufficient, when a world is hungering and thirsting for the truth of God and for the vision of the Lord Jesus Christ, and for a manifestation of Christian fellowship and brotherhood here on earth.

We may well pray that his kingdom may come and his will be done on earth as in heaven, that his kingdom may go forth among the nations of the earth, and that they may accept his gospel so that his kingdom may go forth on earth. But if we truly pray, it will mean not only silently and orally, but also with our might and main, with our money, and our life, not alone as individuals, but as a church, as necessary to carry this gospel to the honest in heart throughout the world.

What Proof Is Needed of Spiritual Things

The Boston Transcript contains a long column on spiritualism and lectures being given by A. Conan Doyle and Oliver Lodge. Spiritualism took its rise in America and at one time was an active subject of discussion on the streets of Boston. But this flourishing condition belongs to the past and the code appears to have been transferred to Great Britain.

As the Transcript says, the statements of men like these, of high character and good standing, impart seriousness to the discussion, and with the experiences they claim to have had, their conclusion is not surprising. But they question editorially if proof sufficient for a court of law is sufficient in this case, and showed distinctly that nothing but personal evidence will satisfy the writer of the editorial. He adds that the evidence of miracles by Joseph Smith, he is convinced, is irrefragable from the point of view of human testimony. Still he does not believe them.

This represents an attitude of mind which is quite common. To a considerable extent, it is necessary that one have individual experience. No one else can have certain spiritual experiences for us, for it is only by our own individual growth that we can come to know the things of God. We should be willing to accept the evidence of others as being at least presumptive proof. It scarcely seems wise to reject in toto. But at the same time, it is not only our privilege, but our duty to try to endeavor to learn the truth for ourselves.

He Gives All He Can

When Nathan Straus found his name in a long list of the very rich men of the United States, he wrote a letter of protest. He had always held that wealth creates an obligation on the holder to use it for the benefit of mankind and that he lived up to this obligation, paying what at times he felt was just to himself and family, hoping that thereby he might inspire others of greater means to use their influence freely for humanity. He regrets that his fortune is only moderate, but only because greater wealth would enable him to give more.

Others may have measured his fortune by what he gave. His purpose has been to give all that he could and not merely in proportion to what others are giving. He states he would be ashamed to adopt such a standard. Carnegie was ashamed to die rich; Mr. Straus is ashamed to live rich.

Metaphysical Therapeutics

The instances continue to multiply of the growing recognition of the fact that Christianity includes more than preaching the life to come. We have published from time to time references to various articles both on the social aspect of the work of the church, and the growing interest in divine healing. The following extract is an editorial from the Tulsa Daily World for April 3, 1922, and rather clearly presents the position taken even by the secular press:

Considerable attention just now is being aroused by the action of certain sections of the Episcopal Church in adopting for orthodox practice as a church doctrine, the theory of faith cures or the drugless practice of therapeutics. In Denver, for instance, it is reported that such practice is quite an accepted part of the Episcopal pastorate.

However, this remarkable acceptance of the most outstanding phases of the Christ career is not confined to the Episcopal denomination. The Methodist clergy of Denver have likewise indorsed drugless healing, or faith cure, as some prefer to term it, as a proper part of the church work. Of course there are many sects which have for years urged this upon all Christian denominations. Churches have been founded upon it outright, while under various titles other movements have sought to bring forward for general acceptance the remarkable value of metaphysical therapeutics, or the power of mind in changing the physical aspect of man.

Whatever one may have thought concerning the power of prayer as a curative agent, or the effect of mental reactions upon physical man, a moment's consideration must lead to a full acceptance of the logic of a Christian cult in adopting faith-cure as a part of the teachings and the promises of Jesus. Because the most outstanding features of his ministrations to man lay in his ability to heal distempers of various kinds: and no other promise is more specific than that which promises that those who believe in him shall do the same things; no command more urgent than that his disciples go forth to practice his art of healing.

Therefore, there is as much logic in his followers accepting a portion of his promises and admonitions and rejecting this, as there would be in a student of mathematics admitting the rule of addition and rejecting the rule of division or multiplication. No church—no evangelical church—can be logically carrying forth the work of the Master without also practicing this very curative art. Unless it can practice successfully this curative art it is at fault somewhere, for the promise is specific, "The things I do ye shall do also."

While some of the reported sayings and acts of the Master are subjected to controversy, his ability to heal and cure is not. Whatever the means employed, it is thoroughly established that he did perform prodigies as a physician or metaphysician. Controversy again enters when one attempts to account for the power by which this healing was accomplished.

Some say prayer, some say faith, some say hypnotism and so on. Terminology in such a case is not only seriously defective but likewise impotent to convey the thought which the mind readily entertains. "As a man thinketh so is he,"

"He who looketh upon a woman with lust hath committed adultery with her in his heart;" and scores of kindred sayings prove beyond the peradventure of a doubt that he who walked the roads and lanes of mankind in that far-distant day recognized amply the effect of mind upon matter, recognized that it is the mental processes which have perfect empire over the physical world, recognized that man's great mission is to learn to control his mind, and that he who does control his mind and controls it in the right way is capable of performing miracles—or what to the ordinary senses appear to be miracles.

It is, after all, a much more comfortable thought that men must show works meet for repentance—in other words must demonstrate their reformation by visible effects—before they may lay claim to having attained that state which enables them to say with certainty that theirs is the way.

We consider it promising that so many of the old sects are at last coming to the point where all of the teachings of the Master are to be incorporated in their requirements. When men in fact do the things that He did, the church will come into its own and will not need to appeal to political materialism for a demonstration of its influence.

Investments

A great deal has been written bewailing the removal from the purchase of stocks and bonds of those having a large surplus since men of large income have been investing in recent years more and more in tax-free securities. But, as the World's Work states in the April issue, though they themselves have joined in this complaint, a recent compilation shows that the income tax has not, in fact, affected investments anything like we have supposed. Nor has it decreased to the point of industrial investments before the war.

In that period immediately preceding the Great War, one and three quarters billion dollars represented the average annual financing of business enterprise. But in the last three years, 1919, 1920, 1921, the investment has been close to two and three quarters billion dollars, and in addition, there has been a large purchase of foreign government and foreign municipal bonds which are also subject to surtax. This makes a total averaging over three billion dollars each year of investment. At the same time, municipal, and other tax-exempt bonds show for the last three years $812,000,000, $699,000,000, $1,350,000,000 respectively. This represents in municipal financing alone an increase of $520,000,000, over a prewar average of only $400,000,000.

This may represent, in part, the effect of the income tax, but it probably also represents the effort last year by municipalities to take care of unemployment so far as possible, and hence to increase their expenditures for public work at that time. It is significant to note that the expenditure for each of the three years for these three classes of investment is over four billion dollars and that the figures for 1921 are the highest for the three years.

Paper Splitting a Success

A few months ago we published an item concerning the new process developed by E. H. Tordoff for the duplicating of old books and documents. Brother Tordoff worked for years in the Herald Publishing House. He is now connected with the art bindery, of Berkeley, California.

A number of items have been published all over the country concerning this process of splitting paper which permits two photographic copies to be placed back to back and make a page of ordinary thickness. We have recently received, through the kindness of Brother Tordoff, a sample sheet illustrating both the photographic process and also the sheet splitting. This process costs about ten to fifty cents a page, but it is well worth the cost in duplicating old books and particularly in replacing missing pages in defective copies. Original copies can thus be kept intact and duplicates used for reference. Brother Tordoff evidently uses a camera with a different lens, as he takes the exposure directly on sensitized paper and so secures a positive rather than a negative. He says he can split a sheet fourteen by thirty-two inches in about five minutes.

The Palimpsest for March declares that beginning with the discovery of America in 1492, there followed centuries of horizontal exploration, but now, with the North and South Poles discovered, there remains little adventure in that field. There does remain the field of vertical conquest—intensive discovery in the sands of Egypt, the tangles of Central America, and the hilltops of the Andes, or underlying the plains of the Mississippi Valley. Many new discoveries have been made, and many more doubtless will be made in the years to come in the field of archæology.

For the first growth of every plant or animal, tame or wild, if it makes a good start, is of the highest importance towards placing a fitting crown on the excellence that properly belongs to it. Now man, we hold, is a tame animal; nevertheless, although when he meets with right education and has a happy disposition he becomes the most divine and gentlest of creatures, if he be nurtured inadequately or ill, he is the wildest of all the offspring of mother earth.—Plato's Laws.

HYMNS AND POEMS

The Home of the Blessed

By John R. Gibbs

Look beyond this earthly journey,
O my soul, toward that fair land
Where the breeze is soft and balmy
And the sky is clear and grand.
Earthly pilgrims
Gather there by God's command.

In it spring the living fountains,
Through it flow the streams of peace;
There to moisten its fair valleys
And immortalize its face.
Life eternal
They breathe there, the gift of grace.

There death's arrows can't come closer
To its border any more,
And the enemy of mankind
Can't molest its peaceful shore.
Life immortal
They breathe there forevermore.

Now my spirit is rejoicing
In the hope within my breast,
To inherit the grand promise
Of an everlasting rest.
Faithful comrades,
There we'll mingle with the just.

Jesus, help us to endure
To the end of this long race;
Then to dwell with thee forever
To behold thy loving face.
Ever trusting
In thy mercy and thy grace.

Autumn's Gift to the Angels

By Doctor Anna Key Swift

(This sister is totally blind, yet carries on a successful practice in the profession of osteopathy.)

The fairest flower of earth has gone away,
Beyond the scarlet azure of the sky,
She's dwelling now in realms of endless day,
Where love, and joy, and peace can never die.

She was my friend, faithful and just to me,
She always loved me in the same old way.
Her smile was sunshine; she was blithe and free;
Her words brought glimpses of a brighter day.

The gold, the brown, the scarlet, crimson, gray,
And all the gorgeous tints to autumn known,
Were scattered all along the milky way
While angels drove the car that took her home.

The moonbeams rested like a spotless shroud
Upon the grand highway from earth to heaven;
And angels threw the jeweled gates abroad,
And by our Christ the words, "Well done," were given.

I loved her; she was good and kind to me;
I hope to meet her when I cross the bar.
I hope to meet her by the crystal sea;
I hope the time will not be long—nor far.

THE FORUM

The Forum is a department of the HERALD intended primarily for free discussion of various questions, especially of a controversial nature, the contributions representing the views of the writer but not necessarily indorsed by the editors or the church at large.

How Does Mr. Ford Do It?

By D. R. Baldwin

The threatened railroad strike that frightened us was called off, but that furnishes us no evidence that the much-mooted railroad management, high rates, unsatisfactory wages, and gratifying finance is settled.

A great poet has said, "No matter is ever settled until it's settled right."

Oliver S. Morris, editor of National Leader, says, "There are going to be more threats of strikes, perhaps developing into the biggest industrial war the country has ever had."

Public opinion is one of the greatest forces known in shaping world events; therefore the people should all know the truth about these big questions. Otherwise, the trouble is sure to hang on and multiply.

Jesus sounded the keynote along this line when he said, "You shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." This applies as much to economic as to spiritual things.

Since the editors have given us Wall Street's answer to the above question, who lay the blame of their troubles upon the broad shoulders of the organized brotherhood of railroad workers, of course they will now be pleased to give us Henry Ford's solution, because Mr. Ford knows better than anyone else why he is able to pay his men fifty-two per cent more wages than Wall Street pays its workers, also how he is making more money on the capital stock invested in a "broken-down, bankrupt railroad" than Wall Street claims to make operating its roads after Uncle Sam had repaired them to the tune of one and one half billion dollars.

Judson C. Welliver, the Review of Reviews man, and William Atherton Du Puy, of The Nation's Business, recently interviewed Mr. Ford, and here are a few of the interesting things that Mr. Ford said:

"The railroads are a fine illustration of too much hurry to get profits. The pioneers built railroads, not to provide transportation, but to make money out of promotion and construction." Then he showed that through manipulation of securities over capitalization, gambling, and consolidation, etc., the railroads fell into the hands of Wall Street bankers. "Bank management," says Mr. Ford, "got the railroads involved with business relations in which they ought not to have been complicated—too much bank management, too little real transportation management. The average freight car weighs three times as much, contains about three times as much steel, as it ought. That means an almost unbelievable waste. You ought to see the work we are doing in locomotive and car building. We are going to make some revolutionary changes. We find that the present type of rolling stock can be greatly improved."

Mr. Morris says that Mr. Ford has applied the lubricating system of the motor car to railroad cars "so that a car can be lubricated once in three months and be forgotten between times."

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in a recent official valuation of eighteen railroads, shows that their actual investment valuation was just one half of their book valuation while Mr. Ford's railroad is capitalized at his actual investment. Both Mr. Ford and Wall Street figure their profits upon the basis of their capitalization. So it is that the three per cent dividend that Wall Street acknowledges making in 1921 upon their inflated valuation equals six per cent profit that Mr. Ford may be clearing.

Our Federal Trade Commission reported corporations paying trust magnates individual annual salaries of over $364,000 in a mad rush to make their expense account equal their income for the purpose of dodging their income tax.

Quoting again from the Leader staff, "It is well known that railroads are bled white by legal talent retained by the year in every town and village and by executives with soft jobs drawing from $25,000 to $100,000 a year."

One of the first things that Mr. Ford did was to fire all of these useless, gluttonous drones.

Either of the two last-named items would probably more than equal the fifty-two per cent extra wages that Mr. Ford is paying his men, while the other boosts his net profits. Better catch these facts and store them away. Put them in your file for they are good food for thought.

and the ease of person. It doubtless will require a spirit of real consecration throughout the church.

We well may pray that his kingdom may come, his will be done on earth as it is in heaven. We may pray that his kingdom may go forth among the nations of the earth and that they may accept his gospel so that his kingdom may go forth on earth to meet his kingdom when it comes down from above.

But if we truly pray, if it is the secret desire of our hearts, whether oral or unexpressed, it will mean that with our might and main, with our money, with our life, both as individuals and as a church, we are ready to do all things necessary to carry and to send this gospel of the kingdom of God and of the brotherhood of man abroad throughout the world. WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Reunion Plans

We wish to call attention to the splendid reunion plans which have been laid by the superintendents of the Sunday school, Religio, and Women's Departments, as they appear in HERALDS of April 19 and May 3. Besides these public announcements, an envelope, bulging with materials and suggestions for reunion use, is being mailed from our general office to each organizer. It would appear that none of our workers who fail to put over a fine, constructive, and educational reunion program this year will be able to lay the blame to a lack of interest, work, or cooperation on the part of the general superintendents. It is a matter of congratulation that these leaders have gotten into the field so early in the season. This will give each organizer a chance also to "get busy" early, and communicate with the various ones whose cooperation she wishes to secure, as well as to plan with her reunion committee for the time she needs for her work.

It is to be hoped that every one of our organizers will take the cue from these early announcements, and all will determine to do their parts both promptly and thoroughly. Do not allow anything to discourage you. After thoughtfully considering all possibilities and deciding what features you will present, line up your workers and assistants and then give them all possible assistance in carrying out their work. Do not make the mistake of feeling that you can dismiss all responsibility after you have assigned a certain task to a certain person. Real executives cannot do that. While you may feel great confidence in the helper, and that things will doubtless be done, it is only good policy to make yourself sure of those facts by occasional inquiries as to progress. Some leaders never know, until the moment a helper's services are needed, whether or not the work will really be performed, and often, then, it is too late to supply another in case of failure.

Another thing which should not be neglected, is the coun-means that men of experience shall be sent and men with new zeal also go with them and the forces of the kingdom of God on the firing line shall be increased.

If this is to be done, it will require first a sacrifice and an example set by the officers of the church and followed with all integrity without the backward glance, but in all humility, by the members of the body of Christ. This sacrifice may be manifested in a sacred fund to see that this work is so sent forth and that this fund be treated as indeed a consecrated one, so that those who go forth will strive to secure the best and greatest results possible for each dollar expended.

The world is-hungering and thirsting. It is talking more than ever before of Christian fellowship, of unity, and is looking, as never before since the days that the apostles walked the earth, for his coming for which they seek and ask in vain. If we fail, can we hope to receive the continued approval of God as his representatives? S. A. B.

sel with district and other officers who are in charge of the reunion and responsible for its success. Get in touch at once with them, have a well-mapped-out program you wish to put over, and give them as perfect an understanding of its details as possible. Secure their enthusiastic support in putting it across. Harmony and mutual comprehension of what is to be done will work wonders towards its success, while little can be accomplished of a permanent nature when the opposite feeling prevails.

It is the plan of the departments to have a field worker at every reunion this year, if possible. These workers will represent the three departments, conduct the joint study hour, and in other ways help to advance the interests of the departmental phase of church work.

Sister Glines, general Women's Department superintendent, is being scheduled for a very busy summer, it being the intention to have her attend as many of the reunions as possible. The First Presidency is cooperating with Sister Glines in arranging her itinerary, which will doubtless give many hundreds of our women the opportunity to make her personal acquaintance. This will be good news to all, we feel sure, since increased interest is always taken in any endeavor when one can meet and get acquainted with those at its head.

Freewill Offerings

When we were in our general office recently, our secretary handed us a letter from the sisters at Higbee, Missouri, which she said accompanied the most generous freewill offering which had, to that date, been received; that is, most generous, counting from a per capita standpoint. The local has a membership of rather less than thirty women, and the offering was $6.40, approaching twenty-five cents per member, which we consider was fairly liberal for a semiannual offering.

When the members of the church everywhere realize the very serious financial depression which is affecting every phase of our church work, we feel that each one will try to make some real sacrifices rather than see the efforts of the missionaries, of the leaders, of every department, come to naught for lack of necessary funds. We have been told that it is a day of sacrifice, and repeatedly reminded that the Lord blesses every one who does so sacrifice for his sake.

It is well, then, that we do not let this hour of special necessity on the part of the church pass by without our improving the opportunity to act in harmony with that appeal of our Father. He is ready and willing to bless. He does not need the money for himself, but his people need the development which will come with their consecrations and offerings. In this day of materialism and greed, only those souls are free before God who have successfully freed themselves from the entanglements and the allurements which attend the accumulation of much of this world's goods to the neglect of God's work and people.

Our sisters are loyal to the work of this Women's Department of the church. They feel the need for better homes, better mothers, better wives and children. They would that the desire to improve the quality of our service would permeate every nook and corner of the land, and they are willing to assist, by their temporal means, in the work of arousing and encouraging our women and girls to study and work towards that end. Our little study courses are offered with the hope that they will be of assistance in planting a sincere desire for further study in the minds of our sisters—a study directed to the end that their bodies shall be fit temples for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, that their homes shall be permeated with the peace and love which characterize the true disciple of Christ, and that the children and companions who share that home shall receive a strength and inspiration from the life and service of the woman who reigns there.

These are the hopes and desires which actuate the women who are laboring to direct and administer the affairs of our department. That their desires in holiness shall not be shortened for lack of the needed funds, should be the concern of all who appreciate the work they are trying to do and see in it a place and function in the redemption of Zion. We feel confident that our sisters throughout the church will recognize this place and need, will share in this appreciation, and will willingly do their part towards our successful "carrying on." These semiannual offerings which come from the heart of our sister membership will speak convincingly of their desire to so assist, and each one will be blessed according to the spirit in which it is offered, we are sure.

Social Hour.

June, the month of roses, affords an opportunity for pretty schemes for decoration and social activities. Guessing games built upon the names of the many varieties of roses are interesting. Prizes can be roses, natural or artificial. Rose-colored cake or bonbons could be included in the refreshments. A rose petal floating upon a glass of fruit punch is pleasing. Poems or songs about roses are abundant, and an afternoon spent in the midst of such beautiful reminders of the "queen of flowers," can but add to each one's appreciation of Nature and Nature's wonderful God.

A. A.

The Living Room

In the literature written by many of our best authors, we find beautiful descriptions of the home where the family group gathered to read, play games, and surround the family altar. Sad but true, it is, in these crowded, thoughtless, recent years, that much of the beauty and power of such gatherings has been eliminated from our modern homes. All the more important is the necessity of making the family life and home the most attractive place in the world to the inmates of our homes, since every device known to man is being used to lure our young people, as well as fathers and mothers to desert home and its restfulness, and turn to pleasure-seeking and pastime of all sorts in the things of the world.

The living room is the gathering place for the family, and for our friends for social relaxation, and should be large enough to accommodate a number of people at one time. The oblong-shaped room seems more favored at present, as it brings people into easy communication, and it is possible to arrange it more artistically than a square room having the same number of square feet floor space. Furniture should be so arranged that the room seems well balanced. For instance, a large couch, piano, chairs, and other minor furnishings should not all be in one end of the room, and only small articles in the other end, as it gives an unbalanced appearance.

The most satisfactory wall decoration is in a plain, medium shade so that pictures will produce a much more attractive and artistic effect upon the walls. The color may vary in accordance with the inclination of the housewife, but other furnishings should be in harmony with it. This does not mean that only one color and its shades can be used, but that care should be taken to have harmony, that a pleasing effect may be procured. Some light touch of another color gives variety and life to our decorations; such combinations as gray with a dash of rose tints is usually good, if well chosen.

The choice of rugs depends upon other furnishings and one's pocketbook, but a choice of rugs of good material, in pleasing colors and artistic pattern, is well worth purchasing even at a higher price, as they will outwear the cheaper rugs and also look much better.

In the draperies it is well to choose a shade which is least predominant in the rug, such as a rose or green or blue color, as this will emphasize that tint in the rug. Light-colored shades in buff or some such color will make the room lighter and cheerier.

The importance of pictures cannot be overestimated. Not only do we wish beauty in the pictures on our walls, but they should bear some meaning to us. Pictures of noted places and historical buildings are of value, but we should also have some of the artistic presentations of many of our noted painters; copies, or reproductions of some sort, can be obtained at a nominal price, nowadays, and have an educational value and an uplifting influence upon us. Love of art must be developed and trained in this line, as in music, poetry, or sculpture. Who has not felt the breeze and caught the rhythmic spirit in Corot's "Dance of the nymphs," or felt the wonderful strength imparted by daily viewing Hofmann's "Christ" or Raphael's "Madonnas"! A beautiful face or scene induces pure and lofty thoughts; and pure thoughts tend to produce acts of the same type. Therefore, good pictures are not only pleasing, but a real necessity for improving our lives. Enlarged photographs or family pictures have no place in the living room.

Some people object to statuary because they have seen only crude work in this line, or have listened to narrow views. Some statuary is not fitted for our schools or homes, but there are many beautiful and delicate figures which have the same uplifting influence that is produced by an artistic painting. Consider for instance the light, buoyant poise of the "Mercury" which is a work of art and beauty.

Flowers and foliage are cheering and healthful for our living rooms, and add an element from God's great outdoors which is refreshing and inspiring to us all. Gas has an injurious effect upon plant life, and where it is used there is little probability of any luxurious growth. Every effort should be used, however, to obtain some plant growth indoors, during winter months especially, when there is so much lack of freshness and interest from contact with nature as we have it in the spring and summer.

In lighting a living room, we should endeavor to have sufficient power to give an agreeable atmosphere to the entire room. Often one sees a large room with the lights in the center, and in the corners one can scarcely see. This is especially objectionable if the window space is too small for the size of the room. In building, one should see to it that this does not occur, as it means a gloomy room, where pictures and other decorations cannot be seen. It also makes less sanitary conditions, for sunlight is an essential to health and cleanliness.

Who has not sat before a crackling fire in a big fireplace and pitied his friends who have none! The cheer, the comfort, the social spirit hovering round the fireplace is contagious, and makes a social hour there one long to be remembered. There is an artistic value as well as a social influence in its presence, and it contributes much to the comfort of many a chill and gloomy day. In Whittier's "Snowbound" we have an excellent description of the beauty of an old-fashioned home, where the family sat round "the clean winged hearth," brushed by the hand of the good housewife. Such social hours live forever in the minds of those enjoying them. May we have more such scenes, to leave their impress in the memory of the coming generations!

Native Handwork From the South Sea Islands

While unable at this time to announce details, we are glad to tell the sisters about the plans for an exhibit and sale of handwork from the South Sea Islands, to be given in connection with the next General Conference, in October. Sister May Needham Elliott, our organizer there, writes that the sisters in many of the islands are very much interested in the project, and have been working for months at the articles to be sent to America. The proceeds are to be used for the prosecution of the Women's Department work in those far-away islands, and it is most commendable that the native and missionary sisters should be encouraged in this effort to finance their work there.

A series of lessons, designed to be used as a sort of quarterly among the locals, is being arranged by Sister Elliott, dealing with foods, their values and proper preparation and serving. Other sets of lessons, in sewing, child care, etc., are in contemplation, in which Sister Elliott will be assisted by Sisters Merchant, Karlstrom, Ellis, Almond, and others.

We feel sure the sisters in America will be interested in further announcements concerning this proposed sale of embroidery, mats, hats, fans, etc., and will be glad, when making their arrangements to attend General Conference, to count in a few extra dollars to be spent in this manner, to the encouragement and material assistance of these worthy sisters, who are giving so whole-heartedly to the work of spreading the gospel; the gospel of love, kindness, and health in this life, as well as that of the salvation of the soul in the one to come.

A Sister Seeks Advice

I read many helpful articles in every number of the SAINTS' HERALD. At present I am trying out "Food combinations" as suggested by Sister Cramer. I have a weak stomach. Have taken pepsin, belladonna, and Sppy's ulcer cure. Have dieted for a number of years, the pain and vomiting are now things of the past.

In our study of food combinations at school it was brought out that lemon sauce on cooked rice rendered the rice indigestible, as the acid prevents the digestive juices from acting on starch.

There is so much in the child study course about the proper ways of cooking food that I could not afford to be without it.

In human nutrition we were taught that most people eat too much; also that people who ate no meat had greater endurance than those who ate it. Doctor Kellogg gives the putrefactive bacterial content of the different meats. For round steak it is 16,800,000,000. He says these germs are not destroyed in ordinary cooking. These bacteria infest the digestive tract, and cause putrefaction, colitis, and many other diseases.

He also says we should eat sparingly of cane sugar, as large quantities cause acidity and finally gastric catarrh and indigestion. Sweet fruits, as raisins, dates, and figs, are natural and wholesome.

I would like to get in communication by letter with Saints who have had cystocele and been operated upon for it, or who have gotten well without operation. The doctor thinks an operation is the only thing for me. I should like to hear from those who have gone through this trouble, for then I would feel more certain about what to do. Perhaps there are those who would be glad to give their experience for the help it would be to me.

Suggestions for Reading and Discussion

"We recognize, and are bound to war against, the evils of to-day. The remedies are partly economic, and partly spiritual, and partly to be obtained by laws, and in greater part, to be obtained by individual and associated effort; for character is the vital matter, and character cannot be created by law.

"These remedies include a religious and moral teaching which shall increase the spirit of human brotherhood; an educational system which shall train men for every form of useful service and which shall train us to prize common sense no less than morality; such a division of the profits of industry as shall tend to encourage intelligent and thrifty tool-users to become tool-owners; and a Government so strong, just, wise, and democratic that, neither lagging too far behind nor pushing heedlessly in advance, it may do its full share in promoting these ends."—Theodore Roosevelt.

LETTERS AND NEWS

Independence

The joint council of Presidency, Twelve, Bishopric, and Presiding Patriarch concluded its sessions last Tuesday, and following a session of the Twelve as a quorum the next day, began to disperse to various assignments.

T. W. Williams has gone to Lamoni to deliver some lectures to the class in religious education on the subject of foreign missions. From there he and Paul M. Hanson will proceed to Toronto, Ontario, and other Canadian points in the interests of the church work. From there Elder Williams will return to his home in California. Brother Hanson continues in charge of the office work of the quorum.

Elder R. C. Russell is to leave soon for his mission in eastern Ontario and Quebec, Canada. Elder G. T. Griffiths has returned to his home in Columbus, Ohio. Elder U. W. Greene is in charge of Indian work. Elder J. W. Rushton has several local engagements in speaking before high school and other groups in baccalaureate and similar addresses, but by the end of the month plans to leave for his home in California. Elder J. F. Curtis was in Omaha over Sunday in the interests of the church work.

Elder J. A. Gillen, who has been in England for over a year, returned to his home in Independence on May 19.

Of the Presidency, Elbert A. Smith was in Mondamin, Iowa, over Sunday, the 21st, where he delivered the baccalaureate sermon before the high school class. Next Sunday morning at the Stone Church he will deliver the baccalaureate address to the graduates of the Independence Institute of Arts and Sciences and the School of Nursing at the Sanitarium. On Monday evening Elder J. W. Rushton will deliver the commencement address to the same group.

Bishop B. R. McGuire, who has had strenuous duties in connection with joint council work, has had to give up his work for a time in order to secure needed rest and recuperation. He has so far remained at home.

The Quorum of Twelve have been extending their campaign for missionary work. Elder Hanson was in Holden over Sunday, addressing the priesthood of the stake. Elder Rushton was in Kansas City addressing the priesthood there, and he and Elder Curtis plan to visit Saint Joseph soon for the same purpose. The "Program for missionary work" of the Twelve is being distributed, with a copy of their interpretation of this program, and every local man possible (and including the sisters in their line of work) is being enlisted in an effort to proselytize our respective communities.

Sister Ethel Hanson, who has been in the Society Islands for nearly two years, devoting her time to the extension of better living ideals and an appreciation of nursing skill in line with her profession as a trained nurse, returned recently to Independence, accompanied by a young native sister named Tevaite. This sister has been very active in local church affairs in Tahiti and present plans are for her to get some practical work in the Sanitarium, and to develop her musical ability further. She understands English and French as well as Tahitian and will no doubt soon know how to speak English.

The I. X. L. Class of the Mount Zion Sunday School gave a reception last Tuesday evening to the members of the joint council. The meeting was held in the dining hall, and over two hundred were present. The decorations were exceptionally fine and the menu of the banquet unique. The entire affair bespoke pleasing dignity and unity of purpose which only comes of thoughtful planning and careful management.

An enormous fruit crop is coming on in this entire section, and recent rains insure the best of conditions for farm and truck crops, which, though late, may catch up.

A treat was given the Saints who attended the Sunday evening service at the Stone Church in the orchestral program under the direction of R. T. Cooper. With technic approaching that of professionals, with spiritual finesse exceeding that of an ordinary group of musicians, the results were highly satisfactory. The choir was assisted by the orchestra in singing, "Unfold ye portals everlasting," and it seemed to us the choir exceeded its previous performances in whole-hearted responsiveness.

These specially planned evening features before the sermon, as planned and largely executed by Elder H. C. Burgess, are a great inspiration to the Saints.

The speaker of the evening was Elder Walter W. Smith, on "The Book of Mormon." Apostle R. C. Russell spoke in the morning.

Bishop B. J. Scott, who is now chief of police in Independence, made a statement before the Sunday school in the morning that he intended to see that the law was enforced without regard to personalities. Whether speeding or poultry-at-large regulations were being violated, he intended to correct law violations.

Through the faithful efforts of Independence men, most of them members of the church, an organization has been effected and funds raised and pledged whereby all of Jackson County outside of Kansas City is to be a first-class council of the Boy Scout organization. Bishop Mark H. Siegfried is treasurer, and Walter W. Smith is commissioner, with George A. Gould chairman of finance committee. Doctor Stanley Green is chairman of the court of honor, and Hilton H. Hartley heads committees on leadership and training, and camping. A number of our men are members of the new council of twenty-nine. G. W. Eastwood, present secretary, will serve in that capacity until superseded by a paid secretary who will devote all his time to this work, this being the key-stone to the new plan of organization. It is expected such a man will be secured about June 1.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium during the week ending May 20: Rebecca Bierley, Dubois, Pennsylvania; Dean Bostian, Warrensburg, Missouri; Master Nelson B. Lewis, Raytown, Missouri; Pansy Connor, Mount Washington, Missouri; Mrs. Grace N. Constance, Cameron, Missouri; Imogene Percival, Kansas City, Missouri; Master Lavern Ballantyne, Lamoni, Iowa; Mr. Eri B. Mullin, Richmond, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Baby Stanley Morford, Miss Myrtle Grapes, Miss Hulda Hansen, Mrs. Rosa Spurlock, Mr. James R. Webb, and Miss Corrine Hill. X-ray patients: William Menth, Kansas City, Missouri; and Clara Moore and Mrs. J. S. Ayres, of Independence.

A Child in Distress Asks Prayers

My mother has been afflicted for many years with asthma and other diseases. But now she has paralysis caused from neuritis. It first started in her left arm and now it is all over her body. She is entirely helpless; she cannot feed herself or help herself in any way, and she is losing her voice and can hardly talk at all. Her hands are all drawn shut and we fear her knees will draw like her hands have.

I am the only girl in the family. I am fifteen years old and I have two brothers smaller than myself. The oldest one of them is thirteen years old and the younger one is eleven years old, and we desire to ask the whole church to fast and pray for our mother, as she is afflicted and we want the Lord to make her sound and well if it is his will.

My mother is still a young woman; her age is forty-six years. She has had neuritis for one year and a half. My papa died almost ten years ago. We would like to ask the Saints to fast and pray for her on Sunday, June 4.

Your sister in the gospel,

ORPHA DAY.

Centralia, Washington

Our membership slowly and steadily increases; now it has reached 191. Our work continues from week to week. The branch is quite active in every department although there are places for improvement.

The February district conference convened here from 24th to 26th, with good interest and friendly spirit prevailing.

Our new church basement was just finished and equipped in time for use. The Women's Department worked with much zeal to prepare the meals. Special mention should be made of the many donations and carpenter work done by those in charge of putting on the finishing touches to the basement.

The August reunion will be held at Centralia. A new park called Fort Borst, just out of town, has been offered us for use during the reunion.

Our Temple Builder girls and Orioles are planning their part to assist in having a rest room and also exhibits for the occasion.

Our branch officers are firmly applying their time, strength, and ability to keep the camp fires burning.

Our Women's Department have conducted "Home and child welfare" programs each month since last September under the leadership of Sister Lula Premo.

We hope all the Saints throughout the district will make all possible plans to attend the reunion here that we might revive the spirit of interest of several years back when our gospel tent could not begin to hold the crowds that stood on the outside listening to the gospel story. We trust the reunions will be an open door for the old-time enthusiasm and activity of the work.

We have from one to two socials each month with an average of one program each month.

MRS. LULA PREMO.

A View of Youth

While I was reading some sermons and short discourses on youth, being young myself, I thought I would like to write a few lines.

We read in Proverbs 15: 3 that the eyes of the Lord are in every place beholding the evil and the good. There are two roads to follow, the road that is evil or the road that is good. Which shall we follow? The youth are growing up among temptations, and the world is offering seemingly great joys which are like bubbles. They are here, just for a short time, and then they are gone, and the pleasures of this world leave a remorse. This is what they offer for this life, but they cannot offer anything for the life to come; that is, eternal life. We read that no man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. It is made plain that we must serve one or the other—we cannot serve God and the world.

The wages of sin is death. Yes, it is even spiritual death, to be shut out from the full presence of the Lord. But the gift of God is eternal life, the glory of the celestial, a type of the sun in its brightness and glory, to dwell with Christ a thousand years and then dwell with God on this earth if we live up to the gospel law. Revelation 21: 3: "And he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them and be their God." The question is asked, When must I start to get this glory and also enjoy the life with the Saints while on this earth? The answer is, Now. Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth, the days when we can start training, the days when we have vigor and strength to do and give the best to God. This is our only reasonable service. Also like a plant, if it is cultivated and helped when it is young, it will grow up to be a strong, healthy plant, and will bear much fruit. So it is with us. The Lord wants the young to use, to help advance his kingdom on this earth. Will we refuse, or will we say, "Here am I, Lord, send me"? But let us be united in this effort in bearing much fruit, and when we are united we can accomplish much and we cannot fail. Therefore let us from now on seek our companions and friends in the church and let us help the social problem of the church and so let our light shine that they (the world) may glorify our Father who is in heaven. Let us be in the world, but not of the world. Let us take Christ and the gospel as our standard and then God will fulfill his promises to us, and give us our reward with all the other Saints that endure faithful to the end.

"The world and its folly
I bid them all adieu.
I find there no comfort
That's lasting and true.
One hour with Jesus,
That noble, true friend,
Brings peace to my soul
That will nevermore end."

J. R. HOCKADAY.

GLASGOW, MONTANA, May 12, 1922.

Editors Herald: Two years ago last Thanksgiving Day, my wife, five children, and I left our homestead in northeastern Montana in care of renters and after some traveling stopped at Kalispell, Montana, where we met with two or three families of Saints. We, with Elder Newby, arranged for a place to meet and hold services for a week.

From there we went to Couer d'Alene, Idaho, where we became associated with a fine band of Saints. I obtained work and we remained there a year and a half, enjoying the climate, fruit, and associations of the Saints. We did what we could to promote the work. I preached nearly every Sunday and a branch was organized.

We then went back to Montana, put in a crop, and left for Duval, Saskatchewan, where we had lived prior to locating in Montana. Soon after our arrival we began making preparations to hold services, but prejudice ran high, as it did during the summer of 1918 when I was talking the gospel here.

I obtained permission from Brother W. J. Cornish to represent the work and soon found a schoolhouse, about eight miles away, where I could preach on Sundays. I worked through the week and preached thirteen Sundays to about thirty or forty interested people. As a result I baptized three and blessed four children. One family came over thirty miles several Sundays to hear the gospel message.

We are now in Glasgow, near our homestead, where our children can go to school. There is a nice branch here and we are trying to hold up the gospel banner high enough for others to see.

Your brother and colaborer,

ELMER D. CHASE.

"We had an exceptionally good Easter program the evening of that day," writes Sister J. R. Enyart, of the Bisbee, Arizona, Branch. "It was conducted by our chorister, T. R. Davis, and his wife. Our pastor, E. R. Davis, has recovered from his serious illness."

Restoration of the Ministerial Standing of Elder B. L. McKim

During the recent sessions of the joint council of Presidency, Twelve, and Bishopric, a committee was appointed to wait upon Brother B. L. McKim in response to a request that he had lodged with the council. As a result of conversations between Brother McKim and this committee Brother McKim wrote out and signed a statement which was read before the joint council. The statement follows:

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, May 5, 1922.

To Whom It May Concern: Whereas, there seems to have been a misunderstanding of my purpose regarding what I have written and circulated in tract form, I wish to definitely state, that it was not my intention in any respect to dishonor or bring reproach upon the fair name of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, God being my witness.

I love the gospel of Jesus Christ; it has been my all for the last few years, and its being spread abroad among the children of men is my heart's desire; so if what I have written has been offensive to any, I am sorry and ask their forgiveness, as it was not my intention to offend in writing.

As stated above, it is my desire to see the gospel of Jesus Christ proclaimed to the children of men, and if occasion requires and wherever the privilege is extended I will do my utmost to build up the kingdom of God and his righteousness.

Hoping that good will may be extended to me, and that we can be brethren in the fullest sense of the term, I remain,

Yours for Christ's sake,
(Signed) B. L. MCKIM.

Following the reading of the foregoing document the joint council voted to approve the recommendation of the committee that the silence that had been imposed upon Brother B. L. McKim by Apostle G. T. Griffiths some time ago should be lifted. In view of this action of the joint council the Presidency hereby take pleasure in notifying the Saints that the silence has been lifted and Brother McKim has been restored to his ministerial rights and privileges.

Brother Elmer Pearson, of Silver, North Dakota, writes that he appreciates the HERALD and does not see how any member of the church can get along without it.

Brother A. Wing, of Zion City, Illinois, writes: "I am renewing my subscription to THE SAINTS' HERALD. I assure you that I cannot get along without it. I am the only Saint living here. One month ago I walked between twenty-five and thirty miles to Evanston, Illinois. From there into Chicago I took the elevated road to get to church, I was so hungry for the gospel. I was fifty-three years old in April, this year. I had been without work for six or seven months, so I had no money and I trusted God to help me. I had one dollar and a quarter when I started for Chicago. When I got to church I told the elders how hungry I got for the truth and how I walked part of the way. The brethren surprised me after meeting by giving me about ten or eleven dollars. So it pays to trust God under all circumstances. I have been working now for a month. It seemed good to obtain work again."

Regarding Inequality in Family Allowances

The bishop says, Such seeming inequality is accounted for by local, personal, and family conditions.

The Presidency is in receipt of a letter from a brother who states that he has heard some criticism on the ground of inequality of expenses among the general church officers and the missionaries. He submitted a table that some one had prepared showing an average of family expenses of the general church officers including the Presidency, Twelve, Bishopric, Presiding Patriarch, stake officers, etc., and the families of some 324 of the general missionary force. At first sight the statistics contained in the table seem to indicate a very great inequality. The letter was submitted to the Presiding Bishopric and by them a reply was drafted which sets forth some facts that throw a different light on the situation. For general information we quote the following paragraphs from said letter:

We have your letter of April 27 and are glad indeed that you have written us in regard to the matter which has been troubling your mind, for it gives us an opportunity to canvass the matter with you in such a way as to throw light upon the matter, and enable you to see that there are a number of factors which you have failed to take into consideration, and which obviously would change the figures which you have set up in your letter.

With reference to your analysis of the report, which on the face of it would show gross inequalities, we do not admit that inequalities exist for we have learned that equality cannot be measured in dollars. To give to the ministry an equal amount as family allowance would cause the grossest kind of inequality. While it is true that the average amount paid the Twelve and Bishopric is in excess of the amount which you show has been paid to the remaining 324 families, there are a number of things which—as stated above—you have failed to take into consideration.

There are several men in this group of 324 who have pensions.

Some have farms or other income property.

Some have stock, the dividends of which they are willing to apply on their living expenses.

A number of these men are single men and draw nothing from the church.

Some of them are superannuated and either themselves or their wives are earning part of their living expenses and only draw a portion from the church.

Others are being supplied with part of the family expenses by the children.

A great many of our men who are located in cities are being supplied with a monthly stipend from the branch to assist in taking care of their rent. This does not appear in the figures from which you have drawn your conclusion.

A number of these men have only given part of a year's service. Had they been working the full year, the amount which the church would have supplied would have been greater.

Some of these men are self-supporting in whole or in part and consequently the amount shown in our report as furnished them does not represent what they have had for living expenses.

It must not be forgotten that our leading men are located in large cities where the rents are higher, while a large number of the groups of seventies and high priests live either in the country or rural districts where the rents are cheap and they can have their garden and fruit, cows, and chickens to assist in supplying the family needs. This greatly lessens the amount which they have to draw from the church.

It is hardly fair to state that the Twelve and Bishopric are receiving more than they should, for we can pick out thirty men among the seventy and high priests who are drawing as much or more than the average amount drawn by the Twelve. It will be just as fair to say that you had drawn more than you should—$480.00—because there are at least fifty on the list who have drawn less than has been furnished to you.

The facts are that the family allowances for every member of the Twelve and Bishopric have been figured on identically the same basis as that of every other missionary, and we have not varied from the rule during the year. There are many times circumstances which are known to us which affect the sum total drawn by any family, but which are not known to those who are looking over our report. For instance, there is one missionary's family on the list where we have spent probably a thousand dollars this year on account of a very sore and grievous affliction which has come upon them in the way of sickness. Somebody seeing the amount which we had furnished that family could very easily criticize the amount which they had drawn and yet, were they knowing to the facts, would say that we would be grossly negligent of our duty had we failed to take care of the needs of this family.

This statement is not made to justify any extravagance upon the part of any, but to emphasize the point that the Bishopric and the committee who work out the family schedule, having all the facts before them, are in a much better position to judge what is right and fair than are those who only have the sum total at the end of the year from which to judge.

As you say, we have been conscious of the fact that there is a disposition on the part of many who have part of the facts before them to criticize the leading men of the church in their work, but of this one thing we feel confident, that this kind of procedure will never correct the difficulty if one exists. If the Bishopric are guilty of maladministration or are derelict in their duty, there is a lawful procedure which the Lord has outlined and which should be followed in order to correct the evil. To encourage the spirit of criticism and faultfinding is destructive to the faith of the Saints and cannot but work harm to the church. If the President of the church, or the Bishop of the church, or the members of the Twelve are not doing right, we should proceed orderly to the correction of the wrongs.

I bring out this point, believing that you will see the logic of it, that it may be helpful to you in your work among our people. It is a very easy matter to criticize the work of others, but it would be much more difficult for the ones making the criticism probably to do the work more satisfactorily. To continue to heckle and harass and criticize the men whom we have appointed to do a particular piece of work for us is to hinder them in the accomplishment of the thing we expect them to do, for in answering these things their time and energy are taken from the things we expect them to do. We add to their burdens.

From your experience as a missionary I am sure that you appreciate the whole-hearted, energetic, and untiring support of those with whom you are laboring, and the support that we ourselves desire should be accorded to our brethren.

We have written at some length and with the desire to give such light upon the subject as would enable you to successfully meet the problem. As I have perused the revelations to the church and the history of the church, I have been convinced of this one thing, that the church has always had its problems and that the spirit of faultfinding and criticism has been prevalent frequently, for the Lord has condemned it from time to time. However, it is quite likely that as long as we have human judgment and human passions as factors in our religious experience, we will continue to have our problems.

We are trying to occupy in this office in such a way as to eventually receive the commendation of our heavenly Father, for we are aware of the fact we must give an account of our stewardship not only in time, but in eternity. We are trying the best we can to serve the interests of the church. We may make mistakes, but we want to make them just as few as possible. We believe in the ultimate triumph of God's work and trust that we may so deport ourselves as would be worthy of the blessings of God and of the confidence of His people.

Blue Pencil Notes

Idle Curiosity is the father of Rumor, and Thoughtless Gossip is the mother. They believe in large families: Vicious Rumor, Silly Rumor, Harmless Rumor, Malicious Rumor, Preposterous Rumor—they are too numerous to name. Then there is True Rumor—but he is the runt of the family.

A connoisseur of rumor could soon make a notable collection. Why waste the time? His collection complete to-day, to-morrow one would come along too big to put in his show case. But it may be worth a man's time once in a while to select a few samples and examine them carefully, that thereby he may rightly appraise the general run of the genus rumor.

A good brother (yes, he was a very good brother, only troubled in mind,) approached a Brother V—of Independence, saying, "I hear that the Presidency and Twelve are having a terrible time. What do you suppose it is about?" Brother V—being something of a wag, replied, "Yes, they are quarreling day and night. They can be heard for blocks around. And I'll tell you what it is all about. The Twelve want me in their Quorum and the Presidency want me for the third member. They are having an awful time to decide which shall have me." Moral: a liberal sprinkling of the salt of humor on the tail of the average rumor will help bring it to earth.

Some years ago a good bishop moved to Independence from an eastern State. After a time a rumor escaped from Pandora's box and flew even to the bishop's former home, alleging that the church had furnished him a big, expensive, high-powered motor car to ride about in. In fact, the bishop bought his own car with his own money and brought it to Independence with him. He used it in church services constantly. Instead of riding in the church's car the church rode in his car. He used it without stint constantly in church service in the Independence Stake. When it reached a certain state of dilapidation where economy was served by a new car, the church helped him to pay the difference in the trade; which seemed the fair thing to do as the car was still in church service. Moral: After salting your rumor, examine it before you swallow it.

Some one with an imagination wrote to a far western State that the joint council of Presidency, Twelve, and Bishopric had broken up in disorder and that President F. M. Smith had left the church and gone east—why east we do not know unless it be that the wind that blew over that particular cuckoo's nest blew east at the time: "The wind blew east, the wind blew west," etc. In due time the rumor got back to Independence finding President F. M. Smith engaged in his church work, and the joint council carefully, prayerfully, and diligently working its way towards a better common understanding. The simplicity of those who believed the rumor was sadly betrayed and abused. Moral: After salting your rumor examine it before you swallow it—then you will not swallow it.

These are sample rumors—plucked out of the air. There are plenty more on the wing. Unfortunate the man whose belfry is full of them.

Latter Day Saints boast that their creed is all truth. Let us not modify it to read: "Our creed is truth—our diversion rumors."

Floyd M. McDowell says: "I read about people quarreling away back in the Dark Ages. Latter Day Saints should try something new. You can quarrel without being Latter Day Saints. We should try to live together in peace and harmony—that is something different and worth while." To which we may add that any empty mind and idle tongue can embellish and enlarge a rumor and speed it on its way greatly invigorated towards the four points of the compass, and to all intermediate points. But to discover the truth, to think the truth, to speak the truth is a man's job (or a woman's job, as the case may be; rumors have no sex—nor has the truth).

True Education and True Evolution

We suffer from the fact that too often the word education is taken to be entirely synonymous with schooling, including the public schools, colleges, and universities. The facts are that our education is never complete, and in the nature of things cannot possibly be so.

We have seen many definitions of education; one of the best statements is that reported to be over the door of Hampton College for colored students. Paraphrasing it freely: "The purpose of education is preparation for life; the test of life is capacity for service."

But perhaps even a better understanding of its significance may be secured by an analysis of the term itself. Education comes from the Latin and means to lead out. It means to develop the natural capacity of the individual. Schools are educational in their nature because they so largely assist in this work in an intellectual way. To do so fully, they should assist in this process of development physically and spiritually as well as intellectually. That man is the most completely educated who has his natural powers the best developed for service.

A great deal is presented in the name of evolution. As a derivative from the Latin it means simply to unroll, which infers also the idea of unfolding. Bateson, in his presidential address in 1914, declared frankly that no properties could be developed from the original crab apple except those that were already inherent therein. He reiterated the thought last December in Toronto. The unit properties of Mendel must be in the individual, even though latent, or else they cannot be evolved in later descendants.

This means that there can be no evolution unless there has first been involution. Evolution develops that which is already latent in the germ.

The word of God is full of this ideal. "It does not appear what we shall be." We do not receive that body which is laid down, but some other body. A change is coming. The mortal shall put on immortality. We are called to be the sons and daughters of God.

If it is possible that we shall ever put upon us the divine likeness, it must be because there is inherent within us that kinship with the divine, a spark of light, though it be but in the embryo, if we are ever to arise to the stature of the manhood of Jesus Christ.

From this it conclusively follows that real education is not complete until we have fully put on the divine nature. Our education or unfoldment is not complete until we walk in his righteousness. Our education, the leading out, the development of our capacity, will not reach its fulfillment until we become fully sons and daughters of God. Education is therefore not confined to youth, it is not a matter alone of the school, but it is a matter of life itself. None are too old to study to show themselves approved unto God. None are too young to begin that process. When we consider our possibilities, that which before seemed difficult becomes not only easy, but necessary that we may assist the unfolding, the development of the divine spark within ourselves.

To this definition, all others that we yet know of are subordinate, yet are vital factors thereof. In this sense, true education is true evolution but adds to it the conscious effort for development of each and every natural talent to the end that we may at last lay it as a sacrifice on the altar of God.

The L. D. S.

There has been some comment concerning the society formed at Graceland College, the L. D. S. Society, or using the Greek letters, the Lamda Delta Sigma. A recent article in the Homiletic Review gives a significance to these letters which probably will express in different terms the idea involved. In the Homiletic Review, it is called the L. S. D., but there is no reason why it should not be rearranged as above indicated.

The plan as there laid down is outlined for juniors in the Sunday school, but the principle is broad enough to apply to all of us.

L stands for "Learn something worth while every day." Our minds are blanks in which we should store our treasures.

D stands for doing—"Do something for somebody every day." We may not be able to go among the poor every day, but there are those at home who need help, even though it be but to read a story to a child, a sick person, or one feeble with age.

S stands for "See something beautiful every day." What we seek we find; what we look for we are apt to see. A trained eyesight is needed. One so trained will see a dozen items of interest where another will see one or none.

For higher education the motto to learn something new each day would certainly be a distinct help. For stewardships, to do something for others each day will tend to cultivate the right attitude. For a Christian to consider those things that are lovely, to seek for the good, both with our physical eye and also with mental insight, will lead to beauty and strength of character.

Health Increasing

Some one has made a survey to determine mathematically the conditions of sickness and health, and claims to have found that we are only sick on the average of one week a year. Eighty-five per cent of us are born sound and healthy. We yell "bloody murder" when we open our eyes simply because it is different.

There has been not only a decrease in infant mortality, but also in infant sickness.

Forty years ago, one out of seven died of consumption; now it is one in fourteen. Typhoid fever, fifty years ago, cost fifty thousand lives a year; now only one fourth as many, despite the increase in population. Many of the large cities hardly average three to five deaths a year for a hundred thousand population. There are three cities of over two hundred thousand which have not had a single death from typhoid in two years.

Collier's reports that Doctor Alexander Lambert made a careful study of rheumatism in Bellevue Hospital, and found less than one third as much per thousand as there was fifteen years ago. Of childhood diseases, hip disease, white swelling of the knees, spinal diseases, etc., have disappeared.

A Point on Evolution and the Soul

The story is told that an old village carpenter went to hear a lecture on evolution. Shortly after he led his minister into his best parlor where stood a fine oak settle. The minister admired this very much, and offered to buy it, but the carpenter refused to sell it, as he told the minister that the settle had saved his soul.

It seems that he was given the job of repairing a pigsty which was in such bad condition that it had to be completely torn down. When he started to rebuild, the man for whom he was working told him not to put any of that filthy stuff in it; that he wanted new stuff in it, and that he could take the other wood home and burn it. He took it for that purpose, but during the winter, while idle, he ran across a picture of an old settle.

He had noted that the wood taken from the pigsty was old oak which, though filthy on the exterior, was sound at the heart. So from that oak he had built the settle, rubbed it with linseed oil, and polished and repolished.

So, as he said in the Baptist Times and Freeman, nobody would think, to look at it, that it ever came out of a dirty old pigsty. "So it does not make any difference where my body came from. It isn't a question of how the Lord made the body or out of what stuff, but it is what he put in it that counted. It doesn't matter what it has been, but what it is now, and what it shall become."

Questions and Answers

Question. Did the Aaronic priesthood exist among men before the ordination of Aaron? In Doctrine and Covenants 104 we are told that this priesthood is called the priesthood of Aaron because it was conferred upon Aaron and his seed, etc., and that it is called the lesser priesthood because it is an appendage to the greater. In the Book of Mormon we are told that Alma "ordained" priests and elders to preside and watch over the church. (Alma 4: 1.) Is there any scripture given showing the existence of the Aaronic priesthood before the flood, or at any time before it was conferred upon Aaron?

Answer. We do not know of any scripture which plainly states the existence of the Aaronic priesthood prior to the flood. But we note that the Aaronic or Levitical priesthood continued with the early Christian church. (Acts 6: 3-8; 8: 8, 12, 14; Ephesians 4: 11.) It was on this continent in the days of Alma and for evidently two hundred years after Christ. (Alma 9: 60-73; 10: 1-16, 103; Mormon, chapters 3, 4, 6.) It is also on earth to-day; in each instance, along with the holy priesthood, which was named after Melchisedec.

Since the gospel was on earth from Adam to Moses, it seems a reasonable inference that the secondary priesthood was on earth as an appendage to the holy priesthood. But this is only inference. We know of no scriptural reference so stating, nor has the church as such ever taken a position thereon.

Forscutt-Shinn Debate—1875

In a recent issue of the HERALD, page 449, the date of this debate is stated as August, 1877. We have to thank Elder Rannie for calling this to our attention, as it was August, 1875.

Where Did Your Dollar Go?

By B. R. McGuire, Presiding Bishop

You are doubtless always interested in the manner in which the funds of the church are spent. Many do not take the time to analyze the figures which from time to time are presented, and if they undertake to do so, lose themselves in the labyrinth of figures. We have therefore worked out in simplified form the following figures, which will show how many dollars have been spent for the ten months, July 1, 1921, to April 30, 1922.

The total spent during this period was $367,533.19. Each dollar was distributed as follows:

Stake expense	3.1 cents
Graceland College	5.2 cents
Aid to Poor, Homes for Aged, Children's Home, and Sanita- rarium	11.2 cents
Missionary work:
Families, 54.9	}67.6 cents
Elders' expenses 12.7
Administrative expense	12.9 cents
	$1.00

Administrative Expense covers the following offices and departments, Presidency, Presiding Bishopric, Twelve, Publicity, Statistician, Auditor, Architect, Historian, Patriarch, Women's, Health, and Music Departments, Church Secretary, Librarian, General Offices, and miscellaneous general church expense.

Where did the dollar come from? During the ten months ending April 30, 1922, our total expenditures for the above purposes were$367,533.19

Our receipts from tithes, etc. 294,714.15

Leaving a deficit of$ 72,819.04

This means that every dollar spent has come from the following sources:

Tithes, Offering, Consecration, and Surplus	81 cents
Borrowed, etc.	19 cents
	$1.00

Shall We Continue Increasing Our Deficit?

The answer rests with the membership of the church. To do so means that we but add to our burden, for we must pay interest upon funds that we borrow. If every member will try to look upon the financial needs of the church as his own individual problem and resolve to do all in his or her power to supply this need, our problem will soon be solved.

The Joint Council has worked diligently in an effort to bring the expenditures within the income, but this is a difficult task. Office forces have been reduced until in some departments the work is cri-pled. Several missionaries have volunteered to devote themselves to some secular employment until conditions improve. There are some activities that must continue. We cannot dismiss the inmates from the Old Folks' or Children's Homes, nor the sick from the Sanitarium, nor discontinue the aid that we have been extending to the destitute.

We are approaching June, July, and August, which are always the three lean months in church finances. Farmers during this period are receiving but little from their crops, while in the cities many are planning their vacations or reunion trips, and all this results in the lessening of our receipts during this period.

A Brighter Outlook

There will be a temporary improvement in business conditions during the summer and fall—farm products are bringing higher prices; factories are running better; greater activity in building is in evidence; and we are hopeful that ere long our receipts will increase. Can we count on you to do your part?
“We are laborers together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all.”

A Just Weight

By C. E. Wight

Sermon at Lamoni, Iowa, January 15, 1922.

Reported by R. A. Wight.

In Proverbs is found a statement like this:

A false balance is an abomination to the Lord, but a just weight is his delight.—11: 1.

You will remember that the Master did not urge his people not to judge, but he did say this, “Judge not unrighteously, but judge righteous judgment.”
Every person who is attempting to develop his life in harmony with that of the pattern, the Master, will judge. We develop the God-given powers within us when we attempt to judge, but we should see to it that our judgment is a righteous one.

It is a universal custom to use a measuring rod, not only in judging fellow man, but also in judging government, religion—practically everything with which man comes in contact. It is proper that he should use this measuring rod, but it is doubly important that he should see to it that the measuring rod is a correct one and the standard he is using in measuring his fellow man, his government, his religion, is one that will stand the test.

The Factors of Judgment

There are none of us but make mistakes in our judgments. In the first place, we fail to take into consideration all of the factors involved in making our judgment; and in the second place, many times we judge when we are not set as judges. What are the factors that come to us in making these various judgments?

Suppose that I am going to judge my fellow man. I have a right to judge him, provided I judge him correctly. As I set that man up in judgment before me, what are the questions to ask regarding him? First of all, if I am to judge righteously, I must ask something in regard to the past history of that man. I must ask something with regard to his forebears. What are the conditions that have come into his life through heredity? What has been his environment? For, if I am to judge him correctly as he stands before me to-day, I must not only know with regard to his forebears, but also with regard to the conditions through which he has come in life, which have molded his character and made him what he is to-day. Then I must attempt to analyze him as he is to-day. I must ask myself the question, Is he able to rise above his condition?

What about the judgment of our government and of our religion? Let us call your attention again to our text:

A false balance is an abomination to the Lord, but a just weight is his delight.

Elements of a False Balance and a Just Weight

Three elements constitute an unjust balance. First, ignorance; second, superstition; third, tradition. When a person judges a thing without having the facts at his command, he is necessarily using a false balance. Why? Because he is ignorant of the conditions relative to that which he is attempting to judge. When superstition creeps in he is also using a false balance. And third, when one allows tradition to have an undue weight in judgment he again uses a false balance.

If these, then, are the main elements that constitute a false balance, what are the three that constitute a just weight? I have set them down as these: 1, Knowledge; 2, Analysis; 3, Synthesis.

First, to judge accurately it will be necessary that we have a knowledge of the conditions.

Second, it will be necessary that we be able to divide that knowledge into its component elements.

Third, having made that separation, it will be necessary to choose carefully and correctly those elements that will help us make a satisfactory judgment and put them together again until we have a well organized and constituted opinion. These are the elements that constitute a correct judgment and they are the things that make for a just weight.

The Master's Use of These Elements

The Master was constantly going through these very processes that I have attempted to analyze this morning. You will note, if you study carefully, he did not judge unless he had a knowledge of the situation. When he did render judgment he carefully analyzed the situation and built up a judgment that would stand not only the test of his time, but from that time until now. We believe it will stand the test of eternity. I wish you would carefully and critically read the sermon on the mount. I am confident that not one of a hundred people grasps the wonderful points presented in that matchless message. The Master of men struck right at the heart of things. He presented principles of divine life. If you will analyze that sermon you will notice there are certain standards vastly different from standards constantly used in the world.

Not only throughout his whole ministry, but particularly in the sermon on the mount, the Master attempted to set up a just weight over against the false balance that mankind is in the habit of using. Men have used a false balance when they have set up money as the standard of living, but the Master completely changed that situation when he said that a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of things which he possesses. The Master indicated that the soul of man is of infinitely greater worth than the dollars we so strenuously are attempting to get.

The Master not only set up the correct weight, so far as the standards of living are concerned, but told us that the real intent of the heart in giving is greater than to be seen of men. The Pharisees drew their cloaks about them, and standing there in their dignity said, "We have Abraham for our father; what need have we of listening to this man?" But he struck right at the root of the whole situation and told those people that if they were to give alms to be seen of men, in this giving they had their reward: they received their reward in the admiration of their fellow men. But if they desired to receive the real things of life, it should be necessary that they give for the sake of giving and not that they should give to be seen of men.

The Master gave us a third principle that well can be applied to life, not merely to what we ordinarily call our religious life, but to all phases of our activity. He said, "Let thine eye be single." In other words: You cannot expect success in this life, whether that success come to you in business, in the social world, in religious effort, if you have a double standard. It is necessary that your eye be single, your vision clear, that you be able to see right into the heart of things.

There is another principle that the Master established: that the performance of miracles and the speaking in prophecy were not the real measure of a man's spirituality.

Not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? And in thy name cast out devils? And in thy name done many wonderful works? And I will profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity.—Matthew 7: 21-23.

I am not saying that prophecies and miracles do not have their proper place in the work of the gospel. I believe they do or I would not be a representative of this church. Paul says, "Despise not prophesying." I want to emphasize, however, that they are not to be the measure of a man's spirituality. Neither are they to be the measure of the spirituality of the church; but the real measure that the Master was attempting to present here is that you shall do the work of God. But that is not all.

The Master taught us that we must substitute the stewardship ideal for the selfish motive. You will remember he said:

For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it.—Matthew 16: 25.

In this statement is contained almost the entire content of the stewardship ideal. Whosoever will selfishly seek to save his own life is automatically losing his life; but on the other hand, one who will lose his life in service is automatically obtaining eternal life.

The sixth and last rule we present this morning is: The golden rule, and not the rule of expediency, should be the basis of living. "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets." In other words, the entire law and the prophets that were given of olden time are contained in the one statement. That is the basis of the entire proposition.

Analyzing Our Message

What is it that differentiates us from other religious denominations? It is that we believe in a God not alone of yesterday, or to-morrow, but a God of to-day. As the Master said, "God is the God of the living and not the God of the dead." We believe in the God who reveals himself in the present day. We believe, as Brother Elbert A. Smith says, in a present-tense religion. That present-tense religion has brought to us something which must be analyzed, so we can see what is the heart of this message that has come to us. If we go right down to the heart of that present-day revelation, what is it that stands out? It is true that we had a restatement of the principles that were given to us by the Master, but they were only a restatement. We had them before. There has come to us something that is entirely new, and that is the mechanics for the solution of the social problem. If we analyze carefully that solution of the social problem, you will see that before that social problem can be solved it will be necessary that the individual members of this church have the stewardship ideal as a basis. But how are we going to know that we have the stewardship ideal as a basis?

Just the moment that our lives accord with the statement made here by the Master: "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them," that moment shall we begin, at least, to work upon the stewardship basis. There is no external process of stewardship that will work until first of all the heart of the individual has been so adjusted that he will work in harmony with the intent of that stewardship proposition.

How are we going to use the Master's standard in application to our present-day lives? For, if we were only to present certain beautiful thoughts from the work of the Master with no real application to your lives, our effort would be largely wasted. We are interested that you shall be able to receive a definite impetus forward, so that the work that has been done shall carry a definite step forward to the accomplishment of our Zionie ideals.

How are we to use the standard in measuring our fellow men? We shall ask, first of all, Does that man recognize that the soul of his fellow man is worth more than the Almighty Dollar he is attempting to corral? Does that person have the real intent of giving in his life? Of course, when we are making this judgment we should judge ourselves first of all on an equal basis. Is that man's eye single to the work of God? Does he believe that the work of the Father is the important thing in the test of his spiritual life? Has he really substituted the stewardship ideal for the selfish motive of life? Is he working according to the golden rule, or is he working under the rule of expediency?

Testing Our Religion

How are we going to use this rule in judging our religion? First of all, we must have knowledge of that religion; then we must analyze it and build our completed structure of belief. I do not believe any one of us has a completed religious structure until we have individually obtained that knowledge, made that analysis, and also made that synthesis. I do not believe that we have a true comprehension of what our religion really is until we have individually gone through that process. We must recognize, too, that the institution is secondary to the belief, and that the letter is of less importance than the spirit of the law. We are told that "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life."

A False Balance Versus a Just Weight

I want to give you a comparison of the two standards that we have attempted to set up, and first of all to call attention to the false balance used by the individual who in his judgment goes to either one extreme or the other. In order that we may bring this clearly before you, I am going to try to analyze the seventeenth century very briefly, picking out some of the most important events. It is very easy to use a false standard and come to a false conclusion.

On the one hand, the seventeenth century is one of the worst centuries in history. Note some of the terrible events that occurred during that century. The king of Persia put out the eyes of the entire royal family, including even the infants. Russia began her cruel oppression of Poland. Prussia was engaged in the Thirty Year War, the massacre of Prague, and banishment of 150,000 Protestants; 700,000 French Protestants were murdered in twenty-four hours. The licentious court of Louis XIV held sway. Mary, Queen of Scots, was beheaded. The French exiled 800,000 of their best citizens.

You will say that this is a terrible period of the world's history; but the seventeenth century was one of the best centuries that history has ever known.

It was during that hundred years Grotius gave to us the laws of peace and of war, the forerunner of our international law of the present day. Galileo contributed the refracting telescope and the laws of motion. Milton, Shakespeare, Bacon, and Locke made their wonderful contributions to literature during that time.

We may use a false balance when we attempt to judge from only one side. If we are going to use a correct weight, to judge accurately, it will be necessary that we consider the good and the bad and base our judgment on their relative importance.

The just weight is that one which recognizes both the good and the evil and then renders an impartial decision.

Judging the Present Correctly

Let us apply this to the situation that confronts us as a church to-day. Have we in judging used a false balance or a just weight? I consider this to be absolutely fundamental, not alone to the judgment of the present situation, but in every judgment that may come to us in the future.

As a church we are in debt. We are forced to take many of our missionaries from the field. Instead of increasing our official forces as we should like to do, it is necessary to take many of our missionaries from the field. Therefore this message cannot be carried to the countless thousands of people as it could if we had the money to send these missionaries. What shall be our conclusion? Shall we, therefore, conclude that God is no longer leading us and that we should cease our efforts?

Let us look on the bright side. Our debt is caused by conditions that have been almost, if not quite, unavoidable. In actual net worth we are farther ahead than we have ever been before. It is true that we have found it necessary to reduce our missionary force, but what shall be the answer? Shall we simply sit down and say, The church is going on the rocks and we have no responsibility in connection with it?

It was my privilege only recently to be in Council Bluffs. I have been there twice during the past year. Those folks are on the job. Within the past year there have been baptized into that church over a hundred people. What was the reason? Was it due simply to the missionary effort on the part of those sent out by the church, Brother Macgregor and Brother Curtis? I would not for a moment minimize the splendid work they have done. The reason they have had so many baptisms and are taking care of the converts is because the Saints are on the job. They are wide awake. They are attempting to follow out the injunction of Paul, "Let us go on to perfection." Does it suggest anything to us? It suggests to me that just the moment a missionary is released from the work in the field it places upon you and upon me an added responsibility to take the place of that missionary who has been released. We can do it if we will.

Follow me carefully here, because your judgment with regard to this matter may also suggest something in relation to our judgment of all processes and all other matters before the church at the present time. At Graceland College a radio station has been installed, and through the efforts of the President of the church these wireless stations have been put into operation in many branches of the church. I recall very distinctly how critical some of our people were of those who were instrumental in this forward movement, for the reason that the missionary arm of the church had need of their constant attention and if they were giving the time to that kind of work they would not be wasting it upon wireless stations. How many read of the commencement of the move recently made to preach a sermon by wireless in Independence? You will see the statement in the last HERALD, and I am advised that Brother Arthur B. Church, at the head of that work, is making plans at the present time to have a service every Sunday evening. Literally thousands of people are going to hear our message of peace because we have these wireless stations at the present time. Some of us were not able to foresee the possibilities of this work. Some of us were not able to peer into the future and see that which would result from the efforts of a few years ago; but to-day we are commencing to realize the importance of it, and even if a man should make a dozen mistakes and then should bring to us something of this sort which would enable us to carry our missionary work on in this present crisis, it would appear to me that he had received at least some divine direction with regard to the carrying forward of that process. What is the answer? To me it is this: I am going to be very careful in judging the present processes going on in the church, that I do not condemn in a wholesale manner, because that process is not identically the same as that which went on a few years ago. We have to be very careful. We must, in going through this process of judgment, use the three steps we suggested:

First; we have no right to judge unless we have a knowledge of the situation.

Second; it will be necessary that we analyze that situation carefully.

Third; it will be necessary that after that analysis has been made we build up a constructive program of our belief so we shall know exactly where we are attempting to go.

We have presented both the dark and the bright side of the picture so far as our church is concerned, and I am going to tell you very candidly, a person is using a false balance when he looks only at the pessimistic aspect, and he is using just as false a balance when he is looking only at the optimistic side. That is true not only in the present era, but regarding everything in life. One uses a false balance when he judges only superficially, when he looks only on one side. It is necessary that he look at both sides, that he analyze the process and then consider as to his particular part of the program. Let us do it.

Do present conditions justify the conclusion that God has forsaken us? What did he tell us? "I will have a tried people." "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth."

Two or three years ago there was a prophecy delivered to the people at Hiteman, Iowa. I wasn't just sure the message was correct. It did not seem reasonable, but I simply reserved judgment. The gist of that message was that there was coming to us a period of sacrifice such as we had not seen for many years, that there was before us a time of trouble. At that time everything was moving along smoothly. The present financial situation had not struck the country and it looked as if we would continue to move steadily forward, yet that statement came to us, warning us of the very condition through which we are passing at this time. Had God forgotten us? No, he looked ahead and saw the conditions, and warning us, he put the responsibility on us. He warned us then that these conditions were coming. These conditions have come. What are we going to do about it? The man who can go forward regardless of the conditions is truly consecrated to his work. He who is not annoyed very much by the sunshine or rain, who is able to go whether it be calm or whether it be stormy, who will constantly go forward in spite of weather conditions, in spite of whatever situation may confront him, he is the man God wants in this present age, that he has always wanted, and that he always will want.

Here is a stanza from a poem by Edgar Guest that expresses very beautifully what the Master desires of each of us. He has entitled this "My creed." I am going to change one word. As it is changed it would read like this:

To live as fully as I can;
To be, no matter where, a man;
To take what comes of good or ill
And cling to faith and honor still;
To do my best, and let that stand
The record of my brain and hand;
And then, should failure come to me,
Still work and hope for victory.

The Delinquent Child

By Ida Etzenhouser

Prepared for the Sanitarium Number of the Herald.

The Survey of November 13, 1920, reports Mr. Herbert Hoover speaking before the American Child Hygiene Association in Saint Louis, October 11, as saying:

The Nation has the obligation of taking such measures toward its children as will yield to them an equal opportunity at their start in life. This responsibility and duty is not based alone upon human aspirations, but it is also based on the necessity to secure physical, mental, and moral health, economic and social progress by the Nation. Every child delinquent in body, education, or character, is a charge upon the community as a whole and a menace to the community itself. The children of strong physique, of sound education and character, are the army with which we must march to progress!

The Nation cannot do this work until public opinion has been so aroused to its necessity that such opinion has become crystallized into laws. When we are awakened to the fact that our neglect of the children in the past is in a measure the basis of our social unrest of the present; that this past neglect is filling our almshouses, houses of correction, jails, and asylums, and that the upkeep of such institutions is greatly in excess of the amount in dollars and cents which would be necessary to dam this stream of human driftwood and turn it into safer and more profitable channels; then, and only then, shall we be successful.

Society is becoming so complex that only the physically and mentally fit are capable of making the adjustments necessary to the existing complicated conditions. Unstable nervous systems must be stabilized as far as possible; physical defects must be remedied while in their early stages, if we would give our children a fighting chance in the great social and economic struggle which we call life.

Often it has been said that it is the right of every child to be well born. This is true, but it is also the right of every child that is not well born to be given every chance possible to lift him from that path that leads downward to failure, to that other path that leads upward to at least a limited degree of success.

This will be possible only when public conscience is aroused to the importance of an annual physical and medical examination of school children by reputable physicians, and remedial work done when needed. So many hours of the child's life during his formation period are spent in schools which are under state control, that much may be done to correct inherited weaknesses and offset those weaknesses caused by bad environmental conditions in the home. Teachers should be trained in hygiene, and this subject presented to every child under their care in such a way that no child shall finish his school program without having formed definite individual health habits which will stay with them throughout their life. School buildings should be built having in mind the proper distribution of light, air, heat, and moisture, and should have proper sanitary surroundings.

So much of the mental retardation which we see around us had its beginnings in physical defects that might have been corrected, that annual physical examinations cannot be overemphasized. Adenoids and nasal obstructions pressing upon the nerves and blood vessels of the head and cutting off the supply of oxygen may retard the development of the brain; and if not removed, may cause the child to become subnormal. Defective teeth are a menace to the health of the child, not only causing toxic poisonings but poor nutrition, and malnutrition retards neuro-physical development upon which mentality is based. The eyes and ears have been called the gateways to knowledge, and their functioning in this capacity should be understood and appreciated, and any defect remedied, that the child may not be cut off from the maximum of impressions that may be received only through these organs. Rheumatism and other ills have been traced to diseased tonsils, therefore they should be removed. Poor posture may lead to curvature of the spine and hollow chests, which if detected in time by the school physician may be corrected by proper physical exercises and so may save the child from tuberculosis.

Like Esau of old, we too often sell our birthright for a mess of pottage, allowing the selfish enjoyment of what money can buy to-day stand in the way of that social inheritance which should be the birthright of every child, and which can only be obtained by the investment of money in such corrective measures as will reap a rich harvest in social and economic efficiency in the futures of our children.

The state is the great mother of all; too often the public schools, the product of the state, is nothing more than a human grist mill, into whose hopper we pour the raw material in the shape of immature children, with the idea of turing out the same grade of finished product regardless of the differences in the raw material with which the hopper is fed. We are awakening to the falsity of this idea, and are beginning to realize that individual differences exist; that chronological age is not the true measure of mental capacity; that even the age at which the child should enter school should be measured by anatomical-physiological development rather than by the number of years he has lived; that the grading of children according to their mental age is much more significant than according to their chronological age, and that no child of retarded development should be submitted to the stress of trying to compete with children of better neuro-physical development, but that special classes or schools should be provided where they may receive individual treatment and so stabilize them as far as possible, that they may later function acceptably as members of society.

None of this can be accomplished without an annual physiological examination of children; also psychological examination by experts followed up by proper remedial work. Those who have made a special study of this question tell us that the five per cent of children who are now mentally below normal because of neuro-physiological defects, could be cut down to one half of one per cent if they were given proper consideration and corrective measures carried out. When we take into consideration that it is out of this questionable five per cent that are below normal that our paupers and criminals are largely developed, we can see one of the reasons why we as a church should interest ourselves in this vital matter.

A criminal is a nonsocialized individual; he is often nonsocialized because his powers of inhibition are below normal, because of an inherited or acquired unstable or defective nervous system. It is

OF GENERAL INTEREST

Revelation Before the Flood

The evidence showing a revelation, at least before the Flood, of the will of God to man continues to accumulate. Our attention has just been called to an article in the Sunday School Times by Doctor Melvin Grove Kyle, in which he makes the following statement:

Can anyone read John 3:16 thus: "God so loved the world after Abraham that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life"? I once asked.

Theologically such a thing seemed impossible. "According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world," and knowing that Enoch prophesied of the second advent (Jude 14). Archæologically also there were already at that time indications that there was a more or less full revelation of the divine scheme of redemption to the antediluvian world; that the promise to Eve was not the only revelation of redemption to that period of the world, Enoch not the only one who 'walked with God,' and Noah not the only preacher of righteousness to the antediluvian world, but only the last one.

It is certain that whatever was known of the plan of redemption to Noah and his sons would go off along all lines of migration after the Flood and so probably leave traces of itself in mythology in many lands. Traces of such descent have been suspected for a long time in the mythology and poetry of Greece and Rome; more than suspected in the weird, suggestive myths of Osiris in Egypt, and the farther back in Sumerian or early Babylonian mythology research has been able to penetrate the more remarkable have become indications of the Messianic hope.

True, in all these lands, far along these various lines of migration after the Flood, the Hope has been horribly mixed with polytheistic myths, yet the Hope still appears.

So I felt as early as 1914 that sooner or later more complete information of early Babylonian mythology pointing back to antediluvian revelation would come to light. But cer-therefore our business as members of that great family, "the kingdom of God on earth," to see that everything possible is done for the child to give him a strong physique, sound education, and moral character.

We agree with Mr. Hoover that the "children are the army with which the Nation must march to progress." Then let us interest ourselves in the Nation's greatest assets, that we may take our place as a church at the head of civilization and lead the world in its onward progress. Remembering that just as a weed is a useful herb out of place, so often the delinquent child is a child out of its proper sphere, that is not understood, and when placed in the right environment, properly nurtured, and physical defects remedied, it may become a useful citizen.

tainly no one could have anticipated the startling way in which it would appear as it is now seen in the following sensational for the facts of which I am indebted to the distinguished cuneiform scholar, Professor George A. Barton, of Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania.

There then follows an extract from Doctor Barton's work, including many lines from Tablet VI. Students of Biblical criticism are well aware of the comparison which has been made between the Babylonians, Genesis, Numbers, etc., and that of the Jewish Scriptures, and some writers have even inferred that the Jews secured the first part of the Old Testament during their captivity in Babylon. Doctor Barton and Doctor Kyle, however, very clearly consider that this later discovery rather indicates, as they go back farther into the Sumerian records, the existence of an antediluvian revelation of which these various accounts are the offshoot. The Babylonian, therefore, is only a derivative, and as Doctor Barton says,

"The general resemblance to Biblical account of the Creation, the Garden of Eden, the Fall, and redemption by the death and resurrection of Christ is astonishing. If we eliminate the polytheism some of the lines might, when thus slightly revised, be applied to our Lord. For example:

"He is the God, who by his holy death makes the dead to live.

There perished the hireling who hated him.

Verily he is the God whom God his father named,
The holy God who makes pure all of us."

"In many respects this Babylonian narrative differs strikingly from the Biblical. For example, it lacks human interest."

Doctor Kyle then concludes as follows, showing plainly his belief that it is the result of this early revelation and that God has not left man without a knowledge of him:

Here certainly is, as Professor Barton has called it, "An adumbration of the Christian scheme of redemption." It seems to reflect prophetic revelation. I say reflects revelation, for it is impossible to think for a moment that the myth itself was a prophetic revelation on the plan of redemption. Polytheism may reflect revelation previously given, but polytheism cannot itself be a revelation of God, the one true God; for the one God to reveal himself through polytheism would be to make revelation a lie.

Professor Barton has pointed out for us the most patent and unmistakable similarities between this Babylonian tablet and the Biblical statements. There are other hints of Biblical things in the inscription less unequivocal, and it is to be expected that there will be discussion over the exact meaning of some portions of the tablet, but there can be no doubt that, in the main, this Babylonian story of Creation, the Fall, and Redemption as here presented will stand.

That there are thus but two possible interpretations of the significance of this tablet will be apparent at once to most careful readers. One of these interpretations, which I believe to be the correct one, I have already given at the beginning of this review. The other possible interpretation, which will soon appear from anti-Christian rationalists, may as well be anticipated now. They will at once seize upon this myth

The City of God on Earth

The following poem from the Border Cities Star, of Windsor, Ontario, is another indication of the thought of the world.

We have pointed out before the effort to build garden cities in England, the strong arguments put forth by others on behalf of a city of Zion. This poem is another indication of how widespread is become that desire for the city of God to be established on earth.

O City of God! O vision most splendid!
Oh! when shall we see thee established on earth?
When shall this old world's long travail be ended,
And out of its anguish a new brought to birth?

We look and we long for that day, resplendent,
When wrongs shall be righted, and tyranny cease,
When righteousness, love, and justice transcendent
Shall insure to mankind the blessings of peace.

When truth on the throne shall once more be regnant,
When poverty's shame shall vanish away—
We watch and we wait, for that day so pregnant
With promise so splendid, the future to sway.

The sages and seers and prophets have spoken,
In voices long stilled, of this time that shall be;
Yet age follows age and men ask us the token
Or sign of its coming—give faith, Lord, in Thee!

Our spirits grow faint and doubts are arising;
O Lord, we are longing thy footsteps to hear,
Come quickly, we pray thee, the faithless surprising,
Thy promise redeem and to all men appear.

as the origin of the whole gospel story of redemption and make the story of the historical Christ only a legendary incarnation of this Babylonian myth, associated with the actual biography of some Jewish enthusiast of the time of Pontius Pilate. Such modern devotees of Strauss with his mythical theory will be numerous to put for this interpretation. The world of believers, as well as the world of scholars, must choose between these interpretations, the one that makes the gospel no more than a myth, and the other that lifts up our eyes to a historical background for the revelation of redemption that bridges that vast empty place between Abraham and the Prot-Evangelium in the Garden of Eden and confirms our belief that John 3:16 tells us that God loved the whole world, and that we were "chosen in him from the foundation of the world."

The readers of The Sunday School Times, from the distinguished scholar who sends me the facts and the translation, to the humblest reader in the farthest corner of the world, will not need any guidance from me in choosing between these two interpretations of this most sensational and epoch-making find. If the world was astonished when in 1875 George Smith announced that he had found a Babylonian account of Creation, from which the account of the creation of man was wanting, how much greater will now be the wonderment when the missing part is supplied and is found to reflect not only the account of the creation of man, but of the Fall and of Redemption!

Yet let us not stand with hands idly folded,
Content with our hope, our gaze fixed on the skies.
But grant we each may be fashioned and molded
For service most holy and true sacrifice.

That so by earnest and loyal endeavor
We may hasten the day when those things shall be;
And from the whole earth, Most Blessed For Ever,
Shall praise without ceasing arise unto thee.

His Hand Is Over All

By Mabel K. Smith

Last midnight came a dismal train of thoughts,
To haunt my pillow, that I might not sleep;
Thoughts of the trouble cloud that hovers near,
And threatens failure, trials, and sorrows deep.

And were it not for other vigils spent
In like forebodings and in fancies drear,
And were it not that I am still His child,
My soul would sink beneath its weight of care.

But I recall the dreary midnights passed,
While hideous warfare filled the world with woe;
And I recall that God's own hand was raised
To quell the sounds of battle. So I know

That now, although grave fears harass the soul,
While night's dark curtain closes out the day,
That same dear Hand will lift at earliest dawn,
And scatter torturing fancies far away.

My Mother's Face

Three little boys played together,
One beautiful summer day,
And I leaned out of the window,
To hear what they had to say.

"The prettiest thing I ever saw,"
The first little boy said,
"Was a bird in grandpa's garden,
All black and white and red."

"The prettiest thing I ever saw,"
Said the second little lad,
"Was a pony at the circus,
And I wanted it awful bad."

"I think," said the third little fellow,
With brave and gentle grace,
"The prettiest thing I ever saw,
Was just my mother's face."

Rheumatism in the pocket nerve, my friends, yields quickest to desperate remedies. Nurse the twinge and it cripples the whole body. Ignore it, and you walk quit of it forever. But if I ignore it and the other fellow does not, don't I penalize myself to his advantage? In cash, yes. On a spot-cash basis, such a transaction, as you should realize at the start, does not pay. Only in long-term, compound-interest-bearing bonds does it pay. And these bonds are cashed-in to you at times and in a noble currency which you least expect.—Everybody's.

THE FORUM

The Forum is a department of the HERALD intended primarily for free discussion of various questions, especially of a controversial nature, the contributions representing the views of the writer but not necessarily indorsed by the editors or the church at large.

The Place of Evolution

By Edward Ingham

There are several varieties of evolution. It is as a theory not demonstrated as affecting religion. It is hypothesis, not doctrine.

The editorial in the HERALD of January 11 under the caption of "Science and revelation" was read with great interest by the writer. In the opening paragraph it says: "The recognition of the place of science or open-mindedness towards the hypothesis of evolution does not mean we should reject our religious concepts."

Personally, I have always considered that evolution was very much like socialism—there are several different varieties. Hence, when a person says he believes in evolution the question which naturally presents itself is, "What kind?"

In your article you point out that an acceptance of crass materialistic evolution (the kind championed by men like Haeckel) would be suicidal to our Christian faith. But how about the evolutionary point of view enunciated by Herbert Spencer, which seems to dominate modern sociological thought? Can we consistently accept this evolutionary basis and at the same time contend for the power and efficacy of the atonement of Christ? For if we are to believe that the early habits of men are indistinguishable from those of animals; that mankind started at the foot of the ladder and gradually ascended from a state of savagery to civilization through the slow accumulation of experimental knowledge; then it is the rise, not the fall of man with which the study of history makes us acquainted. And if there was no fall, there is, of course, no need for redemption. If there was no special creation, and man is merely an evolution from some tadpole or fish or anthropoid ape, what need of an atonement? All that is necessary is to leave him alone in his own evolutionary development and he will finally come out all right. The atonement, therefore, if such be the case, is theologically and philosophically absurd.

First Man a Savage Is Inconceivable

I have always preferred the sanity of the views entertained by the Duke of Argyll with reference to man's primitive condition. He says:

That the first man should have been a savage, with instincts and dispositions perverted as they are never perverted among the beasts, is a supposition impossible and inconceivable.

With arguments so deeply founded on the analogies of nature in favor of the conclusion that the first man, though a child in acquired knowledge, must from the first have had instincts and intuitions in harmony with his origin and with his destiny, we must demand the clearest proof from those who assume that he could have had no conception of a Divine Being, and that this was an idea which could only be acquired in time from staring at things too big for him to measure, and from wondering at things too distant for him to reach. Not even his powers could extract from such things that which they did not contain. But in his own personality, fresh from the hand of Nature—in his own Spirit just issuing from the fountains of its birth—in his own will, willing according to the law of its creation—in his own desire of knowledge—in his own sense of obligation—in his own wonder and reverence and awe—he had all the elements to enable him at once to apprehend, thought not to comprehend, the Infinite Being who was the Author of his own.

Scholars who have begun their search into the origin of religion in the full acceptance of what may be called the savage theory of the origin of man—who, captivated by a plausible generalization, had taken it for granted that the farther back we go in time the more certainly do we find all religion assuming one or other of the gross and idolatrous forms which have been indiscriminately grouped under the designation of fetichism—have been driven from this belief by discovering to their surprise that facts do not support the theory. They have found, on the contrary, that up to the farthest limits which are reached by the records which are properly historical, and far beyond those limits to the remotest distance which is attained by evidence founded on the analysis of human speech, the religious conceptions of men are seen, as we go back in time, to have been not coarser and coarser, but simpler, purer, higher—so that the very oldest conceptions of the Divine Being of which we have any certain evidence are the simplest and the best of all.

Purer Nearer the Source

The instinct of perfection, then, the moral impulses, the help of God which accompanies these, must have been as great and as clear to man in the beginning as to-day. As Max Muller has so conclusively and convincingly shown in his comparative study of religions, the process of evolution as applied to religion is just the process of corruption; and the nearer we get to the source of religion the freer do we find it from the corruptions that characterize its later history.

Unless some idea of God had been part of the original dowry of the human soul, religion would have been a thing impossible; for explain the religious instinct as we may, we shall never explain it by evolution. For that cannot possibly be an explanation which yields no first origin or cause for what it assumes to explain; and if anything is to be evolved in an orderly manner from the resident forces of primordial matter it must first have been involved through the creative act of the Divine Being.

In my opinion, this tremendous factor of involution completely eclipses and entirely subordinates the factor of evolution.

Physical Evolution Rendered Largely Obsolete

Since the general acceptance by science of the electronic base of nature it seems to me that physical evolution has been rendered largely obsolete. Professor Larkin has written very extensively upon this fascinating subject and the following is quoted from one of his articles:

Science, even of the highest recent type, does not know what anything is, or how any act of nature is performed or why. But it knows that nothing exists but electrons. Electrons either know of themselves how to assemble into revolution around each other thus to form atoms of the ninety-two kinds at present known to chemists; or are directed how, by external mind. The process of atom building is absolutely mental. If mind is in the electrons, then the entire physical universe consists of mind manifested as electrons. If outside, then mind is the creator, since electrons, in order to be, have been created, had to be thought of before creation. There is no use of denying this, for the word create is primordial and prehistoric in human speech. In my science chambers, I show by illustrated lectures that the word create was in full use when the first light of history appears.

Mind created life, and not life mind. Living creatures assemble matter around their forms or shapes; but form, shape, model, pattern, or design, these all are thought specifications. The shape of a man had to be thought of first. And this solid fact at once completely upsets, overthrows, and forever wipes out the theories of evolution as taught by Lamarck, Wallace, Darwin, and the vast multitude of their congeners, coadjutors, and imitators, together with the mutation hypothesis of Doctor Vries. For all traces of change in the sidereal universe are in preceding mind. This incessant harping about natural selection, variation, and mutation is about ended. All these are in antecedent mind. Argue as these people may, they cannot upset the fact of creation and creation by mind.

Only mind is eternal; matter is not, because all matter is assembled electrons. The mind that created electrons is able to take them apart, and thus end the entire material universe. This idea of building and disintegrating the universe of matter is one of the oldest in literature. The Bhagavad Gita mentions it.

Physiologists tell us that all the substances which compose our bodies, pass away into vapor and others take their places: That our bodies are mere aggregations of molecules which are never long composed of the same molecules, because molecules are retiring before other molecules incessantly. It was upon this concept that Tyndall predicated his supposition of life. He says:

Supposing, then, the molecules of the human body, instead of replacing others, and thus renewing a preexisting form, to be gathered first hand from nature and put together in the same relative positions as those which they occupy in the body. Supposing them to have the selfsame forces and distribution of motions, would this organized concourse of molecules stand before us as a sentient, thinking being? There seems no valid reason to believe that it would not.

An Established Order in God's Creations

While it may be regarded as a fine conceit on the part of physiologists to expect some day to test the completeness and correctness of their investigations by the artificial creation of life, it is at least within the prospect of belief that what a man of science like Tyndall could suppose possible, certainly God, if he chose, could accomplish in fact. Such a supposition is not at all illogical nor unscriptural and it would greatly illuminate the somewhat obscure account of man's creation given in the Mosaic narrative if this method of creation were accepted. There would then be no logical necessity for evolution. This does not mean that there would be no natural law of progress, but merely that it is not the same that is affirmed in the "Naturalistic" doctrine. Throughout the whole process of creation there was an orderly progress from lower to higher forms of matter and life and there is an established order in all the Creator's work. But Progress is the advance of any being or order of beings from a state of imperfection towards such perfection as it is capable of. The advance is within itself, it still remaining the same being or order of beings. Progress, then, is the improvement of anything within its own class and does not contemplate a transition of a being or order of beings out of itself into another. It does not mean a displacement and a substitution—another thing in its stead—but a bettering of the thing itself.

The inquiry, therefore, as to whether God created lower species in any realm of nature, for the sake of the further production of higher ones out of them; whether it is in the divine plan at all that orders of existence shall ever pass beyond the bounds of their class and mix up in kind—is an inquiry which does not touch the doctrine of progress, but it does vitally concern the question of man's redemption.

"An Empirical Generalization"

Mr. Spencer calls evolution "an empirical generalization" but no generalization from experience ever gave man the idea of perfection, for it could not be generalized from the imperfect. It is the instinct of perfection in man's soul that gives it the prompting to achieve the perfect in anything: he has a tendency to progress because he has a tendency to realize his ideals.

All art is the endeavor to realize in material forms and colors an idea of beauty latent in the human soul from the beginning. Hence the true artist is the one who gives expression through the medium of metal, wood, stone, or pigment to the things which we impotently see. The same is true of music: both have their origin in the realm of the ideal and require the master's touch to body them forth. The beauty and impressiveness of a picture or statue are things separate and apart from the mere canvas or marble. So it is with the religiosity of man. There are certain facts of human history and experience that bear witness to an essential relation of the hu-

The Dream of Pilate's Wife

By Edwin Markham. One of the readings suggested for reunion programs.

"When he was set down on the judgment seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him. When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it."—Matthew 27: 19, 24.

You cannot wash your hands of this: that crimson would defy

The many waters of the sea, the cisterns of the sky.

His blood will be upon your name; nor years can wash it white—

Not till the leaping seas shall wash the great stars from the night.

You say the Galilean only dreams a foolish dream,

That he is but an idle leaf upon an idle stream.

No, he is the Man of the People, hated by scribe and priest: He is the fear at the Temple door, the specter at the feast.

Shall the whispering house of Annas draw down upon your head

The hatred of the future and the shadow of the dead?

Why palter with this priestly crew? They hold a long intent:

When the wheels of the street have pity will the hearts of the priests relent.

You say you fear Tiberius—you fear the roar of Rome:

But this man is to Cæsar as a sea-rock is to foam.

Whoever turns from this man's truth, he takes the thorns for bed,

He plows the seas for gardens, and he sows the sand for bread.

man soul to the infinite—that are the attempts, more or less imperfect, to give expression and realization to that latent consciousness of an Infinite Being and Life which is bound up with every man's nature as a rational and spiritual being.

Virchow tried to prevent the introduction of evolution as an approved science in the schools of Germany. In one of his lectures he said he "would teach evolution if it were only proven; it is, as yet, in the hypothetical stage; the audience ought to be warned that the speculative is only the possible, not actual truth; that it belongs to the region of belief, and not to that of demonstration. As long as a problem continues in the speculative stage, it would be mischievous to teach it in our schools. We ought not to represent our conjecture as a certainty, nor our hypothesis as a doctrine."

Is it, after all, possible to get any such proof of evolution as shall seriously modify our religious concepts? I think not; but what say you?

Oh, let the Galilean go, strike off his cruel bond:

Behold that fathomless silence and those eyes that look beyond.

There's more than mortal in that face—than earthly in this hour:

The fate that now is in the bud will soon be in the flower.

O Pilate, I have suffered many things in dream to-day,

Because of this strange teacher of the strait and mystic way:

I saw him hanging on a cross, where the stones of Golgoth are;

Then laid, at last, in a guarded tomb, under the evening star.

I saw him rise again one dawn and down a garden go,

Shining like great Apollo white, our god of the silver bow:

And then the wind of vision tore the veil of time apart,

And love of him ran greatening from camel-path to mart;

His story was a wonder on the eager lips of men,

The scourged Galilean walked the roads of earth again.

I saw Jerusalem go down before the wrath of spears,

And turn into a field of stones under the trampling years.

All these fair towers and walls went down, with a great and terrible cry,

While signs and portents threw on earth their shadows from the sky,

Where spectral warriors strode the clouds like giant cherubim,

Going to battle in the night, now glorious, now dim.

Then whispers wild; the shout of crazing prophets on the street;

The wail of mothers by their dead; the sound of running feet;

And then the Temple reddened up, and stood, a cone of flame;

Then ashes, and Jerusalem had withered to a name.

World-battles roared around this man, the world's mysterious king;

But over the storm of the ages I could hear the seven stars sing.

Rome crumbled and I heard a voice across the ruin laugh:

A Power had risen on the world, shaking the thrones as chaff.

And down the ages ran your name, a byword and a jeer:

"He suffered under Pilate!" sounded ever in my ear.

The deeds of some are clean forgot, but yours did breathe and live;

Some are forgiven in the end, but none could you forgive.

Additions to List of District Organizers

Appointments of the following district organizers have been made since the publication of the list in HERALD of February 22. These appointments have been made with the concurrence and approval of the First Presidency, and the Saints should feel it a pleasant duty to assist, encourage, and support these women wherever and whenever it is possible. The service given is often, even under the most favorable conditions, both difficult and arduous to women who have the care and responsibilities of home and family, or other already heavy duties, but through proper cooperation and sympathetic assistance they will be able to accomplish definite things in the way of uplift and betterment. The work entrusted to the Women's Department by the church is worthy the loyal support and attention of all, which we bespeak in hearty measure for those sisters who have accepted responsibilities of a district or local character.

Influence of the Mouth and Teeth Upon the General Health

(Fourth of Four Articles.)

Your mouth and your teeth are very important factors in your health. This fact is now recognized by practically all medical men, dentists, and scientists.

The late Sir William Osler said: "There is not one single thing in preventive medicine that equals mouth hygiene and the preservation of the teeth." Doctor E. C. Rosenow, of the famous Mayo Clinic, says: "It seems to me that a public mouth propaganda is badly needed, that people may be fully informed of the dangers to their continued health that may arise from infected teeth, and may learn how to avoid them; prophylaxis should be the watchword."

All prominent authorities agree that ninety per cent of disease germs gain access to the blood stream from the teeth and jaws. The teeth being the only organs of the body which are not automatically restored or renewed are more liable to harbor disease than other organs which are automatically rebuilt about every seven years.

Teeth possessing live, healthy pulps or nerves are seldom a menace to the health, but on the other hand, teeth deprived of this important organ, either mechanically or by disease, are almost always a source of danger. Uninterrupted decay of a tooth gradually involves the pulp or nerve, causing its subsequent death and putrefaction. The dissemination of this infected material through the blood vessels adjacent to the roots of the teeth and thence throughout the body may be the direct cause of such diseases as rheumatism, sciatica, neuralgia, neuritis, chronic headache, etc., and indirectly may be responsible for such diseases as Bright's disease, diabetes, and disease of the liver, kidneys, gall bladder, stomach, intestines, and heart. Inflammation and suppuration of the gums supporting tissues of the teeth may also be responsible for any of the above mentioned diseases, owing to the infected material being forced into the blood vessels and carried through the system until it lodges in some susceptible organ or tissue. All of these so-called focal infections arising either from the diseased roots of teeth or from so-called pyorrheal conditions of the gums and supporting

Book of Mormon Confirmed by Chippewa Traditions

[In a personal letter accompanying the following article, Brother Joseph A. Northrup, who is a Chippewa Indian and was recently baptized in Minnesota, expresses the new hope that his people may speedily accept the restored gospel and again become a delightful people.]

He has visited old Indians in different places and finds their stories all the same regarding God and things as they were among the Indians before the coming of the white man. His daily work prevents his giving all the time he would like to this research. But so far as he has gone he finds that these people retain some of the fundamental truths in the Book of Mormon. He adds that it is his present desire to labor among his people, not so much for citizenship as before, but to bring to them the restored gospel message.—EDITORS.]

In this short letter it is not our purpose to extol the virtues or condemn the shortcomings of the Chippewa Indian Medawin or society, but to glance at a few of the outstanding features on doctrines of this native form of worship, for worship it is; it recognizes one God.

Since the old Chippewa priests claim it was ordained of God, we have compared its teachings with the Book of Mormon and find some startling facts that corroborate.

We must remember this worship of Giji Munido, or God, was practiced here on this continent before Columbus discovered my country and people.

The Chippewas knew of those Nephites which the Book of Mormon tells us were left here on earth, even before the Pilgrim Fathers made a landing on the bleak New England coast.

In their religious ceremonies the Meda-wa-tig, or cross, occupies the most central place.

They claim that Giji Munido made the first man out of earth or dust and blew the breath of life or soul upon him, structures of the teeth, may exist for considerable lengths of time without giving rise to any bad symptoms, but just as soon as one's vitality or resistance is lowered they attack the weakest part. Radical measures then have to be resorted to, such as the extraction of the offending teeth.

Most of these menacing conditions of the teeth and gums are caused by early neglect and are absolutely controllable if taken in time. Clean teeth rarely decay, and if a child is taught to keep its teeth thoroughly brushed and is brought up on food which is hard and coarse enough to compel thorough mastication, and which does not contain an excess of starchy and sugary materials, tooth troubles should be reduced to a minimum.

Few of us would care to eat food from a dirty plate or dish, and yet it would do us just as much harm to put clean food into a dirty mouth, for in both cases the food is contaminated before it reaches the stomach.

The aim of dentistry to-day is prevention. By having one's teeth examined two or three times a year from early childhood, it should be possible to avoid having fillings inserted large enough to endanger the health of the teeth.

A prominent medical authority says: "Infections which are most hazardous to general health usually cause no local manifestation of pain. Major operation will decline fifty per cent when the majority of the people have their mouths cleaned up of focal infection and when proper dental prophylaxis is generally accepted and adopted."

that the body returns to earth and the soul, or Ochi-chog, lives on or dies, according to the life it has lived.

Perhaps this is all that is left of the religion that was established on this continent after the death and resurrection of our Lord in Palestine, for it is said after this religion was established happy was the state of the people. Everyone loved his neighbors; there were no rich and no poor; all things were held in common; there was plenty for all; the seasons were mild. In fact, peace was upon the land. But after a time the Evil One got control of the majority of the people and then came wars and misery, even the teachers or priests beginning to practice the black art or Che-suk-ki-win. And even to this day there are priests who seem to work miracles!

It is possible that the first people degenerated in this land, for we have only to look at so-called Christianity today to see how the evil one perverts men's minds with the dazzle of riches and power!

The folklore of the Chippewa is built around kings, beautiful princesses, soldiers with horses, swords and lances; great cities are mentioned, and so are gold and silver, all of which tends to show that these remnants of a once mighty civilized people retain some memory of their past splendor!

While their tradition is interesting to anyone, to those of us who believe in the Book of Mormon the legends of the Medawin priesthood will be added proof that truly God works in a mysterious manner.

On account of lack of space, we will not go deeply into the origin of this ancient order. It was ordained of God, or Giji Munido, and its main theme was life here on earth and the hereafter. But it also lays important stress upon the fact that Giji Munido left three men, or Gi-shik-go-wi-ni-wak, here on earth to protect the Chippewas.

Our legends state that these three Nephites appeared and gave help and advice to the Chippewa in times of famine or sickness, taught them the use of herbs for medicine, etc., before the coming of the whites, and even up to this day there are old fellows who speak with reverence of the appearance of one or more of these men, always as a great light, with beautiful white faces, ever on a mission of love and mercy.

To cite one instance, while Minnesota was still an infant in the great family of States and Duluth only a small trading post, the white man's doctors were few and far between. The Chippewa depended mostly upon their winter's catch for their livelihood. Their camps were scattered throughout the then virgin forests along the streams and banks of lakes. One of these families was encamped on Kettle River where the present town of Rutledge now stands. This family consisted of the man, his wife, and two little girls.

One day the father came home after a weary tramp along his line of traps and found his oldest child very sick. In a few days it died with the strange choking disease. On the same day the other and only child was down with the same dread symptoms. This man was a firm believer in Medawin, the only form of worship he ever knew up to that time. In vain they gave the child native medicine, but the little one was dying faster than the first one. When they had lost all hope, the father sat with bowed head praying to Giji Munido, the Author of life. Suddenly the wigwam was filled with a strange light; a vision appeared and motioned to him to give the child water. At that instant all fear left the father's heart, for he knew this was one of the Gi-shik-go-wi-ni-wak (one of the Nephites) of whom the Medawin priests had spoken. By signs he was made to understand the child would be well in three days. Then the vision disappeared and from that moment the child began to get well.

In three days it was playing around as usual. That man was my wife's grandfather; the child is her mother, who is still living.

Our traditions speak of the flood when nearly all life was destroyed by Giji Munido, but one family. True, learned men will tell us that the Mediterranean Valley was flooded in the Neolithic age, also that man is descended from a sort of monkey. Still they have not been able to establish beyond a doubt just why their theory is correct. They have also failed to find what they call the remains of the pre-man in America.

But to us who believe in the Book of Mormon, the coming to light of important connections in these legends and folklore of the Indian people and the fact stated in the Book will give hope that these people will gladly receive the restored gospel message and will in these last days become again a delightful people. All glory to God.

Independence

The Twelve remaining in the vicinity of Independence have been busy the past week meeting with the priesthood of the various stakes. U. W. Greene and T. W. Williams were in Lamoni meeting with the class in Religious Education discussing missions with different members of the class, urging the importance of foreign mission work, and also meeting with the priesthood on Wednesday evening for the same purpose. John W. Rushton and J. F. Curtis were in Saint Joseph Monday and Tuesday for the like purpose of meeting with the priesthood of that stake and urging the importance of foreign missions. After the work in Lamoni, Elder Williams and Paul M. Hanson left for Canada where they expect to be kept busy for several weeks attending to matters of church work.

John W. Rushton returned to Independence in time to deliver the commencement address for the Junior High School on Thursday, the 25th. He remained over to deliver the like address for the Independence Institute and Nurses' class on Monday evening, the 29th, but left the following day for his home in Los Angeles, which he expects to reach in time for the graduation from the Teachers' College of his daughter Dorothy, the first week in June.

Bishop B. R. McGuire was able to come to the office by Friday, the 26th, to sign some necessary documents. He did not remain and should doubtless have a continued rest for a few weeks. But those who know him were very glad to see his smiling face again and meet the firm clasp of his hand.

A handsaw duet was given at Religio last Friday night, by Harold Edwards and Kenneth Thompson, who with violin bows on the backs of common carpenter's saws of standard make produced beautiful treble and alto effects resembling violins, but with less hollow quality of tone. They played a medley of popular religious and other songs of slow movement. The handle was held firmly between the player's knees. One hand grasped the tip of the saw and by bending the blade changed the tone. The other hand wielded the bow and found its positions. Evidently no community need be without an orchestra when such good music can be had without instruments.

Outdoor motion pictures begin on the church lawn on the evening of June 3 with the film entitled, "In Old Kentucky," put on by the Religio. This is the first of the series for the summer season, given free, and supported by collection at the time the films are shown.

The recreational committee has in shape the tennis courts on West Lexington just off the car line near Fuller, and have also arranged for a ball game on the recreational ground on West Walnut every Saturday afternoon.

The American Medical Association met in Saint Louis May 22 to 26, and Doctors G. L. Harrington, John R. Green, and Stanley Green were in attendance from the Sanitarium staff. Doctor B. A. Greer was also in attendance from Lamoni and visited the previous week in Saint Louis several important clinics which were arranged for the benefit of visiting physicians.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium during the week ending May 27: Mr. Samuel Brooks, Kansas City, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Mrs. Mildred Wetmore, Mrs. Lillian Lamb, Mrs. Anna Taylor, and Mrs. Charles May. X-ray patients: Mrs. Mabel Underwood, Pittsfield, Illinois; Mrs. Minnie Akers, Bayfield, Colorado; Mrs. Grace Vredenburg, Lamoni, Iowa; and Edith Ehrenhardt, John E. Lewis, and J. V. Endicott, all of Independence.

President Elbert A. Smith expects to be in Lamoni to deliver the baccalaureate for Graceland College June 4. Walter W. Smith and wife expect to attend the Graceland commencement, as he will deliver the address to the Lamda Delta Sigma Society on Tuesday, the 6th.

The Independence Music Club closed its work for the year with a reception at W. W. Smith's on the 23d and a luncheon on the 26th.

The Nurses' Training School of the Independence Sanitarium, and the Independence Institute of Arts and Sciences held joint commencement exercises on Monday evening, the 29th. Helene Barr Fleet, Lettie A. Ralston, Carrie Dean Russell, and Vida Mae Sutterfield graduated as nurses. The Normal Kindergarten-Primary Training presented the following for graduation: Emma Bertha Constance, Zella Eunice Hill, Mabel Morant, Edith May Troughton. The Normal Religious Education class presented Abbie Wingate Horton. Sister Horton is far past eighty years of age, but she is one of the most devoted students of the Institute.

Sunday, the 28th, was an excellent day and the church was well filled for all services. President Elbert A. Smith delivered the baccalaureate sermon to the Nurses' Training class and the Independence Institute in the morning in his inimitable style. In the evening the members of the priesthood met early and furnished the half hour song service, 7.30 to 8, in a most acceptable manner. The evening sermon was by Elder John W. Rushton assisted by J. Arthur Gillen, who has recently returned from England. Elder Rushton brought the indictment of the fifth chapter of Jeremiah against the world of to-day.

Bisbee, Arizona

A special business meeting of the branch was held May 21 for the purpose of arranging for a series of tent meetings to be held in Warren, beginning June 4. Committees were elected for erecting the tent, arranging advertising matter, and the distribution of handbills. Provision was also made for the drafting of a petition for raising funds for the meetings. Brother K. H. Rogers, missionary for Arizona, will be with us for this campaign, and will locate his family in Warren for the summer. Five hundred tracts of the Busy Man's Series have been received for distribution.

Several new books have been added to our Sunday school library of late, some of them being gifts from friends and some purchased by the library board. The birthday offerings and fines collected on overdue books supply the fund with which new books are purchased.

We had two very interesting and beneficial sermons, May 21, by Elder E. R. Davis. Subject in the morning was, "Our interest in the saving of souls." Evening subject, "The building of a life." There was an exceptionally good attendance at evening service. MRS. J. R. ENYART.

Trenton, Missouri

Last Sunday (14th) was a busy day at the Trenton Branch. Sunday school was well attended. P. F. Chappell, superintendent, is taking a deep interest in the same. The sermon at eleven by J. D. Proffit was very inspiring and uplifting, his subject being, "The higher life."

R. S. Salyards, stake president, was with us in the evening service, having arrived from Jamesport, Missouri, where he visited with the Saints, delivering to them a sermon at eleven o'clock that day. He reports that a few of the Saints south of Jamesport are very enthusiastic, and are very anxious either to buy a small church, or build one. The enthusiasm that they portray, perhaps would justify them in doing so, as they are in need of a place to meet. Brother Salyards has taken this subject under advisement. He preached for us in the evening, and gave us quite an interesting sketch of some of his experiences, and some good advice which was very helpful to the Saints.

On Thursday night the Women's Department met with Sister Amelia Archibald. There were seven ladies outside of the church present, three of them giving in their names for membership. Subjects such as better homes, care of children, and the more hearty cooperation of neighbors in the keeping of back yards clean and beautifying lawns are being discussed. BRANCH SECRETARY.

Bevier, Missouri

Last fall Elder C. E. Wight, of Lamoni, Iowa, held a series of young people's meetings here. While here he visited the public school and made a short address to the pupils; it seems that the address made an impression on both the teachers and students. When it came to choosing a speaker for the high school commencement services, Brother Wight's name was the only one considered, so on the 19th, he delivered the commencement address to the class of fourteen who were graduating from the high school.

The services were held at the First Congregational church, which is the largest church in Bevier. The building was crowded and Brother Wight delivered an inspiring address, his subject being: "Enduring investments." The pith of the argument was that it is not what we get out of life for our own selfish purposes, but what we put into life, and service to our fellow man that are the most enduring investments. Brethren F. T. Mussell and V. D. Ruch were asked to deliver the invocation and benediction at different exercises.

The address has been highly commended by those who heard it. Sister Mary Francis Jones was one of the graduates. Sister Mary also rendered a beautiful solo in a highly creditable manner.

The Northeastern Missouri district conference will convene at Macon, June 10 and 11. The work throughout the district has shown an improvement and greater interest to hear the word, than for some years.

There are fifty-five members living at and near Macon. They have a very neat brick church building, but are not organized as a branch as yet. They are sorely in need of an elder. At present the services are being conducted under the priesthood of Bevier Branch and visiting ministry. Macon would be a good town for an elder to locate in. It is the county seat of Macon County, has a population of about five thousand, is a good business town, and is surrounded by a good agricultural country and coal mining industry.

The miners of Bevier have been idle since April 1, on account of the miners' strike. Most of our members at Bevier are coal miners and depend on that industry for a living. It will be a great advancement for the world at large when some other means will be found to settle labor and working conditions.

J. L. WILLIAMS.

Seattle, Washington

As a branch we sustained a great loss in our musical department by the removal of Sister Sarah Barney. She was both capable and dependable and always added to the deep spiritual impression of the services. Her daughter, Sister Gale Waite, is also missed from the Sunday school work. They moved to Alderwood Manor, Washington.

Sister Florence Laing Love, our new chorister, is giving splendid service in choir work. She is assisted in the work by Sister Daisy Oliver as organist. They are being well supported in their work.

Our sacramental service was well attended. We noticed Saints from Bremerton, Auburn, and Kent in attendance. The testimonies indicated a firmness of faith and desire to press onward.

Our Everett Saints have become tired of paying rent and being driven about, so have bought a lot and lumber and have a neat church, twenty-four by thirty-six, about inclosed. The work is donated and that largely by nonmembers, but we trust they soon will be members. A trusting young man, not as yet a member, is financing the movement. We hope for them great success. They deserve it.

Brother Samuel Stearns, our faithful Everett elder, has lately baptized three in his mission and others are standing at the door awaiting courage to enter.

The name of Henry Steel was omitted from the names of the reunion committee of our Centralia reunion, August 11 to 20. The other names are Harold Premo, Sister Jessie Ward, George Steel, and Deck Obrist. They propose to give the district one of its best reunions.

Arrangements are being perfected for a successful reunion in every particular. A restaurant will be on the ground with all possible accommodations. Tents may be ordered at any time; the price will be given later. The usual entertainment on Friday evening, August 18, promises to be an intellectual, spiritual, entertaining affair. Sister Jennie Jones, our district superintendent, and Brother G. R. Brundage, Religio field worker, will have it in charge.

Our sisters are busy in their line of work. Through the efforts of Sister Jennie Jones, our organizer, a regular demonstration and lecture are held in basement of church in "Red Cross" work. An enjoyable supper was recently served for fathers and sons, and was made an enjoyable affair. Willing hands and true hearts bring to pass much towards the perfecting of the Saints.

Brother S. S. Smith worshiped with us on Wednesday night on his way to Centralia and environment, largely to perfect arrangements for a splendid reunion. Plan your vacation to attend and help make it a success. We expect a "good elder" from headquarters.

Any inquiry concerning any feature of the reunion will be willingly answered by the undersigned, or referred to proper department.

J. M. TERRY.

3625½ Second Avenue, Northwest.

Saint Louis, Missouri

Since the dedication of our church was reported by the HERALD editorially, we will chronicle only other services of the two weeks following.

We wish the space permitted of a full report of the sermons delivered by our pastor and by Brother C. Ed. Miller. Both are local talent and the word delivered through them was satisfying. When Brother Miller talked of "The years the locust hath eaten," he told us the gospel had been the same from the beginning, that not evolution but revelation was the need of the world; that our teaching should be constructive, not destructive. Practical men, educated men, and thinking men read the Bible for the thought and the vision contained therein of a living God and a personal God.

Later he said the personality and life characteristics and sayings of Jesus could not have been conceived by ordinary mortals. His life is a proof of his divinity.

The illustrated lectures on the Book of Mormon were so entertaining as well as instructive that we wish everybody could, or shall I say would, hear them. I feel sure that many would feel as one stranger expressed herself after one sermon, "I never understood the belief of your people. It is wonderful."

The American Medical Association met in our city last week. Among those attending we noted Doctors Harrington and Green from Independence. But we did not note them among the crowd who went to the famous Cahokia Mound, or possibly they could tell better than I of the lecture given on the top of this mound and the beautiful talk by an Indian girl at the same place. This girl, so fine looking and educated, certainly was a fulfillment of the prophecy that they should become a delightsome people, and the admission by the professor that the origin of these mound builders was largely a matter of conjecture, made us wish that he, too, had heard the Book of Mormon lectures.

Joseph Smith brought to the world the only logical solution of this great problem, and it is not wonderful to our people that John Quincy Adams should have predicted that in some future generation Joseph Smith would be referred to as the greatest influence of the nineteenth century.

Brother Archibald has preached such comforting and convincing funeral sermons that strangers present on such occasions have remarked they never heard such fine sermons and such wonderful doctrine. His sermon, "The dead shall live," was a series of wonderful and beautiful thoughts along these lines, and as all his discourses, it bore the imprint of sincerity, study, and spirituality.

On Wednesday, Sister Hunt, of Independence, gave a talk to the Women's Department meeting, convincing us that fellowship, development, and loyalty should guide us in our work and aims for the greatest good. Sister Hunt will address the women's meeting at our conference session Sunday afternoon.

Brother C. Ed. Miller also gave the sisters a very practical talk on dress, culture, and—most important—decorum in the church. We hope it will have the desired effect.

The attendance at these meetings has been very good, but the illustrated lectures brought the largest crowds.

Saturday afternoon the Religio and Sunday school institute was very fine, and our young people are to be congratulated on the good material presented. It shows growth and development in their work. Sunday morning the district was well represented at the conference. Sister Mary Parrish was also with us. She now lives in Detroit.

MISCELLANEOUS

Concerning Ministers Released From Appointment

The following resolution was adopted by the Joint Council, May 13, 1922:

Resolved that the following be the action of this body, and that same be published in the SAINTS' HERALD:

The industrial depression of the past year has affected the church finances to such an extent that it has become imperative that retrenchment be made.

The Joint Council, comprising the First Presidency, Quorum of Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric, after reviewing the situation have found it necessary to adopt measures, including the release of a number of men from the ministerial force, some of whom have been under general appointment for a number of years. In order that there may be no misapprehension, we wish to state that in every instance the brethren so released have been notified that the church will care for the family needs in such cases where this may be required.

Pastoral Notices

To the Saints of Eastern Montana District: At our last conference it was decided that instead of holding the reunion, the district officers and missionary in charge should visit each local branch and hold a three-day meeting. These visits will be made upon the following dates: Golden Valley, Opheim, June 23 to 25; Glasgow, June 27 to 29; Vida, July 1 to 3, conference; Andes, July 5 to 7; Fairview, July 9 to 11. Effort is being made to arrange for a visiting official from our church headquarters, so we should lose no opportunity of advertising these dates throughout each local and vicinity. There will probably be two Ford cars loaded with officers and visiting members of the district and we are trying to prepare an entertainment for one evening. Any desiring further information may write Eli Bronson, district president, Glasgow, Montana, or the district secretary. May we all unite our prayers for the success of these coming efforts. Earl Wilcox, secretary, Box 174, Glasgow, Montana.

Citizen's Military Training Camps

The Government has just announced arrangements for military camps to be held this summer. Attendance is entirely voluntary, and for those without previous military training, includes the age limit of 17 to 25.

There are two other courses for those with previous military training according to the amount of such training. The actual age limit for all applicants is 35 years.

All expenses are paid, including an allowance of five cents per mile for railroad fare. Physical examination is undertaken, recreation provided, as well as all equipment and uniforms.

Retire Early

Recently we received a letter from one not a member of the church who said that he wished his wife were a Latter Day Saint so that she would follow our advice and go to bed in time and not sit up late reading papers and burning oil and give her body more sufficient rest.

This raises the question, How many Latter Day Saints are observing this command? It is clear-cut and definite; the reason is very plainly given. It may be taken as part of our Word of Wisdom. Are we keeping it as a church that we may profit thereby?

John D. Nutting Has a Preference

The Reverend John D. Nutting has a preference. In fact, he has made a definite choice. Who is the Reverend John D. Nutting? What is his preference? Listen! The Reverend John D. Nutting is editor and manager of Light on Mormonism. He has long been active in what is known as the Utah Gospel Mission. Whether or not this new periodical, Light on Mormonism, is the headlight or taillight of that institution, we cannot say, as we do not know the direction the thing is going. Probably, like most such organizations, it is going after contributions, in which event the periodical may be a searchlight. Be that as it may, in the benign rays of the first number we discover John D. Nutting's preference.

Now for the preference: On page three of Number One of Volume One of Light on Mormonism there appears an article entitled "Different kinds of Mormonism." It is devoted mainly to a dissertation on Utah Mormonism (or Brighamism) and the Reorganized Church (or the "eastern branch" as the writer terms it). From that article we reproduce the following:

Each of these branches on the one tree denies that the other is true at all! Both are as much Mormons as either; see any dictionary. If we had to be either we would have to be of its Utah kind, because they hold to polygamy as "revelation" of their former "prophet," which is the truth beyond question, as much as any other "revelation." The eastern kind have been influenced largely by their Christian surroundings, and are personally and in their literature somewhat higher than those in the West. But the system is one; and no Christian can fellowship either and be true to his Lord. The eastern kind, by denying that they are Mormons at all, are able to put many people off their guard and make victims of them; hence these are if possible now the more to be guarded against."

Alas; we did not know in time that the Reverend Nutting had thought of joining either of the churches; but it seems that he has given the matter quite serious consideration, sufficiently so that he has reached a definite conclusion. He has made his choice and the choice is of sufficient importance in his opinion to be published in the first number of his paper.

We were surprised to learn that he thought of honoring either of the churches with his membership. We are a hospitable people and hold to the old adage that "While the light holds out to burn," etc., etc.—but just as we have opened the front door a wee bit and have the water running into the baptismal font and are about to ascertain if Brother Nutting has truly repented, we hear his footsteps dying away towards the West, towards Utah, and we learn that never under any circumstances could he join the Reorganized Church. Life is hard enough at best without such bitter disappointments; but we shall have to bear our lot bravely. However, we are inclined to be philosophical and we conclude that the kind of a man who would prefer to join the Utah Church for the reasons that Nutting sets forth is the kind of man that we would prefer should join that church.

We may now give a little consideration to the reasons that seem to have influenced him towards this preference. And his preference is so positively stated, that he "would have to be of the Utah kind," that it reminds us of his old Congregational doctrine of predestination. Is it possible that his cogitations, his conclusions and preferences, are but the inevitable unfolding of predestination speeding him towards his ultimate goal in the great West?

We note the reasons for his preference: "If we had to be either, we would have to be of its Utah kind, because they hold to polygamy, the revelation of their former prophet, which is true beyond question as any other revelation." If he is to join either church it must be the Utah Church because they believe in polygamy. The question as to whether the doctrine came through Joseph Smith cuts comparatively little figure. That question is exceedingly secondary in importance. The primary question with us and most thinking men has always been as to the character of the doctrine itself. Yet here is a man who (quite disregarding the character of the doctrine) says that if he were to join either church it would be the Utah Church, because they hold to polygamy. This statement hardly needs any comment. The bashful Ole is said to have asked his sweetheart, Olga, to marry him. He received such a positive and sudden "Yes" in reply that it quite took his breath away. After he had sat in stony silence for some thirty minutes, Olga said, "Why don't you say something, Ole?" And Ole replied, "I tank dere ban too much said already." We are quite sure that Reverend Nutting's friends will feel that he has said too much already.

Our position has always been clear. The passenger train is held up for the fast mail. The missive has more deference than the man. The message takes precedence over the carrier. So in religious matters. The prophetic message is more important than the prophet. Judge the message on its merits. If we were to admit that Joseph Smith bore the message of polygamy (which we by no means do) we would still scrutinize the message first and most carefully and reject it because it is bad. But John D. Nutting prefers a church that would accept a bad doctrine out of deference to a man. Well, as we have said, the man who is capable of such preference is the sort of man that we would prefer should favor others with his preference.

But let us proceed and note further reasons for the Nutting preference. "The eastern kind have been influenced largely by their Christian surroundings and are personally and in their literature somewhat higher than those in the West." All this seems to have been considered carefully by the Reverend Nutting in making his choice. But altogether, his decision having been made and published and reasons assigned, we begin to "perk up" a little, if you will pardon the expression, because, after all, of the three parties concerned—the Utah Church, the Reverend Nutting, and ourselves, the only one upon which any credit is reflected in the decision is the Reorganized Church. The Utah Church is set forth as being polygamous, as being less Christian, lower personally and in its literature than the Reorganized Church. Those assertions reflect no credit upon the Utah Church. Reverend Nutting then says that of the two he prefers the Utah Church, which certainly reflects no credit upon him. But we do get the small credit of being higher personally and in our literature than the Utah Church, and the very great credit of being monogamous in our belief and of having been very greatly influenced by Christian surroundings and ideals.

Of course when first learning the Reverend Nutting's preference, the kindly-hearted and accommodating reader will begin to ask himself, "Can we modify in any way so that there may be a possibility of a reconsideration on the part of the Reverend Mr. Nutting, that the church may not always be deprived of his membership and fellowship and be doomed to live a miserable existence without the light of his benign countenance and the blessing of his presence and favor?" But after mature consideration we must all conclude that heavy though the penalty be, we cannot modify in any way to meet his standards. We cannot accept polygamy. We will not renounce the good things that have come to us because of the influence of Christian surroundings and ideals. We do not care to lower ourselves either personally or to degrade and debase our literature. Hence the matter is hopeless—unless, indeed, the Reverend Nutting himself shall make a change.

If the time comes presently, when choosing between two churches he can feel to select the one that does not believe in polygamy; if the time comes when he prefers the church that has been greatly influenced by Christian surroundings and ideals—the church that in its personnel and in its literature is higher and better, why then, still believing in the old adage, "While the light holds out to burn," etc., etc.—we will open the door, fill the baptismal font, and ascertain if the Reverend Nutting has truly repented.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

Our Social Problem and the Forum

Each writer expresses his own opinion.

There probably is no other question of so wide an interest to the members of our church at this time as is the social and economic solution to the problem confronting the world at this time, including stewardship and the establishment of Zion. We are inclined to doubt if any other two or three topics together would excel, if they would equal, the present general interest in this problem.

It is for that reason that we have published a number of articles in the past in the Forum and that we are publishing several more at once in this and the succeeding issue. These four articles were all written quite independently of each other and without any one of the writers knowing that any others had written. It should not be necessary to add that these views present the opinions of the writer only. They do not represent the position of the church nor of the officers of the church, nor do they represent the position of the editors. This of course is shown by the heading of the Forum which reads as follows:

The Forum is a department of the HERALD intended primarily for free discussion of various questions, especially of a controversial nature, the contributions representing the views of the writer but not necessarily indorsed by the editors or the church at large.

When a question is mooted, of course it is not decided, but free discussion should add to right thinking and we sincerely hope that this will be the result, so that in the end we shall be prepared to agree all on one thing, when it is properly presented to the church for action.

That which appears in the HERALD is not the law to the church, except when it quotes the law of the church as set forth in the three books of the church in the action of General Conference, or in the action of certain quorums. The opinion of the leading officers of the church, even though not formally binding as law, naturally carry great weight. But aside from this, it is the policy of the HERALD to permit a fair consideration in the discussion of all problems to present that which is being done by others for the information of our readers, and to consider every article, not on its acceptability to the editors, but on its literary merit and value to our readers as a whole.

Certainly this does not mean, on the other hand, that we offer free space for adverse propaganda to anyone who wishes to apply. The responsibility is upon the editors to do their work to the best of their judgment and ability. We are under the further limitation that it is a religious paper and has as a primary purpose the presentation of the immediate problems before this church.

This being the case, those who write in any department as a rule express their own opinions, which should be duly considered and duly weighed by our readers. For the church should be informed in the social sciences if we are rightly to meet our own problems and rightly interpret our own social and economic program. If we are to do so we should, as Bacon points out, "read not simply in order to discuss and argue, nor in order to accept and agree, but in order that we may weigh and consider."

We therefore present in the Forum, in General Interest, and even in the editorial columns, different views held by others of social and economic problems, as well as the discussion by various of our members, in order that we may have a broader grasp of some of the difficulties and view the work in the light of what has been done and results achieved by others. This discussion is necessary for economic success, since that success depends upon the democratic support of the whole people.

Naturally it is much easier to discuss than it is to move forward and act. Naturally it is easier to criticize than it is to present a complete affirmative plan, but we believe that there is a deep-seated earnestness on the part of many of our readers to do something, to move forward, and at least to attempt a solution. We are certain that the leading officers of the church are giving both earnest and prayerful attention to this theme, and many of them, at least, are most anxious to move forward in an effective and active way. In this they are, as they should be, in fact, leaders. So that any seeming reflection upon the officers of the church, as a group or individually in any article, should be read with that in view—the earnest desire and effort of their brethren to work out a right and true solution.

When we read the articles that have appeared in the past, or which may appear in the future, in the columns of the HERALD, and especially in the Forum, it is well to consider a few fundamental factors.

Stewardship involves a trusteeship, it is true. But we must not forget that a fee simple title is not the basic title to land. For there is beyond that the allodial title, which was in England vested in the king, and in this country is vested in the State. This permits of land being taken for public use without regard to the wishes of the one holding the fee simple title. There is beyond that the fact of divine ownership, and especially that we should recognize that divine ownership.

But it is necessary that the title to land shall be placed in the name of living persons on this earth. Within that term, persons, may be included a corporation. If one receives land by a deed and covenant which cannot be broken, he can transfer or sell that land. There is no possible way that he can be prevented from selling that which he owns by a deed which cannot be broken, unless it is the possible limitation of a short-time lease in which he is specifically prevented from assigning or subletting.

In Missouri the church as such is prohibited from holding the legal title to land except for very limited purposes. At the time the law was given as set forth in Doctrine and Covenants these restrictions were greater than they are to-day. It was at one time not permissible for a clergyman to receive land by will. The bishop, as bishop, is not authorized to hold land for the church, though probably to prevent land bought with church funds being appropriated by his heirs in equity such holding would be recognized.

But if he can hold land as a steward for God, while he in fact holds the fee simple title, is it impossible that others may also hold land by the fee simple title and yet recognize their moral trusteeship under God? The land cannot be deeded to the church either as a corporation or as a church. When the bishop holds land he holds it as a man. It is true that as a steward he recognizes his responsibility to God. The particular earthly title, by the law of the land by which he holds it, is of secondary importance to that mental and moral attitude.

On the other hand, there is a grave danger in attempting to put all of the property in the hands of one man. While to-day we have a worthy bishop, it is too great a responsibility to place upon one man continuously. The early Christian church attempted it and the result was the poverty of the people. The Catholic Church directly attempted to hold, and did hold, large tracts of land. It is because of the evil arising out of the church holding the bulk of the land and then granting its use to certain church members, that the restrictions against churches so holding land have been established.

It is well also that we read our Bible a little more carefully. It is true that the 25th chapter of Leviticus states "the land shall not be sold forever, for the land is mine." That does not say that the land shall not ever be sold, for this chapter distinctly provides in detail for the selling of land. But it also provides that the land shall return at the end of fifty years. To whom? To the priest? To the Levites? To the Jewish nation? Not at all; it returns to the man and his heirs who first owned it. It returns to the tribe; it reverts to the former owner. This is not, as has been sometimes misrepresented, otherwise than a holding in fee simple by the original owner.

The Missouri law did provide, however, against any owner attempting to sell beyond the jubilee year. But even in that there is an exception. If a man sells a house within a walled city, he must redeem it within one year, or it shall be established forever to him that bought it through his generation. There is a protection here of inheritance in a return to the original owner. There is the spiritual recognition of ownership in God. There is no evidence that the deeds were made to the Lord nor that they were otherwise than were stated in the law—an individual holding in fee.

We might also possibly be permitted to suggest that while a great responsibility is placed upon the administrators of the temporal law, still it was Moses who gave the law and Joshua who took the place of Moses to lead the children of Israel into Canaan. Also that the law of the church to-day places the responsibility of leadership on the spiritual authorities of the church.

Interest

The editors have been amazed, as no doubt have our readers, with the strenuous objection made by some against interest, and then the requirement of a payment much greater than any possible interest. Personally we have had in view that the poor will be greatly assisted in the securing of land. We confess we cannot as yet see where a poor man suffers in having his payments credited on his inheritance instead of considering it an open donation. For existing conditions it would seem the better part of wisdom that the poor should be protected.

That it is possible for the poor to work together to help themselves has been shown in many successful building and loan associations. A variety of this has been announced recently in Jackson County, the loaning of money at three per cent. The plan is that each subscriber is numbered according to the order of his application. He pays one per cent each month of the amount of the loan he wishes to receive. Each month the amount which has been accumulated is distributed so far as the funds will permit in the order of application. Those who receive an advancement or loan are expected then to pay three per cent on the balance due at the beginning of each year. From this three per cent the expenses of handling are met. This would seem to be a large per cent and is for the mere purpose of handling. But if it is wisely administered, is not objectionable, for it is provided that any excess from this three per cent shall be paid into the general fund. The rate of interest becomes of but little importance so long as it is paid into the common fund for the benefit of all. The man who is first located should be able to pay in more than those who are still under the burden of rent or of mortgage.

We note that those who object most to interest are the most insistent that the excess amount he should pay should be quite in excess of legal interest. Of course this is quite justified on the principle of brotherhood, for he should assist others to the extent of his power. But how great his power will be will depend on management and many other elements which are unfortunately too often ignored.

A reason for there being a charge or interest payment and the land not given outright is that it would be unjust to permit some one to come in and get a home, and then step out without any responsibility to the others of the poor, who were contributing. When interest is suggested, when a repayment of the loan is urged, it is for the protection of the poor, those who are contributing to help to establish a fund so as to establish one another. The man who is truly converted does not need any such restrictions; but as all are not perfectly converted, it is to protect the common body and the common fund.

We ought not be unduly frightened. We sincerely hope the time is near at hand for us to advance decisively.

Russia

So far as Russia is concerned, we read regularly every week several socialist papers, as well as reading other papers. This reading has convinced us that conditions there are far from ideal. But leaving to one side the departure from democracy, leaving to one side other elements, it is well at least to consider 200,000,000 people attempting to carry out a plan. If they cannot and have not fully succeeded, it is well to consider the care which a smaller group of 50,000 will need to take in order to be safe.

Another element of foresight would be that as much land as possible should be purchased, for as the project develops it will naturally increase the value of adjoining land. But we believe there are many who are reflectively referred to as the rich, who will be ready to help when the time comes to move forward and who are not less willing to do their part, to assist to make the movement a real success, but who are insistent that methods be used giving reasonable hopes of safety and success for the good of all.

But that which is most essential above all else is a spirit of personal consecration, of personal stewardship, so that each one feels himself a steward, not only over his property, but also over his own life, his own body, and the talents with which he is endowed of God.

S. A. BURGESS.

Give While You Live

There is joy in giving. This is the common experience of the race. It always has been so. Jesus declared, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." You have noticed the lack of satisfaction as some gift was made to you, but oh! what pleasure you had in making another happy by your generosity. Giving is one of the channels through which we express our love. I think it must be the best way, for it was the plan chosen by God to express his love for the children of men. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." He has also indicated that by giving we in turn could express our love for Him. "If thou lovest me . . . behold, thou wilt remember the poor, and consecrate [give] of thy properties for their support, . . . and inasmuch as ye impart [give] of your substance unto the poor, ye will do it unto me."

There are many people who are able to give and who would like to give, but who do not know how. The purpose of this article is to show such how they may be helpers now, how they may "give while they live" and experience the joy of giving.

Our first financial obligation to God is the payment of the tithe. One tenth of the increase belongs to God. This is a debt.

As we create a surplus this also should flow into the Lord's storehouse (the general church treasury). Surplus is "that part of a man's possessions, whether of money or properties, of which he has not present or immediate need; the word need being determined by the man's position, sphere of action, his business, and his dependencies." Not all have a surplus; many may have, and such should observe the law, for again the Scriptures declare that "he that turneth away his ear from a hearing of the law, even his prayers shall be an abomination unto me."

There are many, however, who have no surplus, but who have sufficient possessions, the earnings from which will provide for their necessities when they are too aged to work; who have no relatives to whom they care to leave this wealth, and who would like to leave it to the church, that they might carry forward the gospel work. If you are in this class of individuals, you can "give while you live" and experience the joy of giving.

This is provided for by what we call a consecration contract. This contract provides that you can now make such gift as you choose and that as long as you live the church will pay you an amount each year equal to five per cent interest on the gift. This is in no sense a loan to the church, but an absolute gift with a contract which provides for the church to make annual payments to the giver. For example, should you make a gift of $10,000 this contract would bind the church to pay you $500 annually, or $250 semiannually as long as you live. The contract is not transferable to others while you live and the payments would cease upon your death.

Many have given in this way and it has been satisfactory to all. It is a much better way to give than to provide for your gifts to the church by making a will. There are so many things that may happen after your death to defeat your good intentions. Some one may try to break your will, or there may be some State law, unknown to you, which will prevent your executor from doing the thing that you direct in your will. Again, much of your gift may be dissipated by attorneys' fees, court costs, executor's fees, and State taxes on bequests.

If you desire to know more about this better way of making your gift secure to the church by a Consecration Contract, that you may "Give while you live and experience the joy of giving," write to Benjamin R. McGuire, Presiding Bishop, Box 256, Independence, Missouri.

Needed: the Old-Fashioned Virtues

Mr. John J. Tigert, United States Commissioner of Education, is quoted as urging before the National Educational Association recently the teaching of old-fashioned virtues in our schools in preference to the modern "highbrow" subjects, and saying, in view of conditions existing in some of our colleges excluding religion therefrom:

In the words of a famous evangelist, "I would rather have my boy in heaven learning his A B C's, than in hell reading Latin and Greek." We had better have citizens who have character and little erudition than citizens whose knowledge is a peril to society.

Germany showed us plainly the evil of education for culture and efficiency without proper social attitude. Germany raised the efficiency of education to the nth power, but this efficiency was directed into a spring at the throat of the world and brought on a calamity that almost destroyed civilization.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

Bill of Rights for Capital and Labor

Senator William S. Kenyon, now judge, while in the Senate of the United States was head of the commission investigating the industrial disturbance in West Virginia. He sponsored a bill for an industrial code which is now before the Senate of the United States and which he and W. Jett Lauck and others believe will be to industry a bill of rights.

The code has been prepared primarily to settle the difficulties in the West Virginia coal fields, but in form may be applied to all industrial conditions.

During the war the War Labor Board was composed of representatives of labor, of the employer, and of the general public. It acted, however, without a code, but under the stress of war secured good results. At the close of the war an attempt was made for a national industrial conference which broke up on the question of trade unionism as the basis for collective bargaining. The second industrial conference, representing the public alone, gave careful consideration to conditions, but provided for decentralization, while what is needed is a central code. The following points are covered:

1. Coal is a public utility, and in its production and distribution the public interest is predominate.

2. Human standards should be the constraining influence in fixing the wages and working conditions of mine workers.

3. Capital prudently and honestly invested in the coal industry should have an adequate return sufficient to stimulate the production of this essential commodity.

4. The right of operators and miners to organize is recognized and affirmed. This right shall not be denied, abridged, or interfered with in any manner whatsoever, nor shall coercive measures of any kind be used by employers or employees, or by their agents or representatives, to compel or to induce employers or employees to exercise or to refrain from exercising this right.

5. The right of operators and of miners to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing is recognized and affirmed.

6. The miners who are not members of a union have the right to work without being harassed by fellow workmen who may belong to unions. The men who belong to a union have the right to work without being harassed by operators who do not believe in unionism. The organizations have a right to go into nonunion fields and by peaceable methods persuade men to join the unions, but they have no right to try to induce employees to violate contracts which they have entered into with their employers, and the operators on the other hand have the right by peaceable means, to try to persuade men to refrain from joining the unions.

7. The right of all unskilled or common laborers to earn an adequate living wage sufficient to maintain the worker and his family in health and reasonable comfort, and to afford an opportunity for savings against unemployment, old age, and other contingencies is hereby declared and affirmed. Above this basic wage for unskilled workers, differentials in rates of pay for other mine workers shall be established for skill, experience, hazards of employment, and productive efficiency.

8. The right of women to enter into industrial occupations is recognized and affirmed; their rates of pay shall be the same as those of male workers for the same or equivalent service performed; they shall be accorded all the rights and guarantees granted to male workers, and the conditions of their employment shall surround them with every safeguard of their health and strength and guarantee them the full measure of protection which is the debt of society to mothers and potential mothers.

9. Children under the age of sixteen years shall not be employed in the mines.

10. Six days shall be the standard work week in the industry, with one day's rest in seven. The standard work day shall not exceed eight hours a day.

11. Punitive overtime shall be paid for hours worked each day in excess of the standard work day.

Ladd Money Bill

An interesting attempt to change the existing financial scheme.

Senator E. F. Ladd, in his address before the Monetary Conference at Washington, states that the farmers have lost about $38,000,000,000 in the last three years while business had lost very nearly an equivalent amount. As a result of the policy of inflation and the consequent slump in farm prices and stagnation of industry there has been a loss to labor, and other business men, of at least $10,000,000,000.

This makes a total, according to his figures, in agriculture, manufacturing, and commerce of $88,000,000,000 in the past two or three years.

The cause of the difficulty he finds in our financial system, so he has introduced a bill in the present Congress to provide for the Government issuing paper money, retiring bank money, loaning money to farmers at the rate of 4 per cent, the loan to run for not more than thirty-five years. The policy is to be carried out of discouraging speculation in land.

Corporation loans are restricted, requiring a margin of fifty per cent, and are restricted to approve state, county, and municipal bonds, to approved first mortgage railroad, telegraph, and telephone bonds. Loans to farmers shall be to those actually resident upon the land for not more than 60 per cent of the value of land and 40 per cent of the improvements, except that where a tenant farmer is bona fide purchasing the farm, the loan bureau is authorized to loan 75 per cent of the value of the farm. No loan shall be for more than $20,000 or less than $200, and loans upon single mortgages for less than $10,000 shall receive preference.

This financing shall be handled through the Postal Savings Bank, and provision is made for loans on approved city real estate at the same rate of interest for farm loans, but not for more than fifty per cent of the value. It is clearly provided that the profits shall go solely to the Government for the purpose of reducing taxes.

If this law should become effective, it would greatly modify the existing Federal Reserve Law, which has proven so profitable to those who have engaged therein. A cause of the agitation which has produced this bill has been the manner in which credits were handled by the reserve banks the past few years so as to precipitate, as some consider it, deflation in a way injurious to the farmers and laboring men.

Further information can be secured from the National Honest Money Association, Box 911, Washington, District of Columbia.

Price of Industrial Peace

The five items in the account which we must meet, if we are to buy industrial peace, are:

1. The payment of a minimum wage based on reasonable human needs.
2. Reasonable hours of work.
3. Reasonable economic security for the workers.
4. That the workers shall have a real share in determining their working conditions.
5. That the workers shall have a definite share in the prosperity of the industry in which they are engaged.—Seeborn Rowntree in World's Work for May, 1922.

In every form of organization there is need of executive authority, of a manager. Good managers are comparatively rare. Any form of organization which does not develop and maintain them suffers thereby a serious weakness. There can exist together a social recognition of equality; a cooperative effort between the management and the workers, and still the recognition by each of the particular field of service of the other.

Zion for the Poor

By Leon A. Gould

"If we are to have Zion let us have Zion, not a modern capitalistic hell with all the trimmings."

(NOTE.—For the purposes of this article the term rich is used to designate those who have enough of this world's goods to establish themselves in Zion in comparative security, the term poor those who have not.)

As I read "The clarion call," by Brother Williams my soul was stirred within me. By the end of the fourth reading I had convinced myself that there were those in the church that really believed in Doctrine and Covenants equality, stewardship, inheritance, etc. But when I picked up a later HERALD and commenced to read, my brightened hopes were dimmed, and the horrid fear assailed me that we were still floundering around in the same old quagmire.

Inheritance by Consecration or Debt?

Why quote the Doctrine and Covenants statement that every man should be made a "steward over his own property, or that which he has received by consecration," and then proceed to distort it to mean, That which he receives by debt? Where does the law provide that any shall receive inheritances and stewardships by debt, and be forced to drag along over weary years of heart-breaking effort before becoming an asset to the church? Many of us know by actual experience what stewardship and inheritance by debt mean. That is the way we are doing it in the world; and hundreds if not thousands of Saints are trying it out now in Zion. How do they like it? With the usurous money-lenders and the conscienceless profiteer riding on their backs with outstretched hand ever ready to take their meager earnings faster than they make them, with the Great Fear their constant companion, seasoning their food as they eat, the nightmare of their troubled sleep, dogging their footsteps each morning as they take up their daily tasks anew, the fear of losing their little all—can there be happiness, contentment, and security in Zion while these things exist? Then why insist on using these things to make Zion a hell on earth for the poor, when it should be a haven of refuge? No, if we are to have Zion, let us have Zion, not a modern capitalistic hell with all the trimmings. Why, the poor of the church now, under the system of rents, interests, and profits in which they are enmeshed, are paying annually into the coffers of the money-changers enough to make a substantial showing in the building up and redemption of Zion, which if diverted to the establishing of a city of Zion would in a few years result in a community of happy, contented people.

Shall We have Bankruptcy?

By all means, if there is to be no equality without it, better far to be reduced to bankruptcy of both individual and church, than to continue the dallying process another hundred years. Let us all be hungry, let us all be barefoot, let us all be homeless, let us all be reduced if necessary to the condition where we may appreciate the philosophy of the down-and-out lumber-jack, a victim of our brutal economic system, who consoled himself thus: "If you hain't got nuthin' you can't lose nuthin'; blessed be nuthin'." We would then be equal in temporal things, and in a position to begin a cooperative effort to build by learning to "produce for use, and not for profit," to be of mutual assistance to each other, and to see that all are equally supplied with the necessities as well as the opportunities of life. There are worse things than bankruptcy—the present unequal situation for instance. However, I hope it will not be necessary to reach quite that stage.

The Ideal City

The Lord's plan seems not too hard of comprehension, unless we are so thoroughly steeped in the broth of capitalism that it has stained our very souls and blurred our visions. Do we read the church history? Do we study the plan of the city of Zion? If not, why? In it are found details for the successful building of the city of Zion: the platting of the city, size of lots, material to be used for building, space for gardens, the location of the barns, etc., and yet allowance made for individual tastes and initiative in building and decorating, so that there need not be absolute uniformity; and then the thing that stands at the top as well as at the bottom of equality of opportunity and human rights, i. e., Let every man live in the city. All equally accessible to the opportunities and advantages afforded by the community in the way of church privileges, schools, entertainments, and whatever is for the collective as well as the individual welfare, all sharing equally in the benefits of sanitary dwellings and surroundings, and the up-to-dateness of modern facilities, which are almost impossible in a straggling scattered country population—a city, it is possible, without horses or cattle or mongrel curs, and the consequent flies and vermin of unsanitary conditions, where the motor vehicle would play its proper part to the exclusion of other means of transportation. The barns for horses, cattle, hogs, hens, etc., to be without the city, and the land to the south and north, and, if necessary, the east and west, to be laid off for farms, and vineyards, and orchards, and dairies, etc. Each one to own his own home as an inheritance, with a "covenant and a deed which cannot be broken"; his stewardship to be his allotted labor in the sphere best suited to his qualifications and desires, whether office, farm, factory, or ministry, each department to be supervised by a qualified steward who is not above working with his associates. The storehouse to handle the surplus products of farm and factory "without fraud," i. e., profit, supplying each according to his needs and wants, inasmuch as his wants are just. A city in which it would be impossible to buy a home or lot with money, the only means of acquiring an inheritance to be by consecration.

For such an object we can work. For such an object we can pray. For such an object we will sacrifice gladly, and if necessary go hungry and ragged, barefooted and hatless. Give us then an organization, an order of Enoch, a something with a body of men pledged to the realization of this ideal. Give us men, red-blooded men, with a vision untarnished by the usages of the present system of greed. Give us men who are not anxious to be lifted up above their fellows, but whose only desire is to advance with them. Give us men who believe in their fellow men, however poor in spirit and in this world's goods they may be, and these things can be accomplished. But to give us men who are so wedded to the idols of capitalism that they can in no wise be divorced therefrom is useless. To give us men who are not thoroughly awake to the intolerable conditions of the poor, either through intensive study or actual experience beneath the crushing, grinding millstone of the capitalistic machine, is hopeless. Such have no sympathy with, or understanding of, the feelings of the poor, and cannot help them. The thought of a storehouse operated upon a profiteering basis; the thought of an organization, an order of Enoch, or whatnot, for the purpose of selling inheritances to the poor at a profit and loading them with the misery of debt, the thought of trying to establish a few communities of farmers on a stewardship basis as producers, leaving them at the mercy of a hoard of profiteers within or without the church, with no provision made to handle their produce and supply their needs in the things they cannot produce without profit, is abhorrent. The attempt to establish a Zion along these lines would not be worth the wasting of a forlorn hope upon.

Let the Poor Help Themselves

Shall we wait for the rich to make the first move?

We have waited nearly a hundred years and the poor haven't been invited to Zion yet. Why continue to wait? The rich are not essential to the building up of a city of Zion. If they are hesitating, as is intimated, because they want safeguards thrown around their sacred rights of property, they are only standing in the way of the building up of Zion, and it would be easier to move forward without them. The rich for nearly a hundred years have been in control. They have been able to attend the conferences, to shape legislation, to direct the work of building up Zion, and what have we as a result? A crisis! 'Tis an old story. We no sooner struggle through one crisis than we are plunged headlong into another. It is time the poor had something to say about the building up of Zion. It is folly to wait for the rich. Let the poor do it. They can, and be under no obligations to the rich. So we are not asking for the favors of the rich who are unwilling, or who are letting the sacred rights of property stand in the way. We are not asking the favors of the money-changer, the mortgager, or the usurer. We are merely asking that the poor be given the chance to help themselves, that the spiritual authorities inaugurate a movement in behalf of the poor, an enterprise in which the poor can do all the work and furnish all the means, and, under the sanction and advisory counsel of the spiritual authorities, build for themselves a place on the earth where they may live "after the manner of happiness." We are not even asking to be incorporated within the confines of Independence. Give us a location twelve, fifteen, or twenty miles out, where we need not mar the peace of the purse-proud, or those who feel it degrading to come in contact with a community of laboring people. The poor have nothing to lose, but all to gain under such a proposition, the rich under no obligation, and in no danger of losing their sacred property rights. Not a sou would they be asked to lend, not a penny profit would they be permitted to make off Zion's poor. They might continue their capitalistic Zion unmolested and pore over their musty pigeon-holes crammed with mortgages and notes and interest-bearing bonds as long as they liked for all we would care.

Suppose—

Suppose a call or drive were made primarily among the poor for funds to help themselves establish a city of Zion, not barring any, of course, who felt that they had a few dollars they could contribute without suffocating for fear of losing it. Suppose it were found advisable to raise a fund of $500,000 to make a beginning. Imagine fifty thousand in the church willing to pledge themselves to raise ten dollars each in a year's time. Hardly a man, woman, or child belonging to the church but could find some way to do that, even the poorest of the poor. Let us assume there were only twenty-five thousand who would make the effort to raise twenty dollars each, still it could be done—by a superhuman effort, perhaps, but it could be done. Suppose about a section of land, necessary for a start, could be bought for, say, $50,000. A hundred homes, modest, but comfortable and sanitary, could be built for say, $300,000; and $100,000 used for the barns, sheds, stock, and equipment necessary for the support of the hundred families, leaving $50,000 plus whatever could be consecrated by those taking part in the enterprise, in the operating fund. A hundred of the most needy families might be selected and placed in these homes, and given the opportunity to work for Zion—families who were unreservedly willing to consecrate themselves to the success of the venture. Consider that as means were provided and the city filled up it were found advisable to add a section of land to the south, another to the north, and finally one on the west, and one on the east, until a city with its farm lands looked something like this illustration, the center section the city, and sections 2, 3, 4, and 5, the farm lands:

Suppose the first city were filled, and it were found necessary to lay off another. A second city and farm lands could be provided by adding sections numbered 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, and a third city by adding sections 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, as in the following illustration:

And so on, until the world is filled up. A big order, but the poor can accomplish it if given an opportunity. The cities being a mile apart from corner to corner (in the rows of sections running north and south and east and west there would be always four farm blocks between cities), each family would have all the city conveniences, at the same time having country life practically at their door. Each city would have four sections of land to support it, which should be enough under intensive cultivation. Would that not be a far happier state for the poor than the debt-burdened conditions in which we see them now, in the world and in Zion too? Go into any of our cities, not barring Independence. Note the mansion of ten or twelve or more rooms with its family of two or three, then go out on the outskirts and look at the tumble-down, tar-papered shack miserably housing its family of eight or ten, or more. Take a long look at the luxurious mansion shared by master and mistress and possibly a poodle with a gold- or silver-studded collar, then go out into the outskirts and take a long look at the family of the poor living in a hole in the ground, a forlorn, hopeless existence, and ask yourself if the church is doing its duty by the poor. I am voicing the plaint of the poor like the widow before the unjust judge. I ask that we be given a right to be heard, a right to be gathered, a right to be considered, a right to help ourselves, and a right to help build Zion. I hope the plaint will be continued until, if for no other reason than to be rid of the annoyance, the unjust judge grants this concession to the poor and gives them an opportunity to help themselves. The poor have never yet been invited to come to Zion. On the contrary, they have been bluntly told they were not wanted; that it was no place for them.

Learn to Do by Doing

The constant reiteration of the thoughts that we do not know what to do, and we do not know how to start, and we do not see how it can ever be accomplished, gives me a pain. The axiom that, We learn to do by doing, is true of the child at school, and of the adult in every phase of life. The child who never takes his pencil in hand, who never turns a leaf of his book, will be a long, long time learning to read, write, and cipher. But the child who knows enough to take his pencil and try to copy the characters set before him by his teacher knows all that he needs to know to begin. So, in the building up of Zion, we know all we need to know to begin; the balance we'll learn as we go along. Let's begin.

The Samaritan

Brother Williams says the Samaritan within our gates has put us to shame. Yes; so has the Samaritan without our gates. Take for instance the most hated and despised, the most lied-about, one of the so-called most ignorant, and at the present time, perhaps, most miserable of all nations, soviet Russia; hemmed in as no other nation ever before was hemmed in, with fifteen strong, mostly so-called Christian nations, without a declaration of war, hedging her in on fifteen battle fronts, barring her from all trade relations with the world as no other nation ever was barred; fifteen nations, most of whom had been rather hypocritically praying for hundreds of years, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is done in heaven," at the same time doing everything they could to prevent his will being done, economically, religiously, and politically; fifteen nations whose armies before taking their departure from such an indefensible act of occupation, burned all cities, all farm houses, all bridges, tore up all railroads, smashed all farm machinery within their reach, and left the poverty-stricken peasants to face a state of devastation seldom, if ever, equaled in the history of the world—in the face of all this the peasants of Russia set up a most remarkable government in many ways, with a constitution couched in the working man's own language, but with ideals most extraordinary to come from a purely human source: The conditional tenure of land, elimination of profits, rents, and interest; the idea of every man living in the city or village, the only qualification for citizenship that of being a producer in the commonwealth, and that only those who were willing to work should be permitted to eat. Listen:

The Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic considers work the duty of every citizen of the Republic, and proclaims its motto: "He shall not eat who does not work."—Soviet Constitution, article 2, chapter 5, paragraph 18.

Doctrine and Covenants 42: 12:

For he that is idle shall not eat the bread nor wear the garments of the laborer.

Book of Mormon:

But the laborer in Zion, shall labor for Zion; for if they labor for money, they shall perish.—2 Nephi 11: 109.

Bible:

For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat.—2 Thessalonians 3: 10.

Let's give the Samaritans due credit for what they have accomplished towards establishing a system of society, faulty as it may be, where the laborer in factory sets his own wages, the schools are free, the street cars free, the theaters free, rents free, and a monthly ration of food and raiment allotted each worker and worthy nonworker; and for having in five years accomplished this in the face of such a concerted effort on the part of the uncivilized and capitalistic world to starve them into a renunciation of their ideals. And why should the word soviet be such a bugaboo to so many? In the beginning of our own Government, history tells us the people met together in the town hall to make their laws. That is the only way a government of the people could start. Something of that sort would be necessary in governing the affairs of the city of Zion, if all things are "to be done by common consent." Well, that is what the Russian peasants did. Instead of calling it a town meeting, they called it a soviet. Nothing so very frightful about it after all.

Opposition

We might, in trying to establish a city of Zion, be met by a "battlefront" of opposition on all sides. We might even be called names, such as socialists, anarchists, reds, bolshevists, communists, or non-partisans. If we are cowards we better not begin.

We want no cowards in our ranks,
Who will our colors fly,
We call for valiant-hearted men,
Who're not afraid to die.

A few years ago we would have been called "socialists"; now there are at least five other good epithets to apply. In ten years there will probably have been a half dozen more coined. We gain nothing, except epithets, by waiting.

The Crisis

Recently one of our noted speakers in Zion expressed himself like this:

I am going to say it clearly and deliberately, our church to-night is in one of the most severe crises it has ever been in. We are at the parting of the ways. I speak advisedly. I speak soberly, seriously. The church was never in the danger in all its history that it is in to-night, and nothing but a consecrated attitude on the part of God's people will save it. And I say to-night, Thank God for the crisis. Thank God that we have come to that period that once and for all we must choose as to whether we will serve him or not. Are you willing? Are you ready?

Yes, of course, thank God for the crisis. It is about our only hope. As long as the rich are in control and shaping our policies, we do nothing, because the poor cannot, and the rich dare not. So, if there is to be a crisis, a parting of the ways, let the line be drawn between those who are afraid they will lose their earthly store, and those who have nothing to lose; between those who are willing to labor for the upbuilding of Zion in a Zionie way, and those who put self first; between those who believe in an equality of possession as well as opportunity, and those who do not; between those who are willing to cast off the old worn-out insane system of extortion and misery, and those who are so completely saturated with its virus that they can only think in terms of interest, rent, and profit. And thus the crisis met and weathered, the church can free itself from the condemnation now resting upon all, as expressed in Doctrine and Covenants:

It is not given that one man should possess that which is above another; wherefore the world lieth in sin.—Doctrine and Covenants 49: 3.

In conclusion, I want to say that we stand ready to pledge ourselves to raise at least ten dollars for each of the eight members of the church in the family by the end of the year for the purpose of starting an enterprise of this kind, and to double the amount if only twenty-five thousand can be found who will cooperate in this work. And then we are willing to repeat the operation the next year and help place another hundred families on their inheritances, and continue for ten years, if necessary, until the city is filled. It should not take that long to complete the city, for when once started the work would gather momentum and move more rapidly. The Saint Paul Daily News in a recent issue states that for every dollar the farmer received for his last year's crop those who make it their business to farm the farmer received two dollars. In 1913 the Chicago-Record Herald figured that each farm family was supporting five families besides its own. With these farmers of the farmers eliminated, the first one hundred families in Zion ought to do considerable towards placing many other families on their inheritances.

Shall we have Zion in a Zionie way, or shall we continue to temporize with the follies and crimes of capitalism?

Stewardship by Consecration Attacked

By E. Peterson

A nonmember challenges us here to publish what he thinks is the key to our situation—the cause of our failure.

It is a question in my mind whether I will be permitted to say a few words on this all-important subject, in view of the fact that I am not a member of your church, but, in any event, I feel it my duty to submit a few thoughts along that line, for I assume that you want to get right on this, as well as every other question, regardless of from whom criticism may come.

I have just read in the HERALD a recent article, and I find the same old story, namely, that a man can be made a steward over his own property. A stewardship is the superintendency over the affairs of another; so says the best English authority. To illustrate, Jackson County has a farm, formerly known as the "poor farm." The superintendent of that farm is a steward, has charge of it under the authority of the county court, which represents the people, who are the real owners.

This steward must render an account of his stewardship to the court annually. Now, supposing this steward has some privately owned property in some other locality; does he make an accounting of that also as a steward? No. Why? Because he is an owner there and not a steward. He is required to make an accounting of his stewardship only, as that is all that the court has invested him with.

Now all we need do is to substitute the Lord in place of the court and apply the same rule and we will have what he requires of all his people in the last days. A man can never be a steward over property which he owns in fee simple. But if he turns all that property over to the church, and the church holds the title in fee, then if the church assigns certain properties, or businesses, to the person who has thus consecrated all his property to the Lord, then he becomes a steward and not till then.

A recent writer quotes from section 42 in the Doctrine and Covenants and lays particular stress on the words, "he shall appoint every man a steward over his own property, or that which he has received," he says, "by consecration," but those last two words were not in the original revelation and are therefore an interpolation. "Received" from whom? From the bishop, of course, as a stewardship, and the apparent reason that it is called "his own" is that it formerly was his in fee, but was not the Lord's, by a deed and covenant which could not be broken, and he was assigned such property as a superintendent, under the direction of the bishop of the church which represented the Lord as the real owner.

Now you may ask where I get that. I will tell you where. It says in one of the revelations, "If these properties are not mine then ye are no stewards." Plain enough, is it not? Now to cap the climax I will quote a paragraph from the same section, 42, which has also been tampered with, which tampering has been the cause of all the controversy that has arisen over this stewardship question.

I will quote from the original revelation, as it appears in the Doctrine and Covenants published in 1833 at Independence, and which was tampered with by the committee which was appointed to arrange and revise the revelations, of which Sidney Rigdon was the chief culprit. Here it is from the original:

"If thou lovest me, thou shalt serve me and keep all my commandments; and behold, thou shalt consecrate all thy properties, that which thou hast unto me, with a covenant and a deed which cannot be broken."

Sidney Rigdon made a mess of it and made it read,

"consecrate of thy properties, to the poor with a deed and a covenant which cannot be broken."

Now as one cannot be a steward unless the properties belong to others than himself, and as it is commanded that we must consecrate all our properties to the Lord by deed, where does the retention of properties as owners in fee come in, pray tell?

Dare you publish this to your members? I am afraid not. Why? Because it is predicted that the Gentiles will not see this great truth, and that the vineyard will be taken from them and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. The time of the Gentiles has about expired, and, as predicted, another race will take up the proposition of stewardships and get it right. Read the last few verses of the 24th chapter of Matthew. It tells your destiny. It tells your failure, and it names your successors. Too long you have been deceived. Too long you have been sleeping on your rights. To awaken you now would be a miracle which can never be.

Stewardships

By C. A. Gurwell

"Let the priests step into Jordan and the people will follow."

A recent SAINTS' HERALD contains in The Forum an interesting article entitled, "Shall stewardships be appointed now?" The article closes with the inquiry, "Shall we concede God's way by doing the things required of us?" This is preceded by the relation of an incident taken from the history of ancient Israel, the crossing of the River Jordan into the "promised land," as recorded in full in Joshua, chapters three and four. The choice of material for illustration is particularly fortunate because of the parallel involved between ancient and modern Israel; however, that article stopped short of the conclusion of the parallel. Let us pursue it a little further.

In ancient Israel there are two classes mentioned, "the priests" and "the people." The priests' duties were various, but one of them was, they were the custodians of "The Law." It was kept in the ark of the covenant, the visible seat, or manifestation of God's presence. In this instance, the officers having the custody of the law were commanded to "take up the ark of the covenant and pass over before the people. And they took up the ark of the covenant and went before the people." (Joshua 3: 6.)

Now let us identify the other member of the parallel. To-day, the law is published in books and in the SAINTS' HERALD, where it may be preserved in the one, and exhibited to "the people" in the other. "The law of temporalities" is lodged in the keeping of the priests known as "The Bishopric" or The Order of Bishops.

Priests Went Before the People

In taking possession of the promised land, the priests bearing the ark went before the people, and it was not until their feet "were dipped in the brim of the water," that "the waters failed, and were cut off; and the people passed over right against Jericho." (Joshua 3: 16.)

These two facts are clearly outstanding: First, The priests bearing the ark, went before all others of the people. Their own feet first stepped into Jordan; then the waters were stayed, and all "the people" could plainly see where the crossing was, and how it was to be accomplished. For Joshua had commanded them to stay behind for a distance of "about two thousand cubits by measure; come not near unto it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go; for ye have not passed this way heretofore."—Joshua 3: 4. They were not to crowd around like a mob; nor get ahead of the priests "bearing the ark," for they were to show the way by going ahead and demonstrating its feasibility; for the way was untried "heretofore."

Leaders Seen by All the People

The second fact to note is, they were to be seen by "all the people" going forward with the ark.

Now, to apply the parallel: When our bishops, who are the custodians of this law, go forward and comply with its full requirements, making full consecration of "all their surplus property, . . . for the laying the foundation of Zion," etc., as told in Doctrine and Covenants 106: 1, (the remainder of section 106 is short, but is quite interesting reading,) and publish in the SAINTS' HERALD, (as is the Bishop's annual report,) the names and consecrations, with the residue retained, "the people," which includes all the members of the church from the Presidency down, except the order of bishops, can then see just how to proceed, and "the way by which" they "must go; for" we "have not passed this way heretofore."

If the order of bishops will devise such a system of stewardship as they themselves are willing to work under, and will put into operation among themselves without reserve; then publish it so there "shall be a space between it and the people," it will not be "two thousand cubits" time until the people would be pressing forward to enter the promised land of a redeemed Zion.

Let us look at the other side for a moment. Suppose the custodians of the ark had said to the people, "You go ahead and cross over this Jordan. God has said we shall go over to-day"; and they should have insisted on the laity taking the lead. What would have been the result? The hosts of Israel would have perished in the mad, rushing waters of the Jordan River, swollen by the melting snows of summer; for it was then overflowed "all its banks." If the bishops who are to administer this law, cannot produce a system in which they have confidence in their own administration, how can they hope to have the people place any confidence in it; or expect the people to go ahead of them? Disaster alone will result. We are to be the "light of the world"; but not the "tail light" to show "how not to do it," and to say, "There is danger in coming this way."

There is evident lack of confidence somewhere. When we read that in Zion there are to be "no poor and no rich," "Ye are to be equal in temporal things," "just wants and needs," "I require all your surplus property," and others of similar import, and then note the actual conditions, we are led to cry out, "O Lord, how long must we wait?"

Law Not Difficult to Understand

To one of "the common people," the law of the Lord touching temporalities does not seem particularly difficult of understanding. "I require all their surplus property, to put into the hands of the bishop of my church in Zion." What is the, or a, surplus? In a business way, it is more than I need for my business. If my business requires $100,000, and I have $130,000, then there is a surplus of $30,000. If I am a farmer, and live on a farm from which I supply all the needs of my family, but own three other farms and rent them out, I have three surplus farms, which, according to the law, should be "put into the hands of the bishop of my church in Zion." Why? In order that the land may become the stewardship of three other men, who may thus provide for their own "just wants and needs," including the education of their children.

All One's Time to the Church

But I, myself, am a bishop, and am administering these farms for the benefit of Zion; and I have a family of a son and daughter to educate and provide for when they are grown. Or I have half a dozen children, (which is more to my credit,) and they must be provided for. I being a bishop, am engaged in business from which I derive my living. I am on the same plane with every other man who is not a bishop, and have my stewardship for my livelihood. Or, I am a bishop whose whole time is required to care for the work of the church. I have no time for anything else, and like all the other ministers of the church whose time is all given to the church, I obtain my living from the church, for therein lies my stewardship. And if I have no time for aught but the church, neither have I "need" of money or property to claim my time, save my home only; for "even so hath the Lord ordained that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel." (1 Corinthians 9. 14.) That "ordination" has never been canceled or repealed; and our bishops who give all their time to the church, "preach the gospel." If I have five hundred dollars, or ten thousand dollars, it is a surplus, for my "just wants and needs" are supplied by the church, including sufficient to educate my children for useful membership in society and the church; and when they become of age, they receive a stewardship, according to their abilities; and they receive it from the means that are in the hands of the bishop, as for their just wants and needs.

And the son and daughter of that poor widow should also receive as good an education, technical if need be, as do mine, that they, too, may receive their stewardships and become useful, contributing members of society, and of the church, under the stewardship plan.

Getting and Holding of Stewardship

I have said, "receive their stewardships"; but some say, "buy their stewardships." The law provides for taking away a man's stewardship; but no law, in statute or equity, can take away from an owner his land, except by right of "eminent domain." I have a warranty deed for a parcel of land in Independence, that conveys it to me and my heirs "forever"; and yet the Lord says, "The land shall not be sold forever; for the land is mine."—Leviticus 25: 23. "The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein."—Psalms 24: 1. And yet we hold it in perpetuity. This is contrary to his law. We are but stewards; and yet one man will hold as his very own, hundreds of acres that are cultivated by other men, who are compelled to pay the profits (rent) of their labors to the so-called "owner," in contravention of God's law.

In the parable of "The talents," the Lord gave to his servants certain talents, of money value, not to own, but with which to work, saying, "Occupy till I come." This is proved by his requiring them again upon his return, and the punishment meted out to the "slothful servant." If it belonged to the servant he could do with it as he pleased; but it was not his. So to-day the land and its increase belong to the Lord, and no servant is entitled to control (not own) more than he has ability to use. When we recognize this fundamental law, that we, the land, and the fruits of our labor, whether it be with our hands or our heads, all belong to God, and we are entitled to only so much of it as is necessary for our "just wants and needs," (not our "likes") and render into the hands of the bishop, "all our surplus," then may we expect Zion to arise and put on her "beautiful

Do We Believe in Preparedness?

Some years ago, when our country suddenly faced the necessity for war, we awoke to the fact that as a Nation we had gone placidly along our peaceful way, with very little thought of being prepared for any great struggle with other ambitious or domineering powers. The lessons we learned in the hurried and lamentably expensive efforts to cover lost ground and to equip and train our citizen-soldiery to a point approximating efficiency, are still fresh in our minds.

To-day, are we not, as a church, finding ourselves in something like the same predicament? The call to come to Zion has gone forth. Zion has been "established," so far as initial and formal steps are concerned, and the gathering of large numbers of our people in the "center place" is presenting many problems of a purely social nature. Are we as a church prepared to solve them?

Is it enough that our leaders shall have been given the vision of our needs? Is it enough that they have long foreseen the conditions which would result in such gathering, and have, from time to time, sent out their clarion notes of warning or appeal? Before their dreams and hopes shall be fulfilled, must not we, the people, also arouse to a conviction of what we need, and be not only willing to help but make ourselves able to help in a systematic and trained fashion?

Perhaps all may remember the little folders which were sent out by the social service bureau of our department some years ago, which bore across their front page the words, "You are willing, BUT are you ready?" That is the keynote of the appeal we would like to make to-day. Dear sisters, with your hearts of gold, which thrill in sympathy with suffering and affliction, are you ready to give service to those who need your tender ministrations, in that sure and scientific manner, which, added to the love of God in your heart, will be effectual in righting the wrongs, correcting the conditions, which cause the suffering, and truly save, heal, and bless?

Some one has divided the years of a woman's life into three periods. The first twenty years should be the years of preparation, of study, of acquisition of knowledge and power. The second twenty should be spent in the bosom of her home and family, paying her debt to the race and her Creator. After that, her work should be extended beyond the confines of her home, and reach into the community life garments," and the glory of the Lord to rest upon her.

It is the prayer of "the people," that such a system of stewardships may be wrought out by the bishops as will commend itself to them that they will be willing to step into the roaring torrent of modern commercialism, having faith in God and in one another, and stand there so that the people may know the way; "for we have not passed this way heretofore." Let our "priests" go forward with the ark, the law, and produce a working plan that they themselves are not afraid of, and "the people" will soon be "all passed clean over Jordan."

about her, and be expressed in bettering the conditions there existing.

While this is but a rough division and will admit some variation, it is an accent to the thought we would like to put before our sisters at this time. Shall not we help the young people of to-day to see that in their years of preparation, their years of study and application, they could follow no better light, no worthier purpose than this of social service? What was Christ's ministry but that? What is that of his holy priesthood but that? What is a mother's commission but that? All have the salvation of souls as an object, and surely that is the underlying desire in the heart of every true worker among the needy.

We have a deep and abiding faith that God is working upon the hearts of his people, and in many ways is guiding them, however unconsciously to them, into paths of his choosing, into avenues of study which will richly qualify them for service in his vineyard. As another has mentioned, we believe that in Graceland is being trained a band of workers which, could their motivating spirit but be reflected in the lives and desires of all church members, would work as leaven throughout. Our young people go to Graceland with thoughts and ambitions but partly formed, and they return to us with ideals of love and service which put our selfishness to shame! They learn there, not only by precept and the letter of the law, but by examples which are resplendent in their beauty, that true glory is that which crowns the humble; that honor which has any value in the spiritual realm is that which has lost sight of itself in service to others; and that success is only to be truly measured by sacrifice and consecration.

There may be some whose minds run in the grooves of the past, who fail to recognize the fact that the youth of this church are being equipped with a rich endowment for service. There may be some who are too conservative to concede that the generation which has risen about us may be better qualified to handle the problems that will confront them than were we of the passing one. We feel sure, however, that these attitudes towards the young are not typical of the highest examples of parental love. The thoughtful parent is usually one who has great faith in his offspring, great faith in the gradual upward tendency of the entire race, and great faith that God's purposes concerning humanity will be fulfilled. Surely his designs for this church must, to a large extent, be worked out by the younger members, for the coming years are to be ones of tremendous accomplishment, if all that is necessary to be done before the coming of the Lord shall be well and profitably performed.

So it pleases us to present in this issue a letter written by one of our devoted, thoughtful young women, who is in the midst of her preparation for service. Does not it show to even a casual reader that the "spirit which enticeth to do good" is in the ascendancy, and that one could safely trust one's welfare in the hands of one so imbued with sympathy and love? And does it not, also, stir one's heart in thankfulness that the leadings of the Spirit have been to qualify, to prepare, to learn and understand, so that when "the Lord shall have need" of her, she will be not only willing, but ready?

We ask our readers to consider Sister Briggs's little letter with great thoughtfulness, and then ask a few questions of their own hearts. Am I a polished stone, ready for placement in the temple of God? Am I a workman who "needeth not to be ashamed"? Have I the oil of service in my lamp, or have I neglected opportunities to fill it at the front of learning? Is my life animated by the spirit of loving ministry so needful in a Saint, or am I drifting into habits of harsh judgment, criticism, faultfinding? Is it possible for me to enter at this time into a definite course of study with a view to increasing my ability to do intelligent work of a social nature? Is it possible for me to help some young Saint to see the beauty of such a life, and to encourage him or her to decide to qualify therein? If I cannot hope to do much myself have I the means to make such a course of study and preparation possible for some young person whose gifts and qualifications for such service in our church might otherwise not be properly trained and directed?

These, and many other questions, we might all with profit ask of ourselves, and then, by the grace of God, let us each be given the strength and determination to consistently carry out the answers of our own hearts, as they may be made in righteousness before him! Let us be not only hearers of the word, but doers as well. There is a world of work and opportunity before us. The church needs our help in many ways, not the least being this need for trained and qualified workers along the lines mentioned in the letter from our young student sister. Do we believe in preparedness?

Trained Social Workers a Necessity

I feel keenly the importance of the social conditions of which you spoke in your last letter. You requested that I offer what I could in the way of suggestions and observations which might aid in the solution. In response to that request, I am appealing for the development and growth of—shall I say, a new spirit, or, better, the operation of the old, old spirit of love and service of Jesus. This may sound disappointing, but I think you will soon see what I mean.

Zion is the great battle cry of our people. Zion is the goal towards which we are all stumbling, plodding, or racing, as it may be, but that Zion is not material, cannot be realized by the acquisition of wealth or members, or by economic organization, alone. It is fundamentally psychic. It depends upon the interaction of mind, upon social adjustments, mental attitudes, personalities.

We have attempted to organize our people economically, to establish physical and material stewardships. This is well, but I feel such efforts are inadequate and one-sided. In view of the conception of Zion in terms of personalities and attitudes, there is another way in which we must be organized, and this way is more fundamental and crucial. We must be organized socially. Such an organization should be complete and systematic to the minutest detail. The number of families, the size and character of the families, the economic standing, the physical and mental status of the members, and their interests, tendencies, and capabilities should be known. In other words, I believe that the realization of Zion depends upon the knowledge of the potential sources of strength and weakness in the units of Zion—the families—thereby making possible the prevention of certain tendencies and the guidance and use of others.

In this connection, I may say that I firmly believe the time is coming when our church will have to take a definite and scientific stand on the question of marriage, and when we will have a right to, at least, demand a health certificate from our young people before sanctioning the establishment of new homes. When marriage is raised to this standard, a new importance, a new seriousness and respect will be attached to it, and fewer youthful, thoughtless marriages will be entered into. This problem is one in itself, and is not the subject of this letter.

It is of the social organization that I wish to speak. It will demand specialists in all lines of medical work, with adequate clinics. Graceland, with her educational standards and socialized attitude, will be the great melting pot of our people and the mother of Zioniac cooperation and aspiration. Recreational leaders and facilities are necessary, as well as socialized Sunday schools, intellectualized sermons, and family social workers.

The social workers are the heart of such a social organization, and it is, probably, in this field that we are the least prepared. We do not even realize the scope of the field, or the opportunity of our people in such work. We need visiting teachers (experienced teachers with social training), industrial social workers, family-case workers, medico-social workers, community social workers, psychiatric social workers, etc. And until we get them, any plan for social organization of our church will be a failure; for here, if anywhere, thoroughly trained and prepared leaders are necessary.

This question of leaders is extremely important, for the personnel is the vital factor, since people, not things, are being worked with. As in no one else, must there be in them the realization, and hence practice of the doctrine, "Don't despise a single human being! He is made of the same material as mankind in general." Those who would be social workers must have the same universal sympathy as was expressed by one: "Obscure old people with their lonely tragedies get a tremendous hold on everyone who comes to know them." Such a spirit destroys all stratification.

"It is not enough for social workers to speak the language of democracy. They must have in their hearts its spiritual conviction of the infinite worth of our common humanity, before they can be fit to do any form of social work whatsoever. Life itself achieves significance and value not from the esoteric things shared by a few, but from the great common experience of the race—from the issues of birth and death, of affection satisfied and affection frustrated, from those chances and hazards of daily living that come to all men. Unless these conditions common to all humanity strongly appeal to us, or until they do, we are not ready to adopt social work as our major interest."

To be efficient in this field, we must realize: human beings are interdependent; human beings are different; human beings are not dependent and domestic animals. We must realize the reality of personality; must each trust by being worthy of trust; must have imaginative sympathy; must avoid rigidity of mind; must assume no superhuman perfection; and must be frank. We must have as our ideal the love and service of Jesus. With these qualities must go thorough, intensive training from recognized training schools.

This is my little contribution and suggestion towards the solution of the problems you presented. We must have a definite, complete social plan and have prepared leaders to carry the work on. I dream of the time when our people will be so organized and when we will have social case-workers stationed throughout the church centers, all co-operating for the betterment of individuals and society. Not only must we be completely organized within our own group and working cooperatively, but must work in harmony with the social organizations not of our own religion. If only our young people fitted for this type of work would see the vision, and undertake the long period of training necessary to bring about this dream!

With faith that God is guiding us all,

"This kind of diet is good, and a sufficient amount of food for anyone. It saves labor before and after taking.

"Green vegetables, dairy products, and fruit are more easily assimilated than starches and meats. Milk, eggs, cheese, and nuts may be used with any food."

I should not presume to dictate as to the amount or kind of food anyone should take. I only know that I have had infinitely more comfort since using this diet, commenced in December. My daughter likes to diet for weight, so we are both suited. I do not know that it would please or be adequate for a working man. However, little meat and lots of common-sense mixed with vegetables and fruits result in a good diet.

We use wheat cereal, well cooked, with cream, drink milk, and have a slice of brown bread or toast, or cookies or doughnuts, for breakfast. For luncheon, hominy or potatoes or canned corn or rice or macaroni, with a green cooked vegetable; lettuce salad, or banana salad with French or cooked dressing; bread or muffins, cake or cream puffs, or custards, etc. Vegetable soup is a good meal. Do not put in starchy vegetables.

There are many combinations which make a change and give the right amount of nourishment.

For dinner we have any kind of meat, poultry, or fish, with neutral vegetables, tomatoes, and fruit. Fruit salads make a good finish for a meal—apple, pineapple, apple and orange, on lettuce, with French dressing. Grapefruit, a dish of apricots, pears, peaches, plums, or prunes.

The question has been raised: "According to this diet it would not be right to serve flour sauce on apple turn-over or chocolate cornstarch with meat, would it?"

No, it would not be "right." Flour is in the third column;

LETTERS AND NEWS

Making a Start in Stewardships

Since my last letter about the gathering I have received a letter from Graceland College asking me to write again on the same subject.

From my observation of the past thirty years as a member of the church, the fact is evident to me that Zion will never be redeemed except by sacrifice.

The celestial law or order must be established at the beginning. Apostle Paul in 1 Corinthians 26 speaks of how not many mighty after the flesh are called (to be Saints). We see by the letters from our bishop that the tithes received are not sufficient to meet running expenses, and a number of our missionaries have been released, as the church couldn't care for all of their families. The celestial law, if put into operation, will make it possible to keep at least one fifth of all our men in the missionary field and their families be well supplied.

We have perhaps thirty thousand men, and I believe that at least one fifth of them, or six thousand, hold the priesthood; and one half of them, or three thousand, could be spared from the home branches to spread the angel's message.

Now, what is required of God's people in order for this celestial condition to obtain? In section 77 of Doctrine and Covenants, in a revelation given March, 1832, the Lord says: "For if ye are not equal in earthly things, ye cannot be equal in obtaining heavenly things; for if you will that I give unto you a place in the celestial world, you must prepare yourselves by doing [not talking about them] the things which I have commanded you and required of you."

What had God commanded? Section 70 of Doctrine and Covenants says the Saints are commanded to be equal in temporal things and this not grudgingly, otherwise the fruits in the first. (See "Food Combinations," page 216, HERALD for March 1, 1922. Meat is in the first column, corn in the third. The rule is never to mix foods in the first and third column. Any kind of fruit pie or fruit pudding, fruit cake, orange cake, etc., are mixtures of I and III. Banana cake, or lemon cream cake, or banana pie, eaten with the right meal may be all right if one can eat pie and cake.

Simple meals are best if there is any disturbance of the digestive tract. A liquid diet is a good beginning—orange juice and warm water, milk, mutton broth, wheat gruel (strained) with a little cream, beef broth—a cupful of any one of these every two or three hours. But if bread or crackers be used with meat broth the effect is entirely different. Gas will often result. It is not "right" according to this diet.

Health is, above all, to be desired, and it is good that the proper attention be paid to the diet.

I do not wish to say anything to undo that which has gone before in the Food and Body Course, but we know that some foods do "fight"; and I know that I have much less disturbance these last months than for many years, and have gained some weight.

(In my article in the March 1 number of the HERALD, Women's Department, a grammatical error crept in; it should be, "the following list of food classifications was given.") abundance of the manifestations of the Spirit shall be withheld. Saints, you that have been numbered with the Saints for years, can you truthfully say that there is any equality among us, except a few holding the priesthood and some other church positions? And are the manifestations of the gifts of the gospel with us as you and I believe God intended they should be?

In section 58, the Lord says: "It is wisdom in me that my servant, Martin Harris, should be an example unto the church in laying his moneys before the bishop of the church. And also, this is a law unto every man that cometh unto this land, to receive an inheritance, and he [every man] shall do with his moneys according as the law directs."

Did the Saints (and are the Saints that have gone into the land of Zion to dwell) keep this command to lay their moneys before the bishop and then to share and share alike so that there is a basis of equality among those that are called to be Saints? Or is one family living in ease and luxury and other families obliged to skimp and economize in every way to get along?

I saw by a recent HERALD that about three thousand were out to the Stone Church services Sunday. I wonder if they are living the celestial law. The article said that three apostles were addressing them. I wonder how many of those that go by the name of Saint are ready and anxious to really live the celestial law.

In section 81 of Doctrine and Covenants God says: "And you are to be equal, or in other words, you are to have equal claims on the properties [church properties] for the benefit of managing the concerns of your stewardships, every man according to his wants and his needs, inasmuch as his wants are just; and all this for the benefit of the church of the living God, that every man may improve upon his talent, that every man may gain other talents; yea, even an hundred-fold, to be cast into the Lord's storehouse, to become the common property of the whole church, every man seeking the interest of his neighbor, and doing all things with an eye single to the glory of God."

In Doctrine and Covenants 102 the Lord says: "Verily, I say unto you, who have assembled yourselves together that you may learn my will concerning the redemption of mine afflicted people: Behold I say unto you, Were it not for the transgressions of my people, speaking concerning the church and not individuals, they might have been redeemed even now; but, behold, they have not learned to be obedient to the things which I require at their hands, but are full of all manner of evil, and do not impart of their substance, as becometh Saints, to the poor and afflicted among them, and are not united according to the union required by the law of the celestial kingdom."

And Zion cannot be built up unless it is by the principles of the law of the celestial kingdom. What are those principles? Even temporal equality. How is this to be brought to pass?

In Doctrine and Covenants 101 the Lord tells how. Listen: "I, the Lord, stretched out the heavens, and builded the earth as a very handy work; and all things therein are mine; . . . but it must needs be done in mine own way; . . . that I, the Lord, have decreed to provide for my Saints: that the poor shall be exalted, in that the rich are made low."

The real definition of a rich person as understood by reading the Doctrine and Covenants, is one that possesses more of this world's goods than is necessary for the support of his dependents in a manner equally as good as the rest of the Saints can afford. All surplus of moneys or lands, stocks, or bonds—it is the command of God to lay before the bishop to be put in the Lord's storehouse. They are to receive back that which is necessary to improve or increase their talents, that they may gain more to be put into God's storehouse.

In Doctrine and Covenants 87 is found an example of the way that God requires the rich to do. A certain rich lady named Vienna Jaques joined the church of Christ and was required to lay her money or property at the bishop's feet, God commanding that enough be given back to her to pay her expenses to the land of Zion, and the rest to be consecrated unto him (or the church). She was to receive an inheritance in Zion and settle down in peace, and be not idle in her days from henceforth.

All these commands were given about ninety years ago and still Israel is wandering in the wilderness. We are not living the celestial law. God is withholding the spiritual blessings he longs to bestow. Our sick are not healed, only in a very limited way, and my soul cries out, How long, O Lord?

Let every one who longs for Zion's redemption and celestial conditions, and is willing to come and settle in colonies and share alike, everyone in honor preferring his brother, and each willing to abide by the judgments of the body, sharing the gains or losses, the trials and triumphs, write to the bishop telling what property or moneys they can raise, and let us make a start, and as each community prospers let others, even the poor and needy, be brought. Industries will grow. We can start a broom factory and an overall and shirt factory, where those that are not fitted for heavier work can be useful. Many such enterprises can be started with very little capital, and they will pay good profits, and if we can locate within one hundred miles of a good market, small fruit, poultry, milk, etc., can be produced at a good profit.

At first those must come with money, brains, and brawn, their whole souls and means consecrated to the work, and it won't be long before we can send for the widow and orphan, the lame and the weak. All that are able will find congenial employment surrounded by God's people, all working for the honor and glory of God.

It isn't necessary to write a long letter to the bishop; just say, I am so old; tell the ages of your family, and I have five hundred dollars or fifty thousand as the case may be; or, I am willing and strong; no money, but will work.

THOMAS G. WHIPPLE.

Billy Sunday on the Reorganized Church

A few weeks ago the editors were informed that Billy Sunday, during his meetings in Kewanee, Illinois, had made a reference to our church, hence we wrote to Elder Amos Berve for accurate information. The following letter is our reply:

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, May 17, 1922.

Dear Brother Burgess: Your letter of May 11, 1922, is before me, and I take pleasure in giving you the information you ask:

I was present during all of the services held by Billy Sunday at Kewanee, Illinois. I sought an interview with him before the services began, for the purpose of asking him to make a distinction between the Reorganized Church and the Utah Church. Upon making my wants known he made the following reply:

Elder Berve, you need have no fears, I have made it my business to study your history. I know of the history representing your claims both by you people and by your enemies; I know of the murdered and I have also made inquiry where your people have lived for years, that I might not be ignorant in representing you when occasion required, and if occasion requires, you people shall receive ample justice; so have no fears as to this distinction.

Later, and after he (Sunday) had continued his meetings for about one week and he was paying his compliments to the various churches, he had occasion to mention the Utah Church, and I shall not attempt to repeat the language used. Suffice it to say it was not very flattering; and in conclusion he also said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, do not misunderstand me. I have no reference to the little church across the railroad tracks who are called the Reorganized Church, and by the usurpers of the west, Josephites. They have no connection with them whatsoever, and have always repudiated polygamy. They are God-loving people and rank among your best citizens, and if you want to hear doctrine, that is the place to go. But they are not Mormons in the sense that you know the degrading, licentious, home-destroying (etc., etc.,) Mormons of the West."

And at the close of the meetings, when he announced when the meetings of the various church would begin their separate efforts, I was on the platform and he asked when our services would begin. I told him and he in turn made the announcement:

"The Latter Day Saints, the Reorganized Church, they are not polygamists and are not connected with the — of the West. Elder F. A. Russell will be the speaker. All you who have given your preference for this church will find a devoted Christian fellowship, and you should give these meetings your undivided attention. And you who want to learn doctrine will hear it there; they teach more doctrine than any other church I know of."

This is practically word for word as I remember them.

AMOS BERVE.

Service

Now that so many people, both within and without the church, are beginning to realize that service to God and man is their objective in life, it is well that we consider where such should be applied.

It is conceded, of course, that we best serve God by serving our fellowmen; but as we cannot serve all, then whom should we serve, and where do they dwell?

Distance lends enchantment; hence many persons, young and old, are exceedingly anxious to help those far away, whom they cannot help, instead of looking to the poor and needy around them, whom they can help. At home and in the vicinity in which one lives is the place to begin. When one retires at night, he should ponder in his mind as to whom he has rendered aid. When we awake in the morning, we should, before arising from our beds of rest, think of the poor and needy, the sick and afflicted about us, to whom we can render aid. In this way service may not be only a theory alone, but one actually put into practice.

Thus we do not simply say, "Be ye clothed," but we may feed and clothe them. An ounce of help is worth more in relieving the needy than a pound of theorizing. Some prefer aiding those who will aid them in return—those who are healthy and strong. But such do not often need help; it is the weak that need help. The whole need not a physician, but "they that are sick," said the Master, who was servant of all. Of course it is not so pleasant to enter the sick room where one often finds dirt and other things that are unpleasant; but if we who are well dislike dirt, is this not also true of those who are sick?

In this connection one needs but to remember the golden rule, "Do unto others as we would have them do to us." This rule once applied universally in the church will do much in relieving suffering humanity. Let us begin to-day.

CHARLES J. SPURLOCK.

How We Can All Help

Many ministers give the impression that God is an all-powerful personage who sits upon his throne, watching for our mistakes so he can condemn us. God does not condemn us. We bring condemnation upon ourselves. God is a God of love, mercy, and kindness. He pleads with the children of men, and this is the burden of his plea: "Why don't you keep my commandments? Why don't you love one another? Why won't you look for the beautiful and true in your brothers and sisters? Why won't you have charity for all, with malice towards none?"

This we must do to be the pure in heart, so that we may be able to help redeem Zion. It is possible for each one of us to help towards this great work, in this branch or any other. We don't have to go up to Independence, Missouri, to assist in this great work; there is work for each and every one of us here at home.

How can we help redeem Zion? By talking about our brothers and sisters? No! By evil surmising? No! By envy, strife, and wearing our hearts upon our sleeves so we are easily hurt where no hurt is intended? No! By doing nothing ourselves and finding fault with those who are making an effort? The answer to all of these is emphatically, NO!

But we can help by doing our duty in coming to all meetings and taking part, by loving each other, by looking for the good in each other and praying that we all may overcome faults we have, by charity towards all men, in and out of the church, and malice towards none. By practicing the golden rule, not only on Sunday, but throughout our daily life, in all our dealings with men. This is how we can assist towards the redeeming of Zion. Brethren, if we can do this, we will be as God wants his people to be—the pure in heart.

Yours in the faith,

ROY STRICKLIN.

Missionary Work at Humber Bay, Ontario

Early in February, an invitation was received from the Humber Bay Branch to conduct a mission among them. I felt favorably impressed with the request and immediately began to make the necessary preparations. The Saints at Humber Bay had not engaged in a real missionary campaign for a number of years and the idea of four weeks of services almost shocked some of them. Much concern was felt about the services at first because of little differences existing between some and the indifference that had crept in among others, until the Spirit of the Master gave assurance that the support of the Saints would be had.

Brother David Pycock, at the prayer meeting just preceding, received an open vision in which he saw me standing at the head of a lane pointing to some beautiful flowers at the other end and inviting the people to go to pick them. Some beautiful flowers certainly were picked, even though it was necessary at times for the people to go on their hands and knees part of the way after the terrible sleet storms.

After organizing well, and advertising big, the meetings opened with a grand rush on February 12; so did the weather man. Well, we both continued, neither seeming willing to give up; so for a whole month we plowed through rain, snow, and sleet, and bitter cold weather. Sometimes after rains and sleet, the whole surface of the earth would be a glare of ice, but still the Saints came, and as mentioned before, some crawled part of the way on their hands and knees to get there.

About the time the meetings were nicely started, the Anti-Mormon Crusade was launched and it seemed that it centered around Toronto as one of their ripest fields for sympathizers. We no doubt suffered from the unfavorable publicity, but unitedly we went forward.

A number of nonmembers attended. Some only a few nights, others followed nearly every night. We could see the Spirit working with some night after night, which resulted in the ten baptisms and several others expressing themselves as wishing to unite with the church later in the summer.

I remained at Humber Bay for three months and when I left there were still calls for more labors than I could perform. I have nothing but good to say of the Saints there. The children did well in attending nearly every night, the choir never failed one night, the priesthood labored and prayed, and the ladies of the Women's Department visited and made ladies who came among us welcome. Such organized, concentrated efforts are bound to bring good results.

Elders George E. Burt and Guy P. Levitt have done good work at New Liskeard, Cameron, and Burk's Falls. At the latter place, a new opening was effected, with a good interest, which will be followed up later.

Several of the local ministry are doing good work as missionaries and we are trying to place several more, so that with the cutting down of our missionary force, the work will not suffer. Fields for service are continually opening and we pray that God will hasten the message.

Laboring in the interests of the Lord's work,

J. H. YAGER.

Not the Same "Burton"

The news published in some of the papers concerning a certain Roy Burton who poured poison down his wife's throat and then took some himself and both were taken to a hospital in Omaha is not the undersigned Burton. This news has caused some of our friends to wonder and some have written to know if we are still on top of the ground.

We are still happy and are very busy with the Indian work. I don't know the party mentioned in the paper, but if I ever get to see him, I shall tell him that is no way to treat his wife.

We like our missionary work and are making friends in our new district. At present we are at Winnebago and are holding tent meetings each evening with large crowds of interested listeners.

The Winnebagoes are good people and we like them fine. Their ways are not the same as the Omahas, so we have to use different ways to reach them. The Lord has blessed us in our work here, for we have baptized one hundred and nine since November 19. Prospects are good for a good work to be done here in time. How these good Indians love the gospel! It would do you good to hear them bear their testimony of the work in the Indian tongue. You might not understand the words, but you would understand the good Spirit.

No, we don't know anything about the poisoning affair, and Sister Burton would not stand for that kind of treatment I am pretty sure.

WALTHILL, NEBRASKA.

Still in the faith,

P. R. BURTON.

Independence

Doctor Charles Keown was in Saint Louis May 23 to 26 attending the American Medical Association Convention.

Apostle J. F. Curtis spoke at Spring Branch in the forenoon on the 28th and at Second Independence Branch in the evening. Bishop Keir was the speaker at Enoch Hill on the morning of the 28th, and Patriarch F. A. Smith spoke at the same time at Walnut Park.

A change was made in the Graceland program so that R. V. Hopkins delivered the baccalaureate address Sunday evening, the 4th, and President E. A. Smith is expected to deliver the Commencement address on the evening of June 7. Walter W. Smith expects to deliver the address at the Lamda Delta Sigma banquet.

The sacramental service on Sunday was especially good. Elder Walter W. Smith was in charge of the meeting and all felt the Spirit that prevailed in the meeting from start to finish. The new plan for administering the sacrament greatly facilitated its serving, so there was much more time than usual for prayer and testimony.

The patriarchs were very much in evidence in the various branches of Independence in the evening, H. O. Smith preaching at Walnut Park, F. A. Smith at Liberty Street, and Ammon White at Enoch Hill.

Elder Joseph Luff gave one of his characteristic sermons at the Stone Church on Sunday evening. A prayer meeting was held in the afternoon instead of the usual problem meeting.

President F. M. Smith is expected to return to Independence about the middle of the month. He expects to make a short stop in Utah and possibly one in Colorado en route.

Bishop McGuire is much improved, though it is not yet deemed wise for him to attempt to resume his office work.

Bishop I. A. Smith was in Lamoni a few days this week on church business.

Bishop James F. Keir gave the Sunday evening radio sermon from Central Radio in Kansas City. His presentation of our ideal of stewardship was exceptionally fine.

The Religio program this week was especially interesting. Apostle James A. Gillen, in a short talk, presented a ship that had been made for him by the members of the Warrington, Lancashire, Religio as an expression of their appreciation of his work. The young people had requested that he bring the ship to America and tell the young people here about them. Another unusual feature of the program was Book of Mormon names and places illustrated by charades. Next Friday night Mr. Miller, the new athletic director for the Independence High School, will give a lecture on birds, imitating their various calls. All are invited to attend.

Independence Sunday school business meeting was held at Stone Church the evening of June 5. The following officers were elected: superintendent, Albert L. Sanford; first assistant, E. D. Moore; second assistant, Glaude Smith; secretary, Sister J. W. Adams; treasurer, Bishop J. A. Becker. A meeting will be called later for election of delegates for General Conference.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium for the week ending June 3: Mrs. Minnie Akers, Bayfield, Colorado; Carlile Barnhardt, Atherton, Missouri; Mrs. Nora Colpitts, Kirk, Colorado; Mrs. Mabel Underwood, Pittsfield, Illinois; William Jackels, Saint Paul, Minnesota; Willie Downs, Courtney, Missouri; Mrs. Lena May Doughty and Baby Doughty, Sibley, Missouri; Mrs. H. P. McMonigal and Baby McMonigal, Bristol Station, Kansas City, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Mrs. J. B. Sewell, Mrs. Margaret Wheaton, Mrs. Osie Knoepker, Master Albert Newton Isaacks, Miss Mabel Mikel, Mrs. Juanita Sharp, Mrs. Frosty Smith, Mrs.

Ella Langdon, Mrs. Mary Edna Gard, Miss Marjorie Baldwin, and Mrs. Mattie L. Alexander. X-ray patient: Mr. R. R. Schmoyer, Kansas City, Kansas.

Seattle, Washington

The warmest weather we have had since our eight-year sojourn in Seattle has been upon us now for three days. The mercury has reached as high as 80°, which is very unusual.

We look with eagerness for the coming of our church papers. They come as letters from home freighted with cheering news from various ports. We love to read of the various movements in the church; they tend to gladden the heart.

Many hearts and faces out here "beyond the West" are turned Zionward, hoping when the way opens they may find a resting place there. We try to encourage the thought that the faithful and true will not be left to perish with Babylon, even if the Lord has to send an angel to carry them home.

Our Oriole Girls and Boy Scouts united and gave a supper on Friday evening. The boys entertained with a play, "The great watermelon case." It was a mixture of logic, tact, law, and some sensible foolishness. All enjoyed it.

Our visit to Everett Mission on May 21 was very enjoyable. They are progressing nicely with their church building and will soon have it ready for occupancy. We are looking for a special program on the opening day. It is simply wonderful how they have gone ahead. The same united energy will bring joyful success.

Brother S. S. Smith occupied the pulpit here on Sunday evening. He was on his way home from Centralia where he perfected the committee plans for a first class reunion, August 11 to 20. We expect the north tribes of Ephraim to come down and help make it a success.

To show how one part of this church is interested in other parts, at one of our recent prayer services we heard a Saint fervently praying for Brother Clyde Ellis who has lately arrived in Papeete where he in the past passed through a very severe trial and yet was willing to shoulder the cross again and press on. The writer has always felt a warm feeling toward the Society Islanders. We love to read news from there.

Sister Appleman is with us a few days from Portland and showed her earnest love for the church in faithfully attending our services. She reports cheering outlook for a good reunion in Portland commencing July 22 and lasting over three Sundays.

Sister Jennie Jones, as district organizer and Sunday school superintendent is making an extended canvass of the northern branches of the district.

We were privileged to see the loading of the aeroplanes on the vessel Maud, destined to carry Captain Roald Amundsen and party on an expedition of discovery and scientific exploration to the great unknown north. They sail from here on June 3.

J. M. TERRY.

Saint Louis, Missouri

Those who are inclined to rebel at the apparent cruelties and injustices of this life, should have heard Brother C. Ed. Miller on conference Sunday, the morning of May 28. His text from Deuteronomy 32:11 does not give much idea of the sermon. To appreciate it one must hear Brother Miller tell in his thrilling manner how the eagle "stirs up her nest" and pushes the young eaglet over the edge to seeming destruction, then swoops down under the frightened bird and catches it on her wings, bearing it safely back to the nest, only to repeat the operation as often as necessary to compel the young bird to exert its own strength and learn to fly. So the seeming harsh experiences of life are probably sent, or permitted, to force us to test our strength, but always the everlasting arms like great wings are ready to succor us. Why not trust him?

In the evening, Brother Barraclough preached a forceful and timely sermon on the opposition in all ages to the teachings of the men called of God to forward his work. Men they are, and so liable to err, but when really called of God their teaching and advice should be heeded and not criticized and rebelled against by those of more worldly nature. The musical under the direction of E. C. Bell as director, and Mrs. Walrond as organist, was a satisfying finish to a day of uplifting services.

We forgot to mention that Doctor B. A. Greer, of Lamoni, was in attendance at the medical meetings and consequently at our dedication and subsequent services, including conference.

A very large crowd attended the funeral of Brother George Crowell, both out of respect to him, a member for many years, and also because his wife is one of the faithful members for more than fifty years. Sermon by Brother Hampson. E. B.

Third Saint Joseph, Missouri

The Third Saint Joseph Branch enjoyed a great treat of late through the sermons of our beloved Brother R. D. Weaver, continuing through five weeks. Nine were baptized; four children and five adults, of our neighbors and friends, whom we welcome heartily to assist in this great work of redemption of souls for the Master.

The brethren worked diligently to enlarge our church for the services and did a very creditable work. The services were well attended and we enjoyed a spiritual feast which will be long remembered, and which left a lasting desire to press on through the storms and sunshine of life.

Our Sunday school, Religio, and Women's Department work are among the best in the city.

We solicit and always appreciate very much a call at any time from any of our coworkers. MRS. A. N. BROWN.

Hutchinson, Kansas

It seems to me that one of the greatest blessings of the gospel is the opportunity for service that it gives us, and the Saints of Hutchinson are trying to meet the call.

"Christian, wake! Be up and doing," means a great deal to us in a place like this where the field is so large and the workers so few. If there are any Saints living in the larger branches who feel the desire for work, but have nothing to do, we'll gladly welcome them to Hutchinson.

For a number of years we were unable to hold services at all except when Brother T. C. Turpin could meet with us, and he was certainly faithful, but as he lived about twenty-five miles from Hutchinson it was no easy matter for him always to be here. We feel that the Lord was indeed answering our prayers when he sent Brother R. J. Wildey here from Lamoni, Iowa. For with Brother Wildey as our leader, we find that we cannot possibly stand still, consequently since our branch was organized on November 21, 1921, we have been on the upward climb.

We now have five members of the priesthood, and on Easter Sunday, Brother Wildey baptized six new members.

We are holding four services each Sunday, oftentimes more, midweek prayer services each week, also cottage meetings whenever possible. Our officers have also been doing some missionary work at Medora, a town about fourteen miles from Hutchinson. They held one week of meetings there a short time ago and have been holding services there twice each Sunday since then.

We are trying in every possible way to put the gospel before the people and we desire always to be found up and doing for the Master. To this end we ask the prayers of the Saints. AUDREY SANDERS.

San Francisco, California

Sister Hansen arrived from Tahiti with Sister Taviti, a native Tahitian whom Sister Hansen is bringing to America to study our ways, family life, housekeeping, etc. They attended our services, and at our Wednesday evening prayer meeting Sister Hansen gave a lecture about missionary work on the islands.

We also had with us Brother E. H. Fisher and wife from Boston. Sisters Hansen and Taviti left us May 5 for Independence.

Sunday, May 7, we had a fine spiritual sacrament and prayer meeting. Monday, the 8th, a priesthood meeting was held, ordination being the chief feature.

On the 14th we had with us Brother H. R. Inonge, a native of Honolulu, and his wife. They are recently from Independence where we understand he was baptized and married. They will make their home at Honolulu.

This Sunday was very fittingly observed as Mothers' Day. The Sunday school furnished a very fine program for the occasion, and our pastor, E. E. Hartsough, addressed the congregation on the subject of "Mother." On the pulpit stood a bouquet of red and white flowers, each flower being contributed by different members of the branch in memory of any overlooked or unknown mother. The church was also handsomely decorated. The Religio services were also in harmony with the occasion.

We are holding our own all right, and moving ahead slowly. Our meetings are spiritual and inspiring.

GEORGE S. LINCOLN.

New Philadelphia, Ohio

Our pastor, Elder William Goudy, is thoughtful and energetic. Our Sunday school superintendent is a real Scotchman, Elder James Carlile, who is wide awake to the minute, accomplishes a great deal of good. We will not take time to speak of all the other good officers, but say in brief that we are moving upward.

A few months before Easter, our Sunday school superintendent felt impressed to start a class to prepare them for baptism. So on Easter Sunday thirteen precious souls were ready.

We have some in the branch, as nearly all branches do, who are sleeping on their rights, forgetful of the blessings of the Lord. How grand it would be if we could all be numbered among the wise virgins, having our lamps trimmed and filled with oil.

We often hear it said, "A chain is just as strong as its weakest link," or "Our bodies are just as strong as our weakest part." Would it also be true that our branch is just as strong as its weakest member? We should seek to strengthen our weak ones. If they are weak because their burdens are too heavy, other brothers and sisters should place their shoulders under the burden and help them over the stony part of life.

We should have greater faith in the ministry of the church. Like little children who daily receive their food from the table, we do not comprehend our blessings.

Your brother in gospel bonds, A. B. KLAR.

MISCELLANEOUS

District Reunion Program Committee

In the opinion of the Presidency, the district reunion should be under the jurisdiction of the district conference. The district president is the logical chairman of the reunion committee. As many others may be associated with him as the district may choose to elect, but it is well to bear in mind that large committees do not as a rule obtain results.

It is the custom in many districts to leave the question of program until the reunion is organized, ordinarily on the first day of the reunion session. At the meeting for organization some one is selected or designated to have charge of all meetings, to map out the program, etc. The planning for the actual program of the reunion should not be left to such a late date. Not only should the district president as chairman of the committee be authorized to make provision for the reunion, he should also definitely be authorized to arrange for a reunion program. The program then may be mapped out weeks and perhaps months in advance, so that it may be well thought out and arranged in an orderly manner.

It is the suggestion of the Presidency that the district president in arranging this program should do so in consultation with the heads of the departments, viz, the superintendent of the Sunday school, the Religio field worker, the district organizer of the Women's Department, the district chorister, and the bishop or bishop's agent. It will be well, we think, for district conferences and district officers to bear this suggestion in mind and make provision so that another year programs may be well worked out for each district reunion. May 29, 1922.

The schools wishing something not only interesting and effective in a general way, but which when concluded will leave definite impressions on the minds of the children and the audience, would do well to secure copies of the newly published cantata on sale at the Herald Office for 10 cents each, or 75 cents a dozen.

This was selected by the committee as the best of thirty-six papers submitted in a contest to get good material. Its music is mostly selected for present use from the church books, but the theme is original and satisfactory. The title is "Zion redeemed," and the author is Mollie Davis, of Independence.

The Acacia gives the list of those attending Graceland this year. For the college 109 names are listed; in religious education, 27; the academy, 86; commercial, 11; and studio, 99. This indicates a total enrollment of nearly 300, allowing for about 40 of the Studio Department who are taking work in other departments. It will be noted with interest that the collegiate department leads, and when to this is added the fact that the religious education class is composed of those having a high school training or its equivalent, the number of those taking collegiate work is encouraging.

The Trials and Consecration of Fifty Years Ago

In the dark days of the 50's and 60's many were lost. But some came forth through much tribulation to a consecrated service.

It is well worth our while occasionally to consider the conditions of the past with relation to the problems confronting us to-day. There are many in the church to-day who do not appreciate what the "dark and cloudy day" really meant.

Recently we were called to Lamoni to attend the funeral of Sister Alice C. France. She had been baptized in England in 1848 against the advice and wishes of her family. She was the only one of her family to join the church. She married and came to America in 1859 with the intention of going to Utah, but was met by some old English friends who had preceded her, and who on their return told her of existing conditions. That was indeed a day of darkness. She had given up her family for the church; she had left her native land and come as far as Omaha for what she believed to be the truth, only to learn that the church had gone wrong.

Shortly after they removed to Kewanee, Illinois, where she had a vision of our late President Joseph Smith and received assurance of the Reorganization. This good news, for it was indeed good news to the scattered Saints, was confirmed by missionaries, and they were baptized in 1867.

Thereafter both Elder Thomas France and his wife, Alice France, were devoted to the work of the church. He was president of the branch for some years in Kewanee and was active both there and in Lamoni in administering to the sick, in which he was greatly blessed. She helped with the singing, possessing a voice of unusual quality, and both of them kept open house. They also many times denied themselves and their own family in order to help their brethren and sisters, thus showing a deep spirit of consecration. Nor did they use their hospitality and help to others as an excuse, but fully kept the law of God, both temporal and spiritual, and regularly paid their tithing.

This very brief sketch by no means is adequate in a biographical sense. They are one out of many who passed through that "dark and cloudy day." The great majority lost all confidence in the church and were never reclaimed. There are many thousands, if not half a million or more, in the Mississippi Valley, of descendants of those who were once members of the church, but who lost their hope, when after the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, the leading officers of the Quorum of Twelve went to Utah and there departed from the faith and brought in the abomination of polygamy and in other ways brought suffering on the honest in heart. Many lost all hope in religion. A few, perhaps five per cent, ultimately went to Utah and made the best of conditions as they found them. Many others became affiliated with the Reorganization and received it with great joy.

It is difficult for people living to-day to understand the greatness of the joy of these scattered Saints when the tidings went forth that "Young Joseph" had come forth as the leader of the church.

To those who have come up through tribulation, who passed through that "dark and cloudy day," there remains an experience that makes them feel their own responsibility for any course taken by the church and its officers. They feel it is not only their privilege, but also their duty, to know that which is being done, in order that they may give an intelligent support.

In the light of those conditions, the provision in Doctrine and Covenants 114, received in 1861, is more readily understood. With their great joy in the coming of "Young Joseph," there was still a caniness associated, so that they desired that he should approve himself by his life to the church. This was set forth in section 122: 5, received in 1894. It would be a mistake to call this attitude one of lack of confidence. It is true that it is not blind credulity, but it is based on the intelligent confidence and love, and a desire to support and a willingness to support, and it was so based in 1861.

Conditions have changed with the passing years. By 1894, and before then, the one chosen had fully approved himself to the church. But while conditions have changed, there still remains something of that spirit with the individuals who came through that time of darkness and with their descendants in the church of a responsibility to weigh the work undertaken and to give, instead of blind credulity, their intelligent support. As Zion is in the land of Missouri, so do they desire, in the Missouri sense, to be shown.

Another fact of which it would be well for us to remind ourselves is the real brotherly love and spirit of consecration among many of the church fifty years ago. We think we are safe in saying that Elder France and his wife were as ready to consecrate or give their all for the benefit of the work of the church as are any of their children or grandchildren to-day, and probably more ready than many of their descendants are to-day. While the people then were relatively poor, while prices also were lower, there was an open hospitality and a willingness upon the part of more than one for self-denial to help others.

At General Conference there are many still living who remember how no price was asked for room or board; how facilities available were used. We might sleep all the men in one room and all the women in another room on the floor with as much bedding as could be found to spread over us. We have slept seven or eight in one room perhaps ten by eight feet, with just sufficient room to drop the outer clothing at one's feet and to crawl in.

There is a great work before us to-day. We possess a wonderful opportunity, but it is well to remember that there are many who have gone before who have given all for the church. And there are many who have gone before who have denied themselves and have truly preferred one another. An opportunity is offered us of equaling, if we cannot excel, their spirit of devotion, and in our greater wealth of to-day opportunity is offered us of better preparation in order that we may be able to make a more valuable consecration.

The Accuracy of the Book of Covenants

This book was the one approved by the church.

In a recent issue the Book of Covenants was called in question. It has been a source of continual surprise why our opponents will continue to attack that book, with the Book of Commandments, and yet continue to ignore the plain factors involved which have been set forth more than once.

Anyone who is at all acquainted with the printing business knows how readily errors, and even serious errors, will creep into the printed page. We have in the Herald Office people of unusual ability who watch themselves and the copy with the utmost care, and yet occasionally even serious errors appear.

It is quite true that the revelations were sent up to Missouri to be printed. The manuscript was approved, but those who had the work in charge agreed that it was not completed and finished, and that which is more serious, that both in the Evening and Morning Star and in the Book of Covenants, serious errors had appeared.

This has been discussed several times in the SAINTS' HERALD quite recently. An article appearing in the HERALD for May 8, 1907, volume 34, page 404, by Heman C. Smith. Later on an article appeared on the Book of Commandments in the HERALD for June 17, 1914, volume 61, beginning on page 565, this also by Heman C. Smith. Again an article was printed in the HERALD last year, February 9, 1921, volume 68, page 125.

In each of these articles we may learn how these revelations were printed in the Evening and Morning Star, and in the Book of Commandments, how the press was destroyed, the copy scattered, how copies were preserved and some of them have been bound. But these copies, so far as we know, were incomplete and broke off in the middle of a sentence.

From the Evening and Morning Star we note the following statement made by Oliver Cowdery in a reprint published in Kirtland in 1834, since the earliest numbers were reprinted in that place. This statement in volume 1, page 16 of the reprint, is as follows:

On the revelations we merely say, that we were not a little surprised to find the previous print [Book of Commandments] so different from the original. We have given them a careful comparison, assisted by individuals whose known integrity and ability is unexcusable. Thus saying we cast no reflections upon those who were intrusted with the responsibility of publishing them in Missouri, as our own labors were included in that important service to the church, and it was our unceasing endeavor to have them correspond with the copy furnished us. We believe they are now correct. If not in every word, at least in principle. For the special good of the church we have also added a few items from other revelations.—Editor of the Latter Day Saints' Messenger and Advocate, Evening and Morning Star, vol. 1, p. 16.

He further says:

We have again inserted the articles and covenants according to our promise in a previous number, for the benefit of our brethren abroad who have not the first number of the first volume. As there were some errors which had got into them by transcribing, we have since obtained the original copy and made the necessary corrections.—The Evening and the Morning Star, vol. 2, p. 196 (reprint).—SAINTS' HERALD, vol. 61, p. 568.

While we are further informed that in the first print of the Evening and Morning Star he made the following statement:

There are many typographical errors in both volumes, and especially in the last, which we shall endeavor carefully to correct, as well as principle, if we discover any. It is also proper for us to say that in the first fourteen numbers, in the revelations, are many errors, typographical, and others, occasioned by transcribing manuscripts, but as we shall have access to originals, we shall endeavor to make proper corrections.—Vol. 2, p. 384, Evening and Morning Star.—SAINTS' HERALD, vol. 61, p. 568.

These seem to be clear-cut admissions that the printed copy did not follow the original.

It is true that Sidney Rigdon wrote a letter on June 25, 1833, indicating a few grammatical errors and that this letter was signed by all of the First Presidency. But there appears no reason to believe that Sidney Rigdon changed the original revelations.

Because of this unsatisfactory first printing, a committee was appointed to give the matter careful attention, to the printing of the first Book of Doctrine and Covenants, to the reading of proofs and verification, and this volume was then presented to the church in general assembly and accepted quorum by quorum. The Book of Commandments was never accepted by the church as being correct; the Book of Doctrine and Covenants was. The Book of Commandments was never accepted by the leading officers of the church as being correct; the Book of Doctrine and Covenants was. The Book of Commandments was not even presented by the printers as being without serious error.

On the other hand, there remains only the statement of David Whitmer, made more than fifty years after the event, in his age, when he could not see how to write himself, and his statements were taken down by those opposed to the church.

We may note that the Book of Doctrine and Covenants received the indorsement of Joseph Smith, of Oliver Cowdery, of Sidney Rigdon, and Frederick G. Williams. This includes the president of the church, his two counselors, and one of the committee to have charge of the arrangements when published in the Book of Commandments. And he was immediately followed by the other two members of that committee, W. W. Phelps and John Whitmer. Each testified that the Book of Doctrine and Covenants was true.

There are some who are ready to assert that these men entered into a conspiracy. But the proof is not forthcoming. And if that was true in 1834, then their work was certainly discredited in 1833. While to accept their statement and honest acknowledgment that mistakes were made at the first printing, in not completing the manuscript, in the typography, in principle, and otherwise, is but to extend to them decent courtesy and respect.

We may note that the High Council of Zion, by Elder Levi Jackson, also bore testimony that the revelations in the book were true and the high council of Missouri accepted and approved them. David Whitmer was president of the high council of Missouri. So far as we have any record, he did not at that time, nor at any reasonable time subsequent thereto, challenge this unanimous vote. Nor did he at any time in his life claim that his position personally or that of the high council had been misrepresented by Levi Jackson. The more charitable and reasonable construction to place upon his testimony is that in his old age he had forgotten the date of the appearance of the Book of Commandments and of the Doctrine and Covenants; that details over fifty years old were not clear in his mind.

The same subject was also discussed in the Journal of History for April, 1912. It is not true that the issue is one that the church has attempted to avoid in either particular. We do question the necessity of repeated reiteration of a few plain facts. The statement of David Whitmer was challenged during his lifetime, at once upon the appearance of his Address. The church has not been delinquent; nor do we desire in the least degree to avoid passing facts. But we do not consider that our freedom and love of truth require that we should give space regularly to our opponents for the sake of reprinting matters which have been fully discussed in our columns not once, but many times. S. A. B.

Ten Months of Church Finance

In the summary of the Presiding Bishop for the past ten months, July 1, 1921, to April 30, 1922, in last week's HERALD, showing where our dollar went, we notice first of all that if receipts for the ten months had been in proportion to the receipts for the previous year they would have amounted to over $434,000. In fact, when we consider that the summer months are lighter, they were more than that for the previous fiscal year. This year the receipts were less than $295,000.

The statement indicates quite heavy reduction in expenditure and if the receipts had been in proportion to the receipts the previous year there would have been a considerable margin of receipts over expenditures of some $66,000. But owing to the heavy decline in receipts, the retrenchment proved not sufficient to balance, hence the deficit of operating receipts is shown, of nearly $73,000.

It is interesting also to notice that over two thirds of the expenditures have been made for elders' families and elders' expenses for the ten months, and less than one third for the helping of the poor, for the church institutions, for office expenses, and stake expenses.

Yet there is indicated a reduction of nearly $40,000 in the amount paid to elders' families over the pro rata for the previous year, a reduction of over 16 per cent; in elders' expenses the reduction is over $49,000, amounting to more than 51 per cent. The general office expense, of all the general church offices and general church expense combined, shows a decrease over the pro rata for the previous year of over $19,000, a matter of 29 per cent. The stake expenses show a decrease of $5,000, more than 30 per cent.

The amount paid to the aid of the poor, for the various homes, and for the Sanitarium shows a decrease over the pro rata for the previous year of $16,000, a matter of 28 per cent.

In other words, for all purposes there is indicated a reduction of about $133,000 over the pro rata expenditure for the previous fiscal year, July 1, 1920, to June 30, 1921, which is a reduction of over 26 per cent.

The outstanding factors are the retrenchment which brought the expenditure well within the receipts for the previous year; the fact that of the actual expenditures over two thirds were charged to elders' and elders' families expenses. Possibly the rumors of reduction of missionary forces affected the income. In any event, it is sincerely hoped by all who have the interest of the church at heart, that there will be no further decline in receipts, and that the further retrenchment recently made in releasing of men from the missionary force will soon be found unnecessary, and the forces of men on the firing line will soon be greatly increased as the demands on the church and the need of the world for the gospel of Jesus Christ would appear to fully justify.

Shall I Go to College?

The attention of our readers is called to the advertisement of Graceland College now running in the HERALD, and which will continue through the summer. With the close of the school year many of us are considering our plans for next year. Young people, many of them, will be anxious to try their spurs and go to work, but those who are older in years well know that there will never again be quite so good an opportunity for study and preparation for more effective work. Study is good in so far as it helps us to develop our natural powers and in so far as we are humbly willing to rededicate our powers to the service of Christ and his work.

The educational standards of the country are very much higher than fifty years ago. That which was sufficient to meet the situation fifty years ago is grossly inadequate to-day. The number of colleges, the number of students in college, is very greatly increased. The complexity of modern life has also greatly increased. The work before the church requires, in fact demands, trained men and women.

We do not mean that we want those who simply have book learning, who are able to repeat in some form the substance of that which they have read. We do need men and women who know what others have tried and what they are doing, and we need them if we are to have men and women who can rightly appreciate the plan of the church as set forth in divine revelation. We need, in other words, a broad preparation and then the whole man or woman fired with the Spirit of our heavenly Father.

For success in the world, right preparation is becoming more and more necessary. For the work of the church the better prepared a man is, the better fitted he will be to cope with every situation that confronts him, providing always that he remains humble and full of love, possessing the spirit of charity and of wisdom through the Spirit of God.

We are receiving many letters from men in the mission field who are lacking in preparation, who clearly see that with better training more effective work could be done, and who see their own efforts limited because the members of the priesthood with whom they have to labor have not laid even an ordinary foundation.

One of our missionaries who is already a college graduate expresses himself to the effect, "Were I to have continued as a teacher in high school or college I certainly should have taken a degree of doctor of philosophy. Do I need less preparation or less training or less devotion as a teacher in the kingdom of God?"

The class in Religious Education offers an opportunity for the discussion of doctrines and of principles, and doubtless a beginning of that which the church will need to meet some of the serious problems which will come before us as a church. Many of the leading officers of the church, of the Presidency, of the Quorum of Twelve, of the Seventy, and of the High Priests have met with the class, sometimes for several days, and have discussed problems of mutual interest. The course of one year is hardly sufficient, but it does give at least a basis, and an effort is being made to make it more effective as rapidly as possible.

S. A. B.

At the top and climax of divine Revelation is Personality. God's revelation of truth, progressively disclosed through ages, came to its culmination in Christ, made its complete, luminous, and effulgent expression in a unique and peerless composite personality, Divine-human, and Man of Nazareth, in whom dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead bodily; a personality nowise explicable as a human evolution, a truly divine embodiment, and "stepping," as even Theodore Parker said, "thousands of years before the race of man."—William V. Kelley, in A Pilgrim of the Infinite.

Our business in life is not to get ahead of other people, but to get ahead of ourselves.—Babcock.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES

General Conference Auditorium

From different sections of the country we continue to have these questions asked, "When will be commenced the erection of the General Conference Auditorium?" and "What has become of the money contributed for the Auditorium?"

On the second page of the HERALD of June 21, 1921, we tabulated the amounts subscribed to this fund by the various districts with the following comment:

Doubtless, many expect that the active work of construction on the Auditorium would have been begun ere this. While the plans and specifications are being carefully worked out, prices of building material are declining, and it is hoped by the time the work is commenced the prewar level of prices will have been reached.

We desire to call special attention to page 592 of the Bishop's Number of the HERALD, June 21, 1921, in which the status of the Auditorium fund at that time is set forth as follows:

In view of the stringent financial condition caused by the general depression in business, the Presiding Bishopric deemed it advisable to exchange part of the special funds for Liberty Bonds from Operating Funds, rather than to borrow the money needed for current operating purposes and pay interest at perhaps 7 or 8 per cent. Other temporary, properly secured, interest-bearing investments were made out of the special funds, the income of which will, of course, be added to the fund. The investments made out of the Auditorium Fund are of such a nature that they can be liquidated upon short notice and thus will not in any way interfere with the construction of the General Conference Auditorium.

During its sessions in May, 1921, the Order of Bishops recommended that the building of the Auditorium be postponed for the following reasons:

1. General business depression.
2. Existing deficit for 1920-21.
3. Prospective deficit for following year.
4. Prospective reduction in the prices of material and labor.

In the HERALD of November 29, 1921, and the Ensign of the same week, there appeared an article from this office clearly setting forth the history of the whole matter and the reason why the building had not been begun. This explanation should be read in full, but for the convenience of the Saints we quote below the following paragraph therefrom:

The total cash collected for the building at this date is $341,000. The payments on the pledges are falling due. Saints here and there have written us that on account of unemployment, falling prices of farm products, inability to secure money, they are temporarily embarrassed so that they cannot meet these payments. Others do not write, but cease paying, yet we know many of them have good reasons for so doing. However, we have faith in the Saints and believe that the pledges will be paid when possible, but, under the existing conditions, and for lack of sufficient funds to meet the ordinary expenses of the general church, we are not inclined to urge unduly nor to demand sacrifice unto hardship in this special undertaking.

In further answer to the question as to what has been done with the Auditorium money, we quote the following statement from an article entitled, "The financial situation in the church," appearing in the HERALD of December 6 and the Ensign of December 8, 1921:

In order to secure the necessary cash to meet this operating shortage, instead of disposing of our Liberty Bonds and other quickly convertible interest-bearing assets, we have borrowed from time to time the necessary cash from the Auditorium and other special funds by setting apart sufficient of such interest-bearing assets as will repay the loans, so that when it is decided to proceed with the construction of the Auditorium the money will be available for that purpose.

This action of the Presiding Bishopric in investing these special funds in general church assets which can be converted into cash when needed was endorsed by the recent Joint Council of Presidency, Twelve, and Bishopric.

That in the opinion of the Joint Council the policy of the Presiding Bishopric in investing special funds moneys temporarily in General Church assets during the present financial stringency should be approved and, further it is the opinion of the Joint Council that such policy should be continued as long as the need may exist because of the financial pressure.

From the foregoing it will be seen that frequent official consideration has been given to the Auditorium situation and the membership advised periodically through the church press.

To date there has been collected for the Auditorium $399,683.02. Most of this money has been borrowed for the missionary and other operating expenses of the general church, but sufficient security has been set aside from the general church assets and placed in the Auditorium fund. These securities can be reconverted into cash at any time so that the money will be available when required for the construction of the Auditorium.

From a few sources we have received the suggestion that the erection of the building should at once be undertaken upon the assumption that if this were done sufficient means would be forthcoming to carry the work forward to completion, and besides the undertaking of this task would have a wholesome effect upon the receipts of the church in tithes and offerings. We submitted this phase of the question to a number of officials in different parts of the church, and the unanimous reply was that the action to postpone the work of construction was well advised and for the best interests of the general church. The following is representative of the sentiments expressed in the replies received:

It seems to me when the membership of the church are made acquainted with the fact that this has saved them thousands of dollars, and that it has made it possible for the church to do much work which it otherwise would have been unable to do, they ought to feel very grateful that the Bishopric pursued this course. By using this fund instead of borrowing elsewhere, the church has saved itself considerable money that otherwise would have been paid out in interest. I do not believe the postponement of the erection of the Auditorium has seriously affected the payment of tithes and offerings. The terrible depression of the last two years is what not only has prevented the membership from paying tithing, but also has delayed payment of their Auditorium pledges. I am inclined to think the people who had tithing due have paid it, but the fact the receipts are so much lighter is due to the people having nothing to tithe. Our people are generally wage-earners, and the wage-earners have had a tremendous struggle to make a living during the last two years.

Thus the situation stands at the present. Next October the matter will be given further consideration and a representative expression obtained from the general church in conference assembly as to when to commence the construction of the building. We urge the membership to continue to make payments on their pledges as they are able to do without neglecting their tithing.

The Covenant of Life

By A. M. Chase

Have we made a covenant, or are we simply trying to play the game, hoping for a margin of profit?

For some time now, every daily paper I have picked up has had as one of the items of news on the front page, something like this, "Another broker added to list of bankrupts," and with every addition to this long, and still growing list of failure, there are brought to our notice a multitude of clients who, hoping to gain wealth in the gambling on prices of our commodities and products, join in the lament of one of Will Carlton's characters, "My pocketbook's short, my countenance long."

The chance of obtaining earthly riches by an easier way than earning or producing has always appealed to humanity so strongly that the mere offer to guarantee a profit beyond the returns of legitimate business has never failed to bring numbers of individuals who are willing to "take a chance," no matter how small it may be when viewed in the light of reason and justice. The many who are found in these ranks seem to justify the saying, "There is one born every minute."

Gambling in Futures

Nor is it alone in the quest for earthly riches that we see this effort to "get rich quick," or, in other words, lay up treasures without giving an equivalent in service, as represented either in the coin of the realm, or in honest toil. How many of us are inclined to trust to our church connection or declaration of faith to bring us safely into the triumphant kingdom of God?

The Lesson of Israel of Old

When the Lord called Abraham out from his father's house, the blessing which was to be his was to extend to "all the families of the earth." So, when he brought his posterity into the promised land, there was given them the opportunity to build such a commonwealth, that the world would get a glimpse, not only of the brotherhood of man, as shown forth among the tribes of Israel, but also an idea of the fatherhood of God: for in teaching this great truth, there must be the orderly process of exemplifying the unknown by the known. To this end were the checks and counterchecks placed upon business, so that every man should not only be alert in extending aid unto the poor, but every seven years there should be a partial release of debts, and in the year of jubilee—every fiftieth year—even the land would revert to the family unto which it had been assigned under the initial division of the commonwealth.

Under this administration of the covenant there would not be a necessity for the warning of Isaiah, "Woe unto them that join house to house, that lay field to field, till there be no place, that they may be placed alone in the midst of the earth!" But every generation would have its own opportunity for life and development, while those who so helped to maintain the balance of development in their national life would realize the faithfulness of the promise, "For this thing the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works and in all that thou putteth thy hand unto." (See Isaiah 5: 8 and Deuteronomy 15: 1-11.)

This was to be the sure, legitimate road to earthly wealth and national blessing and prosperity: but it was also the road of endeavor, of honest toil and service, where they would reap the fruits of their own sowing. It was not an offer of "velvet," but of legitimate dividends from capital invested.

If this law had been carried out in the spirit, even the provision which permitted bondage for debt would have ultimately wrought for the uplift of the race: for among every people is to be found those who need discipline in real honesty and business acumen, and this would have been obtained in their obligation to pay—which our later laws of bankruptcy do not always impress—and in their association and service under those who were possessed of business ability; and from this service would they have passed out to independent effort with a new start in life, for—

When thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty: thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy flour, and out of thy winepress; of that wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him. . . . It shall not seem hard unto thee, when thou sendest him away free from thee; for he hath been worth a double hired servant to thee, in serving thee six years: and the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all that thou doest.

Israel's gamble with life turns out to be

A Covenant With Death and an Agreement With Hell

By reading Jeremiah 34: 8-22 you will see that the nation had not kept this law, but even when they had been brought to an acknowledgment of their fault in this regard, and had consented to observe this requirement, "Afterward they turned, and caused the servants and the handmaids, whom they had let go free, to return, and brought them into subjection for servants and handmaids." Because of these transgressions Isaiah was told to, "Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and show my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins."

The condemnation here declared did not come because the nation did not seek to worship God, for, "They seek me daily, and delight to know my ways, as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinance of their God: They ask of me the ordinances of justice; they take delight in approaching to God." They seemed to think that by this approaching to God they would be entitled to his protection as a nation, while they absolutely ignored the ordinances of mercy which, always tempering judgment, would have proved a very covenant of life to the nation, and a source of light and blessing to all nations.

Let us read the prophet's description of properly keeping the fasts unto the Lord:

Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?

And let us see further what the effects of this observance would have been: "Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thine health shall spring forth speedily; and thy righteousness shall go before thee; the glory of the Lord shall be thy reward. Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer." Read this in Isaiah 58, and then turn to the same prophet's message as given in the 28th chapter; here the Lord lays bare the mistake they have made, and declares: "Your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand."

A reading of this entire chapter cannot fail to be interesting and profitable just here. Notice that even the many revelations of God to them were to make their fall more absolute and their breaking more sure; for where much is given much is required. As long as this nation sought daily to know the ways of the Lord, and then utterly failed to attempt to walk in these ways, the effect of this revelation of God was their condemnation. They had not been weaned from the ways of the world as they had learned them in Egypt when they were in bondage there, hence they could not learn or understand. Let us hear the prophet just here:

Whom shall he teach knowledge? and whom shall he make to understand doctrine? them that are weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts. For precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little and there a little: for with stammering lips and another tongue will he speak to this people, to whom he said, This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest; and this is the refreshing: yet they would not hear. [Italics mine.] But the word of the Lord was unto them precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little and there a little; that they might go, and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken. [Italics mine.]

The Lesson for Latter-Day Israel

We scarce need to quote Paul's declaration here that in all these things they were for our example or admonition (1 Corinthians 10: 11), nor yet Nephi's declaration that we may liken the words of Isaiah to all people (2 Nephi 8: 16), for we are continually witnessing to the world that like causes always produce like effects.

Life Unto Life or Death Unto Death

God's plan of revelation still remains the same: there comes to us "precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little and there a little"; for never at any time, or unto any people has the Master given to know but in part, only as they have lived up to the ideals so revealed until they have been (like Enoch and his people of old) "glorified in light." The Master has declared that, "To him that continueth to receive, more shall be given; but unto whomsoever continueth not to receive, from him shall be taken away even that that he seemeth to have": and the warning is still pertinent, "Take heed therefore that the light which is in thee be not darkness"; for if, by ignoring the conditions given whereby Zion may be redeemed, we so grieve the Holy Spirit—the Spirit of revelation—that it is withdrawn from us, then is the way opened for the return of the Spirit of the world, and it will come so reinforced by other spirits of mammon, that the last end of this people will be worse than the first.

Our Covenant

In the baptism of Helam, as recorded in Mosiah 9: 44, Alma declared it was "a testimony that ye have entered into a covenant to serve him [Almighty God—A. M. C.] until you are dead as to the mortal body," and every time we partake of the Lord's supper we declare our willingness, not only to take upon us the name of Christ, but to, "always remember him and keep the commandments which he has given them" [us]. And the Master has warned us that only upon the conditions that we do keep his commandments, have we any promise of eternal life, in the regeneration or the blessings of the gospel in the "life that now is."

A Dependable Broker Doing Legitimate Business

If we have entered into this great adventure in finance, this account with the banking house of God, have we become wearied in well-doing, or fearful of the soundness of the concern with which we are attempting to do business? There never was a time when the opportunity to invest in this enterprise offered better returns, nor when the privilege of investment was more freely open to the Saints of God.

In the preface to the Doctrine and Covenants the warning is given that peace is to be soon taken from the earth, and it is for the church to prepare for this time of trouble; and in Doctrine and Covenants 107: 2 the statement and question is, "For the day of my visitation cometh speedily, in an hour when ye think not of, and where shall be the safety of my people, and refuge for those who shall be left?" And in this same section the Saints are admonished to send their treasures from far, that the Temple may be built in Zion.

If the call should again go out for this consecration for a physical temple, how many of us would make an effort to have a part in the building of this house unto the Lord? Is not the call to rally to the help of the church—the spiritual temple—the true tabernacle—that the work of building up Zion, and carrying the message to the nations of the earth be not hindered, of much greater importance?

The Bank Is Sound

Brethren, the bank is sound and the enterprise of building up the kingdom of God is a legitimate undertaking, whose dividends are sure to those who are willing to place their resources at the command of the King. The only question is, Have we been weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts of worldly ambition until we are willing to make our covenant effective by sacrifice? It is no longer a question of, "How much thou requirest," but rather, "How much can I invest, both in money and in endeavor?" for we have been admonished that now is

OF GENERAL INTEREST

The Status of Education

Civilization has accepted the fiat that under democratic forms of government education is essential. Where the people rule, the people must be educated.

Yet there are still a great many people who regard education as a luxury, as a side show or appendage of the state. We at present in the United States have no minister of education in the President's cabinet. Britain has a minister of education, but that is not preventing the new economy proposals advanced by Sir Eric Geddes from ruthlessly slashing educational appropriations, wiping out to a great extent the great educational undertakings inspired during the illiteracy discovered during the war tests, and even to reduce teachers' salaries, making the profession even less attractive and less efficient than in prewar days. It is a hopeful sign, however, that these proposals have aroused a storm of public disapproval in Britain.

In this country, on the other hand, the illiteracy revealed by the war tests has shocked and inspired us to wider educational endeavor, not only in the individual States, but in Congress.

The idea of a state organized for the education of its citizens in the widest possible sense was worked out in Plato's "Laws." The outstanding feature of the suggested constitution was that the minister of education was also the prime minister—and in this country it would mean he was also the President. In fact, in Plato's ideal state, spiritual and mental education, the best intellects conforming to the best principles, would reign in all positions of authority. For Plato believed that intellectual development went hand in hand with moral development.

It may be some time before we can attain to any such ideal, but there isn't any question about the menace of ignorance and illiteracy in a democracy, and such an ideal is worth striving towards.

President Wilson, our schoolmaster President, may have proved a long way from being the ideal state leader, but he was a great man and he was an idealist. And he held office during the most disastrous upheaval the world has yet witnessed. Yet no matter what his failures, he will stand out in his the hastening time, and the Bridegroom is at the door. Let us examine ourselves and make answer, like one of old, "Here am I"; and let that answer include a complete consecration of all we have and are, for the Master's service. May we be equal in our willingness and endeavor to do this, that we may enjoy the fullness of the blessing and power of God.

tory as the man who set the ideals of his country upon a pinnacle which commanded respect. Any country must be the richer and greater for such school teachers. And incidentally most of the great statesmen of the world have been highly educated men, notwithstanding the few notable exceptions.

If we admit that ignorance and illiteracy are the greatest menaces to a democracy, we must also concede that a higher standard of general education is the paramount remedy. The time has gone by when the argument could be offered that it is dangerous to educate the masses out of their "sphere." Such a view is held to-day only by the narrow and obsolete thinkers. We know now that education only raises those spheres to higher standards of efficiency, denudes them of their degradation, insures a greater perfection in the humblest of services. The only disgrace to-day is to be an ignorant servitor, in whatever "sphere" one finds one's self.

Once this attitude of mind is firmly established in the public cognizance, we may look to see the whole status of education and of the teaching profession raised to the highest level in national appreciation and of national responsibility. And we are gradually but surely working to that end. Elementary schools, high schools, universities everywhere report "crowded to capacity." Our own southern branch of the State University has turned away as many students as it accepted, a condition that should not be possible in an intellectually idealistic democracy. Moreover, the whole standards of teaching requirements are being raised. We no longer have "normal" schools for the training of our teachers—henceforth they will all be university graduates, whether their "sphere" takes them to the elementary or the high schools, or the little country school-houses. And they are nearly twice as well paid as twenty years ago, commanding the greater respect their abilities demand.

States everywhere are increasing their university capacities in response to an overwhelming public demand.—Los Angeles Times, January 31, 1921.

"The Bible, What a Book!"

One of the exquisite selections which Nina Salaman has collected in Apples and Honey (Doubleday, Page & Company) is a paragraph of rhapsodic prose by the poet Heine which even in translation carries the emotional exaltation of a great poem.

"The Bible, what a book! Large and wide as the world, based on the abysses of creation, and peering aloft into the blue secrets of heaven, sunrise and sunset, promise and fulfillment, birth and death, the whole drama of humanity are contained in this one book. It is the book of God. The Jews may readily be consoled at the loss of Jerusalem, and the Temple and the Ark of the Covenant, and all the crown jewels of King Solomon. Such forfeiture is as naught when weighed against the Bible, the indestructible treasure that they have saved. That one book is to the Jews their country, their possessions—at once their ruler and their weal and woe. Within the well-fenced boundaries of that book they live and have their being; they enjoy their inalienable citizenship, are strong to admiration; thence none can dislodge them. Absorbed in the perusal of their sacred book, they little heeded the changes that were wrought in the real world around them. Nations rose and vanished, states flourished and decayed, revolutions raged throughout the earth—but they sat poring over this book, unconscious of the wild chase of time rushing on above their heads."—Kansas City Star.

The Great Ties of Life

In times of stress, it is a relief to refer back to the pages of history and find that most of that which is worrying us to-day is not new, but that the world has faced it successfully in ages past. And thus in the attack made upon the drama and moving pictures to-day, a parallel may be found after the commonwealth in England at the time of the restoration of Charles II. The same fight was then conducted and with similar arguments, by similar elements.

Macaulay, reviewing the dramatists of that period, states that public opinion was on the side of the reformer, so that a great and rapid change for the better appeared in all departments of lighter literature and a new race of wits and poets arose who generally treated with reverence the great ties which bind us together—love of family, of parents, of children, reverence for marriage and for loyalty to the state and religion and the church.

As The Outlook sets forth, this, after all, is the test. Those who would ridicule and destroy reverence for the great ties that bind us are, after all, the real social enemies.

Several clippings inform us that a week's healing mission was conducted by the Episcopal Church at Greeley, Colorado, the early part of May. This includes both an announcement and also news items stating the success of the effort. It is stated clearly that deaf people immediately testified that they could hear; those whose sight was poor claimed they saw clearly; the lame walked better and were confident that they would soon be made whole. The method used was the laying on of hands.

Stewardship a Solvent for Poverty

By C. A. Smurthwaite

Stewardship would make for the unification of all classes.

The chief causes of poverty, speaking in an economic sense, may be fairly put into the following category:

1. The failure to base our economic standards on the teachings of Jesus Christ.
2. The failure to realize that we are all dependent upon on another; that when one suffers we all suffer.
3. The belief that it is perfectly right for us to secure for ourselves individually as much wealth as we can, regardless of the effect upon others.
4. The failure to organize for good while others organize freely for evil.
5. The idea that the purpose of work is merely to earn a living; therefore we all try to be smart enough to live without working, but out of the work of others.
6. Regarding labor as a commodity, something to be bought and sold.
7. The use of labor-saving machinery for personal profit rather than for wider and more economical service.
8. The use of automatic machinery whereby a man's economic foes may be those of his own household, the children.
9. Workers living in subjection to other people because they cannot get their bread and butter otherwise.
10. The discharge of workers when they become old, or sick, or otherwise incompetent.
11. The lowering of men's wages by the employment of women to do the work of men at lower wages, displacing men who ought to be husbands and therefore need higher wages.
12. The monopolization of land, making it difficult to own land and homes, resulting in the poor being forced to undesirable localities, and the ownership of natural resources by private corporations for private profit.
13. Lack of cooperation among the workers in the distribution of merchandise and for the creation of the tools and profits of industry.

What Stewardship Is

Ordinarily stewardship means "the office or duties of a steward; hence the duty of dispensing as an accountable person." The church corporate is the steward of the gospel; the officers of the church are stewards of the church.

A steward is "a person intrusted with the management of estates or affairs not his own." So long as a person thinks he owns, he is not a steward.

It is recorded in 1 Chronicles 28:1 that David "assembled . . . the stewards over all the substance and possessions of the king." A true king merely symbolizes as his possessions the possessions of the whole people.

How a Steward Administers His Stewardship

The steward in Matthew 19:8 put some men to work at various times of the day and then paid them equal wages: they all needed alike and were therefore paid alike, so long as they faithfully performed the duties during the time they were called to work; and in answer to complaints the steward said he had the right to give them equally of what was his as the steward of the kingdom.

Jesus taught a similar lesson to his disciples in Luke 12:42. The wise steward was the man who was giving to the household their portion of meat in due season; and the unwise steward was the man who did not, but who used the food himself and would be punished.

In Luke 16 there is an account of the unjust steward who wasted the estate maliciously and was removed. The Master said that we cannot serve both God and money, and being stated in the hearing of the Pharisees (very religious people who were lovers of money) they sneered at Jesus, as similar people are sneering to-day at the protagonists of the principle of stewardship, meaning the just distribution of wealth on the basis of the "needs" and just wants of all.

In this same chapter of Luke Jesus teaches us that Dives went to hell because he kept Lazarus poor by refusing to listen to Moses and the prophets, whose counsels were in behalf of the poor and against the accumulation of wealth for personal purposes.

It is quite evident that the intention of Jesus Christ was that we should base our economic standards on his teachings. Our failure, speaking as individuals and as society, to use these teachings as our economic standards is the primary cause of poverty in the world. Were the principle of stewardship made basic, all mankind would have his "portion of meat in due season"; and there would be none using his product wholly for himself.

Universal Interdependency

That we are dependent one upon another, individually and socially, is amplified in our common experience, and the years since the armistice have shown this more abundantly probably than at any time heretofore. All nations and peoples are interdependent; we are all one body, as Saint Paul puts it in 2 Corinthians 12: 26, and when one suffers we all suffer. It is becoming palpable to-day, if it never were before, that oppression of the people by the stewards of the world (rulers, employers, capitalists, etc.,) brings distress first to the people, then to the steward, a fact which Jesus taught in his parable of the unjust steward. We must get this fact into our consciousness and then we shall all forget ourselves in our work for others. The peoples of Europe were made first to suffer by the oppression of rulers and capitalists; then afterward the rulers and capitalists suffered. Had the rulers and capitalists (stewards) realized their oneness with the people there would have been no war, nor could there be, for war is always waged for individual and national aggrandizement. The "stewards" of kingdoms, governments, and business have regarded themselves as owners, rather than as stewards and rulers only, whose duty it is to rule and dispense justice (giving their households meat in due season).

The present standards of commerce and industry are violative of the spirit and teachings of Jesus Christ, being for private gain rather than for universal service, and making wealth for ourselves and demanding the right to use or spend it for our own pleasure and in any way we see fit.

Needs of Israel in the Wilderness

The duty of a steward is to administer his trust in harmony with the trust authority. The basic principle of "needs," as against private profit, is laid down in Exodus, chapter 16, where it is commanded that no man shall gather more of the "manna" than he shall need for himself and his family, and the sequel is told that, as is inevitable, there were some who did get more and some less than their needs, but when it was all measured out there was enough for all; none had anything left over and those who had little did not lack. It is a simple exposition of stewardship, where all put forth their best efforts to gather for the common good, a practical illustration of the Golden Rule in community welfare.

The Apostle Paul cited this basic example in 2 Corinthians 8, where he makes an appeal for aid for the poor Saints at Jerusalem, that the intention was not to bring distress upon the Corinthians and relief to others, but it was equalizing others' needs out of their abundance.

Using the terminology of this article, the Israelites in the wilderness and the Saints at Corinth were required to be "stewards" and to regard their possessions as in trust for the common weal.

Stewardship therefore conduces to the remembrance of the effect our business and industry will have upon others; for if they impoverish others while making for our opulence they violate the trust.

Stewardship means that, whether our business is individual or organized in the association with others, it is a trust in behalf of our employees and the community in which we operate. The first charge against a stewardship business is the compensation of all engaged in it, whether so-called owner or manager or hired help, on the basis of needs and just wants. There can be no differentiation. And in the event of a surplus being produced it becomes the property of the community, and so takes away the present natural incentive to exploit the workers.

Stewardship, being not for private gain but for the common good, is readily organized for the good of all, the selfish incentive being removed; which means therefore that good people would be organized freely for good and there would be little or no opportunity for organization for evil. Business organized for the purpose of service rather than private profit must inevitably overcome in competition any competitive business organized for private gain. It is a libel on the intelligence of intellect to say otherwise.

Stewardship means we would not work merely to earn a living, but because the work we do renders a service to the community which the community needs to have done. It places all forms of service on an equal footing, makes all of us professionals, diggers of ditches and engineers alike; exactly as a lawyer or a doctor, true to his professional instincts, gives his best service to his client and patient regardless of the fees involved, service being the motive, compensation being secondary. Labor thus would be removed from the commodity class, subject to barter and sale; for whether the steward should perform so-called menial or expert service it would be compensated for on the basis of the steward's needs and just wants.

Stewardship, not being interested in private profit but in the service to be given, would utilize labor-saving machinery for wider and more economical service and not for private profit. The use of automatic machinery could not therefore be employed to make foes of his own household, for the needs (food, clothing, education, etc.,) of children would probably require more money to supply them than would the needs of the father, even with his just wants added.

Stewardship would eliminate all the present subjection under which workers at present work. The worker would be working for the service he could render, alike with the manager or so-called owner. He would be subject to himself, his incentive being to give the highest possible service, for he would be a co-steward and conjointly responsible for efficient service; otherwise he would lose his stewardship, as the unjust steward did in the parable.

Stewardship would abolish discharge for old age, sickness, or other disability, or the present results thereof, for their "needs" would continue to be provided for out of the stewardship, as a first charge against the business alike with "wages" of those actively engaged, and such service as they were capable of rendering would still be rendered until total disability should ensue.

Stewardship would abolish the lowering of wages to women, because all workers, male and female alike, would be compensated according to their "needs." A woman might get more or less than a man, but only because the difference in their "needs" required it.

Stewardship would correct the monopolization in land, because the land would be utilized by the steward for the common good, and the incentive for monopolization taken away, that of private profit.

Stewardship corrects the lack of cooperation among the poor for the possession of the tools and other means of industry, because a steward is trained in the duties of his stewardship, the tools provided, for there is no incentive to keep them from him, but rather the incentive is to provide them in order that he may take his place among the producers.

A great friend of the poor, a philanthropist, and an eminent speaker and writer on social economics, states that "those who wish to see the world redeemed from sin and vice and crime must start their work by finding out how to organize industry so as to insure all useful labor shall be considered honorable and of value." It appears to the present writer that the principle of stewardship fulfills this requirement. It changes the motivation from wages, or profit, to service. It makes all service honorable by compensating all service on precisely an equal basis, i. e., on the "needs" and just wants of each. A great English statesman of the early nineteenth century was once asked what he would do if he were a bootblack. He replied that he would be the best bootblack in London. That would be the motivation of the steward, whatever his service might be. It would no longer be "work"; it would be service, a pleasure. The writer already quoted in this paragraph further states: "We must so raise the status of the worker in our midst that he will at last begin to realize that his labor and himself are things of real worth and consequence to the whole community." Stewardship would do this. It makes the industrial "foot" as necessary as the intellectual "head"; it compensates them both on the same plane, that of needs and just wants.

Stewardship, as it appears to the present writer, it would seem, would make for the unification of all classes; would bring about the prime realization essential to the bringing in of the kingdom of God and of his Christ that we are all one people, all one in mind and heart, one in joy and sorrow, for sorrow must come under any form of social life, one in true fellowship and comradeship, not poetically or sentimentally alone, but in fact and very deed.

We trust the reading of this article will enable us better to realize why the Lord has laid it down in what we call "the latter days," that his law is: "appoint every man his stewardship . . . for it is expedient that I, the Lord, should make every man accountable, as stewards, over earthly blessings." That this may be done individually is evident, it is largely determinable by one's self; and that it may be done in association with others, and should be so done where association means greater efficiency and value, is explicit in the instruction "that ye shall organize yourselves and appoint every man his stewardship." (Doctrine and Covenants 101:2.) A stewardship can be made operative individually when a man is individually qualified and has the means at hand; or cooperatively in any business or industry where collectivity is essential or desirable; and in either event all who are associated in a stewardship shall no longer be mere employees, in subjection to other people because they cannot get their bread and butter otherwise, but responsible stewards notwithstanding their service may be given under the direction of a supervising steward; while the dignity of all is maintained in the giving of the best service it is within the power of each to give, not for himself alone, but for his fellow men.

"And the Lord called his people Zion, because they were of one heart and one mind, and dwelt in righteousness; and there were no poor among them."—Doctrine and Covenants 36:2.

"Be one; and if ye are not one, ye are not mine."—Doctrine and Covenants 38:6.

Conquering Bad Habits With Good Ones

Judge Ben B. Lindsey, of Denver, urges that the only way to combat bad ideas in children is to crowd them out with better ones. Horace Bushnell preached a sermon many years ago on the expulsive power of a new affection. Centuries ago, Jesus told the story of a man from whom an evil spirit was cast out, but the swept and garnished room was not occupied, so the evil spirit came back with many others worse than himself.

According to Baptist, one may call it psychological or anything else, but even a little knowledge of boy nature will show the one method of conquering undesirable habits.

Home Craft Studies at Graceland

A copy of the Graceland Record, cataloging courses for the next school year, has reached our desk, with marked pages indicating the home craft subjects which are to be offered there. It brings a glow of gladness to our hearts to recognize therein the beginnings of conditions and opportunities which will, we trust, in the near future develop into those fuller and more special courses which, we feel, should be more generally included in the education of every girl.

The subjects marked we quote below, with the explanatory paragraphs connected with each, and ask each parent to thoughtfully consider their place and value in the education of their daughters.

General Psychology. This course will emphasize the more important features of the structure and functioning of the mind. While the chief emphasis will be placed upon those mental laws which are basic in teaching, many other possible applications of psychology will be considered. Students will be furnished mimeographed outlines of each topic covered and will have access to a score or more of the best textbooks in psychology available to-day. This work will be supplemented by lectures and experimental work.

Economics. A treatment of the theoretical aspects of economic life, followed in the second semester by detailed attention to economic problems which grow out of the complex relationships developed between the major economic groups.

Principles of Sociology. The relation of sociology to the other social sciences; the physical and psychical aspects of association; the process of socialization; social genesis; social values and social welfare.

Animal Biology. Lectures and laboratory work introductory to the entire field of animal life—structure, life history, physiology, ecology. The lectures deal primarily with the facts of evolution and the development and functions of the various parts of an animal. The laboratory work is given to a study of the structure of animals. Dissection will be largely supplemented by examination of microscopic slides and prepared specimens.

Chemistry. Inorganic. The lecture periods in this course will consist of written exercises, solving of problems, writing and balancing of equations, supplemented by class demonstrations. Also an introduction to the properties and characteristics of various elements along with fundamental laws and theories. Laboratory work consists of general experiments in which the various elements and chemical laws and theories are studied. Nine weeks of basic qualitative analysis is also given.

Chemistry. Organic. This course consists of one lecture period and one laboratory period of three hours per week throughout the year. It is a study of the chemistry of living matter; of substances formed by and from plants and animals. The work is presented problematically, with reference assignments to texts and treatises for research reading. An effort is made to present work of a practical nature in the laboratory.

Art. The aim of this course is to develop the power of observation and appreciation in art, together with its practical applications in the home. It will include a study of the great artists and their production, a course in color combination and design, with its application to home articles, such as pottery, china, stencils, enamel decorations, and simple household articles.

Story-telling. A study of childhood literature—fables, myths, folklore. Story-telling in the elementary school required.

Home Economics One-Year Course

Two recitations and three laboratory periods each week throughout the year. Ten-hour course. This course is planned to give the students a general insight into the field of home economics. It is offered especially for students who desire to take some home economics as a part of a general education.

Course I. Foods and Cookery. This course is planned to give the student a basic knowledge of the principles underlying the selection and preparation of foods. Emphasis throughout the course is on the study of the composition, care, and properties of foods, and also the fundamental laws of sanitation and nutrition. Problems in household management are also studied. In the laboratory work the aim is to inculcate the ideals of cleanliness, order, and accuracy.

Course II. Textiles, Clothing, and Design. The aim of this course is to prepare the student to deal with her own clothing problems. The selection of materials and the principles of garment construction are worked out through the planning and making of undergarments and a simple dress. A study is made of textile fabrics, especially of the modern manufacture and finishing of cotton, wool, linen, and silk, and their properties and values in relation to their manufacture the identification of materials, their names, prices, width, their use and value for clothing and household furnishings. Color harmonies and the fundamental design principles are studied to develop the student's appreciation of beauty as expressed in clothing and household furnishings. Clothing, Choice, Cost, and Care, by Doolman, is used as a guide in text in this course.

Two-Year Course

Two recitations and three laboratory periods per week through each year. This course is planned for students who want to specialize in home economics. Courses are equivalent to the courses offered in the first and second years in four-year colleges and universities.

First Year

Course I. Selection and Construction of Clothing. This course takes up the clothing problems of the college girl. The following topics are included: Study of textile fabrics; use and care of the sewing machine and its attachments; drafting and adaptation of patterns and the construction problems connected with the making of undergarments, cooking uniform, and a middy suit or Jack Tar dress. The manual, Clothing for Women, by Baldt, is used as a guide in this course.

Course II. Elementary Design. Exercises involving and lectures and assignments concerning: Lettering; the fundamental design principles; color theories and color harmonies with application to problems of everyday life.

Course III. Food Preparation. This course is planned to give the student a knowledge of the principles underlying the selection, preparation, and serving of food. The aims are: a mastery of the principles of cookery and their application to analysis and preparation of basic recipes; as well as development of a good technique.

Course IV. Personal Health and Efficiency. The work in this course is founded on basic scientific principles, so that the student may understand the reason for hygienic laws. Some of the topics included are: Pure water; proper nutrition; proper heating and ventilation; proper clothing; and adequate and suitable exercise and rest.

Second Year

Course I. Household Problems. This course is planned to give the student a general insight into the field of home economics and of questions that have to do with the modern home, such as sanitation, construction, and furnishing; hygiene, and general care of the house; modern appliances for cooking and housekeeping, and value and construction of budgets.

Course II. Food Problems of the Household. The aim of this course is to prepare the student to deal with the food problems as they present themselves in the average home. It includes the study of food and marketing, and purchase of food, the principles of the balanced diet, the nutritive value and the cost of the different food materials, the care of food in the home, and the equipment for its preparation and serving. Throughout the course meals are planned to meet definite conditions, prepared and served. It must be preceded by the courses in food preparation and household problems.

Course III. Dressmaking. This course is a continuation of the study of textile fabrics with reference to the construction and care of clothing. More extensive work in drafting, fitting, and designing of patterns is given. Students are required to make a lingerie blouse, wool skirt, and simple silk dress. Students provide material to the approval of the instructor. Selection and construction of clothing is a prerequisite course.—From Catalog Number of the Graceland Record, for April 15, 1922.

Is Home Craft a Means of Livelihood?

The article, "How shall we train our daughters?" was read as an educational feature of our group meeting to-day. We tried to see just how far-reaching the suggestions were. While we were all agreed as to the necessity for such a course, we failed to see how it could be used as a means of livelihood or a vocation. Perhaps we failed to grasp the full meaning, however. We fully agree as to the need of such teaching for our girls, but we are afraid our people could not afford to send their daughters to Graceland College for such a course of study, if it was meant as a vocation, as the openings for such are few.

We did wish we could just be able to converse face to face with some of the leaders of our department on this subject, and we certainly hope to hear more about it in the future.

Perhaps a word concerning our work in the city where "Fords" are made would be interesting. We have found the "group" system very much better than the old way. Splendid work has been done. At the district conference in Detroit recently, our city supervisor, Sister Emma Gannon, made a report of the work in Detroit which caused the priesthood to applaud and many eyes to fill with tears of emotion. Over 500 hours, or about 11 weeks, of service were reported, besides many other good things. Pontiac and Flint also made very good reports, showing much serious labor performed.

We are blessed—yes, that is the proper word—with a good, earnest worker and leader in the person of our city supervisor, and we hope that her health will permit her many years of service. We are finding quite a number of "lost" members through the efforts of our friendly visitors. We held a bazaar at Christmas time and made quite a bit over $300. This money is used only for the needy, and now we are at work for the next bazaar.

We hope to see many thought-inspiring articles in the HERALD from our sisters, and we trust the time may soon come when all confusion and misunderstandings may be removed from the Women's Department, so that the sisters needing advice may feel assured of an answer, which has not always been the case. 'Tis hard for us, so far away, and we do need help!

I pray for peace and unity in all God's great church.

Training the Soul of Prime Importance

Having read with interest your article on "How shall we train our daughters?" and having two little daughters of my own, I feel it a pleasure as well as a privilege to express myself upon this subject.

As my oldest is just preparing to enter high school, it will be four years before I shall be confronted with this problem. However, it is already a thought occupying an uppermost place in my mind, and the burden of my heart is, How best may I train them?

When I think of the time when they are to go away to college, if I should be financially able to send them, it causes me to meditate seriously, wishing I might have the opportunity of placing them in a school where I could feel sure that, in addition to their regular studies, they were being properly trained for the responsibilities of life.

I have thought upon this many times, and have been thoroughly convinced that the usual college course is incomplete in that many of the essential things of life are left untouched and untaught. Then, when finding themselves face to face with the problems of everyday life, failure and incompetency are the result.

It would certainly be a great step forward in the matter of education to be able to send our children to school where not only the training of the mind but that of the soul, as well, is of prime importance. I would like to learn more about Graceland, and hope to have the privilege of reading more articles on the subject which lies so near my heart.

I am praying for a solution to this problem, "How shall I train my daughters?"

Leadership

The Leader as Chairman

The leader must frequently preside over meetings of various kinds, business sessions, councils, class meetings, lectures, programs, etc. Her conduct may be of such a nature, her leadership of such a high character, that she may carry a meeting through to a successful culmination, sending her people away with hearts aglow; or, her leadership may be of that character, indifferent, apathetic, that the enthusiasm of the speaker is squelched, a business session allowed to degenerate into a gossip society, a class meeting lose its dignity and value, and a program be a pronounced failure—all for want of a little thought, study, careful planning, and the usual amount of personality.

A good chairman is a rare find. Her attitude makes either for success or failure of her program. When we learn to rank initiative before superficial knowledge, and tact before brains, we may be able more successfully to choose the people who must preside at our sessions, and so have better results.

Often we read the statement, "Leaders are born, not made." Admitting this may be true in the larger sense, we must acknowledge that even born leaders must prepare for their work, and by experience fit themselves for their special service. How much more carefully then must the ordinary leader lay plans to "work out her salvation"! How much more seriously must she plan her work, study her problems, try out her ideas, in order that she may come approximately near the standard set by the real leaders of the race.

There are several traits of character that a leader in her duties as chairman should possess. Let us begin with that rarest of all traits, tact, that core of politeness and good breeding which is evidenced in even the little things of life. Some one has termed it "that instinct of service that is an innate joy of doing something to make others happy."

Coupled with tact should be kindness and courtesy. The kindly soul has always time to be courteous, polite, and mannerly.

Next come two traits that must be linked together, each balancing the other. They are firmness and self-mastery. Firmness gives control of others, while self-mastery gives that inner strength which tells the world that intelligence guides, and not desire. Self-mastery comes through discipline. It means that a leader possessing it has found herself and realizes her power and her responsibility.

Personality is the next trait that is needed. Personality is that elusive something which goes out from one and touches another, bringing him into close touch and sympathy. The personality of a man or woman is his or her usual way of reacting to situations of life. It is an invisible electrical force that permeates the atmosphere and gives one a definite impression of another. Cultivate personality. Be unafraid, and not self-conscious. Assume an attitude of poise and power. Your confidence in yourself will command the confidence of others. Power can be developed through personality. It is worth obtaining.

Another fine trait in a leader is hospitality. The chairman should ever be a tactful hostess, welcoming those who are to help her through the hour's work just as she would welcome her guests in her home, not forgetting the word of appreciation at the close.

A chairman has many duties. She holds the audience in her hands. She must provide for them. She has her helpers to place, such as musicians, secretary, and other workers. She should be quick to welcome her speakers, singers, or others who are giving their services, and not allow them to suffer awkward and embarrassing experience through her oversight.

It is the duty of the leader to preside over the meetings. Putting off her duties on others is but a confession of her own inability. If a leader lacks faith in herself, doubts her own ability to meet the situation, why, how can the audience believe in her? So block your retreat, burn the bridges behind you, take heart of grace, and have faith in yourself! Practice the virtues we admire in others! Perhaps some of them will become part of us!

A chairman should not have other duties, such as playing the piano, looking after janitor work, etc. Such things should be delegated to others.

If the session is a business one, or a council, be sure all the workers are present and ready to take their special parts in the meeting. A study of parliamentary law will give you the general principles for conducting a business session.

If you are in charge of a lecture program, there are a few courtesies you should offer those who are giving their services to make your meeting a success. Remember that you are a tactful hostess. Speakers, musicians, should be welcomed, told where to put their wraps, introduced to other workers, consulted as to their preferences in arrangements, and accurate information obtained and given about their subjects and the part they are to play in the program. They should be given a general idea of the arrangements, just where their number is expected. Sometimes a speaker has a preference in regard to songs to be used, or sequence on program, etc.

Always invite speakers to seats on the platform, facing the people whom they are presently to address. There are reasons for these thoughtful attentions which need not be explained here.

Now we are ready to begin. The fifteen minutes of preliminary work is finished. The clock is striking the hour. The good presiding officer never wastes time. She has everything ready, her workers about her, and she is sure of her program. She steps on the platform and announces the song at once. The meeting proceeds in an orderly and systematic fashion. One after another, the numbers are introduced, each with some courteous, kindly phrase, recognition being given briefly at the close of a number when the work has been well done. Such comments should be brief. Do not talk too much, or allow others to do so. Keep the reins of control in your own hands. Do not let discussion lead the meeting away from the work of the hour. Remember always to be kind, even when firm. Sarcasm or temper are not traits of a good chairman.

Remain in your place, overseeing every detail of the meeting, all the time, until its close. Do not leave your chair, going about the room to see about other matters. Do not rise and interrupt a speaker in the midst of a talk. Never introduce a speaker while he is seated in the audience. A speaker needs to view his audience massed before him, a few minutes before beginning a speech to them, in order to estimate their levels of thought, that he may quickly establish a point of contact and sympathy between himself and them. Some of these points I have learned through painful experience, for I have seen discourtesies shown speakers by chairmen which would crush the enthusiasm of any of us, were we not sure they were offered unwittingly, and perhaps in ignorance of the effect produced.

Sometimes the unusual happens, something no one is expecting. A speaker fails to keep the appointment, or a musical number must be omitted. Substitute a round table, or give the time over to the discussion of some pertinent question. Draw out ideas which may lead to splendid plans for future work. The test of life is the unexpected. Rise to the occasion and without giving expression to deep disappointment, fill in the hour with profitable things. Only small souls are upset by the unusual, for they take it as a personal grievance. A great soul adjusts itself to whatever is, and finds in the happenings always a world of opportunity for growth and development.

One final word: As to yourself, be bold; as to God and his world, be teachable.

LETTERS AND NEWS

A Blow at the Head

Synopsis of talk at Akron, Ohio, April 9, 1922, by E. G. Hammond.

The proclamation of the First Presidency appointing this day as a day of prayer and supplication throughout the church has reached us so late that we could not arrange for its observance as fully as might be desired. But as we had meditated a discourse for this morning along the lines indicated by the proclamation, we have decided to follow the suggestion of a brother to have a short talk leading up to the prayer service, concluding with that.

If it were not for this special service, and if we were undertaking to occupy the entire hour with preaching, we might announce the subject as "A blow at the head," and talk for a little while about killing things.

I know you agree with me that we don't like to kill things very well, and we are especially instructed to protect the birds that sing. Any boy that would harm one of these would at once be set down as bad and cruel. But there are other things, the killing of which does not seem repulsive to us at all.

If I should be going along the road with the smaller children and happen to see a rattlesnake run across the path, and should call any of you, I think the best boy among you would not hesitate to kill it, and you would come running with cudgel or hoe.

When you would reach us, and assume the responsibility of killing the reptile, I am sure there are none of you so lacking in common sense but you'd aim every stroke at its head.

Striking at Head in Slaughterhouse

Then again, there are other things which do not seem hateful to us at all, which our very existence seems to require us to kill. When we have company and would serve a good dinner we must kill one or two chickens, and even the least of you knows how you aim at the head.

Then there are the beeves I have seen killed wholesale. Once I was in the slaughterhouse at Union Stock Yards, Chicago, and what I saw would make your heart ache. They drove those fine, fat cattle along narrow aisles in which they could not turn, and a young fellow walked along the long platform above, swinging a hammer at the end of a long handle that reached down to where the cattle stood.

The guide that conducted us explained everything that was not immediately apparent to visitors, but when we came to this man with the hammer he offered no explanation of him, feeling, as we supposed, that everyone with only a little understanding would be able to recognize him as the Official Knocker.

You could not help despising him as he moved lightly along the platform, occasionally jerking himself to a stop as he selected his victim, and then, half turning aside his own face as if to see if he would be observed in his evil work, he would swing his hammer, and a fine animal would fall, quivering, quivering, dead.

We watched him as long as we could bear it, and as we turned away I asked the man who was with me how much it the Christian men and women dominate in political affairs, or one in which the "machine politicians" rule? Give your reasons.

9. In which city would you prefer to live; one in which would take to hire him to that man's position. And after some hesitation he rubbed his hands together thoughtfully and said, "I would want fifty dollars per hour, and would work three hours."

But the point we desire to hold fast to is that everyone, everywhere, and especially those who make a business of killing things, invariably strike at the head.

The Head of the Church

Now, we have a church organization made after the pattern in the heavens, and we learned last Sunday evening in a very beautiful argument that it has a head here on earth. And because it has a head we believe it to be a living institution.

Also, we have a district organization, and a branch, by means of which the benefits are brought down to us, and each of these divisions must have a head, if it is alive. It may be a mere figurehead, as I have said before in a different connection, or it may be an arbitrary blockhead, which would be deplorable, but each division must have a head if we get the benefits.

And I have heard you testify here of receiving benefits; how that some of you have been healed from dangerous illness. There was a man who is not of our number, who stood here the other day to testify, with great sincerity, that he had been sick and was suffering terribly. I had seen him. He was in an awful condition, feet drawn up high as his head and the electric fans going, and the doctors could not give him relief.

Then he sent for two of the elders who administered to him in the name of the Lord, and you heard him say that he was healed immediately.

But we are not left to this class of evidence alone whereby to conclude this a living church; we have another class.

You yourselves are witnesses that on many points wherein the world gropes in hopeless darkness over the mysteries of existence, of life and death, time and eternity, in these things you have light that the wisdom of this world can by no means approach. The great men of earth, the kings and the honorable governors, might with propriety sit at the feet of your children to learn many things. And by reason of these things, we can say again that this is a living church that can bear us these benefits.

Also, we have heard of an enemy that goeth up and down in the earth to prevent these good blessings, to accomplish which he must of course kill this institution, this church, and you may consider where he will strike.

The Lie as a Weapon

But I tell you that he will surely never use any such ordinary weapon as a stick, or a hoe, or a hammer. He has something more deadly than these, an article of his own manufacture and invention, with all rights reserved, and it is known everywhere as a "lie."

This is a most effectual and also a most peculiar little invention, with interesting properties. Perhaps the most peculiar feature of it is that there is lots of truth in it.

You will remember the one he used on Mother Eve, and that the strongest feature of it was truth—most of it true as gospel. "In the day thou eatest thereof ye shall become as gods, and be wise."

You have heard of liars going through a community, and the citizens discussing their report after them, saying, "Well, indeed there is a good bit of truth in it."

That's the kind the Devil uses; it always has a very good foundation, and the most of it is true.

The Devil is not a simpleton. You don't ever need to think that. He would never undertake to poison you by offering you raw strychnine with a label on it. That is not his way. He would make a feast for you, invite guests of renown, prepare an excellent cake from the best materials that could be furnished, so that none are so wholesome, but within it he would conceal just one grain of arsenic, knowing that with all the fine things he gives you, you will swallow your potion of death.

Don't think he will ever use a lie that doesn't have truth in it.

That is one reason I never cared to defile my mind much with a study of the religions of this world, and theories of men. They have a good bit of truth in them.

The Demand Creates the Supply

Now there is another thing. We have marked our enemy as the maker of all lies, and I want to tell you he would never manufacture anything there is not a market for.

If no one wore shoes, there would be none made. If there were no demand for hats, there would be none produced. But there are those who seek after these things.

So it is among us: there are those who long for false reports, and seek false positions, and desire to have such things stirring, and it has been so in all ages.

You remember Paul spoke of cutting off occasion from those that desired occasion. And in the early day of this church we were reminded that there were those who sought occasion against one another, and I fear we have still a few of the same class.

Should the Devil make lies as high as the mountains, still they could do us no harm till some of us would hear and believe; but you know there is a proverb that speaks of those who will give heed to false lips, and Revelation tells of those who love and make a lie.

Notice the two classes, he that loves, and he that makes.

You have seen people that would be shocked at the intimation that they made a falsehood, but just let it get on the market once, and oh, how they will buy. And they will hug it to their hearts, and nourish it, and meditate on it, and enjoy it, and they will tell you that indeed there is a good bit of truth in it.

It is by means of this class that the deadly blow is dealt.

Now I do not want you to feel that I am undertaking to present any man, as the head of any division from the First President down, as being without fault. I think they all make mistakes. Of Joseph the Martyr the Lord said that he had committed sin; not anything very gross, I judge, but he was warned that if he did not make a better showing he would lose his gift, and become as other men. But the Lord doesn't kill a man for making a mistake, so long as he sins not unto death. If so, where would any of us be? But he forgives him, and gives him a chance to right himself. Then finally, after long patience and endurance, if he will not do the right, his candlestick will surely be removed.

Charity Required in Our Judgment

For my part, I have not always been pleased with the policies of the church, and with those at the head. I doubt if they have always been pleased with themselves. But I have always been somewhat willing, and am becoming more so, to show the same charity towards them that I would like to have shown me were I in their stead, and were I just as far in error as they are sometimes thought to be.

My inclination in this direction has been increased by a recent local occurrence, whereby I have been able to see how a false impression can suddenly encompass the whole earth, and mislead very good people. And when I see how nearly a thing can resemble the truth, and how much truth it can have and yet carry the deadly grain, I am moved to greater confidence in those at the head, feeling the explanation of their side might make some difference.

Now I hope you will be able to find in these scattered remarks some justification for renewing our confidence in those at the head, and that in the light of this argument we shall be able at least to pray, that if there be those who are in error the Lord will convince them of the right, and draw them to it to establish it.

Before we change the order of the service, I feel to congratulate you that you have found your way into a living church, and I believe you have cause to rejoice.

A Dream

I have been studying whether I should relate a dream I had the other evening. I don't think these things should be spoken too freely, and am not sure this should be mentioned, but there is something in it I believe would encourage you, and believe I shall risk relating a part of it.

As I dreamed I found myself in the midst of a flock of sheep, the finest I had ever seen. They were clean, their wool white and fluffy, long and silken, and beautiful beyond description, only I could feel my fingers throb with a wish to grasp the fleeces and bury my hands in them, and the best and only interpretation I can get is that those sheep were the local flock.

They were to be transferred to fresh pastures, and there were two shepherds among them that went along the road with them, and when they came to the fresh pasture the flock fed heartily, and they did not owe their good fortune to the shepherds. They had not sown the grass, but it had sprung spontaneously from the sowing of a greater hand—His shower and sun.

Then the flock was gathered together again, and the two shepherds in the midst, and as they were talking together I saw a large, strong, male sheep whose wool was coarse, and thick, and bluish, and not fine like the others, and his nose was a little dirty, but he was not too bad at that. And all at once he raised his head, stiffened his neck, and pricked back his ears as he began to back off for a drive at the shepherds to give them a jolt.

The shepherds observed his preparations unmoved, but as he backed off the other sheep seemed casually to settle in closer about the shepherds so that coarse fellow could not make his run.

Do you see what that is?

Then I heard the men talking, and the one more experienced said, "They jolt one like everything, and bruise one's hips considerably sometimes." Then he opened his clothes and showed his hips and thighs all black and blue and blood-shot.

Afterwards I awoke, and as I meditated the matter there came to mind the scripture saying, "He was bruised for our iniquities; and with his stripes we are healed."

Now I hope we shall be able to endure these jolts like men, without showing anger; and that the sheep may stand close enough together to prevent long and damaging drives.

Commissioner Haynes insists that prohibition is a fact, not only through law enforcement, but because bootleggers cannot secure grain alcohol in quantities, so the stuff that is sold is 98 per cent poisonous, and either death or blindness is the result. This 98 per cent is arrived at by an analysis of all specimens they have been able to secure.

Brother F. S. Gatenby, of Clearwater, Nebraska, who is president of the Central Nebraska District, writes that if any of the Saints in that district would like to have any preaching done let him hear from you and he will try to furnish you with a speaker.

Macgregor-Glendenning Debate

Well, it's all over but the shouting, and now they're shouting. If you think the people of Maine are not enthusiastic in religion you're hugely mistaken. I never labored amongst a people where the sense of fairness predominated to such a degree.

Some few weeks ago while in Toronto, word came from the Twelve that my services were required in Jonesport, Maine, to diagnose the disorder of Adventism which had broken out in an uncontrollable way. Our people were challenged to debate.

Communicating with Elder O. L. Thompson, our local missionary at Jonesport, I assured him that I was delightfully willing to do what I could towards arresting the malady, providing he could assure me "a boiled lobster."

Accordingly the brother advised me that the lobster was ready, but that they would "defer the boiling" until my arrival.

The usual church propositions were fixed up, together with a proposition on the Book of Mormon.

The Adventist operation came first. It was under the ether for two days. Considerable probing and disemboweling had to be performed, for the subject was in an advanced state of decomposition. Things were jingling joyfully. The largest hall in town had been secured, and although it seated between six hundred and seven hundred, it was far too small to accommodate the crowds. Multitudes were turned away, notwithstanding all children under thirteen years of age were barred in order to make room for the grown-ups. They came from forty miles around.

Two hours and a half before time of starting each session, the people could be seen flocking to the debate. They came by autos and by boats while others availed themselves of shanks' ponies, carrying a trusty chair to assure a place of sitting. Such a spectacle, and coming, too, simply to learn who had the truth. What an inspiration to Latter Day Saints!

The first two evenings were taken up with an examination of the Adventist Church. My opponent, Reverend Glendenning, of Iowa, was under the necessity of affirming the practice, doctrine, and organization of his church as identical with that of the Bible. He had some task.

Well, it was a walk over. Never had an easier thing in my life. It will probably be ungraceful for me to recite our achievements, so will merely repeat the poetic expression of one of our Baptist sisters who, after attending the funeral, stated in emphatic tones to a personal friend, "Well, you should have heard it; the Latter Day Saints sent the Adventist Church straight to —!"

On the third night the Latter Day Saint proposition was up. We affirmed for our church that which the Adventists affirmed for theirs. H. A. Koehler, my moderator, and Brother O. L. Thompson were in charge of the opening exercises. For an hour they sang our songs together with the assistance of Brother Riley Beal and others. It was grand! They sang such songs as, "We thank thee, O God, for a prophet," and others of like precious faith. The Adventists inaudibly growled, but it was our innings and we were in for home runs.

The first evening on our proposition passed off pleasantly, save the expected display of wrath by my opponent. He is a veteran at sarcasm, which sometimes got under the skin of our red-blooded New Englanders.

The fourth evening dawned with a clear sky. There was nothing to suggest a storm hovering off the coast, but it broke in all its fury. The hall was jammed and the feelings were tense. Everything was breaking beautifully, and I knew that we had our opponent in a "death grip" that would demonstrate his soul-sleeping theory to a nicety.

Glendenning started in. It was his last and only chance to introduce the polygamy question. Rules had been adopted that no matter considered new could be introduced in the closing speeches of either contestant. Of course he might bring it in on the next proposition involving the Book of Mormon.

He had not proceeded far in his argument when he shouted, "Joseph Smith was a polygamist and I'll prove it." We let him run for about five minutes, that his position might become clearly apparent to the public.

Thereupon we put across a point of order. Our point was that the proposition under discussion would not permit of any examination of the conduct of Joseph Smith; that polygamy was not the question.

The chairman (a nonmember), big minded and big fisted, saw our point and promptly sustained us. Our opponent, humiliated and chagrined, fought back like a cornered coyote. Proceeding with his remarks, he continued his vitriolic attack, only to be bowled over with another point of order. Nothing daunted, he tried it again, only to experience the same rebuff. By this time excitement was running high. "Have I no friends in this audience?" cried Glendenning, only to be responded to by a pair of twin voices female in sex and altitudinous in pitch, "Yes, Brotha." But the chairman had things in hand. As deputy sheriff he arose in his majesty and said, "Mr. Glendenning, you signed up to meet this proposition and you'll meet it or you'll quit."

Glendenning quailed. He was up against New England in its wrath. The country that had given birth to freedom was still ringing true to her ancient rock-bottomed principles of civil and religious liberty as templed on her rockbound coast.

Frontier lawlessness wouldn't go here, and he sat down, squalid and pale, declaring that he would not abide the chairman's ruling. Thereupon the chairman arose and declared the debate closed!

I may observe that both my moderator and myself publicly assured my opponent while the points of order were being raised, that we would meet him on the "Joseph Smith polygamy question," immediately after our proposition on the Book of Mormon was over. We guaranteed him every chance of getting his "slice of polygamous steak," but no! the facts are that the man had run out of "home-brewed assertions," and had nothing to offer but polygamous w(h)ine.

Well, it didn't go, and the man who boasted that he had "met our men eleven times," crawled and "kivered," jumping the discussion when it was but half over.

Funny things happened at the close of the debate. It then became every man's discussion and the ladies were as eloquent as the men. For a full hour they lingered. Some of the outsiders were anxious to put Glendenning out of business for his insulting remarks. Fully ninety-five per cent of that great audience were with us.

While the points of order were on tap, I defied my opponent to submit his objections to the audience, inasmuch as he was indisposed to abide the chairman's ruling. But, "No, sir," he shivered at the thought.

On the way home that night, one of the Adventist preachers narrowly escaped an immersion in the untempered waters of the briny bay. He had gotten into an altercation with some weather-tanned fisherman, who threatened to "throw him into the soup." He beat it next morning at 5 a. m. The previous evening poor old Glendenning, unused to the rocking of the boat, fell overboard, and was rescued little the worse for his pickling in a dry state. We can therefore truthfully report that up to date one immersion has resulted from the debate, although in this case very little of "remission of sins" took place.

We are continuing services in the same theater building owing to the immensity of the crowd. It was packed last night.

In conclusion I wish to say that a full measure of credit must be assigned our progressive young missionary, Elder O. L. Thompson, who for over a year has been holding down the situation in Jonesport and the regions round about. He has endeared himself in the hearts of all and is surely delivering the goods.

Elder Koehler has helped immensely with his singing and as moderator, as well as in preaching the word.

The utmost harmony prevails in the branch, presided over as it is by Elder W. E. Rogers, a man of experience, who ever displays a fatherly spirit unto all.

Am enjoying my stay hugely among this humble people; a people who in their quiet, unostentatious way show the meekness of a lamb, and when aroused, the strength of a lion.

Well, we've had our lobster all right, and boiled, too.

Sincerely in the struggle,

DANIEL MACGREGOR.

The Recent Joint Council Meeting

[At the request of the editors, Elder John W. Rushton prepared the following letter giving his impression of the recent joint council meeting.]

The recent sessions of the joint council, the First Presidency, Quorum of Twelve, and the Presiding Bishopric, which began on the 28th of February and closed in the afternoon of May 16, may not be very easily appraised so far as concrete expression may be concerned. Perhaps at no time in the history of the Reorganization have critical issues accumulated in as threatening a manner as at the present time. The world conditions morally, politically, and financially, are so well known to all that it is unnecessary to catalogue them to impress the church generally with the menace they constitute to the stability of all departments of life.

However, we may emphasize the fact that the war which engrossed the attention of the whole world for the period of five years could have no other effect than general demoralization in which the spiritual idealism characteristic of Christianity necessarily was driven into the background, and all that goes to make up a brutal state was requisitioned in order to carry on the conflict. Not only the accumulated treasures of all nations engaged therein, but practically the whole of civilization representing the labors and gains of countless generations were thrown into the conflict, and the strength and prowess of nations both of the present and the future were commandeered; even the unborn was placed under mortgage so that the accumulated debt must press heavily upon the shoulders of the race for many years to come. To expect that the church would escape the pressure of the consequences of this world madness would be unreasonable.

Whatever may be said by way of criticism of personal desires or policies, and however wise the proposals as to what should have been done may be, it is objected that none of these afterthoughts could help in the meeting of the situation which at present confronts the church. It was with this deep sense of responsibility resting upon the council that the men met together in the council chamber at Independence on the first day. It was because each one felt the need of more than human wisdom and skill that the first session was devoted to earnest prayer invoking guidance, illumination, and control by the Holy Spirit.

The tension which was manifested during the course of the sessions was not caused by personal feelings or of individual desires for mastery, but because it was sensed that upon this association and the outcome of the several meetings the immediate future, at least, would depend. The council was also well aware of the numbers of church members who were impressed with the importance of the situation and how anxiously all were looking for relief and solution of the urgent problems, and under the consciousness of the church confidence and expectation, every man sought to say the right thing in the way that would be most nearly representative of his own conscience and understanding of what Christ expected of him. Whatever acerbities developed during the discussion of the many matters presented, such were never outstanding features of discussion but always were incidental to the main subject, and the brethren ever were willing to overlook and forgive any trespass upon personal feelings because of the deep sense of the importance of the work which was pressed upon them for attention.

Several times during the course of the sessions pause was taken for special prayer, and on one occasion in the midst of these meetings nearly one week was spent in meditation and prayer in order to stand back, so to speak, from the immediate contemplation, and in the spirit of reflection endeavor to envisage the whole of things.

However much it may be regretted that a catalogue of concrete results which will appeal to the imagination cannot be presented which crystallizes the work of the council, yet it may be said without exaggeration that there was developed a spirit of unity, mutual understanding, and personal appreciation of each other which provides a foundation for future work making for the benefiting of the church at large.

We feel sure that the church at large appreciated the situation referred to and will rejoice to know of the results of the joint council sessions in this increasing good will and unity of purpose, from out of which the course to be taken will evolve and find crystallization in the coming General Conference.

It is our sincere hope none will excuse themselves in discharging their duties either morally or financially in these duties stressed, because of any misunderstanding or criticism which may obtain, but that all will rally whole-heartedly to the assistance of the cause which to each one is the biggest thing needing our attention.

May it please God to clarify our vision, strengthen the faith, deepen the convictions, and widen the horizon of the church consciousness; and in the passion for the saving of souls and building up of the kingdom may all be stimulated and nerved for the coming days. JOHN W. RUSHTON.

Independence

The Stone Church and Enoch Hill celebrated Children's Day on June 11. Second Independence and Walnut Park expect to celebrate it June 18. Also, we are informed that Liberty Street Church will have a Children's Day program Sunday morning, the 18th.

At the Stone Church the services consisted of the usual Sunday school session; a sermon by the local superintendent, Elder A. L. Sanford, at 11 a. m.; the baptism of thirty children at 2 p. m. Those officiating were A. L. Sanford, R. V. Hopkins, M. T. Williams, Walter W. Smith, N. Carmichael, Elder Stephenson, and Joseph Luff. Elder Luff baptized his grandson who is also the grandson of W. D. Bullard. Three confirmation services were held shortly after the baptism, that in the upper auditorium in charge of Walter W. Smith; in the lower auditorium, R. V. Hopkins; and a third service was held at Liberty Street at which seven were confirmed. The baptisms thus included some from other portions of Independence than the Stone Church.

The evening service was given over to an entire program by the children, a cantata entitled, "Messengers of summer," originated for the occasion by Mrs. A. L. Sanford and Mrs. J. T. Westwood.

President F. M. Smith is reported to be en route home and is expected to arrive sometime between June 15 and 20.

Apostle J. A. Gillen spoke at Second Independence in the forenoon and Elder A. M. Chase in the evening.

Bishop R. T. Cooper who, with others, is attending the Benton Law School, is just advised that he has the highest general average for the Sophomore Class in the year just closed. Last year he had the second highest general average and won the first prize in Domestic Relations.

Thomas Carr, who is appointed to the Isle of Pines, called at Independence on his way east.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium for the week ending June 10: Joe Sponeich, Sugar Creek, Missouri; Mrs. Wilma Cook and Baby Cook, Guy C. Spurgeon, and Miss Emma Elkington, Mount Washington, Missouri; Howard Jones, Marshall, Missouri; Mrs. Effie Akers and Baby Akers, Wallace, Kansas; Hyla Pendergraft, Lamoni, Iowa; Miss Mildred Collins, Atherton, Missouri; Master Theodore Dieckmann, Levasy, Missouri; the following from Independence: Harry Martin, jr., F. A. Inman, Mrs. Vera Davis, Mrs. Velma Morales and Baby Morales, and Mrs. J. W. Chapman. X-ray patients: Mrs. George Robb, Blue Springs, Missouri; Mr. Leroy Colbert, Chetek, Wisconsin; S. Embrey, Grain Valley, Missouri; and Mrs. J. W. Luff and Leona Thompson, of Independence.

The newly organized band will make its debut next Sunday evening on the church lawn at the preaching service to be held outdoors at that time.

Graduating from the Junior College of Kansas City on the 9th were Aubrey Glines, son of Sister Dora Glines; Evan Fry, son of Bishop Charles Fry; and Wayne Smith, son of Walter W. Smith. These three received the degree of A. A., Brother Wayne being accorded the highest honor among the men. He was accorded the same honor in the William Chrisman High School and also in the grammar school at Philadelphia.

On the evening of the 9th the Kansas City Conservatory of Music held its graduation exercises and among the number graduating was Sister Pauline Becker who was accorded the degree of Bachelor of Music, the first degree granted by this school, although they have had a charter for this privilege for eight years. Sister Becker is very liberal with her services for the local church work, officiating in choir and orchestra renditions constantly in addition to teaching a goodly class of private pupils.

Sister Walter W. Smith and sons Wayne and Dudley have this week opened an open-air vacation school on the lawn of their home and the lot next door, where for the next six weeks they will give a course in athletics, hand work, and swimming. This will include the making of various articles of handcraft, such as hammocks, baskets, balls, kites, etc. They opened with twenty-one pupils, and others from six to fourteen years of age are welcome. A nominal charge is made for the instruction rendered.

The seminar of the Independence Institute of Arts and Sciences held the last session of the year at the home of Henry C. Smith June 1. The seminar is composed of those who have a college education or its equivalent, and has offered an excellent opportunity for the exchange of ideas and research. Its purpose is to encourage advanced educational work. As a rule the meetings have been held at the office building, and in the last three sessions the hours devoted to study have been followed by a half hour of a social nature.

The radio sermon from Central Radio Company Sunday evening was by Elder A. B. Phillips.

The open-air pictures on the church lawn Saturday evening were accompanied by a radio program consisting of numbers from the studio of the Central Radio at Kansas City and numbers broadcasted by other sending stations. An amplifier made it possible for the entire large audience to hear everything. The radio station back of the Stone Church, which is carrying the radio work between Independence and Lamoni announced through its instruments on Friday that daily programs, market reports, weather forecasts, the time, etc., would be sent out from the local station amplifier. The writer heard the announcement distinctly two blocks away, with the amplifier perched on a platform at the station antennae tower.

On next Sunday afternoon at 4.30 a photographer from the Kansas City Journal staff will take a picture on the Temple Lot of all cradle roll children for publication in a Sunday issue of that paper. All mothers of children under four years of age are requested to have them there at that time. We have as a church the largest aggregation of such children for a city of the size in the United States.

Kansas City Stake

The recent stake conference, held May 21 and 22, was full of interest. The weather was beautiful and the attendance at Sunday school and eleven o'clock services good. Patriarch F. A. Smith delivered the discourse at this hour, laying the foundation for a constructive sermon on the subject of "Sonship" (John 1).

At 1.30 p. m. the elders' quorum discussed the fifth day of the creation. The prayer meetings for both the old and young were held in the main auditorium and north room respectively. A lively interest was shown in both by prayer and testimony.

At 4.15 the Women's Department held forth in the main auditorium, addressed by Brother E. D. Moore, of the HERALD staff.

At the same hour the priesthood were in session in the north room. They were first addressed by Doctors Harrington and Green, of the Independence Sanitarium, emphasizing the need of an annex to the Sanitarium. The present institution now is a hospital and overcrowded. The stake officials will go into the merits of the matter so that, if it is decided to build as suggested by these brethren, the Kansas City Stake may have the privilege of helping build and maintain the project.

Apostle J. W. Rushton then made a short address, getting before the ministry of the stake a plan whereby they could enter into missionary work in Greater Kansas City. The plan as outlined is similar to that adopted in Zion. Some seventy-five immediately gave in their names to assist in speaking, singing, tracting, and the use of automobiles. As a missionary effort had already been arranged for at Mount Washington by Amos T. Higdon, it was thought advisable to adopt the new plan at once at that place. The work preliminary to carrying on meetings as suggested provides for a personal house to house tracting effort, with at least two "follow-ups." In this way every home in Greater Kansas City will be visited at least three times during this effort.

A song service was held, commencing at 7.30 p. m. and continuing until 7.45. Brother J. W. Rushton then addressed a fine audience on the subject of "The body of Christ," speaking of the kingdom of God as a social ideal. Those familiar with Brother Rushton's method of declaring himself know that every feature of his discourse was driven home to each receptive heart present.

At the business session at 7.45, Monday night, the financial report of the bishop showed: receipts, $12,313.55; expenditures, $10,312.48; balance on hand March 31, 1922, $2,001.07.

The stake council recommended the following brethren for ordination: R. L. Bishop and Wallace Eskridge to office of elder and Edward Baker as priest, which recommendations were adopted and ordinations provided for. Alma R. White, on recommendation of the joint council, was presented to the conference to be ordained as high priest and member of the stake high council. It was approved.

The following changes in pastorates are noted: Grandview, C. D. Jellings, with L. W. Hayes as associate pastor; Chelsea Park, J. A. Harrington, with A. W. Sears as associate pastor; Second Kansas City, J. Harry Paxton, with F. A. Evans as associate pastor.

Women's Department report showed a total of 692 calls made to the needy, shut-ins, and sick. They also distributed 400 church papers and loaned 200 quarterlies.

Repairs to the amount of $1,700 were ordered for Central Church.

An organization of the young people known as "The young people's association of the Kansas City Stake," whose purpose is to support the various church activities and whose directing committee, composed of C. D. Jellings, Robert Crane, Emma Thomas, T. B. Dunn, R. L. Bishop, Harry Oldfather, and Blanche Tucker, was placed in nomination by the stake presidency and ratified.

The resolution passed at the February conference, requiring the membership in attendance at the Sunday service on conference Sunday to come fasting, was by motion annulled.

The bishop was instructed to purchase for each church needing them, an Inspired Translation, Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, and communion sets.

Sister F. P. Hitchcock, 2652 East Thirtieth Street, correspondent for the Women's Department, desires to advise all supervisors to report their news direct to her.

Paul M. Hanson delivered the morning discourse at Second Church on Mothers' Day.

Northeast Church reports two baptisms on May 7.

The Stake Sunday school convention will be held June 25 at Central Church, with business session at 8 p. m. on June 26.

Council Bluffs, Iowa

Two-day meetings have been arranged for Hazel Dell, Underwood, Boomer, Crescent, and Carson. Hazel Dell, May 27 and 28; Boomer, last Saturday and Sunday in July; Underwood, the second Saturday and Sunday in September. At these meetings the time on Sunday from 10 o'clock to 12 will be used for departmental work.

On May 17 Brother and Sister Samuel Harding, who have spent their lives in Council Bluffs, started for their new home in Hamilton, Missouri, where he takes charge of mercantile employment. On May 9 the Saints to the number of about fifty gave them a surprise and presented them, in the name of the branch, with a Book of Mormon in the best binding as a memento of respect and love from the Saints among whom they have labored and worshiped. Word has been received that they have arrived safely and are busy at work. The loss of this branch will be a great gain to the Saints at Hamilton.

The ministry of C. J. Hunt last Sunday in this branch was much appreciated. He was bubbling over with enthusiasm and gave words of encouragement that will do good.

It has been decided by the reunion committee for the districts of Pottawattamie and Fremont, Iowa, and the Northeastern Nebraska to hold the reunion for the year 1922 in Prospect Park, Council Bluffs, the same place where it was held last year. Everything bids fair for an interesting reunion. We learn that Brethren W. W. Smith, church historian, and T. W. Williams, of the Twelve, are to be present and will render the help they can. With the local help in these districts we look for a profitable gathering.

Previous to the reunion it is anticipated that an intensive missionary effort will be made by the membership and ministry in the city and adjacent missions. Following the reunion it is thought that a series of tent services will be held and we are expecting that T. W. Williams will be in charge.

God has very graciously granted the moisture that was so much needed in southwestern Iowa, and there is cheerfulness in the efforts at seeding and cultivating.

We are pleased to report the rapid improvement of Brother B. S. Lambkin. It is a marvelous recovery for the serious accident that he met. Brother Fenn, of Carson, is now at the hospital in this city suffering with gall stones and gall bladder troubles. He, too, is improving, and it is thought will recover without an operation.

Central Chicago

April 28 to 30 all services were conducted by the young people. Religio was the opening service on Friday evening and the program consisted of six talks on the past and future of the church, as follows: "Preparation," by Lucy Lockard; "Organization," by Wallace Lester, followed by song, "Organize my church and kingdom"; "Period of growth," followed by male quartet, "Speed away"; "Dark and cloudy day," by Marie Yates, followed by solo, "I came to the spot where the two Martyrs lay"; "Reorganization," by Gene Keir; song, "Go on in faith"; "Zion," by William Keir, followed by the Zion Builders' song.

Saturday evening was given over to a social by the young. Sunday services began with an early morning prayer meeting. At 11 a. m. the subject was "The work of the church as seen by the youth from three sides," by as many speakers. "Pastoral," by Alf Lester; "Economics," by Harry Jowett; and "Missionary," by William Murray. Evening service was consecration service; sermon by H. P. W. Keir. Both choir and orchestra furnished splendid music for all services. There was a splendid spirit of consecration throughout and we certainly feel such a devoted band of young people augurs well for the future of our church.

None who heard these talks and listened to the music at these services could fail to see the spirit of consecration that actuated these young people and combined with their youthful zeal and enthusiasm. It makes us feel assured that when the burden of carrying on this great work in the future devolves upon them they will be ready and qualified to carry it forward, perhaps better than we of to-day are doing.

Certainly this spirit of preparation in the young makes our hearts rejoice, and not alone from our own branch but from all over the church we hear these reports, and surely we can feel that no matter what may happen to the world in these troublous days, God's work is marching on and in due time Zion will be redeemed.

HATTIE K. BELL.

Mrs. John Shotton, of Stonington, Illinois, formerly Mrs. Frank Sharrock, of Rich Hill, Missouri, is convalescing in the Missouri Baptist Sanitarium, room 319, division 3 A, Saint Louis, Missouri, and will be pleased to have any Saints or elders visit her, as she is a stranger in the city and far from home and loved ones.

They were both rebaptized into the Reorganization April 27, 1867. In 1859 they came to this country intending to go to Utah, but stopped near Omaha and returned to Kewanee, Illinois, where they resided until 1886, at which time they removed to Lamoni. Of their eight children, three, Alfred, Thomas, and Martha, passed away in childhood. Died June 2, 1922. Leaves five children, eighteen grandchildren, twenty-two great-grandchildren, besides many friends. Funeral sermon by A. Carmichael.

Playgrounds

The past ten or fifteen years have seen a growth in the recognition of the need of parks and playgrounds in cities and towns. The movement is not a sudden fad, but has been tested out for over fifteen years and is proving so successful that we now favor its extending even to small cities like Lamoni, Iowa.

The parks, in the sense in which they are established in large cities, and open breathing spaces, are not needed in the rural towns, but there is the need of supervised play not only for young people but there should be more facilities for proper exercise by those older in years. And this is not entirely or adequately secured at the woodpile, or by cutting the grass, because while these give sufficient exercise they lack in the social element and the contest of play.

In Independence the city council has voted a bond election to be held the 11th of July for the purpose of purchasing the land now used for a fair ground for some $30,000 and allowing a margin of $10,000 for equipment. Independence has no parks at present. This is to supply both a park and playground. The land lies immediately east of the land purchased by the church which will be used by the Independence reunion. The church has already made provision for outdoor play in tennis courts and in a baseball ground and is attempting to provide also for the smaller children. After all that is a very vital factor—playgrounds for the small children.

This idea is well expressed in the efforts in Saint Louis of the P. A. P. A. Club, What are you doing for your children? The very suggestion of Papa calls at once to mind the need of our children, and Papa is the provider. What are you doing for your boy? This at once attracts the interest, which is rather increased when one remembers that P. A. P. A. is the abbreviation for Parks and Playground Association.

Some attempt has been made to utilize the school grounds, but in nearly every case such grounds are too circumscribed and do not give space for grass and trees, and in fact exclude the children from immediate contact with Mother Earth. Real parks are an insurance of the health of the people.

Time When

There has recently come to our desk a leaflet illustrating day by day the Passion Week. The author, William Frederick, claims that Jesus was crucified on Wednesday, that Thursday was the Passion Sabbath, and that Christ rose before sundown on Saturday. To accomplish this, he changes the reading of the twenty-eighth chapter of Matthew to read: "Late on the Sabbath as it was getting dusk toward the first of the week." This, of course, is changing the text of the Scriptures, which renders it "as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week," and in this Matthew agrees with the other evangelists who make it the first day of the week—early in the morning.

Raising Money by Fasting

We note that the Utah Church has a method of raising funds. The principle laid down is that each member of the church should fast the first Sunday of each month, that is to fast for two meals, a full twenty-four hours. They ask that the money thus saved be turned into a general fast fund. They have estimated that if the whole United States will practice that for one Sunday each month and turn the money over for the benefit of the poor, it would raise at least $21,000,000.

"It might be interesting to those interested in boys," writes Sister F. C. Mesle, of Sherrill, New York, "to know that one of our Saint boys, Orville Comfort, who lives here in Sherrill, was recently made an Eagle Scout, the first in this place. Orville is also a credit to the church—more credit, perhaps, because he holds on and assists in the work when he is the only boy of his age in the branch."

Render Effective Service

You aim to live a life of service. That is a splendid ideal. Industries and trades are calling for laborers. Here is an opportunity for service immediately.

BUT STOP! CONSIDER!

The desire to render immediate service is praiseworthy, but it is "effective" service which finally counts.

"The Highest Possible Efficiency" Is the Goal

which students should ever keep in mind. Thousands of the captains of industry pass out of the ranks of business each year to be replaced by younger men. Thousands of jobs are vacant, calling for men. On the other hand, thousands of the unemployed are clamoring for jobs. The trouble is, so many of the unemployed are unwilling to prepare. The world needs production, but most of all

The World Needs Educated Leadership

There never was such a demand in the industries, in business, in the trades, in the professions, in the homes, in the schools, in the church, in public service, for men and women whose preparation enables them to direct and lead. More and more the world's leadership is being left to educated men and women.

Money Spent for an Education Is a Good Investment

For every dollar you put into your college education, the school or the state puts in two. This shows how urgently the world is demanding the educated or trained man. The public believes in education and is willing to pay for it.

It Pays Dividends

Anyone can be an unskilled laborer. Only the few are doctors, engineers, experts, executives. The difference is education.

An Ultimate Standard Is Needed

Those who have made much progress in the world, in looking back over their lives will realize that they have set an early goal and then attained it, or even drawing near to the earlier goal have set a further goal, and so as they have progressed have restated new goals and have continued to advance.

Because of the relativity of human knowledge, because of these observed facts of progress, because our idea of God changes as our knowledge increases, some would question whether there is an ultimate reality or an ultimate moral standard.

It is quite true that as we view the history of the people we find instances of customs observed which would not now receive the approval of modern ethics. Taking a short look there appears to be progress certainly, and a change in custom and moral ideals. But that does not change the fact that there is fundamental right and wrong and an ultimate standard of justice, however imperfectly we may apprehend that standard.

The fact that we cannot fully apprehend God now, the fact that as we progress in years to come our idea will be changed, is not a source of discouragement. We should hope that our ideas would change, and would progress nearer to the truth. If we could fully apprehend God now, he would then be no greater than the concept of a man. But because we cannot know him perfectly is no reason why we should not learn all we can and progress line upon line, precept upon precept, knowledge upon knowledge. For what is there that we do know perfectly? We do not know just why a tree grows, but that is no reason why we should not study and learn all we can of how it grows and that which will conduce to growth. Because we do not understand fully the source of life even in a blade of grass is no reason why we should refuse to study agriculture. Because we apprehend God only in part is no reason why we should not learn all we can of his nature and learn more and more to associate with him as is our privilege.

But the grave evil and the fundamental evil of the idea of a progressive ethics with no ultimate standard is the weakening of all moral standards. We know that style of dress, in men as well as in women, the style of hair, etc., changes from generation to generation and sometimes decade by decade, and year by year. We know that customs are modified in the long term of years. Hence we will say that much that is now proposed in the name of religion will in time be done away with, so why not be ahead of our time?

Baptism is therefore called in question and even the marriage relationship. But unfortunately the discussion will not end with theory but becomes the expression of a desire for a different practice. Polygamy is therefore sometimes suggested, that with a better grade of people perhaps polygamy might be permissible. But such ideals, whether consciously recognized or not, have their basis in a conscious or unconscious wish for a different practice. Therein lies the gravest danger in the assumption that there is no ultimate standard of morality, that present standards of right and wrong are called in question and then violated. So immoral practice follows on the excuse of "progressiveness."

We are surprised at times to note how clearly the Bible foretells just such a condition. "Know ye not that in the latter days perilous times shall come and men shall be lovers of their own selves . . . having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof, . . . ever learning but unable to come to a knowledge of the true." (2 Timothy 3.) Truth is the fundamental.

But in the latter days, there will be those who will be ever learning, ever progressing; yet they will present a form of godliness but will deny the power thereof. They will be continuously progressing and learning but unable to come to a knowledge of the truth. "From such turn away."

There is not, dear friends, any soul of mortal man, which, in youth and irresponsibility, can endure possession of supreme power over men, without becoming filled with foolishness, the greatest of diseases, and thereby bringing upon him the hatred of his best friends and the speedy loss of his dominions.—Plato's Laws.

Wisdom is oftentimes nearer when we stoop than when we soar.—Wordsworth.

Illegitimacy in America

Of late the statement has been many times repeated that there are 70,000 illegitimate children born within a limit of a year, and of these 40,000 have young girls for mothers. It is interesting, therefore, to note in the annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science a summary for twenty-eight States of reported illegitimacy from 1915 to 1920. These States show a very slight increase or none; .1 of 1 per cent for Alabama, Indiana; of .9 of 1 per cent for Missouri; of .5 for New Hampshire and Texas, but a decided decrease in Maryland, Massachusetts, and a slight decrease in South Dakota, Nevada, and among Negroes in Maryland. It must be remembered, however, that for white people these increases and decreases are based upon figures of .8 of 1 per cent to 2.4 per cent in 1915 of all births. Maryland shows a decrease from 2.4 per cent to 1.7 per cent; Massachusetts from 2.3 per cent to 1 per cent; Minnesota from 2 per cent to 1.8 per cent.

Of twenty-one cities, sixteen show a decrease from 1915 to 1920 and some quite a marked decrease. On the other hand, Saint Louis is stationary at 3.7 per cent and Kansas City leads all of the other large cities by an increase from 6.1 per cent to 13.6 per cent. It would seem in this that the immorality is both larger in Kansas City than in any other city and the percentage of increase is also decidedly larger than that for any other city for the like period.

Further light is thrown upon this matter in the statistics shown that the infant mortality rate for infants born out of wedlock is fully three times as great as for those born in wedlock. In Boston in 1914 the infant mortality in wedlock was 95 per 1,000 against 281 per 1,000 of infants born out of wedlock. In Baltimore in 1915 against 95.9 per 1,000 infant mortality born in wedlock there is set forth 315.5 per 1,000 of those born out of wedlock.

International Sunday School Convention

The sixteenth International Sunday School Convention convenes June 21 in the Convention Hall in Kansas City. Several of the general officers of the Sunday school have been enrolled as delegates and will attend, including A. Max Carmichael and Floyd M. McDowell of the general superintendency, from Lamoni; E. D. Moore, general secretary; S. A. Burgess, of the consulting board; Mrs. R. S. Salyards, quarterly editor; R. S. Salyards, church secretary; Walter W. Smith, church historian, and wife; A. L. Sanford, superintendent of Sunday schools in Zion, and wife; and several others from Independence.

The program includes some very educational exhibits by publishers of Sunday school supplies with opportunities to consider the special advantages of each.

The speakers are men and women of international renown who have subjects teeming with interest not only to Sunday school specialists, but all concerned with religious education. Sessions will begin at 10 a. m. and continue practically all day and evening.

The discussion rife in the press some time ago over the appointment of William Jennings Bryan to a place on the program was decided in favor of having him deliver the closing address. It appears that there was a mixup because of the merging of two separate organizations causing a change in program. This merger took place in Chicago the middle of February and affected the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations, representing over thirty communions, and the Executive Committee of the International Sunday School Association representing sixty state, provincial, and national units. The merged body is called the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education and will attempt to combine research in religious education with the practical work of the Sunday school. Whether the merger shall be approved is one of the questions before this convention.

Underweight Delusion

Probably a good many of our readers have been troubled at times by the problem of underweight. Common sense should have taught us, as it has some of us, that it is good health that is important and not the matter of height and weight.

To those who have been troubled, it is of interest to note the article in The Outlook for March 15 by Charles K. Taylor. He states that instead of taking one average weight we should rather take five average weights, any one of which may be perfectly healthy. For example a boy five feet tall may be slender, with an average weight of 77 pounds; slender medium, with an average weight of 82 pounds; medium, what is mis-called the average, 90 pounds; medium heavy, 98 pounds; or he may be heavy, around 106 pounds.

The important factor is good health. One who is naturally stout may be weak and still be well over the average weight for a slender person. It will be noted that these figures vary a matter of 30 pounds for the one height, but that is scarcely of passing significance, because the great question is, Is the boy healthy and strong for his type of build?

Common sense has long ago taught us that there are different types of people and that they cannot be all thrown together as a general average. Perhaps in the course of life the heavyweights, through their very ponderosity, will gain the most attention. But even this does not permit, let alone require, that those who are slender shall or may become stout.

The West as Seen in 1820-52

Kansas, Nebraska, and all western States were thought to be a vast desert similar to Sahara.

The Missouri Historical Review for January contains several articles of interest. The first fifty pages discusses the constitutions and constitutional conventions of Missouri, laying a basis for the constitutional convention which is soon to meet. Pioneer life in southwestern Missouri is continued, and also the followers of Dudan, and Missourians abroad.

A short article on traditions, concerning the Missouri question, is of particular interest in setting forth conditions existing at the time Missouri became a State in 1821. The Missouri Compromise included Missouri, Arkansas, and part of Oklahoma, of the Louisiana Purchase and slave States, while Iowa, Minnesota, the Dakotas, Montana, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and Wyoming were included, in whole or in part, in the territory to be free. But the real significance is that all of the above free territory, or practically all of it, was considered to be desert. The Great American Desert was supposed to reach from near the Missouri River, and to be practically as extensive as the Sahara Desert in North Africa. Zebulon Pike had declared that these great prairies would be an advantage to the United States as they would restrain our citizens from rambling further west, hence would tend to an intensive building up of the eastern country.

Major S. H. Long, in 1820, also pictured the West beyond Missouri as uninhabitable, while he declared that between the Mississippi and Missouri large tracts are often to be found exhibiting scarcely a trace of vegetation, while the mountain regions he declared to be destined to be the abode of perpetual desolation because of its barrenness and physical disadvantages. In fact, he declared that the territory intervening, east of the Rockies, bore a manifest resemblance to the desert of Sahara. This is repeated in 1849, and again in the geographies of 1852, which indicates that the Nebraska country is but little better than a desert, and that Dakota and Montana resembled Nebraska, but gradually the desert shrank. By 1867 western Kansas remained, and by 1877 only the Bad Lands of Dakota were left.

It is curious that even to-day a trace of these ideas still exists; that Kansas and Nebraska are dry States, especially in the west, and practically deserts without adequate rainfall. To the contrary, it appears that eastern Kansas has a greater rainfall in the six months, April to September, than any other section except that on the Gulf. It equals in rainfall other States in the Mississippi Valley, as Iowa, Illinois, and Michigan, for the year, but exceeds these States during the summer months.

Even western Kansas, during the summer months has three fourths the rainfall of Iowa for the same period, and an amount according to a recent Government report, approaching that of other States in the central section.

In 1820 to 1852 Missouri and Illinois were considered the frontier; beyond that was only the desert, with buffaloes, wild horses, and Indians. Even as late as 1850 and 1860, this territory was still referred to as the Great American Desert. We have heard old-timers so refer to it as they related their experiences in crossing the plains. S. A. B.

The Spirit of Consecration

One of our missionaries, Elder George W. Thorburn, learning that the months of June, July, and August were the slow months financially, has suggested to the Bishop that he cut their allowance down to $25 for those three months. He wrote to the Bishop as follows:

"Since getting your letter my wife and I have been talking the matter over, and as you said that June, July, and August were slow months financially, we concluded to make a special effort to relieve the Bishopric; so for the months of June, July, and August, cut our allowance down to twenty-five dollars. If a hundred more of our missionaries can do the same it will help relieve the situation some."

On this the Bishop made the following comment:

"Just think of what the result would be if a hundred thousand people should catch the spirit of consecration as this noble servant of God and his wife have."

Questions and Answers

Question. What may we understand to be the difference between "The 'sin' of the world" and "The 'sins' of the world"?

We are frequently confronted with the statement that Christ died for the "sin" of the world and not for the "sins" of the world, but referring to the Book of Mormon, Nephi says he saw the Lamb of God lifted up upon the cross and slain for the "sins" of the world. (1 Nephi 3: 19; 3: 5; and 2 Nephi 13: 1.) We read of the Lamb of God who should take away the "sins" of the world. In Mosiah 8: 1, we read of the atonement that God himself shall make for the "sins" and iniquities of his people. In Doctrine and Covenants 53: 2; 46: 5; and 54: 1, the statement is that Jesus Christ was crucified for the "sins" of the world. In more than twenty different texts in the Bible the word sins is used in this connection; about the strongest of which is found in 1 John 2: 2. "And he [Jesus Christ] is the propitiation for our sins, and not for our sins only, but also for the sins of the whole world." Against all these instances of this word sins in the plural, there occurs one text only found in John 1: 29 where he says of Jesus, "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world."

Does the church put any different construction on these two words? If so, please tell us.

Answer. We know of absolutely no such distinction as is referred to in this question. As the writer points out, Christ died for the sins of the world and we have usually heard it so presented. There may be much speculation, as "In Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive." Through this fall of Adam the world was cursed. It groans and is to be freed from sin and receive the celestial glory, but much of this is speculative in its nature.

Special Offer on Ensign Subscriptions

Arrangements have been made to take subscriptions at this office for Zion's Ensign, to be sent to nonmembers, at the special rate of 75 cents a year. This will be effective with subscriptions beginning July 1.

There should be a wide response to this liberal offer, as a means of supplementing missionary work. Perhaps there is no more effective way of reaching a family than to have the missionary paper of the church make fifty-two visits with its persistent message of gospel cheer and soul-satisfying discussions of various aspects of the plan of salvation.

The missionary work of the church must go. Though the personnel is reduced so far as actual men in the field is concerned, there must be no abatement of our efforts. We who have been warned must warn our neighbors. Can you think of a more effective way than to send the Ensign, in lieu of personal work?

Freewill Offering

From many fields come expressions on the part of the Saints of their desire to help maintain the operating funds of the church by not only paying their tithes, but also making special offerings. One district is trying to have every member give not less than ten cents a month. Those who can give a dollar are invited to do so, but no one should give less than ten cents.

From Madison, Wisconsin, H. W. Woodstock writes the Bishop that a few weeks ago he made an appeal to the Saints to help meet the operating deficit for the current year. He called their attention to the fact that one dollar from each member would meet the operating deficit for the current year ending June 30, and he writes that excepting a very few, all responded. He expects to have such a special offering, or dollar day, about three times a year in the branch. This is, of course, entirely in addition to the paying of regular tithing.

Such expressions as the above show at least the good will and desire of the Saints to help.

Faith Needed for Healing

Doctor Rachele S. Yarros, of the United States Public Health Service, is reported as urging at a health institute held in Kansas City, Kansas, recently, that there is a great need for a return of faith in healing. The faith for which she pleads is that in the old family doctor, concerning whom she says:

He was not bothered by the unnumbered ailments that science has discovered, but he doctored his patient with a success that often shames the modern specialist.

He was untutored in comparison to the prodigies graduated by your medical colleges nowadays and knew nothing about psychic complexes that are a bane to physicians now. Psychology, except as a word, was unknown. Yet he diagnosed cases with marvelous exactness, because he was intimately acquainted with his patients. He knew the family history and was a friend and advisor. He was present at marriages, births, celebrations, and deaths, and unconsciously assimilated the psychology so necessary to diagnosis.

And though his pillbag might have brought hysterics on a modern stickler for sanitation, and he often was slovenly, his patients had unlimited faith in him and responded to treatments. He was a social service worker and did the work modern doctors have no time to do.

The old-time doctor's drugs cured many ills, but faith was his best medicine.

We hear much discussion at times among physicians as to the value of faith healing, but it may well be questioned whether any great percentage of cures result without the intervention of faith. It may be the faith of the child in the parent; it may be the faith of the patient in the physician, but faith is a tremendous factor in the restoration of health. The representative mechanism is part of humanity. Is it not reasonable to suppose that if it is acting by the Spirit of God and the faith be in God rather than in some other human being, the results will not be any less satisfactory but the assurance of things hoped for will rather be increased?

Gospel Stewardship

By James F. Keir

Stewardship recognizes the supremacy of God and his ownership of all things. It includes the use of spiritual, mental, and physical powers, as well as material possessions.

(Sermon preached from the Central Radio Company station at Kansas City, Missouri, June 4, 1922.)

The aim of every church is to increase the sum total of human happiness. Happiness comes from within. It is the result of a contented mind. The higher our ideal and the closer that we, in our own lives, can approximate that ideal, the greater will be our happiness. It is for this reason that we point the unhappy sinner to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world. He represents our highest ideal—perfection. Happiness can be built only on virtue, and must have truth for its foundation. Happiness cannot exist where sin reigns, hence the clarion call of this church is first, last, and all the time:

Repent Ye! Repent Ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven Is at Hand!

Much of the unhappiness, misery, and woe in this world is caused by the inequalities that exist. The motivation of our present economic system is selfishness. Every business transaction has for its end, gain for personal enrichment. There is no limit to which men may go in amassing fortune. They may go on and on and on while countless millions suffer from hunger and privation. This is one of the anomalies of our much-boasted age of enlightenment and civilization. Think ye, that the Christ who declared that he was "no respecter of persons" could approve of such a system? Shall the church sit supinely by and make no effort to solve this problem which so vitally affects human happiness? If she turns a deaf ear to this wail from humanity, for justice, she shall be weighed in the balance and found wanting. I know of no other religious organization that is trying to give to the world a remedy for this social maladjustment.

The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints hopes eventually to give to the world a practical demonstration of economic freedom. This shall be brought about by the law of stewardships. We speak of stewardships in a much broader meaning than that which is ordinarily applied by our religious contemporaries. The dynamic of this order of life is love, in contrast with the present motivation of selfishness.

The first great command given by God to the children of men is, "Thou shalt love the Lord, thy God, with all thy heart and with all thy might and with all thy strength." The second is like unto it, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

Stewardships offer to men the opportunity to demonstrate their love for others. They might be defined as follows:

Stewardship is the attitude of mind in which the individual holds himself in his relation to society of which he is a part. Recognizing that as an individual his self, talents, possessions, and opportunities are to be used, not for personal enrichment or aggrandizement, but as a means through which he can function for the welfare of the social group. Not individual acquisition for personal profit beyond his needs, but so that social betterment may result from his functioning.

Again it might be defined as follows:

Stewardship is a status or relation, and arises out of the recognition by an individual of the supremacy of God, his ownership of all things, and the confidence reposed by God in man in conferring upon him spiritual endowments, mental abilities, physical powers, material possessions (the legal title to which may or may not be vested in the individual), and the corresponding responsibility and willingness to use, and the use of and the accounting for such powers and blessings to the realization of God's purposes in man.

In other words, we are to consider that whatever wealth has come to us as a result of our activities does not belong to us, but to God. This idea harmonizes with the statement of the Psalmist: "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof." We are only stewards. God intrusts us with the responsibility of managing this wealth.

The financial returns from the stewardship shall be applied as follows:

1st. To the supplying of his immediate needs and just wants.

2d. The payment of the tithe of the increase, that the gospel may be carried to the nations of the earth.

3d. Out of the remaining nine tenths he shall supply himself with an inheritance which shall be sufficient in size and value, the earnings from which shall be sufficient to amply provide for the needs of himself and family.

4th. Thereafter as a surplus is created he shall annually, not only pay the tithe of the increase, but also consecrate of the surplus.

From the foregoing you will note that nothing is taken from an individual which he needs; but, having supplied his needs, his surplus or that of which he has no need, flows into the common treasury of the group or order of stewards, of which he is a member, that others who are industrious, willing, and worthy, and who have skill but who lack capital, may be placed in a position so that they, too, may not only supply their needs but be able to make their contribution to society.

Political organizations have from time immemorial sought a cure for the existing economic evils, but thus far have failed and will continue to fail until the element of selfishness is eliminated from human hearts.

In 1919 the British Labor Party placed a plank in their political platform in an effort to direct the surplus of the people for the common good. I quote from the Social Service Bulletin for December, 1918. The caption to this plank reads as follows:

The Surplus for the Common Good

One main pillar of the house that the Labor Party intends to build is the future appropriation of the surplus, not to the enlargement of any individual fortune, but to the common good. It is from this constantly arising surplus (to be secured, on the one hand, by nationalization and municipalization, and, on the other, by the steeply graduated taxation of private income and riches) that will have to be found the new capital which the community day by day needs for the perpetual improvement and increase of its various enterprises, for which we shall decline to be dependent on the usury exacting financiers.

Of this one thing we feel sure, that no effort to cure our economic ills by political measures or legislation will be successful. We must reach the seat of the affections, create a deep-seated love of justice and a reverential regard for God, ere we shall solve our problem. Religion must be the cement of our social and economic fabric.

Under the system of gospel stewardship, there is no stifling of initiative nor the submerging of our individuality. Each is required to provide himself by his own thrift and industry with the things which he needs. He shall have an opportunity to give expression to his ability to its fullest extent, that thereby he may increase his capacity by the exercising of his talents and judgment, and thus be able to make a larger contribution to society.

Regeneration and not legislation is the key that unlocks the door to economic freedom, where increased happiness may be found.

The Coming of Christ

By J. J. Cornish

Including a discussion of the "last generation" and "the end of the world." In two parts—part one.

Predictions of Prophets Fulfilled

I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him.—Deuteronomy 18: 18, 19.

Those who are familiar with the Bible will recognize these as the words of Moses, a reference to the fulfillment of which is found in Acts 3: 22, 23; 7: 37, 38.

Isaiah, also prophesying of him, said:

For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The Mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace.—Isaiah 9: 6. (Luke 2: 10, 11.)

The third witness declares:

But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting.—Micah 5: 2. (Matthew 2: 6.)

This was all fulfilled in the first coming of our Savior in the flesh.

To Come in the Meridian of Time

Man of Holiness is his name; and the name of his Only Begotten is the Son of Man, even Jesus Christ, a righteous judge, who shall come in the meridian of time.—Genesis 6: 60, Inspired Translation. (See Genesis 5: 43; 7: 53; Jude 14, I. T.)

When shall the blood of the righteous be shed, that all they that mourn may be sanctified, and have eternal life? And the Lord said, It shall be in the meridian of time, in the days of wickedness and vengeance.—Doctrine and Covenants 36: 9.

The Lord said when he was here on earth, and before the destruction of the temple and the scattering of the Jews, that the days of vengeance were near at hand.

Days of Vengeance

For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled.—Luke 21: 21, I. T.

For there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the time of the Gentiles be fulfilled. Now these things he spake unto them, concerning the destruction of Jerusalem.—Luke 21: 22-24, I. T.

Christ Came in the Meridian of Time

Wherefore the almighty God gave his only begotten Son, as it is written in those scriptures which have been given of him: he suffered temptations but gave no heed unto them; he was crucified, died, and rose again the third day; and ascended into heaven to sit down on the right hand of the Father, to reign with almighty power according to the will of the Father, that as many as would believe and be baptized, in his holy name, and endure in faith to the end, should be saved: not only those who believed after he came in the meridian of time in the flesh, but all those from the beginning, even as many as were before he came, who believed in the words of the holy prophets who spake as they were inspired by the gift of the Holy Ghost.—Doctrine and Covenants 17: 5. [And again in the revelation given January, 1831, the Lord said]: Hearken and listen to the voice of him who is from all eternity to all eternity, the great I AM, even Jesus Christ, the light and the life of the world; a light which shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not; the same which came in the meridian of time unto my own, and my own received me not; but to as many as received me, gave I power to become my sons, and even so will I give unto as many as will receive me, power to become my sons.—Doctrine and Covenants 39: 1.

I believe this will be sufficient to prove that our Savior came in the meridian of time. Shall we now figure a little?

From creation to Christ	4,004
		Meridian
From Christ until now	1,922
From now until Christ	82
The millennium	1,000
The little season	1,000
	8,008

According to the best account we have, our Savior was born 4,004 years after the creation, but as stated in our Bible helps, the Jewish idea is that it was even 4,000 years after creation. Should that be true, then our figuring would be thus:

From creation to Christ	4,000
		Meridian
From Christ until now	1,922
From now until Christ	78
The millennium	1,000
The little season	1,000
	8,000

The bottom row of figures is twice as much as the top row, at which time Christ came. Hence we have proven by the word of the Lord, and the best figures we have that our Savior came in the meridian of time.

But some may say, especially those who have preached and prophesied, and interpreted their dreams and visions to mean that Christ must come in this generation, beginning 1830, that I am making the 82 years too far away, and that the "little season" will not be one thousand years.

Very well; whatever you wish to deduct from the "little season," you must add to the 82 or 78, whichever you choose from now until the coming of Christ, to make it come out right. You could not put it on the millennium, for that must be 1,000 years; no more, no less. You must not add it to the 4,004, or 4,000, for that is fixed so far as we are concerned. Although Ussher does not say that 4,000 or 4,004 is absolutely correct, yet it is given to us as their best figures. (Hales figured it more; others less.) Neither dare you add it to 1922 (from Christ until now), for the church when first organized in 1830 acknowledged it as follows:

The rise of the church of Christ in these last days, being one thousand eight hundred and thirty years since the coming of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ in the flesh, it being regularly organized and established agreeably to the laws of our country, by the will and commandments of God in the fourth month, and on the sixth day of the month which is called April.—Doctrine and Covenants 17: 1.

More Facts and Figures

The Lord created the heaven and earth in six days, and rested on the seventh day from all his works which God created and made. And since the Scriptures show that a day with the Lord is as a thousand years with man, we will figure up the time the next Lord's Day will commence, as that will be the Sabbath rest, or millennial rest, with the Lord and his people. Because of transgression Israel could not enter into God's rest. (Hebrews 3: 18, 19.)

Paul says:

So I swear in my wrath they shall not enter into my [God's] rest.—Hebrews 3: 11, I. T. So we see that they could not enter in because of unbelief.—Verse 19. Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it. [Sabbath rest, margin].—Hebrews 4: 1.

Instead of "For unto us was the gospel preached," the Inspired says, "For unto us was the rest preached." (Hebrews 4: 2.) Thus we see the sabbath rest of a thousand years was preached to ancient Israel, as well as to the Saints in Paul's time, and it is surely time we Latter Day Saints were preaching it, too.

There remaineth therefore a Sabbath rest for the people of God.—American Revised, Hebrews 4: 10.

Evidently the Apostle Paul has reference to the sabbath of rest during the millennium. And beautifully does this coincide with the statement of the Apostle Peter wherein he is speaking of the coming of Jesus Christ:

But concerning the coming of the Lord, beloved, I would not have you ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day.—2 Peter 3: 8, I. T.

David says:

The Lord also tells this church the same in 1831 as follows:

Behold, now it is called to-day (until the coming of the Son of Man), and verily it is a day of sacrifice, and a day for the tithing of my people; for he that is tithed shall not be burned (at his coming); for after to-day cometh the burning: this is speaking after the manner of the Lord; for verily I say, To-morrow all the proud and they that do wickedly shall be as stubble; and I will burn them up, for I am the Lord of hosts; and I will not spare any that remaineth in Babylon. Wherefore, if ye believe me, ye will labor while it is called to-day.—Doctrine and Covenants 64: 5.

Let us believe him, then! His ways are right all together. This side of the one thousand years is to-day—to-morrow is the millennium.

Cruden says:

Sabbath is also taken for eternal rest and felicity in heaven, where the spirits of just men are made perfect. . . . for they will be with the Lord and enjoy an eternal Sabbath.—Hebrews 4: 9.

There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God. In the Greek—a keeping of the Sabbath.—Cruden.

Thus, then, the next seventh day with the Lord will be millennium—the seventh thousand years with man.

Shall we figure again?

From creation to Christ	4,004
From Christ until now	1,922
From now until Christ	82
The millennium	1,000
	7,008

Or, as the Hebrews have it:

From creation to Christ	4,000
From Christ until now	1,922
From now until Christ	78
The millennium	1,000
	7,000

Thus the figures are in harmony with those of the meridian of time hereinbefore mentioned.

Some of those who read this may say they do not believe this theory because the sun was to rule the day, and the moon to rule the night; therefore it is just days and nights of twenty-four hours each. Yes, but most of God's creative work was finished before there was a sun or moon! There was no sun or moon or stars until the ending of the fourth day—God's days—there was no man yet! That theory is (as I see it) worthless.

God arranged matters so that when he placed man on the earth the sun was to rule the day, and the moon to rule the night for him, whenever God was ready to create him. Then, God rested on the seventh day.

For I, the Lord God, created all things of which I have spoken, spiritually, before they were naturally upon the face of the earth; . . . and I, the Lord God, had created all the children of men, and not yet a man to till the ground, for in heaven created I them, and there was not yet flesh upon the earth, neither in the water, neither in the air.—Genesis 2: 5, 6, I. T.

After that, man was made, perhaps in the beginning of the next day (God's day) after the "sabbath rest." Then another six thousand years with man to toil and labor—the seventh thousand—the millennium—God's sabbath again.

Let Peter speak again right here:

But concerning the coming of the Lord, beloved, I would not have you ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.—2 Peter 3: 8, I. T.

Let the reader please go back and look over the last figures again.

But some may ask, "Why are you doing any figuring at all when you are not sure that those figures are correct?"

I am not depending on figures as they are given to us; but, as Christ did come in the "meridian of time," I am justified in finding out with the best figures available how near it is. And you may figure how far others have gone astray in figuring that he must come in 1843, 1844, 1872, 1873, 1875, 1895, 1905, 1924, 1927, 1930, 1932, 1955. And Samuel Ralston 2016; also Professor Young's sun theory 3314. With, "Millions now living will never die."

Do Not Know When the Time Is

I am sorry to think that so many in and out of the church have appointed about the time, when there is so much recorded telling us that we will not know when the time will be. "Nor shall they know until he comes."—Doctrine and Covenants 49: 2. And most of whom have turned to Daniel and John the Revelator for the principal proofs of their arguments, which, without the proper key, and depending upon our own faulty interpretations, are proven to be the two most unreliable, superficial, and questionable books in the whole Bible. And yet no doubt these same books will, when the time of their unfolding shall come, give us the most profound and intellectual understanding of the future. My proof for this is as follows:

Daniel was commanded to shut up the words of the book "until the time of the end."

For at the time of the end shall be the vision. . . . Wherefore shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days. . . . And I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it.—Daniel 8: 17, 26, 27.

Books Sealed Till the End

But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end: . . . And I heard, but I understood not: . . . Go thy way, Daniel: for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end.—Daniel 12: 4, 8, 9.

Some say when the gospel came was the time of the end; I say the gospel restoration was merely the beginning of the end.

But many who figure and finally settle on a time for the end to come are very ready to tell us that "the wise shall understand" (Daniel 12: 10), then go on to tell us when the time will be, but fail every time!

The wise Daniel, who had those visions, did not know; neither do we.

As for the revelations of Saint John, the Book of Mormon plainly says:

Come unto me, O ye Gentiles, and I will shew unto you the greater things, the knowledge which is hid up because of unbelief. Come unto me, O ye house of Israel, and it shall be made manifest unto you how great things the Father hath laid up for you, from the foundation of the world; and it hath not come unto you, because of unbelief. Behold, when ye shall rend that vail of unbelief . . . And then shall my revelations which I have caused to be written by my servant John, be unfolded in the eyes of all the people.—Ether 1: 109-113. (Doctrine and Covenants, 90: 1.)

Then, dear reader, will we understand.

So, then, when we read Daniel or John the Revelator's writings, anything that looks clear to our minds, and is in harmony with other writers of the Bible, we may safely teach; but that which we read that seems mysterious, and upon which no other prophet or writer speaks, let it alone! "Because it is yet for a time appointed."

When his work was accomplished, Jesus returned to the Father where he was before, leaving a promise to his dear disciples, "I will come again." (John 14: 2, 18; Acts 1: 11; 1 Thessalonians 4: 16, 17.)

What the Lord Said to His Church

Before this church was one year old the Lord told the prophet that we would not understand much about Christ's coming until the New Testament be translated, and in it the time of the signs of his coming would be made known. Ah! Then no wonder the many failures and mistakes!

And now, behold, I say unto you, It shall not be given unto you to know any further concerning this chapter [Matthew 24], until the New Testament be translated, and in it all these things shall be made known, wherefore I give unto you that you may now translate it, that ye may be prepared for the things to come.—Doctrine and Covenants 45: 11.

If "in it" all these things shall be made known, you will not obtain that knowledge from any other book but the Inspired Translation of the Bible.

"As I showed It Unto My Disciples"

Watch closely; see how the Lord is urging us on to listen to the instructions he is about to impart to the church.

Hearken, O ye people of my church [all of us], and again I say, Hearken, . . . Hearken, O ye people of my church, and ye elders, listen together, and hear my voice, while it is called to-day. [To-day, the day before the millennial day.] . . . Wherefore hearken, and I will reason with you, and I will speak unto you and prophesy, as unto men in days of old; and I will show it plainly, as I showed it unto my disciples, as I stood before them in the flesh, and spake unto them, saying, As ye have asked of me concerning the signs of my coming, . . . I will show you how the day of redemption shall come, and also the restoration of the scattered, Israel.—Doctrine and Covenants 45: 1, 2.

Then to obtain this knowledge, we know where to go, don't we? Where he will "show it plainly."

First of all (as I have gone over it several times) I will tell you how you will come to an understanding quickly. From verse 4 to about 27, of Matthew 24th chapter, Inspired Translation, the Savior is telling them of the things that will happen in their time, and on to the end of that generation. Their question is:

Tell us, when shall these things be which thou hast said concerning the destruction of the temple, and the Jews.—Verse 4. [I abbreviate.] And Jesus answered: Take heed. False Christs. Deliver you up. Kill you. False prophets. Iniquity abound.

When you, therefore, shall see the abominations of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, then you shall stand in the holy place.—Verse 12.

Now the question so often asked, "What is the abomination of desolation?" From any other Bible we could not tell, but in the Inspired he has just told it. "Concerning the destruction of Jerusalem," that's what it is!

Then flee to the mountains. Get off the house—flee—never mind your clothes. Woe to them (under certain conditions). Greatest trials and tribulations the Jews ever passed through. Days shortened.

This does not mean now—at that time and generation only—as evidenced from the following: "Behold, these things I have spoken unto you concerning the Jews."—Verse 21.

All of which took place in that generation. (Doctrine and Covenants 45: 3.) The Master uttered those words in the year 33, and the destruction took place in the year 70 (thirty-seven years after), when 110,000 Jews were destroyed in that whole siege, 97,000 were carried away captive, and 11,000 perished for the want of food (Josephus), and the balance were scattered among all nations.

Then the gospel was preached among the Gentiles from generation to generation, but was open for all people who would obey. To the Jews first, one generation only, and now in the latter days it is reversed. It came from heaven (Revelation 14: 6) to the Gentiles first, and will be preached to them from generation to generation (we are in the third generation now), and when the proper time comes it will go back to the Jews. And when they begin to accept it, and those signs and wonders begin to be shown forth, that generation will not pass until Christ comes to reign a thousand years.

"So the last shall be first, and the first shall be last."—Matthew 20: 15.

And after he (Christ) has manifested himself unto the Jews and also the Gentiles, then shall he manifest himself unto the Gentiles, and also unto the Jews. And the last shall be first, and the first shall be last. (1 Nephi 3: 199, 200.) And the law as given to us is, "Firstly, upon the Gentiles, and then upon the Jews" (Doctrine and Covenants 108: 3) for these last days.

Signs in the Sun, Moon, and Stars

Coming down to Matthew 24: 28-55, the Savior calls their attention to our time and on to the last generation. They ask: "And what is the sign of thy coming?" (Verse 4.) His answer: There will be wars, rumors of wars, nation against nation, famine, pestilence, earthquakes, iniquity shall abound, etc. And again (this age like unto that):

And again, this gospel of the kingdom [we have it] shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations, . . . And again shall the abomination of desolation [another destruction at Jerusalem], spoken of by Daniel the prophet, be fulfilled. And immediately after the tribulation of those days [referring to the same war, Zechariah 14], the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of heaven shall be shaken. Verily I say unto you, this generation . . . shall not pass away until all I have told you shall be fulfilled.—Matthew 24: 28-35.

Those signs have not appeared yet, neither will they appear for many years to come.

Mark, in chapter 13, tells it just the same as it is recorded in Matthew. Thus we discover that there will be another destruction at Jerusalem, maybe more, after the Jews are gathered in sufficient numbers to build their city and temple before the sun, moon, and star signs will appear. There may also be other wars there.

If we would but look at the wording of those scriptures we should readily see that it is all in the future.

After the next destruction—"immediately after the tribulation"—sun, moon, and star signs. Verily I say unto you, This generation is the last.

How Long Is a Generation

A single succession in natural descent, as the children of the same parents; hence, an age. The people of the same period, or living at the same time. A family; a race; progeny; offspring.—Webster. By some of the ancients—100 years; others 33 years or 30, and even 20.—Cruden. American Popular Dictionary, same as Webster. Patriarchal age 100 years; subsequently as other civilized nations 30 to 40 years.

THE SEMINAR

The Problem of Progress

By Lonzo Jones

The author's hope of the future for society lies in social structures built around a definite "purpose" to fulfill a given "function," bound together by a common religion.

(Read at a gathering of the new Greek letter society, the L. D. S. Society, at Graceland College.)

Professor Ellwood, of the University of Missouri, defines civilization as "the creation and transmission of the ideal values by which men regulate their conduct; the transmission from age to age of the ideals, customs, beliefs, and knowledge by which men have found it possible to conquer nature and to live together in well ordered groups." Whether civilization as thus defined is increasing or decreasing from age to age constitutes the problem of progress. To it we turn for discussion in this paper.

It was no unusual thing ten years ago to hear our public orators declaiming the rapid strides civilization had been making in the last few years. And those of us who are still optimistic and are enjoying the fruits of the inventions and scientific attainments of the past few years still look with pride —William Smith's Bible Dictionary. 33 years.—Lees. From Abraham to Christ 42 generations.—Bible, Matthew 1: 5. About 47 years to a generation—more in Abraham's time—less in Christ's time.

So we are safe in saying 33 years to a generation in our age: yet, we must hold the word generation elastic. One generation is as long as any person lives, if it is a hundred and fifty years or more; but from generation to generation—a succession of generations—we must take the average age of man, which is at present thirty-three years.

We (like Job 42: 16) might "see four generations," yet live only one generation. I can live (in the present life) only one generation, yet I saw my grandfather (1), father (2), myself (3), my children (4), my grandchildren (5), and great-grandchildren (6). Yet I live only one generation.

And still we find many in and out of the church preaching that the signs in the sun and moon were fulfilled in 1780, one hundred and forty-two years ago! Over four generations past. And yet, the Lord says to the church, in 1830, "The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall be," etc. All in the future! (See Doctrine and Covenants 28: 4; 33: 2; 45: 6; 85: 24.) All of those references prove clearly they are still in the future!

(To be concluded.)

upon what we term the progress of our age. Since we have the heritage of all past ages, I am not sure but that we do stand higher in the plane of progress than any previous age, whether or not we are able to maintain our equilibrium at all times.

But the war has struck a new chord, the insistence of which makes it almost dominant in the refrain we now hear. Even the most enthusiastic orators and the most optimistic citizens are forced to take note of the barbarous reversions of the war and post-war periods. The inhuman slaughter of the war, the barbarous methods used by both contending sides, the selfish diplomacy at the peace table, the reactionary attitude and narrow provincialism of our own Senate, are a few of the wider social evidences of such reversions. The ever insistent war between labor and capital, the race riots and lynchings, the divorce evil, and the increasing number of robberies and holdups are evidences in a narrower field. Evidence in a still narrower social field, but more widely representative of the masses of the units which compose society, is found in the jazz music, the cheek to cheek dancing, the sensational movies, the sensuous appeals in advertising, and in the constant disregard for chastity and the higher virtues.

Meaning of Progress

These reversions are so evident that no sound-thinking, public-minded citizen can escape them, and even the blind enthusiast is forced to recognize them. On every hand the questions are being asked: "Have we made so much progress over the civilization of our forefathers? Are we further advanced? Just what is progress? How can it be determined and guaranteed?" Unless we are willing to yield our sustaining optimism to the drab pessimist, and unless we are willing to struggle blindly through the chaos that is now in evidence, we must face these questions and answer them to the best of our ability.

Chesterson says, "Progress can be conceived only by one with a cast iron code of values; of creeds and dogmas; one almost infallible." Kant says that only by fixing our eyes upon a goal can we give direction to our efforts. Spencer speaks of progress as the "change from incoherent homogeneity to rather definite, coherent heterogeneity." Sumner defines it as "social power," stressing the idea of production. Carver, Giddings, and Ward are not essentially different in their definitions. All of them define progress in a materialistic sense.

Doctor Case speaks of progress as "More of the good," and defines "the good" as "happiness" or "that which all men seek." An attainment of more of the good, or an increase in the quality of the good would indicate progress. He also defines it in what he terms a cynical way as "Movement in the direction I want society to go."

Todd, after recounting several definitions and commenting upon their failure, attempts an orientation of his subject by a discussion of the "criteria of progress." This he sums up as follows: "The criteria of progress may be summarized as industrial, humanitarian, educational, and institutional." He summarizes the "tests" of progress as the population, the vital, the economic, and the moral. He then spends many chapters in a discussion and criticism of the different interpretations of progress to which sociologists have subscribed. These he classifies as the materialistic, the biological, the institutional, and the idealogical.

After this long discussion, Todd finally sums up his own conclusions in the last two chapters of his book. He sees the hope of social progress in "social service" rather than in "social exploitation" for selfish ends. He thinks the ideal can be established through a process of social education. He would make that education not one of theory alone, but a thoroughly practical one as well. With such an ideal he would bring to bear the forces of the materialists, of the biologists, of the institutionalists, and of the idealogists in its accomplishment.

I consider Todd's greatest contribution to be in the next to the last chapter, where he discusses the hope of progress. He says society must lift itself by its own bootstraps. For any progress to take place, it must be done by man's consciously directed efforts. He thus emphasizes the necessity of a consciously set goal and the struggle towards it.

Hope of Future Under Three Heads

Doctor Case sees the hope of the future in three different lines of endeavor: First, increased production; second, more equitable distribution; and third, more adequate appreciation of the goods of life and relations. I think in these three points, properly adjusted and related, he has struck the nail squarely on the head. Neither one alone can guarantee progress. The first we have had with a minimum of two and three for the past hundred years—one may almost say since time began. But it has been speeded up since the beginning of the nineteenth century, and under the influence of American individualism and unbounded opportunities has reached its maximum. The second of these has been cried for during the past thirty or forty years, with an ever-increasing strength, until at the present time it occupies the forum of social discussion, finding expression in industrial wars, Bolshevism, Guild socialism, and direct actionism. The third is just now being heard in the faint whisperings of a few idealists and religionists, despite the fact that it was repeatedly spoken of by the Master of Life nearly two thousand years ago.

While Professor Patrick, in his book, The Psychology of Reconstruction, discusses the first two of these points emphasized by Doctor Case, he despairs of hope in those directions. The third of these points he indirectly refers to, but overlooks in summing up his conclusions. Like Todd, he sees the hope of the future in education, reiterating the slogan of Socrates, "Knowledge is virtue." While there is no denying the value and the indispensability of education as the instrument of progress, it is by no means the keystone. There must be the ideals towards which to educate—towards which to strive.

G. D. H. Cole sets forth in his book, Social Theories, his ideal of the future in a society reconstructed on a functional basis. There is value in his contribution, in that he forces upon our attention the only excuse for any societal organization, namely that of the function it is to fulfill. (Cole discusses function, or purpose, from an objective standpoint, while Professor Patrick gives more space to the subjective causes, or instinctive causes for social organizations.) While these discussions emphasize the form and excuse for society, they do not attempt to define the nature or content of society.

Definition of Social Progress

I should like, in the next few paragraphs, to set out in brief outline my own idea of social progress, and point out how I think it might be attained. First, I want to define social progress and in the definition will be indicated my concept of it. I would define social progress as follows: Social progress is the conscious movement of society towards definite goals or objectives, upon which the members composing the society are harmoniously agreed, and towards which they collectively strive, even at the sacrifice of selfish motives, which goals, even though they appear as fixed positions, when attained prove to be merely new vantage grounds from which new objectives can be viewed, and which furnish a base for operations towards the attainment of the newer goal.

It will be noted that the words conscious, goals, objectives, and agreed are used as though it were possible for society to have a conscience, a mind, and a will. In other words, my definition seems to indicate that society is in possession of such attributes as are clearly recognizable in a self-willed and self-directed individual. These attributes are usually denied to society by psychologists and sociologists. But so long as they are denied to society it is useless to talk of "social progress." True, social groups move often without conscious directions, just as many human beings drift through life without a purpose—and just as it is claimed by the mechanical evolutionist that our forebears progressed. But the best that is claimed by evolutionists of this type is that life evolved by chance variation and natural selection, from the single celled animal to man—a complex being capable of many reactions, and self-directed. For such an evolution millions upon millions of years have been required. Even then, with so much depending upon "chance," there was as much likelihood of failure as of success.

For society to evolve in the same way would require another series of ages, equally as long. It would also involve as great a likelihood of retrogression as progression. Would anyone sponsoring a plan of social progress consign it to a scheme so uncertain? The individual can be said to progress only when he is moving towards consciously sought goals. He may be moving without the aid of a goal, but such movement is not measurable nor recognizable except in relation to some other object. If such be true of the individual, it cannot be denied to the group. To be assured of movement, either progressively or retrogressively, it is necessary for thirty or sixty or a thousand individuals, moving as a group, to have a standard whereby to determine their movement.

How Is Goal Determined?

Even though there may be no doubt as to the necessity of having a goal, there may be a great deal of skepticism regarding the manner in which the goal is to be determined by the group. It is at this point that the arguments of the various writers on the subject diverge, some agreeing with McDougall that the group has a super-mind, external to that of the members composing the groups, while by far the greater number seem to hold that the group mind is determined by the minds of the individuals composing it. To me, it seems that the group mind is made up and the objectives set by the very forces which drive or draw men together in social groups. It may require the foresight and ability of a leader, a seer, or a prophet to point out the objective and crystallize the group mind, but the objective is set for them when they recognize the force which draws them together. This holds true for the warring tribe driven together for safety; for the pastoral clan banded together for mutual aid in protecting and caring for their flocks; for the labor union formed to secure shorter hours and better pay; for the industrial or manufacturing corporation organized for economical production of goods; or, for the religious body bound together by common desires for worship. The objective is set in each instance, and the attainment of it is the "function" for which the society is formed, of which Cole has so much to say.

Must Have the Will to Do

Having such an objective consciously recognized, it is necessary to move towards it by consistent effort in order to progress. The individual who plans big things, but lacks the will to put them across, is merely building "castles in Spain." The same is true with a society. As Browning says, "The will is somewhat." How the will power of a social group is to be aroused presents another knotty problem. But it seems to me that the will of a social group need not be considered essentially different from that of an individual. Each situation faced plus the individual's powers of meeting it, determines his decision, or will in each instance. Just so with a social group. Each situation plus the society's machinery for handling it, determines the will of the society. If it faces a situation for which it does not have the proper machinery, it must will to let it alone, or face defeat, or create new machinery sufficient for that particular situation. (I mean by "society's machinery," its organization and structure.)

In any social group, the first essential element is the "appreciative" referred to by Doctor Case, and only so long as the appreciative is kept keenly alive will there be any real social motive and social bond. The second essential is the distribution of responsibility to the several members of the organization for the production of the goods or services for which the society was organized. The last element is the just sharing of the goods accruing to the group by such united action. (By "appreciative" referred to above, I mean a keen appreciation of the goal for which the society was organized, and of the purposes it attempts to achieve.)

The paragraph above includes the three essential elements presented by Doctor Case, plus the "distribution of responsibility." It also includes the contribution of Cole in the "appreciative" which requires an awareness of the "function" of the society.

Education's Part in Progress Not Integral

The solution presented by Todd and by Professor Patrick—that of education—while an element vital to the success of the social group, is not an integral part of either function or structure in society. Having given the conscious goal of a society and the organization whereby to attain it, education furnishes an effective instrument by which the ideals of the society are disseminated and promulgated and by which the machinery is adjusted and perfected.

The difficulties in social progress encountered after these integral elements are provided, lie in three directions: first, in the persistence of the structure of society after the function for which it was created no longer exists; second, in a society attempting to function in fields for which it is not equipped in structure; and third, in the lack of co-ordination between smaller societies, thus preventing a harmonious union in a world order.

Analysis of the Difficulties

The first two of these difficulties are probably the greater, though at first glance the latter would appear to be so. The persistence of old organizations after the function for which they were organized has died out is not an unusual phenomenon. When this is the case, we have on our hands a lot of empty shells or mere rituals, or forms to which no meaning is attached, and from which no efficacy is drawn. The worst trouble encountered from this standpoint is the waste of energy due to the adherence to dead forms, and in the dead drag which such adherence attaches to further forward movements. This represents the point where an objective is gained, but is regarded as a final end rather than as a new base from which to operate in the attainment of a still further advanced position. Anyone who has attempted to introduce a reform measure into a fossilized society can appreciate how such adherence militates against progress.

The second of these difficulties—that of attempting objectives for which the society is not equipped—is equally disruptive. Besides being a failure themselves, such-attempts usually run counter to societies organized and equipped for that purpose, and thus deters them, if not actually thwarting their purposes. These two difficulties are fruitful of wars and contentions, and result in a waste of time and effort.

To prevent these difficulties from arising would entirely foredoom the third; and properly to meet the third would mean the elimination of the first two, for the lack of coordination is a result of in-harmonious relationship between societies. At which end to begin, in order to eliminate these difficulties, is a problem. It would perhaps be best to attack both ends at once.

The first two of these difficulties can be overcome by sane revision, or entire abolition of a social structure when new functions are forced upon it, or when the function for which it was created no longer exists. When revision is made, and a new function is assumed, such functions should always be in harmony with the machinery of the society assuming them, or the machinery should be so changed as to meet the requirements of the new functions. To minimize the difficulty of making the revisions, or the entire abolition of a society, provisions should be made at the time of organization for just such measures when the emergencies requiring them shall arise.

The third difficulty—lack of coordination—can be met only by a strong thread or bond of common interest to all the social groups, binding them together, and by a common ideal towards which all the social groups are working, to which each consciously contributes a vital part, and in which they all blend harmoniously.

What that bond shall be is hinted at by Doctor Case when he says we must develop the “appreciative” side of man’s nature; and is pointedly referred to by Professor Patrick when he says, “We can be united by a great world movement in religion.” As I view it, herein lies the hope of the future—in a great, world-wide, soul-satisfying religious movement. Religion is the great affective, or “appreciative” or “ideal forming” element in the life of man and society. It is the one thing that grips and binds the souls of men into one harmonious whole, and furnishes for them their common objective. A discussion of the applicability of religion to the social problem is a broad subject, and deserves a paper in itself. To this I hope to turn in some future paper, but to follow it further here is beyond the scope of this paper.

For me, then, the hope of the future for society lies in social structures built around a definite “purpose” to fulfill a given “function,” bound together by the bonds of a common religion, which furnishes for them their “common ideal,” towards which they each consciously strive, and for the accomplishment of which they joyfully contribute even to the sacrifice of the smaller groups when their function has been fulfilled, or when their machinery is not adequate to the task they are attempting.

Remedy for Immorality Is in the Home

A clipping from New Zealand indicates anxiety in general circles concerning a lower moral tone and the waning of home influence. The remedy is suggested to be found in education.

It is interesting to note, however, that the world has passed through several such crises heretofore and that if one tenth of the marriages fail, nine tenths of them do not end in divorce. Certainly we should reduce the ten per cent of delinquencies, but not lose sight of that which has been preserved.

The solution suggested is one in which we can all most heartily accord, that the cause of purity will be best advanced by more definite teaching about the reverence due to the body as the temple of the Holy Ghost. The remedy is in the proper spiritual and moral recognition of the work of the church.

Home Craft for Girls

In a former article in this column called, “How shall we train our daughters?” no attempt was made to specify, or adequately outline, the special courses desired in a curriculum for girls. We did wish, however, to get some of our parents to thinking the matter over, and to make some sort of a decision and selection for themselves which might better meet the acknowledged situation. From the numerous replies that have come to our desk, we are led to feel that a gratifying amount of interest is being taken in the subject by the readers of our column. Parents are awakening to the need for more specialized teaching for potential mothers and fathers—those who, in a few years, will be molding the destinies of our Nation as they develop and train, for good or ill, the plastic bodies and receptive minds of their children.

That thoughtful parents are wanting and demanding of our schools certain most necessary subjects to supplant many that have little or remote connection with the most probable responsibilities of parenthood, is a most encouraging sign. It has been pointed out that three fourths of American women marry, and most of these become mothers. What proportion of American men marry and become fathers we are not prepared to say, but certain it is that there is an equal number of mothers and fathers in the country, and, just as certainly, the responsibilities of that mutual parenthood should be equally divided. We hope to see the time when our sons shall be taught to carry efficiently, honorably, intelligently, and successfully their portion of the duties and privileges of parenthood, as well as our daughters to be prepared and trained for their part of the task.

Whatever may have been the necessity for a girl to earn a livelihood prior to her marriage, at least it must be conceded that utter ignorance of the laws which govern home making and mothering is not apt to spell success for the matrimonial venture which succeeds her business career. If all mothers were qualified to give their daughters the necessary instruction; if all had the desire and the time to do so properly, systematically, and thoroughly; and if every daughter felt responsive to such teaching and training, problems along this line might vanish as the dews of night before the rising sun. But alas! As we find the matter to-day, most mothers are not prepared to give a scientific basis for their home craft, and most daughters are not willing to receive it at the hands of their mothers—even if both could find the time in the midst of the whirlwind pace of to-day!

“The business of life,” says Doctor G. S. Hall in an oft-quoted but wonderfully basic passage, “is the transmission of the sacred torch of heredity undimmed to future generations. This is the most precious of all worths and values in the world.” If we cannot give our children a better heritage than we received, let it at least be as good and true and worthy. The generation which preceded us lived simpler; there was much less complexity, and mother and daughter spent much more time together. Because to-day is a day filled with a multitude of attractions and allurements which draw the children early and often from the fireside of home and the companionship of their parents, we, the parents concerned, will surely have to take a more positive and aggressive stand upon many matters, in order that we may make up to our children some of the losses which they are suffering in the less simple life they are living. In other words, since the customs of to-day make it more difficult for us to have naturally a close and intimate companionship with our children, we must definitely plan for and obtain that desired companionship if we would overcome the handicaps and make good the losses accruing.

What we should like to see included in the education of our young people is not only those practical subjects which will make them adaptable and efficient in the affairs of life, but that there shall be also ingrained into their characters an appreciation of the spiritual character of life, the unity of all its forms, the interdependence of every atom in the universe, the relation between to-day with its opportunities—its deeds whether good or evil—and all eternity, and a knowledge of divine laws, their potency and immutability. In other words, it is not enough for a girl to know how to make a white sauce, to roast meat, or to make a dress, important as it is for her to know how to do them well; but she should know that her loyalty to her Maker, her oneness with all the universe, her right to be counted a citizen of the spiritual kingdom, depends upon her mental attitudes towards even these homely tasks and every other incident of her life. The material things of life are but the vehicles for expression of the spiritual life within the individual. The young mother who places the proper values upon the means and processes and materials of her home life will be the one who will appreciate the more eternal values of the spirit—the one who will appreciate the confidence and love of a little child, who will see in its eyes a reflection of its divine origin, its immortal life. Is it not worth while to give our girls this appreciation, teach them the sacredness and beauty of motherhood, and how to properly care for children and train them for the kingdom of God? Surely the task is not light, nor is it trivial. It is one over which to pray, and for which to prepare as fully as possible.

It may be some time before many of these needs shall be fully met in any of our educational institutions, but it is most gratifying to reflect that so far as ideals are concerned, so far as deep devotion and consecration to the welfare and spiritual development of our young people are concerned, our own church college cannot be surpassed. If Graceland is not prepared, at the present time, to present courses which shall include the specialized child training, child care, and child welfare which the mothers of to-morrow will need in order to fully and properly estimate their parental responsibilities, at least we may feel sure that our girls at Graceland will be placed in an environment conducive to the development of that which is highest in their natures. And as the demands shall increase, gradually there will be made available many more of the studies and research we desire for them. It is "up to you," the parents of the girls of our church, to help bring about these opportunities. As you may help your girls to decide what courses they will take in the pursuit of their higher education, you may guide them towards these most desirable and useful subjects, and so far as you decide to utilize the college opportunities offered by the church, and to send your young people to Graceland you have contributed definitely to the progress and development of the body as a whole. Successful prosecution of any of the projects launched by the church is a factor in the success of the entire organization.

From the Heart of a Plain Countrywoman

Mother Nature, in the beauty of her ten thousand flowers, worships God in his "first temples," all newly decorated, washed with spring showers, and painted with golden sunshine. It is the time of loving, of joyous awakening!

The sunbeams dancing through the open door of the farmhouse reveal dingy walls and soiled, faded curtains. And the housewife sees and sighs: "Not this year—and I wanted it so much!"

Did you, too, want a new spick-and-span, blue-and-white kitchen, and a new rug and gay cretonne curtains for the living room? So did I. And you can't have them? Neither can I.

But we must have a change of scenery—it's springtime! Shall I tell you what I'm doing?

First, I pinned my duster over my broom and swept down all the cobwebs in out-of-the-way corners and wiped the dust off ceilings and walls. Then I found a can of white paint and retouched the woodwork. Mine isn't the polished kind that can be varnished, but it's astonishing the difference a can of paint can make in the looks of a room! I even painted my old cupboard and washstand inside and out. Now I can easily wipe the dust off the shelves and keep the outside spick-and-span as well.

I need a new comforter for the children's bed, so I am using for it my old curtains that hung in the opening between the rooms. My old white window curtains are getting "holey," so I'll just launder them carefully, tie in a bundle, make sanitary in the oven, and then put them in the medicine box for use in case of accident or sickness.

I'm going to take a few yards of very thin unbleached muslin, trim with plain hemstitching, or perhaps embroider a simple design in colors, combine with a bit of gingham in harmonious shades, and there are my new curtains!

Now, suppose we sit down for a few minutes in our dear little room, so fresh and bright in its new dress, and do a little mental housecleaning! Let us sweep the cobwebs of disuse from our minds, brush away the dirt of envy and discontent, and destroy any filth that gossip or slander may have left. Let us disinfect our souls thoroughly with the sunshine of love and service, hang the white curtains of charity at the windows, open wide the door of tolerance and sympathy, and bathe our very beings in the vision of a new day dawning on the mountain of our hopes and desires.

"Dwell deep, my soul;

The little things that chafe and fret—

Oh, waste not golden hours to give them heed.

The slight, the thoughtless word do thou forget.

Be self-forgot in serving others' need.

Thou faith in God through love for man shalt keep—

Dwell deep, my soul, dwell deep."

Social Hour.

For the social hour in our July meeting, why not emphasize the thought of needlework? Most of us like to have on hand a bit of fancywork for the leisure hours on the porch, or when a friend drops in for a little visit. We could bring this work with us and exchange patterns and ideas. So many simple but elegant things are used nowadays for furnishings, which require little outlay in money, but add such a touch of beauty to our homes. Especially is this true of the curtains, draperies, dresser scarfs, and other pretty things which may properly and tastefully be used in our bedrooms. An exchange of new and clever ideas, a description of some articles recently seen in the shops, or a talk by a local decorator or designer would add to the pleasure and profit of our afternoon.

The Bedrooms

In recent years we have been giving much time to the study of hygiene and all that would promote health. Especial attention has been called to the necessity for cleanliness and fresh air. The sleeping room should have enough window space to give sufficient light and plentiful ventilation. In order to have the most pleasing effect for those who occupy the room, one should use simple, but tasteful furnishings, for all these things have an effect, ultimately, upon health.

Simple furniture makes much less work for the busy housewife than do the elaborate types, as it requires less dusting and care in cleaning. This is also true in decorations, in walls, rugs, draperies, and pictures. Then, too, the sleeping room should be a place where one may relax and find a restful atmosphere. This is best produced by orderliness, simplicity, and harmony of coloring in all the articles in the room. Many a good woman sweeps, dusts, cleans, and frets until no room offers a restful haven at the end of her day's work.

Some of the most tasteful furniture is the less ornate, rich type of polished woods, in which the grain of the wood is its greatest decoration.

The walls may be hand decorated, in homes which can afford it; or tinted, or papered in a plain or striped paper, in delicate tints. No large flowers or highly colored paper is appropriate in a bedroom. Stripes should not be used in a room with high ceiling, as they accentuate the height; nor should a drop ceiling be used in a room with a low ceiling, as it makes the room seem too low and crowded. In a small room, especially, large flowers or figures of any kind make the room look smaller and give one the feeling that the walls are crowding him. In sickness this effect is most pronounced and has often been so serious in its effect, and caused such nervous tendencies in patients, that the latter have had to be removed to rooms where glaring figures and colors were lacking, and the confused mind could rest.

The rugs in the sleeping room, as in other rooms, should be in harmony with the colors of the walls and draperies. Usually the hardwood floor, with varnish or wax finish, and the small rugs, which can be easily removed to be dusted and to clean the floors, are most sensible. Especially is this convenient in case of sickness, when one must sterilize and dust the floors daily.

Too much drapery, or too heavy, is not desirable, as it excludes the light and is a dust retainer. In a sick room draperies should be removed entirely, as should all superfluous furnishings.

Pictures should be few, and restful. "Daniel in the lion's den" is not especially soothing, or conducive to sleep, especially to a child. Something with beauty and restfulness is more desirable.

The window space in these rooms should be sufficient to give a great deal of sunlight, as it is more sanitary and cheerful than when a room is gloomy. Artificial light must be regulated according to the needs of the occupant. Students, or those who read much, find the student lamp most convenient. At any rate, only one, high, central light is not sufficient, except merely to light the room for sleeping purposes only.

It is well to locate one bedroom on the first floor in a two-story house, as in case of older people, sickness, or where there are children, one often needs a rest room conveniently located. It should, however, never be situated near the kitchen, where the odors of cooking and gas or coal smoke penetrate, making the atmosphere disagreeable and sickening at times.

If in the city, it is often quieter at the rear of the house. Where one has but a one-story building, a sleeping room or porch where, during the spring and summer, vines or flowers peep through the windows, luring the birds to our window side, is most cheerful and adds an artistic touch to the monotony of many wakeful hours, or days of sickness.

Most of our homes now consider that the "boys' room" needs its touch of the artistic, as well as does the sleeping rooms of the other members of the family. Boys, as well as girls, need the refining influence of a tasteful room. How many of us look back and see the walls of our old home bedroom, with its touch of this or that which will never die in our memory! After all, the sleeping room has a great place in the life of each of us; and truly, why should it not have? Is it not here we first saw the light of day; and have we not sat beside our dear ones in hours of pain, as well as during the joy of convalescence? So let us see to it that it is as pleasing and cozy as any room, for in it we spend practically half of our lives.

LETTERS AND NEWS

A New Vision

The course in religious education brings a new outlook on life.

"Where there is no vision the people perish." (Proverbs 29: 18.) When he wrote these words, the ancient writer gave expression to one of the basic truths of life. The people in the world to-day are perishing because of this lack of vision.

Every new truth, every ideal of value that men have to-day, has come through men of vision. They acquired this vision through study and devotion to the interest of their fellow men to the extent that they were willing to sacrifice their lives in service. The world to-day is in great need of such men.

The world at this time is calling for a religion of the present. A religion which will be a panacea for all the existing ills among the nations of the earth. We believe we have that religion. It lacks something, however, to make it stand above all other religions of the world; i. e., more men and women of vision, men and women of consecrated intelligence who sense the importance of our message and are filled with a burning desire in their souls to take it to a dying world. This is a great and honorable task which is offered to the present generation, that of forming in the minds of the coming generation a new view, a new evaluation of life, a greater appreciation of service this church offers them.

It is only through the development and well-directed use of our talents we can expect to evangelize the world and establish the social order for which we are hopeful. The larger and more complex our social machinery becomes, the better trained must be our engineers. One social writer has said, "Religion is basically the observance of the law of God in the orderly use of all our material and spiritual powers."

The course in religious education at Graceland offers to the young man and woman of this church an opportunity of training for this service.

As workers in religious education, we are continually called upon to deal with people. That a thorough knowledge of the nature of those with whom we labor will tend to more efficient service, is self-evident. A field for the acquiring of this knowledge is opened up in the course in psychology—a study of the laws governing the working of the human mind and the best methods of teaching it. Surely this will enable one better to present the message of life.

Through the study of sociology, one is given a broader comprehension of the responsibility of the individual to society and society to the group.

We are in great need of a clearer understanding of the history of our own religion, and at the same time a more tolerant view of the history of the religions of other peoples.

These studies, with a thorough course in English, contribute to those who take the religious education work in Graceland College a clearer vision of the ideals towards which we, as a church, are striving.

I believe we are safe in saying that unless there is a renewed vision, a renewed consecration to our work, and a new and clearer understanding of all the facts and forces of life among our people, this church cannot succeed in its stupendous task. We need a new view of our relationship as individuals and as a church towards the people of the world. This knowledge of the interdependent life of men will reveal the worth and meaning of life and will supply it with direction and power.

This course (speaking from my personal experience) increases one's willingness to serve and gives to one the ability to apply that service for the welfare of his fellow man.

Further Reports on Macgregor-Glendenning Debate

From letters to the Quorum of Twelve by several of the brethren at Jonesport.

May 25, 1922.

The fight is on! Two sessions have passed into history, Monday and Tuesday night. There was no session on Wednesday night as the opera house was in use for permanent appointment by the proprietors. Activities will be resumed to-night (Thursday).

The Adventist Church proposition, "Resolved, That the Advent Christian Church is in harmony with the Bible in doctrine, organization, and practice" has been examined. To-night the proposition for the examination of our church will be taken up. "Resolved, That the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is in harmony with the Bible in doctrine, organization, and practice."

Thus far there is no doubt that we have carried the day, according to public sentiment. Brother Macgregor in his dignified manner, and his forceful ability, has made a splendid impression with the thinking people. Mr. Glendenning has been preaching soul-sleep of the dead most of the time. Twice during the discussion thus far he has tried to leave his proposition and attack the Book of Mormon, but he has had immediately to come back, when he was called to a point of order. He is continually telling the audience to just wait until he gets on to our proposition; then he says he is going to have some fun.

Brother Macgregor has vividly shown up the foundation, origin, doctrine, organization, and practice of the Adventist institution, showing the evolution of it, its changes, and its fickleness. Glendenning was wont to deny that Miller was the founder of his institution, but later he was forced to admit it.

Everybody is talking. The excitement is running high. The vital part of the discussion is yet to come.

O. L. THOMPSON.

May 30, 1922.

Well, the big debate is over. It closed sooner than was expected. It was to have lasted until Tuesday night, but it closed Friday night when about half through Friday night's discourse. It happened on this wise:

The opera house was packed! About seven hundred people were in attendance. Elder Macgregor led off with the affirmative, replying to some of the arguments made by Mr. Glendenning on the previous night, and then going on with the affirmative. During the opening singing and Brother Macgregor's discourse, the Reverend Glendenning paid no attention to what was going on, but was faithfully pondering over material and collecting data for a final shot, which he hoped might prove fatal to our cause. His turn came at last; he talked about five minutes upon preliminaries, and all at once he jumped from the main issue and said, "Joseph Smith was a polygamist and I can prove it." He picked up a book and began reading very rapidly purported testimonials given in support of the contention that Smith had many wives. Brother Macgregor asked for the name of the author, which Glendenning seemed reluctant to give. He turned to the audience, making some sneering remarks about the request of Brother Macgregor, but this was a rule in the propositions, and after talking a few minutes, Brother Koehler, who was our moderator, said, "You haven't told us yet who the author is." Glendenning, then, with the face of a devil, sneeringly said, "It's Shook's." Then he went on haranguing, and Brother Macgregor came to his feet on a point of order and said that the gentleman was not talking on the proposition when railing on the character of Joseph Smith. The chairman agreed, but Glendenning proceeded, until three times he was called to order in about five minutes. Then the chairman said to Glendenning, "Do you intend to stay on this proposition? If not, you'll quit." He refused to abide the chairman's ruling, and the chairman said, "Open those doors and the crowd disperse!" Then came a whine from Glendenning, "I'll abide by it," but it was too late, and the debate closed. He was as white as paper, and trembled like a leaf.

Elder Macgregor is remaining for a time here holding meetings with good interest. The church is to be dedicated Sunday.

O. L. THOMPSON.

June 5, 1922.

I am spending my time in Jonesport assisting Brother Macgregor in the meetings. I had the privilege of leading one more precious soul into the kingdom Friday afternoon—a fine lady.

The church was dedicated here last evening, Elder Macgregor preaching the dedicatory sermon and Elder J. F. Sheehy offering the dedicatory prayer. The building was packed to the limit. It was a wonderful event in the history of Jonesport Branch. Elder Macgregor baptized seven people in the afternoon, and they are to be confirmed to-night. A splendid interest is being shown now. The debate seems to have caused a spirit of investigation.

O. L. THOMPSON.

May 28, 1922.

The debate has passed into history. I think there can be no doubt but what it was a complete victory for us, although it ended very abruptly. The consensus of opinion among both saint and sinner was, that if the sheriff had not stopped it when he did there would have been a riot. People were in a boiling mood when he commanded the doors to be opened and warned everyone to pass out orderly and say nothing. However we could not consistently evade the challenge for the debate, and I am glad that Dan was here to meet the issue. I believe that he will do much good here. Further, let me say that Dan was absolutely consistent in his statements of Millerism. His manly way took with the consistent outsider.

I preached in the Saints' church in the morning and at Beals in the afternoon. At night I assisted Dan, who had a congregation of six hundred in the rink. If found necessary I may stay here and help him out. If not, I shall go to Kennebec. Feeling good? I should say.

H. A. KOEHLER.

June 10, 1922.

It was a glorious event. Unusual power was present. We are now reaping the results. Thirteen baptized to date, twelve of whom are heads of families. More baptisms to-day and to-morrow, which will run us over the twenty mark. Splendid crowds, keen interest, and I am feeling glorious.

DANIEL MACGREGOR.

June 13, 1922.

During the past week we had the privilege of leading two more fine people into the waters of baptism, and these with the twenty-three which Brother Macgregor has baptized to date make twenty-six baptisms following the recent Macgregor-Glendenning debate, and many more prospects. Things are moving here in rapid order.

Elder and Sister Ellis Are at Work in the Islands

Perhaps a line or two from the Society Islands' Mission will not be amiss, and will be appreciated by those who are especially interested in foreign missionary work.

We left San Francisco on the 3d of March on board S. S. Tahiti. Several of the Saints of the San Francisco Branch were at the wharf to bid us adieu as we left the homeland for this far-away mission. We watched them as long as natural vision kept them in view—until we were carried out towards the Golden Gate, and finally through it to the vast open sea.

The kindness of the Saints all along the way, Independence, Pueblo, Oakland, and San Francisco, will not soon be forgotten. Such kindly associations and remembrances help to keep one's spirits up when thousands of miles from home and among a people so foreign in many ways to us.

What a wonderful voyage across the Pacific we had! How fascinating and alluring ocean travel is! And those wonderful sunrises and sunsets, only to be seen on the Pacific after we reach the tropics. One could not possibly stay in his berth after 5 or 5.30 a. m., for those sunrises were gorgeous. Words cannot describe them, hence we do not make the attempt.

On the morning of the 15th we were up bright and early to see Tahiti in her morning glory, with her mountain peaks towering to hundreds and thousands of feet without even haze, fog, or cloud to close out our view. As we neared her shores we could see her ravines, deep gulches, and fruitful valleys, with their tropical foliage so dense in growth that entrance without an ax is next to impossible. We could see streams of smoke rising skyward by which we knew the native inhabitants were preparing their morning coffee. Point Venus, with her lighthouse, stretched out and almost touched our bow, and while we stood there on board, a modern steamer nearing an island where primitive people with all their native tendencies once lived and roamed unmolested by foreign foe, I thought of the first men and women who, not more than a century and a quarter ago, came to this same island on sailing vessels from our mother country, England, and placed their feet for the first time on shore near this same point, and where, too, many of them fell in service to humanity—martyrs to and for the cause of Christian liberty, in contradistinction to idolatry and all her kindred evils. One could not help but offer in silence a prayer that he be given strength and be able to righteously represent his God and church in leading such a people from darkness into light, that the lives of those before us, in a general way given for a common cause, be not in vain, but that we with the greater light might be able to lead our native friends farther than those first missionaries were able to do.

We finally reached the pass, entered it, and then anchored in the lagoon near the quarantine station, where our passports and vaccination certificates were examined by the port doctor and chief of police. At last we were permitted to go ashore on the mail boat—a launch that came out to take our mail to the post office—as another steamer was anchored at the wharf and it would be some time before our steamer could dock. We were met on shore by several old-time friends, the missionaries, and some of our native Saints. According to custom, we were escorted to the mission church, where we were formally welcomed by the Saints who had gathered to greet us. No excuses were permissible, so we preached that night at 7.30.

We are entering again into our work of the mission and hope to be able with the help the Lord has promised and alone can give, to push, with the help also of our associates, the work of the Lord ahead in these distant isles.

After a little over six weeks' stay in Tahiti seeking an equilibrium, and getting the mission house (number 1) and yard in shape, we left Tahiti on the morning of the 5th on board a 210-ton, three-masted schooner, for this island, Makatea. We reached here the next morning before daylight, and after daylight were put ashore, where we were met by some of the Saints who were looking for us, they having been apprised of our coming by wireless a few days before.

At present we are very comfortably located in a three-room house with a porch on three sides. We are fortunate in having a one-burner oil stove to do our cooking on. That, with our dining table, is on the back porch, while the front porch is used for our library. Our house stands about ten feet from the ground, on posts, giving us ventilation underneath, thereby making it more healthful, especially in a tropical climate like this. We are only about one hundred feet from the seashore, where the restless, yet very calm sea to-night, rolls up and breaks on the reef, which is very narrow in this island. This is a most beautiful spot for a week or ten days' stay.

We expect to leave here in a few days for either the island of Tikahau or Rairoa, where we will be for several days, and perhaps weeks.

We are both well and feeling fine in our work. The tropical heat is gradually taking some of our flesh away, but it does not affect our health.

Not being able to write to all our friends in America, we take this means of letting you know of us, and our address for which many of you asked.

Yours for service,

MR. AND MRS. C. F. ELLIS.

Blue Laws and Personal Liberty

"Those who rave about personal liberty mean personal license to do as they please, unrestrained by any law."

I recently read a speech by a certain congressman in favor of a bill to abolish blue laws because they deprived people of their personal liberty. What he called blue laws were the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, or prohibition, together with the laws made to protect the Christian Sabbath and the laws against gambling and immoral resorts.

As if the laws against social degeneracy are not already low and rickety enough. This man, who is but the mouth-piece of many others, would abolish the bars altogether. But I believe there is still enough of the ideals of our Puritan fathers among us to prevent such a bolshevik revolution from good morals; though it is hard to realize the fact with pastors of the staid old Presbyterian Church urging the installing of modern dance halls by the churches as per the clipping which I inclose.

As I look back over the years which my life covers, and compare the gulf that separates the present religious thought with that in which I was brought up, I feel almost despairing for the young people of the present and future. And to the question of how such transition came about, I think that I can trace it to the desecration of the Sabbath, the Lord's Day. Recalling to mind the strictness with which that day was honored in the time of my youth, and viewing the disrespect in which the day is treated now, I believe that I am correct in considering it the entering wedge to all the moral laxity now.

Early Ideals on Sabbath-Keeping

My mother was of Puritan descent and she possessed a very tender conscience regarding the Lord's Day, the Sabbath of the Lord as she had been taught. No work was done then that could be done before or after. We children were never allowed to run about or play on that day. Memory recalls a day when we became so tired of confinement of the house and keeping still while father read from some solemn book like Flavel's Method of Grace that we—I and young sister and brother—stole out doors to play in a make-believe wagon driving to church. We were frightened by the shaking and falling of a large board from no visible cause. With one accord we all started for the house when sister said it was a warning because we were playing on Sunday.

Again, memory recalls a Saturday night spent with a couple of girl friends whom we were to accompany to church on the morrow. One of the girls was putting some finishing touches to a new dress. The old people retired to bed, admonishing the girls not to sit up so late as to break the Sabbath, and several times the mother called to us, "Girls, do go to bed; I'm so afraid you will break the Sabbath." Those people were Presbyterians, and the idea of dancing at any time or place would have been a shock to them indeed. And now a pastor of that same denomination advocates a public dance hall by the church and under the church superintendence! Can anything better illustrate the change in the moral and religious status of the people.

To-day baseball games and other games are in order, and there is running, shouting, cussing—anything but the remembrance of the Sabbath day to keep it holy.

God Enjoins Sabbath-Keeping

If our ancestors erred in strictness, they erred on the side of right, and they honored the Lord in giving to America a Christian Sabbath. In the latter-day revelations the Lord directed how that day should be spent. See Doctrine and Covenants 59: 2 which reads:

"And that thou mayest more fully keep thyself unspotted from the world, thou shalt go to the house of prayer and offer up thy sacraments upon my holy day. For, verily, this is a day appointed unto you to rest from your labors, and to pay thy devotions unto the Most High. . . . Remember that on this, the Lord's day, thou shalt offer thine oblations, and thy sacraments to the Most High, confessing thy sins unto thy brethren and unto the Lord. And on this day thou shalt do none other thing; only let thy food be prepared with singleness of heart."

Jesus rested in the grave on the seventh day—the Jewish Sabbath—after he had finished his great work of our redemption. He arose on the first day, bringing in the new order of life everlasting to those who follow in the regeneration. This wonderful work is signified in our baptism whereby we are buried with him and arise to walk in newness of life. Surely we have reason to remember the Lord's Day, to sanctify it and keep it holy.

Let us remember, too, that those who rave about personal liberty mean personal license to do as they please, unrestrained by any law. I believe that there are yet too many real Christians who try to live in conformity with Christian ideals for such license to be permitted.

Reunion workers will be interested in a new play just off the press entitled, "The opportunity of the Sunday school," by Margret Davis. It is especially desirable for evening presentation by those in charge of Sunday school work. Simple in motif, few chief characters (ten) and requiring about three quarters of an hour for production. It is on sale here at 10 cents each, 90 cents a dozen.

Two-day Meeting in Southern Canada

In Amherstburg, Ontario, the most southern part of Canada, we held our two-day meeting, June 3 and 4, under the direction of Brother W. Leverton and the other district officers, also Elder J. Pycock. Starting at 8 p. m. Saturday with Brother Pycock and Brother S. Phillips, field worker for Religio, in charge, we received much instruction along the line of social recreation work.

On Sunday we had a feast of good things, commencing at 9 a. m. with prayer and sacramental service. Officiating officers were: Brethren S. Lamont, J. Pycock, J. C. Dent, W. Leverton, and W. Andrew. We had ten prayers, twenty-nine testimonies, nineteen hymns, and one baby blessed. There were seventy-seven in attendance, which included Saints from all the surrounding district.

Following a short recess, the eleven o'clock meeting opened with Elder J. Pycock as the speaker on the subject, "We are laborers together with God," also touching on "Am I my brother's keeper?"

A basket picnic was the order for 12 o'clock, when the inner man was amply provided for by the Women's Department, the Oriole Girls satisfactorily acting as waitresses.

At 2 p. m. the priesthood held a gathering from which the local members received much instruction and benefit. At the same hour, departmental work was held in charge of Brother D. Clapworthy, Sunday school worker, and Sister R. Woods of the Women's Department, and Brother Phillips for Religio, all of whom answered queries along the line specially engaged in.

Three o'clock found us again in a preaching service. Brother J. C. Dent was the speaker on the text, "Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven," and "But let a man examine himself," emphasizing the thought of tithing and offering.

The last service of the day was at seven o'clock with Brother W. Leverton speaker, dealing with "this gospel of the kingdom."

Altogether we spent a happy and busy day in the service of the Master and trust much good was accomplished. The Saints were greatly edified and go forward from this our first gathering of this nature with renewed energy and determination to let our light shine.

Good Conference at Butler

(Extract from letter of Edward Rannie to First Presidency, June 13, 1922.)

When I last wrote you my "weekly letter" I was at Butler, Missouri, where I remained until the 12th instant. Our conference commenced on Friday, in our missionary tent, because the branch has no meetinghouse. Their regular place of meeting is in a country schoolhouse. The tent was set up in the city. The attendance was only fair, not so large as at other conferences. The weather was extremely warm and the farmers were extremely busy, and it is largely a farming community of Saints.

The conference was enjoyable and profitable so far as relates to the spiritual meetings, and so also was the social side of the gathering. Brother William Patterson, of Australia, was sent to us from Lamoni as a substitute for Floyd M. McDowell. Our brother fitted into the work in every place that we tried him. As a soloist he charmed the people with some fine renditions. As a Sunday-school teacher he made a good fit and charmed the young people with his interesting way of presenting things. His preaching was excellent and fit well into the needs of the people. At a picnic given by the young people he did his part well, and a feature that added much to the enjoyment of the young was the introduction of a number of Australian games. He has mastered an art that seems to have gained the strongest foothold in America, that of eating ice cream. We were all glad that he was with us.

We Need the Sanitarium

Whilst reading the Sanitarium number of the HERALD I was pleased to see so many statements made by the several writers which confirmed those which I have held for some time, and especially to see this part of the church work being brought more to the front. It has not been my privilege to see this building known as the Sanitarium, where I am sure much good has and will be done in relieving those suffering in mind and body, but I have spent a great deal of time in two hospitals since I was wounded.

One of the articles in the special number, written by J. W. Peterson, impresses the writer very much. I have spent some twenty-two months in hospitals among other wounded soldiers, and have often wondered what it would be like to be attended to by doctors and nurses such as we learn of in this Sanitarium of the church. I would have liked very much to feel that I was in a building where the Spirit of God was made manifest through "consecrated workers," and where things that were distasteful to one desiring to serve God could not be seen. I agree with Brother Peterson that mostly the nurses and doctors in other hospitals are not God-fearing people, yet some have proved themselves "angels of mercy" in watching over the writer. Whilst these few stand out as monuments of everything that is good, yet others—a large percentage—were quite the reverse.

In viewing my experiences in other hospitals I realize that my spirituality decreased until I was almost spiritually dead. The Sanitarium run by the church, where one can have the "peaceful association of kindred spirits," where one's spirituality can be increased, is one to be desired.

I pray for those in charge of this institution, that the ideals they have in view may be realized, and that the articles penned by the several brethren on behalf of the Sanitarium will prove effectual in bringing home to the membership of the church the great needs of this institution which is worthy of their support.

J. W. FOSTER.

Independence

The opening service of the outdoor meetings of Sunday evening on the lawn at the Stone Church was preaching by T. W. Williams with music by the new band. The attendance was good. Elder Williams leaves soon for his home in California.

Children's Day exercises were observed Sunday at Second Independence and Walnut Park in the evening; at Liberty Street in the morning. At the two first-mentioned new cantatas produced by members of the Pen and Ink Club were tried out with success, one of them being "Zion Redeemed," recently published, and which has sold well this season. Perhaps the next edition will be revised somewhat to include improvements which seem advisable.

At Second Independence seven were baptized and at Walnut Park there were ten. Girls have predominated everywhere except at Walnut Park, where the number was equally divided.

An interesting trip was taken on Saturday and Sunday by about forty persons made up of the members of the Sunday school church history class of Walter W. Smith, with their friends. Five of the autos carrying the party left on Saturday and five on Sunday morning, taking the route (after crossing at Kansas City) which the Saint took when leaving Jackson County in the thirties into Clay and Caldwell Counties to Far West. They drove to Cameron and from thence to Far West, having a number of interesting experiences viewing the historic ground, which will be reported in detail by one of the party.

Elder F. T. Mussell, president of the Northeastern Missouri District was taken ill during the conference at Macon, June 10, and had to be hurried to the Independence Sanitarium where he is under treatment and getting along favorably.

Elder R. D. Weaver, lately appointed as missionary to Kewanee District, was stricken while in his field with appendicitis and brought by Brother Wentworth Holmes, sr., to the Sanitarium, where an operation was performed and he is now getting along very nicely.

We learn here that Brother Herbert S. Salisbury, of Saint Joseph, has been appointed state patriotic instructor for the Sons of Veterans by the commander of the Missouri Division at Saint Louis. He was the speaker on Memorial Day before the Grand Army of the Republic and the American Legion at Seneca, Kansas.

The radio sermon Sunday morning was by S. A. Burgess, on "The universal search for truth." The air is so jammed Sunday evenings that the morning hour of 10 a. m. has been chosen for the summer.

Elder A. H. Mills, secretary of the Department of Music, has opened a studio in the Battery Block, Independence, where he teaches piano, harmony, and counterpoint. In his announcement and prospectus he says: "The writer anticipates the growth of this present venture towards the definitely organized school, which is now in contemplation; and when developments warrant, competent instructors in voice and violin will be associated. It is anticipated that this present effort will prove the germ and eventually the foundation of a properly established and creditable school of music in Independence." Elder Mills has, with a number of the ministry, in the interests of economy withdrawn from full-time participation in church work and will give his time primarily to this musical work. He has nine years of special training in piano, harmony, and counterpoint, and is the composer of a number of our well-known church hymns. For several years he has edited The Staff in the HERALD, and has traveled extensively in the interests of the Department of Music.

An added improvement to civic conveniences lately has been the opening of the newly constructed Natatorium by the Criley family, Brother Frank Criley in charge. It is the largest swimming pool in the county, not excepting Electric Park. There are three hundred lockers and the water is constantly sterilized and tested by the latest machinery constructed for such purposes. The location is convenient—Lexington Street, near the Pacific bridge in the west part of the city. We commend the management for its policy of Sunday closing.

The motion pictures shown Saturday evenings on the church lawn at the Stone Church are very popular. Perhaps the committee may never secure pictures that reach their ideals nor those of all the people, but they are to be commended on their earnest efforts to provide something wholesome in this line to be supported by popular subscriptions. Each Saturday evening, beginning at dusk, these programs are furnished for perhaps as many as two thousand people free of charge. Those who are not able to pay are not required to do so. Those who feel so disposed help more liberally to make up for those who cannot.

Early in the morning of the 18th Elder Alfred White of this city, passed away, after taking sick about ten o'clock the previous evening. He is well known on his own account, also as the brother of Elders I. N. and D. C. White. The funeral is announced for Thursday morning at the Stone Church.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium for the week ending June 17: Mrs. W. H. Eliason, Lamoni, Iowa; F. T. Mussell, Des Moines, Iowa; Catherine Hunt and Gladys Harris, Greenwood, Missouri; R. D. Weaver, Traverse City, Michigan; William Patterson, New South Wales, Australia; Bessie Hutchins and John Everett Powell, Lees Summit, Missouri; Mrs. Mabel Ross, Chetek, Wisconsin; Mrs. Etta Oldfather, Kansas City, Kansas; and the following from Independence: Mrs. Sarah Faler, Mrs. Ammon White, Mrs. Elizabeth Moody, Mrs. Pearl G. Sherman, Clifford L. Nesbitt, Ralph Wittmann, Mrs. Mildred Ziers and Baby Ziers, T. J. Sloan, Miss Frances Fassnacht, Mrs. Mabel Christy, Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Reeve, Mrs. D. A. Galvin, and Mrs. Emma Atkinson. X-ray patients: Arthur Nelson, Kansas City, Missouri; and Lucas Choplin, Mrs. Louis Witte, Mrs. Pearl Lavery, and Thelma Vione Betts, of Independence.

Missionary Appointments

It will be noted that only a partial list of missionaries has yet been published. There are other names to follow. The names published total 187, of which 6 are superannuated, one on leave of absence, leaving 180 appointed to active service. Of these, 32 men and 12 women are sent abroad, across the seas; 136 are sent to fields on the American Continent. It will be seen from this that the foreign missionary list has been increased, especially since the above does not include, as in the past, any native appointments in the South Sea Islands.

"Elmer E. Long, of Lamoni," writes J. E. Steele, from Omaha, Nebraska, "has recently closed a six weeks' series of meetings in our South Side Branch, which has been a wonderful good among us. Brother Long's ability to expound the truth has certainly been edifying to the members of the household of faith, besides adding six through baptism.

"Our Sunday school has just finished a contest which caused a great deal of interest and rivalry among the classes. Sister Emma Moran's class, Number 4, won by a large margin. The contest was an automobile race from New York to Zion and San Francisco to Zion—mileage being given on certain merits. This contest was very successfully executed under the direction of our superintendent, Sister Rena Powers, and has instilled no little enthusiasm in our school."

"The Bay Cities' second annual rally day came with another record-breaking crowd," writes G. M. Hawley, of Oakland, California, "representing practically all of the leading branches in northern California. Oakland, the chosen site for this year, demonstrated her ability to handle large crowds with little confusion. Such an airing of ideals and ambitions! A central and permanent resort in this locality for incoming and outgoing missionaries was one of the aims mentioned by our executives. Headed by our very able brother, J. D. White, Oakland bids fair to lead the West in hospitality and the spreading of the work."

Brother G. T. Griffiths writes from Columbus, Ohio, that Brother Paul M. Hanson visited that place over Sunday, the 11th. During his stay they visited the Serpent Mound in Adams County, and the great Fort Hill in Highland County, Ohio. Brother Hanson came on to Independence and Brother Griffiths planned to leave on the 17th for New Philadelphia, Akron, Cleveland, Kirtland, Toledo, thence to London, Ontario, to attend a reunion from July 1 to 10. He has four other reunions to attend, so in common with the rest of the apostolic quorum will be quite busy during the summer season.

A Lawgiver

When the Dutch ambassador to Siam, several decades ago, told the court concerning the rivers of Holland, how they froze in the wintertime, and how men and even horses could walk and drive over that which had formerly been flowing water; and when he told them concerning the snow fall, they set him down for a common liar.

Lack of experience may prevent us from knowing the truth, no matter how plainly one who knows may seek to declare it.

One who has never seen the Grand Canyon of the Colorado in Arizona could hardly be made to realize its tremendous proportions and beauty. Walking along the earth one suddenly finds a rift at his very feet. But such a rift! thirteen miles across, more than a mile deep, with mountains a mile high in the bottom whose summits do not appear above the rim! A view of fifty miles or more, with the setting sun, makes glorious the multicolored rock, a spectacle which is quite impossible to picture in mere words, and which no painter has been able to adequately reproduce.

On a very much smaller scale, there appears in Yellowstone Park a canyon three miles long, somewhat similar in color, the Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone.

But even in some of the more ordinary affairs of life, a mere word picture, or even a photograph, could not ordinarily present, so it could be seen, so great a spectacle as some of our American cities.

Again, one may insist upon proof of invisible things. But there are many problems in mathematics which cannot be proven to the one who is not as yet well grounded in all the fundamentals of that science, including high school and college work. Because it cannot be proven to such an individual, it does not thereby follow that it is only a guess. There are problems even in the social sciences, which to some are clearly demonstrated, but which some writers find quite incomprehensible. A basis of knowledge, as well as reasonable openmindedness, is necessary upon the part of the learner before truth can be made manifest. This is true in other departments of science, in chemistry and biology, including botany and zoology. It is true in psychology. It is not surprising that it is not less true in spiritual things.

There are some who will insist that it is only a guess and will persistently turn their backs upon essential knowledge, because while with their lips they affirm openmindedness, in fact they do not want to learn and know lest such knowledge change their present predilection.

But knowledge of spiritual things is not simply a guess, even though many who have specialized in mathematics, in chemistry, or in social sciences are not sufficiently developed to perceive the evidences of divinity.

It is rather startling how few of those who are most critical of religion ever stop to analyze the alternative. To deny God, it is not sufficient to set up a brotherhood of man, for the brotherhood of man and social justice is a most essential and ever present element of primitive Christianity. But if there is no God we are forced then to the conclusion that everything depends upon chance rather than upon fundamental law and a lawgiver.

If such an explanation be true, the first cell of life was a tremendous miracle, but having that one cell, the development therefrom of intelligent man, who builds, who plans, who thinks and dreams, who with limited eyesight has extended his seeing far beyond the keenest sighted animal; who, hard of hearing compared with many of the animals, has extended his power of hearing manifold beyond the keenest animal hearing, is indeed marvelous. Then if man is only the result of chance, how great is that miracle of godliness that he should have made and perfected an idea of God among widely scattered peoples with such similarity and uniformity in many details.

Evidently if man has happened once he can happen again and again, but the credulity to believe that once a man has been formed, that he will continue to produce always and unchangeably after his kind, not by a fundamental law of an intelligent lawgiver, but purely by the law of chance, is to a mathematician to declare a credulity far exceeding that required to believe in an intelligent ruler of the universe. The probability that man, starting his new creation with a single cell, that cell will follow without law or lawgiver the whole road of evolution clear up to become another man, is to express a thought that by the law of probabilities is almost infinitesimal. But when that is repeated, not once, but manifold times, when in fact millions and billions of instances occur, and this genesis still continues always the same, it testifies so strongly to a fundamental intelligence, or law-giver, that it would seem that even the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err.

In ancient times it was written, "The fool has said in his heart, There is no God." That is well expressed when examined in the light of scientific knowledge, of technical facts, as well as the common sense of the man of the street to-day. Yet that is only one of the factors deserving our consideration, that uniformity of law, not only with man, but evidently the same law governing with all in nature.

The Lord's Supper; Renewing of Our Covenant

The Lord's supper is not only in remembrance of the sacrifice of Jesus, but also gives to us an opportunity to renew our covenant. In baptism we have secured a remission of sins; in his compassion for us, he has given us this further opportunity to make reconciliation. But as remission of sins in baptism must be preceded by true repentance, so must this renewal of our covenant also be preceded by fruits meet for repentance, a turning from wrongdoing, a resolving to do that which is right, and a restoration or an undoing of the wrong so far as we are able.

Before baptism we are not called upon to disclose all of our sins before the church. We should make reconciliation and restoration, however. On one occasion, Jesus directed Zaccheus that he should repay fourfold. In the Lord's supper, we should not make public confession of our secret sins. They are known to God; our sin is against him, and it is to him we should make our confession, and in prayer seek help to put aside our evil desires and to choose that which is right. Sometimes it may be well to confess our sins to an officer of the church to receive his help in prayer and in council in helping us to overcome; but if so, such confession should be kept most confidential. Such confessions are only for the purpose of helping the individual.

It is not proper, as we sometimes have seen done, for these secret confessions to be presented to the church and forgiveness asked, so that which was before private becomes public property. The great purpose is to help one to a better living, to make easier the path of righteousness and not the complying with an outward form.

If one comes to the altar and learns that he has injured any, he should go first and make reconciliation with the one who is injured. The same is true if others have injured us. We should make a decided effort to bring about a reconciliation. It is on this principle that confession must be made to the injured spouse in the case of first offense of adultery. It is not necessary, nor is it proper, to present such personal offenses to the branch and ask the church for forgiveness, as it is not primarily the place of the church to grant such forgiveness. That belongs to the individual who has been injured. Adultery, however, if known publicly, is a further offense.

Public confession should be made of public wrongdoing; that which is known and which has brought disgrace directly or indirectly upon the church. This might arise from secret sins which have become public property. It may arise from personal offenses which have led to a public evil or have become a matter of public knowledge and report. The forgiveness of the church is for this public offense. It does not take the place of our humble prayer and confession to God for our sins. It does not take the place of our personal efforts for reconciliation or confession to one whom we have personally injured. The church accepts the confession and forgives, if it chooses, the public offense against the church.

It is a wonderful thing that this plan has been given by which we may renew our covenant after such offense. An opportunity is offered whereby we may again renew the covenant we have made before our heavenly Father and the church, and thereby receive anew a remission of sins, and anew the Spirit of God to help us to righteousness.

The Right Kind of a Gang

Professor Athearn, in the International Sunday School Convention, in illustrating that the gang spirit is not from biological instinct but is the result of social training and can be directed by the home or church, related that he belonged to a gang and they tried to make him use tobacco.

His father had never presented a chart on the amount of nicotine in a pound of tobacco or how many dogs could be killed with a cigar. He had none of the splendid statistics of the effect of nicotine or tobacco on growing boys. His father had not even forbidden him to use it. But he had heard his father, who was a physician, tell his mother several times that as far back as he could trace, no Athearn had ever drunk intoxicating liquor or used tobacco.

So, while they tried to force the tobacco between his lips he held his mouth locked shut, and over the shoulders of the boy who was holding the plug of tobacco he could vision father and his father's father and his great-grandfather, etc., clear back to Adam. He belonged to a bigger gang—the gang of the Athearns who had never used tobacco, and he would not be the first to go back on his gang.

There are two splendid points in that story: One, the value of affirmative teaching instead of the negative teaching of "Don't"; and instead of emphasizing the evils of wrongdoing, setting forth an ideal of doing right.

The second point is the substitution of the church or family as our gang and the ideals of the church or of the family or both instead of the ideals of the alley.

The International Sunday School Convention

The sixteenth International Sunday School Convention is being held in Kansas City, Missouri, June 21-27. So far as we are informed we have nineteen delegates: A. M. Carmichael, C. E. Wight, and D. T. Williams from Lamoni; Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Salyards, Mrs. Minnie Scott Dobson, and Edna Christiansen from Saint Joseph; E. D. Moore, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Sanford, Mrs. Tessie Smith, Miss Marcella Schenck, James F. Keir, Mr. and Mrs. Walter W. Smith, C. B. Hartshorn, Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Burgess, and Arthur Allen from Independence. We are not informed whether delegates have been appointed from other places or not.

In addition to the seventeen general sessions held in Convention Hall there are a number of special meetings being held every afternoon except Wednesday and Sunday. There are two sessions of music and pageantry, two concerning Sunday school buildings and equipment, two on Sunday school publicity, two on teacher training, two on the teaching of religious education in colleges and seminaries, one on week-day school religious education, one on the daily vacation Bible school, one on house visitation, one on community training schools. There are three sessions each in the general departments of Sunday school work, the children's department, the young people, adult, and school administration. There are five meetings at 8 a. m. of field workers and three of directors in religious education. This is in addition to the meetings of the executive committee and special committees of the assembly. There are exhibits of Sunday school work of the World Sunday School Association and of Sunday school material and supplies.

This makes it an unusual opportunity for all who are interested in the religious training of children, whether it be in the Sunday school, in church school, or Bible school, in day school for religious education, or in our colleges and universities.

Many of Our Sunday School Problems Similar

It is quite evident that most of our problems are similar to those which confront other Sunday school workers and church workers. We are human beings, our children have the like natural ambitions, desires, inhibitions, and instincts as have other children. Their mentality and physical natures need our earnest and careful consideration. The principles of child psychology and of adult psychology, of sociology, of economic and other social sciences and problems are only rightly understood in the light of the experience of others. It is only then that we are best able to appreciate that which is presented by the church of Jesus Christ. The problems of pedagogy, of methods, materials and supplies, of teaching, the arrangement of Sunday school buildings and equipment are basically in common with other church and Sunday school workers.

Further than this the teaching of the word of God in the Holy Scriptures or Bible is the fundamental basis of by far the greater part of our Sunday school teaching, and especially is it the basis of our teaching of children. Jesus the Christ is the only name given and the only name that shall ever be given whereby men may be saved. The tremendous work of research that has been done in archæology as well as in the Scriptures is a field open for us, if we will, upon which we may start to build the special work intrusted to us. It is for this reason that we think that the International Sunday School Convention is of interest not alone to a few Sunday school workers, but is of interest to the whole church. We must recognize the necessity of Sunday school buildings, of classrooms, of special instruction for children and young people as well as for adults. We do not teach our young people and children by insisting on having one preaching service. The teaching must be adapted to their age and ability to receive.

Church Problems Are Also Largely Similar

Further than this, the problems that are confronting us as a church are very largely the problems of the world to-day. Our difficulties are not for the greater part peculiar to ourselves but they are rather in common with others. The breaking away from old standards, the emphasis between youth and age is one that is being considered everywhere by thoughtful people. The Master prayed not that we should be taken out of the world but rather kept from the evil which is in the world. The moral problem confronts us as citizens as well as Sunday school and church workers, and if we are to help to heal a sick world we must first note what is the trouble, the disease from which it is suffering. Or in a different simile, if we are to talk to them we must know their language.

Biology and the Sunday School

It is quite true that Sunday school work to-day, as Doctor Athearn emphasized on the opening day, is quite dominated by the biological theory and by the offshoot of public school methods. But since our Sunday school work is also affected by these same elements it is well indeed that we should learn how far they are being out-grown. Because we recognize the truth of Doctor Athearn's statement that the danger to-day does not lie in the field of physical science, so much as in the field of psychology and philosophy, including education; because we recognize the fallacious teachings and principles of education and of psychology to-day, is no reason why we should reject the whole study of psychology, education, and philosophy. Rather should we carefully weigh and consider, prove all things, hold fast to that which is good.

It is certain if we are to do the work of the future we must have not only training for teachers but rightly trained teachers of religion. A well-trained public-school teacher is not necessarily a well-trained Sunday-school teacher.

It is true that as a church we have a peculiar problem, but the teaching of the life of Jesus Christ, the introduction of the life of the Master into our lives is after all fundamental. We have our own methods of accomplishing economic justice, we have our own field of teaching, but that field is best founded on a sound knowledge of the Bible, of biblical criticism, of educational principles, of educational criticism, and of psychology, both of the child and of the adult.

Our teachers and thinkers are already imbued with many of these ideas. It is well that we should keep up to date and that we should make a more earnest preparation for the work before us.

We do not attempt to give a verbatim report but do print herewith the impressions and notes taken, a resume of various speeches. It is of interest to note that the opening day far exceeded the largest registration of any preceding Sunday school convention. By noon on the opening day over 6,200 had been registered as in attendance. S. A. B.

The needs of the small Sunday school were especially discussed by a state official at one of the sessions of the International Convention at Kansas City. He was addressing one of the conferences held in various parts of the city and asked for a show of hands of those who were in charge of schools with more than five hundred members. A surprisingly large number of hands were raised. Then all in charge of schools with three hundred or more pupils. Many more hands went up. Very few in charge of small schools were there, which is too often true of our own conventions.

A Resume of the International Convention

A summary of the International Sunday School Convention, giving some of the principal points made and a brief summary of some of the leading speeches.

Wednesday, June 21, at 10 a. m. Doctor O. W. Warmingham, of Boston University, conducted the Bible hour which he continued for the first four morning sessions. The opening address discussed the finality of Christ. Religion is fundamental to humanity. Jesus is the central figure of Christianity. He is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

Doctor W. O. Thompson, president of the International Sunday School Association, also president of the Ohio State University, reviewed the past four years and the increased difficulty in meeting the problems of peace. The world has come to believe its chief problems are material, industrial, and economic, and many are relying entirely upon the organization of these departments. But even more fundamental is the need of the church for religion.

Some have considered the church an appendage to society, and declining in influence. The facts are, the banks, business men, commercial interests, and all other organizations have been pushed to the limit to maintain their balance, but the church has maintained its attendance, the Sunday school regained its lost members due to the war, benevolence funds have increased, and the outlook to-day is as bright as it has been for a generation.

The discussion between science and religion has again cropped up. We had hoped it was settled, but it seems each generation has to pass through a childhood stage.

The big issues before us are the evangelization of the youth and the religious education of the children.

The value of the Bible is not based on its literary value, nor as a textbook in history, philosophy, science, or criticism. Its central truth is Jesus the Christ as the redeemer of the world. The central purpose of religious education is to bring to the world a knowledge of the redemption that is in Jesus the Christ; therefore, it has a definite aim, the evangelization of the world. If we can succeed in teaching the Bible to the coming generation, the moral quality of our civilization is assured.

Changing World Order

Doctor Charles Sheldon, editor of the Christian Herald, and author of In His Steps, next spoke at length on the changing world order. He emphasized the many things that are a matter of our everyday life now, which were not in the world in the time of Jesus. Our social structure is in the melting pot. There is taking place social and political and economic reconstruction. But with all of the changes there abides still Jesus of Nazareth, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

The only thing that could have stopped the world war and its murders was the real living of the principles of Christ, "Good will toward men." One thing that has been accomplished is that war is no longer thought of as noble, but only as horrible. We have lived to see the closing of the saloon; we hope to see the end of the battleship.

But if it is to be done, we must be willing to pay for religion. Parents will pay $8,000 to $10,000 for a university education for their children. They pay out thousands of dollars for the common school education of their children, whereas $1 is expected to provide the religious education of a child. Religious education must be strengthened. To do so the churches must pay.

Spiritual Literacy and Illiteracy

In the afternoon J. C. Robertson, of Canada, discussed spiritual literacy and illiteracy. We become spiritually literate when we grow in knowledge of God. It is difficult to find standards to measure spirituality or rather to apply them when found, but the home is of first importance. Every home has a religion, but that religion may be the making of money, dress, pursuit of pleasure. How many homes place first the principles of Jesus Christ? Probably less than half. In how many of these homes is the idea presented in a definite way?

More helpful books have been prepared in the last five years for parents than in the preceding fifty years. In Canada the community results are lower; towns schools are lower than the home. The school work as such has not yet accomplished the results it should. Church attendance is as high as forty years ago, but the attendance is less than half the population.

The Sunday school is of incalculable value as an agency to secure spiritual literacy, but only a small percentage of the teachers are trained and a very small percentage of fathers and mothers are prepared to teach their own children.

Doctor D. W. Kurtz, president of McPherson College, Kansas, spoke on the same subject very eloquently. There are three great fields of spiritual literacy:

1. All babies have inherent spiritual capacity, but not literacy.
2. There is a field of people who have absorbed some of the ideals of the church, but are not consciously cultivating spirituality.
3. People who profess Christianity but who are immature.

The ideals of the world are largely materialistic. Politics is pagan. All economic problems are religious problems, but when Marx said that all history is economic he was mistaken. We have made too much of economics. The great war between capital and labor will never be solved so long as each has the wrong philosophy. There are the same conditions here now as in ancient Rome. Professor Ellwood's Reconstruction of Religion defines paganism aright as greed for power, selfishness, and the like. Where such exists there is spiritual illiteracy.

The religion of nature, the morality of nature, tends to sensuality. This affects much of the literature and thought of the past fifty years as well as our newspapers of to-day, hence the public ideals are largely pagan.

The idea held by some that educated people are too wise to believe in God is not true. All men of big souls who have not specialized too young believe in God. The list is a long one. But when you get a little "nubbin" of a teacher he will try to prove there is no God. "Some people want me to prove God to them," said Professor Kurtz, "but I would not believe in a God that was so insignificant that I could prove him to such minds."

We do not prove life—we live it, he continued. We do not prove love except by loving. Great people know that living is more than mechanism and that back of this world is God. We need a lot of Joshuas and Calebs, with a big vision. Turn on the light and get rid of darkness and terror.

Moral Situation

Chancellor E. H. Lindley, of the University of Kansas, on the moral situation in America, emphasized that there are black squares, but there are also white squares that make for righteousness, as on the chess board. The causes of our wrong moral conditions to-day are first a breaking away from restraint and convention. Not only the conditions of the war, but those that antedate the war; second, an increase of knowledge among the young people. The number of graduates of high school is vastly increased and has thus increased the field of knowledge. This knowledge also stimulates to high adventure. This will ultimately be one of the great blessings and will give us victory. But for the present, it includes a great junk heap of those who have found knowledge before they have developed discipline.

Third. The new world and a spread of democratic ideals in national and home life. To many this means, "I am as good as you," a claiming of right without corresponding realization of responsibility. Christian democracy says, "You are just as good as I am." In the late war the black men in uniform were fighting for their country and were treated as equals; they came back to the old inequality.

Fourth. There is the lack of leadership and the false doctrines of instinct and desire. One leader (not great) said, "I never step out until my people voice a desire. That is a great fallacy. Too many men in public have their ear to the ground and even down to the grass roots, as they say in Kansas. Great results are not achieved until we have a truly great leader who speaks out and the people recognize their true desires.

Fifth. Again a cause of upheaval is the ancient feud between age and youth which is agitating us to-day.

To be moral means to have an equipment of right habits, incentives, and standards, and that life is good which leads to fulfillment of our best tendencies. For this there is needed first, self-respect; second, the spirit of good workmanship; third, the feeling of responsibility; fourth, the sense of loyalty. In some homes we have too much of mother, too much of father, or too much of children, a sort of a child soviet. We need a consciousness of the state; but above all we need God consciousness.

The Outlook for Christian Education

Professor Walter S. Athearn is chairman of the department of education in the school of Religious Education and Social Science of Boston University. He is one of the leading teachers to-day in religious education. He spoke on the "Outlook for Christian education to-day," and emphasized especially the errors in the views held at present with regard to religious education.

And I if I be lifted up will draw all men to myself. Education is an introduction of control into experience. In the past many methods were used to introduce control. We used to believe it was done by rehearsal: "Practice makes perfect"; "Much writing makes a writer." Yet it was found in the old copy books that the first line was fairly accurate, but the writing grew poorer and poorer to the bottom of the page. This shows that much writing does not make a good writer. Nowadays the original copy is so attached that it is moved down the page and covers up the imperfections in the line above. This proves that practice under criticism does make perfect, as the last line of the page is the best. Each line is an effort to approach the standard.

The Way of Progress

The old law of natural selection was very profound. Those things that live do not die; those that die do not live. Little was said about survival. Then came the great doctrine of adjustment and swept the country. Now we recognize the race is not pushed up by blind biological laws, but is lifted up by the mind, the mental life of the race. If progress ever comes in the future, it will come as in the past, not by processes of breeding or by adjustment, but by stimulating great ideals. So will there be prophets and teachers of the race.

Race Recapitulation

The theory of race recapitulation has dominated the Sunday school literature to a very great extent. A large part of the literature of boy and girl organizations is based on that now thoroughly exploded theory.

The theory is: He is born just a little animal; a brute. "Feed the brute." He is a candidate to become a human being. He should be given a chance to develop. Let it live a full animal life and by and by it will be gradually changed to a savage. Let it live a full savage life; give it bows and arrows and a tomahawk and let it run out into the woods and learn to build a fire. Finally it will evolve into the Greek stage; then the Roman stage; the Germanic; the chivalric; the stage of Queen Elizabeth, etc.; until finally it will reach the Puritanic stage and sprout a soul just about the same time as he sprouts a mustache; after which he will evolve into the modern stage of initiative and referendum.

Eighty per cent of all boy and girl club literature is based on that theory, that a child is born without a soul.

No Gang Instinct

There is no more a gang instinct than there is a women's group instinct. It is merely an expression of social impulse. The gang in the back alley is not caused by a biological process going on inside, but is the result of a social impulse. The church and home can determine the kind of a gang.

Our conduct is on the basis of our internal ideals and the business of education is to control the internal imagery.

Religious education is an introduction of control in terms of the great ideals. Christian education is to introduce control into our experience in terms of Jesus the Christ. Christian education must give a Christian view of the world, a Christian view of the soul, a Christian view of society, etc. There arises the problem of organization, whether a strong central government or loose control of state's rights.

Our Christian education cannot be founded on some biology or psychology, nor the pedagogy of the public schools. There are men who would analyze prayer into psychic atoms and say there is no such thing as prayer. To the scientific methods there must be added the outlook and the inlook of metaphysics and philosophy (religion).

A further danger to Christian religion is borrowing from public education. The absurd idea of sex segregation in the Sunday school was borrowed from the public school just as the public school was throwing it into the waste basket.

Education Now Too Biologic

Education has been a great borrower. It was dependent first upon astronomy to solve the mental life from the stars. Now it seeks its evolution from biology. We are trying to biologize the human mind out of existence. Public school education is too young a science to be reliable. Public school education is not dealing with as wide a range as religious education. The public school deals oftener with the psychology of behavior, but not with the psychology of emotion. It is not correct to suppose training which makes a good public-school teacher will make a good Sunday-school teacher, because the current texts for public education are based on behaviorism, the doctrine of satisfiers and annoyers.

Here is my biological organism: Certain things satisfy; other things annoy. When we want to gather up all the annoyers we say they are of the Devil. The Devil is simply an algebraic symbol for all annoyers and possesses no reality.

So we take God of heaven as the algebraic symbol of those values which are satisfying. We pray to an algebraic symbol that has its only value in the mind. That brings us to the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

The grave danger is not in the departments of science in the university, but in the departments of psychology, philosophy, including education. Psychology to-day is held in bondage to the laws of biology, but there is a school arising now to pull psychology loose from biology.

Yet the literature for religious education is shot full of project making. And in our church colleges to-day there is thirteen times as much for the training of public-school teachers as there is for training of religious teachers. All philosophy must be seen in terms of Christian philosophy. The social unrest is due to the fact that church colleges have not given adequate consideration to the special problems of religious education. There is a tendency to substitute technique for content. The world cannot be saved by pedagogy.

There is a tendency in religion for voluntary leadership; we need trained leadership.

The Fine Arts in Religion

Perhaps as a church we have in our efforts to get away from meaningless ritual and hollow form in our worship, swung too far. Friends and enemies tell us we let our sociability run too far, and as a result we are noisy and irreverent.

At least it will pay us to think seriously about this. However, we ought to consider not only checking on our faults in this regard, but also methods for improvement.

Some of our people have done a fine work in this regard, but they deserve more universal support from the rest of us. If we knew better, we might do better—might be more responsive.

Those of our members who were privileged to see and hear Professor H. Augustine Smith, of the Boston University, in his demonstrations and lectures at the International Convention at Kansas City, came away enthusiastic over improving this part of our worship, especially the singing of our hymns, and the public participation in the services. He conducted two sessions of special conference on "Fine arts in religion," large audiences attending at a church in south Kansas City.

Here were discussed "Worship in the different departments of the Sunday school," "How to get the most out of hymn singing," "Making a hymn book live," "Preparation for special day programs," "Pageants and dramatizations," "Costuming, lighting, rehearsals," "Art masterpieces in stereopticon slides and wall pictures," "Correlation of picture and music."

Professor Smith has the happy faculty of throwing his entire graceful personality into his discussions until one feels inspired with the utter simplicity of the entire proposition of expression and ashamed of the awkward and uncouth ways in which we often approach God in our services. The discussion of getting the most out of hymn singing, especially in our Sunday schools, made one wish we might somehow attain a higher plane in this part of our worship. While none of us like a sermon about each verse of the song we are about to sing, and all of us dislike having a song service degenerate into a singing school, we do appreciate having our song leaders know their business and appropriately help us understand more of what to do.

Our own collections of songs—most of them by others than our members—could often be profitably supplemented by the addition of others, of which there are now a number of excellent ones available.

Pictures for the school and home were presented in classified display. Professor Smith does not indorse the use of the customary black and white pictures so generally used, preferring color work which faithfully reproduces the work of the best artists. While these are a little more expensive he would if necessary use fewer of them for the much better effect to be gotten. Those shown are not generally seen in this part of the country, but may be had from eastern houses.

Pageantry (in which field we have made commendable strides) was urged as one of the finest modes of expressing our deeper feelings. He urged that we surround pageantry with a consistent religious atmosphere, allowing nothing of a trifling nature to interfere with our highest religious expression. Rehearsals should open with prayer and the entire production developed to give expression to our finest motives and actuating beliefs.

Illustrated songs were also demonstrated, using the stereopticon for an aid to congregational singing. The work of our Graphic Arts Bureau has given us a good start in this direction, but it should be widened to include illustrated songs, many of which we could well handle distinctively.

The handling of the congregational singing of the vast audience at Convention Hall gatherings by Professor Smith was a stirring spectacle. From them he was able to get effects hardly imaginable by those who have not participated in the large community "sings" which have been popular since the war. With a minimum of instruction he by meaningful gestures was able to arouse or suppress at will, and all for some definite purpose.

Church Buildings and Equipment

Two conferences were held at one of the churches on better building ideals and equipment that allows church schools to function more effectively. Doctor H. E. Gralle and George Ernest Merrill were in charge of the discussion on church planning, which included new structures and remodeling. These men have collaborated on a newly published book on Church Planning which is built around the interesting argument that we ought to provide sound-proof classrooms for our class work rather than be content with one room, or even rooms with movable partitions.

Mrs. Maud Junkin Baldwin, speaking on equipment, insisted that the need of the child is the law of the church. Thousands of church communities are breaking the law, but it still remains the great factor in our lack of progress. Our own comfort is incidental to the actual needs of the children in our care. She effectually shook her audience loose from the idea that "whatever has been must be." If we have been blind to our responsibility in this matter it is time for us to open our eyes and see that we are required to provide the right environment for our children and their teachers.

She quoted one tight-fisted superintendent as saying that when the children did not come the school saved money, as the Sunday school papers were not given absentees. "Don't try to punish small children for absence," she said, "for if you half way do your part they will come."

The whole matter of equipment was interestingly gone over and convincingly discussed. The habit of some treasurers of trying to build up large balances in order to boast of having money on hand, was disapproved. We ought to consider our money as of no earthly use except for spending, she said, and therefore should spend it cheerfully and as wisely as possible, with the needs of the children first in mind.

Slogans for Schools

The walls of the lobby were covered with placards which artistically presented some very effective ideas in the way of slogans, some of which read as follows:

"They are never still a minute."

"Two out of every three persons under twenty-five years of age attend no religious schools. What of the future?"

"Service for others is the seed of missionary interest."

"Impression without expression means a lost lesson."

"Upon the Sunday-school teacher rests the responsibility for leading the pupils to Christ."

"Church prevention is wiser than court prevention."—Judge Ben Lindsey.

"The place of the child in the church determines the place of the church in civilization."

"Children are molded unconsciously by their surroundings."

"The child's stairway to God: Beautiful room. Adequate equipment. Graded lessons. Helpfulness. Reverence. Worship. Personality of teachers."

The Anglican Church in New Zealand in the Christchurch Presbytery expressed themselves frankly against church raffles or guessing contests. It certainly is most unseemly that when gambling of all kinds is forbidden and prohibited by law that it should be permitted in the name of or on behalf of the church as a raffle.

One of the most inspirational features of the International Convention is the children's exhibit in which a thousand features delighted the soul, inspiring one with the valuable phases of expressional work for children. Everything from the tabernacle in the wilderness to model Sunday school rooms are there, most of them made of surprisingly simple materials but strikingly realistic. From seeing these exhibits one begins to wonder why he has not thought of doing some of those things with the children long ago—but perhaps more important: is inspired to go and do them now. Guides are furnished to show one through the rooms and explain the items.

Budgets

By Benjamin R. McGuire, Presiding Bishop

Budgets are not a fad, but a necessity in any well organized institution. The purpose of a budget is to determine the income and how that income shall be spent, instead of running without any definite financial program.

In making a budget for a city or state, it can be determined with almost mathematical precision just what the income will be, as the tax is prorated according to the assessed valuation of the property, and if the owner fails to pay the tax, the property will be sold by the state for taxes.

In church finances we can only be governed by the law of averages. We can estimate that under normal conditions the increase in our tithes and offerings will be at least equal to the average annual increase for the past ten years. The fact that our membership is increasing each year and that older members understand the temporal law more perfectly warrants us in expecting an upward trend in our receipts. But, after all, we depend upon the free will of the people to supply the funds. We cannot coerce, neither would we want to do so. But the fact that we have no way of providing for a sure and definite amount of receipts calls for the creation year by year of a reserve fund, upon which we can draw when we have panics or periods of depression such as we are now passing through.

We should not spend every dollar that we receive every year for present needs, any more than an individual should. We consider people unwise who live from hand to mouth; who spend their dollars as fast as they receive them. Shall the church be less wise? This suggestion, if acted upon, would call for an item in each year's budget showing cash set aside in a "reserve fund." Such a fund should amount to approximately ten per cent of our total receipts from tithes and offerings.

History, we are told, repeats itself, and the past discloses that these periods of depression come about every twenty years. By setting aside ten per cent of our receipts annually we would eventually have a fund available that would tide us over even a complete failure in receipts for two years.

Such a fund might well serve a double purpose. It could be, not only an emergency fund, but during the times of normality the earnings therefrom might be used for the maintenance and development of some of our institutions, such as the Sanitarium, college, and homes, until such time as we shall create a permanent endowment fund for these worthy endeavors.

Ever since our connection with the bishopric, we have sensed the need of provision being made for a reserve fund, and we hope the day is not far off when something can be done along this line.

It is interesting to note from the following tabulation how closely the various departments have come to living within the budget appropriation for the fiscal year, July 1, 1921, to June 30, 1922, remembering that these budgets were made up about sixteen months ago:

From month to month a statement similar to the above is prepared by the Presiding Bishopric and a copy filed with the Presidency, so that at all times our finger is on the financial pulse of the church; and by the further aid of charts, which help us to visualize the situation, we are able to know whether the financial trend is healthy or otherwise.

Under the heading of Administration and Stake Expenses are included all of the expenses and clerical help incident to the operation of the department, with the exception of the family allowances and elders' expenses of the General Conference appointees in charge of these departments. This policy is followed, as a large part of their time is missionary in its character.

However, in the following departments the family allowance is charged to the department and included in Administration Expenses, Publicity, Statistician, Auditor, Architect, and Women's Department.

Under Family Allowance note that $17,152.44 is left unused in eleven months, out of average budget appropriation of $238,333.33, due to the fact that a reduction was made in the allowances July 1, 1921, and again January 1, 1922, and also by the release of some of the missionaries.

Owing to existing business and financial conditions, some of the improvements that had been planned at the Saints' Home, Children's Home, and Sanitarium have been postponed, thus leaving a part of their budget unused.

On the whole it will be noted that while some departments have overrun their budgets, that the total amount spent for the purposes scheduled for the eleven months ($414,123.07) is $32,413.00 less than had been anticipated.

It is the aim of the Bishopric to guard carefully the expenditure of every dollar that you contribute to the Master's cause. If at any time there are questions upon which you would like additional light we shall be glad to answer them.

The Farmer Unprotected

The farmers for the Northwest have a serious bill of complaint because of the loss incurred by underweighing and undergrading of their wheat at the elevators. This has constituted systematic cheating. Many efforts have been made to meet the situation, and finally an act was passed in North Dakota providing that the buyer must be licensed and that the grading must take place under conditions within the farmer's supervision. This law, however, before the Supreme Court of the United States was held unconstitutional by a vote of five to three, as interfering with interstate commerce.

The American City for April states that a great majority of the cities of America appear to be spending more than their receipts. This is the result of a review of 156 cities, and the conclusion is that they are badly in need of proper budgeting.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

"What Lack I Yet?"

(Matthew 19: 16-23.)

To that pointed query of the young man who came to him, Jesus replied, "Come, and follow me." (Verse 21.) It is recorded that the young man went away sorrowful because his possessions were great. (See verse 22.) He who came to the Master of men anxious to do something to guarantee for himself eternal life (see verse 16) when he found that it meant giving up his own choice way of living in his "great possessions," turned down the call of Jesus to follow him. He went away sorrowful, because there waged within him a battle. Should he give up what he was doing, or should he refuse the "call"?

We want to call particular attention to the fact that he was a "young man" (see verse 20); that he was good, having kept the commandments from his youth up (verse 20); that he was a man who had done things; who possessed great wealth. He was, no doubt, a vigorous young man, who was making good but who by the workings of the spirit in him felt that he lacked something, that he had something else to do. Under the impulse of that spirit he came to Jesus, who in the inspiration of his insight knew God's will concerning him, and told him, "Come and follow me." He recognized that call to be sufficiently authentic that it caused him to sorrow. He went away perplexed, with that call ringing in his ears. Should he give up his business and his wealth and answer the call? Or should he turn down the call and stay with the business at which he was already making good?

Jesus is still asking for men to "follow him." He needs ministers. He needs ministers who are willing to sell "their goods" and "follow him." Men and women who will decide to give up all else to the ministry of Christ. The church is calling for that type to-day. In the January 18 issue of the HERALD a call for "young" men and women to enter the religious education class at Graceland for next year was issued by the president of the church. Some have answered; many more are needed. We are republishing that "call" in next week's HERALD. Watch for it. In the meantime ask yourself, "What lack I yet?"

The Coming of Christ

By J. J. Cornish

Including a discussion of the "last generation" and "the end of the world." In two parts—part two.

Times of the Gentiles

I will give you one more irrefragable evidence, and in harmony with all preceding evidences: "And the disciples asked him saying, Master, when shall these things be? And what sign wilt thou show when these things shall come to pass?" Luke 21:7. (Inspired Translation.) And he said (I abbreviate): False Christs; wars and commotions, nation against nation; kingdom against kingdom; earthquakes; famines; etc. Hate you; kill some. "And when you shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh."

And they [those at that time in Jerusalem] shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations, and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the time of the Gentiles be fulfilled. Now these things he spake unto them concerning the destruction of Jerusalem.—Luke 21:5-24.

Everything the Savior has mentioned, from the fifth to the middle of the twenty-fourth verse, refers to the Jews and Jerusalem at the time he was with them, and on to the destruction in that generation. They do not belong to us or our time!

Take now your pen and make a little cross in the middle of the 24th verse, after the period at the end of the word Jerusalem, and what he says from the center of that verse to the end of the 36th verse belongs to us in our time and on to the last generation, and does not refer to the people of the time and generation in which he lived. Two different periods, then, and the generations that will be living when those signs will come to pass.

And then his disciples asked him saying, Master, tell us concerning thy coming.—Verse 24. And he answered them and said, In the generation in which the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled, there shall be signs in the sun and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity, like the sea and waves roaring. The earth shall be troubled, and the waters of the great deep. . . . [This the Savior repeats with emphasis.] Verily I say unto you, This generation, the generation WHEN the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, shall not pass away until all be fulfilled.—Luke 21:25, 32, Inspired Translation.

Now you can see, can you not, that the signs in the sun, moon, and stars are not to take place until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled? And they are not fulfilled while the Gentiles hold control over Palestine or the Jews; neither until the Jews have built their city and temple in the Holy Land—the land of their fathers. After all that Jesus says, "Verily I say unto you, this generation, the generation when the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, shall not pass away till all be fulfilled."—Luke 21:32, I. T. In harmony with Matthew and Mark.

There is a difference between the time of the Gentiles, and the times of the Gentiles.

There was a time (1830) when the gospel came to the Gentiles, and many thousands obeyed it, and have passed over on the other side, and the time is now when hundreds of thousands are rejoicing in the angel's message; but the time will come when "a light shall break forth among them that sit in darkness, and it shall be the fullness of my gospel; but they receive it not, for they perceive not the light, and they turn their hearts from me because of the precepts of men; and in that generation shall the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled."—Doctrine and Covenants 45:4.

That generation has not come, and will not come until the signs appear in the sun, moon, and stars. To this agree the words of Paul:

For I would not, brethren, that you should be ignorant of this mystery, lest you should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in.—Romans 11:25.

There was also a time when the Romans "tread" them down; then other nations; finally the Turks "tread" them under foot. The Allies have spoken; the Turks are driven out, and the British have been made their protectorate, but they are Gentiles. By and by that country will be turned over to the Jews. They will build their city and temple; then another time of treading down will take place, before all of the times are up.

Two More Prophets Yet to Come.

And that "blindness in part" will remain until two prophets stand up in Jerusalem and prophesy for three years and a half. Revelation 11:3-12. At that time the Gentiles still tread down the city. "For it is given unto the Gentiles; and the Holy City shall they tread under foot forty and two months."—Revelation 11:2.

Sure! Those prophets will not attempt to deliver their message until there are a sufficient number gathered to receive or reject their message! That message will likely be the gospel of peace and salvation, together with prophetic warnings relative to their "abomination of desolation," if they do not repent and accept the same. "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, until he revealeth the secret unto his servants the prophets."—Amos 3:7, Inspired Translation.

The times of the Gentiles are not up then, are they? And the sun, moon, and stars, signs that the Master speaks of, have not taken place, for that comes after the treading down. They must gather there and build that city and temple before it can be trodden down. And after the treading down and destruction come, the signs will be given of the sun, moon, and stars. (Matthew 24:3, 34; Mark 13:37, 38; Luke 21:23; Joel 2.) At which time Christ will come to stop the war then raging. Mount of Olives splits, causing a great valley. Though the spoil has been divided, he stops the war. Gentiles suffer. Terrible plague, etc. (Zechariah 14.)

After all that has taken place, those who are then living will be in the last generation that will not pass until all be fulfilled, or last generation preceding the millennium. (Matthew 24:35; Mark 13:39; Luke 21:32, Inspired Translation.)

Learned men and commentators tell us that the two prophets (Revelation 11) are the "Old and New Testaments." Yes, I know, but let a twelve-year-old boy and girl who have been brought up in the truth and who are living accordingly, have it read to them in that light, and they will, before they are through with the fable of the "Old and New Testament," make those gentlemen look silly.

Some who read this article may say, "But Brother Cornish, you said to let Daniel and the Revelation alone. Why are you quoting the Revelation?" But I did not say that we should not use the Revelation or Daniel. I said, "But that which we read that seems mysterious, and upon which no other prophet or writer speaks; let it alone." But upon this the Prophet Joseph Smith was asked: "What is to be understood by the two witnesses in the 11th chapter of Revelation?"

Answer: "They are two prophets that are to be raised up to the Jewish nation in the last days, at the time of the restoration, and to prophesy to the Jews, after they are gathered, and build the city of Jerusalem, in the land of their fathers."—Pearl of Great Price, page 35.

After the killing of the two prophets; and treading down; and destruction; and dividing the spoil (Zechariah 14) will appear the signs as before stated. Then that generation of Jews will obey, the Gentiles become blinded, last generation.

Sun, Moon, and Star Signs

Joel says: "Israel will gather; the Lord be with them; Send them corn, wine, and oil," etc. Some have the gospel; sons and daughters prophesy. "Afterwards," the "sun shall be turned into darkness, moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." (Joel 2.)

Those who live in that generation—when those signs appear—will see fulfilled the statement of Jesus:

And upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity, like the sea and the waves roaring.

Men's hearts failing them for fear, for looking after those things which are coming on the earth.—Luke 21:25, 26.

That condition prevails some time after the sun and moon signs.

Then, he "that will not take his sword against his neighbor, must flee to Zion for safety."—Doctrine and Covenants 45:13.) But we must have a Zion to flee to. Also a Jerusalem. The gathering must be before all this. Those places must be established first. "For in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance as the Lord hath said, and in the remnant whom the Lord shall call."—Joel 2:32. "Let them, therefore, who are among the Gentiles, flee to Zion. And let them who be of Judah, flee to Jerusalem."—Doctrine and Covenants 108:4. All this in a generation to come when those places of refuge are built up and established. Hear the matter:

Beautiful and terrific as was the scenery, which might be compared to the falling figs or fruit when the tree is shaken by a mighty wind, yet, it will not fully compare with the time when the sun shall become black like sackcloth of hair, the moon like blood, (Revelation 6:13,) and the stars fall to the earth as these appeared to vanish when they fell behind the trees, or came near the ground.—History of Joseph Smith, Millennial Star, volume 14, page 583.

"I Come Quickly"

Because it is recorded in the scripture, "Behold I come quickly," thousands think they are justified in advocating the idea that he will be here soon, wherein the Savior was speaking of that which will take place after the end of the "little season," and judgment. (Revelation 22:7, 12.) So much has been said and written that our children in after days, I fear, will be compelled to admit: "Surely our fathers have inherited lies."

If those who have been fooled and deceived in the past, and up to the present, and who will be in the future, would reflect, they should see at a glance that the darkening of the sun and moon in 1780 occurred generations ago, and cannot possibly be brought in as evidence of the last generation that should not pass before the coming of the Master.

Many who dispute with me ask, "Of what are they signs?" I answer: "They may have been signs of the latter days if signs at all." They certainly are not the signs referred to by the Savior which must take place after the next trouble at Jerusalem.

"Even at the Doors."

When I concluded to write, and if possible have published in our official paper, the HERALD, what the word of God said on this subject, the mail came, and within the Ensign. Glancing over the headings, I saw "Signs of the end," the first paragraph of which reads: "One observing the events fast following each other in rapid succession can but realize that a crisis is at hand. Such an one will agree the coming of Christ is near, even at the door."—Ensign, vol. 34, No. 11.

Of course all should have a right to their views, but let us look over the teaching of Jesus Christ and see if we are justified in saying that Christ is so near that he is at the present time "even at the door."

Mark records the words of our Savior:

And again shall the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, be fulfilled [next destruction]. And immediately after the tribulation of those days [in the future], shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven. . . . Verily I say unto you, this generation in which these things shall be shown forth, shall not pass away till all I have told you shall be fulfilled. . . . For the Son of Man shall come; and he shall send his angels before him with the great sound of a trumpet, and they [the angels] shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. . . . So likewise mine elect, when they shall see all these things, they shall know that he is near, even at the doors.—Mark 13: 37-46; Matthew 24: 33-42.

No one ever saw one of "these things" yet. But the people who may be living in the generations to come, who see all these things, they shall know and be justified in saying that he is near, even at the door.

No one living has seen the next destruction at Jerusalem, because the place and city are not yet built. The gospel must be preached in all the world. We have had it on earth almost one hundred years and have not as yet gone to half of the nations of the earth. Has anyone heard a "great sound of a trumpet"? No. Did you see the angels gathering the "remainder" of his saints? (Luke 17: 37, 38; Mark 13: 44.) No. Did you see an angel at all? No. "When they shall see all these things they shall know that he is near, even at the doors." (Mark 13: 38-46; Matthew 24: 35-42.) May the Almighty help us to understand.

Only those who live at that time, and see all these things will be justified in saying that he is "even at the doors."

We must stand by the words of our Savior: "And whoso treasureth up my word shall not be deceived." (Matthew 24: 39; Mark 13: 43.)

Constantly when talking to Saints about this matter, I am asked, "Well, if you are right, what about all those patriarchal blessings and revelations wherein so many have been promised that they should live until Christ comes? I answer that it grieves me to be compelled to say that those who have made such predictions must be responsible for them. God will never give revelations to anyone in this age which contradict the revelations which he has given in any other age. Many to whom such were made, are dead. Dear reader, do not bring them up to offset or to disprove the many evidences that have been given by the apostles and prophets and our blessed Master himself; and place in lieu thereof the statements of men, who, if they had known His coming was so far off would never have uttered such words.

Zechariah said of the time of the trouble that would come at Jerusalem, in which the Lord will come:

And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof, toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley.—Zechariah 14: 4.

Have We Harkened?

Our Savior has said,

Search the scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me.—John 5: 39.

I fear that we have not been true or faithful to the instruction he gave us; and by reason of our neglecting to do so we have erred, as he said to the Sadducees: "Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures." (Matthew 22: 29.) And to his disciples: "For as yet they knew not the scriptures." (John 20: 9.) In fact we are more to blame as Latter Day Saints than are the people of the world, because we have all the books that make all these things plain to us, some of which the people of the world have not access to. Hence, a greater blame attaches to us than to the people not of our faith. Eleven months after this church was organized, the Lord urged us to "hearken" and "listen" to his word upon this very subject:

Hearken, O ye people of my church, to whom the kingdom has been given, hearken ye. . . . And again I say, Hearken unto my voice, . . . Hearken, O ye people of my church, and ye elders listen together.

How could the Almighty call louder, and make the request more urgent from his written word? But we were not sufficiently willing to "hearken," or "listen," and study his words. Therefore we were left in the dark. See how plainly he says he will show it unto us:

Wherefore hearken, and I will reason with you, and I will speak unto you and prophesy, as unto men in days of old; and I will show it plainly, as I showed it unto my disciples as I stood before them in the flesh, and spake unto them, saying, As ye have asked of me concerning the signs of my coming, . . . I will show you how the day of redemption shall come, and also the restoration of the scattered Israel.—Doctrine and Covenants 45: 1, 2.

Christ's First Coming

As a people we must look at predictions of the prophets relative to the second coming of Christ in a way Israel should have looked at his first coming, or we may make similar mistakes.

For the second coming we read: "I will come again, and receive you unto myself." (John 14: 3, 28.) "Come as a thief." (1 Thessalonians 5: 2, 4; 2 Peter 3: 10.) "Come to temple." (Malachi 3: 1.) "So come as ye see him go." (Acts 1: 11.) "Behold, I come quickly." (Revelation 22: 7), etc.

Israel did not understand the prophets. No doubt one believed one way, and another looked at it in another way; and the final outcome was the rejection of the Messiah when he did come. We must be careful or we will be likewise confused.

Micah 5: 2 said he should be "born in Bethlehem of Judea"; fulfilled in Matthew 2: 5, 6; Isaiah 7: 14, "born of a virgin"; Matthew 1: 22, 23. No doubt some laughed and scoffed at that idea, and declared that it would be some other way. One might say he would be an Egyptian, for—"When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt."—Hosea 11: 1. Another: "The Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple."—Malachi 3: 1. And: "He will come as a mighty deliverer."—Zechariah 14: 1-5. Still others: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold, thy King cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass."—Zechariah 9: 9; Matthew 21: 5. All of those scriptures were true; but while some of those prophecies refer to his first coming, we know they refer to different times of that advent.

The coming as a mighty deliverer no doubt refers to the future; but the coming as the babe of Bethlehem was over thirty years before he came to Jerusalem "sitting upon an ass, the foal of an ass."

Thus are cited two different periods of his first coming. So must Latter Day Saints be studious. "And whoso treasureth up my words, shall not be deceived." (Matthew 24: 39; Mark 13: 43, I. T.)

His Second Coming

The prophecies concerning his second coming are as vague and dim as those of the first advent, and also denote different periods of time. Yet, perhaps they are as plain as the Almighty wants them to be, for he will be inquired of by us. As a church, then, we must study carefully the prophecies concerning the second coming, or we will make like mistakes as did Israel. History often repeats itself.

Of his second coming we read: "I will come again." (John 14: 3.) "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." (Acts 1: 11.) But again: "Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints," (Jude 14) will likely be at another time from "come as ye have seen him go." When he comes to "Zion" will not be the time he stands upon the "mighty ocean" or upon the Mount of Olives. (Doctrine and Covenants 108: 5.) "Behold I come quickly" (Revelation 22: 7, 12) will be over a thousand years after "the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night." (1 Thessalonians 5: 1-6.)

We should be more anxious to be ready for his coming, be among those who "shall be looking forth for the signs of my coming, and shall know me." (Doctrine and Covenants 39: 6.)

When that destruction at Jerusalem (mentioned above) shall occur, in the midst of that battle, Christ comes and fights against those nations as when he fought in the days of battle.

As he stands upon the Mount of Olives, it cleaves in twain, making "a very great valley" to which the Jews may run for refuge. The battle being over, they rally around their "Mighty Deliverer" and ask concerning the wounds in his hands. "Then he shall answer, Those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends." (Zechariah 13: 6.) So, as it was over thirty years from the time Christ's birth prophecy was fulfilled, to the time of the fulfillment of the prophecy indicating his triumphant entry into Jerusalem, perhaps it may be fully as many years between the time Christ stands on the Mount of Olives until the time he comes with ten thousand of his saints; for after he is recognized by his own people on Olivet, comes the conversion of the Jews to his gospel, in accord with the prophecy that says:

The last shall be first, and the first shall be last.

For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that they who are alive at the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them who remain unto the coming of the Lord, who are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first.—1 Thessalonians 4: 15, 16; Zechariah 14: 5; Jude 14.

And after this another angel shall sound, which is the second trump; and then cometh the redemption of those who are Christ's at his coming; who have received their part in that prison which is prepared for them, that they might receive the gospel, and be judged according to men in the flesh.—Doctrine and Covenants 85:28. (1 Peter 3:17-20; 4:6.)

End of the World

The end of the world does not take place at the coming of Christ to reign a thousand years, but after that reign is ended Satan will be let out of his bondage with all the hosts of hell, and they will go out to deceive the world once more. So the end will not be then. The Lord says:

And again, verily, verily I say unto you, that when the thousand years are ended, and men again begin to deny their God, then will I spare the earth but for a little season and the end shall come, and the heavens and the earth shall be consumed, and pass away, and there shall be a new heaven and a new earth; for all old things shall pass away, and all things shall become new, even the heaven and the earth, and all the fullness thereof, both man and beast, the fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea; and not one hair, neither mote, shall be lost, for it is the workmanship of my hand.—Doctrine and Covenants 28: 6.

Watch closely the next paragraph:

And Satan shall be bound, that old serpent, who is called the Devil, and shall not be loosed for the space of a thousand years; and then he shall be loosed for a little season, that he may gather together his armies; and Michael the seventh angel, even the archangel, shall gather together his armies, even the host of heaven. And the Devil shall gather his armies, even the hosts of hell, and shall come up to battle against Michael and his armies; and the Devil and his armies shall be cast away into their own place, that they shall not have power over the saints any more at all; for Michael shall fight their battles, and shall overcome him who seeketh the throne of him who sitteth upon the throne, even the Lamb; this is the glory of God and the sanctified; and they shall not any more see death.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 35.

Let us now take a look at the millennial period, which we have learned is of a thousand years' duration. After the war what is left of the nations are supposed to come up to Jerusalem annually to worship. Those who refuse "upon them shall be no rain," said the prophet. Should the ministers of the gospel go among those nations proclaiming the glad tidings of salvation, what a mighty influence for good will flow among them while Satan is bound! Afterwards, when he is loosed and goes out to tempt the nations once again, how long do you suppose that little season will be? Will it take years or hundreds of years for Satan to overcome that good influence emanating from all the brightest and best preachers of righteousness, who ever lived upon the earth, with Jesus Christ at their head, flowing from Mount Zion and Jerusalem, and plant in the minds of the nations the idea that there can be success in battle against Jerusalem under his leadership?

Having succeeded in getting them in that frame of mind, how long, think you, will it take to make preparations for war, and train his soldiers gathered in from the "breadth of the earth"? (Revelation 20: 9.)

After the defeat of Satan's army, when fire comes down from God out of heaven (as in other days of battle) and devours them, comes the judgment. The lost tribes, with the others being judged by the twelve apostles sitting upon their thrones, from Adam down to the end of the millennium shall be judged according "as his work shall be." It will be an immense undertaking, and that apostolic court will be in session a long time (with us, but "a little season" with the Lord), as well as the saints who are to assist in judging the world. Can it be done in the eight-thousandth year? the Lord's "little season" and to-day, agree? Please look back at the meridian of time statements, and figures. Then cometh the end of the world, for "the destruction of the wicked is the end of the world (Matthew 24: 4; Mark 13: 9). "Time shall be no longer." (Revelation 10: 6; Doctrine and Covenants 85: 35.) Then "new heaven and earth."

The Eighth Thousand Years

In giving the figures for the "little season" as one thousand years, viz, the eighth thousand years, that the reader be not misled, I would say, I do not suppose the little season to be one thousand years. But that it takes place inside the eighth thousand years.

When Satan is out of prison and goes to the four quarters of the earth, deceiving the people, perhaps it will be hundreds of years before they are deceived and blinded to the wholesome environments that they have enjoyed during the thousand years' reign. But, finally, according to prophecy, they will be "deceived." Then the Lord says:

And again, verily, verily I say unto you, that when the thousand years are ended, and men again begin to deny their God, then will I spare the earth but for a little season.—Doctrine and Covenants 28: 6.

This is the beginning of the "little season," which continues while Satan gathers his armies together and Michael likewise gathers together his armies; and then cometh the battle of the great God." (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 35.) Then after the little season, cometh the last acts before the end, such as, last resurrection—hunting up the record of names—last general judgment period, (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 29, 35; Revelation 20: 7-15,) these all with the "little season" to be enacted during the eighth thousand years—end of this world:

Watch ye therefore, and pray always, and keep my commandments, that ye may be counted worthy to escape all these things which shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man when he shall come clothed in the glory of his Father.—Luke 21: 36, Inspired Translation.

Although a person may have a theoretical conviction that public good should take precedence of private advantage, yet, if he subsequently finds himself an absolute and irresponsible ruler, he will never be able to stand fast by this conviction, . . . but his mortal nature will continually drive him to the pursuit of personal advancement and private gain.—Plato's Laws.

That which some call idleness I call the sweetest part of my life, and that is my thinking.—Felsham.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

A New Supervisor

Sister Glines apprises us of the appointment of a new supervisor for our Young Women's Bureau, to succeed Sister Mary Steele whose health is not permitting her to carry the responsibilities longer. This new officer is Sister Addie Belle Chappell, a graduate of this year from Graceland College, and she comes to our department very highly recommended by those who have known her best, as one specially qualified for the position she has accepted.

The work which is before the head of this bureau, combined as it is with that of directing also the activities of the girls of the Religio Department, we consider to be exceedingly important. Just as the hope of the church and of the Nation must rest with the children, just so will the children gradually merge into girls and boys, young men and maidens, and the problems which attend their careful guidance and instruction become more complex. The desired solution, upon which depends so much of spiritual value, will most likely be reached by one who has made the needs, the conditions, the methods and materials a special study, and who is consecrating all her talents and powers to that end.

It is a hopeful sign that our church recognizes to the extent that it does the importance of proper leadership for the young. It is for us, the membership at large, to fall in step, and try to carry out in our local branches, the plans and ideals presented to us by those appointed to supervise these interests. They can do but little after all, if we fail them, for they are not the ones to come personally in contact with the objects of their labor. Local leaders should be chosen most carefully, for none can measure the height, breadth, and depth of their influence upon our young people. We should then try to help and encourage in every possible way. We should support every worth-while measure which is introduced in the effort properly to guide and mold the "hope of the church," if we would attain the high objective in view. A membership of young people, clear-visioned, pure of thought and desire, high-minded and intellectual, spiritually-inclined, expressing itself through sound, vigorous, capable bodies—is this an ideal too high to be realized, do you think? No; a thousand times no!

So let us get behind these devoted leaders of our young people. Let us, as parents and teachers interested in all phases of the development of our children, shake off our indifference and get busy! Let that dream of a tennis court, a gymnasium, basket ball, or other longed-for equipment, come true! Do not we see in physical activity a most wholesome outlet for pent-up energy? Do not we see, in the program of the Oriole Girls or the Temple Builders, an avenue through which our dear daughters may reach a most desirable social womanhood; one in which their longing for companionship and group activity shall be most happily combined with a definite development towards the highest spiritual ideals?

Sister Chappell will have Graceland College as headquarters for her work. This plan affords a splendid opportunity for her to train many who come from all parts of the world so they will be able to go back to their branches specially qualified as leaders. Since the general director of the boys of the church is also at Graceland, this plan affords a very happy combination of effort, thought, and purpose, and can but result in much definite good. Sister Chappell has a position for the summer with one of the leading Chautauqua bureaus of the country, as a reader and story-teller.

To Sister Steele, our outgoing supervisor, we say good-by with many happy and appreciative memories. The mothers can but feel a certain regret that it was necessary for her to give up the work, for one and all have felt the direct influence of her devoted interest in the girls of the church. The high quality of her ideals, the consecration with which she pursued her work, and the intense sympathy and interest with which she heard and considered every appeal, has endeared her to us. Consolation is found in the thought that her cooperation will always be available, and that, while unable to carry the heavy responsibilities of general work, her splendid talents and enthusiastic spirit will undoubtedly find expression in local ways.

We bespeak for her successor the same appreciative goodwill and hearty support that was accorded the outgoing officer. With faith and unity and devoted energy, let us all move forward and upward in a steady, unmistakable swing towards the accomplishment of divine purposes. A. A.

Daughters and Mothers

Miss Jessie Towne, dean of girls in Omaha Central High School, whose long experience with girls of the "flapper" age qualifies her to speak with understanding on the subject, says the girls of to-day "are just as good and perhaps a little better than those of yesterday."

With her main statement The Bee is in full agreement. Also, we agree with Miss Towne that, if these girls do now and then something they should not, they are not entirely to blame. This is not to be taken as an excuse for misbehavior, but it is not fair to blame a girl when she is thrown entirely on her own resources, and allowed to shift for herself along a mighty dangerous course.

Girls are good by nature, and will remain good if given a fair chance. But girls are flesh and blood, full of life and vigor, and out of the very exuberance of nature are frequently brought into trouble. The flapper's lip stick, and rouge pot and powder puff, her goloshes and the like, are not signs of depravity; they merely indicate that the girl doesn't know what she is doing. Here is where mother's part comes in.

It is not enough to inform young folks of certain fundamental facts. Those are essential, to be sure, but tell them some other things they ought to know. Let an inexperienced girl bedaub her face with cosmetics, and then let her wash it clean, get a good night's sleep, and show her how much better job nature can do of painting her cheeks than she can do for herself. Teach her that good health is a prime requisite to having a good time in this world; that rouge and powder and the like are but artificial devices resorted to by those whose beauty has suffered from distress, either of disease, dissipation, or neglect, and intended to deceive and not to enhance the natural loveliness of a young girl's face. She will soon see the difference.

Let her understand that happiness, here and hereafter, depends on keeping mind and body healthy; do not immure her in a cloister, nor put her into the mollycoddle class, and she will come through all right.

Some mothers selfishly neglect their daughters, some thoughtlessly; some respond to a psychological aspect, but all can afford to keep on good terms with the girls in their charge. And when mother and daughter are on terms of cordial intimacy, the flapper trouble will answer itself.—

A Training in Neatness

Do you, Mrs. Housewife, in your busy workaday world, take time to inculcate neatness in your children? It is a habit, after all, this trick of being neat. Were one able to live alone in a home always, perhaps this habit of neatness would not be so essential to happiness, but in the world of to-day, where all must live in some sort of homely everyday contact with the other, cultivating the habit of neatness and orderliness is quite next to godliness.

A married woman wrote me a letter the other day, and in it she states that the one handicap she had all through her business days, was a lack of training in neatness.

Her mother failed, she says, to plant in her mind, as a child, the reasons for carefully wiping out the bathtub after a bath. She had never been trained to replace in good order such common toilet articles as soap, the talcum, the bath mat.

If mother did not find time to do it, it was not done at all. To quote her own words—"our bathroom was (next to our bedrooms) in constant disorder, and the sad part of the whole thing was the fact that we did not imagine for a moment that this was a shortcoming.

Playing the role of a wife and mother is a big task. And it is unfortunate that we still have among us women who believe that they are going on some sort of a vacation when they give up the "business" job for the job of homemaker and child trainer.

Where one of the partners in marriage is a neat person with a sense of orderliness, and the other lacks this training, there is more or less unhappiness. An orderly woman told me that she wished her husband had some one big fault instead of perpetual untidiness. Yet this man was a fine fellow as men go. But his mother had never taken the time to tell him that one does not drag one's clothing off at night and leave it on the floor to be stepped into next morning.

Teach your children neatness. Remember that you are passing on to them one of the best bits of training a mother can give.—Loretto C. Lynch.

Higher Towers

Wielding the tools of being great,
 Man strains to build
 And when his hands are stilled,
 Do they await
 Yet higher towers to try his skill again?
 —A workman with still nobler fellow men?
 Is this what he shall be, or rotting ground
 No more a part of color, motion, sound?

Man's swift mind swings the world around!
 But like the puny flower,
 Each in his hour,
 Man must be buried in the ground
 And from his own decay
 Rise to new day;

He must be prisoned in the earth
 Of grief, and after pain, find birth

Again in glory and in mirth.
 Then, truer still, may he be one
 With light and sun.

But there are graves where man must go
 Slain by remorse, and for a while
 Must hide from life, till he shall know
 That after pain, in God's own smile
 He shall arise, his soul
 Joyous and whole.

So with small griefs that slay,
 So with the little deaths of every day.

And so with that death we fear and dread
 But why, then, should we fear? The dead
 Who take their place beneath the sod
 Are only on their way to God.

If After Kirk

"If after kirk ye bide a wee
 There's some would like to speak to ye.
 If after kirk ye rise and flee,
 We'll all seem stiff and cold to ye.
 The one that's in the seat wi' ye
 Is stranger here than ye, may be.
 All here ha'e got their fears and cares,
 Add your soul unto our prayers!
 Be you our 'angel unawares'!"

"The Saints of Knoxville and Pershing," writes Sister Erma Fee, from Knoxville, Iowa, "were organized into a group on Sunday, May 21. Brother Henry Casting of Des Moines, and Brother McDonald, of Runnells, officiating. There were not sufficient officers to make a branch, therefore a group was organized. The officers are as follows: George Orr, leader; Jessie Roberts, treasurer; Lydia Dixon, chorister; Erma Fee, secretary."

LETTERS AND NEWS

Glauner-Harris Debate

A three-night debate was held in the Reorganized Church between Elder William Glauner and Elder Harris, of Utah. The question debated was, "Resolved, that Brigham Young was the legal successor of Joseph Smith; Elder Harris affirming.

The second night it was: Resolved, that Joseph Smith was the legal successor; William Glauner affirming.

The Bible, Book of Mormon, and Book of Doctrine and Covenants were the books to be used. If any other books were used they were to be accepted on their merits. Elder Glauner used the three books, with some references from the early church literature, also some Utah literature. Elder Harris based his arguments upon the works of B. H. Roberts.

At the close of the debate Elder Glauner favored continuing, but Elder Harris declined. The meetings were well attended and good interest was shown. The best of feeling prevailed between the speakers.

CHARLOTTE F. CONDIT.

A Flying Start

President Elbert A. Smith has helped us to learn a very helpful lesson from the story of the prodigal son. He tells us that when the young man "came to himself" he was in a strange country, and in the most unlovely and unpropitious surroundings, but that his start for home had to be made from that place. In the nature of things this must be so. No matter to what heights of attainment or of service we may aspire, we must start from the place we are in when our decision is reached. This holds good for intellectual attainment, and for ability to serve the church, just as much as it does in the other fields of endeavor.

Some years ago I was at a sports meeting in England, where one of the chief attractions was the attempt to reduce the world's motorcycle record for five miles. The event was reached towards the middle of the afternoon, and amid breathless excitement the racer started out. Twice he went round the course before the judges began to time him. During those two laps he went at what was apparently his greatest possible rate, but on inquiry I found that he was merely working up to his maximum speed. He was getting a "flying start."

Another memory which comes back to me is that when I was quite small, I frequently played games, or started to do some little task, only to find that my experience would teach me that I could have done better had I tried another way. On such occasions I had a habit of saying, "Let us start again." I always liked a flying start.

About two years ago I was appointed to the mission field. This had been the ambition of my life, and I had made such preparation as I could under the existing circumstances, much as had the racer before he appeared on the track. In spite of this I very soon found that there was much that I needed to know, many attitudes which I wished to cultivate, in order that I could run my race with the power and endurance demanded if I were to be successful.

Like the prodigal, I started from where I was. I did the best I could, but I found that for so important a work as the winning of souls for Christ I needed specific training. Some one had said that the successful man makes his failures the installments of success, and I found that if I were ever to be successful I was paying for it on a very much drawn out installment plan. Then came the opportunity to come to Graceland.

Within a few weeks England was thousands of miles away, the threatening heaving of the sea was for me a thing of the past, New York was a memory of hurrying men and towering skyscrapers; I was in Lamoni, in Graceland, and in the association of the happiest and most consecrated group of young people I had ever known.

The work of the year was heavy, for everyone realized the need for intensive preparation, but it was pleasant. The personal interest of instructors and other students gave a zest to study not found elsewhere. The course was mapped with the idea of giving needed information, but that was not the primary object. The studies and the whole life of the college tended towards the central aim—the making of men. I think that that is what stands out in the work of the year. Every activity was developmental, and emphasized the fact that our religion touches life at every point. The prayer meetings in the college chapel are hours never to be forgotten; and the interest of the whole college fraternity in one who was ill, betokened a spirit of brotherhood which will rank high among the causes of future success.

So we came to commencement, my first commencement—for we do not have this idea in operation in England. Our diplomas said that we had graduated from the one-year course in religious education, but that conveyed but little to those who had not been through the course. Our instructors could tell what grades we had made in English, in psychology (which is so human when you meet it at Graceland), in three or four other studies, but above and beyond these things we had gained an outlook on life and service which could not be measured or graded. As we sat in the Brick Church, and listened to the commencement address of President Elbert Smith, I thought that the judges were timing us. We had commenced.

One of the things I had learned was to look on the beautiful, the true, and the virtuous; and so I frequently look back now to the things in my life from which I can get pleasure and sustenance for the coming fights. So I now look back on the many new endeavors I have made, on the many new leaves I have turned, but I think that of them all the most promising was my coming to Graceland. After my preparation I may make a spill round the next corner, but at least I am assured that Graceland has given me a flying start.

A Deplorable Condition

I am grieved more than I can tell you when so many tell me that they cannot afford to take the HERALD. The articles are very high class and very instructive. . . . It is not only the poor who do not read, but I find that those who are intelligent and high up in authority are often delinquents. I often say, "Did you read such and such an article in the HERALD?" Then they look a little ashamed and say, "Well, I have not seen a HERALD for two months."

Such conditions are deplorable. God says, "My people perish for lack of knowledge." If our people would spend just a few minutes every day reading the HERALD instead of wasting too much time on ironing and dusting and on frivolous things, then we could come up higher. I have no patience with the modern woman doing such a lot of unimportant work when such good reading is thrown to one side.

(From a letter to Presiding Bishopric by an aged sister.)

Ambitions and Actualities

Do you remember how, when we were just youngsters, we used to imagine the things we would be and do in the world when we grew up?

Did you ever want to drive a delivery wagon, so you could ride around all day? Or perhaps your ideas were ambitious, and you really wanted to ride on an express train at probably sixty miles an hour!

Every boy, of course, at different stages in his career has wanted to be a policeman, so that he could boss people around; and an Indian, so that he could show his bravery; and a soldier, so that he could wear a gorgeous uniform and a sword and everything and hear people say, "Here he comes."

A little later in life our ambitions began to take firmer root in the social soil and we wanted to be lawyers, judges, bankers, financiers, congressmen, and senators: and of course, each of us had a subconscious sense of a far-away possibility that he might be president of the United States some day, and have the world taking off its hat to him.

And then we had to go to work in a store and factory and office, and the deadly drudgery of doing just little everyday things began to wear away the fine edge of our ambitions. It began to be driven into our minds and hearts and souls that, after all, everything is just a succession of little things joined together, and life is made up mostly of the hard work of doing these little things.

Do you know I believe that the trouble with most of us was just that we didn't use our good common sense when we got a chance to put our dreams alongside the facts of life: we wanted the prizes of life which we saw in the grasp of others who were not any more alive than we, but we let hard work at the beginning scare us away instead of spurring us on. We didn't size up the situation to see that hard work is not a bar, but a gate if only one owns the key. That key to the gate of success is efficient training. The world to-day is demanding specialized individuals to occupy different positions of life. The church is calling to-day for educated and trained men and women. If Zion is to be redeemed it will call for the use of the best talents we have, because if it were not so God would not have commanded us to "seek learning by study and also by faith" (Doctrine and Covenants 85:36). I do not decry the necessity of personal consecration, but how much more valuable would that consecration be if it were coupled with intelligent service. God has given us but the fundamental principles, and intelligence will be required if we are going to carry them out. We have too long assumed that a man is sure to be a successful farmer, or business man, or salesman, merely because he is a Latter Day Saint; but, no matter how consecrated he may be, he must be possessed of expert ability.

Where can we get that efficient training? In Graceland College one will find a college that will meet all the requirements of an ideal college for the actualization of the potential possibilities of the individual. Not only is the mental and physical make-up of the person being fully expressed, but the spiritual side as well, for nowhere can we find a more devoted and consecrated faculty who have the spiritual welfare of the students at heart. I have visited several typical colleges of the country and in none can I find the spirit of brotherhood and good fellowship as prevalent as in Graceland. Not only would a person be made at home in Graceland, but the individual encouragement given by the different members of the faculty spurs one on to success. One cannot help but feel the individual responsibility of carrying on the fight for better social and industrial conditions when one comes in contact with such a consecrated body of men and women.

Do not let the ambitions of youth die away into silence, even though for years and years we don't hear anything but the sound of our own shoes striking the stones as we march along.

But let the echo of the call to success, the martial music of ambition ever come back to you in memory, as you walk to work, or ride in the cars, or while you sit at your desk. Bring it back!

Bring it back and let it ring in your ears to spur your soul on to make you be the man you can be if you will through efficient training.

Now I judge from the fact that you are a reader of this letter, that you are not one who hasn't heard the call to success for years and years, and if you are not, I know you will want to pass the word along anyhow, and that you will find it only too easy to think of some one who needs it. Let him read it.

PRESCOTT A. FOO.

Nauvoo Conference

The conference of the Nauvoo District met with the Burlington Branch, Saturday and Sunday, June 17 and 18, 1922. The district presidency and Elder Orman Salisbury, of Council Bluffs, were associated in the direction of the conference.

At the business sessions the entire official personnel of the district was reelected, with the exception of Elder W. H. Gunn who was succeeded as secretary by C. R. Gunn. This was made necessary by the increasing demands of the work at Fort Madison upon the time of Elder Gunn. Much time has been wasted at various conferences by the appointment of a presidency at each successive gathering. It was decided to eliminate this by the provision that in future the district presidency would take charge of conference activity. A committee was also appointed to consider the advisability of printing all reports to conference. It is suggested that by so doing all such reports will be made accessible to those interested in them, and that much valuable time will be saved.

Saturday evening Elder J. L. Parker showed the Saints the need for their preparation, that the church, the Bride of Christ, might be ready to meet her Lord at his coming. Sunday morning Elder Orman Salisbury addressed the priesthood, outlining the seven steps vital to the successful presentation of the message. The address was in itself a splendid commentary on the value of that which was presented. In the evening, Elder Salisbury preached for the Saints, discussing with them the "Success Road," and inciting all to enter therein. During the Saturday afternoon session talks were given by Prescott A. Foo and F. Henry Edwards, who were entering upon their work in the district as conference appointees. On Sunday they again addressed the Religio for a few minutes, Brother Foo also singing in the Hawaiian tongue.

The outstanding feature of the conference was the ordination of eight young men to the priesthood. At the morning service on Sunday, Elder Salisbury gave the sacred charge to those about to assume this responsibility, and then two elders, two priests, a teacher, and a deacon were ordained for service to the church in Fort Madison, one priest for the work in Rock Creek, and one priest for that in Ottumwa. There was encouraging presence of the Spirit during the setting apart, and we felt that with these additions the work in these places will be enabled to move forward to the more efficient accomplishment of that which is its purpose.

Adjourned to meet at reunion, August 18 to 27, at Nauvoo.

PRESS COMMITTEE, Per F. H. E.

Progress in Hilo

So much has happened in Hawaii within the last year that we have hardly had a chance to tell the story. Last fall, after Brother Etzenhouser left for the coast, we were all made glad to have Brethren McConley and Davis, with their families, pay us a visit. Both these families were very much loved by all the Saints of the islands here, as they had done former missionary work in Hawaii. Hilo being small, and just a little off their route, did not see as much of them as Honolulu, but we were glad they were able to give us as much attention as they did.

A few weeks ago we were again blessed, with a visit from Brother Savage. He having spent much time among the Polynesians of the South Seas felt right at home among the Hawaiians. He made even a shorter trip to Hilo than the others, staying but four days, during which time we kept him busy, but he seemed to enjoy it as much as we did. All three missionaries preached some splendid sermons and gave us much instruction and encouragement.

Brother and Sister Hull have been in Honolulu over six months, but as yet we have not had the pleasure of meeting them. We have been looking forward to a visit with them, but as the steamer rates are still very high, we have been trying to avoid any traveling expenses that are not absolutely necessary. From all reports, they are doing an excellent work in Honolulu.

This year we have been making a special effort among the young. As superintendent of the boys' department, we have been putting forth considerable effort in getting the boys and young men of the community interested, through various channels. We gave them a course in salesmanship and at present are giving a course in wireless. Every Saturday and Monday afternoon we meet on our playground for recreation. We have a fine lot and some very good equipment, including baseball, indoor baseball, volley ball, basket ball, croquet, flying rings, rope vault, pole vault, javelin and shot put.

This season we have had two track meets and one match game of indoor baseball. The first track meet was among our own boys, and the last with the Japanese school near here. We won this meet by a score of 33 to 102 and the ball game by a score of 14 to 20. The Religio is giving the boys' department a Chinese dinner to-night in honor of their victory.

We are not making the play part first in importance, but try to have the church, Religio, and Sunday school assume that place. Our young must and will play; therefore, if we supervise that play on our own grounds we know what kind of company they are keeping and that all their sports and recreations are clean and wholesome.

All departments of the work here are in very good condition, with the exception of the prayer meetings on Wednesday evenings. They have never been as well attended as we would like to have them, and on account of ill health on the part of several of the faithful few, for some time the attendance has not been too great. The priesthood is at present working on a plan to improve this condition. Other such problems have been met and overcome and we have hopes that this one may be also.

Very sincerely,

GOMER J. REEVES,

Among the visitors at the International Sunday School sessions on different days were noticed several members of the Quorum of Twelve, U. W. Greene and Paul M. Hanson, also several others of Independence and Kansas City.

Independence

On National Hospital Day various committee workers circulated tags in Independence and approximately $750 was raised for the purpose of establishing a free bed in the Sanitarium. It has been estimated that this amount will support such a bed for a period of a year. Recently the physicians of Independence held a meeting and elected Doctor G. L. Harrington president of the physicians' staff, composed of all the doctors of Independence. With the secretary, Doctor C. E. Nickson, and Doctor Charles Keown, composing the executive board, they will pass on all cases to be allowed to the hospital to determine whether they are charity patients or part-pay patients. The children's free bed is something the community has long needed, and it is hoped that ere the fund is exhausted it will be extended by other donations.

A considerable number of our people have been attending the sessions of the International Sunday School Convention at Kansas City the past few days. Those not registering as delegates are able to secure admission by the payment of a small sum at the door. Since most of the sessions are educational rather than technical, most of the business being done in committee, one gets a maximum of information and enthusiasm from attendance.

President F. M. Smith has returned to Independence and is busily engaged with his office work.

The Auditorium Orchestra, directed by R. T. Cooper, played on Saturday evening a number of selections at the International Sunday School Convention at Convention Hall and on Tuesday evening (27th) they were to play, associated with the Montgomery Ward Orchestra, to support a large chorus under direction of John R. Jones.

At the Saturday evening rendition the audience was very generous with its applause and the Kansas City Star gave full credit with the name of the church, listing in detail the numbers played.

On Monday evening before the pageant the Independence Oratorio Society sang some numbers and supported the pageant.

From Lamoni we noted A. Max Carmichael, C. E. Wight, and D. T. Williams. Sunday Elder Carmichael preached at the Stone Church in the morning and Elder Wight on the lawn in the evening.

The Independence reunion has been officially called off. It seems that a very limited number were ordering tents, since the grounds are accessible by street car and auto to all Independence people, and those in charge were convinced that without campers on the ground the reunion could not function.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium for the week ending June 24: Mrs. Ada Carter, Kingsville, Missouri; F. B. Riley and Miss Stella Martin, Kansas City, Missouri; Mrs. Fred Majors, Appleton City, Missouri; Mrs. S. P. Carpenter, Kingston, Missouri; Charlie Gilbert, Buckner, Missouri; Mrs. Leona Brown and Baby Brown, Mount Washington, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Mrs. Cora Murdock, Baby Galvin, Mrs. Iantha Wheeler, James Cochran, Baby Marion F. McCallen, Mrs. Maude Kidder, Orpha Marie and Katherine Masten, Master Loyal Chrestensen, and Baby Gene Edmund Custead. X-ray patients: Doctor W. W. Hobbs, Raytown, Missouri; Mrs. G. Graham, Leeds, Missouri; and Mrs. R. W. McCurdy, A. B. Phillips, Mrs. H. L. Eckert, Carl Thompson, and Roy Gould, of Independence.

Indian Camp Meeting

Why not spend your vacation with the Indian Saints at Redrock, Oklahoma? Come and camp with us and enjoy the outdoor life and help out the meeting with your spirituality. Send five dollars to the undersigned for which a tent will be ordered for you. Grocery supplies will be on the grounds—you do the rest. Date July 20 to 30. A. H. Christensen, Redrock, Oklahoma.

Toronto, Ontario

[The following is summarized from a letter by W. F. Clifton, local publicity agent at Toronto.]

Mayor Maguire, of Toronto, addressed the young people at the Religio on the evening of June 9. He gave some good advice on obedience to parents and stated that success very largely depended on our attitude in this regard. He was clear on the standing of our church in the community and remarked that otherwise he would not be addressing them.

The publicity given the church through newspapers during the recent theater efforts by Daniel Macgregor have been very good for the church, and no doubt appealed to the mayor.

Not long ago the Religio had an address by Sister Agnes McPhail, member of the Canadian Parliament, on methods of legislators at Ottawa. She is a member of a little branch north of Toronto.

Recent visits and sermons by T. W. Williams and Paul M. Hanson were much appreciated.

A Pilgrimage to Old Far West

In the Mount Zion Sunday school there is a class of young people, their ages run from the early twenties to the early thirties, who four years ago started the study of the history of the church, using for their text the volumes written and compiled by Church Historian Heman C. Smith.

The writer had the highly appreciated honor of being chosen its first teacher, and was much interested in seeing its numbers increase from the original eight or ten until seventy-five and sometimes more presented themselves each Sunday to hear a short lecture and make some queries, showing the deepest of interest.

Notwithstanding the thorough organization of the class and the division of the work, this number is unwieldy in an open Sunday school room, and the class naturally asked to be divided. Just before this I had learned that Walter W. Smith was available for teacher, and I recommended to the class that he be asked to teach them, which he consented to do, and has been with them now for about a year.

This class never has been satisfied with the ordinary, and in organization, study, and social activity has always developed new schemes, methods, and lines of activity, which is one of the reasons why the class shows an almost irrepressible tendency to grow in numbers.

They early conceived the idea of visiting some of the scenes of the activities of the early church, outside those of Independence with which they daily come in contact. Having reached in their study that period of history where the Saints were removed to Ray and Caldwell Counties during and because of the terrible persecution in Jackson County, this class has recently been pressing upon their officers the fact that if they could but visit these scenes it would aid them in stamping upon their memories historical facts.

Consequently it was arranged to meet on the temple lot in Old Far West on Sunday morning, June 18, and those of the class who cared to make the pilgrimage were aided to secure automobile transportation, and a party of more than forty, in automobiles, successfully made the trip and presented themselves at the spot made sacred by the sacrifice of effort and property and life by the Saints of the thirties of the nineteenth century.

Several cars left Independence on Saturday afternoon and evening, driving to Cameron, where there is a flourishing branch of Saints, who cared for the visitors in the most hospitable and fraternal manner until after the session of the Cameron Sunday school the next morning. The remaining pilgrims made the trip of about eighty-five miles on Sunday morning (what an impossible thing this would have been in 1834 to 1838, and yet how easy to-day), presenting themselves in Cameron in the early forenoon, and at the historic spot of Far West in time to hear a sermon by Thomas A. Ivie delivered in the church just across the road from the old temple lot. Here is a thriving rural congregation and Sunday school of about one hundred members, meeting regularly under very favorable environment, to all appearances. As guide to Far West from Cameron, the party was in charge of Brother Sherman Sloan, who also rendered the class much additional and appreciated service.

Promptly at the close of the worship service in the church, all the pilgrims and the bulk of the regular congregation repaired to the temple lot, standing in the depression which once was an excavation for the beginning of the temple, and upon the beautiful ground immediately surrounding.

The teacher and historian, Brother Walter W. Smith, called the officers of the class, and the president, Brother Charles J. Cox, announced that Sister Madge Nesbitt would lead the singing of hymn 35 from the Saints' Hymnal. Prayer was offered, and the teacher then pointed out the historic places under our eyes, among them being the sites of the city, the schoolhouse, the temple, residence of Joseph Smith, Shoal Creek, and some others. At the close of his short speech all boarded their cars and traveled west to the old cemetery, now a cultivated field adjoining the district schoolhouse. Here another service of song and prayer, and a further delineation of historic happenings was enjoyed, and the party lingered for a time, being loath to leave these places made sacred by human sacrifice and devotion.

Deliberately the cars were again loaded, and the start for home was made, some stopping at one place, some at another, for lunch, a short visit with friendly Saints, or the contemplation of some beautiful pastoral scene, these peaceful farms of gentle slopes and small creeks, clumps of forest and fruit trees and sleek kine and sheep and swine, making up an attractive country in which we are glad to see the Saints settling steadily, deliberately, surely, so that they may become a real strength and support to Zion, besides living a most ideal rural life.

Between the services at the temple site and at the cemetery, some paid a short visit to the late home of Sarah Kerr, the daughter of John Whitmer, an aged woman and the last of the family, then lying a corpse on a corner of the same section of ground where lies the old corner stone of the temple, laid by Alpheus Cutler on April 26, 1839, under the trying circumstances depicted in chapter 18 of the second volume of the History of the Church. The respects of the church for the departed were paid by Brother Smith. Her funeral occurred during the afternoon.

The return to Independence was a very pleasant ride of from three to five hours, just as the drivers chose, or as the comfort and convenience of the pilgrims suggested. The route being the Cannon Ball Trail, continued the atmosphere of the pilgrimage, for it lies very nearly the same as the old trail followed by the Saints when they plodded the road in sorrow from Jackson County to Caldwell, probably taking as

To the Saints of Western Oklahoma and the Panhandle of Texas; Greeting: The appointments appearing in a recent HERALD reveal the fact that we are permitted to continue our labors with you for another year. I trust this arrangement will tend to forward the work of the church in our territory. I feel confident that you will continue your usual good record, therefore I once more urge upon you the necessity of renewing your efforts so that your good services may serve as a beacon light to all who sit in the valley and shadow of many or more days for them as it took hours for us, compelled to leave Zion, but accompanied by the comfort of the Spirit of God and the promise that faithfulness to the gospel would insure a return of the Saints to the promised land.

Surely this was a pleasant atmosphere in which to close a profitable trip through a beautiful and bountiful country. And what a way to impress the memory with the facts of history!

RICHARD J. LAMBERT.

death. It is within your power to become a greater blessing to mankind than heretofore you have been, and I trust we may be able to labor together to this end.

If we are to achieve the best ends, we must of necessity put forth the best efforts. The law of compensation holds good in this matter. We cannot get something for nothing. We have in past years labored together pleasantly, and I feel sure that the present year should be one of success. It will of course require an earnest, persistent, and concentrated effort to enable us to reach the mark that is set us by the Lord Jesus, and it is to this excellent ideal that we should be striving most diligently.

There is much to be done if we will achieve the ideals and excellent work that is mapped out for us in the gospel. One thing that is important and that should be considered is that all are required to be helpers in the cause that is intrusted to us. Let each one do his or her part, the thing that he or she can do, and we shall be able to advance the good work in our field. I shall need your hearty and undivided support, because the field is so large that without the aid of all of you I would be unable to do that which will meet the present needs. But with your cooperation and the help of God I will be able to bring results.

Let us not forget our obligations both in a moral and in a financial way. May God in his infinite goodness bless you in your work, and may the loyalty you have shown in the past continue to adorn your good conduct in the work. Let our motto be, "I will do my best," and then go to work with one might to accomplish the thing which is intrusted to us. Let me hear from you regarding the needs of the work in your respective localities, and I will give you all the assistance possible.

J. E. VANDERWOOD.

To the Saints in the State of Washington, Including That Part of Idaho and British Columbia Incorporated in the Spokane and Seattle and British Columbia Districts; Greeting: The undersigned has recently been appointed by the joint council as missionary supervisor for the above-named territory.

This is written by way of an earnest request for the cooperation of every member and friend of the church in the work of prosecuting missionary activities among the people of the territory assigned us.

Effective assistance can and should be rendered by individuals and also by groups, branches, Sunday schools, Religios, etc.

"All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work, labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all."—Doctrine and Covenants 119: 8.

"The field is white already to harvest, therefore whose desireth to reap, let him thrust in his sickle with his might, and reap while the day lasts, that he may treasure up for his soul everlasting life in the kingdom of God; yea whose ever will thrust in his sickle and reap, the same is called of God; and lo, he that thrusteth in his sickle with his might, the same layeth up in store that he perish not, but bringeth salvation to his soul; and faith, hope, charity, and love, with an eye single to the glory of God qualifies him for the work."—Doctrine and Covenants 11: 2; 4: 1.

The above excerpts contain a few thoughts that should call forth serious reflection. All are called to the work of spreading the glad news. None in the church are exempt. The call is of God. Whatever our vocations may be, whether in the ministry or in the affairs of the men of business and of work, everyone is not only permitted, but enjoined, to thrust in his sickle and reap while the day lasts. The night cometh when no man can work. To every faithful worker is given the heartening promise that thereby he may treasure up everlasting life for his soul in the kingdom of God. Faith, hope, charity, and love qualify one for the work. Without these qualifications success is impossible of attainment. (See Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4.)

Comprehending these things, who would be so indifferent as to fail to qualify for the work to which he is called? Or being called and qualified, who would be so careless or apathetic as to follow the example of the man who "was afraid," and hid away his talent instead of improving it by use, till at last it was taken from him? Who would like to have the Lord of the vineyard say, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" Who wants to be among those who stand "idle in the market place"? (Matthew 20: 3.) Surely there are none.

Who does not wish to be a laborer "with God"? Talk about labor unions! Here is a labor union worth while.

"For we are laborers together with God."—1 Corinthians 3: 9.

Whosoever will thrust in his sickle and reap with God the same is called of him. How can we do it? First, Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman (not idle man) that needeth not to be ashamed. (2 Timothy 2: 15.) Giving no offense in anything, that the ministry be not blamed, but in all this approving ourselves as the ministers of God . . . by pureness, knowledge, long-suffering, love unfeigned, word of truth, and the armor of righteousness. (2 Corinthians 6.)

Complete consecration of time, talent, and temporal possessions, as the law of God directs.

In many other ways, all of which cannot be catalogued. Neither is it essential to do so. Let us find something to do to help spread the gospel story.

Helpful, constructive criticisms will be welcomed. Unkind faultfinding, if any, will be given little or no consideration. Parading the faults or mistakes of others, or over praising their virtues, will never build up the kingdom of God nor establish his righteousness. Avoid both.

Please write me as to any opportunity for missionary work in your locality. What are the prospects? What help can you give? Can you assist in preaching, tracting, or otherwise?

Finally, brethren, in the words of Paul, farewell. Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you.

In gospel bonds, T. C. KELLEY.

Success Awaits - - - Those Who Are Trained

Success sends Opportunity out to look for young men and women. But Opportunity passes by those who have wasted their time in wishing, and summons those who have made ready. The Church and the world have a place for you only if you are prepared.

Graceland College Gives You the Training

By law, Graceland graduates entering the teaching profession receive a minimum of $80 per month the first year. After two years of successful experience they receive at least $100 per month, the majority of them receiving considerably more than this. In the United States at the present time there is

A Great Scarcity of Teachers

In 1920 there were over 100,000 teachers lacking to fill the schools. Over 700,000 children were utterly deprived of proper school privileges. The country is being awakened to this fact and is paying more for teachers. In several States the minimum legal salary for teachers in the public school is $800 for the year, for the lowest grade of certificate.

Business, Trades, Professions, Call for Leaders

It has long been the desire of the leaders of the church to provide Graceland with the faculty and equipment adequate to prepare the young of the church in all lines of endeavor, industry, sciences, arts, education, and the ministry. This desire has been realized. Graceland now offers a large variety of courses, and is full standardized and officially accredited. The training of her graduates is recognized everywhere. No Monopoly in Religion

One speaker at the International Sunday School Convention declared that there is no monopoly in religion. No church has a monopoly. He went further and stated that while men differed he expected that there would be differences of organization. Another speaker suggested that we agree to differ but also agree to work together.

It is true that there is no monopoly. Our heavenly Father is the father of all living, and Jesus is the light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world. But there is of necessity a standard of truth and of right. There are therefore degrees of approximation to that truth. We recognize within our own church that the processes of growth will cause a variety of opinion. But the Spirit of God, when it is truly received, will guide us into all truth.

There have been schoolmasters—the Mosaic Law, and doubtless many others. There are doubtless approximations of various kinds to the divine plan to guide and prepare those who will, to the fullness of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Our heavenly Father reaches after the prodigal and the sinner by his Spirit and by his ministers, and blesses those whose purposes are good.

But that does not mean that there is no standard of truth; that there is no authority in the church of God. If there is authority it must be given from God. If there is a God (and we know that there is), then of reason there is revelation. So there is no doubt of the authority, since his church is directed by his Spirit. There is therefore a right way; there is therefore a way recognized of God.

The teaching of this church differs from many others, since we recognize that the honorable men of the earth will enter the terrestrial glory. Even sinners enter the celestial glory after they have suffered for their sins, if they have truly repented of their sins.

But the sons of God, those who learn of him, who fully take upon them his name here, these sons and daughters enter the celestial kingdom, where they continue to minister to those of the terrestrial.

There is, therefore, no threat of hell fire to those who do not agree with us. It is the promise for those who truly love Christ and are willing fully to take upon them his name. To this extent there is a monopoly, in that there is a crown of the work of God on earth and he has called a people to be a nation of kings and of princes unto him, to minister for others, not to hold a monopoly.

But that being true, how great indeed is our responsibility!

Redeeming the Church Colleges

In his masterly address at the recent International Sunday School Convention, Walter S. Athearn, professor of religious education at the Boston University, asserted that only one sixth of the students attending church colleges get any sort of religious education in the school curriculum. This thought was assented to and emphasized by various other speakers throughout the convention in the idea that there should be more definite teaching of religious education by educators, and that there is no more logical place for it than in colleges maintained and supported by the churches.

Professor Athearn further went on to say that departments of philosophy ought to specialize in the philosophy of religion; that departments of sociology should specialize in the social theories of Christ.

His views on the degenerating influence of biology on the entire educational system were interesting and convincing in so far as his time would allow him to prove his points. For instance, he discussed the problem raised by so many people about the study of psychology wrecking religious beliefs. He said very vigorously that psychology itself was not at fault, but it was the barnacles of biology that had become attached to it that did the harm. Biology ought to be hammered loose from psychology, he insisted, for it was not fair to have a self-respecting subject like this degraded by the conception that man was born just an animal—a little brute.

That the literature of religious education is "shot full of biology" was a further assertion of this virile exponent of clear religious thinking who is a wonderful pedagogue yet says pedagogy alone will not save souls—who is a master of technique yet emphasizes that we stress it too much.

We are reminded, in considering his statements, of the place our church held so long in the educational world: a religious college that did not teach religion. But gradually we came to ourselves as a church. Bible classes were organized and successfully conducted, and finally a class in religious education organized, which has been attracting to it more and more attention.

In the outward form we may be counted as progressive in this field at least. We rejoice in the fact. However, we must not be blind to the fact that the texts to be had for a broad study of the subjects now considered are practically all, if not all, impregnated with the biologic concept of origins and development of man. Further than that, many of the texts for school children of all ages from the first grade up are built around the idea that man began existence as an animal and that all our progress is from the primitive and barbaric up. A child is asked what he would do if he lived in a cave and had to catch a wild horse, or if he lived in tree houses and had to find food—the inference being constantly held out that since we all came up that way we must appeal to the primal instincts first, and when a soul is finally acquired, analyze, and so far as our animal natures will allow, educate it.

There is an inarticulate feeling throughout this church and other churches that there can be no middle ground in this matter. There is conflict, very real and very positive, between those who accept the biblical account of the origin and progress of man and those who avowedly deny the creation of Genesis, consequent fall of man, atonement of Christ, and all that is involved in it.

The presumed neutrality is but a delusion. It is wrong in effect because wrong in principle. It is related of a certain colored brother that he was much exercised over having been born with a dark skin rather than a white one. He could but wish he had been white and earnestly and persistently asked God to tell him why he had been thus discriminated against.

Finally, so the story goes, he was told that at the time of the great war in heaven when the hosts of Lucifer were on one side and the rest of heaven on the other, a certain number sought to be neutral. They would take no sides, and as a result these spirits were punished by being given black skins for their bodies as they entered this sphere.

We are not concerned here with the orthodoxy of this incident. We are concerned with the principle, which is similar to God's denunciation of the church at Laodicea: "Thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art luke warm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth." (Revelation 3: 15, 16.)

Other churchmen are debating it vigorously. Some, it is true, inclining their ears Darwinward, are protesting that it is a dead issue, that no well-informed persons nowadays believe in the Adam-and-Eve story and the "folk tales" of the Bible. Yet it is a very-much-alive issue.

In our own church we must face it. In our own college and schools we must consider what we will do about it. Perhaps there is no need that the church legislate on such matters, for legislation does not change methods of thinking nor raise ideals, but there is need that we consider all that is involved in the issue and discuss it frankly and without heat. Education has enough to suffer without having to bear the burden of atheism on its calloused back. Those who stand aside and see the spiritual wrecks in the path should be helped to realize that education in its true sense is not to blame, but that some of the "ologies" that have crept in need to be dragged out into the clear light of day and required to give an account of themselves.

A potential (but as we have said, inarticulate) majority stand dumbly by, wondering what to do and why some one does not do it. These people are told rather often that until they have read many heavy books on biology and the related subjects they are not in a position to discuss the subject. They are not in a position to do so, but still protest in a mighty, wordless appeal which is wrung from hearts that are loyal to the truth. Those who have read the books and heard the lectures have in addition usually acquired a facile use of words and unusual terms and are able therewith to overwhelm, if not to convince.

The most harm is done by the army of camp followers of science, the Pharisees who make pretense and would sit in Moses' seat. They destroy faith but give us nothing with which to replace it. They are confused themselves and would confuse others by a smoke screen of allusions and insinuations.

On the other hand, towering minds in the fields of science believe in God. They have faith in the Creator of all and in the immortality of the soul. They are not accepting without question the verdict of biology as to the origin of man.

So we ought to consider who speaks as well as what is said. Men like Sir Oliver Lodge, one-time president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, William Bateson, later president of that association, and men of that type who have gone far into real research, are much less arbitrary than some just-arrived high-school teachers who have read a half dozen books and heard a few lectures.

What is the remedy? A disposition on the part of all to get down to the fundamentals involved and see where we are being led by our theories and attitudes.

From whom did we get our ideas of evolution, and from where did they get it? Was their hypothesis or guess any better than others?

Is our attitude against evolutionary ideas and all that grows out of biologic conclusions based on mere impulse and resentment at overturning of our previous habits of thinking, or are we well-founded in the reasons for our faith? How well could we discuss our faith with one who did not believe the Bible, but was open to conviction? (Remembering that to say to such a person, "It says in the Bible . . ." means no more than to inform him that, "It says in the Koran . . ." He is more interested in why it is in the Bible—what principles of truth are involved.)

No mere closing of our eyes in pious attitude, no drawing aside of ecclesiastical robes lest we be contaminated, will insure progress. We must have an active faith in God. We must sound the depths of our souls, search the heights of heaven with our earnest, impelling prayers. We must test the fiber of our intellect and come out from our experiences clear-brained and pure-hearted, ready to face the problem and solve it, not for ourselves alone but for the many others who falteringly hesitate, not knowing which way to turn.

Church Organization

Doctor Barclay stated that there is no divinely authorized form of church organization. He ignored entirely the fact that Christ chose twelve apostles; that these apostles evidently had definite duties; that when Judas died another was elected to fill his place; that there are some twenty apostles listed in the New Testament.

He also ignored the fact that Jesus sent out seventies. He referred to the fact of the seven evangelists, of the elders and pastors, but did not quote 1 Corinthians 12:28: "God hath set in the church first apostles, secondarily prophets," etc. Deacons are also provided, and we note that when the Apostle Paul had a discussion with his churches the matter was taken up to Jerusalem and James rendered the decision.

It is quite true that in the New Testament organization did not receive the primary consideration. Then, as to-day, it was recognized that results are of vital importance. The first four books, the gospels, are of the life of Jesus. They are principally concerned with that and with his special teachings and not with the form of church organization. Yet we note that Judas held the bag; we note that there were twelve apostles; we note from the Acts of the Apostles that the quorum was refilled from time to time and that other officers were appointed with specified duties.

In the Old Testament there are some directions with regard to official duties, but these are not exhaustive. In the New Testament there is provision for a presbytery, for priests, and for many other officers. The greater part of the New Testament is taken up with epistles, with letters written for specified purposes and to discuss specific problems. It does not include a constitution of church organization.

But because it is principally composed of such letters, because the balance of the book outside of such letters consists chiefly of the life of Jesus, and that the two remaining books are the Acts of the Apostles and the Apocalypse, it does not follow that there was no church organization. There were numerous officers specified. What were the duties of these officers? Have we the right to take them out of the church and to build up a purely human organization for the work of God?

Is it not more logical to suppose that when God set in the church apostles and prophets, evangelists and teachers, elders and bishops, and deacons and seventies, that he had a purpose in so doing? When he declared that we have a great high priest, even Christ, and refers to the order of the high priesthood, is it too much to infer that an order means more than one and that God set these officers in the church for a purpose?

We are living in an age of surgical operations, but where surgeons differ, where they do not see eye to eye. We should be a little slow to lop off those parts which God has established as part of the living organ. Of course, if we are discussing that which man has added, we can remove it as readily as we can a glass eye, or our clothing, and with as little danger and damage.

If we do not know as fully as we should the duties of those God set in the church, would it not be well to follow the advice of James to the church:

If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord.—James 1:5-7.

If we believe in a living God, and we do, surely he is as ready to help us to-day as in ages past, and instead of inferring erroneously that there is no organization to the church of Christ, why not rather seek to learn?

We must learn to bear and to work before we can spare strength to dream.—Phelps.

The International Sunday School Convention

Brief summaries of some of the principal addresses.

The Genius of Protestant Christian Education

(From an address by Professor N. E. Richardson, Professor of Religious Education at Northwestern University.)

The existence of any church is justified only by service to humanity. Our aim is progressive, of vital religious experience.

No sacerdotal manipulations can take the place of personal knowledge of the word of God. Christianity is not only individual but also a social aim. Christian education seeks to control conduct in everyday living, not merely to arouse sentiment toward a future life.

Any religious institution that is not able to adapt itself to its environment becomes useless and has to resort to artificial methods. It depends on the anchor rather than the propellers. This law of adaptation is seen in the attitude of Protestant church leaders towards science, modernists, socialism, and the like. Protestant education accepts the devout scientists, for not all scientists are religious and most religious men are unscientific. The best in both classes are both religious and scientific. There are pedagogical principles in the Bible which can be rightly essayed only by those who have studied child psychology.

Protestantism does not fear mistakes in thought. It would rather be efficient than infallible.

We must have a department of research. The motive of Christian education is evangelical. This evangelical motive can find expression in a program of religious education as well as in the Bible.

There must be first, conversion from over-indulgence to self-sacrificing attitude for the love of Christ; second, from unsocial to social; third, from inartistic to love of the beautiful; fourth, from irreverence to an attitude that is reverent; fifth, from intolerance to a spirit of tolerance. There will always be a number of different Protestant churches as long as men differ.

[Doctor Richardson emphasized, as did others, the progressive character of Protestantism. This we have referred to elsewhere in the editorial columns, or shall so refer. But there surely is an ultimate reality. We should progress, but that progression must only be nearer to God. No doubt Professor Richardson would agree with this statement.]

The Church and Religious Education

(A brief summary of address by W. E. Raffety, editor in chief of the American Baptist Publishing Society.)

At the recent Baptist National Convention we had the old Chinese motto, "Agree to differ; resolve to love." Doctor Raffety, who was speaking on the church and religious education, made a considerable review of existing conditions in America, the large number of murders and other crimes as compared with London and Great Britain, including immorality, profiteering, politics, capital and labor, divorces, and other like conditions. The church must meet this condition. We cannot exist as a nation half pagan and half Christian. In carrying out this work we first need organization. He referred to this organization of Sunday schools and of denominations as perfected at this convention. Second, it is essential that we have a great army of trained teachers and officers; third, a curriculum of religious education; and fourth, we must have more time. The public schools have thirty hours, especially in the country school, while we have thirty minutes on Sunday. The church must meet more and must give more service. Fifth, we must have educational buildings and equipment.

Bite off more than you can chew, then chew it; plan more than you can do, then do it. Hitch your wagon to a star; keep your seat and there you are.

A Comprehensive Program of Education, Secular and Religious

(By Hugh S. Magill, field secretary of the National Educational Association and recently elected General Secretary of the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education.)

He discussed this subject from the standpoint of the public school, with its democratic principles, to prepare all people to bear the responsibility of citizenship in a free government. The forefathers of our country recognized that the only way to raise standards is to raise the character of the citizenry that make up the government.

He discussed the early schools which taught in order that one could read the Bible; the objection to maintaining public schools being that to tax all would be illegal for those who did not have children. Conscientious men contended that school laws were illegal. But the courts held that preservation of free government depended upon the right character of citizenship, and that hence the public school was justified.

The good citizen must be physically fit, mentally fit. Man to-day is suffering from loose and careless thinking. Too many people guess and guess wrong.

Third, vocational fitness is necessary for supplying the family; fourth, social; fifth, moral. It is impossible to preserve individual morality—it is difficult if not impossible to preserve national morality—without religion. He referred twice to Washington's farewell address on the importance of religion. If we are to have finally spiritual fitness, religious education, we must have trained teachers. We should have a system of religious education so outlined that it would command the highest respect of all engaged in the field of education.

Civilization's cities are not built out of brick and mortar without men and women with ideals. The hope of the city and the country is in the right training of our children.

A late daily paper published a little editorial on "Why not try Christianity?" It discussed the chaotic condition of civilization to-day and said the only hope lay in trying out in a definite way the fundamental principles of Christianity.

Standards and Measurements

Professor W. W. Charters, of the University of Pittsburgh, spoke on "Standards and measurements." He stated that he proposed to take us from the pilot house where we enjoy broad vistas, down to the engine room where we could watch the machinery. If our ideals are to find expression, it must be because we provide the machinery and work out our theories Sunday by Sunday, day by day.

There are two movements in education, the theory of education, its long history and great ideals; on the other hand, the practice of education which is not greatly influenced by educational theories. Theory has been superficial in influence, except in two or three points, because theories fail to provide missionaries, books, educators, and teachers. So the old methods continue to function somehow.

We are facing the problem of practical living, asking, What are the problems of the young of this age? We cannot disregard the heritage of past generations, but how much of that heritage is of use to help us to live the broadest life to-day. Educators are developing a ministry, measuring material, deciding what shall be taught; measuring a teacher to decide what they shall be taught, etc. When this school is through there will be a merging of theory and practice in some degree at least.

Religious education must become functional. It must be carried into the classroom. It should go out and establish research; lead out, for it is not merely secular education.

Unfortunately there is no uniformity of effort. The Sunday school young people's societies, Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., etc., have organized, each carrying out its own aim.

The standard of selection should not be to cover the Bible once in a year, but to cover the needs and problems of this generation and use the Bible to that end.

Organization for Religious Education

The department of religious education is evidently divided into five sections. The first concerns itself with standards and measurements; the third with the lessons; the fourth with organization; the fifth with teacher training.

Friday morning the work of organization for religious education was discussed. Doctor W. C. Barclay discussed the organization of the local church. He stated that there is no definite organization for all church work. The New Testament gives us no definite plan of organization. Occasionally we see developments as the church emerges from simple fellowship. As an instance, seven men were chosen to administer to widows. James 5: 14 provides for elders, and in the pastoral epistle bishops and pastors were listed. The New Testament writers were not interested in setting forth the form of organization, simply gave it incidentally.

The word organization belongs primarily and essentially to biology. The lowest forms of animal life have practically no organization. The higher up the more complex it becomes; organization is functions by which the body serves its ends.

The church exists for social ends, the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth. Organization should function efficiently; otherwise it fails. When forms fail they should be permitted to lapse; nay more, a surgical operation should be performed. This task is difficult for us to perform. It is difficult to see eye to eye, but the growing conviction is that religious education is the chief function of the church. The church should be organized for educational efficiency. They have not been so organized in the past. They are thoroughly organized to hold property, raise money for necessities, but not for religious education.

The church has a Sunday school, but Sunday school is not the church. It has not been incorporated into the organization. In how many churches do the Sunday school officers report to the church as the trustees report? There should be no detached units of organization. We should examine our aims and methods to secure these ends through affiliation. It is impossible in a living organization, a body firmly knit together, to have detached units. There should be no separation between Sunday school and church instead of loosely affiliated as is too often the case to-day. There should be a unified program also of week-day and Sunday functions. Subsidiary organizations in the church should conform to these principles.

All of the organizations must be tested by the child and fashioned to the child; not the child adapted to the plan.

Hours With the Children

Miss Minnie E. Kennedy emphasized that there must be a definite plan or aim. There must be unification of organization—Sunday school, junior organization, junior mission. You have a plot of ground. One man plants potatoes, another comes along and plants corn, another cabbage, etc. What kind of a crop? The child mind needs reiteration; talk the same on week days as on Sunday. There must be unification.

Doctor Percy R. Hayward, of Toronto, spoke on the young people. Between twelve and twenty-five years of age, there are four great outstanding characteristics. In proportion as the church meets these four outstanding needs its value to the young people is determined.

First, there is a nurturing and solidifying of physical life. There is a corresponding need for athletic activities, recreation; not stuck on as line and bait to bring young people to a place where we can squirt sermons and prayers at them through ecclesiastical atomizers.

Second, they reach intellectual maturity.

Third, there is an expanding of the social nature that should be built up and glorified. There is a necessity for vocational choice.

Fourth, an inherent and practical enforcing of the religious nature. There is a corresponding need for the church to appreciate these outstanding characteristics and meet these eternal needs. The church has not taken adequate account of these needs.

The awakening of life in the youth is a splendid illustration and worthy of consideration.

There is a new ideal in the church on Sunday school equipment. In visiting a church building which cost a quarter million dollars, we went all through and failed to find one spot where a boy or girl could do anything but sit still and look pious.

Second, we need an enlistment of new trained leaders.

Third, a wholesome, comprehensive program to include all sides of life.

Adult Department

Charles Darsie, of Saint Louis, says the adult department is comparatively little developed at present compared to what it should be. It is little more than a preaching service so far, but we need to train the adult to carry on the educational program. They should accept Jesus Christ and enlist for service. They should be trained and we should emphasize objective Bible study. They should enlist in the special service for which they are fitted. Our Bible study should be with an object in view, not the aimless controversy so common. We must make them feel that Bible study is necessary to the Christian life. We must provide for the small adult division for the small Sunday school. At present it is more than any other undeveloped. Organization is secondary to intensive work but should not be neglected.

The average church of to-day has a working force of less than twenty-five per cent of its members. The rest are merely onlookers or well-wishers, if they have not already degenerated into a backsliding or backbiting class.

The Local Church as an Agency of Training

Mr. J. S. Armentrout, of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, spoke on the local church as an agency and emphasized that the fundamental work must be done there because the local church has already started a program of training. It must itself provide its own leaders and teachers in the church and community. The fundamental work should be given in the church school even though the church school cannot give all the training necessary.

I believe the Sunday school has failed to-day more than in any other respect in giving such limited leadership training to the young people. It is in the position of a beggar and asks anybody, trained or untrained, to go in and teach. It should prepare leaders.

The training class should be an annual affair beginning in October of each year. It should take the best of our young people of the senior group; young people of senior high school age. They should be promoted regularly into that department and it should be the best room in the hall, the very choice of young men and young women.

Community Agency

Mr. L. F. Smith, chairman of the International Children's Division, discussed community agency. We must supplement the church school with many community agencies, including a community teacher training of all denominations with one good leader. Also, there is the week-day school of religious education, which is already doing good work in Saint Louis, training for leadership in daily vacation Bible classes. The Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. have done much to provide leadership for cradle roll, beginners, and primaries. It is organized on the basis of the regular school. We have two million teachers in our Sunday schools, which means an average life of two to three years, meaning a turn over of about 800,000, so we must have a strong faculty.

We are surprised to note the busiest men are willing to help as a rule. These many people coming together for a common purpose give fellowship and strengthen the weak school and also the weaker denominations. It must be a real school and the responsibility must rest on the whole community.

Church-Wide System of Leadership Training

(By John F. Shackford, superintendent of teacher training, Methodist Episcopal Church South.)

Jesus started by selecting a group of men and training them to represent him and teach his word to the world. Therein lies the importance of religious education. The church is facing this world-wide task to-day, the Christianizing of the world and bringing the world under the spirit and mind of Christ. How can it be done? The process is essentially educational, for the minds and hearts of children are educable.

The task is to get the leaders of the church to face the facts. First, church colleges should make preparation of leaders in religious education. That should be one of the chief contributions and that is a chief reason why they exist. Second, we should have leadership and demonstration schools. Third, there should be established a system of education, standardized and supervised. We must make an effort to capture the men who are the natural leaders of the church.

Overheard at the Convention

There are quite a number of men who keep the Sabbath faithfully—and anything else they can get their hands on.

There are a great number of the good old ordinary common people in this convention that the Lord loves. It was quite noteworthy that the convention was not one of extremists or highbrows, but was one of mothers, of workers and liver and doers.

The mother had expected the entire family home for lunch, so in true Missouri style had prepared hot biscuits. But only one boy came home. The rest were kept at school, so he ate and ate biscuits until his mother said she feared he would burst. "Well, just give me another biscuit—and get out of the way." This shows the child attitude toward life.

Some hymns are great statements of faith. Paul and Silas sang. Martyrs have died singing great hymns.

We must try to get the dynamic into our church music; make it mean what it says.

Advice to public speakers: Stand up to be seen, speak up to be heard, shut up to be appreciated.—Daniel A. Poling.

There are at present sixteen expeditions in one department of research in the Arctic regions, to the jungle regions of South Africa, and digging in the foundations of cities, but the greatest adventure is the adventure of the Christian life.—Daniel A. Poling.

The difference between South America and North America is that South America was settled by men seeking gold; North America was settled by men who came to find God.—Daniel A. Poling.

Some one has said if a speaker ever ceases to be nervous before his speech he is losing his power. By that test I am about to make the most powerful speech of my life.—Bishop E. H. Hughes.

Herald Read in Every Home

In a late issue of the HERALD there appeared a letter from one of our good sisters expressing her profound regret that the HERALD is not more generally read. We join with her in this regret and have tried to do what we could to insure a wider reading, as the HERALD is the official organ of the church and hence the official means of communication by the general officers to the church. It is also an open forum for the discussion of our problems.

It may interest some of our readers to know that occasionally some one sends in an extra subscription for the HERALD for the benefit of worthy Saints. This fund is naturally small. We are anxious to make it as useful as possible, and enable those who want the HERALD, who will read it, and who are really worthy, but unable to subscribe, to have the privilege of access to its columns.

The Board of Publication cannot itself arrange for these free subscriptions for the simple reason that, if they attempt to do so, the expense would have to be charged against all of the other subscriptions, and the price therefor would have to be raised. They prefer to keep the price at a minimum and let those who are able pay more, if they choose, into this fund for the benefit of worthy church members who are not themselves able to subscribe.

This problem of providing for the worthy Saints is indeed one that belongs to the church, to the financial department of the church, rather than to the publishing house.

As we have emphasized before, the publishing house is anxious to reduce the cost of periodicals and will do so just as soon as the number of subscriptions will justify our doing so. The editorial work, the work of composition and proof reading, the work of make-up and putting it on the press, is just the same whether we publish eight thousand or twenty thousand copies.

We are glad to help in any way we can to see that the HERALD is received by all those who will appreciate it, but the problem of those who are able to subscribe and do not, who are not interested, and those who receive it and do not care to read, is beyond our power to answer. We can only hope for the support of the church also that the HERALD may so fulfill our needs that all will feel the necessity of receiving it and reading it, so that our slogan may be justified, "A HERALD read in every home."

On Threshold of Important Discoveries

An American who enjoys the friendship of leaders of thought both here and abroad was speaking of his recent visit to three of the world's greatest scientists.

I found all three of them in an attitude of reverent expectancy. They seemed almost afraid to put into words the possibilities that are throbbing through their minds. But, in effect, each one of the three said to me this: "Modern science is assuredly on the threshold of discoveries that will outclass everything that has gone before. Our instincts tell us that they are coming, and soon. Human life is going to be profoundly expanded and enriched."

The gentleman concluded his report with an illuminating sentence. "Each of these three great men warned me solemnly," he said, "not to quote him by name."

The thoughtful reader may well ponder for a moment. It is startling to be warned that we are stepping into a period when the most familiar aspects of our daily life are about to undergo vast and far-reaching change. What are these developments which scientists feel rather than see, and in whose impending presence they have a sense of almost religious awe? And why, when they have news of such importance to humanity, are they so reluctant to give voice to it?

The second question is the more readily answered of the two. Scientists have learned their lesson; they know how every new idea must beat its way into being against the cynicism and the sneers of the thoughtless. Can you blame them for not arraying themselves against the one greatest obstacle to human betterment—the total lack of imagination in ordinary men and women, the stolid inertia and smug self-satisfaction of the closed mind?

Robert Fulton ran afoul of that depressing refusal of humanity to have faith in its own possibilities of progress.

"When I was building my first steamboat the project was viewed by the public either with indifference or with contempt as a visionary scheme," he wrote. "The loud laugh often rose at my expense; the dry jest; the wise calculation of losses and expenditures; the dull but endless repetition of 'Fulton's Folly.' Never did a single encouraging remark, a bright hope, a warm wish cross my path."

Samuel Morse, working eagerly to perfect the telegraph, encountered the same deadening doubts and sneers. "Up to the autumn of 1837 my telegraph apparatus existed in so rude a form that I felt reluctance to have it seen," he confessed. "I had no wish to expose to ridicule the representative of so many hours of laborious thought."

Moral Conditions

In the statistics printed from time to time concerning the moral conditions in the country, the editors of the HERALD have no desire simply to set forth the facts of evil. To do that would accomplish but little good. To get people to realize the extent of the evil, would do comparatively little good unless people generally are aroused to the need of watching their own doorstep. It is not a question of some one else's son or daughter, but that we should watch and care for our own, and that we should inform ourselves with this end in view that we may give them real help in avoiding the danger which threatens.

It is with that purpose in view that we shall print very soon short items showing the conditions throughout the world, and America in particular. It seems a disgraceful thing to consider how low America ranks on account of the large number of divorces. We see scattered items which have not been verified, of two divorces to each three marriages, or of some city that for a year reports more divorces than marriages. It is quite refreshing, then, to pick up a paper and read, as we did once recently, that a certain city reported for the fourth time no divorces. That means that for four years there has not been even one divorce in that locality.

But on the other hand, there are several large cities having an extremely high percentage, as well as rural counties, in which the divorce evil is most prevalent.

Freedom is a good thing if not abused. The Lord gave us our free agency in the beginning, and it continues even until now, and will continue. But that free agency means responsibility, even though it be individual responsibility. The lessening restrictions in clothing have been followed by, at times, a seeming carelessness of deportment which is well expressed by a recent writer in the most striking heading, "Girls marked down cheap." He refers, of course, to those who do not consider their bodies the temples of the living God and who are careless, it may be, with small favors, or seemingly minor familiarities.

Success comes only to those who lead the life of endeavor.—Roosevelt.

Equality

By James F. Keir

"The establishing of this lofty condition means an evolution of our present economic system. We must not expect any mushroom developments."

There are three indispensable stones in the foundation of Zion—unity, righteousness, and equality. "And the Lord called his people Zion, because they were of one heart and mind [unity—J. F. K.], and dwelt in righteousness; and there was no poor among them [equality—J. F. K.]" None of these stones can be eliminated for each is a necessary concomitant of the other. They will develop concurrently.

Possibly under the prevailing conditions we should stress the need of unity. An effort to create it is the first step towards righteousness and equality. Unity is singleness of purpose in the direction of right. It means the doing of nothing that would delay or hinder the purposes of God. It requires that we shall sow the seeds of faith and confidence in God and in men, instead of the seeds of doubt and suspicion. It requires that we shall look for the good in others, and as weaknesses are manifest that we shall look charitably upon them. It means that "we shall stop talking where we stop knowing."

Unity can exist only in the life of the prayerful. Unity is an ideal of Christ. He prayed, "Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are." It cannot be preached into people any more than loyalty can. It must be the outcropping of an internal condition and a result of our attitude towards one another and towards God. In the ratio that unity exists, righteousness and equality will develop.

Equality a Necessity

In your temporal things you shall be equal, and this not grudgingly, otherwise the abundance of the manifestations of the Spirit shall be withheld.—Doctrine and Covenants 70: 3.

For if ye are not equal in earthly things, ye cannot be equal in obtaining heavenly things.—Doctrine and Covenants 77: 1.

We should not place a strained interpretation upon the texts which refer to equality. When we have the correct interpretation of any text, there will be complete harmony with every other text. The above quotations in regard to equality only stress its importance. There is not the slightest intimation that it can be worked out instantly or that it means an equal distribution of property, either in size or value.

Equality Defined

Before equality can be brought into existence we must have a common understanding as to what we mean when we talk about it. Otherwise, we will have confusion and discord. Equality, as defined by Webster, is "an agreement in quantity or degree as compared." From this definition it is obvious that we are not confined to quantity in order to determine whether things are equal, but it may be measured from several different standpoints.

For example: a pound of absorbent cotton is equal to a pound of brick—not in size, not in value, but in weight.

1 lb. cotton 60c

—EQUALS— 1 lb. brick 2c

Gospel Equality

What then shall be the basis upon which we shall determine gospel equality?

Shall it be value? No.

Shall it be size? No.

Gospel equality shall be measured in terms of needs and just wants, and shall be brought about by the law of stewardships.

When unity and righteousness prevail it will give you and me little concern whether Brother Brown's inheritance is 80 acres or 160 acres of land, or whether it is worth $10,000 or $20,000. The question which will concern us will be, "Is it adequate to provide amply for his needs?"

This was the plan by which they undertook to establish equality in Christ's time. Then, you will remember, they had all things common. This did not mean an equal distribution of wealth or property, as some have thought, but we read in Acts 4: 35, "distribution was made unto every man according as he had need." If the needs of one were greater than another the portion which he received as an inheritance would necessarily have been greater.

Brother A may be sick, nigh unto death, having no appetite and consuming practically no food. Do you think he would complain of inequality if one doing hard physical labor in the cold frosty air of winter would consume a large juicy steak? or would the healthy outdoor worker complain because he did not have the constant attention day and night of a trained nurse and a physician, with sick room necessities at hand, simply because Brother A is thus supplied?

The Family Pie

When the pie is cut it is quite customary for the grown-ups to have a larger portion than the six- or eight-year-old child. Wisdom commands this procedure. This is equality. It is according to their needs and just wants. But if there is not enough pie to go around, father would be supremely selfish to say, "Well, give me my portion and let the children go without." That would be inequality. But if all will reduce their portion commensurate with the supply we preserve equality.

Beware of Selfishness

Stewardship presents an opportunity to give and not to get. True it is that the purpose of stewardship is to help establish equality by helping those who need help. But the thing that moves us in our desire to be stewards should not be the wish to get.

The disposition to get without giving is selfishness and has no place in the religion of Christ. Selfishness is just as despicable in the poor as it is in the rich. The rich must learn to impart and produce. The poor must learn to produce and impart. There must be equality of effort in production, each contributing in proportion to his skill and strength.

Inheritances Equal

Inheritances are closely identified with the question of equality. The law provides that after paying our tithing we shall carefully husband the remaining nine tenths until we supply ourselves with our inheritance. This inheritance is to be of sufficient size or value, that the earnings from it will amply provide for our needs. We are speaking now of a steward who is managing an individual stewardship. Section 51: 1: "Appoint unto this people their portion [an inheritance] every man equal [not in size! not in value!] according to their families, according to their circumstances, and their wants and needs." For this he was to receive a deed, in fee simple, not gratis, but in return for its equivalent.

On the point of an inheritance being arranged according to needs, this agrees with section 42: "Every man shall be made accountable unto me, a steward over his own property [his inheritance], or that which he has received by consecration, inasmuch as is sufficient for himself and family."

(Doctrine and Covenants 58:7.) Martin Harris was told that he was "to be an example unto the church, in laying his money before the bishop of the church. And, also, this is a law unto every man that cometh unto this land [Zion] to receive an inheritance, and he shall do with his moneys according as the law directs." What then does the law direct? It directs that we shall—

1st. Pay one tenth of our increase.

2d. Provide ourselves with an inheritance from the nine tenths.

3d. Consecrate of our surplus.

In proof of this we cite the command given Martin Harris in Doctrine and Covenants 18:5; "Impart a portion of thy property; yea, even a part of thy lands, and all save the support of thy family." He was not to impart all but a portion. That which he imparted was his surplus; that which he retained was his inheritance and this was to be sufficient to provide for his family.

By this program equality will exist, because,

1st. The inheritance of all shall be alike. Not in value, not in size, but adequate to meet their needs.

2d. All shall be doing the same thing, i. e., consecrating of their surplus.

Killing Incentive

It would be fatal for this church ever to adopt a program that would kill initiative or destroy incentive. We are not living under Utopian conditions, nor are the hearts of all men filled with the love of God. We must deal with human nature as we find it. Our interpretation may sound harsh to some, but is it more so than that expressed by God himself? "By the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread all the days of thy life." "The idler shall not eat the bread of the laborer."

Stewardship is not a device by which we avoid labor or responsibility, but a plan by which we can better direct our efforts—"The idler shall have no place in Zion."

Men should be impressed with the fact that they must provide not only for their present needs but for their future as well. One of the strongest incentives operating in the lives of men is the desire to own sufficient to provide for themselves in a day when old age or ill health comes upon them. This certainly is a laudable ambition. We want to harness this ambition and say to such a man, We will help you to do that, but having done it, by the help of the consecrations of others, in turn you will consecrate of your surplus. We want you to do for society the thing that you want society to do for you.

Joy Killer

The idealist will say that we must supplant this selfish desire with love. That sounds nice, but we must start from where we are. If I am in Independence and want to go to Boston I cannot start from Chicago. I must start from where I am. We must deal with human nature as we find it and not from the standpoint of what we think it should be. Perfection will not be reached in a day, neither will equality.

Let us be practical. Kent, in his commentaries, page 329, says concerning equality, "A state of equality as to property is impossible to be maintained, for it is against nature; and if it could be reduced to practice, it would place the human race in a state of tasteless enjoyment and stupid inactivity, which would degrade the mind and destroy the happiness of social life."

Helping the Poor

Doling out charity as a method of reaching equality is a miserable way of helping the poor. The better way is to help them to help themselves. Give them tools with which to work. An expert carpenter could do only crude work with inadequate tools. Under the law of stewardship, those who are worthy, industrious, and willing may be aided by supplying the tools (capital, etc.) by which they may be able to give expression to their ability, that they might thus be able not only to care for their own needs, but to make their contributions to society.

No Economic Revolution

The establishing of this lofty condition means an evolution of our present economic system. We must not expect any mushroom developments. Great reforms take years for their accomplishment. We may have to begin in a small way and demonstrate, not only to the world but to our own people, that the plan is safe, sane, and conservative and that under it all people can be happy and prosperous.

But let us begin.

Opportunity is now open for individuals to conduct their business upon a stewardship basis, and as the plan develops they can be organized into associations and thus become a helping hand in establishing the divinely appointed social and economic ideal.

Past Associates in the Quorum of Twelve

By Gomer T. Griffiths

[Elder Griffiths gives a brief sketch of the eighteen men with whom he has been associated in the apostolic quorum, but who are not now members of that body. Thirteen of them have passed away; three are members of the order of patriarchs; two are members of the high priests' quorum. Elder Griffiths does not attempt to discuss any of the present members of the apostolate. He was assisted in the preparation of the article by Elder John W. Rushton.]

According to the promise made a little while ago the following reminiscences are offered to the readers of the HERALD. No doubt many will be interested in this intimate sketch of members of the apostolic quorum whose names have been familiar to the Saints of the Reorganization for many years.

The rapid passage of time soon crowds the present into the past and our eyes are always peering into the future, curious as to the coming events. It is well that we take pause, occasionally, and review the pathway along which we have traveled, considering the features which have made for success as well as those which may have hindered, and evaluate them in the light of history. Carlyle has said that the history of our race is the biography of great men, and we may surely say this of our church. Individual character can and does generate dynamic forces which deflect the current of events towards the ideal visioned: Character is the result of the reaction of the individual mind upon the group. The vantage point we have to-day as a church is a monument to the unflagging zeal, loyal devotion, many sacrifices, and strenuous labors of many whose names are almost forgotten, but who deserve to be enshrined in the affection of the church.

The rising generation cannot realize or appreciate with anything like accuracy the painful pilgrimage which these early pioneers have made in order to bring the church to its present state. In those days men had to labor with their own hands and supply the needs of their families as well as personal expenses in addition to carrying on their ministry, because the church was unable to supply the necessary remuneration as to-day. Neither were they fortunate to have educational facilities such as are common to all now. Of them it could be said without exaggeration, "Not many mighty, not many noble, not many wise were chosen," and God did put to confusion the wisdom of the world by inspiration displayed through those who were comparatively the babes and sucklings of their generation. However, the history of the early days of the church forms but one chapter of the romance of evangelization and is not unworthy to be included with the unfinished Acts of the Apostles.

Perhaps it will be of interest to recall that in the early days of the church, from 1835 to 1873, the apostles were called through a committee appointed sometimes by the president and sometimes by the general conference. Since 1873 the apostles have been called through the president of the church inspirationally and directly, and the names, together with the rest of the communication, were submitted to the several quorums and finally to the general conference for consideration and approval. This custom still prevails.

In my own experience it would seem I have been a sort of protege of the apostolic quorum, for when a child I was blessed by one of the first of the seven apostles of the Reorganized Church, James Blakeslee, who was the father of the late Bishop George A. Blakeslee. I was ordained to the office of priest by T. W. Smith, to the office of seventy by W. H. Kelley, and to the apostolic office by the late President Joseph Smith and W. H. Kelley; finally, to the presidency of the quorum by Joseph Smith, all of whom were apostles. My baptism and ordination were performed by Jeremiah Jeremiah, a well-known seventy. My ordination to the eldership was under the hands of Eli M. Wildermuth, who was another seventy well known for his services to the church.

Personnel of Early Quorum

When I entered the Quorum of Twelve April 13, 1887, its personnel consisted of the following brethren:

"JOINT COUNCIL" AT TIME OF ORDINATION OF G. T. GRIFFITHS TO APOSTOLATE

Joseph Smith, and W. W. Blair as counselor, constituted the First Presidency; G. A. Blakeslee, bishop, with Elijah Banta and E. L. Kelley as counselors, constituted the Presiding Bishopric; with the other eleven shown making up the Quorum of Twelve.

This picture and the ones which follow include all who have been members of the Quorum of Twelve in the Reorganization with Brother Griffiths.

1887-1909; Gomer T. Griffiths, 1887-, Heman C. Smith, 1888-1909.

With the exception of Edmund C. Briggs, all had been chosen by revelation through the president of the church. Brother Briggs, who had been occupying this position for many years, was distinguished as the only missionary which the Reorganized Church had in its beginning, and made a fine record because of his intrepid work in Utah in the days when Brigham Young was as autocratic and powerful as any earthly potentate could be. Our brother passed through many dangers, was subjected to many insults in the course of his eventful career as missionary, trying to win back to the ways of truth those who had been deceived. The success attending his work has been one of the outstanding features of the history of the Reorganization.

I have heard Brother Briggs recite several experiences in which he had personally communed with angels. One time when a young man, he was very weak because of continued sickness and his life despaired of; he was walking out in the yard one day when an angel appeared to him and made him the promise of restoration to health and strength, and told him that the Lord would raise him up and that he would accomplish a good work, living to a goodly age. How literally this promise was fulfilled is well known, for Brother Briggs made a very enviable record, and throughout his seventy-eight years was honored and respected as one of the most remarkable men who ever ministered for the church. Our brother had a very congenial temper and seemed to be entirely free from anything in the nature of jealousy of the brethren and always had an encouraging word for all those with whom he associated. Certainly these traits of character are worthy of emulation. In prayer and in exhorting the Saints he was very impressive and touched the hearts of his hearers because he had experience with God. It was my privilege to travel extensively with Brother Briggs, and my memory of his companionship is one of joy and pleasure.

In his early days he was a valiant preacher, and stories are told of his enthusiasm and ability in this respect, especially the length of his discourses. Our brother certainly made a reputation as a valren: Edmund C. Briggs, 1860-1902; John H. Lake, 1873-1902; Thomas W. Smith, 1873-1894; Alexander H. Smith, 1873-1897; William H. Kelley, 1873-1913; Joseph R. Lambert, 1873-1902; James Caffall, 1873-1902; James W. Gillen, 1887-1900; Joseph Luff, iant soldier of the cross while with the church militant, and earned the rest which is promised to the faithful in Christ Jesus.

William H. Kelley

William H. Kelley was the first named as an apostle in the revelation of 1873. My first meeting with this brother was at Gallands Grove Semianual General Conference in 1879. In those days Brother Kelley was in his zenith, a man of fine appearance, carrying himself with dignity, and at-

Some time was spent together in joint charge of various missions; and as a neighbor for many years I tested his sterling qualities and at no time found him wanting. In trial, bereavement, and discouragement our brother's large heart and deep sympathy were always available for comfort, support, and strength in ways which cannot be forgotten. He would readily divide his last cent with anyone in need and share the grief of those who were more unfortunate than himself without any hesitation or reserve. Brother Kelley had the gift of discernment in rich measure, and in his appraisal of a man seldom missed the mark. In council he was wise; his love for fair play and justice were the outstanding features of all his work. Brother Kelley for about fifteen years was president of the Quorum of Twelve and enjoyed the good will of his brethren until released from his duties in the quorum because of advancing age and infirmities. Our brother, who was born in 1841, passed on to his rest in 1915 after a severe and painful illness endured with characteristic fortitude and cheerfulness.

QUORUM OF TWELVE IN 1902

Thomas W. Smith

Thomas W. Smith, another of the group called to be apostles in 1873, stands out in my experience as being a most remarkable man of faith. He seemed to have implicit confidence in the promises of God. Nothing ever daunted him, and he accepted the situation, no matter what it was, without allowing his poise to be disturbed, believing steadfastly that God was both able and willing in the emergencies, and many are the testimonies which have been passed on as a sort of tradition, of the way in which God came to the rescue of our brother in times of stress and need.

He traveled extensively in the interests of the ministry was very fruitful and many converts were baptized into the church as a witness thereto.

While in Salt Lake City, Utah, he was stricken with paralysis and did not recover. He lingered several years, making his home in Independence, where he died in the year 1894. We would not omit mention of his wife, Helen, who shared the many toils, sacrifices, and services with her husband and won a name among the Saints in her own right which was equally honored with that of her husband.

James Caffall

James Caffall was the third of this group called to the quorum in 1873, and ranks as one of the best

THE QUORUM OF TWELVE IN 1915

church, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the extreme south of the United States to the north, and was missionary to the Society Islands, also Australia, and in all these places left a reputation which put him in the front rank as one of the most effective doctrinal preachers of his day. Brother Smith was a great student, and had the poetic temperament, as the several hymns which are still popular with congregations of to-day witness. He was a voluminous writer, contributing to the HERALD, as well as producing several tracts which bear witness of his ability in this particular. For several years he was the assistant secretary of the quorum. His councilors the quorum ever had. Though not as demonstrative or emotional as some, no man made greater sacrifices than did our brother in the interests of the church and for his fellow men. His high sense of honor, clear conscience, and regard for justice, which with him was a passion, made him a devoted friend as well as a loyal minister in the cause of Christ. Those who knew him will remember that economy was one of the special characteristics of our brother; his efforts to save money which in those days was not very plentiful in the church, are proverbial. He enjoyed walking, and many can remember this dear old man who would never be late for an appointment if it was humanly possible to fill it, how with long, swinging stride, cheery smile, and pleasant humming of a familiar hymn he marched. Not infrequently that hymn would be, "Lift your glad voices in triumph on high," which was his favorite, as he moved along the highway to the church or schoolhouse, as the case might be. Our brother belonged to that great class of pioneers through whom the Christian church in all ages has achieved its greatest victories; those humble sons of toil who in the experience of life learn the ways of God through assiduous study, hard work, and relentless experience. In spite of his many handicaps, Brother Caffall acquired a wide range of information, a very rich and varied vocabulary, and his ministerial work was productive of good wherever he labored.

Our brother spent much of his time in the western and midwestern States, also two years in the European mission, over which he presided with good results. Everywhere our brother went he won the confidence, respect, and esteem of the people. Throughout his long career he was very sensitive of his good name and personal honor, uncompromising in the right, working out his conclusions in his own mind, independently and fearlessly, and when they were reached he was fixed. He was a loyal friend and honorable foe, a sturdy warrior whose one aim was to "die in the harness."

Among the many stories which are told of Brother Caffall's ministry, perhaps one illustrates his character more effectively than any other. He had an appointment to preach in some country schoolhouse one day during a severe winter and reached the place in ample time to fire the stove, light the lamps, and arrange the room for service. The time arrived, but there was not a soul present but himself. Brother Caffall opened the meeting by singing a hymn, then prayed, read his lesson, delineated his text, and preached his sermon. A youngster of the neighborhood seeing the schoolhouse lighted up and hearing a noise, became curious and stole up to the door to see what was happening. He got a shock, and believing that the man was mad, ran to tell the people of the strange man in the schoolhouse who was preaching to himself. This of course aroused interest, and the next night the house was filled with people anxious to see the preacher who could enjoy his ministry in house devoid of congregation; whose eloquence was wasted on the wooden benches, paraffin oil lamps, and the stove. It is not too much to say that Brother Caffall would have died rather than be untrue to his duty.

He was born in England, 1825, and released from the Quorum of Twelve in 1902, at the age of seventy-seven, because of infirmity, and though selected as an evangelical minister, he declined the calling, but labored as a loyal and devoted minister until death smote him and he entered into rest in the year 1906.

John H. Lake

John H. Lake was one of the most spiritual men it has been my privilege to know, whose benign countenance, mild, kindly blue eyes, flowing beard, and silvery white hair made an indelible impression upon my mind. I always think of him as an old-time patriarch. As an apostle he carried with him the qualifications which made him very effective in the presentation of the work. His executive ability was manifested in the splendid control of fields over which he presided, and he won the support of his brethren by his kindly and fatherly disposition and considerateness of their needs, always putting them before his own. As a preacher, while not as deep as some of his brethren, he was very attractive and winsome in his style, and always held his congregations in close attention. In all the years of my acquaintance with him I never knew Brother Lake to bear malice or hold any grudge, but was forgiving and generous to any who may have offended him. Among old and young and all classes he was beloved and honored.

He labored as missionary in many fields, particularly in Canada, where even to this day he is remembered by many of those among whom he ministered. He was born in 1831 and died in 1913. He was transferred to the patriarchate in 1902. For many years Brother Lake resided in Kirtland, almost under the shadow of the Temple, and his remains lie in the little cemetery adjoining, awaiting the resurrection morn. His life's ministry is a rich contribution to the church, and he will always be remembered as one who did all the good he could. If there were any defects, they certainly were not intentional so far as he was concerned.

Alexander H. Smith

Alexander H. Smith was the fifth to be named in the revelation calling these men to the apostolic quorum. Brother Alexander was the younger brother of Brother Joseph Smith, and in my personal relationship with him I found him to be a true man, full of tender compassion, and always willing to help and sustain those who were weaker than himself. If rebuke were necessary, he was courageous enough to administer that rebuke, but always in kindness and dignity and in a manner which left behind no wound or scar. His services are still fresh in the memory of the church. His preaching was full of deep feeling and he won his way into the hearts of men because of his intense love for God and man. He was effective, not because of rhetoric and eloquence, but because of the devotion and tenderness which characterized all his work.

In 1897 Brother Smith was transferred from the Quorum of Twelve to the office of presiding patriarch, being the first one to fill that position in the history of the Reorganization. It was felt that Brother Smith was indeed the spiritual father of the church. He also served for five years as a counselor to his brother in the First Presidency, traveled considerably in the United States, and made a visit to the Australasian field in 1901-1902, at which time he was authorized to ordain Brother C. A. Butterworth an apostle.

The news of his sudden death was a great shock to the church at large, and generally the church mourned the loss of so godly a man. In the quorum our brother's counsel was always wise and deliberate, and though a man of peace he was not afraid to take his stand by what he conceived to be the right. His presidency of the quorum from 1886 to 1897 was marked by dignity and sympathy and he enjoyed the confidence and respect of his colleagues.

Joseph R. Lambert

Joseph R. Lambert is the last one named in the revelation of 1873 and is the only surviving member of that group. Though for many years he has been an invalid, more or less, suffering constantly, he has always done his duty and maintains his fealty to the cause to this day. Brother Lambert in his day of ministerial activity was esteemed as a natural orator. He was thoughtful, studious, and used his words with care. His delivery, though forceful and stern in emphasis, was always orderly and controlled. In debate he was searching and thorough, and his reasoning strictly in harmony with the canons of logic. In council his judgment was sound, and whether one agreed with him or not, his strength of purpose and clarity of mind and high moral tone always won admiration.

As already intimated, he was handicapped with uncertain health, and many times his work was performed at great inconvenience and no little distress to himself, but always he was patient and never shirked his duty. Brother Lambert has earned the good will and confidence of all who know him, and his ministry has contributed a chapter of no small value in fidelity, patience, and loyalty to the truth, and though now in the eventide of life, for our brother is seventy-seven years of age, his carriage is still upright, his step unflinching and straightforward, and when he speaks in testimony or preaching, which is all too seldom, his voice is still strong and resonant and carrying the old-time conviction which made him one of the giants of the cause.

Fourteen years went by before any others were called to occupy in the Quorum of Twelve. And in 1887 the following-named brethren were chosen to be apostles: James W. Gillen, Heman C. Smith, Joseph Luff, and Gomer T. Griffiths.

James W. Gillen

James W. Gillen, the first named, I remember meeting first in Syracuse, Ohio. He was quite a young boy, and it was during the closing days of the War of the Rebellion, but I distinctly remember accompanying him to a blackberry patch to secure a mess of berries. Our brother was preaching at the time, and though a young man, he was one of the first missionaries of the Reorganization.

As a preacher Brother Gillen's reputation is generally known. He was widely read, possessed a remarkable vocabulary, and his flowing eloquence was extraordinary; but his emotion was under the control of a very logical mind. In his ministry he spared not himself; his energy in his work was always an outstanding characteristic. He was a good traveling companion, made friends readily, and was very generous in his disposition.

He was among the first missionaries sent by the Reorganization to Utah, and had to tramp for many miles across desert and prairie until his feet would bleed, and he endured hardships such as few to-day can appreciate. He was also one of the early missionaries to Australia and afterwards was appointed to the British Mission in company with the writer. He suffered many privations, made constant sacrifices for the work, and one of his final words to the undersigned was, "The work is all right."

James Arthur Gillen, now occupying in the quorum, is a son of his.

Heman C. Smith

Heman C. Smith, whose name follows, was well known in the church for many years as one of the most able defenders of the cause. As a controversialist he was in the first rank, and many evidences of his prowess and ability are left to the church as a testimony of his worth, especially in writing the history of the church. He was one of the most effective opponents of the Mormon Church and has stood many times in defense of the truth in public debate against those who would besmirch and defame. Brother Heman was a speaker unusually fluent and logical. He knew the value of invective and could employ sarcasm, on occasion, with singular incisiveness. He was very thorough in his research and made his foundation secure before venturing a statement. He enjoyed an enviable reputation as a protagonist of the cause, and his sermons were appreciated because of their keen reason and delicate humor. As an apostle he traveled extensively in the United States, presided for some time over the European Mission, and in common with his brethren endured the hardships and sacrifices incidental to the ministerial career, and left a record which will endure as long as the church remains.

In the Quorum of Twelve Brother Smith served many years as secretary and was always keenly interested in the effectiveness and honor of the apostolate; and his influence in council, debate, and the framing of resolutions contributed to the effectiveness of the quorum influence in the church legislation. Owing to the increasing responsibility as historian of the church, which office he held in connection with his apostolate for several years, he was released from the quorum in 1909, in order to devote himself exclusively to this work. This position he held until 1919, when death claimed him following a brief illness. He had the confidence, respect, and love of the people throughout the church; and many friends out of the church, because of his ability and integrity, mourned his loss.

Brother Heman belonged to that class whom we are proud to refer to as representative of the peculiar qualities which the latter-day work has produced.

Joseph Luff

Joseph Luff, sometimes called the silver-tongued orator of the church, still survives and makes his home in Independence. He still is active in the work and his influence as a preacher undiminished; his renown extends to the utmost limits of the church, and his wonderful gifts, one of the traditions testifying to the power of God in the ministry of the church. Brother Luff is a Canadian and has labored in his native land as well as throughout the United States from the Pacific to the Atlantic, and has won the love and esteem of the people by his devotion to the cause, his rare eloquence, and fine sense of spiritual values, together with his unflagging zeal for the work, which he loves well, and has upheld brilliantly for many years. In 1909 Brother Luff was released because, in addition to the burden of his quorum, he had been called to occupy as the physician to the church. Always of a sensitive nature, his health never very robust, the draught upon him because of the duties as a physician as well as minister, seemed to bear heavily upon him. He was left free to devote himself to his work in ministering to the sick and distressed of body and mind.

While in the quorum Brother Luff was wise in council, skillful in voicing the desires of the body and formulating the expressions of opinions and principles. He was amiable in his companionship and generous in his associations, and carried a fund of anecdotes and reminiscences, together with the love of fun which was characteristic of him from his childhood days. The quorum missed in him an indefatigable worker and loyal supporter of the quorum prestige. But the church is still benefited by our brother, whose ministry, under the blessing of God, is still fruitful wherever he goes.

After another long interval, this time ten years, in 1897 three others were called to the apostolate: I. N. White, J. W. Wight, and R. C. Evans. Of these one filled the place made vacant by the death of T. W. Smith; one who was transferred to the patriarchate, A. H. Smith; and the third filled the quorum for the first time in the history of the Reorganization, which event was the occasion of much rejoicing throughout the church.

Isaac N. White

Isaac N. White still survives and is active as an evangelical minister in Independence. At the time of his ordination as an apostle, Brother White was well known as an energetic minister and successful debater. He was a spiritually minded man and his ministry was characterized by many gifts which enriched his testimony of God's goodness. In debate he met a number of noted men among the antagonistic churches, particularly the notorious Clark Braden. In his work as an apostle he was careful, wise in council. Among the brethren he was esteemed because of his kind and friendly attitude. Through failing health, resulting from his strenuous labors in the ministry, he was relieved from quorum responsibility in 1913. But in spite of his failing health Brother White has maintained his interest in the progress of the church, and his testimony to the truthfulness of the latter-day work and his faith in the final triumph of the cause is just as strong and uplifting as in days of yore.

John W. Wight

John W. Wight, from his boyhood days had been interested in church work, and in 1888, as a very young man, was selected in association with C. A. Butterworth to labor as missionary in Australia. His work in this mission was very successful. There he also found his wife, whom he brought with him on his return to his homeland. They made their home in Lamoni and reared their family to almost young manhood when she was taken by death and Brother Wight was left with his family of boys to mourn the loss of a faithful wife and noble companion. In 1902 Brother Wight, as an apostle, returned to the Antipodes as missionary in charge of that important field. As a preacher our brother was peculiarly deliberate in his delivery. He had a strong, resonant voice, which he used with fine control, and his emphasis was secured in an unusual way, by slow and heavy pronunciation of his words. He was very successful in his labors and brought many to a knowledge of the truth. In the quorum Brother Wight was sincere and loyal in the upholding of the apostolic dignity and influence, and in his association with men he was very just and possessed keen foresight in the conservation of the interests of the work and the integrity of his fellow ministers.

Brother Wight filled many important missions in the United States and Canada, making many friends and establishing the work in a number of places. Comparatively early his health began to fail, his heart developing disease. In 1913 he was relieved from the onerous duties of the quorum work and ordained an evangelical minister, in which office he served faithfully and effectively until his death on May 14, at Council Bluffs, Iowa. His call by death came suddenly, while engaged in some special services in that city. His sons, Leslie and Cyril, are engaged in church work following their father's footsteps, and no doubt, if faithful, will add luster to his name.

Richard C. Evans

Richard C. Evans was also a Canadian and one of the most popular ministers the Reorganization has ever had. Perhaps no man in the history of the church filled so large a place in the affection and imagination of the people. He was a unique character, slight in stature, though tending, in his later years, to corpulency, with a boyish countenance, ruddy complexion, and hair as black as a raven's wing. He had keen, magnetic eyes, and his general appearance was very attractive. He had a very musical voice and, in spite of many years of strenuous work on the public platform, it never seemed to lose its musical quality and always was pleasant to hear. Brother Evans was gifted with a rare eloquence, had a rich imagination, and was very dramatic in his presentation. He was not a scholar, nor deeply read, and his reasoning followed rather the emotional trend than the logical; but in spite of this he ranked as one of the most successful speakers in the church. For many years his ministry was most spectacular, numbers finding comfort and blessing through his work. He traveled extensively in the United States and spent some little time abroad in Great Britain, but the larger part of his work was performed in Canada, among his own people.

As he so often loved to tell, the church found him a barefooted, ignorant boy, selling newspapers on the street, but after his conversion and ordination to the ministry, his progress was meteorlike in the rapidity with which he moved into important and responsible positions. In 1902, after serving as an apostle for about five years, he was ordained second counselor in the First Presidency. In 1909 he was released from the Presidency and ordained a bishop and served in this office, always in Canada, until 1918. Unfortunately our brother, whose gifts and opportunities were so rare and full of promise, at about this date seemed to become the victim of ambition, vanity, and pride; and, because of his unwillingness to adjust himself to the will of the body, he withdrew from the church and for the few remaining years of his life he presented a sad spectacle of the depths to which one may descend after forsaking principle.

His many friends were filled with dismay and sadness and his apostasy made one of the most tragic losses the Reorganized Church has known. Brother Evans died after a brief illness early in 1921, leaving a wife and two children. Now, we desire to remember only his many good qualities, and forget the others which marred so wonderful a record. His career impresses the lesson of humility and the need of constant watching so that they who think they stand should take heed lest they fall.

Peter Anderson

Peter Anderson was called to occupy in the Quorum of Twelve in 1901. Our brother was a Dane by birth, but emigrated to the United States when a very young man and settled at Council Bluffs, Iowa. Soon after his arrival he obeyed the truth, and shortly after was ordained to the ministry and entered into the mission field. He labored considerably in Utah and spent much time in Missouri, but perhaps the work with which our brother is associated in the minds of the church people more than any other, is the Scandinavian Mission. He labored many years altogether in this important field, and his uncomplaining sacrifices, kind disposition, and quiet dignity won for him the friendship and confidence of all people. It is not too much to say that most likely the many hardships he endured as a missionary, especially in the foreign fields, contributed to his early breakdown in health and consequent death at a comparatively early age of sixty.

Brother Anderson was a man of sterling qualities, peaceful and sympathetic in his ways, and unswervingly loyal to what he believed to be the right. While not an emotional speaker, his preaching being an appeal to the reason and judgment rather than feelings, he was, nevertheless, a man of deep feeling. However, he carried these feelings deep in his own heart and seldom manifested them or allowed them to come to the surface. In quorum work he was not disposed to say much in debate and usually was unobtrusive, but when he did discuss any matter he showed careful thought and wide consideration of the various angles and features involved and in sound judgment presented his conclusions in a manner which impressed his hearers and not infrequently changed the course of the sentiment. Brother Anderson was released from the Quorum of Twelve in the year 1920 because of failing health, and early in June, 1920, he died suddenly at his own home. The Quorum of Twelve mourned the loss of so faithful and honorable a man, and the church was made the poorer in the loss of a minister whose honor, devotion, and loyalty were monumental. He leaves a wife and several children to mourn his death and many pay tribute to his memory.

Frederick A. Smith

Frederick A. Smith was ordained an apostle in 1902, and almost immediately was elected as assistant secretary and shortly afterwards, when Heman C. Smith resigned this position, was elected to succeed him, which position in the quorum he held until 1913 when, owing to the demise of his father, our brother was chosen to occupy in the office as the presiding patriarch, which he still holds. Brother Smith is well known throughout the church and his sound counsel is highly appreciated, as it always was by his brethren in the quorum. In all his associations with the brethren he showed consideration and care. His work as secretary bears testimony to his thoughtfulness, neatness, and ability. While regretting his removal from the quorum in which he had occupied so ably for many years, we felt that the church was gaining in a wider sense and fuller measure, because of his assuming the duties of the spiritual father to the church. Brother Smith, with his family, resides in Independence, and his influence as a minister is very highly appreciated, for as a preacher his message is characterized by piety, spiritual insight, and he seeks to bring his congregation into closer touch with God and cultivate a deepening spiritual life.

Francis M. Sheehy

Francis M. Sheehy was also called to the apostolate in 1902, and released in 1920 because of failing health. Brother Sheehy has been an active worker in the church for over forty years, occupying many positions of trust during that time. He has always been esteemed as one of the most capable ministers the church has. As a preacher he is of a philosophic mind, has a well balanced vocabulary, and is eloquent in delivery. He was considered one of the most effective platform men in the church during his active ministry. In the quorum his counsel had good effect, because it was based on judgment and controlled by logical processes. Brother Sheehy had a very genial disposition and a fund of happy wit, which made him a general favorite both in his social life and in public ministry. Early in his ministerial work he made the Book of Mormon a subject of special study and for years has been a member of the committee on American archæology, and still is rendering valuable service in this department of the work. The removal of Brother Sheehy from the quorum was a matter of regret to the brethren who had been associated with him many years and esteemed him very highly for his good nature, ability, and high-class qualifications. We trust that his declining years may be filled with happiness, and in the continuation of his ministry satisfaction of soul may reward his services.

James E. Kelley

James E. Kelley was born in 1879, entered the Quorum of Twelve in 1913, was a son of W. H. Kelley who in this same year was retired from the apostolate. This event of son succeeding father in the same office at the same time is unusual in the history of the church. Unfortunately our brother was a victim of disease, and all the time his ministry was conducted under serious handicaps caused by sickness and consequent distress. June 10, 1917, after a long and heroic struggle against tuberculosis, our brother died at Las Vegas, New Mexico, at the early age of thirty-eight years. Brother Kelley's ministry was characterized by spirituality. He possessed a very keen and logical mind, and like his father had an impassioned style of oratory. In all his associations he was friendly, and lovable in disposition. He had a deep sense of justice, was a good counselor, and carried with him a sense of his responsibilities as one of the apostolic quorum. While mourning his early demise, it was consoling to know that he was prepared for his entrance into rest. His wife and three children, besides a host of relatives and friends, mourned his departure.

William Aylor

William Aylor was ordained an apostle in 1913. Previous thereto he had been especially well known as a successful missionary in the Southern States. He was highly appreciated because he was very sympathetic and kind, but very sensitive. Brother Aylor had been denied, in his early youth, the education desired, and had won his way as a result of persistent toil and had made himself efficient in his ministry in spite of these handicaps. Many converts to the church bear testimony to the effectiveness of the work which, under the blessing of God, he was able to do. Brother Aylor resigned from the quorum in 1921, but is still with the church and resides in Independence. The brethren of the quorum regret the loss of his companionship and the support which he had given in the councils and sessions while associated with them. We trust that the future may still provide ways and means for the employment of the gifts and talents which God has given to him, so that many still may be blessed under his ministrations.

This concludes our review of some of my associations with the men who have been conspicuous in the apostolic work of the church since my own entrance into the quorum, thirty-five years ago; and in looking over reminiscences of these years, so filled with many experiences pleasing and painful, bright and drear, I rejoice that it has been my privilege to be associated with men of such excellent character, indomitable courage, loyal devotion, readiness to sacrifice to the utmost limits in order to carry the cause forward to victory. Though all of them possessed their individual characteristics and most of them were high-tempered, strong in their individual convictions, neither asking for nor giving quarter in the battle for what they maintained to be principle, they were always ready in true humility to admit their mistakes and ask for forgiveness, and maintain the peace and good will of the whole. It is impossible for me correctly to evaluate the results of these associations upon my own life, but I gratefully acknowledge that under the blessing of God they have helped more than I have the ability to compute, in the molding of my character, the aligning of my judgment, the strengthening of my faith, and the qualifying of myself for the service which I have been able to give. The years of my life are rapidly coming to a close, but I rejoice in the testimony which has been enriched in the passing years of the never-failing goodness of God, his continuous fulfillment of the promises he has made, and in all the ways of life he has never left nor forsaken those who put their trust in him.

Whatever state this church may develop, whatever will be the character and qualifications of those who, in the coming years, shall be successors to apostolic dignity, position, and prestige, I feel sure that the foundations laid by men whose names are herein recorded, together with the others who have labored with them, will stand the test of time and prove to be capable of sustaining the superstructure which shall be built.

This little appreciation constitutes but another chapter in the history of the church through which the power of God in these days has been demonstrated, and I hope it may prove that those of whom I have written as well as those who in years to come will write of their predecessors, shall continue the addenda to this work in such a way that none shall be ashamed of any act, or word, or effect which grows out of the ministry of the apostolate of the Church of Jesus Christ.

The most certain sign of wisdom is a continued cheerfulness.—Montaigne.

In order to insure proper care and operation of automobiles, a large number of men in Saint Louis have been organized as vigilantes. They wear no outward mark, nor do they attempt independently to enforce the law. They merely report to the chief of police daily any disobedience of traffic regulations which they have noted. In the majority of cases a written explanation is asked for.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

"Come, Follow Me"

The man who is really worth while always has something to do. He is never long out of a job. When he changes, it is for the better. He is always wanted in a place higher up. The street corner loafer is not selected because he is free to go to work, but the man who is already making good. Jesus called men who were already busy to follow him. They left their business to accept the position "higher up." Peter and Andrew were "casting a net into the sea"; James and John, the sons of Zebedee, were "mending their nets"; Matthew was receiving custom at the customhouse when Jesus "called" them. (See Matthew 4:18; Luke 5; Mark 1:16.) Christ called men who were busy, who were doing things.

The church to-day needs just such men. It needs men who already are busy—who are making good. Its call is to them. Following is the call issued for the next year's class in religious education issued by President Smith:

The work being done at Graceland College by the group of young men and women preparing for church work holds so much promise for the good of the church and its work that it appears wise to issue a call for another class to enter Graceland College next fall. The preparation will be not alone for foreign service, but for domestic as well, the ratio to be determined after the applications are in, showing the material available for the next course. It is expected that the course next year will be extended to two years and will articulate with the university course for those who wish to go on.

The great demand for qualified workers requires speeding up in preparation. This course carried on in Graceland will include:

1. A thorough study of the doctrine and beliefs of the church and methods of presenting them.
2. The language, history, geography, customs, etc., of the foreign country to which the missionary is to be sent, or courses in American political history, political science, economics, or sociology, for those expecting to do local work, with particular reference to the problems of Zion.
3. Certain academic studies to meet the needs of individual students, including philosophy and education.
4. Elementary sanitation, hygiene, first aid, simple nursing, etc.
5. Recreational leadership, Scouting, Oriole and Temple Builder work.
6. Sunday school, Religio, and women's work.
7. Other incidental subjects closely related to the work to be accomplished.

The selection of the young people to make this preparation is highly important. The qualifications of those selected must be such as to assure the highest degree of success possible. These will include:

1. Consecration and call to the work of the church and intense interest in the welfare of the church and the prosecution of its work.

LETTERS AND NEWS

Independence

Refreshing rains have cheered the hearts of all and insured good crops. Wheat harvest is about over and yield promises are good. June was an unusually dry month, and therefore gardens were affected considerably, but main crops well cultivated have come through very well.

A committee of the city council, on which is Church Architect Henry C. Smith, are working on a zoning plan, which it is hoped will prevent the encroachment on residence districts of business houses, and in various ways allow for intelligent control of the situations which make or mar a city's growth. Traffic regulations are made necessary also by the enormous number of autos in use. Streets adequate for heavy vehicle traffic twenty years ago are now crowded lanes, fraught with danger.

The quarterly conference of Zion meets on the evening of the 3d to elect delegates to the coming General Conference and conventions. Pastors of the churches in Zion are to nominate lists from each community, and superintendents of Sunday schools are to likewise bring in lists from the schools as nominations for the convention. These are subject to ratification of the conference.

An item in these notes a few weeks ago probably gave some wrong impressions. At the annual convention of the Sunday schools in Zion Albert L. Sanford was reelected as su-

2. The necessary education and general intelligence; a high school education or its equivalent. Systematic reading courses and travel experiences function as developers of intelligence.

3. Not over thirty years of age, with general good health and physical fitness.

Those desiring to enter the course should apply at once by writing to the president of Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa. From those applying selections will be made by the general church authorities for admission to the course.

Since the establishment of this course, many of the conference appointees and church workers have spoken to me about young people qualified for the course. Such should write to President George N. Briggs, of the college, so application blanks can be forwarded.

Owing to the present financial situation, those applying who are not under missionary appointment should be prepared to finance themselves. Enrollment carries no guarantee of mission appointment, but does offer an opportunity for preparation for service in any field that may later open up.

This work of preparation for church service is highly important, and all interested in the progress of the church work should assist in securing a group of workers in the course whose qualifications are exceptionally good. Those who have taken the courses thus far deeply feel the responsibility and importance of the work, and are earnestly working to meet the divine approbation; and the standard for next year's class must be raised rather than lowered.

May God bless our efforts.

pervisory superintendent of all the schools, in addition to his duties as superintendent of the Stone Church school. Two new offices were created in the election of E. D. Moore and Glaud Smith, superintendents at Second Independence and Walnut Park, respectively, as associates in this superintendency. The convention was acting in the same role as district or stake conventions where such organizations exist.

The sacrament service at the Stone Church was marked by three manifestations of the Spirit, giving encouragement and exhorting to better observance of the Sabbath. Elbert A. Smith addressed the problems meeting at 2.30 p. m. and Walter W. Smith preached on the lawn at 8.

The new band, of about thirty pieces, directed by Roy Turner, plays excellently and greatly supplements the evening meetings. Good attendance is the rule.

The radio sermon Sunday morning was by Walter W. Smith, with vocal solos by George Anway. The time has been changed to ten o'clock Sunday mornings, music beginning at that time and the sermon about 10.30. Those with receiving sets may tune in at 360 meters. Good speakers are being arranged for and the apparatus working fine. Listen for the Central Radio announcements.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium during the week ending July 1: Mrs. Lottie Rabe, Wellington, Missouri; Miss Elsie Lewis, Oak Grove, Missouri; Mr. W. H. Prewit, Ashville, North Carolina; Mrs. Bertha L. Day, Cameron, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Mrs. O. T. Carl, Mrs. Dora Willis, Mrs. Hattie McNeil, Masters Edward and Robert Wayne Curtis, Charles Marion Williams, Mrs. W. C. Harvey, Master Donald Smith, Master Alma D. Fairbanks, and Mrs. A. M. Sherman and Baby Sherman. X-ray patients: E. A. Porter, Blue Springs, Missouri; and D. B. Williams, Baby Swope, Sam Randel, and E. G. Haberlein, of Independence.

Another attempt is to be made Sunday morning at 10.30 (July 9) to get a photograph of all children under four for publication in the Kansas City Journal. Also a motion picture film will be taken for use all over the country. Assemble at Temple Lot.

Kansas City Stake

The special meetings conducted at Mount Washington by Amos T. Higdon, came to a close Sunday night. Four were baptized, friends made for the cause, and the Saints strengthened by the effort. Brother Higdon will commence a series of meetings at Argentine on Tuesday evening, June 27.

Apostle James A. Gillen was the speaker at the Argentine church Sunday evening to a capacity audience. He formerly was pastor there for a number of years. They have just finished decorating their building inside and out, laying walks and steps as well.

The Chelsea church reports four baptisms Sunday and Central one.

The Sunday afternoon monthly meetings were held as usual at Central Church, activities being priesthood and elders' quorums and Women's Department meeting. The latter was addressed by Doctor E. C. White, of the Jackson County Medical Association; subject, “Natal and prenatal influences.” A number of crippled boys from the Masonic home, with their teacher, Sister Tyra Lloyd, furnished three musical numbers for the occasion, all of which were well received.

The Women's Department has its campaign under full swing covering the Stake preparatory to their class work which starts again in September. This is according to a schedule already made and which appointments are filled by two workers endeavoring to normalize all parts of their work before that time. They recently held a baby clinic at the Second Church, under the direction of Sister Moats, assisted by Sister Esther Meyers. Sixteen babies were registered, weighed, measured, and diet prescribed. The City Child Welfare Board gladly sent physicians and trained assistants to these clinics, they being vitally interested in this work.

Elder Charles May has been enlisted in our missionary force and at present is conducting a series of special tent meetings at the new Heathwood mission, near Twelfth Avenue, Kansas City, Kansas. Four have been baptized so far.

Elder Ralph W. Farrell is also one of our missionary force, and we are expecting something good to report from his labors ere long.

The Northeast Church reports two baptized recently. They also have a class in Young People's Church History. Elder E. A. Curtis has occupied the sacred desk, his wife favoring them with her singing in the recent past.

Elder James A. Gillen was the speaker at Malvern Hill the evening of the 11th. This is the acceptable time of the year for outdoor services. Where there is a lawn large enough, twilight meetings may be conducted with advantage, as those not of our faith may be able to hear. At Malvern Hill where F. J. Cleveland is conducting Sunday evening services, the stereopticon lantern was used to good effect, autos and pedestrians lining the street on both sides, thus demonstrating this new departure effective in the gospel service.

At the stake Sunday school convention, held at Central on June 25 and 26, four sessions were held, including a business meeting. E. D. Moore, general secretary, and A. Max Carmichael, general superintendent, addressed the convention at 2 p. m. and 7.45 on themes of vital importance. At 4.30 Sister W. O. Hands conducted a round table where the merits of handwork for the younger grades were discussed, the important part of which was that it could be carried to extremes if the whole session was devoted to it. The instructor should be qualified to teach a gospel lesson in other ways, too.

At the business session Brother Fred Cool, recently from Holden Stake, was elected superintendent, and Ray Lloyd, assistant.

LEXINGTON. As a result of the coal strike a number of the Saints have left Lexington, some to find employment and some to visit. The effect is seen in reducing the attendance at the services; however, the regular services are being held in the church, and the mission at Summit is being continued.

Elder W. S. Macrae, of the stake presidency, was with us recently and preached two excellent sermons which were appreciated by the Saints. There have been two additions by baptism recently, Sister Anna LeChurch and Peter Vasquez. These are young people and will be helpful in the work. Brother Vasquez is a good violinist and for some time has been a faithful member of the local orchestra.

Elder Myron F. Beebe, sr., who has been visiting his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Harmon Beebe, has delivered several lectures on experiences in the church fifty years ago. These have been very much appreciated.

BATES CITY. June 11 being Children's Day, our little church was nicely decorated with flowers, and the exercises passed off very pleasantly. There was a short program by the children, followed by a talk to the children by Brother George W. Beebe, of Holden. At eleven o'clock Brother Scarciff spoke to the officers and teachers on their responsibility and necessity for proper preparation for their work. Brother V. E. Bowers, of Holden, was also with us and assisted in the service. At one o'clock three children were baptized by Brother Mark Ford, and confirmed at the two o'clock service by Brethren Scarciff and Beebe. Those baptized were Evelyn Bailey, Windle Van Tuyl, and Steve Smothers.

On June 18 Brother Mark Ford made his first effort in dispensing the bread of life. He took for his text Mark 4: 28. His words showed an earnest preparation of his subject. It is very encouraging to see the newly ordained men moving out so willingly in the discharge of their duty.

We see promise of our long-hoped-for orchestra. Brother James Ford with his cornet and Floyd Ballinger and Wayne Smith with their violins add much to the music at our Sunday school and we hope other numbers will be added soon.

HOLDEN. The extent of a morally uplifting force cannot be determined until it has grown out of the heart into the material world. Through this manner of reasoning, will we have to wait to determine the amount of good accomplished in the week's services conducted by Elder Roy S. Budd under the auspices of the young people. Brother Budd's sermons were of the character-construction type and will bear abundant fruit if heeded. Although these services were held in June, a very busy month, the attendance was excellent, Brother Budd holding a splendid interest up to the last.

On Wednesday, June 28, the stake tent was dedicated and launched on its mission of salvation, Brother W. S. Macrae preaching the opening sermon. The tent is located in Greenwood, where J. W. A. Bailey, who is in charge of it, had a fine interest last year. Five auto loads went from Holden, and a number of others from Lees Summit and Pleasant Hill. Brother Bailey is a fine tent worker, and large results are anticipated through his efforts.

The Nephite Records

This office has on hand a few copies of the Book of Mormon as issued by the Church of Christ (Whitmerites), bearing date of 1899, entitled, "The Nephite Records." It is printed from the Palmyra edition, which edition was printed from the original manuscript. Book collectors will be interested in securing one of these volumes, since so far as we know there are no other copies of this edition to be had except second-hand copies in book stores. While they last they will be sold at a dollar each, postpaid.

New Reunion Program Material

The new dramatic presentation of a vital idea by Margret Davis, entitled, "Opportunity of the Sunday school," is just off the press. It is especially appropriate for reunion, requiring but few characters and having a simple setting. Sunday schools can ordinarily supply all the characters from one school and put on the entire program in from 30 to 45 minutes. Copies on sale at this office at 10 cents each, 90 cents a dozen. A dozen is a preferable number for the average cast to use in memorizing parts. It is not too late now for most of the reunion program committees to plan for this.

Pastoral Notices

To the Priesthood and Members of the Clinton District: Having been made your choice for district president by your action at the recent conference, I hereby appeal to you one and all to make a special effort for the advancement of the work of righteousness in every branch, and in every locality where you may reside. Because of the financial condition of the church and the release of so many of the ministry, it is necessary that we do this. And I know that all will be blessed in the effort.

Having voluntarily accepted a release from general church appointment, and taking upon myself the support of my family, I cannot give the personal attention to the district work that I was formerly able to give, and much of my work will have to be done by correspondence, though it is quite possible that considerable time may be spent in the district in following my vocation, and this will give opportunity to come in close touch with you and the needs of the work. This is an extra burden which I have consented to accept under existing circumstances with a desire to still do something for the Master's cause, and I sincerely ask for the cooperation of all—both ministry and laity.

I will endeavor to be in attendance at the reunion and the conferences, and respond to calls demanding special attention.

In addition to the quarterly report, will be glad to receive communications from each branch president relative to local conditions and needs of the branch.

My address is 400 East Fourth Street, Holden, Missouri.
Your brother and fellow laborer, H. E. MOLER.

Our Duty as Citizens

It is our duty as citizens to take our individual share in primary, general election, and caucus, in court and elsewhere, in order to maintain the principles of the law and of morals.

It does but little good to maintain a political ring and then complain because of the manner in which our laws are administered. At present in many States primaries are being held or are about to be held. It is of no less importance that every citizen vote in the primaries than it is that they all vote in the election itself. It is also important that able men should be willing to accept the responsibility and even the disagreeable burdens of civic service.

It is at times necessary to enter the caucus. We should do so as citizens and individuals and members of the community but maintain our high ideals as Christians in our own personal behavior and conduct. Of course there is also the danger that when we interest ourselves in politics we may be recipients of criticism and, at times, malicious attack and our motives be called in question. But if the men and women of America are going to clean up the moral conditions, if we are to have the best government of which we are capable, we must interest ourselves in politics and see that good men are chosen. This includes work in the caucus, in the primaries, as well as in the general election.

It then becomes our duty to continue our political efforts, not confine them to a few months every few years, but to assist our officers in the enforcement of the laws. When we know of laws being broken in any way, it is our duty to inform the proper officers and to assist them. There are conditions even when a citizen is justified in making an arrest to prevent a breach of peace, to retain an escaping villain, though care must at times be exercised that in doing so we do not become members of an affray. It is, however, the duty of all good citizens to assist the officers in the execution of the law, to give information of the violation of the laws, and to go to court for testifying in order to protect the community against malefactors.

We do not urge that confinement be the remedy. In many cases the right remedy would be rather the proper treatment medically for the cure of an affliction. There is still a need, and a great need, in the administration of the crime that the punishment not only fit the crime but also the offender.

It is not an agreeable task to uphold the law. When one moves forward he is liable to be threatened by those who are brought to the bar of justice. We note several reports of this in a Chicago paper. We have noted it in our experience in Independence. It is also a disagreeable task to appear in court and undergo at times a brutal cross examination by members of the bar who consider it their privilege to do everything possible to secure the freedom of their client without regard to social or moral responsibility and who are not concerned as to the integrity of the methods utilized.

But when the good citizens, when the church members, are ready to do their duty and will persistently do it, not only at the polls but in court, in public meetings, and in an active way, with Christian lawyers in the bar association, these wrong conditions not only can but will be corrected.

We note a recent item that the moral censor of Chicago has been unable to accomplish much because of lack of support by church members. As to the reasons in that particular case we are not sufficiently advised to make comment, but the principle still remains unchanged. It will take a decided effort to clean up and keep clean some of our large cities so that they are safe dwelling places for our young people.

In this connection we are pleased to receive the Ohio State Journal of June 15 with a picture of Chief Harry E. French across two columns, and under it the following comment:

Of course you've all noticed the fine spirit with which the whole police department is doing its work, and you've seen how snappy traffic officers perform their duty, as though it is a pleasure instead of a task. Then, too, Columbus has won a reputation for the suppression of crime, especially when it comes to bank robbers and hold-up activities. There's a reason for the efficiency of the police department, which is strong despite its small numbers, the reason resting in the personality and ability of Chief French. All of which gives 'our town' the distinction of having the best chief of police in the country.

We may be pardoned for taking a little personal pride in the fact that Chief French is a high priest in the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. He has demonstrated that a man can be clean not only in politics but in the police department, and that where the police are rightly supported by their superior officers they can be depended upon to do their duty. Naturally a measure of this credit is due to the police commissioners who have appointed and who have sustained Chief French. Naturally a measure of the credit is due to the ministers of the churches and the citizens of Columbus, Ohio. Such results cannot be accomplished by one man no matter how able or how honest he may be.

The Cross in Christian Service

Summary of speech on personal evangelism, by Bishop E. H. Hughes, of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

When men passed the cross where Jesus hung they mocked him and said, "He saved others; himself he cannot save." That, according to Bishop E. H. Hughes, is literally true. He could not save himself in a lower sense and still save mankind in the higher sense. We cannot save the wandering children of the world in the higher sense if we save ourselves in the lower sense.

More and more as I grow older, continued Bishop Hughes, do I realize that the cross is the greatest thing in our religion. Those that have lost faith in the cross lose the power to send forth missionaries.

Likewise, in the individual man who discounts the doctrine of the cross, for Jesus said to the men following him superficially, "If any man will be my disciple let him deny himself, take up his cross, and follow me."

If a man desires to become a farmer he must take up his cross and follow agriculture, which means getting up in the summer at four or five o'clock in the morning and working hard till sundown. The same is true of commerce and of manufacturing. The war gave us an example of the vicarious suffering for others. But that doctrine of the cross comes to its highest expression in the field of evangelism.

A few years ago there was a laymen missionary movement. They came to San Francisco and held a big banquet at the prewar price of $4 a plate. There were four speakers—three laymen and one preacher. They were good Christians but took the attitude that preachers were puppet idealists, that business men were now going to take charge and put in efficiency. When it came my turn, I told them frankly on behalf of the preachers that the world is not going to be redeemed by a four-dollar-a-plate banquet at the Palace Hotel, nor by $42 worth of cut flowers, nor cleaned with linen napkins and a big feast. If the world is going to be redeemed, every one of you must climb your little calvary. We cannot redeem the world until we get down to the basis of sacrifice and bear our own cross.

Not many of us are equal to bearing the cross down through the years of training the present child. In starting out on this program of religious education for children we are not starting a merry jaunt; we will find our calvary before we close.

Some, in talking of the old revival seem to think that all that was done was to open a church, announce revival services, then everybody came and the revival was all organized. But that was not true. My father was a preacher, and I know he preached not ten days or two weeks but ten weeks, seventeen weeks, and twenty-two weeks until the whole community was shaken from center to circumference. God pity the church in the United States of America when it wipes Pentecost and Antioch out of its history. But Pentecost and Antioch are also born from the agony of Gethsemane and Calvary.

It is hard to go to an individual and approach him on the subject of religion. It is hard to preach a sermon to many, but much harder to approach a certain type of man and preach a sermon to an audience of one.

Have you ever rung a doorbell and looked a man in the eye and said, "I have come for a straight talk with you about Jesus Christ"? I hope while we are emphasizing the religious education of children, we will not drop out the conversion of adults.

An old New Englander over seventy had held his pew for fifty years. The New Englander is a great steadier of the ark of God, even if he does bring an asbestos blanket to keep from catching fire. After eight years I sat down and wrote this man a letter. There was a calvary on every page and a heartbreak in every sentence for me. He met me the next day but said nothing about the letter. Later I walked up the street and rang his door bell and said, "I have come to have a talk with you on religion." I would have given $50 cash if I could have conscientiously avoided the responsibility of ringing that doorbell. I stayed two hours and had him on his knees before I left. When I left that place several years later he showed me my letter in his wallet. He had carried it with him everywhere. He somehow could not come in through the door of revivalism, yet in fifty years I was the only one that had ever put the question of religion squarely before him. Even as we need a revival of public evangelism do we need a revival of private evangelism everywhere.

Employee Benefit Agreement at Publishing House

For some time Manager G. S. Trowbridge has been investigating various insurance methods for providing protection against loss by employees by sickness, disability, or death of employees of the Herald Publishing House at Independence. Employer's liability insurance has been in effect for some time, covering indemnity or disability or death due to accident while on duty, but the new provisions go further.

Having been indorsed by the Board of Publication, propositions were submitted to the employees recently and unanimously acceded to, going into effect July 1.

Under the new plan any employee who has been in service of the publishing house for six consecutive months or over is entitled to participate.

The fund is provided by payments from the employees in amounts ranging from five cents to twenty-five cents a week, according to salaries received, the balance required to be made up by the publishing house. These very nominal payments are sufficient on the basis of the large number participating and agree with the general average observed by insurance companies in general.

Sick benefits are provided for a period of ten weeks at half pay. Employees are required only to submit written statement of inability to perform their duties. Most insurance companies require that the patient be under the care of a physician and bring a certificate from him, which in many instances requires more expenditures than receipts in order to receive benefit from the insurance.

In case of death or total disability from any cause not covered by the indemnity insurance during term of employment, beneficiaries of the employee are entitled to receive an amount equal to his salary for a period of one year, payable monthly.

The plan has many advantages and is in keeping with the modern tendency among institutions to care not only for the outward necessities of the employee but in endeavoring to provide for the unexpected and the unavoidable.

No hardship is imposed by the small payments asked for, yet the total of the small payments will likely provide a fund nearly ample for all needs. Thereby not only the person involved is protected, but the church through its publishing house is not required to do for anyone that which he is able to do for himself.

Then the scale of payments being in accordance with wages paid seems more just than the cold proposition of the oldest person having to pay double and treble that of the younger people.

Pending the time when actual stewardships may be assigned and participated in, this is evidently a good expedient.

Why Teach Evolution

A convenient and plausible hypothesis but not established as a matter of certain natural laws.

We were recently asked, Why do we have professors at our college who teach or accept evolution?

In the first place the evolutionary theory in its various forms takes so large a part in the intellectual life of the Nation that we must have men who at least understand some of its fundamental principles if we are to reach the people of to-day. To talk with them we must be able to at least understand their language.

In the second place it is hardly possible to secure a textbook on scientific subjects which is not written from that point of view.

In the third place, it is not possible to secure professors who do not know something about the subject and who are not more or less imbued therewith.

In the fourth place, it would not be desirable to have professors who do not know anything about the subject even if such could be secured.

We want and need men and women who are lovers of truth, who are open minded and willing to receive truth wherever found. So far as evolution is concerned we need men who will practice open mindedness even toward such a subject until the truth is known.

As to the evolution of inorganic and organic things, this is a question of fact. What is the evidence? We have indicated heretofore that the evidence is by no means beyond the shadow of a doubt and that in fact it is rather a convenient and plausible hypothesis but is not established as a matter of certain natural law as ordinarily supposed. On the other hand, it is quite evident that evolution in the sense of an unfolding of that which is first involuted is a principle of truth, and applies even in the gospel sense, since "it does not appear what we shall be like, but this we know, that when he comes we shall be like him."

Finally, in our own college our young people receive their necessary training under the most favorable conditions that we know of any place, and under the influence of men of the church of God who are not fearful of considering fairly and frankly all that may be presented on any subject. S. A. B.

Eighty-five per cent of the church members come from the Sunday school, according to Samuel D. Price.

Near East Relief

One feature of recent meetings at Kansas City was the motion pictures on Near East Relief. It is quite a different proposition to see these pictures taken on the grounds of living, moving people, not staged, but taken just as conditions were found, than simply to read a newspaper account. Even the pictures in the magazines are not so convincing of the grave need in the Near East to prevent starvation.

The Near East includes Asia Minor, Armenia, Syria, the Holy Land, and also a portion of Mesopotamia. It is glorious to see the children who, on a small quantity of bread, with proper care in the various orphanages and children's homes, have gained strength. They receive medical and hygienic attention, are trained for work and given time for play as well as being fed. They are dressed well in old and cast-off clothing and in the sacks in which the flour was sent over. It is a little amusing to see them with the letters still on some sacks, "Eventually, why not now?"

But it is tragic to see the children outside hammering on the door, begging to get in, when there is no room to care for them.

It reminds us again that we are in fact rich as a people compared to the conditions existing there. Recently an appeal was made for money to procure seed wheat with which to sow the fields. With proper seed they may be able to produce a crop this year that will do much to better conditions next year.

It is no wonder that the scenes depicted would arouse the anger of men like W. O. Thompson, the president of the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education, anger also that as a people and as a Government we will continue to do so little, but leave such lands under the absolute control of the Turk.

But it also should arouse us with a desire to do something to help those who are now suffering.

Another Way to Help the Church

A brother in the Far West Stake has sent to the Presiding Bishop $3,500 worth of Government bonds with the privilege to sell them and to loan the funds to the church. The Bishop was able to dispose of them at something over par value, and the church will pay him 5 per cent on this amount. The brother therefore draws a better return of interest; and the church is saved from having to pay some bank 7 per cent or more.

It may be that there are a great many Saints who would be willing to do the same thing, who have funds which they are saving to take care of themselves in their old age or who have bought Government bonds and who would be glad to help the church as did this brother in Far West Stake.

Authority of Articles in the Herald

We were recently asked if we approved of all the articles printed in the HERALD but not in The Forum. The editors have attempted to make this clear in a recent editorial that we do not consider the HERALD as our personal periodical. We do not agree with every article that is printed outside of The Forum, and there are articles printed in The Forum which appeal very strongly to the editors.

We might paraphrase the notice printed in the American Bar Association Journal concerning signed articles, and apply it to the HERALD:

As one object [of this journal] is to afford a forum for the free expression of the members . . . on matters of importance, and as the widest range of opinion is necessary in order that different aspects of such matters may be presented, the editors of this journal assume no responsibility for the opinions in signed articles, except to the extent of expressing the view, by the fact of publication, that the subject treated is one which merits attention.

It is our purpose to make the HERALD of the largest possible usefulness to the church, and we have always that criterion in view.

Coronation

Some of our readers have objected to the use of the word died, and some have found some substitute equally unsatisfactory.

We note the use by the International Sunday School Association of the term used above. They gave the pictures of leading Sunday school officials who had died during the four years, but with it simply the word crowned. They did not print the pictures with black borders or with any sign of mourning, but rather with a laurel leaf and the word crowned. They then stated, "We are giving here with those who have passed away during the past quadrennium in the order of their coronation."

It is pleasing to note this open recognition of the fact that they have passed to a newness of life.

The necessity of adequate classrooms is being recognized more and more. Already one Baptist church has been erected in Kansas City which they state has sixty-seven classrooms besides an assembly hall. An effort is being made in some of our Sunday schools to approximate this as nearly as possible with our present buildings, trying to use numerous curtains or other temporary partitions.

What Is Sin?

By John W. Rushton

Sermon at the Stone Church, Independence, Missouri, April 23, 1922. Reported by Howard W. Harder.

At the time a demoniac was brought to him, blind and deaf, and he cured him and the dumb man could see and speak and crowds of people were all filled with amazement and said, Can this be the son of David? The Pharisees heard it and said, This fellow only expels demons by the power of Beelzebub, the prince of demons. Knowing their thoughts Jesus said unto them, Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation and every city or house in which there is internal strife will be brought low, and if Satan is expelling Satan he has begun to make war on himself. Now therefore, shall his kingdom last? And if it is by Beelzebub's power that I expel the demon, by whose power do your disciples expel them? They therefore shall be your judges, but if it is by the power of the Spirit of God that I expel the demons, it is evident that the kingdom of God has come upon you. Again how can anyone enter the house of a strong man and carry off his goods unless first of all he binds the strong man, then he will ransack his house.—The 12th chapter of the Gospel of Saint Matthew, 22d to 29th verses inclusive, Weymouth Version.

"This fellow"—three times in the New Testament this term is employed and always as a term of contempt. Of whom is this word spoken? The One who, "altogether lovely," moved among men and women in their streets and along their highways and went about "doing good," and of whom there came no foul rumor welling up from the little village in which he was born and reared. Of him no word could be spoken justly by way of condemnation, whose very look was benign, his every word charged with sympathy and every act electric with life-giving power. It is of this Man who spake as never man did speak, whose actions were those of God himself, the aroma of whose life has come down to us through the centuries and saturates our present civilization with every fragrance which men hold sweet and dear and sacred. It is of him this contemptuous phrase is used.

The occasion was when he had relieved an unfortunate victim of some congenital disease; which even the common people realized was an incarnation of the Devil himself, and by the gracious touch of his healing hand and the sympathetic word of his loving spirit the victim had been relieved—and they said, "This fellow casteth out devils by the power of Beelzebub." Another occasion was when driven from the judgment hall to the place of execution the rabble gathered around him and the voice of the cultured priesthood was raised against him in condemnation and they said, "This fellow said he could destroy the temple in three days and build it again." And he opened not his mouth. The last time was when he hung on the cross on the summit of Golgotha, a thief on either side of him. In the anguish of his soul he cried out, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me." And under the pressure of pain he said, "I thirst, give me to drink." Again they said, "This fellow saved others, himself he cannot save."

Who spoke these words? It was not the voice of the man in the street. It was not the condemnation of ignorance. It was not the sarcasm of those who were poor and in want or the simple. It did not come from the social outcast, but it came from the scholars, from the circles of religion, from the cloisters of the church and temple. It was the voice of the priesthood of the day. "This fellow!" These men, who gathering around their little systems, glued their bleared eyes upon the perpendicular pronoun, and when they lifted up their eyes they could not see the vision of the altogether lovely, the Rose of Sharon, but they saw "this fellow," the bastard son of Mary, this fellow who seeks to occupy the throne of Cæsar. This fellow! Away with him! Crucify him! We have no king but Cæsar. Give us Barabbas. Crucify him!

In this brief review you have the genesis, the development, and the perfection of sin, which is my subject to-night.

My brethren, there is no fouler manifestation of the depth to which sin may drag the human soul down than to be in the presence of the altogether lovely and see the manifestation of evil, to be in the presence of sanctified purity and blast it with the withering scorn of vice. There is no manifestation of devolution that reaches and plumbs the depths as this inability to appreciate the revelation of truth, the incarnation of cleanliness of mind and healthful, socialized virtue, which can treat that in terms of unutterable contempt. When this condition is reached, death reigns over a barren waste and the breath of God is helpless to woo it into the beauty and grace of the lovely landscape. It has been blighted by the breath of hell. I say once more in this you have the revelation of the genesis, the development, and the perfection of sin.

Irreverence

The psychology of sin begins with irreverence. I could not help but think as I sat enjoying the spectacle to which the president of this meeting called our attention, how gladdened must be the heart of every father and every mother who may have a child upon this platform engaged in the beautifying and enriching of this service by the melodious voices of innocent childhood, by the display of talent which in its early stages gives promise of greater and nobler things. If there should be whispered any word of warning of impending evil that may snatch the ideal of mothers and fathers away, how they would resent with indignation such an approach and such a word of prophecy or warning as the case may be. And yet the churches of the time think more of the spectacular conversion of an adult steeped in the lethal rivers of sin than they do of the education of the body and soul of the adolescent child. Here is the province of God. Here is the untrodden field into which the Almighty may drop the seeds of grace that never shall be marred or withered or blasted by the power of inward sin, that shall make the child under such an influence impervious to the attack and approach of all the wily and external influences of vice. No wonder we rejoice that we have reached the day when men and women of vision believe that education in religion must save the world, economically, spiritually, and morally from a bankruptcy from which we may never recover.

And in these days of social reconstruction I want to remind you that the burden resting upon us is not that we shall save the adult, but our investment is here that we can teach these little ones to respond to the wooing of the divine Spirit as we train them to respond to the baton of the director and the chord of the instrumentalist. And we have reached the time when I may venture to say that though we may lose the glamor of the spectacular revival service in which we may count the adults' conversion to the message by scores or hundreds, it is an economical miracle that God may work who shall give to us a childhood and a youth uncontaminated by the guilt of sin, charged with spiritual experiences to go forward and cultivate the provinces of moral and of spiritual idealism opening up before them.

That is the reason I am going to talk to you about sin. When I discuss education in this life I discuss education with the full spiritual meaning and content of the Old and of the New Testament with the full meaning of the definition given to us by ancient philosophy as well as of modern pedagogy. I refer to "the fear of the Lord which is the fountain of life." I refer to the beginning of an "education which is the awakening of the sense of wonder according to Aristotle." I refer to an education which in the language of Wordsworth is the life which we "live because of admiration and of hope and of love." I refer to that of which Carlyle speaks when he says: "Does not every practical man feel that he himself is made higher by doing reverence to that which is really above him? Irreverence for a holy thing is the raw material of our crime, of our vice, of our wickedness, and of our sin. Whenever there can be the soul of man in the presence of that which is clean and pure and true and good and yet that soul, bathed in the light of the vision splendid, is unmoved with the reverence for that thing, there is a possibility and a potentiality of every sin that may shake and stain the race. In the late war the tragedy was this, that the most cultured nation, the nation which had organized the forces of education, of science and of philosophy in a manner that never had been done in all the history of the race, began their crusade, their accursed baptism of fire by ignoring the centuries long reverence for womanhood and defiling the temples of religion and despoiling the inheritances of the poor. It was no wonder that in spite of their initial victories they were reserved for a baptism of damnation such as has never heaped upon any other nation before or since. Whenever men lose their reverence for that which is holy and sacred, a prophet of God is not able to tell the extent of the devolution of such souls.

Sin begins in irreverence. When men lose their reverence for that which is sanctified, holy, true, and good, only the Devil may state the limit of the possibilities to which they may descend. I should like to pause there long enough to connect that with the intimation made in the morning sermon. For this which I have said is the germinal power that makes it possible for such conditions to exist suggested by the pastor of this congregation. And the solution, the only solution of the evil under which we groan is in the revival of the spirit of reverence for that which is holy and that which is good. And the place to begin is here in this province of God, the province of the unspoiled soul—plastic, romantic, miraculous in its promise of coming achievement.

It is said of Paul Jean Richter, and said by Carlyle of him, that whenever Paul Jean Richter spoke of his mother he always spoke of her indirectly, but in terms of such reverence that you might have thought he was speaking of God and treading the threshold of heaven.

What a double responsibility rests upon the fathers and mothers as they try to teach the little children in this chorus before me. The responsibility of cultivating in the heart and soul of every one of these children a reverence for the holy thing, and secondly, and infinitely greater, the cultivation of those qualities in themselves which will command and win the reverence of every son and daughter for themselves.

The curse of our present age is the indifference and carelessness exhibited towards our social responsibilities. For sin when developed to its final expression of enormity means nothing short of desocialization. When any man becomes desocialized, his value is gone as an asset and he burdens the book of life as a deficit—a debt on the book of God, he shames God who made him and becomes a challenge to his infinite power. The same heart that tells you in the voice and sentiment of unutterable defeat as you gaze upon your child as he now is, blighted in sin, tells you in the same terms what God must feel as he looks upon the blasted image of himself in every sinful man and every sinful woman. If this church is going to make Zion out of the material which has been brought to us from various lands and various climes, holding within themselves the nurture and the culture of the passing centuries of the races they belong to, the raw material of this ideal culture is in reverence and it must become our foundation as a people in this endeavor.

Lust—the Perversion of Passion

What do we mean when we speak of sin? James, the brother of the Lord, tells us what he believes sin to consist of: "But when a man is tempted it is his own passions that carry him away and then the passion conceives and brings forth sin and passion becomes the parent of sin, and sin when it is fully matured brings forth death."

In our King James translation of the Bible the word passion is translated lust, but in its academic translation of the Greek text that word is passion. There is nothing wrong essentially or primarily in passion, but when passion is uncontrolled and takes the throne of dominion and makes the intelligence and the will power victims, then passion becomes a miasma, poisoning the soul and bringing forth sin. And when sin is fully matured death reigns over waste of soul. Only the echoes of the dead world respond to the voice of God who calls, "Where art thou?"

To passion we owe our gratitude for the most sublime things we have in our experience. The splendid reach of the musician's magic is the incarnation of the soul's passion. The miracle in the transformation of the pigment and raw materials of the artist's studio is born of passion and becomes the highway of this majestic evolution. In all the ways of commerce and of industry and of science and of politics, the passion for right, the passion for justice, the passion for the truth, becomes the dynamic power producing this marvelous display.

We have no fault to find with passion. Indeed we are told by those who belong to the school of psychology that the urgent drive of passion leads a man to heaven as well as drives him to the lowest hell. If passion controlled by reason and by will power is harnessed to the task of everyday life, sublimated forms of beauty and of grandeur and of greatness arise. It then becomes the greatest asset of the race. If without that power of control and subjugation to the intelligence and the will, it becomes the corrup-ing influence, poisoning the fountain of life at its very source and like a foul stench it covers the entire landscape with the corruption of death.

God Forsakenness

What is sin? There are so many definitions of sin that I believe the multitude of definitions tends toward confusion. I shall therefore take the liberty of calling your attention to the essential meaning of sin, without drawing you into the realm of theology. I shall direct your attention directly to the psychology of this thing.

As a church we are concerned with sin. It is the point of attack. As long as sin remains, that sin is the challenge to the power of the church. As long as a single man remains whose image of God within him is marred and spoiled by the influence of sin, the church has neglected or failed in her duty. It is therefore one of our primary businesses to understand the element that would seek to overcome the influences of spiritual power within the church. It is our business to understand its genesis, the various ways of working, and the foul manifestations through which it approaches us in order that our specific may be applied with intelligence and effectiveness and finally bring the triumph of the church in the redemption of this world as the kingdom of God. I say, therefore, that sin logically, irresistibly, irrevocably, issues in a state of God-forsakenness. Let me repeat that, the issues of sin logically, irresistibly, irrevocably are God-forsakenness. Its beginning is the rebellion of the soul against God, and when it is finished it is the consciousness that I am forsaken by the God against whom I rebelled.

Take the illustration given to us in the record of Jesus Christ of whom we spoke at the beginning tonight, when as the Lamb of God he took upon himself "the sin of the world." It was when he approached Calvary and finally entered into the jaws of death that upon his shoulders there rested the burden of sin. "He, who knew no sin," became identified with man in all his sin and under the burden of sin the Son of God cried out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

Enthronement of Self

The genesis of sin is the enthronement of self and abandonment of God by the soul. Its completion is to be God-forsaken, and the consciousness of a God-forsaken and a God-abandoned soul is hell. Do you wonder that in approaching this question, backed up as I am by the possibilities behind me, that I want to drive it into our hearts and souls to-night that in dealing with sin we are dealing with more than theological fanaticism. We are dealing with more than the story of an ecclesiastical development. We are dealing with a psychic power that can destroy the consciousness of God in human life.

Sin is the alienation of God from my life by choice. Hell is the consciousness that my choice has made it impossible for God to approach me and therefore that state of existence in which the soul is conscious of being God-abandoned.

Social sin, I repeat, is the dethronement of the spiritual ideals. It is the enthronement of the carnal animalistic passion. It is the turning of my back upon the divine image and upon the vision splendid of spiritual possibility. It is the consorting with that which is beneath me and unworthy of the best that is within me. It is the flirting with those powers and influences which are not on speaking terms with the best within my soul and my consciousness. As with Lucifer, the son of the morning, when he said, "I and I only will do this," in the enthronement of the "I" to the exclusion of God, you have all the dramatic influences which make the splendid drama of Isaiah's poetry possible, for the tragedy in heaven which lost one third of its inhabitants arose out of the enthronement of self and the dethronement of God.

To bring the matter to something like a psychical application, sin is the measure of the disparity between what I know myself to be and what I know God wants me to be. Sin is the measure of the distance that exists between myself as I am and what God wants me to be, revealed in Jesus Christ; for Christ is the humanization of God's will and purpose in and for me, and every man owes it to God to be as Jesus Christ is and was in thought and word and deed. Sin is the measure of the distance between what I know myself to be and what I know Jesus Christ was. I do not care whether you measure that by inches or by miles or by continents or by universes. When you have done your figuring and performed your arithmetical calculation the result of your figuring is the measure of your sin. So if God says, "I want you to be baptized by immersion in water for the remission of your sins," and you say, "No, sir, I don't want anything to do with it," if there is nothing else wrong with you, that is the difference between what God wants you to be and what you are, and it is the measure of your sin.

Mr. Campbell, who is the author of New Theology and for many years a most brilliant member of the Congregational Church in Great Britain and who finally finished up by becoming a vicar of the Episcopalian Church in London, said, "Sin simply is the absence of God." That is what our Christian Scientists believe. I believe that. Sin is the voluntary and deliberate cancellation and negation of God within me, but it of course has a positive as well as a negative manifestation. Sin is the cancelling and negating of God in my life. Of course it is the absence of God, but more than this.

Impairs Judgment

Now let me try to show you how sin works its way in our particular life and in our judgment. One of the wisest sayings of the Buddhist religion is this, "Continued sin impairs judgment and the impaired judgment sins continually." Isn't that right? Such is the condition of man that persistent aversion to goodness will develop into imperviousness to goodness. "The penalty," said Socrates, "of the unjust man is that he becomes still more unjust." Then—and in order to show you that I have not forgotten my Bible—turn to the 22d chapter of the book of Revelation and hear this. The time will come when the word of God will go forward. God's voice will reverberate around the earth and the message will be this: "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; he that is filthy, let him be filthy still. He that is righteous, let him become still more righteous, he that is holy, let him become still more holy."—Revelation 22: 11.

The tendency of sin is always impairment of the judgment. The judgment which is impaired sins continuously and I have no happiness except in the correspondence with a world which I myself have created.

In the discussion of that perennial problem, the sin against the Holy Ghost, it is only fair to say that I do not profess to know what it is. I believe the potential sin against the Holy Ghost is every sin that we may commit. Every sin which I may commit is the potential sin against the Holy Ghost this way: for sinning against the Holy Ghost is the persistent contempt for and violation of the witness of God within me. Psychologically, that which is continually resisted becomes moribund; in other words it dies. That which is continually resisted dies. That which I continually refuse to correspond with finally becomes as if it were not; and for me it ceases to exist. Esau sought earnestly for a place of repentance, but found it not, because he could not forgive himself.

There comes a time in your life, my brother, my sister, when your persistent rebellion against God, persistent flouting of your spiritual idealism within your own being, the persistent cancellation of God in your own life issues in the inability to recognize God when he is near, and you say, "This fellow"—and behold the altogether lovely is passing before you. You say, "This fellow," and the fragrance of the Rose of Sharon thrills the air with its fragrant perfume. You say, "This fellow," and the shadow of the great rock in the desert land covers your soul.

"Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God."

Persistent rejection of the overtures of mercy ends finally in the incapacity to interpret, to identify, and to appreciate. Notice how that works out. In our Bible we have this verse, "Whatsoever is not of faith, is sin." Now that does not mean that you are a sinner because you don't believe everything that everybody presents to you. Faith is an intellectual process which demands an intellectual justification, for faith is the rational inference from accepted truth. Accepted truth means experiential knowledge of the fact, and when I have had experience with a fact that experience becomes a part of my life. It is myself, and every time I do that which is a violation of the rational inference from my experience of truth I contradict myself, and that is just as suicidal as to take a gun and blow out my brains, for it is the negation of the essential self.

Let us take one of the statements of Paul again, "We have all sinned and come short of the glory of God." The glory of God means the ripeness of divine character. Sin is identifiable with a failure to rise up to an approximation of the high mark of my calling, revealed in Christ Jesus. It is the measure of the difference between what I am and the revelation of the divine character. Paul said, "We have all sinned and come short of the glory of God." To come short of the ripened character of God is sin.

Incompatibility With God.

May I say this in the language of one of the most intellectual men the Church of England ever had, R. C. Moberly, "The whole progress of sin is progressive alienation from God and the climax of such progressive alienation is that essential incompatibility with God which we call hell."

A term frequently used in the divorce courts—and there are seventy thousand divorces each year in the United States—is "incompatibility of temperament." Sin is that. Sin is the progressive alienation of myself in love and judgment and will from God, and I progress until I become incompatible with God and God becomes incompatible with me, and when we have reached the stage that finally it is impossible to be reconciled with God—that is hell.

You don't need to wait until you die to go to hell. Hell is incompatibility between myself—my soul and God. "Nothing is more necessary for man's damnation than that man himself should be left by God altogether to himself."

Now in the light of what I have tried to say, May I not repeat, with at least the force of logic and the power of philosophy and the splendid marshaling of human experience, that every sin no matter how trivial it may be, no matter how insignificant it may appear, every sin has the possibilities of this damnation—hell—of which these writers speak. Let us not delude ourselves that we can desocialize ourselves in crime, in vice, in wickedness, and in sin, and yet unless we do some strange, indefinable, mysterious thing that is called the sin against the Holy Ghost there is still hope that there will be glory for me. May God wake us up from that sort of innocent slumber and restore us to at least a logical understanding of cause and effect.

My dear friends, here is the way this thing worked out. I read not long ago of a little tragedy called, "The promise of May," and the hero of the tragedy was a young man called Edgar. He had taken advantage of the innocent love of a young girl. After the betrayer had left her and had thought that she was dead, in order to atone for his sin, he proposed in terms of affection to the oldest sister and complacently awaited the answer to his petition, thinking by doing this he could atone for the wrong he had done her sister. He was mistaken. The girl he had wronged was not dead and when she heard the expressions of love in the same terms with which she had been familiar, the slumbering mind was awakened and she called "Edgar," and her soul passed out into the night. But now in the tragical death of the girl he had wronged there loomed up before him the sin of which he was guilty and he knew himself to be the villain and the rogue he was. There was no atonement for that sort of sin. You cannot make a sin to be as though it had not been.

Our sins pursue us constantly. Not very long ago I saw a very fine thing presented by one of the most famous actors in this country. I saw the devolution that could overcome a man because of the surrender of high ideals in consorting with animalism and low-born, unrestrained passion. And this man who had once been a giant among his fellows and had schooled one of his little companions to be his understudy, met one of these voluptuous women who drink the nectar from the soul of man and sucked him like a vampire. Then under the process of her influence he lost his reverence for holy things, and went down and down into the depths of bestiality, forsaking his mission and abandoning the shrine of the holy calling as a public leader. In one of the scenes he met the man whom he had trained to be his understudy. When these two men met, the man who had once been the nation's hero and the other, the life that once had been in the soul of the victim of unrestrained passion for a moment revived and he said to this man, "I hate you, I hate you with all my soul, for you are now the man I once was." The Nemesis of the soul will dog your footsteps until like Lady Macbeth the sense of your guilt will rise and you will say, "All the perfumes cannot wash away the stains of blood from my hands." And with Macbeth you will say, "If I put these hands into the green sea they will pollute the ocean of God." Your sins will arise like some dead face upon the quiet pool and the moonlight of memory will drive you into the depths of unspeakable remorse. I repeat—every sin is potentially the sin against the Holy Ghost.

I want to say in conclusion I have tracked briefly and altogether far too hurriedly the dreadful trail of the serpent which begins its career in the irreverence so characteristic of our materialistic age, that is altogether unmoved by the innocence of a child, untouched by the miracle of procreation, that stands in the presence of divine art and can sing no song of thanksgiving and can look upon the glory of chaste womanhood and pursue the victim until chastity has been ground into the mud and the victim becomes the monument of an unspeakable despair. This is the menace of our day.

It is said that when Leonardo da Vinci was painting that picture called, "The Last Supper," he had great difficulty in finding the man who could sit for the part of Saint John the divine. At last he found him and he painted his picture. The years passed by until he reached the time when he had to put in the figure of Judas Iscariot. He searched all over Europe; he went into the slums and purlieus of every great city, but his search was unrewarded. Finally one day in his native city he went down into one of the wine cellars, into one of the lowest dives of the place, and there observing and scanning the figures that came and went, he finally selected a man who looked to be the very incarnation of hellish intrigue; and for a few coins he purchased the man's services. During the process of painting the picture of this arch traitor, he discussed this man's fall, and imagine his surprise when he learned that his Judas Iscariot had once been his John the beloved apostle!

May God grant that we shall not underestimate the guilt of sin. That we shall keep these little ones in reverence for that which is sweet and clean and true, and from out of the raw material of the spiritual possessions build up a generation of the sons and daughters of God, and as we stand in divine presence shall be able to say, These are my jewels.

The four great forces against the keeping of the Lord's Day are motion pictures, the sporting group, the American Amusement Association, and certain Seventh-day Adventists and Jews. It is evident that if they can have the Sunday laws set aside there will be no common day of rest and of worship. There will be no Sabbath Day. There is needed today a good Sunday law for California and Oregon, the only two States that do not have a Sunday law, and for the District of Columbia.

The 1922 Christmas Offering for Foreign Missions

By Benjamin R. McGuire, Presiding Bishop

The Columbus (Ohio) Sunday school has caught the spirit to a commendable degree. During the first five months of the year over $200 has been raised. When you learn that their offering for 1921 was $275 and the year before $240, you can appreciate all the more the zeal and consecration manifested.

On Mothers' Day the women's class started a "Dollar Day" movement for "missionary work" which by vote was extended to the entire school over a period of three Sundays. The result was that $71.50 was added to the 1922 Christmas offering for foreign missions. These people are not rich, but they were willing to sacrifice. Moved by the same spirit of consecration, you and I could do the same as they have done.

Our representatives in foreign lands tell us times were never better for the spread of the gospel abroad. "In the day of their peace they esteemed lightly my counsel; but in the day of their trouble of necessity they feel after me." This truth from a latter-day revelation is quite applicable.

Who can say that a dollar spent now will not be as productive as five dollars spent five years hence?

True, when men and women are hungry or their children starving for bread, preaching alone will not suffice. But a bad condition is made tolerable when the heart is filled with hope. Christ, the mighty Healer, brings peace to the troubled soul, a peace that surpasses understanding. The angel message of 1820 carries hope and peace to any heart that is open to receive it. The field has been prepared for the harvest.

It has been estimated that $100 will maintain a foreign missionary and his wife for one month. This should provide them with food, shelter, and clothing, as well as the missionary's traveling and incidental expenses. Can your school support a missionary for one month? three months? Wouldn't it be fine if each district in the church could take care of a missionary and his wife for one whole year? Each one who contributes to the 1922 Christmas offering becomes a missionary helper. "Keep the home fires burning" and the missionary spirit alive in our hearts, and God's peace be with you is our earnest prayer.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.

Robert Raikes established Sunday schools in order to take the children off the street, according to an article in the Kansas City Star. He secured good women to teach them reading and the church catechism.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

Are You Ready?

When just a boy, Abraham Lincoln said, "I will study and prepare myself, and when the opportunity comes I will be ready." In the "long, long thoughts" of boyhood, Lincoln already visioned the work of Lincoln the man. Already he felt that indefinable something which caused him to know he must make ready. Already he knew the call for service, and he knew he must be prepared. He could never have stood the strain required of the man who should cement our Nation had he failed to heed that beckoning call. When the crisis came he was ready.

In our late war the slogan was "Preparedness." That war caught us unawares. There suddenly came to us the piercing call to wage battle. In the white-hot heat of war there was no mistaking that call. We made ready.

Last week there was published an appealing call for men and women to prepare for ministerial service. Out of the present social and religious upheaval that call comes with a piercing note. The battle of sin and immorality is at white heat. The opportunity is here. The call is insistent. The church needs you. You are willing, of course. But are you ready?

This preparation can best be made by devoting a period of intensive study to the essentials of a religious education course such as the general officers of this church and the faculty of Graceland College have outlined for those enrolled. The "call" has come to you. The church has made ready the college and the course.

The faculty will be glad to receive you and assist in every possible way to prepare you to meet your responsibility. The decision is for you. Will you heed the "call" or postpone action until it is too late?

The Facts About Prohibition

The fight for a sober nation, according to Wayne B. Wheeler, attorney for the Anti-saloon League, has reached the point the army reached when the armistice was signed. The troops thought they could quit at once. A colored officer ordered his men, "Boys, you must speed up," to which the reply was made by one Rastus: "I'se done. I 'listed for the war and the war is over and I'se going back to Alabam."

"Rastus, you did not enlist for the war; you enlisted for the duration of the war. The war is over, but the duration has just begun."

Despite the increase in crime last year, arrests for drunkenness were reduced a little over 50 per cent. Even opponents of the cause admit a decrease of consumption of 70 per cent.

Prohibition has helped industrial life, decreased accidents, increased industrial wealth. There has been a decrease of 85 per cent in homes that were broken up or kept on charity by drinking. The Salvation Army have given up drunkards' day because of so few drunkards. From now on they will give more attention to the cradle and less to the grave.

The law must be enforced. There are thirty-seven wet organizations working to prevent the enforcement of the amendment. They wished to repeal the amendment and allow each State to handle its own individual problems, which, of course, is equivalent to repealing the amendment. To repeal the Volstead Act and allow sale of beer and wine—that is their immediate objective.

Of 121 men renominated for Congress, despite the bitter attacks and their assertion that they would defeat every man who has stood for prohibition, only one man who stood right has been defeated, while in three districts men who stood against prohibition have been defeated by three good men.

They tell us that labor wants beer and wine. In the 33d district (Pennsylvania) in which is the steel corporation plant, the Westinghouse plant—distinctly a labor district—the wets raised thousands of dollars and thought they would make a test there. The Anti-saloon League slogan was, "Lawbreakers should not be lawmakers." The present Congressman, who is a prohibitionist, was renominated 3 to 1 by the Republicans. The Democratic candidate, who was for prohibition, was also nominated 3 to 1. In another instance in which they made a strong fight, the wet candidate polled only 5 per cent of the vote.

In an international sense, little Iceland voted for prohibition but was told that she must repeal her prohibition law or starve. That nation now comes to the United States for a two-million-dollar loan. Norway has prohibition laws, but three nations have abrogated their treaties and let her know that their trade is withdrawn. This is a national boycott movement.

Bryan Discusses "All" From the Bible

The great Commoner is a strong defender of the Bible against those who would attack its teachings.

The Bible is the greatest book in the world, according to William Jennings Bryan. Other books are read and are laid aside. The Bible is read and reread. If we had to choose between the Bible alone and all other books we would let the other books go and keep the Bible.

Just to show you the wealth in the Old Testament, let us take from the dry book of Genesis, says he, three sentences that mean more than any sentences outside of the Bible.

"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." Materialists begin by assuming matter in existence; the Christian begins by assuming God. He does not have to explain him; he is self-existent. That one sentence is the starting point. No one has been able to go beyond it. We begin with God all-loving and all-powerful and reason down. Our reasoning is most rich. There is no other book so rich concerning the beginning of life.

There is more science in the 24th verse of the first chapter than any other sentence—a million species and none have ever found where one has ever crossed the line! This is the law of God. No man can repeal it, no matter how wise a man thinks he is.

The third sentence is, "And I, God, created man in mine own image." When man realizes he was created as part of an all-wise plan, put here for a purpose, then and only then can he understand life. Everything depends on the source from which a man gets his information. It is most important that he get it from above rather than waste time trying to find it below.

History proves the truth of the declaration of Moses as to man's creation. Some would tell us that civilization justifies evolution. No, civilization begins when man is godlike enough to be willing to die for the truth. I believe the fact that through all ages men unto whom God has revealed truth have been willing to proclaim that truth with no thought of sacrifice hard to make proves that man has the breath of God Almighty in him and is not a mere blue-blooded animal.

"All" is one of the smallest words in the language, yet one of the most comprehensive. "Thou shalt love thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy mind." "All" is used here three times. What would have been the history of humanity if Christ had used a word of smaller meaning: "Nearly all thy heart, most of thy soul, and some of thy mind"? Nothing but the best word, "all," could describe man's need then and can describe man's need to-day.

What would man's life be if part of the heart were filled with the love of God and part with something else? There would be a conflict. Unless the heart is full it cannot overflow. If it does not overflow it does not affect others.

Contrast the stagnant pool with the gushing spring. The pool receives and gives nothing; the spring is constantly giving. The spring is not itself at all but is only part of a reservoir above.

You never can measure man except in units of spiritual power. Measured in units of horsepower he is not as strong as the animals around him.

Unless you believe in God and love him, you cannot have the consciousness of his presence in your life. That gives the most potent force and sense of responsibility.

Civilization rests on morals. Morals rest on religion. Religion rests on God.

Prayer is a necessary part of the Christian life. What would the world be if there was no heart open to divine suggestion?

You cannot take Jesus Christ out of the world. There never has been a great reform in the ages that has not had its origin in the teachings of Jesus Christ, and right now I think we need the love of God to save the world and furnish the solution of the great problems that face mankind. No matter what is the question—industrial, political, economic—we need still the love of God for its solution.

You have the right to receive in proportion to what you earn. If people knew that they must earn the pay they draw they would all begin early. I might surprise some of you when I tell you how much I think a man can earn—$100,000 in a life-time? That would be only about $3,000 a year. Multiply it by ten and again by ten. I still think it is possible, or even again by ten. If anybody in the audience is ambitious to earn more I am willing to raise it another notch if necessary. I think it possible for a man to earn millions of dollars in politics, and if he can do it in politics where can it not be done?

Two men, if they drew $5,000,000 each, would still be underpaid—Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln. The man who invented steam—what did he earn? What about the man who from a wire learned about electricity? What of the man who gave us the radio? I have not yet come out from under the spell of last March in Pittsburgh where I spoke into a little radiophone on the stand before me. It took my voice and scattered it over 25,000,000 squares miles and more. They told me afterwards that eight minutes after it left the phone it had reached the sun, and that my voice was still going. I don't know where it is now.

But the man who gave us the remedy for typhoid, what did he earn? Or the man who gave the remedy for yellow fever and enabled us to finish the Panama Canal? What of the man who gave the world the first Sunday school, the Y. M. C. A., the Christian Endeavor? Or the Women's Christian Temperance Union? It did more than any other thing to bring in prohibition. If we had time to name all the men and women who since the beginning have earned more than $500,000, we would find that not one of them collected what he earned. Those who earned $500,000 were so busy earning that they had no time to collect it. Those who have collected have been too busy to earn it.

But God's law of rewards is in accordance with service, and should be taught to every boy and girl, so that no Christian would seek to collect more than God's law allows. What we need to-day is the establishment of God's law of reward. We cannot do it till people get back to God.

Just now the third "all" needs most to be exercised. The great sin of to-day is "my" wishes. They put the "my" above the heart. We have atheists teaching science who never lose an opportunity to speak disrespectfully of theology. A professor of science in a Christian university, a great Presbyterian school, said that science cannot go to theology every Saturday night to be checked up. He does not realize that theology cannot come to science every night to be checked up.

A lecturer recently declared that science is ready to take morals away from religion and to have morals based on science. But the mind of man is not infallible; you cannot find a penitentiary where there are no college graduates.

I believe the greatest menace of the church and of religion to-day is in the name of intellect. I have heard somebody say that we must take everything out of the Bible that intelligent men cannot understand. Why, my friends, Christ did not die for college graduates alone. It is the effort to put the brain above the heart, the effort to undermine religion, that the world has to fear to-day.

I believe that Darwin has done more to harm religion than any other man to-day. See what it did to him. He began life a Christian. He dropped away after his hypothesis or theory and ended an agnostic. It brought man down to a new base; it shut the door of heaven against him. Darwin's God was nowhere; he could not find him. Darwin's Bible had no inspiration. Darwin's ancestors began with brutes on both sides.

I would rather save one child from the starless night of agnosticism than to receive the plaudits of all the scientists in the world. I do not mind their guessing if they enjoy it but do not want them to mislead our children. A professor of Wisconsin told the class that the Bible is but a collection of myths. The Bible contains the science of living.

Further, Christ said, All power in heaven and earth is given into my hands. I sent them out to teach all nations all things. Lo, I am with you always even to the end of the world.

The last all is in the latter part of the 11th chapter of Matthew: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Everyone must take upon him a yoke and be broken to the yoke, but here is the yoke that is gentle to the one who is heavy laden.

The Big Thing That Has Happened in the World

Mr. William T. Ellis has traveled all over the world and has written much as well as lectured. He comes from going to and fro on the earth. He says he has been around the world three times and has been everywhere mentioned in the Bible, from the Garden of Eden to the Isle of Patmos. "What! have you been in heaven?" he is sometimes asked. "Yes," he replies, "I get home occasionally."

"Have you been to hell?"

"Yes, I have been in the front line trenches in the recent war on five different fronts. . . . I have also been bitten by the descendants of the same fleas that bit the Apostle Paul."

As a scout of civilization he brings the big fact of the age. We can take it from the words of men who understand the times of to-day, or we can take it from the gospel.

For the first time since the morning stars sang together, to-day the great mass of men are on the move marching, marching in progress across the earth. The old moorings have been split. To-day the multitudes are alert, moving, they know not how, they understand not, they know not where.

High up on the Mount of Olives stands a great palace, hospital, church, a fortress erected by the German Kaiser—a monument erected to one man's glory where the Son of God suffered. There is a portrait of King David with a Prussian mustache. In the ceiling one panel represents Christ and his apostles. A parallel panel represents the Kaiser and Kaiserine receiving the homage of Palestine.

To-day the crowd, the mob, the mass, is wearing the crown. No part of the world is exempt. In the heart of the United States we have seen what the mob spirit can do. The allies were victorious, but to-day the allies are defeated in the Near East. Their alliance has been torn asunder, so that France and England are almost torn asunder. To-day the unspeakable Turk is dictating terms to the allies. Syria, Egypt, India, and a long list of other countries are in revolt, while China is in the worst stage of ferment, so that even the best students of China fail to understand.

In the tests that are now here and the greater tests that are hurrying on, the stability, the salvation of the world, depends upon the free, Christian, English-speaking people of the world.

Recently on Mount Sinai I was talking with a British soldier who said, "To-day civilization is collapsing. In ten years the whole world will be back where it was a hundred years ago." But personally I do not believe it. Personally I say that they are blind. They are too close to get the reality of things. I am convinced that the present great agony of the earth is not the death throes, but rather the pangs of birth. The red glow in the heavens is not sunset, but the rosy glory of the coming dawn.

If I were a highbrow I would talk to you about the pedagogical significance of a psychological experience. Or I might muster a few words about the motivation of it all. Is there such a thing as education by cataclysm? The world may go forward farther by one tremendous experience than by years of trudging.

Picture a frivolous girl more concerned with what hangs over her ears than what goes on between her ears. This thoughtless girl falls in love, becomes transformed by the glory of wifehood into motherhood, and becomes a wise counselor. A profligate rich young man meets his God face to face, and in the twinkling of an eye the purpose of his life is transformed and he becomes henceforth converted, chaste.

I have heard people say that America is responsible for the world unrest. I answer with joy, Yes. Right or wrong they give us credit for setting free the mankind of the world, and America has the supreme responsibility of settling the unrest of the world.

Half a century ago the key of the Bastille was sent by Lafayette to Washington. "I send this to you because it is the spirit of America that has opened the Bastille and set us free."

But we cannot have democracy unless we have theocracy—not only ideals, but acts. The whole world has been looking to us. It was left to America's Christian president to gather up the hopes and longings of the weary world and send them out as a clear declaration. Many instances of this can be given, but unless the Christian church, through its most democratic institution, the Sunday school, leads the world, it will not be saved. To-day America is the world's almoner. Beware lest we become the world's almshouse. To save America and keep her American we must make and keep her Christian.

Religion can only function as it is applied to ordinary, everyday life. Religious education stresses conduct. It is not complete with information about the Bible; it is useful only as its teachings are carried over into life problems.—W. W. Charters.

The Conservation of Childhood

Samuel is an example of the child aroused to a life of service. Evangelism is the very heart of the Christian religion, according to Miss Alice E. May, whose ideas are here summarized. When shall we begin?

The first discovery of the child is the fist or foot. Then follows the long process of knowledge. When shall we begin to train a child? One minute after it discovers its foot. The mere tone of those about a child will determine the child's education, as they are examples for imitation.

When shall we begin the evangelization of the child? We should start certainly at an early age. To do so we must have graded lessons for our Sunday schools. We should bring our boys and girls to get the true perspective, and draw the Sunday school children to the Christian religion. We cannot begin too soon. It takes time to produce desirable results.

Musicians who excel will practice for hours on the scale alone. There is long repetition, but they are made ready for any composition. So should we train for Christianity. There comes a time when there is a call to everyone, but we must study to be equipped and be approved.

Underlying all of the great world movements there has been Christian education. We may say it with changing emphasis, but it was Christian education that did away with slavery, that secured the emancipation of women, and gave us the Eighteenth Amendment. Your boy and mine will not have the education of the open saloon. That is better than to have a million dollars. It is now that great things must be done.

We are the heirs of all the ages. Our field is indeed great, for we have a great country. An open Bible is one of the greatest works on the law. It is the voice of God speaking to men. Anybody who will not allow it to be read in the schools is an enemy of America. We need the Sabbath; he who would take it away or commercialize it is an enemy to our country and our God.

Before Christianity, there were three great civilizations: Egyptian, Grecian, and Roman. They represent first, wealth as their power; second, art, beauty, and buildings; the third, conquest and law. They represent three great concepts: first, enjoy living; second, know thyself; third, control thyself. Egypt, Greece, and Rome have gone down, but since Christ there has arisen the Christian civilization. "Deny thyself, love all men, and serve." This will save this great world of ours.

Sunday School Evangelism

The change is coming; the evangelized truth is coming and is lifting up the spiritual life of the churches. According to Reverend J. M. Bader, results last year were unprecedented—two million members were added to the churches of America. It was the greatest year we have seen in added membership, and it came mostly from the Sunday school. We believe in both evangelism and revivalism, though we may disagree as to method. We should be careful not to confuse the method, however, and the thing itself. Evangelism is not something to be added; it is the very heart of the movement. We must first give religious education for evangelism. We need evangelism for religious education. Education prepares the soil for the teaching of the word.

There are 21,000,000 Sunday school people in North America. Modern training schools have made it clear that young people are suitable for graded evangelism from the cradle roll up. Little children should be taught worship at home in the tender years; primary children taught to think of the heavenly Father; juniors, nine to eleven, taught to love and use the Bible, to obey the heavenly Father as their parents are obeyed. Intermediates learn much from twelve to fourteen and should study carefully the plan made to help them in public profession of faith.

Jesus as the child of twelve was "about his father's business." The Sunday school child learns much about the Old Testament and much about the successful Christian living, of subjection to the law of God. In the fifteenth year they learn the life of Christ; in the sixteenth year, the lessons aim to clear up and clear away the difficulties.

Thirteen years is now the average age of conversion. It once was fifteen.

At seventeen the Sunday school pupil studies the world for Christian service; at eighteen the philosophy of right living as given in the Old and New Testaments.

This is the work of Sunday school evangelism. It is part and parcel of the work of religious education and also of the work of evangelism. The modern Sunday school considers the grading of the child and uses God's graded book for graded evangelism. The Sunday school is great because it deals with youth. We must make decision early. Seventy-one per cent have decided for God young; ninety-five per cent have decided before they have passed the early twenties. Sixty-eight per cent of the great crimes have been committed by the young people. "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth."

Benjamin Kidd's Signs of Power shows what may be done with youth. Germany was changed in a generation; Japan was the hermit nation, but after one generation was first in education, while America was ninth. Frances Willard said to the Republican convention in 1894, "This generation will not settle the liquor question, but we shall raise up a generation that will." Peace will never come to abide with the world until we teach our children to love peace and hate war.

Moody says if we can save one generation we shall put the Devil out of business. Block the road and there can be no more prodigals. We should set the little child in the midst, but instead we have been putting adults in the center of our program and have built up our work around the adult. We are changing now and putting the child in the midst, for we must teach and win him. One generation for Christ will save the world.

We have been warned against emotionalism, but I wish we had more men preaching with the tears running down their faces and the church have a real passion for souls. We must have a new crusade to capture the children for Christ. The old crusade under Peter and others was the saddest of all—a children's crusade. Most of them were sold into slavery or perished, but the crusade now is one conducted by adults for children to lead them to Christ.

The adult should learn, not for his own sake alone, but it is hard for most boys and girls to do anything unless we help in the home. What a chance there is for us to win the people for Christ! But we should have classes to study the evangelical work. The pastor should attend; his absence should be the exception. The pastor is now taking a part in the work of religious education. We need warm-hearted teachers to teach the boys and girls—not teach the lesson, but teach the young people and the children. The life of the teacher is the life of her teaching. The home must take account of parental evangelism, for the parents have the first and longest chance.

We try to do too much by proxy when it should be done by proximity. It is not the work for a pastor alone but for a church.

Social Evangelism

We are face to face with a great world revolution. We must look the fact in the face. We are engaged in the final struggle for a world democracy, according to Charles Stelzel who has been a workingman, who is a student and lecturer on social research in New York City.

First, for religious democracy. Men must break down every barrier between them and God.

Second, political independence.

Third must come educational democracy. Once limited to a few, it must now be opened to all.

Fourth, social democracy—break down class distinction.

Fifth, democracy in sex. Once it was denied, but now women have rights. It remains to be seen what they will do with them.

Sixth, racial democracy. America has not all the talent.

Seventh, industrial democracy. The era of the common man is slowly but surely coming. Nothing can stop it. The coming workingman is going to have more to say.

The lawlessness of to-day is sometimes only incidental to the general progress of civilization. Every great movement passes through great upheavals at times. The Pilgrims boycotted the Quakers and others. This is incidental as a criterion of the church or of the American labor movement. A study of unrest means a great movement forward. The workmen are strongly religious. The average workingman stays away because of the limitation of his vocabulary. In Belgium thousands do not go to church, but in their labor temple they have a large picture of Christ and regard him as the great one sympathetic with their cause. Workingmen in London and other places possess a similar spirit and are deeply and profoundly religious.

Social unrest is the result of high rents, food shortage, men arrested. These great masses of people are not what the people think them. It is unemployment that does it. But we are told by the librarian at the Boston library that in their reading room they do not read Bolshevism nor socialism, but are reading on democracy and economics and similar subjects and will soon be the better educated men of America. While the clerks are reading novels, and others are passing their time, these men are studying. They read books that cause men to think. They go to the art galleries and then determine to better conditions for their families. By more reading they will become better educated.

The workingmen do not envy other men their wealth. They do envy them their opportunity for improvement.

The church is responsible for social unrest. The early Christian church with its preaching turned the world upside down. But without social unrest there is no progress. The great mass of workingmen are going to win, not through atheism but through idealism.

Do not treat these workingmen as if they were not your equals, for the church must help them and they will help the church. We must insist that the social question is fundamentally a religious one. Character is the supreme thing, the gospel of Jesus Christ to make men realize the necessity of Jesus. The church must bring capital and labor together on a basis of mutual respect.

To-day men do not know each other. The church of Christ must get them acquainted, must get them together upon a basis just to both.

The church must not stand for any system. It is not a mere social organization. It is not a chamber of commerce. The church should not adopt a special platform. The church must not advocate socialism, anarchism, nor any other "ism." But it must recognize the right of every man to decide upon his own economic system. Some day there is dross to be burned out. Then the world will stand out purified and undefiled. Then men and women will see the mission of Christ as never before.

But the church must speak with authority concerning great religious principles. Every great question is justly religious—labor, peace, etc. These cannot be settled until religion dominates them. The church must engage in the social task in the spirit of the prophet. The new democracy requires the teaching of Christ by one who must be a prophet. He must not be a handy man for a board of trustees, for the church must make an heroic appeal.

Redeeming a Race Through Its Children

Mr. John M. Gandy is the president of the State Normal School at Petersburg, Virginia, and spoke on behalf of the colored race. He said that they do not usually speak out, but here he felt that he was among friends. Educated negroes are adopting the plan of demanding physicians' certificates before marriage, in behalf of eugenics. The redemption of the children really begins before they are born, but we have a serious problem in their economic condition, as a majority of their homes are not the best influence, though there is an increasing number of well-regulated homes. Even among the less wealthy negroes these ideals are gaining force. But too many families still have to live in a one-room cabin, both in the country and in the city. This makes modesty and right ideals difficult.

But progress is being made, especially through the negro schools in the South. Illiteracy has decreased from 100 per cent at the close of the war to 39 per cent now. But this has been done by unbelievable sacrifice, as thousands of dollars have to be raised to supplement the pittance from the state.

The church is helping with playgrounds and athletics, disregarding the old puritanical ideal. But they are securing not only sound, healthy bodies and developing minds, but also the ideals for the redemption of the race.

Among other forces besides the public school and the work of the churches are a few educators who are taking a prominent part in helping the Negroes. One or two companies are manufacturing toys especially for the Negroes, and biographies of great Negroes are being written. This is necessary, as they must secure a reasonable pride before ideals can become effective.

The Church Cooperating With the Home

By the time the child is seven he is either set toward or away from religion. This emphasizes the importance of the work with beginners, according to Miss Mabel Bailey. One wants to get cooperation with the home. Get parents to help provide equipment.

It is such a tragedy to go into some churches and not be able to find one place that shows there is room for a little child.

Every beginner worker should have a chance to get into the home and be friends with the mothers. When the child fastens a star on the calendar on the day of his birthday, have the fathers and mothers come, and then pin two other stars on the side for them. We must use the mothers in our beginner departments.

The church and home must work together to provide the very best in the way of lessons, buy pictures, etc., and have the children retell the stories at home. Have the children learn to say grace. Give the children go-to-bed stories and let the Sunday school lesson run through the whole week. Some teachers, through notes, give a special lesson, so the mothers can reinforce them at home. The whole week should be colored with the Sunday school lesson.

It is helpful to have occasional mothers' meetings, for there are some things one can say to a group of mothers which one cannot say in an individual call. To this end it is well to have a mothers' club of the department, as well as a church parent-teachers' association. When the mothers come, give them something to do to interest them. It is well many times to have a parents' class.

Ideals in the Christian Education of Children

We must have the assistance of the home, also of the community. We may set forth our rules in terms of will:

First, I will do nothing in the life of the child that will later have to be undone. We want to teach constructively from the first.

Second, I will emphasize the values of living; will teach the real values of life.

Third, I will help the boys and girls to know the Father in relation to the daily life.

Fourth, I will teach the boys and girls the spirit of worship to the heavenly Father and Jesus Christ. Worship means "worth" plus "ship."

Fifth, I will help to get the right attitude towards others.

Sixth, I will help to crystallize into habits these right attitudes.—Mrs. M. S. Lamoreaux, at International Sunday School Convention.

The Opportunity of the Teacher

The circle talk is the teacher's opportunity to learn what it means to the child. The child should be made to feel it is "our Sunday school"—not the teacher's alone. Most beginner departments are not true beginner departments but miniature primary departments.

It provides an outlet for activities; it gives an opportunity for the child to ask, How? Why? Where? etc.

The teacher gets an insight into the home conditions and the children's dispositions; discovers what impressions have been made. We will often find the stories have not given the impression we intended.

It is a constant reminder that the child, not the story or the lesson, should be the consideration in the program. It takes two to make a conversation. If a teacher monopolizes the time and does all the talking, she is a very poor conversationalist.

Draw out the timid child tactfully.

Do not grasp every conversational opportunity.

Introduce easy topics of conversation.

Do not abruptly cut off a would-be contributor.

Watch the tones of the voice and see that all the children hear.

Ask thought-provoking questions.

There is a time for conversation. Handle carefully the conversation in the story. Conversation is also a means of teaching the memory verse and in planning a dramatic play and thus reinforce the lesson.—Elizabeth Shields, at International Sunday School Convention.

Week-day Schools in Religious Education

At the first session of week-day schools of religious education at which Professor George E. Betts and others spoke at the recent convention, the following program was presented: Assembly, 20 minutes; Bible stories, 40 minutes; recreation, 30 minutes; life stories, 20 minutes; dramatic expression, 40 minutes; closing, 20 minutes. It was proposed that such a day school be held two days each week. It was thought the expense could be met at a cost of approximately $5 per student per year. It is possible that these day schools be established by the various churches, that the church itself should assume this responsibility, though it may handle it through the departments of Religion or Sunday school. Some speakers urge the necessity for further community schools.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Message From the General Superintendent

[The following message from our general superintendent is being mailed to our organizers and other officers, who no doubt gladly welcome the definite and helpful suggestions and instructions contained therein. Sister Glines is working on practical lines, and from time to time will likely send out many splendid plans, which will encourage local members to renewed and consistent efforts towards our goal.—A. A.]

To the Women of the Church: We are looking forward to a busy, interesting, and profitable year for the women of the church. From reports and monthly letters from the district organizers we know that many are engaged in study. This is very gratifying. We sense keenly the necessity for more intelligent manhood and womanhood. We are still stressing the organization of classes for study in the various subjects outlined.

We are also encouraging you to engage in some activity which will create an outlet for the expression and development of the abilities and talents of everyone. Every individual has a natural inclination to do something. In the expression of this desire or inclination, the activity may be made to prove helpful or of little consequence as we permit.

As a department of the church we are seeking to aid you in making your contributions this coming year worth while. You have repeatedly been given the list of study courses, which are now to be had at a very nominal cost, by writing the Herald Publishing House. Your intelligent service, made possible after proper instruction, is a splendid contribution to humanity.

As a church we have institutions such as the Sanitarium, the Children's Home, and the homes for the aged, in which many articles, such as table linen, bed linen, tea towels, tray cloths, dresser scarfs, clothing, etc., are needed. We are preparing to give you a list of such articles with regulation specifications, so that those who wish to do service along that particular line may be able to do so.

There are many places in the general church program where our large or small contributions may relieve the situation in such a way that many may be benefited thereby. We will give you a few illustrations of how some are working. Just recently a few Saints took advantage of an opportunity to accommodate a large convention by conducting a cafeteria. As a result, those few individuals made their contribution of two thousand dollars to the church. One club of women at one of their gatherings had a Sanitarium shower. Each guest was asked to bring some article needed at the Sanitarium. At another time this same group of women supplied all the dresser scarfs for the Sanitarium, having received specifications from authority so that all would be of regulation size. One group of women decided upon a contribution from each member at every meeting held. This contribution could range from one penny to as much as one wished to make it. At the end of the allotted time fifteen dollars was turned into the treasury.

Many and varied are the activities in which we may engage, not in the name of the church but as private individuals or groups, that will prove educational, social, interesting, and remunerative.

We suggest that each group of Orioles, Temple Builders, middle aged and elderly women, decide upon something definite and direct their energies that way. As soon as that one thing is accomplished, be ready with something else. The church needs your service. Give it liberally, cheerfully, and unreservedly. Your reward will be the knowledge of having done your part.

In order to curtail expense, we are making some change in the matter of report blanks, thereby reducing the amount of paper and postage. Please note: We are sending one report blank of each of the different bureaus featuring in your district instead of two as formerly. Organizers, give instruction to have these blanks filled and sent to you. You take what data you wish for your own report and send original to Box 255, Independence, Missouri.

DORA GLINES, Superintendent of Women's Department.

Further Executive Changes

Sister Glines announces the following changes in the personnel of the general executive, which are here given to the sisters at large as an item of news. All communications of course will continue to come addressed to the general office (Women's Department, Box 255, Independence, Missouri,) no matter for which officer intended.

First Assistant Superintendent, Mrs. M. A. Etzenhouser.

Second Assistant Superintendent, Miss Nellie Sampson.

Secretary, Mrs. Grace Morrison.

Other board members: Mrs. A. L. Yingling, Miss Pauline James, and the new organizer in Zion, Mrs. W. H. Murphy.

Sister Mollie Davis is to occupy the place made vacant by Sister Etzenhouser's change of residence, her husband, Brother Evan A. Davis, having been appointed to take charge of the work in Salt Lake City. A. A.

Baby Welfare

"If I were asked what I considered the chief requisite for the successful practice of pediatrics, I would answer: The education of the mother. It is impossible to do even fairly good work in diseases of children without proper home coöperation. A direction is never followed out so well as when it is understood."—Doctor Charles G. Kerley.

"Pediatrics: That branch of medical science which treats of the hygiene and diseases of children."—Webster.

"Prenatal Hygiene. If any baby could supervise the preparation for his own coming, he would not wait until the last few months before his advent, that is, any baby who had even moderate ambition for his comfort, his happiness, and his efficiency.

"He would begin by selecting his grandparents, who would be highminded, religious, abstainers, moderate in all their habits, industrious, neither wealthy nor poverty-stricken, and who would bring up his father and his mother as members of a family of children in the same spirit and with foresight for his welfare. He would direct, during their childhood and adolescence, the physical regime of his father and mother, which would be simple, natural, regular, chiefly in the open air, with habitual deep breathing and, especially for his mother, exercises and clothing that would develop the most efficient digestion, breathing capacity, back and trunk muscles, steady nerves, reserve vitality.

"He would guide their education, which would include a minimum of traditional junk, parrothe mimicy and discipline, and a maximum of real experience, valuable information, and æsthetic appreciation acquired through personal exploring, experimenting, judging, creating, with a discipline that developed self-direction, self-control, and self-reliance.

"He would anticipate that his mother and father, with such a heredity and education, would be high-minded above dissipation and triflings, sensible beyond unhygienic habits in food and in dress, well-poised and superior to pettiness and discords, with a radiant love that maintained an atmosphere of joyousness, graciousness, courage. Having chosen each other because they loved each other, his father and mother would live and work and plan because they loved him. Before they invited him to come, they would have a comfortable home settled, so his mother could give her chief attention to him and be free to live much out of doors; they would consult their physician and bring themselves to their best vitality, so he might have the best physical constitution; and they would make any necessary sacrifice of their own desires that he might be undisturbed and thus grow steadily and sturdily until his birthday."—Mary L. Read, in The Mothercraft Manual.

Parents as Educators

(By Katherine Beebe. Issued by the National Kindergarten Association, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York City.)

Companionship With Children

Too much cannot be said concerning a real companionship between parents and children. I emphasize the "real." Those fathers and mothers who have practiced this companionship through their children's unfolding years seem almost to hold them in the hollow of their hands. Those fortunate young people simply do not want to do the things which would grieve or distress the ones they love best, and in addition are so well equipped with vital interest in the better and finer aspects of life that the less desirable makes no effectual appeal. I have seen this happen over and over again, and one mother of five splendid children said it was as certain as that two and two made four. Given this real companionship by their parents and a mutual sharing of the best things in home, books, music, art, nature, and humanity during eighteen or more plastic years and children are bound to turn out well.

Value of Companionship

This sort of companionship is no casual or haphazard thing. The parents who realize its value and mean to have it at any price are willing to play, really play with their babies, to keep on playing with the little ones, to give hours of time to the older ones, and to live on such friendly terms with their children from the beginning that spontaneity, originality, initiative, and enthusiasm are never repressed. Tender love, real living sympathy with the child's point of view, active participation in whatever interests him, doing things together, these are the precious secrets of those parents whose children when grown are still their dearest friends.

It is from the first a question of being willing to pay the price. When one sees on every hand boys and girls whose friends and interests are all outside of home, who seem entirely at liberty to choose their own occupations and amusements and inclined to select those which are not only questionable but often desperately dangerous, and contrasts them with those others of whom we have been speaking, one is forced to conclude that many parents have purchased self-indulgence for themselves at a terrible cost. "Where are their parents? What are they thinking of?" How often do we hear this said to-day as we gaze upon the girls and boys who are on the streets, in the restaurants, at the shows, in the automobiles; as we read the horrors in our daily papers, as we listen to tales of disgrace and disaster.

It does not matter much where they are now. It is too late. Their great chance is gone for good and all. But years ago these parents were spending hours upon themselves which should have been passed in companionship with their children.

What would they not give now for that companionship and the influence which can be bought only at that price!

Priceless Opportunity

But, oh, you fathers and mothers of little children, don't let your opportunity slip! Now is your great chance! Fill the golden hours of your children's early years with all sorts of work, play, projects, excursions, reading and study together. Live with your children. It was long ago that Froebel cried, "Come, let us live with our children," and never was his reason for so doing so clear to our minds as in these latter days. Do not say that you are too busy, or that the labor of providing food and shelter for them prevents. Let them share, according to their years, in the family work, the family responsibilities, and even the family income. Remember that companionship means participation. You can make work a frolic or an unwelcome drudgery to them; it is for you to choose. All depends on the spirit in which the necessary things are done. Even be thankful that your means are restricted, for then your problem will be a simpler one than if you had all the money you wish you had. Necessity is an able assistant to any sort of teacher, and besides it is you the children want rather than the things you think you would like to give them.

The Hidden Flower

How strange it was that we should know
Each other long before love flamed,
Our love was like those flowers that grow
In mines and blossom though unnamed.

Do you recall the day when first
We realized that love had found
Our hearts and growing there had burst
In bloom with one sweet flowering bound?

O dearest flower found on earth,
Too beautiful for time and death,
No struggling word can name thy worth,
He only feels who knows thy breath.

Suggestions for Reading and Discussion

"Every dollar that is spent in any department of government comes out of the pockets of the people. It is not easy for the public to realize this. The Congressman who gets an extra appropriation for a post office or other public building that is not needed, in order to please his home people, may get more votes, but he is adding to the public burden. In return for a vote for his post office he is sure to have to give his vote to a fellow Congressman for an unnecessary expenditure in another State. The chain so formed is practically endless and its inevitable effect is to raise the cost of living unwarrantably. Every such expenditure, every unnecessary public salary, every dishonest public official, every tax dodger, every incompetent piece of public work, adds to the burden of taxation which the people have to pay."

LETTERS AND NEWS

Thirteen Thousand Miles to Graceland

Yes. Traveled so far to attend Graceland, and truly consider it worth while. On the 28th day of June, 1921, in company with William Patterson, the writer sailed out of Sydney harbor, Australia, en route for America and Graceland, to enter the course in religious education. On the way across the blue Pacific, we called for a brief stay at Tahiti, Society Islands. There we were pleased to meet with Sister Frank Almond, who had studied at Graceland the previous year, and was then with her husband, who was also a Graceland graduate, doing missionary work among those island Saints. Other kind and capable missionaries were also doing capable and practical work among those people. Surely the influence of Graceland reaches into many places and different climes. The Graceland spirit will in the near future be penetrating into the hearts of many countries, where the voice of this church is as yet not heard. This fact is assured by the number of students at Graceland who come from other lands.

Just a word about the cosmopolitan character of the student body. It was surely interesting to note that on the second and third floors of the boys' dormitory, Marietta Hall, there were represented England, Wales, Palestine, Austria, Canada, and Australia. These boys were all at Graceland with the ambition to learn and prepare themselves to carry back to their own lands the particular message that this church has for the world. Their influence will be to internationalize the activities and influence of this church. For after all, this church is not an American institution, but a world church, with a definite mission to the world as a whole, and not to any one section in particular. The educational policy of Graceland is, of necessity, broad and international, and so it seems a safe prognostication to say that in the very near future the influence of Graceland, will be world-wide, and, in the opinion of the writer, this is as it should be.

The Graceland spirit is what every student that enters her portals must feel. It continually radiates from the members of the faculty, and is again reflected in the lives and activities of the student body. It is the spirit of consecrated service. I wish right here to sincerely thank the faculty of Graceland for their example and the stimulus which they have unconsciously imparted to me during the past year. I am truly thankful for the year's association with such fine characters, and in the years to come I'll often think of the splendid lives of the Graceland personnel.

As a student who has felt the Graceland spirit, I stand on record against any who would impeach her fair name or cast any insinuating slurs regarding her influence. The vision of one who has traveled so far to attend one of her classes, is that in the years to come her students will greet each other in distant lands, making the Graceland spirit a universal spirit. There, there is no class distinction, but all are working for the good of all.

I wish to again express my appreciation and thanks for the studies and associations I have enjoyed at Graceland during the past year in the religious education class.

A student from Australia,

JOHN BLACKMORE.

Recent issues of the Flint (Michigan) Daily Journal contained a two-column advertisement of a lecture on "Mormonism exposed," in answer to statements by representatives of the Utah Church in which they told the public they had been preaching in our church on Newall Street, thereby confusing many. They are reported to have been in that city in force.

One Year With the Class in Religious Education

Many times have I been asked the question, "Why are you taking the course in religious education?" The peculiar stress invariably placed on this question inferred that the interlocutors believed this special course was provided for members of the priesthood, and to them alone could it hold interest or be of value. My decision was the natural sequence of a number of years of experience in church work, years which were filled with privileges for serving the church in various ways: locally, in district capacity, with reunions, and in the departments. This service brought, as all service will bring, a large measure of satisfaction, but with this satisfaction was also a keen sense of the lack of needful preparation that would have made this work a valuable rather than merely a willing offering. No one could feel content in playing a part in the "Tragedy of the untrained" so I looked about for a remedy and found it in the religious education class at Graceland.

The results are very gratifying. After a year of association with a democratic student body and faculty of our own church college, we return with a new incentive and a renewed determination to give of our service. With this new zeal has also come a greater vision of the general aspects and aims of the church and the basic methods of reaching these aims, economically, socially, and religiously.

A field of service has opened before us so wide, with aim so high, that its accomplishment must require a trained and educated church membership, possessing the same clear vision and consecration to its fulfillment as has characterized our priesthood in the past. Our present problems demand the service of all.

The policy of preparation for service is especially applicable to the women of the church. In the past we have been too passively interested in our religious program; too little aware of its vital relation to real living; but that time is now past, and we find in the church an increasing regard for women's ability and influence which is proportionate to the recognition they are receiving in other fields of progress. The church is in need of the women power within its ranks, and Graceland can help to prepare it for service.

WAVE CROSS.

Baptisms Total Thirty-six at Jonesport

We closed up our Jonesport, Maine, effort Sunday, July 2. A splendid audience greeted the closing service, as indeed the meetings all through the campaign. Surely the field is white unto harvest and this seems to be the condition prevailing all through Maine. A spirit of inquiry is throbbing strongly in the bosoms of the common people. They are weary of sectarian sycophancy and are longing for the "old paths."

I never labored in a place where missionary opportunities were so flattering. A sense of fairness prevails with the people and they are easily approached.

Thirty-six were baptized at Jonesport since the debate, the majority of whom are heads of families. Among that number are enrolled the names of Mr. Emory Farnsworth, his wife, and son. This was the gentleman who occupied the chair in the late discussion with Glendenning. He is a man of sterling integrity and brings prestige to our cause.

They are indeed a happy band of Saints at Jonesport, unassertive in manner but tenacious in their testimony.

An unusual experience was related to me by Sister Cummings, suggesting the interest of the Almighty in our recent debate. Some few weeks prior to the discussion, she saw a large public gathering in attendance at the debate. She observed among other matters the presence of a certain lady and also heard the testimony of a leading townsman, a Mr. Rogers, who, although a nonmember, testified to the divinity of our cause. She also saw John, the Baptist, in attendance.

Upon the opening of the discussion our sister was in attendance and, somewhat to her surprise, the lady referred to was present, also; seated at her side was the gentleman referred to, and later he did testify to the truth by being baptized. Who shall say that the third one, John, the Baptist, was not also present, overruling the psychological forces that prevail at a debate and preparing the hearts of the people for the reception of the truth. It is quite significant that during my closing speech, I devoted some time to the presentation of evidence, showing that John, the Baptist, was to come ministering as an angel in the last days.

It will be impracticable to make mention of the splendid support imparted by the host of willing hands and unselfish workers. Their number is legion. In particular would we mention the splendid home afforded me by Alpheus Clark and his amiable wife. Our dry land brother is nibbling at the bait and we hope ere long to hear of his entrance into the kingdom of God.

To-night, July 4, we open up a short series of meetings at Vinal Haven, where we hope to be kept busy until the Deer Park and Onset reunions.

Everything is running electrically down here. We are kept busy from morn until night.

Sincerely,

DANIEL MACGREGOR.

Independence

The Saints at large who have perused the Christmas offering report in the Blue Stepping Stones of May 21 may have wondered at the small totals reported by the Independence schools. A correction appears in the Stepping Stones of June 25 which gives the actual amounts given by them, which makes a much different showing. Interest in Christmas offering in Independence is high. In fact, some have felt it was too high, and at the expense of other funds, but of late tithing cards have been introduced and are proving successful. Their use should not only give proper credit to amounts paid in, but should develop a better understanding all around as to the financial system of the church. The actual amounts given by the larger schools in Zion are: Mount Zion (Stone Church), $4,000.60; Zion's Hope (Second Independence), $1,122.03; Enoch Hill, $234.31; Liberty Street, $131.84; Walnut Park, $457.38.

Walter W. Smith, church historian, and wife, also Brother Earl Corthell and wife, visited the third annual picnic of the Far West Saints on the Fourth. This picnic was participated in by about four hundred Saints from Cameron, Far West, Delano, Kingston, and Oakdale Branches. A miscellaneous program of music, etc., was had in the forenoon, and one of music and speeches in the afternoon. Brother Walter addressed them at the latter. They met at the old historic Far West and thoroughly enjoyed the fine day.

The quarterly conference of Zion was held on Monday evening, the 3d, at which time delegates to the General Conference were nominated, delegates to the Sunday school convention elected, and expert accountants now examining the books of the bishop for Zion asked to report their findings to the Saints of Zion.

At the April conference, at the suggestion of the First Presidency, the pastors in Zion were made a committee to bring in a list of nominations for selection of delegates to the coming General Conference. They did this, with the specific understanding that it was not final, but subject to addition or subtraction by the assembly. After considerable discussion, led principally by those who feared such procedure might mean a curtailment of the principle of democracy, a resolution prevailed accepting the list as nominations, but allowing further additions from the floor and providing that the total list of nominations be printed and submitted to the membership. A later-called meeting on July 10 voted to select the fifty delegates, those receiving the highest number of votes, all others to be alternates. No objection was made to the one hundred and ten names submitted by the superintendents of the Sunday schools as delegates to the convention, and without debate they were ratified and accepted.

One wonders sometimes if the word nominate is generally understood. If it had been on this occasion it seems that all the assembly needed to do was to proceed in an orderly, expeditious manner to add to the list submitted by a committee of its own appointing, then in the same manner decide as to methods of selecting from the list. Yet the two hours of argument, some of it very violent and incriminating, revolved around the evident supposition that a nomination is tantamount to an election. This is not the first time such a situation has arisen, and it may not be the last, but one can but hope there will be improvement.

On the evening of Monday, the 10th, a special meeting was called at the Stone Church, at which time printed lists of all the nominees were furnished, totaling seventy-five names. The audience spent some time on them, marking their choice of the fifty names. A resolution prevailed selecting for alternates those not elected to serve as delegates, beginning with those receiving the highest number of votes. A committee of three from the audience was chosen to count the votes and report results to the HERALD.

Elder Paul M. Hanson delivered the radio sermon last Sunday and is announced for next Sunday, probably at about 3.30 p. m. Various times of the day have been tried, in an effort to get a time which will allow speakers and musicians to respond, and at the same time find a minimum of air interference. This will be decided soon and announced. The wave length used is 360 meters.

The Religio is putting on motion pictures on the church lawn each Saturday evening, with good attendance. They are having the usual trouble getting satisfactory films, for a very small percentage of those to be had are free from some objection. With the close of the July contract a new arrangement will be in force whereby a special committee will view all pictures before they are brought here, and it is hoped this will secure better results.

A second and evidently successful attempt was made last Sunday morning in taking panoramic and moving pictures of the children of the Saints, by a representative of the Kansas City Journal and a news film company. A good attendance was had this time, though of course not all mothers could be there with their children.

As we go to press a special election is in progress in Independence. Four propositions are being voted on. They are:

1. Bonding the city to raise $40,000 with which to purchase the fair grounds comprising some fifty-three acres just southeast of the city limits for park and playground purposes.
2. Bonding the city for $20,000 with which to improve the fair ground property.
3. Granting a franchise to the Jackson County Light, Heat, and Power Company for a term of twenty years.
4. Granting a franchise to the Independence Oil and Gas Company.

Considerable has been said on both sides and a large vote is expected. Within the past year a renewal of the franchise to the gas company now operating in Independence (Number 3) was refused by the voters, many of the Saints opposing it because of its location. President F. M. Smith was in Chicago recently conferring with the owners of the gas company regarding the relation of the gas plant to our building program, and while he was granted a respectful hearing and consideration, no legal steps were taken to provide for a removal to other location.

The other gas franchise proposed is for a new company which proposes to come in from the north with mains from producing natural gas wells, part of the supply now being available and more possible from new wells that are proposed.

A light wagon, inclosed and apparently fully equipped, hauled by a yoke of large, well-fed oxen, appeared in Independence on July 3 and made a prolonged stop just outside our window. A smaller vehicle followed, drawn by a single animal of the same species. They are following the pathway of the old pioneers from Connecticut to California, and there are few within the past several decades who have seen oxen used as motive power on so long a trip. They have been eighteen months on the trip and evidently are not out for speed records.

Elder J. F. Curtis writes from Dowagiac, Michigan, on the 6th to say that he is engaged in a sixteen-night debate at Dailey, Michigan. Mr. Charles O. Harmon, of Cassopolis, Michigan, a lawyer, is chairman and doing splendid work. He became interested in our work through Three Bibles Compared, by R. Etzenhouser.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium for the week ending July 8: Doris Long, and Master Kenneth Graham, Lamoni, Iowa; Mrs. Anna Willey, Linneus, Missouri; Jack Goza, Harold VanOder, and Mrs. Cecil Peck, Mount Washington, Missouri; F. W. Barbee and Mrs. Irene Evans Smith, Kansas City, Missouri; Mrs. D. M. Dwyer, Cameron, Missouri; Master Walton Lambkin, Glenwood, Iowa; Oscar Deal, Woodbine, Iowa; and Mrs. Anna Jewell Triplett, Buckner, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Bert Arnold, Master William Russell, Mrs. Hattie McNeil, Miss Atha Mae Luff, James F. Lippincott, Mrs. Linda Whiteaker, Shannon Child, Mrs. Jessie Carey, John Ogle, Master Edward Vaile Brackenbury, Misses Ethel and Marie Johnson, Mrs. Pearl Lavery, and Mrs. Mary C. Closby. X-ray patients: Mrs. L. W. Cross, J. G. Morgan, and Mrs. Mary Young, all of Independence.

Saint Louis, Missouri

Our Religio has been having increased attendance because Brother Ed Bell has given, at the past three Friday sessions, lantern views of scenes on the Santa Fe road between Saint Louis and California. An encouraging feature is that nearly if not all attending come in time for the lesson study.

We wonder if some of our young people will not be curious enough about those cliff dwellers and other views of the Mesa Verde ruins and the very interesting talk Brother Ed gave them to want to read their Book of Mormon and learn more about these ancient people. There is no other book giving an authentic account.

Sister M. A. Etzenhouser is in Saint Louis doing social service work with the Provident Association, that she may do more efficient work for the church along these lines. On Sunday, June 25, she gave a very interesting talk to the Sunday school about the work of herself and husband in Utah. We hope to hear more from her.

Saint Louis will not have a Fourth of July picnic. We shall picnic on July 29 instead.

The Mite Society is having a patriotic indoor picnic at the church on Friday, June 30. We will have picnic lemonade free, balloons, and other picnic accessories. A good time is anticipated.

Prayer meetings are fairly well attended and very good.

Sunday night attendance has fallen off in spite of the very good sermons by our pastor.

Our pastor made some very sweeping statements one Sunday morning, if statistics are to be believed. There are twenty times as many men in jail as women. Men use more whisky than women in the proportion of one barrel to one pint, while even a larger proportion of men use tobacco—yet man is called "the stronger sex." Why is this? We can find only one explanation that seems reasonable, and that is, most women are clean and strong and transmit to their sons new energy and vitality. The home should be the best place in the world, and in it the moral strength of the mother predominates and does all that it can to save the race. Ninety-five per cent of animals are born perfect physically, while nineteen out of twenty children are in some measure defective, owing to drink, tobacco, and vice habits of parents. Nine tenths of all degeneracy is due to the same causes.

Boston, Massachusetts

We are now rapidly approaching the season when the Boston Branch hibernates. Every summer there is a more or less general exodus to the reunion grounds at Onset, and during this period branch activities cease. At a recent business meeting it was voted to dispense with all Sunday services from July 9 to August 27.

The ministerial conference held here, May 20 and 21, was well attended, and the program arranged by the quorum president, Doctor Sinclair, was instructive and entertaining.

By far the most interesting item of the work here at present is the missionary effort being made in Stoneham, under the direction of E. J. Gleazer. Stoneham is a town of about seventy-five hundred inhabitants, about twelve miles from Boston. Two families of Saints live there, Alma Nickerson and Stephen Haseltine, and through the efforts of these brethren and their capable companions the work is known from one end of the town to the other.

Several weeks ago, while the snow was still on the ground, fourteen men of the branch journeyed to Stoneham and inaugurated an aggressive campaign to advertise our meetings. We had secured the chamber of commerce hall for our Sunday meetings which were advertised to continue four weeks. Brother Nickerson had provided maps of the town, with different districts designated. Our method was to call personally at each home with an announcement of our services and an invitation to attend.

We held three meetings in the chamber of commerce hall. By this time the opposition of certain interests had been brought to bear so heavily on the officials of the chamber that the use of the hall was denied us to complete the series.

We also held street meetings every Saturday evening for eight weeks, attracting considerable interest. One evening in particular, when Elder James Bishop was passing through Boston, on his way home from England, he addressed a street meeting in Stoneham. Among the interested listeners were some of the town's leading ministers, and the street service was followed by an exchange of ideas in the presence of a large crowd.

Being denied the chamber of commerce hall, we secured a theater, but after three weeks they too shut down on us. But Brother Nickerson was equal to the occasion. He secured the use of a lawn right in the center of the town, built a platform, wired it for lights, erected a big sign, big enough so that all who run may read, and for the past three weeks services have been held practically every pleasant evening.

Beyond a doubt there are some seekers for truth in Stoneham. Our problem is to reach them with our testimony. We have some interested friends, and one in particular has offered us the use of his home in which to hold meetings. Our earnest desire is that we may be able to convince others of the truth of the gospel message, and also that we who have named the name of Christ may acknowledge him as our leader by doing the things he commands. No amount of preaching alone can ever redeem Zion. We pray for an early realization of the crowning achievement of the latter-day work.

H. A. CHELLINE.

Nauvoo District

Extracts of letter to the First Presidency from Elder D. J. Williams.

We are pleased to say that the Nauvoo district conference has passed with the same beautiful spirit that has been characteristic of our district conferences for several years. It seems that our people are not intent on looking for mistakes. If they were, I fear they would find plenty in their pastor. It is surely a pleasure to labor among such.

Our chief difficulty was the housing of the conference. The house was simply crowded. A goodly number of chairs were added to the regular seating capacity, and some were standing in some of the services. Brother J. L. Parker spoke in Fort Madison Sunday evening, and several from that place went home for that service. Many would have been turned away from the service here had they remained.

The conference was a splendid one, and as Brother Salisbury remarked that he felt it was the mark of a new epoch in the district, so we trust it will be. We were glad indeed to have him with us, as his experience has made his advice very helpful.

The conference saw fit to place the responsibility of district president upon the writer for another year, and Brother Clarence Gunn, of Fort Madison, was elected as secretary.

Brethren F. Henry Edwards and Prescott Foo were also present and added much pleasure as well as considerable interest to the conference. It seems we cannot think of them apart from Graceland, for they so often speak of their experience there with delight. The writer has often desired to take the religious education course at Graceland, but as ten years disqualifies him for that pleasure it becomes necessary to readjust such desire. Well, perhaps we can take the course by correspondence, if it can be so arranged.

"The Saints near Eagle Grove, Iowa," writes Anna V. Willert, "were organized into a group on Sunday, June 25, 1922, with Brother Henry Castings, of Des Moines, and Doctor J. E. Slocum, of Webster City, in charge. The following were elected: Doctor J. E. Slocum, superintendent; Sister Florence Kirstein, assistant superintendent; Sister Clara Wilkins, treasurer; Sister Anna V. Willert, secretary; and Sister Anna Lubbers, pianist."

Brother Ed Crownover, of Oklahoma, writes that his son received almost instant relief after he had written the letter asking the prayers of the Saints. Previous to that, the condition had been very serious. Both he and his wife feel to thank the Lord for the blessing.

He asks the continued prayers of the Saints that he may live closer to the Lord and walk in the right path. He is an isolated Saint and has never had church privileges, though he hopes sometime soon to be permitted to live among the people of the Lord. He feels to thank the Lord for this added blessing as well as the many other blessings he has received.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Bishopric

Northwestern Ohio District: Having received the resignation of Brother E. L. Ulrich, we hereby appoint Brother Harold H. Harms, Box 227, Bradner, Ohio, to continue the work as Bishop's agent of the above district.

The Saints of this district are to be congratulated upon having the services of Brother Harms, with his splendid commercial experience, to look after the financial interest of their district. We feel confident that he will receive your loyal support. The stress of the times which are upon us at the present are increasing the calls for help from many who are in distress, and the church should not be found lacking in doing her best to meet this situation. Added to this responsibility is the commission given to us to preach the gospel in all the world for a witness, before the coming of Christ. We trust that each one will fully sense his portion of this responsibility and give freely, as the Lord blesses.

We express our gratitude for the years of service which Brother Ulrich has rendered in this department of the work.

Sincerely yours,
BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

Pastoral

To the Saints and Friends in Utah and Idaho; Greeting: Having been appointed supervisor of missionary work in Utah and Idaho, I take this means of announcing my willingness to be of whatever service I can to all those who are willing to cooperate for the spreading of the gospel and missionary work in general.

Inasmuch as we are required to labor under some difficulty because of a shortage in appointed missionaries, it will be necessary to utilize each one in local conditions who will respond to the call to carry on the missionary work.

Whereas we all realize there is wisdom in a multitude of counsel, I would be glad to hear from any of the brethren, sisters, or friends who would care to offer any suggestions as to where and how best to serve the church, the world, and ourselves in carrying on our missionary work. First of all, let everyone interested become familiar with the "missionary policy" as provided for by the joint council. In so doing we will be able to work in harmony with the authorities of the church, in harmony with each other, and therefore to the best possible good of all concerned.

Those who have not a copy of the "missionary policy" herein referred to, may obtain the same by writing me at my Ogden address.

I realize that there are many earnest Saints who are anxious to give expression to their zeal in service. The most sufficient way in which we can render service is that everyone learn his duty and stand in the office of his calling. In order to do this we must have organization. Organization brings understanding of each other, of principles involved, of objectives and cooperation. In putting into operation these things we can expect success, satisfaction, peace, and joy in service well rendered.

May we prayerfully and earnestly cooperate together in the great work intrusted to us, is my prayer.

I solicit correspondence and suggestions from all those interested in the onward progress of our work.

In gospel bonds,
R. L. FULK.
OGDEN, UTAH, 1501 Washington Avenue.

Having been appointed to labor in the Northeastern and Saint Louis, Missouri, Districts, I desire to get in touch with district and branch officers, especially those of Northeastern Missouri. I should like also to get in touch with the scattered members, where there is an opportunity for missionary work.

Let us push the work and make an opportunity. Those who are willing to tract their locality and assist a missionary in campaign, write me at my home address.

In gospel bonds,
A. M. BAKER.
KOSHKONONG, MISSOURI, Route 1, Box 12.

To the Saints of the Toronto District; Greeting: The undersigned has recently been appointed by the joint council as missionary supervisor for the above-named district. I trust this arrangement may tend to forward the work of the church in our district. May renewed vigor and efforts come to us, that we may be a blessing to mankind.

There is much to be done and the harvest is white and growing whiter, and the laborers are few. I trust that as we meditate on the excellent work mapped out for us in the gospel, it may bring to us a realization that we are part of this great movement. Also may we grow determined that we will find something to do in carrying the gospel into the world, which is pained and travailed, waiting for us to bring them the gladsome news of Jesus Christ.

This is written to request the cooperation of every member and friend of the church in prosecuting the missionary work among the people in the district.

I will need the hearty support of all, because the field is large, and without your aid I will be unable to do that which will meet the present needs. But with your support and the help of God I may be able to produce results. Let us find something to do.

Will be glad to hear from isolated members.

Please let me hear from you regarding your needs in your respective localities concerning missionary work. What are the prospects? What help can you give? Can you assist in preaching, tracting, or otherwise. I assure you that I will give all the assistance I can.

May the God of love and peace be with each one.

GUY P. LEVITT.

Conference Minutes

HOLDEN STAKE.—June 24 at 10 a. m. at Knobnoster, Missouri. Elder Paul M. Hanson was associated with the stake presidency in presiding over the conference. Reports of the various officers in the stake were read and approved. The appointment of Sister Ticy Moler as recorder of the stake was ratified. Provision was made for holding a reunion in the stake in 1923 with details to be worked out by the stake presidency and bishopric. A total of $54.78 was subscribed by various members of the stake to finish paying for the new stake tent. Eighteen delegates and 9 alternates were chosen to represent the stake at the next General Conference with the power to cast a full delegate vote and in case of a division to cast a majority and a minority vote. At 3:30 p. m. the meeting was turned over to the Women's Department with Sister I. M. Ross, stake organizer, in charge. At 4 p. m. Sunday school business was transacted with C. F. Scardiff, stake superintendent, in charge. Forty delegates were chosen to represent the stake Sunday school department at the General Sunday School Convention. At 4:30 Religio field-worker, I. M. Ross, spoke for a few minutes. At 8 p. m. preaching by Paul M. Hanson. Prayer service at 8 a. m. Sunday with H. E. Moler and C. V. Hopkins in charge. Sunday school at 9:45 a. m., in charge of Knobnoster local. Superintendent R. B. Henderson. Preaching at 11 o'clock by Paul Hanson. A collection of $10.02 was taken to defray conference expenses. Sunday at 2:30 p. m. priesthood meeting was held in the basement and a women's meeting in the main auditorium. Adjourned at 4 o'clock to meet next at Warrensburg, Missouri, subject to the call of the stake presidency. Stake secretary.

EASTERN IOWA.—At Cedar Rapids, Iowa, June 16, 17, 18. District President Amos Berve, associated with W. W. Richards, president. Various reports showed an advancement all along the line. Present enrollment of the district was reported as 570. Bishop's agent's report showed $3,972.37 received as tithes and offerings, etc., with disbursements of the same amount. Officers elected: Amos Berve, district president; W. W. Richards and C. A. Beil associated with him in the district presidency; district secretary, W. W. Richards; treasurer, O. E. Lindsay; chorister, Mabel Hall. John Shippy, of Oelwein, was ordained an elder. A good crowd was in attendance at the conference and much interest was manifested. Very educational round table discussions were had on questions of Zion. We were favored to have Professor Floyd M. McDowell with us, who delivered some grand lectures, that called forth words of appreciation from all who had the pleasure of hearing him. One noticeable feature of the conference was the provision made for the children by the district president, who during the regular services invited all the children under twelve into an adjoining room, where he told stories to them. Cedar Rapids very ably cared for the conference. Muscatine asked for the next conference. We are now ready for the reunion at Maquoketa next month. Wesley W. Richards, secretary.

ALABAMA.—At Flat Rock, June 3, with district presidency presiding and G. W. Miniard, secretary pro tem. D. E. Sellers, chorister, with power to choose organist; T. N. Peacock, usher, with power to choose assistants. Branches reporting: Flat Rock and Lone Star. Ministry reported. A recommendation from Flat Rock Branch that J. T. Coleman be ordained to office of teacher and Curtis Barlow to office of priest was approved and ordinations provided for. Bishop's agent's receipts, $65.45; expenditures, $33; balance, $32.45. Books audited and found correct. Adjourned to meet with Lone Star, September 2, 1922. G. W. Miniard, secretary pro tem.

Free Agricultural Scholarship

The Missouri Pacific Railway is offering an Agricultural Short Course Scholarship in various counties in Missouri. The award pays one half the expenses for two years and amounts to $100. Each man is rated on his education, capacity for leadership, good judgment, and industry; on his public achievements, such as cooperating with the Missouri College of Agriculture in demonstration work; on community service in schools, church, farm, and other organizations; on his private achievement in his vocation.

The short course is held during the four winter months, November to February inclusive. Applicants must be between sixteen and thirty. Those interested should write to Superintendent of Short Courses, Missouri College of Agriculture, Columbia, Missouri.

Thrift Reduces Demand

We are confronted with a great many statistics in the daily press and sometimes reference is made thereto in our church publications. A gathering of averages is often a good thing, but, after all, there is not such a thing as an average individual.

Again, recent analysis and statistics have proven not to agree with actual facts. Thus it is stated that the need for cotton exceeds production, but seven million old bales are still stored in the United States with a new crop coming on. Statistics, we are informed, show that the need for iron exceeds the full capacity of all plants throughout the world; while, in fact, the steel plants are working at only 40 to 70 per cent of their capacity.

The reason is that life is not a matter of statistics. The human element must also be considered. Thrift, or careful saving by an individual, reduces the demand.

Back to Whiskers for a Month

The city of Sacramento, California, celebrated the days of '49 from May 23 to 29. A city ordinance was passed requiring every man to wear whiskers. Some had difficulty growing them within a month. A kangaroo court was established and those not properly adorned were fined. One of our correspondents writes us that it was rather amusing to see the local priesthood occupying in the church services all wearing mustaches, side burns, "Kentucky Colonel," or full beard.

For Reunion and Convention Programs

"The opportunity of the Sunday school," a new play, written by Mrs. Margret Davis, of Des Moines, member Independence Pen and Ink Club. Emphasizes that we should be our brother's keeper. Requires about ten special characters, and two small classes of boys. Time of production, about forty-five minutes. Published in leaflet form. Write Herald Publishing House; price, per copy, 10 cents; per dozen, 90 cents.

Definition of Saint

It has been said truly by a great scholar of the science of religion that the best definition of a saint is that he is one who makes it easier for other men and women to believe in God.—Professor Cairns, in Christian Century.

Some churches have taken steps toward beautification of their premises, and some have not. In which class is yours? Why not do something this fall?

Prepare for Service in the Church

TAKE A COURSE IN RELIGIOUS EDUCATION AT GRACELAND COLLEGE

"Till we all come to a unity of the faith."

Is there unity of faith in the church now? No! Yet there must be before Zion can be redeemed. The leaders of the church, the ministry, must understand each other, they must present a solid front to the world. There must be no disagreement on the vital points of doctrine. In what better way can this result be helped than for the young men who are to represent the church to come together and spend a year or two studying and discussing the vital problems of the church? As education is the great leveling process in a democracy, so it must be the ultimate unifying force in the church.

Wisdom and depth of knowledge are fundamental factors in effecting unity among men. The church has made provision for you to add to your wisdom and knowledge of things spiritual, doctrinal, and vital, by offering a course in religious education at Graceland College. Young man, young woman, are you interested in the great latter-day work? Does it mean more to you than all else? Then come, let us reason together.

The church needs you; ignorance and darkness abound in the world; the field is ripe already for the harvest. Thrust in your sickle and reap. But stay! Are you prepared? The church needs efficient workers. Are you willing to prepare to aid in accomplishing the biggest task ever committed to man—the redemption of Zion? Are you conscious of the deep significance of the Gospel Plan?

"Life and Religion Are One, or Neither Is Anything"

No one is so lonely, so miserable, so despairingly hopeless in all the world as the one who denies God. As an orphan in a strange land, having lost the greatest of fathers, he stands mournfully by the corpse of Nature, unmoved and unsustained by the Spirit of the Universe. Out of step with humanity, unsympathetic, unloved, and unhonored, he passes through life, and the crumbling away of his earthly tabernacle is but a welcome release from such an unnatural existence.

No scheme of education is complete which does not teach religion. Are you thoroughly grounded in the religion of your fathers—in the gospel of the latter days? Do you have an intelligent understanding of the doctrine of the church, the arguments brought against it by its enemies and how to meet them? Are you aware of the difficult problems before the church, and are you preparing to aid in their solution?

The glory of God is intelligence. Intelligence is light and truth. In other words, it is the inspiration of the Spirit, plus a wide range of knowledge. The Spirit does not reveal all truth, but leads into all truth. Knowledge of the truth comes as a result of exertion by man himself. Enlist to-day in the great army of young men and young women who are preparing themselves—by study as well as by faith—to establish the Latter-day Glory upon the earth. For complete information

Justification

(Synopsis of the commencement address by President Elbert A. Smith, at the Twenty-sixth annual commencement of Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa, June 7, 1922.)

It is with pleasure that I appear before you on this very happy occasion. Certainly it is a happy occasion for the parents whose sons and daughters tonight complete with honor their studies in Graceland College. It is a happy occasion for the faculty and instructors who have completed another year of hard and faithful work. And it is a happy occasion for the young men and women who have finished their studies in the institution and won through to graduation, though I imagine that they must feel a degree of sadness when they think about bidding Graceland "good-by" for the last time as students. It is true they may return to Graceland—but as visitors. Never again can they possibly have part in the intimate inner student life of the institution.

High Ideals and Common Sense

Yet auspicious and happy as the occasion is, still for some reason I do not feel at all disposed to empty out upon your devoted heads a great tub of oratory, nor to spray you with adjectives. Some of you who are graduating have learned to pour forth oratory on your own account; others of you have suffered, more or less patiently, because of the oratory or near oratory of your fellows. I wish to-night simply to present some plain yet fundamental facts. I would like to give you a mixture of high ideals and common sense in proportion of about fifty-fifty. In fact, I would like you to carry with you through life common sense and high ideals in the proportion of fifty-fifty. I am ambitious for you, because that is a most unstable and difficult combination for a human being to maintain—about as much so as some chemical solutions. One or the other, either common sense or idealism is quite likely to be precipitated and settle to the bottom. And in some instances I have known the one to evaporate and the other to be precipitated, leaving the individual in a deplorable condition.

Changing the simile, high ideals and common sense are the two sides of the field that you ought to take with you in the battle of life. If you have high ideals inscribed on one side of the shield and the other side blank, you are quite likely to go through life with Don Quixote, fighting windmills.

If you have common sense on one side of the shield and do not have high ideals on the other, you are quite likely to become grossly materialistic and perhaps, like Esau, sell your birthright for a mess of pottage; or like Judas Iscariot, sell the Son of God for thirty pieces of silver. Why, certainly, get the pottage while it is hot! Get the silver while it is to be had. Isn't that common sense from a worldly standpoint? and is not that the principle upon which business is done to a great extent?

I wish to speak to-night on the subject of "Justification." Our fathers were great theologians. They juggled with such terms as justification, sanctification, predestination, and foreordination as a juggler does with butcher knives, and forks. And the orthodox man was the one who got away with it without cutting off his theological nose. So I wish to use the term justification in a very simple and easily understood way. You have all seen individuals concerning whom you thought there was no good reason for them to continue on earth. Perhaps there never was a visible reason for their residence here. They were like the little boy who presented himself at school the first day and when the teacher asked him his age and the date of his birth he could not answer. So at noon he had his mother carefully write the date of his birth upon a slip of paper. He put the paper in his pocket and, being a potential man, lost it on the way to school; but being yet very much of a little boy, he presented himself at school in tears and with lamentations, declaring that he had lost his excuse for being born.

An Abundant Justification

We come into this world possessed with intelligence, which we believe to be spiritual. It is marvelous, wonderful, and incomprehensible even to itself. This intelligence is served, warmed, sheltered, and housed by a body composed of exceedingly perishable tissues. Those tissues must be renewed constantly by additional material won from the material world about us. We think we must eat at least three times a day—oftener if we can. To renew the perishable tissues of the body, we must by our exertions obtain from nature this material, or some one must do it for us. And in a physical sense justification consists in winning this substance or in returning service adequately to those who win it for us. But in a much broader sense we have other obligations of a spiritual nature. Because of our interrelation with other human beings, we have many responsibilities, moral and spiritual, which we gather up under the term of duty. The individual who discharges adequately all duties, is justified in his life. At the very least his accounts should balance. Preferably there should be a large amount to his credit. Such individuals the Apostle Peter had in mind when he spoke about those who had been neither barren nor unfruitful and so should receive an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom.

www.LatterDayTruth.org

"At Work, at Home, or at Church"

Some months ago a man in Canada wrote to the — minister in Independence, asking him about our people. The minister, perhaps not thinking that his letter would ever return to Independence, replied, making some very undeserved statements concerning our people, identifying them more or less by implication with the Utah people, intimating that they did not practice polygamy through fear of the law, and saying, "There are many of them here, but we have nothing to do with them." The one receiving the letter showed it to Elder Philemon Pement, who then wrote to the office. Our publicity man addressed a letter to each member of the board of that particular church, asking him if the minister's letter properly represented the board. All that I wish to get out of this is that one of them in his reply said, "When people ask me concerning Latter Day Saints I tell them that you will usually find a Latter Day Saint either at home or at work or at church."

Doctor Richard Cabot, of Boston, who is not only a great doctor of medicine but also a great doctor of souls, has a book entitled, What Men Live By. Three of the four things that he names are work, love, and worship. This statement you notice almost parallels those things that the man referred to catalogued as being characteristic of Latter Day Saints. Cabot says that men live by work. This man said that Latter Day Saints would be found at work or at home or at church. Cabot says that men live by work and love and worship. Home is the headquarters of love, the capital city of the kingdom of love. No matter how far a man may extend his dominion in the kingdom of love, home should continue to be the capital city, while the church is the interpreter of worship and of religion. These three things are going to bulk large in the life that is justified, a man's work, his home, and his religion.

"From Insects to Angels—Creation Hums With Toil"

Taking first the question of work. There is a mistaken idea, perhaps based on a misinterpretation of certain passages in the early chapters of Genesis, to the effect that work is a curse—some seem to render it, "Cursed be work." As a matter of fact, work is not a curse. Excessive toil, uncongenial toil, and unrewarded toil may indeed be a curse, but work is normal and natural. It is a curse when men cannot work; when they cannot get work; but the biggest and bitterest curse is when they do not want to work. All animals, with the exception of parasites, must labor for their living. A boy thinks it hard work to mow the lawn on a hot day, even with a sharp lawn mower; but the poor old cow must mow a whole pasture and do it with her mouth. Bees work day and night, gathering and storing and preparing their honey. Naturalists state that bees visit sixty thousand blossoms in making a single pound of honey, and travel a total of five million miles. Ants work incessantly digging their tunnels and sinking their mines and gathering their food. There is a literal basis for Doctor Cabot's statement that, "From insects to angels—creation hums with toil." God himself worked six days and on the seventh rested from his labors.

Emerson said, "Every man's job is his life preserver. Idleness breeds melancholy in the aged and drives young people to the Devil." What is that longing gnawing at the heart of the old man who has retired from business to enjoy life? It is the desire to be back on the job. What is that longing burning in the eyes of the invalid? the cripple? It is the wish to be again doing a man's work in the world. Work is natural and normal and must be a part of the plan of a well-considered and justified life.

"Be Ye Also Ready"

To do successful work, there must be preparation. There must be a general preparation. All parents generally desire that their children shall have the benefit of at least the grade schools. It would seem to follow that a more thorough preparation would be even more valuable. There must also be a special preparation. The person who makes no preparation for the particular task that he intends to do is something like the Irishman who was set to the job of greasing the wagon. He was recently from the Emerald Isle and knew nothing about farm machinery. The farmer who had hired him told him to grease the wagon. After two or three hours the Irishman returned to report. When asked if he had greased the wagon he replied, "Sure, I greased it all over, excepting where the wheels go round, and I couldn't get at them places." The man who makes no special preparation for his special work in the world is quite likely to grease his job all over—excepting where it needs greasing.

All admire heroes. We are given to hero worship. A hero is a person who not only is not afraid, but who also knows what to do and how to do it in the time of emergency. A group of people are disporting themselves upon the golden sand and in the blue waters of the Pacific. Some of them venture beyond their depth and the undertow carries one woman far out to sea. There are scores and perhaps hundreds of brave men on the beach who would like to help, but they do not know how; but there is one man, the life guard, who has been trained for that particular work. He knows how to swim, how to rescue drowning people, and how to resuscitate them. He is the hero of the occasion, not only because he is not afraid, but because he knows what to do and how to do it.

What Was Christ's Work at Twelve Years of Age?

I think I may presume to say that Christ himself set the example of preparation. At twelve years of age he was found in the temple arguing with the doctors of the law. He himself said, "Search the Scriptures." We can hardly imagine that he commanded us to do something that he did not do himself. He also said, "I must be about my Father's business." What was his business at that time? He was only twelve years old. His mission did not begin yet for some eighteen years. What was his business at that time? Most certainly it must have been the business of preparation. When finally the time came and he entered upon his ministry, he said to his disciples, "Be ye also ready."

Choice of Work

After preparation by prayer and study, there comes the choice of work. This rests with the individual, though he may be guided by counsel, and perhaps be benefited by the modern test of mentality and efficiency. It follows logically, however, that the man who has been blessed primarily with great talent, and who secondarily has perfected it by study and preparation to the highest point, has the widest range of choice. A college athlete, well versed in the science of geology, may on a pinch, if he puts his mind to it, make a splendid pick and shovel man in a ditch; but not many pick and shovel men could obtain work from the Government making geological surveys. The prepared man has the wider range of choice. I just wish to mention one thing in connection with this choice, and that is that the individual ought to choose some work that will render real service to humanity; work that has justification in its very nature. The tobacco grower or cigar maker can hardly find joy in his vocation if he thinks seriously about it; though I can imagine that a man who grows wheat or corn finds great joy in his service, because he is helping to feed humanity. And so also with the man who makes steel rails, or digs coal, or makes overcoats, or carries letters over the route, or delivers groceries, or is an engineer or fireman, or any one of thousands of vocations in agriculture, manufacturing, or commerce. This is particularly true if men will subscribe to the doctrine of consecrated service set forth in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, where it is said that the laborer and man of business are workers together with the ministry towards one common end. Our men, therefore, can find in all forms of honorable and useful labor, whether mental or manual, the joy of consecrated service.

Seizing Opportunities

After preparation and choice comes opportunity. The older generation is constantly passing away, making room for the new. Vacancies are always occurring; but more than that there are always new opportunities opening up with new generations. Fifty years ago the boundless West opened its arms and said, Come, young man; take a homestead, free, without cost! That opportunity is past, but science opens up new opportunities in scientific agriculture, new methods of communication, transportation, etc. And these opportunities often are found near at home. The poem about Opportunity knocking but once at every door is a wonderful poem, but possibly not altogether true. Opportunity knocks every day and every hour. Perhaps some one great Opportunity has knocked at your door and never returned. Be ready then for the next one. Keep your hand on the doorknob; when he knocks open it and grab him by the hair of the head, for Shakespeare says that he is bald behind and you must not let him turn about. Treat him so that he need not knock but once at your door.

Doctor Conwell, in his lecture called "Acres of diamonds," has some very splendid illustrations. He tells about the Persian, Ali Hafed, who had a farm on the banks of the river Indus. He was happy and prosperous until a traveler told him about diamonds; how valuable they were, how priceless. He became seized with the fever and sold his farm and departed into far lands to search for diamonds. The man who bought the farm, some time later found a peculiar pebble in the brook in front of his door and it proved to be a wonderful diamond, and on that very spot was developed the Golconda diamond mines, the richest in the world. So also with the California rancher who in the early forties got the gold fever and sold his ranch and departed to distant lands to search for gold. General Sutter bought the ranch and built a mill, and one day his little daughter came into the house with a handful of yellow gold dust that she had taken from the bottom of the mill race. Right there on that ranch, deserted by the man who went far away to seek for gold, was developed the first and among the greatest of the California gold diggings. The moral of Doctor Conwell's lecture is that there are acres of diamonds under our feet. They await the eye to see them, and we may quite easily miss them while we run far off seeking for distant and elusive treasures.

The Man Who Did Not Stop or Turn Back

With preparation and right choice and opportunity, there must be associated the purpose and the will to carry a man forward to a predetermined goal. Having made up his mind what he will do and what he will be, the man should set his will to that purpose so inflexibly that fluctuating emotional stages and even vacillating mental states will not divert him from his purpose. When General Grant graduated at West Point he occupied twenty-first place in a class of twenty-nine. There were twenty pupils who seemed to be more brilliant than he and to have more promise in them. But he tells us in his memoirs he had a superstition from boyhood that if he started anywhere on a journey, or undertook to do anything, that he would neither cease nor turn back until he had accomplished his purpose. When the war broke out there were many generals more brilliant and promising, but he was the one of all who neither stopped nor turned back; who fought it out on that line, and so succeeded where others failed.

The Home Fundamental

We must come now to the second division of my theme, the home. The home is older and more fundamental than the state. It is older and in some respects as sacred as the church. I use the term home as including the family and all that it stands for. These are the organs of organic society: the home, the state, the church, etc. When anything is seriously wrong with one of them or all of them, organized society is suffering from organic disease, just as the body may suffer from tuberculosis of the lungs, leakage of the heart, or cancer of the stomach. To-day society is suffering from organic disease. The state is threatened; religion is threatened; and the home is being undermined.

I need hardly comment on the increase of crime. It is being commented on by all classes of observers, by educators, by statesmen, and politicians who are by no means statesmen, by editors, and lawyers, and judges. The newspapers are full of it, but a recent number of the Literary Digest reminds us that even as with an iceberg, towering and menacing as it may seem to be above the water, only one eighth of it is visible and seven eighths is concealed beneath the surface. Even so it alleges that with this terrible wave of crime, though so much of it is heard in the papers and seen in the affairs of life, probably seven eighths of it is concealed and not visible. This terrible iceberg crashes down upon the institutions that sustain civilization. These institutions are threatened by the prevailing anarchy and confusion and lawlessness of thought and habit that do not brook government or law or discipline or restraint. The home is imperiled equally with the other institutions, and perhaps even more so. Civilization and the church await the attitude of the younger generation towards the home.

The Angel of the Bread Board

I am talking now not about houses, but about homes. A home may be established in a bungalow, or even in a tent, or possibly in a palace, though it is not often done in a palace, because there are too many servants to do the work. It seems that a home almost needs a breadwinner and a breadmaker. The guardian angel of the home has her sleeves rolled up and her hands in the dough and flour upon her cheek.

Young people, approach this business with care and thought and prayer. You would not choose a partner in an important business particularly for life simply because he happens to be a graceful dancer. You would not select such a partner simply because you happened to like the exact tint of her cheek. You may have heard the story of the man who sealed his betrothal with a kiss and that night died of painter's colic. Not wishing to leave town to-night, I hasten to say that this did not occur at Graceland College. Our brave boys do not face such perils at the college, but I have said that they are brave boys, and if they did I am sure they would not shrink from danger. This must have occurred in some art school where girls are compelled to paint. That young man fell in love with a very fine job of exterior decoration. But if the home is to endure, you must be like the wise man and build upon a rock, the rock of abiding love. If love is to abide, it must have something abiding to love, and that must be true, permanent worth of character. You must have a love that will last from the first joy ride to the sad day when one of the partners takes the last slow ride under the nodding plumes of the village hearse.

I do not think of Zion as a collection of factories or farms, but rather as a collection of homes. Much depends upon the home builders of the future. The ancient symbols of the rooftree, the hearthstone, the family board, and the family altar must be restored to their sacred and dominant place in our lives.

The Question of Religion

I come now, last of all, to the question of religion. A generation ago the characteristic sound of the Sabbath morning was the ringing of church bells. All roads led to church. To-day the Sabbath stillness is disturbed by other sounds. Did I say Sabbath stillness? Pardon me; that is merely a figure of speech. It may be and is a legitimate part of education to teach men how to make a living, so that they may be justified in a physical sense. A much higher function of education is that of religion, to teach men not only how to make a living, but how to live. The justified life must establish right relations with God and with man. In fact, that is the vital essence of all those ancient terms of justification, sanctification, foreordination, predestination, salvation, the establishing of right relationship with God and with our fellow man.

The Two Great Commandments

There have been many laws given. The ancient laws of the Medes and Persians which changed not, the laws of the Babylonians, laws of the Egyptians, laws of the Romans, and last of all, our English laws. There have been laws, ordinances, statutes, ukases, manifestoes, papal bulls, and commandments without number, all a part of the effort of man and God to formulate rules of living by which life might be justified. At one time there came on the scene of action a man before whom the wise men bowed in humility, at whose birth the angels sang; and in reply to the questions of a lawyer he said in substance, "Hear, all men! hear, all the world! From all these laws I will select the two great laws upon which all others hang. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind. This is the first great commandment; and the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. Upon these two hang all the laws and the prophets."

All laws and all commandments are subsidiary to these two, the essence of which is that we shall get right with God and get right with our fellow men. In loving my neighbor as myself I do not think that includes only that I shall have a warm equatorial feeling; that there shall go out from me all the time an overflow of emotional activity; but rather that I shall come to perceive that his right in all things is equal to mine. That is the antithesis of individualism. Individualism thinks first and always of self and perhaps of wife and children who are an extension of self, and to these considerations sacrifices all other people. When I come to the point where at all times I am willing to admit the rights and needs of my brother as equal with mine, and entitled to have equal consideration, I am in a fair way to keep the commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." That greatly to be desired condition we approach with halting steps. We reach after it with groping hands? We move towards it with almost blind eyes. But we have perceived the ideal, are trying to follow the light, and we move forward with faith that our quest will finally be successful.

The Rainbow of Hope

Some weeks ago I went to Mondamin, Iowa, to deliver the baccalaureate sermon before the graduating class of the high school. As I went up the valley from Omaha the steam from the engine blew back alongside of the train, and the morning sun shining through it formed a perfect rainbow. I had an individual rainbow just outside my window, that followed me all the way up the valley. It appeared and disappeared and reappeared. Thus, since the day when God in storm and flood set the rainbow of hope over a ruined world, has the rainbow of hope followed the footsteps of man. And that hope has been that sometime, somewhere, there might be raised up a holy community from which would be banished the ancient evils of sin and sickness and poverty and ignorance. That day waits the time when a people will be raised up to keep these two great commandments. When that time comes, human lives will have perfect justification.

In conclusion I may say that we welcome the addition of these young people to our community's strength. Coming as they do with their undiminished vigor, with their upflaming ambition, with their high ideals balanced we hope by common sense, we welcome them, believing that they will greatly help in the working out of our program. And on behalf of the community, of Graceland College, and the church, I bid them farewell from their college work and welcome them to the life and activity that may be before them.

Arrangements for General Conference

The present plan is to provide a tent for the General Conference, seating about three thousand persons, located just south of the Temple Lot in Independence. This should give seating capacity for all at the business sessions; with the Stone Church in reserve for special meetings. It should thus be possible for a large crowd, if not all, to attend the business sessions and the special services.

The cost of this tent with rented chairs will be about $1,000. Visiting Saints will be given an opportunity to contribute so as to relieve the general church treasury.

There are also provisions being made for a camp ground for auto parties. The conference meets in the fall of the year (beginning October 1), a pleasant time to drive and camp out. This ground will be near town. At present the athletic grounds at the foot of West Walnut Street is under consideration, where there will be water and toilets provided.

These announcements are preliminary, as full particulars will be printed later.

Why Evolution Should Be Taught

It is necessary to meet the conditions of to-day. But to understand a theory does not mean to accept and believe.

In the HERALD for last week there appears an editorial, "Why teach evolution?" A subheading has been added which quite changed the purpose of the article, for it was our position then and is now that we must expect evolution to be presented in Grace-land College.

The reasons for this, as then stated, are that the various ideas and hypotheses which are at different times grouped under the term evolution have a very large place in the intellectual life of to-day. We should have men and women who are able to discuss these subjects intelligently. To do so they must be informed. This, if combined with proper spirituality, or as President Elbert A. Smith has expressed it in the terms of the Apostle Paul, "When you add to your faith virtue, you may safely add to your faith and virtue, knowledge." The better informed a speaker is, the better able he is to meet the various obligations of his ministry and present the message of the church, other things being equal.

As a further reason, it was suggested that most, if not all, of our textbooks to-day are written from that viewpoint. Textbooks are nearly always a goodly distance after the best of research of the day. Some may suggest for this reason that we should have no textbooks or that they are of but very little value. It would be as consistent to urge that we should not use electric lights because with the memory of many the dip candle was succeeded by the tallow candle; this in turn by various forms of kerosene or oil lamps; this by gas and improved gas lights; and the electric light itself has gone through many changes up to the argon and nitrogen lights of to-day. Quite likely the next few years will bring us something still more effective. Should we therefore refuse to use that which we already have? Man's knowledge of truth is certainly progressing.

In the third place, it is not possible to get professors who have not become more or less grounded in this subject and imbued therewith. And, as then pointed out, it would not be desirable to secure such professors if we could.

The term evolution covers a wide variety of concepts. If we ask a man if he believes in evolution, it is necessary first to define more accurately what we mean, for it is probable that belief in the possibility of human progress is as generally held, or nearly so, as is a belief in some form of religion—that we may become better and do better, following a law of human growth.

On the other hand, it is undoubtedly true that many young people of to-day are becoming agnostic, if not atheistic, from the manner in which these scientific subjects are presented. Their moorings are destroyed and nothing is offered that provides an adequate substitute. It is true that some men in the name of science, some in the name of evolution, present a crass materialism, and that some attempt to explain all human thought as but a manifestation of the movement of matter, and religion as only an aspect of human thought. Of course we cannot accept any such an idea, a substitution of positivism for a belief in God (positivism used in the sense of an attempt to explain our existence in purely material terms). Nor is it at all necessary to accept and believe every plausible hypothesis. To understand does not mean to accept and believe.

It is doubtless true that a great many of our men, if not a large part of our thinking men, have been greatly influenced by what they have read along scientific lines, and that this has affected, more or less, their religious attitude. But living in the world that we are to-day, and a part thereof as we are, we are bound to be more or less affected by current thought, and it is an adequate defense, if our information is sufficiently broad, that we know the truth of these matters as well as the truth set forth in the word of God.

It is unfortunate that many young people have been more or less seriously upset. It is unfortunate that at times these subjects have been, here and there in different places throughout the country, presented in a way to insure that disaffection or normally to produce it. On the other hand, because of the convenience of not thinking, occasionally there is a tendency to explain all difficulties of young people in their studies as being the fault of the teaching of evolution, which is hardly the case.

Briefly summing it up, we ought, as a people, to be informed on the thought of to-day. To do this we must have faculty members who are in turn informed. The literature of to-day is so imbued with these ideas that we should know what they are, their strength and weakness; and where can such information better be secured than in our own college, where our young people receive their training under the most favorable conditions that we know of at any place, and under the influence of men of the church of God who are not afraid to face every issue frankly and fairly, with open minds?

Appointed Once to Die

By Joseph Luff

Let us not pass adverse judgment till we know the complete plan.

(Funeral sermon of Daniel F. Lambert, at Lamoni, Iowa, May 4, 1922. Reported by Winsome Smith McDonald.)

This brief statement was given to me by way of obituary:

Daniel F. Lambert, son of Richard and Jane Lambert, was born at Nauvoo, Illinois, on the 15th day of November, 1850. He was married September 30, 1875, at Montrose, Iowa, to Hattie A. Burley. Of the three children born of this union, two survive—Sisters Lena J. Graham, of Lamoni, Iowa, and V. L. Krucker, of Miami, Oklahoma. He was baptized at Nauvoo, Illinois, May 27, 1864, by Joseph Smith. Over forty years of his life were spent in school-teaching, and for a number of years he filled the position of superintendent of schools.

I select from the Scriptures two brief passages, one from the 9th chapter of Hebrews, 27th verse: "It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment." The other from the 14th chapter of the letter to the Romans, as found in the 8th and 9th verses: "For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's. For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living."

My acquaintance with our departed brother extended over quite a long period of years, and the opportunities for it as I embraced and indulged them, gave me to understand that could I consult him to-day in regard to what I should say in performing the service that now devolves upon me, by request of the relatives, one of his first requests would be, "Say only what is necessary in regard to me and any of my personal qualities or virtues." He did not want himself advertised. There are men and women among us who so occupy their sphere and perform service for their fellow beings as God's representatives or ministers, as to place them above the reach of eulogy, and Daniel Lambert was one of these men; there is not anything I could say if I were to indulge my own inclination to-day in regard to his personal excellencies would add one single thing within your minds to the tribute that his life among you has already recorded there. You knew him, most of you, better than I have known him. You had better opportunities for continued companionship with him. From the first day that I met him, a number of years ago, I thought his companionship was desirable, and I have sought opportunities for having the acquaintance I then formed ripen into intimacy, that I might gain the advantage that I saw was valuable by continued relationship and intercourse with the man. His going away to-day leaves a gap in my life. I feel as though some part of my existence has been taken from me, and the joys and privileges that were in contemplation of less worth. I could say nothing that would add to the virtue of the life and the impress he has made upon the children of men who were favored with his association.

He Had Learned Self-Control

He was a man who quite early in life discovered the necessity within himself as well as in others for the exercise of self-control. He made himself a study, and before ever attempting to turn the searchlight upon other men, he turned it upon himself, and not until he found himself justified by what resulted did he attempt to apply it unto others. The virtue of the forces that he would recommend, he tested within himself first, and having learned their worth, he commended them to others.

He was not a boisterous man, noisy in the proclamation of his particular views; and though he was strong in his convictions, he always accorded unto other men equal right with himself, both for the enjoyment of their views and convictions and the expression of them; and while I would not attempt to proclaim him a perfect man any more than I would anyone else, outside of Jesus Christ, I do speak of him as one who exemplified virtues that are worthy of emulation on the part of all. He was a home man, devoted to his home, and the loneliness that his absence from there will produce is simply indescribable by me, and there would be no hope I could extend to those who will feel it most keenly if they had not the same resources to apply to that he had in life and from which what he drew enabled him to leave them these lessons which we refer to as a heritage.

God's Ways Not Ours

Long years ago God made a statement in the early ages of the world for the enlightenment of man, that they might not misunderstand or misinterpret his intent as his course affected their experiences in following years. That counsel or information was, "My ways are not your ways; neither are my thoughts your thoughts. As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways than your ways, and my thoughts than yours." I interpret the Almighty in this statement to mean that he wanted to convey this thought, that down on the common level we could not be expected to see far. On the common level in the midst of the crowd no man can see outside of the circle of which he forms a part, or the circumference of that crowd; but if he be raised on a pedestal above the crowd, the area of his vision enlarges proportionately. The higher he is lifted the wider the area becomes, and in proportion as he rises he is made capable of judging the effect of what is done in the midst of that crowd as he views its results, and its outgoings. God wanted us to understand that he was so high that there is no possibility of getting any higher; that he was on the summit of the celestial hills, and what he said and what he did for mankind was always the result of the judgment that his wisdom led him to reach from that position which was higher than any man occupied, and took in the vast eternity. When a pebble was dropped in the water in the midst of humanity's circle, he knew where the ripple it started would lead to, and just where it would overlap the shores of eternity, and the advice given by him to humanity was given, not because of the effect that we see it produces at that time, but because his eyes were on the eternal outcome. This is why we do not understand it in all its relations sometimes.

Judging an Unfinished Product

Death, like almost all other events and conditions incident to our present estate, takes on an aspect according to the angle or sphere from which we view it. Sixty-two or sixty-three years ago I was a bit of a boy living in Toronto, Canada, and I remember of awaking once and slipping from my little cot and looking out into the room beyond, lighted by a tallow candle, and seeing my mother, as I had seen her sitting by the table there numberless times; in one hand she held a piece of cloth, and in the other her needle and thread, stitching away with an expression of weariness on her face. She had four children, two boys and two girls, to provide for, and that necessitated what she was doing. Stepping out into the room as I had done at other times and talking with her a little while, I asked:

"What is that you are making, ma?"

And she said, "It is a coat, my son." She held it up before me.

As I looked at it I said, "Ma, you don't mean to say that is a coat, do you?"

"I do."

"Well," I said, "that is the funniest thing I ever saw in my life to call a coat."

"Well," she said, "you will get cold standing there; go back to bed, and I will talk to you a little later, when conditions are better."

So I slipped off to bed and was soon lost in slumber. A few days later she called me into her room, where she was busy, and held something up and asked me what it was.

I said, "That is a coat."

"Are you sure?"

I answered, "Yes; why, mother, anyone would know that is a coat."

Then she called my attention to what had occurred a day or two before, and said: "My boy, you remember what you said when I held up this piece of cloth before you?"

"Yes," I said.

"My son, learn this lesson: Never judge a work that is only half done, unless you know all the details that lie between it and the finish and what the object is." She continued, "When I took that first piece of cloth in one hand and the needle and thread in the other I had an image in my mind, and I started out to make those pieces of cloth, when joined together, express that image so that what I had in my mind to start with everybody would pronounce a perfect expression of it when it was done. But you came and expressed your opinion when it was not half done. My son, when I put in the first stitch to join two pieces of that cloth together, I knew where each stitch would be taken all along the line; and then when the work was produced and held up, what the common verdict would be; and you have proved what I knew. You say anybody now would call it a coat. Learn this lesson, son: Never judge a work half done."

Do Not Judge God's Unfinished Work

Oh, if I could tell you, my brethren and sisters, the effect of that lesson upon my life! It is an old story. To-day I gaze upon the cold, motionless form that is inclosed in that casket; I look here and there, and I see the handkerchiefs to the eyes, as tears course their way down the cheek; I hear the voicing of sorrow and of grief, and I ask the question as I turn to the cause of it, and, as infidels have asked, as sages and philosophers have asked, through all the ages of history, "Can this be the work of a God of love?" And I hear a voice from heaven saying, "Do not judge God's work when only half done."

Do not judge God's work half done. It is appointed unto man once to die; but remember that Jesus Christ in the beginning counseled with his Father concerning this fact, and, taking it into consideration, reckoned with it in assuming the mission he had pledged for himself to enter upon. The text says, "Whether we live we are the Lord's; whether we die we are the Lord's." Why? Because, considering the appointments from the beginning and reckoning with them in the plan that he himself laid in conjunction with his Father, and that he entered upon and executed so fully, he met all the conditions that came into the appointments connected with flesh and blood, and he did it with an object in view, that the reins should come into and remain in his own hand.

Christ's Place in Plan of Salvation

The power over death was in the hands of the Adversary. The effect that came upon men through transgression of law was expressing itself in tears, in sorrow, in death and separation; and reckoning with all that, Jesus entered upon a mission according to his appointment which required him to enter into all the conditions man was heir to under the appointment of God, as an inheritor of flesh and blood, with the intention of including in his authority and dominion that which would dispel the gloom which had formerly surrounded them, and could say to them, "I have been there, behold my footprints! I want you to understand that because you were under the appointment to die, is the reason why I took flesh and blood, that I might come under that appointment also, and by so doing include death and hell among the places where the dominion of my gospel is to be demonstrated. I know what conditions beset your passage into the other realms, the hours of bewilderment you would pass through, and your distress and agony and tears in consequence of the fear that this ends all. My mission in entering into this sphere was, as is stated: 'To this end Jesus both died and rose again and revived, that he might become the Judge of the living and the dead,' that no man should ever occupy these places thereafter without being confronted with the evidence that Jesus had preceded him there and removed all cause for fear. Death, sorrow, and the grave, being your human heritage, I make myself a voluntary sacrifice for your sake, and become a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, and put myself under the condition where death becomes a necessity. No man taketh my life from me. No man can compel my death. I have power to lay down my life and I have power to take it up again. It is a voluntary offering on my part, and I do it, that, going down into the realm of the dead, in God's name I may exert the divine power that proves that the church that I have established extends its mission beyond the grave and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; and I will take the keys of those gates from the hand of the one that formerly held them—the keys of death and of the grave."

After he had performed that service he met John on the Isle of Patmos and said, among other things, "John, I want you to write this to the seven churches in Asia, and I want it to be kept on record and go ringing down through all the ages wherever my name is mentioned, that I not only undertook this mission that I might become the possessor of these keys, that I might become the judge of the living and the dead, but I gave you the evidence as you looked upon me that I had executed it successfully. Behold, I am he that was dead and I am alive again. I have been there, I have come back, and I now hold the evidential trophies, the keys."

Who held them before? "I am he that now holds the keys of death and of hell. I am he that hereafter openeth and no man shutteth. I am he that shutteth and no man openeth. Tell the church that hereafter it need not look with dread upon the grave, when death comes. The keys of these places are in the hands of the best friend they ever had, a friend who cannot for a moment allow anything to occur that will not serve their best interests."

Ezekiel's Experience With Product of Death

And so, as I said a moment ago, as I look upon this casket and its contents, and link it with what I see around me, the cheerless faces, the sorrow and the loneliness that are expressed here, I think of the time when God showed his interest in poor, tried, suffering Israel, and he took Ezekiel the prophet in vision away out into a large valley, and allowed him to see that it was full of bones, and they were very dry; and he asked Ezekiel, "Son of man, can these bones live?"

In response Ezekiel said, "O Lord God, thou knowest."

So he said, "Ezekiel, prophesy unto these bones."

And Ezekiel goes on to say, "As soon as I had prophesied I saw the bones immediately begin to stir, bone hunting his fellow bone, until the air was full of bones seeking their own bones, until the formation in each instance was complete, and there stood before me the skeletons of an immense body of people." And then he prophesied at the command of God again, and flesh and sinew and skin came upon them, and then he said, "I was commanded to prophesy unto the four winds, and instantly at the command of God breath entered into these newly formed bodies, and they stood before me a mighty army; and as I viewed them I wondered in my soul, 'What does God mean by all this?' How can I interpret this wonderful presentation?"

God said, "Son of man, back in the place I took you from they are mourning in soul; tears are furrowing their cheeks, and they are sad. They consider the promises I made to Abraham years and years ago as having failed. They have seen generation after generation come and go in their turn and leave these heaps of bones as their only heritage. They have come to the conclusion that this God idea is a mistake, and are saying, 'Our hope is vain, our bones are dry, we are dying out as a race. We are cut off from our parts.' The promises of redeeming the seed of Abraham and bringing about a great and glorious culmination are a mistake. Go back and tell them what you have seen, and tell them this, that the God who created them originally has still the power and grace and divinity and potentialities that were there in his arm, and this is an unmistakable evidence his arm has not shrunken. Tell them that death as they look upon it has no power to interfere with the program to which the divine signature is attached. The power to create can recreate or resurrect to life.

"I promised eternal life; I promised redemption of Israel. Go back and tell them there is a time to come when I will prove to them all I have said, and I will call every one of them out of their graves, and I will put them back into their places in Israel, and when they stand there, that mighty army, then shall they know that I am God. Go back, Ezekiel, to the children of Abraham, the hosts of Israel, and tell them to dry up their tears and not judge God's work half done. I repeat it, Ezekiel, tell them not to judge God's work half done. My ways are not your ways, neither are my thoughts your thoughts. I reckoned with death and all else when laying my plans from the beginning. My unchanged promise is still eternal life as my gift to man."

The Grave as a Gateway to Life

Whoever would think of making the graveyard the gateway to life? Whoever would have thought, aside from God, that humanity's course, and the proper and best course unto the highest plane and most exquisite joy should run through the deepest sorrows? Whoever would think of that but God? The Apostle Paul was lifted away from this mundane sphere, as he said, unto the third heaven, unto the paradise of God, and saw some wonderful things, some of which he was forbidden to write, but God doubtless showed him there some things concerning life and death and the grave. He did not tell us all, a great many things were unlawful for him to write about.

But after he had this experience, in his letter to the Corinthian church, as you find it in the fifteenth chapter of the first epistle, he tells us (giving his ideas in my own words) that death is just as essential in executing the divine program as birth. It is no surprise to him at all, and the provision made by him at the beginning covers all these things along this line. Paul saw the people as we see them today, amid the tears, the casket, the loneliness, and the sorrowing, that characterized their human level, and he knew these were because of the angle from which they viewed the situation.

Death a Contribution to Triumph of God

You are down right in the midst of them, he says, but I have been elevated from the crowd to see and know things that no human being there has learned; and I, from this point of spiritual elevation, look upon the situation as God views things. I see how the divine links in the chain of his purpose are being connected, and I see the ultimate of it all, and I tell you this: Death is neither a defeat nor even an interruption of the divine plan, but rather a contribution towards its more glorious triumph; for "that which thou sawest is not quickened except it die," and then follows the complete subordination of death, hades, and the grave, in the final conquest and revelation. From the crest of this eternal finality I look for the historic incidents that have troubled your fleshly estates, and they have passed into forgetfulness—they are swallowed up in victory—thanks be to God who giveth us this victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Paul, in vision, saw the finished product. They to whom he wrote were viewing the less than half-finished work. Paul saw that what God had given to his church as a means to an end, was vital in all its details to the finishing point. Christ had adopted it and pursued it, and in him was furnished the demonstration, beyond possibility of contradiction, of its divinity all along the line. In other words, Jesus said by his life, There is my first step from the cradle; there is my second step; there is my third step; there is my fourth step; and so on to the hundredth or the thousandth.

Now in taking that first step I did nothing but what my Father commanded me, and so in all my course; where he ordered I began the work, so I continued and ended it. If you accept my testimony, then in expression of your confidence put your first step where I took my first. Put your second step where I took my second, and so on, continuing in the same manner, and just as surely as you took the first and continued to the end, where my last step landed me it will land you. I give you my guarantee. If it leads you through the grave, don't be afraid of death; I have been through it; my footprints are there in evidence. It was part of the program; I pursued the course cheerfully; I threw myself open as no other man had done, and gave God the right of way within me, and I said, I did not come to consult myself in this world, O Lord, or to take my own steps; I came solely and only to do thy will, that the world may have not only a declaratory, but an invincible argument—a demonstration—as to the divinity and efficiency of that which I have said to them—that which I guarantee to them will bring eternal life, and having that before them, they may be encouraged to invest where I have invested and meet the conditions without fear. To this end I assumed flesh—died—rose again—that the success of my work might become the base of your confidence.

Death's Sting Is Removed

That is what our gospel means to us to-day. Now to me the sting that used to be associated with death is not associated with it any more. I try in the exercise of faith, by divine grace, to mount up to that sphere where the apostle stood, in mind at least, when he uttered the words, that this was but a part of the program for humanity, that as man in the beginning was of the earth earthy, to adapt himself to the earthy conditions of that sphere, so the second man, who was the Lord from heaven, and whose continuation of existence on earth is his church, which is the body of Christ, is the means of adaptation to the heavenly estate. Paul says, "As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. Adaptation to the earthly environment being here completed, and having demonstrated the wisdom of God as to its efficiency, became a guarantee in our souls that the means for adaptation to the heavenly, being from the same God, we could step with confidence out on the platform and prepare ourselves for the heavenly environment and take on the Christ estate as naturally as the human had been taken on, and thus as Paul puts it: "Our conversion should not be on earth but in heaven, from whence we look for our Savior, our Lord Jesus Christ, who some day would change or transform this vile body to fit it for an expression of the condition that had been effected in the soul, that both would proclaim the finished work and compel the world's acknowledgment of its divinity.

Appointed to Die But Once

Oh, my brethren, it is a glorious picture, and as I follow it there springs before me a thousand thoughts, and each one becomes a text in turn, and each opens up a new field of contemplation, until I am lost amid the splendors of the glory into which the gospel of the Son of God leads us. It spells God, it spells Christ, it spells life, spells eternal bliss at every step and every turn we take in the road. The sadness I feel as I view the remains in the casket is swallowed up in the victory Christ has guaranteed. Somebody will be saying before long, "Poor Brother Luff is lying in his casket to-day; he has officiated at numbers of like occasions, and we are now performing this service for him." What of it? Just an incident in the program. It is appointed unto man once to die, but notice that word once. Do not get the idea it is appointed unto man only to die. To die once is the appointment; yet he may die twice; but if he does it is his own arrangement. It was not appointed of God. If he follows the line God prescribes in the gospel there is but one death for him, and that death is made a gateway to the higher life.

Just as I look upon an ear of corn, or upon a flower, or upon a grain of wheat, and I think of it in all its details as nearly as I can, I put the flower to my face and inhale the fragrance and think of what its sweetness means to the world; I think of what the corn ear means to the world in the way of nourishment, and health and life; and yet to produce these things something had to die. As I look in contemplation upon that gospel that is unfolding in divine loveliness under his Spirit's halo—flinging out that fragrance that is distinctive of celestial estate, and see multiplied evidences of his love which it expresses, I go back in thought, and remember that to provide this, something had to die; and God made that appointment. I am here to-day, feeling perhaps as sad as any outside of the immediate family over the loss we have sustained in my brother's departure; but with the Apostle Paul I no longer look on death with dread, for "death is swallowed up in victory." And with him I ask, "O death, where is thy sting?" Thanks be to God that giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

In the language of the poet Condor:

Oh, the hour when this material
Shall have vanished like a cloud!
And amid the wide ethereal
All the invisible shall crowd!
And the earth-freed soul surrounded
By realities unknown,
Triumphs in the view unbounded,
Feels itself with God alone!

Angels, let the anxious stranger
In your tender care be blest;
Hoping, waiting, free from danger,
Till the trumpet and its rest;
Till the trump which shakes creation
Through the circling heavens shall roll—
Till the day of consummation—
Till the bridal of the soul.

Can I trust a fellow being?
Can I trust an angel's care?
Oh, thou merciful, All-seeing,
Guide me by thy presence there!
Jesus! Blessed Mediator!
Thou the airy path hast trod—
Thou the Judge—The Consummator—
Shepherd of the fold of God!

Blessed fold! No foe can enter,
And no friend departeth thence.
Jesus is their Sun—their Center;
And their shield, Omnipotence!
Blessed, for the Lamb shall lead them,
And their tears shall wipe away,
To the living Fountain lead them,
Till fruition's perfect day!

Lo! it comes—that day of wonder!
Louder thunders shake the skies!
Hades' gates are burst asunder!
See the new-clothed myriads rise!

Thought, repress thy weak endeavor,
Here must reason prostrate fall;
Oh! the ineffable forever!
Oh! th' eternal All in All.

Oh, for Grace to Appreciate!

Oh, for grace to appreciate as it deserves this gospel of Jesus Christ that has been committed to our trust. We do not know how; we do not possess the power to describe as it deserves, this thing which has come into our existence; this divine treasure in earthen vessels. To those who feel most deeply this departure from their home, may God give them grace that will be equal to every necessity that shall be created in consequence of it and on every occasion when they look here and there and listen as they formerly have done, but listen in vain for the familiar face and voice, may they be led instinctively to turn their eyes upward, and hold their ears in a receptive position to catch the voice as it comes back through the life he lived, through the virtues he manifested, through the good testimony that he gave to that gospel. I commit you to that gospel and all its promises, and may heaven, out of this trial, and out of the conditions following, bring to us that full measure of good that is intended for us; for whatever God wills, or whatever he ordains or permits has a purpose in it, and that purpose is always to bless and never to injure. Shall that blessing be ours? It may be. God help us to put ourselves in an attitude to entitle us to realize it in its fullness until by and by that mortal shall have put on immortality, and shall be brought to pass the saying, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" When (using mother's illustration again) the coat is held up and the infidel, the agnostic, and all who have tried to sound God's depths by lines of human reason, shall drop down on their knees and say, "It is really a coat. It is divinity and perfection personified in infinite completeness."

God help us to live for that, in full confidence, and reserve our judgment even under the reverses that come to us until that time when we shall have put on immortality and death shall be swallowed up in victory.

The whole question of human relations, or economic relations, is in the manner of living our lives for others. We do not do it. Rather, we live seemingly for ourselves alone. A great protest against this same selfish conception of life is seen in the supreme sacrifice of Jesus Christ.

What is our manifest duty as Christian men and women? To my mind, one of its greatest factors is to remember that our lives are not shaped for ourselves alone.—Doctor W. O. Thompson.

Were Both Statements Correct, or Did John Contradict Christ?

By J. D. Stead

And his disciples asked him, Why then say the scribes that Elias must come? And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias truly shall first come and restore all things. But I say unto you, That Elias is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed. Likewise shall also the Son of man suffer of them. Then the disciples understood that he spoke unto them of John the Baptist.—Matthew 17: 10-13.

And they asked him, What then? Art thou Elias? and he saith, I am not. . . . Then said they unto him, Who art thou? that we may give answer to them that sent us. What sayest thou of thyself? He said, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaias.—John 1: 21-23.

But what went you out for to see? A prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and much more than a prophet. This is he of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee.—Luke 7: 26, 27.

Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord.—Malachi 4: 5.

The "Elijah" of the Old Testament is the "Elias" of the New Testament; one the Hebrew form of expression, the other the Greek form of expression.

It is evident to the writer of this article, from the quotations cited, that the Jews were expecting Elijah the prophet to come to them. Doubtless, those priests and Levites who were sent to interrogate John as to who he was, were thinking of Elijah the prophet when they asked him the question, "Art thou Elias?" John evidently understood that the Elias that they were inquiring after was Elijah the prophet mentioned in Malachi 4: 5, and made answer, "I am not." Neither was he. To believe that he was, would necessitate our believing in reincarnation, also disbelief in the statements made by Christ, John, and Mark 1: 2, 3.

Christ declared that John was the messenger referred to by Malachi 3: 1, and not the Elijah of Malachi 4: 5. John says that he was the one referred to in Isaiah 40: 3. Mark says John is the one and same person referred to by Isaiah and Malachi 3: 1. From these several quotations cited we learn that Christ and John are agreed; hence, no contradiction between them.

I submit the above for publication, thinking that it may clear up a misunderstanding with some who I happen to know have been preaching that John was Elijah and didn't know it.

[The following references in the Inspired Version of the Holy Scriptures confirm the position taken by Elder Stead and would seem to leave no possibility for doubt:

Matthew 17: 9-14; 11: 15; Luke 1: 17; John 1: 21-30; Doctrine and Covenants 26: 2.

The above clearly show that the name Elias in the

An Outline of the Religious Education Course at Graceland

In the reprint of the call for the Religious Education Class of Graceland for next year President Smith said: "It is expected that the course next year be extended to two years and will articulate with the university course for those who wish to go on." This has been done. The course will cover two years. It has been arranged to give to those who enter an intensive survey of the materials which will be most valuable to them in their ministerial work. That has been the primary purpose. Secondly, the course has been so constituted that wherever possible credit of university standing will be given. The course will be given in the religious atmosphere which Graceland furnishes and under the instruction of men who have consecrated their lives to this work.

The list of lecturers for the past year included the following: President F. M. Smith, President E. A. Smith, Bishop B. R. McGuire, Church Historian Walter W. Smith, Bishop J. A. Koehler, Apostles T. W. Williams and John W. Rush-ton, Presidents John F. Garver and C. E. Wight, of Lamoni Stake Presidency, Superintendent of Sunday School A. M. Carmichael, representatives of the Women's Department, Sister Lydia Wight and Sister D. J. Krahl, Elders E. E. Long and L. G. Holloway, of the missionary force, and S. A. Burgess of the HERALD editorial staff. The regular instructors in the department are Professor Charles E. Irwin, who teaches sociology and economics; Professor Floyd M. McDowell, who teaches psychology and education; Mrs. J. H. Royce, who teaches English; and Professor Lonzo Jones, who teaches religious history and doctrine, and who is also directly in charge of the department of religious education. The two-year course as outlined includes the following subjects: English, logic, ethics, psychology, sociology, and religious history for the first year. Bible, argumentation and debate, philosophy, history of education, religious education methods, economics and doctrinal subjects for the second year. The doctrinal subjects deal with such topics as:

1. Religion, what is it?
2. Self-existence of God.
3. The personality of God.
4. The trinity.
5. The attributes of God.
6. Man, self-conscious.
7. Free agency and conduct.
8. The atonement.
9. The principles of the gospel.
10. Authority of priesthood.
11. The origin, organization, and object of the church.
12. The necessity of revelation.
13. The mode of revelation.
14. The gifts of the Spirit.
15. The fruits of the Spirit.
16. Factors and processes of Zion building.

first chapter refers to the Messiah. The Doctrine and Covenants makes a distinction between Elias the Restorer; Elijah, who will turn the hearts of the fathers to the children and of the children to the fathers; and John the Baptist.—EDITORS.]

17. Organization and purpose of the Sunday school.
18. The Religio Department.
19. The Women's Department.
20. The Health Department.

Such electives as story-telling, home economics, genetic psychology, and training in music are provided. Surely this course fulfills both its primary and secondary purpose. It will give the student the equipment needed in his ministerial work, and will "articulate with any university course."

Read it again carefully. Note the content of the course. It will be given in the religious atmosphere of Graceland. It will be presented by men consecrated to the work of God. It will prepare men for the ministry. The church needs men so prepared. It needs you. Are you prepared? This course will prepare you.

A Declaration for 1922

The principal fact to be remembered on the Fourth of July, and the one generally forgotten in its celebration, is that when the Declaration of Independence was signed it was just so many words on a piece of paper. Seven years of war were to follow before those words should take on the character and meaning they have to-day; until those years of struggle and sacrifice were accomplished the Declaration of Independence was a political essay written by a cultured Virginia gentleman of literary and rhetorical turn and with a taste for political philosophy.

Americans who hear the Declaration of Independence read to-day and unthinkingly accept it for what it is, the foremost document in the history of their country and of democracy, ought to reflect upon what it was that made it that. What transformed it from a mere political manifesto, elevated, indeed, in thought and sentiment, but not differing in substance from what had been almost a commonplace of discussion in the Colonies for years, into a political reality that was to mark a new era in human government and human liberty?

The answer is not revealed in that part of the Declaration that is what we have called a political manifesto; it is not in the indictment of George III and his ministers, nor even in those words which "solemnly publish and declare that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." What transformed this fulmination against the tyranny of a British king who was not an Englishman, into the sacred and blood-stained seal of American freedom must be looked for in the Declaration's concluding sentence, without which all the lofty eloquence of the entire document would be as sounding brass and a clashing cymbal. Here is that concluding sentence that gave life to the whole:

And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

But for that sentence there would have been no Declaration of Independence, no war with Britain, and no United States.

In these words those first Americans flung down the gage of battle and took up arms to make them good. All else that is in the Declaration is here condensed. Here was the touchstone that was to prove or disprove those truths they held to be self-evident; the equality of men; their inalienable rights; the purposes for which governments are instituted among them. Many statesmen of that or a later age, in this or in other countries, could have written the Declaration of Independence. It took a Washington and a race of patriots to make it good.

They made it good for their age; they could not make it good for ours. Every generation of Americans must write its own Declaration of Independence; must make its own good. Are not Americans aware to-day that those "facts" which their forefathers submitted to a candid world in justification of their Declaration, apply just as strongly now, if in a different relation, and would form in a new Declaration an indictment as necessary and justifiable? The indictment of the forefathers related solely to the acts of a British government; it was these tyrannies against which those first Americans took up arms and by their patriotic sacrifice and devotion broke and abolished. That was their task, the task, of their age.

But for Americans of to-day to say or act as though that Declaration was good for all time, that it was sufficient to confound all tyrannies foreign and domestic in the present and all future ages, is to argue themselves blind to every truth which the Declaration contains and to all the history that followed it. They deceive themselves if they think that Declaration is a safeguard against present dangers, or has any more power to avert them than they themselves give it by their lives and acts; by their ability to rewrite it in relation to present tyrannies, and their willingness to pledge to it all that their forefathers pledged to theirs.

There are tyrannies in America to-day as great and destructive of liberty as those the colonists threw off, but they are domestic instead of foreign. On that class of tyrannies a warning was uttered not by a signer of the Declaration, but by a great American who bore a foremost part in the work of framing the government made possible by it. James Madison said of the edifice of the Constitution, that no government can tolerate a domestic power that is, or threatens to become, greater than itself.

Are there domestic powers in America to-day that threaten or aspire to become superior to the government of the people?

Is there a spirit abroad in America, in this class and that, that refuses its "assent to laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good"?

That has "obstructed the administration of justice"?

That has protected offenders "by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these States"?

That "has excited domestic insurrection amongst us"?

If there are such powers, or the discernible growth of them, then it is for Americans on this Fourth of July to write a new Declaration of Independence, to indict in it domestic tyranny as fearlessly as their forefathers indicted a foreign one and, like them, to pledge to its support their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

Only by thus showing themselves fit to be the heirs of a freedom so dearly won can Americans of this generation make certain that the government established under the original Declaration will continue to be the supreme power in America and protector of American liberty and democracy. —Kansas City Star, July 4, 1922.

The Coal Situation

America is now in the midst of a coal strike. The reasons for it are being quite freely discussed: The seasonal demand for coal, the uncertain working days and hours, but probably above all else, the uneconomic method of shipping coal for long distances by rail, and then the wasteful manner in which it is handled. Many economists insist it would be a great saving to burn the coal at the mine's mouth and then to forward as electricity or, to near-by points, as gas. Several articles have appeared in favor of gas determined by its heating power, not by its illuminating coefficient. It is quite freely forecasted that the future will mean the burning of gas in a gas turbine instead of the ordinary gas engine and high pressure transmission over distances not now dreamed of, also the more general use of coke.

Two Per Cent for Sunday School Finances

The finances of the annual budget is expected to be paid one sixth, or about $25,000, by the denominations officially; one third, or $50,000, from State and Province associations; the remaining one half, or $75,000, from individual contributors. Later the budget was scaled down from $150,000 to $110,000, of which over $23,000 was pledged at the convention.

Director of Religious Education

"With the increased interest in religious education churches are more and more coming to realize that a new officer is needed whose chief duties shall be to look after the educational interests of all the agencies of the church, particularly the Sunday school. This person is called the Director of Religious Education, and hundreds of churches are now employing qualified young men and women for this position. The demand, however, is very much beyond the supply, so that our training schools and seminaries and colleges are more and more recognizing that they must equip young people for these positions. It is interesting to note how many colleges already have departments of religious education, and they cannot begin to meet the demand that is made upon them. There was a time when it was strongly recommended that we have paid superintendents. We have now come to feel that it is vastly more important to let the superintendency of the Sunday school still remain in the hands of the unpaid layman, and that the salaried officers, if but one, should have charge of the religious education in all departments of the church. In many cases, the director of religious education is also superintendent of the school. More and more it is recommended that the religious education program of a church be a unified program, including not only the Sunday school but the church itself and the various activities of the church; all of which should be represented on the committee on education, and that the director of religious education look after that particular feature in all of these associations."

Sunday School Work and Costs

"We all believe that childhood and youth is the time of harvest for the kingdom.

"We believe a boy or girl is worth more to the kingdom of God and to the church than a man or woman, because they have a longer time for service.

"We believe the Sunday school is the whitest part of the church's great field. The records of the church prove it.

"And yet—only one church member in four is in the Sunday school at all or seems to take a vital interest in its program.

"Of those who are members it takes four officers and teachers a whole year to bring into the church one permanent new member.

"For every dollar spent by the average church member for the support of his local church, including salaries, upkeep, missions, benevolences, music, etc., less than two cents goes for the Sunday school and religious education, and yet notwithstanding all the fine work of the Sunday school during the past fifty years (and it has been great), there are more children and youth of day-school age not in any Sunday school than there are in all of them."

Outside Organization

"It is a sad commentary upon the church to see so many outside organizations rising up, some of them loosely connected with the church, others quite independent, sweeping our boys and girls into them by the thousands. Many of these organizations are good, others less so, but mostly worthy, and they have sprung up for the most part to meet the demand of youth for organization, fellowship, and life.

"Many of these organizations, some of which are connected with clubs of various kinds, which are actuated by good motives (I speak as a loyal fraternity and club man) tend to weaken the hold of the church upon the young folks, and thousands of them eventually turn from the church entirely.

"The church cannot complain, for most of these organizations have grown in ground it has left fallow.

"My contention is that the Sunday school, which is the church engaged in one of its legitimate activities, should furnish in and through itself all the opportunities young life demands, for the development of its fourfold nature."

—Marion Lawrance, in Report to Fifteenth International Sunday School Convention, pp. 21, 29, 30.

A Missionary Conference of Laymen

One of the signs of the times is an organization of laymen for missionary work. This was first started late in 1906 and the first convention was held in 1910. Owing to the Inter-church World Movement, their efforts were discontinued for a time but are now renewed in a meeting in Chicago the 3d of May. Its purpose is the missionary program of Christianity and work by laymen in study, prayer, gifts, and work, to see that the great commission of sending the gospel to all the world is carried out. Its work is educational, not federated agencies. It has no missionary fund, nor does it seek any ends for itself. Its expenses are not secured from mission boards or local congregations. It simply strives to urge laymen to further service in the church to which they belong.

We Need Brave Men

"We need men to-day in the pulpit who have the bravery and the moral and spiritual courage to speak the truth. Stephen was full of the Holy Spirit, full of the grace of God, full of power—there was spiritual dynamite in him to blow up the rocks of evil.

You know, to-day we have learned fools and uneducated wise men. But men who are educated in the right way know what to do and how to use their knowledge and faith. A man who has no faith in himself or in God, no faith in his business partner, no faith in the church, no faith in anything, even though he be rich in this world's goods, is more miserable than the poor widow whose heart is aflame with the love of God.—Doctor John Sampey.

Scientific Evidence of Immortality

Camille Flammarions, the French astronomer, has printed a third book along purely scientific lines and quite apart from the religious or spiritualistic viewpoint on the question of whether the soul lives after the body. He concludes that it does continue after the decomposition of the body and is endowed with faculties still unknown to science. This book is the result of fifty years' study and, we are informed, is the third text he has published on this subject. He does not attempt to say that the soul is immortal, but contents himself with saying that classified evidence, he believes, proves scientifically that the spirit survives the body.

Keeping the Home Spirit Alive

While President Elect, Mr. Harding made an appeal before a state meeting of the Child Conservation League in Ohio for a fuller cooperation between American mothers and school officials and other public servants and agencies concerned in the educational, religious, and physical training of children; declaring it to be the duty of motherhood to keep the old-time home spirit alive in spite of the growing tendency to intrust the instruction of the child almost wholly to public institutions, he made a particular plea that religious training be kept within the province of the hearth, and voiced a hope for a revival of religious reverence and faith.

He also asked that the public welfare agencies of the Nation be kept democratic, and expressed disapproval of the practice of the rich in withdrawing their children from public schools and entering them in private institutions.

Since entering upon his administration, the President has stood squarely behind the most progressive measures introduced in the interests of public welfare. There has been a remarkable and gratifying change in the past decade in the attitudes and opinions of our legislators concerning such matters. This justifies the belief that the Nation is keeping pace with the gradual development of human thought towards the ideal set by the Creator. In spite of apparent deflections, in spite of evidences of human greed and grossness and frailty, we must believe that progress is being made, and that the spiritual forces at work in the world, some of which are partially visible to the thoughtful student and others of which are hidden from all earthly knowledge, will accomplish their purposes, unto that day when "every knee shall bow, and every tongue proclaim."

It is for us, as individuals, to see that we are actively supporting every movement for good and uplift. It is for us to ponder the deep and underlying significance of every experience and development in this portentous day and age of the world, and seek to align ourselves with all that is pointing towards the evolution of our race Godward—the ideal towards which our church is moving in faith and achievement.

Let us rededicate our homes. Let us bend every energy towards the task of keeping their atmospheres spiritual and vital, veritable temples wherein Christ may feel at home!

Environment and Training

Luther Burbank, who has worked wonders with the plant world, has decided opinions in regard to the training and development of children. In a little book which he has called Training the Human Plant, he gives the conscientious parent much food for thought, inasmuch as he advocates a radical change from present-day accepted ideas of education. We quote in part:

"All animal life is sensitive to environment, but of all living things the child is the most sensitive. Surroundings act upon it as the outside world acts upon the plate of the camera. Every possible influence will leave its mark upon the child, and the traits which it inherited will be overcome to a certain extent, in many cases being even more apparent than heredity. . . .

". . . A child absorbs environment. It is the most susceptible thing in the world to influence, and if that force be applied rightly and constantly when the child is in its most receptive condition, the effect will be pronounced, immediate, and permanent.

"Where shall we begin? Just where we begin with the plant, at the very beginning. It has been said that the way to reform a man is to begin with his grandfather. But this is only a half truth; begin with his grandfather, but begin with the grandfather when he is a child!

"Froebel said: 'The task of education is to assist natural development towards its destined end. As the beginning gives a bias to the whole after development, so the early beginnings of education are of most importance.'

"While recognizing the good that has been accomplished in the early kindergarten training of children, I must enter a most earnest protest against beginning education, as we commonly use the word, at the kindergarten age. No boy or girl should see the inside of a schoolhouse until at least ten years old! I am speaking now of the boy or girl who can be reared in the only place that is truly fit to bring up a boy or a plant—the country, the small town or the country, the nearer to nature the better! . . .

"But some one asks, 'How can you ever expect a boy to graduate from college or university if his education does not begin until he is ten years of age? He will be far too old!' First I answer that the curse of modern child-life in America is over education. For the first ten years of this, the most sensitive and delicate, the most pliable life in the world, I would prepare it! The properly prepared child will make such progress that the difference in time of graduation is not likely to be noticeable; but, even if it should be a year or two later, what real difference would it make? . . . Above all else, the child must be a healthy animal. I do not work with diseased plants. They do not cure themselves of disease, and only spread disease among their fellows and die before their time.

"I wish to lay special stress upon the absurdity, not to call it by a harsher name, of running children through the same mill, in a lot, with absolutely no real reference to their individuality. No two children are alike. You cannot expect them to develop alike. They are different in temperament, in tastes, in disposition, in capabilities; and yet we take them in this precious early age when they ought to be living a life of preparation near to the heart of nature, and we stuff them, cram them, and overwork them, until their poor little brains are crowded up to and beyond the danger line! The work of breaking down the nervous systems of the children of the United States is now well under way. It is only when some one breaks absolutely away from all precedent and rule, and carves out a new place in the world that any substantial progress is ever made, and seldom is this done by one whose individuality has been stifled in the schools. . . .

"So it is imperative that we consider individuality in children, in their training, precisely as we do in cultivating plants. Some children, for example, are absolutely unfit by nature and temperament for carrying on certain studies. . . .

"The first ten years! Not only would I have the child reared for the first ten years of his life in the open, in close touch with nature, a barefoot boy with all that implies for physical stamina, but I should have him reared in love. But you say, 'How can you expect all children to be reared in love?' By working with vast patience upon the great body of the people, to teach such of them as do not love their children to love them, to surround them with all the influences of love. . . . It is the part of every human being who comprehends the importance of this, to bend all his energies towards the same end! Love must be at the basis of all our work for the race; not gush, nor mere sentimentality, but abiding love, that which outlasts death! You can never bring the child to his best estate without love!"

Just Love—That's All!

John Golden, the great theatrical producer, when asked as to the method of training given to him in his youth by his mother, replied: "She didn't train me—she just loved me!"

No wonder that this man has been such a remarkable success. With just one play, "Lightnin'," he has broken all records for a single run—and that a play that Frank Bacon, its star and author, tried for ten years to sell!

There are many men and women doing marvelous things in the world because somebody just loves them—that's all.

Love will lead a man higher than any power in creation. And the lack of it will burn his soul out.

The first development in the child is love for its mother and father.

Human beings rarely give up the fight of life because they have been less favored than others as far as material affairs are concerned. It's the waiting for love that doesn't come that pulls down the shades of the windows of one's heart.

The unusual thing about love is that you don't have to explain it or define it. It just works and does what it is here for. And all the beauty and happiness which it brings along is distributed far and wide.

Even the dumb animals crave love and affection. The other evening I saw a picture of a woman playing with a dozen or more wild animals—lions, bears, tigers, wild cats—as though they were kittens. Anyone could see that she loved them and that they loved her.

Watch a dog and his master. Many a dog has died of a broken heart when deprived of the one he loved.

How much more powerful must the love of human beings be!

Just love—that's all. It will do what nothing else can. Love conquers, softens, builds, forgives, and guides.

If you crave and lack love, there is one way to get it—by giving what you have to others. Love begets love.—George Matthew Adams.

What Mr. Burbank Doesn't Know

Few men are held higher in the general esteem than is Luther Burbank, the wizard who has played with the mysteries of plant life and its development until all the world rings with his deserved renown. But, like Mr. Edison, quite as conspicuous in another field of human achievement, Mr. Burbank "doesn't know it all."

The plant wizard's views and opinions outside the realm of his own activities are worth no more than another's, not worth so much as those of another whose study and grasp of social problems entitle him to speak with the authority of practical wisdom and experience.

A few days ago Mr. Burbank had this to say about the culture of children:

"I speak of the boy or girl who has the privilege of being reared in the only place that is truly fit to bring up a child or plant—the country or the small town—the nearer to nature the better. In the case of children compelled to live in the city, the temptations are so great, the life so artificial, that a child should be placed early in school as a safeguard. All animal life is sensitive, but of all living things the child is the most sensitive. The child literally absorbs environment."

Very well. Mr. Burbank is seventy-three. He has visited cities. He has lived in small towns. But while his eyes and understanding have been quick to see and aid in the evolution of wonders in the plant world, there have been many other things which evidently he has not seen. No real student of body, mind, and morals, of the relations of health and character to existence, will agree with him that the small town or the wildwood are best fitted for the physical and mental culture of children.

The pinched, sordid, parochial atmosphere of the average small town, with its insufficient sanitation, its narrow educational and social opportunities, cannot compare in any respect with a modern progressive city in the matter of conservation and proper culture of child life. As for temptations, to which the learned plant king refers, they are not peculiar to cities, and in the cities, thanks to that wisdom which guides and guards the world, the sunshine of human hearts never is dimmed, nor the skies of love and hope overcast. Purity, honor, love, industry, fidelity are quite as evident in the city as in the small town—and the green fields, the whispering woodlands, and the blowing flowers are not far away, Mr. Burbank.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

(To such of us as must, of necessity, rear our children in the city, this little editorial comment on Mr. Burbank's views comes with a degree of comfort. The point of it all is that we should be at all times actively concerned in the welfare of children, and be alert to every influence which may be in its environment seeking diligently and prayerfully to overcome that which is undesirable and to provide and foster that which will uplift, strengthen, and develop in righteousness. A. A.)

Superintendent of Department on Tour

A letter from Sister Glines, our Department Superintendent, indicates that she is to have a very busy summer season. The letter was written en route to Chicago, June 28, and it outlines her itinerary as follows:

"Will spend a day in Chicago. Have wired Mrs. Christy to get women together for a meeting. Next day will be in Detroit, and have wired for meeting there, also. Saturday evening will arrive in London, Ontario, for their reunion. Then on to Buffalo, where I shall plan to meet the Niagara Branch people also. Thence to Toronto for a week, and then up the Saint Lawrence River by boat to Montreal. From there to Boston and the Onset reunion. Then by boat to New York, and the Deer Park reunion. Shall stop over at Washington, District of Columbia, and also arrange to meet the women at Youngstown, Ohio. Thence to Erie Beach reunion, and lastly, the Kirtland reunion. Shall I not have a busy time to get in all of these, and accomplish what I want to do?"

We trust the church members who live in the localities our superintendent is planning to visit, will make a real effort to attend her meetings and hear her message. If you have encountered definite difficulties in carrying on the department work as programmed and encouraged by the general department, take the matters up with her in the spirit of progress, with concrete suggestions as to wherein the program might be improved. And, on the contrary, if you have found aught to commend, or which has given you encouragement and definite help, be just as quick to speak of that, in order that future plans may include as much as possible of that which meets the needs of the majority. LETTERS AND NEWS

A New Birth Offering Book

Just off the press and very attractive in its decorative red cover, bearing a three-color picture of a spinner at her wheel, is the new birth offering book entitled Homespun Rhymes.

The names of two hundred and twenty-five children are printed in the back, the offering given in honor of their birth having been used to defray expenses in getting out the book, of which this is number 12 of the series.

There are in all 118 poems, each with its own illustration, and bearing a pleasing little story for the children. It is especially adapted to children up to about twelve years of age, both the type of selection and the size of print being suitable for young children.

The verses are selected from the Sunday school papers of the church, and are all written by our people—the subtitle being, "By home folks."

It has 144 large pages, on good paper, nicely bound in cloth, sells for $1.00 postpaid, and to our way of thinking is about the most attractive birth offering book we have had.

It is to be hoped that the interest in birth offerings will not subside. Through the funds thus raised a goodly list of books have been made available to our children. The cradle roll department of the Women's Department has arranged to collect these offerings. Those who are not fortunate enough to be thus cared for may send the money with items of birth, name, names of father and mother, address, etc., to Box 255, Independence, Missouri. The amounts given usually range from 25 cents to a dollar, with no limit, of course.

Holmes J. Davison Critically Ill

The following is from Elder Davison, written from his home, 736 East Clay Street, Stockton, California, July 9. His desire for word from his friends will likely be heeded by many HERALD readers:

"Since feeling much better to-day than for perhaps two weeks, I take this opportunity to write of my condition, which is much worse than at last writing. My tent experience was a failure—too late. The doctor ordered me home as soon as possible. Final stages of tuberculosis. One lung all shot to pieces—partially consolidated—no good. The other lung and bronchial tubes affected. Quite a bit of breathing capacity left, but gave no encouragement as to Sanitarium. Too old, and I guess too run down. I may last for weeks, but liable to go any time. However, the fight is all off. I have surrendered. My only effort is to avoid as much suffering as possible and bear with patience what has to be endured and pay my penalty like a man. The future does not worry me. With all my failures and imperfections I have lived a life of faith in the Son of God.

"My kindest regards to all the office force including the publishing department. Could it be announced some way that Brother Davison is lingering near the border edge and a card from relatives and friends who care to write would be much appreciated? But cannot promise to reply."

The accompanying poem was sung by a surprise party on Brother Davison just before his departure for tent life. Composed by one of the members, to be sung to the tune of "Waiting and watching for you":

"We sorrow because of this parting,
Our Pastor, our Shepherd, our Friend.
But though we feel sad we are smiling,
Because we feel 'tis not the end.
And though we'll be longing and yearning,
While now we are saying adieu,
You know when returning you'll find us
All waiting and watching for you.

Chorus:

We know you are not well nor able,
Although you are anxious to serve.
Your spirit will often be with us;
We'll try from the truth not to swerve.
Your place will remain always waiting,
We can't change the old for a new.
We'll try to be like you would have us,
While waiting and watching for you."

Impressions of a Britisher

Can you imagine the thoughts surging through the mind of Christopher Columbus, as he set foot on the great continent of America, which he had found after months of trial and tribulation? This man was victorious in his battle against the elements and the failing hearts of his sailors, and in the moment of triumph, he thanked the great God in heaven for the preservation of his men and himself. But wait, it was not "the end of the road"; it was but the beginning. He was in a new environment, and needed to reconstruct his ideas of life in general, necessitating a full measure of consistency of mind, and of purpose. The first chapter of the history of modern America was then written, and as further steps have been taken, other chapters have been added.

The history of the stirring events of 1492 is somewhat analogous to my own experience in my discovery of the United States. As Columbus was forced to reconstruct his ideas, so I had to adapt myself to my new environment, which contained many strange and interesting features. My environment was Graceland College, and my dwelling place since September, 1921, has been the religious education class. The symbolical value of mere words is certainly apparent, but it is strangely enough impossible to find suitable expression to my thoughts in that connection. I can and must say that the association in the class has been the means of bringing new life to my spiritual system; a revivification of my convictions in regard to the activities necessary to the promulgation of the gospel has taken place, and above all a glorious vision has opened up before my eyes as to the meaning of the years ahead.

Three words typify in my opinion the characteristics of the discoverer, and also of a member of the religious education class in Graceland: Consecration, Capability, and Service. Consecration of purpose, capability for development, and finally a serviceable continuance in efforts most conducive to the progress of the great work yet to be accomplished.

A Columbus need not necessarily discover a new continent; for the student under the tutorage of consecrated men and women who have given their lives for Graceland and the church, is indeed worthy of the title of Discoverer. By consistency of mind and of purpose, a broader outlook may be obtained, a wider field of service is discovered, and a wonderful opportunity for the spreading of the message of Christ is afforded.

Life means effort, and effort if systematically carried out means progression. Progression means greater opportunity, greater joy, greater compensation.

It would be impossible to enumerate the benefits derived from my year's work, or to express the gratification which I feel for the opportunity afforded me to become a member of the class of 1922.

Many interesting features might be referred to in connection with the religious education course, and in and through them all one is able to sense an atmosphere of indescribable joy.

The slogan of Columbus, "Sail on," has been utilized by the class, during the days of preparation and reconstruction, with great success, and at the close, a new continent, a vaster field for service, a strange land, have been found, wherein the message may be carried to those awaiting the call, and those who know not the love of Christ.

The year's work is completed, the first rung of the ladder is reached, and the hour to commence the climb is at hand. The cry of the hero of 1492, "Sail on," still rings in the ears of the class, and the future is ripe for a successful climb.

Scattered thoughts are never very edifying, but perhaps in this case their significance may be such as to bring to the mind of the reader, a momentary glimpse of the ideals of a student of 1922, in regard to the course now provided by the church.

HAROLD DEWSNUP.

"I closed a two-weeks series of meetings at the Poplar Creek (Illinois) Branch," writes L. C. Moore, "and two were baptized. Others are interested. Large crowds."

Elder Hubert Case reports eighteen baptisms among the Indians in Oklahoma in two weeks. He urges the local men to enter the missionary work in their communities.

Leo E. Day, 521 East Fifth Street, Cameron, Missouri, writes, "We would like to get a middle-aged woman to do general housework and help care for our invalid mother. Steady employment if work is satisfactory."

Sister A. C. Solomon, of Jackson, Mississippi, writes: "Not being settled for some months, we have been without the church publications and have greatly missed them. If there are any other Saints in Jackson, I would like to meet them. Gipsy Smith recently held a revival here and seemed to give the city a religious awakening. My parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. DePriest, reside at Lucedale, Mississippi. They are also isolated; however, being isolated does not lessen our faith in the true church of the living God."

Spring Banks Reunion a Success

The Spring Banks, London, Ontario, reunion closed last night. In view of the fact that it was their first reunion, we can pronounce it a success, both financially and spiritually.

The committee who had charge performed excellent service and are to be congratulated. This committee consisted of Frank Gray, Frank and Thomas Timbrell, and John Vasbinder, with Brother Alford as chairman.

Their meals were served cafeteria style and the plan worked splendidly. The equipment was most excellent. The grounds are convenient and beautiful to a degree hard to surpass. Wonderful water in abundance.

Brother Frank Gray had charge of the Scouts and was a leader in the recreational features. The Temple Builders and Orioles cooperated with the Scouts in the young people's meetings, prayer services, etc.

The preaching was excellent. The following brethren occupied the pulpit, namely Glau R. Kuykendall, Cornelius Clifford, John Shields, Lawrence Campbell, Joseph Yager, and the writer. Other brethren assisted in the pulpit, including Elder Tomlinson, of the missionary field, and William Grice, president of the Eastern Michigan District, and others of the local brethren.

The social services were inspiring and reviving. The reunion was, no doubt, very helpful and beneficial to those in attendance. Saints were present from Toronto, Port Stanley, Sarnia, Corinth, Port Huron, Michigan, London, Saint Thomas, Chatham, Bothwell, Windsor, Detroit, Michigan, and a number of other points.

All seemed happy and appreciated the privilege of association together at the reunion. The writer was given a grand reception and ably supported during his sojourn among them. After an absence of forty years he saw a great change in the people and country. Those who were babes when last he was there, are now, of course, up in years, and the middle-aged and old of that time have passed to the Great Beyond, most of them. I had the pleasure of meeting some whom I had baptized forty years ago and found them strong in the faith. Our grand old man, Patriarch John Shields, is greatly beloved of the Saints, and all look upon him as a father in Israel. He is always ready to give a helping hand to those who may need him: visiting isolated Saints, praying with and comforting them in their trials and sorrows.

In the absence of the district chorister during the week, Brother Phillipin was in charge of the music and singing, and notwithstanding he was unwell, was faithful in the work.

To many of the sisters is due praise for the excellent service they rendered in helping to make the reunion a success. Many worked diligently from beginning to end of the reunion.

Our efficient Sister Dora Glines was with us from the beginning till the close of the reunion, rendering excellent and beneficial service as head of the Women's Department of the church. She demonstrated to all her competency to fill the position she now occupies, being on the job continuously, and gained the admiration and good will of all she labored among. May God speed her in her future work as a splendid asset to the church work.

Brother Max Carmichael was present for a couple of days in connection with his work as general Sunday school superintendent and gave splendid instruction in his line of work.

We would not fail to mention the remarkable bridge built by the brethren across the stream. It was a suspension foot bridge, and a remarkable achievement.

One tent was given over to hospital needs in charge of competent sisters, one of the first, I believe, on a reunion ground to be established as a permanent institution of the district. It will be kept up through the year under the district authorities at a suitable location, at London, I believe. They are planning for still greater things for another year at their reunion.

GOMER T. GRIFFITHS.

Growing Timbers

It is customary among the religious organizations of the present day to fortify their religious strength with magnificent churches and cathedrals. We, however, have none of them to show. To every stranger that asks, "Where is your temple?" we can point with pride to our ranks of faithful and strong men, "Every man is a timber."

It is interesting to note that Solomon built the temple with timbers of the forests of Lebanon and workmen borrowed from the king of Tyre. He did this because he wanted the best with which to build, and because he could not find proper materials in all his own kingdom.

The church was once situated like Solomon: we had to take the men who made up the timbers for our temple from the ranks of the world, and had to educate our workmen in other institutions.

Now, however, conditions are much improved. From our own homes are coming the young people who shall in the future be timbers in the temple. And we have Graceland, the institution where we can and are preparing workmen to do our skilled work.

To one who has spent six of the happiest years of his life at Graceland, there has come an abundance of opportunity to see that institution in action as a place for the growing of timbers for the temple, and as a place for the training of men to do the work of the church.

In those six years he has seen Graceland grow, prosper, and become strong in the work for which she was intended. She has attained and is attaining the widest recognition, to a very splendid strength and stability, to a broad usefulness. Besides this, there is carried with her and into all her work a spiritual power that has brought moral and religious development to many young people, and gratitude to her from the hearts of many relatives and parents made happy.

Graceland stands for the ideals of growth, development, purity, spirituality, and service. She is not able to implant these ideals in the hearts of all who come within her walls. But in the large majority of instances she is able to benefit vastly, and make better and happier those who come and stay with the serious intent of doing good.

You are a prospective timber for the temple. Will not you come to Graceland to grow among your own kind?

You are a prospective workman in the field of service. Should not you be found among your own fellows, getting inspiration from association with them, getting strength, preparing in a way that will be a definite and positive contribution to your powers and abilities to do the work for which you are intended? For such as you, Graceland is the open door to better skill, greater powers, and broader fields of opportunity for service.

Gospel Veterans Rejoice

We see in speaking of the goodness of God, and this great latter-day work, that Brother Billings, of Little Deer Isle, Maine, joined the church in 1866. According to our account, wife and I joined the same year. We were baptized by Elder Jesse L. Adams, of Mercer County, Illinois. We have taken the Ensign much of the time since it was started. I cannot recollect a time when we did not have the HERALD in our home.

My wife will be eighty-four years old next September and I will be eighty-six. We were married sixty-five years the 19th of last March. We are grateful and appreciate the goodness of God towards us and desire to help build up Zion, as a mark of our appreciation for his goodness in protecting us in our long and active life on the earth. We celebrated our sixty-fifth wedding anniversary and are still both alive. Why should we not feel thankful?

When I had a faint understanding of this great work and the oneness of God's way of doing his work in the church, the Lord seemed to show me the beauty of it. I desired to act fairly with him and supposed that if we got the gift of the Holy Ghost that was promised to the believer, we had to be truthful and honest. I did not want to be an anarchist as they are called in the world to-day by some. Jesus had a different name for them, as you will see by John 10. We did not want to be in that class. So I thought to accept of Jesus' plan.

I could see that he was like himself in organizing the church in every land and every age, and when the gospel was to be preached in this dispensation he took a boy fifteen years old. When the boy wanted knowledge, he was simple enough to take the advice of the Apostle James and humble himself before the Lord and ask him for wisdom; and the Lord directed him in his way, as he had always done, and sent an angel to instruct the boy who was just honest enough to tell it to one of the class who climb up some other way; so the persecution commenced, and never ceased until his death.

The message, given to this boy, Joseph Smith, by the angel, in answer to prayers, set forth the church of Christ with the same organization as was given in the wilderness and in the land of Palestine and on this continent in the days of Nephi as given by the Book of Mormon.

Editors Herald: We are still alive, trying to do our Master's will. We were blessed by having Bishop Bullard with us two weeks ago. He preached some excellent sermons and he didn't fail to tell us some needs of the church.

Brother Hubert Case was with us the second Sunday. It being Children's Day, five children were baptized. It was a beautiful sight to see those children led into the water when the song, "Let the children come to me," was sung.

Brethren Case, Syckle, and Vanderwood are holding tent meetings close to Calumet at the home of our Lamanite brothers. Interest is good.

Women's Department here are making up a freewill offering of fifty cents each to send the bishop. I wish each department would try that. The blessings that we receive are just what we put into the work. Faith without work is dead.

Independence

The committee of three appointed by the special conference of Zion to tabulate the results of the vote for delegates to the coming General Conference have reported the results of their labors and they are shown herewith. The committee was composed of C. B. Hartshorn, E. C. Harrington, and Arthur Allen.

The list is as follows, both delegates and alternates in the order representing the number of votes cast for each:

J. Frank Curtis, James F. Keir, George Jenkins, A. L. Sanford, R. V. Hopkins, M. H. Siegfried, Mrs. C. J. Hunt, W. D. Bullard, Joseph Luff, Louise Geisch, C. B. Hartshorn, Arthur Allen, Scott Cochran, W. W. Smith, E. D. Moore, Thomas Crick, Nathaniel Carmichael, H. C. Burgess, Mrs. Russell Etzenhouser, Dora Glines, S. A. Burgess, Ethel Schwab, Ralph Smith, Mrs. H. B. Roberts, Mrs. J. W. Adams, Mrs. A. K. Dillee, E. C. Harrington, V. A. Reese, Orlando Nace, Arthur Whiting, John A. Gardner, Mrs. Mansell T. Williams, Della Chapman, J. T. Curtis, R. O. Self, F. G. Christie, Della Haberlein, R. W. Farrell, Joseph B. Rodger, Eunice Smith, Mrs. J. A. Becker, Mrs. A. L. Sanford, Mrs. Harry Murphy, Mrs. Joseph Sturgess, John Watkins, Richard Bullard, Mrs. William Madison, Mrs. Ellis Short, J. P. Sappenfield, Mrs. Claude Gouldsmith.

Alternates: C. I. McConnell, Viola Short, Mrs. Clyde Hartman, Mrs. John A. Gardner, Henry Booker, J. W. Smith, J. M. Robinson, Mrs. Flo McNichols, E. H. Wilkins, John Lund, Mrs. Ida Johnson, W. A. Stevenson, E. E. Willard, Mrs. Nellie Brocaw, Mrs. Thomas Crick, Mrs. G. W. Whiting, C. K. Green, Mrs. E. E. Willard, Anna Flowers, Mrs. C. O. Whipple, Mrs. H. R. Hutchens, Gladys Gould, Mrs. Myra Brackenbury, William Ecclestone, sr., Mrs. William Pooler.

It is interesting to note that in the original list submitted by the nominating committee, composed of the pastors in Zion, there were eleven elders besides some of the Aaronic priesthood. The congregation nominated twenty-six delegates, of whom eighteen were elders. Twelve of these were elected, making twenty-three elders on the selected list, with approximately the same proportion of members of the Aaronic priesthood.

This problem of placing the Melchisedec priesthood on the delegations is always a matter for consideration. Rather frequently in the past (and it has already been reported from at least one district this year, as we have noted from their reports) districts have elected delegations entirely from the sisterhood, probably on the basis that the elders had an ex officio vote anyway.

The subject of representation is important, and any reasonable measures to see that it is handled right are justified, it seems to us. The original list of nominations had as a basis a predominance of those not holding the Melchisedec priesthood, though a goodly number were thereon, as the figures cited indicate. It seems too bad to consider sex and priesthood in selection of delegates, when the prime requisite is ability to represent the expressed or unexpressed wishes of a hundred average Saints.

The death of Brother Harry Holmes at the Sanitarium, from typhoid fever, after a brief illness, was the sad culmination of a bright career. He had come to Independence with his brother Frank and some of the other lads from Graceland to find work for the summer. He was active in church work in England, where his parents reside at Clay Cross, Derbyshire; but when a call for volunteers was made in 1920 volunteered to come to Graceland to make special preparation for future service in the church, leaving home on January 8, 1921, for that purpose.

The funeral was held from the Stone Church on the afternoon of the 14th, with sermon by Elder U. W. Greene, with participation by President F. M. Smith, William Ecclestone, and Roderick May. The pallbearers were fellow students from Graceland. Probably twenty other Graceland students attended en masse, and double that number of the British Social League. The floral offerings were profuse and beautiful.

In attendance were the First Presidency, three members of the Twelve, and other leading officials, not only personally sympathetic but testifying in this way of the sympathy of the church over the untimely passing of one who was on the firing line in a definite way, having left his home and loved ones for preparation for service.

Sunday afternoon Paul M. Hanson preached the radio sermon at 2.30 p. m. Saints should hereafter tune in at 2 p. m. for the beginning of the program, 360 meters. A mixed quartet, consisting of George Anway, Bertha Burgess, Alice Burgess, and Frank Russell, furnished the music this week. George Anway is in charge of the music for these services now, and an effort will be made to see that music is furnished at each succeeding radio service. Be sure to tune in at 2 p. m. instead of 2.30 p. m.

H. O. Smith was the speaker Sunday morning at the Stone Church. Paul M. Hanson spoke in the evening on the church lawn.

Harold C. Burgess, of the musical department, was called to Lamoni Thursday to preach the funeral sermon of Clyde Newcomer. These two men were long associated in the Lamoni Electric Company, of which Brother Burgess was for several years assistant manager in active charge, and then manager.

After five weeks of slow convalescence at the Sanitarium, Elder R. D. Weaver is making a good gain. Elder F. T. Mussell, who is also in the Sanitarium, is progressing nicely.

Elder Walter W. Smith left last week for the East. Sister Smith and sons expect to leave Thursday for the Deer Park reunion, where Brother and Sister Smith will have a prominent part, being in charge of the educational work. Wayne and Dudley will look after the recreational features, and the youngest son, Ronald, will probably be the mascot for all of them.

The Saints of Group 10 met in a surprise reception in honor of Elder Charles May on the evening of the 17th and presented him with a fine brief case and a copy each of the flexible edition of the Saints' Hymnal and Zion's Praises. Elder May planned to leave on the 19th for an appointment to the Southeastern Mission, where he will attend the Alabama reunion, and from thence spend a few months in the Isle of Pines.

Omaha, Nebraska

The condition of the work in Omaha and vicinity once more merits recording. Our activities in the Omaha Branch have not been lessened, though some have been absent and others are away on their vacations. We have made up for some absent ones by the visitors that have been present, among them the two daughters of Sister Audentia Anderson, Bertha and Doris, with their families, who spent the month of June in our city.

The activity of our Women's Department is worthy of special comment. On June 15, they held a dollar-day meeting at Sister Anderson's home and each brought a dollar earned by special work performed; a large gathering and consequent big fund realized, to say nothing of the splendid social time had. They followed this effort with a picnic for mothers and children the following week.

The baptism of three more makes eight the pastor has baptized recently, some promising young people being among those who have united with us. Others are ready and will enter the church soon. Brother P. R. Burton also has had great success during the past month, having baptized nineteen more. His efforts are greatly appreciated.

Sister Keairnes, of Dunlap, was in the Lord Lister Hospital. After administration she was much improved. She was very fortunate in having her daughter, one of our own trained nurses, at her bedside, which no doubt was a great factor in her speedy recovery.

Sister Whitcomb, daughter of Isaac Sheen, was painfully burned some time ago, but is recovering. She is very fortunate in having one son who is a physician and who cares for her every need.

On June 26 we buried Brother Scott Leach from the Presbyterian Church in Florence. From the numerous comments touching the sermon, good was done in the community.

For those who were able to attend we had two splendid programs of special meetings, two days each with the Decatur and Blair Branches. Lasting good was done, and these meetings will be repeated. We now have an appointment for a rousing and reviving time for the Walthill Branch, July 14 to 16. Brother Burton will be the life of the sessions, and the Saints, under the branch president, Brother Claude E. Carter, never fail in doing their best.

Last Saturday we held our Sunday school picnic in Omaha. The entertainment for the children and the races were enjoyed, but the associations and brotherly companionship had when the baskets were emptied and one grand feast spread for all present, was the crowning feature of the day. Of course we had the usual contest over who could eat the most ice cream, as everything was free for that day.

Brother A. Lloyd, our general Religio treasurer, and family drove in just at the conclusion of our picnic, having driven in their auto from Saint Louis, Missouri. They will spend several weeks with Brother and Sister T. J. Elliott.

Our young people's meeting last Sunday night was greatly appreciated. The young people's choir, under Sister Anderson's direction, is doing splendidly. The program was furnished by the young people, Brother C. Guyton Riley preaching the sermon. Next our reunion with Brother T. W. Williams, the principal speaker. It will be a success.

Seattle, Washington

Brother H. A. Sprague of Bellingham, our bishopric representative, was with us Sunday and gave us some telling talks on tithing. He occupied morning and evening, returning home on the night boat. He also gave the Religio a nice little talk.

Our Everett Mission Saints have their church building near completion and will soon have it ready for a grand opening, celebrated by programs by auxiliaries and sermons suited to the occasion. If present united effort continues, it will not be long before they will be ready for dedication.

A pleasing letter from Vancouver tells of the spiritual advancement of the new branch. Brother I. McMullen is blessed in his ministry as elder in charge. A close union exists between that and the mother branch at New Westminster, permitting their interchange of ministers. They are thinking of purchasing a lot for church location. The attendance at their Sunday school reaches the ninety mark.

At our priesthood meeting Sunday the question of dividing

Correction

In our report published in the SAINTS' HERALD, April 5, 1922, page 89, J. R. Taylor is charged with having received from the Bishop $248.75. This should have been $123.75. The remaining $125.00 was entered by error. Brother Taylor had advised us that he had spent twenty-five pounds of his own money for elder's expense and was willing to take a tithing receipt for it. We made the entry at this office, not knowing that Bishop George Lewis had also issued him a tithing receipt for $123.75. We are glad to make this correction.

Winnipeg District.—On account of the change in the activities of Brother W. B. Richards, who expects to leave Winnipeg soon, we have arranged with Brother C. S. Case, 507 Park Street, Saint James, Manitoba, to act as Bishop's agent of the above district.

We trust that the Saints will continue to support this arm of the Lord's work according as he blesses them. One tenth of our increase belongs to God, and it should be a pleasure to deal fairly with the Lord in temporal matters. His blessings are promised to those who hear and obey, and I trust that because of the willingness of his people in the Winnipeg District that they may receive a rich measure of the blessings of God.

One-Day Meetings

At Juniata, Michigan, July 16. Saints are requested to bring their lunch with them. At Bay Port, Michigan, August 6. Come, spend the day. William M. Grice, president.

There will be all-day services held at Pontiac, Michigan, July 23. All are invited to attend. It was to have been July 16, but had to be changed. Brother William Fligg, our district missionary, will be in attendance as one of the speakers. Also, all-day services at Flint, August 12. Good speakers will be provided and we trust all will come who can. Brother Fligg and the officers of the district will be there. J. Stanley Parrish, secretary.

the line between prudent and unwise entertainments in the church was discussed with interest.

Our hearts were gladdened in receiving a message of peace and good will signed by eighty-seven of the beloved California Saints who were in attendance at one of their grand rally days in Oakland, held on June 11. It truly caused thrills of joy as we read over those names which have grown dear to us by twelve years of church service among them, especially so as it has been eight years since we bade them a sad adieu. May the Lord bless the dear Northern California Saints.

The Oriole Girls of the Everett Religio rendered the program on June 4 and showed energy and tact in its rendition. There was but one member of the Religio absent, and he arrived before the close. Sister Ruby Nichols is the superintendent.

Brother S. S. Smith spent Sunday morning at Everett, preaching for them the morning sermon. He was with us in the evening in consultation about new tent and general reunion business. Matters are progressing nicely, pointing to a successful reunion. May all labor to this end.

A new assembly tent will be ordered for our reunion, so be sure to come and enjoy the best reunion yet. Order tents early from the writer. See notice in this issue.

J. M. TERRY.

New Graceland Cookbook

The Patronesses of Graceland College at Lamoni, Iowa, have recently issued a new edition of their popular cookbook, the proceeds from the sale of which goes to the benefit of Graceland College. These sisters have been faithfully devoted to their task and through their organization have been able to provide many necessities and conveniences for the college and dormitories. In their nineteen years of service they have not only earned and contributed much in the way of dollars and cents for the young people of the church, but have sought to supply so far as possible that which the students lack in leaving their homes, probably for the first time.

They raised money with which to build the cement walks from the college to the town, furnished two thousand dollars towards the erection of the dormitory which has been named Patroness Hall, furnished many rooms in the dormitories, bought much furniture, dishes, supplies, etc., and this year are purchasing a canning outfit costing close to $200 to enable the college to preserve its own fruit from the farm orchard and vegetables from the garden.

This third edition of the cookbook is enlarged until now it is extended to ninety-four pages. The receipts are all tested and recommended by the Patroness Society.

This edition was published at Lamoni by the Blair Printing Company, and is sold by that firm at 50 cents a copy, the profits to go to the Patroness fund as usual, and will help pay for the canning outfit and a new vacuum sweeper.

Miss Agnes MacPhail, a niece of Sister Daniel Macgregor, and herself a member of the church, has received rather wide publicity recently because she refused to accept an indemnity allowance as a member of the Canadian Parliament and returned the bonus, $1,500, retaining the original salary, which at the time she was elected was $2,500. We have not yet learned that her example has been followed by other members. She is a strong advocate of economy and believes that as an advocate she should herself set the first example and in this way has offered a pattern to other leaders.

The Need for Consecrated Men

Highly trained college men will not alone do the work. There is need for the efforts of all; but especially a need for those who are humble and full of love.

As indicated elsewhere, the problem is far from being a simple one. There is a wide diversity of opinion even in the matter of religious education. There are a great number who do not believe in religious education at all. There are churches which are split on this question, congregations taking sides for or against all Bible schools. These take the position that the church is not only the greatest, but it is the only method of salvation. Then they go a step further and limit the church to preaching by adults for adults. They will permit no Bible school or Sunday school.

This is no doubt one outgrowth of the resistance against the apparent attempt to dominate the field by other organizations, which cannot be done with benefit for real religious education. The church must be dominant and all other agencies not only subsidiary, but part of the work of the church as an organism rightly fitted together.

Then there is the very practical problem confronting not only us but others of the small Sunday schools, and how to provide properly graded work in a small branch, congregation, and Sunday school. Close grading by years is evidently out of the question, and it is often difficult to carry on even group graded work. But if we come to recognize the great value of a proper knowledge of the Word of God and of religion, so we are no longer content with a half hour lesson on Sunday, but will extend the work to the week-day special school, it then becomes more nearly practicable to meet the situation.

We have had, and still have in our churches, as well as outside, continual and repeated insistence on the necessity of training, of preparation, of high standards. As is pointed out in a recent article in the Literary Digest, excellent as is this ideal, it still presents its difficulties. The good old family doctor who knew little of modern science but a great deal of common home remedies and used a great deal of common horse sense, who always grew up in such a community and remained to take adequate care of its medical needs, is fast passing out of existence. (The Herald of Gospel Liberty.)

This family doctor was one who practiced in the country districts particularly, but also with excellent results in the city. The tendency now in medicine is towards specialization. A doctor who specializes in one subject does not go out at night, keeps only very short office hours, and requires his patients to come to the office or to go to a hospital. In part this is justified on the basis of facilities, but it fails to give the service of the old family doctor. And young men who have received this special training are slow to go to the backwoods and suffer as they must over the kind of roads, the kind of folks and homes, to which they would have to minister. The result is a tendency towards prohibitive costs and with an excess of doctors in the city, a shortage in the rural community.

The same problem, according to the Herald of Gospel Liberty, confronts us in the church. It is an excellent thing to have trained men, but it is difficult, nearly impossible, for backward communities to secure pastoral oversight except from preachers of backward denominations. Teachers who are trained and familiar with the conveniences and comfort of modern life in prosperous communities can rarely be persuaded to become pastors of little backwoods churches. Not only would they be discontented with their lot, but their high degrees of literacy ill suits those by whom much learning is neither appreciated nor understood.

There is a wonderful field for the genuine missionary spirit to meet this. It is not only necessary that we have men highly trained and with a deep grasp of religious education, men who scold occasionally at the backwardness of others; but the church as a whole, religious America, must have, according to the paper above quoted, a ministry who are willing to be all things to all men, men who are willing to serve and to help this great mass of common, untrained people and help to lift them on to a higher and better plane. A little scolding alone will never do it.

We refer to the above because it is a world-wide problem. As a church we have been consistent in this, that while we have urged, and still do, the increasing necessity for trained workers, we have not and do not, nor do the officers of the church ask that the ministry shall be all highly trained men. We recognize the basic need of men who have the love of God and their fellow men. Training is only an added qualification, not a substitute. It is a problem of tremendous importance; it is not sufficient to outline an ideal plan or curriculum. The practical problem is to secure results; to convert and help people from where they are. S. A. B.

Beside the Still Waters

(Funeral sermon of Harry E. Jarvis, Burlington, Iowa, April 22, 1922. By Elbert A. Smith.)

The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul; he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies; thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

In connection with the twenty-third psalm just read I wish to remind you of the statement that Jesus made to Martha wherein he said, "I am the resurrection and the life," and the invitation that he issued to the whole wide world, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Nineteen years ago at this season of the year, I came to Burlington to take charge of the pastorate in this church, a very inexperienced pastor. I found one of the pillars of the church to be Brother H. E. Jarvis; and during the more than four years of my pastorate here, in an official capacity he was always a safe and wise and true counselor and loyal supporter; and in a private capacity a friend that I could trust. His home was a haven of rest, and so accustomed was I to see him in the audience that it seems to-day that he should be sitting in his usual place at my right, listening to the service.

Naturally, there are many memories that come to my mind. The words we are able to utter are so absolutely inadequate to portray our feelings that often we have recourse to sentiments better expressed. For that reason I have turned to the twenty-third psalm, feeling that it is in a way typical of the life of our brother, and it expresses my feelings and ideals on this occasion.

Two characteristics of this psalm impress me. First, its very evident sincerity, and second, its simplicity. David felt all of the things he wrote and pictured here as plainly as we experience cold and hunger, rest and warmth, and all those things that strike in upon our souls through the senses so vividly. That is why this psalm lives. And for three thousand years or more, these words have endured as a witness that simplicity is the very best expression of greatness, in literature and in art and in life. Other pretentious writings have long ago been forgotten. The pyramids stand out from century to century, while works of ornate sculpture pass away and are forgotten; and so in life, the life that has been molded upon the simple fundamentals of manhood stands out and impresses us when other more pretentious lives are forgotten.

Notice the imagery of this poem; the simple pictures it portrays, of running water, green fields, a flock of sheep with a shepherd who is the dominant figure in the picture, just as Christ is the Great Shepherd standing out as the dominant figure in our belief as the leader of his flock. The words are mostly one-syllable words—short, simple words, and few of them; only about a hundred and twenty of them, and yet this is the particular piece of literature that still endures as being at least equal to any other expression of faith and confidence in God. It cannot be excelled by anyone, and it may be understood by anyone. It deals with fundamentals, such as life, death, love, faith, immortality, in a way that all may understand yet none improve upon. So it is in life, particularly at a time like this.

Fundamental Things Endure

The simple, the fundamental things are the really true and lasting things. And so it was in the life of our brother. We did not often hear him making professions of his faith and religion. He lived his religion along simple, practical, fundamental lines. In his home, in his married life, for instance, in an age when the ties of marriage and the home, which are at the foundation of society, are being assailed and threatened, and men hold lightly, to their eternal condemnation, the pledge they have made to honor one woman, here is one man who made his covenant in sincerity and kept it in sincerity, and even when his companion passed on, he remained true and faithful to her memory.

In business he believed in the simple policy of honesty, even, some would say, to his own disadvantage. In religion he believed with what seemed to me at times childlike simplicity. I remember, when among other trials that came to him, there came the departure of his daughter, and he said, "Why should we close the blinds and darken the room, expressing our mourning outwardly? We believe in the Christian religion and that she has gone on to happiness and rest. Why give up to ostentatious mourning as those who have no such hope?"

With faith he received and bore numerous trials that came to him, and I believe if there ever was a man who, when the end came, could with childlike simplicity repeat the old prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep; I pray the Lord my soul to keep," that this was the man, and that was the type of his faith.

"The Lord Is My Shepherd"

You will notice the opening sentiment of this song, "The Lord is my shepherd." I think that when a man can utter those words truly in this age of skepticism and doubt, when men are tossed to and fro, expressing one thing here and another belief there, it means something; I think that man is very blessed indeed in his generation. To my mind that is one reason why we as a church so insistently cling to the idea of revelation. Personal contact and revelation from God must be renewed from generation to generation. It is not enough that the fathers knew God—so long as one generation shall pass and another follow, there must be new revelation. Men must come in contact with God and be able to say, "The Lord is my shepherd."

Jesus said, "My sheep hear my voice." I may read that the Lord was David's shepherd; but that does not tell me he is my shepherd. I may read that he was Paul's shepherd and Peter's shepherd: that does not say he is my shepherd. I must by prayer and by pleading and by a life of devotion and consecration draw near and receive from him the assurance that he has not written in any book, and that cannot be received from any man; that he is my shepherd. This little church building, humble as it is, to me is a sacred spot, because at this altar I did receive one of the most convincing testimonies that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, that I have ever received. I read his statement, "Upon this rock I will build my church," and I felt the necessity, in order to be saved, to receive that testimony, and at this altar I did receive that spiritual assurance while alone in the church engaged in prayer.

"The good shepherd giveth his life for the flock." Jesus is the Good Shepherd. There is nothing our departed brother endured that Christ did not endure. He passed through the valley of the shadow of death. The moment he took upon himself mortality he subjected himself to death. If he had not died upon the cross he would have died some other way as a result of having taken upon himself mortality. He chose to take it upon himself, so that because of these experiences of his we will realize that we have a shepherd who has led the way.

"He maketh me to lie down in green pastures. He leadeth me beside the still waters." I presume that in this country those words do not mean so much to us where all fields are green, and where running water is plentiful. But in that country, where it was sandy and desolate, I presume David himself, having come down from the desert with his flock to a place where there were green pastures and still waters, felt the impress and remembered it and put it into his hymn. And in this life where there are so many things distressing that we all should endure patiently, we can feel what David must have felt in that sense of peace "beside the still waters." And finally at death, the Lord, our shepherd, leads us into the places where we find rest and consolation and peace, after life's struggle, and we may be very sure he has known where to lead the spirit of our brother that it may find rest from the distress of this life.

"Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." One approaching a canyon in the mountains is impressed by the shadow in the canyon, the towering walls on either side, the dark chill of the atmosphere, but after he has toiled up through the canyon and reached the summit, the sunlight is renewed. He comes out of the valley into the sunshine and peace. So it is with this life. All of us sooner or later (and it may be sooner than we think) enter into that valley and begin to feel the chill and shadow that closes around us—or perhaps we have seen our loved ones enter into that valley, and fortunate it will be for us if we can say, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil."

How the Shepherd Comforts

"Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." Brother Paul Hanson, who traveled in the Holy Land, told me he believed he had found the correct interpretation of "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." The shepherd, if a storm comes on and the night comes down, goes ahead of the sheep, and in the darkness as he raps upon the rocks with his staff, they hear the sound, and it comforts them because they know the shepherd is leading them. "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." And so this, our brother, having gone through the vicissitudes of life, the loss of loved ones, the vicissitudes of business affairs, and the toil and anxiety and care of life, and finally approaching old age and sickness which prostrated him and eventually robbed him of this earthly life, I think all the time he had this satisfaction, that his shepherd had preceded him. He could say, "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

"I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever." You notice this song finally brings eternity and immortality to our view. "I shall dwell forever." How carefully we plan our houses here in this life! If a man happens to be a millionaire, he hires the most expensive architect and erects a building with care; fills it with rare and valuable rugs, tapestries, and paintings; and equips it with all the modern conveniences, when possibly he will occupy it at the most ten, twenty-five, or fifty years. If a man be poor, he will scrimp and save and pay for his house, that he may have the satisfaction of living in his own home. In giving all this attention to the transitory home we live in on the earth, ought we not to give some attention to the home of the spirit and soul of man? I think the man is both wise and fortunate who makes provision for the future, and when the time comes that comes to all, can say, "I have a claim upon the promise: 'I go to prepare a place for you.'"

Life More Mysterious Than Death

"I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever." Naturally this experience, with similar experiences that come from time to time, brings us face to face with the great mystery of death, though after all death is not the greatest mystery. Death is around us all the time. All inanimate things are dead and lifeless; the rocks, the soil, even the atoms of creation; the earth itself is a cemetery of thousands of past generations. Death is not so extraordinary. It is life that is marvelous. It is incomprehensible. It is marvelous that we are here. Certainly the belief in continued life is no less incomprehensible or unreasonable. The fact is, the very thing we call "personality" is the foundation upon which all arguments for immortality must rest, unless we take them from revelation.

We find ourselves in a world exceedingly interesting. We find ourselves in a very beautiful world. I have seen such beautiful scenes on the seashore and in the mountains and the forest that I have thought I would like to live on and on in this life forever to admire the beauties God has provided for his people. I admire the infinite harmony of nature, whether in the mountain ranges, peak upon peak, snowcapped and rocky crags, or in some little violet or in some seashell, small, insignificant, and unseen; God has taken pains to make all things lovely.

Yes, we find ourselves in a very interesting world. There are many wonderful things in the world today. Man has accomplished some marvelous results in science and invention. He is talking across the continent and around the world by means of the radio; he is flying through the air with marvelous speed in the airplane. He is even attempting to reach out into the spiritual world, till it is an incentive to just go on living to learn and understand and await the next marvel of science.

We find ourselves in a very fascinating world with its experiences of love, marriage, friendship, parenthood, and all the varying experiences of life.

Restored Youth Not Worth While

These life experiences are interesting and fascinating and beautiful, but only on one condition: that we are in condition to perceive and appreciate them. Beauty is more subjective than objective; we must have the ability to perceive and to appreciate.

And so when we begin to be robbed of our power to appreciate and see and perceive, by sickness or age or illness or fatigue, the world does not continue to be so interesting. It is no longer so beautiful, so fascinating, and as we grow older we finally reach a point where we can begin at least to understand the attitude of some older men. I remember preaching a sermon some years ago when I was lauding the advantages of youth and telling how a wealthy man like Rockefeller would give all he had to be young again for a single year, and when I had finished an elderly gentleman said, "I would not care to live my life over. I am satisfied to take the course of nature as it comes, and if I could go back and be young again, I would not do it." I don't think I would either. I would like to if I could be sure I would avoid the mistakes we all know very well we have made. But if we could return we would probably repeat some of those mistakes or make worse ones, and I do not think I would care to retrace my steps with the toil and vicissitudes of life even to again experience its joy and interest and beauty.

I remember an experience some years ago when I was very ill and my friends had taken me to the southern part of California. It was a beautiful place. Under ordinary circumstances I would have seen much to admire. Under existing conditions, there was no beauty anywhere. I was in no condition to perceive or appreciate and I loathed the place, until after months of rest and recuperation it began to look beautiful to me.

Sometimes, after the end of one day's work we are so weary, so exhausted, that the world and life are robbed of interest and beauty, but one good night's rest renews our vision and outlook and we start with new vision and appreciation. This is the point I am getting at. Jesus said, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Christ's Rest Soul Invigorating

When we are tired we cannot appreciate things. When we are refreshed, we are renewed. This man has passed through life. He has tasted all that life had to offer him, the experiences of boyhood and young manhood; of love, marriage, and parenthood, and home building—all these things he has tasted and they were good; but now came age and sickness and pain and robbed him of the power to perceive and appreciate until he reached the stage when this world had nothing more to offer him. To him came the invitation of the Good Shepherd, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." He has gone to test that promise and to receive that rest, and we are fully confirmed in the opinion that having received that rest and spiritual regeneration, he will go forth on the other side into new fields of usefulness and labor. While we believe in the promise of rest, we believe also in the call to service, and in the great beyond there lies before man eternally fields to occupy in usefulness, to move forward in knowledge and faith and service, till finally the individual who is obedient to the full law will obtain a knowledge of those things here hidden and obscure.

We are assured that our brother so lived that he merited the love and protecting care of our Lord and Master, and the further statement, "I am the resurrection and the life," will be made good to him.

In conclusion, we will say, our prayer and desire for his friends and his children and those of the family who live after him is that the Spirit promised by the Master to comfort in such an hour will be given to them. What a consolation it must be to them to look back at the life of honor and integrity and service this brother left them to emulate. What an incentive to follow his footsteps and like him be obedient to the teachings of our Lord and Master.

May the heavenly Father help us that we may test the good things of the gospel, and in our lives manifest the virtues of honesty and righteousness, that we shall be received home when life shall be finished.

Delegates to General Conference

The list selected by the pastors in Zion met with some opposition because of the fact that it constituted only a nomination was apparently not at once understood.

At the quarterly conference in Zion on the evening of July 3 a list of nominations for delegates to General Conference was presented pursuant to the action of the previous April conference in Zion. To the list of forty-nine names thus nominated the body added twenty-six names, and from this list fifty (later report of statistician allowing fifty instead of forty-nine) were elected as delegates at an adjourned session held on the evening of July 10, the remaining twenty-five to act as alternates.

Unfortunately we find that some rumors have gone out from the earlier meeting causing some misunderstanding. At one point the discussion turned on the fact that in one district, according to the HERALD, the district president was authorized to select the delegates. In fact, we know of two such instances at least from the reports to the HERALD this spring and summer. From this there arose, partly through misunderstanding, the challenge of "hand-picked" delegates. The story as repeated seemed to us to be too absurd for credence, hence no earlier reference was made.

There have been rumors of a letter sent out by the First Presidency to district presidents suggesting the advisability of consulting with the various branch presidents in order to see that the various branches were represented adequately at General Conference and that a list of nominations be thus prepared for consideration. We have observed in the past the result of haphazard nominations; also the fact that in the branch where the conference is held a preponderance of delegates is often, if not usually, procured. However, we have been unable to find any trace of such a letter, and the Presidency and their office force each individually deny any knowledge of such a letter; with the exception that President E. A. Smith stated quite frankly that he did make such a recommendation to the April Conference in Zion but did so solely on his own responsibility as representing the First Presidency here in Zion, and that President F. M. Smith knew nothing about the list of delegates and had nothing to do with the action. That letter, which was in long hand—just a penciled note to R. V. Hopkins—is as follows and may be the basis of all of the reports that have arisen in the last month or two. At least we have been unable to find any other letter:

R. V. Hopkins: The First Presidency feels that the delegation to General Conference should be selected so as to represent the various groups and congregations in Zion. With that in view we suggest that a committee be selected by this conference to prepare a list of delegates and report back to the July conference. This committee in our opinion might very well consist of the pastors of the various churches in Zion with the pastor of the Stone Church as chairman.

Respectfully submitted,

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

E. A. S.

April 3, 1922.

There probably is no more independent body of people than those of this church, and that any man or group of men could secure a controlling number of personal delegates appears hardly probable, and so improbable that we naturally doubt that any man would attempt it.

The minutes of the conference also show that before action was taken "R. V. Hopkins ruled that the names selected by this committee would be presented to the conference as nominations." The confusion arose largely because this fact was not recognized at once in the July conference.

It will be noted that President E. A. Smith gave a clear reason, that is, that the various groups and congregations in Zion should be represented. We do not know that any check has been made, so far as the groups are concerned, but a check has been made of the congregations, and it is noted that two churches, Spring Branch and Englewood, entitled to one and two delegates, have no representation on the list finally selected. Liberty Street was entitled to five, and three were elected; Second Independence was entitled to six, and four were elected; Enoch Hill and Walnut Park have their full delegation elected; the Stone Church, entitled to 28 has now 35 delegates. This is the more surprising when we consider that of the 49 nominated by the committee over 70 per cent, namely 35, were elected as delegates, while of the 26 nominated from the floor only 15 out of 26—something over 57 per cent—were elected.

There was some objection to the fact that there were 12 elders on the original list. There were 17 additional elders nominated from the floor and of these 11 were elected, making a total of 23 elders on the final list.

It is true that some objected to elders being chosen as delegates since they have an ex officio vote. At the same time it may be noted that according to Doctrine and Covenants 17: 25 the conference is to be held by the elders of the church. However, the continual practice has been for many years to select lay members as delegates and to allow them thus immediate representation. This matter of representation is covered in Doctrine and Covenants 125: 7-9. The ninth paragraph could be interpreted that no elders should be selected, but that is not in its necessary meaning nor its usual construction, but rather that those not of the eldership should be represented by and through the delegates chosen. If none of these were members of the Melchisedec priesthood, it would mean that the conference would be dominated by those not of the Melchisedec priesthood.

In this and what follows we speak only our personal opinion and do not attempt to represent others. We recognize the right of every man to his own opinion. But in studying the revelations of the church it seems to us clear that it is the purpose of the law that the responsibility of conducting the conference shall be placed upon the eldership. At the same time, it is right that the Aaronic priesthood and the membership at large should be represented.

As a rule, at General Conference the number of elders has not exceeded about three hundred. The delegate vote is over nine hundred. It would therefore appear that there should be a reasonable representation of the Melchisedec priesthood on the delegation to represent the various branches and districts, but that it should not be composed exclusively of the eldership. Wisdom should govern and an effort be made to secure those who will directly represent the various branches and districts, who will be cognizant of the work in the various localities which they represent.

It is indeed an honor and a responsibility, as each delegate represents at least a hundred members and may represent as high as two thousand, since our present rule permits one delegate to cast a maximum of twenty delegate votes. Naturally it is preferable that so great a responsibility should not be placed with one, but that several delegates be chosen where practicable. Many have felt and do feel that where about half of the delegates are members of the Melchisedec priesthood a normal balance is had. However, there is no set church rule in the matter. All branches and districts are left free to choose those whom they wish to attend General Conference and represent them, and they are left largely free to choose these delegates in any way they wish.

In some districts and stakes it has become the practice to permit the district presidency to nominate. It seems that much can be said in favor of thought being taken beforehand and an effort made to see that the various localities and branches are all adequately represented. At the same time it should be remembered also that such a list is simply one of nominations. The body is entirely free to make other nominations as they may deem wise; nor should it be made a matter of local or general criticism if the list as adopted contains a greater or lesser number of elders, a greater or lesser number of the Aaronic priesthood, or more or less of the sisterhood, nor even if some localities should receive no immediate representation. So long as the nominees are to represent the district, the district conference has the right to choose, and while an effort should be made to see that the various localities are represented, there may arise other contingencies which make it wise and sometimes necessary that the delegates should not be chosen strictly on a pro rata basis from each and every branch.

The method to secure more adequate representation for the district and for each branch should meet with approval, but when the majority have spoken we should acquiesce and accept the list as adopted.

S. A. BURGESS.

The Christian Church, according to the Christian Standard, is instituting a movement for group evangelical work that all should assist in the work. As a result, in one county in which they had considerably less than one per cent of the population as members and only some dozen churches which had not been closed, such an evangelical effort brought forth eighty who volunteered for Christian service. It is a time to go forward.

Apostasy and Priestcraft

By S. K. Sorensen

Ministers of the church should avoid all appearance of taking advantage of their office to their own aggrandizement.

In all the history of the past of which we have any record, it appears that the tendency of men holding authority has been to want to lord it over their fellow men. This tendency, so far as the church of God is concerned, has also been associated with a departure from God and his ways, and the first step towards apostasy. The Apostle Peter in his time gave this instruction to the shepherds of the flock:

The elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed: feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock. And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.—1 Peter 5: 1-4.

This apostle had been under the tutelage of the Master himself and intimately associated with him in his ministerial work among men, and who could be better qualified to teach the lesson which he himself had learned from him who came to be the servant of us all? This condition of equality, however, did not continue long after the demise of the apostles, but gradually a self-imposed dignity in the shepherds created a gap between them and their brethren, by which this equality was destroyed, and a superiority, which was only imaginary, arose in their aspiring minds to be like one of old, "to be like unto the most high." This aspiration formed the basis of priestcraft which afterwards dominated the church during this unfortunate period called the Dark Ages, and of which the Book of Mormon says:

He [God] commanded that there shall be no priestcraft; for, behold, priestcrafts are that men preach and set themselves up for a light unto the world, that they may get gain, and praise of the world; but they seek not the welfare of Zion.

Early Church Developed Priestcraft

The historian, D'Aubigne, says:

The church was in the beginning a community of brethren, guided by a few of the brethren. All were taught of God, and each had the privilege of drawing for himself from the divine fountain of light. The epistles which then settled the great question of doctrine did not bear the pompous title of a single man—of a ruler.

It was at first a community of brethren, and now an absolute monarchy was established in its bosom [the church]. All Christians were priests of the living God, with humble pastors as their guides. But a haughty head is upraised in the midst of these pastors; a mysterious voice utters words full of pride; an iron hand compels all men, great and small, rich and poor, bond and free, to wear the badge of its power. The holy and primitive equality of souls before God is lost sight of. At the voice of one man Christendom is divided into two unequal parties: on the one side is a separate caste of priests, daring to usurp the name of the church, and claiming to be invested with peculiar privileges in the eyes of the Lord; and on the other, servile flocks reduced to a blind and passive submission—a people gagged and fettered, and given over to a haughty caste. Every tribe, language, and nation of Christendom, submits to the dominion of this spiritual king, who has received power to conquer.

In reference to the power of this self-constituted authority in the church of God, Bishop Marsh in his ecclesiastical history speaks as follows:

The measures adopted by the Roman pontiffs to secure their dominion, were of a character with the unscriptural and odious tyranny which they exercised. They assumed to themselves the power of filling all the important places in the church; of deposing and creating the bishops, abbots, and canons at their pleasure; so that in time there were scarce any in office to oppose them; for men were selected for these stations who would be tools of their ambition.

The pages of history are replete with accounts of similar recorded facts, showing that in the ecclesiastical realm the ambition for power and authority is just as great as in the civil, and far more dangerous. When the minds of men can be controlled and be imbued with the superstitious idea that God is the author of and indorses such authority, he is reduced to passive submission that borders on the fanatical, whereby his mental and spiritual powers are taken captive by a wicked foe whose purpose is to prevent the free exercise thereof.

Ecclesiastical Perversions in Utah

Time and space will not permit to enter into any extended examination of this evil which has always been a menace to the free exercise of the God-given powers of man's agency and has always proved the downfall of both civil and ecclesiastical governments. The intelligence of man can only thrive and develop upon the free exercises of his mental powers, and to the extent that men are hampered, to that extent will light and intelligence decline from among the race.

We have had in our own time some examples of such rule of tyranny and oppression, not only in the civil, but in the religious realm; and we have seen the fruits thereof. As in former days of the Christian church, men began to assume authority which did not belong to them, so in this age, after the true church of Christ was again restored, a haughty head again raised himself above his brethren; this time it was the chief among those who followed him and who led some of the Saints of this restored church to the valleys of the mountains of Utah, who said in a speech on July 31, 1853:

I will give you the pith of the last order issued, that man or family who will not do as they are told in the orders, are to be treated as strangers, yea, even as enemies, and not as friends. And if there should be a contest, if we should be called upon to defend our lives, our liberty, and our possessions, we would cut such off the first, and walk over their bodies to conquer the foe outside.—Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 167.

Those who went through that so-called endowment house out there were sworn "to implicit obedience to any requisition however treasonable, however criminal, however unnatural, however impious it might be," to that priesthood and their successors. Thus the minds of men and women were bound by the strong cords of secret oaths and penalties to a corrupt and depraved priesthood, and thus history is repeating itself, as it has always done. It is the blind leading the blind and the condition of both is pitiable; they do not see when good cometh.

The following illustration of perfect obedience to priesthood authority, as an arrogant priestcraft demands, is from Leaves of Healing for July 19, 1902:

Charge to Candidates for Ordination

"I charge you before the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth, that you answer truly the questions I am about to ask you. Are you saved through the faith of Jesus? Can you say, I am?"

Candidates for ordination: "I am."

General Overseer: "Are you determined to trust God for healing, cleansing, and keeping power? Can you say, I am?"

Candidates: "I am."

General Overseer: "Are you determined by the grace of God, to be obedient to the general overseer, receiving him as the head of the church, under God, who has the power and right to command? Do you recognize the office of the prophet foretold by Moses, the messenger of God's covenant, and Elijah the restorer, in myself? So far as you know your own hearts, can you say, I do?"

Candidates: "I do."

General Overseer: "Is there anything in the constitution in the Christian Catholic Church in Zion to which you have any objection? Can you say, There is not?"

Candidates: "There is not."

General Overseer: "Are you willing in all things, above all claims of family relationship or citizenship to recognize your position as an officer of the Christian Catholic Church in Zion, as imposing upon you a superior claim above all other claims, under God? Can you say, I am?"

Candidates: "I am."

General Overseer: "Then, my brothers and sisters, it will be my great joy to ordain you."

When the minds of men and women descend to that slavlike submission to priestly authority by which they surrender their intellectual powers, which thus fail to function according to the design and purpose of God, it is an evidence of a low and descending plane of intelligence, which should be the controlling force of mankind, a force by which they should learn to be able to govern themselves in harmony with God-given laws independent of any outside force of coercion.

Man Robbed of Rights

Where priestly rule holds sway over the people, there the God-given right of choice between good and evil is taken from them and they become only machines in the hands of their taskmasters by which their individual responsibility to God becomes an impossibility to carry into execution. Since the days of the Apostle Peter, when he uttered the sublime words of admonition to the shepherds of the flock, as quoted at the beginning of this article to the present time, there has not to our knowledge been delivered a similar admonition and caution against self-aggrandizement until the gospel was restored in this last dispensation. We feel the importance of this admonition, as it was written by the hand of the man whom God had chosen to bring forth his marvelous work in the last days, Joseph Smith, when he was confined in Liberty (?) jail in Missouri for the gospel's sake.

Joseph Smith's Views

They are words which should never be lost sight of; no, not for one moment; they are eternal words, uttered by a true servant of God, setting forth the true basis upon which man may minister in the name of God. The following are his words:

If there are any among you, who aspire to their own aggrandizement and opulence, while their brethren are groaning in poverty, and laboring under sore trials and temptations, they cannot be benefited by the intercessions of the Holy Spirit; we ought at all times be very careful that such highmindedness never have place in our hearts, but condescend to men of low estate, and with all long-suffering, bear the infirmities of the weak. There are many called but few are chosen, and why are they not chosen? Because their hearts are set upon the things of the world, and they are aspiring to the honors of men: they do not learn the lesson that the rights of the priesthood are inseparably connected with the powers of heaven: and that the powers of heaven cannot be controlled nor handled, only upon the principles of righteousness, that they may be conferred upon us is true, but when we undertake to cover our sins, to gratify our pride, vain ambition, or to exercise dominion or compulsion over the souls of the children of men, in any degree of unrighteousness, behold the heavens withdraw themselves, the Spirit of the Lord is grieved, then amen to the priesthood, or to the authority of that man: behold ere he is aware, he is left to kick against the pricks, to persecute the saints, and to fight against God. We have learned by sad experience that it is the nature and disposition of almost all men, as soon as they get a little authority, as they suppose to begin to exercise unrighteous dominion, hence many are called but few are chosen. No power or influence can, or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood, only by persuasion, by long-suffering, by gentleness, by meekness of love unfeigned: without hypocrisy, and without guile: reproving with sharpness when moved by the Holy Ghost, and afterwards showing forth an increase of love toward him whom thou hast reproved, lest he esteem thee to be an enemy, so that he may know that thy faithfulness is stronger than the cords of death.—Millennial Star, vol. 1, p. 194.

Book of Mormon Sentiment

We shall hail with gladness the day when every minister for Christ will be actuated by the spirit which caused these lines to be written. But, praised be the Lord God Omnipotent for the wonderful gift, the Book of Mormon, which in no uncertain terms denounces that inequality, brought about by an arrogant priesthood, by which a partition wall has been erected between the priesthood and the people. An account given in the record of Alma, Book of Mormon, says:

And it came to pass in the first year of the reign of Alma in the judgment seat, that there was a man brought before him to be judged; a man who was large, and noted for his much strength; and he had gone about among the people, preaching to them what he termed to be the word of God, bearing down against the church; declaring unto the people that every priest and teacher ought to become popular; and they ought not to labor with their hands, but that they ought to be supported by the people. . . . And it came to pass that he did teach these things so much, that many did believe on his words, even so many that they began to support him and give him money; and he began to be lifted up in the pride of his heart, and to wear costly apparel; yea, and even began to establish a church, after the manner of his preaching.

The story goes on to say that in the heat of argument with an opponent, he slew this opponent with the sword, for which cause he was brought before Alma, the chief judge who was also the leader of the church. This man's name was Nehor, and he was convicted before the judge of priestcraft, and was sentenced to death. This, however, did not put an end to the iniquitous work thus started, but it continued to flourish, for which cause Alma continued to teach the people against those things, and showed them the proper relation which should exist between the priests and the people. The account of which is as follows:

And when the priests left their labor, to impart the word of God unto the people, the people also left their labors to hear the word of God. And when the priest had imparted unto them the word of God, they all returned again diligently unto their labors; and the priest, not esteeming himself above his hearers; for the priest was no better than the hearer, neither was the teacher any better than the learner: and thus they were all equal, and did all labor, every man according to his strength.

Another man by the name of Korihor was brought before Alma for teaching false doctrine and accusing Alma of bringing the church into bondage and living upon the labors of the people, to which Alma makes reply as follows:

Thou knowest that we do not glut ourselves upon the labors of the people; for behold I have labored even from the commencement of the reign of the judges, until now, with mine own hands for my support, notwithstanding my many travels round about the land, to declare the word of God unto my people. And notwithstanding the many labors I have performed in the church, I have never received as much as one senine for my labor; neither has any of my brethren, save it were in the judgment seat; and then we have received only according to law, for our time. And now if we do not receive anything for our labors in the church, what doth it profit us to labor in the church, save it were to declare the truth, that we may have rejoicings in the joy of our brethren?

At another time Alma gave instruction to the priests whom he had ordained, as follows:

And he commanded them that they should observe the sabbath day, and keep it holy, and also every other day they should give thanks to the Lord their God. And he also commanded them that the priests, whom he had ordained, should labor with their own hands for their support; and there was one day in every week that was set apart that they should gather themselves together to teach the people, and to worship the Lord their God, and as often as it was in their power to assemble themselves together. And the priests were not to depend upon the people for their support; but for their labor they were to receive the grace of God, that they might wax strong in the Spirit, having the knowledge of God, that they might teach with power and authority from God.

Ezekiel's Condemnation

Thus we find that on the Western as well as the Eastern Continent did priestcraft flourish, and on both continents did the true servants of God proclaim against it. Priestcraft is the stepping-stone to apostasy and has been so in all ages and in all places. Apostasy never commenced with the common people, but always with the priesthood; it never entered the feet and went upward, it always started at the head and went downward. Unless the true church of Christ exists there can be no apostasy from it; hence apostasy has always, wherever it has taken place, followed the setting up of the true church of Christ, and its leaders have led the way, before the time of Christ as well as after. Ezekiel the prophet by the word of the Lord condemns priestcraft very effectually in the following language:

And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying: Son of man, prophesy against the shepherds of Israel, prophesy, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God unto the shepherds; woe be unto the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves! should not the shepherds feed the flocks? ye eat the fat, and clothe you with wool, ye kill them that are fed, but ye feed not the flock. The diseased have ye not strengthened, neither have ye healed that which was sick, neither have ye bound up that which was broken, neither have ye brought again that which was driven away, neither have ye sought that which was lost; but with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them.—Ezekiel 34: 1-4.

Wherever and whenever the church of the living God is established, its ministers should with utmost care, seek to avoid the pitfalls into which thousands of their brethren before them have fallen. Priestcraft is the rock and shoal upon which many a brilliant servant of God has been shipwrecked and lost his all, besides leading the souls of men and women into perdition.

Education

By Ralph W. Farrell

Let pupils learn—but not learn to bluff bigger minds.

Who among the members of the church does not believe in education? We have never discovered such an one. But we have found many who do not take kindly to the bombast of young fledglings who having studied for a few hours a few books which are a mixture of truth and error, think they know more than their mother, father, and all other progenitors back to Adam. Away with such foolishness. All intelligent Saints are firm believers in "education," even though they, nor anyone else, seem to know just what the word means; but they believe in acquiring knowledge and praying God to give them wisdom to use it. The trouble with the human part of Christ's church is not lack of secular book knowledge—it is lack of proper spiritual relationship with the Father of Lights.

The writer of this is a strong exponent of schools, of intellectual development, but is as strongly opposed to parading the artificiality of brain vaporings before an experienced and thinking group of men and women, and thus casting a green light on the real education of the common people who have through observation and application obtained a standard of practical thinking that is superior to anything that the so-called higher schools of learning can or do offer. It is this false attitude of mind shown by the "college fool" which has turned really intelligent men against the over-emphasized value of "secular education."

By all means let our boys and girls learn—and learn all they can of things in general. Let them go to college if possible. But do not let them try to "bluff" such men as Spencer (even though we do not agree with his teachings) and Lincoln and thousands of other men who never saw the inside of a school higher than a grammar or a primary, with the claim that a college education is essential to clear thinking and great doing. Of course they studied and profited by the advice of others.

Let us have a proper balance. In some parts of the country, if you are not a member of a certain church congregation you are looked upon with scorn; and in the minds of some men, if you do not hold a college degree, you are little better than the quarry slave. This is nonsense. It was nonsense in the days of Robert Burns when he wrote "a man's a man for a' that." We love to see the children study when they place upon learning its proper value; but we hate to see the skum of pride gather on the top of the common cup—even the communion cup.

If thus briefly, expression of our honest sentiments brings down upon our head the curse of the "wise," be it so. We are not attacking education—we favor it; but we want the real kind. No sham, no shoddy, no pretense. "To be learned is good, if one hearken to the counsel of God."—Nephi.

Right Education

By F. W. Brose

How to become truly educated is briefly discussed here.

One cannot help but notice the many urgent appeals in the church papers for education. And by the way, the writer has yet to hear of anyone who is opposed to education, properly applied.

But here comes the parting of the ways. There are different kinds of education, as well as different grades in each class for a given purpose: even in those intended for good, which helps us to put into practice the things that will bring us to a higher standard of morals to live by, spiritually, morally, mentally, and physically.

But the many misconstructions, and the many misapplications made through education by the wisdom of man, have not been such as to cause us to revere the results.

How, then, shall we become educated and make the proper application, so that it may become of real service to the body—the church? Can we by the wisdom of man find out God?

Oh the vainness, and the frailties, and the foolishness of men! When they are learned, they think they are wise, and they hearken not unto the counsel of God, for they set it aside, supposing they know of themselves; wherefore, their wisdom is foolishness, and it profiteth them not. And they shall perish. But to be learned is good, if they hearken unto the counsels of God.—2 Nephi 6: 58-61.

Behold, I speak unto you, and also to all those who have desires to bring forth and establish this work; and no one can assist in this work, except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity, being temperate in all things whatsoever shall be intrusted to his care.—Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4.

I think perhaps Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36 gives us the key to our problem if prayerfully, carefully comprehended. I would stress the need of diligent prayer, by every officer and member, and to fast often. Prayer is the key that unlocks the door to our heart. Prayer increases our faith in God, brings his Spirit to us, and the Spirit of Christ shall lead us into all truth. Having the Spirit for our guide, we will not become stagnant, but the desire to learn, to become educated properly for efficient service, will then have been awakened within us, and no one who has thus become awakened to the fruits of the Spirit will be satisfied and say, "I want no more." And thus as we shall progress day by day in our learning, we shall make the proper application of our education all along the way.

The Trouble With Sectarianism

By a Nonmember

That there is a disappointing degree of spiritual life in practically all of the Christian churches is an admitted truth, and many and varied are the reasons given in accounting for this condition.

To the reasons which many have given as explaining why the tides of spiritual life run so freely through the churches, I wish to add one which I believe answers the question more fully by striking deeper into the matter than some others who have given reasons.

After many years of prayerful observation, studying the word and comparing the same with Christian experiences, I am led to believe that a great and widespread error has and is being made in diagnosing the state of grace of persons seeking the salvation of their souls. The words which have been especially used to open my eyes to the truth of what I am about to offer as an explanation for the low state of spiritual life in the churches are the words of Christ to Nicodemus, "Ye must be born again."

I have reflected on these words and I give you these reflections, also the conclusion from these reflections. In this conclusion may be found a suggestion offering an explanation for the spiritual poverty of the churches.

First, I have reflected on the figure which Christ used in talking with Nicodemus—a "birth." Consider that Christ used this figure because of its aptness for illustrating a spiritual experience. Now any consideration of birth as an event that does not go back and consider what must necessarily precede birth would be no consideration on the subject at all.

In considering this word birth (a word chosen by Him in whom all fullness of knowledge dwelt) to illustrate or make plain the operation of God's Spirit in the soul, I see first a beginning of life; second, a formative period. Both of these states precede or go before birth. Now if this figure of birth be a true one by which to decipher Christian experience, then there must be in a Christian experience that which corresponds to what is observed in nature. We only state a fact attested by countless numbers of God's people when we say that he who has attained a spiritual experience, consciously embracing the new birth, knows that there is in Christian experience and before the new birth, that which agrees with the two states above named.

Now the error which we believe has been made and is being made and which we believe is sufficient to account for the widespread spiritual dearth in the churches is that of encouraging seekers after God and his salvation to believe themselves Christians before they are made Christians by birth or while

The Oriental Believes in Inaction

The attitude of the Orient as compared with western Europe is summarized in Hearst's International magazine in the following two quotations from representative men:

Soddie, the well-known investigator in the field of radio-activity, values the present state of European science as follows: "We have the tested right to believe that man, sometime, will attain the power to guide for his own purposes the elementary sources of energy which Nature still so jealously guards. As a result of the advance of the science of physics, we find ourselves at a turning point in the upward movement of civilization. We take the first step towards the heights. Although the future is not visible, yet it leads, in our opinion, to the physical control of nature.

"In this ascent, many outer boundaries of thought are left behind, and the dream of mortals embodied in philosophical systems, fall to the ground. The possibilities are revealed of a new order of things under natural conditions which will be better than man can predict; but no consolations based on another existence. These possibilities are realizable here, in this world. We must fight and struggle to rend them from the avaricious hands of a jealous Nature."

The Chinaman, Lao-Tse, taught: "The only thing to be feared is active being. All of us should do without action. Not doing is more desirable than everything that exists between earth and heaven. When men cease to act, complete peace will rule on earth."

Life in a Leper Colony

A cousin of J. O. Dutton in leper colony in Hawaiian Islands.

Nearly a whole page is given in the Janesville (Wisconsin) Daily Gazette for September 24, 1921, to the work among the lepers in the Hawaiian Islands. Near Honolulu there is a hospital at which they are trying out a new cure for leprosy which is apparently successful though sufficient time has not yet elapsed to be certain that there will be no return of the disease.

Instead of the old cry of "Unclean," the patients are required to take a hot bath every day. They may take a cold bath also if they wish, though it must be at some other time of the day. They are required to spend much time in the open air and at play. They are not permitted to sit and become morose. The treatment by injection once a week, though somewhat painful, is made a gala occasion when they dress up and enjoy cheerful music and in other ways make a festival of the day. It is said that the life there is so they are in one or the other of the two states of grace typified by the two natural states above named.

In other words, in dealing with souls seeking God and his salvation we have diagnosed prenatal spiritual life as post natal spiritual life or the new birth. This is an awful mistake, and the dearth of spiritual life in the churches is its fruitage. This also is a reason big enough to account in a rational way for the feebleness of spiritual life in the churches.

pleasing that it is called Mount Happy and those who are paroled beg to be permitted to come back.

Near this hospital, some fifty miles away, is the settlement of Mola Kaia. At this point Ira B. Dutton is established as a Catholic priest and is known as "Brother Joseph." He is a first cousin of Elder O. N. Dutton, and hence a second cousin of Elder J. O. Dutton. He was born in 1843, was a member of the Baptist Church in early life, but after his marriage to a Catholic, joined the Catholic Church in 1883. In 1886 he left his home to go into penance on the islands, his whereabouts being unknown to his relatives, and he has remained there ever since. He was assistant to Father Damien until 1889, when, upon the death of Father Damien, he took charge of the social and benevolent work and continued therein.

Leprosy, in the past, has been ostracized. It is said that in some parts of the world it is "cured" by immediate execution. Modern medical science has discovered that it is a germ disease and it is believed that a remedy has nearly been found. In fact, the statement is quoted from the Scientific American that one had better worry over a case of measles next door.

A bit of humor is added in the statement that Priest Dutton goes over the papers and magazines and cuts out the pictures of modern dress as being detrimental to good morals. He thus indicates that current literature is unfit for even lepers to read.

Is Europe Bankrupt?

A great deal has been written within the past few years concerning the need of Europe. There have been a number of references also in the HERALD. It is therefore with considerable interest that we note an article in the Outlook by William C. Gregg, who has spent considerable time in Europe.

As he said, Americans have been brought to think of Europe as bankrupt, they have considered America as rich beyond imagination; while the facts are that Europe is tremendously rich in fixed assets, but is short on ready cash. We have considerable ready cash—a fair amount—but nothing in fixed assets to compare with Europe. Vienna alone, despite its temporary poverty in real cash, has greater wealth than Chicago and Philadelphia combined, though these three cities are all of about the same size. America's fixed wealth is largely a matter of high valuation placed on the land. If Australia appraised her land at one third or one fifth as much as America, she would be the richest country in the world per capita.

Mr. Gregg emphasizes the art treasures, tapestries, paintings, and great public buildings; also the numerous palaces and fine private residences. The forests of Austria, despite the age of the country, are being carefully conserved. Its live stock number 322 cattle and 182 hogs for every one thousand inhabitants. Feather beds are worth easily $20 each, to say nothing of a down bed, yet Austria averages more than one feather bed for each inhabitant.

Comparing the wealth of two countries, it is well that the basis of the estimate be first considered. Material wealth does not consist in the value of dollars. It does consist in the quantity and fertility of the land; in the quantity, and quality, of buildings; in aesthetic value and in movable and other property actually held and owned.

Monetary values in Europe are disorganized. Mr. Gregg quotes one instance of a man who bought a household of furniture before the war and has since sold one chair for enough to pay the whole original bill.

Use the Mind to Create

A great many people place too much importance upon the acquisition of knowledge and the pursuit of learning. There is no special benefit in amassing information. In fact, it may become very much like the habit of going to baseball games, and the mind that is forever reading and studying and never doing anything with the facts that it amasses, is liable also to be flabby.

That form of exercise which does the mind good is creation and construction.

It is doing things with the mind that brings mental strength, and not merely receiving things by the mind.—Doctor Frank Crane, in Current Opinion for May.

Bishops and Their LL.D.s.

A correspondent entreats that we explain why we do not use the letters, D. D., L. H. D., LL. D., etc., more often after the names of our bishops. The letter is fairly long, but the foregoing sentence carries the pith of it.

Answering to the best of our information and understanding we would say there is no particular reason for omitting the honorary letters. To our mind it is a matter of temperament on the part of the individual editor. So far as the editor of the Central is concerned he has such an appreciation of these brothers invested with our denominational leadership, and he has such an affection for them as personal friends, that he likes to direct attention to them, to them themselves, stripped of all sidelights, and not to their shoulder straps or gold braid. If for example he wanted to pour upon the head of Bishop McDowell (our most frequent contributor) all the halos behind his degree of LL. D., the editor would naturally be inclined to enumerate the institutions from which the distinction came, and our space is not made of rubber; we would have almost to print the list as a continued story, he has received the title, LL. D., so often. And so with other bishops. We could use the string of letters: but it does not coincide with our spontaneous thoughts of him or of his colleagues. It is an happiness added to any day when we can print an article and put under the caption just two naked words, Bishop Cranston, Bishop McDowell, Bishop Hamilton, Bishop Nicholson, Bishop Quayle, Bishop Stuntz, to name here only those who write most frequently for the Central.

There you have it; a personality standing in the spotlight: he and he himself. When we begin to decorate him with regalia, pin on the shoulder straps, and tie on the gold braid of D. D., Litt. D., LL. D., L. H. D., and other high and enviable distinctions, we have the sort o' feelin' that we are diverting attention from the person to the garb. In the old days the king of France was never seen unless he had on his immense wig. It was handed in on a stick and the curtains of his bed were not withdrawn, even to his valet, until he had the wig adjusted to his "block." The wig was his halo, and verily it was about all some kings had—the wig and the medals. We don't just like it. That's all. Moreover the omission of these letters is democratic. And does not that count? After all, we be brethren, even if some are taller.

We look with satisfaction on the habit of any editor who does not have so odd a personality as the one we see when shaving. We like to have them pin on the bishops all the decorations if they feel like it. But we want to get near and just point the finger not to their apparel (not even to Bishop, then Doctor, Nicholson at Decatur) but to them. We like just Bishop Quayle, Bishop Waldorf, Bishop Stuntz, Bishop Mead (to name only those in our area), for our pride is in the men, their talents, their character, their leadership, rather than in letters, that drive you to a dictionary to understand, pleasant and proper and desirable as such recognitions and decorations are. Character is impressive: talent is impressive: achievement is impressive. They combine in personality. That is the quest, the object in our case of veneration and affection. And some way that has become our horizon line, our sky line. Of course they have the titles. If there are any titles not yet in captivity, let's go, catch them, and present them to these leaders. It is proper to do it.

But after all, when the curtains are down, or up as the case may be, and all is over or getting over, there is the essential man. And right there with the man, in the spotlight or in the chamber, is our pride and our joy.

Have we answered the question?—Central Christian Advocate, May 17, 1922.

Fuel Supply Ample

Occasionally we note an item to the effect that there is danger of a fuel shortage and wonder what the world will do when the present supply is exhausted. So far as petroleum is concerned, the Scientific American Monthly for February would indicate that one half of the petroleum supply has already been exhausted, though there remains nearly six billion gallons. But at the rate it is now being used, that supply would not last for fourteen years, without allowing for any increase. This may soon seriously affect the question of gasoline for motor engines of various kinds, including the automobile.

Of known supplies of anthracite, perhaps one seventh has so far been used, with seventeen billion tons remaining. Of bituminous coal, no significant part has yet been used, as there remains in sight over one and a half trillion tons, which at present rate of consumption would last for about three thousand years. And there remains also peat, lignite, oil shale deposits considerable in extent as yet practically untouched.

Single Standard Emphasized

The Chicago Tribune reports a decision by the Health Commission in favor of the single standard of morality requiring individuals, without regard to sex, to undergo treatment at the county hospital. This is, of course, as it should be. No distinction should be made in the case of contagious diseases with regard to wealth or sex, and no exception should be made in the case of venereal diseases. This seems the only rational way to deal with this problem; quarantine the same as for other contagious diseases.

College Societies Must Reform

In an address by Doctor George Thompson, president of the University of Utah, we note the statement that until recently fraternities have been an expression of social life at the American colleges, places for the idler and the incompetent, until it has become apparent that there was a rising public sentiment which might sweep out sororities and fraternities if their ideals were not changed. Hence to-day nearly all of them are trying to become rather the centers of scholarship than of wasteful social activities. He suggests that unless this provision be made and snobbishness dropped they should be abolished.

We cannot save the public unless we teach them. We cannot teach them unless we reach them. You may name it psychology or pedagogy, but in the last analysis it is go and get them.—Durham, at the International Sunday School Convention.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

Edited by Audentia Anderson, 5020 California St., Omaha, Nebr.

Our Reunion Material

The material sent out by the Women's Department this year, suitable for use at the reunions, is varied, splendidly selected, and of a character to both interest and instruct.

The playlets are a most popular form of presenting the work of the department, and cannot fail to make a vivid and lasting impression. One, entitled "Mimic mothers," represents two small girls at play with their dolls, and unconsciously revealing the differences in their training and rearing. One, daughter of a careless, incapable mother, feeds her doll paregoric, licks off the spoon, kisses her children in the mouth, jolts them forcibly on her knees, and in many ways discloses the fact that her mother had taken little pains to discover proper methods of feeding and caring for her children. The other one, daughter of a progressive, thoughtful mother, one who has studied to understand her duties and responsibilities, shows quite plainly that she has been accustomed to special care in regard to sanitation, hygiene, and food. The careless mother, overhearing the play of the children, is stricken with remorse at the revelation of her own indifference and almost criminal negligence, and determines to change her life, and conscientiously devote more time to the study needed to better qualify as a mother.

Two playlets present the work of the Young Women's Bureau, showing how much good influence in the lives of the girls may be wielded by the Temple Builder and Oriole organizations, the elevation of ideals of beauty and service, the strengthening of ties which hold our Latter Day Saint girls together, and the opening of many avenues of development and usefulness. "Every girl's quest for happiness," and "The friendly road," are the titles of these two splendid plays. In addition to them, the bureau offers suggestions as to activities for the girls at reunions—games, contests, athletics, talks, and programs.

In child welfare there is presented a demonstration which was used at our Women's Department institute in Independence. It shows a young mother in her home, receiving a call from the cradle roll visitor, and effectively portrays the help and encouraging counsel such a mother can be given through such agency. Another similar play showing the work of the friendly visitor has proved to be very effective and popular, and gives good opportunity for dramatic talent.

Sister Margret Davis, of Des Moines, has been splendid help in preparing these playlets. One of her new ones for this year's reunions is called "The home beautiful," and clearly shows the influence for good and uplift that can be wielded by the woman in the home who idealizes that home and sees in it opportunity for the use and development of her highest talents. Order, cleanliness, cheerfulness, patience, as well as efficient management, help to make our homes what God intends them to be, and the Women's Department is organized for the purpose of helping our women to reach these ideals.

A series of lessons in household management, by Sister Jellings, of Mount Washington, Missouri, is a fine addition to our reunion material this year. These are arranged for use on consecutive days, and deal with a subject in which it is possible to interest most women. Besides, in the hands of a clever leader, these lessons can form the basis of more extended study, by assigning to different ones topics for discussion or special treatment. Blackboard work will help to add interest, as sketches of well-arranged rooms or utensils which add to the ease and efficiency of housework help to emphasize the points considered.

Sister Krahl and Doctor Harrington have made a large contribution to the educational material sent out this year, through some splendid articles on social purity and sex hygiene. Doctor Harrington makes a special appeal to the men and boys, and it is to be hoped that all organizers in addition to the women's study of this subject, will see that the reunion president or committee will have a special meeting for men for the consideration of the doctor's paper. It is most necessary, if the ideals of our church members in regard to sex life and conduct are to be raised to a plane pleasing to the Master, that there be a greater joint effort on the part of men and women, husbands and wives, fathers and mothers to accomplish it.

Suggestions as to the children's hour—handwork and games, and instructive talks—will be welcome to those who undertake to guide the activities of the smaller ones at the reunion. Sister Walter W. Smith, a kindergartner of experience, has added some valuable suggestions to the best of those offered two years ago, and they are included in our reunion envelope. There are also a number of ideas for demonstrations, especially suitable for display in a tent set apart as a rest tent for women. These suggestions are not too elaborate for reunion work, and an energetic woman, with the help of one or two others, can easily assemble the articles which will make such a strong impression of valuable lessons. What is learned through the medium of the eye is practically nonforgettable, and more and more are the efforts of educators directed towards this potent agency for presenting truth.

A program for reunions, worked out by the superintendents of three of the general departments of the church, will be greatly appreciated by all, and especially by those who are becoming convinced that the work of the departments in the future is to be more and more closely coordinated. Many of the field workers sent out this year to the various reunions are representing all three departments, and it should be recognized that, whatever may have been the dividing lines in the past they are fast disappearing, and that one and all are but phases of the same task—that of bringing the members of the household of faith gradually but surely upward to the higher planes designated by God.

The Women's Department is seeking to keep pace with this tendency, and is willing to lend every possible assistance in the task of accomplishing the desired result. The helps sent out from our general office this year attest that fact, and a prayer goes with them that our sisters will be signally blessed in using them in their work.

A Man's View of Farm Life for Women

One of the principal reasons why many of the sisters want to leave the farm is because they are compelled to be merely beasts of burden there. All joy is taken out of their lives, because they are given loads that would wear out a horse!

One home I was in was presided over by a man who had lived there thirty years. His wife, a frail little woman, had reared six children, and during that whole time the wood she had to use had lain out, exposed to the weather. Sometimes, when it would rain for several weeks at a time, she had only wet wood to burn, with all its attendant difficulties and disagreeable experiences. Five dollars would have bought enough boards to have put a roof over a shed, for they had plenty of timber for the posts.

Another time I was where there was a man and wife, a daughter and a son. Again there was no woodshed. The pile of wood was at least half the distance of a city block from the house, and it was the woman who carried most of the wood from that pile! She had been doing it for nearly twenty years:

The women usually have to do all the garden work, and the men seem to care very little about whether or not things are convenient or arranged so as to lighten the woman's burden. Often there are poor fences and the hogs and cattle see the nice, green vegetables inside the garden, soon break through, and the woman's hard labor is all lost.

Within the past two weeks I heard a woman say that she asked her husband last fall to plow the garden lot, but he didn't get around to do it. The result was, she had a much harder job this spring, and the ground was in much poorer condition to grow plants than if he had spent about two hours with a team and plow last fall.

Sometimes the wells are located so that the woman has a long distance to carry the water. One young woman I know, with three children, with wood to carry, churning to do, and also washing (and, as usual, the wood was out in the wet) had to carry most of the water she needed, both in the house and out of it. I told her she was working beyond her strength.

There is not much sunshine in the lives of many of our farmers' wives, and especially of the poor among them. The number who have pleasant days on the farm is very small among the common, average people.

ONE WHO TRAVELS ABOUT.

Leadership

The Leader Reporting

Perhaps the worst bugaboo in the life of a leader is making out reports. How it is put off, from day to day, and then, because at the last we are short of time, it is either sent in very incomplete or is never sent at all!

Yet reporting is not a difficult matter, if one has kept a proper record of the work done. In fact, it is quite simple, and clears one's desk and makes room for a better prosecution of the immediate task of the hour. Besides, it is only fair to those higher up for us to make regular report. If we sat in the position of chief executive, we might frequently feel like saying, in a peremptory manner, "Send on that report! Don't write me reasons why you are not sending it!" So a liberal use of the "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you" rule might find proper place here.

Having accepted appointment as leader or as organizer, enter at once upon all the duties of your office. Perhaps the first one will be to call an executive meeting. Later on in the week you will begin organizing your class work. In doing these two things, you will perhaps spend some money and make several appointments for future work. Now here are four items already, to be recorded for your report that should be made at the end of three or six months, or the regular time for that duty.

Recorded in what? you may ask. That is the secret of the whole matter. If these items are written down on a loose sheet of paper, they will probably be lost before you are ready to make up your report. If you write them in a blank book, it means a great deal of extra work, since it contains no index or itemized helps to make your reporting easier. And if you do not write them down at all, you are likely to be even worse off by forgetting much that should be included.

In our experience, covering a number of years, we have found that a definite and regular system of recording work done has been of most material help. We can turn to our desk to-day and tell how many appointments or other details of work were performed in any one of the last five years—number of classes organized, helpers appointed, items of expense, etc. This year many of our workers are using a similar system and finding it an easy matter to make up their reports.

We all use small leather-bound books, five and a half by two and a half inches in size, of the kind usually purchasable at any of the ten-cent stores under the term "Diary." This book fits neatly in either desk or handbag. It has a small space of about four lines for each day of the year in which may be recorded activities. When a call is made, say on February 16, we need only to turn to the space for that date and write it down, together with the work accomplished on that day, as: "Organized class at Chelsea," or "Taught class in social service," or "Called on Mrs. Jones in interest of church," etc.

Future appointments are written under the dates at which they are to occur, thus eliminating mistakes or lapses of memory. Over in the back of the little book are pages marked "Addresses" and "Cash." Here may be listed the addresses and telephones of all workers, thus saving much time and labor in looking them up singly when needed. Under "Cash" your expense account can be kept in an accurate and systematic way.

A daily recording is best, but a weekly one will suffice if your memory is good. Always keep your book up to date, and then it will be but a simple matter to sum up your work and mold it into a report when reports are due. Not only will a leader find this plan a good one for herself, but she will find it a wonderful help if her workers will keep such a record of their work. She will be apt to receive their reports more promptly and the reports themselves will be more nearly complete and more satisfactory. If we expect careful and adequate reports from our workers, they will be more likely to try to come up to the mark we set for them. On the other hand, if we are laggards ourselves, we are not fully capable of training efficient workers.

And one other thought may help, and that is, that by helping our workers to do good work, and by being systematic and thorough and prompt ourselves, we will get splendid results all around and will be justly proud of our reports and eager to make them on time. Godspeed the day!

LULA M. SANDY.

From Sister Burton's Letter
