Contributions for Relief Work

Before you send money far from home, read the letter quoted herewith.

It will be remembered that at the late General Conference a resolution was passed expressing our sympathy with the movements looking towards relief of distressed persons in the Near East. We have recently received circular and form letters soliciting contributions to the Near East Relief corporation, and doubtless other officials and members have also received such direct solicitations and perhaps still others indirectly. We are not out of sympathy with such movement, and shall be glad if there are those among us who can contribute to this worthy movement—but charity begins at home, and in looking so far from home for worthy objects of our aid we should not blink the fact that among our own people in certain quarters distress has come from disturbed industrial conditions. It has been a matter of pride with us that we care for our own in most instances, and to keep up our standard in this we have much yet to do. For example, in Wales there are numbers of our people who have been without wage-returning work for many months and have had to accept government dole, and in some cases the wage-earning members of the family have been compelled to go to other countries for work. The church has in some instances extended aid, but has been unable to render assistance in all cases where needed. In other countries similar conditions exist, and special funds should be created to meet the demands made on us in this direction.

It will be recalled by some that I received a letter not long ago from a farmer in this country who in the struggle against what appeared to him unfair odds had grown bitter and greatly discouraged. [SAINTS' HERALD, November 15, 1922.] Before you send money far from home reread this and recall the oft-presented need for this church to organize itself so that all such cases can be reached, and all willing workers given the chance. Our social goal, and it can be said our religious goal also, cannot be reached until we are so organized. And that will be when we reach the stage of stewardships.

A recent mail brought to me the following personal letter from a city in England:

Dear Brother: Reading the letters sent to you by a farmer in distress I decided to put a half-formed resolution into effect and write to you for counsel and advice. I am a member of the — Branch of the church and president of the local Religio, and can safely say without boasting that during the time I have been president it has been one of the foremost in the district.

Now comes the bone of contention. I am twenty-four years of age, did a little bit in the late war; am a fitter by trade and am not afraid to tackle any kind of work. That's the material side. I've done my duty to the church, both in money (when I had it) and in service when it was needed, have always tried to be clean and healthy in my outlook, and yet I have been tramping the streets for close on two years looking for employment. I don't think that for breaking the spirit of a man there is anything more destructive than a long spell of unemployment; and I am beginning to break, nay I can say that I am broke, and now—well, the rot has set in.

I have a girl whom I care for very dearly, and I had hoped some day to ask her if she would honor me by being my wife; but as I have seen the days drift by into weeks, the weeks into months, and slowly into years, my heart fails. I have prayed to God to increase my faith; prayed long, hard, and tearfully. Many nights have I staggered wearily to my room and prayed for guidance, for help. I felt as though I had a right to it; but my prayers came back unanswered and so my soul has grown bitter and hard within me, and I have stayed away from home until early morning so that I would not have to face the pitying eyes of my father and mother and sisters. I am not alone, for there are 5,000 unemployed in this town alone, and this is few in number compared to Liverpool, Manchester, Sheffield, London, etc. But with the inherent selfishness of man I wonder why I should be singled out to be one of them.

I do not want to be a millionaire or moneyed man; I want only a chance to live, to work, to build up a home of my own; yet it is denied me, and I ask myself, why? I pray to God who has told us to call on him in times of trouble and distress, and my prayers are in vain; so on I go, not knowing, as the hymn puts it, and growing bitter and soulsick as I go.

Can you counsel me? I want to be of use to the church, to myself, to my friends, my family, my girl, and it is denied me. I think of that quotation, "Know this, to thine own self be true, and it must follow as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man." And yet if I was true I would let go of everything worth having and drift into wickedness. But because I want to do right I go on, praying against doubt, praying for light, for hope and guidance.

I am sorry to trouble you, but because I know you are to be trusted and have the well of sympathy that will never run dry I appeal to you as a brother who perhaps you may never see but who wants to do a little in the great work of God, but bitterly thinks he is one of those whom God forgets.

Believe me to be, Yours humbly for the right,

This probably is one of many, many similar cases in England alone among our own people. Shall we let them go on without giving them spiritual and material aid? They need encouragement, brotherly heartenment. And by "material aid" I do not mean "charity" as charity is so narrowly used now; I do not mean "dole," but a chance to make good, a chance to care for themselves.

I know the young brother has written me as one of the spiritual authorities of the church, and I shall write him, of course, to stick to his ideals, etc. But my soul cries out in resentment against the conditions which have prevented us as a people getting into a condition where such appeals can instantly be responded to. Some of those preventing conditions were easily avoidable, had we been alert; and long since we should have had stewardships established. Some of the preventing causes are men still actuated by the standard of selfishness. How long, O Lord, how long?

Would that I could write the young man: "The church and its people are on a basis to handle all such cases as yours." Would I could hope that a few short years would put us there.

Watchman, what of the night?

The Two Commandments

Sermon by Elbert A. Smith at the General Conference Tabernacle, Independence, Missouri, October 8, 1922.

I would like to talk to you this morning on the subject of a proper application of the words of Jesus to present human needs. I wish to introduce for your consideration a figure that ought to be familiar in the congregations of the Saints, the figure of a man who came out of a humble carpenter's shop and with the smell of the shavings still on his person delivered himself of teachings that made his life so memorable that it is now recognized as the most wonderful life that was ever lived. Travelers across the western plains used to see a mountain that was a landmark to them for a long time before they reached it, and when they had passed it they looked back to it as a guide on their journey. And so Calvary has been "The Mount of the Holy Cross" that rises out of the plain of human history and divides it into two parts, the history of the world before Christ and the history of the world after Christ. And yet this individual with all his power and dominion is one who will come into any home and any life.

The very prominence of this man creates a difficulty, as all classes, all parties, all denominations are tempted thereby to appropriate to themselves the prestige of his name. Tolstoy used to express this thought in a story that he was wont to tell. It was a fable about a peasant and a wicked sorcerer who wanted to destroy the peasant. This peasant sought the help of a friendly magician who changed him into a kernel of corn. The sorcerer then changed himself into the form of a rooster and was about to swallow the kernel of corn; but the magician poured over it a whole measure of corn and the rooster could not tell which kernel he wanted and he could not swallow it all. So Tolstoy said Christ had been buried under imitations until no man could tell where the real Christ was and no man could swallow all of them. Yet Jesus said, "My sheep know my voice and another they will not follow." Sometime, somewhere, into every human heart will come unmistakably the voice of Jesus Christ, and no man will ever be damned for a message that he neither heard nor understood.

Trying to Make Christ Like Ourselves

Harnack in his Berlin lectures, "What is Christianity?" presents a somewhat similar thought. He says, "There is something touching in the anxiety which every one shows to rediscover himself, together with his own viewpoint and his own circle of interest, in this Jesus Christ." That is, the average man instead of trying to conform himself and his thoughts to Jesus Christ and his thought, tries to rediscover himself in Jesus, and his viewpoint in Jesus' viewpoint, which is vastly different. We try to recast his thought in the mold of our thought and his being in our own likeness, which is entirely different from growing up into him who is the head in all things and making his thought our thought. Humanity is pleased to flatter itself and try to presume that in its present state it conforms to all that is good and is the reverse of all that is evil. So Stanley tells us that when he went through "darkest Africa" he came to a tribe of black men who believed that the Devil was white. When they saw Stanley they thought that he was the Devil. We, being white, always presume that the Devil is a decided brunette.

This effort to conform Christ to ourselves is well illustrated in the paintings of Christ. The German painters have painted him with a strong Teutonic type of countenance. The Scandinavian painters have him a blond. The Italians portray him as a man of dark complexion. While one colored artist has painted him as a negro. So the white man has a black devil and a white Christ; but the black man has a white devil and a black Christ. We are pleased to presume that the devil is the exact opposite of us and that we are made in the express image of Jesus Christ.

Jesus said you must be born again, you must conform to the divine pattern and not attempt to conform the divine pattern to yourself. So if we are ever to have a practical application of the words of Jesus Christ, we must therefore recognize him as the standard to which we must come.

Quick and Powerful Words

Jesus has said, "My words are light and they are life." It is said elsewhere that his words are "quick and powerful." If we could have a practical application of his words there would be a quick and powerful transformation of our lives. Take the single statement of his, "Whatsoever you would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them." They are powerful words. If in every human life they would find a practical application to-day, the world would be transformed before sundown, and the age-long cry, "Thy kingdom come," would have its answer now.

That would mean that every man would judge his neighbor in harmony with his own highest developed sense of justice and give to him the thing that he would want if he were in his neighbor's place. If those words had their practical application the face of the nations would be changed; Mohammedan and Christian would fall apart from each other's throats, and the crescent would be swallowed up in the cross; not because of the power of bloody Christian bayonets, but of the power of Christian love. France would take her heel from the neck of Germany and say to her, "Let me help you to your feet." And by so doing she would save her own soul and fortify her frontiers against German attack for a thousand years to come. It would obliterate differences between classes. If the coal operator could desert his mahogany desk and put on blue overalls and go down into the shaft of the mine, telling his babies good-by, not knowing whether he would see them again or not; and if the miner could sit at the desk of the operator and meet his perplexities, there would be a basis of understanding by which they could reach an agreement that would avoid strikes.

If we in our own church would learn to apply the golden rule and each man would try to put himself in the other man's shoes and get the other man's viewpoint and do unto him as he would be done by, there would be a change in the church. The teachers and the priests and the elders and the high priests and the apostles and the Presidency could leave off the unending task of settling disgraceful quarrels and give their strength to the work of preaching the gospel in all the world. If we could get that common viewpoint and that spirit of Jesus Christ, so that the Presidency could fully appreciate the viewpoint of the Twelve and the Seventy in their problems, and they for a while in spirit could sit in the chair of the President of the church and bear his problems, then there would be a basis of cooperation between the quorums, and the time would come when any quorum could meet any other quorum on any theme that is a proper subject for common consideration and have a good working basis; and we could come here in the General Conference assemblies and for once the statement that "when the sons of God came together Satan came also" could be expunged from the records of the assembly. But until we get into that spirit the Lord may give revelations until the Book of Covenants is bigger than Webster's dictionary and you may pile up resolutions until you cannot see over them to the throne of grace and we will never have cooperation.

About Our Father's Business

When we come to attempt a practical application of the words of Jesus Christ, we are reminded that the recorded sayings of Christ would fill a very small volume, and yet how potential they are: beginning with his first recorded statement, "I must be about my father's business," to his last statement which I call to mind, "It is finished."

The first words of Jesus that we have recorded are those that were uttered on the occasion when he was found in the temple talking with the doctors of the law at the age of twelve years. When his mother rather rebuked him, having been troubled because of his loss from the caravan, he said to her, "Wist ye not that I must be about my father's business?" If these words had a proper application in the lives of Latter Day Saints our work would go forward.

What do we get out of those words? Why, first of all that as early as twelve years of age Jesus Christ had made a definite choice of what he was to do. He had determined that he would not serve himself, that he would not serve the world, that he would not serve pleasure. He had made his choice, that he would serve God. In the second place he recognized life as a business. It was not to be for him a picnic. It was not to be an entertainment. It was for him to be a business—his father's business. "I must be about my father's business."

We come next to the thought of preparation. What business did Jesus have at twelve years of age? What business did God have for Jesus to be about at twelve years of age? His regular ministerial work did not begin for many years. We can only presume that his business was a work of preparation in all parts of his being, mentally, spiritually, and physically, so that when the time came he would be ready.

That is a lesson for all young people and a lesson for all older people who are not yet ready for the business God wants them to do. And it is worthy of remark in connection with this record that it is stated that the lad returned home and increased in grace and in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man. Not only did Jesus increase his store of wisdom; but early he grew in favor with God and he grew also in favor with his fellow man.

Value of a Good Reputation

Nobody here will question the necessity of growing in grace and in favor with God. But sometimes our people seem to feel that it is a mark of religion that they should be in disfavor with their fellow man, and that it is predestined that Latter Day Saints should be evilly spoken of. Naturally when a man is compelled to choose between character and reputation there can be but one right choice and that is to maintain his character at the cost of his reputation; but we are only blessed when we lose our good name in the service of truth, and it is a perfectly legitimate ambition for any Latter Day Saint to desire to grow in favor with the men and women of his community, when favor can be secured by an honorable life. The trouble is, I say, that sometimes our people bring disrepute on themselves by their own unwisdom and then there is no blessing promised.

I am told that the Ku Klux Klan in Independence sent a bar of soap to the family of one of our Saints as a gentle hint that they ought to clean up and keep clean. That family is in disrepute in the community and no blessing attaches thereto. We have men who have lost their good name because they have been unwise in their relationship with women or because they have not paid their debts. There is no blessing that attaches to them under those circumstances—rather the opposite. It is perfectly legitimate that we should endeavor with Jesus Christ to grow in grace and in favor with God and man. When missionaries go into a town where there is one family of Latter Day Saints having a good name and an honorable record the community will be prone to receive them, because that family has made the name of Latter Day Saint honorable. It is true of course that if the Saints anywhere, as they did at Deselm, Illinois, lose their good reputation because of the slanders of the vile and wicked, then the promise of Jesus is that they are blessed when men speak evilly of them for his name's sake. Jesus at twelve years of age was about his father's business, and he was establishing not only a good name with God but with his fellow men.

On the cross he said of those who had crucified him, "Father, forgive them for they know not what they do." When I think of Jesus hanging on the cross, racked with thirst and torment and looking upon those who had placed him there and saying, "Father, forgive them," I cannot think of anything that anyone ever did to me that I cannot forgive. When you think of Jesus Christ uttering those words and apply them in a practical way to your life, can you think of anything that anyone ever did to you that you cannot forgive?

The Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man

Between these sayings of Christ, "I must be about my father's business," and this last sublime prayer of forgiveness, there are many teachings that we might talk about this morning, but one of his sayings to my mind rises up as being supreme above all others. That is the saying of which he delivered himself on the occasion when the lawyer wanted to know what was the first great commandment. Jesus said unto him, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first great commandment, and the second is like unto it: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets."

If we could have a practical application of these words we would have a revolution in society—not a bloody revolution, but a peaceful one; and if we could apply them in our own lives we would have a change in the church. You will notice that Jesus here presented the idea of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. He united the two and said that of all laws and all commandments and all ordinances and all statutes that ever have been given, these two commandments were greatest, and all others hung upon them.

We have had a great many societies and parties that have believed in the brotherhood of man, but they have omitted the fatherhood of God. We have had a great many churches that believed in the fatherhood of God, but they have neglected the brotherhood of man. They have had a cold, austere religion, well buttoned up in front, with a high collar, and they have neither looked to the right at the prostitute nor to the left at the beggar. They have kept their eyes fixed on their own anticipated glorification at some future time in the everlasting kingdom of God. I would rather be a Salvation Army captain than to have that kind of religion.

The Basis of Missionary Work

I want this morning to call your attention to the way in which all our activities as a church hinge on these two commandments. Their intimate relation was pointed out to me by Bishop Carmichael at one time in a way I have not forgotten. I also wish to show how these two commandments hook up with that which is fundamental in human nature.

First of all, thou shalt love the Lord thy God. Some one has said that man is incurably religious. There have been a great many physicians who have tried to cure him. Doctor Robert G. Ingersoll administered emetics and other nostrums in his day, but all the purging that they did only served to help man rid himself of some of his preposterous theological errors. He still remained religious. One generation of materialistic scientists doped man with their nostrums and did their best to make the whole world agnostic and materialistic; but there has come a reaction, and scientists see now that they must recognize something spiritual, so Sir Oliver Lodge tells us that religion has its roots deep down in the heart of humanity and in the reality of things. The fact is that the search for God is impulsive and natural and goes on from age to age. Every idol and every prayer and every creed is an evidence of the undying desire and the age-long search of man for God.

Paul when he stood on Mars Hill encountered this desire. He saw all around him gods and altars, for some one said it was easier to find a god in Athens than it was to find a man (a real man); and finally among all these altars he found one erected to the "great unknown god," a confession that in the midst of all their philosophy and all their religion they had not yet found satisfaction—there was still the unknown god for whom they searched. So Paul, the great missionary, standing up, said to them, "Whom ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you."

That is the objective of all our missionary work. All our missionary work hangs on that—that men should be sent out to tell people how they may find the unknown God for whom their hearts naturally hunger, and love and serve him in accord with the first great commandment.

Brother Griffiths said the other day that the apostles were expected "to travel, and travel, and travel!" Well, the Lord has designated them as the "traveling high council," and the commandment is placed on the apostles and seventies to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. The apostles and seventies must not feel that their splendid services in the past are underestimated; to-day I render a tribute of honor to the men in the apostolic quorum and in the seventies quorums who have gone into the world, leaving wife and children, that with Paul they might preach the unknown God to men who are reaching out after him in harmony with the impulses of their hearts. And I pay a tribute of honor to their wives who made that great sacrifice also. But they have this consolation and this comfort, that their work is attached to this great commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart," and that it is the fundamental work of the missionary arm of the church to carry the message of God to those who do not know. This is in harmony with the first great commandment and also with the impulses of the human heart which will never be satisfied until it finds out God.

Basis of Our Local and Zionie Work

If our missionary work hangs on this first commandment, our local work and our Zionie work hang on the commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." If it is true that man is naturally drawn to seek after God, it is equally true that he is naturally drawn to seek after society and the companionship of his brother. In other words normal man is naturally gregarious and social and never solitary excepting as he may retire at times with Jesus or with John into the wilderness that he may obtain spiritual regeneration and come back to society with a clear vision and a clear message. The greatest punishment that can be devised is solitary confinement. The most beautiful picture in the Bible is that which represents Adam as awakening from his sleep, hitherto the only intelligent, reasoning being on the earth, to find Eve now waiting to commune with him. The statement is made that "it is not good for man to be alone." Man always seeks solace and comfort and consolation in human society and companionship.

This often blind seeking after fellowship is in unconscious obedience to the commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," and on this hangs all our Zionie work. We might seek to teach others, and ourselves learn, wherein we are ignorant, how we shall keep this commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." For it is not alone the experiencing of a warm glow in the heart or to radiate good impulses, but in a practical way to live with and share with and be with and fellowship others in a righteous way that is pleasing to God. This is at the root of our Zion, and Zion can never be developed until that spirit is in the heart of the individual.

It is true that there must be an organization, there must be a system—but it depends on this individual attitude, and no system of paternalism can ever bring about Zion. No system will work that says to men we will put over you a few super-experts who will tell you what to do in all things. It is true they may be there to advise, but there must be development of individual initiative in the working out of enterprises, not only individually but in groups; that all this may not fall upon the church as an organization; but that individuals and groups of individuals under the advice and teachings of the church as an organization may work out these problems. But everyone in those groups must have in his heart this spirit of love.

"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." When we have a people filled with that spirit we have something to work with and we can work on almost any system that is at all reasonable; but until we do have that spirit we can never devise a system that is at all practical. It may be practical in theory; but it will not be practical in operation.

The Two Brothers

You may have heard the old tradition of the two brothers who lived on adjoining farms in Judea many centuries ago. One was a married man and had a wife and several children; the other was an unmarried man and dwelt alone. In time of harvest the man with the family said to himself, "I have a wife to gladden my heart. I have children to make my home happy. It is a small home, but if it were as big as a palace it would not be big enough to hold all I have. But my brother is alone. All in the world he has is his little farm. To-night I will go and take some of the sheaves from my harvest and I will carry them over the line and set them in his field. To-morrow his heart will be glad when he sees his bounteous harvest."

But the same night the man who lived alone said, "I have no one depending on me, but my brother has several mouths to feed, and to-night I will take sheaves from my farm and will put them over the line on his farm and to-morrow his heart will be glad when he sees his bounteous harvest."

That is what they did for three nights, and on the third night the moon came out and they came face to face with each other, and tradition says that on that spot Solomon's temple was built, because there heaven came nearest to earth. If we have that spirit in our hearts, we will be able to build our temple.

But the antithesis of this, the spirit of selfishness, is that thing which ruins the world and which will destroy the church if it ever becomes predominant.

The Story of the Carrot

It, too, is illustrated by another familiar fable or tradition—the tradition of the old woman who had died and gone to hell and for thousands of years had lain in torment. Finally she cried out to her Lord and said, "Lord, I must have deliverance." And the Lord sent an angel who appeared over the mouth of the pit and said to her, "Sister, can you think of one absolutely unselfish thing that you ever did in all your life?" And she thought and thought and finally she said, "Yes, once there was a beggar who came to my door and I gave him a carrot." And the angel said, "Let the carrot be produced." She said, "Oh, that was a long time ago; it has perished." But the angel said, "The evidence of an unselfish act never perishes," and he caused the carrot to be brought, and stooping down he reached it down into hell and she took hold on it and he began to lift her out. And as he lifted her there were others who seized hold upon her clothing and limbs until there was an endless chain of lost souls being lifted out of hell; but suddenly she became alarmed and cried, "Let go! This is my carrot!" And immediately the carrot broke and they all sank back into hell.

If there were only one carrot in all hell and all people in hell were willing to divide it equitably, hell would be turned inside out and Peter's reception committee would be busy receiving them in the kingdom of heaven.

If we can only have a practical application of the words of Jesus Christ in our lives individually and as an organization, this church will go forward from victory to victory until with Christ at its head we shall see the great consummation of all our promises. May His peace and blessing be with us in my prayer.

The New Year

With this issue the HERALD begins volume 70 and enters upon the sixty-fourth year of its life. It is a time when, as is suggested by an item in General Interest this week, we may turn our backs upon the past, say that all that has been done we shall put to one side, and use only the preparation we have been permitted to make to face the future. The longer the look we may make into the future the more glorious will be our vision of Zion and of the work before the church.

No matter what the past may have been, let us look forward to that which is to come with courage and with faith in the goodness of God, to move forward to do all we can do to-day, and also to continue to make all the preparation for future service that our time permits.

As we view the immediate year before us in addition to the reunions there are two great general events which stand forth in our present calendar.

First, June 3 to 16 a young people's convention and Graceland home-coming. It will be twenty-five years since the first class graduated from Graceland College. Is that not a splendid opportunity for the classes of 1903, 1908, 1913, and 1918, as well as the class of 1898 to assemble? Nay, more, since it is the quadrennial of her first commencement, it should be a gathering home of all her children.

Then after the few days honoring Graceland and her graduates eleven days remain for instruction and recreation, for a young people's convention. We have long looked for this. The time is now here for such a gathering.

Then second and by no means of lesser importance, the General Conference of the church will meet October 1. It is a time for serious prayer, and for thought, that as a church we may do that which our heavenly Father would have us do and move forward in righteousness as a church to establish Zion; and provide for the downtrodden of earth.

Exemplifying the opportunity of the work of the church we are pleased to present this week the sermon by E. A. Smith, as well as many other items of more than ordinary interest.

May the peace and blessing of God be with each one as we face the new year. May it be a year of prosperity and of great joy in service before our heavenly Father.

The Class in Religious Education

In the HERALD of December 20 there appears the call for the class in religious education signed by F. M. Smith, president of the church. If you have not read this announcement look up your HERALD and read it now and consider what you shall do. Read also the article by T. W. Williams in this issue as well as a few recent editorials on the theme of missionary work and then turn and read again that call for preparation for service.

This call is similar to that issued in previous years, but different in some important respects, as those over thirty years of age are not necessarily excluded. There is still a tendency to prefer young men and young women, those under thirty years of age, but those who have given the years of their life to the missionary work have thereby gained the equivalent of high school preparation, and have a strong reason to urge that they desire to continue their special preparation in order to render better service.

When one really realizes the opportunities before the church not only on this continent and in western Europe, but the need that the gospel should be presented to all the world, it would not seem too much if a thousand or two thousand or ten thousand could be sent out on missionary appointment, and that the class of those preparing for service should be greatly multiplied.

Youth is the time to build our bins, to do this preliminary work. Education is a lifelong process; we are never through until we develop the full likeness of Jesus Christ. But youth is the time in which to devote our whole time to preparation. Do not let the precious years go by without getting ready to do your share of the work of the future.

The Bible

In General Interest this week there appears an extract from a book discussing the excellent English of the Authorized Version of the Bible and the tendency to-day to use inferior versions. This is a theme which certainly deserves emphasis. We can see the value at times of taking up another version, even though it be modern in form and even crude in construction in order to break away from the indifference with which many people view the beautiful English of the Authorized Version. But that after all is only a temporary expedient.

It is interesting to note how far the Inspired Version preserves the English of the Authorized Version, on which in fact it is based. The Inspired Version is in fact the Authorized Version with certain corrections added by inspiration and certain omitted portions restored. How often the Inspired Version corrects the mistakes and contradictions of other versions may be seen in Three Bibles Compared.

Our first plea is for the use of the Bible for its moral and literary value. Second that the principal stress be put on a representative version, one which inspires the use of good English. There are, of course, other modern versions than the King James or Authorized Version which also use good English.

New Tracts

The business office announces that the sermon of President F. M. Smith at the opening of General Conference is now being printed in tract form under the title, "Our social ideals."

Also the folder tract, "A question of identity," by John W. Rushton, has been revised and is being printed.

A contractor, who was riding with a friend on the Independence-Kansas City car line last week, was asked what he thought of these Latter Day Saints. One of our sisters who was riding in the seat behind overheard his reply which was to this effect: "I have hired many of them and had dealings with them for the past seventeen years—I never was around a better class of people nor had more conscientious workmen." That reputation sets a high mark for all of us to live up to, but God being our helper we resolve to do it.

The Mission Field as a Vocation

By T. W. Williams

The church needs the service of more capable young men and women who will consecrate their lives to the service of Jesus Christ.

There are thousands of young men and women in the church to-day who are undecided and even perplexed as to the choice of a life's vocation. They have not found themselves.

The field of service is so varied, the issues of each vocation and profession so complex that all too many simply close their eyes and jump in. Some respond to the lure for gold. Others are impressed with the glamor of fame or renown. Others hesitate, start, draw back, falter, and then end in a complete misfit. Some few find their place and enlist for service. It is with a view to helping some of our young people to successful solution that this article is penned.

Let me take the following scripture as a text:

Behold, I say unto you: Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields, for they are white already to harvest. Whoso desireth to reap, let him thrust in his sickle with his might and reap while the day lasts, that he may treasure up for his soul everlasting salvation in the kingdom of God; yea, whosoever will thrust in his sickle and reap is called of God.

What greater career could one desire than thus to serve his fellow men? What more promising field for service than with the Church of Jesus Christ? What greater returns could one ask than the privilege of pointing the way to men and women floundering for the light? What higher purpose can anyone have than to be a torch bearer for the truth?

A Tremendous Duty Before the Church

There is nothing which calls out the splendid qualities of men and women quite so much as unselfish, altruistic, helpful, loving service for others. The church exists for humanity. It has but one mission and that is to help men and women to find and know God. Its work is to minister and not to be ministered to. The church was made for man and not man for the church. It has a tremendous duty to perform. To succeed it must command the service of the very best and most capable workers.

We are lacking in representative men and women to-day simply because the fathers and mothers within the church have been more concerned in mapping out business careers for their sons or engineering a suitable marriage with prospects of affluence and ease for their daughters than in thinking of the needs of the church. Parents have overlooked the fact that each child in the household is a gift from God. The Giver has the right to demand that this gift be returned to him qualified and prepared to do service for Him.

We have fallen on evil days. The call to the ministry is not looked upon with that exalted appreciation that it once was. In the olden day no greater honor could be bestowed on a young man than to be designated for the ministry. Fathers educated their sons to look upon this as the crowning realization of rightful ambition. Mothers prayed that God would call and set apart their sons to become ambassadors for him. It is for us to lift the standard of the ministry—to develop respect and reverence for this the greatest gift of God to man.

And to our boys and girls. Perhaps you have not placed a proper estimate on your qualifications and ability. Indeed, you may have the impulse to offer your services to Him and yet draw back because of your feeling of insufficiency. You may be appalled at your limitations. But even this may be made an asset rather than a liability. The fact that you are conscious of your limitations should become a stimulus to overcome. Generally, a man's estimate of himself establishes his limitations. A river makes its own banks. The consciousness of your lack should be made the inspiration for your efficiency.

History shows that Napoleon stood forty-second in his class at a military school. Isaac Newton was such a dullard that at the age of fifteen he was taken from school and put to work. It is related of Henry Ward Beecher that he was a miserable speaker as well as a poor penman. He was bashful to stupidity and talked as though his mouth was full of mush. Pasteur belonged merely among what could be called average students. When he left the university his markings were disgracefully low. But these men found themselves. They heard the call, responded, and achieved.

The church to-day needs pastors, men gifted to work on intimate relations with other men; men who can be fathers to the wayward and brothers to men and women who are weak. We need men as overseers who can feed the flock of God and such must preach by example.

We need home missionaries—both men and women—who can tell the gospel story to a congregation of two or three, at the fireside, in the field, in the workshop, or wherever men and women congregate and will give audience to their story.

We need men and women for foreign fields. These must give up home and loved ones. They will be called to go among people of strange tongues and different habits of life from their own. They must be inured to hardships and persecution. They must lead the isolated life. They must be prepared to walk the lonely way. But what compensation! The bringing of men and women into the light of God. The winning of humanity from heathenism to the Christian life.

What will be your reaction, fathers and mothers, if the church ask that your son or your daughter take up definite work for the church? Will you draw back, hedge, and apologize thinking to spare your child the inconveniences and denial of missionary life? Then are you unworthy to be among those who are known as the children of God.

What is your reaction, young man, young woman, to this call of God to you? What is to be your response when the church asks you to prepare for foreign missionary work? Will you hold back and seek to shift the responsibility? Do you feel that you are called to greater work? There is no greater work. Will you say, "Let John do it. My ability is along the lines of business. I want to make a name for myself. I want to amass a fortune"? How knowest thou that this is the wisest course? Hath God told thee? Canst thou engage in thy life work without the sanction and direction of Almighty God? Let God decide.

Doctor A. M. Zwerner, speaking of this foreign mission work said:

More than the highest honor of the athletic field, more than the rigors of war, more than the lonely watch in the trenches, is the challenge of the difficulties that face the pioneer for the unoccupied fields in the world. Here are perils of climate and isolation and foe. Here is scope for such adventure as will attract the boldest spirits, men who desire to walk in the footsteps of Livingstone and Moffat, Paton and Hannington, Chalmers and Patterson.

The Task of Saving the World

And Doctor Charles R. Brown, dean of the School of Religion at Yale University, proclaimed that when men and women think about the obligations of the foreign fields, they are not going out to snatch a few brands from the burning, they are going out to work with these people in putting the fires of evil out. They are not going out to carry aside a few handfuls of meal to receive the leaven; they are going to put the leaven down into the whole lump of educational and domestic, industrial and political life, until the entire lump of human relationships shall have been renewed. It is to that larger task of saving the world that men and women are being called.

And for that great task we are praying that God may raise up men and women, competent, consecrated, effective. For the furnishing of that necessary spiritual leadership we want college men and women. We want men and women who know something of history, so that all the foolish experiments which have been made and failed will not have to be attempted again. We want men and women who know something of the sound economic principles that must underlie all human well being. We want men and women who know something of the psychology of the human mind, so that they will be able to anticipate and rightly to appraise those thought movements which are destined to become controlling.

We want men and women who have the scientific habit of mind, so that they will be able to draw the thing as they see it for the God of things as they are, and coupled with all that skill in the use of the materials of civilization and advance. We want men and women who will labor for human betterment with their eyes and their minds upon that social order which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. If we can raise up a generation with spiritual vision, we shall see the kingdom of God coming with power and great glory in all the corners of the earth.

Necessarily, the church to-day is handicapped in money and men. Many fields are opening before the church. Would that we could now enter in and occupy. We must move slowly. It is imperative that we continue to maintain the missions which we have already started and be prepared to move into other fields as rapidly as our means and our quota of laborers will permit. But to do this we must have recruits, volunteers, additional men and women, qualified for the work.

The missions now opened are as follows: England, Scotland, Wales, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Germany, Switzerland, Palestine, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Society Islands, Hawaii. Each year calls for additional missionaries for these fields. Where can you fit in, my friend? Go over the list, ask God to guide you, and then should that still small voice whisper to thy soul give heed and God will bless:

Mailable Printed Matter from 1800 to 1845

By C. J. Hunt

Joseph Smith could not have gotten books from which to create Book of Mormon or other spiritual books by mail or express.

We have some energetic opposers to the prophetic mission of Joseph Smith, the Martyr, who studiously affirm that the reason the young prophet was able to give to the world such literary, historical, doctrinal, and spiritual books as the Inspired Translation of the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and the Doctrine and Covenants, was because he was a great student and had access to numerous works on science, theology, archæology, etc., hence outclassed all others as a church builder.

We welcome the change in manner of opposing his prophetic mission. However, neither the "old school" nor the "new school" of jealous critics have solved the problem satisfactorily to themselves and a restless religious world. (My article of similar import will be found in the HERALD, July 13, 1904.)

Our missionaries are correct when they say it was very questionable if printed books were transmitted through the United States mails during the early historical period of our church. Under those circumstances will the "antis" inform us how the young prophet kept in constant touch with the literary world, (as some claim) living, as he did, in the undeveloped western part of New York State? Who of his enemies will attempt to answer? The correct reply, attested by Bible prophecies fulfilled, and tens of thousands of living witnesses is that the Lord by his Holy Spirit inspired him to do the work of translating, organizing the church, etc.

In order to assist in combating some of the enemies of our faith, I sent the following question to the postmaster-general, which was answered April 15, 1904, by Honorable R. J. Wynne, acting postmaster-general: "Kindly inform me the year that printed books were allowed to be transmitted through the United States mails."

The answer:

I find the first reference to magazines in the mails, in the Act of March 2, 1799, section 20, which is as follows: "Magazines and pamphlets, one cent a sheet, for not exceeding fifty miles; one and a half cents for over fifty miles and not exceeding one hundred miles; and two cents for any greater distance."

Under date of March 3, 1825, the following law was enacted: "Unbound journals of legislatures of the several States liable to the same postage as pamphlets. Memorandum written on a newspaper or other printed paper, pamphlet, or magazine and transmitted by mail to be charged with letter postage."

Section 30 of the same Act is, in part, as follows: "When mode of conveyance and size of mail will admit, magazines and pamphlets published periodically may be transported in the mail to subscribers, at one and a half cents a sheet for any distance not exceeding one hundred miles, and two and a half cents for any greater distance. And such magazines and pamphlets as are not published periodically, if sent in the mail, shall be charged four cents on each sheet for any distance not exceeding one hundred miles, and six cents for any greater distance. (Section 13 of this act defines a sheet to be four folio pages, eight quarto pages, sixteen octavo pages, or twenty-four duodecimo pages, or pages less than that of a pamphlet size or magazine, whatever be the size of the paper of which it is formed. The surplus pages of any pamphlet or magazine shall also be considered a sheet.)"

While there were several laws affecting the rate of postage on magazines and pamphlets, I do not find the word "book" in any of them, but on March 3, 1845, the following law was enacted, which of course includes unbound books: "Pamphlets, magazines, periodicals, and all other printed or other matter (except newspapers) unconnected with any writing, shall be charged with postage at the rate of two and a half cents for each copy sent, not exceeding one ounce in weight; and one cent additional for each additional ounce without regard to distance; and any fractional excess of not less than one half ounce above one or more ounces shall be charged for as if said excess amounted to a full ounce."

Anticipating that some might advocate the possibility of the youthful prophet receiving books, etc., by express, I requested the Honorable J. L. Farnum, Secretary of the Library of Congress, Washington, District of Columbia, to give date of first express business in America. His letter of September 10, 1920, reads:

Financial Systems of Local Departments

By A. Max Carmichael

A common treasurer is the last arrangement to prevail in adopting form four.

As the conditions are now, most of the local organizations of the Sunday school, Religio, and Department of Women are financed by collections or voluntary offerings. This is the source of their revenue. Expenditures are made either upon vote by the body in business meeting, or power is given the superintendent to draw out by order upon the treasurer up to certain stipulated amounts.

The best practice, we feel, is for the executive officers to draw up a budget at the beginning of the year. This budget is to be adopted, modified, or rejected by the vote of the local people. The superintendent then should be given the authority to draw from the treasurer up to the amount collected or up to a certain percentage of the amount collected within the maximum limits set by the budget. The superintendent should not be permitted to exceed the amount collected, and if the amount collected exceeds the budget appropriation, he should not be permitted to exceed the budget, except upon vote of the local people or constituents. This could be the system of financial operation under any one of the first four forms, which have been put out by heads of departments.

Under the first four forms it is probably not best that any of the three departments mentioned have the same treasurer.

There seems to be quite a feeling prevalent that form four requires a single treasurer. A single ica, published in New York, in 1881, the first express company was started by W. F. Harnden, conductor and passenger clerk for the Boston & Worcester Railroad Company who "has made arrangements with the Providence Railroad and New York Steamboat companies, to run a car through from Boston to New York, and vice versa, four times a week, commencing on Monday, March 4th, (1839)."

The foregoing authoritative statements from Washington, District of Columbia, clearly portray to the minds of unbiased men the fact that the "Choice Seer" did not produce the sacred books of this church from literature received by mail or express. Hence every effort to throw discredit upon the great fundamental truths of this "marvelous work and a wonder"—this church of the Living God, will eventually bring shame and discontent to the opposer.

Some items in this article may be of special interest to our young missionaries.

treasurer is not contemplated under form four. There is no more reason for a single treasurer for all the departments than there is for a single superintendent for all the departments. In fact, form four anticipates the use of separate treasurers for each department. Only under form five must there be a single treasurer. It is possible, of course, under form four for the various departments to unite upon a single treasurer and unite their funds in common with the branch. Most likely if a single treasurer is adopted, the treasurership will be in the hands of a finance deacon, but not necessarily so. While separate treasurers still exist, either a man or a woman can serve. If a single treasurership were adopted, we would advise the following financial system:

In adopting form four one of the greatest factors in determining whether form four should be adopted is this matter of financial operation of the departments. It might be advisable for local departments to approach form four gradually or to adopt it partially. Local departments could vote to have their business done in the main branch business meeting, but still retain a separate treasurer from the branch treasurer and have the same financial system as outlined above. One of the last features of form four that we would advise locals to adopt is to have a common treasurer with the money of the department and the branch in the same fund.

Let the money collected by the said local department be turned into the common fund with the branch money collected for branch expenses. Let the local church appoint a budget committee, consisting of the branch president, department superintendent of the department that is under form four, and the deacon and such others as may appear advisable. This budget committee at the first of the year would lay out a budget, assigning to the various phases of the local church activity such part of the appropriation as the budget committee feels these local activities are worth.

For instance, the Department of Women desires to go on this basis. Then this budget committee lays out a budget of $1,000 for proposed expenditures for the coming year, meets and sets aside $200 for the Department of Women. You will notice that that is 20 per cent of the total budget.

The deacon of finance would no doubt be the one to engineer the collection of this fund of $1,000. Presume that by March 1 he has collected $400 out of the proposed $1,000. Give then the superintendent of the Department of Women the right to draw from the treasurer or deacon of finance upon order an amount not exceeding an amount equal to 20 per cent of the total amount collected. By March 1 then, the superintendent of the Department of Women should be permitted to draw out an amount not exceeding $80, or 20 per cent of the amount collected.

It might be wise not to permit her to draw out her full quota of the amount collected, but rather to restrict her to a certain percentage of her full quota. For instance, it might be wise to restrict her to drawing out only 60 per cent of her full quota of the $400 collected by March 1, or $240. This would permit a readjustment of the budget in the latter part of the year when circumstances might prove such readjustment necessary. Such readjustment could not be made if her full quota had been previously spent. Such readjustment, of course, would be recommended by the budget committee and be adopted by the local church.

We are by no means recommending this system of financing the local church and its departments for all locals. We repeat that it is the last feature of form four that we would advise a local church and its departments adopting. We advise local superintendents of departments to advocate this form of organization only after they feel assured that their department will receive adequate treatment at the hands of the budget committee. We would not necessarily tell them to make their being on the budget committee a prerequisite to their consent to adopting this form of organization, but we would encourage them to urge it very strongly. In many cases they may well afford to make it a prerequisite to their adopting this form of financial operation. The policy of having a single treasurer should not be adopted until all departments are under form four, and then not until the departments have been running with separate treasurers under form four with success.

Local Religio

Too many seem to have formed the opinion that the departments are wishing to dispense with local Religio class hours. To the contrary, we would hope for more of them. If besides running a Sunday school you are running another class hour on Sunday evening or some week-day evening, by all means continue to do so. As a whole our people do not do enough studying. They should do more. That is one of the greatest needs that the Department of Women is trying to answer. The Department of Women is spending much effort toward added women's classes during the week.

Some would ask then, "What is the significance of the change of the name of the Religio to that of Recreation and Expression?" It is but the expression of the transition of the Religio's work from that of religious instruction to that of recreation and expressional activities, but that does not mean a decrease in the amount of time spent on class study. We would encourage every local to continue these extra class hours of study.

What is the Religio expecting to stress under its new name? We feel that the people should be brought together in recreational activities and in such expressional activities as debating societies and dramatic societies, especially in the larger branches. We feel that the church should assume a constructive attitude and policy in the matter of group recreation. The church can no longer afford to permit the commercial world to provide amusement for its children. This amusement has too long been of a pernicious nature. The only way to rid amusements of this pernicious element is for the church or state to assume control of them. It can never get control of them until long after it has started to foster them of its own initiative. In many of our locals the branch president may see young men or young women who they feel can take positions as leaders in the matter of getting the adults, the young folks, or the children together in group recreation, public speaking, or dramatic expression. In addition, then, to the class study work, we are urging this kind of activity.

After a local has been conducting this kind of work, that is, group recreation and dramatic work for some time, it will soon learn that it is very necessary that the leaders of this recreation and dramatic expression and the teachers of the religious instruction, those of the Sunday school and other groups should get together in their programs. They will see the need of closer cooperation. This is what we are looking for, but it cannot come until these various forms of activities have been indulged in for some time. This closer spirit of cooperation will eventually bring about the adoption of forms four and five in departmental organization.

Prayer in Child Life

In teaching small children to pray we often make a mistake of wanting them to pray adult prayers or prayers said in adult language and about adult situations. In the kindergarten which is being conducted daily in Independence for the little tots of the church, we are told that the prayer suggested was that we say the following things to God, "Tell him we wish to be good," "Thank him for taking care of us in the night," "Thank him for the clocks" (they had a new clock face in the kindergarten) also, "Thank him for the Halloween and all the pretty things in the room." One day they suggested that we pray for two children who had been fighting and were at that time banished from the circle.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

On the Glory of the Bible

I alluded, in my first letter to you about English literature, to the necessity of your learning from the beginning the wide distinction between what is good and what is bad style.

I do not know a better instance of a display of the difference between what is fine style and what is not, than may be made by putting side by side almost any sentence from the old authorized translation of the Bible and the same sentence from The Bible in Modern Speech.

I will just put two quotations side by side:

"Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

"Learn a lesson from the wild lilies. Watch their growth. They neither toil nor spin; and yet I tell you that not even Solomon in all his magnificence could array himself like one of these."

Here you can feel the perfect harmony and balance of the old version and the miserable commonplaceness of the effort of these misguided modern men.

Again:

"Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

The prayer had a very good effect upon the little culprits, each of whom knelt in the little room where we taught privately and asked that God help him to be a better boy and forgive him.

This is mauled into:

"Repent, he said, for the kingdom of the heavens is now close at hand."

These examples are perfectly suited to illustrate the immense difference that separates what is noble and fine in style and what is poor and third rate.

If you recite the old version aloud you cannot escape the harmony and balance of the sentences, and nothing dignified or distinguished can be made of the wretched paraphrases of the two desecrators of the splendid old text.

And, Antony, I would have you know that I, who have spent a long life in precious libraries, loving fine literature with all my heart, have long ago revered the old version of the Bible as the granite corner stone upon which has been built all the noblest English in the world. No narrative in literature has yet surpassed in majesty, simplicity, and passion the story of Joseph and his brethren, beginning at the thirty-seventh and ending with the forty-fifth chapter of Genesis. There is surely nothing more moving and lovely in all the books in the British museum than the picture of Joseph when he sees his little brother among his brethren.

"And he lifted up his eyes, and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, Is this your younger brother, of whom ye spake to me? And he said, God be gracious unto thee, my son.

"And Joseph made haste; for his bowels did yearn upon his brother; and he sought where to weep; and he entered into his chamber and wept there."

The whole of the forty-fifth chapter is touching and beautiful beyond all criticism, transcending all art. To read it is to believe every word of it to be true, and to recognize the sublimity of such a relation.

No narrative of the great Greek writers reaches the heart at the Columbian School of Independence. In the middle foreground we note the leading officials of the church, V. Rushton, R. C. Russell, Paul M. Hanson, J. F. Curtis, and Elder B. J. so directly and poignantly as does this astonishing story. It moves swiftly and surely along from incident to incident till Joseph's loving soul can contain itself no more:

"Then Joseph could not refrain himself before all of them that stood by him; and he cried, Cause every man to go out from me.

"And there stood no man with him, while Joseph made himself known unto his brethren.

"And he wept aloud; and the Egyptians and the house of Pharaoh heard.

"And Joseph said unto his brethren, I am Joseph; doth my father yet live?

"And he fell upon his brother Benjamin's neck and wept; and Benjamin wept upon his neck. Moreover he kissed all his brethren and wept upon them.

"And after that his brethren talked with him." And this wonderful chapter ends thus:

"And they went up out of Egypt, and came unto the land of Canaan unto Jacob their father, and told him, saying, Joseph is yet alive, and is governor over all the land of Egypt.

"And Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not.

"And they told him all the words of Joseph, which he had said unto them; and when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, the spirit of Jacob, his father, revived.

"And Israel said, It is enough; Joseph my son is yet alive; I will go and see him before I die."

If you read the story of Joseph through from start to finish, you will see that it is a perfect narrative of the life of a man without fault who suffered much but without resentment, was great of heart in evil days, and, when Fortune placed him in a position of glory and greatness, showed a stainless magnanimity and a brotherly love that nothing could abate. It is the first and most perfect story in literature of the nobility of man's soul, and as such it must remain a treasured and priceless possession to the world's end.

In the short book of Ruth there lies embalmed in the finest English a very tender love story, set in all the sweet surroundings of the ripening corn, the gathered harvest, and the humble gleaners. Nothing can be more delightful than the direction of Boaz, the great land owner, to his men, after he had espied Ruth in her beauty gleaning in his fields:

"And when she was risen up to glean, Boaz commanded his young men, saying: Let her glean even among the sheaves, and reproach her not:

"And let fall also some of the handfuls on purpose for her, and leave them, that she may glean them, and rebuke her not."

This little gem in the books of the Bible inspired Hood to write one of his most perfect lyrics:

She stood breast high amid the corn,
Clasped by the golden light of morn,
Like the sweetheart of the sun,
Who many a glowing kiss had won.

Thus she stood amid the stooks,
Praising God with sweetest looks,

Sure, I said, Heaven did not mean
Where I reap thou should'st but glean;
Lay thy leaf adown and come,
Share my harvest and my home.

That the Bible was translated into English at the time when the language was spoken and written in its most noble form, by men whose style has never been surpassed in strength combined with simplicity, has been a priceless blessing to the English-speaking race. The land of its birth, once flowing with milk and honey, has been for long centuries a place of barren rocks and arid deserts. Persians and Greeks and Romans and Turks have successively swept over it; the descendants of those who at different times produced its different books are scattered to the ends of the earth; but the English translation has for long years been the head corner stone in homes innumerable as the sands of the sea in number.

No upheavals of the earth, no fire, pestilence, famine, or slaughter can ever now blot it out from the ken of men.

When all else is lost we may be sure that the old English version of the Bible will survive. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away."

Do not think it enough therefore, Antony, to hear it read badly and without intelligence or emotion, in little detached snippets, in church once a week.

Read it for yourself and learn to rejoice in the perfect balance, harmony, and strength of its noble style.—Kansas City Times, December 13, 1922. Quoted from The Glory of English Prose, by Stephen Coleridge (Putnam).

My New Year's Contract With Myself

I hereby promise my higher self that I will make 1923 stand out as the biggest, most successful year in my life.

I am through with failure. I am through with worry, with anxiety and fear. I am through with the past. I will not allow my life to be spoiled, my happiness to be ruined because of anything that has happened to me in the years gone by.

I am now wiping the slate clean of everything that would interfere with the fulfillment of my contract. I will let go of all grudges against others. Feelings of animosity, of ill will, of hatred, of envy, of jealousy—all petty rancors, dislikes, and prejudices—will be banished forever from my mind. I will not carry over into the New Year a single thing against any human being. I will wipe out of my consciousness all feeling of resentment toward those who have injured me, all thoughts of "getting square" for real or fancied wrongs.

Never again will I visualize pictures of failure, of poverty, of ill health, of suffering. Never again will I picture myself as weak, timid, incompetent, inferior, as lacking in self-confidence, self-control, or any of the qualities necessary to make my life a success.

I am God's child, and it is my birthright to be successful, happy, cheerful. I am bidden to rejoice forevermore. I will do this from now on. I will face the light instead of the darkness. Instead of going through life with a disturbed, unhappy mentality, radiating gloom, discouragement, pessimism, I shall go about among my fellows with a glad smile, with the light of hope in my eyes, with the assurance that all is well with me.

As I am a son of God, I must partake of his qualities and powers. Knowing this, I pledge myself to meet every difficulty, every problem that confronts me this year as a man of courage, of initiative, of resourcefulness, a man who can and will reach the goal of his ambition no matter what tries to hold him back or down him.

I pledge myself to live up to this contract through the coming year; to be a man, every inch a man—in my home, in my business, as an employer or an employee, in my social relations, in my duties as a neighbor, as a citizen.—Success Magazine, January, 1923.

LETTERS AND NEWS

Gomer T. Griffiths

An appreciation by one of his sons in Christ.

It may seem to be presumptuous on my part to attempt to offer a little tribute to Brother Griffiths, since his quorum has so eloquently spoken. However, I think a little of the "human touch" in the HERALD occasionally will do no harm.

Possibly I have had the privilege of traveling with him more than any man in the church. Since the late conference has released him from membership in the Quorum of Twelve, I wish to hand out a few humble flowers while he is living.

Over a quarter of a century ago Brother Griffiths visited Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. I had at that time been a member of the church for less than two years. He greatly impressed me from the beginning as a man of God. He had an influence with him that at times awed me. He took a special interest in the young men of the branch, I being among the number. Wherever I have been with him, that same intense interest in the young men was always in evidence.

His doctrinal sermons were for me at that time, food to my soul. As a fireside talker, and as an all-around mixer, I doubt if we have his equal in the church to-day.

Eventually I was called through him to the office of priest. After fasting and prayer, I received confirmation of the call three times in one night. The clear, distinct, and compelling word of the Lord to me was that "Gomer T. Griffiths is mine apostle and the call to you through him is of me." He has ever been a father to me through these many years. His counsel was always wise and helpful.

When he was assigned in 1913 to the Australasian Mission he selected me to accompany him. While on shipboard on our way to the Society Islands, he told me of two dreams he had regarding the work in the islands. I saw every detail of these dreams fulfilled in the return of the "priesthood people" to the church after they had been out of it for over seven years. Anyone who has traveled with Brother Griffiths knows the Lord directed him in his apostolic office.

He entered the ministry an unlearned young man, yet he has written several valuable books, one of them, the Instructor, being among the best sellers the Herald Office publishes.

His sermon at the late General Conference may have been his "swan song" but his cheerful, optimistic spirit raised up that large audience to heights that possibly no other man in the priesthood could have surpassed under the circumstances. I voted to release him, not that I considered him a "has been," but because for these many years his home has been where his family was not. I think the Lord has said to him: "You have labored away from home long enough; well done thou good and faithful servant."

When the time came for him to leave the conference to go to the bedside of the sick woman who has stood by him all these years, and when apparently the angel of death was about to claim her, yet never asked him to leave his labor in the Lord's vineyard, when the time came to go to her, he did not leave the conference in bitterness of spirit because he had been released from great responsibility and honor. His closing words were that he would loyally support the Lord's work and abide by the will of the majority. May he live many years to give blessings to the Lord's people as a father to the church in the office of patriarch.

Some months ago several of us visited the grave of the late R. C. Evans. A beautiful, embellished monument marks his last resting place. As you stand at his grave you see noble shafts of marble and granite, beautiful sarcophagi, humble headstones, and elaborately carved monuments. But the marker which attracted our attention more than any other was that lying at the head of an unkept grave. It was only a small piece of marble; on it was rudely cut, possibly by a boy of ten or twelve, this inscription: "My dad." To us, it was the most eloquent tribute to the dead in the whole cemetery, and we were not ashamed to shed a tear over it.

If Brother Griffiths shall pass away while I am still alive, if I can do so, I shall sorrowfully wend my way to the silent city of the dead where he lies buried and I shall lay a humble wreath upon his grave; it will have this inscription upon it: "My Dad." This will be my tribute to him when he is dead.

As long as he shall live, he will be the Apostle Emeritus of the Reorganization. C. EDWARD MILLER.

"How Can We All Work Together?"

A question and answer on what Sunday schools may do about the new plans of organization, by the general secretary of the Sunday School Department.

The Letter

While at work, I study in my mind about the Sunday school here, etc. I have many problems to meet in that work. Leaving us without by-laws and constitution we are "at sea." Those new five forms are to use as we wish, but if one Sunday school in the district uses one of them and another Sunday school another, how can we all be working together?

Brother ———, a real live wire and our assistant superintendent of the district, was here last Sunday and he could give us no light only as we read in the HERALD ourselves. None of our people who attended conference from here went to the Sunday school meetings as they should have. The assistant superintendent gave us a good recommendation on our school, but of course we want to make it better.

The Reply

It was predicted at the meetings of the Sunday school at the General Conference that there would be some worry over the fact that the constitution was abolished. We realized then and do yet, that such prophecies were well founded. Yet it is only a matter of getting accustomed to thinking about the purpose or true goal of a church school rather than about a number of rules which may or may not fit the local needs.

The fact that the by-laws have been changed at almost every convention in past years indicated that they could not remain as written and fit all the needs of all the schools. As we make real progress we must of necessity keep changing such sets of rules until after a while if we are sticklers for form, it requires more time to keep up on the rules than it does to do the important work of training teachers so they can train the children.

The law of Moses was full of rules, with its innumerable "shalts" and "shalt nots"—mostly nots, but when Christ came and established the new law, it abolished the sets of rules and in their stead gave a sort of freedom and scope for thought and activity that would include the best principles in the law of Moses.

If you must have rules (which I doubt), make them to fit your own needs. Think over them, try to imagine what results they will bring, and how soon you may hope to outgrow them. If after all this you feel you must have a set of by-laws, go after it—but you are more apt to let it go at a general agreement of the workers and those who care, subject to change as soon as you think a change desirable.

We are sorry your delegates were not at the Sunday school convention. They may have considered as many others evidently did, that it was only a sort of sideshow. The attendance was distressingly small and could only be explained by the conclusion that many others than your delegates had not as yet learned the supreme importance of the school side of our church work. But that will change in time as we demonstrate and properly emphasize the true factors involved.

The problem of working together without some sort of rule or system that shall secure uniformity is not serious—in fact not nearly so serious as adherence to hard and fast rules would be without the spirit of working together.

Our Zionie ideals are based on working together in a gathered condition. But even if the gathering were completed we could not all be in one community nor all living under the same conditions. We are bound to have groups, large and small, each working under its leader and leaders, subdivided until there are thousands of little groups and classes and organizations.

It is the most logical thing in the world for a group such as yours, call it school or church or community as you wish, led by one who like you can say: "While at work I study in my mind about the Sunday school here," to progress and flourish and turn out a product most valuable to the church.

It also follows just as surely that a community or school or church is not so fortunate, whose leaders do not study their problems, who continue to go through endless routine that gets nowhere at all, and whose members are not of value to the church because they have not learned that real love implies real service.

Working together is to move persistently toward the same great ideals, regardless of necessary methods. In your community you may have a sentiment established whereby you are already working on form four even though your organization might be considered as in the first or second or third. Under that situation, you could easily adapt the "machinery" of your organization to get the best results from your present ideals.

On the other hand, why should you be held back by the community which is still under form one and inclined to be proud of it—who prefer the "old ways" regardless of which way is best? You should not.

It all depends on how far the people in your community have gone in the process of working together on the real problems before you. You must not be hampered by any rule that compels you to wait for the other community to awaken to its opportunities.

Now, how shall you work together? Do you and your officers in the school work together? Of course you do, else you would not have a good school. Don't you have young and old, men and women, those with experience and those without—in fact the usual cosmopolitan group? I know you do. Does that preclude working together? Of course not.

If your school were flourishing under form five and the nearest other school in the district were doing its best under form one, could not your two schools work together? Of course you could. It is not a matter of being alike but to be working toward the same worth-while ends. You would simply have advanced farther in the process and because of that fact be under the responsibility of helping others by example and precept.

How? Through your district officers. The superintendent is made responsible for these changes. He is expected to study hard and develop himself so that he can give you and the other superintendents the right kind of advice. He is the one who must be consulted before you change your machinery. You have a right to expect him to keep in touch with you and know your needs. You can help him help the other schools by doing your best to-day and making that even better to-morrow. Various aspects of these subjects are being discussed in the HERALD and Autumn Leaves. Try to read all that is written on it. Get your associates to read them. Assimilate it, use it—and rejoice that we are awakening to the dawning of a new era in the progress of the church.

A Letter from Wales

Elder Baldwin and wife are doing a good work. Twelve baptized and all helped.

I had the great pleasure of reading one of the SAINTS' HERALDS last week for the first time and I was glad to read some of the letters the Saints were writing about the elders and the priests that were visiting them and how they are doing such wonderful work for the blessed Master. And it just came to me, Why can't I sit down and write to the Saints at Independence to let them know what a great work Brother and Sister Richard Baldwin are doing among us as new members?

When he first came to Llanely he only had two to come and hear him, but now I am pleased to say he has baptized twelve new members into the church and we are coming on wonderfully. Sister Baldwin has organized the Temple Builders here and the young girls are longing to see Tuesday coming because they are learning to do beautiful things. I am pleased to tell you that the young ladies have taken the responsibility of keeping the church nice and clean.

We have a Women's Department and we had a social at Sister Baldwin's house. The Saints have arranged to meet at different houses each time.

Brother Baldwin has charge of the Religio and we simply love that lesson. We have the roll call after the lesson and every member has to say something so you can know that they don't keep us idle. Every Sunday afternoon all the officers are being taught their duty and they are doing splendidly.

It will be a very sad day when Brother and Sister Baldwin leave us, as we love them and know they are sent by God to proclaim the true gospel of the latter-day work.

Yours in gospel bonds,

BLODWIN PRICE.

"FOLLOW ME"

We are always safe in following Christ. The un-deviating rule of his life was obedience to that which was written in the law. When the tempter came, his reply was, "It is written." When we are tempted to withhold God's portion, let us be reminded: It is written, one tenth of our increase belongs to God.

January will be Inventory Month. You can secure a blank from your local solicitor.

A Debate and New Opening

I thought perhaps the Saints would like to hear from the Sunny South. I have been a member of the Latter Day Saint Church one year, November 16. I was a member of the Methodist Church for twenty-two years. I have a sister in Zion who became a member of this church. She sent me literature and after reading it a while I began to investigate and asked our heavenly Father to send an elder here so I could see if this was his church.

Shortly after this I heard from Brother J. T. Riley of Pittsburg, Kansas, and we corresponded a short while. He came down and after we heard him preach, my husband, son, and myself were all baptized. Now since we have found the true church we are trying to help others see the light of the gospel. I have distributed several hundred papers and tracts among my neighbors and friends, and asked our heavenly Father to send an elder here to help us get the gospel before the people.

I saw in the Ensign Brother N. L. Booker had baptized two people in Magnolia, Mississippi. As they are only twenty-eight miles north of me I wanted to form their acquaintance, so I wrote to the Ensign editor for Brother Booker's address. I then wrote to him for the address of the Saints at Magnolia. When I called on them I found they were a fine family of Saints, and wrote to Brother Booker to thank him for the kindness he had shown me in sending me their address.

So he answered my letter and offered to come here and hold a meeting. We had it well advertised in the paper and by posters and Brother Booker arrived and opened the meeting November 12 with thirty present.

We have a Baptist and Congregational church here and an organization by a former Methodist preacher called Community. He came to hear Brother Booker the third night of our meeting and wrote him the next morning in regard to a debate. Brother Booker called on him, but it seemed he wanted everything his own way.

That night he came to our meeting and the next morning wrote Brother Booker again in regard to the debate so they arranged for it and announced it would begin the following Monday night. The proposition was as follows: Resolved, That the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is in harmony with the Bible in doctrine, organization, and practice. N. L. Booker affirmed. Resolved, That all the leading churches are in harmony with the Bible in doctrine, organization, and practice. E. B. Burch affirmed. Resolved, That Joseph Smith was a prophet of God and the Book of Mormon of divine origin. Reverend Burch denied it.

The meetings continued till Monday night. Reverend Burch opened the services and read a written sermon on "The sermon on the mount." He said the churches believed it to be true. He never had a Bible in sight, but had two hidden. When Brother Booker asked why he never had a Bible he got them out. He didn't tell a word about the organization of the churches.

When Brother Booker came forward he said all knew the sermon on the mount was true, but he wanted to know if the leading churches are in harmony with the Bible in doctrine, organization, and practice so he read the confession of faith, disciplines and the books of five different churches and proved by the Bible that they were not in harmony with it.

When they took up Joseph Smith on the third night, Reverend Burch lost his sermon, so he could not do much, but read from a book written to condemn the Utah people, telling what they practiced and believed, etc. He denied Joseph Smith was a prophet, as he did not prophesy. Brother

Booker proved he was a prophet and told of his prophecies in regard to his death, the Civil War, etc., being fulfilled.

The fourth night they took up the Book of Mormon. Reverend Burch denied it was of divine origin. He thought anybody could write it. Brother Booker read several passages of scripture to prove it was in harmony with the Bible. He also read several passages from the Book of Mormon to prove it was in harmony with the Bible.

The debate closed after eight hours' discussion. Reverend Burch did not make any attempt to prove the churches were in harmony with the Bible, but read sermons, books, and condemned our people for what was written about the Utah Mormons. We were told by outsiders that Brother Booker acted a gentleman all the way through the debate. One lady made a statement that we would have no one to preach to the next night.

This is the third meeting held here and we had a larger crowd out the night after the debate than we ever had before. We have made many friends. If any priest or Saint who reads this, is looking for a place to make a good living and work for the Lord, please write me as we have two gravel plants here and a factory which employs men and women. Will answer letters from those who are willing to work and help spread the gospel message.

A Dream About Tithing

Several years ago at Lamoni, Iowa, I was appointed by the Presiding Bishop to visit the house of each member of the church as solicitor, to teach the law of tithing and offerings and collect the same. To illustrate the character of some and their attitude concerning the law I will refer to two men visited.

The first was an old elder in the church with considerable means. I informed him of the object of my visit and after some talk he said, "I understand and believe in the law of tithing; but I will never pay one cent into the hands of the Bishop until the Lord makes it known to me in person to be my duty. I tried to explain to him that the Bishop was the Lord's agent, that he is to act in the stead of God to us, etc., but in his laconic style he continued, saying: "There is no use talking, my mind is fixed."

The second person visited was an old elder in the church, a well-to-do farmer. After the usual courtesies he said, "Y-e-s, I believe in the law of tithing all right but I don't just like the way the Bishop handles our money, a-n-d I've about concluded to handle my hard-earned money myself. When the elders are sent out without purse or scrip as they were in olden times, then I may feel different about it, but as it is now I have concluded to be my own bishop," etc.

A few days after this I dreamed that three men stood before the great Judge to receive sentence. The first elder mentioned stood with his head bowed in solemn attitude facing the judge; the earth clave asunder between him and the Judge, and without a word or a look around him, he went straight down into hell.

The second man then stood before the Judge and without a word, dropped down part way toward the pit and slipped into a side chamber.

The third man was not a member of any church and did not approach the Judge, but stood unmoved by the events witnessed.

I gathered from this manifestation that the man making no profession of loyalty to God stood a better chance before the Judge than the man who professed to know the law, but refused to obey it.

HENRY C. SMITH.

A Wonderful Spirit

This brother, though blind, refuses to be dependent upon others.

It has been quite a number of years since I have written to you. I have made my own way in the world ever since I was twelve years old. Since that time I have united with the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. As near as I can remember this was about twenty-seven years ago; a step which I have never regretted. The question that confronts me is, Can I be faithful to the end? I lost my eyesight in a dynamite explosion while working for a cement company. A little later on I was left alone in the world.

The company sent me back to Joplin. The brothers wanted to send me to the Saints' Home and I told them no. I would rather give them ten dollars than to take one away and I have never had to call on the Bishop's agent for help.

As near as I can remember we have paid in $121.50 tithing and I did not want the year to go by and not have our names recorded on the ledger. Some invoice at the end of the year and pay their tithing. If I was to do that I am afraid I would never pay tithing. An elder says to me, "How do you pay tithing?" I answered, "When I make $5 and don't owe anything I pay 50 cents on it." One said, "How do you make a living?" I replied, "I sit on the street corner from eight o'clock in the morning till eleven o'clock at night sometimes, with my little cup and lead pencils. I sing and play a French harp. I have never asked anyone for a nickel but am called a beggar. I only wish I could be as good as poor old Lazarus was."

I would be pleased to hear from any of the Saints who would care to carry on correspondence with me.

From your blind brother and sister,

J. C. POWELL.

Such a Letter Touches One's Heart

[It seems pathetic that something cannot be done to see that this brother is given an opportunity to secure requisite training, so that he could earn his living in an easier way and one more satisfactory to him than sitting on the street corner. As it is he gives all that he has to society with a cheerful countenance, a willingness to sing and an effort to sell his pencils for a sufficient margin to secure a living. His hours are long—fifteen hours a day. His disposition not to be dependent but to earn his way if possible, deserves commendation and his desire to help in sending the word of God abroad should make every man and woman who receives support from the church watch closely to see that the church receives not less than one hundred cents' return for every dollar expended. A considerable portion of the receipts of the church are the result of a like spirit of sacrifice.—EDITORS.]

Anamosa, Iowa

At this glad time of the year when we are so concerned about presents for our loved ones and our funds can hardly reach around to our satisfaction we have formed the plan of each drawing a name and providing for just one. I thought what an opportunity where all the family are Latter Day Saints to save all that extra money for the Christmas offering. Truly we could move forward with much more pride in work. Our bishop would not need to plead for us to be more loyal. If we were only more loyal as a people, Zion would soon be built up. I have a knowledge that our work is true, and oh, how many blessings He pours on us all.

Michigan Young People Send Messenger and Message to Zion

At the close of a preaching service at Detroit, Michigan, on the evening of the 20th a letter was read to Elder William I. Fligg, whose home is in Independence, and accompanied with a "token of remembrance" to him which, being interpreted, meant car fare home and back to his field.

Included in the message was this: "Carry this message to the young people in Zion, that the young people of Detroit and Flint are solidly behind every progressive effort of the church. Everywhere there is greater activity shown. At this time of the year when new officers are chosen for the departments of the church, we expect to see the young people come to the front."

The letter was signed by the young people's club and some individual members of the Detroit and Flint branches.

Bishopric Happy

Many have wished us a Happy New Year. We have tossed back a cheerful smile with its usual holiday greetings. Aside from the formalities of such greetings we really have great cause to be happy and to approach the work of the new year with confidence in God and in his people.

As we compare the financial condition of the church to-day with its pre-war status, we are again made happy and we want to share our joy with you.

In spite of the fact that in the past 2½ years we have passed through one of the most severe business crises that this country has ever known and by which the church finances have been affected, yet there never was a time when the net worth of the church was as great as now.

We tabulate our net worth as shown in the conference reports of 1914 and 1922.

Presiding Bishop's office	$ 252,927.41	$2,564,892.49
Chapels not included in report	1,250,000.00
Graceland College	47,690.56		217,974.91
Sanitarium	66,284.84		73,773.80
Herald and Ensign	107,081.33		169,908.33
Total	$1,723,984.14	$3,026,549.53

From the above it will be seen that our net worth during these eight years has increased $1,302,565.39, while we owe on open accounts and notes payable less now than we did in 1914.

We tabulate these last items for the two periods mentioned:

	1914	1922
Presiding Bishop's office	$160,552.16	$216,451.14
Homes	11,008.52
Graceland College	30,737.53		12,701.07
Sanitarium	16,047.59		14,881.51
Herald and Ensign	68,995.72		6,597.00
Total	$287,341.52	$250,630.72

In these figures there is a difference of $36,701.80 in favor of 1922. Then again in 1914 we only had a membership of 71,702, while now we have 94,143, or 22,441 more workers to assist in the great work of God.

Again we are happy to know that the great majority of God's people have a desire to assist and we feel confident that with the steady improvement in business conditions that each will try to make possible the increasing of our missionary force.

A sister from Montana just wrote as follows:

"I am inclosing a check for $10 freewill offering. I have had an awful time trying to deny myself and give this money to the church. There were so many things that I wanted. I wanted an electric waffle iron, a Church History, a normal training course, Autumn Leaves. I wanted Brother Elbert's Square Blocks and Timbers for the Temple but I could not have these and at the same time experience the joy that one derives from giving to the church. I would rather have that joy and satisfaction."

We know that when 20,000 wage earners get the feeling that this noble sister has that we can then move forward with greater rapidity.

We are happy in our work. It is our business to try and make you happy. We begin by wishing every member of the Church a Happy New Year.

Appreciates the "Herald" and Meetings in Zion

I will write a line to the HERALD that all may know it is a comfort to us out here. We came here for a short time and we intended then to return home. But since being out here I have been made to realize that while I was in Independence I was sleeping on my rights. When we get out into the world and see how other Saints have to do and how they would love to have the privilege that some of us have had, I am afraid we do not appreciate the privileges that we have to enjoy.

Sunday we met with the little branch at Weiser. It did me good to see the young folks one after the other take part in the prayer meeting, and I thought what a lot of good they could do in God's work, if they only had the chance to do it. I have read where they formerly used water for wine in partaking of the sacrament, but never did see it done till at our sacrament meeting Sunday. They had no wine, so they used water, but I felt as though God blessed us just the same.

We need some good elder here, as there is a big work to be done. If any of the Saints or elders happen to come this way they will find a home with us and we would be glad to see them.

May God bless us all is the prayer of your sister in the faith,

FAYETTE, IDAHO.

MRS. J. H. CONNYERS.

Visualizing the Christmas Offering Ideal

At the Second Independence Sunday school the superintendent of the primary department procured a celluloid ship to be used in collecting the Christmas offering. The children already knew that the fund was being used to send out missionaries to people in this and foreign lands, from having witnessed and heard the delivery of two stereopticon lectures on the subject. Now the daily passing of the ship, into the hold of which they drop their coins, is a constant reminder of the purpose of the offering. In order to facilitate matters for the small children, a large opening is made in one end of the deck floor rather than using only a slot. The results are so good, the idea is worth passing on.

Isolated but True to the Church

The Presbyterians have had an evangelist here, and wife and I attended. We have been going there to Sunday school where they call on us often for prayer. When they started their meeting they called on me for the first prayer. They tried very hard to get us to unite with them, and said when we got where our church had a church they would give us a letter back to our church. I heard the evangelist said I was a very spiritual man. They told us we need not give up a thing we believe. They don't seem to understand that we would have to give up the very things that make us Latter Day Saints, that is, the true church of God that is dearer than any other thing in life. We have been isolated for twenty years but the gospel has not grown any less dear to us.

We have had preaching here by Brother F. T. Mussell and Brother Tucker, and Brother McCord was here ten days and preached every night. I have a call to hold a meeting at a union church eight miles in the country. I will attend to it soon. I have preached at the place several times. My prayer is for Zion everywhere.

True Service and Family Altar Needed

On November 26, 1921, while visiting my son at his home, the subject of religion was introduced. Those present stopped their conversation and suddenly left the room as if that subject was painful to them. While I was sitting there with my head in my hands in prayer it seemed as if a personage came into the room, but there was no stir nor change. I sat in wonder but there was no fear—only a complete quietness. My eyes looked upon workmanship divine so complete, so fitting, so rich in harmony, making the whole room of wondrous beauty.

I was made to understand the Lord demands a true-hearted service of his people who walk in uprightness, living a life of purity with a family altar in each home. For by neglecting these they lose his Spirit and bring sadness into their lives. How many times have his loving hands been outstretched towards you in blessing and protection. You are living in the hour of God's judgments as well as in the hour of his blessing if you do the thing required of you. Those things that have caused doubt have no foundation in fact, for the Lord has done many things in a way that ye knew not of, but with which the people should be concerned. For those things and conditions by which you are surrounded through life he will give you strength and be with you.

Let us be comforted and strengthened and arise and shine.

MRS. MARY A. FERGUSON.

About Those Christmas Orders

We hereby express our appreciation for the orders which came in so liberally for periodicals and merchandise during the weeks preceding Christmas. We especially rejoiced that the "peak" point in orders was pleasingly early. The orders were many and liberal and we hope will bring many happy days to the recipients.

There were some disappointments, we learn, for which we are sorry. Most of the orders came in early enough to be filled, but some did not, and letters of complaint are reaching us. We explain that all orders were filled within twenty-four hours after their arrival here, and some of them, especially on the last week-day before Christmas, on the same day they were received.

We are answering the letters that come, but making this announcement for the benefit of those who may feel aggrieved in any way. If there were errors in filling orders we are glad to correct them.

We hope to further serve you throughout the year in furnishing the best in books and periodicals and merchandise at lowest prices compatible with good merchandising.

Independence, Missouri

John F. Sheehy to Cameron

(From letter to First Presidency.)

Just now after spending enough time to get acquainted with a few people in Cameron and to size up the work here and its workers, I feel like thanking the appointing powers for my present appointment. I want to do right and work hard while here. I know that I will have your support. I trust that the opportunity afforded me here as I make the best of it, will soon result in good both to the church and myself. I shall try to be true to the confidence you have in me and remain humble before God and do only those things that will bring good reports for the cause of righteousness.

This afternoon the priesthood met and appointed a committee to purchase property, subject to the approval of the branch of course, for a parsonage. We have done this with the view of purchasing property adjoining the church property so we can use some of the lot for enlarging the church just as soon as possible. Will take this up with you at a later date.

I am returning to the East to-night to pack and assist the wife and children here immediately. Expect to be back in two weeks.

We are giving a cantata here to-night and we know that many will be turned away.

JOHN F. SHEEHY.

Results at Saint Marys, Ohio

"I am holding meetings at Saint Marys with good interest," writes Elder O. J. Hawn, on December 18, ordering tracts for his work at that place. "This is a town of about seven thousand people. I expect to canvass every house and leave some of our literature. We look for good results. We have baptized about ninety here within the past two years."

Lecturing for Prohibition

Elder S. W. L. Scott, for many years one of our general missionaries and still one of the seventy of the church, writes that he recently closed a two-month contract with the Anti-Saloon League of America. Following this he has concluded a two-week series of sermons and lectures to the Saints at Flint, Michigan, with a gratifying attendance and interest. The series was in the nature of an educational institute with various subjects considered, including the part the nations are playing and the moral leadership of this Republic, together with our hopes for Palestine as prophetically delineated in the Bible and backed by Christian civilization.

Help for Teaching Cradle Roll Classes

In many schools there are little classes of children from two years to four who are too young to enroll in the beginner grade but who can imbibe much valuable training in the school hour. The book, Object Lessons for the Cradle Roll, by Danielson, procurable through the Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri, is being used in various schools with excellent results. The price is $1.60, postpaid. A nest of ten blocks to accompany the above books, postpaid for $1.35 for the set.

Independence Boy Breaks Two World Records

On Friday, December 22, Dudley Smith broke the world record for speed in fire making by Boy Scout methods.

He is the second son of Walter W. Smith our church historian and Eunice Winn Smith, and has taken a great interest in the work of the Boy Scouts. His father says that he is a doer and a "thing thinker." It is well known that he has taken so great an interest in the work of the Boy Scouts that he became an Eagle Scout (the highest rank) nearly two years ago, and was then the youngest Eagle Scout in the world. It is also thought that he holds the highest rank for merit badges in this part of America.

On Friday evening, December 22, an official test was made with several Boy Scouts for the making of fire by the use of the friction method. Dudley started fire in 9 1-5 seconds. The best world record previously was 9 4-5 seconds. In his preliminary, unofficial tests he only accomplished this feat in 10 1-2 seconds; but when we consider that so far as tests have been made the best record by aborigines to-day is about 20 seconds we will see that either of these records are remarkable. This record of 20 seconds was equaled by Harold Bullard in this test and exceeded by two other contestants—Houston Dickinson and Ronald Smith.

At the same time Dudley Smith also broke the world record for making fire with flint and steel. This he accomplished in 4 3-5 seconds, while the world record up to that time had been 6 seconds.

Dudley was very anxious to break the world record before his seventeenth birthday, and owing to the date of this test was able to do so by a margin of two days. His father informs us that it is no accident, that he has been giving his attention persistently to this problem for six months past, that he has been testing in order to eliminate all waste or excess motion and to reduce the movements to a minimum and those essential. He has also experimented with various woods and also with various kinds of tinder. We are not informed as to the kind of wood or tinder he used in this successful test.

It is an illustration that such results are achieved by using intelligence and by persistent practice and preparation. It is also an illustration of the value of setting a high goal, as he set deliberately to work six months ago to break the world record.

He is well advanced also in his school work, and is a senior in the William Chrisman High School of Independence.

Simcoe, Ontario

We would like our brothers and sisters both far and near to know that we are doing something for our Master in helping to spread his gospel in this vicinity. We are not yet organized as a branch, but negotiating for it. I may say we are some thirty members strong—strong not only in numbers but in devotion to his service. We have for our pastor and presiding officer Elder Hiram Dickhout, a conscientious man of lovable disposition. When he gathers his flock together they represent nothing less than a real band of hope.

A new idea in writing pads. Write with pencil or any hard object on the celluloid surface and the writing shows plainly till the sheet is raised, when it disappears. May be repeated indefinitely. Very popular with the children. If included with order for other merchandise, 15 cents postpaid.

Independence

Sunday morning Elder U. W. Greene was the speaker at the Stone Church and Presiding Patriarch F. A. Smith at night. Elder Greene preached at Englewood Sunday evening and Apostle J. F. Curtis in the morning. Special music was rendered at all the churches, it being New Year's Eve. Doctor McLean, of Toronto, sang a solo in the evening at the Stone Church.

There were several small watch parties held that evening, quite in keeping, however, with the day. At one which consisted largely of members of the Stone Church Choir, Mrs. Pauline Becker Etzenhouser played rapidly one hymn after another starting in the middle in each instance. But without exception they were able to take up the tune and sing the accompanying words.

The Sunday school at the Stone Church has made a persistent effort through the past year for Christmas offering and has maintained a chart in each of the auditoriums to show the status of the Christmas offering month by month. Early in January the school was divided into the various departments: adult, senior, intermediate, junior, primary, beginner, officers and normal class, and a definite goal set for each. The normal class is the only one which exceeds its quota, though the others have made an especially good record. As a result the total offering of the school is $3,540.60. Second Independence reports $601.60 raised for Christmas offering. The schools here observe the request of the Bishop to close the offering with the end of the year. The amounts collected during the year are turned into the hands of the local bishop each week.

On Wednesday, the 27th, the annual recital of the oratorio, "The Messiah," by Handel, was rendered by the Independence choir under the direction of Mrs. Cordie Hulmes who had full charge of all the special rehearsals for this event. For her soloists she presented Mrs. Nina G. Smith, soprano; Mrs. Ella Van Huff, contralto; Eugene Christy, tenor; and David Grosch, baritone. There probably is no other oratorio of deeper religious tone and it is coming to be quite an event in many communities to give "The Messiah" annually at Christmas. The auditorium of the Stone Church was crowded by an attentive audience.

Bishop B. R. McGuire was in Chicago Christmas week attending the thirty-fifth annual meeting of the American Economic Association with allied associations of Statistics, Political Science, Sociology, Accounting, Farm Economics, and Labor Legislation.

Friday evening Miss June Whiting of the faculty of Graceland College occupied the entire evening in a program at the Stone Church Religio. As usual her reading was very much appreciated by all who were able to be present. Her program consisted of the presentation of "The famous Mrs. Fair." She was supported by the Liberty Orchestra, under direction of Walter Davis, assistant director.

At the eleven o'clock hour on the 24th Elder Hubert Case was the speaker at the Stone Church, taking as his theme the event we now celebrate, the birth of Jesus.

The evening was given over to music, the program consisting of songs from the Hymnal and Zion's Praises, four numbers by the orchestra, two solos, and a reading, "The other wise man," by Sister Sallie Forties, of Kansas City.

The Christmas sermon by radio on Sunday evening, the 24th, was by Elbert A. Smith, the musical program by a junior chorus under direction of Mrs. J. T. Westwood, Mrs. A. L. Sanford, accompanist. It was a very effective program.

The radio sermon on the 17th by R. V. Hopkins on "The Book of Mormon and the American Indian," was so well received by listeners in at many points that a series on various phases of the subject is being continued. His sermon on the evening of the 31st was on "Bible prophecy and the Book of Mormon." Next Sunday evening he will speak on "Indian tradition and the Book of Mormon," and that will be followed by one on "American archæology and the Book of Mormon."

The musical program last Sunday evening was by singers from the choir under direction of H. C. Burgess, who rendered several selections from "The Messiah," including the Hallelujah Chorus. Nina G. Smith sang several solos, including "Book of Mormon, hid for ages," as a concluding number. These programs are being sent out each Sunday evening on 360 meter wave, from 6 to 7 o'clock, through the Independence station of the Central Radio Company, Kansas City, Missouri. Station call is W. P. A. G. Ordinary regenerative sets hear these easily as far as six hundred miles, while the higher powered sets from coast to coast and from Cuba to Canada report hearing with ease. People are ordering church books and missionaries are finding an interest created from these programs.

Elder E. D. Moore who recently declined reelection as superintendent of the Sunday school at the Second Independence Church to give his attention to the young people in the Department of Recreation and Expression at the Stone Church has also been placed in charge of the young people's meetings at eleven o'clock at the Stone Church and expects to start a new series for young people on January 14. He expects to make these services expressional and to invite and secure the active participation and cooperation of the young people.

Owing to the additional numbers coming to Zion we now have a considerable waiting list of elders who cannot be accommodated in the existing elders' quorum. For this reason a new quorum, the second, has been organized with Elder E. D. Moore as president and he has chosen as his counselors Elders Walter L. Wehrli and E. E. Willard. They have also elected as their secretary, Elder W. B. Paul.

The wedding of Brother Harold Harrington and Sister Myra Snodgrass occurred on the 24th, with Elder G. E. Harrington, uncle of the bridegroom, officiating.

The wedding of Alma Bullard, son of A. E. Bullard, of Lamoni, and Grace Stowell, was held at the Second Independence Church on the evening of January 1.

The Sanitarium gratefully acknowledges the receipt recently of a new sewing machine equipped for electric or foot power. This was secured through the Society of Patronesses, with Mrs. E. L. Kelley as president and Mrs. B. R. McGuire vice president. Through the kindness of F. M. Muehlhouser, agent, they procured the machine at cost.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium for the week ending December 23: Juan Garcia, Courtney, Missouri; Mrs. R. A. Thutchley and Baby Thutchley, Kansas City, Missouri; Joseph Thorpe, Andover, Missouri; Mrs. J. S. White, Hartshorne, Oklahoma; Mrs. John L. Rees, Stevensville, Montana; A. S. Constance, Vida, Montana; and the following from Independence: Mrs. Rex Rowland and Baby Rowland, Mrs. Lillian Pope Cross, Miss Mary Lewis, Mrs. Joe Pichler, Baby Ruth Eleanor Riley, Mrs. Opal Walker and Baby Walker, Mrs. William Feldmeth, Miss Bernice Fleeger, and S. A. Thiel. X-ray patients: Dalton Selvey, Blue Springs, Missouri; W. J. McCarrison, Kansas City, Missouri; F. T. Mussell, Des Moines, Iowa; and Mrs. J. W. Chapman, Mrs. W. S. Craddock, and Mrs. E. H. Garrett, all of Independence.

Jackson County outside of Kansas City held a meeting of the Boy Scout organization on December 28 and voted to re-register as a first class council with a paid executive. Colonel E. M. Stayton was reelected as president; E. B. Street, superintendent of schools, as vice president; Walter Wayne Smith declined to serve longer, so Hilton H. Hartley was elected as commissioner. Mark H. Siegfried was reelected treasurer.

The Walnut Park church building is under way, though completion is delayed from belated deliveries of lumber for the superstructure.

The following patients entered the Sanitarium for the week ending December 30: Mrs. Mary Irene Cook, Oak Grove, Missouri; Mr. C. C. Joehnk, Knob Knoster, Missouri; William Farmer, Barry, Illinois; W. J. McCarrison, Kansas City, Missouri; Mrs. Gomer Wells and W. H. Eliason, Lamoni, Iowa; Camilo Vabosa, Kansas City, Kansas; Miss Pearl Rose Smith, Emmetsburg, Iowa; John C. Griffith, Mount Washington, Missouri; and the following from Independence: Mrs. Sallie Weiler, Mrs. I. F. Scofield, Miss Margaret Murdock, Miss Bessie Curtis, Mrs. G. W. VanDran, Mrs. W. H. Mannerling, Miss Hazel Larabee, S. S. Hedges, Mrs. Etta Wehrli, Miss Stella Martin, Miss Altha Koehler, Miss Ruth Mathena, Miss Cora Fligg, Mrs. J. W. Woods, and Mrs. Iva Roberts. X-ray patients: J. M. Burnett and Mrs. J. T. Mader, Kansas City, Missouri; Harvey Medley, Waterloo, Iowa; Mr. Raymond Young, La Moure, North Dakota; and Mrs. C. C. Mitchell, Marie Brady, and Maynard Hunt, all of Independence.

Bisbee, Arizona

The Department of Women of the Bisbee Branch held quite a successful bazaar on Saturday afternoon and evening of December 9. It was called a carnival bazaar and had all kinds of booths to represent the various activities of a carnival. The young people of the branch had charge of the booths, a boy and a girl to each booth. They did their own decorating and a prize was offered for the prettiest booth, also one for the booth that sold out first. The doll booth took first prize. It was in charge of Brother Raymond Raeterree and Sister Naomi Davis and was decorated with the Stars and Stripes. The candy and sandwich booths were a close second, but as the judges said nothing could be prettier than the Stars and Stripes the prize went to this booth. The fish pond won the prize for selling out first.

The boys at the different booths furnished a good deal of amusement by calling out their concessions. We also had an oyster supper in connection with the bazaar. Our net receipts for the evening were about seventy-five dollars or a little more, which we considered quite good.

Lamoni Items

Apostle D. T. Williams left Christmas evening for New York City whence he will sail to the British Mission where he expects to remain for several years.

A number from the Herald Office were in Lamoni for Christmas, including Mr. and Mrs. George Anway, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. McKean, and N. Braby; also Miss Hattie Benedict.

A. M. Carmichael came from attending the American Economic Association meetings in Chicago to Independence on Saturday on Sunday school business, leaving at noon for Wichita, Kansas, to participate in a three-day institute at that place.

L. S. Wight was in Lamoni for Christmas, going then to Kansas City with Cyril E. Wight. They both, however, returned to Lamoni for Sunday, where L. S. Wight was the morning speaker.

The community Christmas tree in Lamoni was a success. The mild weather permitted a large crowd. The tree was big enough to make a good showing and was brilliantly lighted. A pageant was presented featuring the nativity of Christ. The stable for the principal scene was located at the base of the band stand, on which was placed the Christmas tree. At the close a truck load of gifts was distributed to the children.

President F. M. McDowell, G. N. Briggs, president of Graceland College, Superintendent A. M. Carmichael, Bishop A. Carmichael, bishop's counselor A. J. Yarrington, and Professor C. E. Irwin were in attendance at the annual meeting of the American Economic Association with allied associations and found the work decidedly interesting.

Nauvoo, Illinois

The few Saints here are endeavoring to hold our own, hoping and praying for reinforcements. We feel that we have received valuable help in the persons of Brother and Sister Amos Berve, who arrived November 28. We were glad indeed to see them and feel that Brother Berve will be a good man at the Mansion House and a great help to us as a branch.

We were agreeably surprised on the morning after the arrival of Brother and Sister Berve to have Apostle Paul M. Hanson walk in. He was on his way to Chicago and stopped off to visit historic Nauvoo for the first time. He was with us in our Wednesday evening prayer service and gave us some good things to think about. His short stay with us was very much enjoyed, not on account of its brevity, however, and we trust that he as well as others will pay Nauvoo a visit when he can.

On Wednesday evening, December 6, our meeting was small but very interesting. Our daughter, Irene, visiting Independence the Sunday before, had the privilege of hearing President F. M. Smith's sermon to the young people, and she gave us a very clear outline of it, which was interesting as well as instructive. Following this, Brother Berve related several instances in which he was very plainly shown that Frederick M. Smith was in his right place. Such statements increased our confidence in Brother Berve, as we were made to feel that he stood loyal to our prophet and leader. We are feeling much encouraged and hopeful that brighter days are in store for Nauvoo.

MRS. IDA A. LAYTON.

Bellaire, Illinois

The district conference of Southeastern Illinois which convened at Bellaire has passed into history. It was very well attended considering the weather outlook which kept some from attending. Those in attendance had a very pleasant and interesting time. Brother Henry Sparling, missionary supervisor, and Lloyd C. Moore, district president, were in charge, and the usual business disposed of. The next district conference will meet with Tunnel Hill Branch the first Saturday and Sunday in June.

The sermons during the conference were both interesting and uplifting and especially the one delivered by our Bishop's agent, Elder Charles Wesner. His subject was "The whole law." The other two sermons by Elder L. O. Wildermuth and Elder Moore, were both delivered to good congregations. Others in attendance were Elder W. W. Brown and wife; Sister Henry Sparling; Brother and Sister Bruce Brown;

The Holders of Passes and Special Railroad Concessions

Through the efforts of the Transportation Bureau, passes have been secured for a number of the workers in the field, and we wish to caution against abuses of the privileges thus extended. Unnecessary travel should not be indulged in any event. Free transportation presents the temptation to make trips which would not otherwise be made, and this yielded to can easily result in undoing the saving, for incidental expenses of travel mount rapidly. We appreciate the courtesy extended to us by the railroads, and ask for the cooperation of our men in protecting the privileges granted.

We concur in the request of the Transportation Manager that trips made on annual and limited passes, and on trip passes as well, be reported to the Transportation Bureau.

We desire the hearty cooperation of the men in handling the problems of transportation for church workers.

To Sunday School Superintendents, Secretaries and Christmas Offering Treasurers

The first step to a successful start on "The 1923 Christmas Offering for Missionary Work" is to close the books for last year and send in your 1922 offering. Please do not wait for the amount to grow to some desired size. The amount collected by December 31 should stand. It represents the actual 1922 offering. Remember, the picture of the school having the highest average per member offering is to be published in the Blue Stepping Stones.

Send a check, draft, or money order to the undersigned promptly and begin early on the 1923 campaign.

Pastoral Notices

To the Saints of the Far West Stake; Greeting: Having been unable to reach my appointed field, perhaps a word of explanation might be in order.

I have been busy constantly since General Conference building a house as a change in location seemed necessary. Several causes have conspired to delay the building, so it will be some time yet before I can enter the field.

Another and more potential reason is the poor condition of my wife's health. It seems that under present conditions it would not be right and proper to leave the burdens of the home on her, especially during the winter, so I may not get to do much missionary work before spring.

However, if any of the Saints in the stake know of chances to do effective missionary work I will appreciate information and suggestions regarding the same so that preparation to meet calls may be made as soon as possible. All are earnestly requested to help.

Sincerely in gospel bonds,
T. C. KELLEY.

To the Saints and Local Officials of the Southern Missouri District; Christmas and New Year Greetings: Once more after a lapse of eleven years I have been chosen or appointed to preside over you. That is, I am your servant and am anxious to cooperate with the priesthood in bringing about the very best results possible for the advancement of the work intrusted to our care. So let us go to work as a united Brother Warren; Brother C. M. Curtis; Cecil Brown, district secretary; and Brother W. Clements. Brother Sparling and Brother Brown will remain with us for a while and hold services. We are certainly glad to have these brethren stay with us for the people here as well as elsewhere need the gospel.

Keeping Your Records for 1923

FAMILY BUDGET BOOK

The only way to know whether one is spending his income right is to keep an accurate account. The account should be divided into such divisions that he can compute tithing and know his status with God.

And even aside from the tithing information, it is interesting to know what our money is going for, how intelligently we are managing our income and outgo—how our savings are increasing or diminishing—in fact, what sort of stewards we are.

Such an account is easily kept by the regular use of our family budget book. It contains instructions on how to use, and is ruled into convenient columns for daily record, with monthly totals.

If the exact subdivisions do not apply, make your own headings, just so you observe the proper classifications.

January is inventory month, Bishop McGuire says. A correct inventory should be based on actual records kept. If that has not been done in the past, do it this year. Get one of our budget books. In heavy manila cover.

We have in stock in convenient size and form the same ministerial diary we have sold for several years. It has items for all the priesthood. The columns not applying may be left blank. If one is ordained to another office during the year, the same book will serve him.

Shall We Have Faith?

The old-time discussion on the virgin birth of Jesus seems to have broken out afresh in and around Kansas City, the discussion having been revived by the forced resignation or rather dismissal of Professor Slaten from William Jewell College, at Liberty, Missouri, because of his expressed disbelief in the virgin birth of Jesus and some other ideas also along the subject of discussion. It is well to remember the statement of Paul, that "we walk by faith and not by sight," and know thereby that it is well within the purposes and intentions of Deity that faith is a prime essential to spiritual development, and becomes to Christians the "knowledge of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen." And this may well apply to the unseen things of the past as well as future.

In the great divine plan of human development it may well be that the "mysteries of godliness" are wisely calculated as factors of faith, or at least designedly faith testers. And if Jesus shall "find faith again upon earth," it must be remembered by his people that nothing in the plan of God exists without reason or purpose, however mysterious it may appear to us. We might plan how a certain event could have been otherwise; but despite our views we must believe that God plans to suit best his purposes.

So in regard to the virgin birth we may wonder why it was ordered according to the scriptural evidences or testimony; but if we have faith we say: "God in his wisdom knows best, and in his omnipotence can dispose as pleases him best; so we believe, though it may now appear to be mysterious." And this attitude does not stultify intelligence. Every hour we accept on faith, even in the realm of the natural, things we do not know or understand. In a thousand directions we can look and see phenomena we do not comprehend, though we may accept some man's "theory." Accepting theory is the exercise of faith in the explanation of the mysterious in the realm of science. Is the exercise of faith in the "mysteries of godliness" less honorable or safe?

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

The Essentiality of Loyalty in the Development of Zion

Sermon by President Frederick M. Smith, at the Stone Church, Independence, Missouri, December 3, 1922.

The subject to-night is not one of my own choosing. It has been assigned. I approach the discussion of the subject with some degree of timidity, and perhaps some of my friends will say it is a bit of temerity as well, but it seems to fit into the series that has been in progress. Inasmuch as the central theme of the series of meetings for the young people seems to have been Zion and Zionic conditions and preparation for Zion, of course I am happy to take a part on that program.

If I am permitted to change somewhat the subject which has been assigned me, "Loyalty the watchword," I should turn it over in this form, "The essentiality of loyalty in the development of Zion," and in that form I shall attempt to develop it. I have not been able to give to its outlining or its preparation the time that I desire; and yet I hope that there shall be sufficient backbone to it that you might be able to follow it and recognize at least the skeleton of what should be a good sermon. I do not know that I shall be able to clothe it with the flesh and blood that will make it attractive to you, but I take it that you are all interested in the subject of Zion.

We Must Not Be Satisfied

It will be recalled that in the over twenty years of my ministry in this church I have been calling for preparation for Zion. I am still calling for that preparation. Preparation is and will be continuously necessary if Zion is to have the development that we desire it shall. But so far as the present is concerned more is demanded than preparation. While some are still in the process of preparation for entering into the Zionic condition, and while there are still others who must be urged to enter that period of preparation, others must be establishing Zion; and while at work establishing Zion they must still be busy in preparing for still greater activity. I will look with the utmost concern, with discouragement and even disheartenment, upon the day when this people shall be satisfied with its achievements. I mean by that that a people who have reached and passed their goal without reerecting new ideals and fixing new goals is a people who are going backward instead of forward.

Let me illustrate that by a story. It may be remembered by some that some years ago a bust was made of the former occupant in the Presidency of the church by a Kansas City artist by the name of Dryer. I talked with him one day after Mr. Dryer had finished his work and asked him if he was satisfied with it. He said, "No," and he said it so heartily that I was a bit disheartened myself, thinking he had not done his best work. However, he explained his attitude at once by telling me the story of a painter. A famous painter one time finished a canvas and when he had stepped back and scrutinized it carefully he burst into tears. A friend standing near said to him, "What is the matter; are you disappointed with it?" The painter replied, "No; that is the trouble; I can find no fault in it. It is perfect. That means that I have reached the limit of my possibilities." And so it is with peoples: when they have done their very best, when they are satisfied with what they have done, it means they have reached the end.

What About Zion?

Now so far as Zion is concerned, we can approach that subject from so many different angles that it almost seems a matter of debate as to which angle we should make the approach from. But perhaps its importance, so far as the estimation of your speaker is concerned, can be emphasized by putting a question to you. You will remember that the speaker of the morning said lessons are most impressed sometimes by using the query method. If Zion is to be established it means that there must be opportunity for its establishment. Where is our opportunity? When is it? Is it here? Is it in the future, or is it passing? My concern can be indicated by the expression of the belief that we are in greatest danger of passing our opportunity. In other words, the very road that we have been looking for in the journey of our progress upward is so close at hand that there is danger that this people will pass that road without entering, and when they do it means that their opportunity is forever lost and either some other people or this people reorganized must accomplish that work.

Let me say to you what I have said to the people in the salt valley of the West: No faction of the church organized by Joseph Smith the Seer has as yet entered upon one of the chief things that leader brought to the world, and that is the establishment of a reformed social condition that will bring about the readjustment of the evils that have crept into our present society and the preparation of a people and place wherein the kingdom of God can be established upon the earth.

The Recent Conference

Our danger is in procrastination, and the work of the opposing power has been constantly to produce that. There never has been a forward movement among the children of God since the beginning of the world that the opposing power has not sought to procrastinate the day of its culmination. And the warning that must be raised to this people is that they must be constantly on their guard against those opportunities seized by Satanic power to still further procrastinate the time when we shall establish Zion.

I have to go back no further in the history of this church than the first of October, last, to illustrate to you how that can be brought about. I know that in attempting to speak of the last General Conference I am getting on dangerous ground; but that is a matter of indifference to me. My voice has been silent to a large extent on the conference, and was in the conference, and if I bubble over a bit now and then in regard to conference you can know it is because the pent-up feelings have got the best of me. I have a right to speak on certain things, and on those things I shall speak, God being my helper. I shall try to do it kindly, as becometh a servant of God; but at the same time I shall try to put behind it sufficient force to give you the meaning of what I say.

In speaking of the last General Conference I do so with more of timidity than I approach the general subject of loyalty, and perhaps I may be accused of having more temerity than I had when I approached the other.

There is no finer and more effective weapon in the hands of Satan than the aspiration of self-appointed leaders, and I heard a danger signal long before conference that I wish every Latter Day Saint could have heard. Recognizing the tone of that danger signal, recognizing the indication of the direction from which we might expect an attack upon some of the sacred institutions of this church, and under the inspiration of God as I firmly believe, I, as the leader of this church, was compelled to stand aside and in a period of helplessness because of the attitude of the people was compelled to see the church on its onward progress approach a forking of the road, and so far as I was concerned the inquiry was present from the depths of the heart, Shall the church take the road that leads onward to its goal or will it be deflected into apostasy? I have been criticized for remaining away from the conference and letting the people fight it out alone. God is in this work, and God could protect the people, and the inspiration that was vouchsafed to me if the church is to accomplish its purposes shall be and must be sufficiently pervasive in the church so that those who would lead it astray cannot.

Without entering into personality, without touching on or entering upon that ground, at least to the point of danger, let me indicate to you by some things that happened what was the character of the leadership that would have led this church into apostasy. One who was instrumental at least in conducting or directing the affairs of the opposition, not once but twice said to me, "The quicker we get rid of the Doctrine and Covenants the better it will suit me." At no time did I give an answer. I am going to give it to you to-night. At another time from a similar source came this statement that three things stood between this church and progress; one was the Book of Mormon, another was the Doctrine and Covenants, and the third was the Smith family.

Now, I answer. This church can get along without the Smith family. It might be possible that every member of the family who has been connected with the development of this church since 1830, and previously, might drop out of activity in this organization and you might substitute among your leaders those who would be named by any other name than Smith and this church could still be the church in succession to the church founded in 1830. But you cannot repudiate the Book of Mormon and the Book of Covenants and still remain the church in true succession to the church founded through the instrumentality of Joseph Smith. And when the time comes that I am compelled to lay aside my belief in the divine origin of the Book of Covenants I will have the manhood to place my resignation before you people and refuse to pose as a representative of the people when I am not representing them.

That is my answer. That much of conference I am going to speak of. With this in mind, some of you people can analyze the blow that was struck at one of the most sacred institutions of this church. But enough of that.

Loyalty Is Devotion to a Cause

What is loyalty? It is not my purpose to-night, or it would be quite beside the issue for me to attempt a philosophical discussion of loyalty or to follow the ramifications of any argument that might be philosophical in its character; but it is my purpose to-night to attempt to analyze loyalty in the aspect which we have presented at the beginning, viz, the application of loyalty to Zionie conditions.

Loyalty is fealty or devotion or faithfulness to a cause. I might go back of that and say that loyalty first is fealty or devotion or adherence to or faith in an ideal, but being a faith or devotion in an ideal it almost presupposes that it shall also be devotion to or fealty to a cause; and it can be carried still further. If it is fealty to a cause based on an ideal or circumscribed around an ideal or activated by an ideal, it also means that it must be devotion or faithfulness to those upon whom falls the responsibility in that cause. And furthermore, the cause presupposes a goal, for no cause can exist as an organic form of activity or progress unless there is a well-understood and well-defined goal.

Its application to us might be put forth in some questions. What is our ideal? What is the cause organized on that foundation of an ideal? What is the goal toward which we as a people are working? The ideal, so far as the church is concerned, is the establishment of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Let me put it in a little different form. The ideal is the gospel of Jesus Christ. The principles of the gospel that Christ brought to the earth are the foundation stones of the ideal of this people. You cannot get away from it. If then the ideal is the gospel of Jesus Christ, what is the goal? The answer it seems to me is obvious. The goal is the establishment of his kingdom upon the earth and the accomplishment of his purposes here and now. That is the immediate goal. I will grant you that the goal is perhaps dual in its character. The goal as we objectify it will perhaps be more clearly in view if we put it into temporal form and recognize, of course, that that kingdom, once established, the factors point to and may lead into the beyond.

If then the ideal or the principle is the gospel of Jesus Christ and his philosophy, we must recognize, or in our examination pass to a scrutiny at least of his own activities while he was here on earth in person; and we have only to take a glance at the Christian history to know and to recognize the fact as being of importance to us in our present discussion that Christ has always worked through an organization composed of human elements. Don't misunderstand me there. That is not taking the divine out of Christ, but it is recognizing the human in his organization and recognizing the fact that we must always be conscious of, that we must always be ready to recognize that Christ had human elements to build with almost entirely in constructing his church objectively. Of course, he vitalized it; he spiritualized it by an inculcation of the divine. But his instruments of contact with the people, and with other people than those already converted, were human elements entirely except as they might be refined by the presence of the divine Spirit.

Loyalty to Christ

Now if we are to be loyal to our ideal, it of course follows as a consequence that we must be loyal to the originator of those ideals, which means Christ. Let me emphasize that, for there have been those who were cruel enough to accuse me, in pleading for loyalty under present conditions, of asking people to follow me where I was not willing to follow Christ. There are times when in discussing the thing from various angles one leaves untouched certain things that critics can easily pick up and accuse one of neglecting; and since sermons are limited to something less than four or five hours you do not have time to explain those things, with the result that the critics accuse you of not believing in them. The people ought at least to be willing to give me credit for believing in the fundamentals of our religion.

Loyalty to Jesus Christ demands loyalty to his organization. Is not that logical? And since loyalty to the organization that Christ placed upon earth is demanded of us, the next thing follows as an inevitable consequence, that it also demands loyalty to those who carry the responsibility in that organization. And that loyalty can consistently and justly be demanded by those who are carrying the burden of standing as representatives of Christ and taking the responsibility of working in his organization.

"When the Son of Man cometh again will he find faith on the earth?" I believe that is an application that can be made right here to the general subject of loyalty. When the Son of Man cometh again there is no question in his mind that we will have faith in God because preceding the coming of the Son of Man there will be, if prophecy is to be fulfilled, such a demonstration of the power of God, such a demonstration of the faith that he has conveyed to his Son, that all the world shall confess that Jesus is the Christ and every knee shall bow. Yet in the face of that utterance, Christ himself has asked, "When the Son of Man cometh again will he find faith on the earth?" Can we not reasonably deduce that Christ asked the question, "When the Son of Man cometh again will he find on the earth a body of people loyal to his ideals and organization, following those leaders that have been placed in positions of responsibility?" That is the application of that quotation we wish to make to-night.

Have We Sufficient Courage?

I was pleased to-night to see the emphasis your song leader placed upon Zion and I was certainly happy to see him put the word "Zion" in place of the word "Somewhere," making it definite. And its application here is this: The establishment of Zion will demand courage. I have sometimes, at least in recent months, been led to question seriously, Has this people the courage of its convictions? For years we have been preaching social reform and we have done little or nothing to demonstrate that belief. Can it be that we shall go on for another one hundred years and then be no closer the accomplishment of our ideals than we are to-night? Must the sad expression used by one, which came to my ears recently, be constantly repeated by each succeeding generation, "You and I will not live to see the establishment of Zion, but our children may"? And the emphasis was placed on the "may." Is it possible that the courage of this people has so weakened, or has failed to be developed to the point that this people must go on and on and on and not be able to point to a practical demonstration of their social philosophy? I cannot believe it. God has promised that the hastening time is here and in the hastening time there will be loosened those divine forces that will so change and mold the opinions and fire the zeal of his people that that will be accomplished in a short time which almost seemed impossible before.

What is courage? Courage is the fruitage of loyalty, and loyalty is always demanded in developing courage. People do not have courage in that which is causeless, and people do not demonstrate courage who are not activated by ideals; hence if this people is to have the courage of its convictions there must be loyalty in its presence, for that courage cannot be developed without it.

As the end of the reign of selfishness approaches the hearts of many of this people will fail. How many within the sound of my voice to-night will fail to have the courage to move out? How many of you will find loyalty to selfishness greater than loyalty to the ideals of Christ? That is the question for you to answer, and it is up to you as an individual, it is up to you as a group, and it will be up to you as a mass of people eventually to answer that. The ideals that have developed loyalty in me will point toward the aggrandizement of the group and they will give me the courage to answer, "I will follow our leaders on to the goal which is established, which is Christ and his ideals."

The Sort of Faith Required

There are times when people must follow a leader, not blindly, but with a faith so sublime that they will be able to say, "I do not see all the steps that are required of me according to the plans of this leader, but from the exercise of all the intelligence I have and from the exercise of all the powers of observation God has given to me, from the exercise of all the degrees of spirituality that I can call to my command, I, in analyzing the program, can reach no other conclusion than that that leader is leading us toward our goal; therefore, I will follow."

That takes loyalty; that takes courage. Have we it? That does not mean that you are placing blind faith or confidence in me. That simply is a recognition of the fact that you are in an organization that you believe to be founded by God, ordained by his divine power, and your own exercise of faith gives you the answer.

"Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him," said one of old. And perhaps the time will come when this people in following the leaders that have been appointed by God will be required to exercise that same stalwartness of faith. This is the ideal. We are going toward it, and though it will cost my life yet still I will trust in the organization I believe God has founded upon earth. "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him," is the very acme of loyalty.

I suppose if I were to get through a sermon tonight and say nothing about stewardships you would think that something had gone wrong with me. I would think so, too. When stewardships are established and when they become common among this people then will the end of the reign of selfishness be marked so far as this people is concerned. But to abandon serving self and begin serving the group will be the crucial test for every Latter Day Saint; and the answer that is given to the question that will then be put fairly to every Latter Day Saint will depend on the degree of loyalty he has developed, and many will fail to respond to that test. In other words, they will be broken by it. "When the sifting time is at work" means just this very time. The parable of the five wise and the five foolish virgins might be taken the same way. If this is what it means, it indicates that many will fail to respond, and that is going to be the crucial test—the abandoning of the serving of self and the beginning of the service to the group.

The lack of loyalty will be the chief factor in bringing this about. Even in the matter of the preparation for the work that is still before us, even before we have entered actually upon it, (I refer now to the preparation of individuals,) there will be times of disheartenment, times of discouragement to pass through in which it will be necessary for us to have the kind of loyalty that I have been speaking about. We had a fine illustration of it in the young people's prayer meeting this morning when the young sister from the South Sea Islands arose and said that she had come here from the Islands to make preparation for helping her people attain higher standards, but her trials had caused her to wonder if her efforts had been a failure. Other individuals preparing for usefulness in this church will find these periods of disheartenment and discouragement coming to them, and the only thing that will tide them over is loyalty to Christ, the ideals of the church, loyalty to the cause, and friendship, for friendship is also a product of loyalty. "A friend in need is a friend indeed." When we are discouraged, then sometimes a friendly word becomes as gold because of the stabilizing force it has to keep our feet from slipping when standing in slippery places, or to make our heart once more warm when it has become cold through discouragement.

What is the function of a leader? Is a leader supposed to know the way simply because he is a leader, or is a leader to select the way by the aid of your faith and prayers? I do not say these things from a spirit of egotism at all, but I say them and am justified in saying them because of your own splendid faith. You folks select your leader; you give your support to a leader because you believe in the efficacy of prayer; because you believe that God is in the work. If your leaders fail to respond to the forces that your spiritual powers generate in supporting them by your prayers, then you might as well mark it this work is a failure. And if your leaders are supported by that power of inspiration that is warmed and enhanced by your prayers, then you are justified in believing that they see the way clearer than you do. It is plain talk, I know, but we need it. And if your leaders are supposed to know the way a little bit better than you do because of the position to which you have called them, because of your prayers and the inspiration vouchsafed to them, can you trust them? There is your application of practical loyalty. You have to answer it now or sometime in the future just as sure as God is in his heaven and the sun still shines.

Leaders for Christ. Yes. Nobody questions that. That is what I meant awhile ago when I said I hope you will not be cruel enough to perpetuate that criticism. Christ is in this Zion, and the very culmination of it is based on Christian principles, and Zion would be useless and would not demand the best that is in me if I did not know that it was the establishment of the principles of Christ. "Thy kingdom come," he taught us to pray, when the time of the kingdom coming will mean the bringing of the will of God on earth as it is done in heaven, and the will of God is that there shall be a society based on equity, justice, equality, and spirituality.

"Preach Christ and him crucified." Has it ever occurred to you that perhaps that might have a new interpretation? If we preach Christ and him crucified it means that he has been taken from us, and he himself said, "Though I be taken unto my Father, I will send him who shall take my place and be your instructor and your comforter," in other words, the Spirit of God. Hence Christ, being not in our midst to lead us in person, has delegated the leadership to others, and loyalty to Christ will demand that we shall be loyal to the leaders that he has appointed. So when these leaders are trying to lead us toward Zion and we can realize that Christ is Zion and that Zion will be the social expression of Christ, then we have no place for disloyalty to Christly leaders. Zion is the perfection of Christianity in its social form, in social activity if you please, or in other words Christian society. This church is built on Christ, but since Christ is not present with a body, then he has put into operation the principle of revelation, the presence of prophecy, the presence of the prophetic office, the work of the Comforter, the prophets to lead the church, the Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants, and now Zion. And where are you, and where is your loyalty? To revolt against properly instituted leaders at the instigation of self-appointed or aspiring leaders is not independence, it is not safety, but it is just the opposite of both. Don't forget that.

Shall Zion be, and if so, how? Shall it be so far as we are concerned, and if so, when? Are we started? Has the small beginning we have made, because we have, on the establishment of stewardships taken us to our goal? Are we going to go on, or are we as a people going to let the forces of opposition and evil procrastinate still more and raise a smoke screen of incidentals and trivial questions to side track us from the constructive work of putting Zion into effect and demonstrating to the world the feasibility of our social philosophy?

Are you young people satisfied? Are you started toward Zion? Are you ready for stewardships? Zion the beautiful beckons us on. Are we going to respond to the call? Are we going to answer to the beckoning of Zion the beautiful in a way that shall enable us to say we are working for the establishment of the kingdom of God so that the will of Christ shall be done on earth, so that the will of God, bringing peace to humanity will be established, when each man can sit down within the confines of a perfect home and be happy with the conditions that surround because there is not that which shall injure in the land? Young people, and old people, are we ready to answer the beckoning of Zion the Beautiful?

The deeper seated and the more fundamental the instinct, the harder it is to remove. Habits based upon deep-seated instincts are the hardest to break. Smoking, for example, is based on the sucking impulse, and the man who smokes—just hasn't been weaned yet. The wise educator does not try to wear out undesirable tendencies; he tries to starve them to death through disuse.—Walter S. Athearn.

A Social Remedy

Under General Interest in to-day's HERALD we are publishing rather copious extracts from a report sent us by Bishop Charles Fry of the address of Lord Leverhulme of England.

In this address he splendidly points out the scientific and mechanical progress of the last hundred years and then asks, What has been the progress in human relations? The answer is, None. Yet he himself shows that they have made some progress or that he in his particular factory has tried to secure better relations.

A great deal is being written to-day on the subject of social reconstruction. The plans at present follow two ideals. On one hand are those who would have the group or society in larger or smaller units to be the actual legal owners, so that there is the first consecration, but after that all work is done as a legal trust. It follows, of course, that in such a plan there must be some individuals who directly administer the trust as a whole and who individually have control of the property. The success necessarily rests upon the devotion of these men.

Some students have gone so far as to urge that such a plan would be so successful that there would no longer be any need of labor having a share in industry, for hours of labor, remuneration, working conditions, would all be determined by the management and determined so that there would be no need.

Lord Leverhulme presents a different remedy which attempts to preserve personal initiative and private and personal independence. As a beginning they pay full union wages and work union hours. As a second step they have for some years now, we believe, had profit sharing with their employees. Though the past year was a poor one, still about $1,000,000 was thus divided. They have also had shop committees and shop management with labor having a share in the administration of the business and also a share in the profit, and labor is in touch fully with the details of the management of the shop.

But in order to lay the "specific ghosts" of unemployment, sickness, and death, they now have undertaken a further step that the company insures every workman who is not thrown out of employment by his own acts a minimum of fifty per cent of his weekly wage, that he will be insured in cases of sickness lasting more than one week up to four weeks, if he remains thus incapacitated for that period, with proper consideration if his illness lasts for a longer period. Also life insurance graded on a basis of efficiency. This is provided for by dividing each group into ten classes. There is no charge made against the employees, directly or indirectly. Each

Our Building in Palestine

By Harry Passman

Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints needed a home.

We arrived in Jaffa, Palestine, July 4, 1920, went to Jerusalem on the 5th, and were permitted to see the historical Floyd House known by name to nearly all members of the church. This place served as a home for many Latter Day Saint missionaries who preceded us to this far-off land. Conditions had changed in the Near East. The old Turkish mejede and mettelick that had such a wonderful purchasing power, and represented so little in American money, had made its departure with the Star and Crescent, and a new era had been ushered in.

The Floyd House, consisting of about eighteen rooms, previously rented by the church for $300, is now bringing $1,536 per year. We could not afford this great rise in rent so were compelled to content ourselves with a small apartment entirely inadequate for our needs. Our school met in a dark room without a window, and when about twenty to twenty-five people assembled the atmosphere became unbearable.

Another hindrance to our work was a Jewish family occupying the front rooms who made up their minds to prevent the progress of our work. If anyone walked up into the yard and inquired for our mission, they were told that we had moved or gone out of business. This family proved to be a perpetual pest and there was no way of rooting out the evil.

Still another hindrance was a wild dog owned by an English family which took great pleasure in standing near the window of our meeting room and barking as loud as he could. This barking would sometimes continue all night. Many of the neighbors shared in the discomfort. He was poisoned about five different times but seemed to survive and when one went out to attend his funeral he would be found as much alive as ever. A final dose was administered to him and he was buried with more than the customary honors conferred upon members of the canine family. He now lies beneath a beautiful olive tree in the Floyd House garden and the whole neighborhood now rests in peace.

We searched for a house, but all in vain. Rents were high; houses were few; demands were great. President F. M. Smith and Apostle T. W. Williams arrived in February, 1921, and were soon convinced that we must buy property if we intended to continue our work here.

The Search for Land

We went to see a piece of land about two acres in size, on a back street, in an out-of-the-way location, thinking we could purchase it cheap. The gentleman said he would sell it to us at a low figure because we were a Christian mission and he was strongly opposed to selling it to the Jews. When he announced the price of $80,000 we just about fainted. Further search revealed to us that he was not far out of the way as compared with the prices demanded by others.

We next ran on to a small cottage and small yard. We corresponded with the owner in Alexandria, Egypt, and he asked 3,000 pounds Egyptian ($12,000). We offered 1,000 pounds and dickered back and forth until we reached a deadlock at 2,500. Just at this time a riot occurred in Alexandria. Many people were killed and injured, and the gentleman decided to return to Jerusalem and dwell in this cottage. We just learned that a part of this land had been stolen from the Greek church. They are now trying to recover it by legal proceedings.

We searched for about one year. Sometimes five men would all claim to own one piece of ground and each would ask a different price for it. It seemed like an impossible task. We began to think that our Master did not want a building here.

The price of land on the principal streets is from two to eight pounds Egyptian ($4.55 equals one pound Egyptian) per square pic. (A square 29 inches on each side equals one pic.) On the back lanes within a mile circle of the Jaffa gate, they are about one pound per pic. A city lot 25 by 125 feet contains 535 pics and cost $2,434.25 at the present exchange.

A great difficulty here is that they object to dividing land. If the owner has 10,000 pics you must buy all. Secondly, people do not have abstracts, and in many instances four or five different families claim ownership to one piece of land, and if the truth were known, in many instances none of the families ever paid one cent for the land, as it was stolen many years ago.

The British Government recognizes an owner if he can produce a plan drawn by the city engineer and signed by neighbors bordering on the land, attesting that the party in question is the rightful owner. And it costs no small sum of backsheesh (tips) to obtain the necessary signatures. The land disputes are so numerous that it necessitated the establishment of a special land court.

Purchasing a Lot

After searching for about one year we finally met a man that wanted to sell 5,000 pics of land in a pretty fair location. It was mortgaged and he wanted to pay it off. He asked 45 piasters per pic. (100 piasters equal one pound Egyptian.) We bargained and at the end of four weeks we were able to come to a definite agreement. We purchased for 30 piasters per pic or $3,400 lower than the quoted price.

The owner of a piece of ground in this country will not invest five cents in preliminary expense. It falls on the purchaser. In the above instance we were compelled to lay about $150 out for stone posts to designate borders of land, pay the city engineer for a new plan, then attempt to secure signatures of the neighbors. If we had failed, the investment would have been lost. The usual trick of another Arab claiming ownership was not omitted, for his claims were presented to a judge and ruled out.

The owner could not locate his land; there were no definite markers so it was not easy to locate the boundaries. By and by approximate boundaries were established and stone posts erected. It proved later on that the gentleman had not properly located his boundaries so we had to shift the stone posts 25 feet to the east. This additional expense was deducted from purchase price.

Erecting the Building

In the United States if a gentleman hands you a card upon which is inscribed "Building Contractor" you can rest assured that the man understands his business. But in Palestine you can find fifty men that will undertake to erect a building and not one of them understands the first principle about building, so you cannot place any credence in what anyone tells you. You start by looking at several buildings that are well constructed, then inquire who the contractors are; then get in touch with these contractors, submit plans and specifications, procuring estimates on all masonry and iron work; then to a cabinet-maker for the wood work.

The estimates on building varied $1,000. We checked up on the low man, made an inspection of buildings erected by him, and then handed him the contract. We had some difficulty in teaching him that work must come up to American standards, that stones with large cavities must not enter into the building. We soon found out that instructing a man here is not sufficient, so we examined the stone frequently as it lay on the ground, and those with large holes we broke with a sledge hammer. In this way we were insured against bad stone entering the building.

The contractor is not desirous of building for another American. They are too particular. The average man lives in a hovel and doesn't care for smooth floors.

Stained floors do not worry him. Everything is mae leesh (good enough). If he slops paint on the walls and floor it makes no difference. If he lays floor tile with a two-inch margin to the wall it's all right. This is the Palestinian method of erecting buildings. To impress upon these different workmen that they must change their standards requires no small amount of persuasion and these gentlemen do not yield to discipline very readily.

Another malady with which these workmen are affected is a feverish desire for backsheesh. Their financial standing does not hinder them from begging. I personally know one workman who is worth $25,000 and he was one of the first to ask for backsheesh. Another instance is that of a mughtar (equal to an alderman) worth about $100,000 came begging for backsheesh. Practically the whole Near East are professional beggars. Of course the great majority of them are poverty stricken and do not know where the next meal will come from.

Building Construction

The building walls are two feet three inches thick, stone construction, each stone weighing about one hundred pounds. The total weight of building including all is about seven hundred thousand pounds or about three hundred fifty tons. Floors are made of cement tile laid upon iron I-beams with concrete in between. The stairs are made of stone and inserted into walls. All stone in the building, including stairs, are hand cut. The life of the building is estimated to be one thousand years. The building is fireproof, except doors, window frames, sashes, and beams supporting a tile roof.

The upstairs has two three-room apartments; downstairs three schoolrooms and a large assembly hall; basement one room. A large tank located in the roof is connected with the well, and water is raised by means of a hand pump. Faucets in the kitchens are connected with tank. These supply running water.

A loose stone wall three feet thick at the bottom and tapering down to two feet three inches at the top, five feet high, incloses the property. This will give an idea of the style of many of the fences used in Palestine and probably antedating Abraham's time.

This fence was erected by Mohammed, the old Arab, and Ahammed, his Bedouin helper shown in the picture; the former having had about forty-five years experience in loose stone fence building. He receives nine piasters per meter or about $15 per week. The little Bedouin about fourteen years of age receives sixty-nine cents per day. His working hours are from 6 a. m. to 5 p. m., one hour for noon lunch. He carries baskets of fill-in stone weighing about fifty pounds.

The cost of building, land, fence, barn, when complete will be about $15,000 and the land represents about $5,400 of this sum.

Great Things Ahead

In the eleventh chapter of Revelation we read of two witnesses scheduled to do great work in the land of Jerusalem. They are to prophesy twelve hundred sixty days. They have power to withhold the rains during this period, and smite the earth with plagues. Their dead bodies shall lie on the streets for three and one half days, etc. Who will receive these witnesses? Not the sectarian churches, because they do not believe in living prophets. The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints will receive them, and they will probably preach in this very building. They could preach to thousands from the platform in the rear, and all would be on our own ground. I firmly believe God guided us in our purchase and location, and it will redound to his honor and glory.

During the purchase of this piece of land things looked very gloomy. It seemed as if we would not be able to secure the land and in addition lose a good sum invested. We prayed earnestly to God to guide us. Sister Passman saw in her dream a trio. They were singing, "Guide me, O my Savior, guide me, till the storms of life are past. Safe into thy haven guide and receive my soul at last." She was impressed that we were passing through the storms of life, but would eventually enter into the haven safely.

We sincerely thank our heavenly Father for the encouragement and hope received upon this occasion.

Good Books and the Ministry

By Edward Rannie

How we can solve the social problem among ourselves.

The Lord in speaking to the church in 1831 said, "Study and become acquainted with all good books, and with languages, tongues and people." (Doctrine and Covenants 87: 5.) The writer has tried to honor that law and as long as I can see to read and have money to buy books and have access to public libraries that course will be continued.

At the late General Conference one of the First Presidency expressed in a public way the desire of his heart by stating that he hoped every one of the ministry would read at least one book on the social problems of the day. When I went home it occurred to me that it would be well to go to my book shelves and check up to see what I had done along that line to keep the Lord's command and it was somewhat of a surprise to find out that the number of books read bearing directly and indirectly on the subject was twenty-eight, enough to get a fair idea of what the best writers had written on the subject.

In reading those books, and some of them several times, there were two things that I learned which stood out the most prominent and of others it is not necessary to write in this paper.

First: They had searched the world for facts, but more especially the United States. In the hovel and mansion, among the poor and lowly, and from social workers in the city slums and from every place where information could be gleaned the writers had gone. There is enough information to startle thinking people, much of it shocking to sensitive minds and a revelation of the magnitude of the task that is before the world or the church, if the problem is ever solved.

Second: They offer no definite program or plan of a practical nature. The uplift of the people by education is the most that is offered and that has been going on at least since the dawning of the Reformation and the distance traveled during that time is very small when the time and amount of energy and money used is given consideration.

Where Shall We Go for Light?

The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple.—Psalms 19: 7.

Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path.—Psalms 119: 105.

It matters not how much man by his own research and study can find out and what his acquired wisdom may be, he cannot accomplish the Lord's purposes, and there is not anything in which man has tried his wisdom so much as in an effort to solve the great social question, best known to us as the building up of Zion. Many efforts have been made since the birth of our Savior by good men and especially in the last one hundred years, and while success has come in a few instances, in a partial way, none can be called a complete solution of the problem. In our own efforts as a church in solving the problem, so far we have failed, and have not done as well as some people in the world.

When the problem is finally solved we will have learned that the law of the Lord as found in the three standard books of the church has been our guide, and man's worldly wisdom has not been much help to us. It may take us a long time to learn that lesson, but it will be the more vividly be impressed on our minds when it finally does come.

Light to Interpret the Word

We cannot work together to accomplish the work of the Lord unless we have a common understanding of what the word means. We will be like the people were who tried to build the Tower of Babel when their language was confounded. It is necessary to have some power give us the same understanding of the things we read in the standard books of the church. We must come to a unity through our minds getting the same viewpoint by seeing things alike because light has come into our souls.

From where will the light come to understand the word of the Lord? Let us go to his word for help: "Howbeit when he, the spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will show you things to some."—John 16: 13.

Here was a body of men that had been with Jesus for more than three years, the best teacher the world ever had, a course of instruction that surpassed any college or university course as much as the light of the sun exceeds the light of a candle, and yet he tells them the Spirit of truth, the Holy Spirit will unfold to their minds all truth. What advantage have we over those men? They had Jesus for their teacher. Surely the written word with all its possible errors of translation nearly two thousand years after could not surpass the personal teaching of the Holy One, and much less can the words of those of men of the world, who if not part infidel are at least agnostic.

Paul in telling of the great things of God said:

But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the things of man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God.—1 Corinthians 2: 10, 11, 12.

Surely the great social problem, the Zionic problem, must be one of the "deep things of God," and the fact that there is no unity of understanding on the great question, is it not evidence that the Spirit of God is not directing us?

Again I say, hearken ye elders of my church whom I have appointed: ye are not sent forth to be taught, but to teach the children of men the things which I have put into your hands by the power of my Spirit; and ye are to be taught from on high. Sanctify yourselves and ye shall be endowed with power, that ye may give even as I have spoken.—Doctrine and Covenants 43: 4.

For a number of years that paragraph appeared to me to express a great deal of egotism, but with time for study and reflection a better view of its meaning dawned on my mind. When we are faithful students of God's word, and sanctify ourselves, by a holy and righteous life, the Holy Spirit will abide with us and be our teacher, our helper, and when we are in that condition we will get the right understanding of the word of God. We are being taught "from on high," and the wisdom of the world cannot equal the wisdom of God. So if we receive our light from God, the Holy Spirit being the medium between God and man, we cannot be taught by the world, for no greater light can man receive than that which is given him by our heavenly Father.

The School of the Prophets

God works in an orderly way, a systematic way, through human agencies to accomplish his work, and he has given us instructions how to prepare the ministry for their great work to bring to pass the Lord's great purposes.

As also through your administration the keys of the school of the prophets, which I have commanded to be organized, that thereby they may be perfected in their ministry for the salvation of Zion, and of the nations of Israel, and of the Gentiles, as many as will believe, that through your administration, they may receive the word, and through their administration, the word may go forth unto the ends of the earth, unto the Gentiles first, and then, behold, and lo, they shall turn unto the Jews; and then cometh the day when the arm of the Lord shall be revealed in power in convincing the nations, the heathen nations, the house of Joseph, of the gospel of their salvation.—Doctrine and Covenants 87: 3.

The language is very positive that the school of the prophets is for the perfecting of the ministry to bring about the salvation of Zion as a part of the great work they are called to do.

And again, the order of the house prepared for the presidency of the school of the prophets, established for their instruction in all things that are expedient for them, even all the officers of the church, or, in other words, those who are called to the ministry in the church, beginning at the high priests, even down to the deacons.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 39.

The purpose of the school is to prepare the ministry for their work. No fair-minded person is envious, or begrudges the opportunity that comes to our young people in Graceland College, because the opportunity that comes to them for religious instruction is time and money well spent. But while we are helping the young there are others whom we should not forget. There are many hundreds of the ministry of the church, both missionary and local, who have given their all to the church, talent, time, and money, and no opportunity comes to them for instruction, except in a meager way, for instruction in the great things of the kingdom of God. We cannot justly complain of lack of preparation, or of being nonprogressive among our ministry, until we have given them a chance in God's appointed way, and that is the school of the prophets.

Not only must we have the school, but the teaching must be of that nature that will give us a correct understanding of the word of God. We need to get the mind of Jesus Christ on the great things of his law. I mean by that we must be taught about those things which are so vital to our progress and not put them away for some more convenient season. We need to grapple right now with the great social problems. Putting them off only delays the work of the Lord that we are all anxious to see move forward.

It would be time and money well spent if the school could be organized and the ministry, missionary and local, as many of the latter as could spare the time, be called together, and remain in session

PASTORAL

On Procedure in Calls and Ordinations

Resolution adopted by joint council of First Presidency, Quorum of Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric, May, 1922, presented to General Conference, October, 1922, and action deferred to conference of 1923. Reprinted by request.

We recognize that God always manifests his will in an orderly way, and his Spirit operates in harmony therewith; therefore in the matter of calling men to the ministry the law as found in Doctrine and Covenants 125: 14 should be observed:

"Branches and districts are to be conducted according to the rules given in the law as directed in a former revelation: They shall take the things which have been given unto them as my law to the church to be my law to govern my church. And these affairs are not to be conducted by manifestations of the Spirit unless these directions and manifestations come through the regularly authorized officers of branch or district. If my people will respect the officers whom I have called and set in the church, I will respect these officers, and if they do not, they cannot expect the riches of gifts and the blessings of direction."

In harmony with the foregoing, manifestations for which inspiration is alleged, calling men to the ministry should come through the officers named therein. However, should any one other than the officials named presume to suggest the call of any to the ministry, the district or branch should not carry into effect this ordination until indorsement has been one or more months. Then if we come before the Lord daily in the spirit of humiliation and supplication, with our minds on the things of God and shut against the frivolous, trifling, foolish things of the pleasure-mad world, God would meet with us by his divine messenger, the Holy Spirit; and our teachers would teach us the things of God, not of their own wisdom, but by the Spirit of truth, that emanates from the Holy One.

Such a holy convocation would bring us near to God and in unity with each other and we would go as messengers of light to our own people and to the world and many hearts would be made glad, because they had learned of Jesus of Nazareth and of his simple, lowly and humble life as revealed in us, because we had learned of him, and the great social problem would find its solution among us. In addition to the good it would do us as a people it would be a revelation to the world of the love of God for his children.

In organized districts, no one shall be ordained to the office of elder without the voice of the district or General Conference be had ordering such ordination. Ordinations to the Aaronic priesthood need only the approval of the branch or district conference. In cases of emergency all ordinations in the interim between the conferences should be referred to the office of the First Presidency for disposition.

How to Change Forms of Organization in Local Departmental Work

By A. Max Carmichael

As the facts now are we find no local Department of Women's organizations under form one. The bulk of them are under form two. We find only local Sunday schools and Religios under form one. By form one we mean such conditions as where the local department is running entirely independent of the main church. Its officers are selected entirely by its own business meetings. It is dependent upon the main church only in that it probably uses the same building and gets its light and heat paid by the main church.

In order that such a local may change to any of the other forms of organization its constituents should have the desire to unite their work more closely with the other work of the main church. This desire is to be expressed by a vote of the local department itself in favor of whatever rules it wishes to adopt in order to secure this larger cooperation with the other activities of the main church. After the local has so voted its desire, its superintendent should immediately get in touch with the district superintendent of said department, notifying him of the motion or proposed change, and asking for his consent. His consent is necessary to the effecting of the change. Upon the receipt of his consent the change may be effected.

If, however, the said local wishes to go so far in the matter of cooperation as to permit its business to be done in the main business meeting of the branch with the branch presidency presiding, not only must the local department vote to do this, but the branch business meeting must also vote to concur. After both business meetings have agreed to the proposed change, then comes the procedure of obtaining the consent of the district superintendent of the department in question.

If the local department wishes to adopt such forms as is illustrated by forms two and three, the concurrence of the branch business meeting is not necessary. It is only when local departments wish to go as far as form four that the branch must also concur.

The local of any department may proceed as far as form four without any of the other of the local departments doing likewise. In other words the local Department of Women may go as far as form four in its organization without the Sunday school also doing so. Or vice versa the Sunday school may go to form four without the other departments doing so.

To go as far as form five all departments must be ready. Each must express its desire in its own local meeting, and the branch must concur. The consent of the district superintendents of all the departments and the general superintendents must be obtained. Of course, if the local is already operating under form four and therefore its business is being done in the main business meeting of the branch, the concurrence of the branch business meeting is sufficient to put that local department in favor of form five.

In other articles we have advised against any locals considering going into form five until within that local church all of the departments have been functioning successfully for some time under form four.

The procedure in going from form two to form three is given above in our first paragraphs. To go from any form to form four as has already been explained it is necessary for the local so to vote, the branch so to vote, and the consent of the district superintendent of said local to be obtained.

But progress does not lie in new forms of organization, but rather in the spirit of working together to achieve our common ends, and the securing and training of better teachers.

"Nothing can prevent mankind from sinking beneath the tremendous temptations due to modern wealth and power save the creation of a strong religious life which shall lead us to consecrate our control over nature to the process of bringing in the kingdom of God."—G. B. Smith, Social Idealism and the Changing Theology.

Nearly all civilized people now prohibit the employment of children under fourteen years of age. The only exceptions are a few of the United States which states, according to Miss Jane Abbott, chief of the Children's Bureau, rank with Japan, China, and India. Only thirteen states meet in all particulars the standards of the Federal law which was declared unconstitutional by a recent supreme court decision. For this reason an effort is being made to secure an amendment to the Federal Constitution.

A Social Remedy

Laying the three ghosts of unemployment, sickness, and death.

Through the kindness of Bishop Charles Fry we have received a pamphlet on copartnership, "The laying of the three ghosts of unemployment, sickness, and death," an address by Lord Leverhulme. We believe a resume should be of interest to our readers as showing what others are actually doing and trying to do. The social question is one of the great questions before the world to-day.

Lord Leverhulme states that this completes fifty years of his service and that he is still working to the same end, to better human conditions. It would appear that the Lever brothers have for some time taken their employees as copartners to share in the profits of the business. The employees are all paid the union wage and work the union hours. In addition thereto as copartners they share in the profit, although as he says they have not been very great of late. But we note the statement made by the chairman of the management committee that last year the copartnership dividends amounted to 208,000 pounds—over $1,000,000.

Lord Leverhulme had presented his plans to the management, to the working committee, as well as the board of directors, and was now presenting it to all of the copartners in a meeting in the auditorium in Port Sunlight. By way of introduction he reviewed the history of the last hundred years and also discussed the general principles involved:

"The views that I take upon comradeship in business are these—that in the center of each business is the consumer, the person who buys our goods. We were paupers seeking charity if we expected them to buy our goods unless they were equal value to the goods of anyone overseas or at home, north, south, east, or west, wherever they can bring competing goods from. We from the beginning were out to concentrate ourselves on service to the public, in endeavoring by efficiency to produce the best value possible during the history of the firm. Now that is the basic idea, and as copartners we decided that we will do it on the basis when, if there are profits resulting—but profits are very elusive these times—they shall be shared in by all copartners on a just basis and value as agreed upon and explained to all.

That is the basis of the organization. I feel that perhaps I might give a little of the past history of the hundred years since copartnership was introduced by Robert Owen. True, Robert Owen was born about a century and a half ago, but he was in the height of his struggles with copartnership schemes exactly one hundred years ago in 1822. He lived thirty-three years longer, and a great deal of disappointment he had to face. What was the condition when Robert Owen introduced copartnership in the face of the greatest opposition? He was considered a madman; he was considered to be running his business on unsound principles. I will tell you what the conditions were. There were no railways, telegraph, telephone; there were no airplanes; there were no submarines; there were no gramophones; there were on cinemas. The change that has taken place as the result of the researches of science in the physical world during the last century is greater than in any period during the previous world's history.

Giant Strides of a Century

There were no steamships; it is true that steamships had been produced which ran a few miles on inland waters.

Every experienced shipowner in the then known world looked upon them as a phantasy—a something that was a toy. It took travelers nearly a week to go by road from London to Edinburgh. I remember well my father telling me of his summer holidays. There was no Blackpool, no Southport, no Morecambe, no Lytham; my father, with his brothers and sisters and his parents, came in some sort of conveyance from Bolton to Wigan, starting very early in the morning. At Wigan they got on one of the canal boats of the Leeds and Liverpool canal and came to Liverpool—the nearest watering place. Where now stands the Lever Building, on the beach under the foundations, my father went and bathed out of a bathing machine just about a century ago—that is, in 1819. He has often told me of it, and curiously enough, I came across an old print of Liverpool of about that period which confirms what his recollections were of it. Birkenhead did not exist. There were a few cottages across the water, that is all. Just think for a moment of the change that has taken place in the physical world. Can we say that we have kept abreast in the world of humanity? Have we made advances from the days when Robert Owen introduced his co-partnership scheme?

“Science has made advances on Robert Fulton’s first steamship, for we have the Mauretania and the Olympic, and others, but in regard to schemes for humanity, I say, ‘No!’

Increasing Efficiency; Better Service

“I say that in the world of science we have progressed. Science does not wait for men to catch up. Science marches on. Men may catch up, or not, as they think fit, but science goes on. But the world of men has not advanced equally with science along the line of humanity in business. Village industries, hand loom weaving was the rule a century ago. I remember in my boyhood days people who lived by hand loom weaving in Lancashire.

“Modern industries to-day are carried on in huge factories, ever increasing in efficiency and better service to the public, because, remember, that is the basis of all industrial developments—better service for the public. My grandfather on my mother’s side was the manager of a cotton mill at Manchester, which my mother often pointed out to me—narrow, small, tiny, looking like an outbuilding of a modern Lancashire mill. My grandfather on my father’s side was a counterpane manufacturer in Bolton. I suppose the premises would be very small. I have never seen them; they have probably disappeared.

“Look at the advance we have made in manufacturing and employment since then. We have advanced somewhat on the lines of material comfort of the workmen. You have only got to read the report of the commission that visited Lancashire, and especially my native town of Olton, to find the miserable, inhuman conditions in which people lived a century ago. Little children of six years of age were turned out of their beds at five o’clock in the morning to go to their work. Their feeble legs were unable to stand the weight of their bodies for ten hours a day, and when I was a lad most of the people in my native town were either bow-legged or knock-kneed as a result of their feeble legs having to carry the weight of their tiny bodies for a long working day of ten hours.

“We have improved on that. The weekly wage then was some nine shillings a week. The same commission reported that they only found one blanket on the average, not amongst four people, but among four families. The remainder had sacks and anything they could get to cover them. We have advanced on that; there is no doubt about it. We are living in better houses, living under better conditions, and with greater comfort, but in the line of relationship between each other we have not advanced much. We are just standing where Robert Owen left us a century ago. We have made little or no progress.

The Mighty Atom

“Now science is advancing every moment, and we are told to-day that we are on the eve of enormous discoveries with regard to the radio-active atom. We are told by scientists that when we unlock the power in the radio-active atom we shall be able to get out of one pound of the radio-active atom as much as to-day we get out of 150 tons of coal. Just think what that means. Some of you may have seen packed here at Port Sunlight 30,000 tons of coal kept in reserve in case of emergency, bulked up like little hills and mountains. When this discovery of the radio-active atom is made, a strong man at Port Sunlight will be able to put a case weighing 200 pounds of radio-active matter on his shoulders and carry away what is represented to-day by the 30,000 tons of coal. Or you could put it in a motor, in the directors’ car, and run it off to some other works somewhere else.

“Professor Soddy, of the University of Oxford, has said that he hopes the discovery of the secret that will unlock this power will never be made until we thoroughly understand what we are doing. Think what it means as compared with the explosives we have to-day, because not only would one pound of radio-activity, something I could hold in my hand quite easily, be equivalent to 150 tons of coal, but, in another form, it would be equivalent to 150 tons of dynamite. With that 150 tons of dynamite we could blow Liverpool and Birkenhead to dust and ashes. With dynamite to-day we could take and blast rock, and so get stone with which the cheaper to build the better homes for the people. We could take the dynamite and we could use it down the coal mines and win the coal cheaper to keep the home fires burning.”

Science Both Good and Evil

“We can do all that, and yet the same dynamite (not radio-activity, which is so many times more powerful, but dynamite put into shells could be dropped from the air and explode and destroy the homes that could be built out of the stones won by the dynamite. In other words, science gives you a means for good and for evil in a supreme degree. Remember this great fact, that from the battle of Agincourt, when the British archers were the defense of England, until you come to the Franco-Prussian war of 1870, there was no arm placed at the disposal of man to destroy his fellow superior to the bow and arrow of Agincourt and Cressy.

“It is true there were rifles, flintlocks, all sorts of arrangements, but the archer at the time of the battle of Agincourt or Cressy could shoot more arrows—make a bigger barrage, I think they call it, with arrows against the enemy than those guns and muskets could produce that were used at the battle of Waterloo. But the army stuck to the guns, and abandoned the bow and arrow. Now we are not in that position at the present time. Weapons of destruction have advanced to such a degree that, as Professor Soddy says, before the next advance is made, we must clearly understand the subject we are handling—we will have the power in our hands to hurl towns to destruction, and that is too much. So much for the physical world. I could enlarge upon it much more. I could say all that has been achieved in many other directions, but I have just given you the fringe of it as an illustration.

“Now, what about the human element? I am as certain, ladies and gentlemen and copartners, as that I am here to-night, that whatever power there may be in radio-active atoms, there is infinitely more power in the human breast of every human man and woman here to-night. We have never solved that power. We have to solve the power of the atom. Let us hope that before we solve the power of the atom we will have solved the mysteries of the power contained in every human breast. That is our duty. We have got science, and, as I said before, science does not wait for any of us.

"Science marches forward. We human elements have lagged behind. We have never adapted the human element in business to produce the best results. We are still with the flintlock, the musket, and the bow and arrow of commerce, as far as the human element is concerned. We have not acted up to that science. We are still practically just in the days of Noah. There have been no advances in the relationships between men from the time of Noah, followed by the Tower of Babel, as you know—the men who had ideas of unity, which were scattered. There has been no advance in any direction in the matter of the human element, say, even in shipbuilding.

"Noah knew, perhaps, as much about shipbuilding as any man did a century ago, and he builds a ship as big as the Mauretania, if we may accept the statement on the authority upon which it is given. Noah also knew all about catering, because he had them all in the Ark, and he kept them and fed them there for forty days and forty nights. I say that from the days of Noah to 1822, which is a century ago, the world neither physically nor materially had made much advance, but since then in the last hundred years we did make advance, and it is a question of an advance in the physical sciences, but little or none in the laws of humanity.

"Now, upon these lines, as I ventured to say at the beginning, I have not changed; I have been working on them for the last fifty years. The problem is complex, and it is so easy for anyone to make an economic mistake which might bring their business down to disaster. You remember disaster overtook Robert Owen, but it was not the fault of copartnership."

Copartnership: A Sheet Anchor

"You have to be so very careful. Believe me, if we, as copartners, fail in business, copartnership will suffer in consequence, although copartnership might be entirely free from any responsibility in connection therewith. But I say this. The last two years of strain and stress that we have gone through in business have proved that copartnership is a sheet anchor in such a time, and that it is adversity that draws human hearts together, and not prosperity. We all knew it. You find your friends when you are in adversity; you do not know your friends when you are in prosperity. Copartnership has come through the ordeal, and proved that it stands adversity. We may have greater adversity still in the future, but I am equally certain if we have, that the copartnership principle will come out triumphant and with flying colors."

He continues with Emerson that "What we think, we are." That fortunes are not exceptions, but fruits; that relations and connections are not somewhere and sometimes, but everywhere and always; no exception, no anomaly, but method and an even web; and what comes out, that was put in. As we are, so we do; we are the builders of our fortunes; cant and lying and the attempt to secure a good which does not belong to us, are once for all balked and vain.

Then that the plan is the result of consultation of the work of the manager and service department, insurance department, and the lawyers in an effort to give to every man a fair opportunity. He then repeats that the basis of their wage scheme is the union wage with us on hours, the fully agreed trade union rate. The further plan is to reward and encourage intelligence and efficient service. There will therefore be a grading of employees, that grading to be done in a fair, impartial manner. Men will be graded up for good work or graded down for insufficient or careless work. If any man feels he has not been properly graded he has an appeal to an advisory tribunal from the workers' representative committee. The foremen or divisional managers would make their appeal to the chairman of the Port Sunlight management committee. There is provided in emergency another further appeal to the chairman of Lever Brothers Limited, but as a rule the decision of the work control board will be final.

"All women employees, whether they are copartners or not receive free railway transportation to and from work: All workers will be graded and given insurance of from 100 pounds to 1,000 pounds, the gradations varying by 100 pounds. Foremen will be given insurance of from 200 to 2,000 pounds, managers and directors from 400 to 4,000 pounds. No contributions of any kind are expected from the copartners or employees. The plan is a complement in addition to copartnership without any money deduction or contribution.

"During absence from employment from any cause such as slackness of trade to which the copartner has not contributed, the company will pay sufficient that with the set allowance it will equal an amount equal to one half the standard weekly wage.

"In the event of sickness for seven consecutive days the copartner will receive the same weekly payment for four weeks. At the end of four weeks it can be considered whether or not the benefit shall be continued.

"Third, each copartner will receive a policy of life insurance with one year's premium paid. The company intends to pay the successive annual premium on each policy and may increase the amount and issue additional policies as they may determine.

"Where the assured with the consent of the company retires, the company will make every effort to arrange to continue to pay the premium.

"In case of total incapacity because of illness or other like cause the company will endeavor to have the insurance company pay the same amount as for a death claim, the first face of the policy.

"Finally, in case of the employment ceasing for any reason the company will make every effort to arrange so the assured may continue his insurance, paying the ordinary table rates without medical examination.

"This is presented as a further effort to advance humanism to compare in some measure with the advancement in science. It is in the words of an American that he closes his address:

"A little more kindness,
A little less creed,
A little more giving,
A little less greed,
A little more smile,
A little less frown,
A little less kicking
A man when he's down,
A little more "we,"
A little less "I,"
A little more laugh,
A little less cry,
A little more flowers,
On the pathway of life,
And fewer on graves,
At the end of the strife."

THE SEMINAR

The Hand

By Alice M. Burgess

"Children should be taught to honor their hands and use them efficiently."

The dignity and importance of this subject may be suggested by the following quotation from Professor Angelo Mosso:

"The more mobile the extremities of an animal are, the more intelligent it is. Among the birds, the parrot is the more intelligent because it makes more use than do other birds of its legs, beak, and tongue. The elephant is more intelligent than all other wild animals because he makes use not only of his legs, but also of his snout, as organs of movement.

"The cephalopods, which have eight arms, formed of muscle substance, and provided with suckers, stand among the mollusks, nearest to the vertebrates, on account of their strength and power of movement. It was movement, probably, that developed their brain ganglia, for these are larger in the cephalopods than in other mollusks. As they possess good memory and a high intelligence, so also they exhibit more intense emotions, as may be seen from the great facility with which the color of their skin changes."

And again:

"During the first epoch of the Renaissance, the greatest artists of Florence were all apprentices in the workshops of the goldsmith; Luca della Robbia, Lorenzo, Ghiberti, Filippo Brunelleschi, Francia, Domenico, Giirland, Oho, Sandro Botticelli, Andrea del Sarto—to mention only a few examples—performed, during their apprenticeship, the simplest labors in the workshop of a goldsmith. But the exercise with which they gained their manual dexterity surely influenced also the development of their genius.

"A fact that cannot be doubted is the many-sidedness of genius, which some Italians of the Renaissance possessed and which has never again appeared in like copiousness.

"Giotto was painter, sculptor, and architect. Leonardo da Vinci was a celebrated musician, a great painter, an architect, a man of letters and of science. Andrea del Verrocchio was goldsmith, sculptor, engraver, architect, painter, and musician. These facts are to be read in many histories of art. An incomparable example, however, is Michaelangelo. For twelve years he studied anatomy on the Cadaver, and afterwards painted the Sistine Chapel, and executed the tombs of the Medici and the dome of Saint Peter.

"These men, who are the greatest representatives of our race, have carried the dexterity of their hands to the highest degree of perfection. They were simple workers who, laboring untiringly with their hands, lifted the human mind to the highest ideals of beauty."

Hands of Mentally Deficient

It is of interest to note in this connection the character of the hand among the mentally deficient. Vaschide, in his "Essai sur la Psychologie de la Main," says that among degenerates all kinds of deformities are especially frequent; supernumerary fingers, lack of fingers, abnormally shaped fingers of all kinds, large or small, swollen or bent, very long or very short. Sometimes the hands are wholly or partially webbed and the nails may be very short or even lacking in some fingers, or they may be claw-like.

Indeed it is generally stated by students of psychiatry that among idiots, imbeciles, epileptics, degenerates, etc., hand movements are poorly controlled, and often the hand shows functional and structural powers and characteristics little higher—or even lower—than the ape or the monkey manus exhibit.

The power of pronation and supination is very limited in idiots. Coutton found this power entirely lacking in many idiots and cretins and Féré states that epileptics can rotate the forearm through an arc of 45 degrees only. As to grasp and opposition also, a large number of feeble-minded are only able to bring thumb and finger points together in pincer-like form.

In the dynamometer tests, abnormal children are found to have less strength of grip than normal children. Dawson reports that juvenile delinquents have a mean strength of grip slightly less than normal, and 56 per cent of them are inferior to the normal by 1.32 to 11.82 kilograms. Smedley at Chicago, found that the boys in the schools for incorrigibles and truants were at every age from 9 to 17 less strong with either hand than normal boys and that this discrepancy increases with age.

Barr says that hand grasp and mental grasp go hand in hand, and that a test of the grip is more serviceable than a test of language to diagnose mental status. Those in the Skillman Institute who are rated as morons surpass imbeciles by 11.6 kilograms with the right hand and 12.2 kilograms with the left, while there is a general increase of grip with the increase in rated mental ages. (Binet Simon tests.) Wallin shows clearly that the high grade epileptic patients are the stronger in grip.

The lateral movement of fingers is generally lacking or defective among the mentally deficient. This movement is of course regulated mainly by the depth between the fingers and often an interdigital web, binding the fingers together, is found among imbeciles. Often too, disassociated finger movements of no sort can be made by idiots and imbeciles. Féré says that the power of flexion of the fingers is always more forcible than extension and that this is marked among imbeciles.

Expressive of the Psyche

It is hard to believe, however, that the characteristic features of the hand are not in a certain measure expressive of the psyche. With Macdougall most people are accustomed to taking for granted the significance of certain types of hand. The shapely hands with fine skin and tapering fingers are associated with the artistic nature, while the broad hand with firmly knit palm and short fingers would undoubtedly belong to a man of affairs. On the other hand, the large knuckled hand with fingers set well apart, and spatuloid tipped indicates manual inventiveness and a philosophical bent. Indeed, the individuality of the hand is no less characteristic than the individuality of the face, and like the latter possesses the power to preserve from generation to generation the traits which constitute family likenesses.

Raif says that educated people have greater mobility of fingers than the uneducated, though he gives no data. That civilized races are distinctly superior to lower races in hand and arm strength was discovered by Peron, in the early part of the nineteenth century. He experimented by dynamometer with Malays and the natives of New Holland; and others have since confirmed his results.

Monsieur Féré says that among individuals of the same race the more intelligent have the greater strength of hand and arm. He asserts that the same dynamometer tests taken upon different classes of society show that workingmen of exclusively manual profession are capable of a less vigorous grip than persons whose work requires more intelligence, and less muscular force, and that individuals of the liberal professions excel both the former.

Among the experimental studies of motor ability in children, we find indications of a positive correlation between hand and intellectual ability.

Relation of Grip Power to Class Standing

In Chicago, Smedley's studies showed the existence of a positive correlation between strength of a grip and class standing by using three methods:

1. By the distribution of twelve-year-old pupils by grades;
2. By comparing the grip of those above grade with the grip of those below grade at each age;
3. By computing the average number of school grades that had been made by various percentile groups (i. e., according to strength) after sex, and age had been eliminated.

Schuyten found by estimating intelligence by school grade in relation to age, that the most intelligent were the strongest in hand grip.

Ada Carmen measured the grip of 1,507 boys and girls from 10 to 19 years old and her results show that "brightest" children exceeded "dull" children by an average of 3 kilograms with the right hand and one kilogram with the left.

The tapping tests of Gilbert, Smedley, Kirkpatrick, Bolton, Abelson, and Burt, show a positive correlation between rapidity of tapping and mental ability and social status. Gilbert found a very marked positive superiority of bright children in general but this did not appear at the ages of 16 and 17. Binet and Vaschide report a positive correlation with twelve-year-old pupils. Bagely alone seems to have formed an inverse relation between mental ability and rapidity of tapping.

Burke found in a study made upon 200 children of "rapid," "slow," and "normal" progress, according to the teachers' estimates, that 5,490 of the "rapid," 3,990 of the "normal," 2,290 of the "slow" were strikingly careful in writing and drawing exercises, while only eleven per cent of the "rapid," 34 per cent of the "normal," and 59 per cent of the "slow" were strikingly careless and inaccurate.

There is much to be said against the validity of such correlations as these, especially because of the lack of adequate means of determining mental ability, yet the studies are very suggestive.

Development of Hand Control in Children

The spontaneous, apparently purposeless, rhythmical flexion and extension of the fingers and paddling movements of the arms, occur from the first day of life. Doctor Mumford compares them to paddling movements of fishes and suggests that they are survival movements of aquatic or amphibian life. They are undoubtedly fundamental and are the necessary precursors of voluntary movement. Burke, calling them the flotsam and jetsam of spinal activity uncontrolled as yet by higher centers, concludes that they are the ultimate units. Tuke's Dictionary of Psychological Medicine tells us that the absence of these primitive movements in a well-nourished infant is a marked sign of insanity.

The studies of individual infants mention these movements. Mrs. Moore states that during the first hour the arms were waved about towards the head and face. Miss Shinn writes: "From the first hour the arms moved quite freely, say three or four inches, and on the fourth day the nurse trying to trace the baby's hand on paper found that even in sleep she would not let it be held still, and kept the fingers sprawled."

Major reports that this bending, stretching, and waving of arms without apparent cause was most marked when the infant was lying comfortably in the crib and he also notes particularly while R was nursing on the seventh day, the stiff convulsive arm movements and the curious closing of one hand tightly while the fingers of the other spread far apart. During the first week, he noticed J's quick contraction of arm muscles, drawing hands toward face or chest, and the slow relaxation when he was crying with hunger.

These elementary, uncontrolled beginnings of movement are named by Preyer impulsive movements, but Bain, Major, Mrs. Moore, and Miss Shinn, prefer to call them "spontaneous or automatic." According to Preyer, these movements arise independently of any external stimulus; the exciting cause is within the organism and originates exclusively in the nutritive or other organic processes which go on in the motor centers of lowest rank. Again he explains more fully that the cause of these movements is given in the "organic constitution of the motor ganglyonic cells of the spinal marrow, and connected in early embryonic stages with the differentiation and the growth of those structures and of the muscular system." "With the formation of the motor ganglyonic cell," he continues, "in the spinal marrow, and cervical marrow, a certain quantity of potential energy must accumulate which, by means of the flow of blood or of lymph or possibly through the rapidly advancing formation of tissue, is with remarkable ease transformed into energy."

From the first day of life the infant hand is capable of the reflex finger grasp. Garry C. Myers writes:

"The child is born with an automatic grasping mechanism which goes off when the proper place is stimulated. The trigger part of this mechanism at birth is most sensitive at the central palm. However, a stimulation of any part of the inner surface of the fingers may create grasping movements."

Major reports that J four hours after birth firmly grasped a finger placed in the palm of the hand. The phenomenal strength of this early finger grasp in some babies was demonstrated by Doctor Robinson's well-known experiments on sixty newborn infants, many of whom were able to sustain their weight by grasping a bar. This surprising strength has often been referred to as atavistic, and indicative of the arboreal life of man's ancestors.

Clutching Power of a Monkey

Wallace records an incident, interesting, in relation to this, of an infant monkey which secured so strong a clutch upon his beard that he was unable to free himself without help.

Voluntary reaching and grasping does not develop for some time after birth, varying in different infants observed, from the eleventh week to the eighteenth. This first voluntary grasping is usually accomplished by a simultaneous reaching of both arms.

"Early grasping may be generally described as two-handed, like a squirrel's; even when one hand did the actual grasping, it was after both hands had fumbled for the object and whichever touched it first had preference."

"During the first few months, objects were carried to the mouth in a peculiar way, the right hand being used for carrying the object, while the left by making corresponding motions, was used to balance and direct the right hand. Even when putting the thumb to his mouth he used the left hand in this way, and finally held the left hand under the right one, while sucking the right thumb. If the left hand was confined so that he could not use it in this way it was noticeably harder for him to put the right hand to his mouth; while it always annoyed him, causing him to cry."

Mrs. Moore, Mrs. Hall, and Miss Shinn first noticed the use of one hand independently weeks later than the first voluntary grasping; Mrs. Moore in the thirty-seventh week, Miss Shinn in the twenty-first week, and Mrs. Hall as near as I could determine from her notes about the forty-first week.

Meyers, however, notes this development contemporaneous with the development of voluntary grasping.

In spite of the fact that correct opposition of the thumb is often observed weeks before the first deliberate successful seizing, the crude manipulation of the hand of early grasping often persists into late infancy. The baby reaches out with a downward sweep of the hand and seizes the object with the fingers pressed against the palm of the hand and the thumb inactive. This method is comparable to the downward sweep of the monkey arm, as it pushes aside the branches in its path.

Major observed that in R's thirty-ninth month, this "simian" method was still employed for picking up bowls, cups, and similar objects, but saucers and plates were grasped by placing the fingers under the edge as adults do.

Gesell writes, "Anyone who will watch carefully the manipulation of a three-year-old child will find that the power of independent flexion and extension of digits is still considerably undeveloped, and that the tendency to use the fingers together in a single hook-like form, still persists." He also states that the invalid in extreme weakness reverts to this racially old method of prehension and grasp with all fingers moving parallel and facing the palm.

According to Moore, Hall, Shinn, and Preyer, prolonged holding of things took place before the first appearance of voluntary grasping, but Meyer's child gave a somewhat different result.

"As with all his activities, so with grasping, attention toward the movement intensified it, and attention away from the movement weakened it. Therefore, the wide variety of new sensations he received on beginning to grasp objects meant that he tended to drop an object soon after grasping it. Forty-five days after his first voluntary grasp he held his rubber dog as he looked at it, for the comparatively long period of one and one half minutes. After about twenty-five more days he seemed to be able to hold a toy as long as he wished."

Meyers also records the interesting observation that "several times when ill, or when his feelings were hurt, he would seem to get comfort from seizing a choice object. During a night of teething he was given his rubber ball and he held to it for half an hour before falling to sleep and for ten or fifteen minutes afterward."

Development Proceeds to Finger Touch

When voluntary grasping is once well established the baby enters upon a long period of handling things during which this reaching, seizing, holding, and handling becomes the all-absorbing interest. At this time the child seems to be enchanted with his discovery of the age-old, fascinating sense of touch, and to be determined to improve all opportunity for greater acquaintance with it. Everything must be touched with hand and mouth alternately although toward the end of this period finger touch and manipulation seem to predominate.

According to Shinn's and Meyer's observations, this period seems to begin during the fifth month and is only brought to an end by the child's advancing interest in locomotion. Miss Shinn thinks this an epoch of tremendous importance. "In a few days he had become a different baby with a new world of interests, and a wonderfully more varied and vivid life."

And again:

"Through the sixth month the baby was eager to get at and touch everything; when carried about the room she put out her hands continually, wishing to touch, pull, and carry to her mouth every object. As she sat in our laps she was busy reaching in every direction for something to get hold of.

If nothing presented itself, in reach to seize, she would lean this way and that, as if seeking something."

Meyers observes this development as follows:

"As late as the 152d day, my notes state that while he was eager to drum over new objects, fixed surfaces, etc., and while he would bend forward in one's arms to thus touch objects it was a hasty rubbing, drumming, grasping touch.

"By the 225th day, there was an inordinate desire to touch things, expressed in squirms, twists, wriggles, and jumps of the trunk. Although the rubbing of the hand over objects was still heavy and hasty, by this time he would always spread his fingers wide apart, with thumb far from fingers, while feeling over flat surfaces. This continued for at least a month. Not until the end of the eighth month did gentle, careful touching appear."

It is during this period of the great supremacy of touch that the forefinger is differentiated, and becomes the prime investigator of all cracks, crannies, and interesting depressions; also, at this time, the forefinger is first used for pointing. Mrs. Moore notices this differentiation first in the thirty-fourth week, while Miss Shinn records its first appearance in the fortieth week.

The first appearance of reaching, shoving, or striking things with other things, seems to me to be of utmost importance in the development of manipulative powers, since it undoubtedly means the very beginning of the use of tools. This activity, however, has been much neglected by observers of children.

Myers and Mrs. Moore, only, notice its first appearance: Myers in the twenty-eighth week; Mrs. Moore in the thirty-sixth week.

Pronation and supination are also mentioned very little by these studies of early infancy. Dearborn observes the partial voluntary supination, accomplished with much apparent difficulty on the 153d day. Meyers reports that on the 125th day the baby completely turned the wrist to grasp a toy held near the mouth and that after that a regular turning of the wrist tended to develop in grasping and holding objects near the mouth.

An analysis of the observations of seven different authors shows the following variations: First prolonged holding of things, five report the sixth to the twentieth week as the first instance. Second, opposition of the thumb, five report that this was observed from the ninth to the twelfth week. First voluntary grasping, seven report observing this but they differ between from the 11th to the 18th week. Using the hands independently, three report between the 14th and the 41st week. Pronation and supination, three note this between the 18th and the 31st week. Reaching or shoving and striking things with other things, two observe this, one in the 28th week, the other in the 36th week. In differentiation of the forefinger, five noted between the 32d and 40th week.

Sequence of Development of Functions

It will be noted that their occasion of the first appearance differs quite widely according to the observers of different individuals. But there seems to be apparent a sequence of development of functions.

Ball throwing and rolling always interest the baby; to see the motion set on foot by himself extending as far beyond his reach. But this accomplishment is not achieved without difficulty, for though the elements of this movement are involved in the two ordinary activities of (1) shaking things and (2) dropping things, and the infant soon learns to delight in either of these two movements alone; the execution of the shoving movement at the instant the hand drops the object demands a coordination too nice for the unskilled baby hand.

Mrs. Hall records her child's experience as follows:

"The ball was rolled to him, he picked it up, then leaning far forward placed it upon the floor but could not push it away. His hand was repeatedly given an impulse which sent the ball forward, but even then he was unable to roll it alone. The ball was thrown to him and he tried to return it, but after raising his arm and reaching the hand forward he could not propel the ball. . . .

"After playing fifteen or twenty minutes, he raised the arm as if to throw the ball, then opened the hand and let it drop out but was unable to give it a forward impulse. (390th day.) The game was played daily and each time at the beginning of the play he experienced the old difficulty; but each day he succeeded after fewer trials than were necessary on the previous occasion, and finally learned to throw the ball in an awkward way. By the fifty-eighth week, he had become able to throw it in the general direction of the effort, and by the sixtieth week was able to throw it with ease and with considerable accuracy."

Major's observation of R's learning to throw a ball, begins in the first week of the second year, when the child took much delight in sitting on the floor and tossing the ball in any direction. R's method of throwing was overhand until the thirtieth month when he began to throw sideways or underhand.

When the Child Uses a Spoon

A baby's first unskillful efforts to feed himself present a very familiar example of the lack of coordination and control of hand movement in these early years. The fork proves a much more efficient tool than the spoon if the food particles are solid. Major writes that R could pick up strawberries with a fork three months before he had the skill to pick them up and carry them to the mouth with a spoon.

Also he comments upon the use of the spoon as follows:

"It will be sufficient to refer to a few of the adjustments which must be made before the child can use the spoon skillfully. How delicate these adjustments and muscular coordination must be can be made clear by reference to two defects of the beginners' struggles. In the first place, the handle of the spoon is grasped awkwardly. Palm down, the hand seizes the spoon handle as if it were a cheese knife or a meat ax, a good position for striking or jabbing but not for dipping. In the second place, the handle of the spoon is not raised high enough and the bowl of the spoon strikes the mouth in an almost vertical plane, preventing the spoon's entrance to the mouth and allowing the food to fall out.

"These two obvious defects of the child's first ventures with the spoon will serve to illustrate the nature of some of the defects which must be overcome in practice by a process of trial and success. This period of preliminary practice in the case of R extended over a period of more than five months. That is, it was not until his twentieth month that the child had acquired sufficient control over the unruly spoon to get a fair share of the food which was allotted to him into his mouth and not on his bib, chair, and the surrounding territory."

At the end of his third year R had learned to use a spoon and fork, throw a ball, turn a knob to open a door, turn leaves in books and magazines, screw on the top of a paste bottle, use a pair of scissors (although he could not cut out pictures—could not control paper and scissors at the same time, pull on his own shoes, open a penknife, wind a small clock, open a drawer, wash his own hands, put a door key in a keyhole and lock and unlock doors, and to push the button of an electric doorbell.

From the third year until the fifth I have been unable to find any study of children's hand movements.

Hancock, at Clark University, in 1894, investigated the motor ability of children of from five to seven years old and obtained some interesting results concerning hand development at that age. He submitted to the body of teachers assisting him two series of simple tests which were designed to discover the complexity of motor coordination of which the children were capable.

One test read as follows:

"Rest your forearm on the table, the hands in an easy position, with the forefingers curved, and the lower parts of the palms and the tips of the fingers touching the surface of the table. Begin tapping, letting the movements proceed rapidly from the little finger to the thumbs. Ask him to imitate you. Notice the movements he actually makes; are they with the hand and arm moving together from the elbow; the whole hand moving from the wrist; all the fingers moving in unison from the knuckles; or with the index finger alternating with the other three? Reverse the tapping, beginning with the thumbs. Can he imitate you any better? Just what does he do?"

Tapping Tests

One hundred and sixty-two children were tested on this with the following results:

None succeeded in reversing the movement.

Five succeeded in somewhat slowly tapping with both hands.

Four were successful with the right hand only.

Three were successful with the left hand only.

Fifty tapped with the whole hand, using wrist motion.

Nine tapped with the whole hand, using elbow motion.

Five tapped with the whole hand, with both a wrist and an elbow motion.

Forty-nine alternated with the index finger and the other three fingers.

Seven did this with one hand only, while the other hand moved all fingers from the knuckles.

Twenty-five gave irregular movements, indefinite and uncertain, in many instances approaching success.

Twelve moved all fingers together from the knuckles.

Sixty children were tested with a pattern found in kindergarten guides consisting of four interlaced slats.

Skill in Lacing Slats

Four slats, each eight inches long and one half inch wide, were interlaced before the children, and four others given to each child. The interlaced slats were left for them to see, and they were interlaced a second and third time before the children, but only one child succeeded in interlacing her slats (a girl of six). Nine copied the figure, but the other fifty were utterly unable to do the task.

Fifty-six boys were given the task of threading large needles. Fifty of these, after two or three efforts, succeeded; six were unable, though furnished with extra large needles and granted more time.

Another test consisted in tying together the ends of a two-foot string. Twenty-two children out of the sixty-three tested failed. The rest, except four, took the simplest method by which it could be done; i. e., placed the ends side by side.

Faults in Kindergarten Work

From the results, Hancock infers that fine and complicated movements are made with difficulty at this age. He also found that efforts to keep quiet or continued efforts to perform finely coordinated movements caused strong symptoms of nervous irritation.

Also Hancock concludes:

"Kindergarten work generally is too fine. Too great precision, involving delicate and complex coordinations in pasting, weaving, folding, pricking, and sewing, is insisted on. Occupations and games for young children should be of the nature that will involve large muscles and movements. Certainly teachers may well give more assistance in the fine work if they cannot see their way to make a change."

Bryan, in 1892, in his famous study on the development of voluntary motor ability, brought forth some significant results in regard to hand development in children. In his tapping experiments he tested the rate for four joints separately: the shoulder, the elbow, the wrist, and metacarpophalanged joint of the forefinger.

Bryan tested seven hundred and eighty-nine school children of the city of Worcester, Massachusetts, ranging in age from 5 to 16 years. After a very careful working over of the data he finds for both sexes an increase of the rate of tapping with age.

Bryan's whole table shows the periods of greatest decline are: for boys, 14 to 15; for girls, 13 to 14. A further consideration of the data reveals the fact that the shoulder grows most slowly, the elbow slightly faster, the finger very much more rapidly during these ten years. At the age of six the finger joint is the least rapid, while the elbow has the fastest rate.

At sixteen the finger has passed the elbow. Bryan remarks that in a child of six, the clasping tendency is still very strong.

This investigation shows also that the mean rate of tapping, with boys, slightly exceeds that of girls for all ages, except when the retardation of growth in boys is identical with the acceleration of growth in girls, i. e., at the age of thirteen. This exception is readily accounted for by the earlier pubertal development of girls with its accompanying earlier general acceleration of growth which very commonly could be expected to coincide with the prepubertal minimum of growth of boys.

Precision Tests

Practically the same peoples were also tested by Bryan for precision. Two tests were used.

1. Writing movement. Apparatus consisted of two strips of platinum foil smoothly pasted upon a plate glass so as to make an angle of 2 1-2 degrees, a small steel needle set in a common wooden penholder (used as a stylus), three or four Le Clanche cells, and a telegraph sounder. The child was carefully instructed after watching the experiment to draw the stylus down between the strips of platinum foil as far as possible without touching the foil. The battery was connected with the foil and the stylus so that the telegraph sounder gave the signal whenever the contact was made. The glass plate was always placed in such a position on the table that the line along which the stylus was to be drawn should make an angle of 45 to 50 degrees with the frontal plane of the subject if the right hand was used and an angle of 130 to 135 degrees when the left hand was used.

2. Probing movement. Apparatus consisted of a one square centimeter of platinum foil pasted smoothly upon a slab of plate glass, the foil being perforated by a circular hole of 1 millimeter in radius and connected with one pole of a small battery to the other pole of which was attached by a fine flexible wire a steel needle, set in a wooden penholder. The subject was required to hold the point of a needle a fixed distance (8 millimeters) perpendicularly above the hole and at command to tap the glass within the hole. As above a telegraph sounder gave the signal of contact if contact was made.

Bryan found that relatively great gain in precision was made from the years 6 to 8, i. e., that the absolute size of deviations from the movement attempted decreases much more rapidly in the two or three years after six than later.

Development of Hand Movements

In 1898 Burke in his study on the development of the nervous system traced the developments of hand movements in children. He sums the development preceding school ages as follows:

"The child traverses before he is six or seven years old not only the long deep-worn road of racial ancestry, reaching back perhaps as far as arboreal or even aquatic life, but I think we may say, blazes a few trees and leaves his mark. As we shall see later, by six years of age he shows evidences in many lines of being far upon the highway of distinctly human capabilities of movement. His fingers and hand that once tended to act upon the lower simultaneous principles, now can move in fair degree by the principles of independence and succession. In the delicate steadiness of central movements and the complex coordinations requiring delicate peripheral movements, he has probably acquired half of the ability he ever will acquire."

Burke notices also the fluctuations of increase of rapidity of tapping from year to year shown by Bryan's study and confirmed by Gilbert. Smedley in Chicago found practically the same results, i. e., an increasing rapidity of tapping between six and eighteen years and fluctuation in this increase.

In this connection I quote the following interesting paragraph from Burke:

"This fact of the comparative immaturity of children's motor ability excites the pedagogical inquiry whether or not in the existing school requirements stick-laying, needlework, pencil work, etc., of the kindergarten (children under six years), and in the writing and drawing of primary children there is intelligent realization that the child's ability, so far as rapidity of movement is a symbol, is only 60 to 70 per cent of what it is at sixteen years."

Burke also compares results of Doctor Porter's study on Saint Louis children and Doctor Gilbert's investigation on Iowa children and Mr. Robert's study in England all of which involve the strength of the hand, wrist, and forearm and find that in a general way strength increases with age from six to sixteen years.

X-Ray Tests

Pryor and Rotch have both made interesting studies of the development of the bones of the hand, from which Rotch concludes that the state of ossification of the bones of the hand and wrist constitutes a much truer key to the stage of development of the individual child than the usual bases of classification, such as chronological age, height and weight, and development of the teeth. Rotch observed about six hundred cases, taking pictures of the bones by means of the Roentgen ray and obtained results which confirmed Pryor's results and were substantiated by a number of observers.

He writes:

"As a rule no centers of ossification of the carpal bones of the epiphyses of the radius, ulna, metacarpal bones, or phalanges are present at birth, but there is a progressive appearance of these ossific centers from birth to the completion of development. While the appearance in succession and the development of the carpal bones and the epiphyses of the radius and ulna, with the epiphyses of the metacarpal bones and phalanges as controls best provide a developmental series for the first twelve or thirteen years of life, the different degrees of ossification up to the complete union of the epiphyses of the radius, ulna, metacarpal bones, and phalanges provide the most practical series for grading through adolescence to adult development. We have, therefore, two distinct groups of stages of development which we can use for the grading of human beings from birth to adult life.

"In the first group the following order of appearance is met with normally in a large majority of cases, but it is to be noted that it is not only the appearance of the bones which represents progressive growth, but also their increase in size and their massing. The os magnum appears first, then the uniform, then the epiphysis of the radius, then the cuneiform, and then the semilunar.

"After the semilunar the scaphoid comes and then either the trapezoid or trapezium, one following the other. After these eight ossific centers, comes the epiphysis of the ulna. There is then for a considerable period an enlarging of the epiphyses and an enlarging and massing of the carpal bones and finally the pisiform appears."

The genetic significance of the hand has been suggested in the first part of the thesis. There is a general consensus of opinion that the development of superior mobility of hand constitutes one of the firmest and most lofty of the ladders which man's ancestors built for themselves in their difficult ascent from animal to man. The distinctly human qualities of man's mind, evolved chiefly through or together with skill of hand, phylogenetically, the human hand with its capabilities, is one of our most recent and most precious achievements.

Hand Shows Awakening of Soul

We have seen also the importance of the hand in the first awakening and development of the baby's soul.

Mosso has expressed his conviction that the great artists of the Renaissance owe the wonderful copiousness of their genius to the extraordinary skill and untiring labor of their hands.

The value of handwork in education has been recognized. Froebel's "Gifts," though they became mechanicalized and misused, were designed to "serve as mediator between mind and the world, to aid the child to express himself freely and to bring the phenomena of the outer world nearer to him." The modern kindergarten stresses spontaneous self-expression, mainly through handwork, and the possibilities along this line may be appreciated from a perusal of Doctor Hall's Story of a Sand Pile.

Sequin showed the world that the idiotic mind might be, to some extent, awakened by hand training.

Gesell eulogizes the hand as "truly an organ of perception."

"With its flexible, motor equipment, it explores surfaces and outlines, and through its thousands of microscopic touch corpuscles—cutaneous and articular—it helps to frame a figured consciousness of size, form, rondure, edges, etc., of things.

"At the end of the index finger, there are twenty-one measuror corpuscles to one square millimeter. The finger tip can distinguish separate vibrations even though they impinge at the rate of .1552 per second, can discern a minimal distance of one tenth of a millimeter and a weight of three grains to a square millimeter.

"Furthermore, the internal sensory mechanism of the hand is so delicate that if the hand be moved through the tiniest fraction of an arc, the movement will nevertheless be felt. Contrast all these powers with those of the brute past!

"But these refined sensory qualities are not to be considered as divorced from the incomparable motor mechanism of the hand. It is the mobility of the hand, joined with its intrinsic sensitiveness, that makes it the supreme organ of perception. The rods and cones of the retina are not so stereognostic. . . . The exploring hand furnishes not only the passive, technical experiences, but the vivid, orderly kinæsthetic sensations which make it a second visual sense, by which the pathway of visual perception is illuminated."

Teachers Ought to Appreciate Exploring Hands

"If teachers were only more profoundly convinced of the psychology of all this they would not so exclusively address the eye and ear."

Again:

"The Scriptures have touched the hands with idealism. We are told that we must have both a pure heart and clean hands. If the teacher feels something of this idealism she will be able to impart it to the child. It is worth while to make a boy really feel the sentiment of honor toward his hands."

Helen Keller is a wonderful example of the great possibilities of the hand as an organ of perception.

Ballard writes: "Every child born into the world, has an instinctive tendency to manipulate and construct—to produce with his hands some definite and pleasing change in the physical world that surrounds him. Upon this rock is handwork built. The teacher has not to generate an interest in manual activities. The interest is there already; he has simply to direct it."

Value of Manual Training

The value of manual training has been recognized by the movement for Manual Training High Schools in the United States. Doctor Burnham, in his article on the Hygiene of Manual Training (Munroe's Cyclopaedia of Education, vol. 4) sums up the hygienic values as follows:

"Thus the brain and the nervous system are conditioned in their development by motor exercises, and manual training represents in an important way a group of habits that are among the alphabets of health. Again, the habits of attention, accuracy, self-reliance, and self-control that are fostered by manual training are of vital significance in mental hygiene. And, finally, manual training furnishes opportunity for the development of normal reactions; and this work is allied with the positive, creative, productive, and cooperative activities that are of vital significance in social hygiene."

But, as has been suggested by Hancock and others, there are dangers in manual education. The hand movement involves some of the finest and most delicately coordinated of accessory muscles, and we must remember that their development necessarily comes late. Lindley found that nervous automatisms were much more prevalent between the ages of 6 and 16, and that the accessory muscles were more often involved than the fundamental. "These automatisms," Terman says, "indicate defective control, rather than an excess of energy and are aggravated by the school's repression of fundamental movements."

Professor Laurie sounds a warning note in this regard: "The very first thing to point out is that children of three and four can do very little of what is called handwork, and that if they have to have a time table, it must be very elastic."

There is a great need of more thorough studies on larger groups of children to determine just what is the normal manual ability of the school child at various ages, especially in the kindergarten and primary grades.

We know in a general way that the finer muscles are uncoordinated and undeveloped and that therefore the child of this age should have no fine handwork but that whatever he does with his hands should call into play the larger, more fundamental, muscles of the arm and that on no account should the finely coordinated finger movements be expected. But we do not know about when to expect the finer coordinated development, and we do not know of what control normal children of the ages 3 to 5 and 6 are capable.

Parents May Profit by Observation

The test of the development of the bones of the hand which Mr. Rotch has suggested, has been used to convince parents, overanxious to force the development of their children, that the children were too immature to commence school work. Why not determine from careful investigation and experiment certain standards of muscle development and control of the hand, which the child must attain before he is admitted to the kindergarten? This would certainly insure less danger of injuring the child by demanding hand activities, for which his neural and muscular development has not yet prepared him.

Then with a knowledge of the general normal development of the hand the teacher could take advantage of the most opportune time in the growth of the hand and perhaps train the child to greater and more perfect hand activity and control than he commonly acquires. This would give those more gifted in the use of their hands a chance to develop. Perhaps we could have another golden age of artistic achievement. Certainly our amateur artists and sculptors, if we have any, get little opportunity for the discovery of their talents in the ordinary public school under the present curriculum.

However visionary the above suggestion may be, teachers should know more concerning the significance of hand activity. To this fact the statistics concerning chorea and nervous disorders bear witness, for hand control is an excellent and obvious key to nervous control generally, a symptom by which the teacher could readily detect children of choreic tendencies and thus prevent and avoid the full development of such tendencies.

General Summary

1. The development of the hand has been a very important factor in human evolution.

2. Man's hand mobility surpasses the activity of the ape and monkey manus in: Power of pronation and supination; efficiency of grasp; lateral movement of fingers; development of the phalangette.

3. The mentally deficient are lacking in hand development and control.

4. Ontogenetically hand activity is a very important factor in mental development. The human infant is capable of spontaneous and reflex movements of hand at birth. But voluntary movement does not develop until the third or fourth or fifth month. The first voluntary movements are simultaneous and bungling, and the first grasping is of the simian type. Pronation and supination is little observed in these early years. There is a period of intense interest in handling things, which comes a few weeks after voluntary grasping has been established.

5. Hancock's study has shown that children of five to seven years old are as yet incapable of fine coordinations in hand and finger movement. Bryan and Burke and others have shown that the hand mobility and control of a child of eight is relative to hand control at sixteen years of age; exceedingly immature in respect to rapidity, precision, and strength. The growth of hand control fluctuates from year to year, i. e., there are periods of acceleration and periods of retardation. The more fundamental muscles of arm and wrist tend to develop earlier than the accessory muscles of hand and fingers.

6. The skeleton of the hand and wrist develops slowly and is a valuable key to the child's general stage of development.

7. The great significance of the hand phylogenetically and

Independence

At a round table held at the Department of Recreation and Expression of the Stone Church Friday evening, January 5, much time was given to a discussion of the advisability of changing the meeting evening to Tuesday. Action was postponed for two weeks so it will again be taken up on January 19.

At the sacrament service at 11 a. m. President Elbert A. Smith was in charge and with him associated pastor R. V. Hopkins, evangelist J. R. Lambert, and Bishop J. A. Becker. The auditorium was well filled with the priesthood as usual on the stand.

At 2.30 a problems meeting for the whole of Zion was held in charge of R. V. Hopkins and President F. M. Smith. The latter briefly introduced the subject matter of the meeting and then presented W. W. Smith as the principal speaker. The special theme was organizing for the better instruction of our children. If we can only convert our own children and bring them up for Christ and the cause of Zion we shall accomplish more in one generation than in any other way. This will include, naturally, the instruction and training of parents so they can properly assist in caring for and training the young children, beginning as early as the cradle roll, prebeginner, and beginner age. The purpose is to train up the children as rapidly as possible in the philosophy of the church.

When adjournment was taken at 4 p. m. a meeting of the heads of departments in Zion was called to further consider and arrange details.

The evening speaker was Elder Joseph Luff who spoke at length on the general subject, "Be like Christ."

The 8 a. m. prayer service of the young people was well attended and good interest shown. The same is true of the children's sacrament service in the lower auditorium in charge of A. L. Sanford, I. N. White, E. D. Moore, and C. B. Hartshorn.

Monday morning R. B. Trowbridge who was for several years church auditor left for Colorado to enter a sanitarium where he hopes to secure needed rest and recuperation after his long illness.

The weekly radio program from the Independence station of the Central Radio Company, station call W. P. A. G., consisted of a sermon on "The Book of Mormon and American Indian tradition," by Elder R. V. Hopkins, and various instrumental and vocal numbers. These programs are listened to by thousands, near and at a distance, many of whom write in to express appreciation, and some going so far as to order copies of the Book of Mormon: Missionaries at distant points are already finding a good response awaiting them from those who have in this way come into contact with our work. Next Sunday evening from 6 to 7, the program will include the fourth sermon of the series on the Book of Mormon, by R. V. Hopkins, on "The Book of Mormon proven by American archaeology."

ontogenetically in the development of the mind has been recognized to some extent in education. Our knowledge, however, concerning hand development in children is still very imperfect. More and larger investigations are needed, and the period between three and five years of age especially should be studied. Children should be taught to honor their hands and use them efficiently.

Off for Europe

Letter from D. T. Williams written on board the Berengaria January 1, a few moments before sailing for Europe informs us he was greatly cheered by the many messages he found awaiting him in his cabin. He says they gave him "comfort and hope."

Radio Program Next Sunday

The radio program for next Sunday evening, from 6 to 7 o'clock, on 360 meter wave, will be especially good. The sermon will be by R. V. Hopkins, on "The Book of Mormon proven by American archæology."

There will be a special musical program arranged by Mrs. Pauline Becker Etzenhouser. This was presented last Sunday evening at the Stone Church in Independence. Sister Etzenhouser has arranged the music for numbers 1 and 6.

The trio consists of Miss Lillian Green, violinist; Ammon Fry, cellist; and Mrs. Etzenhouser at the piano. The numbers will be as follows:

1. Trio arranged by Mrs. Etzenhouser.
2. Soprano solo, "Bend low, dear Lord," by Mrs. Harold C. Burgess.
3. a. Trio. Prelude by Chopin.
b. "Pale Moon."
4. Soprano solo, "Cry aloud and spare not." Mrs. Burgess.
5. Trio. Kammenoi Ostrow.
6. "I need Thee every hour." Specially arranged by Mrs. Etzenhouser.

Sister Etzenhouser is daughter of Bishop J. A. Becker, Brother Fry is a son of Bishop Charles Fry, and Sister Green is one of the best violinists in the community.

THE UNJUST STEWARD

Luke 16: 1, 2: "There was a certain rich man, which had a steward . . . and he called him, and said unto him . . . Give an account of thy stewardship."

The earth is the Lord's; we are his stewards and should render an accounting.

This is in part done by computing what portion of our possessions belongs to God, and by turning that portion into his treasury for the purpose of carrying the gospel work forward.

January will be inventory month. Ask your branch solicitor for a blank.

The Social Service Bureau

The Social Service Bureau which was established in Independence in November is finding a fertile field for its activities and a pressing demand for its services. In the month of December there were twenty-seven new cases entered. These cases involve such problems as moral delinquency, mental defectiveness, suspected insanity, physical disability, nonsupport, neglected children, and free legal aid.

The bureau has just established an added feature of service, a free employment department. This will be operated for the benefit of those who are seeking employment and those who are seeking help. At the present time there are many men and women out of work. Anyone who may know where employment may be secured will please call Independence 1428 and ask for the Social Service Bureau.

receives the full union wage. The expense of the insurance for a year is paid by the company and it is planned to renew it year by year.

It is interesting to note that the church has at times approached this ideal in providing for its missionaries in times of sickness.

Physical Development of Children

Much has been written for several years concerning child psychology and the importance of that study for Sunday school, kindergarten, and home work. Parents have been continuously urged of the importance of this study in the care of children, and rightly so urged.

But there is a need for like attention to the physical development of the child. In this issue of the HERALD there appears an article which is a brief summary of a paper prepared in 1916 on the development and importance of the human hand. The hand has long been emphasized as the sign of power and authority as well as of blessings. The word manufacture itself means that it is made by the hand. It is through the use of our hands that the many works of man in building and in writing, in the making of the most delicate instruments as well as the heavy machinery, has been possible.

But it is important that we consider also the development of the capability of the hand in a rational way. Some faddists have urged the study of proper exercises for the development of the major motor operations in children, but it may well be doubted if one can prevent, outside of restricted force, the development of the major muscles of the body by the child.

But we do fail often to recognize that the finer manipulations of the hand and fingers are of much later development. The larger muscles of the arm and body are first developed.

The important and valuable emphasis is the fact that our idea should not be of the mind alone but also of the hand, in other words, manual training, including, of course, domestic science. This is coming to be recognized more and more in the last decade or two. Though it is a development of a little over forty years, its value has been recognized perhaps for only the past ten or twenty years and much yet remains to be done in pedagogy in this respect.

But again, it is essential that a more careful study be made of the physical development of the child so that the study may be adapted not only to the intellectual attitudes and habits but also to the physical possibilities. There has undoubtedly been a tendency to try to train children at too early an age in operations requiring the finer manipulations of the hand and fingers.

As the ability to make these manipulations steadily increase to at least the sixteenth year of life, there hence should not be forcing at too early an age.

It is unfortunate that both for child psychology and in the study of the physical development of children the period from three to six years of age seems as yet to have received no adequate attention. In infancy the weakness of the child requires constant parental attention. There have been many valuable studies made of the intellectual and physical development from the first year of life, and some have been extended even to the third year. There have been important investigations made on the contents of a child's mind in entering school, and while the field has not been exhausted, the analysis of children of school age has not been entirely neglected. But the child after infancy and before school age is allowed largely to look after himself. There is a serious need of careful study in that field as well as more accurate information concerning infancy and the school age child.

It should be noted, the great importance that all of these studies have for the work of the building of Zion, for the better we are informed in the development of children the better can they retain for their life work and follow definite principles, the sooner will we be able to develop ourselves intellectually and physically, as well as spiritually, to do the work that is necessary to build up the kingdom of God.

On Procedure in Calls and Ordinations

At the recent General Conference, on Tuesday, October 17, there was presented a resolution, which had been adopted by the Joint Council of the First Presidency, Quorum of Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric on the subject of procedure in calls and ordination to the priesthood. This document was postponed by action of the conference until next General Conference and provision was made that publication in the church papers was desired, so that all the ministry could consider it.

This publication has already been made in the Conference Daily for October 18, on page 110. It has also appeared in the weekly HERALD under date of October 25 on page 1005. It also appeared in Conference Minutes, page 3285. By request we are now republishing in the Pastoral Department in this issue of the HERALD and also are presenting this editorial calling the special attention of our readers to it.

Observance of the Sabbath Day

The following letter, unsigned, has been received by Bishop B. R. McGuire but since an answer is requested in the HERALD he has forwarded it to us with the request to give it attention:

I would like to know through the HERALD if it is right to play ball on the Sabbath day, also to hold picnics. It looks as if the rising generation won't have any Sabbath day. I can see both sides—the evil and the good. As one that believes in this latter-day work I am trying to do what is right, so pray for me that God will help me overcome everything that is evil and keep me in the straight and narrow path so I may enter in through the gates into that beautiful city.

We read in the Bible of some that were put to death for breaking the Sabbath. Is it right to go hunting or fishing or picking berries, or if grain is out is it right to draw it in on the day of rest? To do any of those things would not be keeping the Sabbath holy. It says we are not to do any work on that day but on the Sabbath are to do good. Some would say the disciples picked corn on the Sabbath day when they were hungry. Wasn't that the reason? Would like to hear from some one that believes in keeping the Sabbath day.

Pray for me. I want to be able to say to my Jesus, "I know thou art mine for the pleasures of sin I resign," that he may lead me by his Spirit to do good.

This question would seem to be quite completely answered from a careful reading of the Bible. The Jews very strictly observed the Sabbath day. The Christians also observed a day of rest and of worship—the Lord's Day. Unfortunately of recent years more attention has been given to a discussion of the day to be observed than has been given to the proper observance of a day of worship and of rest. The Master urged that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath (Mark 2:27). He also stated that it is right to do good on the Sabbath day (Luke 6:1-9).

So far as this church is concerned the question would seem to be clearly answered in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants:

But remember that on this, the Lord's day, thou shalt offer thine oblations and thy sacraments, unto the Most High, confessing thy sins unto thy brethren, and before the Lord. And on this day thou shalt do none other thing, only let thy food be prepared with singleness of heart, that thy fasting may be perfect; or in other words, rejoicing and prayer.—59:2, 3.

And the Spirit saith further: Inasmuch as there has been much discussion in the past concerning the Sabbath of the Lord, the church is admonished that until further revelation is received, or the quorums of the church are assembled to decide concerning the law in the church articles and covenants, the saints are to observe the first day of the week commonly called the Lord's day, as a day of rest: as a day of worship, as given in these covenants and commandments. And on this day they should refrain from unnecessary work; nevertheless, nothing should be permitted to go to waste on that day, nor should necessary work be neglected. Be not harsh in judgment but merciful in this, as in all other things. Be not hypocrites nor of those who make a man an offender for a word.—Doctrine and Covenants 119:7.

This subject was carefully presented in the SAINTS' HERALD in 1921 in volume 68, page 1114, by Elder A. M. Chase in which he urged the danger to our church to-day as well as to the world in too much time given to pleasure on the Lord's day and too little attention to the services of the church of God. Elder Chase did not take a narrow point of view, nor did the writer in an editorial in 1918 (SAINTS' HERALD, volume 65, page 635). There are some who are strict in their observance of the sanctity of the house of God when present, but who are rarely to be seen there, and are not so careful in their observance of the sanctity of the day set apart as a day of rest and of worship to God.

Necessary labor should be done whether for the care of the family, the stock, or crops. Unnecessary labor should be avoided. It does not seem to the writer wrong for one to enjoy the open air between services in a proper manner, but it tends to reflect upon the work and is a cause of offense to others, if we engage in outdoor sports on that day. This quite aside from the effect it has upon ourselves in not devoting our time to proper rest and worship.

But the answer seems to be fully given in the quotation we have made above. "On the Lord's day offer thine oblation and sacrament. Confess thy sins; prepare thy food with singleness of heart, and do none other thing."

Observe the first day of the week as a day of rest and of worship. Refrain from unnecessary work but do not permit waste or neglect necessary work. Be not harsh but merciful in this as in all other things. Be not hypocrites nor make a man an offender for a word.

No Real Substitute for Church Attendance

The student, seer, or leader may go aside for a season, but only the better to prepare for service.

The coming of the radio permits the shut-ins to hear both good music and sermons and to get something of the benefit of attending church services, but not all, because there is the personal contact which cannot be sent over the wireless.

Of old, men of God, the prophets of the Lord, went aside to commune with him. Jesus took his disciples aside from the multitude to pray and then he went apart from them on more than one occasion to engage in prayer. He also spent forty days in the wilderness before he entered upon his work, and drew aside from the multitude many times to gain strength through spiritual communion.

The great apostle, Paul, also went down into Arabia to study and pray after he was converted. We can note many instances of the student and the man of devotion thus going aside for concentration, for prayer, for study, and for communion with the invisible church of God.

In the Middle Ages this was taken to the extreme of entirely withdrawing from the world, forgetting that these were periods of preparation for greater work, and that the Master in his great prayer did not pray that his disciples should be taken out of the world, but rather that they be kept from the evils which are in the world.

There is and can be no substitute for church attendance. Of course the wireless meets quite a different need from that of the hermit who goes aside to study and pray. It offers a substitute in part for those who are not able to attend the services of the organized church, but it is not an adequate substitute.

The man of God may go aside to pray and to study, but he must come again, if he is to fulfill his mission, and must meet frankly the issues of the church. He needs this, both that he may give that which he has received and also that he may receive from the common touch a clearer understanding of the needs of humanity.

Even Jesus, though very God of very God, yet came to earth and took upon him flesh and became like man, was tempted and tried in all things; and while he went aside for communion with his heavenly Father, he also met frequently with the multitude, so that he understood from practical experience their desires and hopes and their needs. He showed in his teaching a keen appreciation of their daily life, using the homely parables and stories immediately at hand. He found no substitute to take the place of this meeting with the common people, this meeting with humanity. Nor did he offer any substitute to his followers.

Paul, therefore, emphasized, "Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another: and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching." (Hebrews 10: 25.) Man is a social being and does not receive his full development except in the social contact. There is a social aspect to worship. A man may worship God on the golf links on Sunday morning, but how many do? There is not alone this need for personal worship, but also the need for social contact if there is to follow social leadership.

Therefore, neither the radio, nor the withdrawing of ourselves for a season of prayer, can ever be a substitute for the meeting at the altar of our God.

Religious Education

What is the meaning of this term being used so much now—religious education?

This question opens up for consideration the whole field of our departmental work. The first and most essential point is that with all of our getting we should get understanding, and with all the emphasis placed on education we should not neglect the spiritual nature of religious education. We give some twenty-five hours a week to secular school work, half an hour to the study of the Word of God and all that goes to make up religion. It is not a proper balance.

In the second place the teaching of any subject should be adapted to the ability and age of the learner. This is true in the study of the Word of God, as it is true of any other subject.

In the third place, as Walter S. Athearn points out, in one of our States there are 200,000 children and young people who sit each Sunday in the presence of a Sunday-school teacher who has not gone beyond the tenth grade in the public schools. The average Sunday-school teacher is a married woman thirty-seven years of age with two children. She has had but ten or eleven years of schooling and no training for the task of religious teaching. She brings to her class the scientific and social training of the American high school a generation ago. Three out of every four that enter her class at twelve years drop out from the Sunday school if they do not also from the church, before reaching the age of eighteen. Much has been said about the pursuit by the young people of pleasure and the neglect of serious life. How much of the responsibility belongs to teachers, who are grossly incompetent?

Careful students note the importance of proper pedagogy, in which we might include a knowledge of child psychology and the psychology of the adolescent. But we must remember that a public school or college teacher is not therefore qualified to teach the Bible, and may even be disqualified in part from the nature of his or her special school training and experience. Religious education, the teaching of the Word of God, is quite a distinct field and is governed by different principles than is the teaching of reading, writing, arithmetic, biography, or psychology. The attitude and the purpose is different though dealing with the same individuals.

We want a strongly organized department in order to insist upon proper teachers and also to assist all those who have a desire for right service in this line of work. If, as President F. M. Smith has so often insisted, the work of the church is distinctly educational, the proper teacher of religious education becomes at once in rather a large sense a working together with God. As we have pointed out before, what the Sunday schools are teaching to-day will be what our people will be thinking ten years from now.

But important as is pedagogy, for we can do much better work with good pedagogy than without pedagogy, after all it is only a secondary consideration. It is a means to an end. The content of our work must not be neglected. Not to make this single article too long we will merely say that the memorizing of historical facts is by no means sufficient. The learning of dates, of names, and of biography is also only of third rate importance.

That which is of primary importance is the religious education of the child, the young person, and the adult, and by religious education we mean to use all of our knowledge of psychology and of pedagogy, all of our knowledge of the Word of God, and the teachings of the church, in order to establish as rapidly as possible right moral and religious habits and attitudes in addition to establishing right knowledges or a proper knowledge of that which is written in the law of God. The purpose of religious education is to develop as rapidly as possible citizens for the kingdom of God and his Zion.

To procure this we must have lessons with a content well adapted to the age of the child and taught by a method that will naturally appeal to the intelligence of the learner. This process does not cease with childhood nor with adolescence; it does not properly cease until we have reached the stature of a man in Christ Jesus. That means that we must have proper lessons for the beginners and also proper lessons for the young people and adults.

Education means, as we have emphasized so often, the development of the individual, the unfolding of his or her natural talents and ability. Religious education means the development of the religious nature, the spiritual and moral side of the individual, the development also of right social attitudes. In order that this work may be well done a strong organization is needed, and one having sufficiently broad powers to simplify and unify the work of teaching religious subjects. It should be broad enough to include the priesthood meetings, as well as the infant class.

Such a department should also provide for more time than the single half hour on Sunday. It should provide for other hours on Sunday, for suitable sermons, for children and young people, preaching adapted to the age of the child or young people. It should provide for other study hours both on Sunday and during the week evenings, and when possible provide for additional religious study during the week by day classes. This is the ideal toward which we are working. We do not expect to jump to any such accomplishment within a short time. That is not at all possible. It will take long, steady work, it will take years to develop a proper corps of teachers, but we can make important progress this present year.

In a purely technical sense, when the department of religious education is organized it will include not only the Sunday school work and the eleven o'clock hour with a sermon or sermonet for children and young people, but will also include teacher training. It will not only include class work on other hours on Sunday, but it will include such work whether undertaken by a class of women, a class of young people as our recent study classes of the Religio, the classes in Graceland College in religious education, or in the Independence Institute. It also would include other class work and should at least consider the work undertaken in the priesthood meetings. It is already apparent that we are in need of such a course of lessons for the priesthood, for many of the priesthood are requesting it and many more will do so when they appreciate what may and should be done in that way.

Briefly summing up, religious education is an effort to develop the religious and moral nature of each individual, to establish right habits and right attitudes, as well as a better knowledge of the Word of God. It includes the ordinary Sunday school class, but the work to be effected must extend beyond that single half hour of Sunday school class work.

If once we could bring up a single generation rightly, develop in children the right habits and attitudes, we would win the world for Christ and his Zion. If we can save one generation by beginning early enough and preparing that one generation for Zion, we would win the world for Christ. That is what religious education means.

An Aristocracy of Brains

There has been a great deal of discussion concerning the ideal proposed by President Hopkins of Dartmouth College to secure an aristocracy of brains. He would limit the number of students. This plea for an aristocracy of brains has been a subject for much discussion ever since the days of Plato and is quite prone to be misconstrued.

Several of the universities of to-day have from 10,000 to 20,000 enrollment. The result is that in many cases sufficient care is not taken with admission and certainly that attention cannot be given to the individual students as closely as is possible in a small college. An aristocracy of brains does not always mean exactly what one would think at first glance. The emphasis is often placed not so much upon superiority or privilege as upon responsibility. The idea of Plato was that the ablest men should be chosen and placed at the disposal of the state and required to devote their whole time and means for the benefit of the group or state.

There are several vital questions involved. In what size units can students be best instructed? How secure the greatest good for society and for the individual? Some by intellectual or psychological tests are apparently incapable of receiving benefit. Others are prevented by economic conditions. How many students can be supported by society at present in advanced education, especially if, as is alleged, we are spending an average of $610 on each of the 224,000 college and university students, exclusive of the expenses of the students themselves? The expense to students themselves, the necessity of caring for the family prevents and has prevented some of the most worthy from attending. Any plan for an aristocracy of brains provides for this that those who are able to receive the greatest benefit and to give in return to society the greatest return shall be put in a position where they can attend, while those who are incapable, those who are passed because of financial position or political pull, those who make of college simply a temporary social club, would be excluded in the interest of those who, while not possessing so much of this world's goods, do possess the intellectual capacity to profit.

The Saint Louis Star sent out a questionnaire to the heads of many collegiate institutions and summarized the results of the questionnaire as follows:

Their recommendations fall into groupings:

1. Recognize a size unit for colleges based on economy. Five hundred students is suggested as the ideal.
2. Establish small municipal colleges and junior colleges. Put two years of college work into the high school.
3. Filter out the unfit students, especially those who waste their time in school. Restrict intercollegiate athletics, or the emphasis on it.

4. Raise the scholastic standards of the colleges and universities, so as to cut down the number of students.

5. Educate the people to pay the bills of higher education, in return for the benefits it confers upon society.

This paper also states that the larger the school the more cost per pupil if it maintains the standards made possible by its size.

Again a word is said in favor of the junior college and it is urged quite generally that the higher education should be extended democratically to all people capable of absorbing it.

President W. D. Scott, of Northwestern University, makes as the supreme test the use made by the student of his education and urges unless it increases the earning power of the group in accordance with the increase in the number of those having the benefit of higher education we cannot permit the increase in attendance. If, however, there is an increase in group and national income to correspond with the increased attendance, then no limit is necessary.

We need no limit on the right kind of education for the right kind of young men and women. We should eliminate so far as possible education of the wrong kind, and we should discontinue paying for the education of young men and women who will not return to the nation more than the cost of their education.

It is not a problem to be answered offhand, nor on a simple plea of equal rights for all, for we are so very far from having such equal educational opportunities for all as conditions exist at present. Also there is a tendency to urge many to attend who receive no personal or social benefit. The good of the individual and the good of the group as a whole must be the final test, and we must learn to have the courage to advise some not to attend and some who do attend as to their best method of preparation even if it be to take them outside of the limits of the college.

As one reads the synoptists, there cannot be much doubt that Jesus, in his few months of public utterance, proclaimed some kind of a social gospel. It is true that he was primarily concerned with individuals rather than organizations, but equally true that he selected and trained these individuals as a sort of charter members for a society soon to be. It is true that it was thus the spiritual redemption of men and women, not the improvement of existing institutions, for which he labored. But that was because he regarded those present institutions as essentially hopeless and about to perish, not because he did not have the vision of a better and perfected state.—

A Peculiar People

By Frederick A. Smith

Sermon delivered at the Tabernacle, Independence, Missouri, October 10, 1922. Reported by Mrs. A. Morgan.

I presume you will expect a peculiar sermon from a peculiar man, to a peculiar people, under the most peculiar circumstances that he has ever had to preach.

The first epistle of Peter contains the reading that we are going to use to-night.

Wherefore, laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings, as newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that we may grow thereby: If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious. To whom coming, as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious, ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. Wherefore also it is contained in the scripture, Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner stone, elect, precious; and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded. Unto you therefore which believe he is precious; but unto them which be disobedient, the stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner, and a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offense, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient; whereunto also they were appointed. But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light.—1 Peter 2: 1-9.

In this last verse are the thoughts that we shall use:

But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light.

Now, if I needed anything to establish the thought that we are a peculiar people, I have but to refer you to the past week's experience, and I think I have the evidence on my side. But in what sense are we going to be peculiar? The Apostle Peter seems to recognize quite clearly that that people was a different people from others around him, and it is quite evident from the study of history, that they were different. If they would follow the teachings of the Master, as laid down by the Christ himself, it is quite evident to everyone that there would be a vast difference between them and the world. But there is another sense in which we possibly might use this word peculiar.

Some Definitions

We use language at times with little consideration as to its actual meaning and application. The first definition I shall call your attention to is, "One's own; belonging to one with exclusion of others; private; not general; personal." Now if you take the statement of this individual you discover that he presents the thought that the people of Christ under this definition must be christened as his own; belonging to him; with exclusion of others; private, in one sense of the term; not general, in the broad sense in which we would use the term. Personal so far as our relationship to him is concerned. At once there is established under conditions of this kind a most peculiar relationship, and the more you take the books to investigate that feature, the more you will be forced to recognize that as a people, belonging to Christ, following him, we cannot conform to the world, but are exclusive.

I know we have been accused of being narrow. It has been the distinction made, sometimes, that we were altogether too exclusive in our ideas, and they have carried the thought that to some extent we have gone too far in the idea that we were a special people; different from others, and yet, my friends, if we shall follow out the idea that has been expressed in this text, making an application of it to us under the conditions that exist here, "And now, having been called out of darkness into the marvelous light of the gospel of Jesus Christ in these last days," we will find ourselves compelled to be an exclusive people, different from others.

The next definition comes to us especially; "pure; above all others; peculiar." Yes, that's one of the definitions of it. A special people; pure people, too, but I think we ought to be special so far as that's concerned, and I believe you will agree with me that we can afford to be special, and not only special but pure. If we are going to be what we ought to be, we shall have to follow the injunction of the Master, "Come out of her, O ye my people." We must become conscious of the fact that in the establishment of Zion and the bringing forth and establishing of the principles of righteousness there should be such a particular difference between us and the world that the world will be compelled to recognize that difference. Now I don't want you to get to patting yourself on the back too much, but I want you to get a thought or two in connection with this. "Above all others." In what, my friends? I do not want the idea to go out that we shall draw our skirts about us, and be so proud, and consider ourselves so great and so much above others that we cannot associate with them or treat them like human beings, or act toward them like Christians, but there must be in the characteristics of this people, and in their life such a perfect representation of the Christ and his teachings that shall make us, so far as the moral standing and Christian attitude is concerned, a special people, a pure people, and above all others. When we can do that we can redeem Zion.

Another definition is: "Unusual; singular; striking; noticeable; strange; out of the common." Why, that word has a good deal in it, hasn't it? The more we go into that thing, the more it is going to force home to us some of the real responsibility that rests upon us, so let's look at it.

Unusual. Unusual in what sense? In what way? Well, I don't know. I have been tempted to tell you some of the ways that I think you are extremely unusual. I told you that it was under peculiar conditions that we had to preach, and it is. In all my experience in the Reorganization since I have been a minister in this church, I never have had to meet such conditions as we meet to-day. Never has the time come when this people, as a people, should rise to the emergency and exercise the intelligence that God has given us as now, and never has there come to us an emergency when there should be such an unusual effort upon the part of this people to make it manifest to the world that we are the people of God.

"Singular." Yes, we are singular. I think sometimes when we talk about intelligence being a part of God, and intelligence being the peculiar feature that ought to manifest itself in the people of God, we have lost sight of some of the sermon that our brother gave us last Sunday morning, and in our own peculiar way, and in our own peculiar manner we are disposed to submerge our mentality to some extent in the fear of what others may say; their criticisms that may be made; the possibility of some one looking at it the wrong way; we allow these things sometimes to interfere and prevent the frank expression of our thought and the expression of the will of God that ought to be made manifest in the church.

A Striking People

Now, we ought to be a striking people, but we don't want to strike the wrong way. If being peculiar brings this definition into play, in what sense would men be striking? Ask yourself that question. In what way would you be striking? I would want you people to stop and ponder the thought. Would you not want that striking effect to be of such a character that it should make itself manifest, and strike the world with a force that shall cause them to take notice and realize that these people are different because of their recognition of the Christian spirit, the Christian attitude, the spirit of meekness, the word of God wherein is power? And if we want to be striking that's one of the attitudes that we must assume. That of humility; meekness; kindness; willingness to be entreated, and yet standing firmly for what we believe to be right. We may be misunderstood; we may expect to have some of that. It isn't to be expected that in the peculiar condition we live, human as we are, surrounded with the environment of the worldly conditions, that there will be no misunderstanding, but my friends, we surely can hold these misunderstandings in kindness toward each other. We can do this in such a marked degree that it shall strike the world as a real fact that there is a body of people that are Christian in the true sense of the term.

What a Reporter Thought of Us

I remember back yonder, a few years ago, when we held a conference in Kirtland, Ohio. We had some strange and hard times there. We had some warm and heated debates upon the floor. We had a reporter from the Cleveland Plain Dealer there, of Cleveland, Ohio, who stayed right over at the hotel where we did; slept there with us, and the leaders made no effort to keep from him anything; and he said to us when that conference closed that he had reported meetings of religious bodies, political gatherings, and other important gatherings, but at no time, and in no place, had he met such a peculiar people as he met there. He says, You will defend your position and urge it with all your heart, and with all the energy of your souls, and then when you step out of that building, he says, it is forgotten, and you are all friends.

Why shouldn't that be? And one of the peculiar teachings of the president of the church at that time, and one that he emphasized, with the ministry of this church—and he talked to us as a father would talk to his children—was that we must learn to hold our differences in kindness, in love, and yet firmly, earnestly defend our position. Have we forgotten that?

There has been one thing that has struck me very forcibly here, and I have been a little surprised at it; and coming from the source it has, it has been a peculiarly painful one: that there should be the demonstration of partisanship in applause and hissing on the floor of the conference of the church of Christ. Now that kind of striking I hope you will leave out. It is wrong, and you should not allow yourself to go to that extent, no matter which side it may be. But we should keep within us that control, and manifest the dignity and the uprightness and attention and respect to our brother that we would ask him to give to us; and we must recognize in this work of Christ and in this church that he has given to us, that if we are going to be peculiar in the true sense of the term, we must make an application of the principle of righteousness, and treat our brothers as being honest as well as ourselves. In that way only can we qualify ourselves and be a peculiar people, different from the world.

We Should Love One Another

That reporter published his statement. He gave to the conference a declaration of that kind, and my friends, I would love to see the day come when everybody who comes in contact with this people and becomes acquainted with them, would be compelled to recognize that principle that Jesus said should be one of the witnesses that should testify to the world that we are the people of God. "We should have love one for another," and that love, my friends, should not break down our individuality, take away our intelligence, rob us of our rights as citizens in the kingdom of God, to exercise the speech that may be necessary; and under that condition of righteousness we can make ourselves noticeable, and the notice that will be given to us will be of such a character as to bring to us favorable recognition in the world, and open the doors wider for the prosecution of the work that God has given unto us.

Live Not by One Principle

There is another class, my friends, who have been strange because they have assumed the peculiar attitude of pinning their faith, and their hope and their confidence of salvation upon some one principle, and having done that, they are determined that nothing else shall prevail. That's the one thing necessary, and they forget the other important features that God has said should be emphasized in his church and among his people.

Another strange or peculiar way that we do not care to indulge in, for Jesus has made the declaration, You shall not live by bread alone, or one principle only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. We are strange in another way. We have one of the most peculiar and strange organizations that has ever been given to the world. There is no other like it. It is not like the corporate bodies that we have around us. It is not like the Government in which we live. No other government that is on the earth is like it. Nor can we carry out its work under the same rules that other governments have to be governed by, for the simple reason that in this peculiar organization we have not been the architects. God hath set in the church these peculiar, different organizations if you want to call them that, or governments, as we sometimes see them spoken of, in the Scripture, for the specific work of his church and kingdom in the world, and he has designated what their peculiar functions are, and he has outlined how they shall be filled and how they shall be made to satisfy the needs of the people, and he has laid down the law that shall govern in the operation of this great body; and while he has given to us this organization that has made us strange over all the other religious organizations in the world, and peculiar in this respect, he has also given to us that peculiar democratic form that has recognized the rights of the membership and the ministry of this church, the right to say whether they will be governed by these things, or whether they will not. A peculiar feature—the right of common consent that God has established, and it is one of the peculiar functions.

The People Have the Decision

The Catholic Church has its pope, and from him emanates the law; he is the end of controversy with them; not so with us. We have not been placed in that attitude; and even the prophet of the church has been placed under the rule that the people have, the right to say whether that which comes through him as a revelation shall govern or not. Thus we discover at once the peculiar distinction between us and other bodies who operate under what they may term the religious law.

We are out of the common line when it comes to that, and in presenting the thought of being out of the common, I have but to call your attention to the thought that when we go out into the world and begin to present our peculiar beliefs and urge our organization, we are confronted very quickly with the fact that we are not in common with the others. There are some things, it is true, that we may hold in common with the others, but when we come to lay our whole plan before them we are soon made to feel that we are not in common with them. We cannot live like them. We cannot work like them, and in some cases the very fact that we cannot has distressed us, and compelled us to work alone.

Now only those who have been in the field, those who have gone out with this gospel, and have attempted to carry it to the world can understand that fact, and are conscious to what extent we have to do it alone, and how hard it is sometimes to control ourselves and keep ourselves just as humble and as kind and patient in some of these things that force us to the recognition that we are out of the common. Yet, my friends, I want to emphasize again that in the future this being out of common must be marked with the characteristics of the Christ so strongly that it will overcome the prejudice and opposition that confronts us upon every side.

Jesus in his declaration to this church has laid down a little rule and called our attention to some of these things, and I am going to call your attention to one of them right here.

Doctrine and Covenants 119: 2 says:

There is a great work to be done by mine elders, and that they may be fitted to do this work and the accomplishment thereof be not prevented, it is enjoined upon them that they shall not only be kind of heart and of a lowly spirit, that their wisdom may be the wisdom of the Lord and their strength the strength of the Spirit, but they shall lay aside lightness of speech and lightness of manner when standing to declare the word, and shall study to approve their ministrations to the people by candor in speech and courtesy in demeanor, that as ministers of the gospel they may win souls unto Christ.

At once you will discover that it places us in the attitude, that it matters not what the world may do, what it may say, or how far its criticisms may go, if we are going to win souls to Christ we must approve ourselves unto the people.

Peculiar in Having Put on Christ

We may talk about our being peculiar, because we have peculiar doctrines, or because we have peculiar practices, and habits, etc., but the peculiar feature that must mark us and stamp us to such an extent that the world will recognize and notice us must be because, as a people, we have put on Christ, and we are demonstrating the characteristics of Christ:

The elders and men of the church should be of cheerful heart and countenance among themselves and in their intercourse with their neighbors and men of the world, yet they must be without blame in word and deed. It is therefore not seemly that they indulge in loud and boisterous speech, or in the relating of coarse and vulgar stories, or those in which the names of their God and their Redeemer are blasphemed. Men of God, who bear the vessels of the Lord, be ye clean in your bodies and in your clothing; let your garments be of a sober character and free from excess of ornamentation. Avoid the use of tobacco and be not addicted to strong drink in any form, that your counsel to be temperate may be made effectual by your example.

This is just as applicable to the women as to the men. We should be of cheerful heart and countenance among ourselves, and in their intercourse with other members and men of the world. Yet they must be without blame in word and deed. Is anybody exempt from that? And does it not strike you with considerable force that if we put into practice a principle of that description, we are going to demonstrate to the world that we are a peculiar people, no matter how peculiar the conditions may be.

It is therefore not seemly that they indulge in loud and boisterous speech, or in the relating of coarse and vulgar stories, or those in which the names of their God and their Redeemer are blasphemed. Men of God, who bear the vessels of the Lord, be ye clean in your bodies and in your clothing; let your garments be of a sober character and free from excess of ornamentation. Avoid the use of tobacco and be not addicted to strong drink in any form, that your counsel to be temperate may be made effectual by your example.

The Kind of People Missionaries Appreciate

Now I may state frankly to you that my experience as a missionary in this church has taught me this, that if I have gone into a locality where there are Saints who have lived their religion, and their example is in perfect accord with the precept, it has not been a difficult thing for us to secure a hearing, and meet a proper recognition. The very fact that this people were peculiar and different, if you please, from those around them, and their lives were so exactly and particularly and strangely in harmony with the principles of Jesus Christ, and the characteristics of the Master, had marked them, and had given credence to the thing that we taught; so when the missionary came in and unfolded the gospel, the missionary was enabled to reach the people, where otherwise he probably would have had prejudice to meet and hard fighting to get a recognition.

So you discover that the peculiarity of this people must not consist in the idea that they are going to stand up to preach and in the dignity of their own strength and greatness, say, We are the people of God; we are higher and above others. Did you ever hear anybody doing that? If you take the pains to go back, my friends, in history, and read carefully for a little while, you will discover some of these things—just exactly what we have referred to; and why? Well, I am going to call your attention to a little statement found in the fourteenth chapter of Deuteronomy, second verse. Let me read it to you:

Ye are the children of the Lord your God; ye shall not cut yourselves, nor make any baldness between your eyes for the dead. For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God, and the Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth.

Why, you are not the only people who have been talked to along that line, are you? Now, my friends, he said he wanted them, and they were to be a peculiar people, and when you follow their history it is a striking one. That same people wandered around in the wilderness for forty years, and why? I ask you, why? Because of their disobedience. That's the idea that I want you to see. Because of their failure, absolute failure, to recognize the sense in which God had destined that they should be peculiar. They were not common with those around them. They held themselves above the others, and they prided themselves on their peculiarity. They became lifted up in pride and self-centered; self-conscious, and became so much so that they came to the conclusion that they were the only people that ever were righteous, and the only ones that God loved, and the only ones God had worked with. And what happened to that people? Have you ever thought? If you haven't, I want you to think a little bit, for we discover he speaks to them along this line. After giving them a number of statutes and judgments he said to them:

This day the Lord thy God hath commanded thee to do these statutes and judgments; thou shalt therefore keep and do them with all thine heart, and with all thy soul. Thou hast avouched the Lord this day to be thy God, and to walk in his ways, and to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and to hearken unto his voice: And the Lord hath avouched thee this day to be his peculiar people, as he hath promised thee, and that thou shouldst keep all his commandments; and to make thee high above all nations which he hath made, in praise, and in name, and in honor; and that thou mayest be an holy people unto the Lord thy God, as he hath spoken.

Why Early Saints Failed

Now you get the "peculiar" feature. He wanted to make them higher above all nations, but how were they going to reach that altitude? In what way were they going to accomplish that purpose; and the answer comes back to us—by keeping the statutes and doing the commandments that God had given them.

Now, my friends, you have but to follow the history of that people to discover that they failed. They didn't accomplish the work. They lost out, as we express it in these days, and failed to reach the end that God had in mind for them to reach, and as a consequence they were trodden down and driven out from their inheritances.

Now, I am going to make the statement to you and ask you people to think it over. We talk about Zion, and Zionic conditions, the building up of the kingdom of God, and the establishment of righteous principles. If you do, my friends, you must change your tactics. You must recognize a more righteous and upright life. We must get away from the idea of doing things as we want to, and recognize God's way. We must come to a recognition of the law that he has laid down, though it may, at times, conflict with the ideas of man and the wisdom of the world. We must reach that position of sanctification, so to live and do that it will stamp us as different from others, and they may look upon us as being peculiar, if you want to use that term, with all its definitions attached to it. The fact remains we can never accomplish this work until we shall be willing to put away from us the ideas that may have crept into our being, and into our midst, and into our teachings that are not in line with what God would have us be. He has told us that it could not be redeemed and saved only by the law that he gave—the celestial law. Otherwise, he says, I cannot receive it unto myself.

Failure of Latter Days

Israel failed; yes, absolutely failed, and I may say as I go back over the history of this church, we have but to look back a few years to discover another failure, and I ask you why. One of the reasons made manifest in the statement of the Master himself is found in Doctrine and Covenants 98: 1:

Verily, I say unto you, concerning your brethren who have been afflicted, and persecuted, and cast out from the land of their inheritance, I, the Lord, have suffered the affliction to come upon them, wherewith they have been afflicted in consequence of their transgressions.

That's why. Because they failed to manifest that peculiar life of righteousness desired by the Lord, and so set an example to the world and hold aloft the beacon light of freedom that shall give to the world a recognition of the fact that God has said, If the gospel makes you free, you are free indeed; and I may make the statement to you to-night that by careful study I have been forced more and more to see the truthfulness of that statement. The change that is made by virtue of the gospel of Christ in his life stands before the world without fear of God or man. He has nothing to fear. He has risen above the conditions of the world. He can stand in perfect freedom. The laws that have been enacted do not come upon him because he does not break them. The fear of condemnation does not rest upon him. Why? Because he has not put himself subject to condemnation, and you discover that when you look at that thought properly it gives to the individual a freedom of mind; of conscience; of action and thought. Nothing else in the world can bring to you this same freedom except the gospel of Christ, applied in your life, and that will make you a strange, a peculiar individual in the world to-day. Failure comes to us because of our unwillingness to follow the teachings of the Christ; and the more you study that feature, the more we grasp that thought, the more it will emphasize the definitions of the word peculiar that has come to us.

To Whom Do We Belong?

Now, let me read some more: "That which belongs exclusively to one." Well, if we are a peculiar people, who is the one to whom we belong? What is your answer to be, and I think I hear the whispers from this audience—Jesus Christ. Most assuredly, and if we belong to him, then has he not the right to expect we shall follow him, and in following him, recognize the things he has said and follow them?

I want to read one other statement touching this question before I close. It is found in Titus, reading from the 11th verse of the second chapter:

For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. . . . These things speak, and exhort and rebuke with all authority. Let no man despise thee.

Now, let's think a moment of this statement. What has come to us? I want to call attention to it: For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men. "Hath appeared." "The grace of God." That is, my friends, the thing we want to emphasize to you; teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. Soberly; seriously; thoughtfully. That's what we need, that we may get close to God; that we may feel more of the divine contact of that Spirit as it permeates our being, lightens our minds, and strengthens our powers. My friends, we need it, and I am going to say, and say it frankly to you tonight, one of the difficulties that confront us, one of the things that stand in our way has been the failure to get down in the depths of humility where God wants us to go. Where we can feel the divinity moving in our midst, teaching us obedience, and leading us higher. Some may say we have had some of it. Oh, my friends, what a pitiful little bit we have had. We should have had a hundred times more than we have had. When that inspiration of the Spirit of God shall come to our hearts, it shall teach us as nothing else can teach; give to us the forces of divinity that shall open the way, and give to us understanding and comprehension and courage to stand for that God has given, and with the law that he has laid down. We must cleanse ourselves, purify ourselves, to be a peculiar people, zealous of good works, that God may rejoice in us, and finally, under the peculiar workings of his power, he may lift us out of the darkness of the world, the confusion that stares us in the face, and give to us the way in which we shall walk that we may reach higher ground and better conditions, and be crowned with divine intelligence that shall enable us to accomplish the work that God has called us to do, and be, in the true sense of the term, a peculiar people.

Our Budgets

By A. M. Chase

All the sacrifice should not be demanded of the elders and their families.

There is quite a disposition to-day to have a definite goal in all our calculations. Even our Government, with all its party machinery, has come to the point where the business of the United States is being itemized, and our lawmakers try to meet the demands of the budget so formed. In other words, there is an attempt to meet the just needs of the Government, without wasting the people's taxes.

We can hardly blame our bishopric, if they, too, in making their calculations for the needed expenses of the elders' families, ask that there shall be a looking forward, and a calculation of at least the approximate amount needed by these families.

If this is required of the elders' families, why should not the rest of the church membership also try to make an orderly, systematic calculation of their "just needs and wants"? And having made this estimate, make an earnest effort to live within the limitation so set?

The Starting Point

In everything of this kind, there must be a starting point, or a definite goal unto which we work or lay our course.

In our business of life, as "coworkers with God," "called to be Saints," the starting point, as well as the goal, must be "The kingdom of God." "Seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God and establish his righteousness," must come with added force to the man who has been called into communion with Christ, in the effort to redeem Zion and to prepare a people for his coming.

A Leaf From the Mosaic Law

As I turn back to read from the law given to Israel under Moses, I am reminded of the story of the colored saint, who, when she had been reading of this law, set aside a fifth of her wages for her religious activities. When some of her white brothers sought to set her right on the law of tithes, she answered, "I knows what dem old Jews gave to de Lord, but I'se not goin' to let 'em get ahead of me. If dey could give a tenth to deir Lord, I guess I can give a fifth to my Master who died for me." With what should be our better appreciation of the fact that we are "bought with a price," and what that price was, surely we should not fall behind those who were "Israelites indeed," in the time of the "fathers."

Tithes and Offerings

When Malachi pronounced the curse upon Israel, it was not only in tithes that they had robbed God, but, "In tithes and offerings." As we consider that law as given in Deuteronomy 14, we are struck with the thought, Shall not we bring as full an offering to the Master under the gospel law as were they of former Israel required to do? Surely, we who have so often turned to the Old Testament for our pattern may well consider what was the obligation put upon former-day Israel in the line of their family budgets of expenditures.

Tithing Begins With One Tenth of All Produced

The Psalmist sings, "Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion: for the time to favor her, yea, the set time has come. For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof. So the heathen shall fear the name of the Lord, and all the kings of the earth thy glory. When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory. He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer. This shall be written for the generation to come: and the people which shall be created shall praise the Lord." (102: 13-18.) And Moses, in giving the law to be a "schoolmaster," to bring the people to a preparation for this Zion—with Christ at its head—wrote as follows:

Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year. And thou shalt eat before the Lord God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there, the tithe of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thine oil, and the firstlings of thy herds and of thy flocks; that thou mayest learn to fear the Lord thy God always.

And this is followed by the provision that in case they were living too far from the place of sacrifice (church headquarters), they were to turn this into money, and with the funds so raised, go up to the temple, and purchase such things as they wished to eat, and there to eat and rejoice together before the Lord, and, "The Levite that is within thy gates; thou shalt not forsake him; for he hath no part nor inheritance with thee." (Deuteronomy 14: 22-27.)

In speaking of this feast, in common with the other two national feasts which God required them to keep, the injunction is, "Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the Lord thy God in the place which he shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles: and they shall not appear before the Lord empty; every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the Lord thy God which he hath given thee." (Deuteronomy 16: 16, 17.)

Freewill Offerings

In the foregoing, we have a provision for three freewill offerings every year, from every male in the church. Do you suppose that, were we to make an inventory at the end of four months, that there would be nothing to render in this way unto the Master, if it was "according to the blessings of the Lord thy God which he hath given thee"? Surely not if we are "seeking first the kingdom."

Tithing of the Increase

In addition to this tenth, or tithing, that should make up the first item of our family or personal budgets, there then follows the law of tithing for the support of the priesthood, and for the relief of the poor, or for the general expenses of the church. How often have we heard this quoted, to emphasize the law of tithing! Why should we ignore the part which has to do with the individual member and his church obligations? Is it not a fact, and is it not based on good logic and law, that if we do the first, or keep the first requirement, we will certainly have more to tithe when we come to make our inventory to the bishopric? "In tithes and offerings," was the dereliction of Israel of old, and it is still true that, "The liberal soul shall be made fast."

I am convinced that when our Saints come to the point where they understand that their church activities is of first importance to them individually, so that they make it as much a thing to be provided for—even unto the tenth of their income—then will they be so enlarged in spirit, and find favor with God to such an extent, that it will be no longer a question of "How much do I owe?" but, rather, "How much can I put into the Bishop's hands for this work of building up the kingdom of God, and preparing for the coming of the Master?"

When we have reached this point, when we "bring forth all the tithe of thine [our] increase," and lay it up before the Lord for the general expenses of the church, there will be "meat in mine house." (See Deuteronomy 14: 28 and Malachi 3: 10.) And there will be no need to call home those who have been sent out to the nations of the world with the message of salvation, because the church cannot pay for what their families must have to live; nor will all the sacrifice, and curtailing of expenses be laid on these same elders and their families.

In October, 1831, (see Doctrine and Covenants 65) the church was admonished to "make ready for the Bridegroom," and this is still our job. I wonder if we fully sense the honor thus bestowed upon us, and what it will mean in ultimate glory and joy. It seems to me that if we did, there could be no sacrifice that we may be able to make which would be counted a hardship. Surely, if Christ were to make an appointment with us to come to our assembly next October, what a preparation would be made, if we fully credited the tidings of his so coming! How we would vie with one another in our desires to show our welcome of him by our gifts and offerings!

If other believers are under the injunction to "be as men who wait for their Lord to come," how much greater is our obligation to be so earnest-looking unto, and preparing for that "home-coming" when not only will we meet with the Savior (if we have prepared) but with all the Saints of God! May we be ready!

"Our Youngest Missionary"

On the cover of January Autumn Leaves is a picture of Amos T. Hall, a New Zealand lad eight year of age, whose zeal and devotion causes Elder H. W. Savage to call him "Our youngest missionary." At the time the photo was taken he had distributed 791 copies of the Gospel Standard, the mission church paper of Australasia. He lives in Saint Kilda, a suburb of Dunedin, New Zealand.

Does Geological Science Conflict With the Bible?

By W. H. Deam

In a communication to the Kansas City Star in regard to some of the natural beauty of Swope Park being hidden by trees and underbrush, referring particularly to rocks showing seams which evidently had been caused by water erosion, I stated that "they were worn away perhaps millions of years ago by waters of a lake fifty feet deep where now is the valley." A good brother took exception to that statement and told me that I did not agree with the Bible. I told him I had observed nothing in the Bible to disagree with that statement.

When geologists speak in terms of millions of years some people think they are contradicting the Bible account of the creation. People who think the Bible is vitiated when geologists speak of certain stratum of the earth being millions of years old allege that from the time God started with the creation of all things to the present time is approximately fourteen thousand years. In so doing they overlook some facts in the account of the creation.

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

Was the beginning only fourteen thousand years ago? Was there neither heaven nor earth prior to fourteen thousand years ago?

During the sixth day "God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them." Was that a corporeal creation? No.

There is a difference between the word created and the word formed. God first created not only man but all belonging to the animal and vegetable kingdoms, but neither existed, physically, till some time (no one knows how long) after the Sabbath rest of the Lord.

God created "every plant of the field before it was in the earth and every herb of the field before it grew: for the Lord God had not caused it to rain upon the earth and there was not a man to till the ground. And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul."—Genesis 2: 5-7.

Note that God "created" all these things as mentioned in the first chapter of Genesis, and then in the second chapter we learn that there were none in existence on the earth. On the sixth day as mentioned in the first chapter God "created" both man and woman and yet after that there "was not a man to till the ground" so God formed one of the dust of the ground.

The Inspired Version speaks plainly in chapter 2 verse 5 as follows: "For I the Lord God, created all things of which I have spoken, spiritually, before they were naturally upon the face of the earth."

How long the "spiritual" creation was before they were formed "naturally" we cannot conjecture. And if I understand the Inspired Version, the creation spoken of in the first chapter was not confined to one man and one woman, for the 6th verse of the second chapter says: "And I, the Lord God, had created all the children of men, and not yet a man to till the ground, for in heaven created I them, and there was not yet flesh upon the earth, neither in the water, neither in the air."

The creation mentioned in the first chapter was of "all the children of men," all that ever have lived or ever will live. People often combine in one the creation of man (spiritually) mentioned in the first chapter and the forming of man of dust mentioned in the second chapter. There is no reason for this because the creation of man related in the first chapter was during the sixth day (or sixth thousand years) while the forming of the mortal man of dust was some time subsequent to the seventh thousand years or day of rest. Both King James and the Inspired Bibles say the creation was "in the beginning." Does anyone think to limit the beginning of all things—the heavens included—to approximately fourteen thousand years?

I have not the least idea how long it was after "all the children of men" were spiritually created that mortal man was "formed of the dust of the ground." It may have been hundreds of millions of years. Don't lose sight of this fact, that the heaven and earth were the first of the creation—"in the beginning." There is a reckoning so we can tell somewhere near the length of time since Adam was made a "living soul," but prior to Adam there is no reckoning. The period of the creation was six days, and Peter says one day with the Lord is as a thousand years. But we do not know the length of time between the creation of heaven and the consummation of material things on this earth.

In the absence of knowledge it is very unwise to try to make the Bible contradict known facts proclaimed by science. Where true science is made to run counter to the Bible is when the Bible is misunderstood. The Bible is a great book—the Book of books, and contrary to it being like an "old fiddle" there can be only one tune played on it, and that is the right tune in harmony with facts. To try to make it opposed to facts is to try to make it as the proverbial "fiddle."

Tell your pastor the kind of subjects you are interested in, and why. It may help him in selection of sermon subjects.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

Longer Life, or More Useful?

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company reports that for the first six months of 1922 the death rate from tuberculosis was 13 per cent lower than for the corresponding period of 1921. Tuberculosis is therefore a preventable disease and is being prevented.

On the other hand, the deaths from cancer show no decrease but the efforts against it are by no means abated in the hopes of later being able to make a like report as in the case of tuberculosis.

There are fewer deaths from typhoid and other fevers, all of which are preventable; fewer from diphtheria, and fewer from whooping cough. According to an editorial in the Omaha Bee there is a decrease of murders; the number of people killed by automobiles increased. Pneumonia carried off more, as did also heart disease. There has been a decided increase in the number of people dying from heart disease. This may be in part caused by the decrease in other diseases, but in part it appears to be a genuine increase in the number of deaths. On the other hand it is encouraging to note a decrease in the percentage of all deaths during the past decade so on the whole the fight against disease indicates a present gain.

In the meantime another editorial in the Omaha Bee states that there has been an increase in the expectancy of life of 5.1 years in the past two decades to over 53 years, so that if it is continued until 1932 the average expectancy of seventy years will have been attained. But this editorial also raises the question whether length of life alone is to be considered desirable. Should long life or useful life be set before you, what would be your choice?

The Fight on Prohibition

A stronger fight is being made against prohibition this fall and winter than at any time since the constitutional amendment was adopted. The plea is offered, as an entering wedge, for light wines and beer.

Recent review of the situation in America has been made by Gifford Gordon, of Australia, who has written an excellent article in the Christian Work for October 21. He points out that there has been a decrease in the number of deaths per 100,000 of population between 1910 and 1920, that this is true for every age of life, that the hospital for the care of alcoholism shows a decided falling off. That there is some drinking is certain. All of the laws no matter how prohibitive are broken in every state by a small group. This is true of murder and arson and highway robbery as it is true of the violation of the prohibition law.

The surveys of the provident societies show a decrease between 1917 and 1921 of the number of calls for help. But even though the figures as a whole do not show a marked numerical decrease there is a decrease of poverty from alcoholism averaging about 75 per cent—that is, that there is only one fourth as much poverty in which drink is a factor.

Mr. Gordon takes up the various objections one by one and answers them.

The best results of prohibition will be shown in the future generation.

Prohibition was not "put over" suddenly but was discussed for many years and was in effect in thirty-three States before nationally adopted.

It did not go in under wartime excitement because the Congress that submitted it was elected before. America entered the war.

Prohibition is not responsible for the crime wave, as they have crime waves in England, France, and Germany. In fact, had it not been for the closing of the saloons the wave of crime would have been very much more severe.

Prohibition is not responsible for the increased use of narcotic drugs, for there has been a like increase in England though her drink bill was $200,000,000 last year. The victims of the drug habit are mostly young men and young women. Out of 1,403 drug patients in New York the city health department learned that only 12 said they were driven to it by the desire for alcohol. In Los Angeles only 4 out of 500 in the narcotic clinic had been users of alcohol.

This is only part of the data submitted by him. Much of the drinking before prohibition was of wines and beer. The return of beer and wine would mean the return of the saloon.

What they want is not light beers and wines but something with a strong alcoholic content. If light wines and beers were what the antiprohibitionists are seeking they have it at present in drinks containing one half of one per cent alcohol.

Milk as a Builder

Valuable suggestions by Loretto C. Lynch
in the Omaha Bee.

"We have been having in our town what is called 'Milk week.' The posters and lecturers tell us that in order to be healthy even adults should drink at least a pint of milk. Yet our town is full of healthy folks who do not drink milk at all. For instance, there is Mr. S. He is the picture of health and strength and he frankly admits that he has a real grown-up man's dietary and he leaves milk for babies. Will you express an opinion on this?"

But is he really healthy? Are his teeth sound and in good condition? Is he vigorous and energetic? Is his digestion good? These conditions cannot always be judged by appearance. But, granting that he really is healthy, after a careful examination by a physician, how may we account for his health on a nonmilk diet?

Often an adult believing he has a nonmilk diet forgets that he has just a little milk on his cereal, and just a little in his coffee, and a little more in his cocoanut custard pie, and some more in his chocolate pudding and yet some more in the ice cream, of which he is so fond.

Granting, however, that he eats nothing containing milk, he may still be in good health. For, if the water which he drinks in his particular neighborhood happens to be "hard" he will get a little lime from it and this will supplement what he really gets from a general mixed diet. Lime is used in other ways by the body to keep its machinery in good condition.

Then, again, he may secure from eggs many of the substances that he loses from his dietary by omitting milk. He may secure from the liberal use of leaves and stems of plants, such as cabbage, onions, spinach, and celery, some of the substances that he would lose by not using milk.

Unfortunately, many families make the mistake of excluding milk on the basis of cost, while the same family will purchase much of the more highly expensive and less useful meat.

But compare the expense of the things enumerated to a quart of milk. Were milk 25 cents a quart instead of its prevailing price it would still be the cheapest lime-rich food that can be included in the dietary.

The idea of a cup of milk at 2 in the afternoon and again before retiring will in time come into its own. If the tired mother, the overwrought housewife, the young business woman and the older person who thinks lack of energy due entirely to age will take two cups of milk daily at definite hours for one month a remarkable improvement will be noted.

Drink milk. Use it in your diet. A quart a day for little folks, a pint a day for grown-ups. It is one of your cheapest foods. Experiments on animals show that the milk drinkers grow and are lively.

Maya Civilization

An association has been formed of leading scientists with men of wealth in the East to delve into the mysteries of the ruins of Yucatan and Uxmal and elsewhere.

Professor Marshall Saville is quoted in the Boston Post of November 5 as stating that the language, writings, customs, religious elements, and art show absolutely no contact with Asia or Europe before the time of Columbus. He has emphasized, no doubt, the differences. The hieroglyphics are now recognized to be a form of code but no one yet seems to be able to decipher more than the date line with confidence. These people, however, were very highly civilized. They made one of the early calendars, dividing up the year into twenty months of 18 days with 5 extra days. This has been reported many times by different investigators. However their power had declined before the advent of the Europeans. But their ruins indicate a high civilization and a people of fabulous wealth.

Science and Religion

Doctor Charles P. Steinmetz, the consulting engineer of the General Electric Company, ranks very high in the practical scientific fields. His interest has been in scientific lines rather than in the metaphysical. He states that he thinks there is no scientific foundation for religion or for the idea of immortality, according to the Literary Digest, but does not therefore reject religion.

Religion deals with the relations of man to superior entities, that is, a personal God, while science deals with conclusions derived from laws of logic, from our sense of perception. "Though religion cannot be measured in watts or volts, it is not necessarily incompatible with science," he declares, for as he says:

"Our knowledge of the superior entities with which historic religion deals has been derived by experience and by 'revelation.' Undoubtedly experience led to the first conception of superior beings, or 'gods'; the forces of nature personified; the experiences in dreams; the orderly progress of nature, which seemed to imply a manager of the universe. . . .

"The answer is that science derives its conclusions by the laws of logic from the things we see, and does not deal with the real world, of which we know nothing, but with the world as it appears to our senses. But are there no limitations to our sense perceptions, which limit the validity of the conclusions we derive from them?

"All of our sense perceptions are limited by and attached to the conceptions of time and space. Kant, the greatest and most critical of all philosophers, denies that time and space are the product of experience, but shows them to be categories—conceptions in which our mind clothes the sense perceptions. Modern physics has come to the same conclusion in the relativity theory, that absolute space and absolute time have no existence, but time and space exist only as far as things or events fill them, that is, are forms of sense perception.

"Still greater and more pertinent is another limitation of our sense perceptions; our senses can perceive only finite things, but cannot perceive the infinite. No reasoning from any foundation can put anything into the conclusions which is not contained in the foundations, and thus, with our sense perceptions finite, all conclusions from them, that is, the entire structure of science, is limited to the finite. Hence any attempt of science to deal with an infinite conception of God, etc., must fail and lead to contradictions, be illogical.

"There can be no scientific foundation of religion, but belief must always remain the foundation of religion, while that of science is logical reasoning from facts, that is, sense perceptions, and all that we can say is that the two, science and religion, are not necessarily incompatible, but are different and unrelated activities of the human mind."

A Cause of Modern Paganism

There had perhaps never been a time when the sacramental principle had been more valuable and more needed than now. We heard to-day with wearisome iteration of the prominent part borne by the body and its instincts, especially the sexual instinct, in human life. Perhaps there had been something of a conspiracy of silence on these subjects in past years; but now the pendulum had swung right round, and psychoanalysts could hardly talk of anything else; they seemed indeed in their writings to be dabbling in dirt to a quite unnecessary degree. This unfortunate preoccupation of psychology coincided with a general reaction towards self-indulgence and paganism in present-day life. What must above all things be taught was that body and soul belonged together; that the body attained its truest beauty and did its best service as the instrument of the spirit; and that the two were reconciled and harmonized by the reception of something which was higher than either, something which could unite the two by lifting them both to a higher plane, namely, the reception of the Divine life of Jesus Christ.—Bishop of London in Daily Telegram.

No Crime Wave

The Russell Sage Foundation reports under date of November 23 a census of prisoners in penal institutions, comparing the years 1922 and 1917. They find quite marked two tendencies—one for an increase of crime following the war because of the loosening of moral restraint, the disturbing of social relations, and the cheapening of human life which always follows war. This tendency is obscured, however, by the fact that prohibition has intervened. Thus in twenty States which have prohibition before July 1, 1917, every State but one shows a large increase of prison population, the increase amounting to 32.2 per cent from 33,230 in 1917 to 44,025 in 1922.

On the other hand, the majority of the twenty-eight States which did not have prohibition before 1917 show a marked decrease of prison population, the net decrease, however, being but 3.2 per cent. In five States—Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, Missouri, and New York, taken somewhat at random—there is a decrease from 39,706 to 33,251. But it is interesting to note that the decrease is only 78 in the State prison population. Therefore nearly the whole of the decrease of 6,455 occurs in the county and city prisons and is due to prohibition.

The figures do not sustain the popular impression of a crime wave since there is an increase of only from 72.4 convicts in 100,000 population in 1917 to 74.5 in 1922, an increase of only 2.1 in 100,000 persons.

THE SEMINAR

List of Suggested Books on Political Economy

Prepared by the Social Science Department of Graceland College, Professor Charles E.
Irwin in charge.

Outlines of Economics, by Richard T. Ely. Price, postpaid, $3.10.

There are many textbooks available for the use of the student who wishes a serious presentation of economic theory. Moreover, there are a large number that represent different points of view, and it therefore is quite difficult to recommend any one book which will be satisfactory to all types of students. Those, however, who are interested in political economy in its humanistic aspect, will find Professor Ely's book one of the best in this field. One of the highest tributes that can be paid this book is that it presents in fairly balanced form the abstract economic principles interpreted in the light of their social significance.

Work and Wealth, by John A. Hobson. Price, postpaid, $2.85.

This book cannot be classed as a textbook, though the subject matter certainly can be easily adapted to class use. It is theoretical with the primary emphasis upon values. Mr. Hobson is an English author of the liberal school and writes of course under the influence of English conditions. Social laws, however, are much the same in England as in America and the student will find little difficulty in adapting this book to American conditions.

This book should be particularly interesting to Latter Day Saints for Hobson's view of present-day conditions more closely corresponds to our views of economic organization than any book printed during the last ten years.

Economic History

An Introduction to Economic History, 1922, by N. S. B. Gras. Price, postpaid, $2.35.

This is the newest book covering the field of economic history. This is a field that has been much neglected by the economist and has resulted in many works being subjected to sever criticism because of the element of bias that has been all too evident. It cannot be said that this book is free from bias, but represents at least some improvements over earlier ventures in the field.

History of Business Depressions, by O. C. Lichtner. Price, postpaid, $3.60.

Certainly this book is very timely. Experiencing as we are at the present time the pains of depression, this book deserves to be considered, if for no other reason, then, that we may learn to read the signs of the times, thus being forewarned to make provision for these periods. Getting caught is the penalty for our unawareness.

Social Interpretation of History, by M. Williams. Price, postpaid, $3.10.

This book was published in 1920 and was intended to be a refutation of the Marxian Economic Interpretation of History. Fair-minded people will of course want to read Marx before reading this book since the refutation will mean nothing unless they shall have a knowledge of the thing that is being refuted.

The Development of Economics, 1750-1900, by Oswald F. Boucke. Price, postpaid, $2.35.

The author groups the various economic theories under four heads of Nationalism, Utilitarianism, Historism, Marginalism; this is an arbitrary simplification which as he says in the preface, is useful in helping the student to fix the main outlines of the subject where a more detailed treatment might confuse him. The book is helpful in that it provides a background for a projected study of conditions to-day.

Agricultural Economics and Rural Sociology

Farm Management, by Richard Laban Adams. Price, postpaid, $4.10.

This is the most recent book on farm management, though probably is no better than Warren's book, published some years earlier. This book presents the subject from three points of view; (a) the point of view of the student and the farmer, (b) the point of view of the investigator, and (c) the point of view of the investor.

Agricultural Economics, by James E. Boyle. Price, postpaid, $3.10.

Both farm management and agricultural economics are mere subdivisions of political economy. Farm management emphasizes the relation of the farmer to his farm, in the securing of the highest net return. Agricultural economics on the other hand is concerned with the social aspects of agriculture. This book is written so as to be within the range of the average student of agricultural problems and is one of the few textbooks available in this field.

Rural Organization, by Walter Burr. Price, postpaid, $2.35.

A constructive study of rural social life from five distinct points of view; (1) economic life, (2) education, (3) religion, (4) recreation, and (5) pathological aspects.

The analysis is supplemented by well-chosen illustrations of rural social development through the operation of such agencies as the American Farm Bureau Federation, land grant colleges, the Red Cross, etc.

Principles of Agricultural Economics, by Henry C. Taylor. Price, postpaid, $2.60.

Professor Taylor is the dean of agricultural economists in this country, and this book is the outgrowth of nearly twenty years of teaching in this field.

In general the author holds to a comprehensive definition of agricultural economics. He includes some parts usually covered by studies in farm management and rural sociology. About one third of the book deals with the acquisition and tenure of farm land; more than one fourth is devoted to tenancy; approximately one third is concerned with the problems of agricultural production. There are some glaring omissions and the reader will find the text to be rather difficult reading. For general consumption perhaps Boyle's book is much to be preferred.

Labor and Labor Organizations

Organized Labor in American History, by Frank Tracy Carlton. Price, postpaid, $2.30.

The purpose of the author is to present the background concerning which knowledge is necessary if any constructive plan is to be made for better relations between capital and labor.

Generally speaking, this book is a substantial piece of work. One of its chief merits is that it is based on an accurate knowledge of the ideals and policies of organized labor.

Business Methods and Statistics

Commercial Research, An Outline of Working Principles, by C. S. Duncan. Price, postpaid, $2.35.

There are chapters on the need and character of commercial research; and on the sources, character methods of collecting, analysis, presentation, and interpretation of business facts.

Social Problems and Reforms

The College and New America, by J. W. Hudson. Price, postpaid, $2.10.

This book sets forth the exacting demands of this new age and portrays the opportunity which the college of to-day has in making a lasting contribution to the progress of the world.

Before the college can make that contribution, however, Mr. Hudson says that much pruning and purging must be done. His criticism is at times very caustic but not unmerited. The "academic mind" and "education" have too long been used as blanket terms having a significance either distorted and overextended, or else having been used in an altogether meaningless fashion.

This book should provoke serious thought and is worth one's time to read.

Trade Commerce and Commercial Crises

Marketing, Its Problems and Methods, by C. S. Duncan. Price, postpaid, $3.60.

The appearance of volumes of this sort reflects the growing interest in marketing as a field for research and study. This work is a textbook and is therefore fairly inclusive and constitutes a real contribution in that it is an excellent organization of a rather wide variety of scattered material.

At the close there is a discussion of the costs of marketing and of the problems of eliminating middlemen. He recognizes that the elimination of the middlemen does not necessarily mean a lessening in the cost of marketing. The marketing functions must be performed, and attack must be made rather upon uneconomical methods of performing those functions.

A New Play

For Sunday Schools or Religios. Can Be Given On Any Occasion

"THE LOST TRIO"

A new play by Ermina Perkins Kearney, assisted by the Special Day Committee of the Pen and Ink Club, is now ready and meets an insistent demand for something different for programs and special occasions.

Boy Scouts, Orioles, Temple Builders (or those who impersonate these groups) with a few others are leading characters.

The parts are easy and the costuming may be simple or elaborate as desired. The music required is either printed in the booklet or may be had from Zion's Praises.

Appropriate for any time, holidays, reunions, conventions, etc. The theme is helpful. "The lost trio" is Faith, Hope, and Charity, the finding of whom impresses both actors and hearers. The young people will be glad to help and will feel that it is worth while.

About a dozen copies should be had for best results in signing parts and rehearsals.

Price 10 cents a copy; 75 cents a dozen.

LETTERS AND NEWSSpecial Meetings at Saint Clair, Michigan

Prejudice removed, several baptized, more ready.

Special prayer meetings were held for a week prior to our special services. We had been looking forward for some time to the time when we could place before the people of Saint Clair the great and marvelous truths. The time came at last, and while some thought nothing could be done in this place some believed if the right servant of God came we might do a little good.

The time came and God sent his servant, our worthy brother, J. R. Grice. The first gun was fired on Sunday, November 5. We held forth for three weeks when we began to feel our efforts were futile. But our God came to the rescue and commended us through Brother Grice. The Lord said he was pleased with our efforts and that they should not be in vain for he had watered them with the dew of heaven and that we should gather the fruits of our labors.

One evening toward the end of the fourth week they began to ask for baptism and continued until eleven were baptized and many more were interested. A long section of the wall of prejudice has broken down and quite a number are studying. We know what occurs when men study and are honest in heart.

The sisters gathered in small groups for prayer each day. They did most of the tract distribution of near one thousand. We had fifty cards with photo of the speaker and placed them in all public places and in homes. We also advertised in our home paper and the Port Huron paper.

To our great surprise there were many who became interested and there are many to follow. Pastor and missionary agree there are about thirty-five in prospect. If all will only work together there is a bright prospect for Saint Clair Branch. We are making plans for another campaign in May or June.

Meetings in Ohio and Pennsylvania

Brother Cecil Neville and the writer has been appointed to labor in the Pittsburgh and Youngstown-Sharon Districts this conference year. The writer left Independence October 16, arriving at home the 17th.

After making all preparations, I left home for my field on October 27, visiting Warren, Niles, and Youngstown. I spent a week trying to get a schoolhouse near Niles, but was finally refused. The reason given was that they couldn't let anyone have the house that represented any particular denomination or that would teach doctrine.

I spent a little time at Warren where we have quite a nice little branch of Saints who are doing all they can to keep the camp fires burning. And they are doing fairly well. The writer then came to Lock No. 4, Pennsylvania, where I met Cecil Neville, the missionary supervisor. I finally made arrangements to hold a series of meetings at Fayette City beginning November 11 and have continued up to the present time.

The people seem to be so taken up with the things of the world that they have no time for religion of any kind. The church seems to be used more for a social center to meet in and have a good time than to worship God. Truly the Apostle Paul was not mistaken when he said that evil men and seducers would wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived. What will the harvest be?

How much will the Latter Day Saints be in advance of their neighbors? When we go to the Wednesday evening prayer meeting and find only eight or a dozen present out of the number of one hundred and fifty and when the missionaries come to hold missionary services many will not support the effort with their presence, let alone with their means, what will the harvest be? Yes, dear Saints, what will it be? Will it be a day of rejoicing or will it be a day of sorrow and mourning?

The Saints here are doing their part well. A number of them with a few of their friends had an enjoyable time Wednesday evening, November 29, it being the occasion of the 25th anniversary of Brother Samuel and Sister Kate Winship who were married by Brother Rudolph Etzenhouser at Cranshaw, Pennsylvania. They will be remembered by many of the traveling ministry. Their home has been the general stopping place for all the missionaries that come to this city. They received many beautiful and useful presents, all silver. Plates were laid for forty-two. All certainly enjoyed the good things set before them.

The time before and after supper was spent in singing the songs of Zion. Near the close a man not a member of the church sang a number of comical songs to the delight and entertainment of the young people, and the older ones seemed to enjoy it as well as the young. About half past eleven all took their departure, wishing the brother and sister many happy years together, and if possible another anniversary twenty-five years hence.

Brother Neville and I went to the Lock and took dinner Thanksgiving with Brother Wise.

We hope all will end well. Wishing all a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year, I remain your brother in Christ,
JAMES MCCONNAUGHY.

From New President of the Southwestern Kansas District

the Presidency.*

At the beginning of another year, I find myself looking back over the year just past. It has been one of the most important of my life. I began the year as a member of the religious education class of 1921-22, then spent the summer months in missionary work in Lamoni Stake, coming to this city following General Conference. I cannot place an evaluation upon my time spent at Graceland. I am very glad that I was permitted to sit at the feet of such men as Floyd M. McDowell, Lonzo Jones, and Charles E. Irwin. The greatest thing that I learned at Graceland was how to study. I had previous to my coming to Graceland spent most of my spare time in study, but much of my time was wasted because I did not know what and how.

I had to some degree a social vision of our work but from my study of sociology, psychology, and religious history my social vision of our work was very much enlarged.

I was visiting last night a man of this city who has written a very lengthy paper against the Book of Mormon. After listening to the reading of his paper, I asked him what he thought of our social program. He answered he knew nothing about it. I shall try if possible to get him interested in this feature of our work.

I have found that one of the greatest needs of our leaders is a knowledge of people. One may know much about our doctrine and theology, but if he does not know his people he will fail.

The institute held in this city closed New Year's Day, a report of which you have no doubt received from Apostle Edwards. The responsibility placed upon me at that time I feel very much [that of district president]. Any advice as to how to organize my work I would very gladly welcome. My experience as a pastor under Elder Garver in Lamoni Stake will help me considerably in organizing my work here. Brother Garver is a very wonderful man.

Elder R. J. Wildey is our district superintendent of the Sunday School Department. Elder Ellis Bedwell is the superintendent of the Religio Department. The heads of the other departments have not been appointed as yet.

We have many scattered members in this territory. I am planning to get in touch with them by correspondence now. I will not be able to visit them for a month or two because of my work here.

My election to the district presidency will make necessary some change in my plans. I had planned to take up some school work the second semester of this school year at the Friends University, but I will have to give it up for this term. I am planning to take up some work next year and will plan my church work to that end.

I am very glad that I am called to be a servant of God and his people and shall pray that I shall be able to help you put over our very wonderful program.

Sincerely,

THOMAS S. WILLIAMS.

Heard Radio Program in Wyoming

As the hardware store has installed a radio receiving set our greatest desire has been to catch that sent out by the Stone Church.

Last Sunday night about 6.30 we began to hear from different places. We were listening to the announcer from the Palmer School at Davenport, Iowa, when sweet music cut him off and we thought it must be from Davenport. I told the folks that if we could hear the choir from the Stone Church, nothing could beat it. To our surprise we were listening to that very same choir as was announced when they were through.

We also could follow the sermon fine and only wished we could have heard the prayer. No doubt we will hear better when we are more used to the radio. Thanks to the good Lord and the minister and choir and radio we are not always alone if we are out by ourselves among the cactus and sagebrush.

Sincerely,

MRS. JOHN DURKEE.

Christmas Among Oklahoma Indians

One of our Indian brethren writes to President F. M. Smith as follows from Kingfisher, Oklahoma.

I was indeed very glad to hear from you, especially your Christmas greetings, and also the message you sent relative to the peyote.

We had a nice Christmas gathering at Brother Reuben Taylor's place, although the local branch was not in financial condition to have much of a Christmas tree, but my wife and I labored together in buying candy and nuts and also had cakes and pies what she baked for Christmas dinner.

At night I conducted a song service and talks were given by Reuben Taylor and Phillip Cook.

Now for what I have done for the local branch I don't expect to be repaid from them or anyone else but I was doing it for our Master and Savior Jesus Christ.

After the Christmas celebration was over I went to Calumet where the native Americans were holding their Christmas doings and in visiting their meeting I thought I had a hard task for me, but I trust in the Lord. I began to lecture to them about Christ and ended my talk with a quotation from the Book of Mormon, which interested them all.

I miss Brother Sanders as he used to visit often the camp there during Christmas or any time they had gatherings there.

I am sorry I did not get your letter before I left here, as I would have had a chance to read your message before the Indians.

Yours respectfully,
CHARLES M. WICKS.

Cold Affects Missionary Work in Canada

(From a letter to the First Presidency.)

The weather has been so cold (30 degrees to 45 degrees below) that I could not do much except in a fireside way, and even that was limited to a few homes. We arranged to hold services each Sunday, starting at 2 p. m., about the warmest part of the day. One big trouble this time of the year is to get stable room for horses. The low price of cattle has caused farmers to hold their cattle, and every barn is full. Often we could hold a service in a private house if we could find room for the teams. One thing I found was that there is opportunity for lots of work right near home if only I could get to it at the right time of the year.

Another thing I did this winter was to freeze my nose, and, by the way, that was no small thing. In all the years I have traveled out here I never froze before. I must be getting careless. Guess I shall have to get the Indians to make a moccasin for my nose, though it is like trying to cover up a pump handle.

Best wishes for a prosperous year,
SHELLBROOK, SASKATCHEWAN. BIRCH WHITING.

Expounding of Acts 2:23

Did Peter in the above text intend to convey the idea that God designed or planned the crucifixion of Christ?

The writer of this article says no, for if God planned the crucifixion the logical conclusion would be that those who did the deed were doing according to God's plan and would therefore be entitled to the highest glory that God had or would provide for man. What, then, did he intend to convey? Let us turn to the text and read, "Him being delivered by the determinate council and foreknowledge of God ye have taken and by wicked hands have crucified and slain."

The expression, "The determinate council and foreknowledge of God," hinges on the word delivered and not on the word crucified. "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all." (Romans 8:32.) God could not have spared his own Son without destroying the agency of man. That he could not do and make the man out of him that he intends to do through the atoning blood of Christ, man being willing, showing his willingness by obedience.

As to planning the crucifixion or death of Christ, it seems plain to the writer that Satan must have taken the leading part, and that the plan was not made very long before it could be executed. Neither the Devil nor man could kill the Christ until born in the flesh. But that the attempt was made soon after his birth is made plain in New Testament history, and that he was pursued until the deed was accomplished.

God could not have "spared his Son," and been consistent with his justice to all without sparing all of his servants.

Christ foretold the death of the apostles and gave them to understand that "he that loses his life for my sake shall find it again."

Now reader, just learn to draw the line between that which God before knew and that which God before ordained and you will get this seeming tangle straightened out.

The Orient on Social Service of the Church

Last spring a convention was held of the World's Students' Christian Federation in which 133 nations were represented. The meeting was held in Pekin, China, and was remarkable for the fact that so many of the nations sent native delegations either in whole or for the greater part. In earlier years the conferences were attended almost entirely by missionaries or workers from other countries.

Of the 126 delegates, a number of them were missionaries from other places. There were in addition many local Christians in attendance.

As showing the wide interest in the social theme one of the great topics taken up for discussion by them was "Social and industrial reconstruction," with such questions discussed as, "Is the capitalist system capable of being changed to express the spirit of Jesus?" One delegation replied in a decided negative that the capitalist system must be abolished as incompatible with real Christianity. Another delegation observed that the present system introduces both the idle rich and the idle poor, whereas work is both the right and obligation of every citizen. All recognized that the present system needs correction. The discussion presupposes an ideal in the minds of those seeking a new social order and that this ideal is founded upon the family, of which love is the bond, one which includes common sense rather than subjects, that such an order must be established through an inward change rather than by outward arrangement.

Some of the points urged were: (1) Ample provision for recreation; (2) Parents should take the responsibility of education in the home; (3) Women should have equal economic opportunities with men; (4) The amount of wealth that can be bequeathed should be strictly limited; (5) The franchise should be universal; and (6) There should be open diplomacy with public ratification of international agreements.

The Literary Digest reports a steady growth of Christianity in India though not a rapid growth. Eleven years ago the native Hindu Christians numbered 3,876,000. In the eleven years there has been an increase to 4,754,000. But that this is only a start is shown by the fact that there are nearly 310,000,000 inhabitants of India of which nearly 217,000,000 are Hindus, and 68,000,000 are Moslems.

In this connection we are confronted by the fact, as the Church Times, of London, points out, that Mohammedanism is spreading very rapidly in Africa and in a few years may be the religion of the black races and Christianity be excluded. One difficulty that Christianity has is the division into so many different denominations. This is one of the extreme aspects of the necessity for missionary effort and this is one that no sectarian Christian church is meeting adequately as yet.

Elder J. Charles May left January 9 for Florida, as he is missionary supervisor for five or six States including Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and the Carolinas as well as the Isle of Pines and the Grand Cayman Islands. He has recently returned from missionary service at Grand Cayman and may return there from Florida as it is a new field. He reports that there are several good local men in that field.

A Vision Concerning the Evils of the Times

I will tell of a vision I had during a recent illness.

The evening of December 19 my husband sat by my bedside and we talked of the trend of the times toward evil—the moral laxity, increase in crime, etc. About half past nine o'clock my husband went to bed in the adjoining room. I lay for some time with my face toward the wall, feeling quite blue and discouraged. The thought came to me of how easy it would be for a burglar to enter our home when I am alone with my babies.

Then I seemed to see a man, masked, coming in at the door. My eyes remained closed and toward the wall. A panorama of scenes passed swiftly before my eyes. The burglar was followed immediately by a murderer. A woman stood in front of me, screaming, as a man killed her with a knife. Crime after crime followed in rapid succession. Then a monk, in hood and cowl and robe, was kneeling, but evidently with no sincerity. As he knelt he seemed gradually to change into an animal reared on its hind legs. I thought peevishly, "I wish such things wouldn't come into my head. Why can't I have pleasant thoughts and go to sleep?"

Then I saw various beasts, all fierce and repulsive. Next a priest, bareheaded and robed, addressing a group of nuns. The church in which they appeared to be seemed rich and elaborate, and a spotlight was on the priest. Then it shifted to the nuns, who turned their faces toward me for an instant and then back. By this time I realized that my thoughts were beyond my control. I lay motionless waiting for whatever was to come.

The same priest was then seen addressing a congregation. He looked very hypocritical and crafty. The scene gradually faded and I saw a man of another type. He stood alone in a very modest pulpit, wearing a very plain black suit and an air of humble sincerity, but not cringing nor doubting. In his hand was an open Bible. I watched, hoping the spotlight would show me some particular passage. But it did not. The man stood so for a moment, both himself and the book in a glow of light. Then he passed from sight.

After a time I opened my eyes to the dark room, and realized that these things were shown me for a purpose. The meaning is, I think, obvious to all. But I needed a reminder of the eternal truth. I no longer feel so discouraged.

We cannot be insensible of world conditions, but we can each lead a pure and faithful life, thus influencing others; and we, knowing that the Bible is the fountain of all truth and knowledge, will not be led astray by any false doctrine, nor "worship the beast." Let us each do our part, "you in your small corner, and I in mine," and hope for the best.

Will Explain Law of Tithing More

We are reminded the old year has passed into history and the new year is here with all of its joys and sorrows and new responsibilities confronting us all. I believe I have a new vision that I hope will not help me alone, but all that I am permitted to labor with. I have not preached the law of tithing very much, believing this was the duty of bishops and agents, but in the future the law of tithing will receive my best effort. I long to see the treasury built up so the hands of our missionary force can be untied and Zion built up, and I feel it will take a united effort with faith and works united if we shall redeem Zion.

I am willing to pledge my best service to the church for 1923. I hope all strife will cease and the spirit of consecration fill each heart, so all may labor to the honor and glory of God. This life is too short to hold spite or try to get even with our enemies, so may we remember through 1923 we are our brother's keeper.

Wishing you all a Happy New Year, I am

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM M. GRICE.

Finds good prospects for missionary work in the north.

This has been a very strenuous summer for me. Leaving my camp in the mountains of the Kantisna one day I went over to a neighbor's, six miles away, but found his dogs tied up and very hungry and evidence to show he had not been there for two weeks; so I fed the dogs and then went over a divide six miles more, where there were some more miners, and organized a searching party and we found the man dead by the head of the creek where he had died of heart failure. I went over to the Commissioner's, forty miles distant, to report the death, and when I got back another man had died. We buried both men on the creek and I was asked to offer prayer as the boys knew I was the only Christian in that part of the country. I surely felt repaid for living so that I could perform the simple service. There were some comments on the prayer, one man asking me what church I belonged to and another what secret society I belonged to, as he thought the prayer was a formula from some secret society; but I explained to him that it was just a prayer of my own with some of the principles of the gospel. I talked to him

Bound and Unbound Volumes of "Heralds"

Special Offer to Provide Complete Sets for Reference and to file in Your Library

In response to a demand for such accommodation, we will arrange to file at this office a copy of each issue of the SAINTS' HERALD, the official publication of the church, to be delivered either bound or unbound at the end of the year to those who place orders for them now.

As long as the issues since January 1 are available we will date the arrangement to the beginning of the year. Otherwise we shall have to omit the first or other missing numbers, so your order should be placed at once if you wish complete sets.

We will furnish delivered in the United States all the issues of the 1923 HERALD, bound in one book, with strong cloth board and properly labeled, for payment to be made to us sometime before the end of the year 1923. This will require that we be notified now so we can file a copy each week.

If the year's complete volume is desired unbound, we will deliver it on the above basis for

Many persons find it difficult to keep each week's issue unsoiled and untorn. The paper should be read freely by members of the family, and this always means more or less wear and tear. Assure yourself a complete and clean volume for the entire year at the cost of a year's subscription, with a small amount added for binding.

for a long time on the gospel and he said he liked to hear it, so after that he always wanted to hear more of it whenever I was around.

I made four trips to the Commissioner's this summer, eighty miles the round trip over five mountain ranges. One man went crazy and threatened to shoot everyone around, but we finally got him and took the gun away from him and took him to town.

I am expecting to get started mining next spring but I would like to see a missionary up here to open up the work as I believe there is a work here to do. I am doing what I can and trying to live a good moral and Christian life and would be of any service I could to help open up the work here.

Have not had much cold weather here this winter, 30 degrees below being about the coldest. Most of the time the weather has been around zero.

Wishing you all a Merry Christmas and Happy New Year,

Southwestern Kansas District Organized

The institute held in Wichita, Kansas, December 30 to January 1 was a decided success from all viewpoints, the outlying branches being well represented as well as isolated members.

The Southwestern District of Kansas was organized at a business meeting in charge of Apostles Frank H. Edwards and Roy Budd, and the following officers were elected: President, Elder T. S. Williams; district superintendent of Sunday school, Elder R. J. Wildey, of Hutchinson; district superintendent of Religio, Elder Ellis Bedwell, of Wichita; district secretary, Sister J. J. Wilson, of Wichita; Bishop's agent, Elder J. W. Wooten. The remaining offices are to be filled later.

The institute program proved to be very successful, the principal lectures and talks being delivered by A. Max Carmichael, General Sunday School Superintendent, and Apostles Frank H. Edwards and Roy Budd.

The date of the first district conference was left in the hands of the district officers.

New Branch at Macon

Apostle F. Henry Edwards visited us rather unexpectedly and preached a couple of sermons Sunday and Monday evenings, December 18 and 19. We were glad to have the opportunity to become better acquainted with him.

On Sunday morning December 18, Brother Edwards organized a branch at Macon. The Macon Saints have held their membership in Bevier Branch. There are about fifty-five members in and near Macon. About two years ago they purchased the Catholic church building and remodeled it. It is a neat little brick building, plenty large enough for present needs.

Some of our members listened in to the radio sermon broadcasted by Brother R. V. Hopkins several weeks ago. The sermon and music were heard distinctly and much enjoyed.

A letter was just received announcing the safe arrival of Brother and Sister Vernon D. Ruch and baby in Norway.

Elder F. T. Mussell spent several days with us recently finishing up several items of district business before departing for his new field.

J. L. WILLIAMS.

Florida and California weather continues here and, except for the dreary ones who see a long winter ahead anyway, people are rejoicing over the wonderful season we have had.

There was a good attendance at all services Sunday. Following were the appointments: Stone Church, Elders F. Henry Edwards and Walter W. Smith; Walnut Park Church, Elders F. A. Smith and A. B. Phillips; Liberty Street Church, Elders D. O. Cato and M. A. Etzenhouser; Englewood, Bishop B. R. McGuire and Apostle F. Henry Edwards.

The annual series of meetings conducted by the Aaronic priesthood of the Enoch Hill Church in which the local priesthood will be the speakers commenced last Sunday morning and will extend over two weeks, concluding with the evening service of Sunday, January 28. Meetings are held each night, excepting Saturday, at 8 o'clock. This is the third annual series of this character which has been held at that church and which in the past have been highly successful, resulting in a better cooperation between priesthood and laity.

The quarterly conference in Zion was held January 8 at the Stone Church with a representative group from each of the churches in Zion present. The pastor, Elder Roy V. Hopkins, assisted by Presidents Frederick M. and Elbert A. Smith, presided, and Guy P. Fairbanks was elected secretary. Reports were read from the pastor, the bishop, and the various quorums.

The following ordinations were proposed and authorized: Ira I. Burdick and John C. Schwab to office of elder, E. M. Sellers to office of teacher, and Lane Bolt to office of deacon.

Bishop J. A. Becker submitted a budget of $10,000 to cover the local expenses of the various churches in Zion during the coming year. He also recommended that the bishop be authorized to proceed at once in the matter of building a steam heating plant back of the Dining Hall. It was proposed that this steam plant be large enough to heat the Stone Church, Dining Hall, the library, and kindergarten, and perhaps also the Order of Enoch House and the general office building. The bishop was authorized by the conference to proceed at once with this program.

The appointment of pastors for the various churches in Zion was proposed by the Presidency and adopted by the conference as follows: R. V. Hopkins, pastor of Zion and the Stone Church; Richard J. Lambert, Second Independence Church; J. A. Dowker, Walnut Park Church; Merrill A. Etzenhouser, Liberty Street Church; W. D. Bullard, Enoch Hill Church; J. E. Warne, Englewood Church; John Soderstadt, Spring Branch Church.

The Statistical Department reported that the records show an enrollment in Zion of 4,506, but there are 553 of this number whom the department are unable to locate.

A considerable portion of the conference time was taken up in talking over the question of coordinating the various departments of church work in Zion. The First Presidency made the following recommendation:

"To the Conference in Zion; Greeting:

"In the judgment of the Presidency the time has come for a more definite coordination of the departments in Zion and a more uniform method of procedure in selecting officers. Most of the locals in Zion have adopted what is known as Form Four, with certain necessary modifications. The way would seem clear then for action by the conference, and we suggest the adoption of the following rules of procedure:

"(1) The heads of the general departments of the church and the pastor in Zion in consultation with the First Presidency shall nominate the heads of departments in Zion, subject to ratification by the conference in Zion.

"(2) The four department heads in Zion shall then in consultation with the pastor in Zion select the heads of the departments in the various congregations; the pastor in each congregation to be duly consulted. These selections shall be presented to the conference for approval.

"(3) In each local congregation the four local heads of departments together with the pastor shall appoint all subordinate officers and teachers."

Action on the above recommendation was deferred until the March conference.

Tuesday evening, January 9, the employees and officials of the Herald Publishing House, together with their families, were entertained at the Dining Hall by Business Manager and Mrs. Granville S. Trowbridge. The evening was spent pleasantly in the playing of games and in listening to an address by Bishop McGuire and vocal solos by Mrs. S. A. Burgess and Mr. George Anway. Light refreshments were served at the close of the program. This gathering of the Herald people has come to be an annual affair and all seem to enjoy the opportunity of getting better acquainted.

Elder J. D. Shower, who has been with his family over the holidays, returned to his field in Southern Ohio Monday. He went directly to McDermott, Ohio, where he is going to conduct a series of meetings.

Miss Gertrude E. Copeland, from Philadelphia, took charge of the Independence Sanitarium as superintendent January 3 and now has full direction of that institution. Sister Copeland has had a great deal of experience in this class of work. She was superintendent of the Reading Homeopathic Hospital at Read, Pennsylvania, and also did her turn overseas. She reports that there are thirty-five patients now in the Sanitarium, among them being several emergency cases. The Sanitarium repeatedly demonstrates its value to the community in its prompt and efficient care of accident and emergency cases in the vicinity of Independence, and the town people appreciate the service that is extended.

Elder C. C. Joehnk, who at one time was on a mission to Germany for five years and who has long been a member of the eighth quorum of elders, died in Independence on January 11. He has resided of late at Knobnoster, Missouri, and is survived by his wife, Mrs. Ida Joehnk. The funeral was at the Stone Church and the interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

Mr. and Mrs. Earl Moore are the proud parents of a baby girl who was born at the Independence Sanitarium, January 9.

Miss Cora Fligg, daughter of Elder William I. Fligg, went home from the Sanitarium last week having recovered nicely from an operation which she underwent there sometime ago.

Brother U. W. Greene underwent an operation at the Sanitarium last week. His nurse reports him making a very fine recovery.

Church Historian Walter W. Smith went to Lamoni Monday morning and will remain there until Thursday, delivering his annual series of lectures to the class in religious education at Graceland, and filling other speaking appointments there.

Doctor G. Leonard Harrington left Independence January 5 for a trip to Honolulu. As stated above Miss Copeland, superintendent, will have charge of the Sanitarium in his absence.

Interest continues to grow in the radio programs conducted each Sunday evening at 6 o'clock in Independence. These programs are broadcasted by the Central Radio Company, Kansas City. The lecture last Sunday evening was by Elder R. V. Hopkins, on the subject, "The Book of Mormon proven by American archæology." This concluded his series on the Book of Mormon and next Sunday evening Elder Walter W. Smith will address his audience by ether on, "The coming forth of the Book of Mormon." The music by Pauline Becker Etzenhouser, Lillian Green, and Ammon Fry, with vocal numbers by Bertha Bailey Burgess, was greatly appreciated. Next Sunday evening the Walnut Park musicians will furnish the program. Details printed elsewhere in this issue.

The young people's services which are to be held at the Stone Church each Sunday at 11 o'clock started Sunday and promise much of value to the young people and to those who will be affected by the activities growing out of these meetings. Elder E. D. Moore is in direct charge, but will be assisted by others.

There was a joint recital given at the Stone Church Monday evening by Arthur H. Mills, pianist, and Eugene Christy, tenor. This program was given under the auspices of the Independence Music Club and was a complimentary number on their winter series.

Council Bluffs and Vicinity

The district conference of the Pottawattamie District was held in this city beginning Wednesday, the 27th, at 7.30 p. m. and continued over Sunday the 31st. The forenoons, afternoons, and evenings were all occupied with services, although the day services were not well attended. The evening services were largely attended, especially when there was an entertainment. The good Spirit prevailed in the institute and business sessions as well as in the services. It is thought that much good was done. The district president was deprived of the privilege of being present on account of illness from which he has not yet recovered, although somewhat improved. There were ordained during the conference, Brother A. A. Smith to the office of elder, and Roy Henderson to the office of priest. Two adults were baptized. The preaching was done by Brothers A. M. Chase, Charles Putnam, and J. F. Garver.

The funeral of Brother Robert Currie was held at the church on the 17th and largely attended. Another funeral was held at the church Thursday, the 4th, this being the death of the only child of Mr. Lora Kelly and wife of Omaha.

At the same time as the funeral of Brother Robert Currie the funeral service of Sister David Carlile, of Underwood, was held at that place by the district president.

The Christmas entertainments held in the city by the Saints were as follows: At Riverside on Friday evening the 22d; at Belmont, Sunday evening the 24th; and at Central on Tuesday evening the 26th of December.

At the close of the conference on Sunday some of the young people of the church gathered at the home of Sister Ione Anderson or the place where she is making her home and had a watch party and yet others with less thought of the sacredness of the time went to spend the time skating till the ushering in of the New Year.

I forgot to say that both the branch and the district have indorsed Form Four of the suggested plans for conducting the organizations of the church, and will try the virtue of that which is yet a theory, whether an advantage over past methods or not is to be proved, but we have been willing to prove the suggestion.

We are assured that there is a standard for right and wrong, and what one may think of anything does not change it from wrong to right nor from right to wrong. This has been the idea that some have had about baptism. If we think that sprinkling or some other form is right it is just as good as the plan which we believe God has ordained, and so we have taught since the Restoration that the religious world has departed from the standard and gone into error and we have hard work to convince the majority of the people that one way is better than the way they thought was right thinking so from what they had been traditioned to believe.

The large majority of the Saints are desirous of a continuous study of the sacred books of the church in the Religio, especially the Book of Mormon. This is the study that was agreed upon at the time when the Religio was thought to be dead; and the committee to whom was referred the reviving of it brought in their decision after special hours of prayerful consideration that the Book of Mormon should form the basis of study, associated with an appropriate program of literature and music. Since that time this organization has been one for good in the church and trust it always will be.

Brother Guy R. Johnson and Sister Eva Eunice Dobson, the youngest daughter of Elder Lyons Dobson, were married at the residence of Elder J. F. Mintun Sunday, December 31, at about noon. Both are residents of Deloit, Iowa, where they expect to make their home. They spent a week at Council Bluffs, visiting relatives and friends.

Grass Lake, Michigan

We do not have any church privileges here; all we have is the HERALD to keep us in touch with what is going on.

When I hear so many saying, "Why doesn't the church do something for her people?" I feel like saying, "Why don't we as children do something for ourselves?" We can talk and sit down but what good will that do us or anyone else? Let us work together and then we can win. There is only one way to win and that is to work in harmony with the head, pay our tithing, and try to become more pure in heart that we may help in the vineyard of the Lord. I for one wish to dwell in Zion; to do so I must become pure in heart.

I have heard it said that the world is getting better but I fail to see it. On the other hand it is getting worse and will till our Lord comes to put all wrong under his feet. The time is near at hand when we must gather together. Are we in a condition to be gathered? If not, why not? Do we want to be shut outside?

"Let us pray for one another
For the day is fading fast,
And the night is growing darker,
While the scourge goes flaming past."

Yours in the bonds of truth,
WILLARD GREEN.

Dallas, Texas

The Dallas Branch is progressing steadily and the Saints seem to be awakening to their duty towards the building up of the kingdom established for the last time.

We have had a series of meetings by our missionary, S. S. Smith, and we feel he has done much for the success of the Saints in their own spiritual behalf as well as sown the good seed for the few outsiders who came. We hope the time will speedily come when he can again come back to the Dallas Branch.

Our Sunday school has done very well in the past twelve months, and beginning with the new year we all hope to work together in the harness and put forth better efforts for the coming year and help to encourage our younger boys and girls in building up the kingdom so they will be ready to take our places and carry on the work in later years. The Sunday school gave an interesting Christmas program on Sunday night. We were all very much pleased with the

FORT TOWSON, OKLAHOMA, December 25, 1922.

Editors Herald: I am renewing my subscription for the HERALD and am also sending one dollar Christmas offering.

I have been in the church twenty years, being baptized by E. A. Erwin. I have never regretted the step but have been made to rejoice many times and can say that I know this work is true and Jesus is indeed the Christ.

We do not have Sunday school and we have not had any preaching since last summer. Saints, this is all very discouraging to one who loves the gospel, and to never hear a prayer, but our one little feeble effort at times it seems like doing nothing. But I have a great desire to press on; in fact, I have never looked back except to profit by the mistakes I have made. I take the Ensign and Autumn Leaves, and am sending for Stepping Stones at this writing. I cannot see how I could do without them as they have so many good sermons and letters.

I ask the prayers of the Saints, as my health is very poor.

Your sister in the one faith,

MRS. BELLE CHAPPELL.

SECRETARY TO GOVERNOR OF COLORADO

Heman Hale Smith, the son of our late general church historian, Heman C. Smith, and Vida E. Smith, dean of women at Graceland College, has recently been appointed as private secretary to the governor of Colorado, William E. Sweet. Mr. Sweet, within an hour after he was certain of election, announced this appointment. For the past year and a half Brother Smith has been acting as assistant professor of economics at the University of Colorado.

SUGGESTED BOOKS ON POLITICAL ECONOMY

The attention of our readers is called to the list of books on political economy in another department of the HERALD. This was sent us by President G. N. Briggs as the head of that department. We are also in receipt of a letter from Professor C. E. Irwin in which he explains the review or comments which follow the title of each book.

We have long believed with Professor Irwin and President Briggs that it is better to give such descriptive matter for the benefit of the possible student. In this list the books are classified under seven general headings and then sub-classified, one or more books being suggested under each general heading and a description given, so that the reader may have some understanding of the subject matter covered before attempting to purchase.

NEW EDITION OF MARVELOUS WORK AND A WONDER

For some time all orders for the "best seller" in our church literature have been held up pending the issuance of the new edition now on the press. Within less than a month this greatly revised and enlarged edition will be ready for distribution. It is gotten out in usual book style of type and size of page, and has a large number of illustrations added.

Most of the edition will be bound in paper in order to keep the price at a minimum, with a limited number in cloth for those who wish a more permanent binding.

This is the thirty-third thousand of these books so well adapted to introducing the gospel to thoughtful persons who will read. It has wide scope, and covers the ground in a way not approached by any other book we have.

Well arranged and with convenient subheadings all listed for quick reference. Price will be announced soon.

An Unshrinking Faith

We sometimes sing, "Oh, for a faith that will not shrink, though pressed by every foe; that will not tremble on the brink of any earthly woe," and there are times in our gospel experience when we find it necessary to give to our heavenly Father that implicit faith which Abraham exhibited when he left his home in his old age, not knowing whither he went, but assured that God would lead him. By faith he was willing to offer up Isaac; by faith Enoch saw Zion; by faith many mighty works have been done in the history of the church of God.

When serious sickness threatens, there are times when we must place our faith in our heavenly Father and render obedience to his direction even though we see not the reason why. There are times when our loved ones are sick when we find it even harder to exercise the proper faith, a trust that is sure, the assurance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.

But Alma points out how closely related this proper faith is to knowledge and how it is founded in fact upon knowledge, that we have proven the Lord and found him true. Therefore we can have and do have implicit faith in that which he commands or promises. It is true that the commands of God are sure, making wise the simple. It is true that he calls upon us to reason together. It is true that he has given us our free agency and asks an intelligent faith, that we use our reason. But that very reason tells us that as there are times when we must ask from our children obedience because we know what is best, so there are times when our heavenly Father must ask from us obedience and that faith that neither life nor death, things present or things to come, can separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus.

It is not always easy to exercise that faith and obedience when we are called to leave loved ones and go abroad to carry this gospel of the kingdom to a hungry and thirsty world, to the honest in heart who are longing to know God. It is not easy when that longer separation comes and some one much beloved is taken from us. But from our knowledge of the work of God we are assured that it is the purpose of God that we shall understand as soon as we are able and that what he wills will in the end work for good for those who love him and keep his commandments.

There are times when we must exercise that trust and that obedience and move forward in faith assured that in his own time we shall see and know the reason why.

So these two themes of knowledge and understanding and of faith and obedience to the commands of God with a certain trust that we will in time know the reason, go hand in hand, and both work for our development as individuals and as a people.

Think of that faith of Jesus when he sweat great drops of blood, "O Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me." Yet he added, "Not my will but thine be done, for I come as it is written in the book of thy law to do thy will, O God." He moved forward, then, to the most tragic death, the most intense suffering, to taste the pangs of hell itself in order that the purposes of God might be carried out.

Our faith is not only in God but in our brothers that there are not a few who are willing to exercise that faith in Him, "Though he slay me yet will I trust him." And this faith is founded on their experience, on their spiritual knowledge of the goodness and mercy of God who permits even the cursing of those who hate him, who work for the blessing of those who love him.

Klan Contributions

Recently from a Texas city there came to us an inquiry from one of our workers whether he should accept or refuse personal contribution made by Ku Klux Klan in uniform. We replied that he must render his own judgment inasmuch as the contributions were to be personal, but we suggested that perhaps he could use the money to as good purposes or better than the klan, and that in other cases money had been received from other organizations which profited by the gift through the publicity given, and that accepting the contribution did not necessarily mean indorsement of the plan or activities of the donor. From the brother we have since received the following:

"Your letter and telegram came duly to hand. I notice your favorable comment to receiving a personal contribution from the klan. To date there has been nothing done. The offer has been made through one of our members who belongs to the klan, but we have hesitated about receiving such contribution, owing to the divided condition of the Saints here in the — Branch on the question, and there we have let it rest. I would judge from the remarks of Brother —, branch president here, that it would create more harm than good to receive it in the public manner offered, and it would be best to say nothing further about it. I feel it is wisdom to abide by his decision, although I have no reservations of conscience on the matter.

"The Ku Klux Klan angle here is more or less one of political aspect, although there is considerable indignity aroused over the Morehouse Parrish difficulties of Louisiana, and the Goose Creek atrocities of recent date here in Texas. Whether these are actually the deeds of the klan is a question. If so, I feel it is best to evade too close a familiarity with them, for such work certainly is un-American. Thanking you for your courtesy and kindly advice, I am," etc.

We regret to note that here as in some other places our members are joining the klan. We stand for reform, social reform, and other reforms needed; but we have no need to do so behind a mask, for hiding of personality in our activities in the interests of justice or Christianity is out of harmony with our history and principles.

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

Revolt Against Moral Restraint

The morals of to-day is an ever-present question as well as the causes therefor. William J. Dawson in the Christian Century suggests that the literature of any age gives an excellent guide to its life, and notes the fact that whereas such books as Adam Bede, the writings of Fielding and Smollett, were repudiated when written, these books and also those of Zola and Hawthorne were written from the standpoint of morality. Vice so discussed is made hideous and is speedily punished. To-day novelists appear unconscious of the moral law and suggest no social or spiritual penalty for unchastity. Religion is attacked; marriage is attacked. More of infidelity can be found in many modern novels than in the entire writings of Thomas Payne and Ingersoll. These men never went beneath the surface in their revolt but much of the literature of to-day indicates a spiritual decay on the part of the writer and those for whom he writes. All of it is a part of a general revolt against moral restraint.

It is not an expose of vice for the sake of correction but rather a frank presentation of revolt against the moral and religious sanction.

The article immediately following by Joseph Ernest McAfee in discussing denominationalism finds part of the trouble in the lack of proper standards of education in the ministry and that ministerial education is defective on meeting the issues of the day. As one instance he cites the ignorance of evolution, which he does not discuss from the basis of right or wrong or whether it is true or false, but merely as part of the educational thought and language of the day which to be met must first be understood.

Diverse Divorce Laws

Frequent criticism is made of our marriage laws for the reason that we have forty-eight different varieties of marriage and divorce, and unfortunately one may as a result be lawfully married in one State, yet in another he is a bigamist. But this is usually only the case when he leaves his own State in order to go to another to get married, as the status of the marriage and divorce is determined by the matrimonial domicile.

The Literary Digest states that seventeen States have no limit of a marriageable age, that is the age when young people may marry with the consent of their parents. In nine States the common law ages of twelve years for girls and fourteen years for boys has been formally recognized and many other States differ only a little from this condition.

Fortunately a majority of the States set the legal age where young people may marry without parental consent at 18 or 21 for girls and 21 for boys. But three States permit the marriage at 16 without the consent of the parents, and there is one State in which a boy of 16, and three States in which a boy of 18 may marry without consent of his parents.

While most States have marriage license laws, only two decree that no marriage is valid unless a license has been issued according to law.

According to the last census there are 1,600 married males of 15 years of age in the United States. Of these 82 were divorced that same year. Over 3,000 boys of 16 were married; at 17 nearly 8,000; at 18 nearly 25,000; at 19 nearly 59,000. The divorce poll was: at 16, 144; 17, 266; 18, 770; and at 19, 1,327. In other words, there was this number of boys who had been married, but who were at that age divorced.

In the case of the girls one is surprised to learn that 12,384 girls of 15 years were married; at 16 over 41,600; at 17 nearly 91,000; and at these ages there are to be found divorces at 15, 499; at 16, 1,268; at 17, 2,792. The above should surely show the need both for uniform marriage and divorce laws for the whole country, and also of higher standards.

The Forum Discontinued

The Forum Department has been so generally misunderstood that the editors have decided to omit it as a separate department.

This is no new departure, for the HERALD has practically at all times taken this position, that it has been open as the official organ of the church for the presentation of views which were thought to be of general interest to its readers. At the same time neither the editors nor the church have assumed the responsibility or do assume the responsibility for that which appears under the name of some other person, but such persons are alone responsible for the views expressed. The action of the editors in admitting articles to the HERALD is an expression of their opinion only in that they believe the articles present a view or discussion on a subject of general interest, but this does not commit the editors to the acceptance of the views therein expressed.

On the other hand it is not desired and never has been that the HERALD should be a forum in the sense that it is primarily a place for open debate. The editors have tried to get away from this forensic idea and to secure constructive articles by men who know their subject.

How far the HERALD should permit the discussion of subjects which are more or less debatable is probably still a matter of difference of opinion, in which the editors have tried and will continue to try to pursue a safe and right course. There is no desire, nor has there ever been, to close the HERALD to legitimate discussion of questions which are more or less mooted. There is a desire that the discussion shall be affirmative and constructive, the presentation of the writer's views rather than critical, and destructive of the views of some other person.

Prophets and Teachers Set the Pace

From speech of Walter S. Athearn at International Sunday School Convention.

Most of us are evolutionists to-day, but few of us would attempt to account for the progress of the human species on the basis of accidental adjustment to a shifting environment. An entire restatement of the evolutionary hypothesis has been made necessary by investigation since the days of Darwin and Spencer. In recent years men have been studying mind as these early investigators studied matter. We are coming to see that human consciousness, by whatever process it entered the evolutionary series, presents facts which cannot be explained by any preceding level of racial development. When consciousness came, organic adaptation to environment was supplanted by conscious control of environment, and man came to have dominion over all the earth.

Progress in the human species will not be secured by the accidental adjustment of a biological organism to a favorable environment. Progress in the human race will come in the future, as in the past, through two agencies—the prophets of the race and the teachers of the race. The prophets hold up before the race the great racial ideals, and the teachers of the race rehearse the childhood of the race in the ideals for which the prophets stand, and thus hand over to the future the prophetic vision. The prophet and the teacher are the agencies which jointly and cooperatively can bring progress into the race.

The Golden Rule in Business

The Georgia Baptist Convention recently held in Atlanta is reported to have adopted the following resolution:

It can demand that those laborers and capitalists who are members of our churches, regardless of what unions or super-authorities may say, settle their differences in harmony with the teachings of the New Testament; and when they refuse to do it, set the world an example as to the view of the church about settling industrial troubles by excluding offenders from the church.

This is interpreted as being an attempt to apply the Golden Rule to business and for the first time to make it a test of church membership. It has been quoted with approval, according to the Literary Digest, and has also been called in question. Objection is made that the strength of the church is putting religion into the hearts of men and that if men have true religion in their hearts they will follow the golden rule which cannot be forced from without. But of the necessity of the golden rule in all of everyday life, in business, in social affairs, in daily work, and in family as well as in church cannot be doubted.

Grammar Simplified

A book for everyone whose knowledge of parts of speech is imperfect or needs reviving. Most of us find the study of English grammar in school difficult and tiring because we do not have an appreciation of its value. The author of English Grammar Simplified treats the subject as an art, and we like to learn the arts. James C. Fernald, the author, has written many excellent books on the study of English, and this is one of the most popular. Price $1.10, postpaid.

The Very Great Need for Pastors

By Elbert A. Smith

Is it proper to appoint with allowance? Is it necessary to do so? Size of force now under appointment.

The church has two lines of work to prosecute. First, missionary work—to convert men and women to gospel principles. Second, pastoral work—to shepherd, nurture, organize, and educate those who are brought into the fold. If either line of work be neglected the other is quite likely to be rendered futile. We plead for a proper recognition of both.

It is quite possible to become so interested in the one as to overlook the necessity and value of the other. An extreme position may be taken on either side. One would spend the bulk of our money for local needs; another would invest all in missionary enterprises.

The late General Conference reaffirmed conference resolutions Nos. 230, 231. These provide that preference shall be given to apostles and seventies when making missionary appointments. Apostle Griffiths, at that time president of the quorum, pointed out to the conference when this legislation was pending that it referred to appointments for missionary work and had no bearing on appointments for local work. Any strained interpretation of legislation that would undo our pastoral work would in our judgment be disastrous. In missionary work preference logically goes to apostles and seventies. (But even then the constitutional law gives high priests and elders a legitimate place on the missionary force, finances permitting):

The work now lying before the missionary quorums of the church is of such increased magnitude and importance—the field so white unto the harvest, and the need for laborers so great—that the twelve and seventy under their direction, together with such high priests and elders as can travel and preach as missionaries, shall be free to wait upon their ministry in gospel work, leaving the branches and districts where organization is effected to the care and administration of the standing ministers, high priests, elders, priests, teachers, and deacons, so far as possible.—Doctrine and Covenants 122: 7.

Must Pastoral Work Be by the Self-Supporting?

Some who go to the one extreme may even argue that under no circumstances is it proper to maintain pastors in branches and districts on church allowance, that all pastoral work should be done by men who labor at secular work for their own support. Such argument has been advanced in years gone by—even during the days of the late President Joseph Smith as we shall see later.

Certain passages of scripture if not properly construed so as to accord with the general law of equality and stewardships might seem to forbid the appointment of pastors with allowance. Note for instance the following from the Book of Mormon:

And he also commanded them that the priests, whom he had ordained, should labor with their own hands for their support.—Mosiah 9: 57.

Yea, and all their priests and teachers should labor with their own hands for their support, in all cases save it were in sickness, or in much want: and doing these things they did abound in the grace of God.—Mosiah 11: 155.

Only teachers and priests are here mentioned, and to this day the rule is that they labor for their own support. Ordinarily each is assigned such labor (often the care of a certain number of families) as can be done in connection with his daily labor without undue hardship. (Provision, however, seems to be made for their support by remuneration or stewardship when the law of stewardships shall be in full force. See Doctrine and Covenants 42: 19.)

Note next the following given in 1831: "Let the residue of the elders watch over the churches, and declare the word in the regions among them. And let them labor with their own hands, that there be no idolatry nor wickedness practiced." (Doctrine and Covenants 52: 9.)

Interesting History

Certain missionaries had been sent out and afterward the Lord gave the foregoing concerning the care of the local churches. Two things must be remembered. First, at that time (June, 1831) there were not to exceed three organized branches (churches)—possibly only two—in all the world. The problem of caring for large and numerous branches and districts had not materialized at all. Second, perhaps for that very reason, this instruction was not to be for the general church and for all time but was limited to that group of elders and to that conference year or period. For proof read the first paragraph of the revelation: "Behold, thus saith the Lord unto the elders whom he hath called and chosen, in these last days, by the voice of his Spirit, saying, I, the Lord, will make known unto you what I will that ye shall do from this time until the next conference, which shall be held in Missouri, upon the land which I will consecrate unto my people, which are a remnant of Jacob, and these who are heirs according to the covenant." (Doctrine and Covenants 52: 1.) The time limit on that instruction expired at the next conference.

And there is still another thought that is at least worth considering. Those who hold to the idea of plenary, verbal inspiration, and feel that every word of a revelation is just as God dictated it and the sentence divisions and punctuation infallible, must of necessity cling to hard and fast interpretations. Those who hold to the thought that the prophet perceives the mind and will of God, sometimes very plainly, sometimes less distinctly, and thereafter puts it into his own words, which may not always be of the best to convey his exact meaning, will look for the content of the revelation—its real meaning. Belonging to the latter class, we are disposed to think that the meaning of the commandment to those few elders in 1831 was that they were to “watch over the churches” that “no idolatry nor wickedness be practiced” rather than that they were to “labor with their own hands” that no idolatry or wickedness should creep in. The reader may at least reread the paragraph with that interpretation in mind and draw his own conclusions.

Again we might note the following:

The work now lying before the missionary quorums of the church is of such increased magnitude and importance—the field so white unto the harvest, and the need for laborers so great—that the twelve and the seventy under their direction, together with such high priests and elders as can travel and preach as missionaries, shall be free to wait upon their ministry in gospel work, leaving the branches and districts where organization is effected to the care and administration of the standing ministers, high priests, elders, priests, teachers, and deacons, so far as possible; thus freeing these spiritual authorities and leaving them at liberty to push the preaching of the word into the new fields now widening before them; in which work, if they will but now take counsel, saith the Spirit, they shall feel a peace and vigor of mind surpassing what they have enjoyed in the past.—Doctrine and Covenants 122: 7.

Every Man His Needs and Just Wants

In the foregoing the question of support is not considered at all. However, it must be conceded that if a seventy sent out in missionary work finds it necessary to give all his time to that work his family should be supported under the rule that every man shall receive according to his needs and just wants. Who shall say then that under the rule of equality and the provision that every man shall receive according to his needs and just wants, if a high priest or elder is required to give all his time to pastoral work in a large or difficult branch or district his family should not be supported with equal cheerfulness and legality? The need for making such appointments will be discussed a little later.

Good Pastors Help Local Men

There is great need for pastoral work. Pastors must be provided for certain places and should be and generally are active and alert to the work. A real pastor physically able to do so works hard.

He does not have an eight-hour day nor a six-day week. Often his work keeps him far into the night, and he may be called out at any time of the night, and often is called out night after night, to minister to the sick. Remaining in one place he is vexed constantly with problems and difficulties to settle, and moreover must be studious because he should not repeat his sermons, but week by week must have something timely and not outworn to present. Many of the elders have stated that they prefer missionary work to pastoral work with its often disagreeable and distressing problems. Our thoughtful missionaries do not look with contempt on the pastor. They look to him as a colaborer who must conserve the fruits of missionary work. (That, too, we will bring out later more in detail.)

The presence of a pastor under appointment does not rob local men of an opportunity to develop. In reality a wise pastor helps the local men to develop, and his work is judged to a great extent by his success along that line. The successful pastor develops men under him, even to the point where in many instances he can finally be replaced by a local man, and should always work toward that end. He teaches and encourages them and develops them in their particular work, often leading them out in missionary work as well. If he has time for study, it is not to favor him above others, but that he may become a teacher and pass on to many the benefits of his study.

Needs That Should Be Met

We have observed that in the scriptural references cited there exists no real bar or interdiction against the appointment of pastors in districts and branches, such appointees to receive family allowance. True, we believe that wherever possible to do so without loss the care of the churches should be left to local men who are able to support themselves, where such can be found willing, qualified, and so situated that they can assume that burden. But there are numerous places where such men cannot be found. (And by the way, is it not equally true that where possible missionary work should be carried on by self-supporting men?)

There are branches and districts where there are no local men qualified to administer affairs. What shall be done? Shall we let the work die in those places?

There are branches and districts where there are qualified men, but none having the time and strength to spare for the arduous work of presiding. What shall be done?

There are branches and districts where the people are so divided that they will not agree to support any local man in office, and they ask the authorities to send in an outside man to preside until the breach can be healed. What shall be done in such a case? There are branches and districts so large that no local man, obliged to labor for the support of his family, can do the work. To argue that a man who must labor eight or ten hours a day for a living can look after the complex and never-ending work of administering the affairs of a group of from three to seven or more congregations, numbering in all from one to five thousand communicants is to argue without a knowledge of the work required or perhaps without a knowledge of human limitations. And we have such problems in many districts and in several cities.

An editorial evidently from the pen of the late President Joseph Smith gave good counsel on this problem:

Gatherings, assemblies or churches require the watchcare of not only the general but the local shepherds. This the law of God provides; also for their support. No man can fully and successfully anticipate and supply all the spiritual wants of a large branch of the people on the Sabbath whose brain has all the week been unremittingly devoted to labor for the bread that perishes. The people come together wearied by earthly burdens, and laying aside the cares of the present, desire 'the more enduring substance.' This want must be supplied. It is a demand that cannot be ignored; a problem which has presented itself in the past and continues to persistently knock at our doors in the present. It will doubtless be provided for in proportion as the heads of the church are supplied with requisite means by the membership, and as faithful, kindly men of Christlike spirit qualify themselves for this noble ministry. God's law, properly interpreted, will be found to amply provide for the support of these local shepherds; and those holding the appointing prerogative will no doubt supply all the demands, as in the past, as fully as they are able to do so. Nothing in this should be so construed as to interfere with or lessen the importance and value of the work of those local shepherds who, cumbered with the busy cares of life, also labor in the Master's service on the Sabbath and at other times.—SAINTS' HERALD, July 18, 1891.

Who Shall Decide Where Need Exists?

Who is to decide when these emergencies exist and how they shall be met? Primarily the burden rests on these:

The burden of the care of the church is laid on him who is called to preside over the high priesthood of the church, and on those who are called to be his counselors; and they shall teach according to the spirit of wisdom and understanding, and as they shall be directed by revelation, from time to time.—Doctrine and Covenants 122: 2.

But it does not rest there alone. These appointments are made by the First Presidency and Twelve and Presiding Bishopric in joint council or by concurrent action. Some one must decide where the need exists. Under the law the burden seems to rest there.

Section 120 says that in large branches and districts high priests shall be "elected" to preside.

But the law does not stop there—high priests and elders are to be "appointed" or "set" in large branches and districts, under the Presidency, to preside over such districts and branches, note: "Observing the law already given to ordain and set high priests or elders to preside in large branches and in districts."—Doctrine and Covenants 122: 8.

Our procedure has been in harmony with the above law. The duty to set high priests and elders in large districts is pointed out. Where the necessity exists that such men give all their time to their work (and it exists in numerous places) or that men must be sent to distant points not self-supplied (as must often be done), the law of equality requires that they receive from the treasury equally with, not in excess of, those who devote their ministry to missionary propaganda.

Appeals From Seventies and Apostles

In making this argument we are not striking at either apostles or seventies. These men as a rule clearly recognize the importance of pastoral work—because they know that their own efforts in making converts are wasted if their work is not followed up by competent pastors who have the time and ability to organize and consolidate the gains made by the missionary forces.

Indeed it might be a matter of surprise to some to learn of the scores and hundreds of letters received at the Presidency's office from year to year from active seventies and apostles calling for the appointment of high priests to districts and branches where they are needed because the local men cannot handle the situation and at the same time wrest a living from the world.

These men are "up against" actual conditions. A missionary writes that he visited a certain place some years ago and made a number of converts. He has returned to that locality this winter and finds that all his converts have returned to the world. His work must be done over again. And in a few years, yet again. Naturally he calls for pastoral support.

A well-known seventy told the joint council this year: "I am going to make two hundred converts in my district this year, but I want you to appoint a high priest as district president who will follow me up and take care of them."

Numerous letters from apostles and seventies have come in even since the late General Conference pleading with us to send high priests under appointment to specified fields where the work is dying for lack of oversight. Before me is a letter from one of the seven presidents of seventy who says, "We surely are very much in need of a high priest in this district, for we are just the same as without a district president." (The president of that district is a laboring man and has not been able to visit the branches in his district for more than two years.)

"Send a Good High Priest"

Before me is another letter from another seventy asking us to send a high priest to a certain field. He says: "If I am any judge, this district is in sore need of a high priest as president who could give all of his time to it. The work is in a bad condition. I only mention this as I feel you should know the conditions."

Here is yet another from still another active seventy who asks for a high priest to help in two districts in his field. He says: "I am still praying for you to send a good high priest here to help build up these branches." Would you answer his prayer? We would if we could, let who may condemn us for it. But we cannot.

Here is another letter just at hand from a man who occupied in the Quorum of Twelve for many years: "The fact of the matter is that a number of the branches in this district are dying for the want of proper care. Brother —, the president of the district, is a very faithful minister but he has to work for a living. . . . It is impossible for a man who has to work for the support of his family to attend to the work of this district. We must have a high priest here for a time if we are to keep that which we have in these branches and in the district. We must have help and that soon or the church will lose all that it has here." We were able to respond to this plea and send that district a high priest under appointment and drawing an allowance. Did we do wrong?

Here is yet another letter from an apostle asking for a high priest for a certain district in the field, and incidentally for pastoral help in two branches. He says: "This district needs a missionary, but they also need some one who is capable of organizing and developing the material already in the church. This development is sadly needed." Concerning another district that he has recently visited the same writer says: "I am sorry to say that it seems impossible for this district to get along without assistance. The following four branches must have help. . . . I have given this matter considerable thought, for it pains me to see the interest dying in these places. Our district president is a very busy man and is at present assuming additional business responsibility. He cannot in my opinion meet the needs of the district."

Another apostle writes of a district recently visited: "So far as I can determine there is not a local man in the district capable and at liberty to take over the work as district president." We may add that a seventy had to take over the presidency of that district to save the situation until a high priest can be supplied, because the letter just quoted reports the district as slowly but certainly dying—and at one time there were numerous active branches. It has been left to its own resources for several years with this result.

Still another well-known seventy writes:

My greatest sorrow that I have had to meet in my missionary work is that after we have had a real good session and inducted several into the kingdom, they are left to starve spiritually and finally die. . . . The — Branch needs a man stationed there to take full charge of the work. The membership is so large and the character of the work and divided forces make it necessary absolutely that some one be there who can devote his entire time. And he must have plenty of backbone and be a man who will not take sides.

These letters have come to the desk since the adjournment of the recent conference. There are others. These are but samples. During the past year many similar ones have been received. These men of the Seventy and Twelve are not fearful that the pastors are robbing them or living at their expense. They recognize the need of a concurrent development of pastoral work to save the gains of missionary labor. They plead for more pastors rather than fewer. We have not erred in supporting too many pastors; we have not had nearly enough of either pastors or missionaries.

Our Slender Available Force

Of necessity the great burden of pastoral work must fall on the local, self-supporting men. The very limited force of men under appointment makes that imperative. But as we have seen there are many places where local men cannot meet the situation. What is the size of the force available to meet these imperative calls? Aside from the men in stake presidencies, of whom there are perhaps nine, and whose appointment is made automatic by conference resolution, we have a force of forty high priests and elders under appointment to pastoral work and drawing allowance. Sixteen of these are giving their time exclusively to branch pastorates. The rest are in district work—at least three of them presidents of both district and branch. There are besides three seventies who for reasons of apparent necessity are doing pastoral work for the time being, and one at least giving part time to that work. These figures we believe to be correct or very nearly so at this writing. Only forty high priests and elders under general appointment to meet these many demands. We pray you that you do not think to have it decreased. Rather do we hope to see both the missionary list and the pastoral list greatly increased. We plead for a proper recognition of both lines of endeavor. We trust that no mistaken argument will lead the church to either abandon or reduce the volume of pastoral work. Both missionary and pastoral work should be greatly enlarged.

The Latter-Day Work

By J. August Koehler

A practical religion which recognizes all the needs of humanity.

In times of crises ideals undergo criticism and revision. It is when peoples find themselves in trouble that they examine the foundations of their economic, social, and religious institutions. As an outgrowth of the late world conflict, its causes and its political and economic consequences, all forms of social life are being scrutinized with a view to an arrival at a proper judgment of the principles and methods by which human affairs should be regulated.

Religion as a whole has exhibited an appalling impotency in its poorly directed efforts to reconcile conflicting interests and to lay the foundations of peace and prosperity. The hearts of men have been saddened because the one channel through which alone they had hoped to have revealed to them the way of escape from disaster and of approach to desirable social conditions seems to be obstructed. And thinking men are asking this question: If the church—if the oracles of God—are not qualified to point out the way of life, who is there that can deliver?

But, whatever others may say for themselves, we are not willing to be judged by the interpretations of Christian doctrine that are almost universally believed, neither by what has been attempted by religionists or others in efforts to bring practical and permanent relief to oppressed peoples.

Religion a Universal Instinct

Religion is a universal instinct. All peoples in all ages have had some kind of religion. Ideas about God and the church and duty have been and are as diverse as the mental types of man. It should not be forgotten that, throughout the ages, religion has been in continuous evolution. Even to-day, after thousands of years of experience, and notwithstanding the world-wide belief in the mission of Christ and in the Holy Scriptures, Christendom not only does not present a united front, but is actively opposed to itself in its parts. Progress in religious thought has not been great enough to bring even Christian men (so called) to a common judgment of what pure religion really consists in.

Christianity, we are sure, is the highest expression of the universal instinct of religion. It is capable of the widest application under the varying conditions in which men live. Christian doctrine is fundamental to human need and is therefore capable of universal adaptation. Its principles may be applied as well to the concerns of the tribes of the desert as to the concerns of the most highly civilized society. All peoples under all conditions may put into practice the principles of "LOVE"—love of God and love of neighbor. And "love" is the all-pervading doctrine of the Christian religion. "On these two commandments [love of God and love of neighbor] hang all the law and the prophets." If there is any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."—Romans 13: 9. There is nothing that mankind needs more than brotherly love; and there is no doctrine so universally applicable to human affairs and so fundamental to the problems of the race.

Good Will the Essence of Pure Religion

"Charity," or Christian good will, is the having of the same kind of feeling toward others and the same kind of interest in the welfare and comfort of neighbor as one has in himself. This is the highest manifestation of love. It expresses itself in continuous acts of "doing good," in acts of service; under its influence the affairs of each person in particular and of society in general are arranged and controlled in ways which make the acts of each person a source of blessing to others. This mutual helpfulness, this desire and striving to serve and please one another is the essence of pure religion.

But in what manner shall this principle be applied in a practical way to the practical affairs of everyday life? The development of good will among men depends as much upon how the affairs of society are directed and controlled as does man's willingness to reconstruct his modes of life depend upon his good will toward his fellow man. What are these necessary forms of association? What are the relations which, if established and maintained, will unify the interests of men? will eradicate conflict and its consequent hatred? The answer to these questions is to be found only in the true interpretation of Christian doctrine.

This church claims to be the recommitment of all that belongs to Christianity; it professes divine direction and believes that it is the exponent of the true Christian doctrine. It arises at a time when civilization has advanced to a place where a much more highly differentiated expression of Christian principles can be had. The advancements made in civil, political, and economic life—in social life as a whole—the increase in population, the division of labor and the consequent interlocking of interests and interdependence of man and man and group and group, demand a restatement of Christian doctrine in its application to modern social life. This must be had if social disaster is to be averted and if peace and prosperity are to become widespread or universal. These conditions afford Christianity its supreme opportunity to demonstrate its adaptability to human needs. And the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints comes to you with the announcement that it is charged with the responsibility of making this demonstration; that God has spoken to the church; that he has given it the law which, if applied to social life and if used as a basis for determining social (and particularly economic) relations, will bring about with positive certainty the conditions toward which all peoples in all ages have more or less blindly struggled.

Christianity Affects All Human Activity

Christianity is the law of life. Its doctrines cover the whole field of human activity. It treats conduct as a whole, and therefore considers the relations that action in each part bears to conduct in all other parts considered separately and as a whole. Its laws exactly accord with the requirements of human nature and being. It relates bodily health and activity to intelligence, and intelligence to bodily health. It connects and establishes the influence that the manner in which men get their living has upon their fitness to worship God in church. It shows how favor with God depends upon giving proper consideration to the needs and the rights of all men. It reveals the connections that exist between devotions and cleanliness of morals. With Christianity, life is a whole, conduct is a whole; to it a man is not one person on the Sabbath and another person during the week. Its laws are all-comprehensive. Christianity is the law of life.

A man cannot be a good Christian who can sit down in peace to a feast while his neighbor is agonizing in hunger. He cannot be a Christ-man who retains two loaves for himself when his neighbor has none. Christian idealism does not permit the accumulation of private rights on one hand and the imposition of poverty on the other; nor the monopolization of natural resources or surplus goods in private hands for personal ends; nor yet the holding of any properties upon which the common welfare depends in any other manner than that which will guarantee the interests of the group. Christian men cannot sit idly by and fail to employ their resources and energies for the good of less fortunate fellows or the relief of the oppressed. Christian doctrine requires a willingness on the part of the individual to surrender personal advantages for the good of his fellow man.

Equality Made Possible

Through such surrenders and through organized effort on the part of the disciples, the rights and interests of men and the group are reconciled; opportunity to engage in useful, effective effort is secured to all; the costs of production are equitably apportioned, and the benefits are distributed in the only manner which Christian good will can dictate, that is, according to both individual and group needs. Poverty is eliminated; the rich are not impoverished, but the poor are lifted up; all who devote themselves to the cause of the Christian brotherhood are elevated to a higher plane of living.

These surrenders and considerations and adjustments bear directly upon the fitness of the soul to commune with God. The experiences of men prove this to be true. And modern revelation has affirmed this truth. "In your temporal affairs ye shall be equal, and this not grudgingly, otherwise the abundance of the manifestations of the Spirit shall be withheld." And again: "If ye are not equal in earthly things, ye cannot be equal in obtaining heavenly things." The prophets of old affirmed this truth, and the experience of the early Christian church confirms it. The conditions under which men now go forward to secure for themselves the goods of life place the interests of each one in opposition to others and give rise to hatred and not good will. Love of neighbor does not arise from the terms under which business properties are now held and managed and the profits distributed. Charity is incompatible with the forms of association that now characterize modern industrial society; love of "self," pride, and dishonesty are their natural fruits.

The Real Test of Greatness

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" is the first great commandment. The second is like unto it. But how can man love God whom he has not seen if he has not developed a capacity to love his neighbor whom he has seen? The ability to love is developed by exercise. We must begin by loving what is at hand if we are ever to love God who dwells in the heavens above. And love without service is inconceivable. Hence the Christian axiom: "He that will be greatest among you, let him be the servant of all."

The outstanding fact of modern revelation is that it reveals the connections that exist between forms of association, between modes of conduct, and the fellowship of the Spirit of God. The effects of the thoughts, desires, and purposes that men have concerning the goods of life cannot be set aside for the purpose of worshiping in the sanctuary, they cannot be neutralized by prayer or the payment of tithes and offerings; the man at the altar is just what he has made himself by his acts in business, domestic, civil, and political life. If a man would talk with God, he must first learn to talk to his neighbor as a companion, as a friend; his acts also must coincide with his profession. "Behold how beautiful and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. . . . For there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life forevermore." "First be reconciled to thy neighbor, and then come and offer thy gift." "Take away from me the noise of thy songs, for I will not hear the melody of thy viols. But let judgment run down as waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream." "When you spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you; yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear; your hands are full of blood. Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil, learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widows." And "the glory of the Lord shall be thy reward."

In Luke 3: 7-14 John declares the worthlessness of the sacrament of baptism to those whose lives are characterized by corrupt or unfair dealings in everyday affairs. And in Acts 2: 44-47 and 4: 32-35 the connection between business conduct and spiritual power is again brought to light. Modern revelation is specific on these questions and tells what adjustments must be made in business in order to succeed in devotions.

Christian Doctrine the Law of Life

So whether it be physical life, intellectual life, social life, moral life, or life thought of from any angle or in any relation—Christian doctrine is the law of life; it embodies all the conditions of human welfare and happiness.

The test of the worth of any religion is its adaptability to human needs. Any religion which does not provide for all the needs of human life is not Christianity: By this rule we may test every religious movement.

There are a number of diverse religious movements, each of which claims to be the custodian of the affairs of the Christian church. It is not our purpose to antagonize any of these. What we would do is to make the means of life accessible to those who would use it. This has been the aim of many men.

But we cannot overlook the fact that whole bodies of religionists have failed in this purpose to set mankind in the way of life. They did not fail because they did not desire or did not exert themselves, but because they did not know. Some of the most vital needs of the race have not been apprehended; no solution whatever has been offered for the ills of society. Christianity would exhibit the same weakness as other religions if it did not take into account society's needs and point out the way in which these needs may be supplied.

The all-comprehensiveness of Christian doctrine is evident in its direction concerning (1) physical wellbeing, (2) intellectual development, (3) moral discipline, and (4) devotional needs. In relation to physical needs, the gospel gives instruction concerning (a) the kinds of foods that should be eaten, (b) habits of exercise and of sleep, (c) cleanliness, (d) the treatment of diseases, and (e) the manner in which industry should be promoted in order to insure to all an adequate supply of food, clothing, houses, and the like. Concerning morals, the gospel instructs men how to act toward one another in all phases of life's activities, (a) in the home, (b) in the shop, (c) in society at large, and (d) in the church. It also points out acts which are likely to lead one into paths of sin; and at the same time it directs what to do to develop a high morality. The need of mental training and the acquisition of knowledge and the manner in which these should be sought is also pointed out. The official and functional appointments of the church are designed to meet all requirements on the devotional side as well as on the temporal side. The true forms of worship are revealed. Men are instructed and led in prayer, ordinances, and sacraments. The experience of the church gives proof of the value of all of its doctrines, functions, and institutions.

Effects of Stewardships

The economic ideals of Christianity are summed up in the words Zion and stewardships. Zion is a perfected Christian society; it is and has been the hope of all God's people in all ages. In Zion men find peace and safety—a refuge from the evil and strife of the world. The business relations in Zion are known as "stewardships." The gospel provides that Christian men shall organize for industrial purposes on a plan that embodies the sentiment of "love of neighbor" or Christian good will. Stewardships change the relations in business from competition to cooperation, from conflict to mutual helpfulness. Instead of struggle for personal advantage, stewardships inspire production in the interests of the whole body of men who cooperate for the sake of increasing their power to do good. Instead of license to "get," stewardships secure liberty to "give"; it organizes industrial activity in order to make the best use of its social resources—of its wealth and its man power, and it does this to give added value and dignity to the inhabitants of Zion.

Provisions of Stewardships

The law of "stewardships" provides (1) that the resources or concerns, in the management or disposition of which the welfare of the group is involved, should be under social control; (2) That men individually shall be intrusted with the management of enterprises for the purpose of advancing the production of goods; (3) That all "stewards" shall be accountable to the group for the manner in which they manage the affairs intrusted to them, and (4) That the surplus earnings of stewardships shall be the common property of the group. These earnings are therefore to be placed in the common treasury, to be managed by the group for the good of each member in particular and the whole brotherhood in general. The cumulative resources of the group become the guarantee to each faithful steward that all his temporal interests shall be amply protected and promoted.

This social system places before each steward the motive to labor for and to find his own happiness in seeking the common good. By service alone can happiness arise, and under these forms of association Christian good will find the freest expression. Under such forms a new type of manhood is developed—a manhood which fulfills the requirements of the law: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Under stewardships such problems as taxation, monopoly, unemployment, wages, capitalization, interest, and distribution are solved. The relations which entice men to sin are supplanted by relations which give pleasure in righteousness. Men come to be loyal to one another because of the harmonious, reciprocal, and interdependent business relations that come to exist between them. Loyalty and faithfulness to the group are inspired because of the honor or social esteem that attaches to the faithful steward, and the consideration from the group that his service irresistibly claims.

Equality in temporal things is one of the principles underlying Christian industrial life. By this we mean that each person, regardless of the character of labor performed, but only on condition of faithfulness to trust, is to receive according to his needs and just wants and circumstances. At the same time he is to contribute to the welfare of the group according to his ability. In this way social classes based upon accumulated possessions, and which give rise to pride and oppression, are wiped out, and a fellow feeling is promoted instead.

Distribution is made with a view to securing to each an equal opportunity with all others to realize the fullest possible expression of the powers of being, and the satisfaction of just wants according to the individual's capacity to use or enjoy.

Christian Ideals in Stewardships

Such an organization must be composed of men with Christian ideals; its affairs must be administered by representatives of the Christian brotherhood; its concerns must be managed by capable men with motives of "love" and under rules which harmonize all the factors of industry in all its parts and as a whole.

The principles of this wonderful organization are all set forth in the modern application of Christian doctrine. This church, which claims the inspiration of God, is not without the means for effecting the redemption of the race. Of course progress in such a work depends upon the conversion of men to Christian ideals. It is not an easy task to change men so that they will want to surrender private advantages for the common good: but the number who are willing to do this is constantly increasing under the preaching of the gospel, and before long this army of God-fearing men will be a mighty power for social reform, for moral uplift, and for the redemption of the race.

The work of God must succeed. His last great effort to gather His people cannot fail, though it may be delayed. He will raise up a people whose mode of life will be established in "justice and judgment." If prophecy be true and the signs of the times are read aright, then the end of the world is not far away, and the work of preparing men for divine association by practicing here and now the kind of things that will be done there must be hastened. But to succeed, all forms of human activity must be harmonized and reconciled; modes of life which give rise to selfishness must be displaced by forms of associations that give rise to love of neighbor and promote human welfare and a resultant peace. Men must be directed into activities which will issue in true Christian manhood. This is the purpose of the gospel, and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints claims the divine guidance that is necessary, and peculiarly adapts it for this great work.

God has spoken. The truth is before us. We have our day of opportunity. If we will we may use it not only to deliver ourselves from the bondage of sin and its consequent penalties in this life, but also to secure to ourselves and others hereafter the blessings of eternal life forevermore.

"God"

By J. H. N. Jones

A subject open to controversy and dangerous if dogmatic decisions are arrived at.

We are indebted to the Hebrew nation for a knowledge of the true God who was known to them under different names, the chief of which were Jehovah and Elohim.

In Exodus 6:3 God speaking to Moses, says: "I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob by the name of God Almighty, but my name Jehovah was not known unto them."

David speaks of him thus: "That man may know that thou whose name alone is Jehovah art the most high over all the earth." (Psalms 85:18.)

Isaiah, the silver-tongued, and the greatest of the Hebrew prophets wrote or exclaimed: "Behold, God is my salvation . . . for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song." (Psalms 12:2.) Jeremiah says, "And they shall know that my name is the Lord" (Marginal, "Jehovah"). The Hebrews were uncompromising monotheists in contradiction to the universal idolatry and polytheism of that age of the world.

God, Jehovah, it was who made the covenant with Abraham, though not under that name, concerning the blessing that would come to the world through his (Abraham's) seed (Genesis 12:3), which promise was fulfilled. So says the Apostle Paul, (himself a Hebrew) in Christ. (Galatians 3:16.) The Lord Jehovah is a Lord of revelations, and dwells in heaven. (Daniel 2:28, 47; Genesis 40:8; Amos 4:13.)

He revealed himself definitely as one God saying, "Thus saith the Lord the King of Israel, and his Redeemer, the Lord of hosts. I am the first, and I am the last: and besides me there is no other God." (Isaiah 44:6.)

"See now that I, even I, am he, and there is no other God with me." (Deuteronomy 32:29.) He is eternal, (Deuteronomy 33:27) and everlasting, (Genesis 21:33) and is the Creator, (Isaiah 40:28), not a creature. From the definite Bible statements there is absolutely no room for any other conclusion than that there is but one great first cause, a personal God, who has revealed himself unto man through his holy prophets, and also through his only begotten Son, Jesus Christ, and whose name is Jehovah.

Now the question naturally arises, is this great covenant-making and covenant-keeping God of the Hebrews, the God also of the Christians, or Saints? If he be not, are we astray and following a plurality of gods or no true God at all?

That the God of Saints or followers of Jesus

Christ is the same, we quote—"God who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son. (Hebrews 1:1; John 1:17, 18.)"

God was not known to the Hebrews in his three-fold name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, though some say that plurality is expressed in the name Elohim, but there seems to be little ground for such conclusion.

Yet Christianity must be regarded as a completed Judaism, for all Hebrew Scripture and Biblical history finds its fulfillment in Christ. Christianity found great difficulty in reconciling its belief in a plurality of persons in the Godhead with the rigid singularity of the Hebrew beliefs and revelations.

The first centuries were not productive of much controversy, but about the third century fierce and bitter conflicts occurred which split the Christians into parties and spread hatred and strife over the whole of Christendom.

At first the belief in the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit was accepted without definition, much in the same spirit we as Latter Day Saints have hitherto received it: knowing the fact, but not defining the manner of the unity. But such is the controversial character of the human mind; such the desire to solve mysteries, that this condition did not long continue.

About the middle of the third century one Sabelious, an African presbyter (elder) arose at Ptolemais in Libya and contradicted the doctrine of Deity taught by Noctus and taught that God himself was not in Christ, but that only a certain energy was put forth by the supreme parent or a certain portion of the divine nature being separated from it became united with the Son or the man Christ." (Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, Century III, page 3.) About the same time (A. D. 244) Beryllus, Bishop of Bostria, in Arabia taught that Christ before his birth of the Virgin had no distinct divinity. . . . That at his birth a soul originating from God himself, and therefore superior to the souls of all men, being a particle of the divine nature, entered into and was united with man." (Ibid., III.) Paul, a bishop of Antioch, taught that the Son and the Holy Spirit exist in God, just as reason and the active power do in a man; "that Christ was born a mere man." The most powerful schism that arose in the Christian church was that of Arius, who held that the "Son is totally essentially distinct from the Father; that he was only the first and noblest of those created beings whom God the Father formed out of nothing, and the instrument which the Father used in creating this material universe; and therefore that he was inferior to the Father both in nature and dignity." (Mosheim, Century IV, page 160.)

Many prominent clergymen followed Arius and the controversies so disturbed the empire that Constantine the Emperor who at first considered the discussion of little importance called a council of bishops who condemned the teachings of Arius and exiled him (Mosheim, page 161), at the same time formulating the following creed: "We believe in one God the Father, Almighty. The maker of all things visible and invisible; and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God Jesus Christ the Son of God, begotten of the Father, only begotten (that is) of the substance of the Father: God of God, Light of light, very God of very God; begotten not made; of the same substance with the Father." (Murdoch.) To what is known as orthodoxy of to-day, this settled the question but not to us who believe in the apostasy of the primitive church and the Restoration in 1830, through Joseph Smith.

The Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants, teach the necessity of belief in Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and there is no piece of literature in existence which holds more firmly to the divinity of Jesus Christ than does the Book of Mormon.

Therein is its vindication against the charge of being like the Koran and Joseph Smith's vindication against the charge of being like Mahomet.

The three books agree in proclaiming Jesus Christ one of the trinity, but they, and also our epitome of faith, have left us without a sufficiently clear definition of the manner of the unity to settle controversy. We are therefore in exactly the same position as was the early Christian church before the Nicean council and are therefore peculiarly open in that respect to controversy, and there is danger of harm coming to the cause we all love if wisdom is not shown and a decision of the body awaited before any definite or dogmatic definition be attempted.

This paper is not intended as a dogmatic setting forth of the views of the writer upon that infinitely mysterious subject, but merely to point out the danger of dogmatizing upon a subject which needs more than all the wisdom of the church in combination to define.

In conclusion, I beg leave to remark that whatever position we take in relation to Jesus Christ and the Holy Ghost we should preserve that essential belief in the unity of God which will amply safeguard us from falling into the errors of polytheism, which to all the most highly civilized and cultured races has been an abomination.

The idler must have no place in Zion, neither must the green-eyed monster.—Priesthood Journal.

How Do We Progress Religiously?

By Edward D. Moore

In order to progress we must have a reasonable basis for, and an understanding of, where and how far we can go.

In religion as well as in politics there are the fundamentalists and the modernists. As well there are the bolshevists who would go all the way at once as opposed to the reactionaries who pull back and call for the old, old ways.

We cannot avoid the issues which religious progress raises. We may refuse to participate in the activities of our religious organization, but to do so causes us personally to constitute a problem instead of helping to solve one.

In our organization there are divergent beliefs on various subjects, some fundamental and some transitory. We have those who believe in evolution as applied to the origin of man as well as to the development of man's ideas and methods. Then there are those who say that evolution "evolves" into atheism. There are those who believe in and work for strong central organization in the smaller as well as larger groups. Opposed to these are the many who want their sort of democracy, even though it degenerate into a mob.

All of these believe they are progressive. Even those who accept the term conservative assert that their conservatism is but a strong demand for adherence to the principles that will make for true progress.

So it is consoling that we may turn to an entire book on the subject, recently published, written by Harry Emerson Fosdick, a man whose name stands for very much in the religious world of thought.

Such a book is Christianity and Progress ($1.60, postpaid) which is one of the "Everyday Life" books of the Association Press.

Not all our readers will agree with Professor Fosdick in all he says, nor is it necessary that we do so in order to have it draw from us thoughts and conclusions which will be a delight to the soul of the student.

While we may feel that in our church ideals or constitution, expressed in the three standard books of the church and the statutes we have built up in our deliberative assemblies we have a better basis for progress than other religionists, it still remains that we must realize upon these conditions.

It is unseemly for us to boast of progress. Rather, let us progress. But when we do, there are ideas to consider. If we are to go far we must take others with us. Otherwise our progress is only imaginary. If we set out on the journey, we must inspire others to accompany us. What shall our message be?

Too often we mistake the means for the end. Preaching a sermon is not an end, but the means to an end. What is that end?

Making an ideal pastoral visit as a member of the priesthood is not an end, but a means to an end.

To preside with utmost wisdom over a group of people called Saints is not an end.

Let us consider that progress is more than growth. It is natural growth directed into useful channels.

For instance, there is the newer development of social Christianity. We are nowadays giving more attention to the problem of health.

As a consequence we are not content to meet in a prayer service and pray for the sick and afflicted, but in addition we organize to provide better sanitation, prevent spread of contagious disease, and develop more appreciation of health conditions to prevent disease.

We see such good results from this that we often get enthusiastic and transfer our emphasis from the so-called spiritual concept, and place it on the social. Is that progress? But what we might answer matters little. What some one decides for you is not personal progress for you. What you think now and will think after considering a book such as this and others that are to be had, matters much.

Professor Fosdick discusses this aspect as well as the perils of progress. He rather startles us by saying that there were no ideas of progress in the modern sense till the sixteenth century—that prior to that time there was no thought of man's life as a growth. Whether we agree with him or not, we do see many evidences of the static idea prevalent through a long period of history.

We surely appreciate the disposition of certain publishers to seek out and offer to the public books so wholesome and practical. This one will be a boon to many pastors who are deeply concerned over maintaining a proper balance in his pastorate regarding what is progressive and what is not. With the right viewpoint, he can decide for his flock by arousing thought and giving it a basis for correct development. But it is far from being confined in its appeal to executives. It is distinctively a book for those who would think straight in terms of religious expression.

“I am come that ye might have life, and have it more abundantly.”—Jesus. What a warped conception of the Christian “abundant life” some people have!—Priesthood Journal.

Our Limited Knowledge

[That an education is not the mere learning of facts has already been demonstrated, but we fail many times to appreciate how limited is our accurate knowledge. This has already been pointed out in a brief extract from a statement by Steinmetz on the subject of science and religion. It is again emphasized in an address on the student and the citizen, the Phi Beta Kappa address of James T. Shotwell, at Columbia University, March 16, 1922. Some extracts from this address follow]:

Literature itself is at its best inadequate. What a small and insignificant fraction of life it portrays! What experiences eternally elude it, what imaginative dreams, what records of achievement and outlook! Compared with reality it is a feeble medium imperfectly conveying its message. And yet it is the greatest of the arts, the most versatile expression of which mankind is capable.

The same is true of philosophy. The great problems elude it. We come with animal equipment to play with phenomena. And we imagine we find reality when we put a capital letter on Truth. Really, in spite of psychology and philosophy, life faces the mystery, aware of itself, but aware, as well, of the futility of much of its own insistence.

As for science, we are like the cave men, just emerging from prehistoric caves, our animal minds attempting to solve by experiment where experience fools us. What is this world we are in? We do not know. It is as much a mystery as ourselves. We weigh and name and classify, and we get some feeble grip upon reality by our ability to manipulate matter and energy. We have the electric forces of the world somewhat in our control and we connect time and space with the few things we can handle, and call it our world. But, as science moves forward and extends the frontiers of knowledge, the horizon of mystery enlarges as well with each new extension of the known. For the more one widens a circle the greater the stretch of its contact with what lies outside.

It is surely unnecessary to pursue this theme farther. Literature, science, philosophy, or history are as yet but feeble guesses at the merest externals of things. Humanity is only just beginning to be intelligent. With millions of years of gibbering intelligence still haunting our brains, we look out at the world and life like little children. Much of our heritage—beautiful as it often is—is only make-believe. Under these conditions the first duty of the student is humility.

There is one thing more important even than learning itself—it is the development of initiative. I believe the student's life which sacrifices this for knowledge may be largely written down as failure. To string dead facts on ever so beautiful a necklace is hardly a task for a grown man. Repetition is a second-rate process at best; initiative involves creation.

Who knows what changing front the future will present? One thing is sure, it will not reproduce the past. And you who face it, will stand dumb and powerless in the path of each new imperious problem, unless education has taught more than learning. He leads who has initiative. He follows who has not.

Yet there is much in our college work which seems designed to stifle this very vital element. The student submits to the authority of textbook or teacher with as patient a submission as ever shown among monastic virtues. The "Middle Ages" are still with us most of the time. My own students used to be quite content when I assigned the limits of the next day's lesson from line 9 on page 7 to line 10 on page 17; they were mostly bewildered and nonplussed when I refused to make an exact assignment. The day has now come for those of you who have finished your work here, when no one will be assigning line 9 on page 7; or if there is, he will likely keep you forever to that page.

Waste

Several articles have appeared lately discussing the tremendous loss because of waste throughout the world, but especially in America.

According to an editorial in Current Opinion machines invented in the past century are easily capable of producing enough goods to let everyone live in the comfort that is now enjoyed by only ten per cent, but man's social or collective intelligence has not yet been equal to the task.

During the war it was found that factories could easily double their output with the same number of men and machines merely by intelligent planning of operations and the reduction of lost motion. Even war itself is the result of international poverty, nations struggling for the control of raw materials and markets in the belief that there is not enough to go around.

The Federated American Engineering Society recently appointed a committee on the elimination of waste. Its report in book form states that $750,000 a day is lost in clothing factories alone in the United States through inefficient operation wasting one third of the work done. Nor does this include shutdowns.

The sum of $100,000,000 a year is wasted because of different shapes and sizes of newspapers and magazines. If the papers would make their columns of uniform width it would save from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 on typesetting alone.

Building trade workmen lose 37 per cent, shoemakers 35 per cent of their time through badly planned work. Too much has been said about the wastefulness of strikes, ignoring the fact that half of these strikes are seasonal trades where the worker is employed only part of the year and the annual productivity was not actually reduced or else only very slightly affected. [This last is doubtless true concerning the recent coal strike and would invalidate most of the figures concerning the economic loss of the strike.—EDITORS.] Thus in 1916 in New York State two days per man per year were lost because of strikes but ten days per man were lost because of illness of which at least 40 per cent was preventable.

Judge Brandeis, before being appointed to the United States Supreme Court, said the railroads of the country waste $1,000,000 a day; engineers to-day think he understated the amount.

At the Kansas City Convention Hall one of the largest pageants in the world was presented the evening of December 19, with one thousand taking part. This is no doubt practically identical and we believe identical with the pageant presented in Japan in 1920 and again presented in June, 1922, to the International Sunday School Convention, and which those who then attended were permitted to see. The theme is entirely religious and typifies the triumph of Christ in all the world and has as a central theme the birth of Jesus in the manger and the sending of the message of truth to all people.

Methods of Healing

Doctors engaged in mental therapeutics made a significant criticism on sacramental methods of healing; not at all to the effect that such healing was a delusion, but that it was too superficial, dealing only with physical symptoms, and not penetrating to the deep underlying moral causes. Such a criticism was a little surprising, but there was a good deal of truth in it. In many cases of functional nervous disorders, though not in all, there was an underlying moral cause, a repressed complex resulting from some moral struggle—a cause which ought to be dealt with, and which a skilled confessor ought to be able to deal with, before the physical symptoms were touched at all. The priest in confession ought to be able to supply, with equal effectiveness and under more rigorous safeguards, the services which the psycho-analyst aimed at rendering, though real study and training would be required for the purpose. It was sometimes asserted that the psycho-analytic treatment differed from spiritual direction in securing complete and radical and finished cure, so that no repetition of the treatment was needed. But this could hardly be maintained; it might hold good in certain sudden, violent, emotional shocks, where the struggle between instinct and ethical code had instantaneously driven the instinctive reaction underground, causing it to work unconsciously in the production of neuroses. In such cases, of which war shock was the typical instance, the re-association, or dragging into consciousness of the repressed complex, might be all that was required to reestablish normal healthy life.—Bishop of London, in Daily Telegram.

Encouraging Financial Outlook

The tithes and offerings from the Pottawattamie District for December were more than for the five preceding months.

Curtis L. Ross from Cottage Grove, Tennessee, reports as follows:

"Whereas the greater portion of our membership in this district are farmers and, owing to the great reduction in the price of farm products, our tithing receipts have been reduced to almost nothing for almost two years. But the future is looking somewhat heartening. I feel sure with the Lord's help we shall be able to more fully bear our share of the burden."

Frank G. Hedrick from Atchison, Kansas, writes:

"The year 1922 was the lowest in receipts of any year since my appointment as your agent. Yet I see a brighter outlook for 1923. The receipts for October, November, and December show a good increase over the same months of 1921. I believe that this increase will continue until receipts are normal. And I expect this to be accomplished by the end of 1923."

Respectfully,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE,
Presiding Bishop.

Brother A. W. Kelley, of Indian River, Maine, has kindly sent us a history of the Kelley family by himself. It appears that they came to this country before the War of 1812. He himself was engaged in the Civil War in which he was severely wounded. He also discusses very critically the colony led by George G. Adams to Palestine. Evidently Mr. Adams's project did not appeal to him and he emphasizes the fact that of all those who went over all but a few returned in a short time.

LETTERS AND NEWS

Walls and Draperies

Written for the Department of Women, by Charlotte Dryden. One of a series on home decoration and kindred subjects.

When one is entering a new home, the first thing to be thought of is the use or function of each room, as this determines the furnishings and colors to be used.

In olden days there was a great deal of white paint used all through a house, since it was most adaptable and more universally suitable to the different uses of the various rooms. This color helps in making dark halls lighter, and furnishes a good background for furniture. If one chooses the white paint, it is best to use that made with white lead, since it is much more durable.

If we wish to use white paints on the white pine, there should be four or five thin coats of orange shellac to protect the white paint from showing blotches of resin or pitch, which often comes through and disfigures the white surface, if this precaution is not observed. Each application of the shellac should be allowed to dry thoroughly before putting on the succeeding coats. A better and more durable coat is thus obtained than by the use of fewer and thicker coats. It never pays to be stingy with paint.

If the question of economy must be considered, much can be saved by doing the work oneself. Good brushes should be used and not too much paint should be taken on the brush each time. The stroke should be kept even and all in the same direction, thus producing a more desirable effect.

In choosing the paint one should consider the purpose of the room, its light, and how it is used by the family. In a very bright room a gray green is a good shade, as it is cool appearing in summer; and warm-colored draperies may be used during the winter months to give the room a cozy appearance. The adjoining rooms should have harmony of color in both draperies and floor coverings. If it is impossible or too expensive to have hardwood floors, one can produce good results by painting the floors dark in color. In some rooms a green gray shade is preferable, since it does not show the dust so much as a darker color. Floors should be well cared for, if our rooms are to have a cleanly and an artistic appearance.

The subject to be considered after determining the treatment for our floors, is the care of the walls. Shall we use paper or some other method of wall decorations? If the walls are painted, it is very difficult to use paper on them afterward.

Paint, however, is easy to clean, and in such rooms as the kitchen and bath room is especially desirable. We must have good plaster, if paint is to be used, for if there is a crack or hair lines show, the paint will wear through and will be streaked with designs. Do not paint fresh plaster, as it will almost invariably crack somewhat when drying, and will spoil the effect.

If paper is to be used, one should think of the price, design, quality, the color scheme of the rooms where it is to be used, as well as considering the furniture and the purpose of the room, its exposure and the lighting. Do not use large figured paper in rooms where pictures are to be hung, as this would detract from the impression one might get from a good picture.

Next in order after painting and papering, the balancing of light, and of color, will naturally come the choice of suitable hangings and other furnishings of the room. These, along with the painting and papering, constitute the principal factors in giving the home its proper color tone and character.

In the choice of curtains, care should be used as the dust and laundry are injurious to them and they must often be replaced. The lace curtains of elaborate pattern and stiffness have gone out of style. It is more customary now to choose simple material as swiss, lawns, scrim, and for the heavier materials damask, velvet, and chintz.

The use of curtains is primarily threefold: to soften the glare of light, for the seclusion of family life, and to improve the external appearance of the house. The shades in the house should be one color, suitable to the casings and the exterior of the house, as this gives unity to the outward appearance. If it is desirable to have the interior color different, one may buy double-faced shades. These should be kept rolled to the same level, and not only the shades but the curtains which show from the outside, should be similar to a certain extent in color, texture, and drapery.

After the consideration of shades for our windows has been completed, our thoughts turn to the curtains that are to be used with them. If net is to be considered, it should be one and three fourths times the width of the window, but for heavier material one and one half times the width will suffice. If sash curtains are used, they should just clear the window sill, but deep windows require a longer curtain, extending often to the floor. Their length should always coincide with the structural lines of the windows.

One should always allow for shrinkage in the curtain material, and to do this, it is best to baste the hem until after laundering. There should be an allowance of twelve inches for scrim and about six inches for net. For inexpensive curtains net may be used with an edge of narrow braid or lace. A more elaborate arrangement is a panel with medallions and insertion of lace, and these should be hung straight and close to the glass. Care should be used to repeat the colors found in rugs and upholstery, or there will be an unpleasant contrast in the room.

The arrangement of curtains is dependable upon the arrangement of the windows. When these are in groups, the best effect is produced by hanging net curtains at each window, with the inside drapes at each end of the group. If a valance of the heavier material is to be used, it may be hung across the top of the group, as a connection between the two inside drapes. When there are casement windows with leaded glass, only one curtain is required for each window. If a circular or semicircular window of clear glass is to be draped, net may be used next to the window, with a medallion of similar shape as the window, and silk or chintz may be used as the outside drape.

Very high windows may be made to appear much shorter by using two curtains; one should be a sash curtain on the lower sash, while the other curtain is hung on rods from above the window and falls over the top of the sash curtain. The fullness of the goods makes the division in the curtains evident, and lessens the appearance of length. This effect also softens the appearance and is much more artistic than straight curtains would be on extremely high windows.

A valance may be used on any window, but is especially good where groups of windows are found, as it breaks the monotony of repeated window space, yet does not interfere with plentiful lighting. In a room where curtains of silk or velvet are used, one may have shaped valances. In all cases, curtains should be hung so that they may be easily drawn without interfering with the valances or other curtains.

In considering the walls of our rooms, in connection with the curtaining, we may use curtain material which is figured provided the walls are plain in color, or practically so, but if the walls have figured paper or other decorations, a plain curtain is best. There has been a considerable sale of late in chintzes and paper of a similar design, but it is not best to combine these except where the furniture, rugs, and upholstery are very simple. Chintz is most appropriately used with plain walls. There are many materials that may be used, which are found outside the curtain departments. Sometimes even cotton dress fabrics, such as unbleached muslin, decorated with designs made by stencils or otherwise, is used. The colors in these cases should harmonize with the other decorations and furnishings of the room.

If there are doors in any of the rooms which require drapery, it is advisable to use plain material, especially if there is any kind of pattern or decoration on the walls. If these are plain, however, it is often more pleasing to introduce draperies with a pattern, in order to break the monotony and give contrast in the colors of the room. Where the room is large and the ceiling high, the hangings can have a large bold pattern if desired; otherwise, a smaller figure is preferable.

Much more time and thought is being given nowadays to proper decoration and arrangement in our homes, and each of us wishes to make the home as artistic and beautiful as possible. When one is dependent upon a small salary and has a number to feed and clothe, it makes it necessary to consider what would be the most sensible, as well as the most artistic article to be chosen. In curtain material the manufacturers bring about changes in fashion as often as possible, in order to obtain a greater number of sales. Good taste differs from fashion in being more permanent, often, than the thing which is simply fashionable. Therefore, if we choose as good material as possible, suitable to the room and its other furnishings, we will often find that we have a much more beautiful room than one in which we change with every variation in fashion.

Kirtland Glimpses

Surely there is a fascination about Kirtland, a something apart from the wonderful beauty of its countryside—apart even from the Puritan beauty of its Temple. Inert indeed is he who has not sensed the same; true, some few have seen it under unfortunate conditions during perhaps the briefest of visits, but others on equally brief visits have experienced its best. Here, however, shall be recorded some of the lights and shadows gathered over a close study of many months and every sort of condition. Would you have a little clearer view of this little place written so large one time in our history as a people evangelical? Do you wonder sometimes as to its location; how its neighbors view it; how many live here and how do they get that living? It is purposed to review these and other aspects of our church standing in this part of the field in a way that has never been covered before.

Our first picture is seasonal, inspired by once again coming upon that splendid breadth of view one gets on coming in sight of the Temple. It is a clear, crisp eve of Christmas-tide with a thin wisp of moon and the heavenly host of planets flashing their messages to one another through a flag-blue sky; all the light seems to be ascending from the still, white-covered ground so that we can see plainly for miles across the valley to the square white tower of the Temple discerned against the rising hills and woods to the south known as Gildersleeve Mount and Pearson's Knob. Behind us we have left the little town of Willoughby with its bright and busy streets, its splendid county viaduct and big, comfortable interurban cars to Cleveland, whose steel-furnace lights we yet see luridly glowing in the west.

But it is before us that the interest lies: at our feet the broad paved road drops away in easy contour to the valley bottom to cross the river a mile beyond, then with a sharp ascent on the upper part of the S reaches at last the Temple. We are constrained to linger and contemplate the breadth and beauty of the scene, for it is not inanimate as of something only of a bygone day; no, there grips upon the heart a sense of wonder and expectancy: lights twinkle from the gothic windows of the Temple; spread out far to the right and left of it shine out the home lights of its communicants and neighbors, they sparkle like jewels along the rising course of the main road that finally disappears over the hills of the background, they flash from beneath to mark the little cluster of homes at the crossroads on the "flats," from the old mill on the river bank now a modern bakery busy preparing to-morrow's bread for city folk and countryside; even from the mansions of the rich in their outlying estates twinkle these offerings of cheer. It is a Christmas card of wonderful beauty, and there comes into memory that sweet old refrain almost as part of that before us:

"O little town of Bethelhem, how still we see thee lie,
The hopes and fears of all the years . . .
. . . are met to-night."

The temple bell calling to exercises comes distinctly through the clear air so we pass through the frame of butternut trees on either side and descend the valley, cross the iron bridge, call a greeting to the youthful skaters on the river beneath, swing around through the little hamlet in the flats and climb the old Temple Hill; dodging possibly a bobsled party en route, we arrive at the summit. Immediately we see the old church, towering in serenity on our right, and on the left there shines forth the new auditorium to care for the needs of the reunion association each August, providing accommodation for local activities meanwhile; just now it is the occasion of practice for the Christmas entertainment and we hear, perhaps:

"No ear may hear His coming, but in this world of sin
Where meek souls will receive Him still
The dear Christ enters in."

Missionary Helps a Branch See the Way

I just closed a three-week meeting at Winthrop, Arkansas, where I had what I call good success. I did not baptize any, though I could have if I had wanted to—that is if I wanted to take them in before they were ready. I preached to the Saints all of the time, and almost every sermon was from the Doctrine and Covenants. There is no use preaching to others to come in until we get the house clean for the newcomers. But I am satisfied that the branch will take new courage and move out in the work with greater zeal than ever before, because they all say that they will and they manifest it in their works now.

I found twenty-seven in the branch who use tobacco and coffee, and only three who were taking the church papers. There was not a cent going to the Christmas offering and not a cent of tithing being paid in the branch; and putting it at a very reasonable estimate there was about eight hundred dollars going out for tobacco and coffee in one year. By chance I saw the store account of one family here and the tobacco, snuff, and coffee items amounted to about twenty-seven per cent of the total grocery bill.

I am in a new place now, and will commence in the city hall to-morrow night. I have been occupying in a private home, having the room full, and I closed my meeting at Winthrop with a full house.

I am hopefully yours in the field, W. P. BOOTMAN.

What Think Ye?

A message to parents concerning pleasures of the world.

Some years ago, in one of our prayer meetings, I heard a sister relate a dream which made a very strong impression upon my mind, and I wish now to refer to a part of the dream. The sister seemed to be so placed that she could see enacted before her the many ways in which people seek to find pleasure, people "of the world," as we often express it. She saw also here and there among the hurrying crowds some of the Saints indulging in those pleasures, some of which, in themselves, are what we call "innocent" or "harmless," yet she could see that the tendency of such indulgence was not desirable, for it was plainly shown her as she watched that in proportion as the Saints engaged themselves in these seemingly harmless enjoyments they lost the Spirit of the gospel. (By the way, in telling this dream to a brother he at once stated that he could vouch for the truth of that last statement, because he had proved it to be a fact, himself.)

There was much more to the dream, but this is the part I wish to speak of, because I believe that our own young people are not receiving what it is their right to receive; that is, I fear that in many cases they are not being trained to appreciate the best.

We say the young must have pleasures. Yes, that is true; but do we make it plain enough that there are some pleasures which are not for the children of the light to indulge in? Do we remember that when we make the assertion in their hearing—and we hear it on every hand—that "youth must have pleasures," do we bear in mind the fact that the young cannot see as plainly as can those who are older the dangerous tendency of some of these things; but, taking our word for it that enjoyment they must have, who can blame them if they take this as a license, as it were, for them to go after the things they want?

Let us remember that to us has been given the responsibility of guiding the lambs of the kingdom, of seeking in every way in our power to help them choose the ennobling things of life in whatever line they may be going, enjoyments as well as work. Let us sit together for a moment under one of the beautiful trees beside that "old, old path" and talk over some of the things which our Elder Brother, when he was on earth, taught us. He said, upon one occasion, "If any man will follow me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." This is God's way of teaching self-control. Can we obtain the results we wish by virtually teaching the opposite? Can we justify ourselves in making a loophole (for our children to engage in things which, to say the least, do not enrich the soul) by insisting so continually that they must have pleasures? By so doing we take away with our own hands the safeguards which our Father sought to place around us all. We have a mighty problem before us! Of ourselves we cannot solve it. The only way in which we can protect our dear ones is in God's way and that alone.

When we put aside the theories of men, so many of which are merely some one's ideas unsupported by fact, and go back to the old path which was made to fit the feet of mankind as long as they remain mankind, then we are putting ourselves in the way to receive help which will really enable us to do the work, which can be accomplished in no other way. We may progress along some lines, but we cannot progress beyond God's plan, for that was perfect when it was laid down as the one and only way by which we can obtain true happiness.

Do not think that I mean we should have no pleasures, that I have no pity for the young. I think I am in reality taking a stand for their rights! Our Father, speaking through one of his servants years ago, in condemnation of "worldly pleasures" said that he did not seek "to deprive the lambs" of his kingdom of pleasures, but rather to lift them to a higher plane whereon they might enjoy happiness greater and sweeter than the utmost the world could give!

There is another aspect to this subject which I must mention. In a revelation given not so many years ago we are admonished to "repress unnecessary wants." I will not attempt to define these "wants"; our consciences must in large measure do that for each of us, but let me offer one thought. No doubt all of us think at times of the many who never heard the gospel preached, and we wish the church could send out more missionaries. Still, speaking very plainly, these people are strangers to us; and we can hardly be expected to take the interest in them that we do in helping those who are dear to us.

Is this how we feel? Then how shall we feel, if ever we can be so unutterably blessed as to reach a place in our Father's home where the love of each for the others is as strong and tender as a mother's love for her child; and looking forth from thence we perhaps see one afar off who might have received the gospel had he been permitted to hear it, and then remember that in the time of opportunity (our life on earth) we used means for our own enjoyment, or unnecessary wants, which might have brought the means of salvation to this one whom we now discover to be, not a stranger but one tenderly loved by us? What will be our feeling then!

True, we may say such a one will have that opportunity in another condition; still to him there has been a loss, and to us, is it possible that we could be perfectly happy even in the bright beautiful home of our Father, and see one outside who might have reached there had we done what we could! I cannot help but say I do not think so.

One point I do long to have us all consider is this: We are here on this earth for a few years where all must suffer pain and sorrow to some extent, that we may prepare for an endless life of peace and happiness. Should we not be "anxiously engaged" in not only preparing ourselves, but helping as many others as we possibly can to do the same, not as strangers, but as dearly loved brothers and sisters (for we shall find that they are such "when we reach our Father's dwelling" whether we sense that fact now or not)? As stated before, our Father does not seek to deprive us of pleasures—far away from home as we are—but only to replace those which do not enrich the soul by those so much sweeter, so much more satisfying, that there is no comparison between the two.

In a recent communication given as the "voice of the Good Shepherd," we find these words: "Go not in pursuit of pleasure where I have not led the way. Learn of me. Behold, I am sufficient for my people and my purpose. All things have been delivered to me by my Father, and if from the wells of my provision ye shall drink as deeply as I have designed, ye shall know no other thirst, but with me ye shall be satisfied; and if with me ye shall show yourselves content, then will I delight to make myself and my glory manifest in you, and ye shall become as fountains, not only of my word, but of my Spirit also, and forth from you and your assemblings shall flow the light that shall become the life of others, and ye shall become a blessed people with whom my honor shall abide."

This is a high and beautiful ideal which our Savior holds before us. Shall we strive to reach it?

Yours in hope that we may all do so,

CLARA M. FRICK.

We Ought to Take Warning

The conditions in the world demand sacrifice so we may have a right to divine direction.

In a HERALD of recent date a brother referred to the fact that in order to raise money for the church it is proposed to go without one meal each week and give twenty cents to the church. He comments, "I hope none of our members are so poor that it is necessary to go without proper food."

I think the brother is under a misunderstanding in regard to the matter. God says, "This is a day of sacrifice." What sacrifice would it be to go without a meal once a week? God has set his approval on fasting. In the Book of Mormon we are told, "The sons of Mosiah gave themselves to much fasting and prayer, therefore they had the Spirit of prophecy and the spirit of revelation." (Alma 12: 5.) It was because of their much fasting they were given those spiritual gifts. They sacrificed.

There are many in the church who go without meals in order to be able to give to God's work. When we read of the hardships endured by those noble pioneers of the Restoration we are having "flowery beds of ease" compared to them. I would ask, What sacrifice are we making, if any? Brother Keir quotes ten dollars and fifteen dollars as the price of some hats. Well, I suppose all the "fools are not dead yet" and they will get wearers.

The letters to the Presidency are truly heartrending. "Distress of nations," "Men's hearts failing them for fear and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth." (Luke 21: 25, 26.) Tens of thousands are starving for lack of food. These things should put a restraint on all extravagance. I claim that it is nothing short of a disgrace to dress expensively at such a time. Our missionaries are being called home at a time, too, when they are most needed in the field. Probably some of the money spent in stylish hats and dresses would have kept them there. Money is being spent recklessly and extravagantly that should be used to keep the missionaries families, but all these things are not going unnoticed, and will yet stand for or against us. We are living in a "choice land above all lands." It is a wonderful blessing and is having its fulfillment. The blessing on Joseph's land is most remarkable. All around us we can see the wonderful blessings of God in the products of the field, garden, and orchard; and instead of calling it a sacrifice to forego a few meals we stand amazed at such generosity. These wonderful blessings from God should create within us a fellow feeling for the poor unfortunates who lack for that which we have in abundance. All these blessings from God should make us more humble and make us more charitable instead of giving room to haughty pride. In reading the Book of Mormon we can see when the people became prosperous they also became proud and set themselves up as better than their neighbors. History repeats itself, and waste and extravagance are the sure precursors of the downfall of any nation that indulges in them. The history of Rome may be ours, and the end may be ruin. Tens of thousands are being spent on things that are a positive injury to the body. Tens of thousands more are spent in automobiles, ice cream, pop, candy, etc. We are living in an age of luxury and waste and also an age of immorality and vice of every kind. The rumblings of war can be heard. We are near the end. "See ye not the clouds portentous? Heed ye not the world's alarm?"

Indian Civilization and Ideals

They hold their property for the group, not each one for himself.

Elder Harvey Syckle, in a personal letter, writes that he has been making a particular study of Indian legends, especially since he became acquainted with the Book of Mormon. The tribe of which he is a member has always revered their traditions and has made these traditions part of the education of their children. These traditions in part take the form of stories explaining the physical phenomena that comes under the observation of the Indian. To the Indian these stories and his deductions upon these things are as sound and valid as are the scientific experiences of his white brother.

Many of the traditions give the Indian's idea of religious life and were at one time so reverently considered that an Indian who did not believe in them and live accordingly was practically an outcast.

But the civilization of the whites has forced itself so objectively upon him that the Indian is rapidly putting his old ideas of civilization into the background, for the Indian has a standard of civilization even though many of the world have thought differently. Not only have the Indians a civilization of their own but many of them have yet to be shown that the white man's civilization is better than theirs. This accounts for some Indians reverting into old tribal ways of living.

Brother Syckle adds that in his mind there are many things in the Indian civilization that are paramount to many of the ideals of the white men, and he has regretted that the ideals of the Indian must give way to the outstanding elements of the new civilization of the white men and that many beautiful truths held by the Indians must be unknown to their white brothers. The force and numbers of the white man is setting aside the Indian ideals and civilization and substituting that of the whites. He continues:

"We, as a church, have been trying to establish equality. It seems that all of our time is spent in theorizing along these lines; though we think we have every possibility of evil dealings taken care of, there are none who want to take the risk. The Indian is not concerned with the details of theory or how he will best deal with a man of the tribe who takes a mind to speculate on his land. He believes that the land is for the tribe and there is no question as to who shall own specific tracts, but when the tribe moves and each Indian stakes a place for his tepee he will live there unmolested until time to move again."

He adds that one tribe compared the white man to a spider because his fences looked so much like spider webs and whenever anything got inside of those fences he would come out just like a spider and get it. He would grab it for himself.

"Then again if one Indian killed a deer and other members of the tribe were not so fortunate, they had meat as long as that Indian had it. Sorry to say that if a white man gives a slice of bread to a tramp he thinks he will receive a golden crown for his benevolence.

"I have related these things just to give you an idea of some of the Indians' idealisms, then you can judge for yourself whether there are any reasons for them being reluctant in giving them up. It isn't so much as to how we are going to adjust laws by which we can live—as it is the willingness to step forth and try it. Some of our people are saying, 'I would not be so foolish as to step into this stewardship business unless there is protection on every side. I must be safe.' The Indians may be condemned for their unwisdom in trying to live in such a manner but I have no doubt but their foolishness in that respect will be the very thing that will make Zion a reality."

Kansas City Stake News

The meetings conducted by Amos T. Higdon at Heathwood Mission closed December 17. A good attendance at nearly all the three weeks' effort was encouraging. Ammon White, now laboring in the stake, occupied at two or three services. No immediate results, though the instruction to those in and out of the church was well received and timely.

Cantatas, playlets, and dialogues with appropriate music; ships, trees, etc., with the ever-present Santa Claus loaded with things that wee tots like, made Christmas merry at the various churches in the stake.

To-day, January 7, is the day when the church makes its big resolutions, being the first Sunday in the year. When the sacrament is served one is touched by the good spirit and resolves, God being his helper, to lay all on the altar, trusting him for guidance through another year, for health and willingness to serve when assigned to labor.

J. Charles May occupied recently in the stake at the Heathwood mission.

The changes necessary and incident to the new order concerning the Stake Departments of Education, Recreation and Expression, and Department of Women, have already begun taking form. Brother F. A. Cool, who has the two former departments, is making the rounds of the churches setting forth the steps necessary to progress in these lines of effort.

The T. A. D. Class of the Chelsea Church Department of Religious Education busied itself during the holiday period in caroling and making seasonable gifts to many in that part of the city, thus extending cheer and good will to those thus favored.

Interesting News Items

Gathered from various letters from many places.

Mrs. Belle Kendall writes from Sperry, Oklahoma, that the Saints there are progressing nicely and that the meetings are well attended. The Sunday school and the ladies' aid are doing a good work, and the Saints are really learning to "love one another." One hundred fifty attended the last sacrament service. Attendance has grown so that the erecting of a new church building is being contemplated.

Brother Rasmussen, Sykeston, North Dakota, writes as follows:

"There are two brothers at Alamo who were ordained in November who have the harness on and are preaching alternately in their schoolhouse. They have a live Sunday school which they have been keeping up for some years. In November they had about seven dollars per capita Christmas offering. Not many schools can go beyond that record. If all were enthused with the same spirit, the Bishop would not have to appeal to the Saints for aid as much as he does."

The Saints of Alexander, Kansas, held a two-day meeting recently and report a fine time. Saints came there from Selden, Brownell, and Ness City, Kansas. A little later the Saints of Selden held a two-day meeting which some from Alexander attended. They report having splendid meetings at both places and the Saints were built up and strengthened.

Elder W. B. Weston, of Lamont, Iowa, writes that the Olwein Saints recently held a business meeting at which Elder C. D. Shippy was elected president of the branch. He sees much ahead to be done, but feels optimistic about the future. Elder Shippy is city clerk at Olwein and a man held in high esteem by the citizens of the town.

Elder A. E. Stoff, recently appointed pastor of the branch at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, writes from that place under date of January 8 as follows:

"Our attendance yesterday was quite gratifying in spite of the condition of the weather. There were about 165 in attendance at Sunday school and 118 at sacrament service. I cannot say that the latter service was one of very great activity, yet the time was well occupied and there was a good spirit present. Perhaps I could have enjoyed the meeting much better, but owing to my physical disability I was unable to. The change of climate and general conditions together with the water caused me to become sick; but at the present writing I am feeling much better, though I am still weak.

"Last Wednesday night I had a very pleasant visit with Brother Albert Hoxie. Incidentally he told me about President Smith and himself being out on a fishing trip last summer when the seas were quite high and the President had a nine-pound cod on the end of his line—and all the time he was asking Albert what to do about it."

The passing of Elder Isaac A. Morris on January 9 brings back to mind his long history in connection with the church in Southeastern Illinois. He has been president of the Brush Creek Branch for over 50 years. This branch is one of the few branches which was never reorganized after the "Dark and Cloudy Day" when many were following Brigham Young. The branch was organized in the days of Joseph Smith the Martyr and has continued without having been reorganized to this day. Members of the branch have continued as members of the Reorganized Church without baptism.

Another lady told of going shopping. "The stores are full of clerks," she said, "but it is hard to get waited on. Finally one came over to inquire if I wished to buy something. I asked if she had dress goods of a certain kind and color. 'Yes, we have, but we are just inventorying the goods in that section and if I took a bolt out and cut it the work would all have to be done over again. Would you mind waiting about ten minutes?' Of course I wouldn't mind to wait for I had to have the material."

January Is Inventory Month

Why not make it so in the tithing business? If another time of the year suits you better, use it. We have not meant to set an arbitrary schedule for making out tithing reports. It is merely a suggestion to act while the very air is pregnant with the inventory spirit. Perhaps now is as good a time as any. Procrastination has been convicted for stealing time and is under indictment as a tithing embezzler.

Every step in the tithing process may not be absolutely clear. We may not understand just what to do under certain conditions, but that will not free us from all responsibility. Ignorance of the requirements of God's law alone will not excuse us. Otherwise the preaching of the gospel would bring condemnation rather than blessing. Study the accompanying forms. Use the one best adapted to your case. Your branch solicitor will furnish you with blanks and will gladly assist as occasion may require.

The thought may arise in the minds of some, "Why does the Bishop want to know all about my personal affairs? I'd rather tend to my business myself." Suppose you use the blank just to figure your tithing for your own information. We shall not judge you for that. Even then one of the chief objects of the inventory has been served. So far so good. But somehow we have gathered an idea from the scriptures that the "business" we are inclined to refer to occasionally as "my personal affairs," is really part of God's business. "It is expedient that I, the Lord, should make every man accountable, as stewards over earthly blessings, which I have made and prepared for my creatures." (Doctrine and Covenants 101: 2.) Whether or not you wish to recognize us as God's representative is a matter we are satisfied to leave with you and the Lord.

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE,
Presiding Bishop.

A recent death in the community was that of B. F. Downs who died from an injury received in his work at Kansas City. The services were conducted at the Stone Church with Elder W. D. Bullard in charge.

The weather here continues mild and springlike. The official forecaster is promising changes for this week, but his previous prognostications have gone awry many times this year and we refuse to be alarmed so long as the temperature stays around sixty.

Appointments in Zion Sunday were as follows: Stone Church, President Floyd M. McDowell and Patriarch H. O. Smith; Walnut Park, Elders Joseph Luff and J. A. Dowker; Liberty Street, Apostle F. Henry Edwards and Elder A. B. Phillips; Englewood, Elders Edward Rannie and John Ely. The radio service Sunday afternoon from 6 to 7 featured a musical program by the Walnut Park orchestra and a short lecture by Church Historian Walter W. Smith, on the subject, "The coming forth of the Book of Mormon." Next Sunday evening he will lecture on "The organization of the

The series of meetings being held at the Enoch Hill Church in which the preaching is being done by the members of the Aaronic priesthood has been very successful thus far and will continue all this week. The services begin at 8 p. m.

every evening, excepting Saturday. This is the third year such a series has been conducted and the local priesthood are making very creditable efforts in the stand. Preaching Sunday was by Amos Allen in the morning and J. C. Alexander at night.

Elder J. W. A. Bailey delivered an illustrated lecture recently to the members of the Nonpareil Class at Religio at the Stone Church on the subject, "Ancient American ruins."

The following supervisors for women have been appointed for the local congregations in Zion: Englewood, Mrs. Grace Morrison; Walnut Park, Mrs. W. E. Haden; Enoch Hill, Mrs. M. F. McDonald; Second Independence, Mrs. E. E. Weir; Liberty Street, Mrs. James Greene; Spring Branch, Mrs. D. D. McLean; Mrs. H. W. Murphy is supervisor for the Stone Church group as well as general supervisor in Zion. Mrs. C. B. Hartshorn is secretary.

After deferring the proposition two weeks for further consideration, the Stone Church Religio, at its session of the 19th voted almost unanimously to change its time of meeting from Friday evenings to Tuesday evenings. This change was made because of the large number of members being required to divide allegiance between the high school activities which center around Friday evenings and the Religio. It has been a standing problem throughout the school year for a long time, but the young people took the initiative, made many personal converts to their plea, and were supported in their argument that they wanted to help the Religio and enjoy its privileges. The result was almost universal support of the proposition. As soon as adjustments can be made concerning other organizations using the night, the change will be made, probably very soon. The character of the service is still a combination of class study and expressional programs, with a tendency toward the latter.

The Standing High Council of the Church met at general headquarters in official session Monday afternoon. President Floyd M. McDowell and Apostle John F. Garver, of Lamoni, were present to attend this council.

Church Historian Walter W. Smith, in addition to maintaining the regular work of his office and conducting the Independence Institute of Arts and Sciences in which he teaches a number of classes personally, has now undertaken the task of acting as chaplain for the Sanitarium. He conducts chapel services there each morning at 10 o'clock and visits the various patients in the institution, administering where requested and helping to cheer up the many patients.

The Board of Publication of the church held session Tuesday at 10 o'clock in the office of the Presiding Bishop, Benjamin R. McGuire.

Elder U. W. Greene continues to improve at the Independence Sanitarium and inside of another week will be enabled to return to his home.

On Tuesday evening, the 16th, in the dining hall of the Stone Church was held the first annual meeting and election of officers of the Michigan Club of Jackson County. There were about seventy-five members and friends present. The invited guests included Patriarch F. A. Smith and wife, Bishop Mark H. Siegfried and wife, and Elders A. B. Phillips and R. S. Salyards. Games were played, old acquaintances renewed, and a general good time was had. The officers and committees were all sustained for another year. One item of business done which will reflect credit upon the organization was the passing of a motion which set the aim of the club definitely in one direction, viz, the supplying of much-needed reference books to the church library in Independence. City missionary Arthur Phillips, who made the suggestion to the club, spoke at some length on the need of the library for works of reference which would be standard.

The club was enthusiastic in its approval of the scheme. About thirty dollars in the treasury now will be used for that purpose. Oyster soup and pie were the refreshments served. Elder B. C. Harder is president of the club.

The junior class of the nurses' training school at the Sanitarium in which there are eleven members finished their work at the Junior College in Kansas City last Saturday. The Sanitarium, together with the various other hospitals in Kansas City, sends its junior class to the Junior College each year for certain courses. The rest of the lecture work is given here at the Sanitarium. A program was given by the nurses Friday at Junior College and two of our girls, Miss Lucretia Brewster, of Willoughby, Ohio, and Miss Lita Ralston, of Wiley, Colorado, read papers. Miss Copeland, superintendent of the Sanitarium, says that now that these eleven members in training will be at the Sanitarium all of the time it will be possible to give even better attention to the patients than has been possible during the time they have been away at school.

The Independence Music Club, for its second concert of the season, on January 8, presented a string trio from the Kansas City Chamber Music Society, assisted by Mrs. Raymond Havens, contralto. This was one of the most enjoyable concerts yet given by the Music Club, and was heard by a good sized audience. Each member of the trio is an artist and the solo playing was as much appreciated as was the ensemble. Mrs. Havens has a voice of pleasing quality. She sang a group of four songs, including one, "Dream dawn," written by a Kansas City pianist, Powell Weaver. The concert was quite up to the standard set by the club last year, and the people of Independence should be proud of such an organization.

The Social Service Bureau, which was established a few weeks ago by Brother and Sister Merrill A. Etzenhouser, is finding a great deal of work to do and in a systematic and scientific manner is going about the business of taking care of some of the special problems of our people in Zion. In addition to maintaining an office in the Battery Block where they meet a great many people, they are also conducting an employment bureau, a used commodity shop, and now have opened up a day nursery. This day nursery is planned as a help to parents who must leave their children during the day while they go to their work. A building has been secured just west of the library on West Lexington Street. There is a governing board consisting of a doctor, nurse, kindergarten, and dietitian. The nursery is under the charge of a competent woman. Children from one to fourteen years will be cared for from 7 a. m. to 9 p. m., and mothers can leave their children there with every assurance that they will be properly cared for. The health of the children is particularly safeguarded by daily inspections by a trained nurse and the supervision of a doctor. The smaller children are given the privileges of the kindergarten while the larger ones can be sent to the public schools. The children are properly fed and the charge is made on a scale to suit the requirements of the individual families and in no case is prohibitive. The purpose of the Social Service Bureau is to serve and the day nursery is only one step in the establishment of the program that they have in view toward helping people to help themselves.

Monday morning the house of Elder R. V. Hopkins on West Short Street was badly damaged by fire. The fire itself was confined to the roof, but the furniture and finish of the entire house was badly damaged by smoke and water and it will be necessary for Elder Hopkins and his family to find another home until repairs can be made.

Satan is not yet done with Europe.—David Lloyd George.

The old continent is with both hands throwing to the dogs of war the bread that should feed its children. One day these dogs will in their arrogant savagery turn upon the children and rend them.—David Lloyd George.

Recent years have been years of terrible disillusionment for the world. That fact with its accompanying bitter cynicism accounts for much of the individual anarchy of conduct so noticeable. There is no bright star of hope visible on the horizon of the masses of humanity.

Only a few years ago the belief was general that the world was moving onward toward universal peace and enlightenment. Men were becoming more humane, more just, more merciful—so they dreamed. The dream is broken. The world has awakened. "As when an hungry man dreameth, and, behold, he eateth; but he awaketh, and his soul is empty: or as when a thirsty man dreameth, and, behold, he drinketh; but he awaketh, and, behold, he is faint, and his soul hath appetite: so shall the multitude of all the nations be."—Isaiah.

Even so recently as the disarmament conference at Washington, the old hope that died so hard at Versailles flamed up again. At last men were to cast aside the implements of war and learn the arts of peace. But now—so soon—Europe is ablaze again. Forebodings of more terrible wars fill the press. Despair asks, Why should women bear children? That they may be rent and torn, bombed, blistered, blasted, and poisoned, and damned in hell while they yet live? Why should men toil and save? That their earnings may be thrown on the world's bonfire? And cynicism answers, Let men and women grab a little pleasure for themselves while they can.

But all this should set Latter Day Saints to thinking. Why some of them should be losing faith in the revelations of God to his people is a mystery. The revelations are self-evidently true. Time vindicates them. While the world deluded itself with false hopes the Lord forewarned his people. There before them for a number of years was the very first section of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, so full of wonderful predictions, among others, this: "The day speedily cometh, the hour is not yet, but is nigh at hand, when peace shall be taken from the earth, and the Devil shall have power over his own dominion; and also the Lord shall have power over his saints, and shall reign in their midst, and shall come down in judgment upon Idumea, or the world."—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 6.

America is supposed to be at peace, and shudders at the famine, pestilence, and violence of Europe. But awful things happen in America. You have read the details of the Herrin massacre. Unarmed and helpless men were hunted and shot down like rabbits. Dying of their ghastly wounds, lying in the dirt of the road, burning with fever in the heat of the summer sun, they were denied a drink of water. Mothers with babes in arms cursed these anguished men in the name of God and refused them a drink of cold water. They were told they might get it in hell. Perhaps so. There may be mercy in hell. There was none in Herrin.

You have read of the two young men of Mer Rouge, Louisiana, taken by a great and organized band of masked men. They were never seen alive again. And now physicians on oath in a court of justice, having examined the headless and mutilated bodies of these two men, say that they must have been slowly and brutally tortured to death on some rack of torment. Their bones were systematically broken one by one. Atrocities that can only be hinted at in the press were perpetrated on their persons before death, man's ancient enemy, more merciful at least than man's neighbors, came to their rescue.

Such malignant hatred is almost inconceivable. It is incomprehensible. But you will remember that Jesus said that at his coming it should be as in the days before the flood. And you will remember that the record says that in those days the earth was "filled with violence." No wonder that when God wept, and Enoch asked him how he, being God, could weep, the Lord replied: "Behold these your brethren; they are the workmanship of my own hands. . . . I gave them a commandment that they should love one another . . . but behold they are without affection, and they hate their own blood." (Doctrine and Covenants 36: 7.)

Yet these things happen in America, to-day, in the twentieth century, toward which our fathers pressed, thinking that they saw the sunrise of world peace, the era of enlightenment and kindly humanity, the reign of emancipated man. In the background of our history lingers the shadows of the stern but righteous Pilgrim Fathers; making the sounding aisles of the dim woods ring with the anthem of the free. To-day bandits, seducers, murderers, ply their trade both by day and by night. The story of their deeds parades its procession diurnally across the front page of our morning newspapers in big headlines.

But surely the God who foretold all these things may be trusted to lead his people on. The race tried to press into the millennium carrying with it its old vices and errors. It cannot be done. Thus they failed to realize their ideals. And the day comes when the line will be drawn even more plainly, when the Devil will have dominion over his own, and God will have dominion over his own.

It is a time for faith. Man is not equal to the crisis. There is truth in the statement made by President Richmond of Union College: "If we think for a moment that the confusion into which this old world has been thrown is to be straightened out by the devices of economists or by the manipulations of political experts we are making a hideous mistake. It will be done, if it is done at all, as it was done in the beginning when the Spirit of God brooded over the face of the deep and brought an ordered world out of chaos." ELBERT A. SMITH.

Awake, Saints, Awake

In a personal letter to me one of the missionaries recently wrote:

"Last Sunday morning in our sacrament service there was given me some spiritual light on some of the matters affecting the church and I was made to realize some of the things that men were passing through that at times were very discouraging. I feel as a result I can more fully appreciate the position you occupy and how at times your heart almost sinks within you as you have in a great measure seen the conditions coming in upon the world as well as the church, and with all the powers of body and mind you have attempted to arouse our Saints to a realization of the things that were seen and understood by you, but so far only a very few have caught the vision. No doubt this is one of the great trials that you have to meet. I am fully convinced that it will take some very drastic measures on the part of the Author of the latter-day work to bring the people to that condition so that they can appreciate the provisions made for our benefit. Some will 'learn obedience by the things they suffer,' which no doubt will be the experience of many.

"I shall not only pray that you will be given power to endure this great burden of responsibility, but also will I plead that you shall see an awakening to these great tasks placed upon the church, and be made to know your efforts have not been in vain. I am sure from my observations that slowly you are awakening to a greater degree than you perhaps realize the forces that make for the good of the church."

God grant the Saints may awake soon, for we are sleeping away too many opportunities!

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

Reflections

How to keep the boys and girls in the church is a question always before the pastor, and must have effective answer if we are to preserve our proper ratio of gain in membership. It may be suggested that the answer is to make the church attractive to boys and girls. Yes, but how? What say you, pastors?

To fail to hold our young in the church puts upon the missionary arm of the church the whole burden of increasing the membership.

What have we gained when we have lost to the church one of our youths through disaffection, while a convert has been made by some missionary?

Our recent editorial regarding the young man in England who has so long been without work has brought to us several letters, some inclosing contributions and some offering work. The outcome will be noted later.

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

The Small Branch

Last week there appeared a splendid article by President E. A. Smith on pastoral work, especially in large branches and districts.

Since General Conference we have received several letters from members connected with small branches, who seem to think that the emphasis placed on missionary work by the late conference means that the pastoral work is to be neglected. Naturally we all most sincerely hope that this is not the case. So far as scattered members and small branches are concerned, their added care depends upon the missionary arm of the church, as it certainly would not pay the church to put in a pastor to give his whole time to a small branch. But the need of small branches as well as large branches and districts is keenly felt.

The church some years ago made arrangements that the presiding patriarch, as father to the church, should write to those scattered members who are really scattered because they do not live in an organized district. In this issue of the HERALD he reports this work for the past year.

But in the organized district this work naturally is part of the work of the district presidency to see that the scattered ones are visited, to encourage them to affiliate with the nearest branch and try to secure their attendance as regularly as possible, also to use these outposts as possible loci for future activities for bringing the church to the scattered members and their neighbors.

This brings another important aspect of the work to our minds and that is the grave need of active local officers. All too often the local priesthood and even the president of the branch is content, if he attends the church services and meets those who are there present, quite neglecting those who need his attention, those who have for various reasons been unable to attend regularly, those who perhaps are losing interest, those in other words who especially need his pastoral care as a shepherd of the flock and the care of his assistants in the Aaronic priesthood.

There is need for a great arousing of the priesthood of the church that every man do his own duty, that every deacon have his assigned task and every member of the Aaronic priesthood be open and ready to spend at least a reasonable portion of his time in visiting the Saints, that the Aaronic priests in particular visit the house of each member; that in the larger places the associate members of the Melchisedec priesthood shall be encouraged to give time to work which is in its nature pastoral to the support of the presiding officer and to the benefit of the church. If the work of God is to move on as it should, it is essential that every man remember his duty and do it. The holding of revival services occasionally by a patriarch or evangelist or one of the traveling ministry is by no means sufficient and is hardly a start unless it is loyally supported, loyal on behalf of the church not only at the time, but before and after, day in and day out, year in and year out.

In a rural community the task may not be easy. In a small branch it often happens that there are more scattered members. In large branches there is also this problem to be considered. It is the duty of the officers to see that all members are visited. But if any are to be given special attention it should be those who need the pastoral care rather than those who are already faithful. Though we do not urge that the faithful ones should be neglected or fail to receive the support and spiritual strength that they may receive in a visit by the officers of the branch or group, whose duty it is to make such home visits.

There is needed a great revival of interest and of activity by the whole priesthood and especially those on whom is laid the burden to feed the sheep and lambs of the kingdom of God, to edify the Saints, to care for the body of Christ.

Then having cared for the family of God, they should organize to take the word as missionaries to those hungering and thirsting in their vicinity.

The Passing of Frank W. Burton

In another column will be seen in a communication from W. H. Garrett the news of the death of Frank W. Burton, son of "Captain" Joseph Burton, of South Sea missionary fame. The fine work of Joseph and Emma Burton as missionaries has made them known throughout the church, and we feel sure all will extend to Sister Burton, who survives her husband and son, sincere sympathy in this her latest bereavement. We know, too, that Frank's host of friends will grieve over the loss of a genuine friend and devoted servant of the church.

Why Boys Leave the Farm

Farmers' boys leave the farm, according to Miss Abbot of the Federal Children's Bureau, because of a longing for leisure and because some of the farms are still but little beyond pioneer conditions of fifty years ago. A recent survey in North Dakota shows that farmers' children were required at times to do heavy and more or less hazardous farm work, driving even four- or five-horse teams to stackers, hay forks, and harrows; that boys as young as seven and girls of ten were required to do plowing. Eight hundred forty-five children were studying, and half had missed at least a month of school and nearly a third two months or more. Nine per cent had missed half the school term during the year. The remedy suggested is better legal and administrative provision for school children.

Child Welfare

During the past ten years since the Children's Welfare Bureau was established, forty-five States have added special children's welfare divisions whereas only one State had such a department in 1912, and whereas two States then granted mothers' pensions. In some form the number has now increased to forty, while more than half are making comprehensive inquiries to secure better legislation and administration.

Our Annual Tithing Reports

The request of the Presiding Bishop that we all make out our tithing reports annually, and that we do it this month unless we have already established a better fiscal year, is one that ought to be heeded.

We are in the Lord's business. Any business house must have its annual inventories. The assessor must know the valuation upon which taxes are levied. The Government must know what we are worth so income taxes can be collected. It is businesslike and the only method by which we can learn of our profits and losses.

It is not enough to make a guess as to our standing with God. To make liberal offerings is not sufficient. We might have a wrong basis for estimating our liberality. We might either rob God or hamper ourselves.

Then it is possible that we might pay money into the treasury as tithing which should have been credited as offering, or we might pay in offerings which should have been listed as tithing.

There is no need of guessing about it. Set down on the tithing report your income and your expenditures, both divided into proper headings. Find out how much your holdings have increased over last year. Pay the Lord his tenth the same as any other debt. Why not?

It is too difficult? Not at all. In 1920 the census

That wish may be realized by the use of a family budget book such as the one sold by the Herald Office for 25 cents. Its columns can be used for daily items, properly subdivided, and at the end of another year we can have more actual figures and fewer estimates.

But suppose we do not have the money when we find we owe tithing? Handle it the same as you would any other honest debt. Make some sort of arrangement to pay it. Go over your sources of future income, consider your immediate and necessary expenditures, and plan to handle it as expeditiously as possible. If the merchant sends you a statement of account with a "Please" on it, you understand that he is not necessarily going to enter suit for payment, but that he feels he ought to have the money he has earned in service to you. You either pay or go and explain what you intend to do about paying.

The state of the church finances is such now that we may well write for ourselves the "Please" on the bill we owe the Lord. Then do the best we can about it. That's all anyone can do.

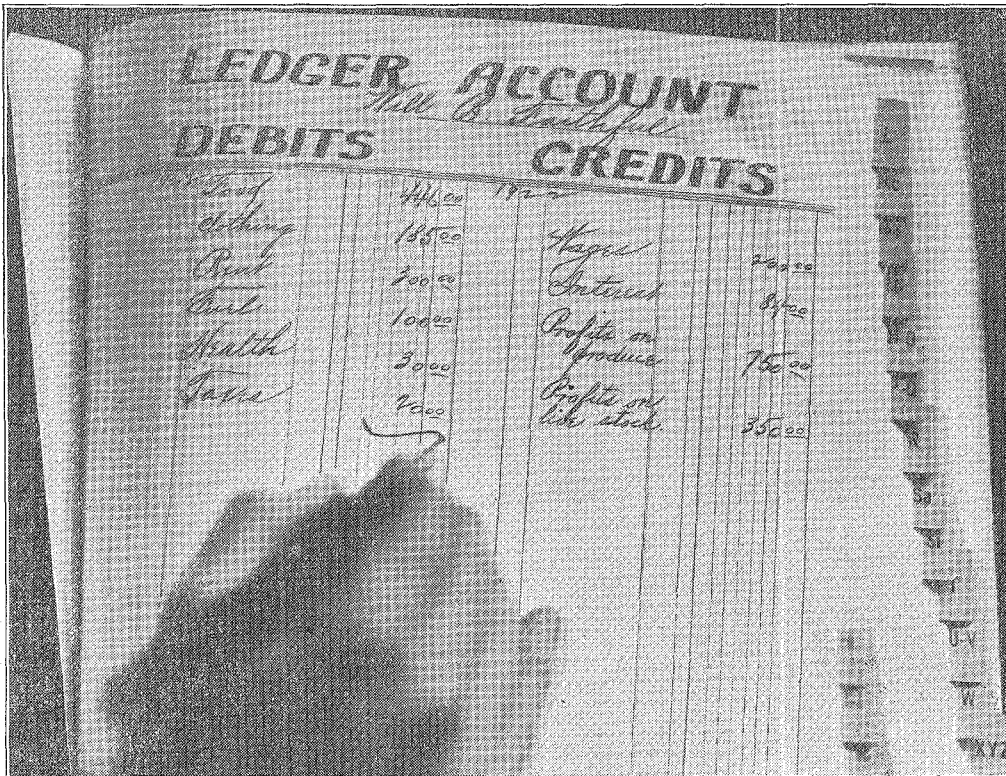

Your bishop or agent or solicitor will help you make out the blanks if you need such help. If none of these reside in your territory, ask the Presiding Bishop for a blank. The illustrations in last week's issue show plainly how to perform this simple task.

Our leaders in the financial department are seeking only to help us. They give much thought to making the task easy. In common with the missionaries and the other administrative officers of the church, they are actuated only by the best impulses in suggesting these methods. They are our servants and wish to serve us and thus serve the Lord.

They are not seeking to pry into our private affairs, but rather are trying to help us analyze our own affairs. They hope that as a result of this analysis we shall become more prosperous and thus more happy in our service to God.

enumerator called. He asked a great many questions that we did not know in detail how to answer. What was done about it? We arrived as nearly as possible to an answer and set it down. That was all we could do. It is all we need do in this instance. If we are honest with ourselves and with God, the mistakes we make in one item will largely be counterbalanced by compensating mistakes in another.

We may, and ought to, wish we had more accurate figures at hand.

Zion, The Pure in Heart

Sermon by Elbert A. Smith at the South Side Church, Independence, Missouri, Sunday, December 10, 1922.

Many pagan, heathen, and primitive forms of religion seem from our viewpoint to have given little attention to the moral and spiritual condition of their adherents. The main idea seemed to be to placate the particular god or gods to whom devotion was given. These gods were to be kept in a favorable attitude by means of sacrifice, ceremony, and ritual. The devotee might be vile, mean, cruel, yet he could enjoy his religious experiences and approach his altar apparently satisfying all the demands of his religion by ceremonial and sacrificial means.

Indeed it seems to us at times that the religious exercise itself made him immoral, as for instance in the worship of Moloch fathers and mothers cast their innocent children alive into the fiery furnace to win the pleasure of the god. The goddess Venus at one time in the development of her religion demanded that every woman at some time in her life must come to the temple and offer her virtue as a sacrifice to the first man who would give her a piece of silver to throw into the treasury of the temple. The mothers of India cast their babies into the sacred Ganges River.

Even in the Mohammedan religion which is considered neither pagan nor heathen, it was not only proper but even laudable to hate, persecute, and kill the nonbeliever. A converted Mohammedan from India, who recently visited Independence, related his experiences. He was a chaplain of Mohammedan troops in the French service in the great war, and while in this service became converted. Mindful of the fact that in the Koran he was enjoined to hate and kill the heretics, he learned that Christ had taught the gospel of love; that he taught the disciples to love their enemies, to forgive them, and that he himself upon the cross prayed for those who had slain him, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do." The contrast was so great that he was compelled to make a choice and there could be but one choice between the gospel of hate and the gospel of love. As a result, according to his story, his own children, still in India, were put to death when it was learned that he had been converted, and his wife narrowly escaped with her life. This accounts to an extent for the interminable slaughter of the Armenians by the Turks. To kill an Armenian is not only desirable but necessary, from the viewpoint of the Turk. It is related that a British officer remonstrated with a Turkish officer, saying, "The whole world respects the bravery, fortitude, and devotion of the Turkish soldiery. If you would only quit your wanton slaughter of the Armenians, we would take you into our fellowship." In some surprise the Turk replied, "Well, if we didn't kill them, who would?"

Not only did a wrong idea of religion creep into the pagan, heathen, and Mohammedan systems of religion, it even found its way into the so-called Christian churches. Catholics devised the inquisition where men were put upon racks, where they were tortured with pincers and thumbscrews and all the instruments of torment that the Devil could suggest to ingenious minds. Yet those engaged in such work felt that they were finding their way to the throne of grace through ceremony and ritual and sacrifice. Protestants themselves when they came into power retaliated upon Catholics in somewhat similar manner and turned to persecute the lesser sects who drew away from them by the ever outbranching roads of apostasy—as the sad experiences of John Wesley, Roger Williams, and many others testify.

Even among our own people we must admit that many times there is manifested an entirely mistaken idea of the vital thing in religion. Dependence is placed entirely upon membership or upon ordinances and ceremonies, such as that of baptism and the laying on of hands. I recall at one time how a certain brother who was charged with a certain small offense was tried before an elders' court, where he stoutly denied the charge. The case was appealed to a stake high council where he repeated his positive statement of innocency. It came to the high council where he again declared that he was innocent. When convicted before the high council he went into his home branch business meeting and confessed guilt. Certain it is at one time or the other, either when he professed innocency or when he confessed guilt he lied in order to protect and preserve his church membership. Certainly he could not expect to win the favor of God by telling an untruth, but he could hope to preserve his name upon the roll of the church. Too often membership in the church is looked upon as a fetish that in the next world will preserve one from the torments of hell—a sort of fire insurance.

The true religion of Jesus Christ differs from all these concepts in that it demands individual righteousness. The vital and essential thing is that a man shall be righteous—that is, that he shall be right with God and with his fellow man. Church membership, ceremony, sacrifice, ordinance, doctrine, worship, these are but subsidiary things, vehicles, methods, that help him to become righteous and to maintain his standing in that state, and to express himself religiously.

The Significance of Rite and Ceremony

I might pause here to dwell for a moment on the significance of membership, of ceremony, and of sacrifice. Does the fact that you are a member of the church and that your name is on the record, in and of itself, suffice to meet the demands of God and the needs of your own soul? Is that the significance of membership? No, the significance of membership is that you have entered into communion in an organization where you may have fellowship with those of like belief who are moving towards a common goal and that with them you may have fellowship with God. It means an opportunity for worship, for fellowship, and for service; and if you do not avail yourself of the opportunity for fellowship, for service, and for self-development, of what good is membership to you?

What is the significance of ceremony—baptism for instance? Some people have sought strenuously for some method by which they may be rid of sin by mechanical means. They feel that baptism washes sin from them as one might cleanse his hands with soap and water or if they are very dirty with more vigorous elements. That would be a very easy way to rid oneself of sin. But baptism first of all is a symbol. It is true that man has always cleansed his body with water and so when God cast about for a symbol that would represent the cleansing of man's soul from the stains of sin, that would be to the individual and to those that observed him a memorial of such cleansing, he very naturally selected the ordinance of baptism by immersion in water. When this baptism is not accompanied by a voluntary change in the heart and in the life of the individual, he cleansing himself with the help of God and putting away iniquity out of his life, the rite of baptism becomes to him void and quite without meaning or significance.

What is the meaning of sacrifice? If you give one tenth of that which you own, or perhaps, having paid your tithing, sacrifice in order to give a free-will offering, does the significance lie in the thought that thereby you have purchased the favor of God, and have insured yourself against fire under the thought, "He that is tithed shall not be burned"? If so the one giving the greatest amount would receive the greatest favor from God. But Jesus pointed out the poor widow who had given of her mite and declared that she had given more than any one of the rich men who had cast liberally into the treasury. In fact he said that she had given more than they all. The significance of all such sacrifices, as I see it, is that it permits you to become a collaborer with God. You enter into his work. You thus help to preach the gospel in all the world, you help to sustain the Saints' Homes for the aged, the Children's Home, Graceland College, and all the good enterprises of the church that are carried on for the help of humanity. You are also assisted to cast out selfishness from your life and to enlarge your heart with love for humanity by the process of sacrifice. And the heart which is biggest with love receives the most favor from God, rather than the individual who has the longest purse.

Jesus Demands Righteousness

We repeat that Jesus demands righteousness. Young people, what is to be your attitude? Will you satisfy yourself with church membership? Will you be content with having been baptized? If so it isn't worth your time to trouble yourself with a profession of religion. If you are prepared to move forward in a life of growth, development, and righteousness then the church has everything that is worth while to offer you. The true meaning of ceremony and sacrifice shines forth in the message of Christ. Indeed it began to appear in the Old Testament scriptures under what we term the Mosaic economy. I read from the first chapter of Isaiah:

To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the Lord: I am full of the burnt offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts; and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he goats. When ye come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hand, to tread my courts? Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto me; the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with; it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting. Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth: they are a trouble unto me; I am weary to bear them. And when ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you: yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear, your hands are full of blood. Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow.—Isaiah 1: 11-17.

The Lord was there speaking in reference to Sodom and Gomorrah. They were quite satisfied to make sacrifices and offer prayers, which were good enough in their way, but quite valueless and without meaning when disassociated from the real vital things of religion. The thing that God wanted them to do was to make themselves clean, seek judgments, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless and help the widow.

I read now from the sixth chapter of Hosea, "For I desired mercy, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings." (Verse 6.)

Again I read from the sixth chapter of Micah. "Hear ye, O mountains, the Lord's controversy, and ye strong foundations of the earth: for the Lord hath a controversy with his people, and he will plead with Israel." (Verse 2.)

The Lord had a controversy. What was it? Hear him! "Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" (Micah 6:7, 8.)

The children of Israel were willing to make burnt offerings of rams and to offer sacrifices of oil and even give their firstborn, "the fruit of their bodies for the sin of their souls." For there did come a time in the history of Israel when Moloch was set up in the valley of Hinnom just outside of Jerusalem and to him the Jews offered their little children as sacrifices. But the thing God wanted of them was to do good, to love mercy, and to walk humbly.

Early in the ministry of Christ the fact began to shine forth even more clearly that he was interested in the individual, in his heart, in his life, and that a bad life could not cover itself under ceremony and ordinance and profession, thus hoping to win divine favor. Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews, came to Christ, acquainted no doubt fully with ceremonial law, and to him the statement was made, "Ye must be born again." It is true that ceremony appears here. He was to be born of water and of the Spirit. But these were helps and the vital thing was a transformation in the life of the individual.

On a certain occasion Jesus dined with the Pharisees. While so doing it came to his ears that they had criticized him because he ate without washing his hands. He said to them, "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess. Thou blind Pharisee, cleanse first that which is within the cup and platter, that the outside of them may be clean also." (Matthew 23:25, 26.) Taking a platter and cup from the table before him he used them as object lessons. The Jews were very particular in the the cleansing of vessels. Many pages of the law related to the ceremonial cleansing of vessels, but apparently, at least with this family, less care was given to that within the cup and the platter. Jesus was talking about the cup and the platter, but thinking about men, and they no doubt perceived very clearly that he meant that they were giving strict attention, in fact exceedingly strict attention to form and ceremony and outward display and were not what they ought to be within their own hearts and in their own private life. If they had any doubts concerning his meaning it must have been cleared away by that which he immediately proceeded to say to them, "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchers, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness. Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity."—Matthew 23:27, 28.

The Kernel of a Wholesome Growth

Religion is a growth from the inside out. In the development of Zion, the people of Zion must be the pure in heart because that is the method of normal growth in all nature. The oak tree grows from the heart out, adding year by year concentric rings, and if the heart be rotten, presently the tree will fall. The apple grows from the inside out. If the core be rotten a beautiful exterior is of little value. Jesus said, "Blessed are the pure in heart." Verily so, because they have the kernel and the life from which may be developed a pure and wholesome and strong growth. That is salvation. Christ came not only to die for men but to show men how to live; and no matter what importance you may attach to his death upon the cross, you must come to see that a very great and vital and indispensable part of his mission was that part which went into living, the setting of an example by which others should live.

Why must Zion be the pure in heart? Many obvious answers occur to you. The heart is the seat of desire, or at least we use it that way symbolically. Thought, feeling, and will control our action. It is not enough to be intellectually converted. If the desires continue wrong there will be a clash in the life within that sooner or later will bring disaster and defeat. That to a certain extent is the trouble in the world. I hear men, for instance, railing at profiteers. I hear them castigating railway magnates for oppressing railway laborers. I hear them castigating mine owners for oppressing miners in their wages, and complaining about the general dishonesty of the times. And yet I observe that many men who indulge in this line of conversation as soon as they have an opportunity to defraud some one or enrich themselves at the expense of another do so without perceptible hesitation. They have had an intellectual perception of that which is wrong with the times, they have perceived the iniquity and danger of graft and fraud and oppression in the lives of others, but when the opportunity came to indulge themselves the covetous desires of their own hearts prevailed.

Not long ago I was talking with a man who had observed a murder in Kansas City. A certain man had been shot down because he had broken up another man's home. The man talking to me said that the fellow got what he deserved. He strongly condemned the crime of invading another man's home, and yet from his general appearance and finally from his statement of his own moral convictions, I concluded that if a good opportunity came to him to gratify himself at the expense of another man, even to the point of breaking up that man's home he probably would do so. The man who slays another man for invading his home wins a good deal of popular applause, but without doubt it is a fact that many men who say that he has done right, themselves have been guilty of invading homes or will be guilty if they have a good opportunity. Perhaps the man is finally set free by a jury of twelve good men and true, who bring in a verdict of justifiable homicide or something of the sort, taking refuge under the unwritten law. And it may happen that members of the jury themselves have not hesitated to prey upon the virtue of womanhood. I am speaking now about men of the world.

That was where Solomon failed. He was so wise that the fame of his wisdom spread around the world, and to-day after the lapse of centuries of time when we wish to find a synonym for wisdom we pass back of Lincoln and Washington and Gladstone and even Socrates to the name of Solomon; and yet the uncontrolled desires of his heart led him to do the very things that his wisdom had warned him against. There must be more than an intellectual conversion. Zion must consist of those who desire to deal honestly and live righteously.

The subject assigned me seems to have been taken from the fifth paragraph of the 94th section of the Book of Covenants, and I note that whoever is responsible for the editing of this paragraph capitalized the words, "Zion the Pure in Heart," for purposes of emphasis.

A good deal of importance may attach to Zion as a place and to Zion as a city, but after all Zion will stand or fall upon the character of her people. For that reason when they failed and were driven out in 1833 this statement was made, "Behold I say unto you there were jarrings and contentions and envyings and strife and lustful and covetous desires among them." (Doctrine and Covenants 98:3.) Nothing that those people did justified the persecution heaped upon them and the murderous and unjust assaults that drove them from their inheritances; but the fact that they themselves were not entirely right before the Lord came between them and their great Protector, so that for them he could not exert himself as he otherwise would have done. One of the great promises is that God will dwell in Zion by his Spirit and we know that he will not dwell in unholy temples or with an unholy people. Let us so live as to merit his blessing and his presence.

Evangelism

Sermon of William Patterson, delivered at the tent, Independence, Missouri, October 3, 1922. Reported by Mrs. A. Morgan.

As has been announced my subject this morning is that of evangelism. I am not going to give you any definition other than the one found in any of the standard dictionaries—the purveying of the love of Christ, which is expressed in his message to the people.

The question has been asked, and is being asked daily, What's wrong with the world? It is an easy matter to ask the question, What is wrong with the world? but it is a most difficult thing to present the solution. I believe, however, as a people we have the solution in the gospel of Jesus Christ.

I would like to read a paragraph that I clipped from a book recently, to give you the thought of one of the leading men of the present social world:

The influence of Christian religion on daily life has decayed very rapidly throughout Europe during the last hundred years. Not only has the proportion of nominal believers declined, but even among those that believe, the intensity of belief has enormously diminished.

Thus in a few words there has been pictured before our mental vision the condition not only of Europe but of the whole world.

The great panacea for the ills of the human race is the gospel of Jesus Christ. Not the word of Jesus Christ only, save it be that that word becomes flesh, and dwells among us.

Jesus Christ manifested in his life the message that he brought. Consequently he has become to us the great standard by which we measure our lives. I have not yet found a man whom I would like to have stand as a measuring stick for my life. I could not point you to any man in the church of Jesus Christ to-day, as we know it, to whom you could look as a pattern. There is, however, a pattern, there is a standard by which each of us is to be measured. That standard is Christ.

True Religion Comes First

Let me read again from another book, a statement which I believe is just as truthful as the former, the words of Frederick Harrison:

I believe that before all things needful, beyond all else, is true religion. This only can give wisdom, happiness and goodness to men, and a nobler life to mankind. Nothing but this can sustain, guide and satisfy all lives, control all characters, and unite all men.

I believe we can say amen to that statement, because we have come to a realization that we want something in the world superseding that which the world has been presenting throughout the centuries.

There has been a desire on the part of many people, many persons, to bring about the unification, the uniting of human relationships. Many men have had a specific land or territory in mind, to which they have pointed as the center in which the unified rule or government should be located. Efforts have thus been made under the iron heel of despotism, using militaristic means to gain their purposes. Thank God, they have all failed.

Other men have tried to unite the people by education. Well, if you will define the term so as to apply it to the development of the whole being called man, the development of the soul of man, I say education is the thing that will solve the problems of the present age; but if you say college education, university education, or any technical education without the religious education, there will be a complete failure.

Why the Greeks Failed

The Greeks failed in their effort because they developed an idealism at the expense of true religious development.

What is needed in the world to-day? Religion. Not creeds, but a religion; and the highest expression of religion is the Christian religion. Consequently the solution of the problem of to-day is the application of the religion of Jesus Christ as expressed in the lives of the people.

The Lord said, Except ye are one ye are not mine. We realize this necessity more each day, especially on this occasion, when we are gathered together in conference capacity to perpetuate the work of Christ's church on earth. We are here as a body of people, but unless we are united by the bonds of Christ, we will never accomplish the end that God has purposed in this church: That is, the uniting of humanity, the consummation of the brotherhood of man.

The church of Jesus Christ is the organ by which Christ finds expression. The organ is all right, so far as the development is concerned, exterior development, but I wonder how much we have developed internally. It is a case, I believe, at the present time, for the physician to heal himself. Yes; we need the healing process, the healing balm of Jesus Christ as a people to-day just as much as did other people, whose aims were in the direction of the consummation of the word of God.

Need for Change in Policy

We heard yesterday that the aim of the church was the creation of Christian character. That all will readily admit is the great aim of this church; but how are we going to develop it?

First of all, and you will pardon me for saying this, there is a need for a change of policy. There is a need for a change of policy in the presentation of our religion. The content of the religion is all right, but the policy is not sufficiently farsighted.

I listened to an able address from the lips of the Reverend M. Bader in the International Sunday School Convention, convened at Kansas City a few months ago, and this is what he said, and we as a people may take heed:

The world is needing a new evangelism; not the evangelism that has been presented, but an evangelism that has as its watchword, prevention; not rescue.

I remember whilst I was seated there and the audience was indulging in a song service, some one asked for the old hymn to be sung, "Throw out the life line," and I heard a comment alongside of me which cause me to think. You know that as a people we have been throwing out the life line instead of teaching the people to swim. That's the trouble with us. Like other people, we have been throwing out the life line. We have been seeking to rescue our young men and young women, when we have failed to develop in them the religious character.

Wanted: A New Evangelism

Now you know what I mean when I say that the world wants a new evangelism. Not only does the world want a new evangelism, but the church wants a new evangelism, an evangelism that will go down to the very source. Prevention, then, should be our watchword; and only where people have been ignorantly foolish shall we have to use the life line.

I believe, then, that instead of conversion we will have to use the word conservation.

Conservation is the development and preservation of the realities of life.

We should not languish till we have lost control of the growing child, and then come to a prayer meeting and ask God, in prayer, to take the responsibility which we have shirked. Parents have oft-times shirked the responsibility of developing the childhood of the church, and then when they grew up into maturity, into the adolescent period, they have asked God, with tears, to save their children. Remember, we as a people must teach the children how to swim, if they are to be saved.

The policy of the church in the beginning was to go out and preach the principles of the gospel. And if you will read the history of the church, you will find that when the elders went to England they preached the resurrection of the dead. They preached the resurrection of the dead when they went across on the boat, and when they arrived in England they again preached the resurrection of the dead. But they didn't resurrect the people as they ought to have done, consequently the church net gathered in all kinds of fishes, and you know the result.

More Than Principles Required

I don't say we should cease preaching the principles of the gospel of Christ. I believe that these should be inculcated in the minds of the childhood of the church; so that when they reach the years of maturity, they will have that development, of which I spoke. They want the principles of the gospel, and more too.

One organization has placed itself on record as saying, Give me a child till he is eight years of age, and you can have him afterward. There's a lot of truth in that statement; but we have, as I have previously stated, shifted the responsibility until the youth of the church has in many cases, gotten too far out to sea. It is sad to think that we are losing so many of our young people when they might have been saved to the church. The loss is startling. We should not close our eyes to the fact.

I was very much impressed yesterday morning when I heard a mother speak of the experience of her eight-year-old son. She spoke of a vision that this child had—a most wonderful thing, and I thought, Well, there's something back of all this. And as she began to relate her experiences, how she had desired that God would bless her with such inspiration, I began to think that that mother unconsciously conveyed that to her child. She found her desire, not in her own experience, but in the experience of her son. So if the church is going to find expression, true expression, there must come a development or a transmission of these rich potentialities to the posterity of this church.

Home, Church, Society

Too often have we been considering abstract matters, while we have been leaving the fundamental things of life untouched. I have heard men speak eloquently concerning the Trinity. I have heard others try to disprove that, with just as much eloquence, but how many of you know about the Holy Trinity on earth? We are not in heaven yet. We are right here, friends. Right here on earth. And how many of us know concerning the Holy Trinity of the home, the church, and society, or the state. When I say the state, or society, I mean not a few of the people in a certain land, but the brotherhood of man throughout all lands.

Too many of our people have joined this church because of the prospects of a celestial glory. I have heard people who came into the church because we preached concerning the resurrection of the dead much better than another church preached it. It would have been better had they remained out of the church, because we have baptized a modern Pharisee into the church, and they have joined this church because of what they could get out of it.

We should belong to this church for what we can put into it, not what we can get out of it; and when we get that attitude of mind, we will know full well what the word service means, and why these men are constantly repeating to us to give expression of the gospel of Jesus Christ in service.

The Holy Trinity, to me, then, is the Home, the Church, and the State.

The home cannot be too greatly stressed. I think the main troubles which the church is facing to-day might be traceable to the homes. I will tell you why.

The good mother and father who do not want to put the stewardship plan into operation, are inculcating selfishness in the minds of their children. If selfishness is developed in the mind of the child, you will have a selfish man or woman. When the child asks for candy and you give it unhesitatingly, you are oftentimes doing him an injustice. American people spend more money for chewing gum than they do on education. It would be better if children were taught to appreciate the value of money by procuring more healthful expedients, instead of so much candy, which is physically and economically ruinous to the child. Oh, yes, to get rid of the children, we will give them a dime, and they will go down to the store and purchase candy and as a result have no sense of money values. They don't get the meaning of money, save it be the getting of some frivolity. Instead of developing them for the stewardship of the future, they are becoming social parasites. The home is the foundation.

Home Exists for Child

The home exists, primarily, for the development of child life; otherwise, we wouldn't need a home. The cattle don't have homes. They don't need them, because their children are developed in a few months, but the human children have a longer period of childhood, to prepare them for the complicated responsibilities of manhood and womanhood. Hence, if we have failed to set the house in order, to that extent have we failed to set the church in order; and you will remember that a few years ago, some of the leading men of this church, Frederick G. Williams, for instance, of the presidency, was rebuked because he had not instructed his children.

Now, I can see why the Lord rebuked that man, and that rebuke is just as applicable to-day as then: You know there is a good deal of prudery in the world. The time has come when the things that concern our development must be taught, and the mother will not be able to shift the responsibility for her failure upon the Lord, in not instructing her daughter; nor the father for not instructing his son; he will have to shoulder his own and she her own responsibility.

As a young man, I have been in this church but a few years. I have represented it but a few years, but I have been placed in some of the most difficult positions, and have had to face some of the most trying problems because of a failure on the part of the parents to instruct their children; and I have even had them ask me to instruct them as they ought to be. It ill becomes a young man to do that. The responsibility rests in the home, and upon the shoulders of the parents does this responsibility lie.

A child—oh, we cannot stress this too much, in the light of the experience I heard yesterday—a child has a right. It has a right to be well born, and to be brought into a religious atmosphere by religious, devoted parenthood.

Now, do you know what I mean by conservation of life? The development of the child life? The responsibility of parenthood?

Mother's arms is the first world the child comes into, and we have thought the apostles and prophets and teachers had the great responsibility! I would place the responsibility on the mothers, right from the beginning.

Women Do Not Require Priesthood

The apostles cannot do much without the assistance of the mothers. I have heard it said, I don't know why the women have not been ordained to the priesthood. I know. They have that by right of their sex. They don't need the priesthood. God has endowed them with a greater thing even than the priesthood.

I heard it said one time by a certain man, that the women could not boast of their Shakespeares, of their Lincolns, of their Garfields, of their Washingtons; and a very sensible man there got up and said, No, but these men had mothers. Lincoln attributed his success not to himself but to his mother, and you will notice in every instance, men, big men, attribute their success to their home environment, which was created by a devoted, religious mother; and so, that sister yesterday paid a tribute to motherhood, and did not know it.

So in this great evangelizing movement mothers are certainly very prominent. With all our prophets, apostles, and evangelists, pastors, teachers, and deacons, minus motherhood, an intelligent motherhood, our work is of no avail.

Home conditions, then, determine the product. We will have religious characters from the home, or we shall have irreligious characters; and if I should say, if I should again repeat, I would say that the home is greatly responsible for the present condition of the world. Nations are composed of families; of homes. The homes are the units. They are the integral parts of a whole, and the whole is no stronger than its integral parts.

Zion No Stronger Than Its Homes

The church, we may say, to-day, is no stronger than its integral parts. Zion shall not be stronger than the homes of its people.

I would like to go into homes where petty fault-finding, and backbiting were supplanted by family worship. Where the principles of altruism were being manifest instead of selfishness. The home is the place where we can develop the greatest democracy of all. The greater serving the lesser; the parents serving the children, and the children serving the parents. That's the true democracy; the true democratic spirit—each serving the other; no big ones, but all having one common end.

From the home must come the religious consciousness. The home must prepare us for church. As I said, church comes second, and if we have not a home consciousness we will never have a church consciousness, for the children who cannot voluntarily love their parents, cannot love God. Love must begin at home. If a man cannot preach upon his own doorstep, he should not go into the pulpit to preach.

The reason why we haven't found a church consciousness is probably because we haven't got a home consciousness yet, and have to go back and establish the foundation, for a building is no stronger than its foundation. This church is no stronger than its homes, which is the foundation of the church, of society, of civilization; and when the time comes that the homes shall have become disintegrated, then the church will have become disintegrated too. The reason civilization is going down to-day is because of the lack of a home consciousness; this lack in home consciousness results in legal dissolution. This legal dissolution can either be the cause or the result. Both are evil. As the home prepares the child for church consciousness, so must the church prepare the child or the adolescent for a state of consciousness, not a provincial state consciousness, a world consciousness.

Salt Must Lose Itself

You will pardon my repeating the text that was quoted yesterday morning, "Ye are the salt of the earth."

You know the salt is of no consequence until it loses itself in the thing it is salting. This church will never be the salt of the earth until it loses itself individually and collectively in humanity. We have been too provincial. The time is coming, when we as a people must think in international terms and not in national terms.

I thought as I looked up at these flags this morning, of what they meant to us. What does America mean? Does it mean a body of soil with houses on it, with trees planted in it, or does it stand for principle? We have soil in other lands. We have trees in other lands. We have beautiful houses in other lands—what does America stand for? Does it stand for democracy? freedom, religious freedom? If so, I am as a result of my citizenship in this church an American. But if it stands for provincialism, I can never become an American. If the Australian flag stands for liberty, freedom, democracy, I am an Australian, but if it doesn't, I am not, though I was born there.

An International Church

The time has come when we must have a universal concept, when we as a church must consider the people of other lands as well as our own selves here. The statement was made the other evening by one of the apostles, the church is to diffuse the Spirit of Christ in all nations. Then this church must be international, and it is so.

I am pleased I came to America, as I know you people more. I always did have a love for America. I always will have. I have a greater love for it now, since I came over here, and I wish some of those people who are provincial in their ideas would go abroad somewhere, and become broadminded.

The Hebrews in the past were provincial. They had a line of demarcation around them, and they classed themselves as the favorites of God. Jesus Christ had to come and break down these provincial barriers; and I will never forget the statement I read where he went to the well and there saw a Samaritan. Oh, we cannot have any dealings with these Samaritans. No, they are not of our nationality. We cannot have any dealings with those people. The Lord had to come and break down that thing. I wonder if he will have to come again and break some of it down in this age.

He gave a commission, the commission which is being perpetuated by this church, which is universal—Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel—unto the people who call themselves Americans? No. He said, Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. Universal in its application.

There is no nation to-day holding a patent on the religion of Jesus Christ. It is for all. The men and women who are to go out and represent this church in other nations, must have this concept, or they had better stay in America. The time has come when we must evangelize the world, and this evangelization cannot be accomplished by narrow-minded men and women. We must have a broader concept of things.

Yes, and the Lord knew that, too, when he told the people back in the early days of the church to get a knowledge of all nations and study all histories. Why? Because they would be better able to appreciate their viewpoint. You could appreciate my viewpoint, and I, yours. I may not to the fullest extent appreciate yours, but I am more able to fully appreciate it now I have been among you, and I hope when I shall go back to Australia—if it is the wish of the church—I shall be true to the principles of Christ, and not be provincial.

I often think we are rather provincial, and that we set the lines of demarcation in the church, when we say, I belong to this stake, or that district. The church is the church of Jesus Christ in all lands.

Not a Foreigner

I am pleased that I was born in Australia, and pleased, furthermore, that I came to America; and I hope I shall go to other lands, as your representative, that I may get a broader concept of life.

I have been introduced to the people of the church in this land as a foreigner. I don't feel it. I don't feel there is anything foreign about me at all. I don't think that word can be found in the church of Jesus Christ. As a citizen, I am a foreigner, that is, of this nation, but as a member of this church I am not a foreigner. I am a part of the great brotherhood of man. Unless we feel this, when we are sent to other lands, we are unable to adjust ourselves to conditions there.

After all, our work is not so much preaching as practice. We want practical men. I heard it said, or read it in a letter, that a certain American had gone across to Europe, and in a short time had accomplished a wonderful work. The reason for this was that he adjusted himself to the people; he mingled with them, and got down to their level to lift them up. A lot of men stand off and throw their theological theories like little children throw the apples into the air; no wonder they don't get results.

I remember reading a statement by Bishop Fowler, who said:

America is my alphabet; the world is my textbook. You cannot get much out of the alphabet, but you can get far more out of the textbook.

Now, let us ask the question that has been asked recently, What's wrong with the church? It is not all right, you know. What's wrong with it? I will tell you what is needed.

New Birth of Church Needed

It needs a new birth; just like each of us needs a new birth. The church needs a new birth, and a new evaluation, a spiritual rejuvenation, a return to its pristine purity, and evangelistic aggressiveness. In the early church they had the real evangelistic spirit, and you know the accomplishments of that church; but we want to go back farther into the Christ spirit of the church, and getting that perspective, let us so order our lives that we may be able to adjust ourselves.

The urgent need of this church to-day is a need of unification. We heard it said recently that the church had lost its power. It hasn't lost a bit of it. It hasn't lost any of it at all. The trouble is the power is being misdirected. You have seen the stream flowing down from the mountains at a great pace, but finally the ingenuity of man placed a dam, a wall, across it, and as a result of the harnessing of this power, the stream now turns on the electric lights in a city miles away. There was power there, but it was misdirected.

The church needs a change of methods; the development of a home, church, and state consciousness, a greater tolerance toward our fellow religionists, and the revaluation of our religious experiences, a more aggressive evangelism, and the demonstration of our theology in practical living.

A Clearer Vision

By A. H. Parsons

Of all things that could happen to the church for its betterment, one of the best would be a clearer vision of our personal duties making to the redemption of Zion from ignorance and superstition that so largely predominates in our minds and souls. These latter are preventives of growth and the highest spirituality possible for the people of God to enjoy.

Education is synonymous with religion, and it cannot be separated, though we may wish it so. The man who learns or makes the discovery of his personal asset to the church, will make the discovery that religion is not made up of being a seventy, high priest, or historian, or having the term apostle affixed to his name, but is an achievement that has come by earnest devotion (not to selfish purpose), but to the group as a whole. And it is not made up of an austere manner, or by cutting remarks in words that naturally arouse and fire the human soul with resentment. Religion is the result of happenings and application to divine ethics. If we fail to demonstrate our godly ethics in life's unfoldments, we certainly are not under the influence we have thought.

God Is Not Mocked

It is possible for us to fool ourselves and to some extent our neighbors, but no man or woman has acquired the ability or has qualified so as to fool Jehovah. Apostle Paul said, "Examine yourself," and see if the beginning of your spiritual life has improved your manners. Of all religious people in this big world we can the least afford to be deceived, personally or collectively; hence should be very careful that we are not deceiving our own selves.

"By Their Fruits Ye Shall Know Them"

Are we wholly satisfied with the fruitage we are individually bearing? Is our life bearing or exhibiting heavenly fruitage? In other words do my acts and words exhibit that I love my neighbor as myself, and am willing to speak of him as I want him to speak of me? We may differ, but need we fight or use words that are harsh like a knife that is sharp and cuts deep and wound our fellow?

Think of it and ask yourself if ever guilty of such acts, if you have been in the habit of doing so, are you satisfied with your qualification and growth along that line and are your prospects good for a heavenly entrance when life shall come to a close here?

Education

The great bugaboo of the age, with some, is education, and, in fact, it has been in all ages past with a portion of the people. Yet it is the only means we have of knowing anything. When we open our eyes upon this great world everything is new and strange. Right there we begin to make discoveries and continue to do so (if we are normal) as long as we live. With this vision of things before us why should we discredit our fellows who may not see as we do and vote their own sentiment as they see it? If education means anything to man, it is to be demonstrated in his attitude toward others. In the language of this text: "No one can assist in this work, except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith." We may have faith in ourselves, but the getting of it in our fellows is the problem.

We love ourselves, but the other fellow can love himself; yet we hope to be one sometime—but when?

I remember a debate I was a party to in my early ministry and what the man said as we met before the public. He said he was a scholar, and told all he knew of Greek and Latin. I said as I followed this wise man, what I knew would be developed ere this debate was concluded, and I would not beg the question by tooting my horn at this juncture. However, I had sympathy for those who felt it necessary for them to unfold so much talent at one setting, but however, I presumed that my opponent was like the boy, "afraid if he did not tell it it might not get out."

I feel the same way about education and religion, that I might be like the young fellow I heard of that got religion and went to the logging woods for the winter and the minister said to him, "My dear brother, now you are going away I pray you not be careless and lose your religion," on his return the minister approached him and asked how about his religion, he quietly answered: "I have all I took away, and I do not think anybody knew that I had it."

How many of us would have to furnish a telescope to our fellows to help them to find that we had that wonderful article, religion? Big letters affixed to my name may mean more than some people want to give credit to and it may mean less than I have discovered. If I can by reason of what those big letters stand for give publicity and expression to my personality in such a way that I am helpful to those who are or have been more unfortunate than I, providing my consciousness of humility and love is the dynamic that moves my activities, all is well.

The Affirmative

If we could see the affirmative and seek to present the facts we have accumulated without reference to what our brother may have or may not have said, how much more brilliant our inspiration would shine to our fellows. But when we stoop to the low trickiness of politicians it is a demonstration to a thinking person we are only begging the question instead of arguing it from an intellectual viewpoint. Education in its rules of development of the mind is only reflected by the acts of the one possessing that valuable quality as he or she may obtain.

In other words I may purchase a splendid set of carpenter tools and then may not know how to use them, having no knowledge of their use, so I might obtain big letters affixed to my name and still be ignorant as to how to exhibit the power, influence, and attainment they should bring to the human soul. And because of this fact and lack of knowing how to act or use that I am supposed to know, I disgust thinking people with education instead of helping them to see the beauty of it.

So it is with religion. Some people only get a smattering and think they are the finished product—when in fact they have not learned the first principles of religion. Religion that does not produce results in keeping with the divine mind as historically portrayed in the Holy Scriptures, is not religion, though it may be called by that name.

Neither is education education unless it imparts gently, lovingly, humbly, the true essence of development and an uplift to our associates who may not have as much as we think we have. If we have it, let its true worth become apparent to the child as well as the older ones.

We only make ourselves old fogies or fossils by repudiating the only means that exist for information that leads to knowledge.

Can we afford to climb part way up the tree of learning and cut off the branch we are resting upon? Think of it, my dear reader.

Let us be consistent. Educated or undeveloped, college or seminary will not put on those finishing touches unless we make an effort for self qualification to reveal the advantage of those opportunities afforded in the finer texture of our feelings for those who have not enjoyed the possibility of entering such conditions.

If refinement does not come and is not apparent in the activities of one who has had these advantages, what encouragement is it to those who have looked upon education as a bugaboo or a dangerous thing for a person to invest in? If I know any more than my fellows that I am associated with, it is my duty gently and kindly, lovingly, humbly, and graciously to help them to what they need without disparaging their unfortunate condition.

If I am truly educated I see farther, clearer, and more distinctly the subject and hence should be able to give an exegesis in such a manner that I would draw them to me as a teacher and strengthen their faith in the big letters affixed to my name, as meaning more than they had anticipated.

I cannot blame people for their disbelief in religion and education. They predicate their judgment upon the fruitage, and it is often bad and produces such bad influence, in class and class legislation. If we all looked for the beautiful and the sweets of life, it would not appear so disastrous to either religion or education.

Will We Wake Up?

I wonder sometimes if we will wake up in time to hear the call when Gabriel blows his horn, and become one in thought and one in act. It can only come by the process of education. Are you willing to go to school every day and every hour till we learn the lesson of how they live in heaven, and thus bring it here?

If we are, it will take application and discipline to develop our minds, our every act as well as our thought so as to become God's children in preparation. It will cause many a halt and many things we have been doing we will be compelled to cut out of our speech and our acts.

We need confidence in one another, and first in oneself; so we know we have the product of that development under gospel discipline, so we are really trustworthy. Then we can begin to trust others as they come up to the standard of divine ethics.

I long to see that day and people who can be patient and loving under the fire of debate or discussing problems that may come up in our conferences. "If ye are not one ye are not mine" should not be forgotten by us as a people, and the fact that we do not and seemingly cannot see eye to eye is no reason that we should become heated and austere in our demeanor to one another.

I learned long ago that in married life I could not always have my own way for the simple reason there were two interested parties, and one should be respected as much as the other in settling the problems of life. Many a time we could not agree and I thought I was right and my wife was sure she was right, and following the advice that President Joseph Smith often gave to the ministry while he was with us, "If right you can afford to wait, if wrong you should wait." And I have discovered that sometimes I was wrong—yet at the time I would have banked my life I was right, and she was wrong.

Here was the pinch. I never would confess it to her for fear she might use it as a lever in our solving future problems. I never thought of divorcing her on any of these occasions and why should I think that the church is wrong because some do not think as I do or do as I think they ought to? I may be wrong in my thinking. Can I not afford to wait and let God who is more interested than I or you take care of that which I may not understand or do not see as you do?

We talk about Christian ethics and logic and seemingly cannot grasp the effects that Christian ethics should have on the soul of man. And it would be extremely illogical to profess to be educated or religious, if there are no evidences of refinement and culture as the result of contact with the elements of these sublime propositions.

Zion is to sometime be the light of the world, but when? This is the question you and I can help to settle by getting busy and qualifying. It will not be a place of ignoramus, but intelligence will beam from every soul, and those who enter will do so by reason of the fact they have graduated from the primary and grammar schools of life.

They may not all be college graduates, but we can all be graduates of excellent experiences in the gospel way, which make us bright and thoughtful of the feelings of our fellows. May God help us to learn the wonderful lesson of, Love thy brother as thyself.

Envy is the handmaiden of selfishness. Banish selfishness and envy goes.—Priesthood Journal.

PASTORAL

Doing Missionary Work

By J. F. Curtis

Good suggestions by one of the foremost proselytizers in the church.

The gospel was to be preached in all nations, so that all men might have the opportunity to worship God in spirit and in truth. Jesus said, "The harvest truly is plenteous but the laborers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest."

That is, many are waiting to hear the gospel and are in a position to obey it as soon as it is properly explained to them. Upon the shoulders of the twelve and seventy, with high priests and elders and priests who may be sent forth as missionaries, rests the responsibility chiefly of preaching the gospel to all nations.

However, we must not forget that the local ministry should also give of their time as much as possible to the spreading of the gospel. He that is warned should warn his neighbor. Every minister called to preach the gospel should be about his Father's business and should be looking and hunting for places and opportunities to tell the gospel story. They should not sit down and wait for an opening, but should get busy and find or make openings whenever and wherever it is possible, as wisdom may direct. This may be done in churches, halls, school-houses, private homes, parks, and on the streets at times, to a good advantage.

Where the church building is located in a branch of the Saints, where there is a good audience of Saints and friends with one or more of the ministry to assist, with the choir ready to do the singing, with the building clean and well lighted, heated, and ventilated, with the seating well provided for, the minister for Christ has a splendid chance to preach the gospel and encourage the Saints and win others to Christ. Due preparation should be made by study and prayer on the part of the minister lest he should fail to make good when the opportunity offers. It is well to bear in mind that the men of God are sent out to preach the gospel and this should be done.

The creeds and theories of men, the private or speculative views of the minister should not be permitted to consume the time set apart for the preaching of the word of God. How can people be converted to the gospel if it is not preached? If the food presented by the minister produces spiritual indigestion on the part of the hearers certainly the minister is to blame.

"He whom God hath sent, speaketh the words of God"—at least he should. The minister's appearance should be such that will be favorably received. He who neglects his personal appearance need not be surprised if the audience gives him the cold shoulder. Loud talking, much noise, or screaming is not necessarily preaching, yet one should talk loud enough to be heard. A sermon delivered in a monotone is hard on the ears and grates on the nerves of the hearers. The voice should be regulated to the size of the audience. The message presented must, and by right should be, the most important thing of the service, yet the praying and singing have much to do with the success of the meeting. No one should pray with his back to the audience, or with his hand over his face.

The gospel should be presented in subjects, yet sufficient latitude should be allowed so that other principles or subjects could and should be referred to in the same sermon. The sight of an automobile frequently sells the car, but if the car were presented to the buyer a piece at a time, unless the buyer were well acquainted with different cars, it would not make much of an impression on him, and possibly the sale would not be made.

I have used charts to a good advantage and I try to keep before the people the organization of the church, the doctrinal principles, the gifts and blessing, the apostasy of the church, and the restoration of the gospel.

Affirmative preaching should be the rule, but sometimes our position shows up well by way of contrast. The speaker should always be careful how he refers to other faiths and beliefs. I find it best to give credit to others where credit is due. A direct attack on other churches will generally bring opposition, but seldom converts. Vinegar never catches flies.

Meetings should be well advertised. People who attend should be invited to return. The speaker can generally make friends and get better acquainted with the people by getting back to the door and shaking hands with the people as they go out of the building. Invite them to return again. He who makes friends must show himself friendly.

There will be times of success, then there will be times of trials and opposition. He who lives closest to God will be nearest to the people. For years I have had splendid results by having a short prayer and testimony meeting each evening before the preaching service. This works good for Saints who need reviving and it has a splendid influence on non-members. New converts can easily be taught to pray and testify in public, and once started are apt to continue. God's people must learn and know the power of prayer.

If a good interest is secured in a week the speaker has done well. Continue your meeting as long as the interest is good. Do not get discouraged if the crowd falls off for a night or two, because there may be several things to cause this condition, but by a prayerful, persistent effort you can generally succeed. Remember that you are the servant of the Lord and he wants you to succeed. Be your own judge of conditions, but by observation be ready to learn from others. Preach the gospel in the spirit of kindness, and in God's own time and way good results will follow. Remember that eternal life awaits the faithful workers of the kingdom of God.

Religious Education in the Family

By Edward D. Moore

Text of the current course for senior Religio classes.

One of the most valuable books to be had to-day for providing real help in solving the problem of religion in the family—in meeting one of the most vital situations of the day—is Religious Education in the Family, by Henry F. Cope ($1.60, postpaid, of this office), which is used as the basic text for the senior Religio quarterlies now current.

No brief mention can do justice to the book. It must be read and studied to be appreciated fully, but when the Saints come to realize that in this way they can get real help in not only visioning the task but eminently practical suggestions in working out the problem, the book will have steady sale and an appreciated place in every real home.

The Watchman Examiner says: "It would be a good thing if every pastor would purchase this volume and put it for a week at a time in the homes of his congregation, pledging the people to read it."

Some groups of priesthood have used the book for a text, finding in it the best expression of the finest sentiments on family life which make the three standard books of the church pregnant with meaning.

The current senior Religio quarterly uses this book as a text. It is eminently practical for study and interesting as a reading book. In accordance with the style of the latest books of this class it has questions at the end of the chapters, with references for further reading and study.

While the highly educated person will at once appreciate its value from casual examination, those with little schooling will likewise derive much in both information and inspiration from the presentation of this vital subject.

It is not only for those who have homes and home problems, but as well for those who would be a source of strength and power to home builders. So

The Vengeance of the Flag

The following is the summary of a sermon preached on Lincoln's birthday by Henry D. Esterbrooke and contains a suggestion which will doubtless be new to many of our readers.

It was on the night of April 14, 1865, that the shot was fired which killed Abraham Lincoln, and its reverberation will last forever. On the morning following, at precisely 8.18 of the clock, Abraham Lincoln yielded up the ghost. The fatal moment is notched on the scythe of time. Even the watchmakers, those wardens of the hours, have embalmed that moment in the sign of their calling. In every city of the Union, North and South, East and West, you have seen that great dumb, wooden horologue pointing backward to the dread event. Look at it whenever you will, it is always 8.18.

The murder of Lincoln was the most appalling tragedy ever witnessed in a theater. On this fatal night the President had sought to be amused. He wished to laugh, to be made to laugh; and for this he had been criticized. Why should he wish to laugh when every click of the telegraph was the death tick of a soldier? Why should he? Why should he not? There had been too much of tragedy, and now this laughter-loving man would gain surcease from the long tension on his heartstrings by forgetting fact in fiction, the real in the apparent.

The box which the presidential party was to occupy had been appropriately draped with the Union flag so arranged as to frame the portrait of George Washington, whose serene and august face smiled from out its ample folds as from an aureole of glory. Midway of the performance, and shortly after ten o'clock, a young man came down the outer aisle and presented his card to the President's messenger. Before the messenger could fairly glance at the card, the young man had pushed past him and entered the narrow passage immediately behind the box in which the President was seated. Going to the door opening into the box, he peered at the occupants through a small aperture, also previously made for the purpose.

Surely the noble Lincoln must have felt some vague consciousness of evil. We may never know. In a moment the door was opened; the murderer entered. There was a sharp detonation, a moment's dread paralysis, a wild commotion, a clutch at the fleeing assassin, a fierce imprecation, and the savage slash of the knife as he freed himself from the detaining grasp, his leap to the stage, his mock heroics, his rehearsed magniloquence, and the startled, bewildered cry: "The President is murdered!"

Instantly with the pistol shot the President had fallen forward. The dear head dropped, never to rise again; the loving heart fluttered into rest, and Abraham Lincoln, offered by the All Wise as a mediator and an exemplar to his distracted countrymen, was with the "undying dead."

But what of the assassin? Maniacally bold as now seems this murderer, the chances of capture had been weighed by the murderer and reduced to a minimum. His route to the South had been chosen and carefully studied. His confederates were numerous and discreet. His finances were ample, his equipment was complete. We are told that, except for the accident of his foot, as he leaped from the proscenium box, catching in the flag, his escape would have been inevitable. But why call it an accident? It was no accident, but a miracle of gratitude—the vengeance of the flag. Washington was there. Washington, the father who begot and brought it forth, seemed for the moment to live again in its embrace. Lincoln, the savior who had redeemed it from the sin of slavery, was even then dying that it might live, the last quiverings of his heart pulsing in all its breathing folds.

It was no accident. In the absence of human intervention, the flag itself became an avenger. It reached forth and grappled with the assassin. It clove to him like the bloody garment of old mythology. It shrieked, and was rent in twain, but clung—clung—clung, writhing about and binding him like a python in its coils. The flag was the captor. The flag was its country's avenger.

All hail the flag, sparkling with its stars, conscious of itself, its God, and its America! Look up, my countrymen! Look up, poor human race, look up to it in reverence and with a prayer of gratitude! What wonder that it seems like a gift from the spirit world, as though Father Abraham had reached it forth from beyond the stars, and said: "Take it, my children; study it, learn it, know it, and love it always."

Profiteering

Much has been said concerning the difference in price between farm products on the farm and the same vegetables and fruit when retailed in the market. In this case there is the loss of perishable commodities.

The American Economist for September 1 now publishes a letter from the secretary of the treasury to the Senate finance committee with information secured by request as to imports, origin, original value, charges to bring to this country, duty, and the landed cost in the United States, also retail purchase price in the United States. With one or two exceptions these purchases are made in New York City. It is somewhat surprising to note that the smallest increase is over 150 per cent. That is, the retail price is two and a half times as great as the landed cost in the United States. There are a large number of instances where it is two, three, five, six, ten, sixteen, seventeen, up to twenty-two, twenty-three and twenty-five times as great. This last is vegetable ivory buttons which cost less than 1 cent landed in the United States yet retail for 25 cents each, nearly twenty-seven times the landed cost.

There is a justifiable spread between producing costs and retail prices because of transportation, the overhead expenses, the retail department, delivery, clerk hire, etc., but it would scarcely appear that such wide differences are justifiable. These high percentages appear not only in small items like buttons which might possibly have a high selling cost though they are sold twelve buttons to a card, but also apply to such articles as a razor, landed cost 34½ cents, retail $5; magnifying glass, landed cost $1.24, retail $12; shears, landed cost .216 cents, retail $2.65; amber beads, landed cost 76 cents, retail $12.50; wooden clocks, it is both a book for those who teach and those who practice.

It recognizes the modern definition of "religious education" and helps to vivify its real import. As we come to recognize our problems in imparting religious education in the family, we shall in the same degree appreciate the help such a book as this gives one in crystallizing and imparting his best views on the subject.

landed cost .081 cents, retail $2; cuckoo clocks, landed cost $1.267, retail price $22; electric flat irons, landed cost .767 cents, retail price $5.50 and $6.50.

Faultfinding

Our spirit of complaint comes from immaturity. We should grow up.

The habit of finding fault is attacked quite earnestly in the Christian Century by George Lawrence Parker under the heading, "Our habits of petulance." This spirit of complaint over the church must be broken, for the real message of joy, of Christianity, cannot be heard until complaint dies down. The world has a straight case of the grouch; whether we look in our papers, listen to a political speech or attend upon the pulpit. He adds, "Our spirit of complaint comes from immaturity, mental unripeness." The war is not the cause of our universal habit of sighing; it is only the excuse. "As for our public in general, we seem to be in a world that has decided never to grow up; we do not need to grow old but we do need to grow up!" Jesus insisted on childlikeness; he also insisted on full mental maturity.

"He challenges us to see life as eternalized reality, as something that hath foundations, not as something that has just "been shot out of a pistol"—that phrase is Abbe Loisy's, I think. Most people are running around to the tune of popping pistols and finding excitement in finding out who fired them and when the next will be fired. Like children we want our world to run as smoothly as a toy, and we refuse to understand that it never has and never will do so. Football cannot be played without knocks and bumps; the knocks and bumps constitute the game; they are the game! And if we only had full mental maturity we should understand that the world must have its interruptions and strenuous periods, although as in football the actual breakages can be reduced by care and attention. . . .

"I am weary of this complaint about the world. This is after all the best world I know of. I am willing to accept the universe, to adjust this world to my shoulder and carry it as a burden; willing to lie awake nights with it and study it as a puzzle and a problem—any of these things. But I am weary of kicking the poor thing around, doing it no good and bruising my toe! I have been hearing men say for the last forty years that the world would soon be in limbo. My boyhood ears heard the same talk and I read the same editorials that we now read. Although it has nearly fallen over the brink, still it has not yet gone to limbo. God knows the tragedy has been great enough; but after all the world is still here, and if we would match the glorious dead who gave their lives to keep it here, we must be as eloquent in our refusal to complain as they are. Then we shall have spared our energies for a fruitful work of helpfulness. . . .

"Come, come, Horatio, let's grow up! Of course our task is hard, but it neither began nor ended with us. Of course there are profiteers and strikes, and 'revolts of mankind' as Mr. Lathrop Stoddard says, and crime waves and all the rest. But no wave ever stayed its course because people cried on the shore. That is not the way out. Never! Even if we be flippant we had better insist that Kant's 'starry heavens and the moral law' still exist; that George Barrow's 'wind on the heath' still blows; and that Jesus' 'Come unto me and I will give you rest' still opens out its beautiful arms to men. No, the world is perplexing, I know; but I will not keep on throwing insults and stones of criticism at the house I live in! . . .

The next step for the church to take, Horatio, would be to rid the world of the false difference now supposed to exist between tradition and progress. You will find that Professor Gilbert Murray makes this beautifully clear in his book, Tradition and Progress. Tradition and progress are not enemies but friends. There is no such thing as self-created progress; no parachute leap into æons of advance. While we step forward with one foot the other is always on the ground; that is the real relation between tradition and progress. The young and impatient intellectuals may shout until they are hoarse; they need only to remember that in twenty years their own revolts will be traditions. The world's best revolutionists have always understood this. And on the other hand the contented traditionalists may weep their eyes red, it will not avail to stop the onrush of new belief and further discovery of God and his truth. The church could not find out, if she would, the real brotherhood between these two great forces of our modern world; and if she is to help she must declare the eternal realities of God all over again; but declare them in the clothing of speech of to-day. There is no other way. Tradition is preserved by progress, and should be told so. Progress is only assured by tradition and should be told so. The church has here its opportunity to talk with both parties!"

Parliamentary Books

Three Books That Impart Self-Confidence for Business Sessions

To paraphrase a certain well-known advertisement, "Don't admire a good parliamentarian—be one." Who has not wished he might be able to present matters of business in the right way, discuss them properly, and know at all times what might or might not be done with the proposals before the assembly?

The procedure is not hard to learn. A little study of such books as are listed here, with observations of the methods of any well-ordered assembly, will impart the necessary knowledge.

Religions ought to have more parliamentary programs, especially when they can be preceded or followed by a study of good books on the subject.

RULES OF ORDER

For Deliberative Assemblies

This book is now available in a new edition that is very convenient and has some of the best features of many modern works on the subject. The entire book is divided into 341 numbered paragraphs, and a copious index makes reference easy. The new book deals with more than a score of topics not found in the old Book of Rules.

GRIFFITHS'S KEY TO PARLIAMENTARY PRACTICE

This book was published in Australia and is quite popular on both continents. A chart is bound into the book which conveys at a glance the order of proceedings, undebatable questions, breaches of decorum, principal motions, questions not amendable, and motions requiring two thirds vote and previous notice.

The book discusses the old Book of Rules and makes clear many of its points. Only a few left.

Independence

The eleven o'clock hour Sunday morning at the Stone Church was occupied by Reverend W. S. Foreman, assistant superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Missouri, who addressed a crowded house on the subject of prohibition and the enforcement of the laws pertaining thereto. At eight p. m. the house was again crowded with an appreciative audience to listen to a concert by the Latter Day Saint band, under the leadership of Brother Roy Turner. There is a membership of thirty-five in the church band and Brother Turner has been leader for several years with the result that we have a very creditable band organization.

The following were the other appointments in Independence on Sunday: Second Independence, preaching by Patriarch Ammon White and Elder F. A. Rowe; Enoch Hill, preaching by Clyde E. Hartman and Kenneth Morford; Liberty Street, Preaching by Bishop J. F. Keir and Church Historian Walter W. Smith. Englewood, preaching by Elder William Clow and Elder P. A. Sherman. Walnut Park, preaching by J. W. Peterson and O. W. Okerlind.

The radio at six o'clock Sunday evening consisted of a very fine musical program by the Quindaro musicians of Kansas City Stake and a lecture by Historian Walter W. Smith, on the subject, "The organization of the church." Next week's program is given elsewhere in this HERALD, announcing President Frederick M. Smith in a lecture on "The social ideals of the church."

Monday night, the 22d, the Independence Music Club presented Mr. Tandy McKenzie in recital. This was the third number of the winter series which the club is sponsoring and there was a large attendance. Mr. McKenzie is a well-known Scotch-Hawaiian tenor, who possesses a lyric voice of fine quality. His program was much appreciated. He sang two numbers in the native Hawaiian tongue which were especially interesting to our people in view of the fact that we are doing extensive missionary work in the islands. Programs of the high character of this one bring much credit to the Music Club and they are to be congratulated in the work they are doing to further music appreciation in Independence. The next concert under the direction of the club will be given March 5.

The Stone Church Religio will devote the entire evening next Friday to a literary program with President Elbert A. Smith as chief speaker on the origin of some of his poems and songs. Some of the latter will be sung, and altogether a fine program will be provided. On the following Tuesday the Religio will meet in its regular class work, to be followed by a big social program in charge of the large class taught by Mrs. J. A. Gardner.

Word received from Brother R. B. Trowbridge who is taking treatment in the Woodman Sanitarium at Colorado Springs is encouraging. His many friends will be glad to know that prospects for his complete recovery are very hopeful.

Elder U. W. Greene, who underwent an operation at the Independence Sanitarium two weeks ago has so far recovered that he has been removed to his home and is reported as doing very fine.

In the absence of Doctor G. Leonard Harrington, church physician, who is now in the Hawaiian Islands, Doctor Paul Rannie will take care of Doctor Harrington's office practice and may be found at Doctor Harrington's office each day at the regular hours.

Editor S. A. Burgess went to Saint Louis Friday and will be gone a week or more.

The problem of water for domestic use in Independence has been serious for some time. It has long been evident that some new system must be devised other than the taking of water from the Missouri River, because the pollution of the river by Kansas City makes this source very undesirable. A movement is now under way to make a contract with Kansas City whereby the municipal plant there will furnish water to the Independence company for distribution. By this arrangement water will be taken from the Missouri River above Kansas City. The mayor of Kansas City as well as the Kansas City press are favorable to such a contract and we have no doubt but that the arrangements will be completed. Kansas City now has under contemplation the erection of a very large and up-to-date water plant, and Independence if given a contract will share in the benefits.

There was a meeting of the patronesses of the Sanitarium Friday afternoon at the home of Mrs. A. L. Yingling. At this meeting which was well attended were addresses by Miss Copeland, superintendent of the Sanitarium, and Bishops McGuire and Becker, each of whom spoke on the needs of the Sanitarium and the possibilities there are for the women of Independence assisting that institution. The meeting was very enthusiastic over the plans submitted and an effort is now being made to organize the groups in Independence in such a way that every group will have a chairman interesting herself particularly with the work of the Sanitarium. Through the direction of these group leaders it is hoped to stimulate interest more widely in the needs of the Sanitarium. Mrs. E. L. Kelley is now president of the patronesses, with Mrs. B. R. McGuire as vice president, and Mrs. F. O. Thomason, secretary. At the next meeting of the patronesses in February there will be an election of officers.

On next Sunday afternoon at the Stone Church at 2.30 o'clock the people of Independence will be privileged to listen to Doctor Edward Howard Griggs of Columbia University, New York. It is through rare good fortune that the church officials are enabled to present Doctor Griggs, as his time is in great demand as a lecturer and his schedule of cities is well filled. Every winter for years he has delivered a series of lectures in Kansas City at the Grand Avenue Temple under the direction of the University Center, and many of our people have been in attendance there. They are enthusiastic in saying that he is one of the finest lecturers on the public platform to-day, and the subject he will speak on Sunday afternoon, "Government in the home and in the school," will link up directly with the problem facing the people of the church here in Independence. It is believed that seating room will be at a premium in the church for this lecture and it is asked that those under sixteen years of age do not attend, so as to leave all available room for adults. There will be no admission charged, but a collection will be taken to defray the expenses of the lecture.

Appreciates Sermon

(Excerpt from letter of Elder F. G. Hedrick of Atchison, Kansas, to President Frederick M. Smith.)

Just concluded the second reading of your sermon, "The essentiality of loyalty in the development of Zion." This sermon rang clear to me, and I believe that it will reach the hearts of all true and loyal Saints. A continued presentation to the people by you of your ideals and vision will draw about you a stalwart people who will stand shoulder to shoulder with you in the development of the great problems that now confront the church.

Kansas City Stake News

The speaker at 11 a. m. at Central was Mr. R. E. McDonnell, of Burns-McDonnell Engineering Company, Kansas City, the subject being citizenship. The speech was in the interests of the proposed new city charter which should be nonpartisan and excluding politics.

The monthly priesthood meeting was addressed at 3 p. m. by President E. A. Smith who used as a groundwork for his discourse the Scripture reading which defines the fruits of the Spirit. He held the attention of a good-sized crowd of the ministry throughout, emphasizing the growth from within, the necessity of cultivation, etc. At 3 p. m. the Women's Department held forth in the main auditorium with Sister Ida Etzenhouser as principal speaker. Her subject was practical social service work. Bishop Blair followed with a like subject in the interest of Kansas City Stake.

The Grandview church people are rejoicing genuinely as at 11 a. m. the ceremony for the laying of the corner stone of their new church took place at that hour. The principal addresses were by Bishop Blair and President Tanner. Brother Blair forcefully and plainly set forth the need of being not only hearers but "doers of the word," that the erection of the building was not the end but the beginning of their journey. The church, next to the public school, is considered the greatest asset to the community. It never was intended for the selfish uses alone of its own individual members but the desired goal was to recreate men and women that they too may live in harmony for the upbuilding of the work—to bring the influence of the gospel to the people of the community. What is the best thing concerning the building of this church? The brick, the mortar, lumber, iron, stone? Its conveniences? The best thing in the church is men and women who have consecrated their lives, their work, their all! What is the first duty of this church? It is to hold aloft the banner of King Emmanuel that honest men and women may be attracted to it. The next duty to our Master is the caring for the poor; not the primary duty to entertain or minister to the amusement of any. Your church building is the beginning, not the end of your career.

Brother Tanner made use of the following scripture in setting forth the lesson of the hour: "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain who build it." (Psalms 127.) He also read 1 Corinthians 3: 9 and Ephesians 2: 19-22. It is a trait among men to look upon any achievement they have made with pride. "The church looks with pride upon ancient Israel in the building of Solomon's temple as it was the greatest achievement of that great people. We take deep pride in calling attention to what a few men did in building the Kirtland Temple. If what our brother has spoken this morning was taken note of we will look with pride upon the building that has been erected here, and in future time your children will look back with pride upon the great sacrifice and effort you are making now for the accomplishment of your work here. You are the temple of God. You believe that God speaks to you, so in erecting this building it should be a habitation for God where you may meet him as his husbandry should function. If you are not living as becomes a Saint when you come to the altar, God will not be there. If on the other hand you are living in holy places this will be a dwelling place of God and a dwelling place for the people. Indeed our foundation is the church. Take heed therefore how you build. Always have an understanding of what is required of you and build with the best material. While you may be saved, your work will be burned, hence very little reward. We are no more aliens to the household of God but fellow citizens with the Saints. The corner stone represents an interlocking and sealing factor in the building of God and if that is a simile to this local church and the building it represents, it will be well with you. Deeply pray that it will be an abiding place of God."

The stake chorister rendered splendid vocal music assisted by the local choir. The stone was simply inscribed and was put in place by President Tanner, Bishop Blair, Pastor C. D. Jellings, and Bon Oldfather, who have been in charge of the erection of the building. The building is approximately 30 by 60 feet with basement full size, of frame construction. It would probably be classed as semi-Corinthian as four pillars of that design will support the front. With stained glass windows it will make a fine appearance and compare favorably with other churches in the neighborhood.

The speaker at 7.45 was Ammon White, setting forth some very marked instances where the churches of the world failed to understand the plain teaching in regard to the bestowal of the Spirit of God.

Brother Amos T. Higdon, assisted by Ammon White, has been conducting special meetings at Quindaro church for the past three weeks. Brother White also looks after his duties as patriarch. No baptisms are reported as yet.

The Fourth Church report a renewed zeal among the workers, the result being a much larger attendance. They are cramped for room and are soon to commence an addition to their building to accommodate their present needs. A social affair recently held at the home of a sister netted the sum of $30.46.

A new departure in the method of arranging for services is one at Malvern Hill consisting in the privilege allowed the laity to provide speakers and special music. The following have responded as speakers: J. F. Keir, President F. M. Smith, L. E. Hills twice, and I. N. White. The stake chorister provided the music. The effort has filled the seats that are too often empty.

Central Chicago Branch

The bazaar under the auspices of the Sunday school was entirely a success. The splendid cooperation of all branches of the church here combined with the zeal and untiring energy of the leaders and the spirit of helpfulness that permeated the entire branch could not bring any other result.

The Northeastern Illinois conference which was held here the fore part of December, was well attended from all over the district, and all departments of the work contributed their part towards making the conference both interesting and helpful. Patriarchs F. G. Pitt and W. A. McDowell, Apostle Paul M. Hanson, and Elder Oliver McDowell were with us at that time, to our edification.

The glee club gave its annual concert December 15. Much time was spent in preparation, and the young people are to be congratulated, both upon the selection of their program and the excellence of the rendition.

Sunday, December 24, the choir rendered a splendid cantata in a commendable manner. Friday evening, the 22d, a short and interesting Christmas program was given by the Sunday school.

Last sacrament service was in charge of Brothers H. P. W. Keir, Roy Cheville, Leonard Lea, and J. J. Oliver. It was a splendid service and we felt it was good to meet with the Saints in this capacity. The Spirit was with us and all through the service there ran the theme of thankfulness for past blessings and a desire for greater service in the coming year.

Echoes From Zion

We were pleased recently in meeting our old-time Seattle collaborer, Brother William Johnson, now of Lamoni, who is spending a few days at the central place near Kansas City which calls itself the "Heart of America." We were pleased to meet Brother Johnson again who retains his old-time genial spirit.

We spent a very pleasant time with the united band at Bates City recently and was greeted with a hearty welcome and an attentive hearing and a cordial invitation to return.

We are meeting many old-time friends and forming new acquaintances. There is a spirit of sociability with the Saints in general which is indeed pleasing—nothing better than the true spirit of sociability.

We frequently visit the Sanitarium, a haven of rest for the afflicted. We find a number of associates of bygone days such as Brothers James Hamilton, Samuel Brooks, Sister Long, Sister Luther Cook, and others who are being tenderly cared for by the efficient nurses.

Last Sunday we were privileged to attend a very spiritual prayer meeting in the Stone Church. The spirit of revelation was present and manifest through Patriarch Ammon White, Brother Weston, Sister McCallum. The thought expressed was the Lord was blessing the Saints to the full extent of their capacity to receive. The capacity may be enlarged by a closer walk with the Lord.

It may sound strange, yet pleasing, to branches whose numbers are few, if we tell them of the sacrament service here on the 7th attended by twelve hundred Saints, the emblems being distributed by eighteen priests in a most orderly and systematic manner. At the same hour a similar meeting was held in the lower auditorium. There was perfect order and system throughout.

Our thoughts and good wishes often go out beyond the west to those pleasant associations in California and Seattle, Washington. May they have a prosperous year in peace.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, 1614 West Short Street.

Denver, Colorado

'Tis a pleasure to live in Colorado. The weather has been fine. Christmas was like summer, until evening, when we had a little snow, but it soon warmed up and has been fine all week.

The entertainment Christmas Eve, under the supervision of Sister Laura Kohanke, was the best yet. The pageant, "The child of prophecy," constituted the entertainment, and was extra good.

Sunday, the 31st, the morning sermon was by Elder G. E. McConley of Sterling. The evening sermon was by Elder J. B. Wildermuth.

Sunday afternoon a number of the Saints attended the rendering of Handel's oratorio, "The Messiah," sung by the Denver Municipal Chorus. The auditorium, which seats over twelve thousand, was crowded, and hundreds stood to the end of the program of over two hours. There was no admission fee. It was the first time we have had the pleasure of hearing the municipal pipe organ, which alone was worth the time spent.

Brother Holmes's family is quarantined with scarlet fever.

Sister Josie Pople of Trinidad was a visitor recently for the purpose of consulting an eye specialist. We surely hope and pray that her sight may be improved.

Sister S. D. Payne of Independence is visiting in Denver.

CORRESPONDENT.

Passing of Frank W. Burton

It was with very deep regret that former residents of Southern California now living in Independence, learned a few days since of the passing at his home in Long Beach, of our dearly beloved brother, Frank W. Burton, in the sixty-second year of his age. He was the only son of Elder Joseph and Emma Burton, and was universally admired and esteemed for his integrity and uprightness; a kindly, genial companionable man and minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ. He was ordained a teacher in 1893, priest in 1898, and an elder in 1902, serving as pastor at Santa Ana, for a time. He was an earnest, diligent worker, and whatever he undertook he gave to it his best endeavor and faithfulness whether for himself or others, secularly, or in the work of the Lord which was dear to his heart.

During the period in which the writer was pastor of the church at Long Beach, Brother Burton moved his family from Santa Ana to Long Beach, just at a time when the work greatly needed the help of such noble workers as himself, and Brethren F. N. Best, H. H. More, and others of that class. A new church edifice was an absolute necessity to meet the demands of the growing congregation, the old building being inadequate. With a beautiful spirit of unity, and much sacrifice and labor on the part of both brethren and sisters, all subscribing liberally of means and time, the new building was completed, and Brother Burton became pastor when the writer returned in 1920 to Independence. During his pastorate the debt was paid off and the church redecored and dedicated. He was a whole-hearted worker in church, Sunday school and Religio, until failing health—a bronchial affection, we were informed—compelled his retirement last year, I believe. As a preacher he was a logical reasoner and a forceful speaker; he made no claim to eloquence, but no one could fail to understand the message he had to deliver.

He will be sadly missed, not alone in the home circle, but the church has lost a devoted, kindly, sympathetic worker, whose influence was ever uplifting, and whose counsel was wise and helpful. He wrought well, and his rest is glorious. To his dear wife and children, and the beloved mother, we extend deepest sympathies in this hour of their loss, but comforted in the assurance of a joyful meeting by and by.

There remain to cherish his memory, his wife, one son, four daughters, mother, a number of grandchildren, and a host of friends in and out of the church. Interment January 2, in the family lot at Santa Ana.

W. H. GARRETT.

Flint, Michigan

Flint, Michigan is still on the map and progressing nicely. We have three churches with a membership of just over 600. We have adopted the amalgamation plan and are working under form four.

In our Department of Women we have nine groups, besides one group of Temple Builders and two groups of Oriole Girls.

On December 8 and 9 the Department of Women held a bazaar in a vacant store building on the principal street which we obtained for a rental of ten dollars for the two days and paying our own electric light bill. Each group, including Temple Builders and Orioles, had a booth which they decorated as they wished and sold articles they had made, including pillow cases, towels, aprons, both plain and fancy, children's dresses and baby clothes as well as toy animals cut out of wood and painted by one of our sisters. A candy and ice cream stand was run by one of the groups of Orioles.

We also operated a refreshment and lunch counter, cafeteria style, to which all articles of food were donated.

Each group paid in to the secretary of the department one half of their proceeds, retaining the other half as a working fund and for the purchase of books for study. After paying all expenses connected with the bazaar we realized $235, which means that our secretary has about $115 to place in the hands of the branch treasurer.

As this was the first bazaar ever attempted by Flint church we feel quite enthusiastic about our success and encouraged to go on and accomplish greater things.

MRS. MURIEL R. DUROSE.

Stewartsville, Missouri

The beginning of the year 1923 found the work in this place still moving forward and all joined heartily and hopefully wishing good results for the coming year. Brother John Davis was elected branch president, Leonard Ehlers, superintendent of Sunday school, Gordon Hidy, superintendent of Religio, and Mrs. R. R. Flinn has charge of the women's work.

At our last business meeting a committee was appointed to look after the needs of the DeKalb church building and cemetery which has become in much need of repair since the DeKalb Branch was disorganized.

Mrs. W. H. Worden, who has been confined to her bed for some time, is slowly improving.

Brother James A. Gillen is announced to hold a series of meetings, beginning February 11. We hope if weather conditions are favorable to make this one of the best seasons of the year and ask a cooperation of the adjoining branches to assist us in making it a grand success.

CORRESPONDENT.

Bisbee, Arizona

At the annual business meeting of the Bisbee Branch held on Tuesday night, January 16, the branch unanimously voted to concur in the action of the departments of the local work in adopting Form 4 as outlined by the heads of the general departments. This was a joint business meeting of all the departments, the first of its kind to be held here. The pastor nominated the heads of departments, which were approved by the body, and arrangements were made for a meeting of the cabinet further to complete the work of organization.

In electing secretaries and treasurers for the departments, a motion was had combining the two offices into one. Our branch treasurer acts as treasurer for the funds of all departments, and the department treasurers are the custodians of the funds only as they are collected from week to week, or month to month. No money is paid out by any of the departments except upon order drawn on the branch treasurer, which amount is charged to the department for which it is expended. Budgets were adopted covering the estimated needs of the branch and each of the departments for the year.

A motion was also passed favoring the loan of a sum of money amounting to about $427 to the bishop at four per cent. This sum is on deposit in the local banks in the savings account, and is in the nature of a building fund, belonging to the branch and the local Department of Women; and as there are no prospects of the branch being in a position to build in the very near future, it was thought best to offer the church the use of this money.

Quite a deep interest was shown in this meeting by the membership, and it is hoped that we shall have a constructive year's work ahead of us.

Many Visitors to Kirtland Temple

Elder John F. Martin writes interestingly of his work as caretaker last year.

It may interest HERALD readers to know that there were 9,022 visitors at the Temple during the year 1922, just 2,001 more than in 1921. The offerings last year amounted to $739. Some of the visitors came from France, England, China, Switzerland, Spain, Sweden, Canada, South American countries, and other places. Thousands of tracts were distributed. Many friends were made for the cause and much prejudice was removed.

I know of no better place to advertise our work than in the Kirtland Temple. The architectural beauty of the building immediately challenges the admiration of the visitors and, invariably questions are asked regarding its history, which, if carefully answered, lead to the gospel story. I would estimate that about nine tenths of the visitors came to the Temple with the belief that we were affiliated with the Utah Church, but we endeavored to see that none went away with that opinion. Judge Sherman's decision came in very handily in this connection.

In the temple work one meets some very splendid and interesting people. One in particular whom I might mention is Professor O'Donnell, who is instructor of the History of Architecture at the University of Illinois. He was so fascinated by the work in the lower and upper auditoriums that he begged the privilege of sketching some of the designs, stating that he would like to use them in his school work, as there were no textbooks in which this work was shown. We saw no harm in granting him this privilege. As he was about to leave, he said, "I would defy anyone to find any architectural work or workmanship that would excel that which you have in this building."

During the year there were many of the Utah Church representatives at the Temple, and I found most of these men to be gentlemen who showed a reverence and respect for the temple that could well be emulated by our own people.

I shall ever consider my year in the Temple as one of the richest of my experience.

Unity at Warrington

It gives me pleasure to report that the Warrington, England, Branch has made progress during 1922. There is a splendid spirit of unity among both ministry and laity, which certainly foreshadows progress for this year. The year 1922 cast many black shadows in the pathway of the Saints here, on account of the serious industrial situation; but we look back and thank God that out of it all has come the spirit of sacrifice for each other, so we have mutually been able to sustain one another, both in temporal and spiritual things.

We now glimpse the coming of better conditions in the industrial world here, and it shall be our duty in the day of plenty to call the minds of the Saints to the need of humanity, and endeavor to get it expressed through the medium of the church we love.

Sincerely your fellow servant,

WILLIAM H. CHANDLER,

Branch President.

$48,165.53 Christmas Offering to Date

Up to January 27 the total Christmas offering reported was the amount given above. The highest average per member reported from any school so far is $7.37. If your report is not in, attend to it at once. Send to B. R. McGuire, box 256, Independence, Missouri.

MISCELLANEOUS

Pastoral Notices

To the Saints Throughout Western Oklahoma and the Panhandle of Texas; Greeting: Feeling more keenly than ever before the weight of responsibility that rests upon me as a minister for Christ, and a servant of the church, I once more appeal to you as fellow workers and solicit your hearty and individual support. You have been called unto liberty, and I feel that with me you are interested in the advancement of the work that is so precious unto us.

The conference has returned me unto you, and I feel highly gratified that I am continued in the work with those who, like yourselves, believe in giving the best there is in you for promotion of our cause, and the advancement of the work that has been intrusted to us. In the past you have served nobly, and your sacrifices have in many instances ascended unto God as an acceptable offering. But the present hour demands of us even a better service, a stronger effort, and a higher ideal. We are ambassadors for Christ; we are to be his representatives among men, and as such we must seek to qualify, that the divine mind may be revealed to us.

If we are to succeed in life, and bring our work up to the mark that is set for us by our Lord Jesus Christ we must be loyal to his cause and loyal to the program that he has given us. We must coordinate our efforts, and avail ourselves of every opportunity to advance the cause of Christ.

As your minister I can do but little unless I shall have the undivided support of the membership of the district. This I feel sure you are ready and willing to give; only I feel it is needful that I stir up your pure minds in the way of remembrance.

Let each one make a full inventory, and reconsecrate himself to the cause so as to give it greater impetus. We need your moral and spiritual support. We need your financial support, for without this we will fail of our great purpose. If each one does his part, though it be small, there will be plenty to go around and meet the immediate needs. If you are able to place the Ensign six months or a year in the homes of those who are not acquainted with our work it will be a great help in the prosecution of missionary work. If you are unable to do this you may pass along your own HERALDS or Ensigns after you have read them. Or you may loan tracts or books to your neighbors and friends.

If each will contribute his part none shall be required to be overburdened. Our Bishop's agent will be glad to receipt you for tithes and offerings at any time, and it may be sent direct to him, L. D. Dyke, Eagle City, Oklahoma. Or the undersigned will be glad to receipt you as his solicitor. May we this year renew our efforts and make our work in this part of the world triumph and grow until it shall become an honor to God and a blessing to man.

Mail sent to me at 1302 West Maple Avenue, Independence, Missouri, will always reach me.

Very truly,
J. E. VANDERWOOD.

The Bishopric

To the Saints of Southern Saskatchewan District: Brother C. V. Smith advises that the demands made upon him in his secular activities make it impossible for him to give the necessary time to the work of Bishop's agent. He, therefore, presented his resignation and recommended Brother J. R. Dickson, Weyburn, Saskatchewan, as his successor. Brother Dickson has agreed to accept the office and the change will take effect February 1, 1923.

In behalf of Brother Dickson we solicit your continued support of the Lord's work. We appreciate the services rendered by Brother Smith and his promise of continued cooperation in every way possible.

May the blessings of heaven crown your efforts to be obedient to the Lord's will and to advance the interests of his cause.

Sincerely your coworker,
BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

February Autumn Leaves

The February number has pleasing variety and an attractiveness throughout which is appreciated especially by Saints who care for that which will uplift and influence for good.

"Lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God," is a leading article by T. W. Williams. "A bitter lesson" is the title of an anonymous article by one who writes of an experience in the mission field which had deep effect. "To those who draw," is by William T. Goullee, recently of London, England, and contains helpful suggestions to all who feel inclined to develop artistic talent and help the church papers.

The "Book of Mormon Quiz" is a monthly feature which is of much interest. Questions are proposed each month, with answers to those of the previous month. The poems are excellent and indicate a good tendency toward better expression through this medium.

The leading editorial is "A problem of the large branches," which one thoughtful sister said should be read by every person who would move to Zion.

"How to prepare a lesson," is a valuable article for hundreds of teachers who seek such help. It is by A. Max Carmichael, one of the best pedagogues in the church.

The articles by T. W. Williams, on public speaking, continue with heightened value, as does the serial by Marcella Schenck, on "Social graces."

The departments are valuable. The report from Australia give information from that field seldom if ever offered in such manner.

The price of Autumn Leaves is only $1.75 a year.

Being of a home-loving disposition and the mother of a large family, it gave her the opportunity of serving in the way she most enjoyed in the home. During her last illness which was long and the suffering very severe, her faith in God never wavered and she was always able to recognize Christ as her Savior. Many were the trials and vicissitudes of life which he was compelled to meet and overcome, but so strong was his determination to defeat those conditions that he was enabled to accomplish his purpose and live out a commendable life long to be remembered by those who knew him. After an acquaintance of one year he married Amelia Chapman, December 25, 1870. Settled in Scranton, Kansas, in the fall of 1879. Entered the general merchantile business in March, 1880, where he was continuously engaged for the period of thirty-nine years, in which capacity he was ever befriending the needy as well as serving the community. Blue Pencil Notes

"Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute!" That slogan brings back the old schoolroom—the blackboard, the chalk-laden air, the fine, hand-carved desks, the green-backed History of the United States. How we thrilled to read the story of the disciplining of the piratical little Mohammedan states, Algiers, Tripoli, et al. For generations the Christian nations had paid tribute to these pirates, buying immunity for their commerce. But at last Columbia put on her sea togs and summoned Commodore Stephen Decatur, with his high-collared uniform and his high courage, and she went overseas and with him as pedagogue conducted a very successful school in manners. That chapter in the green-backed history, as we remember, closed with these words, "The United States never after paid tribute to any of the pirate powers." True, some days ago bandits took two hundred thousand dollars from a United States mint. But they were American bandits.

"Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead!" It was Roosevelt who said that. Raisuli, a Moroccan bandit had kidnapped Ion Perdicaris, an American citizen, and moreover a wealthy American citizen. Should a Moroccan bandit, far across the seas be allowed to kidnap an American citizen and escape the wrath of Columbia? Never! An American citizen abroad is a very sacred institution. So Roosevelt, even then famous for his ability to pack dynamite in small verbal containers, dispatched a fleet of warships and cabled the sultan, "Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead!" The sultan understood the message the first time he read it. We got Perdicaris—alive. At home, generally, it is Perdicaris dead and Raisuli alive and at large. If Raisuli is captured we have professional bondsmen, and before Perdicaris is embalmed Raisuli is bailed.

"Go get Villa!" That brings us nearer up to date. Or is it down to date? That depends on which way we are going. Villa was a very well-known bandit in the days before the jazz era. Moreover he was a Mexican bandit and presumed to raid an American town—being a Mexican he should not have done that. So we sent the army into Mexico to capture Villa. But one small and very active brown man is hard to find in a large country. The race was interesting and the world figured the odds were against the Gringos. The world was right. We did not get Villa, but we did get out of Mexico—which is always something worth while.

Our record in dealing with foreign bandits and pirates is rather creditable, but for some reason we do not take so much pride in the story of the American disciplining of bandits in Morocco, China, and Mexico as we did. There is too much going on at home. It diverts attention. We cannot think about those foreign fields with sufficient concentration of mind. There is too much noise.

The respectable private citizen returning home in the evening from his toil or from the movies finds a bandit waiting for him in the shadow of the front porch. He suffers the removal of his watch and wallet without anæsthetics, and is told that he must not call the police for ten minutes. When the time is up he calls the police; but they do not seem interested. The man does not appreciate his luck to be alive. Many are not. The grocer or druggist counts his cash at the end of the day, switches off the lights, and turns to confront a pistol. Later he goes sadly home, or is taken home. John Doe goes for a ride in his car. Three bandits fresh from a hold-up leap into the car and with pistols in his ribs tell him to go like —, well, like some place that does not go at all but is quite stationary, a place in fact to which people go. A posse forms and takes up the chase. There are shots. John Doe is the only man hit. The bandits get another car.

Five or six bandits drive up to the Drovers' National Bank in Kansas City, Kansas, in broad daylight and collect ninety-seven thousand dollars. They drive away again.

Finally, and this is getting a bit thick, as our English brothers say, two carloads of well-armed bandits drive up to the United States' Mint in Denver. They work under a perfect hail of bullets from the guards. The newspapers said so. But only one bandit gets hit. What particular good is an armed guard who cannot shoot straight enough to hit a large object just across the street? Uncle Sam used to shoot rather straight in the days of Daniel Boone. The bandits get away with two hundred thousand dollars. That would have been a good haul for Villa—who was a Mexican—or for Raisuli who was a Moroccan. Well, it went to American bandits. If one of the rather large raiding squad got killed by chance the shares of the others were the bigger for it.

We seem to need another slogan. Something like the old "Millions for defense but not one cent for tribute!" Or, "Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead!" Or, "Go get Villa!" Only it should be for home use. As a nation we should not speak so loudly to foreign bandits and so softly to our own children. "Millions for law and order but not one cent for graft or loot!" How would that do? Or, "Raisuli dead and professional bondsmen and criminal lawyers in jail." But what we need more than a slogan is the old spirit that made slogans. If we had the spirit to obey the law ourselves and enforce it with others we would not need slogans.

Our Financial Situation

In another column there will be found a communication from Bishop McGuire on "Improved financial outlook," which will be of value to all who are interested in the financial part of our work, and at least all adult members should be found among those who are interested in this aspect of church work because of its vital relation to practically all our activities as church workers. We trust therefore that our readers will carefully scrutinize the figures presented by Bishop McGuire as treasurer of the church.

To those who are familiar with methods of accounting the various reports of the Bishop are more or less readily understood; but to many of the members of the church the real meaning of the figures may not be so clear. We therefore venture some comments calculated to present these matters clearly to those not versed in deciphering financial reports and touching briefly upon the general situation.

We cannot escape the conclusion that our own financial situation is affected directly and indirectly by the general industrial conditions; and hence recognizing the general financial and industrial depression we could not expect other than a shrinkage in our receipts while the extraordinary inflation of prices would increase the general expenses as well as individual expenses of officers and families. The reports of the Bishopric department have shown the results of these effects, and in the reports the membership has been informed in figures of the amount of shrinkage in tithes, offerings, and consecrations to a point where the income from these sources was less than the amount paid out to carry on the general and missionary work. And the excess of expenses over income from the sources indicated has been termed "operating deficit" or "operating loss." And the regularity with which the reports of the Bishopric for many months showed an "operating deficit" gave rise to fears freely expressed by many that the church was becoming hopelessly involved and in danger of bankruptcy; while as a matter of fact the net assets of the church were actually increasing, because in ways other than tithes, offerings, and consecrations the Saints were making contributions, liberally giving to special funds such as Auditorium Fund, Christmas offering, land fund, etc. But because these were specifically contributed they were not shown in "operating receipts" because not used for general and usual operating expenses. And these contributions, except in a few months, were sufficiently large to overcome the "operating deficit" and actually increase the assets, or net worth. For instance, the total received on the Auditorium Fund to January 1, 1923, amounted approximately to $487,000, while the "operating deficit," or the amount of church expense over church income from tithes, offerings, etc., for the past two and one half years was approximately $277,000. This means that despite the "operating loss" shown in reports, the contributions to the Auditorium Fund alone overcame this deficit and actually increased the net worth about $210,000, a showing which reflects brightly upon the devotion of the Saints to the cause.

Adverting now to the article of the Bishopric in another column of this issue, we note that for the four months from July 1 to October 31, 1922, the church spent about $63,000 in excess of receipts for the same period. It will also be noted that for the six months period from July 1, 1922, to December 31, 1922 (the last half of 1922), the expenses were $55,000 in excess of receipts from tithes, offerings, and consecrations. By an easy deduction it is therefore seen that in November and December the receipts were in excess of expenses by $8,000, the amount by which the $63,000 deficit at the end of October was reduced by the end of December. Inasmuch as the average monthly "operating deficit" had for some time been about $10,000, this $8,000 surplus in two months meant changing a $10,000 monthly deficit into $14,000, a surplus—a $14,000 difference—a remarkably pleasing accomplishment on the part of the membership.

It is estimated in the article by the Bishop that in the six months from January 1, 1923, to July 1, 1923, the receipts from tithes, offerings, and consecrations, including Christmas offering, will exceed the probable expenses by about $55,000. This would close the year without an "operating loss," the deficit at the end of October will have been wiped out. This estimate comprehends the receipts for the year ending June 30, 1923, from tithes, offerings, and consecrations, approximately $400,000 (this excludes Auditorium Fund receipts and other special contributions), and a general expense of approximately the same amount. Should the estimate prove correct, it will mean completing the fiscal year without an "operating loss," and at the same time an increase in the net worth of the church to an amount equal to the total contributions for the year to the Auditorium Fund and other special funds. And if these estimates are correct, it will mean further that it will not be necessary, in order to pay general running expenses, to use special funds set aside for other purposes.

It will be noted that in estimating "operating income" in the estimate by the Bishop, the Christmas offering fund is included. This is because this year that fund is being used for such purposes, and receipts from this source are estimated at $50,000.

It will prove gratifying to our members to know from this report of the Bishop that the operating condition of the church is improving because cash receipts have increased while expenses have been somewhat reduced. And doubtless the hope is universal that this condition may continue. From various monthly financial reviews of conditions generally, we may safely conclude that business is gradually getting better; but to a careful observer it is clear that the foundation for a boom does not exist. There are too many factors of uncertain evaluation. The financial and industrial situation of the United States, in this day of internationalism, is inextricably connected with the industrial affairs of other nations to such an extent that to be self-contained and enjoy fullest prosperity while other nations are in chaos could not be achieved without a readjustment not easy now to make. We speak here of United States affairs in this connection being of prime importance with us because the majority of our membership are in the United States, but at that our own situation as a church is already affected by industrial conditions of other countries; e. g., Canada, Australia, England, etc., where we have strong followings. How deeply or in what directions the welfare and business of the United States will be affected by European conditions is difficult to determine; but we cannot expect to escape unscathed. On the whole, however, the outlook in the United States is such that we may be encouraged and feel that the optimistic outlook seen by the Bishopric is justified. At least we can feel that with us there is no need for alarm. Scrutiny of the reports of the Bishopric will reveal that after all liabilities are deducted the net worth of the church to-day is approximately two and one half million dollars, and this does not include Graceland College, the Sanitarium, or the Herald Publishing House. Contrasting this with our situation ten years ago will give us cause to rejoice, and the Saints are to be congratulated.

We join the Bishopric in their optimism over the financial outlook.

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

Roman Catholic Imperialism

We have not joined in the hue and cry raised against the Roman Catholic Church by certain agitators, believing their propaganda to be nearly if not quite as anti-Christian as anti-Catholic in both spirit and method.

By no means, however, have we been blind to certain dangerous fundamental ideals and long-cherished ambitions entertained by Catholics. The Roman Catholic Church inherited from the Roman Empire the doctrine of imperialism and the ambition to rule the world.

As the Roman Empire crumbled before her enemies, the Roman Catholic Church quietly but effectually took over her world dominion—the Cæsars receded and the popes came on. The imperialistic ambitions of the church were soon realized throughout the world in both temporal and spiritual dominion—the church going even beyond the empire to claim dominion in the next world as well as in this.

Of this Harnack says:

The Roman Church in this way privily pushed itself into the place of the Roman world-empire, of which it is the actual continuation; the empire has not perished, but has only undergone a transformation. If we assert, and mean the assertion to hold good even of the present time, that the Roman Church is the old Roman Empire consecrated by the gospel, that is no mere "clever remark," but the recognition of the true state of the matter historically, and the most appropriate and fruitful way of describing the character of this church. It still governs the nations; its popes rule like Trajan and Marcus Aurelius; Peter and Paul have taken the place of Romulus and Remus; the bishops and archbishops, of the proconsuls; the troops of priests and monks correspond to the legions; the Jesuits, to the imperial bodyguard. . . . That is no church like the evangelical communities, or the national churches of the East; it is a political creation, and as imposing as a world empire, because the continuation of the Roman Empire. The pope, who calls himself "King" and "Pontifex Maximus," is Cæsar's successor. The church, which as early as the third and fourth century was entirely filled with the Roman spirit, has reestablished in itself the Roman Empire. Nor have patriotic Catholics in Rome and Italy in every century from the seventh and eighth onwards understood the matter otherwise.—What is Christianity, page 270.

The reformation together with the dawning of democratic ideas among the masses greatly reduced the powers of the Catholic Church, but her ambitions were by no means relinquished. The pope retired to the Vatican and became voluntarily the "prisoner of the Vatican," waiting a more opportune time to again press his claims. Defacto dominion has been curtailed—theoretical dominion is still cherished. The imperialistic ideal has never been renounced. And no opportunity to beat back toward world power is ever knowingly overlooked.

In a country like America or Canada or England, where the central ideal politically is democracy, and where religiously every man is presumed to worship according to his own conscience, or not at all, such imperialistic ambitions to world dominion in things both temporal and spiritual introduces a foreign element that sooner or later will make trouble. The persistent rumors that Catholics are arming and that certain anti-Catholic societies are arming for the day of conflict may not be without foundation.

The following extract is taken from a letter written by a missionary in a distant field:

One thing which seems to have a decidedly bad effect upon the sacredness of our meetings here is the noise and confusion throughout our building, mainly because of our people dining together in the rear part of the building, and partly because of the crowding of our services, all in the afternoon. Our people are widely scattered, the majority coming long distances. As there is no train service in the mornings of Sundays, we have no morning services. . . . In spite of many talks I have given on the subject, which are a little effective for a time and then forgotten, many walk in just on time, others after the meeting starts, and others often walk in and out during meeting, some leaving almost always before the meeting is over. I wonder do other branches operate under similar conditions, and how they cope with the situation. The effect is especially bad on members of other churches who are accustomed to perfect quietness.

In most places conditions are not nearly so bad as they were found by this brother in the particular locality to which he has reference. But it is undoubtedly true that there are many places where the Saints are not orderly in their houses of worship, and without doubt as a general rule we are too careless along those lines.

The house of God should be a house of order. It is a place where people should be reverent. The members are presumed to be in their places before the beginning of the service and to remain there quietly, reverently, and attentively until the close of the benediction. They should do so without whispering one to another during the service, unless absolutely necessary to do so. They should not come and go or stroll in and out or move about the room. Of course there are times when circumstances compel one to move or to go out during the service; if so the change should be made quietly and speedily so, as to attract the least possible notice from the audience.

We realize of course that in many localities the Saints come together from a distance and meet only at the church. We do not wish to draw the lines too rigidly or frown too severely upon their joyous intercourse between services. A little social contact then may be wholesome, even though there be some laughter and exchange of pleasantries. In this matter we must accommodate ourselves to circumstances. It would be better if attached to each church or near to it there was a room for such social gatherings where members could chat and visit and perhaps dine. Such conveniences are not always at hand, and we would rather the Saints would be social and cheerful and friendly when they meet in church than to have them cold and reserved, or what would be worse quarreling and bickering. Nevertheless they should deport themselves with dignity and not introduce anything unseemly or disrespectful to their surroundings; and during the service, whether of prayer or of preaching or of whatever nature, social intercourse should be suspended. The attitude should be reverent and attentive.

In these matters the priesthood should set an example, and though with the missionary quoted above, they may feel that the example has little effect and the teaching is not observed, if the priesthood as a whole throughout the church persist in setting a good example and in teaching in a kindly way regarding order and decorum in the church the effect is bound to be noticed and result in good. Let us remember that the house of God is a house of order.

High Council Meetings

Recently the Standing High Council of the church met at the call of the President, holding sessions on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, January 22, 23, and 24, and a variety of matters were under consideration.

The importance of this council in the work of the church is not, we fear, fully appreciated; but we hope soon to have some articles for publication covering the organization and work of the high council which cannot but be of interest to HERALD readers who wish to inform themselves in such matters.

The Prohibition Question

There is no doubt where this church stands on the prohibition question as one of the earliest laws passed both at Far West and at Nauvoo prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors. The Reorganized Church at Lamoni and in Independence has also persistently opposed the use of liquors and narcotics.

In America the immediate question is one of legal enforcement. We do not need to advise our readers not to drink nor do we need to urge them to keep the law. Still it is necessary that we keep awake individually to the danger of the conditions confronting us.

Disobedience to one law persisted in leads to a weakening of the spirit of obedience to other laws. In America whatever else may be said, the prohibition law was fairly adopted by a congress elected before our boys left the United States. The action by States was principally by legislators elected before the American soldiers had been sent to France. It was not a sudden action. Already a majority of the States had state prohibition; many counties in other States were also dry.

The primary question before us now in America is the need for administration of the law, that the forces of law and order be upheld and encouraged, that information of violation be given proper officers, that proper officers be given the responsibility, and that they be sustained by all churches and all church members, that they be made to feel the moral support of the citizens of the district wherein they serve. Prohibition is part of the national law. It is part of the Federal Constitution. It is enforced under act of Congress, but it is necessary that moral support be given to that enforcement, and that those who favor law and order shall make their voices heard against the relatively small number who are seeking the violation of the law.

But influence and voice is not enough. There is needed also financial support to see that this question is kept properly to the front, to see that Congressmen are elected who will uphold the spirit of the constitutional provision and who will not favor a movement to lessen or weaken the statutory act for its enforcement.

This requires, as we have previously pointed out, that we watch the candidates for office and vote for those who are for the enforcement of all of the laws and who favor and are working for better social conditions.

The fundamental principles, of course, are not changed. The value and importance of prohibition, its reasons, still occasionally are brought to the fore. The reasons against the admission of beers and wines having a higher alcoholic content than at present permissible, the evils of the liquor traffic, are all questions of immediate vital interest to all the rest of the world; nor can we afford to lose sight in America of the fundamental facts on which the law is based.

Finally on the question of enforcement it seems quite evident to a careful student that there is illegal consumption of liquor. Also many stocked up quite heavily before the prohibition act went into effect. But it also seems quite evident that drinking has greatly decreased whether we consider the arrests for drunkenness, the number of alcoholics, the consumption of drinks, the care of neglected children, bank deposits, or home conditions, as ascertained by departments of social service.

It is also certain that our streets are largely free not only of saloons but of the saloon loafer and of the drunkard. The invitation is no longer held out to children. The bad example of the loafer around the corner saloon has apparently passed away. Growing out of the war there are other unsatisfactory moral conditions, but nevertheless the enforcement of prohibition in America appears to be a success, despite the fact that certain elements are inclined criminally to seek the violation of this law as well as to strive to secure an amendment of the act of enforcement.

The reasons for prohibition and its effect in the United States are matters of general and worldwide interest. The reasons for prohibition are not as much a matter of news in America now as they are elsewhere, but for America the primary issue at present is that the law must and shall be enforced, and that to secure this church people must assist and give moral as well as financial support to the enforcement officers.

Jackson County a Great County

Recently one of our brethren was in conversation with a farmer near Independence not a member of the church, who a few years ago moved into Jackson County and has become prosperous. The farmer was enthusiastic about this part of the country and pronounced it the "greatest in the world." He further gave expression to the following, much to the surprise of our brother: "If anyone thinks God has had nothing to do with the settlement of this country he is thinking wrong."

Too many of our own people are still prone to question the wisdom of the instruction to us as a people to purchase land in the regions round about Zion.

The Mind of Christ

Sermon by T. W. Williams at the Stone Church, Independence, Missouri, November 5, 1922.

Let me read as a scriptural text a reading which I used a month ago at General Conference. I wish to use it in a different way than at that time. It is found in the second chapter of Paul's address to the church at Phillippi.

If there be, therefore, any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any tenderness and compassion:

Fulfill ye my joy, that ye be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind;

Let nothing be done through strife or vainglory; but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves.

Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others.

Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus; Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God;

But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men;

And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross;

Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him and conferred on him a name which is above every other name;

That in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of beings in heaven, and of those on earth, and of those in the underworld;

And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

Let me call your attention to the mountain peaks of spiritual purpose which are indicated in this reading. The apostle here portrays the chief and enduring characteristics of the man Jesus. Let us note them, and this not casually, but with the purpose to make same applicable in our own lives. For we must have a standard of spiritual and moral worth. I know of no character in history to whom we can accord this right save Jesus. We will do well to measure our lives by this standard. If we would succeed we must be like him.

First: The apostle tells us: "He made himself of no reputation." Note the significance of this statement: "He made himself." Jesus—God manifest in the flesh—made himself of no reputation. He did this voluntarily. He "took upon him the form of a servant"—not a master but a servant. He "was made in the likeness of men." "He humbled himself." He "became obedient unto death."

Incarnate Love of God

Jesus was the incarnate love of God. He was God manifest, made known, revealed, in the flesh. His was the ideal life. He the divine witness—leader—commander. His was the passion to give himself that others who lacked might have. His life was selfless. He knew that only through self-effacement could man be exalted. If he was to lift men up to God he must place himself beneath all things.

The apostle speaks of something which is comforting. He emphasizes in what way we can have comfort and consolation in Christ. This consolation does not consist in merely reviewing the life and suffering of our Lord and rejoicing in what he hath done. Our satisfaction only comes when we become conscious of the life and service of the Master finding expression in and through us. Are we content that Jesus humbled himself—that he made himself of no reputation—that he became obedient unto death? Or do we rejoice in that he has shown us the way so we can be like him—not in glory, but in service—not in realization, but in suffering and death? To have peace of mind we must be like him. To possess we must endure. We must be like him in suffering, in unselfish purpose, in service.

If we have consolation in Christ it is because we may follow him. If we have comfort it is because within ourselves we are moved by the same loving purpose which was manifested in him. If we have comfort in trying to become what Jesus was, we should go still further and possess our souls with the spirit of service so that others may have fellowship with him. We cannot have the fellowship of the Master unless we share his crucifixion and denial. We are comforted only when we give out this divine love which Jesus gives to us.

There are some admonitions in this reading. These are as great and vital as the promises. If we do not heed them we cannot have the love of God in our hearts. We cannot have real fellowship with Jesus if we are not possessed of the same Spirit.

"Let nothing." This is comprehensive. "Let nothing"—which you do in the waking moments of your little day as an individual or as a member of the group any time and anywhere—"let nothing be done through strife or vainglory." For if you achieve through strife, you will not enjoy the benefits of divine favor—you will not have the comforts of love—you will not have consolation in Christ Jesus.

Concern Yourself With Other's Needs

"Look not every man on his own things." Do not think of yourself by yourself. Do not be selfish. Do not concern yourself with things as they relate only to yourself. Do not pile up material things for your own comfort and blessing. "Look not every man on his own things but every man also on the things of others." Think of everything in its relation to other people. Concern yourself with other's needs.

"Be ye like-minded with Christ. Be of one mind, having the same love." Let me suggest that before you retire to bed to-night that you take your Bible and carefully, prayerfully, read this verse, aye, read the entire chapter. Read it just before your evening prayer, and then, after you have finished your prayer, read it again. Read it every evening for a week. If a new revelation has not come to you, then keep on reading it until you see Jesus in an entirely new light.

We speak of this church as the Church of Jesus Christ. Sometimes we call it the Latter Day Saint Church. Or at other times we say, "Our church." But this church does not belong to us. We may, if we conform our lives to the plan of the architect, be a part of the church but this is the Church of Jesus Christ. It belongs to him.

A Living Witness

This afternoon when I came into the prayer service I sat down in the rear of the building determined to, as far as possible, enter into the spirit of the service. I listened carefully to the testimonies. It seemed to me there was a spirit of proprietorship on the part of the testators. They talked of the church as though it belonged to them; as though it was something outside of themselves, as a beautiful picture, or a piano, or a house. Practically every testimony ran, "I know this work is true. God has answered my prayer. God has blessed me." The burden of testimony was that the work was true because the individual himself or herself had obtained something. I waited in vain for the testimony which would convey the thought that the work was true because Jesus Christ had enabled the individual to be like him and because the spirit of service which had actuated the Master had taken possession of the individual testator.

I asked myself the question, Do these people think that this is the full heritage of sonship with Jesus? Why, you can hear almost identical testimonies in every church throughout the world—Christian, heathen, any and all, bear this kind of a testimony. You have only to go to the mountains of the west and men, women, and little children will acclaim, "I know this work is true." There you will find decrepit old men, some of whom have violated the moral law but who will arise in the assembly of the people and acclaim, "I know this work is true."

You have only to go to the monasteries and cloisters of the old established church—this institution where monks hide themselves away from the world, and where women become nuns and renounce every thing even the glory of maternity and go into unnatural retreat—and each and all of these will loudly acclaim, "I know this church is true." Why, the devotees of every heathen and so-called Christian church in all the world will bear this same testimony. And when they speak of the institution they assume a proprietorship. They speak as though it belonged to them. They glory because they possess rather than others.

But shall this be the nature and extent of our testimony? Tell me, brother, why do you bear testimony that this church is true? Or what does your testimony embrace? What do you mean when you say, "I know this work is true"? Is it because Jesus organized it? Then it may be true to-day and false to-morrow. Or is it true because we too have received the spirit which directed the Master in its formation? If the mere fact that God, at one time, gave revelation and blessing to men and through them organized the church will make the institution forever true, then we have no place or standing, for the Catholic Church has precedence over us. We affirm that the Catholic Church has apostatized from the faith and thereby lost its authority. The Catholics rest on their laurels and prove to their own satisfaction that their church is true because Christ himself organized it. They offer evidence in the recital of miracles, visions, and healings of divers kinds. If the Catholic Church could apostatize, is it not possible that we can also? And should we do so, would it be strange if we too would be blinded to our condition and be as our Catholic friends?

The Danger of Apostasy

The mere fact that God organized his church in these latter days does not give guarantee that it will always be true. We may apostatize. Men have apostatized. Men will apostatize. There is nothing in the sacred books of the church which guarantees that there will never be another complete apostasy from the faith. In fact the inference is that there may be. Our safety therefore is not in the self-satisfying feeling that because, at one time, God revealed himself and gave blessing and divine power we will always be in favor with him. Security depends on fidelity to God. We may apostatize to-morrow. History reveals that when men were in apostasy they were the most vociferous in acclaiming their fidelity.

The church belongs to Jesus Christ. Please remember this. It is his church. It was begotten by him. He purchased it with his own blood. He brought it forth in travail, and in pain, and in self-denial, and in crucifixion. It is his by every known right of God and man. The church is not a material edifice. It is not composed of brick or stone or costly marble. In fact the church may flourish with no material edifice. The early pioneers of this latter-day work met not far from here in the wilderness. They had no covering over their heads—no seating arrangement. They were hounded by their enemies. They were mobbed by fanatical religionists. And so long as they were true to the revelations of God to them then was the church a living, pulsing thing.

But these people wandered from God. They apostatized from the faith. And they were driven out of this land. And the reason for their being driven was because they were infidel to God—they were in the condition of apostasy—so read the revelations of God. I do not condone the fiendish work of the mobs of that day, but I say the Latter Day Saints would never have been driven out of Missouri if they had been true to their covenant. One with God is a majority. The church which gives itself to carry out the purposes of God and is true to God is invulnerable to men or devils. The reason why the Latter Day Saints were driven out of Missouri was because they were not true to their trust. They did not interpret the spirit of Jesus as indicated in our text.

Church Identity

The church is not merely an ecclesiastical organization. We claim we have a prophet in the church. He has his two counselors. We have a Quorum of Twelve, quorums of seventies, high priests, patriarchs, elders, pastors, teachers, and deacons. Do these comprehend the church?

They have nearly all of the officers in the Catholic Church which we have. Will we conclude therefore that the Catholic Church is the true church? We have not one officer in our church which is not duplicated by the Mormons of Utah. Are they then the church of Jesus Christ? Does the mere fact that we have all of the officers as found in the New Testament church validate our claim to being the true church? No, we can have every officer enumerated in the New Testament and still be a dead organization so far as reflecting the life and purpose of Jesus.

Suppose we go farther and affirm that we have the gift of tongues and the gift of interpretation of tongues, and the gift of prophecy and the gift of healing. Are we now the church? Do these things in themselves validate our claim? If so, then other churches have similar claim with our own. Let me ask you on what do you predicate your conclusion that this is the church of Jesus Christ or rather as the usual testimony runs, "I know that this church is true—I know that this is the work of God"?

We may go a step farther and affirm that the sick are healed and devils are cast out. You may have all these things and still be dead spiritually. Some one inquires, "Do you mean to say that when some one arises and speaks in tongues that this is false?" No. Some of these manifestations may be false. Some of them undoubtedly are. We are directed to try the spirits. Another inquires, "Do you mean to affirm that when our elders are called upon and administer to the sick and they recover that this is not evidence that this church is true?" I reply, we may have a prophet at the head of this church, a body of officers the very complement of the New Testament church, we may lay claim to spiritual gifts, and to divine healing, and still be absolutely dead so far as reflecting the spirit and purpose of Jesus Christ is concerned.

The apostle has well said: "Though I speak with the tongue of men and of angels and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." It will not do even to predicate our claim on the assumption that we have the gift of prophecy. I have heard prophecies out in the world. It may be urged that these were false. Possibly. But I know that sometimes we have false prophecies. I also know that people out in the world predict future events and their prophecies come true. The fact that men prophesy and their prophecies come to pass is not the final proof of a divine institution.

Spiritual Identity

The man who has not within his own soul and being the mind that was in Jesus Christ cannot establish his identity by any other means. Our identity rests in that we are like Christ. If the mind which was in Jesus is not in this church as a dominating impulse, then it is not his church even though we may prove official and doctrinal identity. No church can finally identify itself with Jesus Christ until it can manifest to the world that it has the mind of Christ.

The world can judge us only in one way. And this is not by organization—not by our claims to divine favor, no! Jesus has given the test: "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples because ye have love one towards another." Jesus gave this test. He meant it. Then I affirm the only way in which we can establish our claim to being the church of Jesus Christ is by possessing the mind of Jesus and demonstrating that we have love one towards another.

What is religion? Some one has tritely said that it is the mind of God in the soul of man. Religion comprehends more than this. Is religion something which exists outside of oneself? Is it something which we can hang on the wall as a motto? Is it an epitome of faith which we can paste in our Bible? Is it the Bible, Book of Mormon, or Doctrine and Covenants? Can you ever get religion out of these books? I say no. You may try for a million years to get religion out of books and still be a spiritual pauper. Books grow out of religion. If the religion which gave us these books does not persist, then these books become dead letters. If the spirit and intelligence which gave power to these books be lacking, then we multiply and pile them up forever and still be without God.

The mere fact that we can turn to the past and say that God has spoken to the church is no evidence that this is his church now. Religion is God speaking to man and man responding to God. It is cooperation. It is reciprocity. It is God expressing himself and man reacting to this expression.

Religion Antedates All Books

What is our religion? You answer, Our epitome of faith. This is only our attempt to interpret God. But you say, the Bible contains the revelation of God—it is God speaking. Granted. But before the Bible was, God is. The religion which God had in mind for the world existed long before there were any books; and though all these books might be burned, still religion would persist because the avenues of divine revelation would be open. God will continue to speak and men will continue to respond.

The response is not only towards God, for the man who does not manifest the same attitude towards his fellow which God manifests towards him is not spiritually alive. He may lay claim to marvelous spiritual manifestations and blessings, but after all the real evidence of discipleship lies in man's attitude towards God and his fellows. No man can love his neighbor as himself without divine help. Unselfish love is a divine grace. By its presence we evidence our rightful claim to being the children of God. We must be Godlike.

Jesus was "in the form of God." He was like God. He had the attributes of God. I do not affirm that Jesus possessed the physical attributes of God. I do not affirm that within the body of Jesus there existed the essential substances which go to make up God. But Jesus was possessed of the mind of God and that is the major thing in identity.

Identity comprehends more than physical likeness. If I cannot see in my loved one more than the physical form, then there is something lacking in my spiritual make-up. Religion—real religion, enables a man to look into the soul of his fellow and sense the real affinity which should exist between man and man. God is revealed to man in the life and purpose of Jesus Christ. His body was of very little consideration. He was a man. His body was just like ours. He was mortal. His body had to pass through the change which comes at death—pass from mortality to immortality. It was not the same body after the change that it was before.

Form here comprehends more than the mere shape. If I cannot see in Jesus more than a Jewish peasant, Christianity means little to me. If I cannot see in my fellow minister in church service more than a body with hands, head, and feet my religion is superficial. But if I can look beyond the body into the soul of man and discover the revelation of God in other lives and hearts, then is God manifest in the flesh.

The Attributes of God

What are some of the attributes of God? One is love. Jesus indicates the relationship. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life." Jesus Christ loved folks. He didn't love kings because they were kings. He did not love men because they had money. He did not love men because they had culture. He did not love men because they were educated. He did not love men because they had crops or acres. He did not love men because they were destitute of any or all of these things. He loved men and women because they were folks. He loved the world. He loved men, not for what they had, but for what they didn't have. Isn't that somewhat different from our love?

Christ did not love men because they were good. He loved men because they were not good. Am I apostatizing? Listen; does God love you because you are good? Let the pharisee speak up. Jesus said, "There is none good but God." I confess that God loved me because I was not good. He loved me because he wanted me to become good. What has God ever found in you that was so good that he had to love you for your goodness? Speak up. No, God loved us because he realized our need. God loved us because we had nothing to give to him but he had everything to give us.

God's Love Is Universal

God loves the whole world, the bad world, the erring world, the wicked world, the world which has killed his prophets, the world which has stoned the heralds of salvation, the world that is without God. He so loved the erring world that he said, Here is my son, I will give him that he may make the supreme sacrifice and all for man. Jesus died to save you from yourself, from your sin, from your folly, from your unloveableness, from the things which alienate you from God.

And that was, aye is, the mind of Christ. He left the throne of glory, he forsook the throne of exaltation, the communion of his Father, the association of kindred spirits, and the fellowship of men made perfect. He turned his back on these things and came down and took upon him the nature of Adam. He chose to be born in a stable. He might have been born in a palace. He was born without accredited parentage and subjected himself to what odium might attach to that condition. He did all this that no soul throughout the oncoming ages would ever be able to rightly say he did not have equal opportunity with Jesus. Jesus became the lowest of all. He said to men: Here I am, your brother. I want to become one of you. I want to be your friend. Let us be pals.

Some men might look upon him and say, You do not mean it. It cannot be possible that one of your culture and refinement and training can find association with fallen women, and winebibbers, and gluttons. Jesus was happy with these people. Not that he condoned their wrong or participated in their evils. Jesus did not contribute to their moral lack. He won them to him by loving them.

Members of the Church of Jesus Christ, if the mind that was in Jesus is not in you, then are you apostates to God. If you are not moved with the altruistic purpose of Jesus you may acclaim to the world that you have prophets and apostles and evangelists and pastors in the church, but it will not avail. You may even claim that God is speaking to the church through the prophet of the church, but you are false to God. You may have twelve apostles in the church each claiming that he is a special witness for Jesus Christ, but unless these apostles have the mind of Christ their claim is spurious and their apostleship a myth.

It is not pleasant for me to speak as I do. It would be much easier to commend you, but I must answer to my God. God is asking of this people to consecrate their lives to the truth and to say, "We are going to be true to the mind, and will, and purpose of Jesus Christ. Inasmuch as he gave himself to save humanity, we will do likewise. Inasmuch as he denied himself of the things which pandered to the physical in order that he might bring to humanity a revelation of the divine purpose, so will we give all for the good of humanity."

Please understand that I will not by inference even reflect on the prophet of the church, nor will I suggest that our apostles are not men of God. This is farthest from my purpose. I am only trying to present the real essence of religion and to show that without the mind of Christ we are sterile in the things which make for real religion.

The Sin of Ambition

"Thought it not robbery to be equal with God." Do you know what comes to mind now? The ambition of James and John. They thought that Jesus was going to be coronated in Palestine in a few weeks. They visualized Jesus sitting on the throne of David coronated and robed and they wanted to be with him in glory. And they came unto him and said:

"Rabbi, we wish you would grant us whatever request we make of you."

"What would you have me do for you?" he asked.

"Allow us," they replied, "to sit one at your right hand, and the other at your left hand, in your glory."

"You know not," said he, "what you are asking. Are you able to drink out of the cup from which I am to drink, or to be baptized with the baptism with which I am to be baptized?"

"We are able," they replied.

"Out of the cup," said Jesus, "from which I am to drink you shall drink, and with the baptism with which I am to be baptized you shall be baptized; but as to sitting at my right hand or at my left, that is not mine to give; it will be for those for whom it is reserved."

Friends, we may even drink of the cup of suffering that Jesus drank of but if our purpose is not the same as his, we will drink without the same results. Our approach to trial and affliction and suffering must be identical with his, or we fail. Our approach to sacrifice, our approach to crucifixion, must be the unselfish, altruistic approach of Jesus. He practically said to these men, You may suffer and even die at the hands of wicked men, but you cannot sit with me in my glory save through crucifixion and denial. Jesus has set the pace of living and serving and doing. His was the mind of God.

"Thought it not robbery to be equal with God." What meaneth this? The great curse of the world has always been that men wish to climb into Moses' seat. We are jealous of authority, anxious for power, always striving for place. Answer me, members of the church, how do we measure up with this analysis? Do we talk of equality in terms of place or in terms of service? Jesus thought it not robbery to be equal with God. How? I challenge you to find any suggestion in the divine record that Jesus ever claimed equality with God in the sense that he was as high as God, that he had as much power. Equality with God is not measured in that way. He was equal with God in love, in mercy, in kindness, in ministry, in service. Equality here is measured in what you give out rather than in what you acquire or retain. God has given all his love without check or stint to his creation. Christ came into the world and gave all his love to men. If you are a child of God you too will give all the love of which you are capable to humanity.

A True Definition of Service

And what did Jesus give his life for? Was it in order that men might fall at his feet and worship him? Out upon such heresy! Did he give his life for men in order that when time had been swallowed up in eternity and he was exalted on a throne high above all others, men would say, He saved me? Out upon such blasphemy. This was not his purpose at all. He gave with no thought of return. He gave his life that men might be.

Are you moved by the mind that was in Christ, my brother? Are you, my fellow ministers, governed by this divine purpose? It is immaterial who you are, apostle, prophet, evangelist, pastor, teacher, deacon, if you are seeking place, if you are thinking of yourself, you are unworthy the name of Christ. You need to be converted. You are without real religion. If your actions are determined by your thought of reward or personal blessing you are anathema with God. If you are not moved with the idea of service to men your ministry is a failure.

If you can love men because of their very lack of virtue, that is if you can give love to men who lack without thought as to its reception or reciprocation, then are you moved by the mind that was in Jesus Christ. The divinity of Jesus was not so much evidenced in that he could say that he was the Son of God, but rather that he possessed the virtue to become the Son of Man. He fraternized with all classes of men. He lived with men yet above them. He could associate with libertines and receive no taint. They, in turn, became clean.

What are we doing as a church? What are we doing in this place we call Zion? It is for us to minister to those who are in lack, to go out among the people, our neighbors and friends, and set such an example and work such service that they in turn will recognize in us the Mind of Christ. This is the evidence of our divinity. This the test of our discipleship.

A New Definition of Stewardships

We talk about stewardships. What do we mean? Do we measure stewardship in terms of money? Is stewardship determined by property values? No. Stewardship means that God is our Father; all we are brothers. We speak of equality. Physical equality does not exist. God never intended that all of us should be born equal, despite the fact that the Declaration of Independence so declares. The intent of the framers of that document was to affirm that all men were equal before the law. Men are born into this world with different talents. It is God's way. Equality means equality of opportunity, equality of service. All ye are my equal. There are no low, no high, with God. Let us have equality in the privilege to do, to serve. We may properly cease to concern ourselves as to the failure of others and consecrate our talents to do our very best.

To us is committed the sacred charge to always interpret the mind and purpose of Jesus Christ. I may stand up here and bear my testimony that I have seen God. Possibly I have. Possibly I only think I have. The best evidence that I have seen God is given in my daily walk and conversation. A testimony of service is more impressive than a mere affirmation. You may stand up here and bear testimony that you have seen God and go home and become angry with your family. Your testimony would not have much weight. Eyes do not see. Ears do not hear. These eyes are only windows to the soul. These ears are only the registers of the vibrations in the ether. To see God I must sense him. I must know him in my soul.

If I had really seen God face to face I would not make known my experience to others unless commanded to do so. Unless I can give evidence of my communion with God through my actions the words of my mouth count for but little.

All that I know of God I have learned as a member of this church. I may have gained this knowledge elsewhere, but I did not. I have a degree of uplift, of inspiration, of stirring impulse, which justifies me in believing that I have come in touch with divine things.

Let us go out during this conference year charged with the lofty purpose to portray the Mind of Christ. We will not be of Paul, or of Apollos, or of Cephas. We are not for Frederick M. Smith or John W. Rushton or Paul M. Hanson or Benjamin R. McGuire. We are for Jesus Christ. All these are our brothers but Jesus Christ is our witness, our commander, our leader.

But if we are for Jesus Christ we cannot be against men. Though we be for Jesus Christ, yet we cannot be against any of our brothers. Jesus Christ is our ideal. He is our life and hope. God grant that the mind that was in Jesus may be in us all. Amen.

Our Church Periodicals

By Elmer K. Patterson

Every one of our church publications leads the reader to God.

When the truth of a matter is told, it very often sounds as though the one telling it was trying to stretch a point. Possibly the reason for this lies in the fact that "truth is stranger than fiction."

A number of thousands of people to-day believe that Joseph Smith was visited by angels in these latter days. But the great majority of people, upon hearing that bit of truth will either slink away from it as they would from a poison reptile or else attempt to laugh it to scorn. Some have openly reviled against it. But in spite of all this the truth of the matter remains the same, and unmoved.

The editors and publishers of our several church publications have for years been trying to teach the host who believe in the revelation to Joseph Smith and the institutions of which he was instrumental in founding, the real truth about the place our church periodicals hold in this great latter-day work. Some thousands have heeded and are loyal supporters and have long since, many of them, proven to their own satisfaction the great value of these periodicals to the believer who has set his eyes Zionward and heavenward.

They have looked beyond the typography of our publications and have discovered in the terse, chaste style of its literature the beautiful and impressive rhetorical decoration; the interesting stories; the articles and essays and the well-told narratives; the deepness of wisdom and the soundness of logic displayed; the dignity of language and the humanity-elevating themes—all that makes them worthy of regular universal reading and careful study.

Their great educating power has been revealed to them as lamps to their feet and lights to their paths in a world of sin and darkness. Their vision has broadened, their minds strengthened, their thoughts elevated, and their affection ennobled. Character has been given strength, perception a greater keenness, ambition the blessing of altruism, and judgment the beauty of soundness.

Our church publications as a guide to the attainment of the ideal of perfected Christianity in man find their only rivals in the three standard books of the church. They are the first essential supplements thereto.

Every issue of each of our publications is freighted with the very things our soul craves; the things that give a calm peace in believing, and a firm hope of the future. We find great assistance in our efforts to solve the great problems of life and destiny, and we are wonderfully inspired to a life of purity, patience, and well-doing.

Maybe it is one of the letters, or possibly one or more of the other delightful things we read that fills our hearts with love for God; and that heavenly, altruistic desire to do good to others leaps up within us and we move out and become more useful here, and our preparation for the life to come is greatly enhanced. Who, then, can read and study and ponder over the things that help us so wonderfully in becoming bold for the right and fail to recognize the great value of the agencies lending that assistance?

Every one of our church publications leads the reader to God, and to Christ. If we would know them we would have life eternal, and right here we should find that which would sustain the soul in adversity and affliction. The dark valley of death would be lighted up and the hand of destiny would ever point to an unending life in the realms of a glory celestial.

With these things in the minds of those who are responsible for the existence of our several publications they are righteously zealous in sending each one of them forth on their respective missions of light and blessing, knowing that all to whom they go shall find in them a most excellent aid to private, family, and public study of the Word of God, the doctrine of Christ, and the discoveries of man.

How the Organist Can Help

By William T. Goullee

In our devotions and church services are we as reverent as we should be?

Ever since I started my career as a musician, many of my musical friends have told me what they consider one of the essentials of the work of an organist (even in small branches of our church), and that is the accompaniment of hymn tunes. As I grow older I find this to be indeed true.

I believe that many of us have an intense desire for ideal success in the musical parts of our service, but from my experience I find that we often overlook the simple elements which mean so much. The suggestions I wish to make will be general, although I have in mind the small choir, using the harmonium or American organ. My sympathy goes out to my brothers and sisters who have labored in many cases under trying conditions, and worse still, with little appreciation.

Referring to the hymn part of the service, it is here that the congregation have their chance of making their contribution to the service. In accompanying let us remember that it should tend to give the waiting congregation religious edification. This can only be done by the choir and organist endeavoring to stir the worshipers to praising their Creator.

Here again I wish to emphasize the importance of the accompaniment of the hymn tune. To play over the hymn in an haphazard manner tends to lower aspiration. What is needed is a sense of rhythm, which in a real musician is constantly growing. We should have inspiration for rhythm as we do for melody or harmony. I think that all of us would make some improvement along these lines if we analyzed what has been done in the past. I have noticed singing in unison, and even sometimes a verse without the instrument gives the opportunity for the congregation to express itself in song, and I feel at times a chance for some of "our musical friends" to sing in tune.

When I refer to the organist in playing trying to smother the voices, some may think that is impossible with so few good pipe organs as we have. But I have noticed even in small American organs we have, some are apt to try to drown or overpower the voices. While learning to play a wind instrument I was told by my professor not to overblow, or to blow to get a loud effect, the common mistake with many players. He insisted on my blowing to obtain a softer tone. Tone was his criterion. I think it would be fine for our church musicians to try for tone in the musical part of the services. It would certainly help the spiritual part.

Remember, it is only an accompanying part. If we remember this we shall have done our part in the service.

In concluding this part of my paper, I would insist that we always remember that the hymn part of the service belongs to the people.

The Organ Prelude

The next phase in which as an organist I take great interest, and often subject to a keen and critical examination, is the opening prelude or ingoing voluntary.

In this sphere we cannot put the responsibility on to any other person such as the chorister, but we are wholly responsible for the atmosphere we create for the anthem, or maybe the preacher. I am sorry to say from my experience that as a church we generally lack reverence in this part of our worship. Further still, the music oftentimes lacks that spirituality which we have noticed in outside denominations, and which adds so much to the purpose of the hour. One never knows what may be accomplished by a little forethought and the giving of one's best. I think that those of my readers who have traveled will agree with me.

Much could be written about the ingoing voluntary or prelude. In some countries I have visited it has always been part of the service. In other places I have visited it has struck me as a fine accompaniment for gossiping folk, in fact a kind of obligato to a song of chatter. I have had the good fortune to be one of the congregation, and to notice how it affected my neighbors in the pews around me. I also have had the pleasure of listening to the gossip while endeavoring to give out the opening strains of the prelude. After all, if we want the best brought out from the organ loft we must certainly give the player our unexpressed attention.

When I say that one never knows what good may be accomplished it brings to my mind one of the blessings I received through music. During my stay in Glasgow my friend and I visited the cathedral for the Sunday afternoon service. I was feeling very weary of the war, and my mind was far from a state of rest and peace. We entered in a reverent manner with some of our fellow worshipers. Latter Day Saints could take a timely lesson from the Scotch religious folk. A few minutes before the commencement of the service I offered a silent prayer, asking my heavenly Father to take care of my brothers and sisters, and of all concerned in the war. Just as I had finished my prayer, the organ strains softly vibrated through that wonderful old cathedral. It helped to create that peace of mind for which many of us pray. The hymns sung by a fervent congregation, the anthem by a choir of mixed voices, brought to mind the realization of the heavenly host. I could see neither minister, organist, nor choir, but they had made their impression mentally, and I felt that they had given of their best and had helped and strengthened one waiting soul needing their help. I left that cathedral grateful for the inspiring words of the minister and for the song of thanksgiving.

Of course different seasons of the years call for different styles and types of music, but I would advise that the ingoing voluntary be of the prelude type characterized by good harmonious chords, and moving in a reverent manner, thereby helping to lift the mind of the waiting congregation.

Quite recently I visited a church, and for the voluntary a bright, flutey, shrill air, sustained by a soft chord, repeated four or five times, served to bring the choir into their places. I felt that the organist did not appreciate the position. It put one of the congregation into such a mood that the Sunday paper was found to be more interesting. I was glad to find out later that the logical and inspiring sermon made up for the opening of the service.

The Offertory

As regards the offertory, I think that it is better to play than to let the plate go round without music. Some ministers, I know, like to hear the jingle of the money. One of my reasons is that if there is no music there is a fine opportunity for the congregation to start talking. This means that all the good work accomplished by the prelude, hymns, and the well-rendered and carefully chosen anthem, is lost for the atmosphere of the sermon. The offertory need not be too solemn and monotonous, but more of the bright, moving, and dignified type of piece.

For the outgoing voluntary or postlude, I feel that the character of the music should denote gladness, and not as I have heard some organists play a piece so quick and loud that it makes one feel that one is being told to get out quickly. The more I think about this part, the more I feel its importance. After listening to a powerful and stirring sermon, the outgoing voluntary consists of a thin, limpid air and variations, instead of a dignified and sonorous movement from, say, a symphony or sonata. A movement of this character gives the organist an opportunity to relieve the strain which at times is experienced during the service.

In conclusion, I feel that as a church we have a long way to go to attain to our position in the world of music, especially in church music. Past history shows that many of the great composers and musicians had a thorough training in their early days in church music and its associations. Let us as a church learn a timely lesson from their experience. What are we going to contribute? Do we really feel we have given of our best?

Reduced Prices on Zion's Praises

Through an error in laying the pages, a recent edition of Zion's Praises has several pages in reverse order. In every way except this, the books are as usable as any, and with just a few minutes' work they could be marked to prevent difficulty in using. But we are making a substantial reduction in order to enable our patrons to use them.

Songs numbered 22, 23, and 24 are in this order: 24, 23, 22. Songs numbered 25, 26, and 27, are reversed in this order: 27, 26, 25.

The price is regularly 65 cents each, or 60 cents each in lots of ten or more. We are making a special price on these, singly or in quantity, of

40 Cents a Copy

Those who have received any of these imperfect copies in recent orders before we noted the error may return them and have them replaced with perfect copies without charge. Or if preferred, we will remit the difference in price upon notification of the number bought and the price paid (whether single price or dozen price.) Let us have date of order and name of one ordering.

OF GENERAL INTERESTIndividualism

While there are forces in the growth of our individualism which must be curbed with vigilance, yet there are no less glorious forces growing within, that promise of the future. There is developing in our people a new valuation of individuals and of groups and of nations. It is a rising vision of service. . . .

But service is a quality of the individual, and the sum of service is the sum of the deeds of individuals. Our failures indeed are failures of service, and the soul of our nation suffers for it.

They have forgotten that progress lies with the individual inspired to service.

As a matter of practical fact, social progress is the sum of the progress of individual units. The only road to the realization of great hopes of human progress is the steady and sure advancement of the individual.

We cannot afford to rest at ease in the comfortable assumption that right ideas always prevail by some virtue of their own. In the long run they do. But there can be and there have been periods of centuries when the world slumped back toward darkness merely because great masses of men became impregnated with wrong ideas and wrong social philosophies. The declines of civilization have been born of wrong ideas. Most of the wars of the world, including the recent one, have been fought by the advocates of contrasting ideas of social philosophy.

There are great ends to be accomplished. We can, if we will, march steadily toward a better distribution of our productivity; to an increase in our production, and thus to higher standards of living for all, not for any special group. We can give to all the more general access to the finer side of life; we can contribute to the steady advance of civilization itself. They will come if we hold an abiding faith in the intelligence, the initiative, the character, the courage, and the divine touch in the human soul of the individual. We can safeguard these ends if we give to each individual that opportunity for which the spirit of America stands.—Herbert Hoover, in World's Work, April, 1922.

The Chickasaw Nation

The following regarding one of the most advanced of the Indian tribes in America will be of interest to our readers.

(From a recent book by James H. Malone with the above title, published by the John P. Morton Company, of Louisville, Kentucky.)

The average citizen of to-day believes that our Chickasaws were a shiftless kind of savage, wandering over the country, living in bark or skin tepees and depending entirely upon the chase and fishing for a living. This is a very great mistake. They were a self-reliant, self-respecting people, and it may be added, they required others to respect them. They had good houses suitable to their conditions and means of building, to live in, those for the summer months being somewhat different from those they lived in during the winter which were so constructed as to be warmer and more comfortable. They cultivated maize. Their houses were not only clean, but their lives were pure and their women gracious, many of them very handsome, and what is more important they were chaste and pure. No

Chickasaw girl was ever known to give birth to a child before wedlock.

At the same time the Chickasaw warriors were the bravest of the brave, and for fidelity of character they were the peers of any nation of ancient or modern times.

Their form of government was one of the purest democracies. There was a chief, sometimes called by writers a king, because his duties and prerogatives resembled those of a king. However, they were never guilty of the folly of having a hereditary ruling king, or other hereditary rulers or classes. A Chickasaw became chief or subordinate chief by the choice of the nation solely because he had achieved that distinction by deeds for the nation that entitled him to leadership, and he enjoyed that distinction only so long as his merits entitled him to.

They never went to war except after the most careful deliberation of all the warriors, followed by fasting and prayer to "The Beloved One that dwelleth in the Blue Sky," for his aid and protection in the impending conflict, but once in war they neither gave nor expected quarter.

They were of a deeply religious nature, but superstition was a stranger to them. Unlike most uncivilized peoples, the appearance of a comet or an eclipse or an earthquake brought no terrors to them. These they regarded as a part of natural phenomenon, under the guidance of the "Beloved One," who governed all things and bestowed upon his people all of the good things which their merits deserved.

Whence came this strange race found living in the heart of America, a comparatively civilized tribe, at the dawn of the nation's history? Their remote origin, of course, like that of the American Indian generally, is still one of the unsolved mysteries of history. But their traditions handed down from generation to generation point back to far migrations, from Mexico undoubtedly to their Mississippi home, perhaps from Asia across the Behring Straits in the days of the world's great racial wanderings. Adair, a British traveler and trader, who lived with the Chickasaws a number of years in the early part of the eighteenth century and learned their language, believed them to be of Hebraic origin—one of the "lost tribes of Israel." He adduced "twenty-four arguments," based on facial characteristics and similarity of civic and religious customs, in proof of the theory that the Chickasaws were lineal descendants of the Jews. They chanted the name "Jahwah," for one thing, in some of their religious rites, which Adair thought was a corruption of the Jewish "Jehovah" and he found many striking analogies between their tribal customs and those of the ancient Hebrews.

That the Chickasaws were related to, if not actual lineal descendants of, that mysterious race known as the Mound Builders whose colossal works are found in the Mississippi Valley and throughout the Southern States, seems to be now fairly well established. One of their own mounds, built within the late traditional period, is still to be seen in Mississippi near the site of one of the old Chickasaw villages.

It is the repository of the bones of their ancestral dead which the tribe had carried with them on their long migration from Mexico. It was called in the language of the Chickasaws, "Nunih Wai-yah," the "leaning mountain," and was held in great reverence by the ancient tribe. Around it are still to be found the remnants of a great wall, constructed much in the fashion of the circumvallations of the Cahokia mounds in the Mississippi Valley. According to Gideon Lincicum, a Mississippi historian who spent many years among the Chickasaws and Choctaws gathering their traditions, the migration from Mexico covered a period of forty-three years and each detachment of the tribes that arrived in their new home brought with them the bones of their ancestors and the great mound was constructed as a depository for these relics.

"I visited this mound in 1843," writes Lincicum. "I found it rounded off, oblong square, two hundred yards in circumference at its base, eighty feet in height, with a flat space on the top fifty-two yards in length by twenty-five yards in width. The whole mound was thickly set with large forest trees. Two hundred yards to the north of it is a lake which I suppose to be the place from which they carried the earth to construct the mound. The great wall around the mound was built of the height of two men, and had in it only two openings, one on the east and the other on the west. It seemed to be a complete circle and from one and a half to two miles in circumference. Many places in the wall were still eight feet in height."

The migration legends of the Chickasaws, the Choctaws, and in fact the entire Muskogean family to which they belonged, all point to Mexico as the original habitat of their races on this continent and to an anterior migration by way of Behring Straits from Asia in the far-distant past. "These legends and traditions," says Malone, "had become a part of the religious history of the Indians. The wanderings of the Chickasaws and Choctaws, under the leadership of Shah-tah and Chickasah in quest of a new home, following the Fabussah, a sacred pole which they erected every night and whose leaning in the morning pointed the way for them to travel, and their many privations and sufferings on the way were not only as real, but as sacred to them, and of as deep religious signification, as is the forty years of wandering in the wilderness of the Jews under Moses and Joshua to the Israelites and the Christian world at the present time."

The last migration of the Chickasaws came within a recent historic period. In 1832 the United States Government removed the Chickasaw and Choctaw tribes to their new home in the then Indian territory. Here in keeping with their ancient traditions the Chickasaws separated from their Choctaw kinsmen and set up their own independent form of government, modeled upon the American system. It was a representative sovereignty, with its own rulers, legislative bodies, and judicial system, which they maintained until they became a part of the new State of Oklahoma.

"Moderation" Is Not Moderating

Unless the policy of the Liquor Control Board to force a greater consumption of liquor on the public is suddenly and firmly halted, the best objects of "moderation" will be completely defeated, and British Columbia will be up against something dangerously like economic disaster.

The people of this province are spending approximately a million dollars a month for liquor. Out of this $12,000,000 a year, $4,000,000 goes back into provincial circulation through administration costs and the Government's profit. The other $8,000,000 drawn from the often unwilling pockets of the people, goes completely and forever out of British Columbia.

Contrary to the assertions of the board, increased sales do not mean more money for the Government, more money for hospitals, or more money for anything that will benefit the province. Increased sales simply mean that the people will have less money to pay legitimate taxes, and that more profit is going outside British Columbia.

From a purely economic standpoint, we would like to know just how long British Columbia can afford to send

Instructions by the Young Women's Bureau Regarding Contests

At the coming Young People's Convention at Lamoni in June we hope to have on display some of the things done by Oriole circles and Temple Builder chapters. These must necessarily represent those expressional features such as records kept of activities engaged in, articles of clothing and household use, decorative material, etc.

We have arranged for several contests to be carried on by the girls and young women of the church. These contests are to cover a period of three months, beginning February 10 and closing May 10, 1923. All articles sent in to be judged must be made during said period of time. The circle and chapter scoring the highest will receive the blue ribbon; the second highest, the red ribbon; and the ten receiving the next highest score will receive honorable mention.

Record Book Contest

I. ORIOLE CIRCLES (one book from a circle).

This book should contain a record of the names and addresses of members of the circle; the names and addresses of all the girls in the local church of Oriole age; social, recreational, benevolent, and commercial activities engaged in by the circle from February 10 to May 10, 1923. The following score sheet will enable each group of girls to know upon what basis their books are to be judged:

- 25 per cent 1. The largest percentage of girls helping to make the book in proportion to the number of girls of Oriole age in the local church.
- 25 per cent 2. Kind of activities engaged in.
- 15 per cent 3. General appearance of book.
- 15 per cent 4. Composition, sentence structure, capitalization, punctuation, spelling, etc.
- 10 per cent 5. Artistic arrangement.
- 10 per cent 6. Character of illustrations.

$750,000 every month to outside agencies that give nothing back to the province?

As an instance, the original cost of a $4 bottle is $1. The freight is 8 cents, the Dominion tax is $1.67 and the Province gets $1.25.

Thus, for every $1.25 that comes to the province, $2.75 goes out of the province.

Figures before the legislature show that the pioneer town of Prince George, a town which, like every new settlement, is undergoing hardships, spent on liquor in less than a year, the enormous sum of $500,000.

Moderationists voted for "moderation," but J. H. Falconer and his associates are going out into every little struggling community and in spite of protests forcing in an unwanted liquor store.

Just as soon as an individual or a Government goes into an outlaw traffic, not to control it but to make money, that traffic is doomed, and those who favor moderation should interest themselves in the commissioner's present policy.

How long can it go on? How long can pioneering go on, development go on, provincial health go on, while the board is permitted to fasten a blood-sucking incubus upon every point where man is struggling to establish himself in British Columbia?—Editorial from Vancouver Sun, December 5, 1922.

Elder Thomas Leitch writes from Cormorant, Minnesota, that he is holding some meetings there with fair success.

Activities for Young Women

Helpful suggestions for girls and leaders of girls.

To the Girls and Young Women of the Church; Greetings: The Young Women's Bureau wishes to express thanks to you for your hearty support and cooperation in the past.

At the beginning of this New Year we pause to take an inventory of the past. We try to sum up what we have accomplished, to see wherein we have failed in carrying out our aim, and to plan our campaign for improvement during the year of 1923.

Those who are leaders of Temple Builders and Orioles may well pause to ask themselves a few questions. Are you living up to your possibilities as a leader? Do your girls have "pep"? Are they interested in something worth while? Is the meeting a place of gossip or of wholesome recreation and helpful instruction?

In the heart of every girl there is a desire for some sort of group activity. A girl likes to be with those of her own age, to work with them, and to play with them. The purpose of our club work is to satisfy this natural desire in our girls. In accomplishing this purpose we are able to realize our high aim of self-development. We are able to help the girls solve the problems that come to them in an intelligent manner, thus helping them to be true women. The girls' clubs are going to be just what we make of them. It is the concern of each girl and each leader that her club be worth while. If any club is to be a success it must stimulate in the girls the enjoyment of good wholesome recreation and help them in the formation of character-building habits.

The success of any club work depends largely on the leader. The girls look to her for direction, for guidance, and for an example. Girls are not as strongly held together by the "gang" spirit as are boys, hence more initiative is required of their leaders. Boys are held by a strong group spirit. If the leader loses interest some one else is pushed to the front and the "gang" continues. However, if a group of girls lose the interest of their leader they are more likely to drift apart. The leaders of girls have this problem before them. It will take thoughtful study and preparation. If we are to realize our ideals, if we are to make the club work worth while, our local leaders must concern themselves with these problems.

Some have thought that the Oriole work was to be discontinued and some other organization adopted. This, however, is not the case as no steps have been made to change the organization. There are many girls' clubs well worth our study. Some of these clubs have behind them the best authorities on girls' activities and we can well afford to accept their help. For example, the Girl Reserve movement of the Y. W. C. A. is an excellent organization and puts out a very complete manual which will be helpful to any leader. The Girl Scouts offer another book called Scouting for Girls. The Camp Fire Girls offer many helpful suggestions. Let us be open-minded enough to study these things and if they have anything good to offer we should be glad to accept.

In regard to activities, there are a number of things which you as a club may do. It is well for the programs to be planned several months or a year ahead. By this we do not mean that it should not be changeable. It should be flexible. The activities for the year could be planned out in a general way. For instance, if the girls wish to spend part of their time in study, the whole course of lessons should be planned before the study is begun. There are many subjects which may be chosen, such as: A Study of Child Nature, by Elizabeth Harrison ($1.35); Food and the Body, by Mabel Knipschild Smith, ($0.35); Textiles—How to Know, Buy, and Use Them ($0.10); Mothercraft ($0.15), using Mary Read's Manual ($2.10) and the question outline prepared especially for young women; Household Science and Arts, by Josephine Morris ($0.90); "Story-telling," using Cather's Educating by Story-Telling ($1.60, regular edition $2.40); Elementary Biology ($0.15); Plant and Animal Children, How They Grow, by Ellen Torelle ($1.15); Psychology, Outline by Dora Glines ($0.12); on text The Mind and Its Education, by George H. Betts ($2); and Etiquette, by Lillian Eichler.

Plan to read church papers, current events, etc. A group of Temple Builders could have a few minutes each meeting for such work. They might select a girl each meeting to give a brief review of the happenings of the month. This information would have to be gathered from the current magazines, as Literary Digest, Outlook, and others. There is one small paper, Current Events, which is very inexpensive and which gives a good brief of the main happenings of the week. Any club could subscribe for this paper. It costs only sixty cents per year. Order of Herald Publishing House.

For any suggestion along the line of dramatics refer to the letter put out by the Department of Recreation and Expression. The drama is something which appeals to every girl.

Not all the time needs to be given to study. There are many things which the girls as a group may do. If your church yard has no flowers, here is a chance for you. Is your church building always as spotless as those spoken of in our Latter Day Saint stories? If not, another chance for you to serve is offered. As long as there is such a chance for service in our community and we do not take advantage of it we are not living up to our ideals, or our responsibilities. Probably there are many things you can do to help those around you. Just cleaning up the church and planting and caring for flowers may seem a little thing but it is very important. It is one of the little things which counts much as it gives an insight into how much one loves cleanliness and beauty. Once a noted speaker said, "It is the little things of life which make up its happiness and its tragedies too." Orioles, go down next Saturday and clean up the church and see if you do not enjoy Sunday school better next Sunday. Very soon now is the time to plant seeds and shrubs. Write the Department of Agriculture, Washington, District of Columbia, for seeds. Also write your State Agricultural Department.

The girls may devote part of their time each meeting to making things for our different church institutions. These winter months are well suited to indoor work. If you do not have the lists of the needs of the Sanitarium, Children's Home, and Homes for the Aged, write the Department of Women, Independence, Missouri, or the institutions direct. Get interested in the contests for Orioles and Temple Builders. These contests are to begin February 10 and close May 10, 1923. Be prepared to send in for every contest. Win the blue ribbon.

The Boy Scouts have a motto, "Do a kind deed every day." Girls, are we going to let the boys get ahead of us?

Let your pastor, the department superintendents, and the deacon know that you are ready to help in all noble and worth-while undertakings.

Several chapters of Temple Builders have written that they are taking up physical training. In the larger places the high school gymnasium may be obtained in the evenings for this work. If you cannot use that, meet at the home of one of the members or in the church.

Many have asked about money-making schemes. All of us are familiar with candy sales, needlework sales, etc. These are good at times but it is not best to give too many of them. One of the best ways of making money is by personal sacrifice on the part of the girls. If money is needed try to give up something you buy which is not absolutely necessary. No doubt most girls can find a way for saving something during certain weeks out of the year. Recently a group of girls tried this plan which worked exceedingly well; one gave up candy and ice cream for a week, another gave up a basket ball game which she wanted to attend, still another decided to wear her old tie a month longer. The majority of us can find some little way of saving a nickel now and then.

Supplies

Oriole and Temple Builder Manuals, all books given above and beads, bands, pins, etc., are for sale by the Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

There is now ready the new 1922 Oriole Manual. We suggest that all circles secure this Manual, as it is more complete than the previous copies.

Address all communications regarding the girls and young women's work to Miss Addie Belle Chappell, Lamoni, Iowa. All letters for supplies to the Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

The 1922 Christmas Offering on February 3, $52,962.59

At a corresponding period last year the Christmas offering amounted to $36,493.06. This indicates a strengthening of the missionary spirit in the church. On the front page of last Sunday's Stepping Stones is an article in which it tells of a brother who had been afflicted for three years so that he could not work for a large portion of that time. He had the missionary spirit and desired greatly to assist. At Christmas time he gave a dollar, half of a Christmas gift to himself, as an offering. The spirit of giving is truly wonderful.

The 1922 Christmas offering books close on February 28. If your offering is not in, attend to it promptly. The highest average per member offering reported to date is $7.37. If there is any school that can beat this, send your picture in promptly so that the readers of Blue Stepping Stones can see you.

Fifty Years in the Church

The editors have received a letter from Brother A. W. Kelley, of Indian River, Maine. He has been a member of the church for fifty years. His letter manifests a strong interest in the spread of the gospel and the perfecting of the Saints, and urges that the Saints make the necessary sacrifices that the church may accomplish this work. Limited space prevents publication of the letter in full.

New Edition

A Marvelous Work and a Wonder

By Daniel Macgregor

We have just issued from our press the fourth large edition of this most popular book by one of our leading missionaries. This edition has been greatly revised, has a large number of illustrations added to it, and is in more convenient size than previous editions.

It is in the usual book size with large, clear type, convenient footnotes, complete contents references, and in every way a most desirable book for those who would investigate the claims of the church we represent.

Some of our thoughtful people have believed that it largely takes the place of The Voice of Warning since the latter work was issued in the early days of the church and emphasized the problems of those days while this book includes those and much more.

In some quarters where this book is least known it has a reputation for being a book on the "hoofs and horns of the Bible." While several chapters are devoted to a discussion of the prophecies of Daniel and Revelation and these are carefully and clearly analyzed and presented therein, the larger portion of the book is devoted to a straight-forward presentation of the most essential factors in the restoration of the gospel.

The kingdom of God as set up by Christ being a real organization with a graphic presentation of the principles, officers, and functions of the church with accompanying requirements such as revelations are all presented in excellent form.

The Reformation with its effect on the Restoration and considerable discussion of the signs of the times have a prominent place.

One of the most important chapters is entitled, "The restoration accomplished." This is subdivided under twenty-two headings and especially discusses the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, prophecies concerning it, with literary and moral features of the book, its use and purposes, with evidences of archæology.

It is essentially a book for investigators, especially those of the studious type of mind. It is further an invaluable help to those who do not have the privilege of hearing these subjects intelligently discussed by persons fully acquainted with the scope of the church historically and doctrinally.

The price is very low considering the amount of convenient material offered. The book has had an especially large sale which will no doubt continue as it becomes more widely known. It answers so many questions that are raised concerning the church, its origin, etc., that every Saint should have one copy on hand, especially for loaning.

In two styles of binding: Paper, stapled, 35 cents each or four for $1.25, postpaid. Cloth binding, 60 cents each.

Improved Financial Outlook

A letter from the Presiding Bishop which furnishes a basis for much hope for the future.

In anticipating the amount of revenue which the church will receive from tithes and offerings, we can in a measure be governed by the experience of other years. Under normal conditions, this would be a fairly safe indicator. It is made uncertain during periods of business depression and for this reason we have advocated and will continue to advocate that we should establish a reserve fund to tide us over periods of business depressions and this fund should be kept invested in securities which could readily be converted into cash.

We are happy to inform the membership of the church that present conditions indicate that we are emerging from the financial stringency and are now on the upward incline; and, barring any further economic disturbances or unforeseen events, we should continue to make progress. For the first four months of the present fiscal year, namely, from July 1 to October 31, our expenses were in excess of our receipts from tithes, offerings, and consecrations $63,008.71. By the end of December this was reduced to $55,043.69 and will be still further reduced this month. If the following table is a true index as to the amount which we shall receive from January 1 to June 30, 1923, we should be able to close the year without a deficit.

Total for year	$597,163.68	$527,650.70	$426,183.45	$516,999.27
July 1 to December 31 ..	275,892.23	231,774.72	154,562.15	220,743.03
Percentage of total	46.2	43.9	36.3	43.7
January 1 to June 30 ..	$321,271.45	$295,875.98	$271,621.30	$296,256.24
Percentage of total	53.8	56.1	63.7	56.3
Increase of period from January 1 to June 30 over period from July 1 to December 31 ..	$ 45,379.22	$ 64,101.26	$117,059.15	$ 75,513.21
Percentage of increase ..	7.6	12.2	27.4	12.6

It will be seen by the above table that we always receive more in tithes, offerings, and consecrations from January 1 to June 30 and that the percentage of increase has been steadily growing. For example, this increase for the last six months of the year ending June 30, 1920, was 7.6 per cent of the total receipts for the year, the following year 12.2 per cent, and the year ending June 30, 1922, 27.4 per cent. This last item, of course, was a little unusual.

The following table will show the amount which has actually been received from tithes, offerings, and consecrations from July 1 to December 31, 1922, and the amount we anticipate from January 1 to June 30, 1923, based upon receiving during this period, about 65 per cent of the total receipts for the year ending June 30, 1923.

Income

Income from tithing, offering, and consecration—July 1 to December 31, 1922	$119,494.15
Income estimated from tithing, offering, and consecration—January 1 to June 30, 1923	222,000.00
Total tithing, offering, and consecration for year	$341,494.15
Christmas offering—July 1 to December 31, 1922	$ 20,617.91
Christmas offering estimated January 1 to June 30, 1923	30,000.00
Total Christmas offering for year	$ 50,617.91
Contributions from church institutions—July 1 to December 31, 1922	$ 4,862.70
Contributions estimated January 1 to June 30, 1923	4,000.00
Total church institution contributions for year	$ 8,862.70
Estimated total income for year	$400,974.76

Expenditure—general July 1 to December 31, 1922	$183,562.14
Expenditure estimated January 1 to June 30, 1923	183,000.00
Total expenditures, general	$366,562.14
Expenditures—church institutions July 1 to December 31, 1922 ..	$ 16,371.29
Expenditures estimated January 1 to June 30, 1923	16,500.00
Total expenditures church institutions	$ 32,871.29
Estimated total expenditures for year	$399,433.43

If the same percentage of increase can be expected from January 1, 1923, to June 30, 1923, the deficit which now exists will practically be wiped out by the end of the fiscal year June 30.

Now that we have the ball rolling, the thing to do is to keep it rolling. This hopeful financial outlook must not be taken as a signal to relinquish our efforts or we shall defeat our purpose; but, being stimulated by the encouraging outlook, we should push forward with renewed vigor. From many parts of the country come encouraging reports as to business conditions; and, while improvement may be slow, it will be steady. The Saints will share in this prosperity and we feel confident that in enjoying these blessings they will render unto God the things that belong to God.

Giving Will Redeem Zion

Well, here I am again after several years of silence. Years ago when I wrote to these pages I believe I was very selfish. I did so love to hear from my brothers and sisters and so many of you wrote me such lovely letters! How I did enjoy reading those deeply spiritual missives. But, dear Saints, what I received was so much greater than what I gave. Yet I so loved to write that I feared I had formed a troublesome habit. Then I stopped writing, for I do not really wish to be selfish and take up space which might be more profitably given to another. Now I seldom ever write even to my kinfolks. Sounds like a confession, doesn't it? Well, it is one. We are told that open confession is good for the soul. I stopped giving and I stopped receiving. I lost a very great blessing.

Now that I have "fessed up" will you please forgive me for my neglect to exercise this one gift? If so, dear old-time correspondents, when you read this please drop me a line and I will again "tune in," not only to receive, but to give the best there is of me to the cause of Christ and his great church, which I love with all my heart.

While speaking of forgiving, the least that any one of us can give is ourselves and our talents, whatsoever they may be, to the cause of God and our fellow beings. And this is not alone giving; it is receiving. All I have to give is myself, and some few talents which belong to God, the great Giver. I may withhold these gifts and thus lose the outpourings of God's Spirit. To give is to receive. May God grant me the spirit of giving, if it is only to give an encouraging word or a lift to one who seems down and out. At least, let me give this much.

Saints, do you know that just as soon as we get the habit of giving formed we will enjoy the game so much that we will forget the desire to receive and be swallowed up in the great whirlpool of God's love, and the next thing we know Zion will be redeemed?

Lest I weary you I will close by giving you my love and best wishes.

Ever yours in Christ Jesus,

SADIE BURCH.

Missionary to Germany Reaches Switzerland

(Excerpt from letter of Jacob G. Halb from Basel, Switzerland, January 17, 1923, to the First Presidency.)

It was a glad surprise to us when Brother E. C. Ohlert knocked at our door on the morning of January 4. Two days later he and I went to Luzerne for Saturday night and Sunday. We had preaching both evenings, Brother Ohlert occupying about half of the time each night, and I interpreting for him. I do not have the difficulty in interpreting for him that I had when trying to interpret for President Smith and Elder Williams when they were here two years ago. We also had Sunday school and sacrament service Sunday morning. We are to go again to Luzerne next Sunday. I shall go on to Zurich to hold two meetings there during the week. During my absence from Basel Sister Halb has been conducting a Bible class each Sunday night with success. The members report an interesting and profitable time.

The past week I have spent quite a lot of time running around with Brother Ohlert to get him located. He stayed at the Blue Cross Hotel a week. We then found a nice, quiet room where he can study. I have put in an application for him to get a permit to live in Basel. Am also giving him instruction in German each day. Before I leave I shall either hunt a private teacher for him or try to get him in a school where he can learn the language. It is going to be hard for him until he can speak the German well enough to preach in that language.

Last Sunday we spent here in Basel. Had thirty-two present in Sunday school. After Sunday school we held our sacrament meeting. At the evening service we both occupied.

We were glad to find that Brother Ohlert played the saxophone. Sister Halb has talked and worked to get the people interested in music ever since she has been here as it is one of the best means to interest people in the gospel. Her ability to play has helped both on the street and in the hall. She has been trying to get a little orchestra started which she hopes will grow and be a help to the work.

Letters from Switzerland

Translations by Elder Jacob G. Halb, missionary in Switzerland, of two letters to all the Saints.

BASEL, SWITZERLAND, December 23, 1922.

Dear Beloved in the Lord: I greet you in the name of the Lord. Oh, how I rejoice that we have a Lord who helps us and a Lord who saves from death. Dear brothers and sisters in Christ, although we are not acquainted, yet in the Lord we are as if we knew each other. So I write you a few lines from Switzerland and with gladness of heart I say: rejoice, and continue in prayer, also for us, that we may be found true unto the coming of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ and that we may enter the eternal Sabbath-rest. Oh, how blessed that will be.

I heartily greet you as a sister in Christ,

MARIA JENNY.

BASEL, SWITZERLAND, December 22, 1922.

My Dear Brothers and Sisters in the Lord: As a member of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ, I write a few lines to you as a sister in the Lord, to let you know that we continually think of you in love. As members of one body in Christ Jesus, we have the blessed hope of seeing each other before the heavenly throne. All members of this true church, who will be found true, will be permitted to enter over there where there will be nothing but peace. Hallelujah.

I ask you dear brothers and sisters to remember us in your prayers, and that many people in Switzerland may come to the knowledge that this is the true church.

I send greetings to all who love us in the Lord.

Your sister in the Lord,

IDA ROTH.

The Missionary Spirit

We quote in part from a letter received from a sister at Lamar, Colorado:

"I like the suggestion in the HERALD that we all save $1 per week.

"Most everyone wastes that much or more. We waste lots of money, I know, but will try to do my part. I will tell you what I have had in mind for a long time. It has always been my desire to keep one missionary in the field and that desire grew to such an extent that I went to work to make it come true."

Sincerely yours,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

Using School Method in Honolulu

Our Chinese missionary writes the Presidency that they are building solidly through the Sunday schools among Chinese and Japanese.

Thinking you may be interested in what we are doing in Honolulu, I hereby write of some of our activities. As soon as possible after our arrival here, we organized two Chinese Sunday schools, one Japanese Sunday school being organized just prior to our coming. They are in different parts of the city. It keeps me rushing every Sunday going from one place to another. Through the week we (Brother Waller and I) conduct two different prayer meetings, one Chinese and one Japanese. On Wednesday evening after prayer meeting I have a teacher training class which is made up of our Sunday school officers and teachers. Am very enthusiastic about the latter because the success of our work is through the Sunday school and the success of the Sunday school is through trained teachers.

We do much house-to-house visiting which often leads to a discussion of our church doctrines. Most people here think we are the same as the Utah Mormons. I have often been asked why our church does not change its name so as not to be confused with the one in Utah.

We are progressing nicely so far as I can see—not mushroom growth, but I will be satisfied if it grows slowly, if with the right kind of people. PRESCOTT A. FOO, HONOLULU, TERRITORY OF HAWAII, January 2, 1923.

News from Australia

Elder McConley writes the First Presidency the following interesting letter.

Accompanied by Elder A. V. Robinson and wife and three children, I left Auckland, New Zealand, on the S. S. Niagara on the 16th of December, en route for Sydney. The weather has been very calm, none having suffered except with a slight attack of seasickness, and we feel that we have indeed been favored.

During my stay in New Zealand we have been strenuously assisting in the erection of the mission house and before leaving were able to see it nearing completion, to the extent that Brother J. H. N. Jones hoped to move into one half of it before Christmas. The balance will be finished as soon as possible after New Year's.

I recently had the pleasure of seeing Brother Jones baptize Mr. and Mrs. Watt. They are a fine couple, in the early thirties, and will be a good addition to the little band there. Brother Watt was chosen for Sunday school superintendent for the coming year.

Upon recommendation of Bishop G. Lewis, concurred in by Elder Hall, president of the Dunedin Branch, and by action of the branch, and confirmed by the experience of Elder A. V. Robinson on his visit to Christchurch last year, the ordination of J. C. Bradley to the office of elder was ordered. Elder Bradley and his family are reported to be genuine Saints and are conducting a little Sunday school there and seeking to effect a permanent organization of the church. I think we can send an elder from Australia to do missionary work on the south island the coming year and hope we may not only rebuild the tottering branch at Dunedin, but also establish our work in Temuka and Christchurch.

On my arrival in New Zealand, I found it in the heat of a campaign to secure national prohibition, and with others of the elders I rendered all the assistance I could. Considering the size of our organization, we were given prominence on the lists of speakers; and on the last Sunday, at a big demonstration in the open air on the water front, I was one of the three speakers to represent the churches of Auckland. I was the last speaker and spoke for almost an hour to a crowd that was estimated by the campaign leaders to have numbered close to two thousand people. The campaign was well organized and we thought success was in sight but the liquor crowd polled a majority of about seventeen thousand votes on election day. Anyway, we did our part and our church position on the question was well advertised by it.

On Sunday, November 25, the school of agnostics made a public presentation to Elder A. V. Robinson on behalf of his services in speaking on the water front during his missionary work there. Three members made speeches, testifying to the regard they had for the representatives of our church and acknowledging that they considered us honest even though they did not agree with our views. They presented the brother with a fine steamer rug which they had made to order and gave Sister Robinson a silver mounted umbrella and ten shillings in money for the children. This was done in the presence of about three hundred people and was favorable propaganda. This street work should be continued, followed up by intense house-to-house canvassing.

Elder Loving and I succeeded in getting the two Maori tracts prepared for the printer and I will have them printed on the Standard Press. We have brought the illustrated tract on the First Presidency up to date.

Sydney, December 29. Arrived safely on the 20th and at once entered on preparation for the mission conference. Had very hot weather, in fact last Sunday was the hottest for twenty years. Attendance not so good as last year, but Western Australia, New South Wales, Queensland, and New Zealand were all represented by delegates in person.

A good spirit prevails generally though some are very discouraged on account of lack of unity at the last General Conference. It is certainly a regrettable occurrence. However, I believe the men are going to their fields to do their best as circumstances permit.

Southern Wisconsin District

The work in this district is moving slowly on, and sometimes I wonder how the Saints do as well as they do, with the general conditions surrounding them as they are. It would seem that there is little more that the world and the Devil can bring forth, that has not already appeared, to try to draw the Saints from the "narrow way." I am glad that so many have withstood so firmly the powers of evil and stood for what they know to be right. And those who have thus stood firm are growing stronger and stronger in the faith.

I am now holding meetings in the smallest branch in the district, at Readstown, Wisconsin. They have only two officers, Priest O. R. Sheffield and Deacon A. D. Hutchinson. They have a church to meet in 22 by 36 feet and free from debt, which is to their credit; and while they have a lot of repairs to make, yet they are looking forward with pleasure to the time when all such will have been done and paid for by the sacrifice of the loyal Saints here. All being working people, it truly is sacrifice many times that keeps the work moving.

We are glad to report the organization of a new branch at Evansville, Wisconsin, January 14, with Elder E. J. Lenox president of the branch. The Saints of the Madison Branch, with Henry W. Woodstock as president, are rejoicing in the fact that the debt which has been hanging over their church since it was builded some thirteen years ago, is now paid. Dedication will be arranged for in the near future. The Saints in Beloit have a nice church at a very reasonable price, but they have quite a debt to meet; but with godly living and the spirit of sacrifice being manifested they will one day see it paid, as others have done. The Janesville Branch being divided to make the Evansville Branch, is continued with about a score of Saints and with E. W. Dutton president, with three of the Aaronic order to assist.

The Milwaukee Branch is small, but still holding meetings at the corner of Sixth Avenue and Mineral Street. It is presided over by F. V. Dreyer, who is assisted by two of the lesser priesthood. Soldiers Grove Branch is one of the largest in the district. They have a new church builded, with some debt, but with the membership as strong as it will soon be met, if the spirit of sacrifice is continued. The Oak Ridge Branch eight miles east of Lancaster is not as large as it was once, as many of the Saints have moved away; but with G. E. Noble president, and three of the lesser priesthood assisting, the branch is still maintained, having a good church free from debt. Flora Fountain, eight miles west of Lancaster is needing help, as many of its members too have moved away. J. C. Edgington is still president and he has some assistance in the lesser priesthood. Here, too, is a good church free from debt. We have some good families of Saints living in reach. Some of the lesser priesthood live in other neighborhoods and assist when able to be there.

The district conference met with the Madison Branch on December 9 and 10 and was a very lively conference. The June conference is to meet with the Soldiers Grove Saints. The district voted to adopt the fourth form governing departmental work. Most of the branches have adopted form four, but some have continued as before and some under form two. Miss J. N. Dutton, superintendent Sunday school; N. E. Hield, superintendent Recreation and Expression; Mrs. N. E. Hield, Sr., superintendent Department of Women; Mrs. H. W. Woodstock, district director of music. As your district president, may I urge upon every man holding the priesthood to do your best to learn your duty and magnify your office and calling. God requires it of you. Elder B. C. Flint is the only missionary in the district, so if opportunity presents itself, do all you can to assist him in every way. Every man holding the priesthood should be a missionary to the best of his ability to so do. Let all remember the financial needs of the church, and willingly do your best. The bishopric desires your help. Will you respond to the call?

Your servant in Christ, J. O. DUTTON.

READSTOWN, WISCONSIN.

Southwestern Kansas District Organized

Apostles Budd and Edwards report the organization of a new district.

We arrived in Wichita, Kansas, Saturday evening and were in attendance at the Religio program. Preaching Sunday morning was by Elder Edwards and Monday afternoon by Elder Budd. We also gave two lectures to the priesthood. In addition to these activities we met with the Saints in Sunday school and other departmental capacities and also in a social way.

After due advertisement, the organization meeting was held Monday, January 1, at 10 a. m. There was almost complete unanimity of action and the spirit manifested augurs well for the continuance of the work in the district. We presented the name of Elder T. S. Williams, General Conference appointee to Wichita, for selection as district president. This nomination was approved and Brother Williams nominated Brother R. J. Wildey Sunday school superintendent, and Brother Ellis L. Bedwell superintendent of the Department of Recreation and Expression. Provision was made for the selection of the heads of the other departments as necessity arises. In making these nominations, Brother Williams conferred with Superintendent A. Max Carmichael of the Sunday School Department. Sister Anita Wilson of Wichita was elected secretary. There was some discussion regarding the name of the district, but we thought it best that it should be named according to the territorial division and finally obtained consent of the Saints to this. It will, therefore, be known as the Southwestern Kansas District.

During our stay in Wichita we were very much impressed with the progressive spirit of the town. This seems to have reacted upon the Saints to such an extent that they are eager to move forward. Discussing the situation with Brother Williams, he suggested that within a very short time he should like to have the branch in such a condition that it will be to the advantage of the branch, as well as the general church, to open missions in various parts of the city with the object of extending the work so that no place will be very far from one of the church buildings belonging to the Saints.

Each of the three branches, Wichita, Hutchinson, and Winfield, were represented at the conference. Although we did not have the opportunity to visit Hutchinson and Winfield, we felt the spirit of the Saints from these two places was also progressive. We understand that at Winfield our people are building a church of their own.

We would also like to mention that Elder A. Max Carmichael gave some really wonderful instruction to the departmental workers and that his work seemed to be very much appreciated by the Saints we met.

On our advice the "district cabinet" was put in charge of arrangements for a reunion to be held in this district during the summer.

Whose Is This?

In a recent circular the Presiding Bishop presents a striking reproduction of the sort of penny that was brought unto Christ with the question: "Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar, or not?" They admitted it bore the image of Cæsar, and he charged them to "render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's; and unto God the things which are God's."

It is an effective circular and calls special attention to the annual tithing report which has been prepared to assist in figuring out our increase, upon which we owe tithing—rendering unto God the things which are God's.

New Budget Book

Improved New Book Published

The response from our previous announcement regarding budget books was so general that we sold out our entire stock. We have just issued a new edition considerably improved over the old, which will be sold at the same price.

The budget book is for daily account of all items of income and expenditure for an average family. The rulings in the new book are made on the basis of showing in a general way items which are deductible from tithing account and those which are not. Those who appreciated the former book will be elated over the present edition. This edition includes a sample of the tithing report, constant reference to which will facilitate filling out similar blanks to be submitted annually to the Bishopric.

Purchase one of these books and keep a full account for the year. Order one before you forget it. Price, 25 cents.

President Smith Addresses Kansas City Clubs

By invitation President Frederick M. Smith addressed the Kansas City Quill Club at its January dinner at the Baltimore Hotel on the evening of January 15. This is a large and exclusive literary club in Kansas City, and President Smith gave a travelog using enlarged photographs of the scenes taken when he was abroad.

On the 25th he gave a lecture before the Kansas City Art Institute on the subject of "Michaelangelo from a layman's viewpoint." He also illustrated this with photographs which he brought back from Italy.

Independence

California changed to Minnesota this week and we have been having some crisp weather. Health officials say that the change will be good for the community. There has been considerable sickness going the rounds: mostly colds and light attacks of influenza. They say that the colder weather will clear up conditions and eliminate many of the flying germs.

Sunday morning was sacrament service at all of the Independence churches with the consequent large attendance that that service calls forth. The other appointments were as follows:

Stone Church, preaching by Elder E. D. Moore; Second Independence, preaching, Bishop James F. Keir; Walnut Park, preaching by Elder J. M. Baker; Liberty Street Church, preaching by the pastor, Elder M. A. Etzenhouser; Enoch Hill, preaching by Elder Joseph Luff.

There was a very fine radio program broadcasted Sunday evening at six o'clock. The musical program under the direction of Brother George E. Anway was of a very high order and President Frederick M. Smith gave an address on the subject, "The social ideals of the church." The lecture of President Smith was reported and will be published in next week's HERALD. President Elbert A. Smith offered prayer. President Frederick M. Smith will speak again next Sunday evening at the radio service in continuation of the same theme.

Word has been received from Doctor G. Leonard Harrington, saying that he left Honolulu on January 31 and will consequently be back in the States in a very short time.

Elder R. D. Weaver underwent a very serious operation at the Sanitarium last Thursday, and is making a very fine recovery. Brother Weaver underwent a preliminary operation some months ago, and his many friends will be happy to know that he is now nicely on the road to restored health.

Brother and Sister J. C. Schwab are the proud parents of a baby girl born at the Sanitarium on February 1.

There was a large and appreciative audience at the Stone Church Sunday afternoon to hear Doctor Edward Howard Griggs deliver his lecture on the subject of "Government in the home and in the school." Doctor Griggs is widely known as a lecturer and writer, and he had a great message for the people at Independence. Many townspeople were present as well as the Saints from all the Independence branches. The lecture was reported by Brother Howard W. Harder and if permission from Doctor Griggs is obtained, it will be published in an early number of the HERALD.

Elder E. A. Thomas was chosen as counselor in the presidency of the First Quorum of Elders of Independence at the recent priesthood meeting by Elder A. K. Dillee, president. Elder A. L. Sanford continues as the other counselor.

President Elbert A. Smith delivered an interesting lecture at the Stone Church Religio Friday evening, recounting some of his early literary experiences. Some of his earlier poems were read by various persons. The songs by the audience were those written by David H. Smith, father of "Brother Elbert," and so popular among Hymnal songs. Frank A. Russell sang, "The little brown bag," a missionary song by President Elbert A. Smith. Because of conflicting demands for the time, the Religio will continue to meet on Friday evenings as usual until further notice.

Kirtland Glimpses

Here, then, is the Kirtland of history; how has it survived? It is by no means a deserted and dilapidated village of the past, for as we look out this morning upon the broad expanse of view from any direction we see every type of dwelling from the little old-fashioned cozy cottage of long ago and its more modern up-to-date houses clustering around the Temple square, to the mansions of the rich on the crests of neighboring hills. No business blocks of course, but a good-sized township hall of brick and a centralized grade and high school set back on a roomy campus. We note a number of new houses, but call to mind that once in place of the present hundred or so homes there were over a thousand to house a population of thirty-five hundred souls; where did they go?

Some say they were scourged by trials of one kind and another and the community disintegrated like many another in the transition from an agricultural to an industrial age. We know that the advent of the railroad pushing through from Buffalo and the Eastern cities passed a little north of Kirtland and we hear that many cottages were moved over that way or dismantled and rebuilt nearer to the new artery of life. Certain it is that Kirtland, instead of becoming the model city as planned and recorded, a mile square with the Temple as a center fell away to a mere handful of residents. Note that this was not at all confined to the people of the church, many of whom were now experiencing the tests of faith in the new land of Zion; the promised "scourge" seems to have dispersed the nonchurch members quite as thoroughly, though we fail to find record of any pestilence or disease as the factor. Our beloved work is not devoid of pessimistic prophets who insist that this particular pleasure as a matter of course is being reserved for us yet.

But in the sunny ozone of Kirtland this old-time bogie seems to align itself with that class of preachment that can only promise trial, persecution, and sorrow for the new-comer into the gospel. We heard of "giants in the land" before this visit to Kirtland; we found peace and tranquility and a branch of Latter Day Saints running pretty true to form; devout, honest people, loyal to services and desirous of attaining that knowledge that would make them qualify as worthy followers of the Great Teacher himself; not entirely free as yet from those minor frailties that stamp us human. When the old Temple bell calls they do turn out and give such attention as makes the speaker feel he is getting an audience.

Whatever else has changed around Kirtland, you feel that the Temple has not, and our next "Glimpse" will be a very intimate one of the historic place itself.

Foreign Mission Sunday

To Local Sunday School Superintendents: We are asking Sunday schools throughout the world to unite upon a common teaching lesson on the second Sunday of April, designed to promote our foreign missionary effort. We are asking all departments of every local Sunday school to unite in studying a common lesson which the Department of Sunday School and Presiding Bishopric are getting out together. The material for this lesson will be sent to all Sunday schools through the branch president in time for its distribution among the teachers of the school. If perchance you are in a Sunday school that is not organized in connection with a branch, see to it that your local superintendent sends in his name immediately to the Presiding Bishopric in order that he may receive the material.

We are hoping to provide sufficient material and in such a manner that all the departments of the Sunday school may study it. It may be somewhat difficult to have the tiniest tots appreciate what we are talking about, but at least they can be interested somewhat in the pictures of the men who are doing our foreign missionary work.

But, don't wait to start your Christmas offering campaign until the second Sunday in April; start now. This lesson will merely give your scholars the background of our foreign missionary effort.

We are, therefore, as general superintendent of the Department of Sunday School, setting aside the 8th day of April as a special Sunday to be observed by all our Sunday schools throughout the world in studying the foreign missionary activities of our church.

A. MAX CARMICHAEL,
General Superintendent Department of Sunday School.

Blue Pencil Notes

"Between the Devil and the deep blue sea."

Two men sat across the aisle from me in the dining car. Quite evidently they were railroad men of the higher circle of railroad officialdom. They were discussing the strike of shopmen, then dragging its way toward inevitable collapse.

One of them remarked, "I get your viewpoint, all right. But if I were a laboring man, engineer, fireman, or shopman, and a strike were ordered, I will confess I would not know what to do. I would be between the Devil and the deep blue sea."

The expression was not overdrawn. When a strike is ordered the individual very often has no choice excepting between two very distressing experiences. He may continue at work. If so he becomes a "scab," and an outcast from his own class, the only people with whom he has any opportunity to form friendships and the natural associations craved by all men. His family will be ostracized, perhaps injured. His home may be dynamited. Any night or morning en route to or from work he may be waited upon by a gas pipe committee and his bones broken or his brains knocked out. The outlook is not happy. From his contemplation of the Devil he turns to the deep blue sea.

If he quits work, his job is gone, temporarily, possibly permanently. He has not enough laid by to feed and clothe the family many days. Soon he will find himself without resources or standing in the community. His home will disintegrate. His family will suffer. He will be obliged to leave or lose the little property that he has tried to accumulate. Seniority right will be lost, the old-age pension forfeited. If of middle age or older he knows that he must start life over without any hope of securing a position to compare with the one relinquished. With these troubles and sufferings come intense bitterness of spirit as months drag by. Radical advisors inflame his passions. It is almost inevitable that before it is over he will resort to violence. Only by considering human nature and its reactions to misfortune can we comprehend the reprisals attempted by men under such circumstances. He stands a good chance then to be shot down by a hired gunman acting as property guard. Or perhaps he reaches the penitentiary. The deep blue sea seems to offer no hope.

Here is a picture of a former settlement of railroad shopmen at Harrison, Arkansas. It is taken from current press reports:

The homes on Eagle Heights, where the strikers clustered in days when they were working for the railroad, show few lights to-night, and during the day smoke comes from few of the chimneys. It is a deserted Eagle Heights. Families have abandoned homes they owned, with all the furniture; they have taken their children out of school and sought shelter with relatives in cities outside of Arkansas—fearful of the vengeance of the citizens' committee. Many of them probably never will come back to Harrison. It is that way in almost every town along the line."

In this terrific class struggle guns are used by the side that has them. Union men had them at Herrin. Nonunion men had them at Harrison. Farmers and business men irritated by the prolonged strike with accompanying destruction of railroad property and traffic came together from many miles around, a well-organized mob with guns. A committee of twelve sat as a court to pass on cases driven in by the committee of one thousand. Some were flogged with horsewhips or driving reins and many were ordered to leave the community. And during the work of "cleaning up," one morning one of the strikers was found hanging by the neck from a railroad bridge. The committee said he committed suicide. He did. Judging from reports he found himself standing on a railroad trestle with a rope around his neck. Various clubs and sharp instruments induced him to jump off the bridge. When the strike began he was foreman of a department. He had a little home and family, and a son at West Point. When it ended he was hanging by the neck from a railroad bridge. That was what the deep blue sea had for him.

These were his neighbors who induced him to jump off the bridge. These men with guns who cleaned out Eagle Heights were neighbors. They, too, were driven by circumstances—at least to an extent. As business men and farmers they saw themselves facing ruin and their families want because of suspended traffic on the one line serving their community. Whatever moral may be drawn by moralists or whatever argument may be formulated by politicians and agitators in favor of this or that economic or governmental change, when neighbors thus slaughter each other in first this community and the next in that, we are forcibly reminded that latter-day prophecy is being fulfilled.

And it shall come to pass, among the wicked, that every man that will not take up his sword against his neighbor, must needs flee unto Zion for safety. And there shall be gathered unto it out of every nation under heaven; and it shall be the only people that shall not be at war one with another.—Doctrine and Covenants 45:13.

The struggle has intensified immeasurably in the last decade. No one knows what wild scenes of disorder the future will reveal, or the community that will next be disrupted. The promise contained in the prophecy that foretold the condition is the only ray of hope for those between the Devil and the deep blue sea. Will we as a people really help to bring it to pass? Or will we, torn by internecine strife, quite like the world, fritter the time away in disagreements among ourselves until it is too late?

ELBERT A. SMITH.

A baby struggles learning to walk. It totters, falls, gets up again, goes on, falls again. It weeps, is comforted, led by the hand. Finally it walks, then runs, and then it is a free being, for it can move as it will. Every one of us makes the struggle necessary to walk. Few, unfortunately, make the effort that results in useful, sustained thought.—The Saint Louis Star.

Unanswered Prayers

A reason why our prayers are not always answered as we wish.

Probably as long as there are men living in our present mortal and limited condition the question will be raised from time to time, Why do we have to suffer the trials that come upon us? At times even the children of God have felt and probably again will feel rebellious. Having taken upon them the name of Jesus, having striven to keep his commandments, they wonder why such trials should come. Are they punishment, or what is the reason?

How many times have we gone out under the stars with uplifted eyes to ask that eternal question. And in reply there has come the assurance that our Father knows the reason why, that he does not permit a single trial or suffering unless there is a reason and that as soon as we grow up or develop to the point that we can understand he will then tell us the reason why and we will see and know that it is good.

Sometimes we are warned through his Spirit that the pathway we are following as a people will end in suffering if we do not soon enough come down upon our knees in humility. His work cannot be forever prevented, so the time comes at last when we are brought, even though it be through suffering, to see and understand his will.

Recently we read in Current Opinion a short story illustrating this fact. A woman, as we recall it, asked her priest why it should be that she, a young woman and still beautiful, should have to be confined to an invalid chair by paralysis when she wanted to run and laugh and taste the joys of life.

In his reply he indicated that he did not know everything, but that he had learned to cease to strive and rather to listen. He told her the story of his dog. Every day the priest goes out for a walk. When he is preparing to go the dog plants himself before him and watches his every gesture. He dodges and scampers about, then comes up with a jump before him and seems to say, "Can't I go with you?" When the priest replies, "Yes, old fellow, you shall go," the dog becomes suddenly polite and would carry the umbrella or basket. It is all he can do to keep from jumping up and kissing his master's face. The daily walk is his delight, his unalterable right.

But for dogs as well as for men, clouds come. There is rabies in the village; many people have been bitten. The police have been ordered to shoot all dogs that are not muzzled; hence when he started out to-day and the dog placed himself before him he had to tell him, You cannot go to-day. Lie down. The dog seemed to find it hard to believe so the priest had to repeat it, but at last the dog perceived that his master was not joking. His ears drooped, his tail ceased wagging, and he looked with a somber and puzzled air. He could not make out how his master had become so cruel and perverse. Why, oh why?

Yet, his master is unable to give him any comfort. He loves his dog; he pities him, but he cannot reach him for the simple reason that the dog would be totally unable to understand. He does not know about mad dogs and the rabies, the danger to him if he were bitten, the ordinances made for his protection as well as for the protection of man. There may even be a querulous anger.

Yet if he really knew the reason, how grateful he would be to one who had saved him from so horrible a calamity. He would ask a muzzle and a chain as his privilege and right.

In concluding, the good priest referred to the statement of the Master to Peter, "What I do thou knowest not now; thou shalt know hereafter." We cannot now understand the ways of the Lord, nor why he permits some things. But we may take comfort in the assurance, "Thou shalt know hereafter."

Radio Possibilities

In another column will be found a letter from F. H. Edwards on the subject of radio in the church, which will be of interest to our readers. It is to be regretted that we have not taken full advantage of the opportunities offered us. Our Independence station was the first to do broadcasting in or near Kansas City, but we have allowed others to take hours from us until now our opportunities for broadcasting are limited. Brother Edwards's letter is replete with good suggestions. What are we going to do about it?

F. M. S.

Confidence Begets Confidence

Amid the continued and repeated denunciation of existing conditions in the world and of the decline of morals it is quite refreshing to read such an article as that by Sherman Rogers in the Outlook for November 29 in which he states that 95 per cent of the men want to play fair and quotes his experience when first he entered a logging camp and loaned money over the Christmas holidays to some thirty-five or forty men in amounts from $1 to $15 and a total amount of about $150—all of his then available capital.

Many of these men did not return after the holidays to this lumber camp. All of them were broke at the close of their holidays. He had no memorandum of their names or the amount and did not know where some of them had gone, yet within a few days after the first pay day he had received back two thirds of all that he had loaned out and by the middle of March every cent had been repaid. There was no writing nor memorandum; there was no writing in the payment. A bill was often simply slipped in an envelope and returned.

It is a cheerful thought that nearly all people desire to do right and to play fair. In the church this is well illustrated by the statement of President F. M. Smith at the opening of the conference. Men may make mistakes; men may be ready to accuse others of unworthy motives, yet resent a similar accusation toward themselves.

So far as the church is concerned, as was suggested in these columns a few years ago, we are inclined to the opinion that few men have passed through life and accomplished any great work without making some mistakes. We all make mistakes. There are few if any who do not do things for which they have cause to be sorry later. But so far as integrity is concerned we would be inclined to grade our men 99.9 per cent.

It is easy to misconstrue the action of others. We must have reasonable confidence in each other to proceed and we respectfully submit that the confidence is in the end justified for the reasons stated. If of all men 95 per cent are honest or want to play fair, then surely among sectarian Christian churches the percentage is even higher, and of those who have taken upon them the name of Christ, who have today the right of divine communion would grade in intention and desire at least very close to 100 per cent.
S. A. B.

The Ideal of Progress Is Christian

The word of God clearly sets forth the ideal of progress or evolution. We are called to put off the old man and put on the likeness of Christ Jesus. We are called to grow into the stature of a man in Christ Jesus. For the future "It doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." (1 John 3: 2.) All of this implies progress, development, unfolding, or, in a sense, evolution.

In a recent Hibbert's Journal, Devan is quoted as stating that western Europe and no doubt America needs conversion to Christianity. It is inclined rather to overemphasize the rational or intellectual factor in civilization.

While the Greeks overemphasized pure reason they did not contemplate an indefinite progress. But the modern world of Christianity has elevated this doctrine to the highest place and in many instances to the first place in its everyday creed. Homer and other Greek writers, as well as most writers of ancient times, taught very plainly that the great age was in the past and that there had been a decline and an early purity. The Stoics and Virgil, as well as certain Oriental philosophers, especially those of India, emphasized an eternal round by which humanity will again reach a golden age, and decline.

The idea of progress in modern thought, however, did not begin with Darwin in biology but started much earlier in the history of modern science. Darwin emphasized conflict and the survival of the fittest while the science of to-day rather suggests progress in the sense that man realizes the illimitable stretch of his knowledge, also what he does not know and his increasing power over nature and life on the earth. This idea dates back to the seventeenth century. The thought of the day is the outgrowth of this earlier philosophic concept.

So F. G. Marvin in Hibbert's Journal says a true doctrine of evolution will not stress the struggle for existence but will rather lay stress on human growth by cooperation, the development of the collective spirit in humanity and the contact of man with the powers of nature. But while the evolution of the social world in the last six centuries in western Europe and America has added new forces and problems, it has not prevented or destroyed the medieval vision as set forth by Dante nor lessened our belief in it whether we call ourselves Christians or not.

Progress through love and submission to the general good is still true and is true for all time. The task of the prophet is still to call us back to the an-light but it has also added many distractions. The cient and the eternal verity. Modern science has eternal verity remains unchanged.

Report of Archaeological Committee

Committee feels it is unwise to indorse any Book of Mormon map at the present time.

In the latter part of November, 1918, the Presidency appointed a committee to hear what Brother L. E. Hills had to present on the subject of Book of Mormon research, and map, etc. Brother U. W. Greene was appointed chairman, and with him were associated Sister J. G. Pointer, Sister T. J. Sheldon, Walter W. Smith, C. I. Carpenter, and M. H. Siegfried. We also asked Brother Clarence Wheaton, of the Temple Lot Branch, to act and name others of that organization to serve, and he named T. J. Sheldon. Later A. H. Parsons and E. E. Corthell were added to the committee.

Many sittings were had by the committee; and in another column will be found in this issue of the HERALD its report to the Presidency, dated January 5. We commend the reading to the Saints.

Archæological work must, if its proper contribution is to be made, be scientific and scientifically carried on, and emotional motivation must be reduced to a minimum. We thank the committee for its patient and persistent work, the volume of which is only hinted at in the report. To Brother Greene as chairman our thanks are particularly due for his persistent application to the work of the committee, even in the face of discouraging conditions at times. The work of the committee being finished, it is dissolved.

Attached to the report is a recommendation touching appointment of some one to accompany expeditions to Central and South America. We sincerely wish as a church we could act on the suggestion, but are not in position to do so unless some one or more persons able to bear their own expenses will volunteer.

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

Pastors Needed

Definite suggestions on finding both the work and the workers.

A brother who is alert to the needs of the local work recently wrote us suggesting that we list all unmarried elders willing to go anywhere they could serve the church while supporting themselves. As illustration he cited two instances in the district in which he works where branches are much in need of live young elders to care for them; yet in the district he knows only one branch which had such elder to spare, but he will not go. He asks: "Do you know of one or two we could get?"

Knowing several branches where young elders (or older ones) were needed also, we passed the suggestion on to the statistical department to consider the task of making the list suggested. Brother Russell wrote in reply:

So far as this department is concerned it seems entirely impracticable. We have between 1,500 and 2,000 elders, but no way of knowing who is married and who is not. Of course we could address each branch clerk and ask that a list of the names of all unmarried elders enrolled with that branch be submitted. That would require much work. But there are certainly other things to be considered besides "being married." That is recognized, it seems.

Of course fitness for the job is presumed.

There are two ways, perhaps, to reach the end in view; one, to call for volunteers, the other to ask branch and district presidents to submit to us the names. It would be a good thing for each branch and district president to make a survey of the field to see how many elders qualified for branch supervisory work there are who can be spared and who are willing to go elsewhere and support themselves while caring for branch work.

In case of volunteers, of course it would be necessary to look into the matter of qualification, so in such cases it would be necessary to seek counsel from district presidents on this line.

We would like to suggest that district presidents who are interested in the problem presented look over the field of their responsibility and write us on two lines. First, are there branches in your district where the work of such elders is needed? Second, are there capable elders in other branches of the district who can be spared to be sent to branches where needed, and who are worthy to go?

Are there volunteers for this class of service?

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

Here's Your Chance to Help

Kipling says:

"It ain't the individual nor the army as a whole,
But the everlasting teamwork of every blooming soul."

This is the spirit of the preparation we are making for the Graceland Home-coming and Young People's Convention for June 3 to 16, 1923. We know that you will catch this spirit of cooperation. Here's your chance to show it. All you need to do is to write us that you are planning to come. If we find that four or five hundred are planning to come, we can count on two hundred fifty of this number coming by train; in which case we can no doubt get railroad rates. This will save the young people hundreds of dollars. BUT WE MUST KNOW WITHIN THE NEXT FEW WEEKS. If you are planning to come either to the Home-coming or to the convention, drop a card at once to F. M. McDowell, Lamoni, Iowa.

WE WANT TO GET THE RAILROAD RATES FOR OUR VISITORS.

Won't you help us by acting now?

Social Ideals of the Church

By Frederick M. Smith

Lecture broadcasted Sunday evening, February 4, 1923, from Station W P E, at Independence, by Central Radio Company, of Kansas City, Missouri.

I shall to-night attempt to present to my radio audience the "Social ideals of the church," but do not expect that in the time allotted to me in this talk and the one to follow next Sunday night that I shall be able to exhaust the subject, for it is large. Touching as it does both the religious and social sides of our existence, it is apparent that to exhaust the subject one must follow its ramifications into almost every channel of human endeavor and even thought. So I shall only present a brief survey, the fundamentals as I see them, in the hope that my hearers will be interested enough to carry the application of these fundamentals into their own lives and activities.

It will probably be assumed that in saying "ideals of the church," the word church is meant to apply to the church of which I am a representative—the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints; but inasmuch as that church claims to be truly and faithfully Christian we cannot attempt the task of talking on social ideals of the church without having in mind and view the social ideals reflected from the philosophy, teachings, and life of Jesus the Christ; in other words, Christian social ideals. And with the purpose of holding up to view these ideals as we understand them we enter upon our task.

Goal of Divinity

As we of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints believe that in the process of creation of the universe and its establishment in all its beauty of symphony, form, and order, there has from the first been divine purpose, and will be to the end, it follows that there must be a definite goal towards which Divinity is directing all the movements of the universe, a great, wondrous, and to man, because of his finite limitations, incomprehensible consummation. Limited in our comprehension and analysis largely to mundane affairs, we dare not even attempt to seize the idea of the universal goal as it exists in the mind of God, but we do know from the prayer that Jesus taught us that we are here to look forward to, and to work for as well as pray for, the time to come when the "kingdom of God" shall come among men, a time when God's will shall be done here, as well as in his celestial abode.

Can this mean anything or any condition which leaves out of consideration the social factors?

The Trend From Eden

In this light, then, we might well, with the social purpose fully in view, review the entire history of man, to see the gradual unfoldment of God's plan in this direction. The course has not run smoothly in its development towards better things, for man with his agency has not infrequently forgotten God.

In fact very soon after the placement of the human family in the garden of Eden do we see the beginnings of the vicious play of the unsocial against the social, the fight of selfishness against altruism. A handmaiden of selfishness is jealousy, and jealousy and envy as ultra expressions of selfishness lie close to the roots of all crime. Abel as a steward anxious to improve upon that intrusted to his care, with frugality and assiduity, prospered. Cain became jealous and, driven by this unwholesome passion beyond the bounds of reasonable control, killed Abel. The inevitable day of accounting for all crime follows in this case. And in response to the thunderous query from God, "Cain, where is thy brother, Abel?" Cain attempted to take shelter under the subterfuge, "Am I my brother's keeper?" And ever since then that question has been on the lips of those who would promote their own interests at the expense of the welfare of their fellow men, or who are disposed to follow their own inclinations without regard to the effects of their own activities upon others. A belief that that question should have answer in the negative is what keeps Wall Street alive, and keeps sharp the tearing teeth of competition. But the conviction is slowly perhaps, but yet surely, spreading that Cain's question is lame excuse for those who would escape the responsibility for social welfare.

Teachings of Jesus Social

Passing over the time and history intervening between this Edenic episode and the advent of Jesus, we look at the life and work of this Great Teacher. His work and message came at a time when the individualism of Rome had wrought havoc with the social content of the Mosaic economy. The teachings of Jesus were social in significance. To be sure, in his teachings and parables there is always a strong appeal for personal righteousness, but a more than casual analysis of those appeals reveals a strong social content and bearing.

In his theology Christ was liberal, always tolerant with the theological views of others, provided there was a disposition to envisage the larger life. He felt that his purpose in coming was to engender a larger life, "I am come that ye might have life and have it more abundantly." Far too long has it been thought he had reference to the other world aspect of religion. That he intended the larger life to function here cannot well be denied in the light of his answer to the lawyer who would entrap him by asking, "Which is the greatest commandment?" You will recall his answer, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God . . . and thy neighbor as thyself." This clearly reveals his central idea that religion (love of God) can only be demonstrated by social interaction (love of neighbor). And when the lawyer, caught in his own trap, would retrieve himself by asking who one's neighbor is, there came in quick response the beautiful answer that our neighbor is found where there is one in need of help. Service to humanity, then, is fundamental to the Christian religion, service rendered here, not in the beyond. Lip service—avowal of love for God—counts as naught, for service to the least of those in need counts for more than the loudest claim, or even prayer. We become aware of God by seeing our neighbor, and consciousness of God creates awareness of our obligations towards our fellow man.

Love of Neighbor

And it was probably clearly in his mind when he gave these answers that it was impossible to love God without loving our neighbor. Demonstration of real love of God will issue in service to neighbor. No other conception of godly love could exist in the mind of one who gave to the world the golden rule, that our social conduct should always synchronize with what we expect from others. It is the essence of what should motivate ideal social conditions. "I am come that ye might have life and have it more abundantly," is certainly strong in social content.

We would say, therefore, that the religion of Jesus is fundamentally social and any form of society which entails a struggle of individuals one against the other for existence is not Christian, though of course work is God-given, for in the "sweat of our face" must we eat our bread. A ruthless policy of survival of the fittest may be fit for bestly propagation but is unfit for rational beings. We are our brother's keeper, not his destroyer.

The Rich Young Man

As a further evidence that Jesus would lay emphasis upon the social aspects of his philosophy and religion, let us note the incident of the rich young man who came to him asking what he should do. Please note that here was a young man who would to-day very likely be termed successful, and perhaps even religious. He was rich, which to-day passes far too often as being the criterion of success. He had punctiliously kept the Mosaic law, and yet he had under the gripping teachings of Jesus become conscious that there was something lacking. So he said to Jesus, "What lack I yet? What must I do to be saved?" His approach was through the avenue of selfishness; he would be saved, and he would know the minimum of effort to bring him escape from destruction. But note Jesus' answer: "Sell all that thou hast and give to the poor." This in other language meant: Devote all your possessions and powers to God's service by serving your fellow man in need. You have so far spent your life in thinking of yourself and laying up goods for your own gratification. You have been devout in your observance of religious ceremony, but that is not enough. Forget yourself and see those around you whom you can help. Your road to God lies in service to them. The answer of Jesus pointed to social duty. The young man turned away in sorrow, for he could not comply. Too long had he been taught in the school of selfishness. The sorrow followed either because of his inability to comprehend the scope of the answer or else his lack of social consciousness and sense of social duty. The conduct and reaction of this young man is quite typical of far too many to-day, the propensity to put a minimum limit on our religious activities and a maximum on service to self.

Religion Is Service to Those in Need

Religion in the Christian sense is comprised of service, service to those in need, service to others, altruism. And this makes religion immensely more than meditation, prayer, and observance of ceremony. It is meditation become dynamic, it is prayer plus the desire to do, it is ceremony followed by action. It is meditation, prayer, and ceremony vitalized, sanctified, by beneficent action in service to others.

Selfishness Wrong Fundamental

Any social order based on selfishness is fundamentally wrong. Who will deny that to-day the appeal for endeavor is to selfishness? In the school, on the street, in the bank, from the rostrum, from the pulpit the appeal is largely, if not entirely, to the selfish instinct. Individuals are urged to endeavor, but for reward. Service is urged, but in the line yielding the largest returns to the individual. Professions are chosen for the prospective return in money, and excellence therein is striven for because larger tolls can be collected, and the struggle is to amass a competency or more, for the power it brings or for the chance for early retirement and freedom from worry over needed income. Selfishness and fear are our social dynamic to-day. Men toil for their pay envelopes or for their profits because their energies are loosened by the consuming desire to add to their accumulated wealth for the power it brings, or by the fear that old age or accidental disability or disability from disease will find them without a competency. You of my listeners who are laboring men, answer me, Why do you work? Do you work because you love your work? Or is it because you look forward to the day when your pay envelope will be handed you? And the pleasure of getting it—is it lasting or fugacious? And you of my listeners who are business men, manufacturers, answer me: Why do you undergo the worry and vexations of the multitudinous details of your business? Why take the risks of failure, the blows of competition? Why do you face the fears of strikes, walkouts, and boycotts? Is it from love of your business, or because you see the profits if everything turns out all right, and because you know that a few years of successful business will put your bank account where the fear of dependency is for you gone forever?

Selfishness and fear are our social dynamics to-day. What a travesty on the Christian religion! A society ostensibly Christian whose industrial impulsion is fear, or selfishness, when Christianity is based on love—love of God and love of neighbor!

Awakening of Social Consciousness

There has in recent years been in certain circles at least a distinct awakening of social consciousness, and we might begin to hope that the crest of the wave of selfishness which has swept over the world has passed. Did the great World War mark the time of that crest?

We do know that close observers have sensed a steadily progressing revolution of religion, a revolution which holds promise of getting back more squarely upon the basis on which rests the religion of Jesus, for there has come an awakening to the fact that in our attempted evaluation of Christianity, incidentals have been overemphasized and fundamentals shifted to places of secondary or tertiary importance. The original appeal made by Jesus for individual righteousness was for an end. However much we may emphasize the need for personal righteousness, however deeply we may recognize that a prime purpose of the Christian religion is the formation of character on the pattern given us in the life of Christ and in his precepts, a proper envisagement of the religion of Jesus and the evaluation of his life, forces us to the conclusion that not even the most refined and highest developed religious character can live the Christian religion by himself. "No man liveth to himself alone." It takes at least two men and God to demonstrate the Christian religion, each man neighbor to the other, demonstrating his love of God in service to his brother. Let us hope, aye pray, and work, that this conception of the Christian religion shall expand, is expanding in constantly widening circles, until it shall seize the masses of the peoples of all nations; for then and then only shall war cease; when all shall recognize the deep meaning of those words of scripture, Of one blood hath God created all the nations of the earth, and made man that haply he might feel after God, for when man begins to feel after God the Spirit of God working in him will open his eyes to the fact that his fellow men are his brothers and love of God will issue in serving those brothers.

Social Reforms Proposed

With the awakening consciousness that the primary content of the Christian religion is social, has come a flood of proposed social reforms, but how seldom have these reforms escaped the taint of selfishness. The appeal has usually been made in the vernacular of selfishness. How could we expect otherwise? "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." It is necessary for us to know God, and to know God we must become aware of our brother and his needs. God and our brother are complements. To know God we must see our brother, and to see God we must know our brother, a divine paradox. Except there comes that divine personal renaissance which issues in a social consciousness, the new order of society cannot even be glimpsed; and while we to-day look with delight upon that revolution in religion which distinctly tends towards a social interpretation of the Christian religion we cannot blink the fact that as yet there are far too few with a pure social consciousness. The majority still think and speak and act in terms of selfishness. The awakening of this social consciousness has tremendous powers of soul expansion. Paul once found his soul expanding to all the universe. May not his ecstatic expansion of soul have arisen from a deep spiritual impress of the social content of the message of Jesus? We do know from our experiences, that that content once grasped lifts one up and out of oneself till the expanded soul readjusts itself in a new birth, a vision of larger things and an activity directed towards social betterment and weal, towards the achievement of a redeemed society, one in which the will of God has perfect play—his kingdom come.

Stewardship: Opportunity for All

For this to be accomplished there must be social reform, and for such reform this church stands. We stand for that form of social order in which every person shall have fullest opportunity for the complete development of his chiefest talents, and then for the exercise of those talents in contribution to the welfare of society.

For any social reform to be lasting or general it must be built upon a religious foundation, its spirit must be religious, its motivation religious for it must include God. None other will succeed. This, too, has been foreshadowed by the command, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and these things shall be added."

How this church expects to accomplish this, or the principle on which we hope to see it accomplished I want to talk to you about next Sunday night at this hour—the doctrine of stewardships.

The Spirit Giveth Life

By W. F. Yates

They who observe the letter of the law and forget the spirit thereof are apt to stumble and fail.

"The letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life." (2 Corinthians 3: 6.) Among many religious people there is constant insisting upon certain things because "the book says" so and so.

The young church member will say: "I would like to go fishing on Sunday, but I can't because I am a member of the church." The young man or woman may say: "I would like very much to dance, but I am a church member." But just as sure as these young folks do not get any farther along in spiritual things than such expressions as these seem to indicate, they will soon break the Sabbath.

Our books teach that there is a time coming when every man will not teach his neighbor, but that the Lord will "write his law in their hearts."

Until righteousness is from within, its assumption to exist can be but the expression of the letter. Should this be true, and the spirit be not aroused, humanity will go farther and farther from the things they one time acknowledged to be the right. This accounts for the fact that so many thousands who have at some time held membership in some church have finally grown entirely indifferent.

How do we account for the work of men in the past who in a very short time converted masses of men to their ideas? One might think they were extraordinarily gifted, or that their education won them their successes. But the writer believes that they were so absorbingly converted to their own teachings, and that they went forth so imbued with the spirit of their cause that the letter was a secondary consideration. The letter followed after because of the spirit's initiative.

Men who won the applause of nations sufficient to have their career recorded in history and taught to succeeding generations, men who came to the people brimming full of honest enthusiastic attempts to solve the people's problems—men who offered a solution for the difficulties which were uppermost in the minds of the masses.

Any man coming with a program for the people to-day—a program that offers to relieve the oppressed, will need to be born of a spirit far in advance of anything now to be seen in the world.

When the people were troubled over parliament passing the stamp act in colonial days it was then that the country boy, Patrick Henry, thundered out a speech that pierced the soul of the colonists. He was born of a spirit that found response in the hearts of his countrymen. The details of how to carry on the revolution which arose because of this spirit, then followed. Should the plan of procedure have been insisted upon without the fervent spirit of the issue first having gripped the souls of the people the history of the great American Revolution would read very differently to-day.

Stewardships Without Readiness Disastrous

Anything that has been required of us by the Lord, and we attempt to do merely because "the books say" so and so, will surely make against us in the end, unless we can in some way get the spirit of our work in order to add the vitality of life to the letter of the law. We have talked much of what the books teach concerning the law of temporalities. The writer feels sure that if we should proceed to grant stewardships just because of what the letter of the law requires we would lay the foundation for one of the most troublesome scenes this church ever passed through. Without the spirit of brotherhood our work could not succeed.

Think of an individual giving his surplus to assist a brother when he did not love him! Such consecration of property would be given reluctantly. It could not be otherwise. The one who received would become so insulted that he would want to throw the whole thing in the river the very first time this brother would say: "Just look what I gave him," etc. Unless the deep spirit of brotherly love is there it would be advisable not to make the attempt, for the letter alone killeth. It is the spirit of righteousness in the heart that is to make the law of equality effective. Nothing else can possibly avail. God himself cannot, and will not bring about the cherished results in any other way.

The writer is happy to know that there are men and women who have had in the past, and who now do have the deep spirit of the gospel of brotherhood in their hearts. They have constantly given, and are giving their all, for the welfare of their fellows. It well may be said of them, they are the salt of the earth. Some of them are people who have grappled with debt and poverty. People who have even been chided and chilled by the voice of cruel criticism from others while their whole career has been prompted by the spirit of giving, with no thought of compensation. To express more fully the thought in mind, the following is related:

When the writer was young in the church as well as in years, he spent some time upon the frontier of a new country with his parents. The settlement was made up of homesteaders. To secure homestead title they were required to make residence and to put certain improvements upon the land. This was a difficult thing for some without other means of support, and who had to earn their living as they went. Some at times found themselves in dire need. So when the time of the wheat harvest back in the States came around many of the settlers would leave their homesteads for a while to secure work in the harvest fields.

The Victimized Brother A

A certain Saint whom we will call Brother A, had a large family, consisting of the wife and several small children. Because he could neither take his family nor very well leave them, Brother A did not always join the annual harvesting crew; so when harvest time came around a neighbor would call upon Brother A and say: "Brother, I want to go away to the harvest and may be gone for a month or so. Now you will be here at home, could you just run the cultivator through my corn a couple of times for me, and I will settle with you in some way when I return." Another brother across the way would like to go to the harvest too, if he could just get some good person like Brother A to see that his hogs in the pasture got water in case the pond should dry up—which of course it would do in a very short time. In this way various neighbors would call for favors. Of course this brother consented to do the best he could for those who needed such favors done. During the month or so following we will assure the reader this brother had steady employment.

Upon the return of the harvest hands it was plain to see that it began to be a question just how to make the earnings go around. Well, of course the bank had that mortgage—that would have to be paid. And that bill for clothing past due three months must be met. But the money would not go around. Who will be left out? "There is Brother A," they would say; "he is a good fellow and always lenient to those who are trying; he will let it go until we get upon our feet." Thus when Brother A was met by various ones in a similar manner the good brother always being on the side of mercy consented to take a poor shoat as part payment, and from another a soggy load of wood, and so forth. For of course the spirit of the gospel demanded that he be long-suffering and kind, and not easily provoked.

What did it matter if now and then he would hear those to whom he had given his time say of him, "Brother A is a good man but a bad manager." But to stay with his solemn promise to his God he must not "behave himself unseemly" and must be willing to spend himself for the comfort of others. This is only a few of the things Brother A endured. Because to do the will of the Lord was his meat and drink his services were only incidents along with many others that good people make for right.

Some twenty-odd years have passed away since the writer's frontier experience, and time has proven to my thorough satisfaction that Brother A is one of the best managers I ever knew. Right was his standard. Property rights and possessions were of small value when it came down to human relief and real service. If the world of men were as willing to suffer for righteousness' sake as they seem to be to contend for "my rights," "my personal property," etc., what a different world this would be.

There was only one thing that stood in the way to prevent us from having a little Zion back there in those days. So few of us possessed the material elements that make for a wholly comfortable life. But the heavenly Father did bless us richly. We learned some time ago that Brother A still possesses as much of this world's good as formerly, and that his family have all grown to be sturdy characters in the church. Then as we inquire into the lives of some who then pitied this poor brother for not getting ahead in this world's goods, we find they have had family troubles as bad as anything we see in the world, and we are made to wonder at the working out of such events, and to read the lesson taught thereby.

There cannot be found upon earth to-day any who will outstrip some of us when it comes to argumentation and the expounding of the letter, but we seem to be slow to get a great way from the mere letter of the law. For example suppose the writer were to go out and preach the beauties of the fullness of the gospel and insist upon the Saints coming up to the law with their finances, and would prove by the books that it was all enjoined, etc., and then the preacher shall fall heir to a few thousand dollars, and instead of making a practical demonstration of the proper way to place the money he would immediately purchase an expensive car and begin to ride around and emphasize the inequality between him and his poorer brother. How would this compare with the said preacher's teachings? Some one might say of him, "He has such great love for his children to purchase these things that they might enjoy the same."

To carry the thought farther: how much weight would such sermons have upon the minds of those who heard, even though they be ever so profound? The world has heard too much of this word-vaporing now. Are we not reaching a time when justice and mercy will take better?

Needs and Just Wants

We all know that God's laws provide for his children's needs and just wants. I might want a large automobile, but the justice of the thing is quite different as long as my brother whom the law requires me to love as myself has not even a garden spot. One could not follow such procedure while he had the spirit of the "fullness of the gospel."

We, as the ministry of the church, preach these things as though some day the public will see the application and put it into effect. Would it not be grand if we could in some way get the spirit of the thing? Then how quickly the detailed work would follow. We have told the world about these wonderful things and are making preparations to keep telling them of it, but with what effect we could reach the people were we all seeing to it that equality existed even in our ministerial ranks. What joy and added life would come to this church if the priesthood in branch and district could group themselves and agree from the bottom of their heart upon the "bond and covenant" that is being advocated by our president. Then as he has said this particular work will be as "broad as the church."

I dare say that because of the changed conditions we could "tell the story" and almost be self-supporting because of gardens and vineyards our families could tend, to say nothing of the education that would come to the young because of the experience. We hope the day is not far distant when we can both preach and practice. If we cannot do but one, perhaps the latter would be more advantageous for a while. Now as I have stated above, we cannot progress until we get the spirit of righteousness in our heart first. We know of no school that instills this most wonderful thing in its pupils where they will be given a certificate stating that false aspiration has been educated out. No more room for jealousy, etc., but the pure, unadulterated love for their fellows. If there is no such school, how may such a character be attained? Can it be that the school of sad experience will teach this thing?

A Look Backward

For many years we have heard the argument indulged in, "Oh, I cannot do anything to come to that law, because it takes all of this large farm to make a living upon," etc. We have striven on like the world in the markets, have gone into debt like the world, when the command was to come out of it. What have we gained? Are we happier by this individual struggle while mortgages are hanging over our heads and financial depression keeps creeping on? Can we not see that the church would be better off as well as the individuals happier, should we have labored collectively instead of separately and individually? Perhaps the church is getting ready to enter the school mentioned. Indications are that the discipline of this school of experience will try men, before we pass the various grades. We read of a people that the Lord "sent forth that they might be chastened." Was this the purpose of the scattering of the saints?

Two Wrong Things Noted

Ofttimes the poor have been converted to the letter, and because of carnality have commenced to insist that the brother with means come also to that letter. Contention has been the outgrowth at times, and personal freewill agency was overlooked by the one insisting. The Lord always gives room for every man's agency. Upon the other hand the well-to-do because of this same carnality above mentioned, misjudge the motives of some who would teach, not from any personal desire, but that they might see salvation come to the Saints. Of course contention upon both sides comes from the same source. The clearing of the inside of the platter will be necessary in each case.

Carnality sees not the kingdom of God. Righteousness working in the hearts of men cannot be observed by carnality. "The kingdom of God cometh not by observation," we cannot understand the things of God save by the Spirit of God. They are spiritually discerned. We all view the things of Zion by, or according to, the righteousness or unrighteousness within our own hearts. A people living in an humble and unassuming way could never be recognized as having any connection with the Deity by those who interpret the law according to the lusts of the flesh. The Lord's people will never set an example to the world by their pomp and show. Were anyone not prepared in heart to join company with such a people as the Lord's people must be they would feel at once it was a condition of "collective bondage"; for how could they get action upon their pride, their backbiting, or that carnality within, in such a place? Theirs would be to flee at once and raise the warning voice that others may not be contaminated with this delusion. So now as always in the past, the things of the Lord will go unobserved by the world, as to having any merit, but deserving only to be crushed at once. We indeed trust that we shall work along the lines of the spirit, for the letter alone will bring ultimate death.

So, dear Saints in the conflict, keep your ear attuned to the voice that is crying in the wilderness with no uncertain sound—in the wilderness because but few catch its calling amid the clamor of many voices of deception and confusion.

March on, ye noble ones, you who have felt the burden of want and care, you who have staggered under unjust toil. For a wise cause have these things been permitted. Perhaps these things have been, that sturdy characters might arise, equipped with weapons bright and clean, to meet the foe of Zion's war. Meekness is not weakness, brother. They will stand aghast who built upon sand, when the stone foundation was ever cast aside in order that perishable wealth might be possessed. Forget not that in the past many brave hearts have beat 'neath the tattered cloak of adversities. Ye poor in spirit, raise your head, for heaven's kingdom stands with doors ajar, and with gifts of worth to bestow upon those who have passed beneath the rod, and dipped their garments in the blood, that they with Him might salvation bring and eternal joys obtain. "Lay not up treasures upon earth," saith He whose right it is to command, "but lasting eternal wealth possess where moth and rust doth not corrupt."

Light and truth, though stayed and hindered by the follies of men, marches steadily on. Truth, unobserved by the carnal mind, bides its time until false standards lie crushed and broken at the feet of those who have trusted therein, and then shines forth in its steady strength for all who will walk in the rays of her great white light.

May we soon, as a whole people, walk by the Spirit and in the light, as well as preach about it, for the letter killeth but the spirit giveth life.

One of our readers urges that we say more concerning how to preach the gospel, how to reach outsiders, how to reach the Saints to get them to attend the services, to revive them, to rewin them to Christ, how to lead the Saints on to higher ground.

There are questions which are not answered by the ordinary textbooks to-day. There are in fact many of our readers both of young people and of old who wish we had more to offer in this respect, more to tell us how to live the Christlike life, add there are wanted to-day 100,000 men and women to carry that message in their personal lives, thus show others how to worship truly the Lord of hosts.

PASTORAL

Good Questions by a District President

[The following letter is a copy of one sent out by one of our district presidents to his charges. It has so many good thoughts and can be so nicely applied to other districts that we think it worth passing on to our readers.—EDITORS.]

To All the Family of God in — District: The new year is now fairly begun and we have before us the tasks that will fill it with satisfaction and joy if properly performed and which, if neglected, will cause us to look back with regret when the lights of 1923 shall burn low.

Perhaps many of us are now wishing we had a better account to show for the year just made history; I know that such is the case with myself, at least. Now is a better time than we shall again have to take an inventory of our accomplishments for the past. It is a time when we can with profit ask ourselves the following questions:

Am I a better representative of the church than I was a year ago? Has anyone been given a better understanding of the church of Jesus, or has anyone a better opinion of its members by reason of my having lived? Can God reach me any better with his Holy Spirit (for indeed he is continually feeling after every one of us) than he could a year ago? Has anyone heard the gospel who would not have heard it but for me? Is Zion any nearer of realization because of what I have contributed toward the spiritual and temporal powers of the church?

These questions are not mere flights of fancy but are ones which if properly considered will start us to thinking about what the present year will have to say for us at its close. Indeed, now is the time not merely to resolve that this year shall be better than any we have spent before but to begin actual improvement in our own service; now is the time for you and me to begin that work that will make this district in very deed a curtain of Zion.

Has it ever occurred to you that few other districts of the church, save only its stakes, lie so close to the land that will be first redeemed? Is it not true, in view of this geographical advantage given to us, that God could most consistently require us to be the best district in the church? Perhaps no other section, soil, climate, and geography considered, is better endowed by nature for the task of supplying food to the church of God. Saints, how much of this wonderfully endowed section is directly employed in furthering the interests of God's work? Are we living up to our privileges or have we buried part at least of our Master's substance, to be handed back to him on that great day of accounts without improvement?

Shall we not then to-day renew our energies and redouble our efforts to the end that this district shall be second to none in point of spiritual and temporal support to the cause of Christ? That we may attain this goal, shall we adopt as our slogan, "Work, watch, and pray"—work that we may have more to offer our Master, watch that we may be guarded against every onslaught of the foe, and pray for the success of God's work everywhere?

A Model Branch Report

Good suggestions for pastors and others who feel that reporting is a drudgery which should not be required.

[The reports of branch presidents to district presidents are so often statistical in their nature that the editors believe the copy of one such report which is different and is herewith reproduced will be read by our pastors with profit. To some it may open up new avenues of thought and give objectives for pastoral work not yet glimpsed; to others it may bring a sense of keen pleasure to know that the merit of the methods and plans they have been following is recognized by others.—EDITORS.]

Dear Brother: You ask for a report of the spiritual condition of the — Branch. So that you may have a clearer view of what I wish to say, may I outline what I regard as spirituality, how spirituality is manifested, and how nearly we are approximating the standard indicated. The latter point should cover your question.

It is exceedingly difficult to define spirituality. But from the standpoint of a pastor, it seems to me that spirituality consists in regarding God as Creator and Father; seeks association with him as such; sees God moving in nature, and expressing himself in the noble thoughts and beautiful, helpful acts of men; fellowships with men on a basis of brotherhood.

Of course spirituality is manifested differently in those we study, but I think a minimum manifestation will include principally the following:

1. The mind will be turned towards achieving perfection.
2. The graces urged by Peter in 2 Peter 1: 4-8 will be fairly constantly seen.
3. The law of tithing will be observed, and the financial needs of the branch supplied.
4. Fasting as a means of spiritual development will be availed of.
5. Prayer in private and public life will be had.
6. The admonition to "meet together often" will be heeded.
7. Those gifts bestowed upon the individual will be cultivated, and education sought.

8. The family altar will be a regular part of home life.

9. Duties of citizenship will be discharged.

10. An effort will be made to "warn" others concerning the gospel.

The remarks of the Saints, made publicly and in private, tend to show that their desire is to attain perfection, and their lives exhibit in some degree Peter's graces. This applies to the majority of the people. Tithing payments are in excellent proportion; better than seventy-five per cent of the wage earners observe this law, and in the number is included those with the largest per capita income. Branch funds are provided to meet our needs, without recourse to other than pledges paid on a monthly basis, or voluntary contributions. The prayer meetings and social services are marked by the considerable number who participate; the spiritual tone is very good, in my opinion. While the "gifts" are very infrequently manifested in the form of tongues or prophecies, yet in other forms we are supplied. During the past six months we have held special sessions of prayer in behalf of some of our sick, in which fasting has been requested. Compliance with such requests has been general.

Attendance at meetings varies. Owing to the fact that the membership is scattered over the city and surrounding and contiguous towns and country, the best test is the Sunday morning service, and the sacramental service. Average attendance Sunday mornings, out of a possible seventy, is fifty. Both figures are approximate, and the average is raised somewhat by the presence on sacrament Sunday of some who reside outside the city. The membership is "spotty" on cultivation of special gifts, or pursuit of home study or educational work under some institution. Among the young, the record is, of course, very good. Of the adults, two are doing university work, four are in evening high schools. The officers have periodical sessions for study under my guidance. Others do little of a systematic character, so far as I am informed.

Religious life in the home is not easy to estimate. One must judge by external appearances chiefly, and the result is naturally inaccurate. The institution of the family altar is observed in perhaps about fifty per cent of the homes of the active city membership. I base this upon priests' reports of visitation. Virtually all of the men vote, as do some of the women. The latter are not exercising their franchise very extensively as yet. Interest in political conditions at home and abroad is keen in some and lacking in others. That is to be expected. A talk given recently at one of the Sunday evening services on Turkey and the problem of the Near East was well attended and listened to with apparently great interest. The evangelical work of the branch has not been attended to because of the work about the premises which occupied during the forepart of 1922. Plans are now under consideration to effect something along this line during late February or early March. Personal effort varies with the character of the member. Some are active in talking with their friends and neighbors; others are timid and slack. That this phase of our spiritual life is not unhealthy, however, may be indicated by our results in 1921. In that year we aimed at the conversion of ten members, conversion to be upon a sound conservative basis. The year showed the goal reached, and the majority of the ten are now active.

The recent General Conference caused some disturbance among the people here, but upon pointing out that common consent must prevail, and that a discussion of procedure or interpretation of law, if carried out upon a basis of mutual respect and restraint, must result only in good, the disturbance disappeared so far as I can see. Attendance, participation, and financial support have not suffered, and these are fair tests.

We have a few cases where the Saints are indifferent, and two or three where a more active labor of an official sort is called for. But these do not represent the branch. The spiritual condition of the active membership, comprising the majority of the branch I consider good. The standard set out above is open to many criticisms, but results, as tested by it, seem to justify my conclusion.

Some Real Publicity

[A special reporter of the Los Angeles (California) Times wandered into our little church in that city one Sunday morning recently, and though the pastor, Elder David E. Dowker, did not know the reporter was present, he evidently preached some real copy, for the feature writer gave him a column and a half write-up. There is a tremendous lot of value in such publicity as this and we are publishing the report in full. It gives an interesting view of the church work in Los Angeles as well as a clear synopsis of Brother Dowker's sermon.]

DOWKER DENIES GRANT'S VIEWS

Loyalty to Christ Asked by Wall Street Pastor

Quaint Old Edifice Founded Forty Years Ago

Reorganized Church Under F. M. Smith Presidency

(By Alma Whitaker)

Perhaps it was the controversy about Reverend P. S. Grant, of New York, and his denial of the divinity of Christ in an Episcopalian church that sent me yesterday to hear a sermon on "Loyalty to Christ" by Reverend David E. Dowker at the Reorganized Church of the Latter Day Saints at 1114 Wall Street.

This little old church has been established in Los Angeles about forty years—a branch of the Mormon Church that repudiated Brigham Young, polygamy, the blood atonement, and other tenets and functions under the presidency of Frederick M. Smith, grandson of the original founder, Joseph Smith. And President Smith recently sent out a passionate appeal for loyalty to Christ, the inspiration for yesterday's sermon.

It is a quaint little church whose congregation has long outgrown it, now boasting 640 members. The platform looks like a modern bijou theater, with its pink tapestry hangings, artistically festooned around the tiny proscenium, and its pale-green tinted walls contrasting strangely with the old woodwork, the modest, stained-glass window tops and the old-fashioned chandeliers. But a sizable choir, made up largely of hatless women, found space on the little platform.

Essentially Family Church

It is essentially a family church, every age being in evidence. One proud mother with six healthy children occupied one whole pew, including a new baby boy, who was later blessed at the close of the service and behaved with the utmost decorum.

The service impressed me as being very similar to the Christian Church, except that the Lord's Supper was omitted. It opened with the hearty singing of a hymn, "In thy name, O Lord, assembling, we thy people now draw near. . . ." This was followed by an extemporaneous prayer offered by Elder D. H. Crum, whose wife was also the pianist.

The pastor then made his announcements, including a special appeal to the young people, in which the church seems particularly rich.

He also took an informal vote, as at a club meeting, on the question of whether the district conference should be invited to meet at this church in February—and the ayes had it.

Doctor Dowker's sermon of loyalty was delivered in scholarly yet simple language. His text was taken from the Gospel of Saint John, explaining the greater clearness of the Saint James [Inspired] version, and the magic of those words: "Except he doeth the will of my Father, who hath sent me." He said how poignantly he felt the responsibility of the preacher, who must guide without full knowledge of the lives and difficulties of those who heard him.

To Those Weary of Life

"If anyone here has become weary of life," he seemed to almost whisper, with sympathetic understanding, and his voice grew in volume and intensity as he declared: "If we will draw near to God, he will draw near unto us," and added upon a passionate note: "It is true; it is true."

Loyalty and knowledge, he declared, were essentially synonymous. It is the people who know most about the gospel of Jesus Christ who are the most loyal to it. And he cited the case of a family, critical, touchy, misunderstanding each other, and the inevitable disruption that follows, as distinct from that family founded upon love, patience, understanding of each other, whose loyalty stands firmly against all attacks.

He emphasized individual responsibility to Jesus Christ, the shame of selling one's integrity to vice. Lightly, sympathetically he touched upon the death of Wallace Reid, quoting the actor's own mother who said that "he had not died in vain" if his sorrows proved the great lesson the world needed.

Honesty of purpose, he said, holding up the Bible, was the theme of that great work—in government, in the church, and in the home. And he quoted a hymn often sung in the church: "I would be true, for there are those that trust me; I would be pure, for there are those that care."

Another line of it is: "I would be humble, for I know my weakness," and here the pastor interpolated a plea for humility—not often heard in these days of will power and the I am, I can, I will cult, which has won so many.

His sermon concluded with a reiteration of the golden rule.

The Golden Rule

"Can you practice this golden rule," he asked, "to do unto others as you would be done by? Can you be friendly to those whom you regard as your enemies? Can you be kind to those who wish to fight you?"

In fact, throughout that sermon, the pastor subtly put moral responsibility up to every member of his congregation. He did not seem to preach but rather to discuss in friendly and sympathetic understanding. One could not fail to be impressed with the pastor's own humility and a deep and abiding sincerity.

Then came the blessing of that new baby whose mother handed him so proudly to Brother Crum. The pastor and Brother Crum held the baby between them, the latter asking God's blessing upon him and dedicating him to that loyalty to Jesus Christ, which the sermon had so well set forth. This takes the place of the formal baptism as practiced in other churches and proved an impressive interlude.

The Church of the Reorganized Latter Day Saints at 1114 Wall Street is for sale. The congregation intends to build a new and larger edifice in the near future to care for the greatly increased membership.

It was noteworthy that there was no collection. Only in the Jewish Synagogue is this practice also observed, I believe. This plan was adopted over a year ago and under the new system of dues, paid as for a club, the church has a surplus of $1,000 in its exchequer this year, where previously it had despaired of meeting expenses.

It is also interesting to know that pastors in this church

LETTERS AND NEWS

Decrease in Church Membership

Interesting details showing net loss because of transfers.

In response to a request by the Presidency, the statistician has submitted to us in concise form the statistics of membership of the church. We herewith present his letter and the accompanying table, for the subject matter is of great interest to the church officers and members.

It will be noted that the figures indicate a net loss in membership, due to the large number carried to the unknown list. It is a lump sum transfer to Loss and Gain account which should have been distributed over a number of past years, so that at the end of 1923 no such a large transfer will need be made. The year 1923, we trust, will again show the "gain" which has always been present in our statistical reports.

We commend the report of the statistician to careful scrutiny.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY;

Dear Brethren: Inclosed you will please find table showing total enrollment in the years 1921, 1922; also the number of names which we have enrolled as nonresidents at the close of the year 1922. The numbers given in the nonresident column will doubtless interest you, as you will observe in a number of districts the nonresident enrollment is quite large. These Saints come under the direct supervision of the district officers.

You will notice our total enrollment for 1922 is less than 1921, notwithstanding the fact that during the year 1922 we added 3,640 names by new baptisms, and 735 in checking up old baptism records, making a total gain of 4,375. The losses for the year total 4,506. Of this number 2,859 are names carried to the Unknown group, or equivalent to the Loss and Gain account, but of course on the wrong side of the account to show well. During all the years that this church has existed, so far as we know, no attempt has been made to allow for losses to the church other than by deaths or expulsions. Beginning 1920 this department has advised the various branches to clear their records of names of Saints whose whereabouts have for a long period of time been unknown to the branch officers. These names are then counted out from our total net enrollment but the record retained. In case of any of these people being found, the officers of the branch where found are asked to report to us, and we then enroll the name with that group, thus restoring it to the count of our general membership. This plan, while it absorbs all our present gains and even more, will, we believe, when it is once thoroughly in use, enable us to approximate more nearly what our membership really is. At least it is an attempt to determine our known members.

You might be interested in knowing that the number of federation are paid out of a common fund and allocated to their respective churches from headquarters in Independence, Missouri. Doctor Dowker was sent here five years ago and the church has thrived amazingly under his pastorate.

new baptisms for 1920 was 3,827; for 1921, 5,511; thus 1922 was up pretty well with 1920.

Trusting the matters submitted may be of some use, we are,
Very sincerely,

THE DEPARTMENT OF STATISTICS,
By F. A. RUSSELL.

Our Scattered Members

A report of Presiding Patriarch Frederick A. Smith to the First Presidency.

Thinking you might be interested in the work we have been doing along the line of scattered members, I am sending you a little report of what we have done this past year.

We have on our list 619 names. I have written once to 225 of them; twice to 240 of them; and three times to 84 of them, besides about 100 letters in the correction of names in regard to marriages and other things connected with these members. This makes a total of 1,057 letters from our office in this connection.

There have been 65 of them returned to us. These names have been placed on the "unknown" list. We have received 190 answers, some of the answers covering a whole family of four or five, and sometimes more, the answers being written by the parents and include the children. We have had in the neighborhood of 64 of them visited by missionaries and local men to whom we have written.

This work we have done besides the other work incidental to the office in which we have been engaged and besides the time we have spent in the field, which has been largely all the summer season and most of the fall.

I take the pains to write you this so you will get an idea of what we are doing along this line. Our replies from some of them have been very encouraging, indeed, and most of the members have expressed themselves as being very appreciative of the fact that the church took sufficient interest in them to write to them. We have sought to make the letters personal, as near as we can.

We find in a number of places these isolated members are holding little Sunday schools of their own with quite a number of outsiders in some cases attending them, and I have encouraged this so far as it is possible to do so. In some instances we have been asked for literature, with which requests we have tried to comply.

This has all taken considerable postage and stationery, but I really believe the good that has been accomplished and the interest created among the membership is worth the expenditure of the time we have placed upon it, as well as the expense. It seems the percentage of answers is not quite what we would like to have, but we find it difficult to get people living in the country, who are not used to writing letters, to write; but after the third appeal I have received letters from some who have apologized for not writing before, which indicates that the former letters have reached them and have done some good.

The fact that only 65 out of 1,057 have been returned to us is quite surprising. Some of them may have been lost, but evidently the majority of them have found the people to whom they were addressed, and whether or not they answer they are made aware of the fact that the church is feeling after them.

March 4 to 10, inclusive, is being observed throughout the country as Third Annual Religious Book Week. We are observing it and will publish a list of desirable books, new and old, which ought to be in the home of every Saint. And the re-reading of books on hand is urged as well as the purchase of new ones.

Financial Conditions Affect Church in England

Joseph Dewsnup, president of the Northern District, England, in a personal letter to President Smith writes that he and his wife are in good health and that he is devoting what time he can spare from his regular business in visiting the branches of the district week ends, and endeavors to visit each branch in the district at least once a quarter. He says:

"I am afraid that my visits to branches outside of Manchester will have to be curtailed during the present year, owing to the want of finance in the district funds, which are so depleted that it is impossible to meet the expenses of the local ministry in traveling to and from the various branches. Many of the ministry who formerly met their own expenses in the district work are now unable to pay the cost of traveling, owing to bad trade in Lancashire. However we are hopeful that God will open the windows of heaven and send us showers of blessings both temporal and spiritual. The work of the district is progressing and although most of our people are feeling the effect of bad trade, they rejoice in the knowledge of the latter-day work, and those who are striving to serve God with sincerity find happiness and solace even in adversity."

A Testimony of Blessings Through Herald

The HERALD came to hand last evening and was so full of those things that cause the soul to rejoice that it seemed we could not refrain from bearing our testimony to some through its columns.

The article, "Shall we have faith" caused me to rejoice because we verily believe it is by faith that Zion will be established and the gospel preached to the nations of the earth. As it was when Judah returned from the Babylonish captivity to rebuild the temple and the word of the Lord came unto their leader, Zerubbabel, through the Prophet Zechariah, "Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts," so it is to-day, by the same power will the latter day ideals be established. In the words of President Smith, "There never has been a forward movement among the children of God since the beginning of the world that the opposing power has not sought to procrastinate the day of its culmination."

I am glad that I can say our missionary is a strong worker in support of the leaders of the church and his recent visit to Pine River did much toward inspiring the faith of the Saints here. He also manifested a spirit of sacrifice at the district conference. When a collection was taken to defray the expenses of the traveling ministry this brother requested that his share be placed as oblation as he had money for his needs at that time.

Our district president is a loyal worker and is building up the faith of the Saints. It is surprising what harm a very small seed of disloyalty will do in a place so far from the center. I fear those living in Zion do not defend the work as much as they should.

I was impressed with the resolution adopted by the joint council and the late conference on "Procedure in calls and ordinations." Our mind goes back to a little incident which happened in the Andes Branch which shows God's willingness to direct his people. The branch was organized in 1912 with an elder, priest, and teacher as officers. The following year we desired very much that a deacon should be added. There were some young men not holding the priesthood, faithful in service, and it was agreed one of these should be ordained deacon. Some said all that was necessary was to vote him in and have him ordained; others thought the Spirit should direct. So it was voted that we seek the Lord's will the following sacrament Sunday. The choice of the people favored Brother B—. The following Sunday when the Saints met the Lord spoke through the presiding officer in great power calling Brother B— to the office of teacher and another brother to be a deacon. Others also were given witness. And the wisdom of the calls was plainly seen. The Spirit was poured out in great power at the meeting so that young people from nine to fourteen years of age requested baptism, though it were necessary that they be buried in the icy waters.

The Saints are few here at Pine River, though they are faithful. Their hearts are right. The opposing power has been at work, trying to overthrow the work openly and secretly; but we believe there are souls here who will hear the voice of the Good Shepherd. The Methodist minister warns all to stay away from the Latter Day Saints if they do not wish to be caught. It was reported that he made the statement in a schoolhouse near here that if this work was not hindered it would convert the world.

Our meeting place was torn to pieces by reckless boys. We do not know that it was through especial antagonism to the church, though. We now hold services at the home of Brother and Sister Samuel Case, who always have their home ready for the service of God, or as a stopping place for his servants.

May the work of God go forward is our constant prayer. May loyalty to right be the watchword of God's people.

PINE RIVER, MINNESOTA.

MRS. C. B. FREEMAN.

From Wales to America

A Welch family acknowledges God's blessing in moving to Joseph's land.

It is quite a time since any matter from me has appeared in your columns. Since leaving the land of Wales we have experienced what most missionaries and their families are acquainted with, i. e., lonesomeness and homesickness.

It is not my purpose to write an article upon America or to return to Britain and lecture upon "My trip to America." Our compensation has come. Sister Jones and our one daughter joined us in August. We have another daughter in London, England, yet, and we are working and praying for her company too.

The industrial conditions in Great Britain are distressing and depressing to a terrible degree. The last two years of my life have been a great trial in many ways, spiritually and financially.

I heard a story several years ago told with such pathos that it has clung to me ever since. The story begins with a man upon an American train with a baby in his arms. He is trying by every means in his power to pacify it, but he is unsuccessful. His fellow passengers, trying to sleep, ask him rather gruffly to take the baby out or do something to quiet it, at which the man broke down and wept aloud, and, speaking of the baby, he said, "His mother's body lies in the baggage coach ahead." Enough; a dozen hands are ready in an instant to help and advise in the care of the infant. That is how things so often occur. Because we do not know, we do not understand.

I can truly say that many times we as a family have moved around to where we thought we could be of some assistance to the Lord's work. Some of those moves seem a failure, so far as their success goes; but we do not know—it is so difficult to decide.

In a depressed state of mind one night I dreamed that I had descended into a valley and the desire to rise was not very strong. My wife was feeling so badly about it all that my quandary was how to encourage her. We began the ascent. The landside was slippery and steep. But my feelings were to make the effort, saying, "Let us try." We moved a few steps and a handrail appeared; then sawdust to help us seemed to have been placed upon our path. But we did not know it until we tried to climb.

Encouragement came to me to steer to the west, and the mind became suddenly resolved to do so. But we had exhausted all our means. My son and I were idle and had done little work for over a year. But out of the slough we must get. I wrote to several people about it. Some assisted. The major part was loaned to us from a dear friend here in the United States. In a short time we got employment, and my son was talking to his boss regarding having his mother and sister come over here, when his boss offered me a sufficient sum of money to get the rest over, on a note of confidence. I gladly accepted it. This man knew us but a couple of months. God was back of that. "You move; the way will be opened up." Many interesting details are connected with these incidents that are better told than written.

The town of Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania, is laid out like many of our pretty English towns—clean, pleasant, and well lighted. A great many of its inhabitants are English. There is a nice church building and a branch of about forty members here, presided over by Brother Herbert Cunningham. One of the patriarchs resides here in the person of Brother Archibald Angus. There are also two high priests, three elders, one priest, two teachers, and two deacons here. That is hard to beat for so small a branch.

We had a beautiful prayer service on the new Sunday morning of 1923. Brother Whitehead, of New York, was present with us. He is a grandson of the Whitehead who was private secretary to Joseph the Martyr. The Lord told his people that some were being purified in sacrifice and consecration; others would be cleansed by afflictions.

My brother Alfred has arrived here from Nantyglo, Wales.

My grandfather, Isaac Jones (mentioned in the Church History dealing with Wales), presided over the Nantyglo Branch; my father, Jones Jones, myself, and the brother mentioned, all in turn; and we feel sad that it seems things are such now that the stakes must be raised.

We have preached a great deal in many parts of Wales with but meager success as to the numbers preached to. But some men's work seems a series of successes by baptisms. Others seem to be able to stand as testimonies. Many times do the words of certain people recur to me: "Well, I have borne my testimony." That work of being valiant in testimony—yes, a straightforward declaration in favor of the truth—seems at times all that God demands. In fact, "faith cometh by hearing."

I know by over twenty-eight years of experience that this work has humanity and divinity in it. I desire to cling closely to all good men and God.

Yours for the truth, THOMAS JONES.

A new department in Autumn Leaves is the Radio Department, edited by Arthur B. Church, president of the Central Radio Company. It has excellent suggestions, and one of the leading articles in the issue for March is, "How to listen to the church radio programs." In addition is much of interest to all, whether novice or expert.

New Edition

A Marvelous Work and a Wonder

By Daniel Macgregor

We have just issued from our press the fourth large edition of this most popular book by one of our leading missionaries. This edition has been greatly revised, has a large number of illustrations added to it, and is in more convenient size than previous editions.

It is in the usual book size with large, clear type, convenient footnotes, complete contents references, and in every way a most desirable book for those who would investigate the claims of the church we represent.

Some of our thoughtful people have believed that it largely takes the place of The Voice of Warning since the latter work was issued in the early days of the church and emphasized the problems of those days while this book includes those and much more.

In some quarters where this book is least known it has a reputation for being a book on the "hoofs and horns of the Bible." While several chapters are devoted to a discussion of the prophecies of Daniel and Revelation and these are carefully and clearly analyzed and presented therein, the larger portion of the book is devoted to a straight-forward presentation of the most essential factors in the restoration of the gospel.

The kingdom of God as set up by Christ being a real organization with a graphic presentation of the principles, officers, and functions of the church with accompanying requirements such as revelations are all presented in excellent form.

The Reformation with its effect on the Restoration and considerable discussion of the signs of the times have a prominent place.

One of the most important chapters is entitled, "The restoration accomplished." This is subdivided under twenty-two headings and especially discusses the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, prophecies concerning it, with literary and moral features of the book, its use and purposes, with evidences of archaeology.

It is essentially a book for investigators, especially those of the studious type of mind. It is further an invaluable help to those who do not have the privilege of hearing these subjects intelligently discussed by persons fully acquainted with the scope of the church historically and doctrinally.

The price is very low considering the amount of convenient material offered. The book has had an especially large sale which will no doubt continue as it becomes more widely known. It answers so many questions that are raised concerning the church, its origin, etc., that every Saint should have one copy on hand, especially for loaning.

In two styles of binding: Paper, stapled, 35 cents each or four for $1.25, postpaid. Cloth binding, 60 cents each.

Fighting Adversity Successfully

I have been greatly benefited and encouraged by reading the wonderful experiences and testimonies of others, so I thought I would relate one that I have had. I am greatly incapacitated with rheumatism and at the present time am confined to the house all the time.

When I came home from Graceland College in 1904 I had no money at all and was not able to work to make any. The change in climate made my rheumatism worse, so that I had to use a walking stick in each hand to get around. I had taken a business course in Graceland but I could not find any job around home and was not able to go away to look for one. So I waited and prayed for work that I could do to make my support.

One morning about three o'clock a voice, distinct and clear, pierced my whole body saying, "Read and study all good books." It waked me up and I lay there for an hour thinking what this should mean. I knew it was from God, as the evil power would not advise me to read "good" books.

The question with me now was, How could I read and study books that I did not have? I did not have money with which to buy them, nor was I able to work to make the money. Anyway, I wanted work just then more than I did books. So I asked the Lord to open up the way for me to get the necessary books.

One day I got hold of a piece of woven wire fencing, which I tore up and used for making horse muzzles. I had no trouble in selling them. I then ordered the first volume of the Church History, and some other books. Then I kept on until in a short time I owned nearly all the books the Herald Office handled, and all the publications.

I have had many more manifestations of the Spirit in my life. The Spirit has spoken to me a number of times, telling me all would be well, and this has helped me to be patient and bear my afflictions without complaint. I ask the Saints to pray for me.

Hoping this may cheer some one else in like condition and enable them to press onward and upward and to bear their afflictions with patience, always asking the Lord to help you, I am,

MCKENZIE, ALABAMA.

Your brother in Christ,

M. S. WIGGINS.

Optimism Urged

As I do not often see any letters in the HERALD from California Saints, I write hoping that the contents of this letter may be of some benefit to one or all who may read it. I want to be personal and tell you, the one who is now reading this, that I love you; love you because my Elder Brother has directed me to do so, and I am able so to do for the Comforter has softened my heart and made it a pleasure to me to love my brothers and sisters and encourage them to be loyal, faithful, and true to our Master, to themselves, and to the church. Surely the church is the kingdom of God on the earth, and any member who will keep the law (love God and man as directed in the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants), is laying up treasures in heaven and "where your treasure is there will your heart be also."

In my twenty-nine years of membership in this church I have passed through many trials and troubles; but never for a moment have I doubted the divinity of this latter-day work, and my experiences have helped me to feel for others and to help them in every way I am able. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth," etc. (Read Hebrews 12: 6-10.) "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten." (Revelation 3: 19.) If we profit by our Christian experiences it will be to our benefit. If you are discouraged or cast down or doubting, believe me, dear brother or sister, it will be only for a time. Have faith in God, and after you are tried our Father will by his Spirit chase away the discouragement or doubt. He is true and faithful and his promises are sure and will all come to pass in his own due time.

I love this work better than anything else on earth and I am perfectly assured in my soul that all will be well with the faithful and pure in heart. May the God of peace and comfort help us all to more fully realize his goodness and his love, that it may be well with us here and hereafter.

The Gospel in Its Fullness Causes Joy

Some years have passed since last I wrote to your columns. I would like to often, but feel rather to give way to others whose letters perhaps are more inspiring, and there are so many fine articles to be found in your pages that I hesitate to occupy the space. However, there comes the desire today to once more contribute, perhaps because one day this week marked my tenth year in this church and my thoughts have been concentrated somewhat and I can truly say, "How well I remember the dawn of that day," a very cold day in North Dakota, when my companion and I were led by the Spirit the truth to obey and were baptized by Elder Jerome E. Wildermuth.

The time I have been in the church is short compared to others who have been members some forty or fifty years; but, Saints, let me say I have lived in those ten years "a passing as it were from death unto life." We read in Ephesians 4: 14, "That we henceforth be no more children tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men and cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive."

The above appealed to me. While there was a tossing to and fro, there was always a restraining effort on my part when it came actually to joining churches. I knew more about the Catholic and Episcopal doctrines than any others, yet I instinctively knew they were not the absolute truth. When I say, "I know this work is God's work and this his church," I often hear the Saints testify to the same. It is not simply because I have witnessed especially the manifestation of the gifts to any large degree, but rather it has been the operation of that holy and divine Spirit upon my very life, that Comforter that was promised. In short, it was a realization I had received that which the other churches failed to give, the gospel in all its fullness.

Dear Saints, there are many testimonies I have had in regard to this great latter-day work that to many would seem small, the evidence of things unseen, the answer to an appeal made in truth and earnestness for light on things eternal, and for light on different phases of our work. Remember, we were isolated and without books on any subject, and we were too poor then to invest in anything but our three books. I did secure them, but so many, many times I had to look up and sing, "My faith looks up to Thee." God never left us alone under those conditions.

Oh, that I could overcome self, this nature which is so peculiar and has always been. The process seems slow and many times I feel unless I make more headway in the next ten years my reward will be small. Still I know in this gospel one realizes as never before the justness of our God. One will get out of it only that which he puts in.

It is now three years since we came to Zion, and I pray that here as elsewhere I may be found standing in "holy places." I am not much given to the thought that we can fall asleep on our rights elsewhere and then come up to Zion and make a hasty preparation spiritually. I believe it will come easier if we have first stood in holy places, and I trust that I have come with no other thought but to be found at least trying to do the Master's will.

My heart goes out to the isolated ones. But be of good cheer; be faithful to your covenant, and the promise is, "He shall not leave you nor forsake you."

And now, dear Saints, though not as a matter of form, I ask an interest in your prayers for we are weak, frail children and we make many, many mistakes. It seems so often that we have to turn about face, so to speak, and begin again. The times are distressing; perilous times are at hand. To-day I may stand, but what of the morrow? God help us! May the work go on. May we realize more fully that Zion is just what God said it was, the "pure in heart."

Yours in bonds, MARY E. SLATER.

Response to Inventory Call

I am glad to report that the outlook for Detroit is very good. Also, that the present is one of forward movement and tranquillity. Our Detroit Branch business meeting, the second Tuesday of this month, was characterized by almost complete unity.

I urged upon the priesthood of the city at our last general meeting, the first Sunday of this month, that all make out their inventories and pledge themselves to help in the local expenses of the branch here, for all to obey the law of tithes and offerings, and I would do the same. Then we could go to the Saints and accomplish more in persuading them to observe the law. The idea seems to be taking root very strongly as I am told that all the inventories sent here by the Presiding Bishopric have been sought and the brothers acting as counselors to Bishop Blair told me they would send for more at once. I hope to see more accomplished in this line here this year than ever before. We feel hopeful, no untoward circumstances developing.

The services are being well attended here, at the several meeting places.

With sincere regards and best wishes, I am, your brother,
G. R. KUYKENDALL.

Encouraging Financial Reports

Bishop E. O. Clark, of the Des Moines District, has just forwarded us a copy of his report to the conference for the calendar year ending December 31, 1922, which shows a total received from tithes and offerings of $5,792.40 as compared with $5,750.39 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and $4,462.33 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

It will be interesting to know that the amount per capita paid in tithes and offerings in the Southern California District has been the highest average of any district in the church for several years. Their per capita for 1917 was $13.60; in 1918 it was $13.98; in 1920, $9.66; in 1921, $13.57.

Massachusetts District for the year ending June 30, 1921, had a per capita of $17.22. Their highest average before that period was during 1918 when they reached $8.89 per capita.

Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, District for the year ending June 30, 1921, had a per capita of $19.39 which was about three times as much as the two years preceding.

It will doubtless be interesting to the Saints in your district to watch your Bishop's agent's reports and ascertain what amount of tithes and offerings is paid per capita. These per capitae are based upon the payments made through the local bishop or Bishop's agent and do not include any contributions made direct to the Presiding Bishop's office.

Sincerely yours,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

A Testimony and Exhortation

I was much interested in President Smith's article in the last HERALD in regard to stewardships. He mentioned the letter printed some time ago in the HERALD that was written by a farmer to Brother Smith. I suppose many of our readers read it, also the letter written by our young English brother telling how he had been looking for work nearly two years.

I wonder how many of the Saints know how it feels to be located in a big city with a wife and three little ones and thrown out of work in midwinter through no fault of your own, but just because your employer gets a chance to hire a boy (that lives at home and pays no board) for one half of what you were getting. That happened to me in the city of Providence twenty-six years ago this winter. My employer hired into his store through the holidays a number of young fellows, and, after they were broken in and could do the work, laid off a number of men with families. I was one. Only a short time before he told a friend of mine that I was faithful. He said when he laid me off, "I have no fault to find with you, but these young fellows can do the work and I can hire them much cheaper. I have got to work for my own interests. I will give you a written recommendation." I refused the recommendation and tramped the streets of Providence looking for work until I was soulsick. One Wednesday night I came home tired and discouraged. I didn't have the heart to start for prayer meeting. As we were talking over our troubles my wife said, "Let's pray." So we went into the little bedroom and poured out our supplications to our God. The windows of heaven seemed to open and such a blessing as we received! I had been before instantly healed of appendicitis and had received the baptism of the Holy Ghost, but the blessing that night overshadowed all blessings I had ever received before. My wife spoke up and said, "God is able to send some one here to hire you."

We arose with glad hearts and I went to prayer meeting.

I think it was the next evening we heard a knock at the door and I opened it and a gentleman I had known years before stood there. He asked me if I would go to Woonsocket, Rhode Island, and take charge of a restaurant that he had traded some real estate for until he could sell it out. He offered me as much as I had been getting in the store and my board. Years after, this man told me that I was the only man he could think of that he dared to trust.

I am thankful for those experiences for they taught me the value of money and to be frugal. In one of the last revelations received through our late Brother Joseph Smith, the Saints were admonished to be frugal in their living expenses and the church was counseled to not build costly church buildings. I wonder how many Saints are giving heed to that word of God. If I had been as lavish in my living expenses as many of our people I never could have paid a cent of tithing. I have raised to manhood and womanhood four sons and two daughters, all active members of the church and given four of my children piano lessons and paid quite a little tithing and taught all of the children to pay tithing.

I know of those in the church who have a much larger income and smaller family, and their clothing and other expenses are so large that they cannot get anything saved for a home. I know of others who with only one half as much income and larger families have got, by frugal living (that is by being careful in their buying of supplies), homes of their own and paid quite a lot of tithing. A man who is getting from forty to seventy dollars each week and spending it all on a small family, doesn't feel like coming down in his living expenses and sharing with the poor, unfortunate Saints and fulfilling God's command to be equal in temporal things.

Recently I was talking with one of our local business men and he told me that there were 45,000 members of the Ku Klux Klan right in this section. He is a good old Yankee and a political man and seemed worried about the conditions that exist. I believe the time isn't far in the future when that spoken of in the Doctrine and Covenants will come, that he who will not take up his sword to fight against his neighbor must needs flee to Zion.

Are we going to sleep as the Jews did and not prepare, and be destroyed as they were? Is Jesus weeping over us as he wept over Jerusalem? Is he saying, "How often I would have gathered you, but ye would not"?

Jesus requires all of our surplus property to be put into the Lord's storehouse. Jesus requires every Saint to be careful and saving (frugal) in his living expenses. Jesus requires that those goods and moneys that we retained be used by us as wise stewards to gain more money or goods (or talents), all of which are to be cast into the Lord's storehouse to be used for the good of the whole church.

Can one small family of Saints spend from thirty to seventy dollars per week in careless buying, when by living in a little less style they might save from five to twenty dollars per week, while other Saints through no fault of their own are really in need of the common comforts of life, and escape the wrath of God?

It isn't enough for us to give a tenth of what we have left when we have spent of our income in a lavish manner. We are to be frugal. If you had a daughter suffering in Germany for necessary food and you were getting only twenty-five or thirty dollars a week, wouldn't you try to send her some money to feed her little ones and herself? Jesus said the greatest commandment was to love the Lord our God with all our soul, mind, and strength, and the next to the greatest is that we shall love our neighbor as ourselves.

This is a day of sacrifice and the tithing of my people, saith the Lord. But where is the sacrifice when a man takes off the money in the bank that he doesn't really need and gives it into God's storehouse? As long as we have all the good, nourishing food we need, a comfortable home, and respectable clothing, we are not sacrificing anything. We are to sacrifice by going without new dresses, coats, hats, etc., when those that we already have will do without our being really shabby. We are to sacrifice by being careful in buying meat and groceries, etc. A pot roast from the shoulder is just as nice and more juicy than one cut off the sirloin and can be bought much cheaper. In many other ways we can sacrifice for our daughter in Germany, or our brother in Wales, that Brother Gillen told us about, who for a whole week had no other food to offer Brother Gillen than bread and tea and no money to pay the car fare home from the depot where he met Brother Gillen and no money to buy new clothes.

I don't want to be left when the call rings through the heavens, "The Bridegroom cometh, go ye forth to meet him." Our sacrifices will look small then, and if they have only helped to make our garments acceptable to our Lord and he lets us come in, how happy we shall be.

But if we have enjoyed our good things and our brother his poor things, we may be like Dives and Lazarus.

Ever praying that Zion may be clothed in the righteousness of the Saints, I remain,

Your brother in Christ,

GROTON, CONNECTICUT.

THOMAS G. WHIPPLE.

Radio in the Church

Even the most dull of comprehension among us is coming to recognize some of the missionary possibilities of radio. In spite of this I do not think that any effort has been made to take advantage of the opportunities open to us in other countries.

From what little I know of this work I understand that the first one to commence broadcasting has prior claim on some of the facilities for work. However this may be, it is certain that with the rapid development of radio in other countries, a development which will without doubt parallel that in this country when once it takes hold, we shall gain immense advantages from having some intelligent radio expert watching our interests.

The ideal at which we should work is of course to have a receiving station in every branch, and a sending station at every important center. This may be far off, but we should at least keep this ideal in view.

In the light of the above I wish to suggest that you get reports on the possibilities of establishment of radio headquarters in Australia, Great Britain, the Islands, and possibly Canada, so that we can be on a par with other religious organizations in this respect.

A further development of this idea will be the recognition of the fact that to speak over the radio is an art in itself. In the light of this I will also suggest that the Graceland station be kept in good condition, and that the religious education students be given opportunity to study this aspect of coming missionary work under ideal conditions. It might even be worth while to arrange with Brother Church to go there during the year to give a lecture on the possibilities in this direction, so that we can be sure that our men are alive to the significance of radio activity.

Sincerely yours,

F. HENRY EDWARDS.

Missionaries Welcome to Holland

The Presidency are in receipt of a letter from Brother John J. Graven, of Schiedam, Holland, who writes: "I can tell you that I was very happy to shake hands with the Brethren Postma and Veenstra, and we all have the same conviction that the Lord will lead us to the upright of the earth."

Helping Poor Children in Manchester

As a sister of the Northeast Branch, Bradford, Manchester, England, it gives me great pleasure to write to the HERALD. It is a joy to me to be a Latter Day Saint, for as I get older I see the more beauty in the gospel. For the many blessings that have been mine I have a strong desire to serve the Lord, and grow to be a good woman.

Our respected brother, J. Dewsnup, the president of the district, gave this motto for the year 1923: "Service for God." I am sure this put into practice will make us true Latter Day Saints.

For two Christmas days the Saints at our branch have been able to give a free breakfast for five hundred poor children who live in the district. It is when we see the poverty surrounding these little ones that we realize God's goodness to us as Saints.

I hope that I will value the sense of the gospel and ever try with you to follow in the Master's footsteps.

Hoping this work we love will continue to grow and prosper is my testimony as a Latter Day Saint.

Yours in gospel bonds, A. SCHOFIELD.
CLAYTON, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND, 18 Heather Street.

Niagara Falls, Ontario

We write these few lines hoping they will encourage all branches which are steadily losing in membership, that no matter how few working members there are, they will cooperate, and be faithful through the trials which they must pass and overcome before attaining that peaceful influence that is always found with a flourishing and God-fearing people.

This branch has had an extremely hard fight for existence during the past few years, and our numbers have been gradually decreasing. Our services all seemed to spell "failure" with the exception of the Religio Department and that, under the supervision of Superintendent Sister Franks and officers, managed to enjoy as much of God's Spirit as possible considering local conditions.

With the close of 1922 a dark page for us is sealed, and under our new president, Elder D. Pycok, the year 1923 was ushered in full of encouragement and rejoicings, and it is proved that God has not forsaken this part of his vineyard.

Elder C. M. Clifford, our district missionary, paid us a two weeks surprise visit, January 7 to 21, and with the elements all against us it is with satisfaction we state that he must have felt that God was pleased and blessed every effort and hope he held out. During this time he did fine work: Twenty were baptized and several left very much interested. The sermons and lessons were enjoyed by all and we received of the Spirit abundantly. He was called upon to take charge of the funeral service of our late Sister Stoner. Hundreds attended this solemn ceremony to pay their last tribute of respect to one beloved by all. The address was wonderful, and the Spirit of God rested with our brother to such an extent that both strangers and old-time members were present at our evening service, to listen to his farewell sermon. The church was filled to capacity.

Brothers and Sisters, we need your earnest prayers, that now we have been raised from the depths of despondency to hope, we all may be humble and live as near perfection as possible to show to our heavenly Father our appreciation for his mercy and restoration of all good things.

MARTIN A. WARE, Correspondent.

Council Bluffs and Vicinity

The pastor has been absent from the city for some days. We learn that he is in Denver.

At the business meeting Brother Frederick Timm was elected financial clerk.

There has been appointed a social for the entire branch under the supervision of the Religio, to commemorate the coming Valentine holiday. The members have been divided up into groups governed by the class work they are doing and their ages. We look for some developments we trust will be altogether pleasant.

Baptisms every week of late. Brother G. J. Harding baptized one last Sunday the 4th inst.

Brother J. A. Hansen, of Hazel Dell, has been holding a two weeks' series of services at Neola, assisted by Joshua Carlile and P. T. Anderson. Some interest, and some brought nearer to the church and its faith.

Spirituality is the theme on the lips of many as they are considering that we are in the hastening time, and the word of God is the thing most desired in all our study and searchings. An excellent sermon was delivered by the pastor on the night of the 28th on "Our attitude to each other as Saints."

Minneapolis, Minnesota

The Minneapolis Branch has had a very prosperous year. Through the efforts of Brother Kress, who, while being engaged daily in a shoe store in Minneapolis, has devoted with great zeal and sacrifice his time to preaching several times a week in different homes both in Saint Paul and Minneapolis. Seven people were baptized in the last two months. A contest was staged the last four months of the year 1922 for Christmas offering and the school was able to raise about $220.

The small building that is now used is fast becoming too small. Under the splendid direction of Sister Johnson, the Sunday school has grown until it is with difficulty that room is found for the several classes. The Religio under the supervision of Brother Wesley Elvin is also making vast strides to meet the needs of the young people. We are indeed fortunate to have Brother Elvin, who is a graduate of Grace-land College and the University of Minnesota, with us. He is full of zeal, ambition, and has a great deal of patience. On account of the lack of room, the branch is now making a strenuous effort to raise money for either an addition, or a new building. The wage earners of the branch are giving one day's salary each month for this purpose.

We have a fine set of officials. There are about eight members of the priesthood, who rotate more or less in the preaching. This includes, too, Brother Sparling, who has been with us since General Conference as one of the missionaries for this district.

Besides making strong efforts to improve spiritually, and bring our gospel to others, the entertainment committee has arranged several parties. Each group has its own parties or socials about every week or two. The young people in one group, the older people in another, and Sister Lister and Brother Lee Judson in charge of the younger people. All have enjoyed separate parties, such as skating, tobogganing, and house parties, and all have gathered at the church for a general social time.

The district conference on February 3 and 4 came off nicely. A large degree of the Spirit was felt, and Brother Wesley Elvin and Brother Lee Judson were called and ordained to the offices of priest and teacher respectively. We were also glad to see the visiting Saints from Duluth, and other places. Brother Day and Brother J. E. Wildermuth as president of the district and conference missionary aided very materially to the spirituality of the meetings.

The young people took up a collection among themselves and bought a radio outfit for Sister Seaman, of Saint Paul, who because of her affliction cannot leave her home.

The church is located on the corner of Fifth Street and Queen Avenue, on the west side of Minneapolis. We would appreciate any Saints coming through to stop off and see us. We were very pleased to see Brother Ray Carmichael who is in the city for a few months on work for the Government.

Niagara Falls, New York

The year 1922 has passed into history but we look back at it with a degree of satisfaction, feeling that although there has been some discouragement, there has been much progress and the spirit of "less of self and more of Thee" has been manifest in general throughout the branch.

Sister George Landes and the pianist, Sister Robbins, deserve much credit for their work with the junior and senior choirs, and the rendering of the cantata, "The Christmas King," on Christmas Eve was much appreciated. Brother and Sister George Landes are largely our musical "inspirers" and an orchestra has been Brother George's hobby with more or less success. He is going right ahead with plans for the coming year, just as though he had never heard such a word as failure. Can such a spirit do other than win?

Religio has not yet got all the axles greased for action but it finished out the old year under the leadership of Brother Victor Joy in good condition and a spirit of cooperation and determination by all to study to show themselves approved workmen that need not be ashamed.

The Sunday school under the able leadership of Elder C. A. Spilsbury, assisted by Sister P. Ely, has done good work, and if the growth continues the sides will be pushed out of the church. We hear whisperings even now of a new church.

On the first Sunday of the month we held our regular sacrament service, followed by prayer and testimony meeting, which was indeed a feast of good things, and the message of encouragement and admonition given at that time left its impress on the minds of all present and surely augurs well for the coming year.

May the spirit of unity and service reign throughout the whole church is the prayer of
A. H. M.

Youngstown-Sharon District

The Youngstown-Sharon district conference was held at Sharon, Pennsylvania, January 13 and 14, and was presided over by Elders Gomer T. Griffiths and D. H. Jones. Saturday evening Elder Ahlstrom, president of the branch and district Bishop's agent, gave a talk on the temporal aspect of tithing, and Elder James E. Bishop spoke on the spiritual aspect of tithing. The talks were very enlightening to those present and gave each one something to think about.

Sunday morning there was a priesthood meeting in charge of Elder Griffiths, who gave some fine counsel to those present concerning their duties to God and their fellow men. Sabbath school was at 9.30 o'clock.

Business session of the conference was at 11 o'clock, in charge of Elders G. T. Griffiths and D. H. Jones. At this service Brother Jones presented the following names for ordination, which were accepted by the conference: Luther M. Evans, priest; D. B. Morgan, teacher; William McCune, elder. These brothers were ordained in the meeting held at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The following business was transacted: President D. H. Jones presented his resignation, which was accepted, and Elder James E. Bishop was elected to fill the unexpired term. Following a recommendation from Elder Griffiths, Elder Jones was elected district vice president. We feel very fortunate to have as good a man as Elder Bishop to preside over our district.

At the 2 o'clock service a spiritual feast was enjoyed, several being spoken to by the gift of prophecy.

Brother Griffiths preached a wonderful sermon on "Faith" in the evening, which was greatly enjoyed by all present.

M. Terry; Walnut Park, preaching by Apostle Paul M. Hanson and Elder L. E. Hills; Enoch Hill, preaching by Elder W. D. Bullard and Elder Charles Warren; Liberty Street, preaching by Elder J. B. Barrett and Apostle Roy S. Budd.

The radio program at 6 o'clock Sunday evening consisted of a musical program under the direction of Sister Bernice Griffith and a lecture by President Frederick M. Smith on the subject, "Stewardships." Many letters are coming in reporting that the radio programs broadcasted by the church every Sunday evening are being favorably received and many hundreds are enjoying the benefits who otherwise would be unable to attend our services.

Apostle John W. Rushton reached Independence last Tuesday, coming by way of Omaha where he preached to the Saints on the fourth. He will preach next Sunday evening at six o'clock at the radio service, and at eight o'clock will preach at the Liberty Street Church.

Elder S. A. Burgess is back at the editorial desk after a few days in Saint Louis.

Elder John F. Sheehy, whose mission field is now in the Far West Stake, came to the Sanitarium for a slight operation last week and was reported as doing very well. He will be there but a few days.

Mrs. Thomas J. Atkinson, who came to Independence from Saint Thomas, Ontario, about three years ago, died February 9 and was buried from the Stone Church Monday, February 12. Pastor R. V. Hopkins preached the funeral sermon.

Bishop J. A. Koehler, of the Far West Stake, was in Independence Monday on church business.

Elder R. D. Weaver, who about two weeks ago underwent a serious operation at the Independence Sanitarium, is still gaining and in a few days will be enabled to be up and around.

Apostle Roy S. Budd, who now has his home in Independence, returned from his mission field in Oklahoma last week.

Bishops Benjamin R. McGuire and James F. Keir went to Lamoni Tuesday of last week and spent the entire week there. In addition to meeting with the board of the Electric Light Company and looking after various other financial interests that the church has in Lamoni, Bishop McGuire preached for the Saints on Sunday morning and Bishop Keir at night. They returned to Independence Monday.

President Elbert A. Smith went to Lamoni last week to deliver a series of lectures to the Religious Education class at Graceland College. He was to have returned to Independence Monday, but was taken with a slight attack of influenza and his return will be delayed for a few days.

Mrs. Joseph R. Lambert died of pneumonia Thursday evening, February 8, in Independence where she has lived the last few years. Sister Lambert, the wife of Patriarch Joseph R. Lambert, and mother of Richard J. Lambert and Mrs. Arthur H. Mills, had a wide acquaintance throughout the church, her husband's work as apostle and patriarch extending over many years. There was a short service Friday afternoon at the home of R. J. Lambert in Independence at which Presiding Patriarch Frederick A. Smith spoke and prayers were offered by Elder W. D. Bullard and Doctor Joseph Luff. Early Saturday morning the family accompanied the remains to Lamoni, Iowa, where the Lamberts had lived for many years, and on Sunday afternoon the funeral was held at the Brick Church there. Bishop A. Carmichael preached this sermon and interment was in the family plot at Rose Hill Cemetery.

Radio News

Beginning with this issue we are publishing some of the many letters received regarding receipt of the religious programs broadcast each Sunday evening from the Independence studio of the Central Radio Company, Kansas City, Missouri. These religious services are the only ones sent out by this station. The program will appear weekly in this column. The following are excerpts from a few of the many letters received. Most of them are not members of the church. A card is being prepared which will be sent to all who write, giving information about the program, the station, and where to get literature about the church.

HOLDEN, MISSOURI. We heard the entire program and enjoyed it all. Your sermon [President Smith's] was good and covered well the subject, considering the short space of time occupied. We heard you very plainly. I am a believer in the practical utility and effectiveness of the radio as a means of reaching many people with our message—thousands who will never hear it in any other way. And for this reason I wish we had a broadcasting station the equal of any in all this region. I hope to see this a reality.—H. E. Moler.

DES MOINES, IOWA. We heard the services you broadcasted this evening; the music, however, was more distinct than the sermon. I have a very good receiving set and though I have heard from all over the United States this is the first time I have heard from Independence.—Kenneth Davis.

ORRICK, MISSOURI. I have been listening to your sermons; can hear every word, and being rather familiar with the history of your church I take the liberty of writing you and sending you a clipping on the death of David Whitmer which I think you will appreciate. I was intimately acquainted with David Whitmer; have seen and examined the manuscript and had Uncle Dave explain all about the translation. I have also seen the prophecies in pamphlet form given by Joseph Smith in regard to the church going into abomination and priestcraft. No man stood higher in Richmond for truth, veracity, and charity than Uncle Dave Whitmer. He died as he lived. Please take care of the clipping. I am not a member of your church, I am with the Christian Union; am seventy-six years old.—John M. Pigg.

SAINT JOSEPH, MISSOURI. I had the pleasure of hearing your address, as it was broadcasted from your station. I assure you I enjoyed it very much, and could hear distinctly every word throughout your sermon.—Emery Mitchell.

VAUGHN, MISSISSIPPI. I enjoyed the talk by Doctor Smith very much. Thanks for your splendid programs. Drop me a line and send me your schedule.—Albert L. Presley.

HINSDALE, ILLINOIS. Sunday evening, February 4, I was successful in picking up W P E very clearly and distinctly just before you signed off. Heard you ask for reports on reception of your signals so you might inform your artists and check up on how you were getting out. If available I would appreciate receiving your schedule in order that I may listen for you again.—W. L. Blackman.

MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE. Heard your station Sunday evening. You came in very clear. Enjoyed your concert.—W. G. Snowden.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO. I heard you sign off Sunday about 5.45 mountain standard time. I got your address, but due to the terrific static from the mountain storms that day I missed your call. As I am keeping a list of stations heard I would appreciate a reply containing your name and call.—Allen Kinsman.

BEDFORD, IOWA. Your signal strength very good for last few days. Always "on" for you.—O. R. Toman.

ATCHISON, KANSAS. We heard the program put out by you and it came in clear on the detector alone.—Sloan Munsen.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI. The members of my family listened in to the radio musical program and lecture Sunday evening at 6 o'clock. The lecture and music were heard distinctly and much enjoyed.—George V. Jones.

MARSHALL, MISSOURI. I received your station W P E very clearly Sunday, February 4, and would appreciate a card from you.—William Fisher.

DES MOINES, IOWA. We received your program last night, February 4. It was fairly distinct but quite faint. I use two steps of amplification. Hope to hear more of your programs.—Lee O. Mussell.

LEROY, KANSAS. We heard the fine sermon from your station last evening and enjoyed it very much. Thank you.—Mr. and Mrs. F. Herdman.

BLANDINSVILLE, ILLINOIS. I heard your station Sunday, February 4, very loud and clear. Please send me your program schedule and wave length.—Ehrman Huff.

WINSTON, MISSOURI. I heard your tests 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. I am using crystal set with silicon for the crystal and all the tests came in clear. I can hear Atlanta, Georgia, almost every night and sometimes I hear Pittsburgh and Schenectady. I have heard over twenty-four radio stations and expect to keep adding to my list.—Orville Mitchell.

PETERSBURG, ILLINOIS. Your concert of February 4, A No. 1.—William Ramsay, jr.

MISSOURI VALLEY, IOWA. I have been receiving your Sunday evening religious program for the Latter Day Saint church from 6 to 7. This evening was some plainer than other evenings. I receive the Sweeney Automotive and Electrical school of Kansas City plainer. Wish you much success.—C. A. Kemmish.

SELLERSBURG, INDIANA. We had the pleasure of enjoying your program last evening. It is very good and we hope to hear you again.—Robert W. Dougherty.

MASON CITY, NEBRASKA. Heard your religious program to-night. Very good.—R. H. Duke.

TOPEKA, KANSAS. Program came in good on my crystal set. It was the best religious program of the evening.—R. N. Miller.

DUBUQUE, IOWA. We picked up your station for the first time about 6 p. m. Sunday evening, February 4, on your regular wave length. You seemed to come in quite as well as W D A F and W H B. Therefore I surmise that you must have a "regular" station. I hope you are pleased to receive this acknowledgment and would appreciate very much receiving schedule of your broadcasting from you. I would like very much to add W P E to my list of "steadies."—Leslie P. Platt.

ELLENVILLE, NEW YORK. I picked up your station recently and it came in very good. Hope I may receive your schedule so I may have the pleasure of hearing your station again.—Jennie M. Ellsworth.

RHINEBEAK, NEW YORK. Your concerts come through perfectly. Please send card as souvenir.—Charles Hebe.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI. I was one of the listeners to the Sunday evening program and was pleased to hear Doctor W. W. Smith's sermon, also the one before this last one, and hope they will still be continued.—Mrs. A. Tignor.

Report of Committee on Book of Mormon Archaeology

To the Presidency: We, your committee, appointed to examine the evidence presented by Elder L. E. Hills on Book of Mormon geography, beg leave to report as follows:

We listened to Brother Hills for eighteen hours up to March 3, 1919, and since that time have spent one evening listening to new evidence he had to present; and for fifteen hours to Elder F. F. Wipper, representing the position taken by the former archaeological committee; and to Sister J. G. Pointer for seven hours, examining the archaeological and mythological evidences offered by Brother Hills in support of his map. After hearing said evidences and considering the merits of the same, the following resolution was moved and adopted:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that on account of evidences that have come to light, and are continually accumulating, we feel that it is unwise, at the present time, to give indorsement to any map of the Book of Mormon geography.

Resolved further, That the work of Brother Hills has been valuable to the church in that it has stimulated study and research along the lines of the geography, archæology, and mythology of this country, and we earnestly urge the continued investigation by the church.

Resolved, That the secretary of this committee file copy of this resolution and report with the Presidency of the church.

To the First Presidency: We, the committee on Book of Mormon map, respectfully call attention to the several archaeological expeditions now operating, or planning to operate, in Central and South America. We are of the opinion that some one might, with profit, be appointed to accompany one or more of these expeditions on behalf of our archaeological interests.

Conference Minutes

WESTERN COLORADO.—At Delta, January 27 and 28. J. E. Yates from Phoenix, Arizona, J. D. Curtis from Colorado Springs, Colorado, J. T. Scannell from Durango, Colorado, and H. E. Merryman from Montrose, Colorado, were visiting missionaries and elders. Some excellent sermons containing admonition and advice were well received by the Saints; also a good program rendered showing much good talent. Following the resignation of N. E. Slick, publicity agent, H. E. Merryman was elected to succeed him. Next conference is to be held in connection with a reunion, time and place to be decided by the district presidency. Jewell Harshman, secretary.

Our Departed Ones

MYERS.—Arthur Myers, jr., son of Arthur and Ester Myers, was born, January 31, 1923. Died February 5, 1923, in the General Hospital, Kansas City, Missouri. Sermon by Amos T. Higdon from the home of P. J. Raw. Interment in Mount Grove Cemetery.

TRAIN.—Mary Train was born in Sweden. Baptized at the age of eighteen. Died in Omaha, Nebraska, at the age of seventy-six, January 23, 1923. She had been a sufferer for many years, paralysis was the immediate cause of her death. Her husband preceded her six years ago. Leaves four children, one grandchild, and one sister. Sermon by T. J. Elliott.

GROVER.—Merl O. Grover was born July 5, 1883, at Arlington, Nebraska. Baptized when a boy, but has been isolated from the church, nevertheless he aided in the work of Christianity in whatever community he resided. Although he was administered to before the operation the Lord saw fit to take him and he died in a hospital in Omaha, Nebraska, January 26, 1923. Leaves wife, three brothers, and four sisters. Funeral in Elk City Methodist Church. Sermon by T. J. Elliott.

GAMET.—Leo Elvin Gamet was born at Wheelers Grove, Iowa, May 4, 1897. Baptized at Bonesteel, South Dakota, where he grew to manhood. Died of pneumonia at Norfolk, Nebraska, November 23, 1922. He had been engaged in railroad work for the last six years and was a conductor at the time of his death. Leaves wife, baby daughter, father, mother, two sisters, and three brothers. Funeral sermon by M. A. Petersen. Interment in Prospect Hill at Norfolk.

LEWIS.—Ida Bell Roberts Lewis, beloved wife of Brother Daniel Lewis, was born July 22, 1872; passed peacefully away at her home in Casper, Wyoming, February 3, 1923. Her remains were brought to Independence, Missouri, for burial. Sister Lewis was the daughter of Elder I. N. Roberts and wife, many years a missionary. She was married to Daniel Lewis, son of Patriarch William Lewis, deceased, January 6, 1892, to whom she was a kind and affectionate companion for over thirty-one years. Two sons and three daughters were born to them, the sons preceding the mother to the better land. The companion, the daughters (Sister H. C. Snyder, Sister D. F. Herron, and Sister Jane Luvenia Lewis) with her mother, Sister I. N. Roberts, and William Roberts (a brother), one of the presidency of the Far West Stake, with one grandchild remain. She leaves also a host of friends as attested by the wonderful display of flowers from California to Illinois. She united with the church in early childhood and was ever a worker for the cause, having maintained a Sunday school in her home town as strength permitted. The services were held in the Stone Church and were under the general direction of Brother Carson, undertaker, with most appropriate appointments. The quartet singing was never better, the prayer by President E. A. Smith was fitting, and the sermon by Elder J. M. Terry, an old-time friend of both families, was from the text in Malachi, "And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts in that day when I make up my special treasure."

Blue Pencil Notes

Good advice very often has an uninterrupted journey, i. e., it goes in at one ear and out at the other and encounters nothing in transit.

The trouble with many sermons is that they do not contain enough vitamins.

The best remedy for undernourishment of the soul is the milk diet—the sincere milk of the word. Note how Paul gained weight when he changed from the diet of the Pharisees.

A small boy in an eastern city threw a snowball through an open window in the city power plant. As a result the snowball short-circuited the dynamo, and city street cars and lights were out of service for a quarter of an hour. The boy was as modest as he was accurate; and though very earnest and diligent search was made for him he could not be found. They say that any American boy may become president of the Nation; but probably no one of them cares to do so when there are other such opportunities.

The press chronicles the death of a certain Kansas farmer who had lived on his farm sixty-four years. He went there with a prairie schooner over long, hot, dusty emigrant trails. He lived to see eighteen transcontinental trains thunder past his farm daily, binding East to West. And just before he died his grandsons constructed a radio receiving set and the old man "listened in" to Kansas City, Boston, San Francisco. "It is black magic," was his comment. What a span that life covered, measured by changes! That was what Tennyson had in mind when he said, "Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay."

The radio seems almost to have a sense of humor. For many years a certain lady in Independence has nursed a very strong prejudice against Latter Day Saints. By no means could she be persuaded to attend one of our services. During the present winter she became interested in radio. At some expense she installed a receiving set. And the first thing she got was a sermon by one of our elders at the Stone Church broadcasting station. To her surprise she found it very interesting.

It is said that the mayor of San Francisco while dedicating a broadcasting station grew enthusiastic and invited all who heard him to send telegrams at his expense; and that telegrams began to pour in from distant points until his bill grew to more than three thousand dollars. Such at least is the story the newspapers told—and it may be true.

Three stone masons working on a cathedral were asked in turn what they were doing. The first answered, "I am waiting until it is five o'clock." The second said, "I am making seven dollars a day." The third answered, "I am building a cathedral." These three men were on the same pay roll, but they were not working at the same job.

Profanity is a confession of inferiority. The man who has nothing particularly forceful to say has recourse to big, hard-sounding cuss words in order to hold attention and make his conversation seem virile, just as butchers and cooks put very hot spices and condiments into bad meats or flat and insipid food. Swearing isn't bad simply because it is prohibited in the decalogue; it is bad psychologically. A man fools himself. If he has anything worth while to say, he will get an audience without his conversation being seasoned with profanity. If he hasn't anything worth while to say, the remedy is to get something worth while rather than to attempt to impose upon himself and the public. His seasoning at best is in bad taste and at worst is blasphemous.

"When those who have laid hold upon faith as great spoil are joined by crowds of others who wrap it round them like an outer garment, a revolution always occurs. The religion of strong feeling and of the heart passes into the religion of custom and therefrom of form and of law. A new religion may be instituted with the greatest vigor, the utmost enthusiasm, and a tremendous amount of inner emotion; it may at the same time lay ever so much stress on spiritual freedom—where was all this ever more powerfully expressed than in Paul's teaching?—and yet, even though believers be forced to be celibates and only adults be received, the process of solidifying and codifying the religion is bound to follow. Its forms then at once stiffen. In the very process of stiffening they receive for the first time a real significance, and new forms are added. Not only do they acquire the value of laws and regulations, but they come to be insensibly regarded as though they contained within them the very substance of religion; nay, as though they were themselves that substance."—Harnack, in What is Christianity?

The latest wedding always seems the best and the latest bride the loveliest. Humanity renews its youth at a wedding and is made better and sweeter by the perennial appeal of love. The bride and groom may seem foolish in their attentions each to the other, but in reality they are wise; and the spectators with charity overlook their effusiveness, themselves perhaps feeling condemned, and in their own hearts say to themselves, We are the foolish ones if we have let love's fires grow cold or have failed in our service at the altar. And from the wedding they go determined to buy a new ticket and take a new wedding trip and invite the honeymoon to come out from behind her cloud and shine upon them once more with her tender rays.

Live or Moribund Branch Presidents

A live, active, energetic district president, who though handling large business affairs still finds time to give much attention and work to the affairs of his district recently had occasion to travel through another district. Observing some conditions in the work of the church in the district visited which stirred him up a bit, he sought relief from his perturbation by writing the Presidency—not a bad idea, is it? We herewith present an extract from his letter in the hope that it will stimulate some to thinking, even if it does not stimulate some of the "stand-stillers" into action. He says:

"THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
Independence, Missouri.

"Dear Brethren: In my business I chanced to be a few days last week in — District. I talked a little on three different evenings at — and was pleased to learn that a series of meetings was planned for the near future.

"I may be treading on uninvited ground, but I just feel like telling some one my feelings, and I do not think I would be justified in telling anyone but you, therefore I venture. It stirs one to the core when visiting branches that appear to be standing still or retrograding and little in advance of twenty-five years ago. I can see no immediate future for branches where presided over by reactionaries, and where ignorance is bliss. Oh, Graceland! Oh, Graceland! seems to me to be our future hope. Instead of curtailing our religious course, I would that it might be increased a hundredfold.

"It may be I have caught a new vision, but it does seem to me that there was never as great a demand for men who can direct our branches and districts. What can be done, is the question. I know you men are doing all you can, and I am doing so little.

"It may be I will now feel better, as I have got part of this out to some one else. If you have any suggestions that will help me to do more efficient work, your suggestions or criticisms will be appreciated."

We can well appreciate the brother's perturbation over seeing the inactivity or lethargic activity of a branch in the rut, and we share with him the wish that men could be trained to carry our branch work throughout the church on to a higher plane. And we look with longing eyes towards the time when scores of young men and women will be in Graceland, training for this and other lines of church work.

Work in Graceland alone will not fill the bill; for the prime essential is consecrated devotion to the cause, a burning, ever-present desire to spend oneself for the church and in advancing its interests.

And when one is driven by a deep-seated, soul-stirring desire to serve, there is almost sure to accompany it a great desire for preparation; for as we see the vision of greatness towards which we should be moving, a consciousness of our own personal limitation will beat us with depressing effect. Then will be comprehended the significance of the command, "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman which needeth not to be ashamed." And with a consciousness of the scope of this command will come a search for the best opportunity for the development it indicates.

Studying alone is irksome and likely to be neglected for other things. The stimulation of class work is fully recognized.

We need in branches, in districts, live, restless workers, alert to the demands for progress. We need them in all lines of church work.

Oh, for a plentiful corps of young men and women consecrated to the service of God and his people, who stand ready to undertake the heavy task of preparation for intelligent service. Let us pray for such a corps of volunteers, and thank God for Graceland's equipment to help in their training; but let us also pray and work for the expansions of Graceland's equipment mentioned by the brother.

We need men and women of consecration, devotion, and purpose who are never satisfied with their achievement, but are struggling onward and upward along the road of progress and efficiency. The church needs the services of such persons; where are they?

F. M. S.

Why Study?

Only the deeply religious man is fully educated.

In a recent class the why and wherefore of study was up for discussion. What is education? How does it differ from training? Is study in any way different from religion? Which is first, faith or knowledge?

It is quite true that the word education is used in so many diverse senses that a definition is necessary before a clear statement is possible. We have, therefore, suggested many times that education is an unfolding of the natural powers of the individual; a full education would develop all of his powers to the fullest extent. This would include his spiritual, intellectual, and physical powers. In this sense his education is not completed until he has put on the stature of a man in Christ Jesus, and sees him as he is.

"Education" is rightly used in a more limited sense as preparation that we make here for life upon earth.

Training for efficient work in one line is not education. A man may be well trained for some special duty, mechanical or otherwise, and yet not be developed broadly, or fully educated. Education also includes not only development, but training.

Religion is a process of education or of spiritual development. The truest religion would also include physical and mental development. In the sense in which the words are ordinarily used, religion is not synonymous with education, but in a broad sense it can be made so. This, of course, does not mean that schooling or the receiving of degrees is synonymous with either education or religion, though it is one of the processes by which education may be promoted, and, rightly applied, our religious nature developed.

Faith Without Education?

Can there be faith without education? There certainly can be faith without schooling. Can there be faith without knowledge? The question is about as intricate as, Which is first, the egg or the hen? Unless there is faith we do not proceed to gain knowledge; unless there is knowledge there is no foundation for our faith. But the child begins from birth with both faith and knowledge and proceeds to develop and gain further knowledge and faith.

Faith and knowledge are not two components which must be confined within a narrow space. Rather, knowledge is the foundation on which our faith may be erected. If there are any limits to knowledge or faith, they are far beyond human comprehension. Within our finite limits it certainly is true that the broader our knowledge, the greater is our foundation for a righteous faith; on a limited foundation only a limited structure of faith can be erected.

If, however, on our foundation pride is erected, vanity in our own limited knowledge, then there remains but little room for the erection of faith. But after all that is because the foundation is not one of knowledge, but over it has been laid a deep layer of ignorance; namely, ignorance of the importance of the knowledge of God; ignorance of our own limited knowledge and faculties; ignorance of how much we do not know.

The farmer boy is not uneducated. He knows a multitude of things about nature: the growing of grasses, the habits of animals, both wild and tame, the ways of plant life and the flowers of the field. He perceives the stars when he lifts up his eyes. He can hardly live without gaining a certain knowledge of nature.

Schooling is by no means the only method of education. But it is the most effective method when rightly used, as a man can gain more knowledge if permitted to give his whole time to that pursuit even though for a limited season. But that gaining of knowledge in the schoolroom is not sufficient unless supplemented with practical training in the field and observation. The schools of to-day are recognizing this more than was the case in the past.

Furthermore, education or training is not an end in itself but only a preparation for an end, and that end is service. In other words, to quote the sentence so often used and taken from over the doorway of the first college for Negroes in the South, "The purpose of education is preparation for life; the test of life is capacity for service."

Is an Individualist Educated?

Hence the question is raised, Is an individualist educated? An individualist evidently has received a certain degree of education. But one who has not the social instinct and social knowledge is not as fully educated as is possible for one with a social outlook on life. Though he is partly developed, and only partly educated, yet in fact to-day some of the best educated men are individualists. But that does not mean that it will always be so. It does not mean that such a man, however widely trained, who is still an individualist, is as fully educated as he would be if he also had the social conscience and a social outlook on life.

Education and the Church

This, then, was followed with the question, Is any individual truly educated who is not a member of the church of Jesus Christ? Evidently within the definition given, no agnostic or atheist is as fully educated or developed as can be the man of God. As the situation is to-day, many of the best educated—in fact, most of the best educated men are not members of the church and family of Jesus Christ. But this is so because these men are so much better developed and more fully developed in all other lines.

Still, the fact remains the complete development is not possible without religious knowledge, nor is it possible without the true religion and the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ and of God, which comes through revelation. Therefore, the fullest possibility of being and of growth is open only to the truly religious man, to whom is given the broadest freedom of intellectual and spiritual outlook.

But do not let this blind us to the fact that those who have professed Christ have most of them been altogether too content with this fact alone and have not gone on to perfection, and are therefore but poorly educated, not only in secular affairs but in those spiritual things which belong to the kingdom of God.

Therefore, there can be no education or knowledge without faith; nor can there be well-grounded faith without a foundation of knowledge. Before us lies the greatest possibilities, not only in the world, but in the universe. It well behooves us, therefore, to study to show ourselves approved unto God.

Prohibition Lessens Crime

Judge William H. Gamill, presiding judge of the Chicago Municipal Court, discusses in the World's Work for September the effect of prohibition. He secured the figures from such places as New York, Chicago, San Francisco, Saint Louis, New Orleans, the Middle West, and the Rocky Mountain region. He finds that in practically every city and State there has been a decrease in general arrests, in arrests for drunkenness, and in prison population. There is a decrease in the number of boy and girl delinquency in Chicago in 1921 as compared with 1918.

He says that twenty per cent of the jails in the United States have been without prisoners since prohibition went into effect and that in the remaining jails the number has been decreased from fifteen to eighty per cent. Nor is this only one section or State, as he has not found a single State where there is not a marked decrease for 1919 and 1920 in prison population.

In most States there is an increase in 1921 over 1920, but still the prison population in 1921 is twenty to twenty-five per cent below that before the war. Comparing the years before prohibition went into effect with the next year after there was a decrease in Chicago of fifty per cent. Similar figures are given in the insane asylum, and the fact that last year only one person died in the hospital at Bridewell of alcoholism against 169 the year before prohibition.

Further than this, impressions to the contrary notwithstanding, there has been a decrease in crime in some cities as high as sixty per cent. This includes not only the large cities but also the smaller cities of the United States, and he concludes that never before were American cities so free and law-abiding as they are to-day. We still have crimes but three fourths of them emanate from the illicit sale of liquor. But even with that the number of arrests is greatly decreased.

Caution Against Impostors

In another column will be found a letter from Brother Lewis A. Serig, of Wheeling, West Virginia, recounting some recent experiences of being imposed upon by persons claiming to be or passing themselves as members of the church. Repeatedly the Saints have been warned against such impositions, and it behooves them to be careful. We appreciate the predicament our people are placed in in such cases, for they do not wish to withhold assistance where needed and merited, but do not, on the other hand, like to be gulled by impostors. It is, of course, difficult at times to detect impostors, and rules cannot be laid down therefor; but it will be well for the Saints in the various branches to exercise caution in aiding strangers claiming to be members. Efforts should be made towards identification, and this may at times necessitate getting in touch with headquarters to ascertain membership.

Farm Survey and Stewardship

Elder C. E. Irwin at our request has kindly written concerning the work which is being undertaken in Lamoni Stake looking toward the organization of our agricultural interests in that area. It is his idea that there should first be a study made of the existing conditions, so he has prepared a careful schedule of questions, the answers to which will give information which it is hoped may become the basis for formal organization. The survey stresses the economic phase of rural life throughout. Such phases as the maintenance of the physical equipment of the farm plant, the market, farm records, farm credit, and managerial ability are given consideration.

This is but a beginning, having in view the putting within the reach of the farmer the means by which he may effect an improvement in his methods. This will be done by carrying on special studies of soils, studies of the market and marketing methods, the improvement of breeds of livestock by the introduction of better foundation stock, and the development of better methods of financing agricultural development.

The purpose of this program is twofold: First, as mentioned above, the improvement of the conditions under which the farmers of the church are now operating. Second, the development of an organization which, it is hoped, will articulate definitely with the larger economic movement of the church, when the various parts of that movement shall have been fashioned and set in operation.

The larger social significance of this movement includes much more than the economic aspect treated in the present survey.

Rural social life has not received the attention that it deserves nor, indeed, as much as has been given to urban conditions. It has too long been assumed that the country exists for the benefit of the town rather than placing the emphasis upon the proper cooperation between the town and the country. About thirty per cent of the people in the United States live on farms, and we may continue to ignore our rural problems at our own peril.

The church has a splendid opportunity to function in a very definite way, and it is hoped that this movement will soon lead to stewardships and adequate group action having as the foundation of this society, superior types of men and women who are alert to the demands of our modern times.

All Must Attend Public School in Oregon

At the recent general election the State of Oregon passed a law requiring all children between the ages of eight and sixteen to attend the public schools. The effect will be to close church and private elementary institutions. Every child within the State must go to the public schools. It may result in some leaving the State. It raises, however, a serious question in connection with the Roman Catholic, the Lutheran, and Episcopal church schools. With these the Seventh-day Adventists also join in opposing the action as a violation of religious right.

It is quite clearly pointed out that there is a fourth "R" which has been quite generally neglected, namely, religion. Is education a matter that belongs to the parent or to the state? Oregon answers that it belongs to the state. The probability is that it will be taken before the supreme court of the United States and very thoroughly argued.

It is becoming, however, more and more apparent that the field of religious education is being quite generally neglected. Whether such laws become common among the States or not, provision must be made either in the public schools or outside of the public schools, or both for religious and moral instruction. The teaching of science, of grammar, of arithmetic, and writing, is not sufficient. Nor can the church safely wait until her children have reached the age of sixteen years.

Yet to require a young child to carry a full public school curriculum and in addition to attend a church or religious school for any great number of hours would be to adopt a procedure which has already been called seriously in question by prominent educators. For many prominent educators of to-day believe that the child should have rather more time for play, for recreation, and that less time in the earlier years should be given to books and book learning. Certainly it would seem that the physical growth of childhood demands greater opportunities for recreation and for fresh air than is allowed by many parochial schools.

This presents a great problem which has not as yet been entirely solved, but which should not be solved by mere intellectual training to the neglect of moral and physical development. S. A. B.

Religious Population of America

Many statistics are being offered on the religious condition of America. Some recent figures give the recent religious population at more than 90,000,000. These figures are arrived at by taking into consideration the fact that whole families are individually counted by the Catholic Church. The Protestant churches only include actual communicants, hence upon consideration, the number returned for the various Protestant churches is multiplied by 2.8.

The Jews number only the heads of families. For this reason, the number of communicants returned by them is multiplied by four so as to include the Jewish family.

Of course it is possible that the figures thus secured may be high, but after all, a rather casual investigation will indicate that the actual number of church members, of the names actually upon the books of the church, do not give the number of the religious people, as there are probably at least as many more of young children and other members of the family who live in a religious environment and who consider themselves to be in fact religious. The number of those who are atheistic or even seriously agnostic is relatively small. S. A. B.

Going on Unto Perfection

*Sermon preached by Elder James Pycock,
October 14, 1922, in the General Conference Tabernacle, Independence, Missouri.*

We shall build upon the foundation found in the sixth chapter of Hebrews and the first verse: "Let us go on unto perfection."

The objective of everyone who has enlisted in the church of Jesus Christ should be to adjust himself to a correspondence with all truth with a view to becoming perfect thereby. A condition of perfection is possible only when one does properly correspond with those elements that produce and perpetuate perfection.

The very familiarity of the first few verses of this chapter of the Hebrew letter may preclude our being able to mention anything not already a part of your beliefs, so we shall confine our efforts of persuading you to carry into effect that already believed, and, it may be possible, to make prominent some feature in it that has not been obeyed as fully as it should be.

Perfection, the culmination of a Christian life, commences with a development from within the individual, and is not the gathering up or the acquisition of a number of virtues from without.

There is resident within every human being the potentiality of perfection which only needs development. It is the duty of the church to teach the plan of this unfolding, and it is efficient to the extent that it can do so and persuade men to assent to it by their lives.

It commences with the motive, the very thing so many think we should not mention. It is necessary to want to do right before we can do it. Jesus Christ called attention to certain individuals who loved darkness rather than light because of their evil deeds, but he contrasted that with others who came to the light. There was a difference in the motive. It is still true that "a good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit."

A certain lawyer once asked Christ, "Which is the great commandment in the law?" Jesus answered, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets." He touched the motive directly and taught that a good motive towards God and our neighbor is the only legitimate foundation upon which to build a Christian experience that gives any hope of making its participants perfect.

Had we been asked the same question, we might have fallen in with the all too popular classification and order of the first and most essential principles to be obeyed as a foundation by classing them in the order of faith, repentance, baptism, etc.; but Christianity's greatest exponent taught that the motive, by loving God and our fellow man, or loving God by loving our fellow man, is a foundation large enough for all the rest to be builded upon. Our great mistake consists in starting too far down the line of principles and not at the motive—the only logical place.

"As He Thinketh in His Heart"

If the admonition, "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus," were taught as one of the foundation principles, it would not be very hard to build an observance of faith, repentance, etc., on such a foundation.

It is equally essential that the thoughts be directed in a proper channel, always keeping in view the goal. A conversion of the thought is absolutely necessary before one can be sure of an advancement in the future. "For as he thinketh in his heart, so is he," might be made to read, For as he thinketh in his heart, so he will be. If we do wrong to-day, we were thinking of doing it yesterday; and if we do right to-day, we were thinking of doing it yesterday. If we want to do right to-morrow, we must think of doing it to-day. We are to-day the product of our thoughts of not only yesterday but of all our past.

We are responsible for our thoughts. We do not mean those thoughts that appear involuntarily in the mind, but those we allow to grow into words and actions. We frequently hear people say, "I said that, or I did that, and didn't think." Ninety-nine times out of a hundred that is not true, and I doubt the other time. There can be no word or action without a thought any more than there could be a harvest without sowing the seed. We did think about saying it and we did think about doing it, but we did not consider the consequences of our act. Something like the unfortunate who becomes intoxicated with liquor who says and does many things while drunken that he thought about saying and doing when he was sober. Then he had control of himself and suppressed them, but when he lost control they were given forth; so we, if we are allowing those evil thoughts to grow within us, will sometime in an unguarded moment give expression to that within.

The only safe way is to not allow evil thoughts to grow within us, for they will not grow except as we feed them and encourage them. Even the Devil will flee if we resist him. Perhaps we have not been resisting him very strongly, so he stays right on the job. So, although we cannot help evil thoughts coming into the mind, we can prevent their growing into words and actions. The thought of to-day must be as perfect as the action we are hoping for to-morrow. As the thought always precedes the action, there must be an advancement of thought, each thought a little better than the last one, so that this going unto perfection of thought will produce a perfection of action.

The Gospel a Means to an End

We now come to a consideration of some more of the gospel. We might call the gospel the outstretched arm of the great truth that reaches down into the abyss into which man has fallen because of sin, and makes it possible for him to extricate himself from that condition and climb up into the altitude of God's favor.

It is not salvation, nor does coming in contact with it make one perfect. Some people make the same mistake with the gospel that many of the world do with money, when they consider it the end instead of the means to the end. The gospel is but the means to the end. It is the road upon which we travel to reach perfection, the ladder which we ascend to reach salvation.

The gospel is then very properly called by one of old "the power of God unto salvation." It is composed of everlasting principles to come in contact with the everlasting elements of which man is composed.

There is some of this plan called the doctrine of Jesus Christ that might properly be considered a composition of elements forming a recipe to arrest the disease of sin. One would never reach perfection by confining his obedience to those principles that are to counteract the disease of sin only, any more than one physically ill could expect to build up a strong body simply by using the physician's medicine. There may be, then, some of the plan especially adapted to arrest disease, thereby aiding the spiritual nature to take its course, and some other principles actively to assist man unto perfection.

We might say right here that we believe it is natural for man to do right, for we cannot believe that God would make it natural for man to do wrong and then condemn him for developing that which he had given him to develop.

We are dealing with humanity in its fallen condition, and believe that the gospel is but to bring them back to the natural condition. It is to assist man to be again in an adjustment with God.

We may not like the plan of salvation, and I am not sure that God likes it any better than we do. Just as the physician who attends you may not like the remedy your disease requires, so the Great Physician may not like to be compelled to prescribe what he did. God diagnosed our condition and prescribed the only remedy that would effect a cure. Had our condition been different, we do not know just what the plan would have been like, for God does not always deal with us the way he would like to do, but usually the way our actions and condition compel him to.

A careful reading of that statement, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom," as well as many other places will prove to us that the inability to enter the kingdom apart from obeying the plan of the gospel, rests upon man and not upon God's refusal to allow him. Christ stated what was already a fact, and it did not become true because he said it.

This gospel is particularly adapted to man's condition in this world. The only evidence that we have that it will be of any use in the next world is predicated on the proof of its usefulness here. If man's obedience to it here produces results and assists him to advance on the road to perfection, then it can be trusted in some other world; but if those advancements are not made here, why should we believe they will be anywhere else?

If the church teaches a gospel that is not making better people here than anything else, it has no real reason for an existence. Anything to ask men consistently to sacrifice for its interests must be capable of doing in return for such devotion something that they cannot get so well anywhere else. If such institution, that makes greater demands than any other organization, is not doing it here, should it be trusted for the next world? That organization that teaches a gospel that is helping man the most here can well be trusted for the next world, for we believe there is a continuity in all the worlds God has made.

Make Practical Use of Gospel

It is not the amount of the gospel we have that will save, nor the number of the principles we believe, but only the quantity we use. We would have no moral right to ask others to accept what we will not use ourselves. Not long ago one of our brethren wondered why a relative of his could not see the necessity of baptism, while at the same time that brother could not see the necessity of tithing. One who invests in the business himself will be the most likely to sell shares to others. I mention this for the reason that one of the best ways to insure our own salvation and perfection is to be in a position to consistently recommend the gospel to others.

It is said that an agent had, after explaining the good qualities of his fountain pens, induced a dealer to purchase a large number. He took a pencil out of his pocket and commenced to write the order, when the merchant said, "I want you to cancel that order." The agent was astonished and of course wanted to know the reason why he had changed his mind so soon. The merchant replied, "No one can sell me fountain pens who signs the order with a lead pencil." We believe there is an obligation that we should live better than the world, contained in the statement, "Let him that is warned, warn his neighbor," for one must show his willingness to use the gospel first himself.

Let us now look at the statement, "Leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection." Of course some one says, "It should not read, 'leaving,' but 'not leaving the principles.'" Personally we do not care which way it reads, for if we read a little farther we learn that the writer did not mean to leave the principles, but the foundation. The verse is self-explanatory as it stands, even in the King James translation.

These cannot be called "first principles"; we believe they are the principles. They are not something to be obeyed before one enters the church as sort of first principles, to be left in order to obey some second principles afterwards.

The principle of faith is something that must be obeyed every day until we reach perfection; the same is true of repentance. Baptism consists of more than a mere dipping in water, the effort of a moment, but means a "walking in newness of life"; "putting on of Jesus Christ"; "a walking in the likeness of his resurrection"; and can we say that being born again, in the true sense, will not be the effort of a lifetime, and when it is accomplished we will not be far from perfection?

It is something like the boy commencing to learn the science of mathematics. He first studies the principles—addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division—in their most simple form to lay the foundation for his further studies; but he does not always stay around the foundation; he continues to advance, all the time remaining with the principles, finally reaching the most difficult and profound problems, until he reaches perfection in his profession. The only thing he left was the most simple form, the foundation, and if he had stayed around the foundation he had laid, he would never have become proficient.

That is the very thing the Hebrew writer said: to leave the foundation, not the principles, but to continue in the principles, for by obeying them we will become perfect.

Not all the principles of the gospel are mentioned in this chapter, but he mentions a few of them. There are others, such as tithing, virtue, charity, and some others. Anything that is essential for man's salvation is a principle of the gospel.

We notice to-day, as they did then, too many of the followers of Christ hanging around the foundation, with no apparent desire to attempt to reach perfection. They do not seem to sense that all the promises are to those who walk in the light and progress. There is no promise to the one who hangs around the foundation, nor to one who stands still.

Prepare to "Run the Race"

Spiritual life consists in spiritual growth, which is only apparent when there is real advancement.

This advancement cannot be brought about by praying for and being satisfied with a crumb from off God's altar. I am sure we have too many crumb eaters in the church when they should be able to sit up to the table and eat a good square meal. Something like those that Paul encountered when he said that those who should be teachers were under the necessity of being taught, and others who should be able to take strong meat must be fed on milk; and I believe some of them were so weak that even the milk had to be adulterated with water. They were still hanging around the foundation they had laid.

This kind are continually testifying that it takes them all their time to hang on, and in many instances we have no reason to doubt their statements. You know Paul illustrated the race for eternal life by the foot races we so often see. Suppose you were to attend one, and you saw the contestants before the race and one was just able to hang on to the fence; another had to be supported by a friend; and still others were supported some other way; what would you think of the prospects of a good race? Just about the same as the world (those witnesses on either side of the track) are compelled to think when the church exhibits so many who are not even able to walk yet. I wonder how those who exert all their strength in "hanging on to the rod of iron" are going to "run the race that is set before them."

Perhaps the greatest reason for this weakness and inability to leave the starting point and the foundation is the failure to have an appetite to receive spiritual food. Without an appetite, it is as useless to take it as it is to take natural food without a natural appetite. Without such appetite there would be very poor digestion and assimilation.

Create a Spiritual Appetite

There is also a reason for the lack of appetite. In the physical being work is the greatest stimulus to appetite, and this is also true in the spiritual man. The man who got a meal last Sunday and has lived his religion during the week, using the strength received from it, will have an appetite for a meal this Sunday and will not complain about the food, but be ready to absorb it and make it a part of his spiritual being; but he who has not lived his religion since the last meal will have no appetite; and no matter how good the spiritual food may be, it will be nauseating to him.

There is sometimes another side to this question, too. The food is not always served in an appetizing manner, for no matter how good the food, it loses its attractiveness when dished up in the way we sometimes see it. We are convinced that if Paul's advice to Timothy were carried out by more of our preachers to-day, there would be fewer people without an appetite for spiritual food: "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

Those who serve spiritual food should try to season it properly, divide it correctly, and adapt the material to the end in view.

"Except a man is born again he cannot see the kingdom," does not have reference to the fact that one cannot enter and see the church unless he is born again, but means that this complete change or conversion of the whole man is required before he can be a true citizen of the kingdom that we pray for when we say, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven."

Diligence is very necessary to insure progression. I often think if we were no more diligent in our own business than we are in the business of the church and of our own perfection, we would be bankrupt this week and in the poorhouse next week. "Seest thou a man diligent in his business, he shall stand before kings," would be just as true if it said that the man who is diligent in the Lord's business will stand before the King of kings. Upon too many occasions we have the spirit of carelessness, a sort of passive resistance, and think whenever our development is needed, if not too busy or too tired, if we have no other place to go, no one is coming to see us, and we have nothing else particularly to do, we may perhaps go to church; and, at times, if we have a dollar to spare, we may give it to the church; or, in other words, use the church as a sort of garbage can to throw in what we do not want. Development does not come by yielding to, but by resisting such impulses.

What Are Our Church Products?

The acquisition of virtue, honesty, and morality, these essential principles of Christianity, will greatly assist in the progress toward perfection. These things are very necessary for the development of character. It is the duty of the church to produce those of developed character. It might well ask itself the question whether it is turning out as good Christians as the world is turning out doctors, mechanics, merchants, etc., and if not, why not? If the products of the church are not keeping pace with the products of the world, can it be said that the church is even holding its own? Is it true to-day that the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light, the same as when Christ was here? And as individuals we might well ask ourselves the question, Are we improving in our character and progressing spiritually as rapidly as the world is improving in its special concerns?

There must be a development of the intellect as well as every other part of the man. There is no goodness, virtue, or real spiritual life in ignorance. It is not required that we remain ignorant and weak to impress the world that God was partial toward that kind to carry on his work, for the world already believes that. While it is true God did select some who were ignorant, they did not stay in that condition. There is a volume of meaning in the statement of Jesus to Peter and the rest of the fishermen, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." The following of Christ was the greatest study that he could have ordered. He gave them to know that although they were qualified to catch fish now, it would not be until after they had followed him and been made fishers of men that they could successfully do the greater work. There must be as much difference between the fishers of fish and the fishers of men as there are between fish and humanity.

Testimony Must Be Based on Knowledge

All true learning leads to know God and his relation to man. As it is the duty of his disciples to introduce man to God, it requires some acquaintance with both. As witnesses for God we must realize that our testimony is valuable only to the extent that we know; and as ambassadors we must know something of the country we live in as well as the kingdom of heaven.

The value of the testimony of the disciples was tested by Christ when he asked them, "Whom do men say that I am?" Apparently they could answer that question. But when he made the question personal, and said, "Whom do ye say that I am?" there was no answer until Peter gave it alone. Apparently he was the only one who could answer it.

It is something like the boy who sees a problem in mathematics, and instead of trying to solve the problem he looks up the answer, then tries to work toward that answer. Just as we do, when we are asked what we know about the gospel, we immediately get the Bible and read what Moses, Peter, or Paul said, maybe not realizing that we were asked the question and not the writers of the Bible.

A witness for Christ compelled to borrow his testimony from the writers of the Bible is of no more use than a witness in a law court whose evidence is read from the newspaper reports. He gives evidence of one thing, however, that he either has not done the will of God or else Christ has been misrepresented when he is reported to have said that such should know of the doctrine. This knowledge could not be interpreted simply to mean to find out what others are reported to have known.

It is amusing at times to hear men who know almost nothing of the world they are living in spend so much time in telling about conditions in two other worlds they have never seen—one they call heaven, the other hell. The man who knows so little of conditions existing in the world he has lived in for so many years, does not need to spend any time talking to me of any other world, for he knows a whole lot less about it. He who knows the most of this world thereby manifests his ability to know a little about some other.

No one need suppose that by becoming informed he is going to deprive the Holy Spirit of its work, for after we have learned all we can there is still a whole lot left for God to do. The very act of praying for wisdom imposes a responsibility on the petitioner to acquire something for wisdom to use; for our dictionaries tell us that wisdom is the right use of knowledge. Doesn't one who prays for wisdom without trying to acquire knowledge remind you of some one praying to God to know how to invest money he doesn't possess?

It is true that the gathering of information may impel one to change his opinion, and it is almost a crime with some people ever to change. They boast of the fact that their testimony has not changed for many years, and that is evidence to them that the gospel is true and unchangeable; and with some the prayers have not changed much either. That proves nothing so much as that these people are making no progress, are in the same place on the road, and have seen nothing different. The one who is traveling will continually meet new experiences, and his knowledge of to-day will cause him to bear a different testimony from the one of yesterday when he was not so far advanced, and he will see the necessity of praying for things to-day that were unknown to him in the past while in the valley of inexperience, but are plain to his increased vision from the eminence of the present.

Various Angles of Development

We see the necessity of developing body, mind, and spirit. The gospel that cannot teach how to develop the body ought not to be trusted with the mind; and if it cannot develop the mind, why should it be expected that it can the spirit? We might reason that the church that has no recipe to heal the body ought not to be trusted with the healing of the soul. At times we notice that, instead of this all-round development, people are becoming monstrosities; some are developing a splendid body, but the mind is almost static and the spirit microscopic. At times we notice the order is reversed. We wonder what God will do with one who has a body fit for the celestial glory, a mind fit for the terrestrial glory, and a spirit prepared only for the telestial glory. Where will he place him? He is like a man wearing a fifteen dollar hat and a nine dollar suit; so it must be kept in mind to avoid extremes and consider our development as a whole. Every part is of equal importance.

Our perfection depends a great deal upon our attitude toward our fellow man, and we must exercise the same patience and consideration for him as for ourselves. While we are not yet perfect, we should not look for perfection in others, who, like ourselves, are still on the road that leads to perfection. We must learn to remove the beam from our own eye before trying to locate the mote in our brother's eye.

"Let him that is without sin cast the first stone" had a volume of meaning to those who would have stoned the unfortunate woman to death. While the law did state that such should be stoned to death, it also required those who did this act to be free from the sin themselves, so there were very few who were qualified to participate. Had Israel developed equal to the spirit of the law that Christ pointed out to them, very few would have suffered that penalty. While we are throwing the stones at others we are spending time needed for our own advancement, and we never saw any real progress result from throwing stones at others. That is found to be some of "the weights and the sins" that so easily beset us.

Our pattern is Christ; our objective to become like God. This does not mean that I can become as great as God, nor like him in knowledge, wisdom, etc.

I believe in the evolution of mankind from what they are to what God intended—that they should become perfect men and women. There is no higher title than that. Anything that seeks to add to it but detracts from it. God made man a little lower than the angels, and by obedience to the gospel he may regain that position. Man was made in the image of God, but the image is not equal to the original. If I must reach the height reached by Christ, then I am defeated on the start, and it is useless for me to continue, for he is a perfect God; but I have some hope of sometime reaching perfect manhood. It is this possibility that impels man to continue when he realizes that the goal is within reach.

Service the Road to Perfection

The nearest route to perfection is through serving man. It is the road best fitted for the partaking of the divine nature, for man is most like Christ when he is serving humanity. Jesus illustrated this very forcibly in the conversation with the Pharisee who had invited him to dinner. Christ noticed that those sitting around the table were of the aristocracy, who, as we often see to-day, had been invited by the host in the hope that he would be invited to their places next week; or, as Jesus put it, "a recompense be made thee." Jesus taught him that by calling in the more unfortunate he would insure for himself a reward at the resurrection of the just. It was a direct route to perfection.

Jesus also taught the same lesson in his account of the judgment, when he will be compelled to say to some, "Depart from me, ye cursed." Of course, they wondered why they should be thus condemned for not doing those deeds of mercy to a Christ whom they had never seen in that condition. Like a whole lot of people to-day, they would have fallen over each other to help the one who did not need their assistance. If they saw some great one they would rush to help him, not because he needed it, but because they valued the favors they would get in return. They would feed him who himself could feed the five thousand on the five loaves and two fishes; if he were in prison, the jailer would have to put a guard to keep them away; but they were not so ready to help those who actually needed it. Jesus here demonstrated that the most progress toward perfection is on the road through the lowest of his creation. "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these [not to some great man from whom we expect a favor], ye did it not to me."

One of the writers of old stated that pure religion consisted in visiting the widows and the fatherless and keeping oneself unspotted from the vices of the world. The one who travels that road cannot help but become perfect.

We believe then that there must be a complete conversion of the individual, an elimination of all that is evil, an acquiring of all that is good, so that the gold can be refined, mankind become a polished shaft in the kingdom of God, so that when Christ looks upon him he sees his image reflected in the personification of all the possibilities of the gospel.

It will not be until then that God can feel honored in hearing men sing, "Crown him Lord of all."

Real thought has always been for the few. For the many it has been a dull echoing of thought ready made, a dull acceptance of theories handed to us. Millions of men have seen apples fall from trees. One saw an apple fall and formulated the law of gravitation. That was Newton, and he was thinking.—The Saint Louis Star.

The Universal Search for Truth

Radio sermonet June 18, 1922, by S. A. Burgess. Broadcasted from studio of Central Radio Co., Kansas City, Missouri.

It is quite evident that in the short time at our disposal only a brief reference can possibly be made to the different elements of this universal search for truth and its basic significance. Pontius Pilate asked, What is truth? but did not wait for an answer. The Master had declared previously of the word of God, "Thy word is truth."

The definition in the dictionary shows that truth comes from the Anglo-Saxon word troth and meant first fidelity, then a trust or pledge; in the third place sincerity or veracity; fourth, conformity to fact or reality and an exact accordance with that which is or has been or shall be. It is in this latter sense that the world has been and is especially concerned in its search for truth.

But truth is not things to be conformed to the facts or realities. It is knowledge of things as they are, have been, and shall be—not the things.

What is really the meaning of life? The meaning of the universe? Upon what can we depend? Is there an ultimate reality? The world has been asking these questions for countless ages. Many thousands of years ago the Hindu philosophy raised this question, and noting the changes in the manifested universe in all visible phenomena, declared that which the senses perceive is after all only illusions, that back of it all is the eternal reality of being, which is neither he nor she but the infinite it or that.

The Egyptians, in considering the life of men, their suffering on this earth, placed a heavy stress on the immortality of the soul, and made the life to come in amenta to be the reality so far as mankind is concerned, while this life is only a delusion. We see remnants of this thought in our cemeteries to-day, wherein at the entrance to so many lots there is erected a stone pillar with the words, "Our home." With that, however, we cannot possibly agree. The abiding place of the body is not our eternal home. It is not such according to Egyptian philosophy. But the eternal home is the dwelling place of the spirit.

In Greek philosophy there was a continued search for the one reality which was found by the various philosophers in various material or immaterial forms. Some to-day would prefer the quest of truth rather than to possess the truth itself. If by this they mean to deny the ultimate reality, we cannot agree with their conclusion, but in the recognition of the fallibility of man and the fact that any truth that we could now fully apprehend would indeed be a limited or finite truth, we would indeed prefer for humanity to-day the continued quest for greater knowledge in accordance with reality; in other words, the continued quest for truth.

The Greeks also attempted to determine the good. Epicurus found it in happiness. Zeno and the Stoics found it in the keeping of the law. Socrates declared that the highest good is virtue, and Plato that the supreme idea of all ideas is the idea of the good. These are only a few of the conclusions reached by humanity in the continual search to know the universe as it is and to apprehend it in terms of our knowledge.

Somewhat inaccurately, but still with a measure of truth, it has been stated that the Greeks sought after beauty. The Hebrews sought the good or right. The scientists seek after truth, especially to know the reality of the material universe. While the modern aim is the seeking of more freedom and the revolt against supervision or restraint either of parents, of school, of church, or of other government. To this modern seeking of liberty the statement of the Master as recorded in the eighth chapter of John is particularly apropos, "If ye continue in my word then are ye my disciples indeed and ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

They answered him saying, "We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man; how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free?" Jesus answered them, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin and the servant abideth not in the house forever, but the Son abideth forever. If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed."

There are two great fundamental statements in that reading: "He who committeth sin is the servant of sin." He may think he can drink or let it alone, but if he continues he finds his will enslaved. He may claim he can smoke or let it alone, but if he continues, again he finds his will enslaved. A girl may think she is free to dance or not to dance, but experience has shown that continued wrongdoing brings its only recompense of slavery. and the time comes that one lives only to indulge. The same is true of any other abuse. He who sins becomes the servant of sin and is not free.

The other great statement is: "If ye continue in my word . . . (2) ye shall know the truth, and (3) the truth will make you free." Here is the distinct statement that goodness, truth, and freedom are identical, and this statement is confirmed by modern science. It is only when we know that which is good and just, that which is good and true, that our will is indeed free. If we follow any other course we find the restriction of inhibition within our own nature.

This is well illustrated by the story of the young girl related by Holt in the Freudian Wish, who went to a large city from a small country town. She was invited to go to the theater and to the movies, to the dance halls, to cheap entertainments and those of low value. If she entirely refused she was soon left alone and her social nature was stunted and hence dissatisfied. If she went, her earlier home teachings would rise up to make her miserable. She was not free. Even a conscience that has been choked off will arise again. Or if, third, she attempts to compromise by attending church on Sunday and going the ways of the world the rest of the week, her week-day doings prevent the satisfaction of the Sunday service, rendering her not only less able to enjoy the hour but causing her to feel out of place. At the same time her Sunday service interferes with her week-day worldly pleasures. It is notorious that a continual pursuit of worldly pleasures leaves us completely worn out, blase, and does not give us complete satisfaction.

But if she knows the difference between good and bad entertainment, if she accepts but always suggests going to a better class of entertainment, something that is really worth while and of benefit, if she knows that which is good in the line of recreation, she will find freedom in a mental and spiritual way instead of inhibition. She will find sociability; she will find her whole nature satisfied.

A man goes out to pick mushrooms. If he does not know, if he eats he fears poison, if he does not eat, he regrets it because he likes mushrooms. But if he knows the difference between toadstools and mushrooms, if it is good, he eats; and if it is not good, he does not eat, and in either case he is satisfied. So again if he knows proper recreation, if it is good he accepts it; if it is not good he does not accept, and hence is satisfied in both instances. This is only a partial illustration of this fundamental fact that we must know the truth; knowing, we must have the will to choose the good; choosing the good in accordance with truth, we find complete freedom, and there at last we find also the beauty which the Greeks so much loved, and find perfection; and that perfection of right, truth, beauty, and perfection is one.

We hear much of the prohibitions of the narrow way. It is true that he who would walk in the narrow way must deny himself the evil pleasures of the world. But it is also true that he who walks in the broad way is also prohibited from the higher pleasures of the soul, not only the spiritual pleasures, but also the higher intellectual pleasures of good music, of good pictures, and of ability to think clearly. For if he be in the broad way he will find soon not only his spiritual or higher mental processes are stunted, but that his lower mentality is also losing its power, so that he is prohibited more and more from the society of sane people. It is, therefore, our place to choose our ways, recognizing that our human life is limited either by that which is higher or that which is lower.

But there are prohibitions in the broad way as well as in the narrow way. Realizing this, it is not surprising to learn that light and truth forsaketh the evil one or that scientists of to-day find the source of disease, of nervousness, of insanity, in the flight from reality and unwillingness to face the facts, a rejection, in other words, of the truth.

The search for truth, then, becomes the search for God. The condemnation of sin is that it brings about incompatibility with God, the eternal reality. He who loves beauty will find it in the altogether lovely, the Rose of Sharon. He who loves goodness will find it in the pathway that Jesus has trod. "If ye love me keep my commandments. He that keepeth my commandments is my disciple indeed and shall know the truth." If you love truth it is to be found in the path of righteousness, and there also, and only there, is to be found free will, the true freedom. And if your desire is rather for the quest of truth, in this way we are assured also of the spirit of the Great Teacher, even the spirit of truth that shall guide us on and on into all truth.

Therefore the search of mankind for truth has been the search for God as manifested in Jesus of Nazareth, the only name that has ever been given through all eternity whereby man may be saved from the consequences of sin and of death, and the only way in which he can find freedom as well as beauty together with goodness and a knowledge of truth of both the things that are now manifested and that which has been and shall be.

The burden of unemployment falls in its last analysis on the shoulders of the children. Miss Abbott, chief of the Children's Bureau, in her annual report notes that the unemployment last winter meant a permanent loss to the community in lowering standards of care for children which was forced by the fact that receipts were so beyond a reasonable minimum. The mothers of 102 children under six years of age and of 154 between six and thirteen in one small survey had with great difficulty secured work outside of the home and a number of children under sixteen had also been put to work. It is noteworthy that of 414 children receiving permanent care of various agencies in North Dakota only one had lost both parents. In other words the home might have been maintained with proper social attention.

PASTORAL

How Can I Become a Successful Pastor?

By C. Ed. Miller

This question, with a number of others, was asked me by a young elder who has recently been installed as pastor over a large branch. I shall pass the answers to these questions over to the editors.

Answer No. 1. I can put my finger on one thing a successful pastor must have. It is vital. It is fundamental. If you do not have it in large quantities, you must develop it. I believe it can be cultivated to bring forth abundantly under God's blessing. There are many qualifications a successful pastor should possess. He must have system, he must be adaptable, but one thing he must everlastingly have, he cannot get along without it. Now, dear brother, you are impatient for the answer. Here it is:

"No man can assist in this work unless he is humble and full of love."

There is your answer to question No. 1. Full of love. It seems simple, it is simple, but what tremendous results you will obtain if you organize your heart forces to synchronize with the divine formula.

"Yet one thing thou lackest." The rich young man had many admirable qualities, but the vital thing he lacked.

One of the magazines having the largest circulation of its kind in the world lacked one thing to make it perfect. It was experimenting on a new process of binding by gluing instead of stapling the sheets. When the magazine arrived, I would pierce three holes through it and sew it together, as the glued sheets would come apart with very little handling. The fine paper, press work, cuts, articles, etc., were lost; the magazine lacked one vital thing, which has since been supplied. New books often contain a slip relating an experience of a book connoisseur having a very expensive book just back from the binders, ruined by a friend picking it up and "breaking its back." I have always thought the book binder should have so "massaged" the book that breaking its back because it was "green" could not have been possible. The expensive binding lacked a vital thing.

A great Canadian bridge span fell into the river as it was being lowered into place. A small pin sheared off, and down went the span into the river and not over it.

Let love for all the people all the time prompt your policies, and you are on the road to success as a pastor.

One-Preacher Branches

By Edward D. Moore

Some of the ablest men in the church are the result of small-branch training and big-interest thinking.

Many of our branches or church communities feel that they are greatly handicapped in having but one person qualified to preach regularly to them. This is especially considered a hardship because some of the larger centers are often addressed by leading men of the church representing its various interests from different viewpoints as well as by local men of considerable talent and experience. They read in the church papers of this constantly changing spiritual menu and wonder if they are not unduly hampered in their progress from having to listen constantly to the pulpit declarations of one or at most a few local men.

However, this situation may be an advantage. Very often it is. Also it may be a considerable disadvantage, depending upon both the preacher and the audience. As Frederick Lynch, the great editor of the Christian Work, recently declares, "Big thoughts, big interests, make big people."

It is a matter of interest to hear comments from our men who circulate rather widely among the Saints, that some of the very best sermons they have heard are by preachers whose names are hardly known outside their own districts. To be a general officer does not necessarily imply that one is a powerful orator. Occasionally these men are a success in their position because of exceptional administrative or pastoral ability yet may be greatly outclassed in a forensic way by some localized man who has developed a basic talent to that end whereby he is able to move audiences with wonderful power.

While it might be conceded that the wider one's interests are and the more he comes into contact with people and places and developments the better will be his basis for thinking in big terms, there are those who by sheer force of personality break the bands of provincialism and see with discerning eyes that which is taking place in the world, in the church, in their community. We recall one of God's noblemen who daily delved into the earth to dig therefrom sufficient of the fuel that heats our homes and drives our wheels of industry that he might live from the proceeds of his part therein, who daily read and studied much. It was his habit at that time (and no doubt is to this day) to arise at 5 a. m. each morning and spend an hour in hard study that he might qualify himself for his task as pastor and become a better man. As a result, his very personality shone with the results of that application. He was modest and unassuming, withal a capable, earnest man who, because he knew, was able to help others know. Because he had experience he was able to induce others to participate in similar experiences.

Here and there throughout the church there are such men who feel the responsibility of their charge and are earnestly making sacrifices that they might lead aright the flock which is intrusted to their care.

From those communities where these men flourish the church in general is drawing its valiant missionaries, its capable administrators, its men who think and act with that synchronism which makes for success.

One can be in their branches but a short time before he realizes that those congregations have been led into big fields. They think in large terms and appreciate not only the immediate local problems which confront them daily but are enthused with the wonderful spiritual ideals of the church as well as its successes and failures in its present program, and are able because of this conception to vision the future of the church in a way which is far from being provincial.

It is true that some pastors, not appreciating this situation, are arrogant and narrow. They are resentful that their congregations devote their time to petty bickerings and quarrels and do not seem to respond to what they believe is the best the people can do. Ofttimes such men are susceptible to the good influences on the part of thoughtful persons in the congregation who will help them vision the task from the viewpoint of the audience. Leadership is important—very important—but it is not the only factor in church progress any more than in business success. Audiences must be responsive, but they are usually made more so by the same leadership which recognizes conditions and proceeds intelligently to correct wrongs by setting before the people a better way. The good leader will be willing to walk therein himself, setting the example before the flock.

The one-preacher churches in our organization who are constrained to mourn over their seeming limitations should be encouraged to make the most of what may often be a real advantage, if properly understood.

Pastors so situated should see to it that the best in them is brought out, remembering that audiences are usually what he makes of them. He can well remember that "big thoughts, big interests, make big people."

To your neighbor your acts speak louder than your "prayer meeting testimonies" in telling what your religion is.—Priesthood Journal.

Dear Brother:

1. How do you justify the purchase of automobiles to the extent of over $50,000 and the consequent expense of operation when the church is running behind at such a rapid rate?
2. It costs 25 per cent of all money received to administer it. How do you account for that?

4. Are we copying other churches in this and other respects?
5. The statement is made that the funds for the auditorium were loaned to the general church fund and have been expended and cannot be replaced, as the church is not in possession of convertible securities sufficient to cover same.
6. How do you account for the fact that the church is dead so far as membership increase is concerned?

Awaiting your kind favor, I am as ever,
Faithfully,

Answers by Presiding Bishop

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, January 29, 1923.

Dear Brother: I have before me your letter of January 15th and shall be very glad indeed to answer at least some of your inquiries, as it is apparent that you are laboring under a misapprehension of the facts.

Question: How do you justify the purchase of automobiles to the extent of over $50,000 and the consequent expense of operation when the church is running behind at such a rapid rate?

Answer: We have not invested $50,000 in automobiles. I don't know what the source of your information has been, but it certainly is erroneous. There might be $50,000 worth of automobiles engaged in church service but the greater part of these have either been purchased by districts for the use of the missionary in that district or they are the private property of the man using them. During the past two years the only car which this office has directly purchased has been one Ford and this was partly paid for by an old car which was turned in.

Question: It costs 25 per cent of all money received to administer it. How do you account for that?

Answer: It does not cost 25 per cent of all money received to administer it. The facts are that the tentative budgets for the year 1922-23 includes all of the general office expense such as the Presidency's office, Bishopric's office, Quorum of Twelve, Publicity Department, Statistician, Auditor, Architect, Historian, Patriarch, Health Department, Music Department, Women's Department, Church Secretary, Librarian,

Graphic Arts, general office expense, general church expense, only amounts to a little over 10 per cent of the total anticipated expenses for the year.

In the HERALD of June 21, 1921, on page 597, we published the cost of administration of church finances for the years 1900 to the year ending June 30, 1921. They were as follows:

Expense per dollar collected, considering increase in living costs

1900	.014
1905	.015
1910	.016
1915	.016
1920-21	.014

You will see that there has been but slight variation in the cost of collecting and administering the affairs of this office. While the sum total of the expense has been naturally greater owing to the constant increase in church membership, yet the cost per dollar collected has not increased.

Your third question we are referring to the Presidency as well as the fourth and sixth as they do not deal with financial matters.

Question: The statement is made that the funds for the Auditorium were loaned to the general church fund and have been expended and cannot be replaced as the church is not in possession of convertible securities to cover same.

Answer: We have from time to time published in the church papers full and complete information as to what the status of this fund was. In our report to conference we showed that our special fund was invested in the following:

Cash in bank	$ 11,285.67
Certificate of deposit	35,933.83
Liberty Bonds	141,958.10
Expense account	2,193.60
Temporary investments	171,819.98
Cash in hands of bishops and agents	5,362.29

Special funds loaned to general fund	$121,954.56

While it is true that the item marked "Temporary Investments" would have to be reconverted out of cash in the general fund, I do not anticipate any difficulty in doing this. The other items we consider liquid. We have felt that, as trustees of a fund, we would not be warranted in letting these funds lie idle but have sought to invest them in interest-bearing investments and our action in doing so, as well as loaning a portion of these funds to the general fund, has been approved by the joint council of Presidency, Twelve, and Bishopric.

If in answering these questions we have not made them clear to you, we shall be only too glad to throw additional light upon the situation as may be necessary. We are anxious and willing to keep the membership of the church thoroughly advised as to the true situation touching the work of this department.

Sincerely yours,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE,

Presiding Bishop.

Letter From the Presidency

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, February 2, 1923.

Dear Brother: Your letter of January 15 has been referred to us by Bishop B. R. McGuire to whom it was addressed, and in his letter to us he says that he has advised you that our office will answer questions three, four, and six, contained in your letter. We note that in each instance the questions bearing on finances, namely, questions one, two, and five, were based on misinformation that has reached you through some source, and that the Bishop has given you, so far as we know, direct answers which should speedily remove that misapprehension. We are inclined to think that questions three, four, and six rest on a similar misapprehension of the situation, resulting from misinformation that has reached you from some source unknown to us. You did just right in coming to us directly and plainly with your questions.

Question Three: "The great cry at Independence is an educated ministry, and I understand that a move is on foot to fix things in future so that although God may call whom he chooses, only those who have the necessary quantity of the wisdom of man's learning will be ordained. Can you explain this?"

We trust that it has been generally recognized in Independence that associated with education there must be complete consecration, absolute devotion, necessary faith, moral character, etc. It is, we think, recognized by nearly all that mental training is only a part of the equipment and quite valueless without these other requisites; but it has been quite thoroughly taught in Independence that we should have a well-read, well-informed ministry, a ministry that is well informed particularly concerning the things men ought to know who go out to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ. Given consecration, faith, clean moral character, and divine direction, knowledge is very valuable, in fact indispensable, since one who knows nothing can teach nothing—in fact, the wider the range of knowledge the better. Whether this fund of information referred to here be obtained in school, or obtained in other ways by those who are self-taught in the school of experience, is to a certain extent a matter of indifference, providing it is actually obtained by the one who goes out to represent the church. In proof of this you will find in the Presidency, in the Quorum of Twelve, in the Presiding Bishopric—in fact, in all the leading quorums—men who are not college men, some of whom were called and ordained so recently as the late General Conference. Their services are gladly received by the church and are utilized for the building up of the kingdom of God. We know of no such movement as you suggest to "fix it" so that no one can be ordained who has not the necessary amount of "man's learning" even though he should be called of God. It remains with God to call his own ministry. Ordinations of men who are not college men continue regularly in Independence, as men are pointed out by the Spirit for ordination. On the other hand we should not reject the offering of consecrated college men.

Many in Independence are anxious that the young people of the church should be well taught, not only in the things of the kingdom, but in general knowledge such as is set forth for instance in Doctrine and Covenants 85:21, so that God may have a splendid body of well-informed young people, thoroughly consecrated and devoted to his cause from whom to call men to the ranks of the ministry. That is the very fervent and devoted ideal of men who are working in Grace-land and in other places in the church in the interests of education, that is, the right kind of education, that which recognizes that the human race can never move to high ground without religion, and that everything that a man is or has or knows should be devoted to the service of humanity and the building up of the kingdom of God.

Your question is somewhat in line with one coming in last summer following certain releases from mission appointment on account of lack of finances. The questioner wished to know if the joint council was dropping all the men who did not have a college education. We replied by sending him the names of the college and university men who had recently been released by the joint council, including a brother to the President of the church.

Question Four: "Are we copying other churches in this and other respects?"

We do not think so. It is rather attempting to carry out instructions contained in Doctrine and Covenants 85:21 and 87:5 and in numerous other places in the revelations given many years ago. It is, we believe, designed to be in harmony with the commandment, "Seek ye diligently and teach one another words of wisdom, yea, seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom. Seek learning even by study and also by faith." (Doctrine and Covenants 85:36.) That our young people should be taught diligently to seek learning not only by study, but also by faith, is strictly in harmony with the Book of Covenants, and not necessarily by any means an imitation of some other church. Attached you will find extracts from sermons and lectures on education delivered in Independence from which you may judge for yourself. We add in each case name of speaker and date of delivery.

Question Six: "How do you account for the fact that the church is dead so far as membership increase is concerned?"

The church is not dead—so we do not account for its supposed demise. You may have misread statistics, not knowing exactly what has occurred in the church recorder's office. For many years, in fact extending over a number of decades, perhaps through one whole generation, names were allowed to accumulate on branch records, names of people who had moved away and become lost and probably in many instances were dead, at least no trace could be had of them. During the past two years under the general church recorder, Brother Frank A. Russell, there has been a persistent and consistent effort to clear this dead timber from our records. The branches have been canvassed and our records cleaned up, eliminating the dead and missing. This may have caused an apparent loss. It was a loss that had accumulated many years ago. It should have been charged off annually in small numbers, but this was not done. So the loss appears during the past two years, seven thousand eight hundred and eighty-one such names having been cancelled in that time. The loss is more apparent than real, as it is dead timber cleared away. If the church is dead judged by that standard it was dead fifty years ago—yes, even in the days of Christ, when "many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him." (John 6:66.)

As a matter of fact, in actual point of growth by additions of new members the church is growing faster than in years gone by. The year 1921 was the banner year of our whole history for baptisms. The year 1922 fell behind 1921, but was far in excess of other years during the past ten, twenty, or thirty years. Following is a table showing baptisms for the past twenty years:

1901	2,325	1913	3,670
1902	2,498	1914	2,635
1903	2,535	1915	4,907
1904	2,503	1916	4,631
1905	2,843	1917	3,890
1906	1,719	1918	5,195
1907	2,873	1919	2,988
1908	2,281	1920	3,827
1909	2,444	1921	5,511
1910	2,787	1922	3,640
1911	3,062

If you wish further information on this point or an analysis of statistics, we suggest that you write directly to Brother

F. A. Russell, church recorder. There is no more foundation for the idea that the church is dead as judged by membership increase than there was for the idea that the Bishop had spent fifty thousand dollars for automobiles.

Trusting that this sufficiently answers your questions, we remain,

Very sincerely yours,

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

From Sermon by the President

(Extracts from sermon of Frederick M. Smith at Independence, Missouri, December 18, 1921, printed in SAINTS' HERALD, February 15, 1922.)

There is another passage of scripture. To Latter Day Saints it has a significance that attaches to divinity, for we believe them to be words which came to us from a divine source: "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed." Now, let me say I am glad that the quotation, or the words, did not stop at the first phrase, "Study to show thyself." That is what altogether too many of us are doing to-day. In other words, not only young people, but some elderly people are sometimes so imbued with the idea of becoming exhibitionists that their whole study and thought is what their fellow man might think of them, and their study is to show themselves. But listen; I do not want you to stop there. Stop there long enough, however, to think what a spectacle you make of yourself if that was all you thought about.

But the word says, "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed" of the work that he is giving to the world. And if our young people would become to-night or any time in life imbued with that great fundamental thought, and it can enter into their lives and become the dynamic of their activities as that slogan became the dynamic of Jesus' life from the time he was eight years old on, then we can hope that the future of this church will show tremendous results as the aggregate of the activities of the young people. I might say that to-night my hope of the working out of the great problems of the church and my hope that this church will make demonstration to the world of what its social philosophy is, lies in the young people.

Not only does this passage, "Study to show thyself approved, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed," keep before us the idea that our workmanship and its approval should be of prime importance, but it also holds out the idea that that approval shall be a divine one, so that it links not only workmanship with good results, but it links workmanship with divine approval. In other words, it links workmanship with God and with the idea that God will pass upon the question of workmanship; and I wish from the bottom of my heart that I could make every Latter Day Saint to-night, young and old, conscious of the fact that God does intend that the workmanship of his people shall pass his scrutiny and shall be a criterion by which the worth of the individual is to be measured. . . .

I would advise young people then to study to know God. I am not going to send them to the Bible entirely to attempt to know God, but I would certainly advise our people to attempt to know God, by studying his handiwork. This earth has been called by the Bible, God's footstool. It has a relation to the world. There is in this footstool the handwriting of God that has traced God's own laws; and so his laws reveal to us God. It is the duty, it seems to me, of young people who appreciate the significance of this church and its work, to study those things that will give them an intimate, deep, and accurate knowledge of this world and its natural manifestations, its natural laws, that they might know more of God.

The heavens declare God's handiwork; so it is also a necessity for us to know something about the creation that represents God's handiwork, even beyond this world. And I would certainly hold that one cannot love something he knows nothing about; hence, if you are going to love God with all the powers of your being you must know something about what he is. I do not believe it is possible for anyone to study even that degree of knowledge, small though it be, that has come to the human family that tells us of the laws of God as God has established them, without having his love for God intensified, deepened, broadened, and made brighter.

If we are going to have a knowledge of ourselves, I could certainly advise our young people to study those laws according to which we operate. In other words, I would advise our young people to attempt a deep and continuous study that we might know them in relation to our fellow men, to our brother. Not only physically, but that we might know them in their relation to the handiwork of God. There is no getting away from it. Your life is intimately mixed up with the operation of the laws of nature, of the world, and of the universe. Until you know something about those relationships you cannot appreciate the magnitude of God.

From College Day Address

(Extracts from College Day address by President Frederick M. Smith at Independence, Missouri, October 16, 1921, taken from SAINTS' HERALD, December 6, 1921.)

I hold that the work of the church is primarily educational. I might even go further and say that I hold that the entire work of the church is educational, for certainly no one will deny that the efforts we make in sending out the missionaries from one part of the country to another are to educate the people to a better conception of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Certainly the work of the local men is educational in taking care of those converted, giving them to understand and appreciate through the processes of education, the grander and more significant portions of the gospel. So, if I need any excuse for talking on education, it is that you cannot talk on any aspect of the church work without talking on education. If I need a specific excuse for talking on education this morning, it is because of the fact that to-day is the day set apart as College Day. . . .

In order to succeed as a church—and I make this expression after due consideration and hope you will give it some thought—in order for this church to succeed—and we have been some ninety years in making the attempt—our children must have the fullest education that is possible for us to give them or urge them to acquire, with the goal of the church always in view. That has not been done in the past, and the result is that some of our young people who should have their attentions centering in the church are not with us. They are giving their services to people from the standpoint of the activities of the world, viz, selfishness. . . .

A child that goes to the average school to-day, either in the public school where our teachers are teaching for the salary that comes to them, or goes to the college or university, will find that the dynamic used by the instructor is based on some kind of a selfish ground. They make the plea to the child to be a success because it will mean his own aggrandizement. And few indeed are the instructors, and I might say, none of the institutions, with one or two exceptions, that will attempt to educate the children always with the idea in mind, "It is not yourself you are working for, but that you might make it a little better world for the other fellow to live in." I would like to ask you people who have been in contact with the educational institutions of the world, Is there any institution in which you have had experience where that ideal is held up, other than in Graceland College?

From the Church Historian

(Extracts from lecture by Walter W. Smith before the Elders' School at the Stone Church, Independence, Missouri, January 22, 1922, taken from Priesthood Journal for April, 1922.)

I would not try to make a teacher out of a man who did not have the Spirit of God; and what is further, I would not spend the money of the church to educate anybody in this world for work in the church unless I knew he was converted to the gospel of Jesus Christ and had a knowledge of it. But, having knowledge, a man may teach. Having everything else and having no knowledge, he cannot teach.

Knowledge is a thing that is not supplied automatically. Knowledge is a thing that requires a man to exercise his own activity in the acquiring of it. For instance, if God were to tell me to go home, I would not consider it was his business to take me home; I would consider it my business to put one foot in front of the other and to shift the weight of my body from one foot to the other until I got there. Exactly so, when God tells me to do a thing I do not consider it is his business to give me the skill. I consider it is his business to awaken within me sincerity, conscientiousness, fortitude, and devotion to the cause, but it is my business to acquire in my finger tips the skill which may be necessary or required, like playing a piano or writing. I am going to discuss knowledge from that angle, not to do violence, mind you, to the necessity of having fortitude, sincerity, and other qualities that arise out of religion and man's response to God. . . .

Truth is a knowledge of things as they are. If there is anything that would invite you to action, this thought ought to do so, the real test of filling your heart, your mind, your soul with information, with pictures that are true. Ignorance is of the Devil. It is a part of his business to keep you that way. If he can keep a fog in the air, he has got a start with you. If he can keep us ignorant, that is about the best thing he can do.

From Elbert A. Smith

I may say at the start, that so far as education is concerned, using it in the common way in which the term is used in reference to secular education, it is quite absolutely inadequate to save men. If there is present a will to do wrong, which is very often the case, or even lacking the will to do right, education merely gives the individual a sharper and better tool to use in doing wrong, and makes a man more dangerous to society rather than better. We note also how those who have the will to do wrong use the intellect to help them in that kind of work, even continuously setting it to the task of finding reasons and justification for their course, so that some of the brainiest and best educated men constantly justify themselves in the most foolish and diabolical actions, using the intellect as a slave to find reasons and excuses for their course.

There must come into all lives that thing which Jesus had in mind when he said, You must be born again. The old will to do evil must be converted and give place to the new will to do good; then man is in position to use his education. He is following the divine injunction, "Add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge." (2 Peter 1:5.) To gain knowledge while retaining a contempt for or indifference towards faith and virtue, benefits no man.

Conversion and religious consecration are absolutely essential and indispensable to any kind of successful educational venture. But I am here addressing a body of men, all of whom are supposed to have been converted and to have passed through these experiences, whose lives are now dedicated to God. You have the essential thing, you have made the right start so, as far as I am concerned, I say, Go as far as you please in the acquisition of knowledge; go where you will in any course of study, in any college or university, in history or philosophy or science, providing you take the Spirit with you as your guide, to separate the chaff from the wheat, the evil from the good, the false from the true, and always retain your attitude of personal consecration.

Why should we be prejudiced against education in itself? There was a time when people thought that the seat of the mind was in the kidneys. The brain is not mentioned in the Hebrew scriptures, because the Hebrews thought they thought with the kidneys, while the Babylonians thought that they thought with the liver. We know better now. Education has enlightened us on this point. Are you glad or sorry? Well, we are rather glad that we have been set right on that point. It has its advantages. We would not want to surrender that knowledge. Why put barriers down and say we shall go no further? . . .

In fact, though I have used the term education in the way in which it is commonly used, from our viewpoint education is a part of religion. Religion is not a thing confined to Sunday, or to an hour at the midweek prayer service. From the Latter Day Saint standpoint it includes all things pertaining to our lives that are legitimate for us to have. Anything that it is right for me to do at all touches my religion at some vital point. If a thing is irreligious I have nothing to do with it. So that, under that conception, education has a much broader and more holy significance.

The Bible continues to be the world's best seller. Last year 30,000,000 copies were printed and distributed. We are told in the Literary Digest, quoting from the Bible Society General Report, that up to 1920 parts of the Scriptures had been published in 725 languages and dialects. The whole Bible has been published in 159 languages, the New Testament in 138 more. Portions of the Bible, consisting of at least one book, have been published in 428 other languages and dialects. The American Bible Society distributed 375,000 Bibles, nearly 750 New Testaments, and nearly three and three quarters million other portions of the Bible. It may surprise many to learn that half of these for the last two years have gone to the Chinese. The supply has not been sufficient to meet the demand. $5,000,000 could be spent in the distribution of the Bible throughout the world, but in fact the society has a budget of only a little over $1,000,000.

LETTERS AND NEWS

Echoes From Zion

Encouraging Letters to the Presiding Bishop

Elder W. A. Smith, one of our missionaries, writes as follows:

"I am inclosing check for $6 sacrifice offering from myself, companion and daughter. We have decided to go without one meal every week for one year beginning December 1, 1922, which will be equal to 20 cents a meal, and send it to you to help in God's work. If 50,000 noble Saints will do likewise, we will raise in addition to the present income over half a million dollars annually. Oh, wouldn't that make our Bishop's heart glad, and wouldn't our loving Father smile upon us. Let's all do this and God will speed the right."

Brother E. L. Edwards writes as follows:

"Attached find check for $25, $10 for tithing and $15 free-will offering. Our tithing is more than paid and we feel to give $25 each month of this year to the good cause. God has blessed me with many things in life such as the gospel, good health and many other blessings. I enjoy His spirit and feel that it is worth more than silver or gold."

Brother G. R. Kuykendall, another missionary, writes:

"I have filled out the inventory and will hand it to the bishop here. I expect to start a campaign here in the interest of the financial law. I intend to comply with it myself and very strongly urge upon the active priesthood here, that they make out their inventories, pay their tithing and help in the local expense of the branch here. Complying with it ourselves, I intend that we then intensively push the campaign for complying with the law among the membership of the church here."

Sister D. E. Dunshee writes:

"I was seventy years old last March, but the Lord has since then blessed me with health to work 32 weeks at $4 a week. This will be tithing, freewill offering and Christmas Offering. I want to help all I can in the redemption of Zion."

Frugality Pays

Enormous business is being done by the Federal Reserve Banks cashing War Saving Stamps. The Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City and its branches in Denver, Omaha, and Oklahoma City, have cashed to date in excess of 9,200,000 stamps, totaling more than $46,000,000. Over 650,000 separate certificates have been received and each one separately checked and examined. None of these had more than twenty stamps affixed and there were thousands of them with one, two, and three stamps thereon.

There have been issued and mailed to owners of these War Saving Stamps over 179,500 cashier's checks, and this does not include probably $30,000,000 in stamps which have been redeemed direct by postmasters or yet held by original owners who have not as yet presented them for redemption.

In order to carry on this vast amount of work, the Federal Reserve Bank in Kansas City, in addition to its regular force of several hundred clerks working continuously for almost two months, has found it necessary to work until midnight a force of about 275 extra clerks.

Although with this vast amount of work, we feel the Government has accomplished much, for there are thousands of people throughout this district who to-day have bank accounts for the first time, and it was brought about almost entirely through the Government's efforts to instill into their minds the reason and effect of saving a few dollars.

It is a pleasing picture in Zion to see the little children on their way to kindergarten where they are amused and taught by competent teachers from the ranks of the sisters. The dining hall is used for this purpose. Recently the church has started a nursery where children are cared for during the day at a nominal price.

Another well-ordered sacrament service has passed into history, presided over by President E. A. Smith, Pastor Hopkins, Bishop Becker, and Historian W. W. Smith. Eighteen distributed the emblems.

Our sympathies were greatly aroused in visiting Brother R. D. Weaver, one of our earnest, efficient missionaries, in the Sanitarium awaiting an operation for the third time. His first and uppermost desire to live is that he might continue his labors as missionary, in which work he has successfully wrought for ten years. On a later visit we found he had successfully passed the operation and was resting nicely. We had prayer together, in which he offered a wonderful petition. May the Saints remember him in prayer.

As we hear frequently the strains of music by the band and the choir in their practices which frequently extend well into the night, it arouses a feeling of deep appreciation for Zion and her attainments, and also a wonder if such continuous labor on the part of the choir is duly appreciated by the masses. It should be.

We are pleased to learn of the progress of the work in the "northwest corner," our former beloved field where sweet memories linger of our days and years of service there. There are "timbers for the temple" in that district—the Seattle and British Columbia—also adown the coast.

An Advocate of Stewardships

The observance of our social doctrine necessary to perfect the Christian life.

I am located at present here in Everett, Washington, having come here about six weeks ago. We expect to make our home here for at least the winter. There is a little mission here, with a nice little church building and a number of faithful Saints.

The thing that I am most interested in at present is to prepare to do my work as well as possible, that is in preaching the church program. I have been reading the HERALD and Ensign for a long time and the articles written therein on the "Social problems" are very interesting to me. In fact, the social philosophy as expressed in the doctrine of stewardships has been very interesting.

The preaching of the whole church program is very essential and I want to acquaint myself with it in its wholeness. I want to know what I am talking about before I make any attempt to preach. My idea is careful consideration and preparation before occupying the pulpit. I always use notes and often write or sketch my sermon. However, I have met with much criticism and some have refused to listen because I used notes. But I notice that I am not alone in this.

There are a great many subjects preached by many of the ministry that I do not sanction, but be that as it may, the spiritual life as revealed in the Christ is the essential thing, I believe, and it takes the observance of the social doctrine to perfect the Christian life.

A Faith Greatly Strengthened Through Study and Prayer

[We here present two letters which passed between two brothers; one in America, a member of this church, the other in Vienna. Both are Jews. Our readers will be interested in the correspondence.—F. M. S.]

VIENNA, November, 1922.

Dear Brother: Your last letter received, and am glad to know that all is well with you, because I have been puzzled about you. I pray you to let me know frankly what is in your heart. Our beloved parents have no knowledge of this letter.

The most interesting thing for me is to know about the school [Graceland]. What do you intend to take from there that will help you on your career? According to my understanding I believe this school must be built upon a religious foundation. What is supposed to be the real purpose—your moral godliness? Though our parents never mentioned anything about your last letter, I am sure they are not satisfied with it. From your previous letters it was impossible to find out what kind of studies you were really taking. I tell you, my dear, the whole matter looks very queer to me. Have you perhaps obligated yourself to some one? I pray you to tell me the whole truth; you need not withhold yourself from me. Please send your answer to this letter to my business address, so that no one else will open the letter.

About home there is nothing particular to say. Our beloved parents are healthy. Business at the present is not very good, but we must be satisfied with what we are earning. So I pray you again not to turn away but to write me everything directly.

Closing, I remain, with best greetings and kisses,
Your loving brother,

INDEPENDENCE, December, 1922.

My Dearly Beloved Brother: Your letter which you wrote me from your place of work has reached me, and I am indeed very glad that you are asking me in such a way about school and other things. For a long time I have had the desire to declare myself to you. So as much as the Spirit of the Lord and wisdom permits, I will answer your questions without delay.

You are my older brother, it is true, but pardon me if I feel that because my fate has taken me around more in the world than you I have more practical knowledge and more experience. I have studied races (people), languages, philosophies, customs, and religions, and after a mature consideration I have come to the following conclusion:

The God of our forefathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, is the same God of the Jews, the God and Savior of the Christians (God and Christ are one), the Great Spirit of the Indians, and the Allah of the Mohammedans. He is the God of the universe, the King of kings, the Lord of lords. He is invincible, almighty, and omniscient, full of clemency, charity, and kindness. But he is also known for his sternness and justice.

His Spirit, the Holy Spirit, is over me and fills me and commands me to write this to you, my beloved brother. His answer shall be my answer. I am sure you will not be able to understand such a declaration, but I shall try to tell you all this in very simple words. I pray daily to God that he will enlighten your mind so that you may be able to understand me.

God is my witness that this which follows is the absolute truth. There is no thought of reserve whatsoever because, just as I said before, the Spirit of the Lord is with me, and this I say to you, my older brother, with whom I expect to find no prejudice in one way or another:

If you will take the Bible, lay aside all prejudices of your present belief, and go down on your knees as I do every day asking God in earnest prayer, then will he have mercy on you, will forgive you for all your sins, and open your eyes, so that you will see the light of the truth and the Spirit of the Lord will be with you; the Spirit of the Lord is the spirit of truth. Your eyes will be opened and the evil spirits will leave you so that you will be able to understand me. This you will do because the Spirit of the Lord is with me and with this letter.

When you read these wonderful words of the Lord with your eyes opened, then you will observe that he speaks about three books which are now in existence, not only about the Bible itself, though the Bible is one of those three books. But you will notice that he speaks about some people who are our Indians here in America, and then he speaks about a second Zion, which will be here in Independence. After all, you may draw the conclusion that the same God who talked with Moses has the power to talk to-day with his children and he does talk with them now.

That he talks to-day with his children, I am convinced because he twice spoke to me through his servant John Garver, the apostle. Shall I be disobedient to the heavenly vision?

A Luther in Germany, a Huss in Bohemia, a Wycliff in England, a Calvin in Switzerland, and a Joseph Smith, the prophet of God here in America sacrificed themselves for the just cause. Through providential direction I came into affiliation with a grandson of this Joseph Smith, viz, Doctor F. M. Smith, the president of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. With the holding of this office he is the only prophet of the present time—the prophet of the church of the living God, for God established this church through a revelation. Graceland College was also established through a revelation given to the father of President F. M. Smith and is to-day the college of the church.

Though the church has done so much for me, things which cannot be measured in dollars and cents, I have no obligations other than the moral one.

Concerning my present, I hope to find employment next week, and because I am continuing my studies, I hope to have double results.

Here I will close. Believe me that my faith in God has only increased through this letter; I have greater confidence in his work than before. I hope the time will come when I shall have opportunity for a personal talk with you, because it is not easy to make such a subject satisfactorily clear in a written letter.

I remain with best greetings and kisses,
Your loving brother,

"We are expecting Elder H. A. Koehler to commence a series of meetings here about February 4," writes Sister A. Bertha McGillivray, publicity agent, of Saint Thomas, Ontario. "There are several nonmembers here who are quite regular attendants at our Sunday services and we hope before the special services are over that some of them will have seen the necessity of yielding obedience to the 'angel message.'"

"Although just a small branch, we have quite a few members of the priesthood, including Bishop J. L. Burger and Elder L. O. Pearson, president of the London District. These two brothers, together with Elders James Skelding and J. R. Shepherd and Priest W. H. Crowder, do the most of the preaching. Elder Pearson is branch president and Elder Skelding Sunday school superintendent."

Independence

Appointments at Independence for Sunday were as follows: Stone Church: Preaching by Elder R. V. Hopkins at eleven a. m. and at the evening hour a lecture on the meaning and purpose of the Boy Scout movement by Mr. E. D. Wright, Scout Executive of Kansas City. This meeting was in honor of the thirteenth anniversary of the organization of the Boy Scout Movement in the United States. Englewood, preaching by Elders D. O. Cato and Frank Mussell; Enoch Hill, preaching by Elders F. Madden and Lyman Fike; Liberty Street Church, Junior Service at eleven a. m.; preaching at 7.30 by Apostle Paul M. Hanson.

Apostle John W. Rushton was scheduled to preach at the six o'clock radio service Sunday but was called to Saint Louis where he preached twice to the Saints on Sunday. Apostle Paul M. Hanson preached the radio sermon and it is very favorably reported upon.

Influenza is still prevalent in Independence, and it is often complicated with pneumonia. There have been several deaths among the Saints.

Brother Charles Zerr who brought his family to Independence from Brooklyn some years ago died on Friday and his funeral was held at the Liberty Street Church Sunday afternoon at 2.30 in charge of Doctor Joseph Luff. The sermon was preached by Bishop Benjamin R. McGuire. Sister Zerr and one son, Charles Myron, are left to mourn.

There were two deaths in the family of Sister A. Closson this week. Her daughter, Sister Mary A. Moran, wife of Brother George Moran died leaving a three-day old baby as well as two other children and the husband. The funeral was at the Stone Church and the sermon was preached by Elder Walter W. Smith. Interment was in Mound Grove. Brother Millard McDonald, son-in-law of Sister Closson, died Thursday and was buried from the Enoch Hill Church Saturday. Sermon by Elder W. D. Bullard. Brother Millard leaves a wife and six children to mourn their loss.

Doctor G. Leonard Harrington returned to Independence Friday after several weeks in Hawaii. He is now back at his office and the Sanitarium.

Miss Copeland, superintendent of the Sanitarium, reports that the hospital is filled with patients and that they are having a busy time of it. They have quite a number of pneumonia patients as well as the usual run of operative cases.

Sister Mary Clark of Toronto who has been in the Sanitarium since before the General Conference is leaving for her home this week, much improved in health.

President Elbert A. Smith is still in Lamoni suffering from influenza. He is gaining however, and will likely be home by the time this item is published.

Bishop A. V. Karlstrom and wife came to Independence from their mission field in the Society Islands this last week. Bishop Karlstrom suffered a deterioration of health in the tropics and has come here to avail himself of proper care and medical attention.

Bishop's McGuire and Keir went to the Maple Grove Branch in the Far West Stake last Thursday to counsel with a group of the Saints there. They returned to Independence on Friday.

Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Gunder of Colorado Springs have come to Independence to make their home with their son-in-law and daughter, Brother and Sister Frank Russell.

Brother A. Max Carmichael was down from Lamoni for a few hours last week.

President Floyd M. McDowell was down to attend the Kansas City Stake conference which was held at Central Church on Sunday. He preached to the Saints there, morning and evening. He came to Independence on Monday to give a little added emphasis to the Graceland Home-Coming and Young People's Convention which will be held in Lamoni from June 3 to 16. He is very anxious to have every young person in the church attend, and asks that all who intend to go, write him so that proper reservation and plans can be made.

At the Stone Church Religio Friday evening, Doctor J. E. Wolfe, pastor of the First Christian Church, and president of the Chamber of Commerce of this city, was a chief speaker on the program. Mrs. Judson M. Tipton, a prominent D. A. R. was another appreciated speaker. Lincoln's Gettysburg address was recited by Kenneth Fligg. It was a patriotic program of high order.

Elder W. O. Hands, of Malvern Hill, Kansas City, had two Sunday appointments at the Stone Church recently, addressing the young people on proper recreation and pleasure.

Dallas, Texas

The Saints of the Dallas Branch I believe are still trying to do their bit in the Lord's vineyard. Our Sunday school is nicely organized for the coming year with Sister L. R. Wells for our superintendent. Everyone feels like getting right into the harness and helping the good sister push the work along. We have several outside children coming to our Sunday school now which makes our hearts glad, for we feel we may reach others through them by giving them our literature and quarterlies. We earnestly pray for success.

We have a good family of Saints with us from Detroit, Brother A. F. Shotwell's, he being elected at our regular branch business meeting as pastor of the Dallas Branch. We all again desire to help this good brother as well as our retiring pastor, Brother H. H. Davenport, who still remains assistant pastor. We want to help them in every way we can to keep the good work moving which we feel will be successful in the nearer future if we are all faithful.

Our Religio is nicely organized for the coming year. Brother John S. Bradford was elected president, and all the Saints seem to be taking an interest and are coming with better interest to the Religio than in the recent past. Sister John Nicoll is chief leader in arranging the programs for the evening.

I believe all the Saints are taking new courage for the coming year.

MRS. JOHN BRADFORD, Branch Correspondent.

Houston, Texas

It is not often Houston, Texas, Branch is heard from. We have a nice branch of about a hundred members, and we are growing slowly but surely. We have regretted very much that Brother and Sister J. W. Post have gone from our midst, but they have been blessed, we know, for they are now in Zion and have reached their fondest hopes, so our loss was their gain.

Among our departed from this world are Brother Veal and Brother Clyde Smith. These men were stanch defenders of the faith. They were both elders and, with the faithful branch president, Brother A. J. Banta, all worked as one to build this prospering branch. Brother Banta still remains. Brother G. W. Curtis, of Independence, Brother Shey, and Brother Birkhead are still working to put the gospel forth here. We have had Brother S. S. Smith with us the past three weeks. We did not tire of hearing this able servant of God tell the gospel story, and though we know the story, yet it is ever new. The result of his preaching was that eight were baptized into the kingdom. Among these was a Christian minister who had been very much opposed to the work. But he finally surrendered and is happy in obedience. This man is Brother Tipton. We trust we may have Brother Smith again ere long.

Our conference ended Sunday night, January 28. We had a profitable gathering and we feel that we can go on with a new zeal, and that by the help of God we can do greater things for God and his work.

We remain yours in gospel bonds,
730 Courtland Street. ETTA SMITH.

Kirtland Glimpses

This is a bright and clear Sabbath day. Few places seem to reflect and radiate the Sabbath spirit as does peaceful Kirtland. This seems to be the impression that steals over us with the first rays of the awakening sun, and we remember our appointments for the day with increasing pleasure.

Even as our footsteps tend toward the old temple standing in such dignity and grandeur, like one mounting guard over a choice spot of the Creator's handiwork, there drifts into our thoughts those of the Psalmist:

"I was glad and my heart did rejoice at the sound—
Let us go to the House of the Lord."

So we are not surprised when we read on the tablet high up on the front of the building "THE HOUSE OF THE LORD," together with the year of erection, 1833, the title of the church and date of the Court Decision that cleared its title as the true successor to the original church.

So we enter and add our names to the visitors' register in a little vestry room to the right, under one of the winding stairs at either end of the wide and lofty vestibule. The second floor balcony overlooking us and the morning light flooding down from the great Colonial windows midway.

Passing into the main room we come immediately to a quartering view of the Melchisedec rostrum, three tiers of pulpits in triplicate form and a further stand for those in charge of the service directly in front of these, a narrow stair to right and left affords access to all of the twelve seats described, and these are flanked again by raised pews on either side, entered from the aisle. The whole is backed by a deeply recessed window of Colonial type whose light projects along the domed ceiling above the center of the house, curving down at the sides to meet the square-fluted pillars in the aisle and then back to the sidewalls where open out the ten-foot high Gothic windows of perfect design.

As we advance and look back we note that the arrangement of pulpits is repeated precisely at the north end, though the gold initials designating the various stake officers are different and we learn these seats represent the Aaronic order of the priesthood. The intervening floor is arranged in four rows of pews capable of seating eight persons each, with movable benches to seat toward either pulpit.

The entire decoration is in white with a little walnut trim; there is considerable carving and built-up embellishment at the tops of the pillars and about the pulpits, yet not enough to be deemed extravagant or so little as to appear skimpy or meager. A close examination shows that all this handiwork was performed with great care and with no evidence of haste or slighting. To sum up, the whole impression is one of symmetry, of dignity, of beauty and chastity, of order.

We retrace our steps to mount the winding stair to the second floor which is arranged very like to the former description save that the tiers of pulpits are not so lofty nor so rich in design; the pews are without doors but have an addition in the form of an adjustable desk board the length of the compartment. This because the room is the scene of the School of the Prophets.

A further climb brings us to the third floor dormitories or quorum rooms, a central passage bisecting the several rooms until we enter the last or west room; possibly we are here touched with a peculiar sense of discernment as many have noted, and we learn that in this room the Prophet Joseph received many of the major revelations to the church. There is a wonderfully inspiring view that looks westward from the large gable window.

Now we may climb the remaining stairs and steps, one hundred sixty in all, that bring us out on the tower platform, and what a wondrous sight rewards us! We can now look down into the valley and village and mark the place where the late president, "our Joseph," was born, or look away seven miles to Little Mountain; over there toward the north we discern the smoke of locomotives; this is the New York Central, and the train is hurtling through Mentor on its way to Cleveland and the West. Mentor! That makes us think of Sidney Rigdon and the first missionaries of the Restoration coming this way to preach to the Indians.

Beyond, there is a silvery strip between the tree tops, and we recognize it to be Lake Erie, and over beyond Mentor again is Fairport, through which many of the parties of Saints came by water from Buffalo in early days. A few miles south of this point is the county seat of Painesville where the temple claim was heard and good Bishop Kelley cleared our title as successors to the early church. A look south shows us the rising hills and beautiful countryside. From those hills up the ribbonlike Old Chillicothe Pike, now a fine concrete highway, came the hewn stone for this old temple, and we may cast our thoughts back to the labor and sacrifices endured by those old-time Saints whose work stands to-day so stanchly as coworkers with God.

Visitors who have seen the Judean hills have insisted that there is a great similitude between this view from the temple tower and that which is to be seen from the site of the Temple in Jerusalem.

But now the great bronze bells at our elbow peals out to all that fair stretch of countryside that Saints are gathering to worship, the notes are well-nigh deafening to us on the tower platform, but the reverberations will travel many a mile in sweet and gentle reminders that this is God's Sabbath and that he expects thought and service of us. We wend our way to the place of appointment to see what the day has for us, and what teaching may be under such environments.

O. B. SERVER.

WHEELING, WEST VIRGINIA.

Editors Herald: It has been said, "An honest confession is good for the soul," but in this case it might be good for some of the brethren's pocketbooks. I have been connected with this work for thirty years, and in all that time I haven't had an impostor get the advantage of me until last summer, and then twice within a few months.

First, one called at our home stating he had met with the Saints at Independence, but was not a member of the church. He didn't ask for aid, but gave me to understand that some one relieved him of his pocketbook while on the train coming here from Parkersburg. After remaining for an hour or more he left, but came back on the following Sunday, stating he had procured a position at his trade of stonemasonry and intended to start in the morning. He had rented a furnished room but his funds were exhausted. Still he didn't ask directly for a loan. After church in the evening I concluded he might be all right, so I advanced money sufficient to get him food for the week. He stated he would be paid on the following Saturday. I haven't seen him since. He claimed he was a Swede. I presume he was about fifty years of age.

A few months later a man came wanting to see the elder. My wife invited him to stay for dinner as I would be in at that time. The first thing after dinner was a hard-luck story—down and out, on the way here took sick and spent all of his money. But he was a painter and had a position. All he needed was enough money to see him through until pay day. He was a member of the church and came from Ohio. Brother H. M. baptized him. He knew quite a few of the brethren, stating that a brother came there from W. some years ago by the name of E. and took the place by storm. I thought the fellow was O. K. I gave him a ten spot. My faith was strong in him. He surely moved, for I haven't seen him since.

The president of the W. branch informed me that H. was a member of their branch but was cut off for evil acts he had committed.

Again just the other day V. A., alias W., called wanting to see me. When informed that I was at work he stated he would like very much to get in touch with the Sunday school superintendent or Religio president. Sister Serig gave him the name of Samuel Martin, stating he was employed at the Improved Glass Works as paymaster. He was very anxious to get in touch with him. When asked if he desired to call him on the phone he said that wouldn't do, he must see him personally. On leaving our home he immediately called on Brother Martin, stating he was W and would like to get a little money. Samuel suspected him and so informed him, but he worked on his sympathy and he left with several dollars that Brother Martin advanced him, stating he would see him at church Sunday. But alas he didn't come.

Brethren, it amuses me when I think how these fellows pulled a double header on me. I hope you will be on the lookout for stonemasons, painters, and doctors. Make them show their credentials before you advance them any money.

Respectfully, LEWIS A. SERIG.

Thoughts on Official Responsibility

Too many look upon and accept a "call" to the priesthood as a bestowal of honor. It is the imposition of heavy responsibility.

To accept ordination and do nothing is to invite condemnation. To do little is to belittle the office. To do less than your best is to fall short of your greatest opportunity.

You have never done your best so long as you, while doing your bit, have failed to develop your latent talents and capacity for something still bigger.

The man who accepts ordination in this church with a true sense of its responsibility will be humbled by its weight and in his humility will seek to walk close to God, the source of inspiration; but in this walking close to and with God he will never forget to study—prepare for greater service.

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

Come to the Young People's Convention

To the Young People of the Church; Greeting: "We want you with us so that we can be with you." Don't you remember? That was what I said in a letter I wrote you a few months ago.

I meant it.

Several hundred young people are planning to be in Lamoni June 3-16, 1923, for the Graceland Home-Coming and the Young People's Convention.

We want you!

Candidly if I didn't feel that you would miss the best opportunity ever offered the young people of the church, this letter wouldn't be before you now. But—

"We want you with us so that we can be with you."

Graceland Home-Coming June 3 to 16, 1923

For many hundreds of young people Graceland is one of the dearest spots on earth. For twenty-five years graduating classes have been leaving her doors until there are now some seven hundred or more scattered throughout the world. Many have not visited their Alma Mater or met their classmates since the day they left Lamoni.

Next June is the 25th anniversary of the first graduating class. What a dandy time for a home-coming? Seldom in life have we anticipated an event with such fervor. Three days of unadulterated joy.

"We want you with us so that we can be with you."

Are you coming?

Young People's Convention June 3 to 6, 1923

"We want you with us so that we can be with you."

What a splendid slogan for the Young People's Convention!

A school for the generation of enthusiasm:

Spiritually:

A young people's prayer service every morning.

Intellectually:

Lectures, sermons, and discussions of church problems.

Socially:

Training courses for leadership in all lines of church activity.

Physically:

The right kind of recreational activities.

Religiously:

A demonstration of how religion can touch every phase of one's life.

We want you! Don't miss this! Are you coming?

Much of the success of these efforts depends upon you. We must know if you are planning to come.

Because:

We want to prepare for you a real worth-while program.

We must make some arrangements* about railroad rates.

We must arrange early for your accommodation.

Will you do your part by filling out the inclosed blank and mailing it to the undersigned? Decide now to come. You'll never regret it.

"We want you with us so that we can be with you."

Sincerely yours,

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,

By F. M. McDOWELL.

Next Religious Education Class

President Briggs has written the Presidency as follows:

The question of applicants for next year's course in religious education has been receiving our very serious consideration, due to the fact that we have not so far had many replies to the call issued by the President of the church and published in the HERALD some months ago.

Brother McDowell sent out a circular letter in behalf of the Presidency to all branch and district presidents; Brother Edwards, in behalf of the Twelve, sent out letters to all members of the Twelve and to the supervisors; Brother Carmichael, as a member of the committee, has been in touch with Sunday school officials, and from this office we have written to alumni and other ex-students of the institution. From the last two sources we have had very good replies, but from Brethren McDowell's and Edwards's letters to the branch and district president and the officers of the Twelve and supervisors, we have had very little response. It is now the first of February, and it is very desirous to have all applications in so that decisions can be reached earlier than sometimes has been done.

This is an important matter, and it is difficult to understand why the various officers mentioned by President Briggs should be indifferent to the call made. Perhaps each thinks the other will act and so waits. Let us hear from you, brethren.

FREDERICK M. SMITH,
President of the Church.

Free Thought

It is one of the peculiar developments of our vocabulary and historical development that the term free thought should be applied to those who break away from church organization, because to true religion alone does complete freedom belong. This freedom means not only the free agency of man as given to him in the beginning by God, the right to choose good and evil and to select the way in which he shall go, but it also means that man does not enjoy complete freedom except as he lives through all his powers in accordance with the truth. In other words, true freedom and righteousness are basically identical and only adjective terms or attributes of the same identical spirit.

The Master on one occasion is quoted as saying:

If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. . . . Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin. And the servant abideth not in the house forever: but the Son abideth ever. If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed. I know that ye are Abraham's seed; but ye seek to kill me, because my word hath no place in you. I speak that which I have seen with my Father; and ye do that which ye have seen with your father.—John 8: 31-38.

We have previously discussed the fact that only in the way of righteousness is there freedom; that there is no true freedom for the sinner; and a free life is not one of chance blown hither and thither by every wind, but that it is only in accordance with complete and righteous living that freedom is obtained.

The sinner is indeed a servant of sin. The sinner indeed suffers a lessening not only of spiritual but also of intellectual and finally of physical power. The sinner is indeed the servant if not the slave of his sins. The sinner indeed can never feel that full satisfaction and contentment that belongs to the normal man, the man of righteous life.

But in a purely intellectual sense, this freedom is not so generally recognized as it should be. In the first place freedom can only be found when we know the truth and then act in accordance with the truth. In the second place sin impairs the judgment, according to the Hindoo proverb so often quoted by Elder John W. Rushton, and the impaired judgment sins continuously. Sin destroys the capacity for knowledge and weakens the judgment.

In the third place the Master has plainly declared, "By me, if any men enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out and find pasture." (John 10: 9.) The true child of God may find pasture within and without. The Bible is not presented to limit or prevent thought, let alone that the construction of some law should be taken to prevent investigation in the quest for truth.

To the true child of God all truth is open as rapidly as his understanding will permit of his learning.

Hence are we told of the Comforter, even the Holy Spirit of God, He will guide you into all truth.

To him who is free, there is no dogmatic limits in religion nor in the schoolroom of science. He proves all things, but holds fast to that which is true. The word of God, or revelation, is not taken to limit thought. That which is a revelation to us rather increases our ability to perceive and understand, and until it does it is not a revelation to us.

It is true that wise children will pursue the way pointed out by those more experienced until they shall understand better and know for themselves. Wise children do not reject the wisdom and learning of those of more experience, but do not take the conclusions of others as prohibiting their own study, analysis, and thought as they become capable of analyzing for themselves.

So the children of God will well observe the old, old path where the Savior has trod, the way that is marked out by the feet of his followers. There is no intellectual limit placed upon the child of God to study, to understand and learn when opportunity is offered him. He is free to think, to receive, and to reject. He is free to understand; in fact, is the most free in thought of any people on the face of the earth, but does not, therefore, in his pride place his limited understanding as absolute and final, nor as inhibiting or preventing further thought by himself or others. Within the church of God there is liberty; he who keeps His commandments is free indeed.

Methodist Foreign Missions Suffer

The Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church reports a decline of thirty per cent in receipts for the past six months. According to the governing law of this organization, the budget for the succeeding year is based on the receipts for the preceding year. This means therefore not only a shortage for the present year, but also decreased work for the succeeding year. In a letter from Doctor North it is stated that unless something be done at once the result will spell tragedy. Doctor North continues as follows:

It will mean in all probability

First: That no new missionaries whatsoever can be sent to the field.

Second: That we shall not be able to send men to replace those who have either died, or retired, or gone on furlough.

Third: That missionaries on furlough now in this country, and amongst them some of the very finest missionaries we have ever had, will be compelled to remain here.

Fourth: That the forward movement so bravely begun in every mission field of the church will not only be halted, but will be compelled to surrender victories already won.

Fifth: That we shall be compelled to withdraw support from that large body of magnificent young people who are now in our colleges and seminaries and medical schools, definitely preparing for missionary service.

Sixth: That the appropriations of 1923, which by general conference order cannot exceed the income of the preceding year, will be so lowered that missionaries of necessity will be withdrawn from the work, institutions closed, and sections of the work abandoned.

It seems exceedingly strange to this board that in a day like this when the church of Jesus Christ is facing such an opportunity as she has never yet known, we should be face to face with this acute financial stress. Never was this wide world so open to our message as it is now. The very chaos and confusion in all of the foreign lands are breaking up age-long complacencies that heretofore we have not known. It does not seem possible to us that in this hour of so great a human need, which, we are certain, it is the mind of our Savior to meet, we should be compelled to curtail our saving operations.

They plan to meet this deficit by a reduction in the general expense budget, indirect appropriation, and direct appropriation to the extent of one third. A second one third of the deficit they plan to meet by a postponement of the payment of debts which were ordered paid by the last annual meeting. But it is absolutely essential that the remaining one third be received before the end of the fiscal year as an excess over the present rate of receipts.

This is of interest to us as showing how seriously others are suffering from the financial depression. It is also of interest to show how they are endeavoring to meet the situation by a frank, full statement and a direct appeal in order that the work may not be unduly curtailed. It is a direct appeal for definite purposes.

That which we need to watch with especial care is that we do not use the existing financial conditions as an excuse either personally or as a body beyond that which is absolutely necessary. As individuals all who can should pay as liberally as their circumstances will permit. The very fact that some others are not so well able to pay or that some others have in fact no surplus, no gain for tithing, is all the more reason that those who can should pay.

Also, though the year shows no gain of assets, we should consider carefully our expenditures beyond our necessities of food, clothing, and shelter. There is much in most of our expenditures which should be tithed. In the third place we have to consider the possibility of freewill offering, if we are able, in order to maintain the work of the church.

As an organization our attention should not be so closely drawn to the fact of existing economic stringency that we fail to examine carefully our methods and opportunities and consider carefully what we can do now.

Religious Book Week

Practically all the national publishers of religious books have united in a campaign to observe March 4 to 10, 1923, as National Religious Book Week. This is the third annual observance and has a great deal to commend it.

While the origin of the movement may have as its primary object the selling of more books for more profit, there is bound to result from this national advertising of wholesome literature a most pleasing result.

During the past months a goodly number of books have been advertised and reviewed in the columns of the HERALD. The Saints have bought liberally of them, and in so far as diligent attention is given to this side of our education we shall make rapid strides in our development.

The management of our publishing house plan to list again some of the best of these books, and will ask that not only those needing such books purchase at this time, but that those having such books unread or unstudied, for this week give the subject special attention.

We suggest that a fine climax to this campaign would be "book sermons" by our pastors. The following subjects are suggested, and thoughtful pastors will, considering the special needs of their flocks, adapt them or use others of most value:

"Good books build character."

"Religious books in home life."

"Sunday reading."

"Some good books I know about."

"Religious education through books."

"The three standard books of the church."

"Social aspects of religion in books."

"How to read the Bible." (Or, Book of Mormon, or Doctrine and Covenants—or all three.)

"Supplying spiritual needs through books."

Sunday school librarians might well, on Sunday the 4th, make a talk during the school hour about books and reading.

Our church has an excellent historical background in regard to education and the use of books. Its future will largely be determined by the use we make of them in the work before us. E. D. M.

Pastors and District Presidents

In the letter columns will be found in this issue a communication from Hyrum O. Smith, of the Order of Evangelists, who gives his opinion on the question of pastors and district presidents, and speaks from long experience in church work. His letter will be read with profit by all who are interested in the subject of pastors as presented recently by Brother Elbert. F. M. S.

Americans Are Not Morons

Much has been written concerning the results of the army tests on intelligence. Much more has been said of late concerning the large number of morons in the United States, with the inference that a majority of all American citizens are subnormal, while the rest of the world is even worse. Some have stated the average mentality as fourteen years; others as twelve years.

Baron C. Watson, in a recent Outlook, takes up this subject and asks some pertinent questions: Who is the twelve-year-old boy by whom they judge? How much does he know? By what instruments is the mind measured?

Mr. Watson has had an unusual opportunity as a civilian instructor at a coast defense fort and has seen these tests actually being made. He states that in his class work, when the men were being recruited as rapidly as possible, he had men who could not read or write in any language, foreigners who could not write the English language, and men who had been through only a few grades of grammar school. Most of these pupils were classed as illiterate. In fact, only about seven per cent were either stupid or half witted. The others were fairly bright but had very little schooling.

The expert examiner appeared with blanks to be filled out, designated by letters of the Greek alphabet, and some would have been difficult for a well-educated man, because they were mental twisters and had to be done rapidly. Many of the men quit simply because they did not know what the examiner was talking about. For example, the examiner reads rapidly: "If water is a liquid form of ice, put a cross in the semicircle; if not, put a triangle in the oval," and the men did not know what a semicircle or an oval was, so had to give up the question. As such they would be classed as mentally deficient, when the truth is many were intelligent men with a limited vocabulary.

This is a very important factor of these tests, that psychologists use language that is unfamiliar to men who are intelligent, but not specially educated in that line. Also pen and pencils and paper are awkward tools to a man who has not worked in clerical training. Some college professors would pass a poor examination with a pick and shovel under the direction of a gang boss speaking the jargon of his class. Yet that is the basis on which these tests have been made.

During the war, officer material was selected by similar tests. The method was efficient, since it meant a selection of educated men, and for quick training they are better material because they could more readily use the technical textbooks. But as to the value of these tests in business, opinions differ very widely. As a basis for statistics showing the percentage of mental deficiency in the United States, their value is extremely doubtful, if not worthless.

Common sense and common observation should have shown the inaccuracy of such conclusions. It is probably true that one half of our citizens are very poorly educated—which is most regrettable. But Mr. Watson, after going through college and working at different times with all sorts of men, is convinced that the proportion of the simple ones of earth is not much greater on farm or ship, or in mine or factory, than it is in classical halls.

Price Changes of a Century

Study of price changes and business prospects made by L. P. Ayres, of the Cleveland Trust Company, from 1810 to 1920, shows three high peaks of wholesale prices, during the Civil War, the War of 1812, and the World War. In each case, the high prices were followed by a speedy decline of wholesale prices for ten years, which continued a gradual decline for the next twenty years, then a gradual increase for twenty years preceding the war peak.

Wages of artisans have been about 60 per cent higher than for common labor for the past one hundred years. Both, however, show a general increase from 1820 to 1910 with a peak following the Civil War, followed by a decline back to the general curve. This was made possible, however, by industrial and mechanical improvements. Mr. Ayres suggests that if wages are not to shrink to keep pace with prices, it must be that there is an increase in the efficiency and productivity of industry. If the output does not come up, wages cannot permanently retain the very large gain made as the result of the World War.

The curve from 1820 to 1910 shows that wages of artisans and common laborers were about three times as great in the later years as they were at the opening of the period. Wholesale prices have risen less in proportion in the United States than in other leading countries of the world, and very much less in percentage than in either Italy or France. In all countries a marked decline has been shown from the peak prices of early 1920.

In the United States wholesale prices in early 1920 were about 2.7 times as high as the beginning of 1910, in England more than three times as great, in France 5.8 times as great, and in Italy nearly seven times as great.

A study of the research shows that when prices change wholesale prices are first affected, then retail prices to a less degree, then wages, and finally rent. The remarkable factor is that wholesale prices increased more in percentage from the beginning of 1914-1915 to 1920 than did retail prices. This does not mean that the increase was greater in the aggregate, but that the rate of percentage is greater, as based on the earlier prices.

The Feeding of Children

We have had several letters during the past few years from some of our missionaries wishing that something could be done to teach proper feeding of children in some of the homes in which they have been located. They have reported the feeding of salt pork to young children scarcely out of babyhood, and the result is undernourishment.

We have now before us the results of a review made in a county in a southern State by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor. They find that corn bread and sorghum, dried beans, fat salt middlings, and, as a redeeming feature, usually milk, constitute for a large part of the year the diet of southern mountain children.

Children having a diet of milk and unbolted corn meal were found on examination to be well nourished, but the other food available failed to supply the essentials of growth, and undernourishment results when the quantity of milk is small. Three fourths of the children were either poorly or only fairly well nourished.

Except in a few families fresh vegetables and fruit are used only for a short period in the summer and fall, and fresh lean meat for even a shorter period. The small number of eggs produced were sold so that milk is, in fact, the only food that could be counted upon to furnish protein, minerals, and vitamins needed for children's growth. When fresh milk is scarce, or is changed to skim milk or buttermilk, the effect is disastrous.

There is needed improvement of the soil and farm methods from which higher standards of living would probably follow. There is also needed education of the mothers, for they give solid food to infants at too early an age. Coffee drinking by children when milk is scarce, and promiscuous eating between meals, are common customs but not to be recommended. Also the fact that children need more sleep is generally ignored.

We suggest this because bad habits with children, neglect of cleanliness, are much more widely extended than the areas thus referred to. In our own church the Department of Women stands ready at all times to give help to mothers who either desire or are willing to receive the same. They have leaflets on proper feeding of infants and children and also dietetics for the whole family.

Stewardships

Radio sermon by President Frederick M. Smith, delivered February 11, 1923, at the Independence studio of the Central Radio Company.

In our talk last Sunday evening we made an appeal for the development of a universal social consciousness which shall include our brother in our thinking in terms of weal, a social consciousness, based on the Christian philosophy and religion, which seizes the fundamental law, love of God, but recognizes that its manifestation includes our neighbor, which recognizes that consciousness of God makes us aware of our brother, or fellow man, and that to love God means loving our neighbor and giving service to humanity where needed and to the extent of our ability and opportunity.

Social Conscience Is Christian

We held that such is essentially Christian, and that the church which claims to represent Jesus Christ must stand for such social reform as will bring about such demonstration of love of God, and that to work as well as pray for the coming of the kingdom of God means to stand for such social reform.

We held further, that any social reform to succeed must be based on religion.

This idea leads away from individualism, and demands the development of a social consciousness as well as a terminology which shall include the group of which we are members. That is to say we must become accustomed to thinking in terms of community weal rather than personal.

Individual Initiative Will Not Be Curtailed but Sublimated

I know that many hold that a successful industrial organization can be had only where individual initiative stimulated by promise of personal or individual gain, is the social dynamic, and therefore they look askance at the idea of group activity or the development of a social consciousness which looks only in the direction of group betterment.

In fact there has recently appeared a literature which is in the nature of a protest by prominent individualists against an apparently growing inclination to emphasize group thinking and acting as a fundamental social condition. But this protest may be looked upon as a reactionary movement, and such are always present with reform movements, as a deterrent, and may be a wise provision against both sudden and extreme changes. I cannot but feel, however, that the movement towards a larger, richer, and more religious consciousness, one which thinks, moves, acts, in terms of community welfare, is too well developed and too well started to move either in a circle or to stop.

I feel that the fear by individualists that incentive or personal initiative will be less pronounced or less developed, or of less social value in a social order based on the group, is ill-founded, and due perhaps to a failure to see what it is after all which prompts to the largest activation. Was it the thought of profit or reward which prompted soldiers in the Great War to deeds of valor and terrific accomplishment, or was it love of country, thoughts of home—patriotism?

No greater, finer, or richer sublimation of individual initiation can take place than to change it from a selfish to an altruistic base—from self-aggrandizement to group service. And religion—love of God and man—is the magic wand to make the change.

The Christian Doctrine of Stewardship

Our talk to-night, as per our previous announcement, is to be on the doctrine of stewardships, the Christian doctrine of stewardships, as we understand that doctrine. And right here let me say that it means more than paying tithing, for that means merely paying a debt.

The social significance of the Christian religion is crystallized in the doctrine of stewardships, according to which one is held socially responsible for the manner in which he utilizes whatever of property or wealth he may acquire, holding only that which he can make productive or of service. And what he holds thus is clearly determined by his capacity or managerial ability.

It is clear from this envisagement of social responsibility that talents as well as property shall be directed towards community welfare. Furthermore, talents must be exercised, not permitted to lie dormant. Everybody capable of doing so must contribute to the common weal. And this cannot be done by law or statute. Public sentiment must be the compulsion.

One of the failures of our present order is idleness, arising from several sources. There are those who will not work, but live on the fruits of the labor of others. And the indolence of those who do not work or contribute because in some way they have come into possession of a competency, inherited or transmitted, is scarcely less reprehensible than the indolence of those who are indisposed to labor and who thus become a burden on those who do labor or seek to filch support by hook or crook.

Sad indeed is idleness brought about by untoward circumstance, by lack of opportunity, or disability. And it will scarcely be denied that we have much of both which would easily be preventable if present maladjustments were removed by necessary reformatations. In a society founded on the Christian foundation of love and service, all will desire to labor, for through labor alone can contribution to common weal be made.

Surplus Property Reverts to the Group

The holding of only what can be utilized (according to capacity or talent) carries with it a very essential concomitant of the doctrine of stewardship, viz, that all surplus property or wealth shall revert to the common treasury or to the group. In other words, all property or wealth not justly desired or needed for the care or comfort or welfare of the steward or needed in the business or stewardship through which the contribution to society is being made, shall become the property of the group.

Wealth and property are not for personal pleasure according to caprice, but for service and enlarged contribution to common weal or comfort. Riotous or extravagant living is incongruous with the doctrine of stewardships, and luxury is justified only when common.

Just recently I read a defense of American individualism in which it was attempted to show the blessings of the present system by giving figures of the increased production of goods per capita, but the writer was careful to make no reference to the unequal opportunities of the populace to enjoy this increased quantity of goods. It is well known that extreme luxury in some quarters is offset by extreme squalor in others. Some have goods to ennui, while others are denied even the necessities. This is wrong.

Luxury Is Justified Only When Commonly Enjoyed

No Christian, well within the spiritual domination of the genius of his religion, can be happy in the midst of luxury so long as the knowledge remains that others have not the necessities of life. When needs have been supplied to all and just wants have been fully met, then and then only will private luxury be justified—when it becomes common. And here lies the justification even to-day for costly, beautiful, and even luxurious public buildings—they are common wealth. And this may explain the psychology of even poor people cheerfully voting taxes for fine public buildings even when their own wants go continuously unsupplied. But this is a digression. Let us return to our subject.

Every One Labors According to Capacity and Receives According to Just Wants and Needs

In society organized on the stewardship plan, from every man will be expected according to his capacity, and to every man will be given according to his needs as determined by his just wants and his circumstances. Every man, every woman must contribute in the way nature has best endowed, and the compensation in part is that which will be sufficient to supply needs. This partial compensation may be termed industrial or economic compensation; but to the individual will flow a greater one, viz, satisfaction, soul-satisfaction in seeing the group benefited by the services rendered. The criterion of success becomes not bank account, not piled up personal wealth, but service and wealth contributed to the community. To appreciate such a social ideal, such a social organization, requires a social consciousness for the development of which we must depend on religion. It is quite foreign to the present social order.

The True Equality of Opportunity

Such an order means equality. But in saying this we do not mean level equality, the equality so often in the minds of those who advocate communism. We mean equality of opportunity for expression and contribution according to capacity.

Equality of opportunity is quite loudly and boldly claimed for the present order by its apologists and defenders, especially in the United States. And it is readily admitted that there is some justification for the claim; but in many ways it has worked out that the equality of opportunity for all, aimed at by the founders of the United States and its economic and industrial activities, has been subverted by the forces developed from the selfishness which is fundamentally a large factor in individualism.

Very large fortunes and luxury possessed by a small class, generous fortunes possessed by many, the strenuous legal efforts to safeguard private property rather than general weal have so completely upset equality of opportunity that it is a bit farcical to claim its existence for all. It may be a remote possibility, but it is our duty to make it even more than a probability.

For the highest possible contribution from each person means not only recognition of innate chief talents or capacity, but development thereof—and that means education. And who will claim that even in this there is equal opportunity for all even in the United States, where education at public expense has reached its highest development. Far too many examples of its failure lie close at hand. There is no one of my hearers who cannot within his own experiences and observations count many examples where the "equality of opportunity" claim has proven a myth.

Not for Profits, but for Service

Let me repeat, in a social order based on stewardships, on the religion of Jesus, socially interpreted, each person will seek that occupation which will permit the largest expression of innate ability, not measured in profits alone, but in service. In fact each one must find that occupation.

The doctrine of stewardships can be applied to social reform only on a religious basis, for it is contingent upon attitude, and the attitude necessary springs only from a consciousness that service to God spells service to neighbor. The attitude required is that each will give his maximum contribution to the group measured by his equipment, turning all surplus into the common treasury. It may require activity in that which is not accompanied by a return in wealth yet is required by social advancement.

To-day much of this is left either to personal sacrifice or to "foundations," which are usually private surplus so employed as to perpetuate the founder's memory, though public appropriations care for other lines, when public sentiment is strong enough to demand it. But under a form of society in which stewardships constitute the industrial plan, unrewarding labor necessary for social progress or weal will be and should be supported from accumulated community surplus which is the aggregate of contributed individual surplus. In other words, this flowing of all individual surplus into the common treasury, will make it possible to accomplish as legitimate and regular public activities many things which are now left to so-called charity and private philanthropy, or by what may be termed commercialized social obligations only partially discharged. By the things left to charity and private philanthropy I refer to the care of the sick and aged and debilitated, the victims of unemployment, accident, etc. By the commercialized social obligations only partially discharged is meant insurance companies providing for life, accident, industrial, and sick insurance, etc., for these companies insure comparatively only a few, and these the best risks, while those needing insurance benefits most are denied it, or penalized, because most likely to become dependent. Modern insurance is unchristian, because it denies service to those most needing it, and reaps benefit from those most able to serve.

Once society has been established on a basis wherein service becomes the criterion of success, each person will seek the activity best suited to his natural and developed endowments, whether common laborer, farmer, or banker, for "social standing" will not be determined by "income" or bank account, but by common weal conserved.

The Farm Problem and Labor Problem

Unrequited labor under our present system is avoided, even if socially much needed. We see an aspect of this in the movement away from the farm, the laborers seeking employment for which the remuneration demands less hours served. Many schemes have been devised to entice laborers back to the farm. "Back to the farm movements" are common; but still there is scarcity of farm labor.

It seems clear to me that under the stewardship plan the farm problem will solve itself automatically; for, service being the measure of success, those with innate inclination to till the soil will naturally seek that outlet for their social expression. The freedom and wholesomeness of farm outdoor life is what holds many to-day in that service, even if the returns to self are not so great as in other directions and vocations. Within most men if not all is the inbred instinct for agriculture. They love to make garden—to plant and see things grow—and only commercialism and the extreme individualism of our present industrial customs and organization, with the less arduous road to a competency have deflected those with agricultural inclinations away from the land.

What we have just presented touching the solution of the scarcity of farm labor problem will hold in other directions. It is not expected that this change in attitude will come all at once; but "getting religion" in this sense may as suddenly change one's attitude in this direction as in some of the directions we are familiar with in emotional revivals. I grant you that a highly and pervasive social consciousness is essential to develop the idea with all individuals that the prime duty is to serve the group, the benefits of improvements and accumulated goods coming to the individual only through the common uplift, and individual success being measured by the amount he has contributed to the public good.

It is the duty of the church and all church men to develop and promote this social consciousness and agitate such social reform. To discharge this responsibility the church must be something more than a Sunday entertainment society, something more than a performer of ceremonies. The pulpit must stand for social reform, denounce selfishness in all forms, and free itself from the charge of being subservient to the interests entrenched behind the bulwarks of individualism. It is not enough for the church in its efforts to promote Christianity to call on individuals to come to Christ, but the call must be to come with the tools of service in hand ready to devote time and energy and talents to the common welfare. "Get thy spindle and thy distaff ready and God will give thee flax." But the promise of flax follows preparation. It is not enough to preach the entrance of a mystic kingdom of God into the heart, but a kingdom of God come in the form of a regenerated and ideal society where righteousness prevails and justice walks unhampered. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things will be added unto you." The church must foster social reform, and its stalwarts may even have to enter politics to accomplish it. It must stand for social freedom, and this necessitates a break with present conditions, for the church must stand for wealth becoming pervasive and not the heritage of a privileged class.

Not Communism Nor Socialism

Here it becomes necessary for me to say some things about what the doctrine of stewardship is not, because otherwise I might be misunderstood. In speaking as I have I have been under the necessity of using terms and even phrases if not sentences which may have been taken by some of my hearers as ear marks of certain well-known social reform movements and even political ones.

For instance, I have spoken of common weal, community welfare, and turning surplus into the common treasury, etc.; and doubtless some of my hearers have thought, though they may not have said, "That sounds like communism." But stewardship implies an order where the rule of all things common will not apply, for there will be, must be, private property and private responsibility for its use and management; but all surplus will become common and all activity will be directed towards common maintenance and betterment.

Some may have thought, "He is talking socialism." Wrong again, for the doctrine of stewardship is not socialism, though the great tools of industry will be under such social control that they are promoting general welfare first, the advancement of their owners' or managers' interests being incidental, or contingent upon, proportional increase of wealth. This social control of the tools of industry will be promoted and protected by public sentiment, fostered and preserved by religion.

No, the social order for which our church organization stands and for which we work, and which we desire to promote is neither communism nor socialism, though community interests are first, we must think in terms of community welfare, and our talents, abilities, and activities must be socialized.

Such an order permits of no idlers. All who are able to work must do so, and the group is vitally interested in finding something for everybody to do in the way of contribution to general weal or comfort. Everyone a contributor to common good, is the ideal.

The leisure class will disappear, for leisure itself becomes communized, what there is being shared by all. Everybody is entitled to some leisure, to recreation, but even that with industrial efficiency in view.

Drudgery will be abolished; for work being the natural expression of God-given or nature-endowed talents, becomes pleasurable and wholesome.

Universal Education

The ideal society outlined above will demand a system of education more nearly universal than the present, and its universality must extend to the higher education; for society demanding the best of service from every member it becomes of prime importance that every member shall be put through such process of development that will not only discover the special talent or talents, but when discovered, the highest possible development of the special endowment shall be made, with the guarantee that opportunity shall be had for its fullest expression in accomplishment and contribution. Such a system of education must be far more flexible than our present one, capable of fitting itself to the needs of each pupil. Not only must the special endowment of each child or person be discovered and developed, but that must be vitalized, galvanized, electrified, by an aroused interest which will lend itself not alone to expedite development but to its fullest and freest conversion into community welfare.

That this ideal is attainable is beyond question, for evidence of the willingness of individuals to go on the stewardship basis has been seen. That it is time for some such reform to rectify the many maladjustments in our society, cannot be gainsaid.

I have in my talk of last Sunday and to-night attempted to outline in general the social ideal towards which the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is striving. I do not want to be supposed a simplicitarian; but in my study of society and the various reforms which have been proposed, I have seen nothing which holds such universal promise of solving all the social problems arising from present social maladjustments as does this doctrine of stewardships, a social order built on a deep-seated religious conviction and motivation.

And it is not entirely ideal with us, for the ministry of this church has always been on the basis of giving their best in return for a living, while the business people, even the young people are coming forward with their sincere offers to put their businesses upon the stewardship basis, and the details are being in some instances worked out by experience.

At a later date I hope to speak to my radio audience further on this to me deeply interesting subject.

Once more I say I invite criticism. Address your letters of inquiry to Doctor F. M. Smith, Independence, Missouri, or in care of Central Radio Company, Fourteenth and Main Streets, Kansas City, Missouri.

Good night. May God bless you, and lead you to a broader conception of his social order—his kingdom to come.

Can We Believe in the Bible Miracles?

Sermon by Elder Charles R. Hield, in the Minneapolis, Minnesota, church, Sunday morning, January 28, 1923.

On my recent visit to Lamoni during the Christmas holidays at the university, I encountered several young people from Lamoni who were returning home for the holidays. While I do not know that all of them belonged to the church, yet they seemed very interested in the theories of religion and science. They seemed inclined to doubt the validity of the Bible miracles because they could not find them in accordance with what they had learned in the universities. This is not a surprising fact, but rather an encouraging feature, for at least it shows that they are thinking. They are trying to reason things out instead of accepting them blindly, because some one else told them so.

While the Bible has been doubted in ages past, the work of science has never played as important a role in this change of thought as at the present. Our newspapers and periodicals are full of the discussions on the conflict between science and religion. I will try to limit myself however this morning to the discussion merely of the validity of the miracles of the Bible.

Books on Science and Religion

The world is full of books on this subject. I find that the library of the University of Minnesota has about a hundred of such studies. For example I find there such books as these—notice the titles:

Christ Lore, by F. M. Hackwood.

Christian Belief in an Age of Science, by William N. Rice.

The Venture of Rational Faith, by Margaret Benson.

Can We Still Be Christians, by Rudolf C. Eucken.
Psychology and Theology, by R. Elliott.

The Present Relations of Science and Religion, by Thomas G. Bonney.

Science and Christian Tradition, by Thomas H. Huxley.

Man and the Universe, by Sir Oliver J. Lodge.

Religion and Science, by John T. Merz.

The Relation Between Religion and Science, by Angus S. Woodbine.

People everywhere are saying that Christianity would make a stronger appeal to the heart and the conscience and reason of the twentieth century if it would leave out the miraculous element. "Let us believe only in the golden rule, the beatitudes," they say.

Is it any wonder then that the youth of our church are asking about these questions? Is it any wonder that I am asked by the young people of my Sunday school class how they can meet these arguments of their professors in the university and other schools? This doubt in the mind of man is quite natural. They have recognized that the universe is governed by unchanging laws. Everything in the heavens above and the earth below is in the grip of laws, laws with no variableness; therefore miracles seem to be interlopers, or eruptions, into the realm of ordered harmony. They appear an impertinence which the mind of the twentieth century cannot fathom, and therefore rejects.

These doubts have a long historical basis. All students of history recognize a broad stream of miraculous pretensions flowing down through all the ages. Herodotus had his miraculous tales and myths, as well as Homer and Livy. Christian literature is weighted down with legends and traditions of the miraculous. We can read stories of pieces of gold falling from heaven; a mighty serpent ascending in a bonfire in order to awe the people; floods rising to the roofs of churches without entering at the doors and windows, etc.

Stories of the Crusades

You are all familiar no doubt with many of the stories of divine intervention to aid the great Crusades. Outside of Bible literature we also have a vast field of miraculous events. One has but to read the stories of King Arthur and his round table to obtain a good idea of the old stories of miracles. Allow me to read a little to you from Don Quixote, probably the most universally read book outside of the Bible: On page 526 we find a description by Don Quixote of his idea of ideal life:

For, pray tell me, can there be greater satisfaction than to see, placed as it were before our eyes, a vast lake of boiling pitch, and in it a prodigious number of serpents, snakes, crocodiles, and divers other kinds of fierce and dreadful creatures, swimming up and down; and from the midst of the lake to hear a most dreadful voice saying: "O knight, whoever thou art that standest beholding this tremendous lake, if thou art desirous to enjoy the happiness that lies concealed beneath these sable waters, show the valor of thy undaunted breast, and plunge thyself headlong into the midst of this black and burning liquor; for, if thou dost not, thou wilt be unworthy to see the mighty wonders inclosed therein, and contained in the seven castles of the seven enchanted nymphs, who dwell beneath this horrid blackness." . . . And scarcely has the knight heard the fearful voice, when, without further consideration, or reflecting upon the danger to which he exposes himself, and even without putting off his cumbersome and weighty armor, recommending himself to God and his mistress, he plunges into the middle of the boiling pool; and, when he neither heeds nor considers what may become of him, he finds himself in the midst of flowery fields. . . . Then on a sudden he descries a strong castle, or stately palace, whose walls are of massy gold, the battlements of diamonds and the gates of hyacinths. . . . After having seen all this, can anything be more charming than to behold, sallying forth at the castle gate, a goodly troop of damsels, . . . and she who appears to be the chief of them all, presently takes by the hand the daring knight, and without a word, carries him into the rich palace.

Not only, however, do we have such myths, but we have accounts closely associated with Christ. There are accounts that Christ, when a small boy, made birds out of the clay and caused them to fly for his amusement; that some boys who had teased him, he immediately turned into goats; that a school-teacher who scolded him, he struck dead with one look; or there is the account of Jesus wishing some apples from a tree. Because they were out of his reach, the youthful boy causes the tree to bend over so that he can pluck the fruit.

We Ought to Study Miracles

On this account men say: "Which can we believe?" "How can we tell which are miracles and which are not?" One answer I would make to such an inquiry is that they should make a study of the miracles. Men are too prone to come in off the street, grasp up some newspaper, read an article on evolution or the conflict of science and religion, and because he cannot understand these things, and because some potato bug scientist or sociologist says that he cannot make religion meet with his science, the ordinary man without more thought by himself rejects the whole thing.

They remind me of a boy in school with a slate. On this slate he has a hard problem to solve. What will he do? It is easier to erase the figures and have it all over with—dismiss the problem from his mind. But if he is a boy intellectually in earnest he will hold fast to the figures until he has solved the problem. So with miracles, it often takes study to find out the truth, but it surely takes no intellectual effort to rub the miracles away. Surely no man would argue that because I had found by close study and investigation, perhaps by sending to Washington a dollar bill, that the bill was false or counterfeit, that on that account I should throw away all the other one dollar bills that I had in my possession. Yet that is what men are doing with miracles every day. They reject all because some may be found to be man made.

Bible Miracles Part of Historical Movement

The Bible miracles, however, were not isolated miracles. They were a part of a great historical movement. They were clustered around one supreme being; they were a great mountain range across the experience of two thousand years, starting with Abraham and continuing one hundred to two hundred years after Christ. This spiritual wave is a fact in history; nowhere else has there been such spiritual devotion, such spiritual characters, and spiritual achievements. It should not seem strange then to have physical miracles, in view of this great moral miracle.

Historically speaking we have proof of the greatest of miracles—the resurrection. History traces for us the Sabbath upon the first day of the week, back to the resurrection of Christ on the first day of the week. We, with practically all the Christian world to-day, are celebrating in our worship upon this particular day the fact that Jesus arose from the dead. What is the meaning of Easter? Here again history gives us a line of Easters running straight back to Christ. There was no Easter before he died.

Paul's Opportunity to Judge as to Miracles

From the history of Paul as recorded in the Bible and whom we know historically as a man exactly as he was in the Bible, we have one of the greatest testimonies of the resurrection. Paul was converted four years after the death of our Lord. He was an extremely well-educated man, as we have been learning in our Sunday school lessons lately. A few years after his conversion, however, Paul went up to Jerusalem to have a talk with Peter. I like to imagine Paul and Peter talking as they must have during that visit. Peter was a great talker, too, even in the presence of Christ. I can hear Paul ask him question after question: "Now, Peter, tell me, did Jesus do this?" "Did he say this?" "What did he tell you by the sea?" "Tell me about the crucifixion." "What did you find in the open tomb?" "What did he tell you in the upper chamber?" "What happened on the day of Pentecost?" etc. Paul surely was strongly convinced of the divinity of the resurrection.

In Paul's letter to the Corinthians, which is as historically correct as any fact of ancient history, he tells the saints of that place of his convictions; as found in First Corinthians, the fifteenth chapter: "If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. . . . But now is Christ risen from the dead; and become the first fruits of them that slept." "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the scriptures; and that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve; after that, he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep. After that he was seen of James; then of all the apostles. And last of all he was seen of me also as of one born out of due time."

What better witness can we have than that? Surely Paul would not have allowed his head to be cut off if he had not believed in the gospel of Christ and the resurrection. Nor would Peter have been willing to be crucified head down if he had not believed in Jesus and his divine mission; nor would Stephen have allowed himself to be stoned to death. In fact all of the twelve were violently put to death except John, and all of them remained true to their testimony of the resurrection.

Scientists Cannot Disprove Miracles

Probably the second great point of constructive argument for miracles is the fact that the question is not a settled one, as many would have us believe it is. An instructor in sociology said to me in my office at the university: "But you cannot prove that God ever worked miracles in Bible times," thinking by that remark he could close the door against the miracles, but I was able to come back at him with his own argument: "Neither can you prove that God did not work miracles in Bible times."

But the scientist says: "The laws of nature cannot be broken, and miracles are the breaking of laws." To this I would reply that the laws of nature in my opinion were never broken in performing the miracles of Bible times. The things that Christ did in Palestine were done in compliance to law, and not in violation or suspension of them.

For instance, in the course of nature this chair stands upon the floor. It is a perfectly natural law of gravity for it to rest where it is. But I pick it up and hold it at arm's length. In doing this, I am changing the course of nature, yet I am violating no law of gravity, nor am I suspending it, for from the trembling of my arm as I hold this chair here I know that the force of gravity is still working. I am not interfering with the law of gravity, but am working my will into the forces of gravity to obtain an outcome which would not be obtained except by the exercise of will.

Now then that is exactly my idea of miracles. If an ordinary man can work his will into the complex forces of nature in such a manner as to get out of nature products, which nature if left to herself would never produce, why should not the Son of God be able to work his will into the winds and the waves, the forces of gravity, the electrical waves of the air; magnetism, and thousands of other great forces of which man knows nothing, in order to control the seas, the air, restore sight, and heal shriveled nerves, etc., and do it all by the exact compliance to laws which he knows and controls.

Potato Bug Scientists

I spoke of a potato bug scientist or social student a moment ago, because their attitude reminds me of a potato bug. Suppose I had a piece of land in America before the Irish potato was introduced here. I bring a potato from Ireland or Asia and plant it in a corner of this piece of land. In this corner is a fence upon which sits a potato bug. To me it is no breaking of natural laws, that the ground should recognize this piece of potato, give it nourishment, and that it should grow, but to the potato bug that witnesses the operation, from all the history of his ancestors before him, to all his own experience and knowledge, such a plant had never before grown in America with such delicious leaves. To him it is a miracle, a breaking of all natural laws, an interloper on all fixed knowledge. Yet it is not a miracle, it is merely the compliance with laws which the bug knows nothing of.

So I consider many of these scientists and sociologists. Because their minds cannot comprehend the miracles, because nothing has happened like that before that complies with their scanty knowledge, they say that it is impossible, a fake, and they reject it. I don't consider that man knows any more about the vast number of laws that are in existence, always have been in existence, and always will be in existence, than does a potato bug at the present time know of the laws that man now controls.

The wiser of the scientists are no longer doubting miracles. They realize that the word used by the lesser lights, the word impossible is no longer applicable. Nothing is impossible to a truly scientific mind. For instance, in view of the great array of new inventions, new laws discovered in the past one hundred or more years, how can anyone say that anything is impossible, that a miracle is a breaking of laws, that miracles are violations? Who can look at the world about us, and form a judgment as to whether a miracle is the breaking of laws or not, when we know that we are discovering new laws every day.

Modern Mechanical Miracles

Two or three hundred years ago for a man to say that in 1923 men would be flying through the air from continent to continent, would cause him to be branded as crazy, or at least he would be told that such an event would be a miracle. It would have been the breaking of nature's laws, yet we know now that it is not, that men could have flown then as they do now, if they had known the laws.

So with automobiles and steam engines. Two hundred years or more ago they would have been considered as interlopers on the realm of organized laws. Yet we know now that we can span the ocean in from four to six days, which took months to accomplish before. Trains now cross the deserts of America, rumble over great bridges constructed over the canyons, and burrow under great mountains, and all in compliance with laws that have been in existence through all the ages, but until recently unknown to man.

So with the telephone, the telegraph, and now the wireless. For the ancients to have been told that in 1923 we would be sitting comfortably in our homes beside the fireplace, and without the aid of any connection aside from the air, to be able to hear concerts from practically all parts of the world, they would have said it would be a miracle, or the working of divine providence into the violation of laws, for they thought that nothing like that could happen. Yet we know that it has not suspended laws, that these inventions are only the result of finding laws which Aristotle could have used if he had known them.

So even now to a man who has lived in a remote part of Alaska, we tell him by the use of the X-ray we can see the bones in our hands, just as if the flesh had been scraped away, and that we can see through a six-inch plank. He opens his eyes in awe and immediately tells us that such a thing is impossible, that it is unreasonable, that it would be a miracle. Yet we know that it is not, and what he should have said was that such a thing would be beyond his knowledge, and not that it was unreasonable. So our modern sprouting scientists could better say that Bible miracles are beyond their knowledge, and not that they are impossible or unreasonable.

A "Miracle" of Nature

Or if I should go to the South Sea Islands where some of our missionaries are, and tell the natives that up here in Minneapolis I had gone out walking on the lake in winter with rubbers on my feet for two hours and had not gotten my feet wet, you may be sure they at first would consider it as great a miracle as Christ walking upon the sea, because to all their previous knowledge nothing like that had ever occurred. Yet it was not a miracle.

What chemistry has revealed to us should fill us with respect for the great laws of God. What would Alexander the Great have said if we had told him that in 1918 one army would be besieging another army and using guns that threw great balls of iron for a distance of from eighty to one hundred miles? Yet that is what the Germans did in firing upon Paris. A miracle to Alexander perhaps, but not to us. Chemistry can now analyze practically everything upon the earth. They tell us that the amount of salt which a person eats in a month, if mixed with a little nitric acid, will produce a form of chlorine gas that would quickly kill a person; that our sugar which we use is a combination of carbon and water and which if mixed with a little potassium chlorate and sulphuric acid added when in a tight container, a violent explosion will result. All these things would be miracles to the ancients, but are not to us. With chemistry also goes the wonderful advance in modern surgery, the methods of using chloroform, etc., which in performing their wonderful feats have always obeyed natural laws.

All Obeying the Laws of Nature

Probably the most wonderful to me is the use of the microscope and the spectroscope. Here scientists are able to isolate things not visible to the naked eye. They tell us that these minute electrons and atoms are made up of millions of parts, that they are a universe in themselves, that they have a center around which thousands and millions of other parts are revolving all the time, and at a terrific rate of speed. And they are all obeying the great laws of the universe.

Back in Aristotle's time they believed that the sun was seventy-five miles from the earth, and that the stars were stones nailed on a cup-shaped sky. Now we know the earth is almost round; we know that the sun is about 93,000,000 miles from the earth, that there are other suns, the nearest of which is about 25,000,000,000,000 miles away, a distance such that an express train, running about thirty-eight miles an hour night and day, would take 75,000,000 years to reach it. Man is able to study the never-changing laws of the great universe and foretell years ahead the exact time and places where the eclipses of the sun can be seen; he can forecast weather reports, frosts, etc. We think when we go fifty miles an hour in an automobile that we are going pretty fast; if we should go eighty miles it would be very fast. If we should go one hundred and fifty miles an hour it would make our hair stand on end. We can hardly contemplate anything going as fast as a thousand miles an hour, and few of us realize that as we peacefully sit here in church that we are at the same time taking a ride around the sun at the rate of over 60,000 miles an hour.

When then we realize that God is controlling these little universes which are composed of millions of parts that we cannot see; that he controls our great world; that he controls our great universe, and that all our universe, our sun and stars, are but a small part of the whole; that our universe is revolving in its turn around a still greater center, and that, perhaps, revolving around another center, we are brought to realize that man knows nothing of the great and natural laws which God has at his command. Man probably does not know one one-millionth part of the laws which control his great creations. We realize then that our earth is but a grain of sand upon the seashore.

Science Increases Belief

Here science instead of causing me to doubt the great miracles of the Bible and of modern times but makes my belief stronger in the great power of God. I cannot understand all his laws, that is true, but I can understand that he has laws that I know nothing of, millions of them, and it does not seem unreasonable to me that he could make use of them, without breaking a one of them to perform what to us, as man's acts are to the potato bug, marvelous things. I consider God as law and order. I think of him as unchangeable, as never breaking any law, but doing all in compliance with law. Even so I am moved to great reverence for his greatness—moved to respect with renewed determination his laws which God has set here before us for our redemption. The great principles of the gospel of faith, repentance, baptism by immersion, the laying on of hands for the reception of the Holy Spirit, and eternal judgment, as organized in his church by his Son, when he was here on the earth, have a renewed appeal to my determination not to break one of his laws.

As an elder in the church of Christ, and as I go to administer to the sick, I do not think and pray that God may break laws for the recovery of the sick one, but I try to get my mind, my life, my character, my radio instrument if you please, in touch with the divine instrument, that he may be able to transmit to us some of the great laws which we know nothing of, yet which we know that God has under his control for the healing and comfort of his faithful Saints. I often fear that most of us only have crystal sets, that we are only using our life for selfish or personal use. I pray that we may get the broader outlook, the desire for broader service; that we may add to our radios, our characters, our devotion, and our talents, that we may be able to pick up messages from all the world, that we may tune our

Lincoln Used Simple Language

Abraham Lincoln had only a very limited schooling. He stated at one time that his actual schooling did not exceed one twelve months. But on the other hand it has also been reported that he borrowed every book within fifty miles. He studied by firelight and by any other light he could get. While practicing at the bar as one of its most successful members he stated to the surprise of other members of the bar that he was going home to study law. Why? Because the college bred lawyers of the East had already reached Ohio, and he wanted to be ready for them when they moved to Illinois.

Yet, on the other hand, his partner is reported, according to a recent number of the Christian Century, to have said that Lincoln read less and thought more than any other man in the public life of that day. It is doubtless true that today people read too much, and especially too much of trash and too much that they do not remember and which it is not worth while to remember while they neglect that hard mental labor of making that which has been read and is worth while their own.

That is one of the grave difficulties of to-day. Men of book learning, men who can give a book review, can give a summary of that which they have read, but have not thought, nor have they observed for themselves the life around them, so as to develop and maintain an independent judgment.

The Reverend J. P. Gulliver reported in the same periodical a conversation with Lincoln with regard to the clear way in which he expressed himself. Lincoln informed him that he had made it a matter of long study, that he always felt angry when he heard anything he could not understand. He studied until he could understand and studied in order to be able to express that truth so plainly that any boy would know what he was talking about. He was never satisfied until he had bound his thoughts and could express them in very simple language.

instruments in with the Presidency, and the Bishopric, and our missionary forces. By doing this I feel sure that Zion can soon be redeemed.

Let no one then, and I say this particularly to the young people, let no one try to lead you away by telling you that God cannot do things that we cannot understand. I often say that God never works miracles, if by miracles one means the suspension and breaking of laws. But as we contemplate the magnitude of God's power, we should be moved to awe and respect, as we realize that we as a people have the promise and the power to tap these great sources of strength and make them ours if we can only become united, and work together for the spread of the gospel and the redemption of Zion.

LETTERS AND NEWS

Appointed Pastors Needed

Several things have occurred recently that have set me to thinking along certain lines of church procedure, and have brought vividly to my mind some of the experiences of the past, which, coupled with certain revelations given through the late prophet, Joseph Smith, have compelled me to take the positions briefly outlined in the following article.

The first thing that caused me thought was the resolutions that are now pending in Zion, and which were under discussion when we adjourned at the last conference held here. These resolutions involve the right of nomination for certain offices in Zion, viz, Does the right of nomination belong to the general officers of Zion, subject to the vote of the body, or does it belong to the body to nominate and elect.

The other occasion for thought was a statement found in an editorial in the HERALD for January 31, current year, which reads as follows: "It certainly would not pay the church to put in a pastor to give his whole time to a small branch."

The first incident cited brings to my mind an occurrence of the past. I was, at the time, in charge of the work in Saint Joseph, Missouri, and was very much interested in the work of what was then known as the Far West District, as anything that affected the district vitally affected my work in the city. I observed that the small branches throughout the district were not being kept to the standard of development that they should be, and quite often there would come a demand for a disorganization of one of these branches, and it seemed to me that this was brought about by lack of care on the part of officers of the district. A study of the situation caused me, as I believe under the influence of the Spirit, to write up a resolution which I presented to the next district conference, petitioning General Conference to send us a high priest to preside over the district, this high priest to be under General Conference appointment, supported by the general church, thus giving him the time to devote all of his time to the work of looking after the district and its interest, and especially the interests of the small branches. This resolution was presented to a district conference held at Kingston, if my memory serves me right, and action was postponed upon it until the conference following. This action of postponement was taken because the members wanted to more fully discuss the question before final action was had. The next conference was held in Saint Joseph, and the matter was brought up for discussion. It was opposed upon the ground that we already had a high priest presiding over the district, and besides, in the mind of some, it was a direct reversal of the rule of "common consent," and took from the body the privilege, if not the right, to nominate its own presiding officer.

My argument against this was that while we did have a high priest as our presiding officer, and he was a competent one, too, yet he was handicapped by being a farmer, and it was necessary, or at least he seemed to think it was necessary, for him to devote all of his time and energy to the care of that farm, and in consequence he did not have the time to devote to the work of the presidency of the district. As a consequence of this I showed that the history of the past was not one of continued advancement, but branches had been disorganized here and there, and loss had followed, not only in spirituality, but in membership as well. However, the proposition was turned down.

The next Monday after the conference, Brother Joseph

Smith came to my home. I think he was returning to Lamoni from the organization of the Independence Stake, and he was accompanied by several of the brethren, among whom was my brother Heman. They came to my home to spend the time between trains.

During this visit, I stepped to my desk, took therefrom a copy of the resolution that had been defeated in the conference the Saturday before, and handed it to Brother Joseph, with the statement that it had been formulated by me and presented to the district conference for approval, but had been turned down. Brother Smith read it, and turning to me he said, "Hyrum, you have the right idea, and this church will never prosper as it should until this mode of procedure is universally adopted." I think I am giving his exact words; if not, it is the exact sentiment expressed by him. He had read the resolution aloud so all the brethren heard, but I do not recall that any of them except my brother Heman commented in any way. Heman, however, stepped to my center table or desk, picked up the Doctrine and Covenants, and turning to section 120, paragraph 2, read: "Districts may be presided over by a high priest, or an elder, who shall be received and sustained in his office by the vote of the district." He emphasized the word "received" just as I have given it here, with the possibility that his emphasis would be better expressed by capitals instead of italics. He then remarked, "The use of the word "received" in this connection signifies that the one to preside over a district should be sent for that purpose, not always necessarily a foreigner, that is one outside of the district, but he should have the distinction of being sent, or nominated by the appointing powers for that especial work." And the thought was further expressed that such an one would be free to wait on his ministry without being burdened with the care of a farm or other secular work.

The revelation from which the above quotation is made was given in 1890. Four years later this thought was more clearly set forth, if that is possible, in the following quotation from section 122: 8:

"That part of the law which says: 'It is the duty of the twelve, also, to ordain and set in order all the other officers of the church,' is to be understood by the revelation which went before and in accordance with which it was written; and which follows after it in the book; and when those officers are ordained and set in their order, in the church, they should be left to administer in the things unto which they were ordained, having charge of the affairs over which they are called and set apart to preside; the twelve and seventy administering as those prosecuting the work of preaching with the warning voice, baptizing, organizing and setting in order, then pushing their ministry into other fields until the world is warned. It is the will of God that they do this; yea, verily, thus saith the Spirit, If they will now enter upon this work, leaving the burden of care in organized districts, or conferences to the standing ministry, under the presidency of the church; observing the law already given to ordain and set high priests or elders to preside in large branches and in districts, and also evangelical ministers, then will those officers set in the church be useful and he who gave the law be honored; the differences between the quorums be healed, confidence be restored, and good will and peace come to the people as a cherishing fountain."

The words, "To ordain and set high priests or elders to preside in large branches and in districts," clearly indicate the right to nominate these men, and the revelation before cited says that they "shall be received and sustained" by the vote of the people. And this is no more of an invasion of the rights of the people than to present to them a revelation and ask them to receive or reject it. God did, in one revelation, section 107, present quite a number of nominations for different offices in the church and then said:

"I give unto you that you should fill all these offices and approve of those names which I have mentioned, or else disapprove of them." (Paragraph 46.) And in section 103:1, Warren Cowdery is pointed out by revelation as one who "should be appointed and ordained a presiding high priest over my church in the land of Freedom, and the regions round about." And there is no doubt but what he was "received and sustained" in that office by the people in that country, and the results were good, we presume, and that without any invasion of the rights of the people.

All this, however, pertains to large branches and districts without question, and would hardly apply, perhaps, to the small branch. And yet I have always thought this law applied to any place where the church had large interests, such as large cities, even though the branch in that city could not be designated as a "large branch." Neither am I so sure about its being true that "it would not pay the church to put in a pastor to give his whole time to a small branch."

There are two ways, perhaps more, but two ways at least to measure values in this work. One way is in spirituality, and the other is monetary, and I am not so sure but what it would pay the church in both ways to put a pastor into the small branch. A branch is not confined to narrow limits always, but its confines may extend to a large adjacent territory, and this would enable the pastor to extend his labors indefinitely, just so he did not get the missionary spirit to such an extent that he would neglect his pastorate, or the building up of the spiritual interests of his special charge. Such things occur at times. I was in a district not very many years ago where I was requested as an evangelist to visit each branch in the district and report to the president the spiritual condition of the Saints as I found them, while he, the president, was engaged in work that belonged specifically to the missionary arm of the church, that is holding tent meetings out in the outlying districts that belonged to his jurisdiction, whereas it was his specific duty to know the spiritual condition of the branches under his charge by personal observation.

Spiritual advancement presages monetary interest, and the branch that is spiritually alive is the branch that will contribute most to the general funds of the church in tithing, freewill offerings, and consecrations. Hence it is obvious that if we take measures to increase the spiritual growth of a branch we take measures to increase the funds of the church, and this is done, we might say, in exact proportion to the spiritual advancement made. So we might conclude, with safety, that any measure that would increase the spiritual growth of a branch, large or small, would pay, even if we looked at it from a monetary point alone. And so far as the writer is concerned, he will welcome the day when every branch of the church is presided over by "a high priest or an elder" sent, and "received" by the vote of the people, and made free to wait on his ministry without being subjected to constant weariness of body and mind incident to manual labor in field or shop. It is perfectly obvious to everyone who, as one of our lecturers recently said, has "acquired the art of thinking," that the man who is worn out with the toils of the day is in no condition to take up the duty of visiting a large membership after his day's work is done, unless the Lord gives him supernatural strength, mentally and physically, to perform that duty. And I do not believe the Lord is going to do this in order that the lay member shall be relieved of the responsibility of doing his part in the work. I presume I ought not to use the word responsibility; the word privilege would be a better term to use, for it would be unjust to deprive the lay member of the privilege to help in this work and put the whole work on the man who was willing, but rather all should be equally yoked together in the great privilege of working, and thus all equally sharing in the reward.

It may be asked at this juncture, Do the experiences of the past justify us in concluding that the spirituality of a branch would be raised by sending men to take charge? This question will be foolish or pertinent just in accordance with whether we admit or do not admit that it is the law of God so to do. If it is the law of God so to do, then it is obvious that the result will be good; but if we do not admit that this is the law, then it is pertinent to ask for examples of the result of following this rule.

To this I make this reply, and cite some examples of what has occurred under my extensive operations and observations. I have been actively engaged in missionary and branch, as well as district, work for about thirty-five years, and I have seen the effects of leaving branches, both large and small, entirely to their own devices without interference from outside, and I must say that my observations have been that as a rule two factions are formed, and then begins a regular teeter-board performance. First one faction is up and then the other, and usually the one that is down for the time is doing its best to shake the one that is up, and if a fall is recorded, the one that is down counts it as evidence that next time it will be up. It is a shameful thing to contemplate, but it is too true, and it often results in incompetent men being elected and retained in office to the detriment of the work. We might record it as a rule that really competent men, I mean by that competent in every way, especially spiritually, will not be party to such procedure.

I have in mind now an instance where something of the condition portrayed above existed, and the branch was so nearly divided that it was almost impossible to predict who would be elected when election day arrived. The district president and missionary in charge took hold of the situation, called a special business meeting, and nominated me for president, and the Saints approved of the nomination, not unanimously, but with a sufficiently large majority to make a working basis. The first meeting I attended was the first time I was ever in the branch, or the city where the branch was situated. I had no sooner taken charge than both factions united in supporting me in my work, and the result was that we got along fine for the eighteen months that I was there, and both factions united in a petition to the presidency to return me to that work, but I was ordained an evangelist that spring, and my days of presidency were over.

It worked in this instance, but often it does not work, and there is a reason. The reason is that once in a while you find a man who does not submit to the law, but becomes a law unto himself, or else he thinks he knows more about the law than the appointing powers, or those whom God and the church have placed to look after these things.

To me there is a well-defined mode of procedure in this church. The Presidency and Twelve are called by direct verbal revelation to the church. To these men belong the privilege of directing, regulating, and setting in order the various machinery of the church. When operating under the direction of the Twelve, where the Twelve cannot go, to the Seventy belong all the prerogatives of the Twelve. And in the exercise of the prerogatives belonging to these quorums it is their right to nominate the officers who are to work under their direction. To relegate to a lay member the right to nominate these officers, and then, if a sufficient number of votes can be obtained to approve that nomination, direct the regulating authorities to set that man to preside is getting the cart before the horse, or the tail wagging the dog. Under that rule the only thing the man or men who belong to the regulating authorities of the church becomes is an automaton, he ordains where he is told to do so, and further than that he has nothing to say. It is absurd. Some argue that it is placing too much power in the hands of a few, and that to grant the right to nominate is to put into the hands of a man the power to nominate only those who will do his bidding. The only question with me is, Did God set these in the church? If he did, to them belongs this right, and I have no right to attribute to them ulterior motives, at least it is not becoming in me to do so, but I should trust them to do their work well, just as I should ask them to trust me to do my work well.

Every argument taken against this position must of necessity be an argument based upon mistrust and suspicion, and the work of God cannot thrive on these things. Perfect trust will see in my superior officer the power that appointed him. Christ said to Philip when he said, "Show us the Father and it sufficeth us," "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Shew us the Father?" Christ emphasized this on another occasion when he said: "He that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me." And he applied the same language to his servants in these last days when he said: "Whoso receiveth you, receiveth me." (Doctrine and Covenants 83: 16.) And again when he said, in section 120: 5, "He that heareth him that is sent, heareth the Lord who sent him, if he be called of God, and be sent by the voice of the church."

The result of our failure to trust in those whom God has sent is very plainly stated in one of the latest revelations given to our beloved president who has gone on to his reward. That revelation reads:

"Branches and districts are to be conducted according to the rules given in the law as directed in a former revelation: They shall take the things which have been given unto them as my law to the church to be my law to govern my church. And these affairs are not to be conducted by manifestations of the Spirit unless these directions and manifestations come through the regularly authorized officers of branch or district. If my people will respect the officers whom I have called and set in the church, I will respect these officers; and if they do not, they cannot expect the riches of gifts and the blessing of direction."—Doctrine and Covenants 125: 14.

I have italicized the latter part of the passage quoted for the reason that I want the reader to take special note of what is said there. The deduction is obvious. God will not speak to me through a source I distrust, for it is a foregone conclusion that I will look upon it with doubt no matter how genuine it may be.

It may be thought that I am bordering on the position held by an apostate church, but I do not so consider it. The law of perfect trust is the law of progress, and happy is the man who is deserving of it. And the man who desires our allegiance should trust us. Past experience may have made us over cautious, and the pendulum of cautiousness may be swinging to the other extreme. If so it is an hindrance to our progress just as much as the other. Some one asked me when I returned from my mission in Utah some years ago, what the distinctive differences were between the people in the West and the Reorganization, and among others enumerated I told them one of the differences was, that the Brighamites believed everything their officials told them, and the Josephites would not believe anything their officials told them. Some people think I am given to exaggeration, and possibly this was one of the occasions that the spirit of exaggeration had hold of me. But it is a fact that we have fallen into the error of considering every man a rascal until he proves himself true and honest; whereas we should try to believe that every man is devoted to his duty, and does that duty as he sees it, until it is clear that he has violated the law and is unworthy of our trust and confidence.

As I understand the law of this church, to those who have been placed in positions of responsibility there comes the spirit of their calling, and if their place is to regulate the affairs of the church, and call men to place and honor therein, God will inspire them to nominate the right man for the right place, and if they are actuated by the right motives, and we must presume they are, they will not let any personal preference influence them in the appointments they make, but the good of the work will be uppermost in their consideration, and all other things will be subservient thereto. If a man is called to office in this church he must be called of God as was Aaron, at least that is what we have been taught. If, then, he is to be called of God, through whom should that call come? The answer comes through the voice of inspiration to the church, "And these affairs are not to be conducted by manifestations of the Spirit unless these directions and manifestations come through the regularly authorized officers of branch or district." Then comes the promise: "If my people will respect the officers whom I have called and set in the church, I will respect these officers"; but a note of warning follows, which it will be well that we heed, "and if they do not, they cannot expect the riches of gifts and the blessing of direction."

I well remember a statement made by the late Joseph Smith as follows: "The righteousness of a people makes many prophets; but not anywhere do we learn that the righteousness of a prophet sanctified a people; but we do read that by a prophet's voice, heeded by a people, a nation has been raised and blessed."

Each individual called to official place in this church, I care not whether he be deacon or president, should be honored in his place, and when he is so honored by us, God has pledged himself to honor him, and through him to speak to us. And when that perfect balance of confidence is had and maintained, based upon worthiness, then will this work progress. But this perfect balance must come to the leader and the led before perfect progress shall come. As a leader, however, I must not show irritation towards the man who may question my work; for it may be that he is seeking a better understanding of me and my official acts, and it is only through perfect understanding that perfect trust comes. But so often we experience the sentiment contained in the following poem:

Not Understood

"Not understood. We move along asunder;
Our paths grow wide as the seasons creep
Along the years, we marvel and we wonder
Why life is life, and then we fall asleep—
Not understood.

"Not understood. We gather false impressions,
And hug them closer as the years go by,
Till virtues often seem to us transgressions
And thus men rise and fall and live and die—
Not understood.

"Not understood. Poor souls with stunted vision
Oft measure giants by the narrow gauge;

The poisoned shafts of falsehood and derision
Are oft impelled 'gainst those who mold the age—
Not understood.

"Not understood. The secret springs of action
Which lie beneath the surface and the show
Are disregarded. With self-satisfaction
We judge our neighbors, and they often go—
Not understood.

"Not understood. How trifles often change us!
The thoughtless sentence or the fancied slight
Destroy long years of friendship and estrange us,
And on our souls there falls a freezing blight—
Not understood.

"Not understood. How many breasts are aching
For lack of sympathy. Ah, day by day,
How many cheerless, lonely hearts are breaking!
How many noble spirits pass away—
Not understood.

"O God! that men would see a little clearer,
Or judge less harshly where they cannot see;
O God! that men would draw a little nearer
To one another!—they'd be nearer thee,
And understood."

—Thomas Bracken.

Perhaps I've moralized a little too much, but these are my sentiments.

Coming of Christ

Referring to the time when Christ stands upon the Mount of Olives, the writer of an article in the HERALD makes it appear that this event occurs before the time when he comes with ten thousand of his saints, as referred to in Jude, Revelation 1:7, Inspired Version, and Doctrine and Covenants 45:6, for the writer says: "So, as it was over thirty years from the time Christ's birth prophecy was fulfilled, to the time of the fulfillment of the prophecy indicating his triumphant entry into Jerusalem, perhaps it may be fully as many years between the time Christ stands upon the Mount of Olives until the time he comes with ten thousand of his saints."

The above is not in harmony with the Bible and the Doctrine and Covenants. In section 45:6-9 we find the following: "And they shall see me in the clouds of heaven, clothed with power and great glory, with all the holy angels; and he that watches for me shall not be cut off. But before the arm of the Lord shall fall, an angel shall sound his trumpet, and the saints that have slept shall come forth to meet me in the cloud; wherefore if ye have slept in peace, blessed are you, for as you now behold me and know that I am, even so shall ye come unto me and your souls shall live, and your redemption shall be perfected, and the saints shall come forth from the four quarters of the earth. Then shall the arm of the Lord fall upon the nations, and then shall the Lord set his foot upon this mount, and it shall cleave in twain, and the earth shall tremble and reel to and fro; and the heavens also shall shake, and the Lord shall utter his voice and all the ends of the earth shall hear it, . . . And then shall the Jews look upon me and say, What are these wounds in thy hands, and in thy feet? Then shall they know that I am the Lord." (See also Zechariah 13:6.)

This makes it plain that the saints which have slept come forth to meet him in the cloud. Then his arm falls upon the nations, after which he sets his foot upon the mount in the presence of the unbelieving Jews.

This is also in harmony with Zechariah 14, where in verse 3 it is shown that the arm of the Lord shall fall upon the nations. Verse 4 shows that following the destruction of the nations, the Lord will set his foot upon the Mount of Olives. Verse 5 shows that he shall at that time bring with him his saints which have been caught up to meet him at his coming. See also Doctrine and Covenants 85:27.

It is clear, therefore, that the events will take place in the following order:

First: The sounding of the angel's trump and the resurrection of the righteous dead and the change of the righteous living.

Second: Both the righteous resurrected dead and the righteous living are caught up to meet him in the cloud.

Third: His coming with the holy angels and ten thousand of his saints.

Fourth: His arm falls upon the nations in battle.

Fifth: His appearing upon the Mount of Olives.

Sixth: The conversion of the Jews as a nation born that day.

Encouraging Letters to the Presiding Bishop

Youthful Tithesayers

The following letter has been received from Helen and Maxine Neice, of Galva, Illinois:

"I am a girl 12 years old and my sister is 10. Together we have earned $22.70 and we wish to send to you the Lord's portion. Inclosed find money order for $2.27."

Surely this early training will bear fruit to the glory of God through many years to come.

C. L. Munro, of Taneycomo, Missouri, writes:

"Here is my dollar as an offering for the Lord's work. I am planning to give $1 a week for 1923 if God will help me earn it. The slogan for this year is 20,000 wage earners to give $1 a week. I owe $44 tithing which I will send as soon as I get the cash. Times are hard here at present but I am putting my trust in God."

Brother Munro, you will remember, suggested in the HERALD of December 27, 1922, that if 20,000 wage earners would contribute in addition to their tithing a freewill offering of $1 a week, the amount thus raised would exceed $1,000,000. This is a practical suggestion and we trust each reader will bring it especially to the attention of the young people for they are the great army of wage earners and money spenders of the Nation.

A brother said to me the other day, "Do you know, Brother McGuire, that the amount that I have been spending annually for knickknacks and things that I would be just as well without amounts to as much as the tithing I have been paying to forward the work of God." In these days of great need we should think seriously when we spend.

"Gather my people together, those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice." Sacrifice at times may represent self-denial. At other times it represents that which we place on the altar for holy purposes.

The Independence Sanitarium Deserves Your Support

(This is a copy of a letter sent to each district in the church, setting out the needs of the Sanitarium and the district quotas. If you have not contributed you can send to the Presiding Bishop or to the Sanitarium direct.)

Our gospel covenant leads us to seek opportunities to do good both for the church and for mankind at large. Maintaining good hospitals is now universally recognized as of foremost importance in the good work of Christ. Great missions are established in China, India, and other Asiatic countries by Presbyterians, Methodists, and others, largely through the service and good influence of their hospitals in these needy lands. Because of their personal efforts made in real service, the members of these churches are enriched by giving to their hospitals at home and abroad. They can see where the money they give reaches very desirable ends.

We have, so far, but one hospital to maintain in this great needy world. It is becoming a wonderful credit to the church in caring for sick and disabled missionaries, in offering a haven of safety for those seeking medical and surgical care under standard, modern, and scientific conditions, combined with spirituality which is universally felt in our church hospital.

The Independence Sanitarium, our church hospital, has now twenty-seven young women in training. These young women are from Latter Day Saint homes widely scattered in different parts of the United States and Canada. Their scientific training is excellent, and their loyalty to the church is unquestioned. During the recent General Conference, nineteen nurses who have been graduated from our church hospital in its three years' course of training gave a public program representing the work they are now doing as responsible nurses in other institutions—many of them in Kansas City. Their influence to the church is beyond the possibility of estimating because of its far-reaching, silent, and unobtrusive appeal to all good people. One of the authorities at the Bureau of Nurses' Directory said, "They always make good."

At present our most urgent need is for resurfacing the wornout floors. Then there are various small, but necessary items, such as painting the walls, that are needed to begin the new year in good shape.

Another most important need in our Sanitarium is efficient laundry equipment. The depreciation of linens sent to the public laundry is deplorable. Efficient laundry equipment must be secured immediately to eliminate this waste.

We feel that the Sanitarium is worthy of the best that is within us, our loyalty and our consideration for its needs. The following facts will give you some idea of the work being done. In the past year we have cared for 814 patients. Of these, 25 have been missionaries or members of a missionary's family; 80 have been too poor to pay for their care; 15 have been cared for by the free-bed fund service. The results obtained in treatment are excellent. The general well-being of the patients, the lives saved, the low death-rate of surgical patients, and the lives of mothers and their babies that have been safe-guarded in birth are in keeping with the standard, first-class modern hospital.

Miss Gertrude Copeland, of Philadelphia, who has conducted successfully a larger hospital in Reading, Pennsylvania, for four years, has accepted the position as superintendent of our hospital, because of her desire to be of service among our own people.

After careful consideration by the Sanitarium Board of Trustees as to the best methods of meeting these present pressing needs, it was decided to ask the Saints of each district for contributions. We have apportioned the amount of money needed according to district membership, your apportionment being $. Your committee makes this equal apportionment with an earnest appeal for help, thus giving each member of the church an opportunity to cooperate with those who are so nobly leading this endeavor. All moneys should be paid to the local representative of the Presiding Bishop's office.

Thanking you in advance for your prompt support in this work, we are

Very sincerely,

THE INDEPENDENCE SANITARIUM COMMITTEE,
G. LEONARD HARRINGTON, M. D.
JOHN R. GREEN, M. D.
MRS. JENNIE YINGLING.

Working and Preparing for Service

Brother Blackmore, from Australia, who was at Graceland last year, but who is now at Pittsburg, Kansas, looking after branch affairs yet studying at the college there, recently wrote to President Smith as follows:

"I have commenced my studies at the college and am trying my best. Am taking a rather heavy course for I find that I can carry it and not neglect my church duties. I believe that I shall get full credit for all of my Graceland work and later on will be granted my high school credits; if so, it will be possible for me to get a degree in two years. I would like to get this so that I may be able to work for the church wherever I am of the greatest value. I am thankful to have this opportunity to get this education, and my services shall be at the call of the church. I want to be one of the Zion builders. My only regret is that I was not able to get this development a few years ago, for it would have saved me from a great deal of doubt and worry. When I was home in my own country and, in my thinking, problems would present themselves to my mind, there was no one that I felt I could appeal to and place confidence in their answer, and so sometimes I knew not where I was. I am thankful that I came to America, thankful that I spent last year in Graceland and there received the vision of the possibilities resident in this church. There were some criticisms against that class and the course, but I want to tell you that I enjoyed it and appreciated the opportunity to attend. It gave to me a stability that I did not have before. I hope now to further my studies so that I shall be of greater value to the church later on. I shall if possible attend college right through the summer months also. Will major in the social sciences if I am permitted.

"This is a fine school. There are eleven of our young people attending. I am sorry that it is not treble that number, for our people need the greater outlook and a broader field of thought than many have. I look forward to the time when we shall have, not only one church college but several, where our young can receive their education amid the more spiritual influences of our own professors, and more of our own people than can be found in the colleges of the world as part of the environment.

"I must not trespass on your time, but I did want to express my appreciation of this opportunity to increase my knowledge and to state that some day I hope to be of greater value to this church.

"I trust that we shall be able to establish a Zion in the near future before our opportunity is lost, perhaps forever."

Apostle D. T. Williams writes that he has already attended, the last of January, the conference of the Midland District at Sutton-in-Ashfield and expected to attend the Southern District Conference at London, January 27 and 28.

Independence

The appointments Sunday in Independence were as follows: Stone Church, preaching at eleven a. m. by Elder A. B. Phillips; Walnut Park, preaching by Elders J. M. Terry and Walter W. Smith; Enoch Hill, preaching by Elders W. J. Brewer and C. B. Hartshorn; Englewood, preaching by Elders J. E. Warne and Evan A. Fry.

Second Independence began a two weeks' series of meetings Sunday night with a sermon by the pastor, Elder R. J. Lambert. The speakers on alternate nights this week will be Patriarchs F. A. Smith and Ammon White. Next week Elder L. E. Hills will give a series of lectures on the Book of Mormon.

Sunday evening the Walnut Park and Auditorium orchestras assisted by the L. D. S. Band gave a concert at the Stone Church to an appreciative audience that filled the church. Elder R. T. Cooper directed the ensemble numbers, while Orlando Nace directed the Walnut Park orchestra in its numbers, and Ray Turner directed the band.

President Elbert A. Smith came home from Lamoni last week and is again at his office.

Evangelist F. G. Pitt is visiting in Kansas City and Independence for a few days. He is planning on going to Kirtland soon where he will have charge of the temple during the tourist season.

Apostles J. A. Gillen and Paul M. Hanson are in Independence. Brother Gillen has been preaching in the Far West Stake, and Brother Hanson plans to leave this week for his field in Illinois and Michigan. Apostle John W. Rush-ton left Monday to attend the Colorado Conference at Fort Collins.

Elder R. D. Weaver has made a very fine recovery from his serious illness and operation and will go to his field in the Far West Stake for a few days and then on to his home in Michigan for rest and recuperation.

Elder W. H. Deam, for many years the business manager of the Ensign, underwent an operation at the Sanitarium Monday. He is reported as doing well.

Three baby girls were born at the Sanitarium this last week. The proud parents are Brother and Sister Garland Scott, of Dow City, Iowa; Brother and Sister D. F. Herron, of Independence, and Brother and Sister L. C. Coates, of Kansas City.

A very interesting radio service was broadcasted Sunday evening at six o'clock from the Independence Studio of the Central Radio Company. The musical program under the direction of Brother George Anway carried very fine and Church Historian Walter W. Smith was able to make some important incidents of the early history of the church stand out clearly and convincingly. The broadcasting was under the personal supervision of Brother Arthur B. Church.

The Sanitarium Patroness Society met at the home of Sister B. R. McGuire Friday afternoon and held their annual election of officers. The same officers were sustained. They are: Mrs. E. L. Kelley, president; Mrs. B. R. McGuire, vice president; Mrs. F. O. Thomason, secretary; Mrs. J. A. Becker, assistant secretary, and Mrs. Joseph Arber, treasurer. At this meeting they worked for the equipment of the Sanitarium operating room.

A campaign to raise funds for the Independence Sanitarium was undertaken here this week. This is part of a church-wide drive which has been under way for several weeks, for many much-needed improvements and repairs at the Sanitarium. Each district has been given a quota as a minimum, and it is confidently hoped that a total sum of $10,000 will be raised. Doctor G. Leonard Harrington, Doctor John R. Green, and Mrs. Jennie Yingling are the committee in charge of the campaign. Further details are given elsewhere in this HERALD. The campaign is sponsored by both the Presidency and Presiding Bishopric and merits the liberal support of all the Saints.

Saint Louis, Missouri

Several events of more than usual interest have taken place at Saint Louis recently.

On January 21 J. A. Gillen, president of the Quorum of Twelve, arrived and preached both morning and evening and continued speaking each night during the following week except Saturday night. He spoke, however, on both the Sunday school and Department of Recreation and Expression programs, also to the district priesthood meeting on Sunday, and preached both morning and evening on Sunday the 28th. He therefore had a very full week and his efforts were very well received and enjoyed by the Saints.

On Saturday and Sunday, January 27 and 28, the district conference met with special programs of the departments during the day and business meeting on Saturday evening. On Sunday the church was crowded from morning till evening with Sunday school and preaching until noon. Then at 1 p. m. a priesthood meeting and Women's Department meeting held simultaneously, and at 2.30 a prayer and testimony service lasting till nearly five o'clock. At 5.45 preaching service was held and at 7.30 a recital by the district choir. The attendance was large and steadfast from the beginning to the close of the day. Many earnest testimonies were borne. The musical program in the evening was well received and the sermon by Elder Gillen also enjoyed and much appreciated. There was as usual a spiritual power manifested in this assembling of the Saints together. Among others present was Mrs. Etta M. Weidman, formerly Etta M. Hitchcock, for several years general secretary of the Religio. She has been undergoing a series of operations and this was her first general public appearance.

The services on the 4th were marked with the usual spirit of devotion at the sacrament service and the musical program in the evening. Brother Alexander Klein who came from Jerusalem with President Smith and attended Graceland last year is now located and working in Saint Louis and shows a great interest in the work of the young people there. At the sacrament service he bore a devoted testimony which touched the hearts of many.

Then on Friday evening, February 9, there was held a banquet of the branch. We did not count those in attendance but there must have been well over a hundred. This is not the first of such gatherings in Saint Louis. The spirit of sociability and good will that is thereby promoted would seem to commend such meetings to the smaller branches throughout the church. The principal officers of all the departments as well as the president of the branch were in attendance. This is not a charged supper for the raising of money. Everyone partakes freely. The primary purpose is a closer union and spirit of friendliness in the branch.

The special purpose of this particular meeting was a re-organization of the Department of Recreation and Expression. After the service of the supper toasts were given by R. Archibald as pastor of the branch, by Elder Hampson as associate pastor, and E. C. Bell as chorister. S. A. Burgess as an old resident was also called upon quite unexpectedly and spoke extemporaneously. These speeches were interspersed with one piano solo, two vocal solos, and one duet. The speeches were of a practical nature to discuss branch problems. This one on behalf of the young people, an earlier one on behalf of the Sunday school work or the work of religious education. They were not lectures, however, entirely but were also interspersed with humor.

On Sunday, February 11, a representative of the Women's Christian Temperance Union was the speaker and on the 18th Elder John W. Rushton presented two wonderfully fine sermons. "His words affect one as coming from the heart, not merely as scholarly eloquence."

Saint Louis is also feeling a great deal of enthusiasm over the city bond election held on February 9 at which bonds to the amount of over $87,000,000 were voted. The city already had a good water system, sewers made by local assessment in the benefit district; 3,000 acres of parks and in one park of 1,000 acres probably the best-developed playgrounds any place in the world; 25 separate playgrounds in different parts of the city; one of the largest zoos and best equipped in the country; excellent roads and boulevards and other city improvements. This bond election was for the purpose of extending and increasing these facilities. The city hospital and sanitarium is exclusively for those who cannot afford to pay for care and represent already an investment of many millions including as it does a hospital for tuberculosis, sanitarium for nervous and mentally affected persons, and separate camps for delinquent boys and girls. Another interesting feature is that Saint Louis already had placed the playgrounds and parks as well as the hospitals under one general department head, that of public welfare.

These bonds were to extend the water system; improve the sewer system; widen several streets from the heart of the city well out of the congested districts and in one or two instances to the city limits; the final elimination of all grade crossings in the city by taking care of a few grade crossings in the remote parts of the city; several million for new parks and playgrounds, especially in the congested parts of the city; several more also for the extension of hospital service. It is plain to be seen that much of this expenditure would not benefit the wealthy section of the city, which already has parks and recreation, but it is for the benefit primarily of the poorer people, the more congested section. Yet the wealthy portion of the city voted overwhelmingly for every bond issue of the 21, of which only one, that for an armory, was defeated by votes in other wards. One of the smaller issues provided for an aquarium in the largest park. Others provided for a city park in the business section of the city of several city blocks and the erection of buildings of a high type.

Some of the Saint Louis people feel a little inclined to claim that they are doing much to establish Zion and have pointed out that for Independence to do the same she should already have 50 acres of parks and should expend $80,000 more at one time for further parks and playgrounds. She should have $100,000 in hospitals belonging to the city devoted to the care of the poor and for delinquent boys and girls and then vote an additional $80,000 bond issue for that purpose. In all, to make a right comparison, it would mean a single bond issue of one and a third million dollars in Independence, Missouri, devoted to public and community welfare.

It is interesting to add that there was not a suggestion made but that the money voted would be fairly and wisely expended. This shows a community interest that is at least significant and increases our hope of the final establishment of Zion.

Seven Reasons Why I Am Going to the Young People's Convention

Reason Number One: Because of the Graceland Spirit.

This convention is to be held at Graceland College, and I need to catch the Graceland spirit. Ever since I was a small child I have heard of Graceland. The convention will be my opportunity to visit our church school. Everybody who comes from Graceland talks of the Graceland spirit. A friend of mine told me the other day that since going there she felt like adding another principle of the gospel to the six already taught by the church. This principle is, "Get the Graceland spirit." It is this spirit that actuated a recent contributor of the college Record to write the following:

"We admire the faculty, their ability, their brains, but we admire most the friendly atmosphere which they radiate. The service they render is under the sacrifice of pleasure, advantages, opportunities, financial success. They give us stewardship in its true light, the stewardship which is in fact the attitude of consecration. They convey to the minds of us students that book learning, as we generally conceive it, is not the only thing we can receive at Graceland. They feel a pleasure in the service which they are rendering, and it is only through pleasure that anyone can do the most good."

From such an atmosphere are coming young people equipped for proper service. How sad it is that every school does not have such an advantage. I believe that it is necessary for the young people of the church to catch this spirit. This is why I am going. This is why I think you should go. Better come along. I will meet you on the Graceland campus June 3 to 16, 1923.

Boston, Massachusetts

A personal letter from James R. Houghton states:

"Apostle Gleazer has been with us most of the time and has given us a broader vision of our church work from a social and economic standpoint. We are deeply indebted to the church for the privilege of having such a man as Brother Gleazer with us. Truly he is an apostle of our Lord and Savior in every sense of the word. He leaves here the latter part of this week for Jonesport, Maine, and will hold a special series of meetings there, and we feel assured that what he shall offer to the Jonesport Saints will be worthy of their time and effort.

"Brother Herman Chelline, a young brother in the Boston Branch, has been selected by the general church authorities to go to Jonesport to preside over the Jonesport Branch as their pastor. During Brother Chelline's stay in Boston he has rendered very valuable service to the church in many ways, and the Saints in Boston feel confident that Brother Chelline will make splendid success in his new field of endeavor.

"At a recent sacrament service Brother E. L. Traver was ordained a high priest by Apostle Edmund J. Gleazer and Bishop M. C. Fisher. Brother Traver's service to the Boston Branch in the past has been of a very high order, and we know that in the future he will continue his very fine work.

"We have been trying to do something in a musical way in Boston and feel that we have made great strides. I am inclosing in this letter copies of two programs which we gave here recently. We are contemplating big things for next reunion."

Young People's Day in Bisbee

Last Sunday there was a little departure from the usual order of services in the Bisbee Branch. It being Scout anniversary week the eleven o'clock hour was turned over to our scoutmaster, Brother Henry Goldie, and his troop of boys. Brother Goldie spoke on the scout oath and law, giving a very interesting talk. There was a brief history of the scout work by one of the boys, a demonstration of signaling by two of the boys, two quartets by members of the troop, saluting of the flag, repeating of the scout oath and law by the boys in unison, two songs by the congregation, and the usual opening and closing prayer.

At the 7.30 hour there was a young people's program in which no one over forty-five years of age took part. The program consisted of a sermon on "Youth" by Brother D. L. Evans; a paper on childhood by Sister T. R. Davis, two quartets, two duets, two violin numbers, and two songs by the congregation. The opening prayer was by one of the local priests, and the benediction was by another of the local priests. One of the Boy Scouts was in charge of the meeting and read the program.

This change from the usual order seemed to meet with the approval of nearly everyone present. We feel that it was in harmony with the suggestion of President Smith that we make the church attractive for the boys and girls, and we believe that more opportunity should be given for youth to express itself, and be made to feel that they are a part of the church, and can take an active part therein.

Minnesota District

I am still deeply interested in the Lord's work and still believe God will lead his people to victory. I want to relate some things which have come within my observation in my work as district president. I have labored in Bemidji, Duluth, and Minneapolis, and have also been a number of other places. I am greatly encouraged in the prospect of increased activity of the Saints and ministers in the church.

Brother L. A. Gould is president of the Bemidji Branch and is working hard to hold the fort at this place. He has nine ministers to help him and is planning on extending missionary labors in near-by towns in the spring as soon as he can run his Ford.

I went to Duluth the last week of December and found Brother Sam Sloan, president of the branch, busily engaged in his work and strong in the faith. This is a new branch and there are a lot of zealous Saints, doing all they can to maintain the cause of Christ in this large city. They are planning on securing a church building as soon as possible. Brother Sloan and I administered to the sick daily in Duluth and Two Harbors.

I visited Minneapolis for nine days and attended the district conference held February 3 and 4. A number of Saints from Duluth were present and took an active part in making the conference a success.

This is the largest branch in the State, having a membership of about one hundred ninety. Brother William Sparling is pastor and is meeting with good success in directing the affairs of the church. As a result, the branch is in better spiritual condition than I have ever seen it. Baptisms are reported frequently. I am satisfied that the general church authorities are doing the right thing in appointing a high priest to devote all his time to preside over this large branch. I believe many more will be gathered into the fold if persistent labors are performed. Brother C. A. Kress is the assistant pastor and has charge of the cottage meetings held in different parts of the city during the week. He is having good success, and the interest is increasing.

There has been quite a lot of sickness in this State this winter. Many have been healed through administration.

I trust that the Saints and ministry will continue to work diligently to push the work in their immediate localities as fast as possible so that the honest-hearted souls may be gathered into the church. Then God will bless us in greater abundance with his Holy Spirit, and it will prepare us to be in a better condition when the time comes to gather to Zion.

Southern Nebraska Conference

The Southern Nebraska conference, held in Lincoln, February 10 and 11, is a thing of the past for another year, having completed its work on the 11th inst. The attendance was not as large as we expected, but considering the weather and the amount of sickness over the district and in our branch, we have no complaint to offer. Elders Hubert Case and E. E. Long, of the field, were present. The usual business session was held on Saturday. H. A. Higgins was sustained as the president of the district, and chose as his counselors, C. H. Porter and Roy Barber. Sister B. I. Andrews was elected secretary. The Sunday school officers were sustained. Sumptuous meals were served in the basement of the church both days. Saturday evening at eight o'clock a preaching service was held at which Elder Porter occupied the pulpit. Sunday school as usual at 9.45, and sermon at 11, by Elder Long. Social service at 2.30. From seven to eight, a program was given by the Lincoln folks. Elder Hubert Case occupied the evening preaching hour, his sermon emphasized with stereopticon views, and seasoned with a solo by Sister Nelle Kelley. Brother Case occupied each night with pictures and interesting lectures until he left Friday. He went from here to Fairfield. On Monday evening when returning home from the service a carload of our loved ones, including three of our orchestra, met with a sad accident which, while not fatal, was very painful. In crossing a street car track they were struck by a street car.

CORRESPONDENT.

Brother and Sister W. M. Beck write from Green River, Utah, where they have been since last June, that they are isolated but trying to do their part. On February 2 they lost their baby by death, which leaves them lonely. They expect to start a Sunday school as soon as they can obtain quarterlies, and state that if any Saints having Autumn Leaves or other church literature to send out, they would be glad to receive the same.

Radio Program for March 4, 1923, 6 P. M.

Broadcasted from Independence studio of the Central Radio Company, Kansas City, Missouri, on 360 meter wave. Listen for "The old, old path," for opening and closing feature.

The radio programs have hitherto been under the direction of Elder E. D. Moore and the music under that of George Anway. By reason of the pressure of other duties these brethren have been forced to relinquish this responsibility and in the transition, before further help had been secured, the undersigned failed to arrange the program in time for this issue. Brother Anway came to our rescue, and we are assured will give us a program of the same caliber as that to which we have now become accustomed.

The address this week will be by Elder Arthur B. Phillips, of the Presidents of Seventy, and his topic will be: "The reason for the existence of the church."

The demands made of the "radio preacher" are entirely different from those made of the preacher in one of our churches, and for the same reasons the nature and extent of the program will also be different. We shall endeavor to meet these demands, and to enable us so to do we shall appreciate your suggestions and criticisms.

Religious Book Week

Throughout the United States the dates from March 4 to 10, inclusive, are being observed by publishers, book dealers, churches, and religious societies of all kinds as National Religious Book Week.

Not only is the purchase of new books suggested, but a better use of those on hand is urged.

Let us resolve to avail ourselves of our opportunities. If we lack good, readable copies of the Bible, let us get a new one. They cost but little.

If our old copy of Doctrine and Covenants does not have the later concordance and index, with the revelations up to date, get a new one. We have a very few of the later revelations in separate sheets including number 134, the latest, which will be sent upon request, accompanied with other orders.

There is a great deal of satisfaction in having for constant reference the Authorized Edition of the Book of Mormon. All references in articles in the church papers refer to this edition. Keep your old small edition for supplemental use, and buy one of the new editions.

Why not check up on the following list to see if there are not some that you have neglected to procure for self or others? Yet we can set down only a few here. Let us send our complete catalogue for many others of vital importance.

BOOK OF MORMON. AUTHORIZED EDITION

Very convenient in every way: good type, short versification, etc. It is the history of the ancient inhabitants of this continent, the record being kept on plates and finally revealed by angelic hand to Joseph Smith, jr., and translated by the power of God.

THE CALL AT EVENING

By Jessie Ward

A splendid church novel for adult readers. Just the one you are wanting to place in the hands of your unbelieving friends. It will help them to understand the principles of the doctrine of Christ. The hero, a young Latter Day Saint minister, chances to be thrown in the society of agnostics with whom a friendly relationship soon exists. Each evening they gather together to discuss doctrinal principles, which conversations terminate with pleasing results. The book has a nice balance of romantic interest. 433 pages.

"Last week I spoke before the Parent-Teacher Association of the high school; also again upon invitation I addressed the men of the Shops and Crafts Union in the Moose Hall. During the coming week I have an invitation to speak before the Rotary Club of the city. On Wednesday I am to speak to the students of the high school during their chapel period, and on Thursday will speak to the students of the high school at Arma."

The Right or Wrong of Gambling

It is rather curious to note that despite the great injury done by gambling there is yet but little directly in the Scriptures, if there is anything, which is directly in point. It seems that the Catholic Church does not condemn in theory games of chance and has even at times conducted its own lottery. It does condemn the excess which it would call gambling, but its objection is not to the principle, according to an editorial in the Christian Work for December 30.

Yet on the other hand, as the writer there points out, the evils of gambling are apparent to all who will open their eyes. He therefore finds the authority for his answer to the question, Is gambling right or wrong? in the eighth law of the Decalogue: "Thou shalt not steal."

When for remuneration there is given an equivalent service, there is a right and just exchange. Money is only a token representing toil. If for it there has been given service to humanity, you are the legitimate owner of the money. But if you hold it in your hands and have not given full service to man or the community, it is not your own and you are stealing it, for you are taking that which is not rightfully yours.

One may argue the pleasure of this particular form, but that does not change the fact that he who gives no service receives a remuneration to which he is not entitled.

The gambler therefore takes his place with a most dangerous class, the idle people who consume the money they have never deserved, who use the intelligence and labor of their fellow men and give nothing back.

It would seem in principle the same argument would apply if less than a due recompense of service be returned. Truly, then, the love of money is the root of all evil. Through them the issue is met for us as a church in the ideals of Zion. The plain statement that the idle in Zion shall not eat the bread of the laborer in Zion would bar at once the idle rich, the idle poor, as well as the idle gambler and would prohibit at once all games of chance.

We have previously presented our position on this important subject, but reemphasize it in this new setting. For every recompense there should be rendered an equivalent service, for that is one of the foundations of Zion.

Church Colleges

It is interesting to note the relation between the church colleges in a State and the number of high school graduates who enter college and the state universities, as is pointed out by John L. Hillman, president of Simpson College, Indianola, Iowa, in the Central Christian Advocate.

He states that Michigan, despite the fact that it contains one of the greatest of state universities, ranks fortieth in the list of the percentage of high school graduates who enter college, as only one graduate in five goes on to college. While in Illinois, which also has an excellent state university, the ratio is over one in three high school graduates, and Illinois stands well toward the head of the column. He ascribes the difference to the fact that Illinois has nearly $39,000,000 invested in non-state colleges and universities while Michigan has only about $2,500,000.

He also finds from a careful investigation made by the secretary of a denominational board that counties sending no students to the denominational colleges have only one in 7,500 who are taking any college or university work, while in a great mid-western State with a population of over 2,000,000 one person in 590 is in college. But in this latter State one church was represented by six colleges, another by seven. He found as many Methodist students in the state institutions of that State as were enrolled in all seven of the Methodist colleges.

A test made in three other States produces like results. He found that the more students there were to be found in the denominational colleges, the more students there were to be found in the state universities. In one State he found that one Methodist in every 146 is in college.

If Methodist secondary schools were included and departments of the college other than the liberal arts, there is one student in every thirty-five in Methodist secondary schools or taking some form of college work.

Summing up he quotes: "Investigate carefully and you will find that these facts point to a real condition in this country. The religious motive, the religious impulse, is the great motive and impulse to higher education. The very perpetuity of our state institutions, the highest success of our semisecular institutions, depends upon the perpetuation of religion and the institutions under religious auspices."

Cigaret Smoking Increasing

The enormous increase in cigaret smoking is shown by statistics quoted by the Ladies' Home Journal in the summer of 1922 which stated that in 1911 over 10,000,000,000 were sold in America, in 1921 over 50,000,000,000. A large part of this increase is credited to women smokers even though no separate statistics have been kept. A well-known firm in Boston reports that half of the cigarets are sold to women.

This condition in America was preceded some years ago by a like condition in England in connection with the colleges. It is a matter for parents to consider to-day in sending their daughters to college even though it be to a women's college. It is a cause of anxiety whether it be our sons or daughters who are sent away. That is an additional reason for recognizing the importance and standing of our own church college in which right habits may be strengthened away from home before our young people go to other institutions to complete their collegiate course. It is also an argument in favor of the church offering a complete collegiate course.

How Shall We Help?

Doubtless some of our readers will want to know something more of the case mentioned some weeks ago of the young man in England who has so long been out of work. Of course I wrote him, making some suggestion which it was hoped would be helpful. A letter has just come from him which can scarcely fail to be of interest, so it is here presented:

Dear Brother Smith: I find it very difficult to express my thoughts in reply to your letters, for your kindness and the help contained in them rather overwhelmed me a little. Thinking over your offers of help I feel that however much I would personally like to accept the same I am sure that there are hundreds in the church in infinitely worse circumstances than myself to whom the hand of help should be extended.

I am young, single, sound in health, and with all my faculties intact, and I think that it is only right that help should be given to those in distress and weakness. It was not with any selfish desire for help for myself that I wrote, but with a feeling that comes over all of us to confide all our troubles to some one who will understand and advise, and so naturally I turned to the church from which we all expect so much, and I think sometimes for which we do so little.

As regards myself I have obtained a temporary situation on the railroad which perhaps may lead to something better; but better still I have regained that confidence in the church that I wanted so badly, and coupled with the knowledge that the church will help us in our trials I am content to trust in God and hope that I will always be of the same mind. I do not know why we always imagine that when troubles come our way we think that we and we alone have been singled out by God to carry all the trouble of the world, and then we hear of some one else's trouble; and then, oh then, how small we feel.

There comes to my mind our recent Christmas festivities. A couple of young scholars in my class at Sunday school had not joined the school long, so were not entitled to attendance prizes, so I thought that not to dishearten them I would give them a book out of my own small collection, as I was not able to afford to buy one each for them. I did this, and gave them sixpence each (they were brothers by the way) beside the books.

They were delighted. But (and now comes the raw part to me) half an hour later one of the youngsters came to me and said: "I'm glad you gave us that sixpence."

"Why?" I asked, feeling a little surprised and thinking that perhaps he wanted to have a good time at the sweetshop.

"Well, you see my dad went on work to-night and my mam had no tea to give him, and with that tanner [sixpence] you gave me and our Jim, she'll be able to send him some supper, 'cause our Jim's run home with it."

The children of the very, very poor pointing out the way to Christ! I went home that night humbled to the dust, and I know that the memory of those two poor lads' action that night will never leave me. The spirit that made them think, not of the bright-lighted shop windows, glistening bright with toys and fancies of the Christmas season, but of their dad working on an empty stomach, was something I had not really comprehended till then.

Incidents like these make us feel the real spirit of Jesus; and as I close, thanking you once again for your kind letter and offer, I pray with all my heart that whatever I may be called upon to pass through I may see the hand of God piloting my way along to his eternal home.

From your brother in the work of the Lord,

One cannot but like the tone of that letter. The humility coupled with the self-reliance appeals, and I find myself saying, We need a corps of such spirited men to help us put our program of social reform into effect. The letter shows that the young man's experiences, hard as they have been, have mellowed rather than embittered him, and his vitalized sympathy with those who are struggling against adversity cannot but give him a keen appreciation of our own social program which looks squarely towards elimination of such situations as caused him months of suffering, and the one of the working father without his supper.

I sometimes get discouraged in the attempt to hold before the church its ideals, and grow weary in urging towards practical attempts to reach the goal. So many "excuses" are urged, so many "reasons" given why we should "move slowly," that one is likely to say, "What's the use!" and lay back to "take it easy." Then such incidents as these come to the fore, in which are presented the cruel maladjustments of the present order and at the same time reflect the softening yet stabilizing effect of the religion of Christ, and we take courage to struggle on.

This church must establish its social program. The world needs the demonstration God has called upon us to make. It requires the services of consecrated men and women in whom has been aroused to the fullest extent the spirit of helpfulness to others and a determination to fight for that condition of society wherein every man shall have his chance according to his capacity.

The experiences of the young man referred to above can be matched in other directions. Let us pray that out of these experiences shall emerge a corps of workers consecrated in service towards better conditions, with warm sympathy for the unfortunate, and gifted in arousing the spirit of self-reliance. Such a corps of workers will come from those whom the spirit of the Christian religion has kept free from bitterness, and in whom there is a growing, glorious realization of the kinship of man.

Let us fight on, Saints, for better social conditions.

A Tribute to the Saints of Holden

They are a community force for good, according to the "Holden Progress."

The following clipping taken from the Holden Progress, dated February 22, 1923, will be interesting reading to the Saints. The town of Holden, Missouri, as our readers will know, is the seat of the presidency of the Holden Stake. Evidently the editor of the Holden Progress is a man who believes in justice, a man also of considerable courage. The editors of the HERALD greatly appreciate his words of tribute to our people and his defense of them. The article follows:

Denounced the Book

On Sunday evening, Doctor Briney, pastor of the Christian Church, gave the first of a series of lectures on "Is the Book of Mormon from heaven or from men?" He denounced the book in unmeasured terms, declaring it spurious, its colloquialisms proving it was written by a man, who did it clumsily. He exhibited a copy of the first edition, printed in 1830, which gave the name of Joseph Smith as "Author and Proprietor." He had another copy published in 1874, which gives Smith as "translator." The 1830 book was copyrighted, the 1874 book was not. The doctor gave it as his opinion that Smith wrote the book originally as a religious romance. The last half of the doctor's address was devoted to ridiculing the book of Nephi, his method of treatment being identical with that of Robert G. Ingersoll in his famous lecture on "The mistakes of Moses."

Although we have owned a copy of the Book of Mormon for many years, we have never read it. We have lived among the Latter Day Saints for sixteen years and found them a God-fearing, debt-paying people, always aligned aggressively with every movement for civic betterment. The church and its members have always been enthusiastic supporters of the Chautauqua which would be handicapped if it did not get the use of the Saints' Home grounds every summer free of cost. There are numerous "union" movements in Holden, sponsored by the four other Protestant churches, but the Saints are never included. Yet they go on their way, serving their God, their country, and their fellow men the same as if they were "recognized." They are tithepayers and have plenty of money with which to maintain their various church activities without calling on members of other denominations. This includes looking after their own poor, who are rarely found in a poorhouse or listed in the county court's quarterly pauper list. Sixteen years ago, Holden was in the midst of a local option campaign. Strong speakers came to Holden and held meetings in the four churches. The attendance was pitifully small, sometimes not justifying the coal used. Reverend R. B. Templeton was pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church then and very desirous to have a rally worth while. He asked us what to do. We told him if he really wanted a temperance rally, to invite those "despised Mormons" into a union meeting. He was game and did so. As a result, the Saints dismissed their service and the Presbyterian church was packed to the pulpit. On election day, the leader of the wets was asked why something wasn't done. The reply was: "No use; those ——— Saints are voting dry solidly." And they did. Such is the citizenship of the Latter Day Saints in Holden. Just what damage the Book of Mormon is doing them we fail to see. We are strongly reminded of the old, old story of the complaint made to Lincoln that Grant was drinking whisky. Lincoln replied that he wanted several barrels of the same brand for the rest of his generals.

In passing, we might remark if the Book of Mormon is the only evil institution in this community that Doctor Briney can find on which to turn his batteries, we fear that he is not in touch with sundry weak spots in the community, some of which we have been told are leaking copiously.

Wanted: A Chance to Learn

One of the surprising discoveries in the late war was the extent of illiteracy in America, especially in some sections. In the mountain district of Kentucky and Tennessee there are a large number of pure Anglo-Saxon stock, 3,500,000 Americans, but they still lack sufficient schooling. That has been one of the reasons for urging the development of a United States Department of Education, to strengthen these communities which cannot yet care for themselves.

According to a recent number of the Pictorial Review, these people of the land of Lincoln do not want charity, but do want a chance to learn. This story tells of some desperate straits which were undertaken in order to secure an opportunity to go to school "outside," the sacrifice of the family cow in order to permit two out of ten children to go to school.

From this district has come not only Lincoln, but also Andrew Johnson who at twenty-one could neither read nor write; General Sam Houston, David Farragut, President James K. Polk, William G. McAdoo and Cassius Clay. This writer says:

"The new generation is the white hope in the situation. And we have got to give them a chance. From their ranks may come the leaders of the future. They live close to God down there. They are thinking straight and feeling deeply. If you think all the people of the mountains are ignorant and shiftless and immoral, go down and see for yourself.

"Shall we not bear it aloft and resolve to keep it glowing during our generation that it may shine with even greater glory in the next? Shall we not resolve that we will neither falter nor fail until no American boy or girl shall feel impelled to plead, 'Give us not charity, but a chance'?" S. A. B.

Thrift in America

It is reported that the Christmas savings club in 5,000 banks throughout the country report 5,000,000 depositors in these clubs who received a total of $190,000,000. This is only part of the savings of the country. This amount was mostly drawn out to be used for Christmas. If it were done to relieve distress, for real Christmas gifts, it deserves commendation. But much of the Christmas money is spent simply for the exchange of useless presents by those who do not need them.

According to the New York Herald quoted in the Literary Digest there are certainly thousands of other people who saved in their regular bank accounts for Christmas, bringing the total up to half a billion dollars.

Then $625,000,000 War Savings Stamps fell due New Year's Day belonging mostly to the wage earners of the country. Hundreds of millions are also invested in Liberty Loan Bonds by people of small means and there is more than $8,000,000,000 in Savings Banks.

In all, counting investments in corporations, it is estimated that the laboring man now holds in small savings and investments, bonds and stocks, not less than $13,000,000,000 and it may easily be more than $15,000,000,000.

So much is said about the lack of thrift in America that it is worth while to take a glance at the other side of the picture and recognize that many people of small means are saving and investing in liquid assets as well as in the purchasing of homes.

Maya Glyphs

A special effort is being made of recent years to decipher the Maya glyphs. For this work no Rosetta Stone has been found, but the Indians who inhabit the territory are being used. Their hope is to take down and analyze so that now Doctor William Gates, through this instrument of recording has managed to discover a grammar of the present Maya tongue. He believes he thereby has a possible key to the ancient glyphs.

Another factor is that many of these glyphs apparently deal with astronomical data. In this way a further knowledge is gained.

It may surprise our readers to learn the number of men who have practically devoted their lives in the past hundred years to working out little by little the Egyptian hieroglyphs, the cuneiform, Babylonian, Chaldean, and Sumerian writings. Only a careful student can appreciate the great pains required and the years of labor to secure even a little progress. S. A. B.

The Pueblo Indians

The papers are full of the demand for a square deal to the Pueblo Indians. These Indians are very poor. They are not like the small tribe which was moved on to what was thought to be very poor land in Oklahoma and who became wealthy through the fact that the land was the center of an oil field. They are poor and wish to prevent the giving away of some of their property by the Burson Indian Bureau. These Indians out of their poverty have raised the means to send a few of their number to Washington to protest. There is needed legislation by Congress but legislation which will free and help the Indians, not incumber them and take from them the little property they have remaining. S. A. B.

Pasteur the Greatest Frenchman

It will surprise many to learn that when a vote was taken in France some years ago as to who was the greatest Frenchman that had ever lived, the name of Napoleon Bonaparte did not stand to the front, according to the Central Christian Advocate. Despite the monuments erected to the honor of Napoleon, the name that stood first was that of Louis Pasteur, the discoverer of the process of pasteurization and a man who devoted his time to the fighting of disease. In his school work he ranked only as mediocre in chemistry, yet he continued to work unceasingly. He put an end to cattle cholera, ended a plague in silk worms, discovered other microbes including an antitoxin for hydrophobia.

Redeem the church college. Church colleges are not a part and parcel of the public schools and they are practically dominated by the interests that control the public school system. We must return them back to the service of the church. . . . Church colleges do thirteen times as much for the training of public school teachers as they do for the training of religious teachers. Moreover, our church colleges have failed to recognize that they have a distinct contribution to make to the church.—Walter S. Athearn.

Local Men, Awake!

By Elbert A. Smith

*Some excellent work is being done by many.
Why not by all?*

Local men engaged in pastoral work, whether branch presidents, priests, teachers, or deacons (to the extent to which the last named may be considered pastors) are capable of doing a great and splendid work. The opportunity is theirs. The field is ready at their hands. They do not need to be appointed to some distant mission, or go overseas, or even to the next township. The work is at their doors.

Many local men are doing a great and splendid work. We honor and respect them for it. Men who work hard all day, eight or perhaps ten hours, or longer, possibly riding to and from their work in the street cars an hour each way, who then, though weary in body, leave comfortable homes and the pleasures of family life so briefly within their reach, and go out evenings and Sundays making pastoral calls, making priests' visits, collecting funds for the work, administering to the sick, waiting upon the needy, these men have our honor and our support and the benefit of our prayers. The Lord goes with them. On more than one occasion a local priest calling at the home of the undersigned has apologized for supposed presumption in making an official visit upon one of the Presidency, little realizing perhaps that he has brought strength and cheer, that his humble and childlike prayer and faith, and his devotion to duty have greatly helped one whom he thought in no need of help.

Local Men Who Are Failing

Many local men, we repeat, are doing a great and splendid work. But very many others are doing very little and in some instances absolutely nothing to help the cause and to justify themselves in continuing to hold the priesthood. Some for one reason or another cannot occupy. Such are blameless. But there remains even yet very many who are not blameless and who need to arouse themselves. Of such a one a missionary writes in rather scathing terms:

My greatest sorrow that I have had to meet in my missionary work is that after we have had a real good session and inducted several into the kingdom they are left to starve, spiritually, by the officers and priesthood of branches and finally to die. I often wonder just what can be the thoughts of those who have accepted responsibility by way of ordination and then fail to function. I cannot find it within my power to believe their testimony when they tell me they love the work, yet selfishly think only of themselves and their pleasure and are unwilling to spend at least one night each week in feeding and shepherding the flock. For personal pleasure they are found leaving the Wednesday prayer service and attending places of amusement, theaters, or ball games. These may be all right in their place, but the example is not that which would indicate a real heart interest in the work of God. If they were absent visiting some delinquent member they might be readily excused. After the new member dies, spiritually, then they are the first to report the missionary as having baptized people before they were converted. Our greatest need to-day is leadership. We have so few real leaders, men who can successfully direct branch work.

A District That Is Suffering

The way in which one whole district has been left to decay is described by another missionary:

I was in — District at — Saturday and Sunday, at which time I met the leading ministry of this territory, and indeed I think over half the priesthood of the district. I was in this district baptized, ordained a priest, and here I had my first experience in the active work. When I left the territory twenty years ago our people there were active and alert, particularly in the matter of the preaching of the gospel. Many local brethren were abroad maintaining appointments and pushing the work. Indeed, my own conversion was through the efforts of local men under these local appointments. Imagine my feelings, then, when I found the work in that territory at a very low ebb, our people being practically without vitality, not maintaining a single missionary appointment, and in all too many instances not even keeping up branch work. The district, so far as I can judge, is at this time the deadest place I have ever visited in my ministry. My opinion is that we cannot expect results of any kind there until the people and ministry are first stimulated and led to take on new life.

A Sales Manager Who Is Doing Splendid Work

As a bright countervail to such examples, there are many others which show what can be done. Pardon us if we mention names.

Orman Salisbury is a business man who has possibly two hundred salesmen to direct. He has oversight of a large and complex business, reaching into several States. Yet he is pastor of the branch at Council Bluffs, Iowa, and is a very active and aggressive pastor at that. But that is not all. He is president of his district, the Pottawattamie District. He has his district work well organized and up to date. He is a pusher in both branch and district. Moreover as he goes out in various fields covered by his business interests he visits many branches and conferences outside his own district, often preaching twice on Sunday, and everywhere is a very lively and powerful reviving factor among the Saints. This man is a man of extraordinary energy and vitality, a human dynamo; not many could keep up with his pace; but many could imitate him to the extent of their strength and ability, and that very profiably. This hard-headed business man, and successful pastor, writes:

I may be treading on uninvited ground, but I just feel like telling some one my feelings and I do not think I would be justified in telling anyone else but you, therefore I venture. It stirs one to the core when visiting branches that appear to be standing still, or retrograding, and little in advance of twenty-five years ago. Oh, Graceland! Oh, Grace-land! seems to me to be our future hope. Instead of cur-tailing our religious course, I would that it might be increased a hundredfold. It may be I have caught a new vision, but it does seem to me that there was never as great a demand for men who can direct our branches and districts. What can be done is the question. I know you men are doing all you can and I am doing so little. It may be I will now feel better, as I have got part of this out to some one else."

A Bank Man Who Built Up a Church

Wilbur E. Prall is assistant cashier in the State Savings Bank of Lamoni, Iowa. Some people think that a cashier has an easy life. Do not bank doors close early? Yes, but the cashiers have work to do long after the doors close. In addition Brother Prall runs a small dairy on his own account, milking some five or six cows and distributing the milk night and morning among his customers. He was assistant Sunday school superintendent and elder in charge of his group and a ward prayer meeting, and continued this work faithfully. Yet he found time to accept the pastorate of the branch at Davis City, some eight miles east of Lamoni, and not to accept alone, but to occupy. In course of time he won the love and undivided support of the Saints at that place—more than that he won the respect and cooperation of the community of nonmembers. He became a factor in the religious life of the community and won a standing for the church not previously had. He did this by a combination of tact, zeal, faith, hard work, and punctuality. It was never too hot in the summer or too cold in the winter, or too wet or too snowy for him to make the eight miles and be present on time at Sunday services, and at the various meetings of week nights. And his wife was an able assistant in departmental work. He showed what a local man can do in a difficult situation if he has the will.

A Local Missionary

Brother Herbert Johnson is an eastern man. He has given his attention to missionary work. But what he has done shows what a local man can do in either line of service. Of him Apostle E. J. Gleazer writes:

We are pleased to report that several local men are serving the church as missionaries in this district. I am inclosing a report from Elder Herbert Johnson [Cranston Branch, Rhode Island]. It speaks for itself. I am of the opinion that he has accomplished more than some of us men who are devoting our entire time to the work. This brother works every day and this report covers labor performed in evenings, Saturday afternoons, and Sundays. He is in charge of the missionary activities in Rhode Island and Connecticut.

Brother Johnson's report for 1922 is itemized as follows:

Sermons	91	Assisted to confirm....	2
In charge	45	Children blessed	6
Assisted	39	Administrations	337
Other services	91	Marriages	5
Baptized	21	Visits	74
Confirmed	16	Administered sacra- ment	23

In a personal letter to the Presidency Brother Johnson says:

I leave my home on Saturday at 5.30 a. m., go to work until 12 o'clock noon, then I get the 12.45 p. m. train and ride forty-four miles to Westerly, go and visit the Saints and those not of our faith who come out to hear the gospel, then on Sunday morning leave Westerly at 8.50 and ride by trolley twenty more miles to New London, Connecticut, preach there and attend Sunday school and visit, then back to Westerly and hold Sunday school at 6 p. m. and preach at 7 p. m. Leave Westerly at 8.50 p. m., arrive at my home in South Auburn, Rhode Island, at 11.30 p. m. The year 1923 sees me at it again with a great desire to do more for the work I love so well and with God helping me I hope to have a report at the end of 1923 better than 1922.

Western Man Finds an Opening

Robert J. Wildey is a western man, pastor of the Hutchinson, Kansas, Branch. He is a local man, until recently in the laundry business, a young man about twenty-seven years old. A year and a half ago when Brother Wildey moved to Hutchinson no members of the priesthood lived at that place and little was being done in church work. His untiring efforts aided by the few local Saints have accomplished much. To-day there is a well-organized branch with five members of the priesthood, a regular Sunday school with a teacher training class, a Religio, a Department of Women, and in addition some missionary work has been done at adjacent points. There have been fifteen baptisms in the past year. Brother Wildey writes:

I am the son of a widow and have had to work my way in the world since I was fourteen years of age. I am poor; have not been able to lay up any great amount of this world's goods, but the one thing I do possess I am willing to lay on the altar of service.

There Are Many Others

These are but examples, not mentioned either to flatter or embarrass these brethren, but they furnish very illuminating object lessons more convincing than argument. They show what can be done.

Doubtless there are scores and perhaps hundreds of others quite as well worthy of mention.

The great burden of pastoral work must of necessity rest on the shoulders of the local, self-supporting men. As we pointed out in a former editorial there are branches and districts where the church must support men under appointment and drawing family allowance, because for one reason or another the local men cannot handle the situation and do the volume of work imperatively demanded. Probably as the church grows bigger these demands will increase in some ratio proportionate to the growth of the membership. That need must be met. But the resources with which to meet it are limited, pitifully limited just now. Hence the great burden of such work must be met by local men. The opportunity is glorious. It is at their door. True, it demands hard work and sacrifice. So does missionary work. So does any form of church work. But the call comes from our heavenly Father. The need is pressing. Local men, Awake!

Equality

By Edward Rannie

Zion must arise and put on her beautiful garments; therefore, I give unto you this commandment, that ye bind yourselves by this covenant, and it shall be done according to the laws of the Lord. Behold, here is wisdom, also, in me, for your good. And you are to be equal, or in other words, you are to have equal claims on the properties, for the benefit of managing the concerns of your stewardships, every man according to his wants and his needs, inasmuch as his wants are just; and all this for the benefit of the church of the living God, that every man may improve upon his talent, that every man may gain other talents; yea, even an hundred-fold, to be cast into the Lord's storehouse, to become the common property of the whole church, every man seeking the interest of his neighbor, and doing all things with an eye single to the glory of God.—Doctrine and Covenants 81: 4.

And the Lord called his people Zion, because they were of one heart and one mind, and dwelt in righteousness; and there was no poor among them; and Enoch continued his preaching in righteousness unto the people of God.—Doctrine and Covenants 36: 2.

I, the Lord, stretched out the heavens, and builded the earth as a very handy work; and all things therein are mine; and it is my purpose to provide for my saints, for all things are mine; but it must needs be done in my own way; and, behold, this is the way, that I the Lord, have decreed to provide for my saints: that the poor shall be exalted, in that the rich are made low; for the earth is full, and there is enough and to spare; yea, I prepared all things, and have given unto the children of men to be agents unto themselves.—Doctrine and Covenants 101: 2.

And, behold, none are exempt from this law who belong to the church of the living God; yea, neither the bishop, neither the agent, who keepeth the Lord's storehouse; neither he who is appointed to administer spiritual things, the same is worthy of his hire, even as those who are appointed to a stewardship, to administer in temporal things; yea, even more abundantly, which abundance is multiplied unto them through the manifestations of the Spirit; nevertheless, in your temporal things you shall be equal, and this not grudgingly, otherwise the abundance of the manifestations of the Spirit shall be withheld.—Doctrine and Covenants 70: 3.

And let every man deal honestly, and be alike among this people, and receive alike, that ye may be one, even as I have commanded you.—Doctrine and Covenants 51: 2.

Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? He said unto him, What is written in the law? how readest thou? And he answering said, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself. And he said unto him, Thou hast answered right: this do, and thou shalt live.—Luke 10: 25-28.

In Temporal Things

It is evident from the above quotations that Jesus has reference to equality in temporal things and not to brain power or social conditions, and it is from that viewpoint that this article will be written. From the time that historians began to record the doings of men, until the present time, the possession of material wealth has been the cause of people being separated into classes, a condition that God has always opposed because it was the cause of great evil among people, and was the forerunner of strife, contention, and war. Many good men have tried in various ways to prevent such conditions, but their success has been very meager and has brought other evils that were almost as bad as those from which they sought to escape.

Sufficient Means to Permit Effective Service

What is equality and what it is not can best be explained by giving concrete examples. People are not equal because they have the same number of dollars, but because they have sufficient, so that they can follow the pursuit in life in which by nature and training they are best adapted to find success and through which they can be a benefit to the community of which they form a part.

John Blank has two children, a girl and a boy. They both have sufficient natural talent, that if developed and trained in the proper way will enable them to earn their living and be of great benefit in a public way, giving pleasure and happiness to others. The girl desires and ought to have a piano which would cost about $400 and the boy wants a violin the cost of which would be about $50. If they can both have what they need they are equal and have equal opportunity to develop their talent notwithstanding the wide difference in the amount of money they need.

Tom Brown has two sons and one of them believes his niche in life is to be a good carpenter and he gets the benefit of a high school education and is furnished $300 worth of tools and a library of good books pertaining to that trade. At the age of eighteen he starts an apprenticeship of four years and during that time receives a salary that increases each year and with reasonable economy meets all his current expenses.

The other boy desires to be a physician and surgeon and it will be necessary for him to go to a medical college for six years and during that time he will find it to be of great advantage to work only during vacation and his expense during that six years not including board and room will be approximately $2,000. The boys are equal if they have the amount required to meet their legitimate expense.

John Jones has two sons and they both want to enter the business world in different lines. One has served several years in a general store and the other has served an apprenticeship in a foundry, making stoves, and the father wants to start both out in business. Notwithstanding the amounts will be different, he furnishes both boys with enough capital to start them out in their chosen business and so they have an equal start.

Don Smith has three sons and they want to live an outdoor life and make their living from the soil and each one wants to follow different lines. A wants to go into the poultry business, and ten acres will be sufficient for him. B intends to be a fruit grower, and thirty acres will be ample for his needs. C will be a general farmer and he will need eighty acres, and they are all equal if they have enough money to get what they need to start them in their chosen occupation.

This Principle Is Stewardship

The reader will please observe that the above are illustrations and do not confuse them with the thing itself because the thing illustrated may be different in your community than the illustration. The important thing is the principle and not how it may be illustrated. What we have stated above is what the good father would do with his children, and in seeking to understand how such things will work in the church we must remember that our heavenly Father wants us to be one great family and have a common interest in all, seeking the good and welfare of all the great family of God, recognizing the fact that we are all children of the same household. Until we can place ourselves on that common plane we cannot accomplish the Lord's work, worlds without end. The eternities will come and go, and we will still find that we have not accomplished the Lord's work. It is in the principle as stated above that there is involved the law of stewardship, all working together for the welfare of our neighbor and for the glory of God and the spread of his cause in the earth. We may not at present understand the details of stewardships but we can understand that it is based on the law of love.

Workers Together

It is recognized of God as we learn in the scripture that not all men have the same earning or producing capacity and also that not all occupations or callings in the world of material things are in the same condition. The common laborer, the school-teacher, the mechanic, the farmer, the business man and manufacturer all have different earning capacity and all are needed to make up what is commonly called society. Without the school-teacher we would soon go back to barbarism. Yet it is impossible for him to amass wealth compared with the man in business, the manufacturer and farmer. The work of one contributes to the development of the mind, the other produces material wealth. A person to fill his place among his people must contribute to the common fund all that he does not need to carry on and enlarge his business.

The school-teacher contributes his all in the use of his talent and the man of wealth gives his all by giving of his material wealth. One of the greatest difficulties to overcome is how much each person can spend of his wealth and come within the provision of the law which says "according to his wants and needs." God says they must be just, and a person's heart filled with love who is kind, generous, and unselfish would not find it very hard to determine what were his real needs. It is when our hearts are poisoned with selfishness that we find it a difficult thing to be generous and obey the law of the Lord. Bishop Israel L. Rogers was a plain and unassuming man and possessed a generous heart and it was not hard for him to cancel a debt of four thousand dollars that he held against the church for publishing the Inspired Translation of the Bible.

Reasonable Equality Without Waste

Recently I visited a family of four. They had a cottage sufficiently large to provide comfortably for all, modern in all things. It cost $3,000. If they would have added a thousand dollars more to the cost they would not have had one more comfort or convenience to their home. Why waste that thousand dollars? In a family of seven a home with every comfort found in modern houses at a cost of $4,500, two thousand dollars more would only have made it more elaborate, but it would not have added in any essential way to the comfort and well being of its inmates.

Why should we spend eight, ten, or fifteen thousand dollars for a home when we can have one with every modern comfort for half as much money?

How can we ever have money to carry on the Lord's work if we spend it for what we do not need? If we were of the world we would be justified in satisfying our vanity, and our pride and selfishness, so we could have the praise and friendship of the world. But it should not be so with us, for Paul said, "Ye are bought with a price." Are we willing to pay the price that is required of us so we might have the friendship of God? for let us not forget we cannot have the friendship of both at the same time.

Zion can be built up with cottages of the humbler kind such as the late President Joseph Smith saw in vision when the Lord showed him two roads and he could have his choice. One was the beautiful prairies dotted with small cottages, a happy people humble, full of love for God and their fellow man; the other the busy marts of trade and amidst stately mansions and great men of the world. We all know which road he took and what a great work he did in restoring the church from its apostate condition. He brought joy and happiness to many thousands of honest-hearted people.

Zion cannot be built up with one part of the people living in mansions and the other part in hovels. A community separated because of wealth and poverty or learning, cannot have the approval of God. The way he separates people is as to whether they are righteous or unrighteous.

How to Make a Start

Our heavenly Father knew that it was impossible to persuade all his people to accept the law of stewardships and live according to the law of equality, so to help us in our desires to obey his law he gave the church instructions in section 128 and told us how to organize in small groups, or societies, so that we could work together and be of help to each other in our temporal affairs.

Such was the intention of the United Order of Enoch. But under present conditions we cannot carry out the full purpose of the articles of association. The Lord seems to have planned those smaller organizations to be a school of experience to us, and while we were reaping the benefits of them prepare us for a larger service and association, for in the last part of paragraph one he says, "and the whole body of the church when organized."

It may not be the time to organize the whole body of the church. But surely we should be making our preparation for that and building up these smaller groups.

When one holding the priesthood neglects a duty, others besides himself suffer. That is one of the penalties of priestly failure.—The Priesthood Journal.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

Ideals of Liberal and Conservative Thinkers

*There is a conflict in the religious world.
Where do we stand?*

One of the great issues before the world to-day is that between the modernist, or liberal thinker, as he may prefer to be called, and those who hold to the fundamentals of religion who is sometimes called the conservative. The issues are being discussed both in the secular and also in the religious press.

In a recent issue of the Christian Standard there appears an article by Edward Anderson who has been a member of the Christian Church for forty-five years and engaged in the work of public education for thirty years. He is at present an elder in that church and principal of a public school. He sets forth in the following language the conclusion of the modernist group. While all do not agree in all of the conclusions the modernists are practically agreed, he states, on the fundamental ones, hence he attempts to set forth only these fundamental conclusions:

"1. Since evolution is a 'universal process, a continuous, progressive change working according to fixed laws and by resident forces,' the Mosaic account of the creation of man and his downfall through disobedience cannot be accepted. Man must be accepted as the product of evolution. He, in harmony with those laws, must have had a crude beginning; then, under the process through millions of years, and the crossing of millions of species, has arrived at his present stage. One of his evolutionary ancestors must have been common with those of the ape or gorilla. His moral and spiritual life must come under the same process.

"2. The Bible is man-made, full of errors, mistakes, and inconsistencies, but is the historical records showing the moral and spiritual progress of the race. Those records show that man, in the beginning, had very crude ethical and spiritual ideas, but, in harmony with the process, those ideas have gradually unfolded till they culminated in the ideals of Jesus.

"If the process is continuous, it is not quite clear how those ideals could have reached perfection in Jesus Christ. This would admit a break in the process. To be consistent with their theory, they must assume that there are men now living who have reached nearer perfection than the Christ.

"3. The Bible is not the word of God, in the sense that God revealed himself to man by special, supernatural acts; nor are the religion of Israel and the Christian religion unique and different from all other religions because of their supernatural origin. To admit that would be to deny the theory of evolution.

"4. They deny many of the so-called miracles; at least, those that cannot be explained by natural laws. The others, they say are not correct narratives of actual events. Those attributed to the Christ were not true narratives.

"5. The resurrection of the body of Christ and his ascension, the virgin birth, the atonement by the shedding of blood, being miracles not explainable by natural laws, are therefore denied. These miracles could not be, for they could not take place in the process.

"6. They deny that the natural man lacks spiritual life, and must be born again to have it. They, therefore, deny Christ's statements: 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God,' or, 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God.'

"7. They claim that man in the evolutionary process of his spiritual life has reached a point in his growth when physical rites are no longer necessary. Baptism does not mark a single step in progress, and teaches a doctrine wholly foreign to evolution. Then, too, baptism is now an obstacle to Christian union.

"8. The church is a man-made institution, and the conditions of membership may be changed to suit the spirit of progress."

On the other hand he also sets forth the doctrines held by the conservative group as follows:

"1. The Bible is the word of God, inspired, authoritative, and inerrant in the original writings. They believe the religion of Israel and the Christian religion were unique and different from all other religions because they had their origin in a special, supernatural revelation.

"2. They believe the Mosaic account of the origin of man and his fall through disobedience is true, that God created man in his own image and placed him in the garden of Eden in a perfect spiritual condition, and then, through disobedience, came spiritual death to the race.

"3. Man now in his natural state has no spiritual life, but walks after the law—the law of the wages of sin and death.' Before he has spiritual life he must be born again, for Jesus said: 'Marvel not that I said unto you, ye must be born again'; 'Except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' Born again, he walks after 'the law of the Spirit of life.'

"4. They believe the miracles were true narratives of actual events, and in the performing of them God used his supernatural power to accomplish his purpose when natural agencies could not do it.

"5. A belief in miracles carries with it a belief in the Deity, virgin birth, resurrection, and ascension of the Lord Jesus Christ.

"6. They believe the New Testament is Christ's last will, and, since to him was given all authority in heaven and on earth, the New Testament, therefore, is final authority, and by it we must test all matters pertaining to faith and practice.

"7. Christ, through the Holy Spirit, gave us his conditions for membership in his church, and also gave full and complete instructions as to Christian living. No man has any right to add to or take from this Book of his law.

"8. They believe the Holy Spirit gave the following conditions for membership into the church, and our historic body has practiced them:

"a. Faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

"b. Repentance.

"c. Confession before men that Jesus is the Christ.

"d. Baptism. 'Buried with your Lord in baptism to rise and walk in newness of life.'

"e. Christian living by observing all things that Christ commanded you."

To a careful student there can be no doubt of the disintegrating and demoralizing effect of much of this public teaching in the name of evolution. A host of witnesses, both of school men and of ministers, give the same testimony. Evolution is treated not as a theory, but as though it were a demonstrated fact, as clearly shown as the laws of nature, the fact that an apple falls to the ground or the rising of the sun.

In the first place, this is clearly a mistake of scientific fact. Men who are strong proponents of evolution still admit that while they believe in that theory it is only a matter of faith and that we know as yet absolutely nothing concerning the origin of species.

We think the position of our church on the Bible would not be as extreme as either of the platforms set forth above. We recognize frankly and fully that the Bible is the word of God, that it contains divine revelation, but at the same time we frankly recognize that holy men of God spoke as they were moved upon by the Spirit of God; the language is that of the prophet or writer. (2 Peter 1: 21.)

In the second place this which was once so given by inspiration has been transcribed again and again so that we have no manuscript of the Old Testament which is not comparatively modern and the oldest manuscript of the New Testament dates back to the fourth century. There have been errors in transcription and also in translation but it still remains and retains the inspiration of God.

Whatever may be the origin of the body of man, and it would seem quite possible in accordance with Genesis to concede an evolutionary origin for the body, after they were once demonstrated, that is that God could have made man from preexisting animal forms as well as from dirt or dust directly, still that life within him is the spirit of the living God. The spirit within him is not the result of a material evolution.

Revelation is therefore unique and is supernatural and is not explained simply as a development of man. Miracles are in accordance with the law of nature but show the superior knowledge by the supreme being of the laws of nature.

It follows, therefore, that the resurrection of Christ, his ascension, virgin birth, and atonement are all accepted.

There are some individuals who deny or question the necessity of a rebirth and who would deny baptism. There are some who will state simply that the time may come that physical rites are no longer necessary and that baptism is not essential, but to this idea, or that the church is a man-made institution, we cannot for a moment accede. While man progresses and seeks new goals there is still that eternal standard, the ultimate criterion of truth.

Reviewing the conservative doctrine, we would substantially agree with them on the whole, yet would find it necessary to make some modification. It does not follow that the Bible is inerrant even in the original writing. Nor does it follow that man in his natural state has no spiritual life for "he [Jesus] is the light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world." (John 1.) But it is true that he must be born again of water and of the Spirit to become truly a son of God and partake of the Spirit of the Highest.

God uses his knowledge of his own laws to perform miracles. He does not thereby contravene the laws of nature but merely exercises his superior knowledge. This realization that God is greater than man prevents us from judging all things by our own limited knowledge, hence carries with it a belief in miracles.

The idea of revelation from God involves a continuance of that revelation and not a closing for all time.

Obedience to the commands of Christ require obedience to his commandments; a recognition of his lordship is indeed foolish and mistaken, for there is no such recognition unless it involves a following of the path which he has laid down.

We should directly prove all things, but let us not forget the second portion of the statement of Paul, "Hold fast that which is good."

LETTERS AND NEWS

What the Church Needs Most

Some time ago there appeared in the HERALD a number of articles on the subject, "What the church needs most." It is my opinion that the greatest need of the church has been overlooked. While there are many things that we as a church need, the most essential thing now is a better understanding of and a closer relationship between the church and its earthly head.

From my observation I am convinced that, although you have been in the Presidency for more than twenty years, the majority know alas too little about the ideals for which you are striving.

It is very gratifying to me to see the increasing number of articles from your pen in the HERALD, and as well, the circular letter to district and branch presidents. To my mind they augur well for the accomplishment of the above-mentioned necessity.

May God abundantly bless you and assist you to continue your efforts until in their fruitage we may fully realize the ennobling ideal voiced by your counselor at the late General Conference, when we may all be united under your leadership as a band of true and loyal soldiers, confidently marching on to the final victory and triumph of the church of God.

Reflections on Zion's Conditions

[The accompanying letter from one of our missionaries in the field will be of interest. He makes some rather pungent comments which should arouse thought.—F. M. S.]

_____, _____, February 9, 1923.

PRESIDENT F. M. SMITH,
Independence, Missouri.

My Dear Brother Smith: At the expense of being considered presumptuous, I am going to pen you a few lines, and I want you to go with me in mind to January 7 and 8. I with fifteen hundred other Latter Day Saints attended the sacrament service in the Stone Church. It was served with splendid promptness. Thirty-five minutes of the hour was left and occupied by four old women, and I speak respectfully, in telling something no one in this wide world was interested in but themselves, notwithstanding there were in attendance one member of the First Presidency, apostles, patriarchs, and high priests. To me that was a mental and spiritual tragedy to that vast audience. I went with a hope and purpose of a greater vision of work and church advancement for 1923.

The problem meeting in the afternoon was fine. Your thought of home government as one of Zion's greatest problems was well framed and followed by W. W. Smith and his story of the Panama Canal. To me the story should have been placed last as a fitting climax to his wonderful address.

The business meeting the following night or quarterly conference, splendid reports, etc., but one item read found me in a very reflective mood and I have thought of it since, and your "Reflections" of HERALD, January 31, caused me to write this letter. The item in question was $12,000 for aid. Yes, $12,000. No comeback. An outlay on the strength of the statement, "The poor ye have always with you," while not one copper as an investment for the benefit of the great army of our young people, no provision for their safety.

This surely must be a grave mistake. As a church we are not plowing a canal through this feverish world of sin, distress, and the conditions that are killing our boys and girls, and yet not one cent spent to supply the oil that will prevent the world's diseases and save to us the hope of the church in the city of Zion. If Zion needs anything it is a headquarters for purposes of physical benefit.

I could say much; but I am sure you know the case in all its parts. But as an investment bringing good returns could not the church move out and make, maybe, the aid for the old read $6,000 and the investment for the young read $6,000 instead of it all, $12,000, given with no comeback?

Pardon the thought. I wish there were a short cut to better conditions, and is God selfish, withholding that which made Zion of old, or are you or the people slow to heed? I will quit. I am getting in too deep, but may our boys be saved; may our girls be loyal, and may God give you increased leadership to general the forces to greater vision is my prayer.

Faithfully yours,

Willing Helpers

Letter from Mrs. Nellie Russell, Palmyra, Nebraska: "In reading the SAINTS' HERALD for December 27, I read the article written by Brother C. L. Munro: 'Plan to raise $1,040,000 for 1923.' I thought this a splendid plan. Such a small amount that many of us could give one dollar each week. I for one will try sending the full amount at the end of each month. I am a farmer's wife and cash is hard to get, but I have a fine flock of chickens which I am counting on. I stopped drinking coffee when I came into the church and I give the price of that as Christmas offering each year. I am anxious for this gospel to spread and want to do all I can."

Letter from Mrs. Carrie Holmes, Joy, Illinois: "Inclosed find $5 as a freewill offering of $1 per week. I make this start and hope to be able to continue through the year."

Letter from Ida Farley, Carsonville, Michigan: "While endeavoring to do my part and help in building up the Lord's work on earth and after reading an article in the HERALD where a brother had done a little figuring how the Saints could give and by so doing be a wonderful help to you in carrying on the gospel, I have undertaken the plan. It was to give one dollar a week this year, all that could, so by making a sacrifice and denying myself of many things I have been able to save the amount this month. Not knowing where the means will come from, I may not be able to continue through the whole year, yet I have made the start, knowing if I am earnest and desire to give that God will bless and help me, and if I fail I would rather fail in trying than not to try at all. I wish in my heart that all the Saints would become earnest workers and be willing to help our dear Lord to bring about the great purpose he desires to bring about for the safety and comfort of his people. There are too many Saints to-day that want God to come to them. They are not willing to go to him. I have had them say to me, If God will do his part, I will do mine. But God is too noble and wise to humble himself to weak humanity. I am not saying this to find fault with my brothers and sisters, far from that; my prayer is that God's people will awaken to a sense of their duty and use the opportunities God is giving them to help in this great work and by so doing give the officers a chance to bring about the conditions God intends."

By What Rule Do We Work?

Quite early in life I began to observe things, and that faculty has caused me to notice things that by some are overlooked. This faculty coupled with twenty years in the active ministry has enabled me to make observations that have caused me to wonder at times as to just what actuated the minds and impulses of many of us. I have at last come to the place where I have concluded that a large percentage of humanity have a very imperfect or perverted concept of the Christian religion. I am therefore inclined to ask the question, By what rule do we work?

From my earliest recollection I have heard the golden rule discussed, but in few cases have I seen it actually put into practice. This in part is due to the fact that we have not thoroughly weighed and analyzed the philosophy involved in the teaching of our Master that has been crystallized into the terms of the golden rule. I wish for that reason to draw a few observations that might enable the reader to think and act more wisely than he might otherwise do. For whether we are conscious of it or not, we are either working by, or in opposition to, the golden rule.

The evident purpose of Christ's message was intended to teach us how to relate ourselves to our fellow men. We can do this only when we have learned to treat all mankind as we would have ourselves treated. To do this we must get to that place where we cease longer to condemn. We must learn that Christ's method was to correct the errors of men by leading them to truth. We must learn that error can never be corrected by harsh denunciations, but by kind treatment, and by demonstration of the truth.

It seems to be human nature to seize everything that can be had with which to oppose that which they are already opposed to. Strange as it may seem they never stop to inquire whether it is true or false, but only, Is it against this person or order that I want to oppose? This is a very grievous error, and should not be indulged in by the membership of Christ's church. The Jews sought to catch Christ in his words that they might condemn him. Quite often I have seen people of whom I had expected much better conduct, grasping at a shadow, in order to bring an accusation against some one whom they were opposed to. He who does this may perchance hold membership in the church, but he is not working by the rule that Christ has laid down for us.

That I might further illustrate my thought I wish to relate a little circumstance that occurred in the winter of 1917. A good brother came to my door one morning, and as I answered the doorbell he said, "Don't you want to subscribe for the Menace? It is only twenty-five cents per year." I answered him, "No, I have neither time nor means for the Menace, nor anything of its kind." He then said, "It is a good paper Brother —. It tells lots of truth." To this I replied, "It may do so, but can you tell me where the truth ends and the error begins? If I want to learn about the Catholics I will read the works of Cardinal Gibbons and not the Menace."

Now we want to draw the moral from this if possible. This brother was a good old man. I had known him for years, and he had good intentions, but like many of us he had a wrong idea. To him Catholicism was wrong; therefore anything that could be used against them he considered legitimate and right. This is the error that most of us make. I therefore said to this good brother: "Is it not true that we insist that the world should judge us by what we teach and do rather than by what our enemies say about us?" He answered, "Yes," "Then," said I, "let us not do to others what we object to having done to us. Let's apply the golden rule both ways." I further suggested to the good brother, "I read pro everything and anti nothing. Let the philosophy of any man or organization of men be measured by its affirmative teaching and not by the propaganda of its enemy." I then assured the good man that I had neither time nor money for works of that kind.

Now permit me to illustrate the other side of the picture. In 1917 I baptized a man in Woods County, Oklahoma. Sometime after he had joined the church he was in the town of Alva, and was talking with some of his acquaintances. One man said to him, "Mr. —, I understand you have joined the Latter Day Saints." "Yes," said the brother, "so I have." "Well," said the other, "I can't go old Joe Smith." "Were you acquainted with Joseph Smith?" our brother asked. "No," said the other. "Neither was I," said our brother; "don't you think we had better talk about something we know more about?" He then continued, "I didn't know Moses either, but I know Joseph Smith just as I know Moses."

Now let us get the picture clearly. He did not know Moses by what Robert G. Ingersoll said about him. No, indeed; for he would have had a very imperfect concept of Moses if he had become acquainted with him by that process. He knew Moses by reading and acquainting himself with the writings of Moses. So in like manner he was acquainted with Joseph Smith by reading his writings and becoming acquainted with them, and not by what his enemies said about him.

By what rule do we work? Are we as careful as we should be about our relationship to our fellow men? I hope these few lines may enable some of us to see things in a clearer light than we have heretofore seen them. To this end I hope to labor constantly.

Sons of Ministers Succeed

[An interesting letter is contributed here by F. Henry Edwards on the subject of contributions to society by sons of ministers. It might be a matter of considerable interest could statistics be compiled on church and other activities of sons of the ministers of our own church of the preceding generation or the one before that; but perhaps there has not been lapse of time sufficient to be a proper perspective of the subject so far as our own organization is concerned.— F. M. S.]

In the Quorum of Twelve office we frequently hear it stated that the sons of the missionaries do not prove as useful to the church as if their fathers had served the church in some other way.

In conversation with President Floyd M. McDowell, he directed my attention to the following extract from De Candolle as contained in Lester F. Ward's Applied Sociology, pages 164, 165:

"I will mention . . . a few men of unquestioned merit who would not have been born if Protestant ecclesiastics had been restricted to celibacy, or who would have taken a different course if their education had been bad. They are all sons of Protestant ministers, deans, or pastors.

"I could have tripled or quintupled these lists, indicating men of recognized distinction but less known to the general public. This would be useless as a demonstration, for the names enumerated are sufficient to show to what extent science, medicine, and letters would have been impeded during two centuries if celibacy had been imposed upon the ecclesiastics of all cults, or if, being married, their habits of domestic education had been bad."

While of course the pursuits are not identical, the fact that the sons of the ministry have taken so great a part in the development of the world gives us some cause for believing that the contribution of the sons of our own ministry will be by no means negligible when we shall come to estimate the factors contributing to the upbuilding of Zion.

F. HENRY EDWARDS.

Sister A. E. Campbell, of Cobalt (no State given), writes that she is being blessed daily in her warfare for the truth. She has much opposition to meet, but this, she says, only makes her stronger in the work. She bears her testimony to the truthfulness of the cause in which she is engaged, and is greatly grieved to see so many Saints who are not living up to their privileges. She asks the prayers of the Saints.

Some Thoughts on Congregational Singing

Music promotes fellowship. A whole-hearted response in singing inspires the leaders.

Have we ever thought how much congregational singing affects us? A few observations may help us to sing more heartily next time we have the opportunity.

Suppose the minister, choir, chorister, and organist did their share of the service no more vigorously than some do their part in the congregational singing. We should have a kind of Quakers' meeting. I am not criticizing. All I ask is a finer and more whole-hearted response from the congregation—yes, from every one of you. I want to feel and know that each and every one is doing his part.

Some may say, "I am not missed; I like to listen to the others." Quite recently at a certain church about seven people around me were listening, and the nearest one singing was an old brother. Can you picture only one eighth of this big congregation singing? Then just listen to all singing—yes, including you. Notice how wonderful and inspiring it then sounds.

Those all around you cannot help singing. It's catching. Have you ever thought if you, the congregation, take your share of the singing, how much it inspires the preacher, choir, chorister, and organist, to give of their best? After all, the singing of the songs and hymns is our part; in other words it is the opportunity given us of making our contribution to the service.

Let us try to give of our best, as we never know the good we may accomplish even if our efforts are feeble. After all, it is the effort that deserves praise. Have you ever considered that often the music tastes of a city, town, or village are judged by its ecclesiastical music? A visitor passing through your town, perhaps, takes the opportunity of attending a church, and gets quite a decided impression of the music of the surrounding community.

Try to realize how cold the ordinances of religion would be without the presence of music. It is given to us to increase the happiness and joy of the world. We never need fear that we bestow too much thought and time on music or that we be overzealous in furthering its interests in the community. Let us study it broadly and seriously, and so train our perceptions to catch the whole of its meaning and not a fragment. Music when rightly understood promotes fellowship, not exclusiveness.

So in the avenue afforded us to take our share in praising our Creator, let our singing be an unselfish effort to open the avenue for the restored gospel in its glad mission among men.

German Branch Now in Poland

It will be remembered that the branch at Mangschütz was before the war in Germany but is now in Poland. In a recent letter from Brother Carl F. Greene he said:

"I was in Poland at the border of Wioske. The police permitted me to go fifty steps over the border and then preach to our members in the forest under the protection of the police who stood with their rifles on their shoulders. All the member of the Mangschütz Branch were present. I had only fifteen minutes for the members, then I was compelled to recross the border into Germany. It is difficult to get into Poland. I confirmed four persons. The members all feel good."

Memories of the Past

A sister writes interestingly of her experience in Bentley, Michigan, when she became a member of the church.

While reading of the experiences of one who wrote telling of his joys and sorrows, hopes and discouragements, and of his work in the gospel, it reminded us of our experiences and renewed the missionary spirit within us, a spirit that is within us all more or less, waiting every chance that might come our way to assist in this beautiful work.

It seems that we had to go a roundabout way from Pennsylvania to Southwestern Kansas, then to Bentley, Michigan, before we were prepared to hear the gospel. We were living in the Glover, Michigan, Branch, and though we assisted in the music and in other ways, yet we did not accept the gospel, thinking it too good to be true. We were also a little fearful the Saints might be "Mormons." At that time there were few Saints living there, many having moved to the cities; but we noticed how the faithful few, sometimes only four, and generally about six, would attend, though at one time Glover was a large branch. Still these few continued to keep the campfires burning, looking forward to the promises given them through prophecy. Well we remember Brother "Johnnie" Umphrey and his testimony, always the same. We would not have him change it to any other form. "Well, brothers and sisters, I'm glad I'm here. I love to be in the company of the Saints. This gospel is true and I know it. I have seen all the gifts of the gospel, except the raising of the dead, but I know that can be done too." How we loved to hear him! And we always waited until he gave the first testimony or the meeting didn't seem the same. Then Sister John Umphrey usually came next, and in her peaceful, quiet way she would tell what the Lord had done for her. Also there were Brother and Sister Silas Smith, Brother and Sister Judd Smith, and Sister Maynard, Brother Maynard coming into the church some years later. Dear Sister Maynard; we will never forget the "alien supper" she gave to the three husbands whose wives belonged to the church. Later on, two of the three joined, including her husband, and she would laughingly remark, "There, he has aggravated me all these thirty years until I have said and done things I should not. Now he, after joining the church, is as pure as a child while I must answer for myself." But we knew she was a good faithful Saint and inspired us younger Saints more than she could ever know.

It was only through the faithfulness of those few who were left that we knew of this wonderful gospel, and through the teachings of Elder S. T. Pendleton that Brother Walter and Sister May Wilcox and myself were baptized. And let me say, we then understood the meaning of the words, "with a broken heart and contrite spirit," and the joy and comfort the Lord gives his people as a reward for obeying his commandments. Later on when he gave me the evidence he promised us all, that this work is truly his, it seemed that the week days would never end until Sunday morning prayer meeting, that I too might say I knew.

A few months later the "district tent" was brought to Moors Junction, a place about four miles north of Glover, where the gospel had been taught and rejected for thirty years. Elders Ernest Burt, G. W. Burt, James Davis, Matthew Umphrey, and S. T. Pendleton came at various times. Later Elder Pendleton stayed with the tent and preached throughout the summer and fall assisted by Elder Umphrey and others, later holding meetings at Adams, Glover, Bentley, and Sterling. At first few attended and we were somewhat discouraged, but encouragement was given us through dreams and visions. Finally there were two baptized, which proved to be the beginning of a wonderful manifestation of what can be accomplished when the Saints all work together in unity, fasting, and praying. Almost every Sunday we had baptism, also through the week, and sometimes it would be two, though more often it was four, six, or eight. It was wonderful, the interest and enthusiasm and antagonism that was stirred up. Hundreds of people would come for miles around to our place of baptism, expecting to see us there. Seldom were they disappointed. As the large crowds would gather upon the hillside close to the stream, Brother Pendleton would make use of the opportunity and tell the gospel story, and many would hear that otherwise would not come to the tent. There were times when some were baptized before leaving that had no intention of doing so when coming; but those were people who had been taught before but would not accept.

The writer was made happy that summer by her husband and three children accepting the gospel. Our experiences during that time will never be forgotten. The outpouring of God's spirit, the gifts, and signs following the believer, etc. When I look back now I wonder if we really appreciated and comprehended those wonderful blessings. We took great enjoyment going and coming from the meetings. We generally crowded into a wagon that had been kindly furnished by some one whose horses had not worked too hard that day, though many times we walked three or four miles. What cared we as long as there were a number of us together? We seemed more like a group of happy children then because we were always ready to talk the gospel and reason out our own theories; and our happy voices as we sang, "We have found the glorious gospel," rang out with a spirit that none but the children of God could express.

Our missionary work of to-day is different with our auto-

Seven Reasons Why I Am Going to the Young People's Convention

Reason Number Two: Because We Need Teamwork.

I am going to the Young People's Convention to be held at Graceland College, June 3 to 16, because I feel that I need the assurance which comes from the personal acquaintance of hundreds of the young people of the church. Sometimes I feel very much discouraged; sometimes I seem to have to stand alone; sometimes there does not seem to be very many young people interested in our church. I often wish that I knew some of the good young people of the church personally. I realize that the building of Zion will demand teamwork and I believe that this opportunity of getting acquainted with the other young people of the church will prepare me for this teamwork. I am sure that when I come back home from the convention, I can go to work in our local branch enthusiastic, knowing that hundreds of other young people are doing the same in their branches. I want to meet you next June. The success of my work in the church depends a great deal upon this opportunity. Do not disappoint me. Begin planning now to spend two weeks at Graceland. Remember the date—June 3 to 16.

mobiles and conveniences though as far reaching, and perhaps more so; yet we don't have the simple enjoyment that we did in "those days," or as Brother "Matt" Umphrey once said in preaching a particularly impressive sermon and speaking a little too fast his words became mixed, "Away back there in the near future." We always loved to have a joke on Brother Matthew because he loved to have jokes on us. But we remember well the many sacrifices he and his wife have made for the gospel's sake.

There were times when life was not all sunshine. We do not forget the night when Brother Pendleton was holding meetings in Bentley when the bang! bang! of spoiled eggs struck the door, or of other persecutions there and elsewhere, but it took the bitter to help us appreciate the sweet in this work.

In just a few months Glover Branch arose from an attendance of four to six to almost one hundred, and the faithful few who had kept the campfire burning realized the promises given them some years before had truly been fulfilled. And many times since leaving that locality when times are discouraging and there are few to attend, I recall how their faithfulness was rewarded; and in some places we have lived since then where it seemed that the soil was nothing but rocks and that God had overlooked us and our labors were of no avail, we always found it to be just before the turning point, and then of all times was our faithfulness needed the most. And as we saw the silver shining through our clouds and finally the beautiful sunshine flooding in upon us, sometimes our joy seemed greater than we could bear. Our trials and endeavors of the past appeared so small compared with the results.

San Francisco, California

We were very much pleased last Wednesday evening to have with us in San Francisco, California, Apostle T. W. Williams. He delivered a very fine discourse which was much enjoyed by all present. One nonmember stated that it was the best sermon she ever heard. I know he was led by the Spirit to say things which helped many present. Much good has been done for the cause. He left us again but promised to return soon and give us a series of meetings.

On Monday, February 5, Bishop A. V. Karlstrom and wife arrived from Tahiti, on the way to Independence. He is not well and is on his way to the Sanitarium. He left here Thursday, February 8.

All is going well with us. Our meetings are interesting and profitable, with fairly good attendance. Sunday school and Religio are holding their own and doing well.

Two weeks ago our branch president, John A. Saxe, received an invitation by letter from the Mormon Sunday school, inviting our Sunday school to visit them the following Sunday. On motion it was decided to do so. Eight of our members complied. They were treated kindly and invited to seats on the stand where they viewed the exercises in the different classes. They promise to visit our school in the near future.

Among the recent visitors at our services were W. E. Badham and wife from Los Angeles and S. G. Klinghorn from Seattle. Our preachers of late were John A. Saxe, H. B. Simpson, E. E. Hartsough, Emery Parks, district president, J. D. White, and the writer. Our choir is still an attractive feature of our services and some of the anthems are really fine. They are an inspiration for the speakers and thus help the cause we all owe.

Good Interest in Holland

From personal letter to his family in Independence, by Elder Frank Veenstra, dated January 18, the following is translated from the Dutch for our readers.

We are glad in the work for which we were sent here. We are having joyous times in Holland. God is with us and we are trusting in him. We are trying to do everything he wanted us to do in taking this mission. We know we are not forgotten in the prayers of the Saints and we do not forget them.

This is my birthplace (Swaagwestynde) and I have been received kindly by friends who are interested in the Word of God. They all treated us well and talked over the gospel message. Our first meeting in Holland was a sacrament service. Many are coming to us, having hunted us up, and are inviting us to come and talk with them. We, from one evening to another, till twelve and one o'clock, are talking about the gospel.

In Schiedam a choir leader invited us to come, and we had a talk with him. He said, "My home is open to you brethren. You may come and have meetings in my house."

We were invited to a place where the man did not believe in God. We visited there on Sunday. He seems to think a lot of us and tells us to come back. I have great hopes for this man coming into the fold of God.

I have great hope for many here. We are invited this evening by a baker who has invited in a number of his friends to come and have a talk with us. Many are listening to us, interested in the work.

Llanelly, South Wales

Llanelly is a small branch of Saints in Wales, but we are sure it is one of the most interesting branches in the British Isles. Our people here are developing along every line, and are doing some good work in fields that are entirely new to them. But there is such a willingness on the part of each one to do everything he is asked to do, that it makes our work here a pleasure.

On Friday evenings we have a study class, and following the study period, we have a program, sometimes of games, sometimes of music, sometimes consisting of papers, and in fact, our programs carry us into many different lines. While not organized, we are really carrying out, in a miniature form, a Department of Recreation and Expression.

Recently the program consisted of two papers, one written by a sister (one of the only two who were attending church when we arrived in Llanelly) who has always loved the work. The other was by a young sister who just recently came into the church. They were so interesting that we felt some of the Saints whose names are mentioned therein, and who are now in America, would be interested to read them, so we are sending them to the HERALD for publication.

The first is by Sister Margaret Thomas, and the subject assigned to her was, "Llanelly Branch of olden times." She wrote as follows:

"I think it is a big task Sister Baldwin has put before me for this week, to write about this branch of so long ago. I have been familiar with this branch since childhood, because my mother and father both joined the church when they were eighteen years of age. Mother's family were greatly opposed to the church.

"This little chapel had a stage right across the front, from one side to the other, and there were four steps to go up on each side, three book holders in front, and a seat right along in front of the pulpit, where several earnest, aged brethren always sat. I remember well old Brother Thomas Griffiths, who was blind. He was always present at the meetings. He was president of the branch.

"Special praise must be given to Brother Gomer T. Griffiths and Adolphus Edwards. They worked hard to make our little chapel quite presentable. They put the matchboard all around, also altered the seats from the high, old-fashioned ones, made the cupboard in the corner, and the pulpit as it is to-day. Brother Gomer Griffiths made an appeal in the HERALD for help to pay the debt, and some of the old-time Saints, who had worshiped here, and gone to America, sent liberal checks.

"There was a fine branch of young Saints here when Brother Alma Bishop was president, in the eighties, when his firm removed him to Swansea.

"I remember conferences here that strengthened us, and helped us on to bear all things for the Master. One time I remember Brother Bishop writing to Brother Gibbs, of Morristown, inviting the members of that branch to the conference. The invitation was in rhyme:

"Remember us to the Saints of Llansamlet,
To the poet in the hamlet,
To the singer on the hills,
To the doctor and his pills,
To the Davises and Morgans,
To the old and to the young ones,
Come to conference every one,
And the Bishop will say, "Well done."

"Of course the poet, and the singer, and the doctor were real personages. The old doctor was an herbalist, and would often say, 'If you feel ill, do not always trouble the Lord; come to me, and I will give you a pill.' So they came to the church in crowds. We had fine entertainments with Brother Ben Davis as leader, who was a fine musician.

"We have had very nice tea parties here. Also fine receptions for our missionaries when they came. Also some fine send-offs to the brothers and sisters when they were leaving here for America, which was very often in the nineties, when several large families left here, when their trade was very slack here and going well out there.

"Brother Ernest Dewsnup did good work here, too. One time he gave a fine lecture on astrology, which was very much appreciated, and for which a goodly number of tickets were sold.

"When President Joseph Smith paid us a visit, accompanied by R. C. Evans, they came on Friday with J. W. Rush-ton. Henry Ellis was president of the branch then. They preached Friday and Saturday evenings, and all day Sunday, with good liberty and good congregations. On Sunday the chapel was quite full. It made quite a stir here. There were a great many expressed regret that they could not stay the week. We all felt sorry; the visit was so pleasant, and the time too short to visit with such a 'Grand Old Man.'

"Great praise must be given to the brethren at Carway and Pontyates, for they have been good in helping this branch, when there were no officers here, only sisters. Some of them came every Sunday they could, especially Brother Gwilym and David Thomas, and they had to walk both ways, a distance of fourteen miles. Many times it rained, and by the time they reached home they were soaking wet, and their boots filled with water.

"When our branch was in a low condition, Brother Ellis and family came here to live, from Sydney, also Brother William, and Brother Powell and family. So we were doing nicely for a few years, when they all moved away again, Brother Henry Ellis going to Llansamlet. Also Sister E. A. Lloyed, a very faithful sister, left here to go to her brother in Portland, Oregon. So the branch kept decreasing, losing all the members.

"So we were left, only just enough to hold the reins in hand, until Brother and Sister Baldwin came here a year ago. You are acquainted with what has happened since they came, for after a few weeks' preaching thirteen were baptized, and the branch was reorganized by Apostle T. W. Williams last February.

"Trusting we all will be faithful unto the end, to meet all those we have known, where there will be no parting, I will now close."

The second paper was written by a young sister, Laura Mason, and it is her first paper. The subject given to her was, "Llanelly Branch during the year 1922."

"My first recollection of coming in contact with this church was when Brother Price came home one night, and said to my mother and father that he wanted them to go with him to some meeting. They wanted to know where, but there was no reply. Anyhow, the following night, they were all hurrying off, and I was asked to accompany them, but I hesitated and refused and said, 'What do I want there?' But they coaxed, and to save trouble I went. Not for the meeting, but just to save trouble, did I go. But after the meeting was over I was not sorry I went there. The first hymn I heard sung was 'In the light.' When I sing that hymn I always think of that night.

"When we came home that night they were all speaking about the different things they had heard, and what a good speaker Brother Baldwin was. And I was saying what a nice woman Sister Baldwin was, and how nicely she could play, and what a good voice she had.

"I was working away from home, and that night I went back to my situation. About the middle of the week a friend of mine came up to where I was staying, and told me that my family had all joined the church, or were going to do so. How pleased I was to think we had gone somewhere besides our own home, where our meetings were being held at that time. I had not a bit of interest in our meetings before we came into the church, because they were held in our own home.

"The first or second Sunday I came here, Sister Baldwin called on me to teach a class of children. I was amazed to think I was going to teach, for I wanted to learn, myself. I had never done such a thing before. In fact I have never done anything with regards to singing, playing the organ, teaching, and giving out tracts. In fact I was too proud to do it. I never thought to speak to anybody about religion, but now I am willing to humble myself to anyone, because I have come to realize more about the Bible and the gospel, and my whole desire is to do all I can, in every way, and to do the best to my ability, and serve Jesus faithfully to the end, and to uphold the church in every way to the people so that they may see the darkness they are in.

"I must say again, since I came into this church I have seen love and fellowship with the Saints, and I love to be in their company, if it's only with the few we have had here, such as Brother Fry, T. W. Williams, Brother Bishop, Brother and Sister Sorden and baby. We love them all because whenever we meet them they are always the same.

"I thank God for leading us to such a church, for I know nobody but God has led us here. I have never seen a church like it with regard to order, and each one has his duty to do, and his own work to look after.

"And another thing I should like to mention is Sister Blanche Edward's visit here. How I enjoyed her company, and love to think of how she has developed in the church, and how the Lord is using her for his glory, and I pray that she may have the strength to go on, and do all she can for his name.

"I think I have told you all the news, so now I will close. I remain your sister in Christ."

As we stated before, neither of these sisters knew they were writing for publication, but we felt sure that some of the old friends of the Llanely Branch would enjoy reading these papers, as we did in listening to them, and so we have sent them. Your sister,
ALICE HELENA BALDWIN.

From the English Mission

Elder Daniel B. Sorden writes in part to President Smith of his work there.

Elder Abel Hall and I are still laboring together. He is English and I am American, so there are some natural and national differences in tastes and habits, but we have made it fine together so far. Yesterday three adults with no former connections with the church were baptized in Leeds. Two of them are men who I am sure will make useful workers. The confirmation and prayer meeting in the evening was really fine. These three were only partially the result of the work of Brother Hall and myself.

In Bradford we have ten to twenty outsiders each Sunday night, but we have the schoolhouse only on Sunday nights, so it is slow work. But we are having the best interest of any place since we started in August.

England is just beginning to show evidences of industrial recuperation. I certainly hope the move of the French will not be the starting of another war, for it seems that their move is possible of terrible results.

I am hopefully waiting for the summer so that we can do a little open air work here. Personally, I do not believe much in it, but if we cannot get them to come in, it seems we must go out to them.

Hawaii

Elder E. B. Hull reporting on his work in Hawaii for the month of January has this to say:

"All departments are doing fairly well. A Sunday school has been organized near one of our military camps. The place is about sixty miles from Honolulu. Private Carl Hoffman is the teacher. He has thirty-five members already. Special effort is being made with the Chinese and Japanese. We are giving help where we can. It is easy to gather a lot of children together but to get their parents is a big problem. The other churches and societies here give the orientals temporal aid when needed just to get them to come to their churches. In fact they build churches for them. This makes it very hard for us, as we cannot compete in this line. After all the efforts of Brother Waller in his forty years labor here he has not been able to collect a half dozen good members. To get people that will attend church regularly is almost impossible. Oriental work is a hard proposition.

"We are making a special drive among the Hawaiians, with a native preacher and with singing and speaking done in the Hawaiian language. These meetings are held in a private house. Our meetings in the church are fairly well attended."

Alberta

I have just concluded a two weeks' series of pastoral meetings at Ribstone. This branch is the pioneer and largest in Alberta, and for fifteen years has been faithfully led by Elder J. R. Beckley. The hospitality and generosity of the Saints here is known far and wide. Memories of the past come to me as I write, for it was here about fourteen years ago that I undertook homesteading experiences. These were days of struggle and hardship, but how encouraging spiritually! So that now as I return to visit dear gospel brothers and sisters and break the bread of life, I feel the spirit of old associations coupled with present gospel affirmation. Whilst preaching on such subjects as, "Signs of times," "Second coming," "Gathering," "Present revelation," etc., Saints said that they had received great enlightenment and desired to vindicate their loyalty to the church and its leader. A friend in need is a friend indeed, and the church needs friends now. "Ye are my friends if you do whatsoever I command you." Lincoln said, "Don't swap horses when crossing a stream." Some Saints whilst in life's stream of stress and trial would fain leave the steady and sure horse of faith and prayer for uncertain and doubtful steeds.

Alberta is a field of missionary opportunity but partially developed. The general spirit of worldliness plus pessimism of local ministry has retarded this development. Saints are found here from the United States border to the McMurray River and their homes are open for the missionary but, alas, he delayeth his coming. Local ministry must do their share in lifting the warning voice and perhaps soon all the Saints will rally to pay their tithes and offerings and then headquarters as "stewards" of the harvest may send more laborers.

With several active missionaries doing vigorous labor during summer and autumn months, the work would spread rapidly. Winter is the time for close pastoral work, so I as district president labor accordingly. I receive encouraging news from Elder William H. Roy of Innisfree who is Bishop's agent.

Elder Will McLeod of Alliance by active preaching and Sunday school work has rallied about eighteen Saints in his locality. Harry Steede (priest) at Ricinus in the foothills west of Red Deer, despite hardship and privation, has lifted the voice of warning and is baptizing and doing Sunday school work. That is what we need! Faint-hearted and slothful Saint, throw your personal grievance over your shoulder; turn your back to doubt and fear and go on, ever on, to the glorious work intrusted to all. Come on, let's go! I have received the witness that in the due time of the Lord, the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints will redeem Zion. I desire to do my share to this noble end under church leadership. The Saints endeared by association in former pastorates and to all latter-day Israel, I would say, Love and obey.

"Dear saints, at home or far away,
By deed and voice, proclaim your vow:
While you faithfully watch and pray
You'll do your bit right here and now."

WILLIAM OSLER.

How to Progress

A letter with an answer concerning the position of the church and the reasons therefor.

The "crankologist" penning this bit of "crankology" has no bones in particular to pick with the owner of the initials S. A. B., nor with those who sometimes sign themselves E. D. M., E. A. S., F. M. S., or any others. But—he does not like a certain policy or lack of policy of the church which is so prominently reflected in the policy of our official publication of which S. A. B. delineated in the article mentioned.

The writer has been in the church for a number of years and in the course of his study there has arisen a volume of perplexing, and he cannot say, unimportant questions, questions upon which he has often felt some definite stand should have been taken by the church.

Now as the writer looks upon the church, and he believes rightly too, it appears to him that it should be as positive on points of importance as truth itself is positive, and these points should be as definitely declared as were the decalogue under the Mosaic economy.

It seems to him that the church should come out in the open and ascertain, confirm or deny, some of the positions that we presented to the minds of people who are ever seeking and craving truth, something definite.

When this theory or that theory is presented relative to things which often involve such important questions as law and procedure and other questions quite as important, the parties to whom they are presented are often left in a state of semimental aberration at least, because a continual conflict of opinion is thrust upon them and the soul-satisfying, mental-resting definiteness is beyond their reach.

We are all, or at least should all be, more or less imbued with the missionary spirit. And sometimes we go out under this laudable spirit and present our—what shall we call it, theory?—and often we are met with the questions which often involve in our own mind, What position does your church take on this important so and so?

Our answer in no few instances is an apologetic one. With color mounting our cheeks, the first reflex of uncertainty, and a fluttering heart, we humbly admit that the church has taken no definite stand on that question, important as it is. But some of our priesthood, according to their writings which appear in our church publications, and the lectures and sermons they deliver believe so and so, while still others believe some other way, and I, well, to tell the truth, I guess I am somewhat on the fence yet.

It was no pleasant experience to the writer when upon a certain occasion he was placed in a position quite like the above and the investigating person, with a shrug of the shoulders, indicating doubt, said, "To be true, you do set down a few definite points, as does the church of my present choice, yet in the main, I am forced to judge your church is quite like other societies who are forever debating but never coming to a definite position of acceptance on some points vitally important."

It may be possible that such a state of indefiniteness has had its bit to do with that hideous society-destroying spirit of doubt, with the kindred spirits of lethargy and indifference becoming so prevalent.

The writer, for one at least, would like to see the church deduct the truth revealed, or possible of revelation by search or revelation, and isolate it from the mass of debatable theory and define that truth and establish it as an immovable block in the foundation of knowledge.

Let us cease to be a debating society. Let us strive to acquire "All truth" as rapidly as possible, seeking for it everywhere, and when found establish it, and cease to debate it and become united in doctrine, in faith, in practice, and possibly we will come nearer to proving to the world that we are really a church builded upon truth and not theory.

Editorial Note

In the first place, probably all of us recognize that there are certain questions which, it seems to us, would be better to have determined by the church. There are some questions in which it would seem that a determination is the most important factor at present.

Again there has often been the request made or a desire expressed for a set creed to be memorized and learned. The position of the church is not one of failing to have a position, merely because we do not set forth and enforce a definite creed.

We want to acquire all truth as rapidly as possible, seeking for it everywhere and when found to establish it. We want to become united in doctrine and faith and practice, to see things truly in the light of the Spirit and direction of our heavenly Father. We want to see eye to eye, but to agree on the basis of truth. But progress is not made but rather prevented if we attempt too strict a determination of what we shall believe. Every formulary or statement of belief leads not so much to a knowledge of the truth, as it does to a limitation of thought. A mere learning or memorizing of certain statements, however true, does not give us a knowledge of the truth. Truth can only be secured, a knowledge of things as they are can only be found after that mental labor which is first essential.

The church, having taken for its creed "All truth," allows a very wide margin for its membership. There are essential truths, the belief in the mission of Jesus Christ, the belief in our heavenly Father and in the word of God, the desire and effort to live a righteous life. But though the church holds the Book of Mormon to be the word of God and even though the church accepts the Book of Doctrine and Covenants to also be the word of God to the people of this age, the church has also stated that the acceptance of any particular revelation in the Doctrine and Covenants or acceptance of the Book of Mormon is not a prerequisite to membership.

On the other hand the church quite rightly has agreed that those who go out to represent the church, to speak as her ministers, should teach the doctrine of the church and not their own peculiar ideas or hobbies, and that those who go out to represent the church shall not teach against the books of the church. It would seem that that would hardly need statement to be recognized as a correct attitude.

We hold strongly for the fundamentals and eternal truth that is with our heavenly Father, and for the Holy Spirit to guide us into all truth. It is for that very reason that we view with a broad charity those who are not yet fully converted and that we view with broad charity the different views of our brethren, while seeking always for a better understanding for ourselves and for them.

The ideals set forth by our brother above might lead to a verbal repetition of words that fairly approximate a statement of the truth, but it would not lead to a knowledge of the truth, as that is only given through thought and discussion, even if that discussion takes the form of personal contemplation.

It is surprising how much there is we take for granted without really knowing. How many of the readers of this letter really know that the brain is used in thinking? How many know that even to-day there are many learned men who place heavy stress on the share that other organs of the body have to do with our thinking? Merely to say that we think with our brain is not to know the truth, and it may seriously be questioned if it is a statement of the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

It is for that reason that we desire, not acrimonious discussion, but a free consideration of our problems, a frank presentation of different ideas, in order that through due consideration we may individually as well as collectively come to a knowledge of the truth.

Historically we may note that our late President Joseph Smith, though the head of the church, repeatedly emphasized that the editors were not responsible for views appearing signed by others, but that every man was responsible for his own views. He also emphasized that he would not attempt to bind his brethren by his answer to questions in the HERALD, but was presenting his own views for what they were worth.

The children of Israel needed arbitrary statements, because they had rejected the freedom of the gospel which permits us to go in and out and find pasture, and assures us that if we continue in his word we shall know the truth.

We are not left at sea or at a loss how to answer, but shall know the truth and this truth makes us free. We shall also have the Spirit of God, even the Comforter, to guide us into all truth. We know from personal experience that soul-satisfying peace may be found in this way as well as mental satisfaction.

President Smith's Sympathy With Local Officers

In a personal letter to President F. M. Smith a district officer wrote as follows:

"I want to relate a little 'manifestation' I had the other day. I was discouraged and felt like quitting. I seemed not to be accomplishing much; so one night I dreamed that I was about to quit, and went over and sat down on a bench, and you came over and sat down by me and put your arm around me, and I began to receive strength right away, and I thought, Oh, what a power you had! If I had that all the time I never would feel like quitting. Since then I have felt better, and feel like working on again."

[The district and local officers, struggling against difficulties and opposition, have my heartfelt sympathy, and in spirit would I fain put my arm around them to support. And I rejoice that through manifestations of the Spirit there come encouragements such as came to the brother who wrote the foregoing. There is much to discourage, but more to hearten, so we all struggle on with our burdens. May God lighten them by his presence and give strength to carry on the work.—F. M. S.]

Seeking the Scattered Souls

In a letter to the First Presidency, George E. Harrington writes from Travers, Missouri, that he has visited several points in southern Missouri and northern Arkansas. He appears to be making a special effort to visit the scattered Saints, passing on from one point to another trying to look up as many as possible in each vicinity. In one case he had to cross five small streams as well as a river, but in the latter instance was fortunate enough to secure the services of a boat.

At Avoca he preached to a large audience who listened with interest to the subject, "What must I do to be saved?"

He reported leaving the members feeling better. He has urged upon these Saints the advisability of securing radio equipment so as to be able to hear the Sunday evening programs from Independence. He is also urging upon them strongly the need of purchasing all church books and church papers, as he finds that very few have these necessities. Scattered members have an excellent opportunity in this way to keep in touch with the church.

He has visited several times out from Seligman going out in different directions to places in the country. Many of these points, though nine or more miles away, he has reached on foot. One sister he found up in the hills or mountains with houses miles apart, but found them contented with their lot, though he feels that these isolated ones need to be sought out and helped.

In branches the members have the official attention of the officers but these scattered ones are left alone, most of them, without the books of the church or papers. It is not surprising that they lose interest and their children grow up without spiritual guidance and are led astray.

There are a few members of the church at Travers with Brother W. S. Hankins as president of the branch.

Elder Harrington is continuing his efforts to search out the scattered ones, sometimes visiting two or more different localities in a single day.

Veteran Convalescent

To the editors of the SAINTS' HERALD, Independence, Missouri, and the many friends who wrote me those cheering and comforting letters during my recent illness is this letter addressed from my home at Plano, Illinois. I cannot write to all of you. It has been many moons since I wrote a line to either of our church papers and perhaps would not do so now were it not for stress of circumstances.

I am now convalescing from quite a serious illness; for four weeks I was flat on my back in bed and some of that time down where the shadows grow dim; but, thanks to our merciful Father, I am now up again and on the way to recovery. During the period of my illness I received from many of my brothers and sisters in the church many letters which I either read or listened to while others read which brought a great deal of comfort to me, and I am taking this way to acknowledge them as I cannot write to you all.

From far-away Los Angeles, Brother W. A. McDowell sent me a message of brotherly love that will not soon be forgotten. Bishop J. F. Keir from Independence, Missouri, was another who remembered a brother in affliction. From the Northeastern Illinois District and Southern Wisconsin District, from Janesville and Evansville came those messages of sympathy and the assurance that we were remembered at the throne of mercy. God bless you all.

From my brothers and sisters here in Plano I have received every needed attention.

I feel that this little tribute would be incomplete did I not bestow a mead of it to one who so richly deserves it, my wife, my companion in life for over fifty years. During these trying days she had been better off in bed than out of it, but she would not go, though two doctors told her to do so; but by sheer grit she went through it all and was each day a faithful nurse, cook, housekeeper, janitor, and financial manager.

What would I have done without her? We believe and hope that for the present at least the worst is past. May God bless you all.

We have had a record-breaking February in Plano and plenty of zero and below during the month: it has been a hard one on old people. At one time last week four dead were lying in four homes in this little city. Three adults.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

CHARLES H. BURR.

Let Us Find Our Place

When there comes that desire to "do something," to "be something tremendously worth while, not for self-glory but that feeling of discontent with present achievement and outlook on the future; when you feel within you that urge to do something tremendously worth while, not for self-glory but to help on some worthy cause; when this longing fills the heart of youth, happy is he who recognizes in it the hand of the Divine Father and seeks advice and instruction on bended knees.

How few of us when we are young know how we would like to spend our lives or know what talents we possess. We do the thing nearest our hand and then dream of some future time when we will have found our work.

Happy is he who knows early in life what he is best fitted to do. Only pity should be for him who goes through life feeling he has never discovered his talents or has never found the work he is best fitted to do.

Don't you believe that God has given each of us a talent, some more than one, which we are expected to develop and to enlarge and use in some service to humanity? Don't you believe that there is a place for each of us to fill, a place we can each fill a little better than anyone else if we but find it and occupy to the fullest extent?

Young people are inclined to believe this, and the belief often brings with it this divine feeling of discontent.

Let us not waste any more time, but at once ask ourselves the question, Have we found our place? Is the thing we are now doing preparing us for our life work? Are we sure that we know the talents we possess, and are we working to develop them to the fullest extent? There is only one way to know—make it a subject of prayer. First, do all that God has commanded you to do. It may be very little, perhaps there is no tithing required of you as yet, but you must see that your thoughts are pure and your heart is right before God and man. Then with a firm belief that God will open unto those who knock, that he who seeks will find—talk with your heavenly Father as though he were present with you, tell him all that is in your heart—the restless longing and desire for knowledge, the desire for inspiration to know your life work; the desire for the realization of the hidden powers within you and with the telling the vague longing will take form and new paths will open up which before you had feared to tread. It cannot be otherwise. If God is really our Father and if our desire is to fulfill the purpose for which he has created us, then he cannot do otherwise than help us. We have his promise. So let us find a faith that is sufficient to lead us not once but many times to seek knowledge in prayer.

There may come this thought to some, "I am not ready to devote my life to the church. I prefer to wait a while. If God should show me that my life was to be that of a missionary, then I should have to give up much that I am enjoying now." In every line of human endeavor there is work to be done, and until each member of this church is inspired to find his work we cannot progress. Too long have we felt that the missionary was the only one needing inspiration. Why shouldn't we be an inspired people? We have been given a knowledge of the Truth, and are called upon to perform a work that is so vast it seems almost hopeless, and would be hopeless without the faith that we will have divine help.

So let us find our place in this great work, and eagerly strive to serve with heart and soul. Let us use our talents to bring honor to this cause and to us will come happiness and contentment.

Central Illinois District

The following report of the Central Illinois District conference appeared in the Taylorville Gleam and is republished by request. It appeared under the heading, "Latter Day Saints hold interesting conference":

The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints of the Central Illinois District, convened at the Latter Day Saint church Saturday and Sunday. The Sunday school and young people's department held an interesting business session at 9.30 a. m. Saturday. Mrs. M. R. Shoemaker of Beardstown, and Elmer Johnson of this city had charge.

The afternoon was devoted to general church business. Elder Fred Pritchett of Springfield, the district superintendent, and Elder L. O. Wildermuth of Plano, missionary supervisor, presided.

At 8 p. m. the local choir rendered an interesting and educational program to a large and appreciative audience.

At 8 a. m. Sunday the church officers of the district held an informal get-together meeting, and at 9.30 the regular Sunday school session was held, about 200 being in attendance.

At 10.45 the sacrament of baptism was performed in the church font.

At 11 a. m. Elder Bruce E. Brown of Detroit, Michigan, was the speaker. He used as a theme "Growth," taking his text from Matthew 6: 28, "Consider the lilies of the field how they grow." The speaker endeavored to show that all growth is governed by well-defined laws. As the lily in its growth responds to nature's laws (which are God's laws) from the environment which surrounds it those things which are conducive to growth, such as air, sunshine, and moisture, the life of the lily is sustained. Also in spiritual growth; man responds to his environment, the speaker laying great stress on the need of proper conditions and proper training of children and the providing of good literature and recreation by the community.

At 2 p. m. an ordination and confirmation meeting was held. J. A. Williams, pastor of the local congregation was ordained to the office of elder. Albert Johnson, also of Taylorville was ordained to the same office. William Van Hauser also of this city was ordained to the office of priest. Walter Rudew of Pana was ordained a priest, and Fred Ettinger of this city was ordained a deacon. At 2.30 a sacramental service was held, followed by a fellowship meeting. At 7.30 Elder Henderson of Findlay preached an impressive sermon on the "Second coming of Christ."

There was a large delegation present from Decatur, Pana, Beardstown, Springfield, Findlay, and other places throughout the district which comprises about twenty counties. The ladies of the local congregation served meals in the church basement. The next district conference will be held the last Saturday and Sunday of August, the place to be designated by the committee.

A vote of thanks was tendered to the local members and citizens of Taylorville for their kindness and hospitality.

NEW EDITION

A Marvelous Work and a Wonder

Elder Daniel Macgregor, the author, states that prior to putting the Marvelous Work and a Wonder into print he addressed a letter to every book house in the English-speaking world, handling rare antique editions calling for a list of everything bearing on the prophecies, ancient and medieval history, scripture commentaries and the papacy.

Hundreds of volumes were secured from many lands at a great expense, many of them three hundred years old. These were gone over carefully with a view to presenting whatever light they had.

The Marvelous Work and a Wonder contains only a partial list of those rare works consulted.

Under the blessings of God light and understanding came to our brother and the result of years of research and study is now presented to the public at a price that will place the book in the hands of all.

The price placed upon the Marvelous Work and a Wonder gives certain guarantees that neither the author nor the publishers are aiming to make anything out of it.

It is now up to the Latter Day Saints to do their part in the matter of pushing the circulation of this masterful book; thus will its purpose be realized.

PRICES

35 cents each; 4 to one address for $1.25 in the paper cover; 60 cents each in cloth binding.

Progress in Oregon

I preached in Silverton, Oregon, recently and administered the sacrament to the Saints there. Also looked over some possible locations for our district reunion but there is no place obtainable in Silverton that would be suitable. The committee will meet in Portland next Sunday to consider another location. I found the Saints generally in good condition in Silverton. They are expecting to put on an aggressive campaign next summer. Many were interested while we were there last summer. I stopped in Portland to-day and am well pleased with the way Brother Nelson Wilson is getting a hold on the work. I think the prospects for work in the city the best that it has been since I came West. I am satisfied that Brother Wilson will prove to be the right man in the right place.

Hoping for the onward progress of the work,

M. H. Cook.

Eastern Oklahoma

As president of the Eastern Oklahoma District, it may be proper for me to send to your columns a few lines at this time since our conference, which was at Wilberton, February 2 to 4, has become history.

I deem it wise to inform the scattered Saints of some of the work done in order that all may have a chance to do their part. The conference was not largely attended on account of sickness which is general over this country at present, but those who attended were well paid for the effort made.

Brother Roy S. Budd of the Twelve was with us, and his preaching and counsel helped the Saints. It was splendid and well received. The church has a strong young man in him.

Our district is large in territory. Branches are far apart with many scattered Saints, making it very hard to get our forces organized as we would like, to get the best results. I get good reports from most of the branches. Some are having troubles, which is to be expected, but could be lessened if our branch officers would do their duty more fully.

We need help from the general church in the way of men to preach the gospel to the world in order to strengthen our membership, or rather to increase it.

There is a move on to buy a tent for the coming summer's work. Good men and women are back of the movement, so look for results. The tent is to be used by the missionary arm in order that the cities and towns can be properly handled. Will the scattered Saints please strongly aid in buying this tent? Send your money to Brother John S. White at Hartshorne, Oklahoma.

J. ARTHUR DAVIS.

Simcoe, Ontario, Organized

When we last wrote to the HERALD the Saints of Simcoe were not organized into a branch although we were contemplating the same. I may say now that on January 17, Brother Arthur Koehler came here and officiated in the capacity of organizer, and after five continuous nights of service and prayer, which were all well attended, he completed the organization. His sermons were very instructive and inspiring and his prayers beautiful. After a week of service, he left for a visit to Waterford where he held a series of meetings of which he gave a good report. Returning to Simcoe he held services and ordained Brother Charles Turner to the office of teacher. We are looking for his return here in the near future. We are pleased to say we are showing good signs of progress and are forming a library where we will be able to purchase all church literature. We are holding our meetings regularly despite the extremely cold weather.

Yours in gospel bonds,

CHARLES TURNER.

Independence

Signs of spring are here, including robins, and south winds as well as two days with temperatures of 77 this week. However the mercury drops quite as fast as it rises during Missouri March days, so we are not yet planting garden.

The "flu" which has been so widely prevalent the last few weeks is now subsiding. It has been serious in this community as well as throughout the country, and there have been quite a number of deaths traceable to it.

The appointments at Independence Sunday were as follows: Sacrament service in all of the churches at 11 a. m. The Stone Church, 7.30 p. m., preaching by Bishop Benjamin R. McGuire; Liberty Street Church, preaching by Elder T. C. Kelley; Englewood, preaching by Harry G. Barto.

At the regular six o'clock radio program Sunday evening the music was under the direction of George Anway and the sermon was by Elder A. B. Phillips.

Second Independence is conducting a two weeks' preaching series. Elders Frederick A. Smith and Ammon White preached on alternate nights last week and Elder L. E. Hills is preaching this week.

Sunday afternoon at the Stone Church, Doctor G. Leonard Harrington spoke at the problems meeting on the subject of "The growth, development, and physical care of the child." Doctor Harrington is very earnest in teaching the proper care of the body and his lecture was interesting and very helpful.

Mrs. Laura M. Vail, wife of W. L. Vail, died at her home in Independence Sunday and her funeral was held at the Stone Church Tuesday. The sermon was preached by Elder J. M. Terry and interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

Edward S. Weed, who had lived in Independence for ten years, died at his home west of this city Wednesday morning, and was buried from the Stone Church Saturday afternoon. Brother Weed, who was eighty-three years of age, was well known in Independence, and was a pioneer in Nebraska where he lived for many years. He was a veteran of the fast disappearing Army of the Republic, and was a brother-in-law of Bishop E. L. Kelley, Mrs. Weed and Mrs. Kelley being sisters. Elder Walter W. Smith preached the funeral sermon and Doctor Joseph Luff offered the prayer. Interment in Mound Grove.

The program at the Stone Church Religio last Friday was taken up by an imitation session of the city council. So much fun was had and so much business was left to transact that they will have another session next Friday at the same program hour. An evening was spent prior to this in an election of "mayor" and "council," with the usual excitement over "campaign" speeches, etc.

Isaac Sheen's Daughter Passes

Mrs. B. M. Anderson in a card to F. M. Smith, written February 27 from Omaha, says: "Mrs Fletcher Whitcomb, daughter of Isaac Sheen of Plano, Illinois, died at the home of her son, Doctor Glenn Whitcomb, this city. She was down town yesterday, but was taken ill with a heart attack in the evening and passed away at 12.10 this morning."

Isaac Sheen will be remembered as editor of the HERALD which it started in Cincinnati, and moved with it to Plano.—EDITORS.

Bishop Albert Karlstrom, until recently located at Papeete, Tahiti, reports there has been so much rain that the copra crop, on which the natives depend largely for a living, has been damaged to quite an extent. There is also much wind and high seas, which make it hard for our missionaries to travel from one island to another in their work. He is not feeling as well as usual, but hopes that soon he may be fully recovered. He says they had a rather pleasant time in Papeete on Christmas Day. The Saints rendered a program which they enjoyed greatly. They had a tree, electrically lighted, and decorated. He reports that Brother and Sister Ellis are away in the Tuamotus, perhaps at Arutua, where several of the near-by branches were planning to gather for the holidays.

In a letter from Wellston, Ohio, under date of January 21, Elder W. A. Moler expresses his views of education. He is not afraid of what it may do to one who is consecrated to the work; but he thinks sometimes people seeking knowledge lose sight of the goal toward which all education should be directed, and aggression and emulation become their watchwords. He cites the case of Joseph Smith, who was called to his work while unlearned, but who, shortly thereafter, under the dynamic of love and by the help of God became a well-versed man. In conclusion he says, "We hope those who do acquire education will not let it take the place of the Spirit, for we cannot assist in this work except we are humble and full of love."

Brother Mack Brown, Little Current, Ontario, writes that he believes Zion can be redeemed in two years if the Saints will but apply themselves to the problem. He deplors the distrust of their brethren that he sees manifested by some, and feels that God will bless us abundantly if we but seek to know his will. He has resolved to pay his tithing on all money earned and asks others to do the same. He believes we should unqualifiedly support our leaders, and says if we do we will have a great financial year.

MISCELLANEOUS

Bishop's Agent Appointed

To the Saints of the Gallands Grove District: Brother C. E. Anderson has resigned as Bishop's agent of your district and Brother E. L. Edwards, Pomeroy, Iowa, has agreed to accept the office. This change will be effective April 1, 1923.

The demands made upon Brother Anderson in his business affairs have made it difficult for him to give the attention he would like to the Bishop's agency, hence his resignation. He recommended Brother Edwards as his successor.

We appreciate the support of your district in the financial interests of the church, and we feel sure that your cooperation will continue to be expressed through the work of Brother Edwards.

Sincerely your colaborer,
BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE,

Presiding Bishop.

Of Interest to Those Going Abroad

It will doubtless be of interest to those contemplating a foreign trip to know that the Transportation Department of the church has secured steamship agencies for various lines operating across both the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans and will be glad to secure accommodations and furnish tickets. This service is rendered free of charge, and the commission for sale of the tickets goes to the church. We shall be very glad to hear from any contemplating a foreign trip and to secure their tickets for them.

We are also very glad to recommend routes for rail travel in the United States, and to purchase tickets for transportation on the rail lines either when forming a part of a foreign journey or for extensive trips in the United States. In fact, we will be glad to serve the members of the church free of charge in any matter pertaining to transportation either freight or passenger. Twenty years of experience in the traffic department of the railroads enables us to do this to advantage.

Foreign Mission Sunday

To Local Sunday School Superintendents: The second Sunday in April has been designated as foreign mission Sunday. We are asking the Sunday schools throughout the world to unite in a common lesson, which is now prepared and being distributed.

This lesson has been prepared by the Department of Sunday School and the Presiding Bishopric. The lesson is sent to the branch presidents, so if your Sunday school is not in a branch, the local superintendent should send his name at once to the Presiding Bishopric, so as to receive the material in time.

We want all departments and all classes of the Sunday school to study this same lesson on that day, adapting and using the material best suited to the age of the class. Even the tiniest tots should be interested in the pictures of the men abroad doing foreign mission work.

The Christmas offering is primarily for foreign missionary work. But do not wait till April 8, the second Sunday in April, to start your Christmas offering campaign for 1923. Start right now. Then let this lesson give a new impetus to your work by giving to your school the background of our work in foreign missions.

April 8 is therefore set apart as a special Sunday to be observed by all our Sunday schools throughout the world in studying the foreign missionary activities of the church.

A. MAX CARMICHAEL,
General Superintendent,
Department of Sunday School.

Lesson Sheets for April 8

This week we are mailing to the various districts the Christmas offering lesson sheet which has been prepared by this office in conjunction with the General Sunday School Department. In some instances we have been supplied with names and addresses of local school officers and are sending the supply direct to them. In other cases they are being sent to the district superintendent of Sunday school for distribution to the schools. If the schools in the United States and Canada do not receive their supply promptly, inquiry should be made of either the district superintendent or our office—or both—so the material can be supplied in ample time for April 8.

The plan is that on that date all usual lesson material will be displaced with this large, illustrated lesson sheet on Overseas Missions and Missionaries. There is a great deal of valuable material for teaching the lesson to all ages, and it is planned that all classes, from the tiny tots to the older adults, use this material as the teaching theme on this Sunday. There should be one sheet for each class, and they should be preserved for future use in the school.

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

Form 3 was adopted by the district with invitation to all branches to adopt. One hour was given the Sunday school, with Brother William Shakespeare in charge. One hour was given the Department of Women, with Sister Ed. Dillon in charge, and a good program was given. The eleven branches in the district reported, showing a total enrollment of 2,041, including fifty non-residents. Branch presidents for the most part reported the spiritual condition of branches as good and improving. Recommendations for ordination to the priesthood were concurred in as follows: William H. Ware, Woodbine, priest; Fred H. Smith, Woodbine, teacher; Chester Davis, Moorhead, teacher; Jesse W. Smith, Sioux City, deacon; Fields Jones, Little Sioux, priest; Paul C. Goodrich, Little Sioux, priest; J. F. Gamet, Mondamin, teacher; H. H. McLean, Mondamin, priest; Gerald Gunsolley, Mondamin, priest. A resolution prevailed to the effect that as a district we look with favor upon the merger and coordination plan as outlined by the church. John F. Garver and F. A. Smith were in attendance Sunday and were the speakers. George M. Vandell, of Sioux City, preached Saturday evening. On account of prevalent sickness in various branches, many were not permitted to attend the conference, although Sunday quite a number were present. The conference accepted the invitation extended by the Magnolia Branch and adjourned to meet there at the usual time in June. Ada S. Putnam, district secretary.

Blue Pencil Notes

Two by two has no reference to the size of the preachers.

It is a sign of bad luck to forget the letter that your wife gave you to mail.

It used to be good form in Utah to ask a man, "How is your wives' health?" Now, however, it is better to say, "How is your wife's health?" On the supposition that if he has but one wife it is singular.

A man with a high-crowned cowboy hat may be encountered on the streets of Kansas City almost any fine day. In his arms he always carries two or three puppies of just the right age of infantile puppyhood to appeal to the ordinary passer-by. The puppies are for sale. The man is a puppy vender—a peripatetic kennel. A curious prospective customer halted this puppy vender one day recently, and said, "Are those pedigreed puppies?" "Stranger," the vender replied, "those dogs are so high class that if they could talk they wouldn't speak to either one of us."

A certain colored preacher waxed eloquent on the subject of tithing. "A tenth am de Lord's," he declared. "Bredren, gib de Lord his tenth." One of the flock becoming greatly moved and enthused by the exhortation, cried out, "Gib him more dan dat! Gib him a twentieth!" Religious fervor sometimes does work like that when it enters the realm of finance.

A carpenter worked all day on a certain job and at night found that he had done it wrong. He worked all the next day tearing to pieces that which he had done the day before, and at night said, "I am now where I was yesterday morning, excepting that my material is rather battered up from tearing it apart." At that he was much better off than some who live a life wrong, and suddenly discover that there is not even one day left in which to undo and reconstruct.

Tut as the beginning of a king's name seems quite insignificant and unimpressive—no matter whether one pronounce it "Tut" or "Toot." There is little choice. It might as well have been fiddlesticks. No doubt the queen often chose to say tut to him. One may say tut to a king if one is the queen. Otherwise one had best let the king tut.

After such a bad beginning naturally the king's name had to hasten on to more impressive syllables; and in the end, like some bad anthems, atoned for many things by a big Amen. So when the queen said tut, or even toot, all the people could say amen and look innocent and the king was helpless.

King Tut-ankh-Amen flourished in Egypt more than three thousand years ago, at a time when the kings were making man's most successful bid for physical immortality, of a sort—the sort obtained by pickling fluids and wrappings and a favorable climate. One day the king retired to his rest in the Valley of the Kings, taking to bed with him a vast amount of treasure, gold, precious stones, and couches and other furniture sufficient to equip a used commodity shop. It seems strange to men of this age that one man should have been permitted to take into his tomb and retain such vast amounts of gold. What sort of undertakers had they in those days?

Evidently, however, Fate observed the incident with tongue in cheek. She waited a very long time and then whispered to certain savants, "More than three thousand years ago I saw a dark-skinned fellow go into a hole in the limestone cliffs in the Valley of the Kings with a great amount of treasure. I have watched diligently and I am sure that he never came out. It might pay you to dig about a bit." So they proceeded to dig, i. e., "to excavate."

How strange to lie in darkened state for three thousand years, a king, then be dragged forth to lie in a glass case in a museum, a mummy, to be stared at by goggled-eyed visitors who mispronounce the royal name in many strange tongues. How strange to go to rest in the age of the war chariot and come forth in the age of the automobile, the airplane, the radio, with keen-eyed motion picture producers hovering in the Valley of the Kings to commercialize the resurrection for the whole world to look at. How futile the reward given his bid for physical immortality—to exist, a mummy, in the most keenly alive era of all history.

But perhaps King Tut-ankh-Amen does not greatly care. I cannot imagine one maintaining a very active interest in an embalmed body for three thousand years. Evidently, too, the gold was of no value to him, or he would have used it. Nor are we enthused over the perfumes and face paints and powders found. Nearly every drug store in the world is overstocked with such, in spite of the constant and generous efforts of patrons to reduce the supply.

So probably the spirit of King Tut-ankh-Amen long, long ago joined the multitudinous congregation of the spirits of earth's children of all lands and times, where perchance rank and wealth do not count, and he may not be nearly so interested as we in current excavations. If not, and he is indeed troubled by the miscarriage of the royal plans, then the moral to this story, if so be it has a moral, would be, "Do not aspire to take great treasure to your tomb and do not belong to an ancient Egyptian dynasty." That should be an easy moral for most people; and easy morals are the only popular ones to-day.

Work While the Day Lasts

The Master admonished his disciples to work while the day lasts, for the night comes when no man can work.

The time allotted to the average man to work for the Lord is so brief that the admonition is timely and forceful to work while the day lasts ere the night cometh when there will be no further opportunity so far as this world is concerned.

When we look back on the work done by men in the church in years gone by, we see how quickly their ministry passed, and how soon, in fact, it is almost forgotten by the church. As it was with them so will it be with us. The short time given us should be improved to the utmost.

To illustrate, the undersigned remembers when President W. W. Blair was a very prominent figure in church affairs. His voice was strong and his advice influential in the councils of the church. He traveled far and near and preached the gospel with vigor and with splendid results. His smiling face cheered thousands of homes. In a word he was an upstanding and forceful pillar in the church. Today another generation has come on that knows him not. His work remains, it is true; but few of the younger people realize the personality back of it. A few who are middle-aged or older remember the kind friend and the untiring laborer.

Even more recently the late Richard C. Evans was a power in the church, moving thousands with his eloquence, bringing in many converts, traveling far and wide in the United States, in Canada, and abroad. Later for a brief time he attempted to undo the work that he had done; but thus soon, even in so few years, there comes a generation to whom his name is but an empty word. They have heard little about the splendid work he did constructively, even less about the work he tried to do in opposition to the church.

We mention these as we might mention many others, simply to remind our readers how fleeting time is. Wise were they who in past years used well the brief time given them. Though they may be forgotten by the generations that come on, or at most be held only in reverent memory, the fact that they used wisely the time given, in other words worked while their day lasted, commends them to God and assures them another opportunity to work in higher and better spheres, for "He who is faithful in few things shall be made ruler over many." Let us then in our brief day use the time given us and improve the opportunities to build up the kingdom of God and to establish his righteousness.

Church Pageants

In this issue of the HERALD there appears an article by Elder T. W. Williams, superintendent of the Department of Recreation and Expression, on "The drama and religious education." There has been a great deal of criticism of dramatic expression by our young people, but we must remember that the advice to organize and secure a director does not for one moment mean that we shall approve the ordinary drama of the day, nor the cheap melodrama to which young people so much tend in their amateur efforts in that line. Many of these melodramas are not only poor in English but also poor in morals. But that is rather beside the point.

The essential factor is that small children will dramatize everything they learn. They will dramatize the Sunday school lesson beginning with the garden of Eden. It is quite a matter of instinct in this way to make vivid the lesson learned.

Young people long for an opportunity for such an expression, and we are glad to know there are some of us who, while not neglecting those things that belong to the most serious thought, have not entirely left the age of make-believe, of hero worship, of romance, and of social life, but are able to enter into the joy of the young people and the children and realize how that joy can be made effective for the gospel work.

It is an appeal, not for dramatic expression in the ordinary sense of the term, but to utilize this instinct or tendency in a right way so as to teach, as Superintendent A. M. Carmichael pointed out recently, the virtues by concrete facts and by concrete living. In the Middle Ages the pageants, the miracle and morality plays, held their place in the church. For us that is not particularly significant, but it is significant that here is a mode of approach heretofore ignored.

As Brother Williams points out, youth is the time of idealism, the time of love, the time when young women become nurses and young men give themselves for their country. Is it not, in other words, the time when young men and young women—they must do something—can be brought to give their very best for Christ and his work, a time for arousing missionary effort?

The pageant can be in the nature of a morality play, depicting the virtuous life. It may present church history. It may and should make vivid our ideals of right. When we say, "Go to work," in dramatic effect we mean go to work on right lines.

This means to make real the great events of religious history, to revive the great ideals, to teach the children and make alive the message of Jesus from infancy up, so that from the young people there comes at last the response fired with the message of missionary zeal: "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord."

This is no wild dream. It is merely a possibility of utilizing this mode of expression, not alone for entertainment, nor so much for immediate pleasure as for teaching. But it does mean teaching in this pleasant way and not attempting to make dramatic expression so bleak that it will repel.

If we read it aright this is the message in different words that Elder Williams is presenting to the church on behalf of her children and young people. It is not suggested as a substitute, nor to take the place of the many excellent methods already in use in the preaching and teaching of the word, and certainly not to take the place of spiritual power of the prayer service. But it is an instrumentality which may be used occasionally with profit.

Two Letters of Protest

On December 3 last I spoke from the pulpit of the Stone Church at Independence on the assigned subject of loyalty as an essential in building up Zion; and the effort was an appeal for loyalty to the ideals of the church. In the letter column of this issue will be found letters, one from Paul M. Hanson and one from John W. Rushton, of the Twelve, protesting against certain portions of the address as it appeared in the issue of the HERALD for January 10, last.

It is unnecessary to comment upon the letter of either writer, for the readers of the HERALD can readily decide for themselves the issue raised by the two brethren, so we present the letters without comment further than to suggest a rereading of the address in connection with the letters.

The Grave of a Pharaoh

So much space has been taken in the daily papers concerning the research work done among the tombs of the kings of Egypt, and especially the discovery of the tomb of Tutankhamen, that our readers would doubtless be interested in knowing who he was.

He is generally ascribed to what is called the Eighteenth Dynasty which began in Egypt shortly after 1600 B. C. and represented the empire period of Egypt. Prior to his ascension the preceding kings of this dynasty had driven out the invaders from Egypt, had conquered Palestine, Phoenicia, and Assyria to the Euphrates River, had conquered the country to the south, the land of Nubia, had worked the mines of Sinai, and probably Ethiopia, traded with Punt who carried on a wide correspondence with Asiatic rulers. His predecessor and father-in-law, Amenophis IV, is credited with an attempt to establish a monotheistic religion, taking the living power of the Sun, Atun or Aten as the type.

Tutankhamen was not one of the prominent rulers of the dynasty. In fact he was not directly of the lineage, but ascended the throne in the right of his wife, being immediately preceded by another son-in-law of Amenophis IV, who reigned for only a very short time. On ascending the throne his name was Tutankhaten, but finding that religion unpopular he changed his name to Amen, Tutankhamen, "the living image of Amen." Amen is represented by the sun. The "ankh" is the name of the cross held by the various forms of the deity and by the kings in the images of Egypt. It was shaped like a key and typified the power of life. A modern translation of his name would probably be not far from "The living image of God."

While many writers emphasize the polytheism of the age, we have to remember that many times this polytheism was merely a multiplicity of names for the one ideal. The sun was worshiped under various names for various attributes: the rays of the sun, the face of the sun, the circumference of the sun, the living power of the sun, but they were but attributes of the one sun, and that sun, to those who clearly understood, was but a type of the Shining and perfect One.

In several accounts of the Eighteenth Dynasty the name of this king is omitted. He was not a popular king, even though he attempted to restore the former religion and transferred his capital back to Thebes, because Amenophis IV had given so much time to religious matters that he had neglected the sources of wealth through taxation of the conquered provinces, and so had decreased the power of Egypt, according to some accounts at least.

The reason that so much attention has been given to the opening of this tomb is because of modern publicity. It is perhaps the first time that arrangements were made for photographic rights, for moving picture rights, and for syndicate publication of the research. Another reason is that it was hoped that the tomb might be found practically untouched and a royal Book of the Dead found and that possibly this book might throw light on the changes of belief. Also it was hoped that papyri documents might be found, though none have been as yet according to the later reports.

It seems that the tomb of no former pharaoh had been found un plundered, so it was hoped that as a result much would be learned concerning social and religious conditions, and that valuable new data would be secured of this people. Also the tombs of all other pharaohs had already been found and explored. Yet in the midst of this great interest the tomb has been sealed up to await next fall on the grounds of approaching hot weather.

There has been some objection or criticism from the great press agencies which have been ignored in the distribution of the news; and the story has already been started that the mummy itself was entirely absent from the tomb. Under existing conditions this can hardly be determined for another year.

Many writers refer to this king as the predecessor of Moses. One or two at least have suggested that he might be the king of the Exodus, though Rameses II has of recent years usually been considered to be that Pharaoh, because of monuments indicating that he built the cities of Pithos and Rameses. Rameses II belonged to the Seventeenth Dynasty. In any event this was long before Homer or the founding of Rome.

It is natural that comments should be made on the great state in which he was buried and the state to which he now comes as a possible public exhibit. Lessons can be drawn on the vanity of human affairs. Yet this preservation from olden times gives a possible storehouse of archæological knowledge.

These tombs reemphasize the belief of the Egyptians and of other ancient people in the immortality of the soul. If some of their ideas appear to us to be peculiar, we will have to remember some of our own fetishes, to which exception can well be taken.

The comment is well made that science may well look into the tombs with a measure of justification for the knowledge we may gain of ancient people, but there seems no real good reason for exposing his mummy to all the world at ten cents a look. Such a public display becomes more or less discreditable, according to the London Outlook. S. A. B.

The Passing of a Great Indian

Those who were privileged to meet him at the late General Conference as well as on other occasions will be sorry to learn that Doctor Carlos Montezuma passed away the last of February. He was born an Apache nearly sixty years ago. When about eight years of age he was captured by some Indian scouts and was sold to a photographer who took him to Chicago and put him in school. When his benefactor died he had to hustle for himself. He sold papers; blacked shoes and did odd jobs but continued to go to school. The newspaper men of Chicago helped him in many ways, so by hard study he became a pharmacist; then saved his money and attended the medical college of Illinois where he formed a lifelong friendship with Doctor Charles Mills.

As a physician he was employed in the Indian services on a number of the reservations and later in the Carlisle Indian school. He left there, however, at the same time as did General Pratt and from then on gave his attention to the practice of medicine though by no means forgetting his Indian friends.

He was one of the strong opposers of the abuses of the Indian Bureau and published for several years a paper, Wassaja.

Born an Apache, one of the most bloodthirsty of the Indian tribes, he gave his life to the service of humanity, ministering for the healing of the sick and spending every dollar he could raise on behalf of his Indian brother. For him there was no longer north or south or east or west but all Indians alike were held within his affection. Indians who came to Chicago found in him a friend. He went many times to Washington upon their behalf. He was a man of high Christian character and stood for the right. He illustrated what right care will do for the Indian in a single generation. His last request was that his friends would keep up the fight for freedom and justice to the Indian people. His last public declaration was to express the wish that God would create a Christian spirit in the Indian service officials so that they would do justice to his people.

He was one of the great leaders of the Society of American Indians with which several of our people are affiliated. S. A. B.

The Drama and Religious Education

By T. W. Williams

A study of dramatics and pageantry as a means in religious education and training.

An effort is being made in some of the local congregations of the church to introduce religious drama and pageantry into the Sunday school and church services. Lest we make some mistake here it is well that we give the matter careful study before plunging in. We may, indeed, profit by the experiences of others.

Necessarily, any attempt to adopt some new thing must meet with pronounced opposition, and this in itself is not to be decried, for conservative criticism may prevent too radical departure from the well-beaten path. The real merit of any new purpose is that it can withstand the attacks which the defenders of old customs may make.

The members of the church cannot afford to engage in any activity which does not have as its dominant purpose and final objective the bringing of children, boys and girls, men and women, into conscious relation with Jesus Christ. Any pure expression which conserves this purpose may properly be engaged in.

The drama is nothing to us unless it is an aid to our religious life. As a mere instrument of entertainment and amusement we cannot consider it as a part of church work. If it can be used to interpret life, past and present, and thus become a prophecy of the life to be; if it can be employed to enable children to interpret the history and progress of the race in class drill, and stage pageantry, reading, and song, then we may well employ it in our church work.

But we must not confuse modern worldly drama with this phase of dramatics. The line should be so clearly drawn that those who engage in religious dramatics will not be enticed to go to the modern playhouse or employ the many objectionable playhouse methods but rather will they cultivate a wholesome and lofty appreciation of the drama sanctified by religious devotion.

The church has rightful claim on the drama. It is the legitimate child of religion. That it has been alienated, prostituted, discredited, disowned and, to a large extent, been given over to the world, the flesh, and the Devil is unfortunate for the church. It is up to the church to take over its rightful heritage and to make use of the drama as a means of carrying out the divine purpose.

Religion the Mother of All Art

Religion is the mother of all art. Without the religious impulse art would be well-nigh impossible. Art without imagination, and hope, and spiritual aspiration is as an egg without salt. And when I speak of things religious I am not thinking specifically of creeds and cults and rituals. While these are largely dramatic in application still they are mere trappings. Religion is that divine something which transcends physical and material environs and lifts the soul of man out of the sordid commonplace into the realms of exaltation and realization.

The religious festivals of the race have been largely dramatic. And who will question but that God has made use of this medium to put across his purpose? The history of creation beggars all known human pageantry. The rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic period are highly dramatic. Our sacraments of baptism and communion are symbolic and, in the highest sense, dramatic—the interpretation of spiritual purpose through material media.

In the childhood of the race the drama was the mighty force which made for the enlargement of the social instinct. We have but to read the traditions and study the folk festivals, the marriage customs, the funeral incantations and dances of primitive peoples to discover striking corroboration of this position. The drama was, to a large extent, the interpretation of the hopes, the aspirations, the purposes, and the expressional life of the people.

Dramatic Instinct Developed Among the Israelites

The dramatic instinct was highly developed among the Israelites. Far from discouraging and repressing this impulse, God used it to teach and lead the people. One need not draw on his imagination to interpret the celebration of the children of Israel when they came out of Egypt as a great and magnificent pageant. The song of Moses reads like a modern production. This was, in all probability, a dramatic dialogue interspersed with song and interpretative dancing. The act of Miriam in taking a timbrel in her hand and then leading all of the women of the camp and each in turn having also a timbrel was purely dramatic. It was spectacular. It was pantomime and pageantry and dancing, all in one.

What is more suggestive of the part of a character in a play than the following taken from the writings of Ezekiel?

Thou also, Son of Man, take thee a tile and lay it before thee, and portray upon it the city, even Jerusalem, and lay siege against it, and build a fort against it, and set battering rams against it round about. Moreover take thou unto thee an iron pan, and set it for a wall of iron between thee and the city; and set thy face toward it, and it shall be besieged and thou shalt lay siege against it. This shall be a sign to the House of Israel.

Moulton, in his Literary Study of the Bible, calls attention to the dramatic instinct as indicated in sacred literature. He says:

Hebrew literature has not developed a separate and distinct drama; although, as if to compensate for this, the dramatic impulse is found in the Hebrew to invade other regions of literature, including such departments as might have seemed most impervious to it. The current finding no channel has spread and diffused itself.

No sane person would claim that he can find an acted play like the plays of Shakespeare in the Bible. On the other hand it is conceded that the Bible contains some of the greatest lyric poems. In the book of Job the dramatic form reaches an intensity which is not excelled in the literature of any people. There is not any attempt at distinct drama but the "dramatized discussion is made to rest on a basis of epic story." If these things could be made the subject of measurement it would be safe to predict that the "mass of dramatic material in biblical literature will not be less than that found in other literatures where drama is a distinct form."

Pageantry in the Early Christian Church

The drama was given a very prominent place during the first centuries of the Christian church, and this for several reasons. The drama then was limited largely to exhortation and in portraying the sacred theories as to the future life and the conditions of the good and the bad in their final state.

The drama taught by means of the eye, as well as the ear, in those days served a double purpose. The printed page was well-nigh inaccessible to the mass. Public exhortation made appeal only to the ear and was not long remembered. The drama so vividly portrayed the lesson to be taught that it was not soon forgotten.

Unfortunately, during the reign of Constantine the pagan festivals and Christian holidays were so confused that heathenism triumphed over Christianity. The drama then only served to further prostitute the purposes of true religion. It was Saint Francis of Assisi who first made use of the pantomime in religious interpretation. He also employed the tableau. By the use of scenery, animals, and people he introduced living pictures, which stirred and held the people.

In the later centuries biblical dramas were enacted. One deserving special mention portrayed the resurrection story found in the twenty-eighth chapter of Matthew. This was given in the form of a dialogue and chanted by the different characters. One would take the part of the angel, others the part of the women. Originally, this was solely the work of the priest. Subsequently the laity were included. Trade guilds took up the work. It was not long after this when wandering jugglers supplanted all others. Dramatics were commercialized and the enactors were selected by pageant masters. The Corpus Christi guild festivals were adopted by many cities and became the leading event of the year. Some of these had as many as fifty or sixty plays by different guilds.

Meredith claims that the morality plays were very popular during the fourteenth century. These differed materially from the miracle play. Instead of portraying biblical events they were given over to allegory and with moral themes which personified the powers of good and evil struggling for supremacy.

The Pageant a Recognized Educational Factor

The pageant has come into very general and popular use during late years. John Oxenham produced his "Darkness and light" in Boston. This was subsequently reproduced in most of the large centers of America. It was primarily a missionary pageant. While dealing with propaganda its beauty and movement won popular favor.

Most of the prominent churches have long since found the value of the drama as a means of religious education. The Methodist Churches of America in their joint centennial celebration in 1919 presented the pageant known as "The wayfarer." This was followed by over one hundred pageants and plays. Shortly after this the Protestant Episcopal Church created a dramatic department. Dramas were published and generously distributed. The Congregationalists and Baptists followed suit.

The utility of the pageant was never better illustrated than it was at the late International Sunday School Convention at Kansas City, Missouri. This was held June 21 to 27, 1922. Two nights were given over to the presentation of pageants. The 22d was "Kansas City Night." The pageant entitled "The light of the world" was rendered. There were three hundred participants in this pageant, and one hundred in the chorus.

The first scene was entitled The prophecy of the coming of the Messiah (introducing groups from the frieze of the prophets by Sargeant).

Second scene: The manger of Bethlehem—Jesus the light of the world. March of the magi kings. The virgin's lullaby. The adoration of kings and shepherds.

Third scene: The vision of Isaiah. The prophet's vision of service. The altar of consecration.

Fourth scene: The light from Bethlehem spreads into all the world. Spirit of Christianity, education, and church appear. Consecration of ambassadors to following types of Christian work: Bible teacher, evangelist, director of religious education, Christian business man, Christian patriot, missionary.

Fifth scene: Consecration and coronation. Ambassadors lead groups to the light of the world. Consecration to Christian service. Let there be light.

And then there was the pageant on the night of June 26, entitled, "They come." It was a magnificent portrayal of the triumph of Christianity and held the vast assembly spellbound. We venture the thought that not one of that great gathering of people but was more impressed as to the possibilities of the glorious victory of the work of Jesus Christ than they could have been in any single address which might have been given, outside of a Pentecostal endowment.

A movement is now on foot to overcome the commercial prostitution of the drama. The effort is being made to have dramatization of social and educational character without casts. This is to be produced on the streets, in the parks, in vacant stores and churches. During the past few years leading educators have come to see the utility of the drama in educational work.

Emma Sheridan Fry was the pioneer in this work. She was the first dramatic director of the Children's Educational Theater in New York City. She has revolutionized educational dramatics in her particular field.

Statement of Emma Sheridan Fry

In a personal letter which I recently received from Miss Fry, she said:

Please think over the significance of educational dramatics as a field wherein essential ethics may be displayed—the soul's inherent sense of right and wrong developed, the power of decision exercised, the moral judgment given material on which to work, the moral logic of life situations, problems, "trials" opened to analysis.

Recognition of such values at our disposal in the field of educational dramatics wakes us to careful discrimination in the selection of material presented.

This significance of the dramatic instinct as a factor in the development of the moral nature, is of deep interest to me and its consideration is a branch of educational dramatics hardly entered. Will you not be pioneer?

In this view every dramatic activity becomes "religious dramatics," because all material is selected, and developed, with a view to its relation to life, conduct, individual responsibility, inherent consciousness of relation to God. Without intrusion of "piousness" or "dullness" of moral teaching, or restriction to religious subjects may be dispersed the relation of life to good and right—the identity of evil-doing with ignorance, the balance between the individual act and the universal value, the fact that the deed here must be adequately a symbol of and an expression of the Spirit from which all derives.

Educational Versus Professional Dramatics

Let it be distinctly understood that when we are advocating the use of the drama in educational work we do not have in mind the modern commercialized and, all too frequent, prostituted stage. As Miss Fry has well said:

Educational dramatics does not seek to train dramatic talent for the stage, or to coach "amateur actors" for a "show." It cooperates with the universal instinct to develop the whole human being towards life and citizenship.

William V. Meredith, speaking on this point, says:

Educational dramatics may be described as follows: It is a natural method of teaching in that it travels with the child's instinctive desires rather than counter with them. Spontaneity, or the play spirit, marks its efforts, for it is not a forced but pleasurable activity. It attracts the whole attention of the individual, so much so that he lives for the time being the life which he is portraying, and, as a result, attains the benefit of this regulated experience without the dangers incident to real life.

We do not refer to the use of the drama by others with the thought that it is necessary argument for our indorsement. In some things, however, the children of this world are wiser than the children of light. Simply because the drama has been commercialized and used to stimulate immorality is no argument that there is not a rightful place for the drama and that within the church. We are not pleading for the drama as used by the world. We wish to use the drama to teach morality and religion and to make it a factor with children who instinctively dramatize practically everything they learn whether we wish them to do so or not.

Meredith discusses with advantage the various dramatic periods of the child's life. He divides these as follows: Make Believe; Imaginative; Heroic; Group Loyalty; Romantic Idealism; Adulthood. This latter period is divided into social, national, international, community, and educational interests.

The Period of Make-Believe

The child during this the first period of its existence impersonates nearly everything with which he comes in contact. He assumes the relationship of father, mother, big brother, and sister. He seems to have no particular difficulty in enacting any of the roles. Dogs, cats, horses, and even pigs can likewise be impersonated or, better stated, the lives of these animals lived, for he has the power of putting himself in the place of that which he represents.

He feels a closer kinship with dumb animals than with mankind, sharing more sympathetically with them in their joys and sorrows than he does with human beings. To him the trees, the clouds, and the winds have a life that can be interpreted. He sees nothing strange in taking the part of a sunbeam or a raindrop. The world is a make-believe stage to him and he can be the manager, property man, and the whole cast if necessary. Costumes do not trouble him. Properties are easily improvised. Boxes become trolley-cars, boats, and tables in instant transition. Sunbaked mud assumes the likeness of flakey pie crust.

And here is where the drama can be used effectively. Adapt your religious teaching to the instinctive expression of this period. Use nature stories. Preach religion in terms of nature. Corral the make-believe impulse and make it visualize God at work in nature. It would be a crime to attempt to teach God in terms of theology during this period. Dramatize God and nature in terms of relationship. This is true religion.

The Period of Imagination

This is the age of nymphs, of fairies, and eery creatures. It is the land of forests and streams and birds and fairy creatures. It is crowded full with folk legends and fairy tales and wonder stories. The real teacher here throws aside dignity and mature poise and playfully goes hand in hand with the child in this enchanted wonderland. He does not seek to disillusion, for to do so would forever dispel the vision and mar the whole of life bringing everything down to the practical, and the sordid, and the commonplace. There is plenty of time for this later on.

The great leaders of the world, those with foresight, the creators, the men of genius have lingered long in this period of make-believe. They regard it as the most essential, since it has given to them the desire to walk in and to clear unknown paths for the human race. Surely the men and women who have to do with boys and girls and who must bring them through this period should be individuals of large vision—men and women who can see men as trees walking—men and women who still linger in childhood's glorious dreamland.

The Period of Heroism

The transition from the imaginative period of childhood into this, the realistic period, is like waking from a dream. Reality comes with a shock to everyone and particularly to boys and girls.

For a time they are dazed and bewildered. Then the games of childhood become "kid" games. A new life is revealed. The youth wonders, investigates, tests, and then accepts. This is the period of thrills. The boy becomes a hero worshiper.

Happy indeed may that father be who, during this period, becomes the hero in the eyes of his son. The father who thus fails to retain his rightful place, being all that is strong, and courageous, and daring has lost a golden opportunity. There is a scientific reason why boys imitate the rough and uncouth to the horror of the uninformed mother. His hero can be great and strong and good if his guardians and teachers know how to make it so.

Here is the rightful place for the religious drama. If we can portray a Sampson, a Daniel, a Washington, a David, a William Tell, a Livingstone, or a Lincoln, or, better still, if we can help these children to live over the lives of great and good people and to interpret in dramatic idealism, we can hold their confidence and attention and thereby mold their entire life. No namby-pamby sermonets will grip mind and stir heart during this period. We must furnish something vivid, strong, and robust, and the drama will do all this.

The Period of Group Loyalty

The social consciousness now awakens. The boy, who, in the make-believe period was a little savage, selfish and egotistic, now joins himself to some group. He submerges his individual desires and yields to the impulse of the group. Loyalty now becomes his watchword. He prides himself because he does not "peach on the gang." He will take a sound thrashing before he will divulge the doings of his pals. He is not disloyal to teacher or parents so much as he is loyal to the group of which he now forms but an integral part. What a wonderful opportunity to use this dramatic instinct and force home the necessity of rightful application of this group consciousness!

We can use the gang organization with its oaths and passwords and secret ritual as an object lesson to suggest a better organization and thereby give place for the gang impulse. Through this medium we may give proper social instruction and develop the rightful social consciousness. Here we can dramatize the church and its many fields of service. Historical incidents which picture altruistic leaders, men loyal to humanity, are especially valuable for dramatization. Such characters as Joan of Arc, Florence Nightingale, Nathan Hale, Livingstone, Lincoln, and many, very many, of our religious workers can be used to advantage.

The missionary field furnishes illustrious characters whose lives will produce such dramatic effect as will rivet and hold attention. During this period charades, tableaux, and pantomimes are especially applicable. This is the age when comedy is particularly attractive. It is at this time that boys enjoy taking off the different characters whom they meet. At this time the girl's desire for rhythmic expression is almost so strong as to become an urge.

Period of Romantic Idealism

This is the period of storm and stress. It is the time when creative imagination is in the saddle with lash and spur. It is the period of egotistic planning and wistful yearning. Life, at this time, is as fitful and changing as a day in April. This is the period of dreams and achievements. The whole world is awaiting the arrival of the coming conqueror. He brooks restraint. He chafes at the bit. This is the age of emotional sentiment. One falls in love with everything, particularly himself. He resents the real. He possesses the long lost key of achievement, and victory, and glory. The heroic and hazardous make strong appeal. Girls during this period set out to become nurses and missionaries. Boys go in for serving one's country.

Here, again, is our opportunity. This love, this idealism, this unconquerable reserve power can be harnessed for Jesus Christ and for the service of humanity. Let the church step in here and, instead of using suppression, rather shall we foster and stimulate this idealism. How can the church expect to hold our youth and bring them through this critical period if it is content to make appeal through intricate lectures and profound sermons and dissertations on mooted theological questions?

This is the time when the church can make appeal to heroism and courage and action. Youth, in this period, wishes to do things. It will do things whether the church elects or not. We can hold our boys and girls if we emphasize natural and wholesome expression. Let the young people have their athletics, their debating clubs, their dramatics, their public speaking classes. These may be supplemented with rightful religious training and instruction. Pageantry makes strong appeal here. The leader becomes at once the star, and the group will rally to his standard.

The Period of Adulthood

Charles Dillingham, one of the greatest psychologists of the stage, states that family influence quickens the pull of all the old and sometimes forgotten instincts and impulses. He plans his spectacular pageant each year so that he may meet this universal appeal. He furnishes the rhythmic movement and music of the kindergarten, the imaginative fairyland, the funny clown, the stunt man, the spectacular and thrilling features, the child impersonations, the reminiscent scenes which take one back to childhood. He even employs the tactful suggestions of sacrifice and sorrow. The appeal to home, and country, and church, and family are wonderful assets which may be employed in dramatic purposes and by which means the family is brought closer together.

An Appeal for Rightful Dramatics

And here let me make appeal for the rightful dramatic expression in our church life. In all that we do let it be sanctified with divine purpose. Above everything else let our whole purpose be religious. Let us begin with the little tots and keep it up even unto old age. The desire to interpret life is universal. Indian children must act out every story they hear. Chinese children reproduce in their own way Bible stories heard at Sunday school. Our own children will act out the rites of baptism, even though they have to conscript a cat to do it. Instead of merely reading or telling the story of David and Goliath, the three wise men, or the good shepherd, allow the children to improvise dialogue from lessons taught to them and live over again the lives of these Bible heroes.

Here are some dramatic features which may easily be adapted to church interpretation.

Tableaus, Pantomimes, Charades, Stunts

Tableau. This word is taken from the French tableau vivant meaning living pictures. Picture posing is the simplest form of tableau. Children are interested in anything in which they are participants. The utility of the tableau is so well understood that further comment is unnecessary.

Pantomime. This is called the dumb show. Among the Romans the pantomime interpreted mythological stories through gesticulation and dancing. In England Christmas pantomime predominates. Doctor John G. Benson, pastor of the First Methodist Church at Brazil, Indiana, broke up a dancing craze and gave to the young people of his church a comprehensive knowledge of biblical history—all by means of the pantomime.

Charades. The use of the charade is so familiar that no argument need be made in its behalf.

Stunts. Under this head we may enumerate mock trials, conventions, conferences, oratorical contests, art exhibits, country fairs, baby shows, wedding ceremonies, and any other expression which will interpret life. Care should be taken here that these expressions do not fall to the level of the burlesque or trivial. Keep all of your activities on the highest possible level.

The Use of the Pageant in the Church

In each local church one evening a week can be spent with profit in some phase of expressional life. The pageant will be quite helpful for occasional programs. Edgar B. Gordon in The Church School for April, 1920, illustrates the value of the dramatic method in the educational program of the church. He says:

The gradual growth of the educational principle of "learning by doing" has brought into play a larger measure of flexibility in classroom methods and has supplemented the former procedure of book study and recitation by certain individual freedom, imitative, and laboratory method. In a large measure the dramatic method is employed in accomplishing these results. Children are encouraged to act out every lesson which has any dramatic possibilities. This is resulting in a larger attractiveness for the school and a more normal approach to the child mind.

There is a great, and, as yet, almost untouched field for the use of pageantry and dramatics in our work with the young of the church. Only last summer at the Madison Religious School the experiment was made of permitting a class of boys and girls to dramatize some of the lessons which they studied. The very decided increase in interest which they manifested was a very good indication of the value of this method.

We are advising the organization of dramatic clubs in the local churches. These clubs can take up the study and interpretation of dramatics as related to church life, church history, historical characters in church work. Above everything else we can use this means of expression to teach the larger life, to interpret the life and ministry of Jesus—to make the life of Jesus the personal experience of every boy and girl.

My advice to the young and middle-aged is to organize dramatic clubs, get a good teacher, and go to work. If it is impossible to secure a teacher, then get some reliable textbook like W. V. Meredith's Pageantry and Dramatics ($1.35, Herald Office) and select some one of your number as leader.

Preparedness

Summary of sermon by Cornelius Clifford, October 4, 1922, at the Conference Tabernacle, Independence, Missouri. Reported by Mrs. A. Morgan.

I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you. Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches; he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same brings forth much fruit; for without me ye can do nothing. If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned. If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you. Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples. As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you; continue ye in my love.

I have read ten verses of the gospel according to the Apostle John, the fifteenth chapter, and desire to associate with it Exodus 14: 15 :

"And the Lord said unto Moses, Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward." Also Matthew 3: 3: "For this is he that was spoken of by the Prophet Esaias, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight."

The subject of preparedness carries the thought to make ready, or to place ourselves in a condition that we might assume our responsibilities as children of the Most High God. This subject has to do with many perplexing as well as important problems; and to my mind, the subject of preparedness, so far as our missionary program is concerned, is the most important that confronts the church at the present time.

Why This Church?

We have been repeatedly asked the question, What reason has the church which you represent to offer for its existence? Why do you claim to be the church of the living God? Have you anything better than we have? If so, we have failed to see it.

I am sorry that this feeling exists. I am sorry that we have been forced to listen to such assertions. But some of the learned clergymen of the day say we have failed to recognize the fundamentals; we have failed to recognize the philosophy of Jesus Christ. We have failed to function as a living church. We have introduced a narrow curriculum, and we have ignored justice, mercy, and truth, and as a result we have failed to make a lasting impression upon the minds of the people.

The religious position of the world is in that condition presented by these men. Justice, mercy, and truth have been neglected. A lasting impression has not been made upon the minds of the people, and now is the time for us as a church to show the world that we have that which is practical, to show that we are big enough to do things, and that we are able to develop a people who are willing to serve God, and his Son Jesus Christ in spirit and in truth. We have an opportunity to vindicate the Messiahship of Jesus Christ and our position as a church; an opportunity to answer this question which we have presented for your consideration, What reason has your church to offer for its existence?

We claim we can make a lasting impression upon the minds of the people, and direct their religious experience to something that is practical, and worthy of their consideration; something that is going to benefit them during their sojourn here, and not only in the hereafter.

The church of Jesus Christ is the hope of the world. If the world is ever placed in a condition in which it is fit for us to live, it must be as a result of the effort put forth by its personnel; its principles made manifest in everyday life.

My early religious experience was somewhat dark and cloudy. I have not always been a member of this church but I am glad that my early training was such as it was, for after I was permitted to hear this plan of salvation, it became to me the biggest thing in the world. It assisted me to appreciate life. In fact, it gave me a new vision of life. It gave me a desire to become religious in the true sense of the word. I know it brought to my vision some of the very important things of life. It has assisted me to solve the problems which have confronted me, the religion we need to-day.

Needed: Practical Religion for To-day

In my missionary work in Canada, since the close of the World War, I have met and conversed with a number of returned soldiers, boys who served from fifteen to forty-seven months in the front lines. Their religious training, if they ever had any, suffered while they were under arms. Nevertheless, those boys brought from France one thing that is going to stand to our credit and good if we can only make of it the proper use, and that one thought is that almost every returned soldier with whom I have conversed, has asked the question, What is there about your religion that is practical? Is it going to assist me now? I am not interested in the here-after.

One young man told me, "I don't believe there is a God. I saw things in France that drove from my mind all the religious training that I ever had, and I don't believe there is a God. But what has your church to offer me that will assist me now in living a good, clean life? Will it assist me in making amends for the condition under which I was forced to labor while a servant of the Government?"

This question must be seriously considered. It is a well-known fact that in the Dominion of Canada about the strongest organization that is in existence is the Salvation Army. Our brethren of the Army did a wonderful work. They are doing a wonderful work yet. That is why they have grown in numbers. That is why they have become a wealthy body of people and are respected. Twenty-five years ago they were not. Fifteen years ago they were not. For these boys, when they returned from the front ranks to rest and were billeted, were met by a body of men and women who had a prayer book in one hand and a cup of hot coffee and a sandwich in the other. To-day every returned soldier, every boy who saw service in France, appreciates the organization. They cannot speak too highly of them. Why? Because they were giving to these men something that they stood in need of at just the right time. They were demonstrating in a sense the practical side of their religion. They did not continually discourage the boys because of their wildness. No.

They encouraged them to be men, however, and to live good, clean lives. But they gave them what they really wanted; something to eat, and something to drink after being possibly forty-eight and fifty hours without those things. These experiences were common.

Our religious experiences, many of them, are the result of private and individual interpretation of the Scriptures. That which has been recorded by the servants of God is quite clear. We can intelligently read it and comprehend its significance and place a proper and consistent interpretation thereon. If we do this, we are able to appreciate the Christ life. Just to the extent that we approximate the Christ life, just to that extent are we coming to be prepared to be of use to our God, and to his Son, and to our fellow citizens and associates in life.

Just to the extent that we place ourselves in an environment conducive to spirituality, to that extent are we going to be able to do things; and to live our religion in terms of everyday life, and our life is going to be shaped in harmony with the Christ life. Thus we become citizens of the commonwealth of Israel, and having become citizens, ultimately we are going to become intelligent children.

Our Brother's Keeper

We are going to be our brother's keeper and appreciate more and more the message of the President that was delivered for our consideration on Sunday afternoon; to be our brother's keeper more and more, in very deed, too big to become offended at a word.

We must be a prepared people. We must be a people willing to realize that each and all of us have peculiar characteristics which are constantly presenting themselves, and we must be willing to give unto our brother and sister the same consideration that we expect from them.

It is a well-known fact, however, that we have neglected to become a prepared people. We have failed in this responsibility. Now is the time for us to do something. Is it not a fact that Professor House was right when he wrote in his book, The Psychology of Orthodoxy, that too many people have had their eyes on heaven and the hereafter, where God is not needed, and have failed to recognize that here upon the earth is where he could do a great deal of good if we would place ourselves in a position where it would be possible for us to appreciate and approximate him and the life of his son, Jesus Christ?

Men Need Present Help

I believe we must recognize that religion does not deal alone with the hereafter. Religion deals with the ever-present to-day. Now is the accepted time.

The program of Jesus Christ, from a philosophic standpoint, did not deal solely with the hereafter. It dealt with the present. He went forth doing things. He went forth proclaiming the message of life, a message that gave to the people a reasonable status in the community in which they lived, and taught them how to appreciate God and bask in the sunlight of his true love. That was the purpose of the mission of Jesus Christ; to make the world a better place to live in, and the man who is big enough to see this, does not need to worry about the hereafter. It is bound to take care of itself. God has decreed, has given us the right to know and realize that to-day is the appointed time. Now is the time to become prepared, to demonstrate our religion, and to seek the mind and will of God on all matters.

I want to introduce another thought presented by the Apostle Paul wherein he says in the Hebrew letter, speaking to the Hebrew saints, in the sixth chapter and first verse, "Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead work, and of faith toward God."

This people had already done this, and the admonition from that servant of God was, Let us go on to perfection. I believe that statement, that admonition, is applicable to-day. Go on unto perfection. There are people who are willing to be taught the principles of the gospel; who believe the principles of the gospel; have expressed a desire to be baptized, and have been baptized and received the laying on of hands for the reception of the Holy Ghost. I have not noticed any particular change in their life or works, yet they are quite satisfied and sure that they are in favor with God. I do not believe this can be. The principles of the gospel, if accepted, will assist a man in working out his soul's salvation, but not every man who accepts the first principles of the gospel and complies therewith is going to receive eternal life. A man must recognize these principles and obey them. But recognizing these principles and obeying them will not insure eternal life unless the individual recognizes the admonition of this servant of God wherein he says, We have done these things. Now let us go on unto perfection. Now let us prepare ourselves that we may become doers of the word and not hearers only.

Where We Lack

There are two thoughts which have a tendency to discredit the idea that we are at the present time the children of light and are occupying where we should. First is that an organization with a membership of 105,000 last year collected approximately $7,000,000 in tithing, yet they have not the truth.

Another organization that claims to have the truth, and their doctrine so far as their principles are concerned is very much like ours, in one city last year baptized twenty-one people, while we as a church, a body of people who have the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—we baptized only three. They have twelve missionaries there and we do not happen to have one at the present time. Why is it? Are we going on to perfection? Are we doing things as we should? Is it not a fact that to all appearances the children of this world are wiser than the children of light?

The Unprepared Are Cowards

The unprepared men of this church occupy a very unenviable position. The unprepared man—I am not going to apologize for this assertion—is a real moral coward. If you have intelligence enough to embrace this doctrine you have intelligence enough to become an efficient servant of the Christ, and are able to do something for the church and demonstrate your position beyond a successful contradiction.

I want to repeat. I believe that every man and woman in this church should be a doer of things. When I first came into the church I was accused of being overzealous and ambitious. I am ambitious. I am going to admit it. I hope I am not overzealous. I consider this church the hope of the world. This church is the foundation upon which our future civilization has to be built.

The man who is unprepared is very much like the man who was given one talent. He took it out into the yard, wrapped it up in a napkin, and very carefully buried it. He buried his talent, and when the time came for him to render an accounting for this stewardship he was made to realize he had failed.

Now this is going to come to every one of us. We are all, sooner or later, going to stand before God to render an accounting to him for that which has been intrusted to our care. What are we going to do? Are we going to take the five talents, if we have been given five, and return ten? Or have we taken them and buried them in a napkin? Have we remained in an unimproved condition as we were when we were first baptized? Can we think of anything more deplorable, anything more terrible, than to fail, when the Master calls? We all should be ambitious that we may do good works and do something for the church and kingdom of God. I don't consider, for a moment, that the man who is ambitious is infringing upon the rights of anyone else. There is plenty of work for all of us to do, and we must do it.

Education Needed

I now approach with fear and trembling that phase of my thought which has to do with education. I am a firm believer in education. However, I had a gentleman in Canada a short time ago back me up against one of the walls of the church and boldly inform me that in the last five years fifty per cent of the priesthood of this church have, directly or indirectly, allied themselves with the Devil. I asked him why. He said there was a time that men didn't need an education to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ and during that time God used these men and obtained glory. At the present time the majority or a great number of the priesthood have endeavored to obtain an education and God isn't expected to help an educated man.

Now, what do you think of that for an argument? An inconsistent statement; and yet I am sorry to say there are people in this church who are standing upon that very dangerous ground. That man was much older than I am, and he had been occupying in one place for about thirty years. He told me that God filled the mouth of the man who did not have an education, but the man who did have the education didn't expect God to fill his mouth. I contend that this man was not alive to his possibilities in the church. He had not gone on to perfection. However, it is not possible for a man who is book-learned to become of himself an efficient servant for the Master, but the man en rapport with the mind and will of God, who is big enough to allow God to deal with him, to let His spirit rest upon him, the more education he has the greater is his efficiency, the more wonderful he can become, and the greater work he can do.

True Education

The only educated man in the true sense of the word is the man who is en rapport with the mind and will of God and if that man is book-learned and associates with his book learning the Spirit of God, he is of greater use to the church than the man who is unlearned. He is a bigger man, a more wonderful man, for he has not buried his talent in a napkin. He has gone on to perfection. He has learned to contrast, to draw conclusions which are logical, and I wish to God that we had more logical preachers. I would to God that we had men, any number of them, who could go forth and preach the gospel of Jesus Christ as it should be preached.

Now is the greatest time to preach the gospel, with more opportunities to make new openings, more privileges offered us than ever before. We have been permitted the privileges of the press in a great many places. In fact, in almost every place I have labored in Ontario, we have been interviewed. Our sermons have been reported, and we have been extended every kindness possible. In some places where I have been and my discourses have been reported they have been submitted to me by the editor for correction before they were printed. That was very kind and considerate.

Our Privilege to Preach

The privileges offered to us to preach the gospel are wonderful. The Spirit of God is in power during the preaching of the word, yet there has been that which has handicapped the servants of God in proclaiming the word. We have not been able to respond. We have not been able to do that work which many of us would like to do. In your mind at once the question arises, What is that? I must answer. The people of the church at the present time are not in that condition of perfection which they should occupy and in which it is their privilege to occupy. They have felt that to some one else belonged the responsibility resting upon them. They have not learned to function or they have failed to function as citizens of the kingdom of God. As a result, the church has not been prospered as it might have been. We have not been doing the things that it is possible for us to do. I believe that in that one city referred to if our people could have reached these twenty-one people before they were reached by other organizations we would have baptized them, for I believe they were honest. They accepted the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ. In a great many places where the message of life is being proclaimed we are just a little bit too late. We have not appreciated our opportunity. We have not put forth an effort to function. We have not endeavored to become missionaries as a body but have waited for one appointed.

All Are Missionaries

We are all missionaries in the church of the living God. We all have a work to do. We are all responsible to God for our stewardship, and our stewardship must be zealously fulfilled. One privilege that we have in this church is to become a prepared people; a united people; a people who realizes the necessity of going on to perfection, laying aside those things which are not conducive to spirituality, laying aside all forms of contention and doing that which others, seeing, may know that we have learned of the Master.

The world needs a prepared people; a people willing to consecrate, who are willing to do the part required of them. It may not be to preach the gospel. It may be to do other things, but every man in his own place, doing the work which he is best able to do. If that condition prevails I am sure that this church is bound to press forward and that we as a body are going to appreciate that movement more than anyone else.

Going on Unto Perfection

I want to repeat a statement made by one of our very fine old patriarchs in Canada. In discussing perfection he said that if every man would mend a man then all men would be mended. I want you to remember that. If every man would mend a man, then all men would be mended.

I want to ask you people what that would mean? Think of it, a body of men and women who have their eyes fixed on Zion, a zealous body of people paying tithing, their great desire being to locate in this part of the country and willing to do almost anything that they might come here and meet with you people to assist in building Zion. Think of it, a church going on unto perfection!

Many are investigating conditions here, and I am asking you as citizens of this community, What are they going to think? Are they going to be satisfied? Have you appreciated your position? Have we all put forth an effort to appreciate the responsibility resting upon us? Have we approximated the Christ life? Have we interpreted it in terms of everyday life? Have we recognized that true religion has to be interpreted in acts of service to our fellow man? Have we failed to function and become indifferent to the things coming upon the earth?

My prayer and desire is that the church as a whole may see the necessity of becoming a people in favor with God. A united people, drawn together with that influence which emanates from God, which enlightens the mind and makes the spirit resident within man an intelligent entity, that we may do always those things pleasing to the Master. Let us move forward with zeal, and please do not forget that this is a day of preparation. We are preparing for the coming of the Messiah. Are we preparing as a body, or are we preparing a few individuals? I want to bring that question home.

An editorial in the Vancouver Sun protests against liquor control in British Columbia because the board promotes the sale of liquor rather than restraining, and encourages the establishment of a saloon in every settlement however small. This editorial points out that less than one third of the amount spent for liquor remains to benefit in any way the province. Moderation, in other words, is not moderating, but they are rather striving to increase the sale on the false assurance that it will benefit the government in taxes, while to the contrary increased sales do not mean money for the government, for hospitals, or for anything of benefit, but instead mean less money to pay legitimate taxes and more profit going outside.

OF GENERAL INTEREST

Rome and the Sabbath

Refutation of the idea that Rome is responsible for Sunday as Sabbath, by Hermann Peisker, in the "Gospel Standard."

Assertions

This may truly be styled the age of assertion. As soon as a person is influenced by a theory which seems to be proven true by an array of facts, it is asserted to be the truth, irrespective of the formidable chain of evidence to the contrary.

Statements concerning Rome and the Sabbath are rashly made by a certain class of people, for which there is not a shred of foundation, and so shrewd is their philosophy that the average individual who is busily engaged with the cares of everyday life is unable to devote the time necessary to a careful and systematic study to verify the statements. Error can be, and very often is, served up as fact. For a person to assert a thing is not to prove it true. The following are fair samples of the assertions made about the relationship of Rome to the Sabbath:

1. "There is abundant evidence to show that the church of Rome is responsible for the change that has occurred in the practice of the people in the matter of Sabbath observance."

2. "And yet some deny that Rome changed the Sabbath, and challenge anyone to produce the 'slightest historical proof' of it. . . . Rome led in elevating the Sunday, and in trampling the Sabbath of the Lord out of sight."

3. "The apostate church called Sunday the Lord's Day. God nowhere claims this as his day, but he does the seventh. The papacy claims the first."

4. "Protestants, who keep the Sunday, a day formerly dedicated to the worship of the sun by the pagans, and afterward brought into the church by Constantine and Roman Catholics, and called the Christian Sabbath, a name never known for the first day of the week by any of the writers of the New Testament."

The above will suffice to show that those who observe the day called Saturday as the Sabbath, have justified themselves in so doing by believing and asserting that Rome supplanted that day by establishing in its stead what they called a "pagan worship day" (Sunday). They take good care not to state whether Sunday was observed by the pagan Roman empire as their rest or "worship" day, also whether sun worship was the established Roman religion. If they did, the whole foundation crumbles beneath them; for neither was the day called Sunday the Roman Sabbath, nor was sun worship the Roman national religion. Constantine could not have brought into the church, or changed the Sabbath, by elevating something which only exists in the minds of modern Saturday keepers.

The Roman Sabbath

At the time Constantine came to the throne there were several days observed for rest and worship by the different sections of the Roman empire. The Jews, who had not accepted the gospel of Christ, were observing the day called Saturday. The followers of Jesus Christ were observing the day called Sunday, which was called the Lord's Day. Both the Sabbath of the Jews, and the Lord's Day, were rest and worship days which recurred every seventh day regularly. Neither of these was the Roman Sabbath.

What then was the Roman rest day, and wherein did it differ from that of the Jews and Christians? The Roman rest days were called "Nundinae." The following quotations from standard historical works will show what they were:

"1. Nundinæ: . . . The old Roman or etruscan week contained eight days, every eighth day being specially devoted to religious and other public services."—"Calendar," Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities.

"2. Calendar: The Romans also had a week called inter-nundinum, or the interval between two Nundinæ. It consisted of eight days."

"3. Nundinæ: The Roman term for the market day held on the last day of the week of eight days, on which day the countrymen rested from labor and came to town to buy and sell, as well as to do other business. Accordingly, the Nundinæ were used for public announcements, especially concerning public assemblies and business to be conducted in them. . . . Originally, too, no legal business was conducted in them. . . . The Nundinæ, though not a regular feast day, were nevertheless celebrated in private life by inviting strangers to one's table and exempting children from going to school."—Dictionary of Classical Antiquities, by Nettleship and Sandys.

"4. Nundinæ—From the earliest times the Romans made use of a week of eight days. During the seven days the husbandman devoted himself to his rural toils, and on the eighth he repaired to the city to transact business, and exercise his political privileges. These market days were called Nundinæ. . . . The Nundinæ ran on with perfect regularity."—"The Roman Calendar."—Encyclopedia Metropolitana. 1851.

From these quotations it can be easily seen how the Romans reckoned their sabbaths. They were not seventh-day sabbaths like the Jews and Christians were observing, but eighth-day sabbaths which were on the last day of the Roman eight-day week. The Lord's Day and the Roman Sabbath only fell on the same day once in seven weeks. The Lord's Day fell on Sunday regularly, but the Roman Sabbath fell on a different day every week.

It is natural to expect that rival systems of Sabbath keeping would in time become a burden to a nation, and by attracting the attention of the ruling powers be made a matter of legislation. The question would then be: Which system of reckoning the Sabbath shall be enjoined by law? The Jewish Sabbath would not be considered, the Jews and their religion having no prominence at this time. The choice would therefore lay between the Roman eighth-day Sabbath and the Lord's Day, which was observed by the Christians every seventh day (Sunday).

What Did Constantine Do?

The Saturday keeper says:

1. "Constantine, like his ancestors, was a worshiper of the sun. The first day of the week had for ages been dedicated to that worship, and from that fact retains the name Sunday. (See Webster.) But on acknowledging Christ, Constantine refused to surrender the venerable day of the sun, and brought it into Christianity with him, and thus it was handed down to the Christian Church."—Bible Readings, p. 61.

A more willful perversion of facts would be hard to find. Sunday was not given that title because of sun worship, any more than Saturday was named because it was dedicated to Saturn worship. The days of the week were named by the Egyptians many centuries before Christ, at a time when sun worship was certainly not the dominant religion. The truth is that the Egyptians invented a seven-day week and named each of the days after the sun, moon, or one of the planets of the solar system. See Encyclopedia Britannica, volume four, article "Calendar." Saturday was named after Saturn, because that planet was supposed to preside over the first of the twenty-four hours of the day; Sunday after the Sun; Monday after the Moon, and so on.

When Constantine came to the throne, he was observing the Roman eighth-day Sabbath and not Sunday. He could not have "brought into Christianity with him" what he did not have. The week of seven days was not officially recognized by Rome, although the Jews and Christians had been observing it by keeping seventh day Sabbaths for nearly three centuries. He was favorable to the Christian religion, and it is only to be expected that his official acts would be influenced by the religion which he made the religion of the nation. What did he do? Did he enforce the Roman eighth-day Sabbath, and the eight-day week upon the church; or did he make the Lord's Day (the rest and worship day of the Christians which recurred every Sunday), and the seven-day week the law of the empire? Let his own edict bear witness:

"Let all the judges and town people, and the occupation of all trades rest on the venerable day of the sun; but let those who are situated in the country, freely and fully attend to the business of agriculture; . . . lest, the critical moment being let slip, men should lose the commodities granted by Heaven."

This edict is not an ecclesiastical one, but one made for the empire. By it Constantine set aside the Roman eighth-day rest day, and eight-day week, and substituted a seventh-day rest (Sabbath) on "the venerable day of the sun" with a seven-day week. Instead of forcing the church to adopt a pagan institution, he forced the pagan Roman empire to observe the Lord's Day as a rest day. Constantine did not change the Sabbath. He only legalized the Christian rest day.

The Change of the Roman Week

No doubt many will ask the question, "Is it an historical fact that the Roman eight-day week was changed at the time Christianity was adopted as the state religion?"

"1. Calendar: The days in calendars were originally divided into octades or eighths; but afterwards, in imitation of the Jews; which custom, Scalinger observes, was not introduced amongst the Romans until after the time of Theodosius (A. D. 346-395)."—Rees' Encyclopedia, 1819.

"2. Nundinæ: The Jewish week of seven days (Hebdomas) was known to the Romans from the time of Pompeius (A. D. 80), but was not generally adopted until after Christianity became the religion of the state."—Encyclopedia Metropolitana, article "The Roman Calendar."

"3. Week: Although it did not enter into the calendar of the Greeks, and was not introduced into Rome until after the reign of Theodosius (A. D. 346-395), it has been employed from time immemorial in almost all eastern countries."—Calendar, Encyclopedia Britannica.

"4. Week: The use of the week was introduced into the Roman Empire about the first and second century of the Christian era from Egypt, and had been recognized independent of Christianity before the Emperor Constantine confirmed it by enjoining the observance of the Christian Sabbath (A. D. 321)."—Blackie's Modern Cyclopaedia, 1890.

It is thus seen that the so often abused edict of Constantine had nothing to do with the alteration of the Christian Sabbath. It only made it the legal one. It also confirmed and enjoined the use of a seven-day week in the Roman Empire. In the reign of Theodosius the church made an aggressive move by anathemizing Judaizing Christians who desired to introduce into the church any other Sabbath than the Lord's Day, which had been observed by the church from the ascension of Christ, and made the law of the land by Constantine. The fluctuating fortunes of the church could no longer endanger the Lord's Day.

The Assertions of Rome

It is said that Rome claims to have changed the Sabbath from Saturday to Sunday. Is a thing true because it is asserted or made the subject of a claim? Will Saturday keepers admit that Peter was the first pope because he labored in Rome and the Roman church claims it? It must be borne in mind that the Roman church claims existence from the days of Christ, and changes made even then are claimed by them. All the claims of Rome must be taken with the proverbial pinch of salt, compared with history and the divine Word.

If Rome changed the Sabbath, there should be evidences to show that it occurred. There is not a single evidence in the writings of the orthodox Christian fathers of the observance of the Jewish Saturday Sabbath. Neither is there evidence of any change to be found in their writings from the days of the apostles to Constantine 321 A. D. Sunday was observed as the day of worship, and the Lord's Day, long before the church at Rome wielded any influence above that of its fellows. Had any person attempted to introduce a different day to that observed into the church, there could not fail to have been a warm controversy. Such a minor point as the date or day to be observed as Easter was hotly contested between the eastern and western Christian churches. The Bishop of Rome, who tried to dominate matters, was opposed by a powerful combination of the eastern churches. If such a small matter was disputed, an all-important matter such as a change of the worship day must have been bitterly opposed by many. Not a trace of such a contest can be found. On the contrary, the eastern churches which refused to be dominated by Rome observed and still observe the Lord's Day.

Let us be careful, therefore, that we are not deceived by the assertions of any body of people as to what they have done; or the assertions of any other body who would like to think that they did it. It is possible for a person to like or think about a thing until it crowds out all else and becomes a fixed idea. Men have really thought they were the Kaiser or other notable personages in this way. They have been unfortunate enough to find a home in an asylum for feeble-minded. Others who get fixed religious ideas are fortunate enough to escape this ignominy. Let us require proof before we receive an assertion as truth.

President Harding on Education

Without vision the people perish. Without education there can be little vision. Of education it may be said that "It is twice blest; it blesseth him that gives and him that takes." It will be greatly worth the effort if, as an incident to the observance of Education Week, we can impress this thought upon the young manhood and womanhood of the Nation and redirect their interest and patriotic zeal to the idea of making a proper contribution to educational work. It is regrettable that so few young men and women, equipped for such service, are nowadays disposed to give their time and talents to teaching. Education needs their young eagerness, zeal, and enthusiasm. There is no school of discipline more effective than that in which the teacher goes to school. We could do no greater service than by convincing those young men and women who have enjoyed educational opportunities, that they owe a reasonable share of their time and energies to teaching.

The strength and security of the Nation will always rest in the intelligent body of its people. Our education should implant conceptions of public duty and private obligation broad enough to envisage the problems of a greatly distraught world. More than anything else, men and women need the capacity to see with clear eye and to contemplate with open, unprejudiced mind, the issues of these times. Only through a properly motivated and generously inspired process of education can this be accomplished.—President Harding.

Stewardship Campaigns

The religious press continues to be full of accounts of work being done on what are called stewardship campaigns in the various churches. The Christian Standard reports a hundred who have recently pledged themselves for the study and practice of stewardships. One Bible school in Oklahoma is using studies in Christian stewardship in every adult, senior, and intermediate class. Christian stewardship is defined as follows:

"Christian stewardship is the recognition and acknowledgment of all life, with all its vast and varied contents of which money can represent but a minor part, as our Lord's estate. These are committed to our care, and, therefore, to be administered as a sacred trust."

The First School in Kansas City

It is a matter of much satisfaction that the date, location, and name of the first school established within the present limits of Kansas City are matters of historical record. This school was founded by Joseph Smith, in 1832, in what is now Troost Park, by the big spring, whose waters to-day form the Troost Park Lake, a site twelve and a half miles west of Independence. Parley P. Pratt was placed in charge of the school, that was named the "Colesville school" after the parent Mormon church at Colesville, New York. The late William Mulkey attended the school, but in his reminiscences he confuses the Colesville school and its site with a school that started a few years later near the Cave Spring, and of which he was also a pupil.—Missouri Valley Historical Society.

LETTERS AND NEWS

The Need of Shepherds

One of the letters coming to our desk contains suggestions which I am loath to keep to myself and which I therefore have pleasure in handing you so that it might be read by other Saints.

"In my estimation before sending a seventy to a district as missionary, the church must see that there is a good shepherd appointed over the district and sustained by the church, that he may keep alive those members whom we have now in the church. No progressive farmer would send out a man to purchase more stock to place upon his farm if he knew he could not get the help to care for it; neither would he discard the sick ones in trying to procure others to take their place, without making an effort to restore them to health. Where I am now laboring I have a case similar to that which I have related above. I found three families living here who have been good members in the past but who now neither have prayer in their homes, nor pay tithing nor take the church papers.

"I appointed meetings in their homes, and the first thing I was led to preach upon was the keeping up of the family altar. Then they felt the good Spirit and desired to take up the work again, and I sent in subscriptions for the church papers and they are again started on the right road. Now I spent the past month and got five families to believing our work, but did not baptize any (but I feel sure I will if I follow the interest up later). Here I have spent only one week and have brought eight of God's starving children to life again. Figure the cost of what it takes to keep me in the field, spending already one month to get new ones into the church with perhaps another month in order to lead them through the door of baptism. Then one week spent on those we have already baptized in the past. Speaking from a financial standpoint as well as spiritual, we should at least spend considerable money to feed the lambs and the sheep. This was the command given to Peter who held the keys of the kingdom in the days past and gone. Jesus said unto him, 'Peter lovest thou me?' He said, 'Lord, thou knowest that I love thee,' then Jesus said, 'Feed my sheep and lambs,' and repeated it thrice."

Very sincerely, F. HENRY EDWARDS.

The Right to Object—When and Where

Objections to sermon by the President on "Essentiality of loyalty in the development of Zion."

This is to answer the attack published in the SAINTS' HERALD, January 10, 1923, which was made in a sermon on "Loyalty," delivered in Independence, Missouri, December 3, 1922, by President Frederick M. Smith, upon leading men of the church who took an active part in the affairs of the late General Conference. I ask as one of the general officers of the church against whom charges were directed, to be heard in reply.

In a form letter sent out to all of the ministry, bearing date of "October [November] 16, 1922," signed by Frederick M. Smith, Benjamin R. McGuire, and James A. Gillen, the following counsel is given:

"The storm and stress of conference is past. A year of work lies before us. Let us move out affirmatively and constructively. Negation and debate and criticism have their place at the conference, but during the year the policies agreed upon and the officers supported by the conference should be supported. No church representative should undermine others or unsettle the faith of the Saints, but should rather use his influence to unify and build up.

"We beg of you in the interests of the great work to forget doubts and schisms and factions (if such there are) and press out unitedly this year, turning a deaf ear to unreliable and defamatory rumor. Make your mission affirmative and constructive. Seek to unite brethren and quorums rather than to divide. Seek to uphold your associates rather than to pull them down. In this spirit we pledge ourselves also to work with you and to support you with our faith and prayers."

Notwithstanding this, the President of the church declared in his sermon:

"I know that in attempting to speak of the last General Conference I am getting on dangerous ground; but that is a matter of indifference to me. My voice has been silent to a large extent on the conference, and was in the conference, and if I bubble over a bit now and then in regard to conference, you can know it is because the pent-up feelings have got the best of me."

Further:

"There is no finer and more effective weapon in the hands of Satan than the aspiration of self-appointed leaders, and I heard a danger signal long before conference that I wish every Latter Day Saint could have heard."

Again:

"Without entering into personality, without touching on or entering upon that ground, at least to the point of danger, let me indicate to you by some things that happened what was the character of the leadership that would have led this church into apostasy. One who was instrumental at least in conducting or directing the affairs of the opposition, not once but twice said to me, 'The quicker we get rid of the Doctrine and Covenants the better it will suit me.' At no time did I give an answer. I am going to give it to you to-night. At another time from a similar source came this statement that three things stood between this church and progress; one was the Book of Mormon, another the Doctrine and Covenants, and the third was the Smith family.

"Now, I answer. This church can get along without the Smith family. . . . But you cannot repudiate the Book of Mormon and the Book of Covenants and still remain the church in true succession to the church founded through the instrumentality of Joseph Smith. And when the time comes that I am compelled to lay aside my belief in the divine origin of the Book of Covenants I will have the manhood to place my resignation before you people and refuse to pose as a representative of the people when I am not representing them.

"That is my answer. That much of the conference I am going to speak of. With this in mind, some of you people can analyze the blow that was struck at one of the most sacred institutions of this church. . . .

"This church is built on Christ, but since Christ is not present with a body, then he has put into operation the principle of revelation, the presence of prophecy, the presence of the prophetic office, the work of the Comforter, the prophets to lead the church, the Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants, and now Zion. And where are you, and where is your loyalty? To revolt against properly instituted leaders at the instigation of self-appointed or aspiring leaders is not independence, it is not safety, but it is just the opposite of both. Don't forget that."

The attack appears to have been deliberately planned—preached, prepared for the press, and then published.

By what right does the President of the church violate a rule which all others are asked to faithfully observe?

In the form of a blanket the accusations are thrown upon all who took a prominent part in opposing certain measures supported by the Presidency. To make such charges in such a manner, covering persons with a cloud and mentioning no names, preaching loyalty to the Presidency and at the same time attempting to discredit others, lacks magnanimity, is uncourageous, and can have no other effect than promoting discord.

No one has a right to make such serious charges against anyone, ignoring the law and the courts of the church.

The President had an opportunity to express what was in his heart, to charge what he had to charge, at the General Conference, the same as all others present, as he appeared at different times before the assembly and took part in its deliberations.

To hold that all who criticize or oppose what is presented to the General Conference by the First Presidency are "self-appointed, or aspiring leaders," leaves no room for respect to be paid to the expressed judgment of the Twelve Apostles, Presiding Bishopric, and other orders in the church.

The New Testament reveals that the twelve apostles were not intended by the Lord to be ecclesiastical eunuchs.

No graver insult could be offered to an intelligent man than to submit a proposition to him to be voted upon, if he is not to exercise his judgment; but is expected to vote only one way.

I believe in the following: right of investigation by all in the church, set forth in the Salt Lake Tribune, January 29, 1906, by Frederick M. Smith, when a counselor in the First Presidency:

"The Deseret News has attempted to make it appear that the writer teaches and believes the same doctrine of unquestioning obedience to the men holding the priesthood as is taught by the Mormon leaders. . . . We claim the right to examine and weigh and consider, in the light of the law that God has revealed in the past, everything that purports to be from God, and when that which comes, even though it may have come through one claiming to hold and act by authority of the priesthood, is in conflict with what has already been given as law, we claim the right to reject it as not being from God. Thus 'unquestioning' obedience is not given. As evidence that we hold to this belief in theory and practice, it is only necessary to state that I have never sworn away my right thus to question what shall come through any man purporting to act in the name of God, and as one of the leaders of the Reorganized Church I can say that that organization does not ask its members to enter into covenants which will take from them this right—the covenant 'not to speak against the Lord's anointed.'

"Obedience to God always, but 'unquestioning' obedience to men, even though they hold the priesthood, never. Obedience to God and his commands always; but obedience to commands or purported commands which come through human agencies (agencies in which human liability to err is always present) without first determining them to be in harmony with God's law, never."—SAINTS' HERALD, August 22, 1906, p. 796.

In the enjoyment and exercise of our religious liberty, which is a result of our ancestors coming up through centuries of grime, blood, and conflict, it is unthinkable that there should be any other procedure than what is involved in the foregoing.

The church in an early day was commanded by the Lord to importune for redress of its wrongs "according to the laws and constitution of the people which I have suffered to be established, and should be maintained for the rights and protection of all flesh, according to just and holy principles. . . . And for this purpose have I established the constitution of this land, by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood."—Doctrine and Covenants 98: 10.

The constitution, with its clear lines separating the executive, judicial, and legislative functions of the government, was established for the "protection of all flesh"—in and out of the church. Any confusing of these functions of government constitutes a positive element of danger.

A right similar to the one possessed by the people of the Government to inquire into its financial standing, and criticize measures proposed and intended for law, is inherent in the church. At the proper time and place it is the full and untrammelled prerogative of members of the church to examine into their finances, analyze proposed legislation, and deal with purported revelations.

When anything goes for action before the General Conference, which is a parliamentary body, there should go with it a parliamentary right to discuss, and the right of choice to vote for or against, and this without fear of the ones availing themselves of their constitutional privileges being afterward represented as "self-appointed or aspiring leaders."

The Lord directs the church to watch carefully the administration of its officers; note the following:

"In case of the removal of my servant now presiding over the church by death or transgression, my servant Frederick M. Smith, if he remain faithful and steadfast, should be chosen, in accordance with the revelations which have been hitherto given to the church concerning the priesthood. Should my servant Frederick M. Smith prove unstable and unfaithful, another may be chosen, according to the law already given."—Doctrine and Covenants 127: 8.

What is stated applies in principle not only to the Presidency of the church, but as well to presidents of branches, districts, and stakes.

Unless members analyze, scrutinize, and are alert respecting the conduct and administration of the President of the church, how will they be able to determine whether or not he is "unstable and unfaithful," and know whether or not "another" should be chosen? Loyalty does not consist in blind obedience to leaders, but in following them so far as they follow Christ. Confidence and loyalty are priceless gifts that have to be won.

It is not provided in the church of God that any one man shall impose his will upon all others. I am not convinced there is too much democracy in the church. When the revelation on spiritual wifery was going the rounds in Nauvoo, and other works were fostered, prior to the rejection of the church, it would have been a good thing if there had not been so much "blind obedience" on the part of the membership of the church.

If men are not encouraged or expected in General Conference to express themselves within parliamentary rules, courteously, fearlessly, and fully, according to their convictions, but in so doing are to be regarded and portrayed as disloyal to the chief authority of the church, the institution so carrying on is different from the church in which I held membership and was ordained an apostle in the year 1913.

The church must be guided by principles, then it knows in what direction it is going—not by the influence of man. It is necessary for the church to be directed by just, merciful, and holy principles, and be saved from what causes suspicion, separates brethren, and drives men from their responsible places in the church.

My attitude is now what it has been, and I intend that it shall be what it is; by which is meant, when anything relating to the general church is presented in the joint council, or the General Conference, I shall support what I think deserves support, criticize what invites criticism, and oppose what appears to me not to be for the welfare of the church.

PAUL M. HANSON.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, January 11, 1923.

Regarding the President's Sermon on Loyalty

One of the Twelve takes issue with President Smith in some of the issues before the church.

In the issue for January 10, 1923, volume 70, number 2, there appears a report of a sermon preached by President Frederick M. Smith in Independence, Missouri, Sunday evening, December 3, 1922, entitled, "The essentiality of loyalty in the development of Zion."

In spite of the fact that the speaker claims to be under the influence of unusual emotional pressure—"If I bubble over a bit now and then in regard to conference, you can know that it is because the pent-up feelings have got the best of me"—it is evident that this is a deliberate blow at the integrity and honor of those against whom he makes the insinuations.

This attempt to discredit men who conscientiously stood for what they believed to be right and just, even though such a course was disagreeable and in opposition to President Smith, does not justify the placing of all those who voted in the negative upon questions which the President thought should be affirmed, in public pillory. This is neither "fair play," nor in harmony with the elementary principles which the church has indorsed for the adjustment of difficulties between the brethren.

The attempt to deflect the attention of the church public from the issues involved in the discussions of the late General Conference by attracting attention to the "apostasy," and the efforts to lead the church astray by the "would-be self-appointed leaders," and the innuendoes against the character of such men, is neither "kindly" nor "becoming a servant of God," and against such a procedure I earnestly protest.

Why does the President of the church wait until after the conference to introduce these insinuations against these men or the man whom he has in mind but does not name? These men were sustained during the President's presence in the conference, by the conference in their official capacity, and no protest was raised by him. Why not have taken the men or the man to task and required an accounting when the statements he alleges, were made?

Surely if these men or the man are as guilty as the innuendoes would imply, they have a right to be heard, and it is the duty of the President at least to try "to gain his brother." Why use such matter for the purpose of securing the verdict of the church against them and of arousing suspicion and hostility until the elementary law of the church had been complied with?

Then consider the further fact, that after the discussion upon the revelation was over and the vote had been taken, and the document accepted as law to govern the church, at the following session one of the members of the First Presidency arose and made a statement in which he said: "I believe it to be one of the duties of the Presidency to unify the high priesthood. . . . We have not yet succeeded in doing that. . . . But it seems to me that if presently there does not come more unity the time will come when we of necessity must step aside and permit you to select some one else who can perform that work."

One of the two factors which this speaker mentioned as conducing to the division of the priesthood was, "misunderstanding and misapprehension," and pleaded that "the President and the priesthood will unite to forget and forgive all past wounds."

Such wise and chaste words not only touch the heart with emotion but convince the intellect because of their soundness and sanity.

So far as the writer is concerned, as one of the Twelve and speaking for them, the position was stated frankly and clearly: "We shall play the game according to the rules of Christian ethics, and continue to do our best for the advancement of the work as long as God and the people may wish us to serve. . . . I want you to believe that in spite of all the ebbing and flowing of the tides of battle, now that the conference has spoken and approved, and I am glad it has, of the document presented to us by the President of the church, so far as we of the quorum who yet remain are concerned, we pledge the loyalty and support of the quorum to the program that is being put forth by the church to the up-building of the kingdom of God."

President F. M. Smith himself replying to these speeches said: "The introduction of these speeches at this time has been quite unexpected to me. I am glad that they were made. I appreciate the expressions of loyalty that come from both sides. Without some such assurance or expression of loyalty, it would have been a difficult task to take up the arduous proposition of carrying on the work with a divided priesthood. I shall do my part."

After the conference was over, some of us waited upon the President personally to express that now the conference was over, and a new leaf had been turned, we would be glad to do all possible to labor with him to make the work a success. The President expressed his pleasure, and said that he would wish to talk over two or three matters, but would not do so at that time because we were too near the events of the conference and "might knock off the scabs." So the matter rested.

What can be the purpose of the President striking such a blow as this at such a time and under such conditions? Surely his feelings bubbling over in such a way leading him to such indiscretion ought at least to suggest to him the need of reconsideration. The outcome can only be injurious, and the cause to which we are all pledged in loyalty must be retarded.

Very truly,
JOHN W. RUSHTON.

Zion Builders' Sermons

Often inquiring friends ask, "Haven't you anything on . . ." mentioning various fundamental subjects on which they desire to know our position.

One of the best pieces of literature to meet this general demand is a series of sermons addressed to the young people of the church, by President Elbert A. Smith, entitled Zion Builders' Sermons.

A sermon is devoted to each of the "first principles" with one on "The Restoration," and one on "Our spiritual inheritance."

These sermons appeal to all ages and all classes. They are simple and direct, appealing to the lad of twelve or the experienced adult.

The sermons are all nicely bound in a book of 116 pages, with pleasing cover, which sells for only 20 cents each, postpaid.

Our Financial Situation

Increase in income and decrease in expenditures show favorable conditions.

(In order to simplify the reading of the figures shown we have omitted the odd hundreds in dollars and cents.)

At the close of business February 28, 1923, our operating statement showed an excess of income over expenses amounting to $5,000. The operating deficit of $55,000 on December 31, 1922, as referred to in our previous article on "The improved financial outlook," published in the HERALD under date of February 7, has been entirely wiped out.

In other words, the operating income so far this year, or for the period from July 1, 1922, to February 28, 1923, including Christmas offering of $65,000, amounted to $297,000; whereas, the expense for the period aggregated $292,000. A year ago, or on February 28, 1922, our operating figures reflected a deficit of $72,000. However, the Christmas offering collected during 1921 and 1922, which amounted to about $49,000 was not used for operating purposes during this period, and therefore was not included in our income. Had we used this Christmas offering to pay operating expenses, the deficit on February 28 last year would have been $23,000, as compared with a surplus of $5,000, at the close of February 28 this year.

The total income including Christmas offering received during the period from July 1, 1921, to February 28, 1922, was $286,000 as compared to a total income of $297,000 for the same period of this year. The expenses for the period from July 1 to February 28 last year amounted to $309,000 as compared with $292,000 for the same period of this year. In comparing the two periods it will be seen that the income for the last period has been increased about $11,000, while the expenses have been reduced about $17,000.

While our income during the first eight months of this year was greater than during the corresponding period of last year, the operating surplus of $5,000 as shown on February 28, 1923, was principally brought about because of a reduction in operating expenses. If, during the remaining four months of this year our income will average $37,000 per month, and without any increase in the average of operating expenses, the fiscal year 1922-23 will be closed without an operating deficit. However, as previously stated, because of this pleasing financial outlook we should not relinquish our efforts, or in all probability we will defeat our purpose, but stimulated by the encouraging results achieved during the first eight months, let us press onward with renewed determination to accomplish our purpose. The Bishopric feel that the Saints are to be congratulated upon their wholehearted response to the financial needs of the church, and we sense the responsibility of prudently administering the funds received.

The Soldiers of Christ

During the Great World War the German army was looked upon as a great piece of fighting machinery by all who knew of their tactics. We will grant they were, but that was all. The German soldiers were trained with one thought—to do a certain thing at a certain time. Also to follow in one route at a given or fixed time. If they were shelling a place, they would fire two or three shots at intervals of five minutes each, then stop for half an hour, then begin again.

That is why they lost. They fought because they were as a machine. America fought for an ideal, for home, loved ones, and their country.

What are we to-day? Are we true soldiers of Christ, or just a piece of machinery? If we are true Latter Day Saints we have the Spirit of God to urge us on to do great and noble work. Members of the great army of the world, and the churches of Babylon, continue doing the things that have been drilled into them for ages, not because the guiding Spirit tells them to, but because they have a form they must adhere to at all times. Therefore, they do certain things at a given time.

Let us be up and doing, striving earnestly to hold up the banner of righteousness at all times. Let us put ourselves up for inspection, and see if we are one hundred per cent Latter Day Saints, or if we are just a piece of machinery, as the German army was.

Kansas City Stake News

The conference held February 18 and 19 at Central Church was a round of wholesomeness. Sunday was sunshiny, and while it was a little crisp it was not the kind of weather that would keep any away from the services who really wanted to come. The department of religious education, as usual, was able to take care of several visitors in addition to its regular attendance. One should see the Central school in action to appreciate what is being done there—order like clock work and lessons usually studied, two things most necessary.

President Floyd M. McDowell had been announced for the entire day, so there was a crowd. Arrangements had been made for conducting two services at each meeting time except 7.45. That is, a junior meeting at 11 a. m. in addition to the regular services; the elders' quorum and Aaronic priesthood met at 1.30; social service for the young and the older ones at 2.30; and Women's and Men's Department at 4.15.

Well, Brother Floyd came! He addressed the morning assembly in the main auditorium and was associated in presiding at the young people's social service. In the ministry at 4.15 he had a fine audience, as well as in the evening. While his guns were trained on the ranks of the young with telling effect, some of the older ones were affected by what might be called shell shock. He affects the conversational style in speaking, yet his audience responded with rapt attention. They had not forgotten his effort of a year ago and insisted on showing him their appreciation.

Some of the thoughts suggested at 11 a. m. followed the scriptural injunction from 1 Thessalonians 5:1: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." Lengthen your rope and strengthen your stakes. The modern world has lengthened its ropes, but has not strengthened its stakes. The things which brought the destruction of the ancient world are here to-day; the future is uncertain. Modern invention has not failed us; it has thrown us into the water and now we have to swim.

At 4.15 the ministry were taught a lesson by Brother McDowell who began by referring them to the oft-quoted scripture, Proverbs 29:18: "Where there is no vision the people perish," stating that we need a vision of our goal, purpose, and aims; should keep this before us. He pictured a big vision of our work. Some antagonize a church school because of lack of vision. All have not vision, because we have not seen the need of preparation. We are too unmindful of our social condition. Some think that society is a mess pot in which all things are dumped and each take out equally. The relation of our job to the program of religious education should be understood and observed religiously. Some think religion all at once is the thing. Is sudden conversion sufficient? Too much stress on the change at baptism is urged. What about the time in our lives before and after? Shall we wait till the children become adult sinners before teaching them? The Shakers are selling their property because there are no children to carry on their work; millions of dollars are spent to teach the boy that two times two is four. How much is spent for religious education? Emphasize the teaching of children as well as adults.

The lecture method is the poorest method of teaching. What percentage of teaching through the sermon reaches the young? Religious education comprehends the play time, and the playground is where many problems arise that call into play our best judgment. The Sunday school and the Department of Expression lack teamwork. The schools should work together. Visits form a most important part in religious education. It is a most excellent thing to feed those in the church not only in the first grade, but the second and third and so on. Proselyting is another way to carry on in religious education. To-day's problem is separate from yesterday's and must be met. There is no easy method. Our effort must be diligent. The proposition is not "get mine" but "give mine!" We must ever keep before us the new social order. We have the key to the problem of the ages. We make a mistake when we think we have a monopoly on stewardships, consecrations, and sacrifices. There are others.

The sermon at 7.45 was based upon Thessalonians 4: 1-12. The function of the church is to keep alive these wonderful ideals. The Greeks were dreamers, but the Romans were builders. There is a need that we set aside a few moments each day to answer the demands of our spiritual needs. "More abundant life" is needed in the individual and the group. It is a most selfish thing to live for oneself but we should strive to bring men progressively to God. "Who will tell me that we have progressed in spiritual things as we have in material things?" Christ's plan is not a dogmatic plan which he desired to force us to obey. We have looked too much on the distant pearly gates and too little on things of vice around us. There is a way that you may develop that more abundant life. Take note. Corn is a native large grass. The original height was two feet three inches. It has now been developed until it reaches a height of ten to twelve feet and produces an ear from one that was one inch in diameter to the size of three inches. It has found a more abundant life. Burbank has perfected the daisy from that found growing in a wild state to the Shasta daisy, a magnificent bloom. May not we be compared to the daisy? We need the gospel of Christ, the greatest philosophy of life.

The first Christian grace is a Christian consciousness of the world and its needs, an awareness of the interdependence of life. Am I my brother's keeper? We have not enough respect for others' religion; we are angry when another does not have respect for our religion. Christ taught that human life is sacred. The mother exemplifies the Spirit of God when she goes down through the valley of death to bring others to her home. A desire for the Spirit of God shall be a desire that his will concerning us be done, that God's will might come to us. Have courage for a world's purpose. Consider man's relationship to man, and man's relationship to God. Luther said, "I will not take it back," when challenged for the stand he took as the first exponent of the Reformation, a readiness to pay the cost. "Except a grain of wheat fall into the dust and die it abideth alone." First, servant of all, which is the law of consecration. A fine thing to be a partner of God, for the furtherance of his purposes. It is a fine thing to pour out your soul to God whose ear will hear your supplication. I believe the church's best exemplification of his life is lived in the flesh. The goal to work for is to do what he wants you to do. Substitute love for hate, selfishness, and ignorance. Sixty thousand children die annually from preventable causes. We should say, "Here am I, use me." God is our Father; mankind our brother. Wealth must find its expression in service to man. Surplus to all is the key most important. In facing the world choose the good; eschew the bad. Will you not strive to this end?

The prayer and testimony services for the young at 2.30 and the older ones were replete with the best of expressions savored by the good spirit at both meetings, which were well attended and the time fully occupied.

The Department of Women at 4.15 assembled in the main auditorium and were favored by an address by Professor Nowlin of the Northeast High School on psychology.

The interests of the Graceland College Home-coming were set forth by F. M. McDowell. It occurs June 3 to 16.

Bishop Ellis Short from Zion was a visitor and bore a valiant testimony at the prayer meeting.

The church statistician, Brother F. A. Russell, was present counseling the brethren on how to report their work.

A song service at 7.15 was conducted by Bernice Griffith, chorister.

Business meeting at 7.45 on the 19th was in charge of the stake presidency, J. A. Tanner, S. S. Sandy, and Charles D. Jellings. The bishopric reported for the year 1922,

Cash on hand January 1, 1922	$ 2,509.03
Received since	47,133.62
		$49,642.65
Total		$49,642.65
Expenditures	$45,867.57

FREDERICK S. ANDERSON, Bishopric.

The high council recommended the following brethren for ordination which was ordered by the conference: Wilfred Winn, priest; Ira G. Clutter, counselor to president of priests' quorum; E. H. Marks, priest; Calvin Budd, priest. The recorder reported a membership of 2,952 of which 177 were of the ministry.

A petition from the Fourth congregation asking for an enlargement of their building was referred to the stake presidency and bishopric for action.

The Grandview congregation reported total bills to date on their new edifice as $9,145.05, of which $6,483 has been paid.

Appointments as pastors for the thirteen congregations were changed only at Bennington where Brother R. L. Bishop was the appointee.

The Departments of Religious Education and Expression and Training are operated jointly, Brother F. A. Cool having charge. But as the brother may not remain much longer the appointment was left open.

Sister Fern Lloyd was appointed supervisor of the Department of Women. Sister Bernice Griffith was sustained as director of music.

The matter of fully concurring in the coordinating plan was finally accepted by the Department of Women, thus completing this departure of stake work as all departments now operate under this plan and are working under class four as formerly mentioned. The stake presidency and bishopric form a board to arrange a budget for the administration expense of all departments.

Amos T. Higdon finished the series of special services at Armourdale the 18th. Brethren Budd and Edwards of the Twelve assisted. A splendid interest was manifest throughout but no further results.

Patriarch Ammon White held three consecutive services at the Northeast Mission commencing the 13th. Brother Higdon commenced a series there the 25th.

Independence

Appointments at Independence Sunday were as follows: Elders J. A. Gillen and James F. Keir at the Stone Church; Elders George Jenkins and J. A. Gillen at Liberty Street; Elders Lyman W. Fike and Wilbur B. Paul at Englewood; Elders J. W. Peterson and J. A. Dowker at Enoch Hill; Elders W. D. Bullard and Herbert L. Barto at Walnut Park.

Plans are being made for a large auto party composed mostly of young people to visit the historic Far West region on the last Sunday in April. Preceding this date, on two Sundays (April 15 and 22) Church Historian Walter W. Smith will address the young people's meetings at the Stone Church on the history and geography of the region, then on the 29th will be in charge of the program for the day. The party will leave here early in the day and drive the sixty-odd miles, spend the day, and return in the evening. Others in the surrounding territory as well as in Independence are invited to participate in this important venture. If convenient to attend the two lectures preceding, it would be a good plan to do so. Those who believe they might go would do well to get in touch with E. D. Moore, care Herald Office, who is in charge of the young people's meetings at the Stone Church and is arranging for the trip.

The following women have been appointed supervisors over the Stone Church district in Independence: District 1A, groups 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, Mrs. Alice M. Cowan; District 1B, groups 6, 7, 8, 9, Mrs. J. G. Pointer; District 6, groups 10, 11, 12, Mrs. A. E. Nunn; District 7, groups 18, 19, 34, Mrs. Ellis Short, sr.; District 8, groups 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, Mrs. Flo Whittemore.

The city health inspector reports that the "flu" epidemic is subsiding in Independence but it has left a number of people only partly convalescent as yet.

The Independence Music Club which has sponsored a very fine series of concerts here this winter, presented Mr. Reuben Davies, pianist, on Tuesday evening. This was the fifth number of this year's series. The number given by artist members of the club will be presented in April.

Brother Leslie S. Wight has been made general sales manager of the Sodiphene Company of Kansas City and is moving his family to that city. His family has been in Lamoni during the winter.

President Floyd M. McDowell was in Independence over the week end, and went down to the Holden conference which was held at Lees Summit Saturday and Sunday.

Brother Herbert L. Barto has moved to Independence from Goodland, Kansas, and has taken up work with Irving-Pitt Manufacturing Company. For some years after moving from Independence, Brother Barto and his family lived in Lamoni, but they have been in western Kansas the last few years and have been very active in trying to forward the church work in that place.

There has been a great deal of sickness in the home of President Elbert A. Smith the last few weeks. Brother Elbert was taken ill with influenza when he was in Lamoni two weeks ago and was detained there for several days recovering from the effects of the disease. On his return home his wife went through a siege of influenza and following that Mrs. Asa Cochran, Sister Smith's mother, and Mrs. David H.

Smith, President Elbert's mother, were attacked by the same disease. Sister Cochran and Sister David H. Smith were taken to the Sanitarium Monday afternoon, where they can receive professional nursing and care. Both are advanced in years but it is hoped that they will respond favorably to the expert treatment that the Sanitarium affords.

Mr. and Mrs. F. S. Dillon, of Lamoni, Iowa, have a fine baby boy which was born to them at the Sanitarium this week.

Brother William D. Roberts died in Independence Tuesday morning after an illness of several weeks. Brother Roberts was well known and highly regarded in this city, and had taken an active part in years past in the city affairs, serving two years in the city council for his ward. He was a building contractor, and did extensive and creditable building for years. Brother Roberts was born at Tabor, Iowa, in 1857, and came to Independence in 1883. He leaves his wife, Mrs. Mattie Roberts, and three children, Miss Ruby Roberts, Mrs. J. A. Holsworth, and Mr. Earl D. Roberts to mourn. The funeral was at the Stone Church at three o'clock on Thursday afternoon in charge of Pastor Roy V. Hopkins, the sermon being preached by Doctor Joseph Luff. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

Brother James Hamilton who was born in Kentucky in 1844 and who lived in Independence for over 36 years, died Saturday morning. He was a Civil War veteran, one of that fast fading company of Grand Army men. His widow, Mrs. Jane Hamilton, as well as two of his children, Mrs. Clifford Forties, of Kansas City, and Charles Hamilton, of this city, were with him at the last. The funeral was held Monday afternoon at the Carson chapel. Interment in Mound Grove Cemetery.

Bishop Benjamin R. McGuire, Elder T. C. Kelley, and Church Statistician Frank A. Russell and wife went to Saint Joseph to attend the Far West stake conference which was held in that city Saturday and Sunday.

Meetings in Holden Stake

About the middle of December I received notice of my appointment which read, "Holden Stake; Lexington objective." Leaving home on December 30 I arrived in Lexington the same day and feeling the need of acquainting myself with my new situation I spent the first week in visiting among the Saints trying as best I could to encourage them in the work. Having secured the Church of God church which is situated three miles west of Lexington we began services January 7 and continued two weeks with good attendance and interest. Brother George Shippy, one of our old missionaries and a splendid preacher, assisted in the preaching.

We closed the meetings at McGrew Church January 21 and immediately began preparations to hold services at the Saints' church in Lexington commencing on January 28. I spent several days visiting and distributing tracts and advertising our services but on Thursday, the 25th, I found it necessary to return to my home at Knobnoster and was afflicted for ten days with what seemed to be the "flu." Feeling strong enough to begin operations again I returned to Lexington on February 3 accompanied by Elder J. F. Petre, and upon arriving there was gratified to learn that the pastor of the branch, Elder G. W. Talley, had filled the pulpit very acceptably in our absence and there had been a good attendance and interest during the week. I believe it was stated that Brother George Shippy had preached once during that time.

The Saints of Lexington were gratified to have Presiding Patriarch F. A. Smith with them on Sunday, February 4, and to listen to the splendid discourse he delivered at 7.30 p. m.

The meetings continued for two weeks after our arrival with increasing interest resulting in the baptism of five splendid people, all of whom are adults. The writer baptized two on February 12 and Brother Petre the remaining three on February 18, the closing day of the services. On the 19th we began services at a place called Summit, situated about three miles south of Lexington and we are preaching every night to a crowded house. We are hoping other honest-hearted souls may be led into the kingdom of God as a result of these services.

Words fail to express my appreciation for the way in which the splendid Saints of Lexington Branch have cared for our needs and have assisted us in various ways in making our work successful.

ROBERT E. BURGESS.

Traveling in Wyoming

Leaving my wife and family in Independence, the writer once again resumed the old mode of travel and returned to his field by train, singlehanded and alone.

I enjoy rail travel, but I must say that it is not like floating over the country in old Stanley, where we always have our home with us whether on plain or in canyon, highway or low way, glen, forest, continental divide, or where not.

My trip here from Independence was over the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad by way of Denver, Alliance, Casper, Thermopolis, Burlington, Greybull, Lovell, Billings, and Sheridan. We have members at all these points, and let me say that members of the church living in Wyoming or planning on living here or motoring through here will do

Seven Reasons Why I Am Going to the Young People's Convention

Reason Number Three: Because We Want Vision

I have been raised in the church and at times very much desire to give my life to the service of the Master. Although I have tried to do my best in preparing and have tried in a small way to help out in my branch, I seem to lack a vision of the purpose of the church. I do not understand what this "Zion" is all about. I seem to work in the dark. I wonder at times if we know just which way we are going. I wonder if we have a purpose, an aim, a vision, of what we want to accomplish. Since first I heard of the Young People's Convention to be held next June at Graceland, I have felt that there at last was the thing that the young people of the church needed. I am going to the convention because I need to vision the aims of the church. I understand this is just the purpose of this meeting of young people. I am sure that you cannot afford to miss this opportunity. Come with me then and be able to return to your homes inspired by the marvelous vision of the aims of the church in this the latter day.

Lamoni the Place

June 3 to 16 the Date

well to note that we not only are represented at the places named but also at Cheyenne, Laramie, Green River, Rock Springs, Medicine Bow, Lander, Ralston, Powell, Albin, Pine Bluffs, Manville, Alcove, Arvada, Alva, New Castle, New Haven, Ewing, Fort Washakie, Lingle, Vaughan, each of which, except a couple, I have visited.

At Alliance, on the Nebraska side, but not far, we have about fourteen members but no officers. They were largely without the knowledge of each other until my recent visit there when I dug them up and got them in touch. If persons moving into the State or traveling through will write me in regard to any particular place or places I will give them the names of our people. Some of them have been many years in isolation and still cling to their faith. One I have just visited for the first time, Mrs. Rosa French-Nelson, formerly of Santa Ana, California, has been here about fifteen years in the valley of the Greybull.

Passing through Billings, Montana, in order to get east of the Big Horn Mountains, I determined to call on a Doctor Charles Chase whose address had been furnished me. Who did I run into but the son of Amos Chase, our missionary. I was made to feel welcome for the night in their neat little cottage, but we talked so late and slept so late that we had to proceed with Paul Revere speed in his able machine to get me to my morning train. They are four, consisting of a physician with an evidently good practice, an amiable wife, and two little girls to break the monotony of the passing hours.

Living in dry plateau Wyoming is generally about as high as the elevation, with the exception of potatoes and, at the points of production, coal, gas, and honey. Potatoes at Alliance were available at thirty cents a bushel in carload quantities when I was there. Coal at Sheridan, self-hauled, is between two and three dollars per ton. Gas at Lovell is 25 cents per thousand feet and is used for both heating and cooking instead of coal. Honey at the same place was $1 per gallon (twelve pounds) lately and perhaps is yet.

Our plan is to return to Independence in the spring for the steamer and Margaret and Lorne and we plan not to return to Missouri for next winter.

Correspondents, remember Albin, Wyoming, always gets me.

ALVIN KNISLEY.

Oklahoma City, Oklahoma

Editors Herald: The branch at Oklahoma City is still striving to do the will of their Master. Brother S. W. Simmons has been here for medical treatment this winter and we have enjoyed hearing him preach very much.

The Department of Recreation and Expression was organized by the branch president, Brother Ed Dillon, with the young folks in charge. Ray Butler is the president. We are planning to go to Lamoni in June.

The Kashaway Oriole Girls and the boys went to visit a literary society at Sooner Country School Friday night, February 23.

We wish to extend our sympathy to Mr. and Mrs. Earl McDivitt because of the death of their infant daughter.

Sister Amend and Sister Page have been sick but we hope and pray for their rapid recovery. Several have had the influenza but are better now.

Brother Ed Dillon is the pastor of the branch this year. Brother Roy S. Budd, of Independence, preached last Monday and Tuesday nights.

HELEN RIVERS, Branch Reporter.

A branch may not be dead, but dying. In either event it needs reviving. Can you do the work or do you need the help of an evangelist?

If every radio fan within our radius listens in next Sunday, 500,000 people will hear Elder Cyril E. Wight. If five per cent listen in we shall have an audience of 25,000. This is somewhat larger than Lyman Wight, Cyril's grandfather, ever expected when he went to preaching service.

Some of our branches are making a special feature of their radio concerts. In order to help them, and also to give more of the traditional aspect of a service, we hope to be able to include full choral singing in the near future.

This is a day of cooperation. For example, we do not know what type of program is most suited to your needs unless you write and tell us. Why not send your suggestions in on a post card?

It would help us to plan ahead if we knew how many Saints listened in from time to time. If every one who hears next Sunday's service writes in and mentions his membership, it will help us. We are counting on you. Thanks very much!

Very sincerely yours,

Blue Pencil Notes

Probably we should not mention it at all, but judging by psychologists and their conclusions regarding the masses, based on mental tests, a great many people who have had pleasure in calling us "Mormons" are properly designated by that word with the second m omitted.

"Thank you" has become pretty well standardized. It is said in a very crisp, business-like, but mechanical manner, with the rising inflection on "you."

Even paganism may come to recognize the philosophy, "Live and let live"; but Christianity says, "Live and help live."

A story has been going the rounds among football circles to this effect: A student in a certain university is a most able football player, but quite hopeless as a student. Things reached a crisis during the recent football season when in order for the university to win out in athletics it was quite necessary for him to continue on the team, and where if he was to continue on the team it was quite necessary for him to make certain grades. Among other things he had to have at least fifty in chemistry. As a chemist he was a good football player. A professor who was a very enthusiastic football roter was appointed to give the examination. The student passed. Later the president of the university, being somewhat curious, approached the professor and said to him, "How in the world did Brown pass his examination in chemistry?" The professor replied, "I asked him only two questions. One he answered wrong and the other he answered right, so I gave him fifty." "What were the questions?" the president persisted. "Well," replied the professor, "I first asked him the color of blue vitriol. He said it was pink. Naturally he was wrong. Next I asked him the color of red precipitate and he said that he did not know, and he was right, so I gave him fifty."

From time immemorial efforts have been made to develop religiously in seclusion. Man has been slow to give up the thought that the life of the religious hermit or anchorite is the ideal religious life. Such a life was considered a surrender to God. It was not. It was a surrender to the Devil. It was a surrender to the Devil in this sense, that it was a complete retreat from the battlefield of life. It was a retreat from the active affairs of life and the normal and wholesome relationships of life in which religion must function if it ever functions. Religion must function in the relationships of the family, the home, of business, of the community, or not at all. The religious hermit retreated from those domains, admitting that he did not believe that religion could meet those problems, religion was only for prayer and meditation. Even Paul, militant Christian that he was, seemed to flee matrimony, and rather encouraged others to do so, as an estate in which religion could scarcely hope to survive.

As a matter of fact man is social and gregarious. The life of the religious hermit was abnormal, and if judged by its fruits not entirely sane, and certainly unwholesome—indeed it was more irreligious than religious. Doctor Hall in his book, Ethics within Organized Christianity (p. 248) has a very interesting study of the mental effect produced by such a life. Bear in mind that he quotes this study from old Catholic writings in the Latin. Doctor Hall writes:

"It is pathetic in the extreme to read the careful and most interesting psychological analyses of the mental states produced by the unnatural life of the monk. 'The sixth struggle is what the Greeks call —, which we may render weariness and anxiety of heart. It is like melancholia, and is particularly severe with the hermit and a constant and dangerous foe of the solitary, attacking the monk at the sixth hour, as does a fever with its burning heat the sick man, at regular intervals . . . and when it seizes some miserable one, he conceives a horror of the place, and utter disgust of his cell; of his brethren also with him or near him it begets disdain and contempt, as negligent and unspiritual.'"

Le Petit Parisien quotes a London paper in description of a certain funeral occasion, as follows: "The procession was very beautiful and nearly two miles long, as was also the prayer offered by the Reverend Perry."

Up from earth's center through the Seventh Gate
I rose, and on the throne of Saturn sate,
And many a Knot unravelled by the Road;
But not the Master-Knot of Human Fate.
There was the Door to which I found no key;
There was the Veil through which I could not see;
Some little talk awhile of Me and Thee
There was—and then—no more of Thee and Me.

The experience of the young man who has cherished a philosophical or academic interest in fatherhood who suddenly finds himself fully initiated to the Order Parental is set forth by Gilliland in his poem, "The ever new":

He knew that he knew all of fatherhood:
He had read books about it; had observed.
He knew quite all there was in it of good;
How to unselfish sacrifice it nerved
Men of the feeblest courage. He was wise
On that and all themes else below the skies!

One day his young wife hid her blushing face
Against his breast and whispered something sweet.
A thrill, of which he ne'er had known a trace
In all his past, stirred him from head to feet.
To man's full stature in a trice he grew;
At last life's deepest springs he knew—he knew!

Now when, upon his awkward, untaught arm,
He holds the helpless mite—Hers and his own,
And feels that from earth's most resistless harm
He could defend it with that arm alone,
He understands as ne'er he understood—
As though he had invented fatherhood!

His Service to Man

He gave all and counted it gain. His life, death, and resurrection are all one gift to man.

Again the Easter season is upon us when we celebrate the most wonderful event in the world, the death and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. By his death he crowned his life. The fact that there were various sun heroes and that among pagan nations a celebration took place in the spring of the year largely religious interpreted by some as a worship of growing vegetation, by others interpreted as solar mythology, by others as traditions of truth handed down from the past does not change the essential fact of the birth and death of Jesus of Nazareth, the Messiah of the Jews, the Savior of all mankind.

When he came to the world how readily might a plea have been made that if he were allowed $20,000,000 a year it represented great self-denial compared to that which he already had, for by him the world was made. The cattle on a thousand hills were his; he possessed wealth and power beyond the possibility of humanity to comprehend. If he had come as a great prince with mighty power and with the wealth of $20,000,000 a year how well could he have used or utilized such an amount for social good with the wisdom and knowledge which he possessed.

Yet such was not his choice. We are told he was offered the whole world and the kingdoms thereof and refused it, yet he spoke not of his sacrifice nor of the great service he rendered.

Krishna, according to the tale, came as a mighty prince to India; Buddha is made a prince both of Persia and India and as possessing great wealth. Horace in Egypt was also a royal prince possessing power and wealth as measured by human elements. But why prolong the list? Jesus who was no myth but who indeed took part of flesh and blood, Jesus did not choose to come as a royal prince of India nor of Persia nor of Egypt. He did not come to cultured peace nor to the powerful rulers of Rome. He came to little Judea. Nor did he come to the ruling powers of Judea but to the hut of the carpenter.

Yet he was not born even in those humble surroundings for he was born in a stable. The character of the stable has been variously discussed, but it was evidently a stable—on that all writers agree, and that he was laid in a manger.

He abode as a carpenter not only in the early years preceding his enrollment in the men of the tribe but through all the thirty years that he was subject as a Jew to his parents, and then he entered upon his mission. Entering upon his mission he left even the humble home he already possessed. Were any hungry? So was he hungry. Were any athirst? So he had known the pangs of thirst, doubtless in the desert, but certainly on the cross. Do any demean their humble home or lack a bed? The birds of the air had their nests, the foxes their homes, but the Son of man had not where to lay his head. He became the humblest of all in his life. He descended beneath all even into the pangs of hell in his death. Have any felt themselves forsaken of God? That which they have felt for a moment when the Spirit of God was withdrawn he suffered for every man so that in anguish he cried out, "My God, my God, hast thou forsaken me?"

In other words, he became among the least of earth and suffered with others that he might become a fit representative of his brethren and the founder of Zion, the pure in heart, that he might establish the kingdom of God both in heaven and also in earth. He suffered the most ignominious death at last only to have that prayer answered, "Glorify thou me with the glory which I had with thee before the world was."

Mankind really trusts such a leader; man really rejoices that into his hands has been given all power both in heaven and on earth; hence to-day in song, in vocal and silent prayer, and in testimony, our hearts rejoice with that assurance that he has risen from the dead having first set us an example that we may follow in his steps and thus become with him joint heirs of our heavenly Father.

What Christianity Is Doing

In the midst of much pessimistic discussion we sometimes lost sight of facts concerning spiritual and moral advancement.

Thus Doctor Robert E. Speer, the president of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, in a recent address on foreign missions, emphasized the following facts concerning Christianity:

First, the miracle of transformed individuals, men and women who are apparently made over immediately through conversion.

Second, the great tides of changing life pulsing through the world. Thus, according to the report of this address in the Christian Work, Mr. Ghandi is doing more to spread the teachings of Christian missions than all of the missions have been able to do in a hundred years. A national congress was recently held in India making him dictator over Hindus and Mohammedans alike. The unity of the people and their joint interests were emphasized, and this departure from old ideals was justified, not from the Hindu scriptures, but by appealing straight to the principles of the gospel of Christ.

This progress can be shown also in the attitude toward the social evils, the very fact of the general anxiety and discussion. The more accurate statistics signify an awakening of the public conscience.

In the third place, a couple of hundred years ago the conscience of nations required no justification or apology for land grabbing. When land was wanted they took it without any pretense that it was done for the benefit of the people of the land. But barely a generation ago when the Congo Free State was set up, old political ideals were no longer possible. There was a demand for a sanction or at least a moral pretense. A further step is now taken in the matter of the League of Nations in taking over territory and setting forth a principle of trusteeship and missionary duty in the mandates.

Finally the awakening realization that in the Christian gospel lies the only hope of the world. This is shown even through the despair of men throughout the world, that they have no other hope, unless we can have that hope in Christ.

Such a statement as the above is at least of interest, if we are to keep a just balance of the situation in the world to-day. Such statements give us an insight into some of the underlying factors of the spiritual condition of the world, and gives us hope of a social and moral awakening under right leadership. There are doubtless countless thousands if not millions who are more ready than we suppose to accept the pure gospel of Jesus Christ and receive his mind and will to-day. There are doubtless great multitudes that are more ready for social regeneration than is commonly supposed. There are certainly many thousands everywhere giving both thought and prayer to this subject. S. A. B.

The Church Must Help Those in Need

It is a matter of common observation, in other churches at least, the number of men with a family who are taking but little interest in the church and much in their lodge and insurance companies. This question Mr. Roger W. Babson has recently discussed and we quote herewith the following extract from The Literary Digest. The need of the church in social service is being seen more and more. The Spirit of Christ in dealing with our fellow men, of mutual helpfulness and forbearance, is a just want in this day of unrest as much if not more than heretofore.

The church is wondering why it is losing its grip on the masses. It wonders why lodges, mutual benefit associations, insurance companies, and other organizations are growing so rapidly while the church is lagging behind. One real reason is that the church is using outgrown methods to reach the people, while lodges and mutual benefit associations are using modern insurance methods. The church must devise some way to take care of its unfortunates. If a man who is a member of a church and a member of a lodge is helped materially by that lodge when he needs it but hears nothing from the church, he naturally thereafter gives his support to the lodge rather than to the church. I am not saying that the church should mix up in mutual benefit insurance, but the church must do something to help its unfortunates in some material way. In saying this I have in mind not necessarily the poor, but rather the salaried man who has not been able to save and is taken ill and left without any means of support. S. A. B.

An Audience of 500,000

In the Radio column last week Apostle Edwards, in charge of the radio programs of the church, announced that if all who could do so would listen to the speaker over the radio on the evening of the 18th, there would be about 500,000 in the audience. This is probably a safe estimate, and is illustrative of the marvelous possibilities of this sort of preaching.

We hope the suggestion will be observed wherein Brother Edwards asks for reports. Let him know how many are hearing the programs. Tell him the effect it is having on your neighbors. If you need to have the programs published two weeks ahead in order to get them, say so.

It is interesting to note that in Autumn Leaves a new Radio department is being conducted. It has some valuable suggestions in it and is greatly appreciated by Autumn Leaves readers.

Dependable People

Years ago many of us used to sing a song,

"Surely the captain may depend on me Though but an armor bearer I may be."

The song is based on the story of Jonathan and his armor bearer (1 Kings 14) and occasionally has offered the basis for a good sermon on dependable people.

In the story of the prodigal son we may be too prone to see that the calf was killed for the prodigal. Both of the brothers in that case were in fault. One, however, had repented. But the point now of particular interest is how often we take for granted the services of dependable people. Our very modern life itself depends on the quiet way in which a multitude attend faithfully to their daily work. Every train that starts for its destination depends on the faithfulness not alone of one or two men, but on the faithfulness of every track walker and section hand, as well as the engineer and train dispatcher.

In the church it is interesting to note how often we take for granted the steadfast service of the man who is always in his place on time, the organist who is always to be found at the organ promptly ready for service, the Sunday-school teacher and even the children who are faithful Sunday after Sunday. Sometimes when we see the fuss made over some one new we may feel a little like the boy did who said that he had never been new.

But the work of God as well as the work of the world is carried on by these faithful few who quietly and persistently do their duty. They are indeed the family of God.

Child Labor in the United States

The Children's Bureau in a brief pamphlet shows that over 1,000,000 children from ten to fifteen years of age were reported by the 1920 census as gainfully employed, that of these over 378,000 were less than fourteen years old. This indicates a decrease from 1910, but the Children's Bureau suggests that the decrease is apparent rather than real as the 1920 census was taken in January while the 1910 census was taken in April. In farm and other seasonable work fewer children are employed than in the winter. Also the pamphlet says a census at the present time would doubtless show a notably larger percentage of employed children, since the census of January, 1920, was taken at the beginning of a period of industrial depression, also while the Federal Child Labor Tax Law was in effect. This law has now been declared to be unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court while the conditions of employment have improved.

Only seventeen States have as high requirements with regard to child labor as have the two Federal laws which have been declared unconstitutional. This pamphlet gives much other information as maps that show the widely varying standards in force in the different States, the minimum age at which children may be employed, the educational minimum, requirement for physical examination, boys working in mines daily and weekly, hours permitted under sixteen, night work, etc.

The title of the pamphlet is Child Labor in the United States, Ten Questions Answered. It may be obtained free of charge.

Faith and College Work

Truth is one. Right understanding reaffirms religion.

More attention is being given by college authorities to the religious attitude of their students than heretofore. As previously pointed out, the professed Christians are large in number. Also as previously pointed out the big universities of the country do better where there are good church colleges.

On the other hand, a number have "had their primitive faith upset through their college work." Part of this no doubt arises from the character of their early religious education so related to alleged facts of science that when they receive a different teaching with regard to science the foundation of their faith is shaken.

As pointed out by the Congregationalist and referred to in the Literary Digest,

"There has often been in academic circles too coldly critical an atmosphere, and too much leeway given to the sort of professor, usually himself rather immature, who takes a sort of delight in befogging the minds of his students and in jarring them loose from cherished, if mistaken notions. Reverent scholarship is not of that sort." There is a certain delicacy to approach to "sacred things," says the Congregationalist, "that we have a right to expect from the colleges as their proper atmosphere. We have no right to expect that they should be places of dogmatism, nor that they should suppress truth or discourage investigation out of regard for the credulous. We have elsewhere expressed the opinion that the man whose faith can be taken away is carrying his faith around rather superficially or loosely. His faith is not very distinctly real or a part of himself.

"But the less men have thought, the more they need guidance, and when much thought has been added to perplexity, they need counsel. The Dean of Columbia is to be congratulated upon a wise outlook, and a sympathetic and wholesome attitude toward the whole problem."

The student is quite right in his general attitude, whether thought out clearly or not, that all truth is and must be harmonized. One does not show greatness in ridicule, or denying the truths of religion, not even on the grounds that he is not able to understand.

When Will the Spiritual Gifts Cease?

By Elbert A. Smith

Paul in his Corinthian letter enumerates certain spiritual gifts, nine in number: wisdom, knowledge, faith, the gift of healing, working of miracles, prophecy, discerning of spirits, speaking in tongues, and interpretation of tongues. (1 Corinthians 12: 7-10.) These he declares are given or "divided" among believers by the Spirit according to God's will. It has been the position of this church from the beginning that these gifts, severally and collectively, may be and are enjoyed in this age.

Opposition on that point has been a fruitful source of controversy with our brethren of other denominations. Although perhaps willing to admit the necessity for wisdom, knowledge, and faith, they have denied the continuation of others of the gifts apparently more extraordinary, such as divine healing, prophecy, etc. Many are the verbal encounters our elders have had with representatives of other churches on this subject. But during the past two decades has come a decided change of sentiment, at least regarding divine healing. In years gone by we have many times been challenged to work cures under abnormal conditions never contemplated in the Scriptures; while cures actually wrought under normal conditions in harmony with the scriptures were quite ignored. However, during the past twenty or more years a goodly number of the churches have come forward in defense of divine healing. Such movements as Christian Science, the Immanuel movement, and other forms of healing have obtained a great vogue from time to time. This change of front raises a question, namely, If wrong on that point, may not the denominations have been wrong on other points in the controversy?

Are Subject to Control

It may even be that among our own people the thought has occurred to some that these gifts will pass and perhaps should pass as we develop. Some have thought them to proceed from an entirely emotional basis. Even though that be true they should certainly have an intellectual control, since the statement is made clearly that "the spirit of the prophet is subject to the prophet." There arises this further consideration: man himself is emotional; he has the three attributes, will, intellect, and emotion. In the normal man these are well balanced and equally developed. The religion then that would help the normal man should be both intellectual and emotional and should stimulate and develop the will. God is not perceived by the intellect alone. Nor does he appeal to the intellect alone. His appeal is always emotional. The soul that is not stirred never senses God.

It may be that the sentiment that some have developed against spiritual gifts is the result of having observed very evident abuse and misuse of such gifts in certain branches, with inevitable bad results. The remedy, however, is not the cessation or loss of these blessings, but rather an intelligent and proper use. There is no field of endeavor wherein humanity may not err, and in this realm, where we are handling heavenly things, we need not be surprised to find mistakes and abuses. But to revert to the argument so often used by the early elders, we do not discontinue the use of currency because of an occasional counterfeit bill or coin. We denounce the counterfeit and throw it out of circulation, but continue the use of the genuine.

When Do They Cease, and How?

It may have been argued also, even within the church, that as we progress in spirituality and draw near to God the need for these particular manifestations diminishes. This argument does not seem to be borne out by the actual tests of experience. Without offense to other gatherings of Saints we may, we believe, truly say that the gathering of Saints in the Lamoni Stake for some years past has maintained a plane of spiritual and intellectual development not excelled by any other gathering in the history of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. This is only natural since Lamoni was founded early in the history of the church and for many, many years has been one of the leading seats of culture, spiritual development, and religious thought. It is inevitable that following such long periods of culture there should be fruit of a high order, otherwise there would be scant encouragement to engage in religious work and devotion. Lamoni had the advantage of being for years the headquarters of the church, where the leading religious teachers of the church resided. It was the center of thought. There, too, was located the publishing house. Moreover Lamoni was more self-controlled than most other gatherings of the Saints, being remote from many worldly influences. Also we must reckon with Graceland College, whose influence has been pronounced. That institution helped to maintain a high level of thought. From it came a constant procession of keen, able, and consecrated men, helping Lamoni year by year to render a contribution to the missionary, pastoral, and literary forces of the church such as have not been excelled by any other group of Saints on earth. We might then expect, if the argument previously mentioned is to hold good, that in Lamoni we would find a pronounced diminution of the more miraculous manifestations of the spiritual gifts. Not so, however. Particularly at their annual reunions we have observed a richer, fuller, more pentecostal outpouring of these gifts than we have encountered in any other place in our travels. These manifestations have been of a high order, both spiritually and intellectually, one evidence of careful and wise administration of affairs for years past.

As We Recede From God They Decrease

This demonstration of actual experience, this leaf from life, this cross-section of church development, indicates that as we draw near to God and rise to a higher plane of spiritual development these blessings become more frequent and more rich and powerful in their manifestation. Other experiences that we have observed indicate that as we recede from God and drift away from him these blessings diminish or cease. That is in harmony with the position taken by John Wesley in his very well-known declaration found in Sermon 94 where he says:

It does not appear that these extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost were common in the church for more than two or three centuries. We seldom hear of them after that fatal period when the Emperor Constantine called himself a Christian. . . . From this time, they almost entirely ceased. . . . The cause of this was not as has been commonly supposed, because there was no occasion for them, for reason of the world becoming Christian. This is a miserable mistake, as not a twentieth part was at that time even nominally Christian. The real cause was that the "love of many had waxed cold," and the Christians had no more of the Spirit than the heathen. . . . This was the real cause why the gifts of the Spirit were no longer retained in the church, because the Christians had turned heathen again, and had only a dead form left.

That position also is in harmony with the one taken by Calvin, who in his comments on the Corinthian letters says:

We may conjecture how very illustrious that church [the early Christian church] was, in respect of an extraordinary variety and abundance of spiritual gifts. There were schools or colleges of prophets, so that pains had to be taken that they might have their respective turns. . . . We now see our leanness, nay, our poverty; but in this we have a just punishment sent to requite our ingratitude. For neither are the riches of God exhausted, nor his benignity lessened; but we are neither deserving of his bounty nor capable of receiving his liberality.

As We Draw Near They Increase

Experience and our reading of the Scriptures indicate to our mind that as we draw near to the Lord and develop spiritually we receive more and greater spiritual blessings. And we do not believe that any one of those spiritual gifts can well be abandoned or belittled. We cannot break even one point from a snow crystal without injuring its beauty and symmetry. Not one thing that God has done or set in the church or given to the church can be destroyed or removed without loss and damage.

When then will the gifts cease? Our opponents have cited us to 1 Corinthians 13:8-13, "Charity never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease: whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things. For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then I shall know even as also I am known. And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity."

These verses properly analyzed bring to us a wonderful lesson and indicate that the gifts are to continue until "that which is perfect is come." They bring to us a conclusion quite the reverse of that intended by those who have cited us to these passages. What is meant by "that which is perfect"? Apparently from the reading of the text it means a certain stage of development within ourselves. Now we know in part, then we shall know as we are known. Now we prophesy in part, then our knowledge of futurity and of the will of God will be more full. Now we see darkly; then we shall see clearly. These things cease then when that stage of perfection is developed within us. That day is far distant, perhaps not to be expected in this mortal life. Another illuminating scripture which bears out our argument is found in the fourth chapter of Ephesians:

Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.

Until So Common Are No Longer Gifts

The perfect state of man indicated here comes from a development of the individual to his fullest capacity in the likeness and stature of Christ. When that stage of development is reached that individual has reached perfection for him. That which is perfect has come into his life. And we may assume that when that stage is reached in the experience of the Saints collectively these things that have been denominated gifts will no longer continue in the church as gifts. As principles and experiences they will not cease; but they will have become a perma-ment part of our own spiritual equipment and being. A gift is something received from an outside source, not earned, but given through grace or charity. In our present state these gifts are given to help us on the road of development; but when that which is perfect is come, when we reach our fullness in the stature and likeness of Christ, these things will no longer be given to us, but will have become a part of our own spiritual equipment. Thus, though it may seem paradoxical, they cease but do not cease. Now we receive a temporary illumination, as a gift, forecasting futurity, revealing the will of God; then having a knowledge of past things and of present things, having within ourselves the radius of truth, being moreover in touch with God we will constantly know his will and be able so far as necessary to forecast the future—so also with knowledge and faith and wisdom and the power to perform those things which now seem miraculous. As temporary gifts they will cease; as a part of our own endowment they will continue.

The City of God

By A. M. Baker

And I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away.—Revelation 21: 1-4.

Be Ye Perfect

This was shown to John as a closing climax to his visions while upon the lonely Isle of Patmos. It represents the combined efforts of all of God's children from the foundation of the world, to the end of time, as the finished product. The great Apostle Paul refers to this same subject matter in the Ephesian letter (5: 27) in this language: "That he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish," or in other words perfect.

We are also reminded of that other passage of scripture given by our blessed Lord: "Be ye therefore, perfect, even as your father which is in heaven is perfect." (Matthew 5: 48.) When we poor mortals here upon this earth begin to talk about perfection we feel somewhat timid and bashful. I remember one lady over in Illinois who told me publicly that she had not committed a sin for over seventeen years. At the close of the service her husband told me that he knew better, and I expect he was in a very good position to know. But we do not wish to make any compromises or apologies for the man who sins. As Paul states the proposition clearly: "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound? God forbid." (Romans 6: 1, 2.)

The church militant was organized for the express purpose of assisting humanity to overcome the imperfections of human nature and to carry out the ideals of the perfect law. Did not Jesus declare to his disciples: "Upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." (Matthew 16: 18.) There is a power divine at work through this church of the living God that is supreme, all powerful and is able to resist and rebuke the powers of Satan.

This was abundantly demonstrated in the life of Christ and the apostles. Should we as a church be satisfied until we have attained to this high mark? "Go on unto perfection" (Hebrews 6: 1, 2) should be our slogan. How are we going to do this? By adding the Christian graces. Growing in grace and in the knowledge of the truth, by becoming more and more like God (1 Peter 2: 1, 2). We must follow the perfect copy—Jesus Christ.

The public-school teachers years ago taught that "practice makes perfect." They had the idea that much writing made a good penman. But after a while they discovered that the poorest writing in these old-fashioned copy books was always to be found at the bottom of the page. So the theory of penmanship was changed—"practice under direction and proper criticism makes good writers." Now the steel engraved copy is always pushed down close to the student so that his own imperfect line is always covered up. Examine the copy books after this method and you will notice the best writing is always at the bottom of the page.

Now if we can apply this method to our church work—we are going to make progress. Then when the Holy City comes down from heaven to meet the Bridegroom, those who have been laboring with him during the thousand years will be permitted to join forces and enjoy the redemption for which they have labored. I am sure we all want a part in that glorious throng of those able to say, "I have fought a good fight, . . . I have kept the faith." (2 Timothy 4: 7.)

Zion Built by Celestial Law

The Lord gives us to understand in latter-day revelation that "Zion cannot be built up except it be by the principles of the law of the celestial kingdom. "No room here for man-made theories. I also wish to quote the great Gentile apostle, Paul:

"And if a man also strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully. The husbandman that laboreth must be first partaker of the fruits." (2 Timothy 2: 5, 6.) Jesus the Christ has given the law in the sermon on the mount: "By their fruits ye shall know them."

Some wonderful strides have been made by certain people in ages past to produce this righteous fruit. For instance, Enoch and his city applied this law so perfectly among themselves that there was perfect unity—of one heart and one mind. Faith in God was the ruling factor in their lives. The great power of God was manifested in their favor and they were protected from the wicked nations. Their method of living was entirely different from that of the world. If we ever build up Zion it is going to be by the same divine and perfect law.

No Poor in Enoch's City

There was another peculiar characteristic among these people—there were no poor among them. They loved their neighbor as themselves. The selfish spirit was not manifested among them. Every man was supplied according to his needs. If there was not enough to go around I presume they all took a crust together. Now because they were all of one heart and of one mind, it was Zion.

The same condition must obtain with us in our endeavor to build up this new Jerusalem in these the last days. In the city of Enoch the Spirit of God was the directing power. This is right in harmony with what Paul said: "Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God." (1 Corinthians 2: 11.) Jesus said: "Without me ye can do nothing." Even Paul with all his world training was not equipped as a child of God until he had received the baptism of the Holy Ghost. Jesus also taught that the Holy Ghost would be given to the disciples and it would show them things to come and guide them into all truth. (John 16: 7-13.)

The Lord declares in latter-day revelation that the elders if humble would have the Spirit of God to be with them, and that this Spirit would enable them to teach the gospel story, and that if we have not this Spirit we should not teach. Have God's promises ever failed when we have done our part? The term can't cannot be found in the vocabulary of God.

"My kingdom is not of this world."—John 18: 36. The constitutional law of the kingdom of God is found in the sermon upon the mount. Can you find among any of the systems of men to-day in the secular world a substitute for the wonderful ideals lived and taught by Jesus Christ and the early disciples? Echo answers where? The system of the world to-day is a survival of the fittest.

No wonder Jesus asked: "When the Son of man comes, will he find faith on the earth?" (Luke 18: 8.) You will remember this language was spoken to a class of people who trusted in themselves—self-righteous and despised others. The story reads something like this: There was a certain judge who did not fear God or man. And there was a widow who came unto him saying, "Avenge me of my adversary." At first the judge would not give her any consideration. Yet because the widow bothered him every day, and in order that he might not be made weary, he gave the widow the needed assistance. The service rendered was purely selfish on the part of the judge. He was only looking after his own individual wants. At this juncture I ask the question: "Is this the spirit of Zion?"

Am I My Brother's Keeper?

"Am I my brother's keeper?" is still the greatest question of the age. But the only philosophy that will solve these vexing problems is that presented by Jesus Christ and so beautifully applied to the city of Enoch—that there were no poor among them and perfect love and unity prevailed in their midst. That spirit—"I am holier than thou," did not have place among them. The "golden rule" was their policy.

But the thing that interests us mostly to-day—is not what Enoch and those ancient worthies did—but what are we doing to-day to produce these righteous conditions among the sons of men: that we may indeed be partakers of the fruits and become as Jesus said, the light of the world. It was shown to Enoch in this vision that the Lord Jesus would come again to the earth in the last days, and he portrays some of the conditions that would be prevailing upon the earth at that time in the following language:

And great tribulations shall be among the children of men, but my people will I preserve; and righteousness will I send down out of heaven; and truth will I send forth out of the earth, to bear testimony of my Only Begotten; his resurrection from the dead; yea, and also resurrection of all men; and righteousness and truth will I cause to sweep the earth as with a flood, to gather out my own elect from the four quarters of the earth unto a place which I shall prepare; a holy city, that my people may gird up their loins, and be looking forth for the time of my coming; for there shall be my tabernacle, and it shall be called Zion, a New Jerusalem. And the Lord said unto Enoch, then shall you and all your city meet them there, and we will receive them into our bosom, and they shall see us, and we will fall upon their necks, and they shall fall upon our necks, and we will kiss each other, and there shall be my abode, and it shall be Zion which shall come forth out of all the creations which I have made; and for the space of a thousand years shall the earth rest.—Doctrine and Covenants 36: 12, 13.

It seems that the building of this city of Zion is an absolute necessity in order to prepare to meet Jesus Christ and the city of Enoch when it comes. Jude says when the Savior comes it will be with ten thousand of his saints. So we have a big building program before us. It is time we were doing something besides merely talking about Zion.

Question: Are we going to build this Zion city out of untempered mortar: If so, we will have to leave off building, as did those who were building the tower of Babel. There is only one way to build this city and that is to follow the blue print plan given of God. The world has erected a standard that is in contradistinction to the plan given by the Almighty. The world's plan to success is greed, gain, profits, etc. Paul declares, "The love of money is the root of all evil." The Babylon world to-day is built upon this system.

Fall of Babylon

The time is coming, according to John the Revelator, when the dollar is going to lose its purchasing power. Read the entire eighteenth chapter of Revelation. "No man buyeth our merchandise." John saw the entire city fall into ruin. Hence the Lord said: "Come out of her, O my people, and be not partakers of her sins, for they have reached unto heaven."

Here is our difficulty. Our present program will never get us out of Babylon. Interest, mortgages, etc., are principles that belong to the Babylonian world. Let us leave them in the junk pile, for they will eventually go there.

Rise of Zion

Of course reasonable profits will have to be made on productive works. In Zion miners will mine coal for the purpose of keeping the inmates of Zion warm—not to make big wealthy coal speculators. Farming will be carried on primarily for the purpose of supplying our needs. Whenever we expect to launch big business enterprises in Zion for the purpose of commercializing our efforts we will fail. Zion, we are told, is the pure in heart. What we need to-day as a church is a working basis. Not only a spiritual Zion but an "industrial Zion" where we can put into practical application these ideals for which our hearts have been hungering for, lo, these many years.

What would you think of a man who would get up in prayer meeting and testify that he desired that his boy should become strong on "morality" and yet permit him daily to associate with immoral persons—which made an environment conducive to degeneration? You would say at once that father is neglecting his duty. Evidently we have neglected our duties along these lines to establish Zion and provide a proper environment for her citizens, so that they might be permitted to enter in through the gates into the "Holy City." In fact, the Lord reproves us as a church and says: "Zion could have been redeemed already, had it not been for the slothfulness of my people." That is a terrible charge to lay at the feet of any people.

Everyday Religion

Thus, friends, we begin to see that true religion is something that has to do with our everyday life. It not only pertains to going to church on Sunday and listening to a good sermon, or bearing our testimony in prayer meeting; but it has reference to our business endeavors, that which we follow for a livelihood. Jesus said in the magna charta law of the kingdom: "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." (Matthew 6:33.) The spiritual things come first, the temporalities are secondary.

There are two kinds of religion in this world, the true and the false. That which does not contribute to the development of character, and the uplift of the soul is not worth anything. Anything that is good is worth sacrificing for. According to the statement of the Apostle James, true religion means pure religion, and service to humanity. "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." (1:27.) Therefore if we live up to this program, we have a great work to accomplish. However, do not get the thought that the principal work of the church is to dole out charity to the poor unfortunates. But charity and love have a broader vision than this. True charity or love means to place men and women in a position where they will be able to help themselves. In the Holy City spoken of by John there will be no more pain, tears, neither sorrow, nor death. Isn't it worth working for? Does it not mean that our human energies will be expended along those lines which will result in eliminating as far as possible these distressed conditions of poverty and sorrow. Hence all our service to our fellow creatures must embrace both the spiritual and the temporal. Therefore, the vocation which we follow must become a sacramental service which we employ for the good of all and to the glory of God. Everything which we do which in any wise can affect the growth of character is also influencing destiny—and is religion in the broadest sense.

Can we then consistently pray the Lord's prayer and not be willing to work for the accomplishment of the things incorporated in that prayer? I think not. There is enough in the gospel and kingdom of God to meet all the needs of humanity—both temporal and spiritual.

True religion is an antidote for the poisons produced by sin, if taken in large enough doses. We as a church have never made the dose large enough as yet, or we would have been out of the wilderness (Babylon) ere this, and Zion would be flourishing. The gospel dose should be increased, until it gives us a hungering and thirsting for righteousness, to gather under the divine plan; and should be continued until we can see the spires and the temple of the New Jerusalem. Zion will then participate in the world-wide program of human redemption, and prepare a people to meet the Lord Jesus when he comes.

Freedom in the Gospel

One of the great principles of the gospel is to make men free. The Savior said: "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." (John 8:31.) This is a true and tried principle. A disregard of the divine truth is what has brought to man this class struggle. Read the story of Eden of Cain and Abel, and we have in simple form the story of all succeeding class struggles—freeman and slave, patrician and plebeian, lord and serf—in a word the oppressor and the oppressed—who have stood in constant opposition to one another and carried on an uninterrupted fight. At times it has been hidden, but most of the time an open fight. But in the midst of all the turmoil through which human society has been compelled to pass, he who came from the carpenter's shop with the smell of shavings on his clothes—Jesus the Christ—has presented the only remedy by which the divided classes may be united and peace be restored to the world.

In Matthew 22 the lawyer came to Jesus and temptingly asked the question: Which is the great commandment in the law? And Jesus replied: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul, mind, and strength and the second is like unto it, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. Jesus regarded this principle even in his early childhood, for we hear him saying concerning his visit to the temple, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" Men must be "born again" before they can even see the kingdom of God. We must get rid of selfishness and begin to look at our brother's need as well as our own.

Jesus strikes the keynote, as to how proper relations both in the church and the state may be developed in the parable found in Luke 14: 7-14. When you are invited to a wedding feast do not sit down in the most prominent seat, but take the most humble seat you can find, leaving the best seats for others that may come in later. This parable was given by Jesus in the fashionable home of a very wealthy Pharisee.

No doubt this teaching of the Master was a shock to some of these "high society folks." It was so contrary to their custom. But remember Christ did not yield to public opinion when it was wrong.

Truth—applied truth—was the watchword of his message. He did not deal with trivial matters—although he used simple methods of presenting the truth. But as there were people there who gave more attention to form and ceremony, and placed such things far above truth—so we have persons at the present time who cater to the established customs of human society—who seemingly are more shocked at the misspelling of a word than at the gravest misdemeanor, and as one of our present writers has said, "will tolerate a crack in the brain more readily than a failure to crease the trousers."

According to Their Needs

Jesus went on in this parable and told them not to give a feast among their wealthy friends, but make a feast and call that class of people who could not make recompense in return, the poor, the maimed, the lame, and the blind—those actually in need. If we do this our reward will be of an eternal nature. We are told in the New Testament that the common people heard the Savior gladly. He found a greater response among this class than among the rich.

Human nature is about the same to-day. Abraham Lincoln said: "God surely loves the common people; he made so many of them." The greatest proof we have in the New Testament of the Messiahship of Christ comes from the poor people. The sick were healed, the lame made to walk, the blind to see, the lepers were cleansed, and the dead were raised up. What we need to-day in order to build up this Zion of God—the New Jerusalem—is love and humility. As Paul said: Now abideth faith, hope, love, these three, but the greatest of these is love. The human family can never outlive the application of this message of Christ.

There is need of just such a lesson to-day as we have referred to. The gulf between the rich and the poor is one of the greatest obstacles to the church. Class consciousness as manifested in both of these groups defies even religion. The only solution is the gospel of the kingdom applied to sinful conditions. The great Teacher said: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." (Matthew 4: 4.) Are we willing to do it?

Trained, Consecrated Minds Are Needed

There is an effort seemingly on the part of some to interpret the Bible and the church program in such scientific terms that "intellectuals" might be appealed to more strongly. The church is surely in need of trained and educated minds, consecrated and sanctified to do the will of God. The church yearns and calls to the young people, who have by intellectual development, increased their capacity for service. But the remedy is not to be found by compromising the story of brotherhood as exemplified in the life of Christ—with the false selfish system of the Babylonian world where paupers and millionaires grow side by side. All souls are alike to God and Christ. The child of God who shall dwell in the Holy City is not to be chosen by any intellectual test. The test will be spiritual; as in the case of Simon Magus: "thy heart is not right" (Acts 8: 21). For Jesus died for the uneducated as well as the educated, for the poor as well as the rich. "God is no respecter of persons."

Brotherhood

Brotherhood is the only program by which we can have peace and equality in the church, peace and equality in society, peace and equality in industry. This will only be the outgrowth of the teachings of Christ, the fruit of the gospel. The gospel does not mean "reciprocity" only, be good to me and I will be good to you. This is the very sin Jesus condemned in the house of the Pharisee. Love is the keyword of the Christian religion. Do good—do right because it is right before God, and because of love for one another. Lift others up to our level and make them equal with us. This will enable the church to present herself to the Bridegroom without spot or blemish "unspotted from the world." With this spirit animating the church the gospel will go forth in power. We will go into the hedges and highways. Zion will be redeemed even by power, and the nations will say, "Come let us go up to the house of the Lord and learn of his ways."

Christ Loved the Poor

One of the beatitudes comes thundering down the lane of time—"Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Jesus did not try to keep the poor out of the church. He really considers them the most valuable asset in his kingdom. He always put them to work. In fact Christ classed himself with the poor. He was born of humble parentage in an ox stall. He worked with his foster father Joseph to help to keep the wolf from the door. Later he said: "The foxes have holes, the birds of the air nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head."

It was largely the poor class of people to whom Jesus spoke these words: "I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." (John 14: 2, 3.) Jesus always had in mind the welfare of his children; how he could improve their condition not only in this life, but in eternity. No doubt this place he went to prepare was the "holy city" that is coming down from God out of heaven.

We know according to the record these early disciples had some wonderful ideals. They had all things common. Material wealth did not obstruct their spiritual progress. Every man was supplied according to his needs. They had the experience of real "brotherhood." For they broke bread from "house to house." (Acts 2: 41-47.) The missionary spirit ran high at this time. Many were added to the church, as high as three thousand in one day. There was perfect confidence, and there was equality.

If the poor to-day can only put their consecrations into the treasury as did the poor widow in the temple (Luke 21: 1-4) Zion will soon be redeemed. This woman had such faith that she cast in all of her living. If she could do this—it surely ought to be easy to consecrate "all our surplus properties" for the building up of Zion.

The rich and well to do have failed to do this; nearly one hundred years have flown into eternity since the angel came to earth with this restored gospel. Now why not give the poor a chance? Brawn and muscle, with a desire to work, consecration, love, and humility offer a splendid foundation upon which to proceed to build this New Jerusalem.

The same spirit that prompted Christ to leave a palace in heaven and come down to this sin-stained earth to suffer and bleed and die for the good of humanity must actuate the citizens of Zion. Then we will have removed ourselves far from the "making money" propositions for selfish purposes, for producing in righteousness will be our slogan.

"Never put confidence in such as put no confidence in others. A man prone to suspect evil is mostly looking in his neighbor for what he sees in himself. As to the pure all things are pure, even so to the impure all things are impure."—Hare.

"Surmise is the gossamer that malice blows on the fair reputations, the corroding dew that destroys the choice blossoms. Surmise is primarily the squint of suspicion, and suspicion is established before it is confirmed."—Zimmerman.

HYMNS AND POEMS

Easter Joy

By Hattie Hughes

Joy and gladness fill the air
All the earth is free from care;
Birds are singing ev'rywhere,
Christ, the Lord, is risen.

Heavenly light dispels the gloom,
Doubt and fear hath no more room;
Trees and blossoms are in bloom,
Christ, the Lord, is risen.

All creation seems to say,
"We will work for God to-day,
Earthly burdens fade away,"
Christ, the Lord, is risen.

Every cloud is silver lined,
All our hearts with love combined
And our minds in peace we find,
Christ, the Lord, is risen.

"Till he comes," oh, let us sing
While our choicest gifts we bring,
Heaven with hallelujahs ring,
Christ, the Lord, is risen.

Now, he sits on yonder throne,
Soon he comes to claim his own,
Holy, holy, holy one,
King of earth and heaven.

Behind the Mist

By R. B. Trowbridge

As I looked for Mount Cedar this morning, 'at dawn,
In the place where it usually stood,
To my sorrow and pain there was nothing to see,
It was shrouded in mist as a hood.

I knew that the mountain was there without doubt,
Its form to my mind was quite clear;
But the veil that was stretched there between it and me
If I had not known, would bring fear.

How truly akin to some happenings in life,
When temptations and trials come to us,
How soon we forget the All-Powerful Hand,
And our spirits are cast in the dust.

So the lesson let's learn, and remember it well
In our life as we go to and fro,
No matter what comes, yet behind the gray mist
Stands the Giver of Life here below.

And as we remember with courage increased,
Let us lift up our heads and be glad
That the God who created the mountains and mist
Is still the best friend we e'er had.

And just as I sat in my cabin this morn
As the sun mounted up in the sky,

The fog disappeared and the mountain was shown,
So as surely our mists will pass by.

And we'll see once again as we oft have before
That our vision had only been poor,
And we'll find as I've found with Mount Cedar to-day,
That His wonderful Presence is sure.

Resurrection

By Gertrude Sessions

Spring is here! All nature sings it,
Every blade and bush and tree
And the creeping things in grasses
Join the song of bird and bee.

Yesterday was nature dormant,
Quiet, cold, and brown and still—
Now she wakens all responsive
To a higher, sovereign will.

Listen, all men, to the message
That comes in the whispering breath,
Winter is a time of sleeping,
And the soul's end is not death.

Human hearts have need of courage,
And the lesson must be plain,
So this resurrection emblem
Yearly comes to us again.

Winter! Earth's rest after harvest.
Parting! Life's peace after strife.
And as Spring comes after Winter,
After Death, there cometh Life!

Persevere

(The following poem was sent in by Henry C. Smith who says: "I have not seen this poem in writing or print for over sixty years, so I quote from memory.")

Should sorrow's gate be opened wide
And on us pour a flood,
Should hopes we've cherished withered lie
Ere they begin to bud;
Should clouds upon our pathway loom
And all seem dark and drear,
Our motto in that hour should be,
Look up, and persevere.

When dark misfortune on us throws
The shadows of its wings;
When hope, all crushed onto our souls
Like faded roses clings;
Then we should rise with energy
While Faith our bark should steer,
And gazing in the future sky
Look up and persevere.

Why waste in useless, vain regrets
Our swiftly passing years?
Why build across the stream of life
A rainbow-bridge of tears?

Why calmly sit in mute despair
And cause hope to depart,
Thus making stronger still the link
Which binds each broken heart?

Useless, indeed, repinings are;
They but increase our pain.
The noblest plan is, when we fall
To rise and try again.
No matter how the storm may rage,
Let Hope a fabric rear,
And as we rise our cry shall be,
"Look up, and persevere."

Remember, if the night come not
To make more bright the morn,
We could not part with untold joy,
The advent of the dawn.
And, if our life was but one scene
Of pure unceasing bliss,
We might forget the world above
Within the joys of this.

When Jesus Comes

By Eleanor Waldorf Kearney

Sweet peace will come when Jesus comes
And speaks the words, "Be still,"
The blood-red waves of war subside
Obedient to his will.

Good will will come when Jesus comes;
In every clime and race
Love must replace the hate in men,
Who'd look upon his face.

His kingdom comes when Jesus comes;
How changed this world will be!
No politician's fateful form,
The office seekers flee.

Wealth nor power when Jesus comes
No recommend will find;
Favorites of his throne will be
The pure, the true, the kind.

Come quickly, Lord! Lord Jesus, come!
Lest sinking hearts should fail,
Before the world-engulfing crimes
Our sinking spirits quail.

The Christian Life

In the hour of trial, Jesus, plead for me;
Lest by base denial, I depart from thee.
When thou see'st me waver, with a look recall,
Nor for fear or favor suffer me to fall.

With forbidden pleasures would this vain world charm;
Or its sordid treasures spread to work me harm;
Bring to my remembrance sad Gethsemane,
Or, in darker semblance, cross-crowned Calvary.

Should thy mercy send me sorrow, toil, and woe;
Or should pain attend me on my path below;

OF GENERAL INTEREST

Faith the Real Cure

Emile Coué has received a great deal of publicity for his visit to America, yet as Mr. Roger W. Babson points out in the letter below, there is nothing in his philosophy which is not better presented by the Apostle Paul.

This statement of Mr. Babson will well repay a careful reading both as affecting world and national conditions and also our personal relations.

Do we believe the religion we profess? If we do, and would put it into effect, if we really practiced brotherhood, if we really encouraged men to exercise their best initiative, to give their best service, to develop to the utmost and give the best results of that development to social good we would make a simply astonishing forward step.

There is at least the beginning of an epidemic. Some expect it to become very bad, but it is worth remembering that fear kills more people than does disease. We have seen a woman who was dying, saved after the doctors had given her up by the simple device of turning the premature mourners out of the room and one of the family taking hold cheerfully to make at least a fight for life. There is no use dying too soon.

The story is related in the Orient that the pestilence appeared to a certain leader and said, "I will take 10,000 of your men." A few months later he met the pestilence face to face and said:

"You have not played fair. You said you would take 10,000 but you have taken 30,000.

"Not at all, I only took the 10,000 agreed. The rest died of fear."

If fear has taken her thousands so has faith saved her tens of thousands. Faith is in fact a necessary element of therapeutics to a thinking person. The circular letter from Mr. Babson, under date of January 30, follows:

"The Real Cure

"Many times we have diagnosed certain industrial troubles as spiritual rather than material. By that we meant that the motives and viewpoints of the people involved were wrong. Consequently they found themselves in difficulties. Probably at least two thirds of the troubles of this world are spiritual. Certainly 95 per cent of our social evils, and I hesitate to say how many of our political troubles, would immediately disappear if people really believed the religion they profess. The relations between capital and labor, the struggles between nations, and the conflict between individuals depend upon whether or not the parties involved have the right spiritual insight. Physicians are also agreed that a very large percentage of our bodily ailments would be avoided if we were at peace spiritually.

"This is what we mean when we say that lack of religion is responsible for most of the world's troubles. From this standpoint it is interesting to see the tremendous amount of

Grant that I may never fail thy hand to see;
Grant that I may ever cast my care on thee.

When my last hour cometh, fraught with strife and pain,
When my dust returneth to the dust again;
On thy truth relying, through that mortal strife,
Jesus, take me, dying, to eternal life. Amen.

—Selected.

interest which Coué has created by demonstrating the effect of mental peace on bodily welfare. Aside from the question of divine healing it is assuredly a fact that the gospel of Saint Paul, which most people have heard preached from their childhood, contains all and more than Coué or any other scientist has ever offered. The moment, however, that some one comes along with only a part of the same story dressed up in scientific language, everyone hails it as a new discovery.

"The reason is that the majority of people have come to look upon their religious activity as an abstract duty rather than a source of practical power. Even the ministry itself seems to have lost sight of this most important phase of its work. If it had not, every minister in the country to-day would be on his toes proclaiming that faith in God will do all and more than Coué can offer. The fact is, however, that practically all of the Christian ministry are willing to stand by and let Coué monopolize the most valuable part of their work. It is true that the love of God is the only solution of our greatest troubles. When our churches really wake up and show people how to secure this great power we shall hear no more about lack of interest in religion!"

Facing the Crisis

A study in present-day social and religious problems, by Sherwood Eddy.

Between two extremes of thought no doubt lies a proper basis for our consideration of our problems as a church.

There are those who believe that we ought to "stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord," while some Moses man declares the glory of God to us.

Over on the other side are those who insist that all we may hope to do is give, each of us as we pass by, the ball of progress a little push, then pass on. They say that only by long, slow, evolutionary processes can we hope to build Zion—that it may take hundreds or even thousands of years to accomplish the purposes of God through the church.

No doubt we shall have a demonstration of both these processes, and with equal assurance we may suppose that somewhere between the two ideas we shall find our solution.

There are those who see a crisis, a real shaking up, a veritable revolution, in everything that is. Then we occasionally find persons to-day who complacently view the situation with an air of, "I see nothing remarkable; nothing to worry over. Crisis? Where? What? Why all the fuss? We are doing very well, thank you."

But those holding either view can well consider the viewpoint of the other. We can always afford to do that which will better inform us or cause us to think. Wholesome thought, coupled with true devotion, will bring about the attitude of mind that is bound to extract progress from all the conflicting conditions existing to-day.

As might be inferred, the author of Facing the Crisis, a Doran book ($1.60, postpaid, from this office), believes in the crisis theory. He says that "Christianity is facing a three-fold crisis. There is a crisis in our national and international affairs. There is a crisis in our industrial life. There is a crisis in our religious life. Can we rethink our faith in terms of modern thought and needs?"

As might be expected, his theological conceptions are in accord with the general trend of the hour. The background of his religious faith is found in the doctrineless church organizations of the day, and when he discusses such questions as "Is the Bible a finished or a progressive revelation of God; is it inerrant and infallible," or "Is there sufficient evidence for the miracles of Christ?" we may expect and we get the usual answers.

However, the whole book is unusually thought-provoking. Mr. Eddy is a professional writer, therefore one expects to be interested and is in nowise disappointed. His method of propounding many questions and offering his brief answers, his choice of subjects and association of them, help him to produce a most readable book.

The Boyhood of Christ

One of the new books on this old subject.

A great many volumes have been written more or less speculative in nature concerning the boyhood of Christ. Very few of these have made him just an ordinary boy. Some have made him to instruct his teacher, to put his parents in their place, to make his companions obey and to run things quite generally.

So far as the Bible is concerned there is only one statement concerning his life from the time he was eight days old until he entered upon his ministry and came to John the Baptist at the age of thirty and that appears in the second chapter of Luke and is confined to the forty-ninth verse and those immediately preceding and following.

Discussing this question from the Catholic point of view it has now come to our desk, The Boyhood Consciousness of Christ, by P. J. Temple, published by the Macmillan Company in 1922. This book confines its discussion almost exclusively to Luke 2:49. What are the various readings of this verse? What of the significance of each Greek word in the original? What shades of meaning are shown by the terminations? How far does this indicate a divine consciousness on the part of Christ? The opinions of the early church fathers are reviewed together with other early evidence and the opinions of heretics, then the rise of modern rationalism and various modern views. Is this only the ordinary Israelitic consciousness? Is it a special ethical sonship? Is it mere Messianic consciousness or does it signify real divine sonship? The Catholic view tends to the latter conclusion.

The verses preceding and following are considered, the attitude of Christ to the doctors, to his parents, to his mother in particular. Did he grow in wisdom and grace or is this rather a declaration that he was full of wisdom and of the grace of God and grew in stature? A brief review then follows of Luke's account and of the whole New Testament account as to his sense of divinity and then a lengthy bibliography of some twenty-eight pages is included.

To fail to hold our young in the church puts upon the missionary arm of the church the whole burden of increasing the membership.—Priesthood Journal.

A member of the Order of Evangelists makes the following rather caustic remarks in a letter accompanying a recent report:

"There seems to be little demand for revival services in the churches of —, so far. Possibly the system of going the rounds of branches with the missionary services have given them all the protracted series they want. The part of the evangelist is hard to fill under present standards or prevailing customs. It seems to be the custom in some districts and stakes to hold workers' caucuses and never so much as think that perhaps a patriarch would have counsel to give."

The evangelists are to revive the branches and members. Is your branch in need of resuscitation?—Priesthood Journal.

LETTERS AND NEWS

Working for the Young People's Convention

How many are doing like Roy S. Budd?

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLAHOMA, February 15, 1923.

PROFESSOR F. M. McDOWELL, Lamoni, Iowa.

Dear Brother: I have been advertising the convention to be held in Lamoni for the young people and have a number of the older folks enthused over it just now. There are about forty youngsters in this district who want to and should come. A number of them do not have the money to make the trip, however; hence some plan or scheme to raise the money.

I have asked the sisters of the Department of Women to look after it and complete an organization in every branch to stimulate an interest in the convention as well as working out a plan to defray the expenses of those who cannot meet them individually. Just now they think of getting special rates from Tulsa, since that is quite a central point at which they could gather.

What will be the expense for the two weeks while there in Lamoni? Have you any suggestions to offer that I might pass on to the sisters? How much reduction could they get if we can send forty? I am not so sure of this number; it depends entirely on how hard the sisters push it. If I had the time to spend in the district, I am sure we could get that number.

Sincerely yours, ROY S. BUDD.

Keep in Touch With the Women on the Farm

[Mrs. Dora Glines, Superintendent of the Department of Women, received the following letter from a young woman who has been "on the farm" and knows the need that women feel when away from associates and church privileges. She makes some very interesting observations.—EDITORS.]

I have been out there (in the country), alone, and I know what letters from Independence have meant to me. I know how hard it is, in the midst of unfavorable surroundings, associating daily with those to whom even the name of God is but a byword, to stand unmoved, and accomplish that culture of heart and mind which is held out as the ideal of the womanhood of the church. Hard for me—yes—and I was particularly favored in that I knew personally many of the leaders among the women of our church, who so freely gave encouragement, counsel, direction, to me. Despite the fact that I was "born into this church," it has been the personal contact, the personal touch of these friends that has held me through the years of absence from church and school.

Every year our missionaries are sent abroad to make new converts, only to leave them alone in the struggle, to drift, and many to be lost again to us. If they knew that some one in Zion knew of them, if by a "personal touch" the ideals of our womanhood were presented to them, don't you think that perhaps we might have branches where to-day we have indifferent members—members in name only? It is so easy to drift! We are so terribly human that always we are reaching out for something tangible by which to ascend the heights!

Our farm women, as well as isolated ones, are largely deprived of close association with others, and so get into a rut, and fail to take advantage of the few opportunities which are theirs.

Acquainted with me as you are, you probably know that I believe nothing is so essential in accomplishing the redemption of Zion as the home life of our people, and that no one wields so great an influence in that sphere as its women. It is a matter of deep regret with me that the Women's Department column in the HERALD is no more. Even with the departmental merger, why not a "Home Column" even as other columns of particular interest to men? We do not miss it in Independence or Lamoni so much, but the women do miss it in Idaho, and Virginia, and Texas, and elsewhere.

Am I just an enthusiast, or a "Red"? I'm heart and mind for the women's work, and I'm willing to give my spare hours to the accomplishment of its ideals to the extent of my ability.

I do believe that the isolated need particular attention and that our rural women have problems which we should help them solve, and that a "personal touch" to such will return big dividends.

Encouraging Letters to the Presiding Bishop

Brother Wilbert Grant, Fayette City, Pennsylvania, writes:

"I was reading through the HERALD of December 27, 1922, and saw where Brother C. L. Munro has planned to raise money for 1923, his suggestion being that 20,000 wage earners contribute $1 per week during the year 1923. As I read it I thought it would be all right and I will be one of the 20,000 Saints to send my first dollar on New Year's Day with the hope that 19,999 will also catch the spirit of this suggestion."

"A Penny a Day"

Sister Ida Farley, Carsonville, Michigan, in sending in her tithing and Christmas offering, also includes a special consecration of $7.30 from herself and son. We quote from the letter of this faithful sister as follows:

"The year 1922 is about ended and I desire to send to the storehouse of the Lord my consecration money. This is the second year myself and son have sent in our savings of a penny a day. When the end of the year comes it makes quite a little amount and I hope you will accept it for I am thankful that I have it to give and wish I could give more towards spreading the gospel and building up Zion for I hope some day to be able to gain my inheritance there. I am willing to make a sacrifice that the work in Zion go forward and I am trusting in God for his blessings that I might be able to do my part. I love the gospel and pray that I may prove faithful to the end."

Some may think that a penny a day is too small an amount to bother with, but if everyone who cannot do more would follow this sister's example, the special amount thus raised would be of great assistance to the church in sending more representatives out to proclaim the message of life and salvation.

If the membership of the church would do this thing, it would amount to almost as much as the total amount received annually from tithes and offerings. It is amazing the amount of money that slips through our fingers in penny purchases. We wrote to the Government recently to ascertain how much chewing gum was manufactured in the United States each year, and to our great astonishment we learned that the people of this great commonwealth are spending in pennies and nickels for this one article over $100,000,000 per year. Last year we are informed that the revenue which the Government received from the sale of theater tickets and moving picture shows was $16,000,000 less than the previous year. This amount represents 10 per cent of the decrease in the sale of amusement tickets. In other words the people spent $160,000,000 less for amusement than they did the previous year. It would be interesting to know how much they actually did spend for amusement if they spent $160,000,000 less.

We may indulge in some interesting figures if we will estimate the amount of money which we ourselves spend annually for amusement, joy riding, confectionery, soft drinks, chewing gum, and the like, and then multiply that amount by the total membership of the church—about 100,000. I am sure that the figures will prove interesting. In writing this article I have just asked my stenographer to tell me how much, in her opinion, she and her companion had spent in this manner during the past year. Her reply was that they had spent practically nothing for any of these with the exception of automobile riding and she thought that possibly $50 would cover the amount of unnecessary traveling which they had done during the year. Let us suppose it was only half of that amount and multiply it by half of the membership of the church, and we have the colossal figures $1,250,000.

We have found that when it comes to the question of giving, people are moved upon by their feelings rather than their judgment or their knowledge of that which the law provides. We trust, therefore, that your feelings may be moved upon and synchronized with your judgment and knowledge so that God's work may move forward and accomplish its great mission among the children of men.

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

An Appreciation of the Gospel

I am interested in the gospel of Jesus Christ. His church to me is of especial importance; and his message is food to my soul. The ethics of Jesus become more valuable to me as the days come and go; and I am exercising every legitimate means within my reach to qualify for more efficient service to the church, that thereby I may lead my fellow men to higher and nobler things in life. I see daily a greater need for personal development.

We must possess, if we are to impart; and I am quite aware of the fact that the example of Jesus Christ is of value to me only as I am able to make it a part of myself. Merely to talk about his philosophy means but little to us; but if we are able to testify to the truthfulness of his gospel because we have been able to make it a part of our own lives, and thus have received of his Spirit, and are able to order our lives thereby, we are making progress.

That which has endeared the gospel to me, above all else, is that it has opened my understanding, extended my vision, and modified my disposition. The gentle, peaceful Spirit has distilled upon me until I have come to have a love for service. I am able to deal charitably with my fellow men; and I have learned to be tolerant of the weaknesses of others. It teaches me that kindness is the most effectual means of overcoming error; and to the degree that we exercise it, to that degree will we be successful in our work.

I want to express appreciation of the good work that is being done by the HERALD and the Ensign. I see the progress made by them; and the message they are freighted with weekly is an indicator of the spiritual and intellectual advancement that is being made by the church.

I am also glad to observe that a larger and ever increasing number of our membership are beginning to heed the counsel of the Spirit to the church to study good books, and to become acquainted with histories and nations, etc.

There is a great responsibility resting upon us as the ambassadors of our Lord. We are surely required to qualify for the best possible work, so that in our association with humanity we may be able to convince them, by reason of our conversation and conduct, that we have been with and learned of Christ.

Sickness and unfavorable weather have been hindering causes in my work, but I have every reason to believe that the work of the church is onward. I hope to be able always to bend my energies towards the ultimate triumph of the church in its endeavor to redeem Zion. I hope to be able to demonstrate to the world about me the feasibility of the law of stewardships, and thus cause them to have a desire to blend their endeavors with us in an effort to so adjust the affairs of mankind, that peace on earth and good will to men will be the result.

I wish to remind all those with whom I have labored in other days that I am anxious to see them do their best to assist us in carrying into effect the program that is outlined for us in the gospel economy. Our cause is surely a worthy one. It is the noblest of all professions, and it requires the best there is in us. Shall we not go forward in such a noble cause!

J. E. VANDERWOOD.

Must We Learn by Suffering?

Dear Brother Elbert: It is Sabbath morning and I am alone with my thoughts, and they stretch out over the sea to our beautiful America, and to the spot made sacred to all who truly love this latter-day work—Independence, the Zion of latter days.

I have just read your splendid sermon as published in SAINTS' HERALD under date of January 3, 1923, entitled, "The two commandments," and find it rich indeed for the soul hungering for spiritual enlightenment, counsel, and admonition. My soul is fed with the viands which satisfy; for whatever exalts and glorifies the name and character of the man, Christ Jesus, appeals strongly to me; and your portrayal of him under the influence of the Holy Spirit is beautiful in its inspiration and simplicity. I appreciate this meal I assure you.

It may be what I am passing through has in a measure mellowed the harshness of my peculiar make-up, and my mind and heart made by the process more easily accessible to spiritual appeal. If this is so, I want the door of my heart to be left wide open for such messages and the windows of the soul kept clean, so that no blur may obscure my vision of the blessed Son of God and of Mary, and the one given as the example to my life by God, that in him I may see the service required of me.

I am impressed with this thought as I write, If it has taken the process of agony through which I have passed to prepare my soul, my life for a more acceptable service to the Father and humanity, and the only or best means permitted by him to purify and prepare me for such service, then in these moments of meditation, I say with Paul our brother, "I glory in tribulation," and his declaration is more clearly understood by me. And the clearer vision granted me of Jesus the Son of man through the portrayal of him in your discourse, gives added inspiration to my life and a deeper love to God and humanity.

Is the church to pass through an experience of agony before we respond to the many appeals made to us through the Spirit? "To cease contention. Let love be the ruling factor in our lives. Let contention cease. Sustain each other in peace and ye shall be blessed with my spirit in comforting and strengthening you for my work.

"My servants have been harsh one with another, and some have not been sufficiently willing to hear those whose duty it is to teach the revelations which my church has already received.

"And now I say unto you mine elders, apostles, and high priests of my church, continue ye in the ministry unto which you have been called, and if ye cannot fully agree on all points of the law, be patient, and be not contentious, so far as you can work together without heat, confusion or malice. . . . Continue in steadfastness and faith, let nothing separate you from each other and the work whereunto you have been called, and I will be with you by my spirit and presence of power unto the end."

These with many injunctions from the Master are before us in the revelations and commandments given to us. Shall we trifle longer with him and his long-suffering toward us and let the hand of judgment fall upon us? Great and glorious blessings are in the hands of our Father to bestow. Shall we still call for the rod which, if administered, will bring to us weeping and anguish before we have made the necessary preparation for blessing?

I feel apprehensive this morning because of our delay in making our lives approved of him, yet I am hopeful there will be sufficient faithful Saints to keep disaster from us, and to this end I am more determined to labor and pray.

I appreciate your work for the church, Brother Elbert, especially as so much of it has been accomplished when drawing upon your scanty supply of physical strength; but I know the fact which comes to us in service that our Father recognizes the effort made and will not permit his word to return to him without a fruitage, stimulates you in your work and service to the church,

I am gaining slowly, but have received a severe shaking up and am yet quite weak; but the Lord will bring me through.

Sincerely your brother in Christ,
RICHARD BULLARD.

What Do the Papers Say of Your Branch?

The following was printed by the "Pittsburgh Dispatch" in a recent issue. We will be glad to see clippings from other papers.

The Reorganized Church of Christ, Latter Day Saints, is represented by but one branch in Pittsburgh, this at Realty Avenue and Tonapah Street. L. F. P. Curry is its president. The service Sunday morning, during which five persons were admitted to membership with a ceremony which included baptism by immersion and the laying on of hands was an example of the church's adherence, as its supporters interpret, to the form of worship outlined by Christ 2,000 years ago. The sermon preached by Apostle G. T. Griffiths, of Columbus, was an exposition of the Latter Day Saints' contention that baptism as they administer it is the divinely accepted form.

Elder W. C. Neville, of Canton, Ohio, officiated at the baptismal service in the basement of the church building. The service opened with a prayer by one of the other elders and the singing of a hymn by the membership who gathered about the concrete basin in which the rite was performed. Five candidates descended into the pool one by one, and with hands folded were immersed by Elder Neville. Apostle Griffiths concluded that part of the service with a short prayer.

The laying on of hands was performed by elders, including James McConnaughy, of Barberton, Ohio. As two of the elders stood, their heads bowed and their hands on the head of a candidate, one of them would declare him a member of the church, invoke divine approval of the admission and pray that his life be divinely guided and his transgressions forgiven.

The sermon of Apostle Griffiths was an informal talk based on the text: "Verily, verily I say that unless man be born again he cannot enter the kingdom of God." In describing the baptism of Jesus by John the Baptist he pointed out that Jesus was baptized by immersion. He said:

"Jesus Christ didn't stand in water ankle deep as some famous paintings of his baptism show. The Bible tells us that 'Jesus came straightway up out of the water.' Even Calvin stands with me on that. Baptism means buried with Christ in water and not sprinkling and pouring as is done by some. Immersion is the baptism of the body. The spirit of the body is baptized by the Holy Ghost. A dove came down and covered Jesus over after he had been baptized. Jesus set the example; why not stand with the old standard?"

"The apostles prayed that the people who had been baptized might receive the Spirit of God and they laid on hands. The fact that we lay on hands does not signify that we have power. We cannot give you the Spirit of the Holy Ghost. That comes from God, and if after you have received it you do not keep in the proper attitude, the Spirit will not stay with you.

"The Spirit and power of God are like electricity. You don't see it. The Holy Spirit is God's electricity. Jesus said, 'The Spirit of the Holy Ghost is in your heart and can be given and taken away.' The power that went from Jesus to the poor woman who touched his garment and was healed instantly was the Spirit of the Holy Ghost. The Spirit of the Holy Ghost cannot be purchased by money. If it could some of our millionaires would corner it and we poor people would be left without it."

Besides emphasizing their belief that their church is the true church established by God, the members of the congregation deplored the general assumption that they are in any way associated with the Mormonism of Brigham Young, with its headquarters in Utah. The Reorganized Church has its headquarters in Independence, Missouri, and even sends missionaries into the field of the Mormon Church.

The Passing of John R. Gibbs

The passing away of Brother John R. Gibbs on February 10 adds another Saint to the number who are waiting for us on the other side.

Brother Gibbs was born at Alltween, Wales, in 1844, and spent most of his life at Morristown, Wales. He united with the Utah Church at the age of fifteen, believing it to be the true church, but about 1863 was baptized into the Reorganized Church, and ordained an elder about 1874. The missionaries of those early days who labored in Wales found a warm welcome at his home. Many of the elders such as G. T. Griffiths, Brother Caffall, J. T. Davis, James W. Gillen, M. H. Forscutt, J. K. Evans, F. G. Pitt, and many others have all enjoyed his hospitality. Late in life he came to America and made his home with his daughter, Sister F. S. Elliott, at Lakewood, Ohio.

He spent a long and useful life in the cause he dearly loved, his voice being heard in the streets of his native land as well as in any other place where opportunity offered itself in the defense of the everlasting gospel. His wise counsel and words of admonition will be missed by all who knew him. The many poems and hymns which he has written from time to time, have been an inspiration to those around him. His long, active life, studious nature, Christlike humility, have spoken louder than sermons could possibly have done. He was ever ready to reach out a helping hand and never said an unkind word to anyone, or about them. May it be said of us, as was said of him, "The world was better for his having lived." Now his remains rest in the shadow of the temple at Kirtland.

He is survived by four daughters, Mrs. W. H. Thomas, Mrs. Ernest R. Dewsnup, Mrs. Elizabeth G. Lloyd, and Mrs. F. S. Elliott.

New Song by Elder B. H. Doty

In the HERALD of December 20, 1922, I saw an advertisement of the two songs that were composed by President F. M. Smith.

I am sending under separate cover a copy of one of the songs that I sang at General Conference last fall. The title is, "In the garden of our God." I have just had this published and copies can be had by sending twenty-five cents to the writer at 219 West Ninth Street, Traverse City, Michigan.

Will you please mention this in the HERALD? Over two years ago I pledged toward the auditorium. The sale of this song will assist me to pay it. Any assistance you may be able to give me will be greatly appreciated.

I am your servant and brother, B. H. DOTY.

Dedication of the Madison, Wisconsin, Church

The church in Madison, Wisconsin, was built about thirteen years ago, by the sacrifices of the few Saints living here. There was a debt of one thousand dollars on the church when done, and a mortgage was given on the building for the amount. The interest was paid and some on the principal, but other things in the line of improvements were necessary to be done, as sidewalks, paving the street, painting the outside, decorating the inside, and last, bringing in the water and connecting with the sewer. So instead of paying off the one thousand dollars it has been about twice that amount.

There was a time when several moved away and made it hard to do very much; but in the last few years, things have greatly improved, and some Saints have obeyed the gospel and some more have moved into the branch, and some who were not as interested as they should have been have taken their places, and so the debt is paid.

Elder H. D. Stevens was for many years president of the branch, before the church was built, and for years after, and much credit is due to his untiring efforts. Later Elder F. F. Carpenter was president of the branch and thus the struggle to pay the debt went on. Then Brother Stevens again acted for a time and then we also had a short term of helpful service from Elder E. J. Smith, now of Independence, Missouri, and last, Priest H. W. Woodstock was elected president, and last fall was ordained an elder and is now president of the branch. Much credit is due to him and Teacher Marvin Dennis and Deacon Carl Wirth, that the last of the debt was paid. Priest W. L. Dennis, now of Rockford, Illinois, also acted as president for a time.

Sometime in January, last, I received word from Brother Woodstock that the debt was paid and the dedication desired. This matter was taken up with the First Presidency and through them it was arranged to have Apostle John F. Garver come to assist with the dedication. Yesterday, March 11, was decided as the day, which proved to be a very good day. At the hour of 11 a. m. the church was well filled. The opening number was a hymn sung by the audience; opening prayer by Elder B. C. Flint, followed by another hymn by the audience. Dedicatory prayer was offered by the writer, following which Apostle John F. Garver preached from the following text, Nehemiah 4: 6: "So built we the walls; and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof: for the people had a mind to work." Also Psalms 127: 1, "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." We feel that the Lord was with him, as in all the service as a whole. The full sermon may appear later, if all is well. Benediction by Elder N. E. Hield, jr. Brother Garver preached also at 2.30 and 8 p. m. Special musical numbers were rendered by the local choir to the satisfaction of all.

Some Saints from the near-by branches were present and the day will long be remembered by all present, as one of comfort and joy.

J. O. DUTTON, District President.

A Good Publicity Medium

We have had rather amazing evidence of the value of publicity to be obtained through the HERALD. Some time ago Brother Birch Whiting wrote a humorous account of his experiences with a frozen nose, due to the strenuous Saskatchewan climate. Brother Whiting's humor is always delightful and we gave the public the benefit of his account through the HERALD. Now he comes to us with a letter, dated February 8, in which he says, "I am getting letters from coast to coast and from Hudson Bay to the Gulf about my nose. If you ever publish another letter of mine without my consent, it will be the last one I will write. Well, that is all the time I have to spend on that or I would say some more."

We could not refrain from giving our readers the sequel to the anecdote. Brother Whiting threatens that he will not write again, but Brother Whiting is a good Christian and is bound therefore to forgive us not only seven times, but seventy times seven, and we doubt not we shall hear from him even further.—EDITORS.

Desires Prayers of Saints

I am writing to renew my subscription to Zion's Ensign, also to Stepping Stones. I cannot do without some of the church literature. I would like to subscribe for more if I could, but I am a widow with many debts to pay contracted by my husband long before he died. I am trying to sell my place so I can return to Traverse City, Michigan, whence I came, but it is slow sale.

I am an isolated Saint. I have never met a Saint in this country since my husband brought me here five years ago to get me away from some Saints in Traverse City. I thought at one time he would obey the gospel, but he turned against it and tried to make me give it up; but I could not give up my soul's salvation, so I did everything I could to keep peace, except give up my blessed religion. That has been my comfort and help through the many trials I have been called upon to pass through.

I have been under the doctor's care for eighteen months. He has improved my general health, but I am very nervous and my heart bothers me. The doctor hasn't helped that any as it is getting worse. It is a weak heart. I would like to ask the prayers of the Saints in my behalf. I am seventy-two years young, but would like to have my life spared until I could get my debts paid and my place sold. Then I could go back to Traverse City among the Saints where I could be administered to. I have been helped very much in times past that way. Another thing I want to be able to pay my tithing before I pass over the river of death. I have great faith in the prayers of the Saints. I would come to the Sanitarium if I could. I have no one here with whom I can talk of my troubles. I want to do as the Lord has bidden me to do.

Yours sincerely in the faith,

BREESPORT, NEW YORK.

A Message from Switzerland

Basel d. 30 Dez. 1922.

Liebe Geschwister in dem Herrn: Mit Freuden erlaube ich mir als Glied der Reorganisierten Kirche Jesu Christi der Heiligen der letzten Tage die herzlichsten Grüsse aus dem lieben Schweizerlande zu senden. Bald sind drei Jahre verflossen seitdem das herrliche Licht des wahren Evangeliums in der Stadt Basel anfang zu leuchten. Wie der Stern zu Bethlehem den drei Weisen den Weg gezeigt hat, um das Kindlein in der Krippe zu finden, so ist auch ein heller Stern des ewigen und wahren Evangeliums über dem Schweizerlande aufgegangen.

Wie danken wir von ganzem Herzen unserm himmlischen Vater, dass wir durch Missionärsbruder und Schwester Halb die frohe Botschaft hören durften. Als wahre Gotteskinder arbeiten sie unermüdet in seinem Weinberge. Nicht nur im Lokal wurde die frohe Botschaft verkündet, sondern auf der Strasse erschall den ganzen Sommer die wahrnehmende Stirne unseres lieben Bruders; auch dürften wir mit freudiger Stirne unserm Vater im Himmel Loblieder singen, unter der schönen Musik von unserer lieben Schwester Halb.

Liebe Geschwistern, wie ist es doch so herrlich, wenn wir zusammen für unseren Herrn und Heiland arbeiten dürfen, und wie sind die schönen Worte doch so wahr, "ein Tagwerk für den Heiland, das ist der Mühe wert." Obwohl wir weit von einander getrennt, und wir uns nicht kennen, so bin ich gewiss, dass einst die Zeit kommen wird, da wir uns einst alle sehen werden bei unserm Herrn und Heiland; wie sollten wir uns alle, die wir das wahre Licht empfangen haben, beflüssigen in den Wegen Gottes zu wandeln, damit wir einst mit reinen und weissen Kleidern vor Ihm stehen können. Mein ganzes Streben ist alles zu thun was der Herr von mir verlangt, und mein Gebet ist er möge mir Kraft geben, dass ich Ihm treu bleibe bis zum Tode.

Wie wunderbar segnet der Herr uns, und wie erhört Er unsere Gebete wenn sie von Herzen kommen. Ich kann aus Erfahrung sprechen, wie der Vater im Himmel mein Gebet erhört hat, und mir durch einen herrlichen Traum gezeigt hat, dass das die wahre und lebendige Kirche ist. Er führte mich in einen schönen Garten, und in diesem stand in der Mitte ein Baum, bedeckt mit wundervollen reinen weissen Blüten, und ich sehnte mich von diesen Blüten zu bekommen; da kam ein Bruder und brach mir einen ganzen Armvoll; und wie glücklich und zufrieden wurde ich, als ich sie empfing. So hat mir der Herr durch die reinen weissen Blüten gezeigt, dass das das wahre und reine Evangelium ist, welches ich hörte, und mit freudigem Herzen angenommen habe. Und so rufe ich aus, "deine Zeugnisse sind mein ewiges Erbe, denn sie sind meines Herzens Wonne."

Euere Schwester in Christo,

MARIA KLOTTER.

(Translation by Sister Mabel K. Smith.)

BASEL, SWITZERLAND, December 30, 1922.

Dear Brothers and Sisters in the Lord: It affords me pleasure as a member of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints to send sincerest greetings from our beloved Switzerland. Three years will soon have passed since the glorious light of the true gospel began to shine in the city of Basel. As the star at Bethlehem directed the three wise men in finding the way to the manger of the little child, so has also a bright star of the eternal and true gospel arisen over Switzerland.

How thankful we are from the depths of our hearts to our heavenly Father that we have been privileged to hear the joyous message through Brother and Sister Halb. As true children of God they labor untiringly in this vineyard. Not only in the local was the joyous message proclaimed but also on the street the voice of our dear brother resounded the whole summer. We also sang songs of praise with joyful voices. Dear Sister Halb furnished the beautiful music. Dear brothers and sisters, how glorious it is when we are privileged to work together for our Lord and Master! And how true are the beautiful words, "A daily task for the Lord is worth the trouble."

Although we are separated far from one another and are not acquainted, yet I am certain that the time will come some time when we shall all see one another with our Lord and Master. How we all who have received the true light should busy ourselves to walk in the ways of God in order that we may be able at some time to stand before him in clean and white garments. My whole endeavor is to do all the Lord requires of me and my prayer is that he may give me strength to remain true to him until death.

How wonderfully the Lord blesses us and how he hears our prayers when they come from the heart. I can speak from experience how the Father in heaven heard my prayer and showed me through a glorious dream that this is the true and living church. He led me into a beautiful garden and in the midst of this stood a tree covered with wonderful, pure, white flowers and I longed to get some of these flowers. There came a brother and broke off a whole armful for me. How happy and contented I was to receive them. And thus the Lord has shown me through these pure, white flowers that this is the true and pure gospel which I heard and received with joyful heart. And so I call out, "Your testimonies are my eternal heritage, for they are the joy of my heart."

Your sister in Christ,

MARIA KLOTTER.

West Virginia

Have now concluded my work at Wheeling and Moundsville. At Wheeling we were greatly handicapped by cold weather; gas shortage, and much sickness which culminated in two deaths, one the daughter of the branch president, the other a grandchild. I endeavored to adapt myself to the situation as a comforter.

At Moundsville there was little interest shown by outsiders, so I directed my efforts toward the Saints. In addition to preaching each night and visiting among them, by consent of the branch president I arranged for a problem meeting to be held where the Saints could bring questions and problems for discussion.

I was greatly pleased with the result. Many questions on various subjects were asked and the Lord was with me in answering them. The duties of branch officers, the spiritual development of the young people, court procedure, dancing, and tithing were among the subjects discussed. Was much pleased when a number came to me after the meeting and asked me to help them make out their inventory. Some had not paid any tithing since joining the church.

Some interested outsiders have requested that I return to Wellsburg before leaving these parts, so I am going there this week to do what I can, after which I will probably return to the Kirtland District.

Sincerely,

JOHN F. MARTIN.

Lincoln, Nebraska

As a result of the collision with a street car when returning from church service February 12 [see HERALD February 28, page 213] we are called to mourn the loss of one of our sisters in the person of Edith Baumgart. She leaves many friends and relatives, and her place can be filled by none. She was loved by all who knew her. Funeral from the church on March 7. Sermon by Elder H. A. Higgins. All the others who were hurt are getting along fine and we expect to see them out in a short time. CORRESPONDENT.

Independence

There was a fair attendance at the church services in Independence Sunday though the zero weather was most unusual for this place, particularly at this time of the year. South winds and all the signs of spring illy prepared folks for the icy weather that came roaring down from the North and West.

Appointments Sunday were as follows: Stone Church, preaching by Elders A. B. Phillips and Leslie Wight; Second Independence, preaching by Doctor Joseph Luff both morning and evening; Walnut Park, preaching by Elders J. A. Dowker and T. C. Kelley; Englewood, preaching by Elder John Ely; Enoch Hill, an illustrated lecture by Elder U. W. Greene on the subject "The restoration of the gospel."

Elder Cyril E. Wight, president of the Lamoni Stake, was the speaker at the six o'clock Sunday evening radio service, his subject being, "Saviors of men." Bishop James F. Keir will preach at the radio service next Sunday evening.

President Frederick M. Smith and Bishop Israel A. Smith went to Lamoni Friday to attend the funeral of their aunt Mrs. Anne McFadden who died at the home of Brother and Sister B. M. Anderson in Omaha on Tuesday last. Mrs. McFadden who is well advanced in years came to Omaha a couple of months ago from her home in Los Angeles and had planned to go on to Lamoni where she intended to make her home.

Little Robert, the two-year-old son of Reginald and Mary Loosemore, died very suddenly on Thursday afternoon after an illness of only a few hours. He leaves a brother and sister and his parents. The funeral was held at the house Saturday afternoon, the short sermon being preached by Elder Walter W. Smith. The entire community sympathizes with Brother and Sister Loosemore in their sorrow.

Bishop Benjamin R. McGuire left for the East Thursday and is now in Brooklyn. He will be gone a couple of weeks.

Mrs. David H. Smith, mother of President Elbert A., and Mrs. Cochran, mother of Mrs. Elbert A., were taken to the Sanitarium last week. For a while Mrs. Cochran's condition was alarming, but both patients are now improving.

A series of lectures is being given at the Stone Church each Sunday afternoon and a class of over 50 is preparing through the means of these lectures to qualify as better teachers. Mrs. Walter W. Smith gave the lecture this Sunday on the "Education of the little child." Miss Gertrude E. Copeland, superintendent of the Sanitarium will give next Sunday's lecture. The series will continue for about eight weeks.

At the Walnut Park Church the orchestra will give their annual sacred concert Sunday evening, March 25, at 7.30.

The Laurel Club held its annual election of officers in February, and the following will be the officers for the year: President, Mrs. J. R. Sturges; vice presidents, Mrs. Robert Kemp and Mrs. J. B. Rodgers; secretary and treasurer, Mrs. T. J. Watkins; publicity, Mrs. R. J. Lambert, and historian, Mrs. Viola Short. At this meeting the club voted to contribute $25 to the church library, $100 to the Sanitarium diet kitchen, and $67 tithing. Each member agreed to make five things the coming year to be sold at the close of the year.

The Laurel Club held its annual Saint Patrick's party at the home of Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Watkins, last Friday evening. The usual good time was had at this party though it is not the same event it used to be when it came just prior to General Conference. In the years past many a pre-conference visitor has been initiated into the social life of Independence church circles through this delightful means.

New York and Philadelphia District

The conference of the New York and Philadelphia District was held at Brooklyn, New York, on February 10 and 11, Representatives from nearly all of the branches were present, among them Archibald J. Angus and wife. We were very happy to have them with us, but sorry indeed that our brother was still suffering from rheumatism, that painful malady with which he has been afflicted so long. The Saints offered many prayers in his behalf. Our desire is that the Lord will bless him so that he may be enabled to return again to his labors of love and be a blessing to others.

Brother A. E. Stoft, pastor of the First Philadelphia Branch, was present also. This was the first time that many of the Brooklyn Saints have had the pleasure of meeting him. We hope to have the privilege of getting better acquainted in the near future.

The first meeting of the conference was a business session which was held on Saturday evening and a goodly number of Saints attended. After the usual routine of business the reunion committee was elected and the date decided upon. The reunion will be held at Deer Park, Pennsylvania, August 4 to 19.

Sunday, at 8.30 a. m., a prayer meeting was held, Sunday school at 9.45, and sacramental service at 11. The gifts of the gospel were manifest at both the prayer meeting and sacramental service. Special effort had been made in fasting and prayer for the divine favor of the Lord. All felt to rejoice and to consecrate their lives anew to service.

At 3.30 p. m., a short address was delivered by Brother Stoft, followed by Sister Barbara Milligan, district superintendent of the Department of Women, admonishing them to sense the responsibilities and possibilities of their service to the church.

Brother Philemon Pement of Chicago was the speaker at the evening service. Having been in Brooklyn on business for some weeks past, he has devoted all the time possible to the call of our pastor, Ephraim Squire, and the instructions given from the pulpit here this winter, under the direction of the divine influence, could not fail to be of lasting benefit to the Saints. Business having called him from our midst at present, we sincerely hope ere long to have him back again.

During the conference meals were served in the basement of the church by the Department of Women, enabling all to get acquainted and feel at home which was evidenced by small groups gathered here and there in conversation, the gospel being the particular theme.

We have reason to believe that the conference of the New York and Philadelphia District has left a bright spot in the memory of all who attended. ANNIE E. BOX.

Elder John F. Garver left March 9 for Madison, Wisconsin, where he expected to dedicate their church on Sunday, March 11, and from there enter the Northern Wisconsin District on Monday morning, the 12th, for work in his office.

Northeastern Illinois

Since last writing I have visited several of the branches as well as some of the scattered members, also one of our new missions. We are hoping to get two or three more missions started in a couple of our large cities in Northeastern Illinois; it is really a matter of getting a leader to care for them; one who has some vision of pastoral duties as well as trying to get people into the church.

Desiring to get a concerted action towards a given end, I have thought best to call a meeting of all the departmental heads of the district and prepare a suggestive program for the locals covering the various phases and needs of the work throughout the district.

Spasmodic efforts, "hit and miss" methods in teaching the law, do not bring satisfactory results; it leaves too many openings for the enemy, who is apparently up to date in every way, thorough in his work of organizing his forces, and displaying great leadership in this competitive war for souls.

I find it a great pleasure to work according to plan and system, and that seems to be the hardest thing to get started. Some seem to think that this would interfere with the work of the Holy Spirit in directing one in his duties at the time they should be performed.

It shall not be our purpose to force any one to our way of thinking, but after we have counseled with our associates in the district work and a working plan adopted that will eventually touch every one in the branches as well as the scattered members throughout the district, we believe the utility of the plan will become evident to all earnest workers.

We had better make a few mistakes in trying to get ahead in the work of saving souls than to make the serious mistake of never trying to improve. At least I see it in this light.

With best wishes, I am, J. L. COOPER.

DEKALB, ILLINOIS, February, 1923.

Council Bluffs and Vicinity

On the evening of the 7th inst. Brother Samuel Harding, of Hamilton, Missouri, worshiped with us, and gave a strong testimony of his faith in the ultimate triumph of the work of the Restoration.

Brother H. M. Liles, who spent many years of his life in this city and vicinity, was buried from the Central Church, the sermon being preached by Elder O. Salisbury. He was assisted by Elder J. F. Mintun.

The second daughter of Brother and Sister W. T. Fay, Hazel Marie, died of diphtheria at the age of nine years, and a short service was held at the home, March 3, while the family were in quarantine. The memorial sermon will be preached at the Central Church, March 19, by Elder G. J. Harding. The services at the house and at the church were and will be in charge of Elder J. F. Mintun.

Sickness is abating since the storm of Saturday. Many of the Saints have undergone some severe trials, but none as yet have been overcome, and many of them are stronger in the faith than before the trial.

The Bright Star Class of the Religio held a social meet on Tuesday the 12th inst., at the home of J. R. Epperson.

Brother Will Hand paid a short visit at the home of his brother, H. H. Hand. He is on his way to California, to which place his wife has preceded him on account of poor health.

The cold weather following the severe storm is passing and in its stead the warmth of the sun is causing the lawns to begin to put on its beautiful garment of green.

The series of services held at the Belmont Mission by Elder P. T. Anderson came to a close last Sunday. The weather and epidemic conditions hindered. Two were baptized from the vicinity of the mission last Sunday afternoon.

We hear good reports of the West End Mission, especially of the prayer meetings.

From Columbus, Ohio

Presiding Patriarch F. A. Smith writes: "There are a fine lot of Saints here in Columbus. Brother Curtis has been with me until this morning, March 14, when he went to Saint Marys, Ohio, where they hope to organize a branch, all of new members, mostly the work of Elder O. J. Hawn.

"We had a very fine conference here with good will throughout. The sacrament and prayer service Sunday forenoon was extraordinarily good. We had the spirit of prophecy and four people spoke in prophecy and one very fine tongue and interpretation so you will see the meeting was above the average. Brother Griffiths seems to be in pretty good spirits.

"We have two branches in this city with fine churches at both places.

"I expect to attend two other district conferences before returning home."

Kirtland Glimpses

Perhaps not everyone comes into this place with a willingness to understand its past by the evidences of the present, and, by drawing a line straight from the one point to the other and on, project our vision into the future. So this morning as we quietly take our seat in the rear center of the temple auditorium, we find ourselves time and again accepting these people, young and old, as characters of those early days. Were I an artist I would paint such a picture, emblematic of spiritual beauty, as appears silhouetted against yonder panel, the profiles of two young sisters and a vista of the pillars toward a many-paned Gothic window. "Puritan maids at worship," would be a fitting title.

Now the speaker has taken his place, the song been sung, and a simple prayer offered; presently the speaker is on his feet and directing his words to us. Surely such a man must the Prophet have looked in that very stand years ago—a tall and well-knit figure on whom sat the dignity of his office and calling, whose message reflected no lightness of speech, its sincerity being attraction enough, and yet no lack of food for thought in his address. But it is in the testimony of these people that we are made part of that whole, Saints of former days, of latter days, and of present days, the witness of the Spirit attending, and we sense that fellowship that tells us we are one whether we meet with the church at home, in far lands, or the isles of the sea. Here we meet those who have sacrificed that the gospel might go to some of these places; in faces before us we recognize those who might write from experience stories to rival those of a Robert Louis Stevenson of those far islands. Some here could tell us of those bitter disillusionings of the West. Some of more recent time, of trials closer home when Saints and fellowship were few and far between. It is heartening to one's soul to meet and chat with such at the close of such a service.

And now the day is given over to the instruction of parties or tourists who come continuously to see the temple; they come from far and wide, often from across seas, some plain sight-seeing, others from sheer curiosity, and still others with a reverence either for things divine or for antiquities. Often these groups are of some club out for an "experience," or a social hiking crowd making this place its objective. Famous architects have visited—and do visit—for purposes of “shop”; and small parties from religious seminaries also call and question, evidently for purposes of essay. There are also those who seem disappointed that there is not something of the kind that made Utah famous, that they might gloat over it, or mayhap wallow in it!

It oftentimes requires the services of several brethren to conduct these parties through the building and see that they are properly informed regarding our standing as a church. At that there are many willfully blind, willfully deaf, and woefully dumb. Among such many mighty works may not be done! Then there are the many and many that come whom we must feel are directed of the Spirit and give heed to our testimony.

So the afternoon busily wears away; we eat a frugal lunch at the hospitable table of a neighboring Saint and sit a while to chat on topics of the work dear to us until the church-going bell calls us to the evening service.

Again we sit and muse as the Saints come quietly in to their places; we watch the violet sky and deepening shades in the foliage seen through the three windows behind the pulpits. Presently the soft electric light floods the interior with a whiteness of alabaster. One may easily believe angelic beings occupy the empty pulpits. The windows appear of most beautiful stained-glass mosaic until the darkness without has settled down to a blue-black, relieved only by the delicate frets of the white sash bars. We enjoy the singing of old favorites in the Hymnal and a solo number sung unaffectedly, followed by an earnest discourse by one of the local priesthood.

“And after they had sung an hymn they went out”; the benediction has been given; they tarry for a few moments extending greetings, and disperse even as the sharp rays of light fall in every direction from the lighted windows; they flash off and on again, linger a moment, then a darkness that reveals the slender moon and the great firmament above where dwells the great Ruler of the universe, and we feel to ask him, with bare head under the silent stars, “What have you in store for this place and this temple yet? Does it stand defiled and rejected as some have said, or is there yet a work and waiting glory before thee?”

May we dare draw that line straight from the past, through the present, and project it on into the future? We will try as we go on.

A Good Tract for Class Study

The adult classes in Sunday school and Religio who seek advanced courses for worth-while study would do well to consider one of our best tracts, “The Latter-Day Glory—Church History in Brief,” by President Elbert A. Smith. This tract has many commendable features for such purposes. It is brief yet extensive enough to cover the ground thoroughly with the essential points.

The study of this tract could well be on the basis of learning for the definite purpose of equipping one for telling the story of the rise of our church to others. It has some advantages over but need not supersede the study of the four volumes of church history in use by the church. The tracts cover the period of preparation, first visions, the migrations of the church, introduction of false doctrines following the death of the leaders, the scattering, and the reorganization. The price is low—every class member will want to own a copy for himself. The material is of exceptional value to all ages and will appeal to nonmember as well as member.

HERALD PUBLISHING HOUSE

Elder E. F. Shupe writes from Littleton, Colorado, that the district conference met at Fort Collins February 24 and 25 but was not largely attended. John W. Rushton was in attendance on his way to Utah, from which point he expected to return to Denver the 14th to hold a series of meetings.

The sacrament service at Denver the first Sunday in March was especially good. Raymond Hamlin was out for the first time since recovering from a severe siege of smallpox. Twice in one week the branch was called upon to mourn, first the death of Sister Wyatte who was eighty-three years of age and who was buried March 6, with sermon by Elder J. B. Wildermuth. The second was that of Lucile Thompson, the only child of her parents, who was laid to rest with sermon by Elder Frank B. Almond. There were many flowers as she is missed by a large number of friends.

You are one of our assets through utilization of which we can still lead in our speciality—witnessing for Christ. That idea you did not send us is maybe the very one needed to make our message effective. It is your radio. Make it count.

The conversational specialties of the moment are King “Tut” and radio. King “Tut” has taught the man in the street the meaning of archeology. Our radio will tell him the great lesson to be learned from the archeology of his own country. Everything witnesses for Jesus.

Tell your friends of the program. Invite them to listen in. Be a missionary.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI. Sermons are fine, but too short.—J. T. Curtis.

Material for April 8 Sent Out

The Missionary Educational Lesson Sheet to be used in all the Sunday schools on April 8, 1923, went forward from this office on or before March 10.

The plan of distribution is as follows: One copy only was sent to the branch president on which was stamped the request, "Please hand this to the Sunday school superintendent." A supply was sent to each district or stake Sunday school superintendent on the basis of four to a school, to be distributed by them except in the cases when these superintendents requested us to send the supply direct to the local superintendent, and furnished us with the address of each superintendent and the number of lesson sheets required corresponding to the number of classes to be supplied.

The district superintendent is expected to be able to furnish each school with enough copies so that each teacher may have one. If the supply we have sent is inadequate let us hear from you at once. To keep the cost to a minimum, only enough copies to go around have been provided. A few extra, to supply actual shortages, are still on hand. Combining classes is a remedy of last resort. Nevertheless, we hope that on this Sunday, April 8, every pupil in every school will be made thoroughly acquainted with the purpose of all our Christmas offering endeavor, and in this process be thoroughly saturated with the missionary spirit.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, Box 256.

Missionary Sunday, April 8, 1923

Attention of Sunday School Superintendents and Teachers: Doubtless you have received or soon will receive, from your district superintendent, the lesson sheets to be used on Sunday, April 8.

Have you decided just how you will use them? If practicable we suggest that each superintendent call a conference of the teachers soon and make certain that the situation is thoroughly understood by them in advance. They should know:

1. That the lesson sheet is to take the place of quarterly, Doctrine and Covenants, normal, or other texts regularly in use—in fact all classes in all grades.
2. That it is to be used the entire class period.
3. That the pupils do not have access to these lesson sheets.
4. That it is designated to be used exclusively on Sunday, April 8, and should be used for reference many times later.
5. That there is much more material here than can possibly be "covered" in one lesson, which suggests:
6. That the material which shall be used must be carefully selected, outlined, and prepared so that the lesson sheet may be passed among the class members without retarding the teaching process.
7. That additional information concerning the pictures is to be found on the reverse side of the sheet, under the caption, "Church missionaries of to-day." The numbers appearing at the beginning of each section refer to the numbers of the pictures involved.

8. That duplicate copies to replace those torn or lost are not available.

9. That the direct object sought is an enlarged missionary spirit in the church and,

10. That the means by which a greater missionary program may be carried out should be "tied up" with this lesson, and that means is the Christmas offering.

Brief preliminary remarks may be appropriately made by the superintendent before the school goes into class session. At the close of the session a talk on the Christmas offering might be used. Some material appearing in the Blue Stepping Stones of April 1, 1923, will furnish you a basis for this discussion.

A. MAX CARMICHAEL,

General Superintendent Department of Sunday School.

I am a very sincere believer in the program for higher education being urged upon the attention of the church; but always conditionally. The conditions are these: that as individual students and as a church we shall carry with us the old ideals, the fundamental doctrines, the faith, devotion, and consecration typical of the "Great restoration." Without those conditions education will profit us nothing and would not be worthy the term "higher" education. Given those conditions it will profit us greatly to have a membership and a ministry much better informed in all the realms of learning.

If a deeply religious people cannot move forward with such a program and carry Christ with them, who can? And if we are not a people who can study nature, God, law, government, society, sociology, geology, astronomy, biology, whatnot, and carry Christ with us, is there any hope that we can remain in ignorance and keep him with us?

Certainly many colleges and universities of the world are so shot through with atheism that any student entering them unless well grounded by early training runs the risk to emerge without either the faith or the virtue necessary to a foundation for a worth-while life. And thoughtful observers are beginning to inquire if the influence of such institutions may not eventually hasten the destruction and ruin of society rather than its redemption and upbuilding. When students are imbued with the philosophic doctrine that "immortality is a sheer illusion" the feeling of personal responsibility is immediately lessened. The old doctrine that Christ "brought life and immortality to light" gave man something to build for. It evaluated responsibility and personal worth in the light of immortality—of eternity. When students are boldly taught that "man is a mere cosmic accident" springing from nothing, returning to nothing, the foundations of character are undermined. An "accident" can have no moral responsibility. The only ethics that can possibly result from such teachings are epicurean—to make the most of physical sensation in every way possible during the brief moment of consciousness—eat, drink, and be merry for to-morrow we die. To the extent to which modern education spreads that doctrine abroad it is sowing the wind from which society will reap the whirlwind.

Doctor Fosdick tells the story of a young business man face to face with a great temptation; great gain was to be had at the expense of honor. Gripping the arms of the chair as he sat in the doctor's office he cried: "If I could be sure of immortality, this thing would be simple." Fosdick comments: "What did he mean? Simply this: if his character was really a thing of eternal significance it was worth the fight, no matter what the cost. But once let him have the suspicion that his life is merely a piece of tissue paper, destined to be crumpled up and tossed away—well, why sew diamonds of virtue on to tissue paper?"

That man's reaction will be the reaction of the masses once they are imbued with the materialistic philosophy. The atheistic propaganda of many college professors is helping to spread that gospel. Can we go forward in education and avoid that pitfall? Can we avoid the responsibility to go forward and avoid it? Ours is the admonition to "seek learning even by study and also by faith." (Doctrine and Covenants.) Ours the admonition to "add to faith virtue and to virtue knowledge." (The Bible.) Ours the advice, "to be learned is good, if they hearken to the counsels of God." (Book of Mormon.)

The Literary Digest for March 3 has a very interesting article (in turn based on an editorial appearing in the Century). It is headed, "The growing philosophic despair." I quote:

No salvation, no immortality, nothing but cosmic collapse at the end—this is the philosophic fear which the contemporary literature of despair holds for us, and which is likely, we are told, to do considerable harm unless counteracted. The mechanistic philosophy, as it is being taught in some of our colleges and universities and in the published works of some of the philosophers schooled in psychology, biology, chemistry, and physics, is inculcating in the man-on-the-street the idea that he is little more than an animated clod, and that the universe is a mere machine without sympathy or purpose. This theory of life is not the view of insane men, seriously avers Albert Edward Wiggam, lecturer and writer, in a letter to Glenn Frank, editor of The Century Magazine, but a view that is laying hold upon the minds of some of our leading philosophers, a view that is being taught in many of the colleges and universities of America and northern Europe. Nietzsche, the German philosopher, proclaimed that "God is dead," and that in his place man has nothing to offer except the "superman." Nietzsche died in a madhouse, but his skepticism influences the minds of some of our later philosophers and educators, to the great spiritual danger of the generation of to-day, particularly that part of it which depends on the educated and cultured for its spiritual light and food.

Our people must carry with them in their educational program the old religious beliefs that are fundamental to character building if we are to be in any sense the "salt of the earth" to an age whose salt has lost its savor. And our ministry must go out preaching the fundamental things of salvation. A knowledge of philosophy, of science, of history, may help them to preach that gospel but must not supplant the gospel.

Paul understood Greek philosophy and Roman law and used both, but could he have filled his mission had he been content to turn himself into a lecturer on Greek philosophy or Roman law? As an exponent of Plato or Aristotle he would have been about as valuable to Christ as is the modern clergyman who is a teacher of psychology and nothing more, a lecturer on sociology and nothing more, who has a smattering of ethics and poetry and nothing more; but he could never, never have been Paul the Apostle, "a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel." This church must have some vital things to tell the world that no other people have, or we have no reason for existence. Let us first preach those things. That which is common to all, others may promulgate.

EDITORIAL

A Strong Pulpit Man

Some weeks ago we published an editorial from the Holden Progress relative to the attack on the Book of Mormon being indulged in by the Reverend Doctor J. B. Briney. The fact that Holden is a prominent place, the seat of the presidency of the Holden Stake, the courage and fairness displayed by the editor of the Progress in that editorial made it interesting to our readers. They may be pleased to hear further concerning the matter. In the Holden Progress for March 8 there appeared an interesting editorial on the work of Brother A. B. Phillips in replying to the Reverend Briney, including also copy of extracts from court decisions regarding the standing and belief of the Reorganized Church. And the editor closed his editorial with these comments, "These facts, taken from unimpeachable records, ought to be sufficient to let the God-fearing portion of our community allied with the L. D. S. church go their ways in peace, free from assault of any kind on their faith," while the Progress for March 1 contained an editorial entitled, "A strong pulpit man," referring to the work of Arthur B. Phillips. This editorial we feel sure is worthy of a place in the HERALD.

A Strong Pulpit Man

Elder Arthur Phillips, a prominent man in the L. D. S. denomination, spoke in the Holden church Friday night in answer to the denunciation of the Book of Mormon delivered by Doctor J. B. Briney in the Christian church the Sunday night previous. He is a scholarly man from New England and just now is engaged in a work of making comparative texts and other interesting notes on the Old and New Testaments from the many English translations of the Bible and from the Greek and Hebrew texts. He had been furnished with stenographic notes of Doctor Briney's remarks. These he answered in a scholarly manner.

At no time did he utter a word inconsistent in a gentleman or a Christian. He did not jeer or sneer or use ridicule in any way. He did not descend to the level of using nicknames such as "Joe" Smith, as the doctor did many times in his Sunday night effort. The nearest Elder Phillips approached to a personality was in connection with this. He said that the doctor's use of "Joe," etc., was (in his opinion as a character analyst) evidence of a prejudiced mind, whereupon he declared that no prejudiced man could discuss any question dispassionately or accurately.

In the matter of the title page of the 1830 edition of the Book of Mormon on which was inscribed, "Joseph Smith, Author and Proprietor," which same expression appeared in the copyright certificate on the following page, Elder Phillips explained that this was in accordance with regulations specified in the copyright law. Every person presenting a document for copyright becomes technically the "author and proprietor." (The editor of The Progress wishes to say at this point that later on we will print a fact or two about this "author and proprietor" matter that will make Doctor Briney and the whole of his congregation wish he had never said anything about it.)

In the matter of the copyright line not appearing in the 1874 edition, Elder Phillips called attention to the provisions of the copyright law by which a copyright runs 28 years with a renewal privilege of fourteen years; the copyright had expired before the 1874 edition was published. Doctor Briney's assertion that "Nephi was the hero of the whole business" is disproved by the facts that the book covers a period of time from 2200 B. C. to 400 A. D., and that it is composed of fifteen books with at least twenty other prominent men. The assertion that Nephi was but a babe and incapable of the "stunts" attributed to him, such as slaying a soldier and putting on his garments, is disproved by the statement following the portion quoted by Doctor Briney, to the effect that Nephi "was of great stature." The doctor's objection to the repetition of the words "came to pass" is of little force because that expression is used many times in the Bible. There are many instances of an expression such as "came to pass" being used differently by various translators. For instance, the Greek word "angelos" is translated both "angel" and "messenger" in different parts of the New Testament. In the Douay version (the English version of the Catholic Bible) the word is always translated "angel" because one translator had done all the work. In discussing translations of the Bible, Elder Phillips called attention to the fact that there is not in existence to-day (so far as archæologists have information) a single original MS. of the Sacred Writings. He also declared that the assertion that God had never appeared to man outside of Palestine or at any time since so-called Biblical times is a matter of opinion, not supported by the Scriptures. That there should be no miraculous intervention since Biblical times is also a matter of opinion.

Elder Phillips will speak here again to-morrow (Friday) night in reply to the doctor's remarks delivered Sunday night. He invites questions pertaining to the subject at issue.

Doctor Briney was invited to hear Elder Phillips, Elder D. J. Krahl's invitation being dated Tuesday, the 20th. Doctor Briney replied on the 21st, declining the invitation, one of the reasons assigned being, "It behooves one of my age to be out as little as possible at night." Yet that same night of the 21st, it seemed to "behoove" the doctor to attend the Edna Means entertainment at the high school auditorium.

Missionary Sunday, April 8

The special Sunday school class sheet prepared under the direction of the Presiding Bishop on behalf of the 1923 Christmas offering with the cooperation of the Sunday school has now been distributed and provision made for the subject of the missionary work of the church to be taken up in all of the Sunday schools on the second Sunday in April, namely, April 8.

This is the nearest Sunday to the anniversary date of the organization of the church. In addition to this Christmas offering effort, there remains the great fact of the missionary work of the church and what we are doing and what we should do. This presents a great theme for all of the members of the church as well as for the children. How can we better celebrate the anniversary of the foundation of the church than to consider the missionary work now being undertaken and which lies before the church in the near future.

It may surprise some to realize how many years the church has pushed its missionary work in Australia and New Zealand, the Society Islands, in Germany, and Great Britain, and the fact that it has also been extended to the Isle of Pines, to Holland, and to the Holy Land. On the continent of North America the work has been presented in all parts of the United States and of Canada; not, it is true, in every hamlet, but certainly in every state and province. But there still remains those great lands to the south, the Spanish-speaking people of Mexico, Central America, and South America. There remain also many parts of Europe which are as yet untouched, while as to Asia only a small effort has been made in Palestine.

Three years ago it was planned to send missionaries to South Africa where there were hopes of an excellent opening, but conditions in the church have so far prevented. The missionary possibilities in the land where the work has already been opened up are still tremendous and we have scarcely made a good start with our opportunities.

While the Sunday school is taking up this theme for a special purpose it is well that all of us consider it carefully as members of the church of God.

Philosophy of Life

The editors have been much pleased to receive individually copies of The Philosophy of Life, by F. M. Pitt. Brother Pitt is a son of Evangelist F. G. Pitt who is so well known to the Saints throughout the world. His book is a very worthy statement of his philosophy of life and sets forth clear ideals. It is printed privately on good quality paper in clear type and contains a number of excellent illustrations. It is in fact a work of art and we take this means of expressing our appreciation.

The Australian Mission

Australia, though classed as an island, is a land about as large as the United States. It is 2,500 miles straight east and west and about half that distance north and south. It is of course more than this from the most eastern to the most western point or from the most northern to the most southern point.

Recent maps show that the greater part of west and south Australia which comprises practically two thirds of the land is but very little developed. There are a few roads runnings into the interior and the population is very small for the size of the land. In fact about half the people live in the cities Adelaide in south Australia and Perth in west Australia.

It is well to keep this in mind, for as we read reports from that mission we have noted several times that a missionary has written of the possibility of going to West Australia, but the trip was then postponed and nothing done. The reason for this may be better appreciated when we realize that we have one branch in West Australia on the west coast of the land, namely Perth, with a membership of 66. This branch is practically isolated, as it is about 1,500 miles to the next nearest branch, that of Adelaide in South Australia, while Adelaide with a membership of 126 is still 500 miles from the nearest neighboring branch. It is safe to say that Perth must be close to 2,000 miles away from any other branch, except Adelaide. This will account in large measure for the rarity with which that place is visited, so that the responsibility is left with the local men.

Elder W. J. Vaughn and wife spent about eight months in Perth and vicinity during 1922 but found it necessary to return.

The bulk of the membership is in the southeastern part of Australia. The Southern New South Wales District reports 735; North New South Wales, 532; Victoria, 408. This is a total of 1,613 out of a present membership in all Australia and New Zealand of 2,117. The remaining membership is 199 in South Queensland, 22 in Auckland, New Zealand, and 29 in Dunedin.

Bishop Lewis has charge of the financial work in New South Wales, Queensland, and New Zealand; Bishop Crane in Victoria, South Australia, and West Australia. The report of Bishop Crane is not set forth in the Gospel Standard, but that of Bishop Lewis shows receipts of nearly 2,300 pounds for the year which would appear to compare favorably with the receipts in other districts of the church.

The above information is principally gathered from the excellent report of Apostle M. A. McConley as published in the Gospel Standard for January 1, together with the report of the business of the conference. Elder McConley has visited all parts of Australia and New Zealand where we have church members, with the exception of West Australia, and he hopes to visit that branch this present year. He has already arranged for another missionary to go to West Australia. We should remember, however, that West Australia is not greatly built up at present, but there are Saints living in several different towns, and it is hoped that more assistance may be given them and others converted, so the work may be better established and strength gained through association in that field.

In South Australia the Saints have secured a Catholic school building as a house of worship. The Victoria District has six branches and two organized groups. New South Wales has received more missionary help than all the rest of the missions. The Southern District consists of seven branches; the Northern District of New South Wales consists of six branches. The labor of Elder James W. Davis has been especially effective in these districts by way of baptisms, as there have been at least sixty baptized there, while the total given for New South Wales for both districts is 110.

There are two branches in Queensland with Elder Hermann Peisker as the only missionary. In New Zealand the church has for a long time paid high rents for poor quarters. With the concurrence of the Presiding Bishopric 1,000 pounds were expended for the purpose of erecting proper quarters. This effort proved successful and the saving on rental which will be paid over by the local Saints will in a few years pay the general church for the building, and the church will have the building then without any great expense.

Because of the fact that Australia is in the Southern Hemisphere, this conference is held in their summer and is one of the big events of the year. The meetings were held over the Christmas holidays and began on Saturday, December 23, at 10 a. m., and continued until Sunday, December 30, with the 7 p. m. service closing the conference.

The appointment of missionaries in the mission consists of one to West Australia, one to South Australia, two to Victoria, seven to New South Wales, two to Queensland, and four to New Zealand. Elder J. T. Gresty has been appointed as evangelist to New South Wales and Victoria. Sister McConley as well as Brother McConley is appointed to the whole mission. The bishops are appointed to their own particular fields.

How the Wets Helped Prohibition

One of the amusing features of the prohibition movement is the excitement over the amount of publicity secured by the Anti-Saloon League in New York City by an expenditure of less than $25,000. It perhaps is not surprising that anti-prohibition interests would like to secure more details about how it was accomplished, and in part the state superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League has informed them.

He took advantage of his knowledge of psychology, of the intense opposition of all of the New York papers to the Anti-Saloon League, and their very alertness or guard against any efforts to work them out. This made it possible to use the simplest method, because he had back of him a great moral issue. The very sophistication of the papers offered his opportunity and helped his publicity campaign with a nominal expenditure. And this because the wet press failed to comprehend the potentiality of the moral issue and the reaction of a moral constituency to ridicule and antagonism when carried to the point of persecution.

This very attack, Mr. Anderson says, was the factor which he capitalized for the advancement of the cause of the churches. The very efforts to belittle the cause offered him the fulcrum for a great movement. Hence he used the efforts of the wet press, as he expresses it, to "kick the Anti-Saloon League up hill." As long as they were kicking it up hill, he was willing that they should have a lot of fun doing it.

It is a fact that too many men entirely ignore the importance of the moral issue and the tremendous force that righteousness exerts. We have seen that in other cases; we have seen that elsewhere in the prohibition movement than in New York.

Profit Sharing Ancient

Among the discoveries of the oriental research in the vicinity of Babylon there have appeared several reports that they have discovered contracts, agreements of profit sharing, and the like, dating back several thousand years. It may be that some of these statements are not quite authentic, but we have been assured by direct communication that such discoveries have been made.

The story is at least an interesting one as related in a recent periodical that in 2000 B. C. an employer decreed that his employees were to profit because of faithful service and receive a share of his gains for the year; all except the black mailers who it seems had caused some trouble which was first to be investigated, and if satisfactorily settled then they, too, should share.

The Unchangeability of God

Synopsis of a radio sermon by President Elbert A. Smith, broadcasted by the Central Radio Company from its Independence studio, Sunday evening, March 11, 1923.

In order to understand our religious philosophy it is necessary for you to understand our belief concerning God. In fact in order to understand any religious system or organization or even any particular phase of any particular religious system, it is necessary to understand its central ideas concerning God. The idea of God is the beginning of all religion. The characters and destinies of men, of communities, and of nations are greatly influenced by their attitude towards God.

Roger W. Babson, the well-known statistician and business expert, tells a story about an interview that he had with the president of the Argentine Republic. The president said to him, "Mr. Babson, I have been wondering why it is that South America with all its natural advantages is so far behind North America, notwithstanding that South America was settled before North America." He went on to recount the great natural resources of South America—her forests, her mines, her rivers, and her great plantations, and concluded by reiterating the question, "Why is it that notwithstanding all these, North America is so much greater than South America?" Babson, being a guest, could not well answer excepting to inquire, "Mr. President, what do you think is the reason?" The president replied, "I have come to this conclusion. South America was settled by the Spaniards, who came to South America in search of gold. North America was settled by the Pilgrim Fathers who went there in search of God."

The Pilgrim Fathers, in whose lives God was very real, put a spiritual foundation under the nation that was adequate—a foundation of faith, integrity, industry, and morality. But alas, to-day we have undermined and diminished that foundation until Babson says our great and wonderful material superstructure is left without an adequate spiritual foundation, and unless we beware it will fall.

A Personal God

You have a perfect right to ask us concerning our belief in God and we are happy to answer you. Of necessity the answer must be brief and by no means exhaustive. First, I will say that we believe in a personal God. We believe in a God having all the attributes of personality—intellect, feeling, and will. Not in some impersonal force or power in nature, but in a being to whom we may pray, as we were taught to pray, "Our Father, which art in heaven." We believe that he is all-wise, all-powerful, all-loving, in fact infinite in all his attributes, and is in all things good.

We believe, moreover, that God is unchangeable. You may tell us that it is needless for us to announce such a belief, for do not all people who believe in God think that he is unchangeable? Not necessarily so. There are those who have announced a belief in a progressive God. They say that "as man is, God once was." They tell us that God came over the road which we are traveling to-day. Also there are and have been many philosophers who have announced a belief in a finite and growing God. My message is affirmative and I do not stop to-night to negate these positions, only to say, If the universe is in the hands of a finite and experimenting deity, then God pity us, and let us pity God.

We believe thoroughly in the scriptural declaration, "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." (James 1: 17.) The Lord himself says, "I am the Lord, I change not." (Malachi 3: 6.) Jesus has this attribute and of him it is said, "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever." (Hebrews 13: 8.)

A great many people, who do not announce that they believe in a progressive God and who perhaps would repudiate that doctrine, seem to have such a belief in that they apparently think that many of the things enjoyed by the ancient church, freely bestowed by God at that time, are not now to be given to his people, indicating a change of attitude on the part of Deity not comprehensible to us. On the contrary we agree with John Wesley, who said that these blessings had ceased, not because God had changed, but because the people, touching those things, had become heathen and disbelievers. The logic of our belief in the unchangeability of God forces us, though very happily, to a belief in a continuation of all the good things enjoyed by the New Testament church. Because of it we believe in continued revelation. Not only is God unchangeable, but man himself in the fundamentals of his nature changes not. As the centuries pass he may change the style of his dress, his language, his customs, his methods of travel and communication, but fundamentally he is the same. His passion, his desires, his aspirations, his problems, his spiritual needs change not. If God can say, "I am the Lord, I change not," man may without blasphemy reply, "And I am man and I change not." Out of these considerations, God's unchangeability and man's needs, comes logically our belief in continued revelation.

Present Tense Religion

We believe also in other things which may be illustrated by scriptural reading. For instance, from the twelfth chapter of the first Corinthian letter I read, "But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal." I pause here to comment. Paul's religion was in the present tense, "The spirit is given." The Jews had lapsed into the past tense and were always telling about the things that God had done in the days when he led them through the Red Sea. Jesus came returning the present tense to religion, and Paul followed in his footsteps saying, "The spirit is given." To-day again many have lapsed into the past tense. They tell us that God did speak, the spirit was given, blessings were enjoyed, there were prophets. The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints stands up to restore the present tense to religion. God speaks now; his blessings are given now; there are prophets to-day.

I renew my reading:

But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues: But all these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will.—1 Corinthians 12: 7-11.

Our belief in the continuous operation of the divine Spirit of an unchangeable God leads us to believe that the manifestations of the Spirit mentioned in the scripture just read are for us to enjoy to-day. I read now further from the same chapter, "And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues." (1 Corinthians 12: 28.)

Also:

And he gave some, apostles; and some prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ: till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.—Ephesians 4: 11-13.

New Testament Church

In the scriptures just read we have an outline of the organization of the New Testament church as the Lord himself designed it. Our belief that the church should be organized to-day as it was in New Testament times, that it should teach the same doctrine, and enjoy the same blessings, follows naturally upon our belief in the character of God. He has not changed; his administration has not changed; the Christian system is what it was designed to be.

Religion Is God Consciousness

Not long ago a group of religious teachers and educators were discussing religious education for children. They were trying to determine the one thing that ought first to be instilled into the life religiously and all finally agreed that the first essential was to become "God-conscious." This people, having often enjoyed the blessings that were enjoyed by the New Testament church, having had again and again pentecostal outpourings, having seen the goodness and power of God displayed, became exceedingly "God-conscious" in their religious life. Their favorite song began:

The Spirit of God like a fire is burning;
The latter-day glory begins to shine forth;
The visions and blessings of old are returning;
The angels are coming to visit the earth.

What was it made Paul so vehement in defense of the Christian religion? Was it not because he was so vividly conscious of God in his work? He had seen the power of God and had felt it, not once but many times; and in a similar way out of our experiences there have come to us spiritual testimonies that can hardly be duplicated either in the 19th or the 20th century. As for instance this testimony which I read from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, section 76, paragraph 3:

We, Joseph Smith, jr., and Sidney Rigdon, being in the Spirit on the sixteenth of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, by the power of the Spirit our eyes were opened, and our understandings were enlightened, so as to see and understand the things of God; even those things which were from the beginning before the world was, which were ordained of the Father, through his only begotten Son, who was in the bosom of the Father, even from the beginning, of whom we bear record, and the record which we bear is the fullness of the gospel of Jesus Christ, who is the Son, whom we saw and with whom we conversed in the heavenly vision. . . . And, now, after the many testimonies which have been given of him, this is the testimony, last of all, which we give of him, that he lives; for we saw him, even on the right hand of God; and we heard the voice bearing record that he is the Only Begotten of the Father; that by him, and through him, and of him, the worlds are and were created.

Where in modern literature will you find another such testimony? Perhaps in the brief time that I have occupied I have given you at least a partial understanding of how it is that many of our doctrines and religious beliefs follow logically our belief concerning the character of God.

The Functions of the Storehouse

By J. W. Gilbert

It acts as the hub to the economic wheel, of which the iron rim is the Order of Enoch, and stewardship the spokes.

Never in the history of the race has society concerned itself in its collectivity with the task of providing for its physical needs in an organized, rational manner. Nor does it seem to contemplate doing so at this late date, and for that reason the failures, according to Bradstreet, are about 87 per cent of those who launch industrial undertakings. This is deplorable in that it involves an enormous waste and discouragement. This, however, is an inevitable condition that naturally obtains in the evolution of the race from a thinly scattered condition. But in the increase of the peoples of earth, there comes a time in which the haphazard, individual efforts to provide the necessities of life must give way to a more systematic, orderly concerted, cooperative effort. That time has come, and there is a crying need for society to betake itself seriously to the task of collectively supervising and regulating the work of supplying itself with the commodities of life. So, in the words of instruction given,

The time has come, and is now at hand; and, behold, and lo, it must needs be that there be an organization of my people, in regulating and establishing the affairs of the storehouse for the poor of my people . . . for a permanent and everlasting establishment and order unto my church, to advance the cause which you have espoused, to the salvation of man, and to the glory of your Father who is in heaven, that you may be equal in the bands of heavenly things; yea, and earthly things also, for the obtaining of heavenly things; for if ye are not equal in earthly things, ye cannot be equal in obtaining heavenly things.—Doctrine and Covenants 77: 1.

And again, let the bishop appoint a storehouse unto this church, and let all things, both in money and in meat, which is more than is needful for the want of this people, be kept in the hands of the bishop.—Doctrine and Covenants 51: 4.

This storehouse is to be a repository, 1, of money; (a) tithes; (b) surplus; (c) freewill offerings; (d) consecrations. 2, of commodities of all kinds; (a) produce that is ready for immediate use; (b) raw materials for manufacture; (c) manufactured articles of various kinds as produced by the several stewardships.

For Exchanges

The storehouse is to be, therefore, a means of effecting the exchange of the various commodities that are the products of the stewardships, or in other words, a clearing house for commodities, for it is to receive, store, hold, distribute, or dispose of the surplus products of the order of stewards that compose the Order of Enoch, the business organization of the church. The storehouse is the economic hub of the industrial wheel of stewardships bound together in an order of temporal equality—the Order of Enoch, the outer rim and band of iron.

The industries enumerated only serve to illustrate, and there may be many more added, for the order of stewards will eventually cover all the range of industries needed to produce the necessities of life, for Zion is to become independent of every creature under the celestial world. These stewards in the United Order of Enoch are accountable to God for the way they handle their stewardships, and they are to strive to increase upon their stewardships, and after keeping enough for their support and for that of their families, the rest is to be cast into the storehouse to become the common property of the whole church. (See Doctrine and Covenants 42: 14.)

And if thou obtainest more than that which would be for thy support, thou shalt give it unto my storehouse.—Doctrine and Covenants 12: 14.

And let all things, both in money and in meat, which is more than is needful for the want of this people be kept in the hands of the bishop.—Ibid., 51: 4.

Inasmuch as they receive more than is needful for their necessities, and their wants, it shall be given into my storehouse, and the benefits shall be consecrated unto the inhabitants of Zion.—Ibid., 70: 2.

Equal Economically

Now this makes the stewards all equal economically, after they have put all above their needs into the storehouse, and none of them will ever get to be ostentatiously and dangerously rich in this equitable system. Not only are they made equal by casting all over their needs into the storehouse, but they are equal still in their claims upon that storehouse that is full of all the good things that are the products of all these industries, for in case any one of them happens to need a little help in the prosecution of his stewardship, to spread out a little, or install some more or better machinery, he may call on the storehouse supply to "help him in the managing of his stewardship" that "every man may improve upon his talent, that every man may gain other talents, even to a hundredfold, to be cast into the Lord's storehouse, to become the common property of the whole church, every man seeking the interest of his neighbor, and doing all things with an eye single to the glory of God." Picture to yourself a community of these stewards in these various industries, bringing into existence all the good things of life as a result of the working of their stewardships, casting all over their living into the storehouse, and all of them having an equal right to draw out of the storehouse as they may need, and you will see the best and most economic commonwealth that has ever existed since Enoch's day.

Now let us have another quotation from the Doctrine and Covenants, and it will show more conclusively the process of the working of this system, and the beauty of it in contrast to the cutthroat system of to-day. First, mind you, these stewards are going to be farmers, and fruit raisers, and dairy-men, and poultry raisers, and shoemakers, and furniture makers, and foundry men, and brick makers, stock raisers, and in fact the producers of all things that make life worth living, and they will improve upon their several undertakings, and gain as much as they can, and the instruction runs thus:

And all moneys that you receive in your stewardships, by improving the properties which I have appointed unto you, in houses or in lands, or in cattle, or in all things . . . shall be cast into the treasury as fast as you receive monies, by hundreds or by fifties, or by twenties, or by tens, or by fives, or in other words, if any man among you obtain five talents, let him cast them into the treasury; or if he obtain ten or twenty or fifty, or an hundred, let him do likewise; and let no man among you say that it is his own, for it shall not be called his, nor any part of it; and there shall not any part of it be used or taken out of the treasury, only by the voice and common consent of the order. And this shall be the voice and common consent of the order: that any man among you, say unto the treasurer, I have need of this to help me in my stewardship; if it be five talents, or if it be ten talents, or twenty, or fifty, or an hundred, the treasurer shall give unto him the sum which he requires, to help him in his stewardship, until he be found a transgressor, and it is manifest before the order plainly, that he is an unfaithful and an unwise steward; but so long as he is in full fellowship, and is faithful, and wise in his stewardship, this shall be his token unto the treasurer that the treasurer shall not withhold.

This is scripture and comment all in one, it is so plain and to the point. It will be seen that among these stewards an exchange of commodities is effected without the trouble of setting a price, or paying any money, or borrowing any money, or paying any interest. Of necessity an economic solution of the industrial problems of to-day must have in it radical differences from the present profit system. In the stewardship system things will be produced for use, and not for profit. Whereas, at the present, if there is no profit in the business, the business closes down, and the employees are discharged, and the people may starve for the need of that very article. This new system ushers in the day of humanity, and relegates to the past the day and rule of the dollar.

Stewardship Is More Economical

The steward system is more economical than the present, because there is account taken as to whether there is a need for any particular undertaking, and if there is enough already produced by the stewards who have already received stewardships in that particular industry, no more will be appointed in that particular line till there arises a further need. This is one of the good effects of organized and directed industries by society. Again it is more economical in that it is centralized, and the distribution can be directed systematically, and the work of distribution be carried on in order, the deliveries being made street by street in their order, and not in the haphazard, criss-cross manner as at present is done by the many different stores, delivering a package here, and one on another block several streets away, and in a few minutes, or simultaneously another firm will deliver a package next door to the first, then cross each other's paths to some other part of the city. And in almost any direction you look, or whatever feature the mind contemplates, there is marked economy over the old system.

The millions spent in the old for advertising are saved in this, as everyone knows just where every good and desirable thing is, and just how to get it, for it is all over in the Lord's storehouse.

Smith, who is one of the joint stewards in the shoe factory and spends all his time making shoes, and has no time to raise garden or fruit, or make garments, simply goes to the storehouse and says to the keeper of the storehouse, I have need of some vegetables, and some apples, and some eggs to help me in my stewardship. And so long as he is a wise and faithful steward, the treasurer will not withhold. Some one may think that he would not need eggs and vegetables and fruit to help him in a stewardship where only shoes are made. I answer that he could not well run his part of that business without something to eat. Things to eat will help him greatly in working his stewardship.

On the other hand, Jones, who spends all his time raising vegetables, must have shoes, and so he also goes to the storehouse and gets some of the shoes that Smith has turned in as being more than he can make use of for himself. And so the casting in and the taking out goes on according to their just needs and wants, effecting an exchange that benefits both parties to the transaction, neither being injured, neither making any profit off the other. In this form of exchange there is always an equivalent given both ways; whereas, where there is profit taken, there is not an equivalent given by the one taking the profit.

Profit, therefore, is an unearned increment, being the part taken on the price of goods sold, that is above that which is necessary to support the trafficker in the usual standard of living. It is unbalancing in its influence on economics, and there can never be an equitable exchange so long as the system is in vogue that permits of profit taking.

Needed: The Stewardship Plan

It has been said by some that if all the wealth were divided equally to-day to all men, it would not be long till a few would have it all again. True enough, for the same principle that caused the flow of wealth from the many to the few would still be in force to compel it to flow right back to the hands of a few. And that is what I am striving to make plain, that we must have a new system altogether.

Again, the storehouse and stewardship plan provides the best insurance system ever yet invented, and does not rob anyone to support it nor does it sustain a great body of high-salaried officials. But in this way there will be no need to patronize the various insurance companies.

The storehouse will have all the surplus earnings of all the people stored up for any who may need, who may be sick, for in the system is contemplated hospitals for the sick. It is to everybody's interest to keep them well, and not to let them even get sick if preventive measures can keep them well. If a hailstorm goes through the country and ruins the crops of a few, the whole wealth of the community is stored up for the very purpose of tiding them over such a calamity, and setting them on their feet again. For whatever they may need in their stewardships, they have an equal right with everyone else to call upon the treasurer or keeper of the Lord's storehouse to get just such things as he shall need to help him in his stewardship, be it food, clothing, raw materials, machinery—or money if the storehouse has not on hand that which his stewardship needs to put it in a working condition.

Community Assumes All Risks

Again, in a community of this kind, the collectivity is in a position to assume the risk that sometimes is necessary in some undertakings. The Order of Enoch is the legal vehicle that is to function for the whole body in launching any undertaking, and if it is the best judgment of those of the order who direct in these public affairs, that a certain undertaking should be launched that has an element of risk in it, such as prospecting for oil, or minerals, the expense of putting down those that turn out to be dry holes, or shafts that do not strike the desired ore, the expense is met by the whole body, and does not fall upon one single individual and break him entirely as in thousands of instances in the world to-day. Risk is a public function in a civilized society, and when it runs the risk it takes part as a whole in the gushers and the bonanzas, and in this way all the people get the benefit of these great treasures of earth's natural resources that are for all.

Again, if any of these stewards should make an invention that would result in the saving of labor of thousands of men, it would be used to the benefit of all, and instead of throwing a lot of the stewards out of a job as is the case in the world at present when a labor saving device is invented, it would only make the sum total of work of all the stewards easier by just the amount of labor saving effected by the machine. The steward making the invention could remain the owner of the patent, or consecrate it to the church. It would make no difference as to the results, as all would get the benefit of the saving in labor and it would result in shortening the hours of work or in an acceleration of product output.

In this system young people who would marry would not have to put off the happy day to some dismal time in the misty future, but as they come of age would have claim on the Lord's storehouse and an appointment to a stewardship, if their parents were not able from their stewardships to give them an inheritance and a start in the world.

The need of borrowing money, and incidentally of taking interest, would be done away, and there will be no such thing when people learn the better and just way. Rent will be out of the question, as all will own their own homes as an inheritance and hold with a deed that cannot be broken. It clears up a host of things that constitute interminable difficulties and tangles in the present system, when one once gets the vision, and views it from the new standpoint. Present methods of business cannot be harmonized with the new and equitable plan. In contemplating this plan of society some of the brethren postulate isolated instances, and ask how we will do under such and such circumstances. It seems to me it all unfolds as clearly as the noonday sun when one gets the central idea, the fundamental principle of Zion's business ethics. Some hold up their hands and say, Oh! are we not to have any money in Zion? Yes, till we get beyond it. We will have interest, and borrowing money till we get higher up, but in time, no.

The population of Sydney is now stated to be one million, so that nearly 44 per cent of the people of New South Wales are congested in the small area of that city. Still this is the smallest percentage of any of the states of Australia, since the population of Melbourne represents over 50 per cent of the people of Victoria. Nearly 52 per cent of the people of South Australia reside in Adelaide, and 46.42 per cent of the people in West Australia reside in Perth. When four cities (or five with Brisbane in Queensland) contain about half the population of a land as large as Australia, it shows congestion in small areas and also that much land is sparsely settled.

God's Love for the Individual

By Paul M. Hanson

Sermon broadcasted Sunday evening, February 18, 1923, by Central Radio Company, Kansas City, Missouri, from its Independence studio.

In the life and teachings of Jesus Christ is revealed how infinitely precious is the soul of man. No one has made this so plain as the Man of Galilee.

God Is Good

There is much of mystery all around us—our present situation could hardly be otherwise, considering our great limitations, and at the same time living as we do in the midst of a complex, divinely-arranged universe. The finite can hardly expect suddenly to comprehend the infinite. There is much that is mysterious in the physical domain, as well as in the spiritual realm.

Whatever the problems that confront us, it is not difficult to believe that God is good and wise and kind. If he were not, he would not be enthroned in heaven, ruling in universal sway. He lives and reigns. It is possible to apprehend him. According to trustworthy testimony from modern and ancient times, he may well be addressed as "Our Father." This designation he is entitled to, for impartiality and unchangeability are a part of his character. His course is without variableness or shadow of turning—his march along the centuries has been straight and triumphant.

God Moves to Redeem His Offspring

We are his offspring. He is interested in the progress of everyone. His glory is intelligence. His work, the greatest of all works, is to bring to pass the eternal life of man. Eternal life cannot exist apart from intellectual and spiritual development. Therefore, in working with individuals, or with groups, the heavenly forces are without cessation assisting in bringing about true adjustments in life, true relations between man and God, and between man and man.

In proof of this, consider how man is endowed with gifts to be successful. Wonderful and bountiful are the provisions in the world of nature to bring human comfort, to gladden the eye, and to cheer the heart.

Think also upon God's demonstrated love for the world in sending his only begotten Son to make an infinite atonement, and to teach the world what would result in its salvation; the sending of the Spirit of truth to all walking in obedience to divine commands, in this way giving perspective to life, defense, help, and strength; Christ healing the sick, pleading for the widow, drying the orphan's tears; ministering to the needy; exalting child life; whispering words of hope in the sinner's ear; weeping over the thoughtless; commanding that his "sheep" and "lambs" be fed; and finally making possible the resurrection of all from the grave.

In all of this there is wondrous sympathy, deep interest, practical help! Everything reveals an attitude of desiring to bless, to be friendly, and to enter into intimate relationships. The world's Savior should not be held off by anyone at arm's length.

No One Escapes God

Often one feels lost in the crowd. One thinks, What is a drop of water in the ocean? Our soldier boys must have thought of this, when considering themselves as units in an army of millions. But nothing escapes the eye of God. He dwells in the bosom of eternity, and his eyes are upon all; not seeking the individual to entrap, to punish, or judge, but to enrich, exalt, and through his providences unfold and develop human life. Marvelous are the possibilities wrapped up in every soul.

How quickly does the drooping and discouraged spirit revive under the power and influences of the Prince of Peace!

The Soul Is Beyond Value

It is surprising how much in the Scriptures relates to the individual. The parables of the prodigal son, lost sheep, and lost coin are illustrative.

In the first parable mentioned, we learn that the son after receiving his inheritance, leaving home, and forgetting God, in a time of extreme loneliness and hardship in a far country, "came to himself."

He said: "I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee. And am no more worthy to be called thy son; make me as one of thy servants."

Now discover the position and attitude of God, which is represented by the action of the father in the parable: "But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran and fell on his neck, and kissed him."

The son said: "I am no more worthy to be called thy son."

But the father said to his servants, "Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet; and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry: For this my son was dead, and is alive again: he was lost, and is found."

When an elder brother remonstrated because of the special reception given to the one who had departed from home and wasted his living and sinned, the father said, "It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found."

A value too high cannot be placed upon the worth of a human soul.

Jesus said to persons who charged him with receiving sinners, and eating with them:

What man of you, having a hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which was lost, until he find it? And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing. I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance.

The broadcasting through heaven of a report of a soul repenting creates supreme joy in all of the celestial spheres.

Instances of God's Solicitude

Saul, of Tarsus, was visited by the Lord on his way to Damascus while engaged in opposing the church; he was visited with salvation in view, and to employ him in the service of the church, that many through him might know Christ, the Light of the world.

The tender care, interest, and solicitude of God are abundantly exemplified in the words of the angel to the affrighted women gathered at the sepulcher from which Jesus had risen:

Be not affrighted: ye seek Jesus of Nazareth which was crucified: he is risen; he is not here: behold the place where they laid him. But go your way, tell his disciples and Peter that he goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him, as he said unto you.

At that time Peter was perhaps the most desolate man in the world. He had before declared of Jesus that he was the "Christ, the Son of the living God," had been with him in the death chamber when the dead were called back to life, and was confused in utterance on the Mount of Transfiguration because of the majesty and glory of the divine scene—after which he had thrice denied Christ, binding his words with an oath. He had queered himself as an apostle and member of the church. It was not in his power fully to set himself right. Dreary was the outlook. The angelic command provides one of the most striking instances showing God's concern in the individual. Nothing so moves Divinity as the prospect of a human soul being ruined. God in the midst of glory, while looking upon worlds, numberless to man, listening to the music of the spheres as they moved in one grand sweep through boundless space, was moved to action by an unuttered cry in Peter's heart. The loneliness of the man moved Heaven. The words of the angel, spoken in a voice of heaven's harmony, were, "Go and tell his disciples and Peter that he goeth before you into Galilee."

Night was turning into morning. In Peter's heart was the song of a nightingale. All that he had and ever hoped to have was from that moment consecrated anew to the service of God. Where sent he would go, and try to be true and courageous. The building up of the kingdom of God was worthy of his best offerings. He accompanied the disciples and met with Jesus in Galilee. Ever afterwards he could point with pride, though with spirit bowed, to the angelic command, and testify that he was one of a number honored with the Savior's presence after he rose from the dead, and that upon him was placed by the Lord a degree of happy responsibility in executing the great commission.

Peter's Appreciation Translated Into Service

How graciously did Peter convert his experience into blessings for others. The heaving of his own breast, the intonations of his own voice, his inexpressible sorrow and remorse, were God's point of contact between him and countless souls living in the valley and shadow of death. Ever afterwards there was to him in every heaving breast, the broken voice, and disconsolate look, a revelation of human needs. Called from the ranks of the common people, that he might be better fitted to minister to their needs, having been so close as to hear the great throbbing heart of humanity, he became an illustrious servant of the church, and in later years was able to gently counsel as follows:

Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.

Where can the individual, willing to be helped, go and be outside of the Creator's beneficent reign?

God's Beneficence Reigns Supreme

The Psalmist said:

Whither shall I go from thy spirit? Or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me.

The Lord declared to one of the churches in Asia:

Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me.

Companionship With God Brings Righteousness

With the entrance of Christ into the life of an individual, or of society, positive forces are let loose, and as a result there is as they operate a corresponding diminution of invalidism, delinquency, and unhappiness. A new meaning is injected into life. Life is proceeding from the Author of life. The enigma of existence is gone. Noble thinking leads to noble living. Big thoughts lead to unusual achievements. Companionship with the Master brings intellectual, moral, and spiritual development—on such a basis an individual may build securely, and influence the world advantageously. On such a basis only can an ideal state of society arise.

The purpose of God in working with an individual is to bring to him the elements of success—salvation. The individual in the association learns of the One who is greatest of all, and of justice, mercy, truth, and righteousness, and on these everlasting principles life is without doubt safely bottomed. In due time the conclusion is reached that always on the side of right are the eternal forces, that without Christ one can do nothing, and that with him "all things are possible."

Jealousy and Envy

By Arthur Allen

The first sin that caused the fall of Lucifer, the great sin of to-day. The true Christian neither envies others nor permits their jealousy to turn him aside from righteousness.

Jealousy: Proverbs 6: 34; Canticles 8: 6.

Envy: Proverbs 14: 30; 27: 4.

If any apology is needed for presenting this subject, it will be found in Ezekiel 3: 17-21.

Jealousy and envy are kindred evils, and may be classed under the same head. In speaking to you at this time we shall so consider them. Some subjects a speaker touches a great many times, now coming on them from one direction, again from another. This is one which is seldom handled in public.

It is an old sin, haggard, furious, and monstrous, that has for ages walked forth in every quarter of the globe. In it is found all that is obnoxious in the race; it is in every community, in every church, in every professional circle—legislative, monetary, or literary. It whispers, hisses, lies, and damns. It is grieved at the superiority of others, in talent, or wealth, beauty, elegance, virtue, social, professional, or political recognition.

It is the shadow of other people's success. It is the shiver in our pocketbook because it is not so fat as some others. It is the twinge in our tongue because others are more eloquent. It is the flutter in our robe because it lacks the luster of some other. It is the earthquake under our house because of less front and depth. It is the thunder of other's popularity, souring the milk of our kindness. It is the father and mother of one half the crimes of humanity. Envy's memory is a row of hooks to hang up grudges on. Some people's sensibility is a mere bundle of aversions, telling how many things and persons they cannot bear. Mr. Locke asked a blind man what he thought scarlet was. He said, "Like the sound of a trumpet."

Envy is not temper, but it is distemper, resulting in a diseased mind and blindness, so that the envious person does no more comprehend the good qualities of others than the blind man could tell what scarlet was like. Ask an envious person what he thinks of a beautiful woman, painting, or poem. They see disagreeableness in all that is delightful. Envy goads a man on like a locomotive until it will bring him much sorrow (see Isaiah 50: 11), and if he continues therein, death.

The First Sin

Jealousy and envy were the first sins committed. Satan was envious of the glory of God and desired it himself. (Doctrine and Covenants 28: 10.) It was jealousy that caused Cain to slay his brother Abel. (Genesis 4: 4-8.) The Philistines envied Isaac. (Genesis 26: 14.) Laban and his sons were jealous of Jacob. (Genesis 30: 1, 2.) Joseph's brethren were jealous and hated him. (Genesis 37: 4-24.) Jealousy caused the trouble between Esau and Jacob. (Genesis 27-41.) Jealousy caused Miriam and Aaron to speak against Moses. (Numbers 12: 1-10.) Jealousy caused Korah, Dathan, and Abiram and twenty-five princes to rise up and speak against Moses and Aaron. (Numbers 16.) Jealousy caused Succoth to depreciate Gideon (Judges 8). Saul was jealous of David. (1 Samuel 18, also 20th chapter.) It was jealousy that caused the princes to plan to have Daniel killed. (Daniel 6.) Jealousy caused the elder brother to be angry because his father made a feast for his brother that returned home. (Luke 15: 11-32.) The chief priests and Pharisees were envious of Jesus. (John 11: 49.)

It was jealousy that rose up and under the darkest cloud that ever shadowed the earth, and amidst the loudest thunder that ever shook the mountains, and amid the wildest flash of lightning that ever blinded or stunned the nations, hung upon two rough pieces of timber on Mount Calvary, the kindest, purest, and most loving nature that Heaven could delegate. And it stopped not until there was no power left in hammer, bramble, or spear to hurt the dead Son of God. The Jews were envious of Paul and Barnabas. (Acts 13: 45.) Plutarch says: "The tyrant Dionysius out of envy punished Philoxenus the musician and Plato the Philosopher." Jealousy keeps all Europe agitated—nations jealous of England, of Germany, of Russia, and those jealous of each other, and all of them jealous of America. After Columbus had placed America as a gem in the Spanish Crown, jealousy set on the Spanish courtier to depreciate his achievement and aroused animosities, until the great discoverer had his heart broken.

The Clergy Tainted

Preachers are jealous of each other, the old especially of the young. We should be glad to see the young with bright talents willing to step to the front and help in the great harvest field. Let me do what I can and if any can do more, I should rejoice at his success and not in my heart desire his usefulness and honor less. "Where envy and strife is, there is confusion and every evil work." (James 3:16.) "Envy is the rottenness of the bone; jealousy the rage of man." Friends, if this evil passion is in any of your souls, cry mightily to God for its expulsion. It has downed kings, emperors, apostles, elders, and thousands of men and women. You are not able to contend with it unaided. It has so many roots that the help of God is required to pull them out.

Jealousy will do to the one possessing it more harm than the one he assails. It will delude you with the idea that you can build yourself up by pulling somebody else down. You will make more out of the success of others than out of their misfortunes. Speak well of everybody. Stab no man in the back. That shows cowardice. Be a honey bee that gathers sweets, rather than a spider that weaves a net. Be a dove that carries messages of love, rather than a buzzard that lives on foul things. This world is large enough for you and all your rivals. God has given you a work to do. Go ahead and do it.

Let each one mind his own business and you will find no time to be idle, no time to be jealous and back-bite others. Backbiters as a rule are always jealous. He who will talk about others to me, will talk about me to others. Be careful of them, they cannot be trusted. They sow discord. The apostle has said the tongue is a little member, but unruly, and no man can tame. It is set on fire of hell. (James 3:5-8.) How little Christian work even is a protection against this un-Christian feeling—envy.

That most despicable of all the unworthy moods which cloud a Christian's soul assuredly waits for us on the threshold of every work, unless we are fortified with this grace of magnanimity. Only one thing truly need the Christian envy—the large, rich, generous soul which "envieth not." Jealousy entertained will dwarf your soul, flatten your skull, and bemean your eye. Jealousy will put a pinched look about your nostrils, give a bad curl to the lip, and expel from your face the divine image in which you were created.

Be Thankful for What You Have

When you hear a man or woman abused, if you will take their part, nine times out of ten you will be on the best side. Watch for excellencies in others, rather than defects. If some one is more beautiful than you, thank God that you have not so many perils of vanity to contend with. If some one has more wealth than you, thank God you have not so great a stewardship to answer for. If some are higher in social standing or position, thank God that those who are down need fear no fall. Be content with your lot though low, and fewer will desire your death.

The Duke of Dantzic, rich, was visited by a friend who was poor, and said, "All I have I will give if you will stand twenty paces off and let me shoot at you one hundred times." "No, no!" said his friend. "Well," said the duke, "to gain all my honors I faced on the battlefield more than a thousand gunshots fired not more than ten paces off."

A minister of a small congregation complained to a minister of a large congregation about the spareness of his attendants. "Ah," said the latter, "my son, you will find in the day of judgment that you had quite enough people for whom to be held accountable." A grand rebuke for jealousy. Let us heed the admonition given in Leviticus 19:18; Romans 12:9, 10; and James 3:14-16.

Substitute for jealousy an elevating emulation striving to equal. Seeing others good, let us strive to do better; others industrious, let us work more hours; others benevolent, let us lend a helping hand to the needy. Praise those who are worthy of praise. Cheer those who do brave and useful things. Life is short at the longest. Let it be filled with love and sympathy for others' misfortunes.

Do not wait until our associates are dead and then cover the coffin with flowers. Let us give cheer and comfort where we can. Let our arms be full of white mantles to cover up the mistakes and failures of others. If an evil report about some one comes to us, let us put on it the most favorable construction. As the Rhone enters Lake Lemon foul, but comes out crystallized, if you are assailed by the jealous, make no answer; take it as a compliment. People are never jealous of a failure.

What Jesus Did When Reviled

Remember how Jesus conducted himself under such exasperations. Did they not try to catch him in his words? call him the victim of intoxicants? misinterpret him from the time of his birth until the last groan of his assassination? Yet he answered not a word. His mission, his good name, are not forgotten after nineteen centuries. He outranks everything under the skies; and angels and archangels bow at his feet. His bloody, jealous opposers thought they had finished him when they wrote over the cross their accusation in three languages, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, not realizing that they were by that act introducing him to all nations then gathered at Jerusalem, since Hebrew was the holiest language, Greek the wisest of the tongues, and Latin the widest spoken.

You are not the first who has had his faults looked at through a microscope and his virtues through the wrong end of a telescope. The world's habit is to make a great ado about what you do wrong and forget to say anything about what you do right, but God will take care of the man who does right.

"Blessed are they who are persecuted," although persecution is a severe poultice. Ointment may smart the wound before healing it. What a soft pillow to die upon, if when we leave the world we can feel that though a thousand people may have wronged us, we have wronged no one; or if we have made envious and jealous attacks on others, we have repented of the sin and as far as possible made reparation. The good resolution of Timothy Poland in his quaint but exquisite hymn entitled, "Most any day," we might well unanimously adopt.

We'll keep all right and good within;
Our work will then be free from sin,
Upright we'll walk through thick and thin
Straight on our way.
Deal just with all; the prize we'll win
Most any day.

When he who made all things just right,
Shall call us hence to realms of light,
Be it morn or noon or e'en or night,
We will obey;
We will be prepared to take our flight,
Most any day.

Our lamps we'll fill brimful of oil,
That's good and pure, and will not spoil,
And keep them burning all the while,
To light our way,
Our work all done, we'll quit the soil,
Most any day.

According to an item in the Boston Globe the Presbyterian Church, through Doctor Lewis S. Mudge, stated clerk, denies that infant damnation is a doctrine of that church. He goes farther and says that it never was a doctrine of the Presbyterian Church. He admits that there is a section in their Confession of Faith which has been so misconstrued and that because of this some years ago a resolution was adopted and the statement distinctly included that "We believe that all dying in infancy are included in the election of grace."

Civilization in Ancient America

Scientists are continuously studying the ruins of ancient America. Interesting comment is made in the Schenectady, New York, "Gazette" for January 26, this year.

Nearly 2,000 years ago there was in Central America a wonderful civilization, rivaling the ancient empires of the Old World. We do not know what they called themselves but we speak of them as the Maya people, using the name of their northern descendants, who now live in Yucatan, several hundred thousand in number.

This ancient people built great cities, pyramids, and inscribed and sculptured monuments. Both the technical skill and the beauty of these structures is impressive in high degree. They had an elaborate and highly developed system of hieroglyphic writing, different from the Chinese, Egyptian, or Babylonian. We still cannot read the text of these inscriptions, although scientists have sought the key now for sixty-nine years. But partly through information preserved in the writings of Spaniards of the sixteenth century and by long study since, we can read the numerals and the dates, and thus work the mathematical and chronological calculations that make up the greater part of the stone inscriptions. It is shown that these deal with astronomical records of an elaborate character, including the movements of the sun, the moon, and certainly Venus among the planets.

These Maya also had hieroglyphic, historical, and astronomical books, of which only three are known to have survived the fanaticism of the early conquerors. The writing on two of these is extraordinarily fine and regular, and the coloring of the symbolic pictures is exquisite. We have found that six pages in one of these is a perpetual eclipse calendar for the sun and moon, with probably the planetary and constellation positions defined and without a single error.

The great building period of this empire was from about 200 to 600 A. D. back to 20 B. C. and again come down to the coming of the Spaniards, about 1520. The great old empire cities lay in the low country to the north of the great mountain chain, and stretch from what is now Honduras, up into the Peninsula of Yucatan and across Guatemala into Mexico. After 600 A. D. what we know as the old empire began to break up from causes unknown, save that they must have been economic in some way and not military. Later, about 1,000 A. D., two northern kingdoms arose, quite as France and Spain arose out of the parent Roman empire, and these lasted until Spanish times, one in Yucatan, known as the Maya, and the other on the highlands of Guatemala, known as the Quiche. . . .

Scientists in this country, France, and England, have done great work in exploration, and at last through work done under the auspices of the Carnegie institution of Washington in the field, the connection between Maya dates on the monuments and our dates have been made, and we have the skeleton of the chronology. The historical facts, the text, we cannot read—as yet—although an outline hieroglyphic dictionary is soon to be published. The land can well be called our American Egypt, its sea our Mediterranean.

The present Guatemala government has recently united scientific and political enlightenment to the founding of a national bureau of archæology, ethnology, and philology, with a national museum, and with liberal provisions for welcoming scientific expeditions. It is seriously seeking to solve the racial, economic, and educational problem of this 98 per cent illiteracy, raising the standard of life for the Indians in sane and effective ways. The problem of all middle America is "Indianism," and its salvation lies in education and the arousing in these 1,000,000 Indians in Mexico and Central America the desire to become a contributing and receiving part of modern life respecting and respected.

What Is Wrong With the Churches?

According to George L. Moore, in The Outlook, this question heads all others in popular discussion and he attempts to answer it from the point of view of a churchgoer. In the first place the church should not exist as a club or for programs to be set up or social activities. All of these things have their place but the church should exist, not for these, but as a broadcasting station for the word of God.

"I do not belong to the church to attend the dinners, to canvass the community for funds, to be instructed in the Einstein theory, to hear the soloists, for any of a dozen or more social expressions which are covered by the popular shibboleth service."

The reason for going to church is to come in touch with a superior power in order to bring our individual thought to its finest and best during the following week.

"I have not been in search of any particular brand of religious interpretations. I am not greatly interested in controversial questions as to whether Christ was ten per cent God or one hundred per cent; whether Isaiah was written by one or by three hands; whether the first three Gospels are synoptic or synthetic. I have looked for bread upon which my better nature could feed, and the pulpit has handed me the stone of 'problems.'

"I have heard that word used until it gives me acute nausea. I have listened in vain for affirmations. The everlasting yea seems to have totally disappeared. Most of the sermons I have heard begin with a question mark and end the same way. I have heard books reviewed, labor conditions discussed, education defined, psychology extolled, the 'economic point of view' advocated, and all sorts of similar matters rehashed. I have gone to forums in the church, where half a dozen cranks arose and aired their formulæ for setting all things right by first knocking them into a cocked hat."

He continues that this negative preaching is bad salesmanship. The pulpit is in a chronic state of unbelief. It should present something affirmative. What the preacher believes is important if he believes it hard enough.

In other words the church to-day needs the voice of authority, men who will speak with the conviction of a real message, not men who are simply wandering in the wilderness. The church should present an answer, not simply a question mark.

He suggests that what the churchgoer needs is to have his sins, his practical faults, brought squarely out and presented even if he must go so far as to bring in a little hell fire and brimstone. To-day you can shop around from church to church and never hear the subject of sin mentioned except in the vocabulary of controversy, while it is needed in the field of practical living.

It is not enough to tell us something is wrong with the social order. The social order is made up of men and women in the pews and those occupying the choir loft and pulpit. The minister needs to convince us what is wrong with us and point out the definite way, selling us the way that is right. If this is done he need have little worry about social order or disorder.

It is worth while taking an occasional review of conditions in the world and with other churches and to note this continued call and demand for the voice of authority. Still there are some instances where the real purpose of the church needs restressing and especially that it is not enough to point out the difficulties though naturally we must see the difficulties before we can appreciate the solution.

It is a pity at times that so many splendid words like "service" and "unselfishness" are being spoiled by excessive use or abuse. It is not the word we want so much repeated as the real living of a life of unselfish service. S. A. B.

The Temperance Movement in England

Temperance and prohibition is not a matter simply of the United States. Early last winter, in November, a world league against alcohol was held in Toronto.

Now through the kindness of Elder J. E. Meredith, of Birmingham, England, we are in receipt of the British Temperance Advocate and Journal of the British Temperance League, a paper devoted to the war against alcohol.

There are many excellent facts set forth in this journal of which we can refer to only a few—the effect of alcohol on disease; the report of the World's League. It has long been known that alcohol is injurious to patients suffering with tuberculosis—one of the topics presented. Also a recent book on poison devotes only forty-five pages to chloral and cocaine and forty-six to other poisons, while alcohol and lead take up 162 pages. This volume is strongly recommended by the Lancet, which is the official British Medical Journal.

Another theme is the use of the fruits and grains that have been given to man, but in the fermentation to make alcoholic beverage there has come abuse.

There are some interesting figures presented on prohibition in the United States showing even in New York City a decline in the death rate, so that New York is now one of the healthiest great cities in the world. There is also shown a decided decline in alcoholism and corresponding to it a decline of cirrhosis of the liver.

Again there appears an item that Henry Ford released 8,000 of his 75,000 employees and has said positively that any man who comes to work with the odor of intoxicants on his breath or has any on his person or in his home can simply get his time, for prohibition is the law of the land and he will not have in his employ men who will not obey the law.

We are presenting this brief statement to emphasize the wide scope of this problem. In America the primary question now is one of enforcement; but for the world at large the effect of alcohol, its injury to humanity, is still the question to be considered, also how to protect society and the innocent from its abuse. Industrial Outlook Progresses

Mr. H. A. Overstreet, professor of philosophy in the University of the city of New York, has taken a year's leave of absence and has spent it in factory work. For years he had been teaching, according to his article in the Christian Work, a remedy for the problems of our industrial and business life. He recognized the conflicts and thought he had the solution, but states now that he blushes when he thinks of those years.

He spent the year in three different factories, high grade factories, for he was not trying to find out how poorly a factory could be run, but how well. He was surprised to find within the industrial society itself a movement making for a more adequate scheme of human relations, and that many who talked so learnedly on the subject do not know industry as it is. He therefore comes with a much greater hope to the solution of the problem, instead of being deterred by the ordinary stereotyped study of the system. Habits change slowly, therefore he believes that the change or progress will not be rapid.

He was surprised to note the happiness and joy of those that were working as he expected to find them with looks of tragedy as he had noticed in some of the great steel towns on a former occasion. He said he felt a little like the little girl who sent a dollar to the Johnstown Relief Fund: "I hope the suffering isn't over yet."

Of the lessons that he learned he adds:

"We talk of the sulkiness of the worker, his lack of 'loyalty,' and all the rest. Workers are human beings. A word of appreciation; and they are all there! Left alone, unregarded, it is not to be wondered that their inherent humanness, their deep-lying self-respect, makes them into resentful creatures."

There are two significant movements—one for the industrial education of the workers, the other for the establishment of relations of self-respect between machine and man.

Physical Examination of Infants Needed

An examination of some 3,000 children from two to seven years of age in Gary, Indiana, found less than one in twenty free from physical defects. The most common defect is stated to be those of the nose and throat, adenoids, and diseased tonsils. Sixty-nine per cent of all cases were so affected. Another conspicuous defect was decayed teeth varying from twenty per cent in two-year-olds to eighty-seven per cent in six-year-olds.

More than one third of the children had defective sight and only ten per cent of those needing glasses were aware of that need.

In the matter of weight only 9.7 per cent were below the average weight for their height. But the question is raised whether the ten per cent standard is really applicable to children of these ages and it is thought that there is need for further study of the growth of children of these pre-school years before any approximate standard of deficiency can be made.

This certainly seemed an astonishingly high percentage of physical defects and emphasizes the value of periodical examination and proper attention during the formative years when most physical defects may be safely corrected.

Near East

The stories sent out on behalf of Near East Relief are such as to sadden one's heart. One missionary writes that orphans have been marched overland across the country five hundred miles. Because of snow in the mountains and other regions this wholesale deportation brought many deaths. Orphan asylums have had to move and this was a hardship despite the fact of American support as they had to pay full fare for children to ride in six inches of snow in open freight cars.

Another writer states that over 1,000 boys were domiciled in an abandoned well house; another group of nearly 1,000 in an exposition hall. As many as 67 girls were crowded

Culture and Refinement

The riches of the commonwealth
Are free, strong minds and hearts of health;
And more to her than gold or grain,
The cunning hand and cultured brain.

—Whittier.

Culture is the training, development, or strengthening of the powers, mental or physical, or the condition thus produced; improvement or refinement of mind, morals, or tastes; enlightenment or civilization.

Cultured; possessing or manifesting culture and refinement.

"Rebuking with her cultured phrase, our homeliness of words and ways."

Synonyms: humanity, refinement.

Humanity, mankind collectively, the human race. The state or quality of being humane. Humane or philanthropic disposition or behavior.

Humanistic studies, humanism, etc., words used in connection with the branches of knowledge and the culture which rests in general on a classical training, considered as developing what is most truly characteristic of cultivated man.

Good breeding, manners, politeness.

Polite or classical literature, as philology, rhetoric, poetry, grammar, the Greek and Roman classics, archæology, "those studies which are considered the most specially adapted for training this, the true humanity in every man."

Humanize, to render humane, make susceptible of kindly feelings or capable of humane actions, make gentle or refined.

Synonyms: cultivation, culture, refinement.

Antonyms: barbarism, coarseness, rudeness.

Refinement, fineness or chasteness of thought, taste, manner of language. Freedom from coarseness or vulgarity. "Refined gold, freed from impurities or extraneous substances."

Possessed or characterized by refinement; cultivated, polished, gentle.

"A high development of the best qualities of a man's mental and spiritual nature, with especial reference to . . . graces of speech and manner, regarded as the expression of a fine nature."

Rhetoric; the art of perfecting man's power of communicating to others his mental acts or states by means of language; art of discourse.

The foregoing was gleaned from a study of the dictionary, which was enjoyable as well as enlightening.

As many as twenty years ago, I listened to a lecture by Doctor Nicholas Murray Butler on "Some evidences of an education," and later I gave the headings and commented upon them in an article published in the Ensign. Last year, attending the graduating exercises of the School of Religious Education, in this place, at which time a member of our branch graduated, I listened to some wonderfully good addresses. One of the speakers said that he had recently in one room 20 by 20 feet with no other place to eat, sleep, work, or play day or night.

American relief is doing much, according to these reports, not only to care physically for those who are suffering, but also to promote international good will.

S. A. B.

heard Doctor Nicholas Murray Butler, and he gave some headings which were almost identical with the ones which I have, and which I have pondered over many times. They will bear repeating.

"Some evidences of an education: correctness and precision in the use of the mother tongue; refined and gentle manners; the habit and power of reflection; the power of growth; efficiency, or the power to do."

To repeat: "Culture is the training, development, or strengthening of the powers, physical or mental."

Cultivation of the physical body, strengthening it by proper food, exercise, fresh air, is one of the essentials to a good beginning. Mental endurance depends largely on the physical powers. A strong mind is more easily developed in a strong body.

Many educators favor keeping a child out of school until he is ten years of age. Luther Burbank has given his approval of this theory. (This was written before Burbank was quoted in the Women's Department, July 19, 1922. Read the article.)

Emerson tells us that "the man who plows the field walks abreast with life, and feels no shame at not studying a profession, for he does not postpone his life, but lives so already."

Life's handicaps and life's freedom seem sometimes to go hand in hand.

President Warren G. Harding says: "Physical unfitness, most of it, comes from unwise eating, sleeping, bad habits, no play, no exercise, no working out the poisons in good sweat, no adjustment of the human frame by stretching it in competitive effort."

We need not have riches to have culture, though leisure is a desirable thing if we use it in the right kind of exercise, the best kind of improvement, the best recreation.

Culture places us in a position where "we feel neither our inferiority nor our superiority." A man truly great is humble, simple, not proud or bigoted, making those with whom he comes in contact feel uncomfortable. However, "I prefer a tendency to stateliness rather than an excess of fellowship."

Deliberation is a good thing to practice. Hurry is never dignified; in speech, apt to be incoherent, unintelligible; in action, not pleasing.

"A gentleman makes no noise, a lady is serene."—Emerson.

Beautiful behavior can be attained by all, and imparted to those around us, especially to children. Courteous demeanor toward them begets courteous demeanor in them.

Poise has come to mean the result, in dignity of manner, bearing, of the education, culture, refinement, which one has acquired. Some people unconsciously assume a delightful poise which is unstudied, a grace and kindness of manner which is pleasing, and which makes them liked, well-received wherever they go. Poise is greatly to be desired.

A brusque, unpleasant manner makes itself unhappily felt, and is apt to be taken as an indication of the disposition which lies beneath the surface; though sometimes bashfulness in a young person or backwardness in an older one, makes him appear the very opposite from that which he would wish to appear.

Self-consciousness is an unhappy state of mind, and may be largely overcome by thinking of others, doing for others. If we stop to realize that most people are thinking of themselves and not of us we need not be so fearful of their condemnation or criticism.

The mind is always occupied in some way, but usually busy with "its joy, its sorrow, its love, yours or mine."

"Accept the place the divine providence has found for you," but make that place one of refinement, culture, of spiritual uplift; for, going back, "culture is a high development of the best qualities of man's mental and spiritual nature."

Self-control is one of the most important things to be learned, and will serve admirably on many a trying occasion when to lose control puts one at a vast disadvantage, and leaves one with a sense of defeat instead of victory.

Children deserve to be controlled by those who have complete mastery of themselves.

An exhibition of anger is undignified, ungentlemanly, unwomanly, unrefined. We read, "One's tongue will behave if he has trained his temper to behave."

Self-control, the power to turn away from evil, will keep many a boy, many a girl, from harm. If parents can teach their sons and daughters this one thing they will have done well.

There are those studies which will help us to know how to strengthen the will, the will to choose the right way, the best way. Seek out those things which you need most; ask for help. Anyone who can is more than willing to give help.

If we are in school or college we ought to make the best use possible of the time. If that is not our happy lot, there are dozens of ways in which we may be improving ourselves, fitting ourselves for usefulness, for intelligent companions for husbands and children, for pleasant associates for neighbors and friends.

In the opinion of some people, intimate knowledge of the theater, the opera, novels, oriental influences, home lore, scientific rest, main values in speech, etc., (splendid lectures by Ida Kruse MacFarlane, Denver University,) constitute some phases of modern culture."

To those who want to know, research in almost any field is interesting. We should seek to gain that knowledge which will be of the most practical value to us as well as giving pleasure in the acquiring.

It is not wise for us to wade through something which we do not understand and do not enjoy, and of which we cannot make practical application. It is well to ask the question, Can I use this knowledge to benefit my family, my friends, myself?

To be educated one need not be an encyclopedia, stuff oneself with knowledge to be brought out at a moment's notice, but to have well in mind where we can get information on certain subjects as need may arise.

"Mere going to college, reading books, knowing historical dates or having sapped up knowledge is not education. . . . Real education comes through passionate seeking for knowledge for years, after preliminary school education is ended. The test of education is what it produces, not what it knows by heart."—Arthur Brisbane.

Once I asked a lady to look up something on a certain subject. I said, "Go to the library and you will find what you want." She said, "I have never been to the library."

Our great libraries are wonderful places to search out knowledge. We ought to avail ourselves of the privilege; we will be gaining culture—refinement, also.

"The study of literature is both a duty and a delight, a pleasure in itself and a help toward what is better. . . . Reading is the garden of joy for youth, but for age it is a house of refuge. . . . We cannot afford to do without literature as an agent in the development and shaping of character."

The writer quoted above says that "from a literary standpoint of view the Bible is the most important prose work in the language. . . . It is a library in itself, so great is its variety. To neglect it is one of the most grave errors possible to the student."

The Bible, the courses of study based on the Bible, our church books, and others which have been selected, furnish material for years of study for those who have not a great amount of time. To repeat, select that study which you will like and which will be of the most practical value to you and study it. Be studying something, always.

"Do not help to maintain a dead church, help it to come alive."—Emerson.

You will be helping yourself to think, to be thoughtful of others, to be kind, to be gentle. Culture is larger than education. The source of fine manners is deep, hidden, out of sight.

"When a man lives with God his voice shall be as sweet as the murmur of the brook, the rustle of the corn."

To do well whatever is to be done cultivates within us something that is fine, washing clean, writing well, reading well, speaking correctly. To keep the house neat, to make a bed carefully, to set a table attractively, though simply.

"An evidence of culture is its fruitfulness; . . . always resourceful and constructive." To make a beautiful loaf of bread, a pan of muffins beautifully browned. To make things not only good to eat but good looking.

To take advantage of a class in Domestic science or dress-making is a source of pleasure and profit. To study home lore may help us to create a home which will be to us a real home, simple, restful, exhibiting quietness in taste and color schemes.

Taste is something which can be cultivated, though some go to extremes and call that good taste. A happy medium is always best.

Extravagance, splendor, are oftentimes far removed from refined taste. A person showily or gaudily dressed is not well-dressed. Quiet taste in dress bespeaks the gentleman, the gentlewoman.

Coarse lace, coarse, showy embroidery, to a refined taste, is not pretty. Crochet made with coarse thread and large crochet needle is time wasted, except to learn the art. Fine, close crochet is beautiful, but too much time should not be spent in making such things, except as a reasonable decoration for things needful.

Tiny, narrow, dainty edges of handmade or machine-made laces are a most appropriate finish for baby's little dresses, or a narrow hem around neck and sleeves simply hem-stitched.

Baby's dresses used to be loaded with embroidery, long and heavy and stiffly starched. We welcomed the change to plain, soft goods, laundered with no starch. They are more comfortable and prettier. The "long" dresses are now very little longer than the "short" ones, which is far more sensible. Rompers or bloomers are a most sensible style.

To be sensibly and appropriately dressed is always good taste. In woman's wear there are dresses beaded so heavily on waist and tunic as to look a burden to carry, and appearing like a medieval coat of mail. A moderate use of beads is a pretty decoration.

To be appropriately dressed is to be well-dressed, whether in khaki or kingham or serge or silk; and it is better, always, to be simply dressed than over-dressed. A hostess should never be dressed more elaborately than her guests.

There are many good suggestions in Autumn Leaves on table setting and decoration and serving, table etiquette; the care of the hair, the finger nails; the care of the body, exercise, recreation; study—culture.

If you have not read them, look up some of the back numbers and find some of the interesting, instructive articles which have been printed for suggestive helps.

Mothers and teachers, help the girls; girls, help each other. Pass on whatever good you have learned.

New Mission House in New Zealand

Interesting news letter from our distant mission field.

During the last three months my time has been so fully occupied working on the mission cottage that my correspondence has fallen into the background, but having an hour of leisure to-night I am penning you a few lines.

This mission house will in the future no doubt make for advancement, but the present effect is to paralyze our missionary labors. We simply hold Wednesday and Sunday meetings, and for the rest of the week it is build, paint, varnish, etc. We came here from Eden Terrace on the 18th of January, so we are nearly a month in our new home. One side and the large meeting room are quite finished and we find it very comfortable. The Saints have decided to meet at the cottage instead of at the hall and this will save another ten shillings per week going out. This with the one pound, eighteen shillings paid at Eden Terrace will more than pay interest and rates, etc., and we have the other half yet to fill either with a missionary or other tenant.

It is certainly a very fine home for a missionary's family, and the whole place will make a fine headquarters for the church. From our door to the farthest point in the main street of the city it is about twenty minutes walking and on electric car fifteen. The Sunday street meeting still continues its peculiar existence; it has gone two months and no diminution of numbers is discernible. Last Sunday I announced that owing to our removal to Morningside there was a possibility of our discontinuing those meetings, when immediately one of the chief agnostics or infidels spoke up and asked me to reconsider my decision, saying that we had done such an amount of good that it would be wrong to stop. I replied that if that were the public sentiment we would endeavor to continue. That is how it stands at present and still no apparent fruit so far as adding to the church membership is concerned.

Recently I baptized a very fine young Scotch couple and they are proving very faithful and humble, and both testify to the joy they have found in the work and their desire for service. I am running a normal class for their benefit and also four boys of another family. They are eager to learn and I feel sure Brother Watt and his wife will yet represent the church in high stations. Both are fairly well educated and have traveled. The work in other parts of this long dominion is much the same as at last writing. The advent of Brother J. R. Taylor in the South Island will no doubt give the Dunedin Branch fresh life and pick up the interest in other parts.

The Maori work seems very slow. It is difficult to get this people into regular church service. Two tracts are translated into Maori and we hope will soon be in print to aid the work among that people. They cling to their tribal religious rites and legends and in my judgment are not converted to Christianity except in its social aspect. They have quit cannibalism and live like the rest of us, except that at home their women lie about the floor quite a lot and squat about on their haunches and eat off the floor, but in dress, etc., they are European. In a few generations they will be blended with the whites, as there is really no racial hatred or aversion, and mixed marriages are common. They grow the kumera or sweet potato profusely and this forms a large part of their diet.

Recently we have had a stirring by an American evangelist named Doctor French Oliver, from Kansas City. I went to hear him once and he spoke so like a Latter Day Saint on the prophesies of Daniel and Revelation that he needed only to teach the restoration to complete the identity. He did teach the literal return of the Jews to Palestine and the second coming of Christ.

This field is one that calls for much energy and I feel my health or strength is not so great or good as when I started out in my mission work twenty years ago. Sometimes I feel very weary at the end of a Sunday's work. Finances are scarce, so much so that I cannot travel through the Islands as I desire. It is a long journey by rail and boat to Dunedin. The needs of the work and the building have kept me in the north, but if I am required to stay here I trust my hands may soon be free to go right through the mission.

With best wishes, I am yours in gospel bonds,

J. H. N. JONES.

Observations on Indian Work

(Letter to First Presidency.)

I have not written you since General Conference so will write you to-day and let you know how things are going with us here among the Indians. I am not altogether satisfied with my work in this mission, as I have not baptized as many as I did last year in the same time. I have been very busy since General Conference among the Indians as well as the whites and have held three good meetings, one at South Omaha of five and one half weeks, one at Decatur of six weeks, and I am on my fourth week here at Winnebago. I shall continue two more weeks here, as the prospects look good. Have baptized several and look for more in a day or so.

I opened this place up last summer with the district tent, and we are ready for branch organization. Some of the best people in town are among our members. The manager of the lumber yard here is an elder and president of the Walthill Branch. His wife is half Indian blood. The city drayman is half Omaha and his wife is a Sioux. He is a splendid man and is a priest. They were baptized last winter at the Walthill meetings. Both of these men are splendid preachers, but it is difficult for them to take care of 181 members and attend to their business besides.

To do missionary work on this reservation one has to be on the go all the time. There is always some one to visit or a funeral or sick to visit. So you see one must be continually at work. I have driven all winter, and some days are pretty cold. My old Ford has surely stood by in good shape, but our last snowstorm was too deep for her, so she is taking a well-earned rest for a few days.

I have made a careful study of conditions among the Indians and am prepared to say that we as a church must save the Indian if he is ever saved. We will have to adopt him into the church in reality and teach him and assist him to put in force the economic plan of our church. In and through the redemption of Zion by an application of the gospel of stewardships must the Indian be redeemed, and this goes for the white men as well. I am satisfied that we as a church have not altogether visioned the real gospel of Christ. We have spent lots of time on the doctrine of adoption and have brought lots of people into the church, which is a fine thing, but after they have been baptized, have they been taught to vision the real application of the fullness of the gospel—the temporal part?

As I see it, the only way for a real Christian to express himself is through the temporal law of Christ. Many of our people think that a testimony of this work in the prayer meeting is the expression of the gospel, but, as I see it, that is only a hollow echo, and the true expression, the one expected by Christ, must be the works of Christ. That to my mind is the temporal law of Christ. This is what the Indian needs. When I hear a testimony from a person opposed to tithing, stewardships, and the enactment of the temporal law, it sounds to me like sounding brass or tinkling cymbal—pretty hollow. I have looked this Indian question squarely in the face and I think I see the only solution to the matter, and that is the application of the gospel of Christ not only in word but in deed.

Our Philosophy as a Church

To-day I am reminded of the bigness of our task in endeavoring to evangelize the world. I wonder sometimes if we are aware of the largeness of this task, and if we are alert to the pressing needs of the hour. I am quite fully convinced that we have been sleeping on our privileges and therefore have fallen far short of what is required of us. But if we are to fulfill our mission, if we are to accomplish our task, we must bestir ourselves and unfold the very best there is in us.

Personally I wish the church at large had a better understanding of the philosophy of the church. If only sections 85 and 90 of the Doctrine and Covenants were fully studied and the philosophy therein were applied we would make strides in the right direction that at present are unknown to many of us. Too frequently we find ourselves in the condition Paul found certain of his day in, "When we ought to be teachers, we have need that another teach us what are the principles of the doctrine of Christ." We should observe that the doctrine of Christ consists of more than certain external ordinances and principles. It has to do with the real philosophy of life, much of which is expressed in the two sections previously mentioned.

It is, however, interesting and gratifying to me to see that many of the leading minds of to-day are advocating the philosophy that we have been so slow about learning and applying. To-day I read a very interesting and wholesome article in the American Magazine under the caption, "What comes after death?" The writer of the article simply reports an interview with Doctor Harry Emerson Fosdick, in which this great man discusses much of the philosophy that is contained in our Doctrine and Covenants. The thing that forcibly struck me was that this man, without our Doctrine and Covenants, has discovered the truth that it advocates, and many of us who have had access to our textbooks for years know nothing about it. If we are to teach the world the real philosophy of life we must keep ahead of the world. But are we doing it? We possess only that which we put into our life, and which by that process becomes a part of ourselves.

Our religion is not something apart from ourselves. If our message were vitalized, made flesh and lived, the world of mankind would form quite a different concept of it than they do at the present time.

Now the big problem is this, How are we to best teach the doctrine of Christ to a world of humanity that is perishing for the want of a knowledge of the philosophy of life? Are we to content ourselves with theory, or shall we not rather demonstrate by actual living what the fruits of our philosophy are? I see no solution to the big problem that is before us outside of a practical demonstration of the real philosophy of life that is revealed in the life and message of the Carpenter of Nazareth.

In my humble judgment we should use more time and energy in preparing for and doing constructive work. We must grasp the larger vision which will enable us to see that only as Christ lives in us, to will and to do according to his own good spirit, are we able to succeed in our undertaking of evangelizing the world. When we make the philosophy of Christ a part of our life and live it, it will become as the leaven that was hid in the three measures of meal. It will leaven the whole social lump and the principles of divine justice will in a large measure permeate the social group.

To me, this is our problem, this is our task. Are we going to be equal to it or are we going to make a miserable failure? It is up to us to answer, and as we answer will we succeed.

Very hopefully, J. E. VANDERWOOD.

An Appreciation From Isle of Pines

Being moved with joy in the work of the Lord day by day since I came into the church, it deepens within me the desire to do my best in this work. Sometimes when discouragements come about me your letters that you wrote me a few months back encourage me very much to be a loyal worker for the Lord. I can truly confess this, that the Latter Day Saints or the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ must be the true church. I am not questioning this, brother, but I mean it from my heart, for I have been to many different churches, and even though I am young I take my Bible as a guide, and not myself alone but all the young people on the Isle of Pines.

Elder Tordoff has gone off to the Cayman Island and Brother Fisher is in charge. We are having a lot of spiritual meetings. Our Sunday school is making great progress and also the Religio. Sister Pender is giving beautiful lectures on the Book of Mormon. And by the way she is not only a teacher, but she is like a mother. I must need say she possesses a true missionary spirit about her. Also Brother Tordoff is not expected to be with us much longer. After his return from the Cayman Island he will be going to America. It will be a great shock to us. For his sedate ways and courteousness we surely love him, for he is a missionary by word, thought, and action, and one thing he can be admired for, he is quite interested in the young.

In our Religio meeting we use half an hour to study the Book of Mormon and half an hour for lecturing. This lecturing is to teach the young people to do public talking; and sometimes the Oriole Girls or the Temple Builders take up the time. We are truly having a good time.

May God help you at all times to select missionaries as Elder Tordoff and Sister Pender for the field, some with the true spirit about them, that they may be loved by everyone and that this gospel may be established in the West Indies, especially Jamaica.

I remain,
Your brother in the faith, EUSTACE DUNN.

New Branch Wanted

On yesterday we were privileged to baptize six more into the church. This makes twenty-one that we have baptized since we began meetings here at Rolla, Kansas, the 4th of February. There are still others who expect to be baptized next Sunday.

Brother T. S. Williams, district president, expects to arrive here to-day as we are to begin a debate to-night with a Russellite on the regular church propositions of organization, principle, and practice.

We surely have an excellent group of people here and are sure if you would send a member of the Twelve out they would organize a branch.

The Lord has been blessing our efforts very greatly. Yesterday morning we had a young people's prayer meeting (the first one held here) with an attendance of about twenty-five, several of whom were not members of the church. The meeting was one hundred per cent, every member taking part, about fifteen testimonies. These people have their faces turned Zionward and are anxious to grow and develop.

With my efforts spent for the advancement of the cause,

Your brother, R. J. WILDEY.

Elijah to Be Presented in Kansas City

Afterwards many will say, "If you had only been there."

Some opportunities come rarely in life, and as we know, some never come again. The opportunity to see and hear the dramatized version of the oratorio "Elijah" by Mendelssohn at Convention Hall, Kansas City, April 4 and 5 should be of especial interest to all our musical church members.

The Biblical story is well known, but it is interesting to note that others have thought of this dramatic element in "Elijah." Mendelssohn, we are told, was anxious to make it as dramatic as possible. With a subject like Elijah, the dramatic element should predominate, as it should in some other of the Old Testament stories. The oratorio should not only be a musical picture, but a real world, such as you find in many chapters of the Old Testament.

Reverting to the history of music it is amusing to find that nearly the first libretto for Elijah was a wedding present to Mendelssohn. It seems that he had an affection for this particular story, and was pleased to receive this libretto though it did not quite satisfy him. So he altered it to suit him and had it translated into English, supervising the whole with microscopic care.

The music I feel sure is of such a character that it should interest all. Yet when we analyze it and think for a few moments how this Bible story, as well as that other famous oratorio, the "Messiah," are immemorial, we begin to wonder why some of our own church history incidents could not be dramatized and set to music, so that they would come down and live through the ages.

I should like to give some musical analysis of "Elijah" here, but space will not permit. I think we as a people should get acquainted with these masterpieces. Music should enter into our everyday life. As it is, the musicians of our church have a very uphill task, for some of us may have lost our sense of appreciation.

The first performance of "Elijah" took place at Birmingham Town Hall, August 26, 1846, the composer conducting. The hall was densely crowded. A letter from Mendelssohn to his brother the next day throws some interesting light on how the work was appreciated by the people, which might make Latter Day Saints sit up and take notice. He says: "If you had only been there . . . the two thousand people in the large hall were so fully intent on the object in question, that not the slightest sound was heard in the whole audience," etc.

In regard to the performance the Times said: "Never was there a more complete triumph; never a more thorough and speedy recognition of a great work of art." In a letter written to his brother on the day after the production of "Elijah," Mendelssohn thus records his impressions of the performance:

"My Dear Brother: From the very first you took so kind an interest in my 'Elijah,' and thus inspired me with so much energy and courage for its completion that I must write to tell you all about its first performance yesterday. No work of mine went so admirably the first time of execution, or was received with such enthusiasm, by both the musicians and the audience, as this oratorio. It was quite evident, at the first rehearsal in London, that they liked to sing and to play it; but I own I was far from anticipating that it would acquire such fresh vigor and 'go' in it at the performance. If you had only been here. During the whole two hours and a half that it lasted, the two thousand people in the large hall, and the large orchestra were all so fully intent on the one subject in question, that not the slightest sound was to be heard in the whole audience, so that I could sway at pleasure the enormous orchestra and choir, and also that organ accompaniment. How often I thought of you during the time. More especially, however, when the 'sound of abundance of rain' came, and when they sang the final chorus with furore, and when, after the close of the first part, we were obliged to repeat the whole movement 'Thanks be to God.' Not less than four choruses and four airs were encored, and not one single mistake occurred in the whole of the first part; there were some afterwards in the second part, but even these were trifling. A young English tenor sang the last air 'Then shall the righteous shine forth' so beautifully, that I was obliged to collect all my energies so as not to be affected, and to continue beating steadily. As I said, if you had only been there."

The First Production

It makes me gasp as I think how some of us cannot sit still and refrain from talking even while a solo or anthem is being sung.

Quite a number of choir members of our churches around Kansas City and Independence are singing in the choruses, but I think many more could have taken the opportunity. I feel sure our general manager of the Department of Music, Brother Harold C. Burgess, would have been better pleased to see a bigger proportion of our church choirs present.

This Presentation Should Excel

I do not purpose here to criticize the performance, but I will say that I have had the opportunity to see "Elijah" dramatized at three different times, and I am confident this performance will surpass the previous ones I have seen. Much credit and appreciation is due to the directors, principals, chorus, and orchestra, and to the Missouri Federation of Music Clubs, who have worked hard and earnestly for the success of these performances to be held during their special week of music held at Kansas City.

Will you try to be there?

(I am indebted to F. G. Edwards, of Novello & Company, London, for the Times criticism and Mendelssohn's letter to his brother.)

WILLIAM T. GOULLEE.

Dramatic Work in Seattle

Our past week has been very busy, our attendance at all the meetings is increasing, and we are finding more work for the workers to do, and they seem to enjoy it. There has been splendid talent here pining for the want of something to do. We have an exceptionally fine teacher in dramatic art and public speaking in Brother R. P. Mulvane, so when we found it out we cultivated his acquaintance, and also his talented wife, and have them both at work. They seem very contented. Brother Mulvane is a graduate from two colleges in his line and is an excellent teacher. He drilled the players in the play, "Entitled Jobe" written by one of our young men here. We gave it at conference time and all pronounced it very fine. Will send a copy for you to look over, and if it can be of any use it is for that purpose. Brother Wilfred Powers of this city wrote it, and he is now at work on another.

We are conducting, the wife is, two teacher training classes a week, and organizing the young people of the branch into working or better working condition.

We are very busy in the work and very happy, and so pray God's blessings on the work.

Very sincerely yours,

C. E. JONES.

Ideal Work Under Difficulties

Elder Edward Rannie writes the Presidency: "The article of President E. A. Smith about pastoral work recalls my past when I was a young man more than forty years ago. We had a small branch starting with eight members and we were ten miles between the two extremes. My mother and I drove four miles to a family where there were three members and three others six miles beyond came to the same place, and there we met for four years every alternate Sunday. The other Sunday I was free and for two years I rode on my pony ten miles to keep up regular appointments, and with the assistance of the missionaries that came in occasionally in four years we had two branches in the county—ours in the country and one in the county seat, Fremont, Nebraska. Those were happy days, because we were enthusiastic and zealous and the good Lord helped us in our work, and that was a sample of what others were doing.

Echoes From Zion

How wonderful! We look out our chamber window and see the great broadcasting station in Zion just across the street from whence is sent out into the air the gospel message accompanied by beautiful Zionite music which message is in turn gathered in from the air by thousands who may be many hundreds of miles away. Ye Pacific Saints, listen in from 4 to 5 p. m. Pacific time each Sunday evening.

The song of the robin tells us spring is here. The winter has been unusually mild here in Zion—less than an inch of snow having fallen, all favorable to those who have not abundance of fuel.

Our good Bishop McGuire's sermon last Sunday was largely suggestive. An alert mind listening could get many sermons in and from the one, all splendid sound doctrine.

We attended some of the services at the South Side Church held by Patriarchs F. A. Smith and Ammon White who truly fed the fine audiences attending with the plain gospel dished up in splendid style—spiritual food.

We were invited to occupy at Walnut Park Church recently and found a wide-awake lot of Saints and some splendid musical talent. They assist the orchestra at the Stone Church on special occasions. When their church is completed Walnut Park will be one of the chief places in Zion. Brother John Dowker has charge.

An extended and most beautiful view of the land of Zion is obtained from Enoch Hill on the south side where is located a prosperous congregation of Saints with a good church building. The Saints are locating there quite rapidly. If you love a beautiful view go to Enoch Hill and look out and say, "Zion, beautiful for situation—a perfect people will complete the scene."

The writer and his missionary companion will soon be located in their home in Zion. The kindness of Brother and Sister Thomas McKevit has afforded us a welcome home under their hospitable roof since coming to Zion. We still have the gospel harness on and ready for active service. We love the work.

Children's Day Programs

Begin now to complete arrangements for observance of Children's Day. We offer this year three specially written cantatas for our own people. All of them were tried out last year, but only one, "Zion redeemed," was published in time to be used. The others were improved and developed so one may be assured of their practicability for a school of any size.

ZION REDEEMED

By Mollie Davis

This cantata is distinctly Latter Day Saint in theme, has various interesting drills, songs, and mass situations. It is comparatively short, and easily presented. The costuming to represent the nations can be done with little expense, and the effect is good.

Price, 10 cents each, 75 cents a dozen.

LANGUAGE OF THE FLOWERS

By Madge Craig Siegfried

Requires 25 or more children and is one of the most beautiful affairs one can imagine. The costuming, to represent flowers, is one of the most effective features. The music is nearly all new, and the drills a riot of color. This one was presented in Lamoni last year and with excellent results.

Price, 15 cents each, $1.20 a dozen.

ZION BUILDERS WE WOULD BE

By Edward D. Moore

Adaptable to small schools or large ones. The theme is carried throughout and includes demonstrations as well as drills. The characters include chorus of children of all grades, several beginners, primaries, juniors, intermediates, Orioles, Temple Builders, and Boy Scouts.

There is a new building song, with words by Frank A. Russell.

Price 10 cents each, 75 cents per dozen.

Independence

The speakers at the Stone Church on March 25 were Bishop R. T. Cooper in the morning and Church Historian Walter W. Smith in the evening. At Second Independence Evangelist H. O. Smith was the speaker morning and evening. At Enoch Hill Elder F. Nadin spoke in the morning and Elder W. J. Brewer in the evening. At Liberty Street Bishop Ellis Short occupied in the morning and Bishop J. A. Becker in the evening. Apostle F. Henry Edwards preached at Englewood in the morning and John Ely in the evening. At Walnut Park Elder C. B. Hartshorn spoke in the morning and in the evening, the orchestra gave its annual concert. At the radio program at 6 p. m. Bishop James F. Keir was the speaker.

Despite the extremely cold weather twelve of the young people made a trip on the evening of Sunday the 18th to Grandview, Kansas City, where they furnished three musical numbers and the sermon and met with the young people in that place. The Grandview Saints have a fine new brick church almost completed located at Fourteenth and Central Avenue, Kansas City, Kansas.

Next Sunday, immediately following the sacrament service the young people expect to go to Sibley and Buckner to render an Easter program at both places. At Buckner Elder J. W. Peterson at night will give a lecture with slides from the South Sea Islands.

Seven Reasons Why I Am Going to the Young People's Convention

Reason Number Four: I Need to Know How to Do Things in My Home Branch.

For a number of years I have not been satisfied with the way things were going in our home branch. It has appeared to me that the opportunities for reaching outsiders as well as holding our own people to the church were almost unlimited, and yet little has been done. Our people need more spiritual food. Our young people are slipping away from us one by one. Many places in the community are more attractive from every point of view than our church building and grounds. We seldom have an outsider visit our church. Only a few of our people are both qualified and willing to serve.

Recently I have been elected to a prominent place in the branch. I am very anxious to qualify, but I do not know how to begin. Since reading about the Young People's Convention to be held in Lamoni in June, I have decided that such was my golden opportunity. I have decided to attend the convention for the full ten days and I know that I shall return home qualified to do some of the things that must be done to build up our branch at home. I hope, oh, so much, that many other young people will meet me in Lamoni who feel much as I do in regard to the need of training for service. Will you meet me there?

Lamoni the Place

at the Stone Church during April, "Shall I join secret societies?" is to be continued April 8, with S. A. Burgess as speaker. On the 15th and 22d Church Historian Walter W. Smith will speak on the history and geography of Far West, preparatory to the trip announced for the 29th to be made by auto with services on the grounds. These sermons or lectures are open to all, and all who can make arrangements to go are welcome on the trip of the 29th.

Since the first of the year the choir has been busy rehearsing Sunday afternoon the choruses in "Elijah." This is to be presented as grand opera at the Convention Hall in Kansas City April 4 and 5. Over two thousand singers will participate, and there will be eleven magnificent scenes. Tickets are selling at from fifty cents to two dollars. For the past six or seven weeks the choir members have been going to Kansas City to practice as part of the great choir from greater Kansas City.

In the Department of Recreation and Expression Friday evening at the Stone Church Mrs. Dorless Harris Dean, a blind vocalist, will furnish the program.

Sister Clara Smith, the mother of President Elbert A. Smith, had sufficiently recovered to leave the Sanitarium on Monday, the 26th, but Sister Cochran, his mother-in-law, is still in a very critical condition.

Of the Quorum of Twelve, J. A. Gillen is in Des Moines, John W. Rushton, in Colorado, to which point he returned after attending the Utah convention. J. F. Curtis is laboring in Ohio where he recently organized a branch at Saint Marys. Paul M. Hanson was recently busy in Chicago, while from Australia M. A. McConley reports splendid interest. D. T. Williams is busy in the work of his office in Wales. R. S. Budd is holding successful meetings in Oklahoma. E. J. Gleazer has had some splendid series of meetings in the East and is now in Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania. J. F. Garver is still busy in Wisconsin, but expects to return to his office the last of the week. T. W. Williams is holding a two-week series of meetings in the Native Sons Hall, in San Francisco.

For Easter Sunday, April 1, the forenoon service will be sacrament. In the evening the choir will render the Easter oratorio, "The Lord of the Eastertide," by John D. Dreswell, accompanied by the orchestra.

The regular quarterly conference in Zion will be held at the Stone Church next Monday evening at 8 p. m.

Bishop B. R. McGuire is still in the East on church business. Elder A. E. McKim left on the 24th on a two-week business trip.

The Independence Dramatic Club expects to give a program of three one-act plays on April 14 of which more complete items will be furnished later.

Duluth, Minnesota

I write to let you know we appreciate the letters and different articles in the HERALD. The Saints here are still strong in the faith, striving to keep the commandments of God in the bonds of peace, going on to perfection day by day.

Brother Thomas Leitch, of Fargo, district president of the North Dakota District, was with us the 4th of March during sacrament when the spirit of prayer and testimony was in our midst and he remained with us during the week holding cottage meetings when goodly numbers of outsiders attended. He left here for Bemidji, Minnesota. The work here is new but it is slowly spreading over the city. We hope that anyone of the ministry calling around this way will find us and help us keep the gospel spreading, as the harvest is white.

This is a large field and but few laborers in the vineyard here. We hold forth our meeting at 31 South Fifty-third Avenue West at the hotel where resides our branch president, Samuel Sloan.

Yours in gospel bonds,

W. C. STANTY.

How many of you have read the stories of Jules Verne? We should require all the imagination which was behind the writing of his stories to picture the developments of the radio which will be accepted as a matter of course within a few years. We must not only keep abreast of the march of radio progress, but it is for us to set the pace. After all we have numberless advantages. No one has so wonderful an objective as have we. To date our radio success has been built on the efforts of a very small group of consecrated enthusiasts. From to-day we are counting you in the membership of that group, and naturally we look for bigger results. Encourage all the "Radio bugs" in your branch, and advertise the radio sermons and programs. Do not forget to send in your comments.

We have not yet been able to find a volume of radio sermons. If you will write in and tell us who you would like to hear, and we can arrange for transcripts of the sermons delivered, we may be able to publish just such a volume in the near future. It will be different from any other book of sermons, for radio preaching is an art in itself.

CAMERON, MISSOURI. We listened in on your sermon from the Stone Church Sunday night. It came in fine, and enjoyed it very much as it was too cold and stormy for us to go to church. The program was fine.—Mr. and Mrs. Frank Stone.

ENID, OKLAHOMA. I heard your station Sunday evening and wish to tell you that you came in awfully clear. Clearer than Sweeney's, and as loud.—Grover S. Mettler.

OLATHE, KANSAS. I have been enjoying your Sunday evening services and think they have improved in clearness of tone.—Mrs. Julia Frieb.

EAST SAINT LOUIS, ILLINOIS. I heard your station for the first time the other evening. You came in loud and clear. I enjoyed the program very much. Do you broadcast regularly? If so, would you please let me know?—Allen Grime.

NEWTON, KANSAS. The program from the Latter Day Saints came into Newton, Kansas, clear and loud.—J. L. Moore.

LEONA, KANSAS. I have listened to your station several times and in listening to the program from Independence now you are coming in clear as a bell.—J. S. Gentzler.

OAKLAND, NEBRASKA. Heard the church service and singing broadcasted from your station this evening. Came in very loud and clear and surely enjoyed it very much.—Harry E. Stromquist.

MERRILL, MICHIGAN. I have listened to your concerts and enjoyed them very much. Hoping to hear from you in the near future.—Don McFarland.

LEON, IOWA. Your radio program from the Reorganized L. D. S. Church at Independence broadcasted last night was very much appreciated by myself and family. You came in very clear.—E. W. Farquhar.

ATHERTON, MISSOURI. We were listening to the sermon Sunday night by Brother Cyril E. Wight. We could hear very plain.—Brother and Sister Christie Kearns.

TOPEKA, KANSAS. Am receiving your fine concert this evening for the first time. Music coming in fine and clear. Wishing you the best success.—L. B. Myer.

Appointment of Superintendent

We are hereby with the consent of Joseph W. Lane, district president of Little Sioux District, appointing Brother George J. Meggers, Pisgah, Iowa, as the district Sunday school superintendent of Little Sioux District to hold office until the next district conference.

A. MAX CARMICHAEL, General Superintendent.

Appointment of Agent

To the Saints of the Central Texas District: Having received the resignation of Brother A. J. Banta as Bishop's agent of the above-named district, we hereby appoint as his successor Brother D. A. Fuller, Route 9, Box 736, Dallas, Texas.

Brother Fuller, having served in this capacity before, I am sure will be able to handle this work to advantage and we commend him to the Saints for their faithful support.

The enjoyment of material blessings always carries with it a responsibility. We may discharge a portion of that responsibility by contributing to the support of the Lord's work by which the gospel may be carried to the nations of the earth.

We appreciate the splendid work done by Brother Banta during his tenure of office. Sincerely yours,

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

Lecture Charts

We have six lecture charts especially designed to assist the ministry in presenting the vital aspects of the law relating to temporalities. Some of these were on exhibition at the tent during the recent General Conference.

We shall be glad to loan them to any of the missionaries or local elders for two weeks or more if required. All it will cost you is the asking and return postage. These have been in almost constant use for the past year with good results. We shall be glad to let their influence extend further.

Ordinarily requests will be filled in the order received. However, preference will be given to conference engagements or special meetings wherever it is possible to do so.

BENJAMIN R. MCGUIRE, Presiding Bishop.

New Pamphlets on Dramatics and Pageantry

The Department of Recreation and Expression has recently issued two new pamphlets dealing with church dramatics and pageantry. These pamphlets will prove quite helpful and instructive, covering as they do specific fields in the introduction of dramatics in our church work.

The first of these pamphlets is by T. W. Williams, General Superintendent, and is entitled, "The use of dramatics in religious education." The price of the pamphlet is 10 cents.

The second is in mimeograph form and is entitled, "The organization of a dramatic club," by June Whiting, director of the College Players, Graceland College. The price is 10 cents. Please send all orders to the Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri. Sincerely yours,

HAZEL B. DEXTER.

Independence Sanitarium Out-Patient Department

Beginning February 15, Miss Elsie Barnett, a graduate of this institution, has been working from the Sanitarium as a public health nurse. She is assisted in her work by a senior student nurse, which is giving our students the opportunity and experience in public health work which we consider very important for them to have in their training.

Any person in the community desiring the services of this nurse may call the Sanitarium. All calls must be in by noon if patients wish the nurse to visit them that same day. Prices for same will range from ten cents to one dollar, according to the financial status of the patient and the length of the call.

we hope, to the teachers of every class in the Sunday schools. It gives twenty-three pictures of our foreign missionaries and of missionary groups. It gives a map of the world, and furnishes suggestions as to how the lessons may be adapted to each of the five classes of students from the beginner to the senior class, inclusive. It furnishes data on the work being done by the church missions of to-day. It includes a historical statement of the missions of the church since 1830, and concludes with an appeal for an extended missionary activity.

There is a famine in the land for the hearing of the word of God. The Christmas offering is especially designed to care for this foreign mission work, and April 8 is designated as the special Sunday for us to study what has been and is being done to the end that the missionary work may have the united support of all of us.

The time should be given exclusively on next Sunday to this missionary work. The lesson provided in the quarterly should be omitted for that day. This missionary work may be discussed from time to time on other Sundays as supplemental work, or in connection with the regular work for the day, but this is the exclusive lesson for the foreign mission Sunday, April 8, to be observed by all of our Sunday schools throughout the world.

Elder John F. Garver relates that on a certain occasion he visited a camp meeting where a very emotional denomination was holding forth. As he approached the camp he heard a great shouting from the top of a wooded hill near at hand. When he met some of the leaders of the meeting, he inquired, "What in the world is the occasion for all that racket on yonder hilltop?" They replied, "Oh, that is Brother Johnson having secret prayer." Elder Garver concluded that he would leave before Brother Johnson engaged in silent meditation.

A Canadian editor remarks that every man has a right to be a heretic; but no man has the right to do it while clinging to the benefits of orthodoxy.

"The only sacrifice which Jesus asked his people to make was the same sacrifice which the farmer makes when he throws his seed into the soil."—Babson.

This is from E. W. Howe's Monthly. Has it any lesson for Latter Day Saints?

I do not understand the tremendous quarreling that goes on among the people day after day, year after year, and century after century. Not only church people quarrel fiercely over nothing. Republicans and Democrats do it. . . . Why may not decent men everywhere work together amiably to better conditions? Why should a man care if another does not agree with him about the atonement, the tariff, poetry, or politics? No half dozen men think alike on anything, except on the essentials of life; on these all decent men agree, and should get together to enforce more respect for them. The world is getting into serious trouble; probably more serious than any of us realize. The great cause of our distress is that not one tenth the talking or writing that goes on is decently fair.

Some have greatly overestimated and overstated the benefits of doubt. They have extolled doubt as a pioneer in human progress and an incentive to forward movement. As a matter of fact, doubt seldom if ever is a pioneer. It cannot move forward, since it has no program. All that it can do is to negate the program of the other man. Having no program it can only stand still in the middle of the road until faith and reason suggest a move to make.

But one may say, Did not doubt always lead men to move forward into new fields of investigation and discovery? No, it is seldom if ever doubt of old error, but nearly if not always belief in some new truth or ideal that leads men forward. Luther, for instance, became such an outstanding figure in the Reformation, not because he came to doubt the errors, inconsistencies, and iniquities of the Roman Catholicism of his age, but rather because he became thoroughly possessed with a great belief in the principles that made the Reformation so remarkable.

Faith is dynamic in all human activities. It is the basis of all human institutions. It underlies marriage and the home. It is at the base of all democratic government. It is the foundation of all business. Business to-day is done almost exclusively on credit, and credit rests on confidence. Only a few years ago four German marks were worth very nearly one American dollar. To-day the papers report that 45,000 marks can be purchased for a dollar. What makes the difference? In that day people had faith in the ability and intention of the then existing German Government and in its promise. Such confidence was world-wide. To-day people have little belief in the ability of the present German Government, under existing conditions, to meet its obligations. It is so in the affairs of every community. Business is transacted on the promise of the government or a bank or a corporation or an individual. Men plan and work and build and explore by faith.

Seeing then that faith runs through all the affairs and experiences of humanity, need we be surprised that it is carried over into the realm of religion and made a principle of the gospel? We need not be surprised unless indeed we have thought of religion as a thing quite apart, by itself, disassociated from the affairs of life, something to be bottled up like cologne and used only on Sunday when we perfume our handkerchiefs.

To affirm belief only in things demonstrated to the senses is merely to pause at a half-way house on the road of skepticism. There have been philosophers in plenty to deny the reliability of sense perceptions. The road goes on to the reductio ad absurdum achieved by Tennyson's sage:

Thou canst not prove the Nameless, O my son,
Thou canst not prove the world thou movest in,
Thou canst not prove that thou art body alone,
Nor canst thou prove that thou art spirit alone,
Nor canst thou prove that thou art both in one:
Thou canst not prove that thou art immortal, no,
Nor yet that thou art mortal—nay, my son,
Thou canst not prove that I, who speak with thee,
Am not thyself in converse with thyself,
For nothing worthy proving can be proven,
Nor yet disproven.

You have heard the story of the German philosopher who doubted this and that (he was on the road of progress—doubt being accepted as a pioneer) until finally, hopelessly pessimistic and despondent, he even doubted his own existence—there was not one thing left that he did not doubt—No, stay, in a happy moment he chanced to think that he could not doubt that he doubted. He caught at that one thing like a drowning man at a straw—strange when doubt is so highly extolled, that in its rich fullness it should leave a man so unhappy. He had followed the road to its end. The only thing that doubt cannot doubt is itself. All it leaves a man to believe is that he doubts.

The men who have blessed humanity have been those who believed, men who had faith in something big and worth while—and the bigger the thing they believed and the bigger their faith in it, the bigger the men. On such faith only is progress possible and without it there is no adequate basis for soul culture or even common morality. The moral? Tie up to some one or several big ideals that you can believe and affirm; that you can live by and if necessary die for.

Serving the Sacrament When Only One Officer Is Present

Question: "When an officer of the church, having authority to administer the sacrament is alone in a branch or field (no other officers of like authority present), should he partake of the sacrament when administering it to others? It seems that in that case he would have to administer it to himself. Would that be legal?"

Answer: We should answer this question affirmatively and that without hesitation. This difficulty does not arise in fields where missionaries travel two by two, or in branches where there are several holding the necessary priesthood. In such instances as a matter of courtesy they administer the emblems each to the other. In distant foreign fields where there is but one man in charge, or in isolated branches where there is but one holding the necessary authority, when the time comes to serve the emblems he may not only serve others in the congregation but himself as well. This on the presumption of course that he is in spiritual condition to serve others. If not himself in condition to partake of the emblems he is not in condition to serve it to others. This custom is frequently observed in small branches where there is but one officer.

Read Church Literature

Thus may all keep in touch with the church.

The missionary forces of the church are very much less than they should be when we consider the opportunities before us for the preaching of the word. There are many scattered Saints who feel the lack of proper missionary aid and who cannot be as adequately cared for by personal visits as the officers of the church desire.

But there is open to everyone a method of keeping in touch with the development of the church and that is a reading of the books and the periodicals of the church. The minister who preaches to the Saints merely to express his own views is failing to render the service that he should. He should teach also the law of tithing and he should also endeavor to secure the development of the Saints through their own personal study. These men of the church as they visit from home to home have a splendid opportunity to observe conditions. Some of them report, and we are sure that many others if they reported would tell the same story, that comparatively few of the homes of the Saints have the regular church books and a lesser number are subscribers to the periodicals of the church.

For the sake of the church itself, for the sake of the future of the church, they should distinctly urge upon the Saints the value of good reading, and first of all the literature of the church.

The Way to Enforce Prohibition

There is probably no more effective method to enforce prohibition than a rigid enforcement of the law by the officers on whom is placed that responsibility. This does not mean simply a few raids or arrests but it means such a punishment as will make the illicit sale of liquor an undesirable crime to those who are inclined to violate that law.

When a single case of liquor is sold for $100 and over, a fine of $50 or $100 does not act as a preventive. In many cases it is considered very nearly in the nature of a license.

It is upon this account that we notice with a great deal of interest that Judge Page Morris of the United States District Court at Minneapolis is handing out jail sentences instead of fines. He continued until he had filled the jails in that vicinity. Then he proceeded to fill all the county jails. Some of the jails he filled several times, that is, a man was both fined and let out on bail but with the term in the jail awaiting him as soon as there was a vacancy. He declared positively he was going to do everything possible to stop this illicit sale of liquor if he had to fill all the jails in Minnesota.

It is fortunate that he does not stand alone in this respect. Other judges, as in New York and elsewhere, are sending at least some of the offenders to jail or the penitentiary for a reasonable term. In Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, a sentence of two years in the penitentiary and a fine of $10,000 was imposed. The only regret expressed at present is that they have not yet reached the man who buys as well as the one who sells.

In many cases Judge Morris not only sent the men to jail for a period from one to nine months, but also fined them. And one man who had been fined twice before was fined $400 and sent to Leavenworth for a year and a day. He then continued with some old offenders or they were found in a conspiracy to violate the prohibition laws and the judge fined them $5,000 and gave them eighteen months at Leavenworth. He declared that he will increase the prison sentence for old offenders until results are secured.

Judge Morris gave them a warning a year ago but they thought they knew better. But this year he has started out in earnest. In this manner 110 cases were disposed of in one week and not a single man demanded a trial. Of 320 cases there had not been a single acquittal. In addition, bonds were forfeited to the extent of $40,000.

The church people must support the officers of the law in enforcing and carrying out all laws. Particular emphasis is placed upon this one law because it was passed so largely as the result of effort by business men and church members and also because it has been violated recently more than any other law if not more than all other laws combined, in some jurisdictions at least.

Education Is Practical Peace Work

One of the interesting results of the American Women's College in Constantinople is the doing away with jealousy between races. In a picture recently published there were three Turks, nine Armenians, three Bulgarians, four Greeks, and one Hebrew girl brought together by the American missionaries. They are taught in the same classes and taught the same things, so that barriers of race and creed are forgotten.

In like manner in Robert College for boys another picture shows a Croatian, Bulgarian, Greek, Circassian, an Albanian, a Briton, and a Chaldean, a Turk, an Israelite, an Armenian, a Persian, an Egyptian, and a Ukrainian, a Russian, an American, a Syrian, and a Swiss boy. This is some of the practical work being done on behalf of peace in the Near East through education and association. "It is hard to hate one who is known sufficiently well."

Friends Wanted

Elsewhere in this HERALD there appears an announcement from the Quorum of Twelve, asking that the names of friends and relatives outside of the United States be sent to their office.

Time and again in the United States the homes of isolated members have been found to be nuclei for the carrying on of missionary work, and eventually leading to the establishment of strong branches of the church.

The time has now come for the church to spread its work more energetically in foreign fields. This opportunity has not yet been used as it should be. We have branches at several points in western Europe, at Jerusalem, and throughout Australia. But there are doubtless relatives of church members or those who would prove friendly in many places throughout the world where there are as yet no church members, or where there are only a few scattered church members. Where members are so scattered and away from any convenient branch there is even danger that their address may be lost entirely to the church.

The Quorum of Twelve therefore asks that all readers of the HERALD and all members of the church who know of church members at scattered points in foreign fields, especially those who have relatives or friends outside of the United States whom they think would like to have the gospel taken to them to write to the Quorum of Twelve at Independence, Missouri.

In their announcement there are listed fifteen countries outside of the United States where we already have established branches. But there are many other places in which we should be represented.

Missouri Chamber of Commerce

The Missouri Press Association has appointed a committee to present more favorably the news of Missouri. The Kansas City Chamber of Commerce has also taken up this theme, and as a result a joint meeting will be held in Jefferson City April 6 and 7 of delegates from the chambers of commerce and of business bodies, with a strong representation of newspaper men, one from each county. One organization will thus be made to advertise the State and present it in a business way.

Unfortunately, as Mr. Hull, chairman of the Missouri Press Association committee, says, "Missouri has been misadvertised too much so that others know but little of the wonderful diversity of resources, the romantic history, the scenic beauty, and the unexampled opportunities the State offers, while even the citizens of northern Missouri are but poorly informed of the wonderful playgrounds as well as the rich mineral deposits and other splendid advantages of the Ozarks.

Less Liquor Used

There has been a marked decrease in the consumption of liquor in Canada during the past year. It is true that the value of alcoholic beverages imported has risen from $18,182,268 in the 1921 trade period to $21,742,472 in the present year, but the increase is all in the price, for there is a huge falling off in the quantity of alcoholic imports, the following being the comparative figures:

Brand	Yr. ending Oct. 31, 1921 gallons	Yr. ending Oct. 31, 1922 gallons
Brandy	270,747	56,778
Whisky	1,533,731	861,557
Gin	537,250	166,646
Wines (value)	$2,530,146	$1,190,843

Our Purpose Served by the Spiritual Gifts

Not long ago in Independence a group of Saints were discussing the question of religious training for children. An effort was made to determine precisely a limited number of fundamental ideals and attitudes that ought first of all to be encouraged in young minds. It was suggested and we believe generally agreed that the first thing to do was to promote "God-consciousness." That may be equally necessary in religious training of adults as well as of children. To make a formal profession of faith in God is one thing; to be vividly conscious of him in the affairs of life is quite another.

While thinking about the spiritual gifts since the conversation above mentioned, it has occurred to us that one of their chief functions is to promote this very thing of God-consciousness. Paul exhorted the Corinthians that they should not be ignorant concerning spiritual gifts:

Now concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant. Ye know that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto these dumb idols, even as ye were led. Wherefore I give you to understand, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed: and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all. But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues: but all these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will.—1 Corinthians 12: 1-11.

If there is any one thing that shines forth from the early history of this church it is the fact that the Saints of those days were vividly conscious of the presence and power of God in that thing which they termed, "The great Restoration." They loved to sing, "We as the living witnesses declare the truth to you." With equal fervor they sang:

The Spirit of God like a fire is burning;
The latter-day glory begins to come forth;
The visions and blessings of old are returning;
The angels are coming to visit the earth.

They were blessed from the very beginning of the church with wonderful manifestations of the Spirit of God. Joseph says that no sooner had he baptized Oliver Cowdery than Oliver broke forth in the gift of prophecy; and no sooner had Oliver baptized him than he, too, received that wonderful blessing. He wrote:

Immediately upon our coming up out of the water, after we had been baptized, we experienced great and glorious blessings from our heavenly Father. No sooner had I baptized Oliver Cowdery than the Holy Ghost fell upon him and he stood up and prophesied many things which should shortly come to pass. And again, so soon as I had been baptized by him, I also had the spirit of prophecy, when, standing up, I prophesied concerning the rise of the church, and many other things connected with the church, and this generation of the children of men. We were filled with the Holy Ghost, and rejoiced in the God of our salvation.—Church History, vol. 1, p. 36.

The Saints themselves in their congregations experienced these blessings, and out of it all grew that positive assurance revealed in Joseph Smith's own account of his first vision, wherein he says:

However, it was nevertheless a fact that I had had a vision. I have thought since that I felt much like Paul when he made his defense before King Agrippa and related the account of the vision he had when he "saw a light and heard a voice," but still there were but few who believed him; some said he was dishonest, others said he was mad; and he was ridiculed and reviled; but all this did not destroy the reality of his vision. He had seen a vision, he knew he had, and all the persecution under heaven could not make it otherwise; and though they should persecute him unto death, yet he knew and would know unto his latest breath, that he had both seen a light, and heard a voice speaking to him, and all the world could not make him think or believe otherwise. So it was with me. I had actually seen a light, and in the midst of that light I saw two personages, and they did in reality speak unto me, or one of them did; and though I was hated and persecuted for saying that I had seen a vision, yet it was true; and while they were persecuting me, reviling me, and speaking all manner of evil against me falsely for so saying, I was led to say in my heart, Why persecute for telling the truth? I have actually seen a vision, and "Who am I that I can withstand God," or why does the world think to make me deny what I have actually seen; for I had seen a vision; I knew it, and I knew that God knew it, and I could not deny it, neither dare I do it; at least I knew that by so doing I would offend God and come under condemnation.—Church History, vol. 1, pp. 10, 11.

These experiences have continued with the church. At the conference of April 7, 1853, Jason W. Briggs wrote:

It was at this meeting that there was an exhibition of power, light, and unity of spirit, above any ever before witnessed among us. Tongues were spoken and interpreted; hymns sung in tongues and the interpretation sung; prophecy and visions were exercised here for the first time to the writer. Many sang in tongues in perfect harmony at once, as though they constituted a well-practiced choir.—Church History, vol. 3, p. 222.

At the memorable conference at Amboy in 1860, at which time the later President Joseph Smith received his ordination, similar blessings came to the Saints:

Prayer meetings were held every evening during the conference and the Spirit of God was poured out upon the saints in an extraordinary degree. The gift of tongues, interpretation of tongues, the gift of prophecy, and other gifts, were graciously bestowed.—Church History, vol. 3, p. 277.

We are happy to say that such experiences have continued with the church and have been enjoyed in different places and at different times until the present. And these experiences have contributed no little to our attitude of God-consciousness in the minds of the Saints, which has made them very positive in their testimony that this is indeed the Lord's work; and given in their full richness, power, truth, and beauty the gifts have carried with them such a feeling of certitude that those under their benign influence have felt the very presence of God, as was the experience of the worthy Methodist minister who, sitting in the congregation of the Saints at a Lamoni reunion during such a pentecostal outpouring was finally impelled to rise to his feet and declare, "I feel that if I kept silent the very rocks would cry out. I have discovered in this meeting a power which I did not know was longer on earth." He had been reared under church influences. He had spent his life in the ministry. But there for the first time was borne into his consciousness a power that he had thought had long ago been taken from the earth.

It may be very true that you will meet people that have been enthused by listening to a wonderful prophecy, and when you ask them to repeat it they will not be able to give a coherent statement of all that was said. Do not smile. The greatest benefit received by them was an opening of their souls to the divine presence. To feel God for a moment may be better even than to listen to him. To become God-conscious is the first step toward becoming God-directed. If one emerged from such pentecostal meetings with base feelings and perverted intentions, we might well question the worth of spiritual gifts in the church, speaking now of those which are obviously more extraordinary and unusual; but when the Saints come from them conscious of the power and presence of God, with souls uplifted, hearts temporarily at least cleansed from wrong desires, and minds once more fixed in determination to become more Christlike, we know that the experience has been self-justified.

Long may the beautiful gifts of the Spirit, all of them, continue to be the heritage of the Saints. May those gifts, however, be used wisely and intelligently, remembering that the spirit of the prophet is subject to the prophet, so that always good and never harm may come from their exercise.

May the Lord thus reveal himself in the congregations of the Saints from time to time in such power and clarity that all may verily feel his presence and become God-conscious even as it is conceded that little children should be, because after all we are commanded to become as little children. The kingdom becomes ours only as we do become childlike and learn the true principles of life in simplicity from our divine teacher, who has promised by his Spirit to guide us into all truth. E. A. Winning Men to Christ

By J. A. Koehler

It is characteristic of the Christian church to try to win others over to its beliefs, doctrines, and modes of life. Latter Day Saints are no exception to the general rule. Latter Day Saints think they have special reasons for proselyting in the fact that they have a superior concept of Christianity. This means, of course, that the Latter Day Saint work offers better returns on religious investments. In view of this claim it will do no harm to inquire what the true basis of Christian proselytism is so that comparisons may be made and such adjustments effected as may be thought necessary or advisable.

Incidental Facts

The circumstances of the genesis and progress of Christianity have given rise to certain facts of time, place, persons, forms, etc. In contemplating the Christian movement it is only natural that some notice shall be taken of the attendant chronological and morphological facts, of the ecclesiasticisms, and the concomitant spiritual phenomena. If a movement is inaugurated at all, obviously some one must be a principal in the movement. If a work arises at all it must arise at some time and at some place, and there will be circumstances attending its inception and growth. If a social development is to be realized, of necessity there must be a social organism having both form and structure; and if confusion and disintegration are to be avoided, then there must be a recognition of office and of powers.

But in dealing with these facts one should be careful not to confuse the by-products and incidental facts of Christianity with the essence thereof. The prophecies relating to the Christian movement, certain facts of the Apostasy, of the Restoration, and of the social machinery employed as a medium of expression, as well as such other facts, are not the essence of Christianity; they are incidental; they should not form the basis of Christian proselytism, even though they may have value as collateral evidence.

Means Should Be Adjusted to Ends

The object of Christian proselytism is not to gather into one body an ever-increasing number of men and women; it is not to secure mental assent to certain ideas of time or place; it is not to convince the mind that certain prophecies refer to certain events; it is not to persuade men and women to subscribe to a system of conducting worship according to prescribed forms; it is not to acquaint them with the scripture by which certain doctrinal precepts may be defended nor to make them skillful in argumentation; but the end of Christian proselytism is individual and social regeneration—the “more abundant life,” or in other words, “The righteousness of the kingdom.”

For those who may doubt that this is the end of Christian proselytism we submit, (1) That the government of God is established in “justice and judgment,” (Isaiah 9: 6, 7, et. al.), not in mere forms and beliefs. (2) That Jesus came to save his people “from their sins,” their individual and social sins, as is evidenced in his teachings. (Matthew 1: 21.) (3) That in his ministry, from beginning to end, Jesus taught the positive necessity of individual and social righteousness. (See Matthew 5: 6, 7 in particular and the four Gospels in general.) (4) That the unregenerated are not converts to Christianity. (Acts 8: 9-24; Luke 3: 7-14; Matthew 5: 20; Romans 2: 28, and by implication, Romans 6: 4-6; Galatians 3: 27; 1 Peter 1: 2, and many others.) And (5) That the law of this church (which is supposed to govern in the work of proselyting) provides that only the regenerated shall be received by baptism into the church (Doctrine and Covenants 17: 7, 18); and that those who will not remain true to Christian ideals shall be “cast out.” (Doctrine and Covenants 42: 7.)

Individual and social regeneration or conversion to righteousness is the object of Christian proselytism, and if this purpose is ever achieved the means must be adjusted to the ends. By everlastingly emphasizing chronological and morphological facts, by continuous boasting of ability to maintain a given theology and to disprove others by a skillful marshaling and manipulating of scriptural data, a group of ecclesiastical polemics or religious disputants or whatnot may be brought into existence and prominence; but it will be something new if this means serves to bring into being a group noted for its devotion to “good works.”

The inspiration for all self-discipline that issues in a high morality is to be found only in perceptions of personal responsibility, personal duty, or personal worth. The basis of Christian proselytism then must consist in doctrines of personal right doing and personal worth. “Say nothing but repentance unto this generation” (Doctrine and Covenants 10: 4). Repentance involves a personal evaluation of self; it is a matter of personal adjustment; it is a longing for and outstretching of the individual soul toward what is conceived to be good and pure and holy.

Individual Regeneration Versus Institutional Expansion

A person may be led by argumentation to believe that the apostasy began in 570 A. D. and ended in 1830; he may be convinced that in the church are certain officers; and he may be induced to observe the forms and rites of the church without being made one inch a Christian. "Hoofs and horns" are not the basis of true Christian proselytism. Simon believed in the rites of the church and he was baptized. He believed that the ministry of the church was possessed of a peculiar divine right to perform certain ceremonies (see Acts 8: 9-24); but with all that he had "neither part nor lot" in the Christian movement. Why? Because his heart was not right in the sight of God; Simon was not regenerated.

The multitude that came to John to be baptized believed in the forms and ceremonies of the Christian church (Luke 3: 7-14), but they, too, were a "generation of vipers." What these people needed was a conception of individual fitness to have part in a worthy undertaking; i. e., individual regeneration. This condition is brought about by pressing upon the attention the beauty of holiness—personal righteousness and social reformation, not by arguments concerning names and dates and persons and places.

The basic laws of Christianity are love of God and love of neighbor. It is vastly more important that one should learn to love than to be able to discourse on the prophecies. To proselyte on the basis that "my church can prove its lineage" is to work for institutional expansion. But to proselyte on the basis of love—on the outdrawing of the soul toward the object of its affection in a desire to serve and to please—is to work for individual regeneration.

The moral quality of an act resides in the motive. Doctrines that by nature aim at institutional expansion may lead men to join the church to save their bodies from the burning. There is nothing highly moral in such action. Doctrines which by nature aim at individual regeneration lead men to join the church because it gives them the best opportunity to be real men—to live the more uprightly; to render better service. One motive is escape from physical discomfort, the other is satisfaction of personal achievement or worthwhileness. The one "conversion" leaves a man willing to shift his moral responsibility to the group; the other increases his determination to carry it himself. The one is taken into the body but is not made a part of it; the other is assimilated to the body and becomes a helper in the advancement of its concerns. Individual regeneration—the fundamental of Christ's teachings—and social righteousness, not institutional expansion, is the basis of Christian proselytism.

Structure and Function

First the function, then the structure. This is the order of nature. The structure is determined by what the functions are to be. The purpose to take Christ to the world and to bring the world to "Christ," the function of evangelization, determined the structural development called the "apostolic office." The purpose to enlarge the scope of the work of evangelization gave rise to another office called "seventies." And subsequently when the need for the discharge of the function of ministering to the wants of the poor and needy demanded it, "seven men" (Acts 6: 1-6) were appointed "over this business." The office appears as the need for the function arises. The function dignifies the office; the office does not dignify the function. If the nature and importance of a function is comprehended, and if the relation of each function to every other function and to the movement as a whole is clearly understood, there is not likely to be much quibbling over either the form or the structure (i. e., the morphology) of the church. But the real function of the parts to which the purposes to function give rise are shoved into the background, and the "divinity" of the parts and their formal official relations are continuously stressed, and men are proselyted to ideas of form instead of to ideas of function; and the work of the Christian church has at times resolved itself into an ecclesiastical arena instead of a social effort seeking the expression of Christian ideals through the structure provided for that purpose.

But why stress form and structure in proselyting? Why not stress function? Is anyone so foolish that, having comprehended the beauty of the function of ensemble and instrumentation, he will run away from the orchestra that proves itself pre-eminently equipped instrumentally and qualified artistically to render the symphony that alone can satisfy the longings of the soul? No; function needs to be stressed in the work of Christian proselytism. If once the parts would but function, the beauty of the structure would become apparent. But there is a very poor chance to picture the beauty of church morphology as long as either separately or collectively the activities of the parts present the aspect of an arena instead of the perfection of beauty in social organization.

Ephesians 4: 11-16

This is a much-used scripture in attempts made to win men over to the Christian church. It would be better if men were won over to the movement instead of to the crowd. This scripture is used to maintain ideas of church morphology. A careful reading will show that it was designed to stress the beauty of function. "For the perfecting of the saints"; "for the work of the ministry"; "compact by that which every joint supplieth according to the effectual working in the measure of every part." Thus the whole argument is on the effectiveness with which this combination of functions serves to "perfect the saints," to "edify the body of Christ," and to bring men to the "measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." The parts, called by the names "apostles" and whatnot, were placed in the organism as they were because there was a purpose to have certain functions discharged in certain amounts and relations. "If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? if the whole were hearing where were the smelling?" But because Paul used the titles applied to men called to function, and because men can be easily seen and seen, too, in a certain official arrangement, and because the big idea of functions and a coordination of functions is harder to grasp with the mind (indeed some do not grasp it at all), the spectacular, ocular, and mechanical facts of the Christian church are feasted upon day after day and year after year and as continuously stressed as the big idea, as the central thought, the essence or summation of Christianity. In these facts are to be found the chief causes for the miserably poor showing made by the Christian church in the world it was designed to save.

The Latter Day Saint Basis

"Say nothing but repentance unto this generation." "Contend against no church, save it be the church of the Devil." Of course since the term "The church of the Devil" is used in this connection, the idea of doing the work that the church is called to do may not rise into the field of mental vision in some cases. The "Devil" has a way of outshining many more lovely objects of thought. It would be better to leave him more in the background and to bring the beautiful to the front. The way to overcome bad habits is to cultivate good ones. "Say nothing but repentance." Repentance: the outgoing of the soul toward the good; toward God. Teach men to appreciate the good. Surround men with such exhibitions of the practical workings of Christian good will that they will come to love the righteousness of the kingdom and to abhor their old modes of life.

At the very beginning of the latter-day work, the leading men called to do service in the church were in turn directed to "seek to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion." (Doctrine and Covenants 10:3; 11:3; 12:3.) Anyone who will take the pains to analyze the revelations to the church may easily see that "Zion" is the essence of the latter-day work. "Zion" is a society established in the principles of Christian good will; a life of perfected mutual aid; a life of social righteousness; a union of lives of regenerated individuals; of men who have been converted to the ideals summed up in the one word "Zion."

More than eighty per cent of the doctrinal precepts of modern revelation relate to individual and social regeneration; to social and particularly economic righteousness; to the development of relations between men which alone adequately express the basic principles of the Christian religion, i. e., the love of God and the love of neighbor.

To what particular ideas of religion, then, may the following instruction have reference? "The duty of the members after they are received by baptism"; "The elders or priests are to have a sufficient time to expound all things concerning the church of Christ to their understanding, previous to their partaking of the sacrament and being confirmed by the laying on of the hands of the elders." (Doctrine and Covenants 17:18.)

Since eighty per cent of the Latter Day Saint work relates to individual and social regeneration and since Zion is the essence of Latter Day Saint work, it must be obvious that doctrines relating to such matters must of necessity form the basis of real Latter Day Saint proselytism. Beyond any doubt, Doctrine and Covenants 17:18 means that a real Latter Day Saint is one who has been won over to such beliefs, doctrines, and modes of life. But where is our Zion? And how widespread among Latter Day Saints, and how adequate is the conception of Zion?

The idea of the "mode of life" should be stressed in all proselyting efforts, for it is the "life" grounded in doctrines of individual and social righteousness that makes an individual a Christian man and constitutes a group of such Christian men the church of the living God, the kingdom of heaven. They must be "organized according to my laws; if otherwise, they shall be cut off." And "if my people observe not this law, to keep it holy, and by this law sanctify the land of Zion unto me, that my statutes and my judgments may be kept thereon . . . it shall not be a land of Zion unto you." (Doctrine and Covenants 106:2.) And if not Zion, then surely not the kingdom of heaven or the people of God.

"Hoofs and horns" and chronological facts, and facts of morphology and the like, are not the essence of Zion nor of righteousness; they are only incidental and secondary; and men cannot be proselyted to Latter Day Saint work by doctrines and preaching which stress such matters to the neglect of the weighty matters of the law, "justice and mercy and faith," "to establish it in justice and in judgment."

And now, finally, it should be recognized that facts alone argue. "Theorists" and moral "do-nothings" may be attracted by mere talk; but men who wish to achieve are attracted to movements—they are enticed by whatever promises to give opportunity for more extensive and freer manly expression, and the only really effective instrument for proselyting to Christianity is a Christian life. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another"; not by the "hoof and horn" test. "Let your light so [in like manner] shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Good works are facts; the good works are the light. Facts argue; they attract worth-while metal by the power of their magnetism.

Love of God and love of man is the dynamic of good works, the Zionie adjustment. Love is a positive force; it does; it achieves; it acts; it blesses; it serves. Love fulfills the law. It is by the establishment of social righteousness through individual regeneration "that the kingdoms of this world may be constrained to acknowledge that the kingdom of Zion is in very deed the kingdom of our God and his Christ." What, then, should we do that we may proselyte to Christianity? And the answer comes: "Therefore let us become subject to her laws"; Zion's laws, the operation of which alone make Zion a fact. ZION is the true basis of Christian proselytism.

The Sabbath—When?

By S. A. Burgess

An inquirer writes:

I would like to inquire what the status of the original church, organized in 1830, was with reference to the Sabbath. There being nothing in the revelations, so far as I have been able to discover, that tells us whether the seventh day, as named by the Lord, or the first day as named by the Catholic Church in the fifth century, is the proper Sabbath. Was the matter ever discussed in the old church? If so, is there any historical record of it? Perhaps some of your readers who were with the early organization will be able to throw some light on this important subject. Please have the HERALD publish the replies so all can become interested in the question.

The subject of the Sabbath Day, the day of rest, the day especially set apart for the worship of God, has been discussed heretofore in the HERALD and also in two or three tracts. We therefore reply only briefly, indicating the law.

In the first place we find a reference in Genesis to the seventh day. This, however, was written in the days of Moses. It is noteworthy that the Jewish sabbath was established for the Jews to remind them of their being brought out of Egypt (Deuteronomy 5: 15; 16: 9-12; Exodus 31: 13.) This sabbath of the Mosaic law does not belong before the time of Moses nor before the time that the Jews rejected the gospel law as first brought down by Moses.

We do not mean but what a day of rest was early understood and was doubtless practiced. This principle appears to be deep-set in the law of God, but we mean the selection of the particular day, and the circumstances surrounding it in the Jewish law were peculiar to that people.

In the second place Gamble has clearly pointed out that according to Leviticus 23: 15-21 the day of Pentecost was also a sabbath after the seventh sabbath. He makes a strong argument to show that under the Jewish law the sabbath was changed from one day of the week to another each year, as Pentecost followed a seventh sabbath after the Passover. This fiftieth day was also sabbath. This follows the same pattern as the seventh sabbatical year followed by the fiftieth year, a year of jubilee, thereby changing each fifty years. That was recognized as the sabbatical year because continuing the 57th, the 64th, the 71st, and so on to the 99th year, were all recognized in turn as sabbatical years. We will not attempt to repeat the full argument but will refer our readers to Gamble's work which was, until recently, sold by the Herald Publishing House.

There is no affirmative evidence that Saturday was always the sabbath day.

In the third place the statement is distinctly made in the Old Testament that the sabbath should pass away (Psalms 118: 22-24; Isaiah 13: 14; Hosea 2: 11); in the New Testament that the sabbaths were done away with. (Colossians 2: 14-17; Ephesians 2: 15; 2 Corinthians 3: 3, 7, 14; Hebrews 8: 8-12.)

In the fourth place, in Hebrews, chapters three and four, it is specifically stated that if the Jews had not failed there would have been no need to appoint another day, but states that to-day, after so long a time, another day of rest is appointed.

In the fifth place, we note that the disciples were assembled on the day of the resurrection, the first day of the week, when Jesus appeared in their midst. They were also assembled a week later when Thomas was with them, again on the first day of the week. They were assembled on Pentecost, which evidently was again the first day of the week, since Pentecost is the day after the seventh sabbath.

In Acts 20: 7 and 1 Corinthians 16: 2 specific provision is made concerning the assembling of the saints on the first day of the week. John, in Revelation 1: 10, also refers to "the Lord's Day," and from such sources as we have been able to consult, we note that anciently the first day of the week was so designated and is still so designated in the Romance languages.

The Early Christian Usage

It seems to be quite true that the Jewish Christians observed for a time also the Jewish sabbath. The sabbath is a day of rest and also a day of worship. It is not true that the first day of the week was established by the Roman Catholic Church, because from an early date we learn through the Christian fathers and others that this day of the week, the first day of the week, was celebrated. Croft, in The Sabbath for Man, gathers a number of these findings to which reference is made in the SAINTS' HERALD for December 3, 1892. We simply here list the names and time of writing:

Ignatius, 101; Pliny, 104; Barnabas, 115; Justin Martyr, 140; Teaching of the Apostles, 140; Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, 170; Irenæus, 177; Melito, bishop of Sardis, 170; Clement of Alexandria, 192; Tertullian, 200; Origen, 210; Fabian bishops of Rome, 236; Commodianus, 250; Timothy, bishop of Cascar, 277; Peter, bishop of Alexandria, 300; Clementine recognitions, about 200; apostolic constitutions, between 200 and 300; Mincius Felix, 210.

This list is by no means necessarily exhaustive, but it does show that many long prior to 321 A. D. report the fact that the early Christian church celebrated that day, and this was prior to the establishment of the Roman Catholic Church, and hence prior to the fifth century.

The Rule To-day

As to the Restoration, as early as August, 1831, the following was given:

And that thou mayest more fully keep thyself unspotted from the world, thou shalt go to the house of prayer and offer up thy sacraments upon my holy day; for verily this is a day appointed unto you to rest from your labors, and to pay thy devotion unto the Most High; nevertheless thy vows shall be offered up in righteousness on all days, and at all times; but remember that on this, the Lord's day, thou shalt offer thine oblations, and thy sacraments, unto the Most High, confessing thy sins unto thy brethren, and before the Lord. And on this day thou shalt do none other thing, only let thy food be prepared with singleness of heart, that thy fasting may be perfect; or in other words, that thy joy may be full. Verily this is fasting and prayer; or, in other words, rejoicing and prayer.—Doctrine and Covenants 59: 2, 3.

The interesting point is that August 7, 1831, was the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, and is here referred to as "this, the Lord's day." In addition to this we note repeatedly from Joseph Smith's history and from the statements of the old men of the church that the first day of the week was the day on which they assembled to worship God.

This has been continuously the custom of the church since the Restoration. It is true that about 1880 there were a few who took up very energetically the argument in favor of the Jewish Sabbath, and as a result section 119: 7 was given:

And the Spirit saith further: Inasmuch as there has been much discussion in the past concerning the Sabbath of the Lord, the church is admonished that until further revelation is received, or the quorums of the church are assembled to decide concerning the law in the church articles and covenants, the saints are to observe the first day of the week commonly called the Lord's day, as a day of rest: as a day of worship, as given in the covenants and commandments. And on this day they should refrain from unnecessary work; nevertheless, nothing should be permitted to go to waste on that day, nor should necessary work be neglected. Be not harsh in judgment but merciful in this, as in all other things. Be not hypocrites nor of those who make a man an offender for a word.

This clearly provides for the existing practice of the church. While it does not undertake to discuss any of the problems involved, it does confirm the previous practice of the church and does justify us in continuing the first day of the week as the day on which we remember him, and the sacrifice he made for us, and celebrate his life, death, and resurrection.

Home Decorations

After building a house, the next step is to furnish it. To do this in the majority of homes, the inmates must depend upon a small income. Though they may wish to have the best wood and richest upholstery, it may not always be possible to purchase it. However, it is well to note that the cost of furniture is not always a test of its worth.

When shopping, one should keep in mind four principal requirements. First, choose furniture with simple lines; second, have it similar in type to what you already possess; third, have it comfortable; and fourth, choose what can be easily cleaned and kept in good condition. Many become bewildered by the large number of articles around them when buying and sometimes select undesirable furniture. It is well to consider carefully or test each piece; for instance, some chairs look inviting and comfortable, but when tested are not as comfortable as they appeared to be.

The most common wood is the so-called "golden oak." This has many coats of varnish, is not always good in design, is sometimes overdecorated. This type may be improved by removing all varnish and then giving a stain and wax finish.

The mission and craftsman style is one in common use and is inexpensive. It must be carefully chosen as it is often clumsy in design and sometimes poorly constructed. This style is suited to large rooms, rough plastering or wood walls. It does not combine well with other furniture and its possibilities are more limited than lighter forms.

Wicker and willow furniture is inexpensive and durable, but is most appropriate for summer use, or porches, or for general use in warm climates. When supplied with cushions of gay chintz or similar material, wicker furniture proves very attractive.

When possible it is well to buy good reproductions of the best furniture. A copy of the good is always more expensive but it remains good almost indefinitely. At the present time the "Period Styles" are quite universally accepted as the best and most popular. Some of these are the Chippendale, Adam, Hepplewhite, and Sheraton. These styles have remained good through a long period of years.

The furniture of a room should be all of one shade of wood, at least, and if possible one should use the same kind of wood for each room. The best taste requires the furnishings of each floor to be of the same shade and style. For example, a person can readily imagine what an impression would be made if paint were used in one room and varnish in an adjoining one, or if two shades of paint were so used. There must be harmony of color, style, wood, line, and texture.

Being ready to purchase furniture, the next step is a choice of a place from which to buy. There are several places commonly accessible: the furniture store, the department store, a mail order house, or the second-hand store. Private sales often furnish excellent opportunity for obtaining good pieces at nominal cost. To one who is handy with the paint and varnish brush, the second-hand store may supply furniture which can be painted or enameled and made tasteful, sometimes more beautiful than that on sale in larger stores. Second-hand furniture should always be fumigated.

Light Fixtures

In choosing the light fixtures for the home it is quite necessary to select them with regard to the other furnishings, as well as their various functions. Much ignorance or lack of taste is often displayed in this, as we find great domes or bowls, over-decorated brass fixtures, and glass pendants. Thus the lights are unbecoming and often practically useless. Usually the more ornate an object, the cheaper it is. This applies to all things as well as to lighting fixtures. Choose then the simple, inconspicuous article, and consider in your choice where it is to be placed.

In the vestibule or hall the light may be placed overhead in the form of a decorative lantern, or some style of indirect lighting, or it may be entirely by side lights. If the general effect of light is not strong, it is well to have a side light at the head or foot of the stairs.

In a living room, library, or music room, there should be plugs near the baseboard or floor for lamps to be arranged conveniently for reading or playing. For general lighting of such rooms, side lights are usually sufficient. The overhead lights are needed only in rooms of very high ceilings.

A most attractive way to light a dining room is by side lights, and the use of candles on the table for dinner at night.

There should be strong light in the kitchen, as we wish to facilitate work there and make cleanliness possible. A light is needed near the sink, one near the stove, and in a large room one is needed near the cupboard.

In the bathroom side lights should be placed each side of the mirror. This will suffice for the room.

The bedroom is a somewhat similar problem. Light is especially needed each side of the dresser, and also at the head of the bed. If electricity is used, lights in each closet are very convenient. Sufficient light throughout the house often prevents accidents. The stairways, especially, should be well supplied. In years past, many systems of poor lighting were used. This was particularly true in rented houses and apartments. Recently inverted bowls have been used to turn the light to the ceiling. There are some places where this serves a good purpose; such as large halls, railway stations, hotel corridors, and lobbies, or wherever a daylight use must be made of artificial light.

Too extreme light is not desirable, as it affects the nerves, not only of the eyes, but through them it irritates indirectly the whole body. Hence we see the question of light and its necessary fixtures is not only a matter of good taste and economy, but it is a factor which influences eyesight and health, and serves as a protection against dirt, theft, and other disagreeable conditions which lurk where darkness is found.

In purchasing furnishings of all kinds for the home, we should consider well where we can get the best in quality, price, and beauty. Choose carefully and buy a few good things at a time if money is scarce. This is much better economy than to buy carelessly and to purchase at once all our furniture of an inferior grade. Our home and practically our whole life is influenced by our environment. We should get the best we can afford, as such articles last for many years and often for a lifetime. If we are not certain what is in best taste in furnishings,

OF GENERAL INTEREST

A Study in Ineptitude

The Government have often a very good case from their own point of view. That is, when faced, as they have been, with great difficulties and with the necessity for a decision one way or the other, they have come to a decision for which there is a good deal to be said. We do not say, and never have said, that they ought to be arraigned for their decisions in the abstract. It is when we come to the practical carrying out of the policy adopted that our objections begin. It is the recklessness, callousness, and levity which have marked their actions that condemn the Government. Their ineptitude has been colossal. Often it has occurred in cases where it would have been thought that every consideration, including the consideration of their own good name and their hold upon the country, must have made them careful to avoid offense.

A notable example of what we mean is to be found in their handling of Palestine and the Zionist problem. Though we consider their policy to be wrong, we fully understand the temptation under which the Government were in 1917 to make the famous Balfour Declaration. We also recognize that when the Declaration was made the Government might have thought that the very careful limitations that were attached to it would save them—as, indeed, it ought to have saved them—from a worse danger. But if we can well understand how they came to make their initial mistake, for certainly a mistake it was, we have nothing but amazement amounting in the end to the strongest condemnation for the extraordinarily inept way in which they have carried out their policy. Even though in Tuesday's debate Ministers were extremely ingenious in their excuses—they are adept in defending foolish, nay scandalous follies—they failed to explain the reasons for their conduct. At every stage of the proceedings connected with the settlement of unhappy Judea they seem to have been asking for trouble, and when the trouble came, instead of taking warning, they went on to ask for more. That is a severe censure, but look at the case against the Government. Having promulgated the Balfour Declaration, and knowing the fierce, turbulent, passionate, powerful, and all-pervading race with which they had to deal, the Government, one might have imagined, would at once have said or thought something of this kind: "We must proceed with great caution, for the Jewish problem is very thorny. The Jews have suffered terrible wrongs at the hands of Christians. Now they have got a great opportunity to prove their worth, as well as their patience, and we want to help them to do so. But the difficulties are enormous. In the first place they are in effect, if not in name, planning to do a thing which has never been done before, except by conquerors in arms. They want, that is, to accomplish the peaceful eviction of the present inhabitants of the country—inhabitants who are not a newly entered people, but a people who have been in Palestine for 2,000 years, and many of whom are quite possibly descended from the men who were there long before the Jews found the road across the deserts of Sinai or through the hills of Moab and so out-Allenbied Allenby." If there is a "statute of limitations" for nations as well as for individuals, the Arab Mohammedans and Christians have as good a case for quiet possession against the Jews as against the descendants of Crusaders—Latin and Teutonic.

In a word the Government, as the provisos of the Balfour Declaration prove, had the strongest possible reasons for handling the Arabs carefully and for insisting on the Zionists asserting their claims with the greatest possible respect and sympathy. They should have recognized that it must have been a terrifying thing for the indigenous population to think of hordes of fierce, passionate and distracted Jewish zealots of the original type pouring into their country from Central Europe. These zealots were men who had been schooled by suffering and persecution to be bad citizens; men who had learned, not tolerance but rather intolerance, from the torments of the Russian regime and from a series of pogroms stretching down the dim vistas of history to our own day. In all these circumstances, the first thing one would have imagined that the British Government would have done would have been to say: "We are in Palestine first and foremost to maintain justice, to reassure the Arabs and local Christians and Mohammedans, to make them feel that they will be justly and fairly treated and to give them assurance that the very difficult job of bestowing a national home on the Jews, and the bringing of them back to Palestine, will be accomplished with the minimum of anxiety and suffering to the men on the spot. We will show them that such good and just administrators are the British, and so fairly will they hold the balance between all nationalities and all creeds, that the Arab will in the end feel that he has little or no grievance, and that the Jews instead of bringing a sword have brought peace and plenty. There is much talk about key industries. Here is a key policy—the policy of impartial justice maintained by the third party to the settlement of the Holy Land, the British Government and people."

That is what one would have expected the Government to do and say, and what, to judge from their speeches in the debate, they intended in their own minds to do and say. And now, what in fact did the Government do? In the first place, they were mad enough to allow the Jews to break the great law that one must not be judge in one's own cause. [That was the rule of which Burke so finely said that though he was not often afraid, there was one thing that did inspire him with fear, and that was the thought of being a judge in his own cause.] We made the Jews judge in their own cause and so vitiated, ab initio, our Palestinian policy. We appointed Sir Herbert Samuel to be High Commissioner in Palestine. Sir Herbert Samuel is said to be, and for all we know may be, a man of extraordinarily high ability and good intent. But he is a Jew, and what is even worse in this context, a Jew who accepts the Zionist view, and accepts it with sincerity and enthusiasm. Therefore his appointment, though it is probably quite true that he tries hard to be impartial, was at once a red rag to the Arabs. It immediately filled the native population with suspicion and alarm, or, if you like, awoke their worst prejudices, for that is just as unfortunate. They could not and would not believe that the appointment showed anything else except that the British Government had gone over entirely to the Zionist side and meant to let the Jews deal with the other races as evicting landlords deal with tenants whom they require to give up possession. Rightly or wrongly, they have found in almost every official act since his appointment proof that Sir Herbert Samuel is not holding the balance fairly, but whenever he can is supporting the full Zionist policy. They see behind him—and who can wonder?—a shadowy but potent controlling hand. That hand is the hand of the immigrant Jew from Central Europe.

it would be much better to depend upon some friend who has this ability, or to deal with some one who is dependable and who specializes in correct furnishings of the home.

How can it be said that the objections made to Sir Herbert Samuel's tenure of power are prejudiced and unfair in the face of the newest revelations of the Zionist policy? He is piling his own ineptitude upon the original ineptitude of the Government in appointing him. He is piling Pelion upon Ossa. One would have thought Sir Herbert Samuel would have argued: "I am very naturally in a suspected position. Therefore I must be extra careful in giving concessions or special privileges to Jews. It will not do for me merely to pick out the best man to whom to grant some big commercial privileges. I must go with extraordinary care. During my time of office not the Jews but the Arabs must be the most favored race." Instead, we find that not long after Sir Herbert Samuel had taken up his post in the Palestine Government he actually had the amazing folly to give one of the most watertight monopoly concessions ever drafted to Mr. Rutenberg, a Jew, we believe, of Central European origin, for the exploitation of practically all the water power worth having in Palestine. So far as we can see, the Brook Kedron, "that ancient river," seems to be almost the only exception. The Jordan and the Lake of Tiberias and all the running and perennial water of the Holy Land are placed in the hollow of Mr. Rutenberg's hand. Unless the concession is revoked, he will be able to have a monopoly not only of electric power and electric light, but more important still of irrigation. It is with water, and water alone, that the wilderness of Judea and Galilee may be made to blossom like the rose. We have not a word to say against Mr. Rutenberg himself, nor do we want to imply that he has any sinister motives or any desire to be cruel or merciless in the use of his concession. We take it that, like so many of his race, what he wants to do is to make a big profit for himself and for those connected with him. Also, we shall not be the least surprised to hear that he is a sincere and patriotic Jew and, further, wants to do the best thing not only for thousands and tens of thousands of his countrymen, whom he means to bring out from their houses of misery and oppression in Europe, but also for the indigenous inhabitants of the country.

If he saw a big profit sticking up out of the ground and saw an opportunity of taking it, one can hardly blame him. The people to blame are the Government who created the opportunity for the folly and appointed to the Government of Palestine a High Commissioner so entirely without political judgment as to grant such a concession. And here we must say that we are not the least assuming that it was not wise or possibly necessary to give a concession for water power and irrigation. Conceivably that was a better plan than raising a loan and certainly better than putting the burden of making a national home for the Jews upon the unfortunate British taxpayer. All we do assert is that in granting a concession Sir Herbert Samuel ought to have said, and it is inexplicable to us that he did not say, in effect, "Whoever is to have this concession it must not be a Jew. It would frighten the Arabs beyond measure and it would be sure to be used as a proof that we meant to exploit the Arabs. Generally it would do the greatest possible harm to Zionism and impede us in our essential task of quieting Arab susceptibility. At any rate, I am not the man to pass such a concession. During my tenure of office it is impossible."

Instead of that, Sir Herbert Samuel appears not only to have passed the concession but to have apparently passed it in silence. It is only recently that the world has come to hear of it. If Sir Herbert Samuel has been so obsessed with the zeal of Zionism as not to see what he was doing, one would have supposed that the British Government at least might have said to themselves: "Well, this Mr. Rutenberg may be the best man in the world, but surely he is not the man to whom to hand over the commercial future of the country in a way which will disturb the mind of every Arab. Samuel must have lost his head in granting such a concession and we must give him a severe rebuke." The Colonial Office, however, appears to have considered it a very wise and natural thing to give a monopoly of this kind to the Jewish zealot in question; to give, as it were, a kind of indorsement of the formula that Palestine must be as Jewish as England is English.

We are, of course, aware that in face of the protests that the formula has called forth the Zionist organization has now put it on record that it does not represent the policy or intention of Zionism. Still, the Arabs may well be pardoned if they say: "Hang your intentions! What we have got to think of is your acts!"

Can it be denied that we have proved our case as to the colossal ineptitude of the Government in their Palestinian policy? But though it is easy, it is by no means enough to prove such things. What we have got to do is not merely to point out this fact to the nation, but to ask it to insist that the Government shall clear up the mess they have made. The Rutenberg concession must be revoked and the whole of the problem must be reconsidered. Surely that is not too much to ask.—The Spectator, July 8, 1922.

Where Are the Nine?

[The following article was sent us by Elder E. F. Shupe who states that it was read by Chaplin P. Ricketts at a regular meeting of the Colorado State Range. It should prove of interest to our readers as a brief synopsis of inventions made, of what we owe inventors, and especially of its analysis of selfishness.—EDITORS.]

On one occasion as Jesus went to Jerusalem he passed through a certain village and was met by ten lepers. They lifted up their voices and said, "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us." Jesus said unto them, "Go show yourselves to the priests." And as they went they were cleansed. One of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice, glorified God, and fell on his face at the feet of Jesus, giving him thanks. And Jesus answered saying: "Were there not ten cleansed, but where are the nine?"

Selfishness is one of the worst sins of which the human race is guilty. The nine are grabbing for the loaves and fishes without any thought of thanking the giver. They are after the best in everything, not caring what the cost has been to some one else.

Ten men were healed of the most loathsome disease known. One immediately came back and fell at the feet of the healer, giving thanks. Nine rushed away to show themselves to the priests, as required by the Jewish law. Then what? Well, there is no record that they ever came back.

Do not the most of us belong to the nine? Some people say the world is growing worse. It may be morally, though I do not believe it, but physically and economically it is growing better.

Our grandmothers lighted their homes with a tallow candle, and their mothers lighted their homes with a grease-filled lamp with a rag wick. Then some one gave us the coal oil lamp. What a boon it was. Then Edison gave us the electric lamp. We turn the switch and the whole house is lighted. But how many of us ever think to thank the man who gave us the switch? How many think of the weeks, months, yes, years of toil it took to perfect the electric lamp? "Oh," you say, "Edison is a genius, it was not hard for him."

Inspiration and Perspiration

Edison says genius consists of one part inspiration and nine parts perspiration. He has shown his faith in that belief by working twenty hours a day, the most of his life. And now at seventy-five, he has not shortened his hours of labor. For what is he working? Money? No. To add something more to the three hundred inventions he has already given to the world. We sit in the electric light and listen to the Edison phonograph, and not one person in a thousand can distinguish between the music of the instrument and that of the human voice.

Edison says his phonograph gives more pleasure to the world than any other of his inventions. And as we listen to this most wonderful instrument, should we not bow our heads and give thanks to the man who shut himself in his laboratory and worked and worked, and would not give up until he had made a machine that seems almost like life itself. Perhaps some do listen with a feeling of gratitude, but where are the nine?

As we travel across the continent at forty or fifty miles an hour, in cars almost as comfortable as a modern home, do we ever think of George Stephenson, who, while working on a salary of five hundred dollars a year, built an eight-mile railroad from which have developed the wonderful railroad systems of the world? Or as we send our messages over the land and under the sea, do we ever think of Morse, whose work and study gave us the telegraph?

Inventions of the Age

Steamships are sailing on every sea and bringing their merchandise into every harbor, yet the forerunner of them all is the little steamboat that Robert Fulton built, after much labor and disappointment and ridicule, and launched on the Hudson River, and which made the remarkable speed of five miles an hour. But as the great steamships unload the wealth of the world at our doors, who gives a grateful thought to the man who, by patient toil made it possible? Ungrateful, selfish, are we not? Where are the nine?

I believe the telephone is worth more to the world than any other invention of the past century, yet we seldom give a thought to the man who gave most of his life to perfecting it. Farmers especially have reason to be thankful to the inventors. Take away the inventions of the last fifty years and the farmers could not feed the world. Compare the sickle with the harvester, the ten-inch plow with the tractor dragging a half dozen plows, or the hand flail with the grain thresher of to-day. The ox wagon with the gasoline truck, the two-wheeled cart with the automobile, or a hundred other inventions that could be named. Grangers, are you not ungrateful, selfish, one of the nine when you do not take off your hats to the men who have given you these things?

As many useful things have come to the matron as to the husbandman. Howe did what no one had ever thought of before. He put the eye in the point of the needle, instead of the head, and the sewing machine was the result. Only the seamstress can estimate its value. The steel range in place of the fire place and crane. The electric washing machine in place of the washboard. The pressure cooker in place of the pot. The electric sweeper in place of the broom. And so on through the house. Sisters, are you thankful to the people who through toil and poverty and sometimes hunger gave you these labor-saving devices? Do you go with the nine, and if you do are you not ashamed?

I believe that inventors have done more to benefit the world than any other class. As a rule they have been poor. They have not had the sympathy of their fellows. They have been ridiculed, rebuffed, called dreamers, but in spite of all they have persevered and succeeded. When Marconi wanted to sell the right to use his wireless telegraph to the United States, he was turned down, yet how many lives has it saved on the ocean, and is still saving almost every day? Where is the ship captain to-day who would sail his ship without a wireless outfit?

Who can even surmise what the final goal of aviation will be? Yet Langley, who was the real pioneer in aviation, was so laughed at and ridiculed about his flying machine that he died of a broken heart. Many brave men have given their lives working out the problems of aviation. Do we honor them as we should? Forty-nine aviators are buried in Arlington Cemetery near Washington City. Still it was left to a girl aviator to fly from San Francisco to Washington to lay a wreath of flowers on their graves.

Let Us Do Honor

Let us give honor where honor is due. Too much cannot be said of the medical profession who have done so much to find the cures and remedies for disease. We honor our statesmen who have been instrumental in giving us just and wise government. We laud the man who becomes a hero fighting in defense of his country; but a hero of peace is better than a hero of war. Inventors are heroes of peace.

The earth is dotted with monuments erected to men the world calls great, but not many of them are for inventors. It seems to me the highest monuments should be erected to those who have done the most to lift people out of drudgery, out of the slavery of toil, and give them some of the beauties and pleasures of life; have taken some of the burdens off their stooping shoulders, and permitted them to stand upright. That is what the many inventors of the age are doing. My friends, can we not lay aside our grasping, greedy selfishness and give our sympathy, our thanks, and our help to every person who is trying in any way to make the world a better place in which to live?

Sister Isabella Arnold, of Keokuk, Iowa, eighty-four years of age, in renewing her subscription to the HERALD, says she greatly enjoys reading the church papers as they enable her to keep in touch with happenings in the church. She asks the prayers of the Saints that she may be faithful to the end.

Letter From Indian Mission

An interesting list of books for students of the Indian question.

The work is as usual, onward. We have been very busy and interested in our work the past year. We put our efforts last year to the development of the Redrock Saints principally; and we can say that their development was as full and rapid as any other people with whom we have labored. The more experience I have with different peoples, the more I am convinced that they are alike essentially. All yield about alike to the same treatment, and the reaction is the same, save in the sound. So also ought the missionary to be resourceful and flexible, so that he can change his outer self, but not the inner self, to fit the occasion: for the inner self always fits the situation (if it is good), but the outer self does not.

In order to do this we ought to saturate ourselves with a knowledge of the external aspects of the Indian. It is presumed that we already know the other part of him. This can be done in two ways, first and second handed. To accomplish the second method, I suggest the reading of the following books, which are the result of other men's observations. These books I have not been able to secure, save only two, but I am sure they will help qualify us for our work.

- The Oklahoma Scout, by Theodore Baughman; Chicago, Homewood Publishing Company.

It seems to me that the church ought to have these books in the library, and that we ought to push the matter of research in the direction of the Indian, his present, past, and future; and that we ought to be the best qualified of all people on this subject. We ought to run the matter of Indian languages down to a final fact. Every missionary laboring with them should learn their language and classify what he learns on paper, so the facts won't die with him. I have begun a clipping program, and all clippings that say anything about the Indian I keep; and after a while I will sort and classify them and perhaps out of the whole we can glean some important facts. It is curious how much material we have to sift to obtain a precious stone.

A. H. CHRISTENSEN.

Those who have listened to and enjoyed the ministry of Elder Daniel Macgregor will join in our sorrow with him and others who best knew her in the recent death of his mother. On account of this Brother Macgregor was recalled from his field to her bedside.

Why One Man Stopped Tobacco

At the age of twenty years I was a confirmed tobacco user. I had tried to quit several times in my own strength, and had made complete failures. I had given it up as a hard task, and had quit trying, when one day as I was lying on my bed reading, a sister came into the house. She asked if I were in, and mother answered, not knowing I was there, "No, he has gone to town."

I was just going to speak up and tell her that I was there, when the sister said, "Well, I can tell you something that we said of him at the aid society the other day. Don't tell him, for he might think we are trying to meddle with his affairs."

My mother said she would try to judge herself as to whether to keep quiet or not.

I decided to keep still and see what it was all about. You know the old saying, "An eavesdropper never learns anything good of himself," but what I heard did me a great deal of good, as you will see later.

The sister said, "We were talking the other day about Henry, and some one suggested we each give him a good talking to, and tell him how vile a thing tobacco is, and try to get him to brace up, and quit. Another sister said, 'If you really wish to see him quit, you had better pray for him, instead of giving him a piece of your mind.' We talked it over, and decided to fast and pray if necessary."

It made me feel good to think that some one thought enough of me to fast and pray in my behalf. Then I tried a new way of quitting. I went to fasting and praying also. I quit on a sacrament Sunday in February, 1915. It was a hard struggle to overcome the habit, but with the prayers of the Saints, and the help of God, I succeeded.

In the fall of 1917, just before reporting for service in the army I was talking to my sister and said, "Now that I am going into the service, I suppose I will have to start using tobacco again."

I had no real intentions of doing so, but was just trying to see what she would say. I will never forget her answer:

"Just as sure as you start using tobacco again, the Spirit and protection of God will be removed from you."

I forgot all about this incident until one day on the other side, as I was engaged in a soldier's duties, after having been deprived of sleep for two nights, it came back vividly. I was on guard over a machine gun, guarding No Man's Land. I had no one to talk to. The trench was very shallow, so I could not stand or walk erect without exposing myself to the enemy. Having to crawl on my hands and knees for exercise, I became very sleepy.

Satan came and said, "If you could smoke now, you wouldn't be so sleepy."

Looking down, I saw three cigarets lying on the ground, where the man on guard before me had left them. I stooped to pick them up, thinking I would give them to one of my buddies, when the tempter said, "If you take just one of them, it will not hurt you, and you won't be so sleepy." I refused to take one, but he kept on insisting, until I finally said, "One will not hurt me."

I took one and started to light it. Then my sister came and stood before me, and pointing her finger at me said again, "Just as sure as you start using tobacco again, the Spirit and protection of God will be taken from you."

I threw the tobacco out in No Man's Land, and asked God to still be with me. He blessed me, and gave me strength to overcome the desire to use the weed once more.

If this will help anyone to overcome the use of tobacco, I will be more than paid for the trouble of writing it.

Special Meetings at Burlington

We have just closed one of the most interesting and enthusiastic series of meetings we have held in Burlington for some time. Elder C. E. Wight, of Lamoni, was the speaker, and presented his themes in a most convincing manner, giving to his hearers inspiration and aspiration to higher living, and a fuller appreciation of the mission intrusted by the Master to his followers, when he said, "It is given unto you to be the light of the world." Beginning with the question, "Is there a God?" the subjects led on up through a consideration of "The message of Jesus," to a consummation in "What that message means to us," "How may we answer the call," "A life of service," and "To him that hath." The development and perfect sequence of these themes were designed to lead us to careful self-examination, and full consecration of every faculty given us, for the good of humanity, and to the glory of God. The consecration and whole-heartedness of the speaker carried with his words a convincing power they could not otherwise have had. Brother Wight won a place in the hearts of both the older and younger members of the branch, and we hope that this may be only the first of his visits to Burlington.

The "young people" (no age limit) organized preparatory for the campaign, selecting committees for publicity work, social interests, and correspondence for the benefit of those who were hindered from attending and thus securing the benefit of the services "first hand." We feel that this organizing and drawing together of forces has resulted in good to all who participated, in that it paved the way for more unified effort in the future.

A social gathering Saturday evening, in charge of the recreational leader, in Brother Wight's honor, gave him opportunity to mingle in a social way with some forty or fifty of the membership. The games were well planned, and the response and sharing in the whole-hearted fun was practically unanimous, our "dignified" pastor and speaker both providing a goodly portion. We will leave Brother Wight to tell you about his reward as prize cracker eater—time limit two minutes.

We feel that in every way, the association of the past two weeks, its uplift and influence, will leave a permanent impress for good.

Other branch activities have not varied much from their customary trend. A food sale held by the Department of Women Saturday, February 17, brought in over thirty dollars for the building fund. We understand this is planned as a monthly feature.

Hawaiian Mission

The First Presidency: Brother Reeves has returned home. We were glad to have him with us, although the special meetings were staged during the most severe storm we have had since I have been on the islands. The storm lasted about three weeks. It was impossible to continue the meetings, although we tried it for a week. To add to our trouble the city tore up the street in front of our church, which made it almost impossible to get from the street cars to the pavement, because of ditches full of water and mud. It was unfortunate to start the meetings at his time, but we had spent twenty dollars in advertising, and we did not want to back down. But we soon found that it was impossible to get the strangers out to our services, so we closed them after one week. Brother Reeves then went and assisted Brother Foo get his meetings started in a schoolhouse.

Brother Reeves has the spirit of his office and calling, namely, a seventy. He certainly can represent and defend the work among strangers. He will be one of our valuable men in the future, as he is studying all the time.

Brother Foo has a hard job on his hands, trying to get the orientals into a condition that they can be talked to so they can understand. You can get the children to Sunday school, but the adults—here is the problem. They may come for a time or two, then you have to go after them if you want them again. They seem to be always looking after the temporal rewards. Christianity does not appeal to them to any great extent. As far as this is concerned, we might say this is true with most everyone at the present time. They want to know what is in it for them now, not hereafter. Hereafter is a long time off, a very uncertain condition that does not appeal to many, not even to many of the Saints that have been members for a number of years.

There is one thing we are doing just now, that is, teaching the financial law as hard as we can. Brother Waller lectured from the church charts last Sunday morning. We had seventy-five members present. He explained the system very plainly; everyone should have understood. He told them that he was coming around to their homes to have another talk with them about their inventories.

We are keeping up our Hawaiian services in private homes. Do not get many strangers in, but we have a dozen or more of the Saints out every week.

We have a lot of sickness around just now. Buried two of our oldest members this month.

Sincerely yours,

E. B. HULL.

Is the Missionary Auto Practical?

When I think of the many ways the missionary auto has been a blessing to us, I feel like telling it to others.

We first got personally acquainted with Brother John Shields in 1908 when the little "Black Billy" turned in at our gate one day, and since then he has been a father to me and mine in the gospel. As time went on Billy was superannuated into the home of some good Saints and is alive yet, and our brother procured a motorcycle. One incident among many others of this motorcycle is fresh upon our mind.

We had a very sick little boy, and for weeks it seemed he must die with spasmodic croup. Our family physician had done all he knew for the child, and said he never wanted to see a living thing choke like that again. After much telephoning we located Brother Shields of motorcycle fame in Saint Thomas. He started to us at once, coming by way of London, a distance of about fifty miles. It was a very hot day, but he arrived in record time, dripping with sweat and covered with the dust and dirt of the road, having had to pump his machine and walk part of the way to get here at all, because the old motorcycle was a cheap one and not working well. He and Brother Cohoe administered to our son and at once he began to get better.

At that time the thought came to me, "Is it possible that this grand old man, in order to reach us and many others has to ride in a chariot of this kind after spending so many years in the mission field and always practicing the strictest economy?" I wished for money to provide a little Ford, but did not have it. However, the motorcycle went and a second-hand Ford took its place about six years ago.

We are a family of isolated Saints, nine in number, and live about twenty-five miles from a branch so we cannot begin to tell how glad we are to hear the chug of the missionary car. Many blessings have come into our lives because of it.

Why couldn't more of our missionaries have small cars? Surely the Saints could make it possible without much sacrifice. Of course all are not so mechanically turned as the brother I speak of. I have seen him don the overalls in my shop to repair very carefully anything that needed fixing about that car, being very particular in keeping everything in the best condition possible, working away into the night oftentimes in order to keep appointments or get away to some one sick or in trouble. And I know that by his personal effort the life of his car has been greatly prolonged.

It is easy to understand how expensive the upkeep of any car would be if the driver could not or would not do most of his own repairing. But a small, comfortable car in the hands of a good, judicious, mechanically inclined missionary should be a source of pleasure and economy in travel and a great blessing to many who would very seldom see his face under other conditions as we have experienced.

Sister Burton Writes of Her Son and His Passing

Especially to those who have written me kind, sympathetic letters and have not had a personal answer, also to all who have prayed the Father to comfort and sustain me in the great loss of my dearly loved son, I am writing this to thank you for those letters and prayers, and to let you know that those prayers have been answered beyond anything that I thought could be. Oh, this blessed gospel! the fruits of which bring peace to the heart in the midst of what otherwise would be a crushing sorrow, and the blessedness of being in touch with our heavenly Father, and Christ our Lord and Master, and the loving-kindness of them to give such assurance of the happiness that awaited him in the future. This assurance was given to both daughter Addie and me two or three months before he was taken from us. But we mistook it for his future life in this world when he should be freed from pain and be well again, that he would enter into the work of the Lord and be very useful and very happy. And after that first time when I would plead with the Father that bright, happy feeling would come. And now since he has gone from us I know it was pointing to his future that would be so happy in the better land. The peace and consolation that has been given me confirms this evidence, and I can rejoice in his happiness rather than mourn my loss, though never did a mother have a better son, so dutiful, so void of anything like disobedience to parents, and so thoughtful of his mother even when a child.

Bear with me while I tell you the confidence that the Lord had in him even when a young man. The night that I had such a peculiar experience before going to Australia, you remember that I wrote of talking with the Father, wanting to know why we could not serve him as well to stay here and labor to bring souls to Christ as to go so far away and leave our son without a home to go to. Said I, "Suppose he, not having home or parents to go to, should be led in the ways of wickedness by the men that he was working with and lose his soul while we were trying to save others?" The answer in plain words was, "You know he will not." The tone as well as the words was a rebuke, for I really had no such fears, only we were leaving him to the chances.

I did not write these words of the Father at that time, thinking perhaps that it was best that I should not, but I treasured them in my heart. Oh, yes! I miss him and long to see his genial, happy face, and ever will, but the sting of death has truly been taken away so that my life is not darkened because of my loss. In some ways it is made brighter because of thinking of his great joy and happiness freed from all sorrow, pain, and suffering.

We know not why the Lord permits such long sufferings, but know it is all for a wise purpose and none has suffered like our dear Redeemer, Lord, and Master. May we live worthy to be his when we are called from this life, worthy to enter into the greater joys of the better life and meet the dear ones gone before.

This bereavement will be felt more deeply by his gentle wife and family. His wife took entire care of him day and night during the five months that he has been confined to his bed with only the help that the girls rendered when at home from their work. Dear girls, how they loved their father! He has left a worthy family of six, all grown, and all members of the church, and nearly all active members, giving of their time, means, and ability whenever called for to assist the work, especially in the branch.

Some will like to know that Annie is not alone. She has her aged though active mother, her sister Mary, and Lelia, her unmarried daughter, boarding with her, and Wilfred, her only son, lives near.

May peace and blessings of God abide with them as they have this handmaiden whose heart goes out in gratitude to the Giver of such great blessings. EMMA B. BURTON.

Young People's Convention

The way some people boost. What are you doing?

At the district conference of the Southern California District recently, nine delegates were appointed to the young people's convention, which meets in Lamoni in June. We are informed unofficially that the Saints at this conference expressed themselves as willing to aid the young people who attend in meeting their necessary expenses.

The president of the Holden Stake, Brother D. J. Krahl, recently prepared an open letter which was mailed to every home in that stake. In this letter parents and adults were urged to see to it that the young people of that home made every effort possible to attend the convention in June.

A young sister in Michigan, Sister Ruth McNickle, 39 First Street, Battle Creek, Michigan, has worked out a plan whereby twenty or more young people can come to the convention from Michigan at a saving of from fifty to seventy-five per cent on their traveling expenses.

In Oklahoma the Department of Women is making an effort to reach every young person in that district. They are determined that as far as they are concerned Oklahoma will be represented with a large delegation. They have been ably assisted in this work by Apostle Roy S. Budd and Brother George Kelley. In fact the latter has been chosen as sort of general manager of the advertising. Of him it is said, "When George says he'll do it, it will be done." In regard to getting young people to come to convention George has said he'll do it.

We are quite sure that those who are living in branches and districts near Lamoni do not appreciate what a large number of young people from a great distance have already determined to come. The following are a few of the many who have already mailed us their enrollment cards:

Roscoe Davey, Salt Lake City, Utah.
Blanche Edwards, England.
Mrs. D. L. Evans, Bisbee, Arizona.
Arista Goff, Pascagonla, Mississippi.
N. E. Hield and wife, Madison, Wisconsin.
Mary Jones, Columbus, Ohio.
Esther Irene Layton, Nauvoo, Illinois.
Mildred Mitchell, Bentley, Michigan.
William McCune, New Castle, Pennsylvania.
Margie B. Reneau, Tryon, Nebraska.
Jesse Roth, Lawrence, Kansas.
Gladys Umphrey, Bentley, Michigan.
Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Sumption, Webster, South Dakota.
Mrs. Daisy B. Short, Bisbee, Arizona.
Miss Johanna Thomas, Malad, Idaho.
Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Kuhlman, Denver, Colorado.
Wilfred Tordoff, Isle of Pines.

If those young people living near-by do half so well, next June will see the largest gathering of the young people in the history of the church. F. M. MCDOWELL.

A Missionary Sends New Subscribers

Elder S. T. Pendleton in a letter suggests that all the missionaries take one month in which they make a special effort to try to gather new subscribers for our papers as well as secure the purchase of church books. We must remember that that which is presented in the HERALD does not reach the people who need to subscribe for the HERALD. It depends upon the readers, on the missionary, to see that the word is carried to those who are not now subscribers. Do not let it rest upon the missionary alone. You who are readers and are enjoying the papers of the church should loan your copies to others and should make a definite effort to secure from them a subscription so that they will receive it regularly and promptly for themselves. Elder Pendleton in one month has sent in orders amounting to about $45. Other missionaries have done as well in the past, yet there are many homes which do not as yet receive the periodicals of the church. S. A. B.

Jerusalem, Palestine

"Brother Alma Pitt's business partner and family visited us in Jerusalem on March 1 and 2. We enjoyed visiting with white people again. The dam in front of the foundation of the Mission Building is finished, but our blinds are not. During the coming summer we must put storm doors on the rain side, put in kitchen drains, screens, and put some sort of a filler between the stone on the rain side of the building. We have had little rain compared with other years, but are hoping the latter rains will be heavy enough to make up the deficit."

[The unrest in Palestine is clearly shown in the Palestine Weekly sent by Elder Passman who writes that conditions are insecure, as there is practically no British army. The Zionists are financially short, so that school-teachers have received no pay for many months.

While in Great Britain there is a growing anxiety over the British burden in the Near East of Mesopotamia on one hand and of Palestine on the other hand. Yet as one writer points out in the Palestine Weekly there is but little probability that the British Government will entirely withdraw. There may be a withdrawal of troops, a changing of methods. The burden of taxes is being felt very severely in Great Britain, hence an effort will be made for economy, at the same time preserving the factor of safety.—EDITORS.]

Dramatic Activities in Zion

As a culmination of their winter's study of one-act plays the Independence Dramatic Club have undertaken to produce three representative one-act plays. They are "Will o' the wisp," a fantasy by Anna Wolsrond; "Suppressed desires," a clever comedy by Susan Glaspell and George Crane Cook; and "The prince of court painters," a historical play by Constance D'Arcy McKaye. These plays will be given at the Junior High School on April 14.

Those who attended the 1922 Conference will remember the pageant which was the club's maiden effort. The proceeds of this coming performance of one-act plays are to be used to put on a pageant during the 1923 conference. This pageant will be written by our own people and based on incidents of our church history.

The Dramatic Club was organized less than a year ago, yet they have now a junior department of forty members of high school age, and they have a children's department in process of organization. These departments work under the direct supervision of the executive of the senior club and have the use of all properties, costumes, etc., that belong to the club.

The ideal of the club is service. In cooperation with the recreational leaders of the various branches of Zion, Miss Gladys Newton, president of the club, is appointing dramatic leaders or directors in each branch. The plan is to exchange dramatic talent, that when the organization of one branch puts on a good dramatic production they shall be invited to present it at other branches also.

The dramatic leaders are encouraging the dramatization of church history, Book of Mormon incidents, and noteworthy religious experiences.

The Dramatic Club is also assisting in the dramatization of the Bible lessons for the young people's services held every Sunday morning in the basement of the Stone Church.

This club has high ideals of dramatic achievement. Several of their members have attended the School of the Theater in Kansas City this winter and have heard lectures by authorities on the various subjects of stage artistry such as costuming, lighting, and the directing of plays. Two of the members, Gladys Newton and Louise Newton, have played in the productions of the Theater Guild of Kansas City.

The club hopes to add a valuable contribution to the dramatic art in the church and the community.

Holden Stake Conference

The conference of the Holden Stake was held at Lees Summit, Missouri, March 9, 10, and 11. The purchase last summer of a church building formerly used by the Methodist people at Lees Summit made it possible for the holding of a conference there. Friday evening, Elder J. W. A. Bailey gave a sermon on "Preparation for service."

Saturday morning at 8.30 the Saints met in a devotional service, Bishop C. J. Hunt and Elder E. E. Fender in charge.

The business session was opened at ten o'clock. Apostle F. Henry Edwards and the stake presidency were chosen to preside, who were authorized to make provision for the conference. Reports were received from the stake presidency, stake bishopric, leader of the Department of Women, stake Sunday school superintendent, stake director of music, stake recorder, quorum of priests, and from members of the high priests' quorum, teachers' quorum, and deacons' quorum. The stake bishopric's report showed: received from all sources from July 1, 1922, to February 28, 1923, $5,089.01; total expended including amount sent Presiding Bishop, $5,- 190.05; on hand $391.64. Real estate deeded to the church and recorded on Presiding Bishop's book, not included in receipts. The bishopric reported that there had been a decided increase in tithes and offerings since General Conference. On hand special funds: Department fund, $9.35; tent fund, $10.60; reunion fund, $249.35; stake building and loan fund, $1,182.20, with equipment including building estimated at $1,200. The recorder's reports showed present membership to be 1,657, an apparent loss, but one occasioned by revision of the records and transferring to the unknown list. Nineteen baptisms reported since last conference. The following ordinations were ordered: R. Berber Cook, of Levasy, Missouri, and Gland W. Rodger, of Sedalia, to the office of elder; A. D. Kuykendall, of Lees Summit, to the office of teacher; Earl C. Raveill, of Post Oak, Perry B. Mengel, of Lees Summit, and Freeland Hampton and Joseph Beebe, of Holden, Missouri, to the office of deacon. The ordination of Brother Rodger was ordered, subject to the approval of the high council, the other ordinations having been approved.

At three o'clock Saturday afternoon Mrs. Dora Glines, superintendent of the Department of Women, delivered an address touching on the working of the departments, together with the church with special reference to plan number four, which had been formerly adopted by the stake.

The following paragraph from the stake presidency's report was called up: "We suggest that there be organized classes in this (the book, Religious Education in the Family), outside of the regular Religio session so as to give opportunity for those who cannot attend Religio, or who have duties at the Religio session which prevents their attending class work. The family is fundamental to our religious and national life. When Zion reaches the point that the term 'pure in heart' can be applied to her properly, it will be because of the religious standing of our families. Those who neglect these lessons are neglecting that which is vital to our growth and development." A motion to refer to the superintendent of the Department of Expression and Recreation failed to carry.

A committee presented request of East Independence Church for transfer from the Holden Stake to Zion. It was moved to adopt. A substitute offered and prevailed as follows: Resolved that the question of boundary lines of Zion is not for the stake to pass on but lies with the General Conference action. The stake therefore declined to act in the matter except to refer the petition to the General Conference the stake having no objection to the change should General Conference so decide.

The matter of reunion was discussed, and decision reached not advisable to hold a reunion this year.

At seven o'clock a musical prelude was given under the direction of stake music director, Mrs. Lola A. Johnson, which was followed by preaching service, Apostle F. Henry Edwards being the speaker. His subject was that of repentance, and he emphasized that repentance means more than "ceasing to do evil," but in addition, "learning to do well."

After the sermon some business matters were taken up. The need of repairs on the Lees Summit church as mentioned in the presidency's report was called up and it was referred to the stake presidency, high council, and bishopric, with power to act.

Sunday morning, the 11th, devotional service was held at 8.30, with Elder Charles Martin and Roscoe Moorman in charge. At ten o'clock the Sunday school session was held, the local superintendent, Brother E. F. Brace, in charge. The elementary classes met in the smaller room, and the balance of the school listened to talks in the auditorium by Brother I. M. Ross, superintendent of Expression and Recreation, and Sister Lola A. Johnson, stake director of music. At eleven o'clock President F. M. McDowell occupied, and gave a sermon which was of untold worth to the hearers. It was the most spiritual service of the entire conference in which the speaker and the audience seemed to be enveloped in the Spirit as the needs of the hour and the present condition of the church were stressed. Our stenographers, Sisters Moler and Macrae, took notes on the sermon, which we trust will be given to the Saints through our periodicals.

At 2.15 the conference met and a short musical program was given. A 2.30 President F. M. McDowell gave a thirty-minute address to the young people. He spoke particularly in regard to the young people's convention to be held at Lamoni, Iowa, June 3 to 16.

At three o'clock an ordination meeting was held. President McDowell gave a brief talk on the need of ministers. The following brethren were ordained: R. B. Cook, elder; John G. Haas, priest; A. D. Kuykendall, teacher; E. C. Raveill and Perry B. Mengel, deacons, President F. M. McDowell and Elders W. S. Macrae, C. J. Hunt, and R. E. Burgess officiating.

Three children were blessed by Elders J. W. A. Bailey, Calvin DePuy, and D. J. Krahl.

The Elders' Quorum reported R. B. Cook, of Levasy, Missouri, had been chosen secretary and C. V. Hopkins, of Grandview, was recommended as president of the quorum of the Holden Stake and the Clinton District. The conference approved the recommendation. The First Deacons' Quorum was organized, and J. H. Post, of Atherton, was recommended for president. The conference approved the recommendation.

A motion of appreciation was extended to the Lees Summit Saints for their hospitality. Conference adjourned to meet again at Holden, Missouri, subject to the call of the stake presidency.

BLANCHE CHRISTENSON, Stake Secretary.

From James W. Davis in New South Wales

(A letter to the First Presidency.)

We received your Christmas greetings, and acknowledge the same with pleasure. We are beginning the work of the new year under rather more favorable conditions than a year ago. We are already here and have a grasp of the situation, and for myself I am in better health than a year ago. I am steadily though slowly improving. We are still in the hot season of the year here, which will continue for another month or two. When the cool weather comes I expect to be quite well. The intense and prolonged heat here is very debilitating.

I am being very well blessed in my work, and look forward to an active and successful year. Notwithstanding my poor health last year I was able to do some substantial work, and I am inclosing a copy of my report for the year.

Inez is in fair health, and her work among the people here seems to be much appreciated. She is always in demand. She is quite contented out here and does not worry about going home.

Brother McConley's work in this field is much appreciated. He is a constant and tireless worker, is always congenial and even tempered, and his devotion to the church is the outstanding feature of his ministry.

Sister McConley is also a good worker, but unfortunately she is in very poor health. The traveling about is too much for her I fear.

Altogether we are pleased with the prospects of the work in this mission, and are anxious for the success of the work in all the world. We are fully committed to it and feel that its fortunes are ours, and that we must stand or fall with it.

I hope that the inspiration which comes from the Eternal source of all good will constantly guide you in the work of your great callings.

Independence

Easter Sunday began rather cool but that did not prevent a good attendance at the early 8 o'clock prayer meeting nor at the Sunday school which followed at 9.30. At 11 in the upper and lower auditoriums at the Stone Church the hour was given to the sacrament service. President E. A. Smith, R. V. Hopkins, U. W. Greene, M. H. Siegfried were in charge. After the administration of the sacrament of the Lord's supper the time was given to an Easter sermon by Pastor R. V. Hopkins, who spoke with unusual earnestness and spiritual power.

This laid the basis for the prayer meeting at 2.30 p. m. which was well attended and proved a spiritual feast to those who were present as no time was permitted to go to waste.

In the evening the oratorio, "The Lord of the Eastertide" was presented by the choir accompanied by the orchestra. About a hundred took part in the splendid choruses of this oratorio as there were nearly seventy singers and the orchestra consisted of about thirty pieces, including the pipe organ and piano. The fact that this is the first time that the two have been thus united in an oratorio makes the event one of historical interest, as well as the excellent presentation by both the chorus and the soloists.

In the other churches in Zion the morning hour was also taken with the sacrament service. In the evening the Liberty Street church presented a junior program. The Enoch Hill church presented an Easter cantata, "The risen king." At Walnut Park the hour was likewise taken with an Easter musical program, while at Englewood George Jenkins was the speaker.

The regular quarterly business meeting in Zion, it was announced would be postponed one week until April 9 on account of the absence from the city of President F. M. Smith. The principal item of business is the following recommendation from the First Presidency, which was discussed at the January conference, but action deferred until the April conference. The opposition is especially strong to the third recommendation. The resolution is as follows:

"To the Conference in Zion; Greeting:

"In the judgment of the Presidency the time has come for a more definite coordination of the departments in Zion and a more uniform method of procedure in selecting officers. Most of the locals in Zion have adopted what is known as Form Four, with certain necessary modifications. The way would seem clear then for action by the conference, and we suggest the adoption of the following rules of procedure:

"(1) The heads of the general departments of the church and the pastor in Zion in consultation with the First Presidency shall nominate the heads of departments in Zion, subject to ratification by the conference in Zion.

"(2) The four department heads in Zion shall then in consultation with the pastor in Zion select the heads of the departments in the various congregations, the pastor in each congregation to be duly consulted. These selections shall be presented to the conference for approval.

"(3) In each local congregation the four local heads of departments together with the pastor shall appoint all subordinate officers and teachers."

The priesthood meeting of Zion which is regularly held the fourth Monday in the month had already been postponed, and so was held Monday evening, April 2, at which time President E. A. Smith addressed them.

Bishop B. R. McGuire who has been in the East for a couple of weeks to attend the conference there and to care for other church business returned to his office Friday, March 30.

President F. M. Smith and Bishop I. A. Smith left for Detroit on Tuesday, March 27, for a week or ten days.

Pastor R. V. Hopkins who has been absent for two or three weeks in Wisconsin on special church business in which he was associated in part with John F. Garver has returned to his office.

John F. Garver having completed his special work in Wisconsin is now back at his editorial desk in Lamoni.

John W. Rushton opened a series of meetings at Colorado Springs March 27. He has just completed a series of meetings at Denver and expects to visit every branch in Colorado, preaching for the Saints, laboring with and instructing the priesthood, and organizing them for local missionary work. While in Denver he was called upon twice to address the railway men of that city and also the students at the Iliff Theological College of the University of Denver. In this latter case he had been asked to speak on the labor movement in Great Britain, but at the very last moment while walking to the stand he was asked to set forth the teachings of our church, which he did concisely and acceptably.

The hearts of many were made sad by an accident to the six-year-old boy of Rupert A. Wight. He was playing near his home in Kansas City on March 27, ran out into the street directly in front of a passing truck and was instantly killed. The boy is a grandson of J. W. Wight and a great-grandson of Lyman Wight.

The members of the choir have been unusually busy the past few months preparing for the Easter oratorio and also as part of the great chorus for the "Elijah" in Kansas City. This oratorio is being presented as grand opera on the evening of April 4 and 5 in Convention Hall in Kansas City.

The radio programs are calling forth a great deal of interest. President E. A. Smith preached a wonderful sermon on Sunday evening but for some mysterious reason the sending apparatus was out of commission except for the last three minutes of the sermon so that only those who were present in the sending room were able to appreciate it.

Negotiations for the purchase of the Swope place on South Pleasant Street, Independence, have been completed. The building is a large residence with sixteen rooms besides a large room suitable for an assembly or lecture hall and capable of seating two hundred and fifty people, in addition to five finished rooms in the basement. It has many facilities for convenient use, including an elevator or lift, and is well situated, being in convenient reach of the car lines, but a few blocks away from the turmoil of the city. It is planned to use the building primarily for the Independence Institute of Arts and Sciences, as they have been meeting any place they could find room, in the church, dining hall, library, and office building; but it will also be used as a social center, playgrounds and park, as the purchase includes the twenty acres of the estate. While the building is well adapted to many church uses, its purchase in fact has been made by private individuals. First, friends in the East have made up a large share of the $50,000 required (a reduction from the price required last fall); then the balance is being made up by private donations in Independence and vicinity so that no part of the expense will fall on the general church. Title will be taken to the Independence Institute of Arts and Sciences, which was recently incorporated.

Brother Dewey McNamara, active in local Boy Scout and Religio work, has gone to Iowa City, Iowa, to participate in the two-weeks' session of Boy Scout executive conference, to prepare himself for better work in his chosen lines.

A large party of young people from the Stone Church drove by auto to Sibley and Buckner, northeast of Independence, on Sunday afternoon and gave an Easter program at each place in connection with the services. They were entertained for supper at the home of Brother and Sister Cook and altogether had a delightful time.

The Religio program at the Stone Church by Dorless Harris Dean, blind singer of Kansas City, was much appreciated. The Independence Dramatic Club furnishes the program next Friday.

San Francisco, California

The San Francisco Branch decided early in March to engage in a vigorous campaign of publicity and expansion, and appointed various committees to see that the work was thoroughly done.

As a first step they secured the cooperation of T. W. Williams, of the Quorum of Twelve, and J. D. White, the district president, with Brother Williams as speaker. The meetings were held in the Native Sons Hall for two weeks, each evening from March 18 to April 1.

They advertised the whole series of lectures in a little card and called upon the church membership to cancel all other appointments or engagements of every kind, and to attend every meeting, and bring the family, and to use every endeavor to bring others by personal solicitation, by telephone, and writing to friends.

As a definite task each member was asked to run through the telephone directory each day and select twenty-five names, call them up and invite them to the services. Again to carry a bunch of invitation cards and hand to the people met.

"Invite your doctor, druggist, music teacher, dressmaker, etc. Contribute as liberally as you can to meet the expenses, and finally, pray unceasingly that God will bless the effort."

Such a letter is inspiring and possesses the additional advantage that it does not ask indefinite help, but tersely and directly challenges the attention of every member and reader, giving a definite task to each and every one.

New Budget Books Ready

There was some unexpected delay in securing the stock of specially ruled paper for the Family Budget Books, but all orders have now been filled with the new edition recently printed.

One of the big improvements in this edition is that the items are so classified that one can easily determine the amount of tithing due. For instance, there are items that may be deducted from one's income and items which should not be deducted. Then there are classifications upon which each person must decide for himself whether or not these are necessary living expenses.

A copy of the annual tithing blank is printed in the book, with excellent suggestions on how to keep the record. The book is divided into twelve monthly divisions and may be used for any twelve months desired. The price is low. Young people should be encouraged to keep their own accounts, as it will be an excellent aid in establishing correct attitude toward one's possessions.

Twenty-five cents each, postpaid.

Southeastern Illinois

(Excerpts from letter of L. C. Moore, president Southeastern Illinois District to the First Presidency):

I came to Benton where I found a nice live band of willing workers, I believe soon to become an organized branch. From there to Mount Vernon, where I found another nice band of Saints ready to help roll the gospel along. From there I went across to Mount Carmel, Illinois, in answer to a call and found my folks all down with the measles; to-day much improved. We have a large room in this district; plenty of room for all the Saints to make improvement, and I believe with proper care and attention the Saints will move forward. I have more calls than I can look after and see to the needs of the family. However, this summer and fall I look for quite a good work to be done among the Saints. I learn that our missionaries are moving along nicely.

Warner, Alberta

I sometimes wonder if other isolated Saints enjoy reading letters from me as well as I like to read the letters found in the columns of the HERALD and Ensign. I often wonder if they have the same joyous love pass through their souls when they read the testimonies and experiences of others of our faith. It has been more than three years since I have had the privilege of attending a meeting of our church and have also been without the church papers some little time. I miss them much, as they are our silent preachers. Still I have read and reread my old papers so have been able to enjoy the good Spirit to a marked degree.

It has been said that isolation would finally result in backsliding, but this is not a fact with those who have ever tasted

Seven Reasons Why I Am Going to the Young People's Convention

Reason Number Five: I Need to Know My Leaders Personally.

From my very infancy I have been taught the beauties of the gospel and have heard of the work of the leaders of the church. It has been my privilege to meet very few of them, and I have been very anxious for a long time to know them better. I have been assured that many of these leaders will be present at the young people's convention; that during those ten days they will give their personal attention to the needs of such as I. I feel sure that the personal acquaintance of these men and women will inspire me with a greater desire to work with them in the building of Zion. I am confident that when we learn to know each other better the mists will clear away. It is for this reason that I have gone to work earnestly to save enough to cover my expenses at the convention. I know that I shall not be disappointed and shall never regret the effort made. Will you meet me there?

of the spirit that accompanies this latter-day work. I believe I can truthfully say that to-day I stand more firmly than ever for Christ and the gospel. I love this great work of God and I want all my friends who read this to know that I am still for him and this restored gospel although I am isolated from any of the Saints of like precious faith. I stand alone in my family; still I am praying that in some way the Lord will answer prayer and that they may all be brought to the knowledge of the one faith.

I hope to be able to attend reunion this summer in Bellingham and am looking forward to the good I may receive from meeting with God's people and once more hearing the old gospel story.

Sunday morning service, January 14, was given over to a lecture by a speaker provided by the Anti-Saloon League on "Law enforcement" relating particularly to the prohibition law and showing dangers yet to be encountered to keep prohibition in effect.

At 7.30, Elder Norris of Kewanee preached, using as a text, "God's arm is not waxed short," and proving conclusively that God still rules and guides his people. Local men who have occupied are Brother Baldwin, Leonard Lee, Stephen Lester, H. P. W. Keir, and Roy Cheville. Elder E. A. Curtis was with us February 23 to 25 and preached Sunday a. m. at a meeting of officers and teachers of the Sunday school. It was decided to recommend that we adopt Form 4. Sacrament service was marked by a peaceful all-pervading spirit that made all present feel to rejoice and press forward.

Sunday, March 11, at 11 a. m. Apostle Paul M. Hanson preached a splendid sermon, touching principally on right attitudes as the church stands for and helps us to maintain, and urging more stress on things Christ stood for, such as helpfulness, love, and sympathy, and less on minor things.

Many and varied activities are being entered into by all departments. The Department of Women are setting apart some of their time to visiting members who do not come to church services regularly. Thus are all departments working together prayerfully for the upbuilding of God's kingdom and strengthening of his Saints.

We desire to let you all know we are still trying to accomplish the Lord's work in this city. We are fortunate in having as our pastor Elder J. A. Daer, who is a humble and untiring worker, giving all his time and means to the upbuilding of the work here.

While our meetings have not been as well attended lately on account of sickness yet we have been blessed along this line.

Our district president, Elder J. Cooper, gave us a couple of days (February 18 and 19) of his busy time. He made us all feel encouraged and we are trying to profit by his kindly advice.

At the present time we are contemplating the organization of a Woman's Auxiliary. In the past this has been an impossibility but we are going to get our distaff ready and trust the Lord to send the flax.

We are still holding our meetings in the hall at 115 North Third Street. Sunday school is at 10 a. m. and preaching at 11 a. m. Our pastor resides at 1532 Benton Street so when you happen to be in our city don't forget us.

We are hoping to be able to secure hours during the week to broadcast lectures, sermons, and concerts which will teach our message. Write and tell us what topics you would like to have discussed in the lectures and sermons. Also tell us what you think of the programs given, so that we can accumulate ideas which will enable us to put out a first-class program every time.

We used to sing

"Send the sound, the earth around
From the rising to the setting of the sun."

It will not be long until we do this. Last week's sermon was heard in Winnipeg. Next year's may well be heard in England. When we have the apparatus to reach there we want also to have the best understanding of radio-preaching, so that our message will be fittingly presented.

Names Wanted of Relatives and Friends

One of our greatest assets in endeavoring to spread the gospel, is to be able to cite friends and relatives who have been blessed through their association with the church. We have used this introduction very successfully in various parts of the United States and Canada, but in our Foreign Missions—where it would be particularly valuable—we have not as yet realized on this asset.

H. G. Wells says that "the last act of faith is to trust those that we love to God." We believe that you wish to do this, and therefore suggest that all the Saints who have relatives and friends to whom they would like the gospel taken write to the Quorum of Twelve, Box 255, Independence, Missouri. Wherever they live, send us the information. We are represented in practically all the States of the Union, and hope to be in the others shortly. We have missions in the following countries, and will extend our labors as soon as we are consolidated there.

Australia.

British Isles.

Canada.

Cayman Islands.

Denmark.

Germany.

Hawaiian Islands.

Holland.

Isle of Pines.

New Zealand.

Norway.

Palestine.

Society Islands.

Sweden.

Switzerland.

Let us know just such particulars as will be of interest to a missionary making himself known for the first time, and we will promise to do our utmost to take abroad the message for which your relatives are hungering.

Answer this request now, please, or with the best of intentions it will be left for a "more convenient season"—and forgotten.
