But mothering seasons do not always assure that the business of manhood, when taken over, shall be conducted properly. And that is what happened in Israel. That overgrown child—which in the normal course of development should have taken over—did not walk in the straight and narrow way. It turned away from the light which shone through such instrumentalities as Samuel, and elected to walk in the ways of death. And when Israel did that, she ruined the business of the Kingdom.

In the course of these articles, I believe I shall show that the social philosophy, together with the practical plan of social action, of the modern prophet, is designed to avoid the principal pitfalls that ruined the business of the Kingdom which Moses sought to establish. I do not contend that even the prophet himself escaped every pitfall, for there never lived a man who did not make mistakes, much less do I say that his people did not depart at any point from the straight and narrow way. I only argue that to succeed in restoring the business of the Kingdom this people must walk in the light of the genius that manifested itself for a time in the career of the modern prophet.

You Say "It Can't Be Done"?

"Can't" becomes "can" for every leader and worker who studies and uses Guide-Lines to Leadership consistently. And the question you ask yourself as you start your study of the January issue of Guide-Lines is not "Can I?" but "How Can I?"

You may teach the Junior High Age, and are joyfully aware of their power to learn and grow. You long to help them learn usable truths and to develop into useful kingdom-citizens. You want to know how.

The January issue of Guide-Lines carries a stimulating and helpful article, "More Effective Religious Education for the Junior High Age," by John Banks. Oh, yes, there are other articles for teachers and leaders of every age group.

Flint, Michigan

Pastor, H. J. Simons

Twelve new members have been baptized recently; they are Kathleen and Delores Curry, Donelda and Ralph Ross, Elaine Grinnell, James Thompson, Darla Irwin, Linda Cottrill, Dorothy Perry, Carol Shaft, Gerald Phillipi, and Inza Morrell. The annual business meeting was held at the Newell Street Church on September 17; officers for the coming year are H. J. Simons, branch president; Arthur DuRose, Arthur Slater, and Clyde Youngs, associates; Kathleen Barker, secretary; Mary Sears, statistician; Henry Hartzler, treasurer; Glenn Hardy, church school director; George McNamara, assistant for Newell Street Church; Carl Vun Cannon, assistant for Baltimore Boulevard Church; Muriel DuRose, women's leader; Etta Youngs, Herald correspondent; and Leo Reigle, book steward. A recommendation for the ordination of Priest Ernest Wecker to the office of elder was approved. The Michigan State Religious Education Institute was held in Flint, September 20 to 22. Guest speakers on the closing day were John Booth and Warren Chelline. Eighteen women from Flint attended the regional women's meeting held in Detroit on October 1; Apostles E. J. Gleazer and Blair Jensen were the instructors. Promotion services were held at both churches in October; 121 from the children's division, and thirty-two from the junior high group were presented promotion certificates; three pupils and one teacher were awarded perfect attendance pins. Church school attendance is showing an increase under the supervision of Glenn Hardy and his assistants. The Junior and Senior Zion's League leaders are Hattie Joplin and Ernest Wecker; programs have been planned in advance for each group. The young people of Flint and Clio provided special music for the October 8 services when Apostles E. J. Gleazer and Blair Jensen were present. Other visiting speakers have been Elders Carl Muir, J. J. Ledsworth, Merle Howard, B. H. Doty, Rigby Leighton, Ben Hewitt, Percy Farrow, L. O. Brockway, Herbert Lively, and Evangelist William Fligg. Daniel Joseph and Kaye Janeen Russell, Sally Ellen, Ruth Alice, and Doris Esther Mason were blessed at recent services.

While Rome Burns

BY ROBERT BRACKENBURY

In his now famous letter to the President on foreign policy, former Secretary Wallace stated, "I believe that for the United States and Russia to live together in peace is the most important single problem facing the world today." Regardless of what one may think of Wallace and his views, most of us probably would agree that the problem he mentioned is one of the most important, if not the most important, of our times.

In his statement requesting Wallace's resignation, President Truman declared that the problem of maintaining the peace was the most vital one confronting us. He simply disagreed with Wallace, at least publicly, as to the best method of promoting it. What has Christianity to offer on this subject, and what stand do our ministers take?

Here Is the Writer . . .

Robert Brackenbury was born in Des Moines, Iowa. He attended Graceland from 1935 to 1937 and, quite in keeping with said college's reputation, fell in love. It was not until 1943, however, that Opal White consented to become Mrs. R. Brackenbury. After leaving Graceland, Bob attended the University of Chicago, receiving his B.A. and M.A. degrees in 1939.

The following three years he taught social studies in Iowa schools. Then came the war. He went into service and spent twenty-eight months overseas. Since his release from active duty, he has been at the University of Chicago, working for a Ph.D. in education.

There are many other vital and urgent problems which confront our world today, problems which we cannot avoid solving in one way or another. The so-called "race problem," the "labor problem," inflation, and full employment are but a few of the many problems we have with us. We cannot escape them by turning away, for by such action we commit ourselves. What, then, is the Christian answer to these problems?

In vain have I attended the services of our church, seeking light on these matters. During the war and since I have had the opportunity of attending services, both in our church and in others, in many parts of our country and abroad. I have listened to many sermons upon issues such as those mentioned above. With but one exception, however, they were all delivered by ministers of churches other than my own. I have heard our ministers preach on drinking, miracles, baptism, and various phases of church doctrine.

Those members of our priesthood whom I have questioned concerning the subjects of their sermons have invariably given me one or more of the following reasons for not speaking on what I believe to be the vital issues of our times: (1) they did not believe the issues or problems I have mentioned to be the most vital ones, (2) they did not think Christianity offered much in the way of solutions to these problems, or (3) they felt that the church should not get involved in "politics."

None of these answers seem acceptable to me, for I fail to see how our church can hope to fulfill its obligation to God or to its members so long as it avoids those very issues and problems which are of most concern to all of us. Let us examine each of these answers separately.

We need not take Wallace's or Truman's word that the problem of peace is the most vital one that confronts the world today. We need only follow the daily newspapers for a short time to be convinced of its importance. Surely the frequency with which peace and the other issues mentioned above claim the headlines should lead our ministers to suspect that there might be subjects more suitable for sermons than drinking, miracles, baptism, and church doctrine. Why then do the latter claim the attention of our preachers? There may be several reasons.

It may be that our ministers are simply not well enough informed on current affairs to speak on them intelligently. It may be that some of them feel it is still necessary to "justify" our church to the world and hence speak of miracles and doctrine in the attempt to "prove" that we are "the" church. Or it may be that we have a "negative" approach to Christianity. This latter seems to me to be the best explanation.

One might believe from listening to many of our preachers that a person could be a good Christian simply by not drinking, not smoking, and not dancing. Surely there is little in the life of Christ to support such a viewpoint. Christ did not teach a negative doctrine. Whereas the Ten Commandments might be considered negative in that most of them read "Thou shalt not . . .," Christ taught "Thou shalt love the Lord . . . and Thou shalt love thy neighbor . . ." To refrain from doing evil was not enough to assure one his salvation, according to Christ.

Let us next consider whether the teachings of Christ do offer any solutions to the real problems which face us as a nation. It is true that Christ was primarily interested in teaching us how to live as individuals. But is there any reason to assume that the principles he advanced for individual or personal conduct are invalid when applied to the conduct of one nation towards another? I think not.

Nations are, after all, but collections of individuals. Who can say that the Golden Rule will not work as a basis of national conduct? Certainly we have never tried it. As a nation we have long paid lip-service to the proposition of "no taxation without representation," yet for years we have ruled Puerto Rico and

Charles V. Graham
Discusses—

The Trouble-Shooter

Marriage for the Young Isolated Saint

"Conference, reunion, and various seasonal church activities fill an important place in the social needs of the younger church membership, but there are those who by reason of occupation or responsibility are not able to attend.

"It may be that all communities are not alike. Here the social menu largely is dancing and card parties. I do not take part in these, and yet, as it is considered necessary to have some recreational pursuit, the situation puzzles me.

"In the thirties (1930's), one brave writer in a church paper, speaking of the economically frustrated social needs of that generation (being financially unable to marry and establish homes of their own), wrote something like this: 'These things, the need for companionship, feeling, emotion, and the assurance of affection returned, are just as real as are material things.' I feel there is a large measure of truth in this assertion."

Saint's letter. It is a problem which faces a great many of our church young people. And it is not easily answered, for it rests so much upon the faith and strength of the individual.)

This question will be approached in relation to Doctrine and Covenants 111: 1, last phrase.

This section on marriage relations (1) is not a revelation; (2) it was not written by the president of the church, but by W. W. Phelps, (3) was presented to the general assembly of August 17, 1835, and adopted unanimously by that assembly; it was ordered to be printed in the 1835 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants. It has been retained in every edition published by the Reorganization. (4) This revelation, accepted by the church for over one hundred and eleven years, and retained in every edition of the Doctrine and Covenants published by the Reorganization, has become both the spiritual and the moral standard of the church in relation to marriage.

As one studies this section on marriage, especially the first paragraph concerning the "weak in the faith," referring to those who marry out of the church, he finds much wisdom in the statement and much room for serious thought and scrutiny.

We would say that in the center place, in stakes with branches in close proximity with each other, and in exceptionally large branches where there is ample opportunity to meet and associate with young people of the opposite sex, a person easily might be considered weak in the faith if he found companionship elsewhere and married outside the church.

It is highly probable that the above statement was prepared specifically for those who lived in localities where large groups of our people associated in their church life together.

It is rather hard to believe that under all circumstances a person would be considered weak in the faith if he married outside the church. The young isolated Saint in many cases would never marry if he had to wait for someone in the church. God never intended that normal human beings should go through life without the experience and companionship of the opposite sex. In the very nature of God's creation and purposes in us, it is intended that man should seek companionship, marry, and multiply. Genesis 1: 27 and 28 reveals this fact: "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he them. . . . And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it." In the light of this scriptural statement and in conjunction with man's God-given instincts, it is not only natural for the sexes to seek companionship with each other, but also to marry and multiply.

It is a known fact that the sex drive is one of the most potent instincts with which man is endowed. God, therefore, being desirous that this natural impulse be used to glorify him and his creation, advised (Genesis 2: 18): "It is not good that man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him." For man to fulfill this responsibility, God further said (Genesis 2: 24): "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh."

The Apostle Paul said on one occasion, "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons." If this statement be true, and we have reason to believe it is, all young people, isolated or otherwise, are expected to seek companionship and association with other young people.

It is the writer's opinion, as a result of personal observation, that one could marry in the church and still be weak in the faith. There are all kinds of people in the church, and just to associate with and marry someone in the church neither guarantees proper social and personal relationships nor a happy and successful married life.

A young person with high moral and spiritual standards, active and interested in the church, could easily associate with and marry a young person in the church who had low moral standards and was uninterested in the church. This association might ruin the life and contribution of the devoted partner to the church. Hence this person could be considered "weak in the faith."

President Edwards in his Commentary on the Doctrine and Covenants has this to say about section 111: 1: "A young man or young woman living in a small branch and isolated from other church contacts can hardly be expected to refuse all suitors who are not church members." We are led to say, then, that a young isolated Saint should associate with other young people in his community, and if the proper suitor is agreed upon, the marriage should be consummated. However, the isolated youth has a responsibility to himself and the church to be sure he seeks his companionship in the best places possible and among the best people of the community. I would advise going to other churches in your community and associating with persons of like standards but be sure and not hide your church affiliation, beliefs, and standards "under a bushel." Keep your own standards high, then should you find a close companion, he or she will be attracted to your high qualities of Christian-living.

The Apostle Paul said on another occasion (II Corinthians 6: 14), "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?" In lieu of this statement, one must be careful with whom he associates, whether isolated or in a central place.

Man, being a gregarious person, normally associates with people. He becomes, to a great extent, like those with whom he associates. Thus it is very important that we wisely choose our associates if we expect to grow in the likeness of our Maker and assist in building his kingdom.

For a young person to grow up in the fullness of life, he must develop his physical, spiritual, mental, moral, and social capacities. To do this, time and attention must be given to these aspects of life. A young person must associate with others in these fields. He can, to a great extent, choose where he will go to satisfy these needs, and he can choose carefully the best in his limited circle of surroundings for his close friends.

Remember, we are all stewards over our time, talents, money, and possessions. Therefore, we must be careful in our selection of social activities by being sure we engage in the best and highest type afforded us in our communities. As a church member you have the responsibility of doing all within your power to attend the stake, district, and branch activities, district conferences, reunions, and other young people's activities that are sponsored for you by the general, district, and branch officers.

Let us keep in mind that the period in the life of a youth in which dancing, card-playing, and other worldly activities are great temptations is reasonably short in comparison to the total span of life.

This being true, a young person should be all the more careful to discipline himself rather severely so that he does nothing that may mar the long fruitful years of his life. Life being as complex and as difficult as it is today, one would be exceptionally wise to carefully and prayerfully choose his friends, his social activities, and above all, the one who is to be his life companion.

Finally, keep always foremost in your mind that you belong to Christ's church, that he needs your assistance now. This assistance should be the very best in intelligence, character, and ability that you possess. Nothing less than this is acceptable to Christ. You are the zenith of God's creation. He gave his all for you. You are able to give your all in return for his great love and abundant blessings when you grow into maturity with a clean life of purpose behind you.

The best source of help in guiding you in your selection of social activities, friends, and even in wedlock, is Jesus Christ through his church. Give your youthful problems serious thought and consideration and fail not to go to God in prayer for council and advice. By so doing your errors in life will be minimized, your character will be strengthened, your problems will melt away, and you will become strong in the faith and service of God and his church.

Who can say what might result if instead of denouncing imperialism we first abolished our own? Many might expect the result to be national suicide, but then do not most people consider it personal suicide to live by the Golden Rule? Christ never claimed to teach the easy or even the safe way of life. He taught merely the abundant way of life.

Do the teachings of Christ contain anything that might help us solve the "race problem"? I believe that they do. Christ said, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." We might then ask whether the Negro, the Jap, or the Jew is our neighbor. St. Luke tells us that a certain lawyer asked Jesus the same question: namely, "Who is my neighbor?"

Jesus answered with the story of the Good Samaritan. We have only to remember that to the Jews the Samaritans were the most despised of all people. Thus Christ tells us that all human beings are our neighbors, and he commands us to love them as ourselves. I regret to state, however, that I have attended more than one branch of our church where the Negro has not been made welcome.

The question of whether the church should get involved in "politics" has many sides. I doubt anyone would advocate the church drawing up a political platform and promoting its own candidates. However, it does not follow that the church should not take a stand on issues that are termed "political."

I have mentioned already the fact that ministers of other churches comment upon current affairs and still seem to escape the label "partisan." The local newspaper to which I subscribe almost daily features articles in which noted religious leaders or organizations take a stand on current issues. "Methodists Urge Recall of U. S. Troops From China" and "Rabbi Stephen S. Wise Links Church to Peace" are the headlines of two recent articles. In both articles a definite stand was taken upon a controversial issue.

Not all agree upon the interpretation of Christ's teachings. I am sure many good Christians would not accept mine. But possible disagreements should not prevent us from attempting to seek light on current problems in the teachings of Christ. And whenever the latter unmistakably indicate the stand we should take or the policy we should follow, we ought to be courageous enough to declare ourselves.

I do not believe we should be too concerned with the matter of avoiding "politics." Christ often has been erroneously portrayed as a mild and meek individual. It was no mild, meek individual who drove the money-changers out of the temple. It was a militant leader who demanded a militant following. Christ did not avoid "politics." In fact, he got himself very much entangled in the politics and with the politicians of his day. And those who consider he made a mistake to do so fail to see his real greatness. For Christ not only taught us the way but by his very life and death showed us the way.

Thus it seems to me that the least we can do is to apply his teachings to those problems and issues which we face as a nation as well as individuals. This calls for a people who seek answers to their problems in the teachings of Christ, and who demand from their church leaders help in their search. It calls for a ministry sensitive to the problems of the times, enlightened upon the teachings of Christ, and unafraid to take a stand upon controversial issues.

Return of Gold Star Heroes

Several hundred clergymen already have procured free copies of the informational booklet on repatriation, "Return of Our Gold Star Heroes," but the National Selected Morticians, Inc., 520 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago, which published it, has announced that more copies are available.

The booklet was designed as a guide to the public in considering the repatriation of the remains of those who died or were killed overseas during World War II. More than 100,000 copies have been distributed free to the public by morticians, veterans' organizations, the N.S.M., and other groups, and individuals. Distribution of the booklet for profit is prohibited.

"Return of Our Gold Star Heroes" is furnished in bulk lots at cost of printing by N.S.M., but single copies are mailed without charge to clergymen, Gold Star families, and others upon request. The booklet was published purely as a public relations gesture for the entire field of funeral service, according to W. M. Krieger, executive secretary of N.S.M., and nowhere does it either encourage or disparage repatriation.

"Return of Our Gold Star Heroes" answers the questions most frequently asked about repatriation," Krieger said. "Many clergymen have found it to be of great help in counseling those seeking their advice and guidance. We would like to place it in the hands of every minister and Gold Star family."

Southeastern Illinois District Conference

The Southeastern Illinois District Conference will be held at Mt. Vernon, 20th Street and Casey Avenue, on Sunday, November 10. Apostle Arthur Oakman and Seventy Z. Z. Renfroe are to be in attendance. The day's activities will include a prayer service at 9:30 a.m.; preaching at 11; basket dinner in the church basement at noon; and a business meeting at 2 p.m., at which time district officers and delegates to General Conference will be elected. All reports should be sent to District President M. E. Louny, 1304 Main Street, or Ruby Ellis, district secretary, 519 South 12th Street, Mt. Vernon, Illinois.

RUBY ELLIS,
District Secretary.

Births

Mr. and Mrs. Orville Bair of Springfield, Missouri, announce the birth of a son, Stephen Howard, born September 20.

A daughter, Nancy Lee, was born to Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Latham, Jr., of Gaspee Plateau, Rhode Island, on September 21. Mrs. Latham is the former Doris Salibury of Auburn.

Our Departed Ones

BROWN.—Mary Gladys, wife of George E. Brown, passed away September 23 after a long illness. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church for many years, and attended Central Congregation in Detroit.

She is survived by her husband; two sons: Frederick and William Brown; and three daughters: Mrs. Lucille Neeve, Mrs. Shirley Ritter, and Arlene Brown. Elders Warren H. Chelline and W. Blair McClain were in charge of the funeral service; interment was in White Chapel Memorial Park.

WALBYE.—Neva Stewart, was born April 9, 1929, at Norfolk, Nebraska, and died September 12, 1946, from injuries received in an automobile accident. She was the adopted daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Roy Stewart of Page, Nebraska. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church at the age of ten. On July 19, 1946, she was married to Erling Walbye of Rawlins, Wyoming, and resided there until her death.

She is survived by her husband, parents, and grandparents. Services were held at the McKelvey Funeral Home, the Reverend F. F. Kraft officiating. Burial was in the Rawlins cemetery.

TURNER.—Charles E., was born August 28, 1875, in Freeport, Pennsylvania, and passed away at his home in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on September 23, 1946. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on February 12, 1885.

He leaves to mourn one sister, Mrs. T. A. Dershimer, also of Pittsburgh. Funeral services were conducted by Elders E. B. Hull and Henry Winship at the Beinhauer Funeral Home. Interment was in the South Side Cemetery at Pittsburgh.

GUSS.—Arthur H., was killed in an accident September 6 on Saipan. He had been a civilian employee of the United States Government for the past three years; in addition to his work in the States, he also spent a year in Panama and South America, and a year in Oporta, Portugal, and North Africa. He had gone to Saipan only a month before his death. He lived for ten years in Lamoni, Iowa, going from there to the O'Reilly Hospital in Springfield, Missouri, before being sent overseas.

He is survived by his mother, Anna Guss, of Springfield. Funeral services were conducted Sunday, October 13, at the Reorganized Church in Springfield.

HICKLIN.—W. T., son of Mr. and Mrs. George Hicklin, was born July 14, 1861, at Slate Hill, England. He came to America as a child with his parents, settling in Bellville, Illinois, where he was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in 1875. He was married in 1881 to Ruth Davis at Bevier, Missouri; five sons were born to this union, two of whom preceded their father in death. Mrs. Hicklin passed away eleven years ago. Mr. Hicklin was ordained a deacon, which office he held until his death on October 1, 1946, at the Samaritan Hospital in Macon, Missouri.

He is survived by his three sons: James of Canton, Illinois; W. T., Jr., of Lockport, Illinois; and Roy of St. Louis, Missouri; a brother, George, of Kansas City, Kansas; and three grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church, Elders B. S. Tanner and F. T. Mussell officiating.

CURTIS.—Harrison M., son of G. B. and A. Phoebe Curtis, was born August 18, 1888, at Kibbie, Illinois, and died September 3, 1946, at Indio, California. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church in 1908, was ordained a priest, in 1917, and an elder in 1918.

He is survived by his wife, Maud O.; six sons: Harold M., Nephi C., Stenard, Stanley L., L. Paul, and James E.; three brothers; one sister; and four grandchildren. Burial was in the Mound Grove Cemetery.

WILDEY.—Cora E., was born August 18, 1891, in Huron County, Michigan, and passed away October 9, 1946, at her home in Des Moines, Iowa. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on May 25, 1902, and was married to Robert Wildey in June, 1914. In 1927 she moved to Des Moines, where she taught in the public schools until the time of her death.

She is survived by three daughters: Merle Ferris, Madison, Wisconsin; Carol Kellogg, Des Moines; and Lois Van Fleet, Denver, Colorado; a sister, Mrs. Ella Lambkin, Holden, Missouri; and five grandchildren.

THOMAS.—Myra E., was born at Neola, Iowa, on October 16, 1898, and passed away unexpectedly at her home in Council Bluffs, Iowa, on October 9, 1946. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on August 22, 1917; she was active in the Harmony Group of the women's department, and served her church in many other ways. She was a cosmetologist and a member of the Iowa Hairdressers' Association.

Surviving are two brothers: A. L. and Kenneth Thomas, Neola, Iowa; four sisters: Mrs. Elmer Calder and Mrs. Lawrence Ferguson, Council Bluffs; Mrs. William Sutherland, Long Beach, California; and Mrs. C. W. Cofelt, Logan, Iowa. Services were held at the Woodring Funeral Home. Elders V. D. Ruch and Charles F. Putnam officiating. Interment was in Grange Cemetery near Council Bluffs.

A young people's retreat was held September 5, 6, and 7 at Coronet Bay. This camp is located in the foothills of Puget Sound and offers mountain climbing, hiking, swimming, and boating as recreational features. Following the worship service on Saturday morning, the group was divided into two classes. The boys, under the leadership of Alma Johnson, discussed "Enlisting Divine Aid in Choosing a Life Work." The girls, with Wana McDole as teacher, discussed "Problems of Girls Making Right Choices." The next class period was a round-table discussion on League Problems; Clark Davis, district president of Zion's League, and Ken Sheffer, district director of religious education, were the mediators. The afternoon was devoted to sports. A barbecued salmon dinner was served in the evening by the outdoor fireplace; evensong was the final feature of the day. On Sunday morning, after the worship service, a general summary of classes was given by Granville Swenson. District President Alma Johnson gave the final sermon of the retreat.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Pastor, Carl E. Muir

A farewell party was given for Elder and Mrs. Charles V. Graham before they left for Independence. A program was presented, and a banquet served by the women's department. A group of Saints was at the station to bid the Grahams Godspeed on the following afternoon when they left. Elder Carl Muir, his wife, and three sons arrived October 1; Elder Muir was installed as pastor on October 3, with President F. Henry Edwards and Apostle George G. Lewis in charge of the service. A reception was held in the church basement following the installation service.

The district priesthood institute was held October 5 and 6 in Philadelphia. Classes were conducted by President Edwards, Apostle Lewis, and Bishop Chesworth on Saturday and Sunday. The number of attendants at the Communion service was greater than the seating capacity of the church. Meals were served in the lower auditorium by the women's department during the institute. An installation service for all new officers was held on the evening of October 13. Priest Charles Thurman, young people's leader, has joined the Army, receiving a rating of first lieutenant in the veterinarian corps. He was also teacher for the intermediate boys' class.

Savanna, Illinois

Pastor, Howard Grayless

Kyle and Wayne Welch, Edna Troester, Donny Marken, Ed and Eldora Sweeny were baptized recently; confirmation services were held in the church with Elders C. A. Biel and Howard Grayless officiating. League officers elected to serve the coming year are Merle Welch, president; Marjorie Grayless, vice president; Ione Sartwell, secretary-treasurer. Rosemary Jessen and Wilma Phillips are co-chairmen of the program committee; Edna Troester and Gerald Sartwell are in charge of recreation. Lucille Sweeney is young people's supervisor. One member of the League, Wilbur Sartwell, is attending Graceland College. Officers in the women's department are Myrtle Grayless, president; Iva Welch, vice-president; and Lucille Sweeney, secretary-treasurer. Meetings are held every other week in the various homes. Beginning with October, family night is to be held once a month.

Morgantown, West Virginia

Pastor, James L. Jeffries

District President R. E. Rodgers, Samuel Martin of Wheeling, and Samuel Zonker of Wellsburg were present on September 8. A business meeting was conducted, and the following officers were elected: James Jeffries, pastor; Harry Joseph, church school superintendent; Sister Shirley, clerk and treasurer; Bertha Kinney, women's leader; Mary Jeffries, young people's supervisor; Ramah Shirley, publicity agent; and Sister Joseph, cradle roll supervisor. A building committee was also appointed. For some time services have been held in the Joseph home, but plans are being made to establish a public place of worship. The women meet every other week. One hour is spent in worship and study; the rest of the time is devoted to planning projects to raise money. The members of Morgantown congregation mourn the passing of Juanita Ayersman, who died September 2.

The Saints' Herald is the official publication of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, with headquarters at The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, and is issued through the offices of Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage Street, Independence, Missouri.

Entered as second-class matter at the post office at Independence, Missouri, under Act of March 3, 1879. Issued weekly at Independence, Missouri. Price $2.25 per year and $1.15 for six months in advance in the U. S. A., its territories and possessions; Canada $2.50 per year and $1.30 for six months; other countries, $3.25 per year. Notice of a change of address must be given three weeks ahead of the date that it is to become effective. Accepted for mailing at the special rate of postage provided for in section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized July 21, 1921. Printed in the United States of America.

All checks for subscriptions to church papers, or for books and other materials sold at the Church Bookstore, should be made payable to Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

Suggestions to writers: Typewritten scripts, double-spaced, are preferred. Keep carbon copies to protect against loss. All articles and letters should be signed by writers. Please avoid use of post cards. News letters should be signed, approved by pastors, and should concern only church activities and workers. We find it necessary to edit most articles, and to condense news. No charge is made for one printing of the usual announcements of church meetings, births, marriages, and deaths; no memorial verse is used. Bulletin Board notices should be in our office at least ten days before date of publication. We cannot accept commercial or personal advertising. Articles for publication are gladly received, but there is no provision to pay for them. Those that relate to church work, doctrine, general cultural and educational subjects, personal development, etc., will be considered on basis of contents and literary merit. Writers should feel free to make independent presentations of their views, but should avoid criticism of the work of other writers appearing in these columns.

Letters: All letters and money for subscriptions and books should be addressed to Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage, Independence, Missouri. Articles and letters for publication should be sent to the same address, and marked "The Editors." Letters for all general church offices should be sent to The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Checks or Money Orders for contributions made to the General Church should be issued in the name of the Solicitor, Bishop's Agent, or Bishop in the district or stake in which the contributor lives.

If circumstances or conditions are such that it is more convenient to send contribution direct, Money Orders or checks should be issued in favor of The Presiding Bishopric, and mailed to The Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

This includes contributions for tithing, surplus, offering, oblation, Christmas offering, Auditorium, College Day, and The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

* AUTUMN

Autumn is the old age of the seasons. It is nature's last fling of glory before the long and deathlike sleep of winter. Combine the brilliance of sunset with the red and yellow beauty of the leaves, and you have something almost too lovely, too poignant, for the heart to bear. . . . There is a turquoise sky edged in flaming golden clouds, and the magic crescent of a new moon riding high in the west. The wind buffets the trees, warning them to drop their summer finery, and sweeps the leaves along the ground with impatient, gusty motions, toward little unmarked graves. At such moments, one stands in awe of some invisible power, of a universe too great to understand, and of fate hovering somewhere around; one feels moving closer to him that day when his leaf, too, will fall back to the earth from whence it was drawn by the sun.

* THIS FRIENDLY WORLD

The Editor's office opens its door into the bookstore, so is accessible to all who come. Among the more charming visitors are the small toddlers who escape from their mothers a few moments to go on good-will tours of their own, until recaptured again.

How lovely is a small child's assumption that all the world is friendly. His usual greeting is "Hi!" He takes a frank and ingenuous interest in everybody. Like God, he is no respecter of persons; he has not learned the snobbery of fine clothes, and he sees in every man or woman only a kindred human being. The tiny ones seldom have much to say, except in the silent communication of the eyes which they understand so well. Cordial acquaintance—even ephemeral friendship—is briefly lighted up. While things are still going well, and before any misunderstanding can develop, mother arrives to carry off her small ambassador.

* THE COVER PICTURE

The original of the cover picture for this week was a 16 mm. Kodachrome shot taken by Glenn Cargyle while he was on the vacation described in "Over the Pathways of Yesteryear." After arriving at home here, he enlarged it to accompany the article. It seemed beautiful and artistic to us, softening the sharp detail of ordinary camera work, and emphasizing a spiritual quality and an atmosphere we would like to share with our readers.

* NOBODY knows how many good housekeepers spent an afternoon baking cookies to have something on hand for Halloween when small spooks clad in motley garments and hidden behind masks would come to visit and say, "Tricks or treats!" At the same time, papa was looking up a club for the big hooligans who smash fences, carry off property, and commit general destruction.

* UNCLE JOE has never liked fiction. Somebody persuaded him to try a detective story, and he began plodding patiently through it, his matter-of-fact mind trying to catch a new viewpoint. After a while he threw the magazine down in disgust and exclaimed, "It's a lie! This story says that detective clipped off the top of a soft-boiled egg with one stroke of his knife, and didn't mash it. I've been trying to do that for ten years and never did it yet. I don't believe he could do it, either."

* THEY SAY that people are counting their dollars again instead of pitching them around like hay. Is it a sign we are returning to sanity?

The Personal Factor

Trouble With People

This editorial is addressed to somebody with a troubled heart. It may be you. Possibly you have been having difficulty with the personal factor. A lot of good people do.

Everywhere in life you must meet the personal factor, the great variety and character of individual differences that exist in men, women, and children—people of all classes, kinds, and conditions. Clashes of desire and will occur in the most carefully selected of circles and threaten to disrupt them. Homes are broken, churches are sometimes disrupted, great causes suffer, and the kingdom of God itself is retarded by these personal differences. Why must they exist? Why cannot we achieve uniformity in thought and desire? Why can't we be one in mind and purpose? This is a mystery we cannot solve, but it is also a situation we can understand and accept. We must understand and accept it if we are to get along.

Jesus said that "the kingdom of heaven is like unto a net, that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind." We must assume that it gathered every kind of good people as well as a considerable variety of bad ones. There is virtue in variety, even for a fisherman. He may like codfish very well; but he would not be willing to settle for cod all the rest of his life, eliminating forever the satisfaction to be found in halibut, haddock, swordfish, and a lot of others.

A Key to Good and Evil

In a way, most of the troubles and problems of the world arise not out of natural conditions, but out of the personal factor. A person's attitudes and prejudices, his fears and hates, his likes and dislikes, his limitations of knowledge, understanding, and perception—all these and many more things affect not only his happiness and success, but also the happiness and welfare of others.

But if the personal factor gives us our problems, it also gives us the great variety of contributions that come from many kinds of people. That is why the state or organization in which only one man dares to think or speak is doomed to sterility and destruction. No one person can have all the good ideas. A state built upon the passions and limitations of any one man is bound to be a monstrosity in the fields where his lacks are the most noted. The kingdom of hell is built upon the limitations and intolerance of a single will. The kingdom of heaven may be built upon the contributions of everybody to the common good. That is one of the reasons why Christ cared for the individual, his freedom, his dignity, his honor.

It is when we are unwilling to make adjustments to other people, or when they are unwilling to make adjustments to us, that trouble occurs. If all will make adjustments, trouble can be avoided. We must also consider the necessity of making adjustments not only to each other, but also to the truth.

Close and Distant Views

We can see great things in due proportion only from a distance. Galaxies of stars require millions of light years of space to be observed by the astronomer. Mountains and sunrises call for a few miles of distance to be seen in their beauty. Details are good, but must sometimes be forgotten to observe the whole. It is so with human character and the personal factor. It takes some capacity in the observer to be conscious of the perspective and the distant view while living up close to a thing or a person.

Coming into Kansas City from the west on U. S. 40 any bright afternoon, when the sun is at the traveler's back and reveals the landscape most clearly, the traveler may see a magnificent view of the city if he will look up at it. There upon the historic crest of the bluffs that overlook the junction of the two rivers, the Missouri and the Kaw, a group of tall buildings rise to a majestic height. It is like something out of a picture book; more beautiful than if the architects had tried to plan it so, producing some civic monstrosity instead. Too bad that no artist has immortalized it in paint, no camera has recorded it for all to see. How significant that one of the best things in Missouri can be seen only from the soil of Kansas.

But as the traveler draws near and crosses the viaduct over the Kaw, he sees below a confusing clutter of little buildings, random, sooted, and dusty, with fading paint and untidy streets. Here in the bottoms are the businesses that make those tall spires of modern commerce possible. The roots of beauty grow in drab and ugly things. It requires in the traveler the mind to look up and to remember, not to be confused nor to have his vision obscured by the petty detail of little things.

In fact, if the traveler will look closely at those little buildings, he will find many examples of a humbler kind of beauty; he will observe that the dust of the city which gets into his eyes may also be hiding many a fine bit of work, many a small detail of excellence, many a cameo and miniature of inspiration and artistic skill.

Appreciating the Person

This has been a long and tedious illustration. But if it serves the

Did God Mean Hot?

A disputed point in the Word of Wisdom clearly explained

By Apostle D. T. Williams

AT ONE TIME I remarked to one of our general church appointees that we sometimes act very unwisely about the "Word of Wisdom." Then, to his question as to what I meant by such a statement, I asserted, "So many people who profess to be special friends of this particular revelation seem desirous of putting a strangle hold on anyone who does not interpret the manifestation in the same manner as they do."

In fact, their number is legion who place a stricter interpretation on this revelation than the God who gave it. To some it seems to mean nothing that the Almighty said in this section that it was "not by commandment nor by constraint." Almost every writer I have read after, who wished to inflict his particular theory on his fellow Saints, goes all-out to prove that God did not mean what he said in this instance, or seeks to explain it away so effectively as to practically eliminate its clearly expressed intent.

A few years ago one of our friends remarked, "So President Roosevelt has taken rationing from coffee! And now if he could remove the curse placed on it by the Word of Wisdom, a lot of Latter Day Sinners would indulge in their favorite poison with easier conscience. However, a lot of us will continue to stay with Postum; it may be lacking in kick, aroma and glamour, but it does not give us the twitters nor bother our nerves when the fun is over."

Why should an attitude such as this be assumed and expressed when they who are so accused are breaking no "commandment" nor evading any "constraint?" Why should men seek to impose their self-invented restraints on their fellow men in that thing in which God has declared them free? It is such as this which causes us to wonder why we use so little wisdom about the "Word of Wisdom."

It is impossible to get through to a mind which insists on its own particular brand of logic when any other idea is presented calling in question its particular theory. But may we be privileged to point out that the "Word of Wisdom" does not place a "curse" on coffee, nor for that matter, on tea. One would think that people who insist on naming these names as though they were in the written word of God's revelation would read first what the Word says, or have they, and still persist in misquoting the revelation?

Some say that coffee and tea must have been in the mind of God for did not Hyrum Smith say so? I might ask what right has anyone to add to the revelation of the Almighty? Did not the great God of heaven have a vocabulary as large as Brother Hyrum's, or, for that matter, as efficient as any one of ours? Did God run out of words so that he could not say what he meant to convey? Did he fail of expression at this vital point? The answer is self-evident. God was still able to express his own mind and when he did express it, he did not say "tea and coffee." He said "hot drinks." To quote the revelation: "Hot drinks are not for the body nor for the belly" (Doctrine and Covenants 86: 1). This is true whether the drink is hot Postum or hot coffee.

Now, why did our Father in heaven put the matter in this manner? It seems to me that the answer is easy of comprehension. Being a farseeing God he looked down the years and saw hot Postum, hot chocolate, hot cocoa, hot barley, and even hot water, etc., coming. If God had wanted to put the "curse" on coffee or tea, he knew their names, but he evidently had something in mind of even greater importance, for he made it all-inclusive with "hot drinks."

How farseeing, indeed, is the God who gave the Word of Wisdom. It would not be wise to catalogue all such drinks, so God summed them all up under the simple words, easy of definition, "hot drinks." But should we be so fanatical as to say that water is not good for us to drink when it is cold because God says not to drink it hot, or that a cup of warm Postum would not be good to drink on a cold morning? It is evident that the Lord was talking about heat—temperature, not ingredients. When he talked of ingredients, he talked of "strong drink." Why do we "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel"? It has been made clear by medical science that hot drinks of whatever nature or ingredient are not good for man. Some years ago the famous Mayo doctors of Rochester, Minnesota, asserted that it seemed probable that much of the cancer of the stomach afflicting the people of the world was brought on by hot drinks. If medical science is to be listened to, it might be well that we take such a statement as this into account. Is it not possible that God was ahead of our medical science by almost one hundred years?

We have had a lot of needless contention in our church over this matter, only because we try to put in God's mouth what he did not say. As long as we insist on doing this, we will always have trouble. What if some men have tried to tell us what God meant by what he said, is it not more important to know what he, God, said, and do that?

Some have gone so far that they will not drink ice tea, because they have been led to believe that drinking ice tea is contrary to the Word of Wisdom. We do not mean to condemn such good and wholesome people, who might have been misled, but we pray them to consider that the revelation has not one word on cold drinks, but on hot and strong drinks. Are we not better off sticking closely to the Word of God rather than to some other person's interpretation of that Word, especially, when the word is so plain and so simple, "that a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein"?

Of course, no one can blame another for presenting his theories of health, especially, when such a one feels that many may be permanently injured if they are not warned of the destructive elements with which they deal. Therefore, if one believes that in tea and coffee there is lurking a deadly poison which may afflict for life the user, he is justified in issuing his warning. But let not such a one quote the Word of God to substantiate his claim when there is nothing of substance to justify it.

A young man said to the writer one day: "What does it mean in the Doctrine and Covenants where it says not to drink hot drinks?" I replied, "Why not believe that it means what it says?" There is no attempt in the Word of Wisdom to use imagery or figures of speech. If such were the case, we might be justified in asserting that God meant something other than what he said. But the language is too plain for misconstruing, if we are inclined to accept God at his word. "Hot" is hot, and "strong" is strong. Why labor to complicate what the Lord has said.

All of this is not to say that tea and coffee, even when taken warm—not hot—are good for every person. These are mild stimulants, and when taken moderately might be good for some, while to others of weak hearts, they may prove harmful. I have not attempted to say that either of these is good for us. I think in most instances we will be better off without them. I have only endeavored to point out that these, when taken in any other form than "hot," are not condemned in the Word of Wisdom. What you do about this is a matter between you and your conscience, and between you and your doctor.

NOW I KNOW

By Norma Anne Kirkendall

"If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him."—James 1: 5-7.

A young lad believed those words and retired to the Sacred Grove to seek light as to the choice he should make concerning church membership. A wondrous thing then occurred, for two personages were then to appear and command him to "go not after them" (meaning the dissenting churches) and promising young Joseph that the fullness of the gospel should be made known to him at some future time. (Story of the Church, page 26.) Quite a wonderful experience—for such a heavenly vision certainly does not come to all, and yet, notice that this vision was only the beginning of a long series of events which so shaped the life of Joseph Smith that he eventually died a martyr to the cause of re-establishing Christ's church upon this earth. That one first vision was not his final or complete proof of the truth of the gospel.

Recently I had a long talk with a young man who has belonged to the church for a number of years. He is thoroughly sold on the doctrines and program and is admirably living up to the laws of the church. Yet, a short time ago he turned down a call to the priesthood, for he felt that he had no proof of his call. In fact he told me, that, although he knew the church to be true, he had never received any proof of its truth other than a strong personal conviction. He pointed out that many people had received visions, visitations, miraculous healings, or one of a number of other spectacular proofs either before or after their baptism, but he had received no such thing for his baptism, nor his call to the priesthood. As far as he knows, nothing but his own intelligence is the motivation for his sticking.

Now I might say that "the glory of God is intelligence, or, in other words, light and truth" (Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6), but a mere repetition of those words is not an adequate explanation. Then I began to wonder—just what does constitute adequate proof of the truth of the gospel; and the allied question—just what is an adequate proof of a call to the priesthood. And the whole subject is far deeper than it appears at first glance. Mere platitudes and quoting of Scripture is not a sufficient answer. I reviewed my own experiences and those of historical and modern men in search of a convincing answer.

In 1829, three young men were told to "Ask the Father in my name, in faith believing that you shall receive, and you shall have the Holy Ghost which manifesteth all things, which is expedient unto the children of men" (Doctrine and Covenants 16: 4). And those same three witnesses to the establishment of the church in these latter days were blessed. This passage has often been quoted as standard procedure—"ask and you shall receive"—but it's not quite that simple.

Some people have received without asking, for the simple reason that they were sincere in their efforts to worship God. Some of these receptions were spectacular. The oft-repeated story of the conversion of the rebellious Saul to the missionary Paul is an example of a proof so positive that no man could deny that the experience was from God. This experience was so forceful that hundreds were brought into the church through a vicarious enjoyment of that same vision. Certainly not all of Paul's converts received such positive proof as did Paul.

One of the earliest "proofs positive" was given to Abraham whose faith in God's truth was so strong that he was willing to sacrifice his son if needs be, to fulfill what he believed to be God's wish. Few people have seen a burning bush as did Moses, but all of us have at some time or other felt ourselves on "holy ground." Nor has God provided many of his children with a "cloud by day" or "a pillar of fire by night," but we have been conscious of his protection and guidance in our daily affairs. Thus we, too, experience vicariously these same visions of the men of old.

The disciples were worried when Jesus left, for they knew that when his presence was no longer with them that much of the spirit and part of their visible proof in the cause would be lost to them. But they were told that, "He shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth."—John 14: 16. Later came the day of Pentecost, a soul-shaking experience.

But will this comforter always come in such a spectacular fashion? Does a man always know the exact moment of its arrival, or is it an infiltration of understanding? Again I searched my own experiences.

When I was about five years of age, I had a queer and wonderful thing to occur. My parents had taught me to pray my own thoughts and my own words. I already believed in the literal existence of a God and Christ, and that my prayers were only a method of talking to them. One evening I knelt beside my bed and prayed, as was my habit. I don't remember the whole prayer, but I do recall one phrase—for I said, "Dear Jesus, I love you." Then—a clear, sweet voice spoke to me and said, "And, Norma Anne, I love you, too." No one will ever persuade me otherwise than that I heard the audible voice of Jesus Christ speaking and actually calling me by name. Small wonder that I could hardly wait until the arrival of my eighth birthday, so that I could be baptized. But after I was baptized and confirmed I had nothing particularly unusual occur, except that now I was happy that the time had arrived when I could give some visible proof of my thankfulness for the "voice" which had spoken to me. Nor can I yet mark any date on which I have received the Holy Spirit as proof of my right choice.

Some say that the Holy Ghost comes as a "burning in the breast" or a "quickening of the spirit." This may be an indication of its manifestation, but somehow that experience is a common one for me. I saw a glorious sunset and an indescribable feeling of well-being and unity with the universe filled my heart. I knew (at least I was emotionally satisfied) that God was in his heaven, and all was right with the world.

Recently my parents, a friend, and I revisited the Sacred Grove late one Sunday afternoon. The trees there are dense, and already a silent darkness was settling down. Yet, suddenly, a burst of the last rays of the sunset beamed straight on the spot where Joseph is purported to have knelt. The rest of the woods remained in darkness, and the sun's rays chose out this one spot to illumine. A coincidence, you say? Yes, but my heart beat faster, and

I experienced a strange feeling of calmness and peace.

Several times I have stood in the interior of the Pyramid of Cholula, or the top of the Pyramid of the Sun at Teotihuacan, or at Cuernavaca, or in any one of a number of other archaeological sites. There in some strange fashion I have felt myself allied with the heroes of the past, and it would take much logical explanation to disprove the Book of Mormon to me now, but I'm not sure that I have yet received the proof of the Holy Ghost in this particular subject. Certainly God has not yet said (in any fashion) "Look here now—I shall proceed to prove this particular truth to you."

Then, too, our family has seen many healings. I was healed at the age of two of diphtheria, and at the age of nine I went through a major operation with no anaesthetic and felt no pain! Blessings? Definitely! Our car went over the side of one of the Cumberland mountains, and only a single strand of barbed wire kept us from tumbling a thousand feet downward. God's protection? Certainly! But in none of these cases has he ever said, "Now look, I'm doing this for you to prove the truth of my gospel."

No, I must actually admit, I have never had any experience upon which I could place my finger and say, "This is my proof of the truth of the gospel."

I believe the problem of proof of a call to the priesthood may well be compared to proof of the right step of baptism.

Often I have heard that "If ye have desires to serve God, ye are called to the work," (Doctrine and Covenants 4: 1) and "Whosoever will thrust in his sickle and reap, the same is called of God." (Doctrine and Covenants 26: 2. I have heard some who say this refers to the priesthood, but in that case all honest and sincere people (women and all) would be members of the priesthood. This is too far-fetched for my satisfaction. Surely there must be some more specific call.

The problem seems to have worried others, but not all have been so fortunate as to have such assurance as did Brother Elbert A. Smith. He was ordained by Patriarch Alexander H. Smith and Bishop E. L. Kelley, and was told, "Cease to fear and be troubled, you are called of God." He was further told that, "the spirit of your father's calling, which was known as one of kindness and mercy shall be with you," On Memory's Beam, page 101.

We find many in places a definition of the sort of a person necessary for the priesthood. "Here, then, is a calling, requiring . . . a knowledge of languages, of peoples, of customs, of laws and of historical background, of diplomacy, of international practices and world politics; and on the home front a knowledge of economics, of sociology, of business, of industry, of commerce, and of the professions; and a specific knowledge of the people with whom leadership is to work in the church, and whom they are to stimulate to their part in learning, in living, in loving, and in serving as stewards in all these fields."—Pastoral and Missionary Manual, page 30. Add to these a thorough knowledge and understanding of the Three Standard Books and a real love of God—and you have the standard of the priesthood. If a man feels he must conform to all of these standards to receive a call, there would be few called.

A more easily understood standard is the one which says, "No one can assist in this work, except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope and charity, being temperate in all things whatsoever shall be intrusted in his care."—Doctrine and Covenants 11:4. This is a standard which any man can attain, a base upon which a call may come.

I have finally arrived at a conclusion that proof of the truth of baptism or of a call may come in one of two ways. The first is spectacular and emotional—as powerful as a thrust of lightning. This type of proof comes when it is needed, and that is not very often. Our friend Paul was of such a character and in such a fit of zealous activity that mere logic was useless; it took a sudden bold stroke of blindness sent by God to bring him to his senses spiritually. But not everyone needs such a drastic proof.

The other type of proof is more complex and less easily defined but just as positive. This proof may be a combination of a number of things. "There are many gifts, and to every man is given a gift by the Spirit of God."—Doctrine and Covenants 46:5.

You may have a real ambition to serve God, a satisfaction in your own beliefs, an ability to look upon the world and yet not be in the world, a discernment of the work which goes beyond the pettiness of daily routine or of human failures, an ability to recognize needs and seek out solutions to those needs, an abundance of opportunities to serve in varying capacities, a consciousness of God's hand in the direction of the affairs of your life, a feeling of safety in the face of danger, a satisfaction in the fact that you are doing your best, or a sense of partnership with your fellow men and with God in a great work.

Some day these proofs will have accumulated to such a degree that a sudden realization of truth or of your calling will come that it will be a revelation to you. A child may work at a problem or a series of problems, arriving at the correct answers only because he is following a rule. Suddenly, the light dawns—no longer is it routine, now he sees why, and it seems absurd that he hasn't known why it worked that way before.

A musician practices a certain complicated musical phrase over and over, and it somehow just doesn't go quite right. Suddenly it is right—the error or misunderstanding is erased, and now it is hard to do it wrong.

So, too, may come the appreciation of the proof of God's gospel or of a call to the ministry—a revelation and understanding of what you already know.

Which shall it be? Are you the sort of person that God must literally "hit over the head" to reveal his truth, or can you reason your own beliefs to a logical conclusion? It will come, you know, so which do you actually want, an emotional or an intelligent proof? Remember, "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself."—I John 5:10.

Every time a liner arrives in Singapore, a man may be seen walking up the gangway and around the ship looking for penniless refugees.

He is a Jew himself, and remembers the time when he also was fleeing from persecution, and when, on his arrival at Singapore, a fellow passenger pressed a pound note into his hand, which kept him from starving till he found work. He does with a kindness what we are meant to do with it—pass it on, and today any penniless refugee receives a pound note from this good Samaritan.—Mari-time Baptist.

The Arrival of

The Modern Prophet

By J. A. Koehler

Number 10 in a series of radio addresses on the subject:
"The Social Philosophy of the Modern Prophet"

WHEN THE TIME came to deliver Israel from the bondage of Egypt, the requisite leadership arrived in the person of Moses. When the business of the kingdom which had been established under the leadership of Moses and Samuel went to the bad for want of a holy spirit in the people, along came the right man in the person of Jesus. When the church, of which Jesus had laid the foundation, went into apostasy for want of a competent priesthood, along came a new church leadership in the person of the reformers. When Europe was plagued with disease, when the consultations of the doctors, who knew next to nothing, were little more than wrangling matches, when something had to be done to prevent Europe from being depopulated by disease, along came a new medical leadership in the person of Louis Pasteur, et al.

When, for the want of industrial knowledges and skills, man was unable to rise far above the primitive level of living, along came the requisite scientific and inventive leaderships in the persons of such men as Faraday and Hargreaves. When the thirteen American colonies were in trouble and needed military leadership, along came George Washington. And when they needed political leadership, along came a dozen men of whose capacities the people were not aware, or whose geniuses had not been discovered.

One could go on and on to recount the leaderships that have arisen in times of great need. The truth revealed in these stories is that, when in the course of human events a great need arises, or when peoples plunge blindly and ignorantly into troubles, if they only knew where to look for it and could appreciate it, they would find that somewhere there is in the making a leadership which could save them from the evil that had befallen them. They would find, in the making, a leadership that is peculiar to the times.

WHAT IS THE peculiarity of the crucial times in which we now live? Even a very hasty review of the course of human events during the last three centuries should reveal the answer.

This, roughly, is part of the story. The leaders who gave us the answers to the problems of disease and production did not give us the answers to the social problems arising out of industrial progress—out of the increasing complexity of modern economic life. That was not their forte and calling. The next type of leadership required by the age of industrial and financial power did not give us the answers to the moral or ethical problems which arose out of the industrial and governmental changes inspired by the leaderships in these two fields. So as peoples promoted their industrial and governmental affairs, they got themselves into new troubles; they created problems peculiar to their times.

As I intimated previously, the first political leaders regarded the family of industrial workmen more as a dairyman regards his herd of cattle. Not until the nineteenth century did political leaders think of man more as a "soul"—not until then did they make the object of their economic prescription the improvement of personality and living conditions. The new leaders, therefore, talked more about human rights and attainments, relatively, than about the rights of property. The economics of J. A. Hobson has a very different emphasis from the economics of J. S. Mills or Jean Baptiste Say.

But there was something wanting in even that leadership. Somehow it did not get at the heart of things; it was not quite "on the beam"; it had no adequate program of social reconstruction, nor did it provide the moral motivation without which peoples get themselves into other troubles. Add together all the leaderships that appeared even up to the year 1945, to which peoples have responded because they appreciated them and the sum is still less than the answer to the modern world problem. It is not the way out of the crisis of civilization. For the more deeply the mind delves, the clearer its apprehension of the under currents of human society, the more do men's hearts fail them for fear of the things which they see in the offing.

SO, UNLESS the course of history has changed, unless the forces of time do not work in the present as they always did in the past, somewhere there is still another type of leadership—an ethical, a religious, a kingdom-building leadership—in the making. And it is not quite so foolish to anticipate its arrival as some would have us believe. In its present circumstances, the world should be on the look-out for that leadership.

I say that people should be anticipating the arrival of a religious leadership with the message of the times, because the problem of the modern world is more than ethical; it is distinctively and positively religious. It is a problem to which nothing short of a religious social philosophy can be the answer. For unless the conviction takes root in the hearts of peoples that in the conduct of their economic affairs they build for eternity, and unless there is engendered in them the only spirit that will impel them irresistibly to conform their conduct of economic affairs to that purpose, the spiritual evils which breed greater and greater social disasters as time marches on will not be uprooted. The turns in the road which they shall take in the crisis of civilization will not be "the way out."

Some leaderships tend to be aggressive. They intrude themselves on peoples. Business and political leaderships, usually, are of that type. Some leaderships come to be in the lead through subterfuge, force, and stratagem. But you will have difficulty finding real kingdom-building leadership that ever did that. There have been, and there still are, men claiming to be religious leaders, who aspire and maneuver to get the affairs of their peoples into their hands; who try to dominate religious activities. There have even been some theologians like that, but I have never known a true kingdom-building prophet of such a disposition. True kingdom-building leaders are not foolish enough to believe that their objects may be promoted unless the spirit of the people itself is a demand for their offices.

No true Kingdom-building leadership every plotted for a position in a church that would enable it to dominate affairs. That is not the spirit of Kingdom-building leadership.

Though the prophetic genius does not seek for power, it does seek to be an influence in the life of its own people especially. It is the very nature of the genius of prophecy, of kingdom-building leadership, to burn its heart out over the miseries of humanity that arise from the maladjustments of human society, as one Jewish historian put it. And the characteristic of that burning heart is to win peoples to the mode of society which alone can deliver them from their miseries.

Many centuries ago the genius of prophecy said: "Behold, I will send my messenger [one bearing a true philosophy of social life] and he shall prepare the way before me." And the time of humanity's imperative need of that social philosophy is the time when the genius of true Bible religion said that messenger should arrive.

IN THE COURSE of these articles, I intend to bring to your attention the social philosophy of the man who was perhaps the greatest social philosopher England ever produced. The proclamation of that philosopher is one of the witnesses that, more than a century ago, the American prophet did arrive.

He did not arrive as a conqueror. There was no publicity campaign to assure him a hearty welcome. There was no big show; no blare of trumpets; nothing spectacular. If any fuss was made, it was made by others, not by the prophet. All the prophet did was to go about trying to make his conviction carry over to others, and seeking to engender the spirit of the enterprise which is to be the implementation of his social philosophy.

Many would already have been convinced that this is true, but for the stupidity of the people who only said, "Lord, Lord," but who have never demonstrated that they meant what they said.

The first leaders in any field, including religion, have looked through glasses "darkly." I do not say that upon his arrival, the modern prophet saw everything in true perspective. It is not even necessary that his vision of the finished kingdom should be perfect. In truth it is hardly possible. But as I contemplate the present social condition I see in the philosophy of the modern prophet, who made his arrival more than a century ago, an almost unbelievable comprehension of the system of ethico-religio-economic principles for which this generation is groping blindly. I see what to me are sure witnesses of the arrival of the modern prophet. As in the case of any leadership that ever made a contribution to the eternal welfare of humanity, it is up to the disciples of the modern prophet to refine his message, and to implement it, so that others may know assuredly that the modern prophet has arrived. For there can be no positive proof of any social philosophy, save the consequences of its implementation in the lives of peoples.

The modern prophet has gone the way of all the earth. It is our calling to make sure that, notwithstanding the body of the "modern prophet" is dead and in its grave, his message shall be made to live in the social institutions of his people.

What Help for Pastors and Church School Directors?

By Lydia Wight

The work of a new school year is launched. Problems of administration, especially the securing of effectively trained teachers, loom large for many of you pastors and your church school directors. This year you wish to do some definite things to improve the ministry of your church school.

GUIDE-LINES TO LEADERSHIP, in the January issue, has specific help in several areas of the total task. William Webbe, worker in Religious Education in Kirtland, Ohio, has been doing much in recent years in his field. He writes challengingly on the topic, "More Effective Administration of Religious Education."

If you have not seen the value of intensive short courses in methods, read the testimony of others in the fine article by Thelona Stevens entitled "Shifting Emphasis in Leadership Training." Schools that are growing and improving in their service to old and young attribute much of their progress to the hard work and study done by their officers and teachers. Read in GUIDE-LINES TO LEADERSHIP, the January issue, what may be done now in training classes.

THE WIND-SWEPT HARP, by Grace Noll Crowell. Harper, 1946. 76 pages. Handset type. $1.

A new book of poems by Mrs. Crowell is welcome news to all who maintain a religious or spiritual outlook in their reading. This is her first volume in which the experience of the recent war is definitely past, and she has turned her whole attention to the themes of peace. These poems have values for many kinds of people. Those who are always saying "yes" when they should say "no" should read "The Donkey." "Thank You, Friend," is a lovely appreciation that can be applied to those who help us. "Who Loves a Garden," is a text on the rewards of patience. We recommend "The Family Altar" to pastors when they are preaching on that subject. In fact, many of the poems in this volume will be found beautiful and useful for worship services.

VISUAL AIDS IN THE CHURCH, by William L. Rogers and Paul H. Vieth. 214 pages, $2.00. Illustrated with line drawings.

REVIEWED BY MARVIN McDOLE

This book was written primarily for those who want a better understanding of visual aids and their place in the educational program of the church. It is presented as a book on the "philosophy and practice" of visual education in the church. The authors have a fine understanding of the problems facing the local church, as evidenced in the preface, from which we quote:

Beginning with a brief statement of the history of visual education in the church, we follow with two chapters of the meaning, the practice, and the method of visual communication.

Then we proceed with a consideration of the various phases of the church's program and show how visual method is applicable to each of these. Some may feel that we have included more on general religious education than should be done in a book on visual education. Our justification is that visual education is not something which stands by itself, but finds its meaning and value only in close relationship to the ongoing program of the church.

The authors do not limit themselves to projected visual aids but include a discussion of flat pictures, models, drama, and field trips among others. There are concrete suggestions about Sunday evening programs with pictures, the training of workers, making your own visual aids, and building the church program.

We feel that this book is the best yet written in this field and so do not hesitate to recommend it as being of value to all who wish to get their visual aids program started on a sound basis.

ECONOMICS IN ONE LESSON, by Henry Hazlitt. N. Y. Harper & Bros. 1946. 222 pages. $2.

This is a controversial little book, tossed into the troubled waters of our current economic thought. It is being hailed by the conservatives for its attack on the basic principles of the New Deal, state capitalism, and a lot of other things that go with them. It is being attacked by the reforming element who are in favor of anything that looks like a change, whether for the better or for the worse.

Let it be said that the author simply takes the approach of common sense and experience to the whole business of the new political economy which seeks to establish and maintain government control over the vital aspects of our commercial and industrial life. Many of his condemnations of government bungling and private interference with the ordinary laws of economic life are right and just. But he is not free from faults. Some of his statements favor the autocrats of big business who think it is utterly wrong for government to take charge of the economic life of the people, but utterly right for private enterprise to do the same thing.

This is a stimulating little work. Interesting too. But read it with an open mind and a healthy salting of skepticism. The book is smooth and persuasive. But don't let it put a ring in your nose and lead you into the laissez-faire camp.

Comment on Books

It is always a pleasure to share some thought or idea presented by our friends, whether in conversation or in correspondence, and to pass good things on to our readers.

A letter from our Church Architect, Henry C. Smith, brings us something very worthy of publication:

Your efforts to encourage people to read "all good books" has done some good, but I am still often greatly disturbed upon finding just how little real and serious reading is being done. No doubt much of it is due to lack in the fundamentals of education, but I do think that their understanding could be increased by trying to read some of the good books to be found most everywhere.

If I may be pardoned, I shall step outside my chosen field and mention some books which seem to me to carry vital matter for us.

It would be difficult to find a more enlightening treatise than . . . Mainsprings of Civilization, recently written by Ellsworth Huntington of Yale. Many interesting physical and social phenomena are presented, opening up limitless ideas for continued study in worth-while fields.

Now I am tackling John Dewey's Problems of Men, and for diversion I am reading my favorite historian, Guglielmo Ferrero's The Principles of Power. Are you reading The American Scholar now? The autumn issue has an enlightening article on the Jewish question, and a review of Einstein's latest pronouncement.

Over the Pathways of Yesteryear

Magic Carpet Visits to Church Shrines

By Glenn Cargyle

WHAT REMAINS TODAY of the places at which occurred many of the awesome, exciting and tragic events in the early part of the Restoration Movement?

Let's step onto our magic carpet, whisk up into the clouds and speed across the sky toward the western part of New York state. There we see the glistening waters of Lake Ontario. Just south of the lake is Rochester, New York, a city of considerable size.

Moving on twenty miles east we see Palmyra, a town of three thousand, whose main occupations are the raising of corn, kidney beans, and cabbage. After finding a suitable place to land and upon alighting from our carpet, we notice the town's business section is on one street, most of the stores within a distance of four blocks. A sauerkraut factory and an auto parts plant are its main industries.

There's a drugstore. Let's go in and ask how to get to the places of interest. "I wonder if you might tell us the best way to see the historical places?" With an outstretched finger pointing south the druggist retorts, "Mormon hill is just four miles from here, and Joe Smith's farm home is near there."

Soon we are on our way. A few blocks from town, we see a sign directing us to our destination. On the same corner we notice a church of a different denomination on each corner, each one an elaborate brick or stone structure. Later we hear that this is the only corner of the kind in the world.

Upon nearing Hill Cumorah, we see a towering monument at the top. A small handsomely constructed colored stone building stands at the base of the hill just off the highway. We are greeted at the entrance by a distinguished middle-aged gentleman who directs us to a modernly furnished lounge. He excuses himself for a moment while he talks with another group of people. "We are called Mormons," he said, "but our correct name is, 'The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints'. Christ's gospel has been restored to the earth in its fullness. The Book of Mormon is part of that gospel."

He continued, and after a brief sermon, our turn came. Introducing ourselves as members of the Reorganized Church, made the introductory sermon unnecessary. Instead, we asked about the hill. We were told the property was bought in 1927. Two farms were included in the purchase in order to get the hill. The monument was placed atop the hill in 1935, and the Bureau of Information building at the base of the hill in 1936. Eight hundred sixty-nine sightseers visited the grounds during the month of July, an average of thirty a day, twenty per cent members of the Utah Mormon Church.

"The temple-building program and the ordinances performed therein very much interest visitors," the guide tells us. "The sacred ordinance of baptism for the dead appeals to many. To learn that they have a chance to redeem loved ones is very gratifying," he added. Unhesitatingly we asked, "Is it not true that baptism is performed with the recipient's understanding of its purpose and making the decision through the medium of his free agency of choice?" He nodded in the affirmative. We continued, "How do we know that the person on whose behalf we're being baptized has the knowledge of the gospel and has accepted it and made the choice to be baptized?" "That's a good question!" he exclaimed. "We don't have to know," he added. "You mean you believe that baptism for the dead opens the doors—" He interrupted, "Yes, that's it! If they have not already made the choice, the doors are open waiting for them." Thus we have a clear picture of one of the ordinances practiced by the Utah Mormon Church, explained by a high priest in that organization.

Let's follow the roadway around the east side of Hill Cumorah to the top. The monument at the top bears a large figure which represents Moroni. His right hand is pointed toward heaven, and in his left he holds the sacred record. Near the base of the monument on three of its four sides are bronze relief panels of the witnesses. An exhortation of Moroni is inscribed on the fourth side. (Book of Mormon Moroni 10: 4.)

Large hedge letters spell the word "CUMORAH" on the hill's west side. A small placard marks the approximate location of the plates at the time

Joseph Smith obtained them. Visibility is good for miles across beautiful farm land.

Joseph Smith's home is several miles from the hill. A placard erected by New York state in front of the home states that Joseph Smith lived there during the time he translated part of the Book of Mormon plates. We were informed that the small two-story wooden structure was built in 1822 by Alvin Smith, the prophet's older brother; that he died before its completion but requested that it be finished. The home was used by the Smith family three years, commencing in 1825. The caretaker said it is probable that the visitation by the Angel Moroni in September of 1823 occurred in this building. The interior furnishings are similar to those used in 1823, including household effects of those days, such as a bed warmer, candle lantern, candle mold, shot bag, powder holder, bellows, guns, stove, sad irons, and a manually operated vacuum sweeper. A human yoke which was used for carrying loads is one of the interesting items. The home, including one hundred-fifty acres of surrounding farm land, has been maintained by the Utah Mormon Church since 1907.

Directly across the road one fourth mile from the home is the Sacred Grove. On the way to the grove we pass a small barn used by the Smith family. Larger barns have since been added. An old zigzag wooden fence of the type used during the 1820's by the Smiths is placarded. Its construction consists of logs placed horizontally, interlocking at the ends. Upon entering through the gated entrance, a shaded path leads through the grove to a small cleared area on which have been placed benches and a concrete platform. It is indeed, a beautiful peaceful grove. Rays of sunlight shine through the openings in the leaves of the small trunked trees. Because of its convenience to his home, it is believed this is the grove in which Joseph wrote that he retired to pray.

AGAIN we're on our way on our magic carpet into the blue sky over the state of Pennsylvania into Ohio. Forty-five miles across the state line, twenty miles northeast of Cleveland, a short distance from Lake Erie's coast is the town of Willoughby. The Kirtland Temple is on a hill three miles from Willoughby. Much to our surprise we learn that Kirtland is not a town, hardly a village. Although it is a beautiful residential community, a grocery store and two filling stations are the extent of its business places.

Across the street from "The House of the Lord," which is now identified as the Kirtland Temple, a stately white southern type building stands in which dining facilities and classrooms are housed. The temple's exterior plaster covering, which has the appearance of sidewalk concrete, is the original except for numerous repair patches that are visible. Inside its two feet thick stone plastered walls are three stories. The exquisite whiteness of the symmetrically designed interior is magnificent. The sun shining in the one hundred one-paned windows casts reflections throughout the building. Many of the original rippled hand-made glass panes remain. Former Apostle Gomer T. Griffiths who is guide, tells us the pulpit trimmings and all other trimmings were stripped during the period of vacancy after the Saints left Kirtland. All trimmings have been duplicated and replaced since the church reclaimed the building in 1880. An armrest desk-type chair used by Joseph Smith is near a vestibule stairway.

The first and second floors are auditoriums very much alike, each fifty-five by sixty-five feet on the inside, exclusive of the entrance vestibule. There are twenty-four pulpits on the first floor and the same number on the second floor, twelve in each end. Those in the west end are for the use of the Melchisedec priesthood and those in the east for the Aaronic. The third story is divided into five small rooms of equal size for use as classrooms for the priesthood. The building has been struck by lightning several times, knocking off the lightning rod on one occasion. A ten foot wide area was burned on the roof at one time. It is not known how it started nor how it was extinguished. At certain times during the day, the sun's rays cause the exterior walls to sparkle, affirming the story of the women giving their china dishes to be crushed and to be placed in the mortar at the time of construction for use on the outside walls.

Patriarch Griffiths, guide at the temple, speaks with dignity of his ninetyeth birthday last June, having been a member of the church eighty years, sixty-four years spent at Kirtland. He baptized in the River Jordan and organized the first branch in Jerusalem. Brother Griffiths tells of his purchasing the bell for the temple tower over three hundred dollars and relates the feat of hoisting it to the tower with a team of horses. With a smile he tells of buying a Baptist Church across the street from the temple and moving it several blocks away from that vicinity. We are informed that he purchased for the church, at an auction sale, the grounds near-by the temple. Across the street, next to the Sunday school building, is the former home of Sidney Rigdon. A block beyond on Joseph Street is the former home of Hyrum Smith. At the foot of the hill on the north side is the house in which Joseph Smith III, was born.

The character of the community's original status can easily be determined as being religious by seeing the names of some of the streets. Luke, John, Peter, Lyman, Hiram, Joseph, Martin, and Pratt are among the street's names. A very old school building in need of much repair stands a short distance from the temple, next to a cemetery. It has been moved from its original location (according to Patriarch Griffiths). One authority believes the first Apostles were ordained there. The building is now used as a barn. Whether this building is the one for which Lucy Smith raised funds is not known (Joseph Smith and His Progenitors, by Lucy Smith, pages 243, 244.)

ONCE MORE, up in the air we sail on the magic carpet over the center of the states of Indiana and Illinois to the western border of Illinois, about half way between its north and south border. There we see Nauvoo, Illinois, with a one-time population estimated from 15,000, to 25,000 Saints, now dwindled to scarcely 1,000, mostly Catholics. In days when the temple crowned the hill, with the residences and business houses of the city near at hand, and the great sweep of the Mississippi River around the peninsula on which the city stood, the scene must have been magnificent. Today the business section of town is atop the hill. The mayor, who has his offices in his filling station, operates the station as a partnership with the town's fire chief. In collaboration with the gas-station business, he sells hardware, electrical goods, coal, paint, is an agent for a bus line, and operates a cleaning and laundry pickup service.

The many substantial and now historic buildings were erected at the base of the hill near the river. Of the remaining buildings, the Old Homestead, built of logs in 1823, was the first home of Joseph Smith in Nauvoo. It was previously used as an Indian trading post. Joseph Smith built on an addition to the structure shortly after he moved there. The Nauvoo House, begun in 1841, was designed to provide hotel accommodations for the rapidly growing city. The foundations were laid to front 120 feet along Main Street and 120 feet along the river. These foundation lines are still visible. The building was to be five stories high. At the death of Joseph Smith, the walls of the first floor had been erected to the window sills of the second story. Twenty-five years later a part of the two wings was torn down and the building remodeled as it is now. Emma, the widow of Joseph Smith, lived there during the closing years of her life and died there. Title is now held by the church.

The Mansion House was begun in 1842, and Joseph Smith and his family moved into it in 1843. In part it was intended to furnish lodging for the many transient visitors then coming to Nauvoo. Originally the building was much larger than now, having twenty-two rooms. Because of its poor condition, in 1890 the east end of the building was torn away. The roofing and siding were replaced in 1918. This building is now owned by the church and is being refurnished with period furniture of that time.

Nothing remains at the Nauvoo temple site. Never completed on the interior, this building was burned by enemies of the church in 1848. The last ruins were destroyed by dynamite in 1873. Several buildings in Nauvoo, including a Catholic institution are built of stones taken from the ruins. A private residence now stands on the church-owned temple site. There are some fragments of the temple preserved on the grounds near the Old Homestead at the base of the hill. A desk used in the Nauvoo Temple is displayed in the Mansion House.

Many early church publications and other historic items are on display in the Mansion House and in the visitor's registration building. The Book of Covenants and Commandments printed during Joseph Smith's life time is very often used in discussions with Utah Mormon visitors. It is compared with their book which contains one hundred twenty-five alterations and additions made by Brigham Young. The similarity between the present-day edition used by the Reorganized Church and the original Joseph Smith edition leaves our Utah Mormon friends bewildered, the guide tells us. Brother and Sister J. E. Vanderwood are responsible for the well-organized work and beautiful grounds there. The church maintains a branch in Nauvoo.

Several of the first five thousand copies of the Book of Mormon are displayed. Others printed in German are there also. In view in the visitor's registration building is Joseph's hat box, one of Lucy Smith's hats, tools used in the construction of the Nauvoo temple, handles, a piece of wood, and cloth from Emma Smith's casket and various Indian flints.

In the front yard of the Old Homestead is the resting place of Joseph, his wife, and his brother Hyrum Smith. After their death, the bodies of Joseph and Hyrum were brought to Nauvoo and lay in state in the Mansion House where thousands came to pay their respects. Before the public funeral, however, the bodies were secretly removed from the coffins and buried in a safe place because of the reward offered for them. Some months later the bodies were again moved and were buried under the floor of a small brick building known as the springhouse, standing only about twenty feet from where the bodies now rest. The place is marked with two stones inscribed "J" and "H" indicating the positions of Joseph and Hyrum. In time, the little building entirely disappeared, and no marker was left to identify the graves. Only a few members of the family knew the approximate location. In 1928, by request of the president of the church, excavations were conducted, and the bones of the two men were identified beyond question, and were re-interred where they now rest. Emma, Joseph's wife, whose body had rested near that location since her death, was also removed to rest beside her husband.

The basement foundation of Joseph Smith's store building remains at Nauvoo. In this vicinity near the base of the hill is the old Masonic Lodge building and the structure that housed the Times and Seasons publication. There also are the homes of Lucy Smith, Joseph Smith's mother; John Smith, uncle of Joseph, Jr.; Heber C. Kimball, counselor to Joseph; Brigham Young, president of the twelve; Orson Hyde, one of the original twelve, who later followed Brigham Young; Wilfred Woodruff, who also was one of the original twelve, who later followed Brigham Young and was responsible for the "Manifesto." Also remaining are the homes of William Marks, counselor to Joseph III; John Browning, grandfather of the inventor of the machine gun; and John Taylor, one of the original twelve, later second president of the Utah Mormon Church.

Twenty miles from Nauvoo is Carthage, Illinois, with a population of two thousand six-hundred, where the historic little jail stands in which Joseph and Hyrum Smith were killed. The building was built in 1839-1840. Its walls are made of yellow limestone, two and one half feet thick on the first floor, and two feet thick on the second floor. The nine original doors remaining are made from walnut or butternut held together with wooden pins and handmade screws. Most of the floor is original. Since 1866 it has been used as a residence and various other uses. In 1903 it became the property of the Utah Mormon Church and has since been restored to its original atmosphere with the replacing of cell bars and window bars. The bullet hole in the door, through which Hyrum Smith was killed, is yet to be seen, as are also marks of bullets upon the walls outside which were fired at Joseph Smith and Elder Taylor. On the floor, the stains of blood which flowed from the wounds of Hyrum Smith and John Taylor are plainly to be seen yet, as it is said that bloodstains never wash entirely out of wood.

Over the pathways of yesteryear, we have trodden the same hills and farmland, into the same structures, and viewed the same beauties as did the Latter Day Prophet and his associates. Thousands of visitors of every religious affiliation have preceded us, and many more will follow, coming away with a better understanding and respect of the early pioneers and their leaders. Some have caught a glimpse of the restored gospel message and have a deeper appreciation for God's servant, whose short but colorful life ended with the tragic event at Carthage, Illinois.

We thank God for the privilege of enjoying the blessings of the gospel in these latter days and praise him for inspiring the early pioneers so that they endured countless hardships and sacrifices. For this heritage, we are grateful, and we give God all the honor and glory.

Yes, There Are Other Things to Drink

"The trouble with not serving alcoholic beverages is that the only alternative is the very ordinary tomato juice or the common coke," said a lady the other day.

Not at all. For instance, someone sends us a clipping (unfortunately the credit line was off), which suggests that when the crowd is hot and thirsty, the following chilled drinks will be acceptable:

Citrus Soda

For each soda, combine 2/3 cup chilled blended orange and grapefruit juice with 1/3 cup chilled ginger ale in a tall glass. Add a large scoop of vanilla ice cream and two straws and you have a treat in any weather.

For an old-fashioned Fourth of July drink, serve a silver pitcher of iced raspberry shrub. This recipe comes from "Cooking With a Foreign Flavor," a new book by the always reliable Florence La Ganke Harris.

Raspberry Shrubs

Four quarts red raspberries, 2 cups cider vinegar, sugar.

Put berries in colander. Let cold water run over them lightly. Drain. Spread on a large enameled tray. The enameled drop pan of the stove is excellent.

Set in a cool oven, not more than 250 degrees F. After the berries have been in for 10 minutes, pull the tray out and mash them lightly with a spoon. Put tray back in oven 30 minutes. The heat should be so low that it does nothing but set the juice to running.

Put fruit in a jelly bag. Squeeze out juice. Measure. Count the cups. Measure one-fourth as many cups of sugar.

Boil sugar and juice for 15 minutes after boiling begins. Add vinegar. Boil 10 minutes longer. Pour into hot, clean jars, capping with the sterilized rubber ring and top.

To use, dilute the juice with cold water and chipped ice, using one-third shrub and two-thirds water.

Orange Malted Milk

Combine 2 tablespoons of lemon juice, 2/3 cups of orange juice and 1/3 cup of sugar into a saucepan and heat until syrupy. Cool; pour into a shaker or jar and add 1 quart of milk and 2/3 cup of plain malted milk powder. Cover jar tightly. Shake. Serve at once with chipped ice. Serves 6.

Raspberry Orangeade

Pour boiling water over 8 teaspoons black tea leaves in heated container. Cover. Steep 5 minutes, pour tea immediately from leaves. Chill.

Combine 2 cups of fresh or canned raspberries and 1/2 cup of sugar or corn syrup, 1/2 cup of lemon juice and 2 cups of orange juice. Pour into tall glasses over crushed ice or ice cubes. Serves 6 to 8.—The Clipsheet, September 16, 1946.

Come Out of Babylon

But Into What?

W. C. Stone

discusses the dilemma we face in trusting our economic fate to a system that our philosophy declares carries the elements of its doom within it; he indicates that we must either share the calamity or implement our faith with a social order expressing its principles. While the editors do not commit themselves to the views herein expressed, they believe those views are worthy of consideration. Other writers may be stimulated to express their views also.

Come forth, my people, out of her, that ye have no fellowship with her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues.—Revelation 18: 4, American Revised Version.

For if the trumpet give an uncertain voice, who shall prepare himself for war?—I Corinthians 14: 8, American Revised Version.

THAT WE SHOULD be convicted by some among us of being largely deficient in our proclaimed field of endeavor is not surprising. That which is surprising is that we search for remedies without first ascertaining the cause, casually assuming that we know this. We have our goal, our philosophy (knowledge of general laws and principles pertaining to Zion) and devoted, often well trained and informed ministers. If we fail in making the first two an integral part of our lives and to further develop the third should this be regarded solely as a cause or a symptom?

There are undoubtedly reasons for much of our difficulty originating in natural causes and easily understood. Striving to understand some of these reasons might help point to the solution even though it may call for more searching collective and individual readjustment than any we have so far contemplated. If something can be developed that will bring to many of us an earnest conviction that much of our daily thinking and activity is at variance with what we profess to believe, we will be started toward solution of the problems under discussion.

In the period in which our first prophet undertook to assemble the Saints in Zion, the application of portions of our philosophy in contrast to that of the individual agricultural economy of the period could be easily understood. Simple illustrations such as "the bundle of sticks" would serve nicely to illustrate the advantages of united effort in contrast to the individual, monotonous and often isolated economic effort of the time.

What has intervened to make the application of our philosophy today less obvious to the world in general and to diminish our own understanding of it? The answer could be, a number of things, more than space will permit us to discuss. However, two simple factors stand out above all else.

First: With the rise of the machine age and consequent mass production the emphasis of our economy has shifted from agriculture to industry. With this and the flood of radio and press propaganda the simple illustrations of yesterday are no longer so obvious to the casual observer or ourselves.

Second: The necessity of regathering the scattered Saints into a cohesive group while at the same time trying to live down public disapproval engendered by false doctrines broadcast in the name of the church and prophet consumed the time and energy of the Ministry of the Reorganization. It is only natural that the literature of this period should reflect this effort above all else.

From this time a body of splendid church literature has developed dealing with church history, organization and doctrine, yet dealing almost in a passing manner with Zion's philosophy and hardly troubling to contrast it with the philosophy current about us. With reference to "economics" we and our children are being vaguely indoctrinated with what is blatantly referred to as "The American Way of Life." Our church school is not equipped with a body of literature designed for this field or a core of teachers sufficiently indoctrinated to meet and offset this daily outpouring of propaganda. With the memory of persecution ever with it and the cloud of public misunderstanding ever present, it is only natural that the Reorganization should endeavor to pour itself into the most acceptable and honorable mold current in our social state. In this we have met with considerable success. We have attacked individual and some social sins in common with other religionists. We have striven to copy and improve the best in accepted forms of worship with a large measure of success.

Consequently, we find ourselves tolerated if not respected; permitted if not urged to take what appears to be a normal part in various phases of community life, social and political as well as economic. We have adjusted ourselves to society, ceasing to be an organization of struggle. In face of all this we would be vehement in denial, if charged, that we have made friends with the "Mammon of unrighteousness."

With the constantly increasing tempo of modern living and the rise of various "isms" our teaching is almost lost in the commotion and has, by comparison, become almost a dream that passes with the dawn of each succeeding day. All of this largely accounts for our complacent acceptance of our current economy, hardly realizing that it has within it the seeds of its own destruction. Many of us continue to accept it without endeavoring to challenge it in our daily thinking. Yes, even more, we fail to see that this economy requires challenging if we are to draw earnest and thinking people to us.

Have we justified within our group the statement that "the worst enemy the best has is the second best"? Has all this led us to a possibility that we might require the reminder given by our Lord to a class of people these things we ought to have done without overlooking others of more importance? Have we accomplished what we have while pouring ourselves into a social mode in which we will go down with this economy in which we live? Must we have "fellowship" with her sins and receive of her plagues? While claiming to have God's Holy Spirit resident among us only, should we not live a testimony of something more than complete satisfaction with what we have?

The necessity of supporting government and obeying laws stemming from our social state and the further urge to seek and support good men is easily understood. What is not so well understood is that this need not involve blind acceptance of the social structure itself. Is it possible for our trumpet to have "a certain voice" while our energies are spent supporting radical or conservative forces stemming from our present economy whose principles are frequently the antithesis of Latter Day Saint philosophy?

"Say nothing but repentance unto this generation." Repentance from what? Sin. Is not sin any act or condition, individual or social, separating people from God? How many of us are vitally conscious of all evil, social or individual? How are people to repent of evil they are not aware of except by the voice of warning? If those who might be expected to sound the warning are not conscious of evil how shall repentance be preached? Has evil been held before us for good for so long that the perception of the preachers has become dull?

Thus many of us find ourselves in the unenviable position of calling on people to come out of "Babylon" (apologies to Brother Koehler) without thoroughly understanding what it is we wish them to come out of, beside their current religious affiliations. Moreover we find ourselves unable to demonstrate just what we want them to come to outside of our regular services of worship. The world is not lacking in zealots calling on people to renounce allegiance to our present social order and honor only Jehovah. But since so many of us are not zealous the world is sadly lacking in anything that in any way exemplifies what is required in giving allegiance to "the kingdom of Heaven."

Are the developments of our age such that we are incapable of understanding them? Is the tempo of our time such that we lack the time and energy to develop an enlightened and trained ministry and a body of literature that will carry our philosophy to this generation in terms that can be understood? We shall certainly lack the time if we fail to evaluate properly the social economy in which we are living!

We must embody our philosophy in a body of co-operatively minded people willing to sacrifice and be sacrificed in order that this light might shine through their daily toil. Such co-operation can only arise from knowledge and inspiration. To achieve this we will be forced, in a measure, to alter the emphasis in our training and study and to bring almost an entirely new field of thought into our study material. We are forced to admit that the developments of our time have caught us off balance, however natural its cause may have been. Perhaps we should as well admit that, in the face of our philosophy, we do not have a large group of co-operatively minded people due to causes and lacks developing for generations and for which individual responsibility need not be assigned. In making this admission we are also forced to admit that in and of our own efforts we are not likely to alter these conditions abruptly or quickly escape the effects.

What, then, is so urgent with reference to these lacks that they suddenly become uppermost in many minds? Why is it that some of our veterans and others are so deeply concerned? Simply this, the realization that our economy of "private enterprise" can not stand the strain of an immediate world conflict. Note closely what is here said. We are not saying that our nation will be defeated in war or our government violently overthrown; no, even worse! Let us repeat, our private enterprise economy can not stand the strain of another immediate world war. The effect of a change in our economy on our form of government under wartime conditions can be left to imagination; or can it?

If we accept this at face value the need for a change of attitudes on the part of a large portion of our people can be easily understood. But what avenue of relief will be sought before a large amount of improvement is noted? We will suggest a number of things that will likely lead to slow improvement but which in themselves will not fire the entire body with Zion's light.

There is a power resident within and among us capable of enlightening and inspiring when a sufficient number invoke it with prayer and fasting. Only by organized effort to invoke this power will forces of inspiration be released in sufficient volume to lead to anything approaching a general change in attitudes. God willing, we need an outpouring of the Holy Spirit. We may be confident that if we realize that we are faced with a collective lack and unitedly seek Divine inspiration it will not be withheld.

Since the Holy Spirit is both a means and the end by and for which we minister why not give it the privilege of working in and through us for these improvements we desire? In the ultimate it is our goal. Through it only we shall achieve that challenging power that will draw honest hearts to us. Because many of us are not alert we have not, as a group, sought this power and because we have not, perplexity is to be found, especially among our veterans. Why not?

We must come to see our church school as an instrument in developing a clear understanding of our philosophy and a fundamental knowledge of the technical structure of such groups we may desire to found in opening up the way toward our goal. The need of texts gathering together what inspiration has given of God's plan and a summary of the abundance of learning covering the field of co-operative endeavor should be clear.

This is a project that should be a "must" in our program. Texts can be developed suitable to all ages and leadership courses in these subjects established on the same basis now current in our educational department. That this will impose a burden beyond the present capacity of our educational department may be easily understood. But under expert supervision new blood can be brought in to this department.

purpose, it will not have been in vain. There is the distant view of every person and his work, in which his greater contributions can be seen. And there is the little close-up view in which principally the faults are apparent. There is greatness and smallness in almost every person you know, and with whom you have to work. Your problem is not to forget the great virtues while you have to live close to the small eccentricities. Human nature is like the differing views of the city. It always contains the beautiful and the ugly, the good and the bad, the small and the great, the petty and the noble. When we are oppressed by the smallness of some detail, we must not forget to look up for the majestic view. It is to be found in every person, in every church, and in every social situation.

What We Shall Eat

A Moderate View

By Hazel Napier

In recent issues we have had two articles on the subject of diet in relation to the Standard Books of the church. One presented the case of the vegetarians, and the second the case of meat-eating. This article, prepared before the appearance of the other two, represents another view which should be of interest. Like the others, it represents the ideas of the author, and is not an official expression of church attitude. . . . We still lack an expression of the viewpoint of the standard medical schools and medical doctors of the country.—L.J.L.

AT THE BEGINNING of this article, I wish to say that I do not profess to be an expert on the subject of what we shall eat, which I approach from the viewpoint of logic and sound reasoning, using Scripture as my authority, rather than from actual scientific knowledge.

In the Bible, one of the first references to food is found in the second chapter of Genesis: "And out of the ground made I, the Lord God, to grow every tree naturally, that is pleasant to the sight of man. . . . And I, the Lord God, commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat, but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it."

Because of the above references to trees, it is assumed that such fruits as pears and peaches were the only food of our first parents. This is highly improbable. Special mention was made of the trees because two of them were of peculiar significance. Since Eden was a garden, not just an orchard, it must have contained vegetables of all kinds. With its wondrous foods, ornamental shrubs, and myriads of flowers, it was a place both of loveliness and utility.

During the millennial reign, the beauty and fruitfulness of Eden will be restored. Change in social, economic, and climactic conditions will make of the earth a veritable paradise. Drought and disease and crop failures with their resultant hunger will be a thing of the past. Ezekiel tells us in the thirty-sixth chapter: "I will save you from all uncleanness, and I will call for the corn, and will increase it, and lay no famine upon you and I will multiply the fruit of the tree and the increase of the field."

No longer will the housewife have to pay forty cents for a can of fruit, for "then shall every man sit under his own vine and fig tree." Man and beast shall return to a vegetarian diet, "for the lion shall eat straw like an ox" and "they shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountains."

Because of the diet of our first parents and the future change in food habits, it is advocated that people in this age should live solely on raw fruit. Before anyone accepts or teaches such a theory, the following facts should be considered:

First, we have lost Eden and are not yet in the millennium. It is doubtful that we have the identical fruits of the garden. Since Eden was the only perfect spot on earth, it naturally follows that the fruits and vegetables on the outside were inferior, competing as they did with thorns and thistles. This is the vegetation we have today. The time will come when there will be vines and trees that we do not have now. We read in Ezekiel 47: 12. "And by the river upon the bank thereof, on this side, and on that side, shall grow all trees for meat, whose leaf shall not fade, neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed; it shall bring forth new fruit, and according to his months, because their waters they issued out of the sanctuary; and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine."

Even if we did have the same kind of food eaten by Adam and Eve, we do not possess their physique, nor their leisure time. All they had to do was tend and dress the garden. To people of their perfect physical condition, this was mere child's play. Eve was not a mother of several children; nor was her time taken up with home, social, and church activities. Before the fall, Adam was not head of a family, nor elder of the church, forced to earn a livelihood and burdened with multitudinous pastoral duties. It might invite physical disaster for hard-working men and women of our time to attempt to live solely on raw fruits or raw vegetables.

Knowing the food best for man in this dispensation, God laid down the fundamentals of diet in the section of the Doctrine and Covenants known as the Word of Wisdom. In this we read: "And again verily I say unto you, all wholesome herbs God hath ordained for the constitution, nature, and use of man, every herb in the season thereof, and every fruit in the season thereof. All these to be used with prudence and thanksgiving. And yea, flesh also, of beasts and fowls of the air, the Lord hath ordained for the use of man, with thanksgiving, nevertheless, they are to be used sparingly; and it is pleasing unto me that they should not be used only in times of winter, or of cold, or of famine. All grain is ordained for the use of man and of beasts, to be the staff of life."

"All grain is good for the food of man, as also, the fruit of the vine, that which yieldeth fruit, whether in the ground or above the ground. Nevertheless, wheat for man." Notice that these foods were ordained for man's use; fruit of the vine, grain, and meat.

The question has been asked why such valuable foods as milk and honey were not mentioned in the above revelation. Some people will not eat them because of this. Others, who will not use milk and eggs because they are animal products, are inconsistent enough to eat honey, which is, they explain, a product of the flower. That is true, but it is processed by the body of the bee, which is certainly not a vegetable. Following the same line of reasoning, milk is another form of grass, which, if edible, would be a very good food, and eggs are a product of grain.

These protein foods contain amino acids which are as necessary as vitamins and minerals. Though there is no proof, there is evidence that one of these amino acids, found in eggs, milk, cheese, and organ meats, helps the mind to function properly. Whether this is true or not, the worth of these foods has long been established. One should think twice before entirely eliminating them because they are of animal nature. Angels did not refuse the milk, butter, and meat that Abraham served them (Genesis 18: 6 and 7).

The fruit of the vine would include the varieties of berries and fruit, leafy green and root vegetables, lentils, nuts, and the different sugars. Notice that prudence is advised in the use of these foods. It is unwise to eat too much sugar, too many starches, vegetables, such as potatoes, or too much raw fruit and vegetables at one time.

Grain, the "staff of life," is also essential in the diet. Though all grains were ordained for man, wheat is designated as the best for his use. This has been confirmed by research workers, who declare wheat to be almost a perfect food. Through testing, it has been revealed that people can live entirely on whole wheat for months. But the refined products of the grain, as well as polished rice and other denatured cereals, should be avoided, or better still, excluded from the diet. However, if one prepares an occasional dish of rice or macaroni, or a fine cake made with white flour and white sugar, he does not need to feel as if he should pull down the shades to eat it. Neither is it wrong to eat meat sparingly, in times of cold or winter. In spite of the clearness of the Lord's word on this subject, it is believed by some to be both a physical and moral wrong to eat meat. To prove this, they call attention to the supposed suffering of the animal, quote an isolated Scripture, and refer to the stories of Daniel and the Israelites in the wilderness.

By talking to men who have worked in packing houses, I have learned that the killing is done so quickly and humanely that the animal is not frightened and suffers little, if any pain. It is over, they say, in a twinkling of the eye. Physicians tell us that pain does not accompany instantaneous death. Meat is to be used with "thanksgiving," not with morbid awareness of suffering of the animal probably never even felt.

If it is wrong to eat chicken, beef, or mutton because of any possible suffering inflicted upon the animal, the same applies to fish. Yet, through his miracles, Jesus indorsed this food. Futhermore, after his Resurrection, he prepared bread and fish for his disciples and on one occasion ate a piece of fish and honeycomb. It is interesting to note the latter was recorded by Luke, the physician. Jesus ate these foods, some people say, to convince his disciples that he, indeed, had a body, but the bread alone could have accomplished this purpose.

Before his Crucifixion, Jesus ate the passover lamb. If it were wrong to eat meat, he would not have done so, especially in a religious ceremony or observance. One might say that in instituting the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, he did away with the eating of meat, but such a statement would be out of harmony with latter-day revelations.

From one of these revelations a Scripture is isolated to prove that it is wrong to eat meat. It might be best to quote the entire paragraph:

"And again, I say unto you, that whoso forbiddeth to marry, is not ordained of God, for marriage is ordained of God unto man; wherefore it is lawful that he should have one wife and they twain shall be one flesh and all this that the earth might answer the end of its creation: and that it might be filled with the measure of man according to his creation before the world was made. And whoso forbiddeth to abstain from meat, that man should not eat the same, is not ordained of God; for behold the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the air, and that which cometh of the earth, is ordained for the use of man, for food, and for raiment, and that he might have in abundance, but it is not given that one man should possess that which is above another; wherefore the world lieth in sin; and woe be unto that man that sheddeth blood and wasteth flesh and hath no need."—Section 49: 3.

The last sentence is the one referred to by vegetarians, "People do not need meat," they say, "therefore it is wrong to eat it." Now let us look at this in a logical way. If a man had no need of meat for food, why did God ordain it for that purpose? "To be eaten in times of famine," one might answer, but is this the only time designated in the Word of Wisdom? "It is pleasing unto me," saith the Lord, "that they should not be used only in times of winter, or of cold, or famine." Since the degree of cold was not specified, in quoting the Scripture, some interpolate the words extreme or bitter.

No man has the right to add to or take from the Word of God. Deuteronomy 4: 2, "Ye shall not add to the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish aught from it." And again in Revelation 22: 18, 19, "If any man shall add unto these things God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book. And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book."

Interpreted in connection with the whole, the Scripture in question undoubtedly refers to the needless and wanton destruction of animals, such as has occurred in the history of our country. A hundred years ago, the forests abounded with them. Sometimes men hunted for the questionable thrill of it, leaving the body to lie where it had fallen. Hundreds upon hundreds of buffalo were slaughtered, not for food, but for gain, their flesh left to waste upon the plains. Seals were also subjected to man's greed and cruelty. The carrier pigeon became extinct. Many an animal died simply because someone had an itching trigger finger. Game laws had to be passed to protect the creatures of the woods and fields from man's folly. According to the Word of Wisdom, these wild animals are not to be used, except in times of famine and excess hunger.

When you read the foregoing revelation, did you notice that marriage and the eating of meat are classed together? Is this not significant? Both pertain to this life. Both will be done away with, but it is not for us to set the time. Since they were placed in the same category, is it not reasonable to believe that it is as wrong to command to abstain from meat as to forbid to marry?

Paul has some definite and emphatic things to say on this subject. The similarity between his words and those of the Lord's proves that he was divinely motivated when he wrote, "Now, the spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared as with a hot iron, forbidding to marry and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth."—I Timothy 1: 3.

The remark has been made that Paul's views on meat-eating were in direct opposition to those of Daniel. But let us consider. The belief that Daniel was a strict vegetarian is based on assumption. He may or may not have been. The record does not say that he thought it wrong for people to eat meat. He objected to the king's wine and rich food. For ten days Daniel and his companions lived on pulse and water. If he had planned to show up the indigestible quality of the king's food, he could have chosen no better method, for at the end of the specified time, he and his three companions were fairer and fatter than the ones who had eaten at Nebuchadnezzar's tables. The details of Daniel's diet are not given. Of one thing we can be sure: as wise as he was, he selected all the foods requisite for health and strength.

To me, the lesson contained herein is not the value of a meatless diet, but of simple, wholesome foods in contrast to rich ones, such as were served on the king's table. Meager meals of herbs are preferable to those composed chiefly of protein, starch, and fat. People eat too many of these foods. Even Saints eat too much meat, which is not in keeping with the Word of Wisdom. Some people, like the Israelites in the wilderness, have an inordinate desire for the flesh pots. Scorning the simple manna of food, they overload their stomachs with meats, rich gravies, pastries, fried foods, and vegetables dripping with grease and salted and peppered with a lavish hand. Like the Israelites, they suffer physically and often spiritually.

The story of the Israelites is sometimes told incorrectly. As a result, some believe that after a month's gorging on quail, these people sickened and died. Such is not the case. "While the flesh was yet between their teeth, ere it was chewed," the plague struck them. It was not the effect of eating meat that killed them, but their lust. If it is wrong for us to eat meat because they lusted for it, it is wrong to eat melons, cucumbers, leeks, onions, and garlic (Numbers 11: 5).

The antithesis to the above story is found in the Book of Mormon. In the wilderness, Lehi and his family lived entirely on raw meat, which the Lord made sweet to their taste. On this food the women grew strong as men. If the stories of Daniel and the Israelites are proof of the wrongness of eating meat, following the same line of reasoning, the story of Lehi and his family is proof of the rightness of eating it.

From the story of Lehi, we can derive a needful and timely lesson: We should not be too concerned about diet. If we do the best we can with what we have, using common sense plus the Word of Wisdom in determining our diet, the blessing pronounced upon it will supply any deficiency. Although everyone should know the essentials of diet, there is no need to fret and worry over what should or should not be eaten, reading a lot of books that may lead to confusion. Food specialists and dietitians disagree. As one woman so aptly expressed it, "Some of the things they advocate are ridiculous to the extreme." For example, here comes one with the theory that protein and starch should not be eaten at the same meal. If this were true, we could not eat the whole grain of wheat. Anyone who says we should avoid wheat and should never eat meat has wittingly placed himself above God, who ordained these foods for our use. Wrong in one thing, he may be wrong in another. By following the instructions of such a dietitian, one places his health in jeopardy. After all, our prime consideration should be righteousness, not food. This was the teaching of Jesus. We read in Matthew 6: 25, 28, and in Mark 7: 15, 16, "Therefore take no thought, saying, what shall we eat? or what shall we drink? nor where withal shall we be clothed? Why is it ye murmur among yourselves saying, we cannot obey the words because we have not all these things, and seek to excuse yourselves, saying that, after all these things do the Gentiles seek. Behold I say unto you, that your Heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. Wherefore seek not the things of this world; but seek ye first to build up this kingdom of God and establish his righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you." "There is nothing from without that entering into a man, can defile him, which is food; but the things which come out of him; those are they that defile a man, that proceedeth forth out of the heart."

Celestial glory is not contingent upon any kind of diet, but upon the purity of our hearts and the righteousness of our lives.

What Type of Fruit

Are YOU Bearing?

By BERNIE FLEEHARTY

The author is well remembered as a student leader at Graceland College, and her many friends will welcome this contribution. At present she is engaged in professional work in Independence, and is identified with the Fellowship Class of Stone Church.

FOR THE PAST FEW WEEKS we have been making self-observations as to the separate fruits of the spirit in our mid-week devotion services. This stimulation has caused me to analyze more carefully the phrase "fruits of the spirit." Thus, in my deliberate meditations the thought has recurred to me how like the growth of a fruit tree our lives really are. In the beginning, nature, or God if you prefer to call it that, has provided in its fundamental laws of the universe the inevitable principle of growth and development. Growth, then, is an innate factor of both plant and animal and is governed, therefore, by the principles of the universe.

If growth is understood in this light, we then find that it no longer presents itself to us as a mysterious thing, but rather as a natural, easy, and inevitable principle of God. The mere failure to recognize this fact does not defy the principles of God's creation, nor does it stop growth. Beautiful flower gardens are menaced by the growth of unsightly weeds. Both the flowers and the weeds, however, grow because God instituted growth, without partiality, as a part of his universe, and because he set in his universe the sun, the rain, the soil elements, and other requirements to aid in this development. By the same process is governed the growth of children and adults, noblemen and criminals, delinquents and social contributors, as well as men of integrity and thieves. They differ only in their growth in the form which this growth takes which is conditioned by the constituents of their make-up.

An apple seed is planted. It may fall in fertile soil, absorb moisture and food from the air and ground, swell, burst, and spring forth from the ground. Its reception to its new life is the light and sunshine which enables it to continue its growth and to send forth its fruit to the world. Or, the seed may fall in hard, dry soil which is lacking in its chemical makeup and fail to burst forth in foliage. Nevertheless, the principle of growth and of struggle for life is there. Between the time the seed is planted in the unkept soil and the time it withers and dies, the process of growth is in operation. This is apparent in life itself.

An individual is born into the loving care of parents and of God who nurture, and protect him. That individual represents power, just as the seed in fertile soil does. His potentialities are limited only by the type of environment which is his, either by choice or by fate. When that child reaches the age of accountability, he is baptized and confirmed. God, then, sends an additional strength to comfort and protect him. This spirit is comparable to the sunshine which enables the apple sprout to grow and bear fruit. As the sprout grows and develops, there may be things which come uninvited into the realm of its growth. Gales of wind may threaten the stature of its growth. Excessive or inadequate sun or rain may stunt its growth and development. It may be trampled by animals who thoughtlessly disregard it. Small pieces of this carefully assimilated piece of nature may be broken from its source of life and lost. But if the roots have been firmly grounded, the plant will draw from its reserves and will continue its growth according to the quantity and quality of its reserve.

I have seen man blown about by every wind of doctrine. I have observed intemperance in man, and, furthermore, I have seen him trampled by the thoughtlessness of others; and having been shut off from the source of life, he has died a spiritual death. I have made other observations in regard to these men. Some have had the faith necessary to withstand the destroyers of their spirit. Others have wilted and become unlovely and useless because they have failed to recognize the plan of God.

We are told that life in any form is active. In the tree there is a constant breaking down of protoplasm and the building up of new. There is the incomprehensible program pertaining to the assimilation of food which is constantly taking place in growth. Man's spirit grows, also, in a like manner. There must be a constant intake and expulsion of ideas, thoughts, experiments, social contacts, concessions, apologies, contributions, etc. And, thus, we grow. The growth which takes place, however, is not without regard to the type of mental and physical activity, because this activity is the seed which produces after its own kind. The sprout, in the process of time, continues to grow until eventually we no longer identify it among the sprout family, but are forced by its very nature to recognize it as a small tree. Have you not known persons who compel you by their nature to recognize them not as a mere individual, but as a Christian, as a steward of God, and as a contributor to the society in which you live. As one, being thus recognized, continues to grow, there comes to him the convictions of experiences. This may be likened to the bark which forms around the tree. Its purpose is protection and strength.

Having observed the principles of growth, development, and of time, having withstood the winds and the tests of life, and having absorbed certain elements and experiences, man, like the apple tree, may bring forth a beautiful blossom. This again is the natural consequence. It is not miraculous, it is only exemplifying other principles of the universe which God set there in the beginning; that of orderliness, potentiality, and of purpose. The beauty of this blossom may vary as may the stature of the tree and the personality and character of man. Nevertheless, from this apple blossom there is sure to be developed, not a pear or an orange, but an apple, because that is the purpose of the blossom, and because before the blossom took form there was assimilated apple-making constituents. Each tree must develop fruit after its own kind, and in line with its own purpose. Even so with human beings. Therefore, can we not see how imperative it is for us to have a clearly established, constructive purpose in life? Some apple trees may produce large, lovely, red, delicious fruit whose versatility enables it to be used in many ways and in many situations. It may be used in a salad or a pie. It may be baked or fried. Or, it may even be used as a delightful, beautiful centerpiece. Other trees may bring forth small, unlovely, ill-shaped, wormy apples whose nature and imperfections may limit their use to apple butter. But the fruit will be there. And in the lives of men and women there will be fruit, for that is the purpose of man. Therefore, the concern of every interested and thinking individual today is not the bringing forth of fruit. That is God's promise to us as he set in his universe the laws of growth, development, potentiality, variety, purpose, etc. But rather our concern should be the precision by which we align ourselves with those principles which in turn will determine the type of fruit which we bear. It is not hard to find apple butter individuals who will contribute to their own home, to their own community, to their own church, and to their own country as long as it is conveniently arranged for them to do so. But many have suggested the lack of eager individuals who will volunteer to create, with God, such a contagious personality and character whose services and nature will offer to the world a carefully assimilated, methodical life comparable to the decorative apple. Or, in other words, an individual whose imperfections are so minute as to qualify him for the highest classification, even that of the celestial glory. After the apple tree has produced its fruit and has given its contribution to the season, it takes on the appearance of death. In its expectancy and faith, however, it bursts forth anew in the warm sunshine of a new season with a new purpose. This time in all its previous majesty, beauty, and power, but still after its own kind. Is this not comparable to our belief in the resurrection?

The Church as a Social and Religious Center

By Alfred W. Smith

I read with interest the challenge by Brother Elbert Dempsey, Jr. I appreciate his feeling, for I, too, have spent the past three years in the Army.

It would be well if the individual branches would apply this challenge to themselves. During the last sixteen months, I have been confined to various army hospitals, and as often as possible I have attended services at branches near by. I have come to feel that we should make our church the center of our social as well as religious activities. Certainly the world does not offer us a worth-while program for recreation. Out of a specific program for all our people should come material for inspired leadership. We must build our own social life around our ideals and philosophy of life.

There is a crying need in many small branches for planned services. The last-minute selections of songs and spur-of-the-moment prayers are out of date. Our services must be well-organized if we are to appeal to people who are learning precision and efficiency in our schools and businesses.

Not long ago we visited a branch where the morning adult class time was devoted to drafting a letter to the Presidency, asking why more wasn't being done about the establishment of Zion. In the arguments and flurries of temper, it was brought out that only about ten per cent of that membership were tithe-payers. To me it was obvious why that branch wasn't establishing Zion.

A few days ago I had a copy of Elbert A. Smith's A Study in Prophecy on my bed table. A chaplain visiting the men in the ward noticed the book and after talking to several of my neighbors came to my bed. He inquired about the book, but when I attempted to show it to him and tell him about it, he walked off, leaving me to talk to myself. The church has a long way to go before the gospel will be preached to every kindred tongue and people. However, there is a spiritual awakening in process throughout our church. It will come to all who are willing to lend an ear and listen to the still, small voice as it administers to us. But we must make every effort possible. I have noticed in prayer meetings that too often those who can assume comfortable positions bending forward, instead of kneeling, never fail to ask God for many blessings.

The church is taking a big step in the right direction by calling in the missionary arm of the church for special instruction. Out of this will come the nucleus of revitalized men who will help us kindle the fires bigger and brighter in our branches. From rejuvenated branches will come more young people with a zeal for the building of the kingdom.

The world today is calling for a demonstration of what a truly God-conscious and devoted people can do for humanity. Are we going to be able to answer that call?

Worship Suggestions for December

By Leola LeLone Sheppard and Thelona D. Stevens

Theme for the Month:

REJOICING IN JESUS

December 1, 1946

Theme: JESUS AS THE WAY.

Call to Worship:

"Thomas saith unto him, Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way? Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father, but by me."—John 14: 5, 6.

Hymn: "Lead on, King Eternal," Saints' Hymnal, 181.

Prayer

Scripture Reading:

"And now behold I say unto you, that the right way is to believe in Christ, and deny him not; and Christ is the Holy One of Israel; Wherefore ye must bow down before him, and worship him with all your might, mind and strength, and your whole soul."—2 Nephi 11: 55, 56.

"In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And when I go, I will prepare a place for you, and come again, and receive you unto myself; and where I am, ye may be also."—John 14: 2, 3, Inspired Version.

"And now behold, my beloved brethren, this is the way; and there is none other way nor name given under heaven, whereby man can be saved in the kingdom of God."—2 Nephi 13: 31.

"And I will prepare the way before you, if it so be that ye shall keep my commandments."—1 Nephi 5: 78.

Solo or Chorus: "Jesus Is the Light, the Way," Zion's Praises, 77.

Challenge:

To every man there openeth
A way, and ways, and a way
And the high soul climbs the high way
And the low soul gropes the low;
And in between on the misty flats
The rest drift to and fro.
But to every man there openeth
A high way and a low
And every man decideth
The way his soul shall go.

—John Oxenham.

Talk:

Jesus said to Thomas, "I am the way." No man cometh to the Father except through Jesus. Jesus is the way; if we walk therein we cannot go astray. Jesus was a man of strength and power as well as a man of peace and love. He will help us in every walk of life. In time of sorrow when we need comfort, in time of trial when we need strength and courage. There is no time in our lives that we need to look to any other source.

Give us a virile Christ for these rough days!
You painters, sculptors, show the warrior bold;
And you who turn mere words to gleaming gold,

Too long your lips have sounded in the praise
Of patience and humility. Our ways
Have parted with the quietude of old;
We need a man of strength with us to hold
The very breach of Death without amaze.

Did he not scourge from temple courts the thieves?

And make the arch-fiend's self again to fall?
And blast the fig tree that was only leaves?
And still the raging tumult of the seas?
Did he not bear the greatest pain of all
Silent, upon the cross of Calvary?

—Rex Boundy.

Look only to Jesus to find the way to happiness, strength, and your soul salvation, for Jesus said, "I am the Way."

December 8, 1946

Theme: JESUS AS THE LIFE

Call to Worship:

"And Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst."—John 6: 35.

Hymn: "My Jesus, I Love Thee," Saints' Hymnal, 12.

Prayer

Scripture Reading:

"... my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. Then they said unto him, Lord, evermore give us this bread. And Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life. . . . For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. . . . I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever; and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. . . . Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up in the resurrection of the just at the last day."—John 32-54.

Hymn: "Break Thou the Bread of Life," Saints' Hymnal, 70.

Talk:

The only way to live is to eat the bread of life. Jesus said, "Blessed are all they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled with the Holy Ghost."—Matthew 5: 8, Inspired Version. There is never any lack if we look to Jesus. The trouble is, too few of us look. We are satisfied not to be filled. Too many of us are spiritual anemics. We need a good square meal of spiritual food. We need a greater desire to grow in the stature and likeness of Christ. Those who truly seek God and come in through the door of his kingdom, are heirs of the promise to be filled with the Holy Comforter Jesus promised. When we worthily partake of the sacred emblems at the Lord's Supper, the promise is that we shall be given strength to keep our covenant, and to grow more Christlike.

Reading:

I am the bread of life.
Eat and be filled,
That you may have the strength
Never to yield
To any lesser thing
Than good and right.

I am life's fountain.
I am the light.
If you do hunger,

Eat of the bread
That giveth light and life;
From Jesus be fed.

—Leola Sheppard.

December 15, 1946

Theme: JESUS AS THE LIGHT

Call to Worship:

"Then spake Jesus again unto them saying, I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life."—John 8: 12.

Hymn: "Walk in the Light," Saints' Hymnal, 320.

Scripture Readings:

"I am the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world; And I am in the Father and the Father in me, and the Father and I are one."—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 1.

"And the light which now shineth, which giveth you light, is through him who enlighteneth your eyes, which is the same light that quickeneth your understandings; which light proceedeth forth from the presence of God, to fill the immensity of space. The light which is in all things; which giveth life to all things; which is the law by which all things are governed."—Ibid., 85: 3.

"Behold, I am Jesus Christ, of whom the prophets testified should come into the world: And behold, I am the light and life of the world."—3 Nephi 5: 11, 12.

Talk:

Jesus said to the people: "Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you; for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth. While ye have the light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light."—John 12: 35, 36. Also he said, "I give unto you to be the light of the world."—Matthew 5: 16, Inspired Version. Are we living up to our privileges and also to God's expectations of us? Are we the "children of light"—"the light of the world"? When we open our hearts to him, his light shines in to show us the way. When we close our hearts, we shut out the light and walk in darkness. We are under condemnation before God when we do not live up to the privileges which are ours, for John wrote, "And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil."—John 3: 19. Are we guilty along with the world of perceiving not the light of Christ? If the light of Christ shines in us, it is like "a city that is set on a hill" which "cannot be hid." The world should see Jesus through us.

MIRRORS

Each son of man a mirror is,
His life an image of
His concept of that Mighty One
Who ruleth from above.

And God is searching constantly;
He looks in all he finds,
But each reflects a different face
And many different minds.

God does not want an image that
Is blurred or weak or dim;
He seeks clean lives and perfect ones
That truly mirror him.

He wants no distortions queer,
And darkness not at all,
Nor can he use a glass that's cracked
Or broken from a fall!

But when he finds a mirror fine,
That's clean and bright and fair,

He holds it up that all might see
His face reflected there.
—Dorothy Wells.

Hymn: "'Tis a Glorious Thing to Be in the Light," Saints' Hymnal, 410.

December 22, 1946

Theme: JESUS AS THE TRUTH

Call to Worship:

Once long ago, a little babe was born in Bethlehem,
A stable was his room; a manger piled with hay, his crib;
The Christmas lights—the glory shining down on Judah's hill;
The carollers—the charming angels of the Lord.

The Wise Men came from far
To lay their gifts beneath those baby hands; Gold—for he shall reign a King within the hearts of men,
His kingdom flatters neither wealth nor birth,
Nor stay at any boundary line;
Frankincense—for here before them was the great High Priest;
And myrrh—oh, strange, prophetic insight that foresaw
The pain and suffering of his earthly life.

And humble shepherds worshiped beside that lowly bed,
For His days shall be spent with men of common clay—
Men of the field and sea and town and mart, Who still had need to know the majesty of man.

Today we tell again this story never old,
Oh, may it's telling burn into the hearts of men;
And we—we sense again the greatness of our task
Because, once long ago, a little babe was born in Bethlehem.
—Walter N. Johnson.

Hymn: "O Little Town of Bethlehem," *Saints'
Hymnal*, 144.

Prayer

Scripture Reading:

Luke 2: 1-21, Inspired Version.

Talk:

"For the law was given through Moses, but life and truth came through Jesus Christ."— John 1: 17, Inspired Version. Jesus was born in Bethlehem of humble parents. He grew up with men; he walked and talked with every man who would listen to him. Thus we came to know him. He is truth, truth that will last always, for truth is without beginning or end.
Thus the Christmas story will be retold until the end of the world, but truth will not die.
Jesus said, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." Jesus was born into the world that we might know the truth and be made free. Jesus is the truth; learn of him, believe on him, accept him. King Herod was afraid of the truth, but we should ever be happy that Jesus was sent to us as the way, the truth, and the life.

O Holy Child of Bethlehem,
Descend to us, we pray;
Cast out our sin and enter in,
Be born in us today.
We hear the Christmas angels
The great glad tidings tell;
Oh, come to us, abide with us,
Our Lord Immanuel!
—Saints' Hymnal, 144.

Hymn: "Oh, Come, Let Us Adore Him,"
Saints' Hymnal, 145.

December 29, 1946

Theme: I WILL FOLLOW JESUS

Call to Worship:

I heard him call "Come follow."
That was all.
My gold grew dim;
My soul went after him.
Who would not answer
When he calls?

Hymn: "Saviour, I Follow On," *Saints'
Hymnal*, 268.

Prayer

Scripture Reading:

"Fear not, little children, for you are mine, and I have overcome the world, and you are of them that my Father hath given me; and none of them that my Father hath given me shall be lost; and the Father and I are one;
I am in the Father and the Father in me;
and inasmuch as ye have received me, ye are in me, and I in you; wherefore I am in your midst; and I am the good Shepherd (and the stone of Israel: he that buildeth upon this rock shall never fall), and the day cometh that you shall hear my voice and see me, and know that I am. Watch, therefore, that ye may be ready. Even so. Amen."—Doctrine and Covenants 50: 8.

Talk:

"Then said Jesus unto his disciples, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me."—Matthew 16: 25, Inspired Version; 16: 24, King
James. Many times Jesus said "follow me."
He is still asking us today to follow him.
Have you heard him call? He does not promise that the way will always be smooth.
He said, "take up your cross." He told his disciples that for a man to take up his cross was to deny himself all ungodliness, every worldly lust, and to keep his commandments.
And though, like Jesus, we carry a cross, and the way is not always easy, Jesus promised,
"Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you."
—John 14: 27. Jesus is a good shepherd, gently leading his sheep. He said, "My sheep hear my voice; and I know them, and they follow me; and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither any man pluck them out of my hand."—John 10: 27, 28.
Let us say with fervent meaning, "I will follow Jesus."

God hath not promised
Skies always blue,
Flower strewn pathways
All our lives through;
God hath not promised
Sun without rain,
Joy without sorrow,
Peace without pain.

But God hath promised
Strength for the day,
Rest from labor;
Light for the way,
Grace for the trials,
Help from above;
Unfading sympathy,
Undying love.

—Selected.

On," Saints' Hymnal, 267.

Notice to Church School Workers

TWO QUARTERLIES are no longer available. These are OUR CALL TO EVANGELISM and STUDIES IN THE ZIONIC HOME AND FAM-ILY. If you ordered these for the first quarter of this church school year and your order was filled, and not canceled by our order department, you can be assured of receiving the quarterlies for the second, third, and fourth quarters. You will need to continue to place your order each quarter, however.

These two quarterlies were advertised in the catalog to "be available only as long as the present supply lasts."
Now your demand has exhausted the supply. Please do not place your or-

ADVENTURES IN LATTER DAY SAINTISM

Playlet and Discussion

By Mary B. Hill

This is another in a series of supplementary program helps prepared by the author, who is Zion's League leader of Hamilton, Ontario, for use with the book, "Does It Make Any Difference?"

Four young people are seated at a table, with a Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants open in front of them. Jean and Arthur are Latter Day Saints, Ruth and Paul are not. The conversation has turned into a religious discussion.

Ruth: Well, of course I've heard of the Latter Day Saint church, but I've never bothered to look into it. I don't believe it makes any difference what church you belong to anyway.

Paul: I don't think so either. I know we don't all worship in the same way, but we're all aiming in the same direction, and hope to get to the same place when we die.

Arthur: Oh? Well, just in what direction are all Christian denominations aiming?

Ruth: You mean to say you don't know?

Arthur: Maybe not, at least I'm not too clear about it.

Ruth: I thought you were a good church man!

Arthur: Don't judge me too fast, Ruth. But Paul, you haven't answered my question.

Paul: What? Oh—yes—well—uh!—you know that as well as I do. We're all trying to be good, and—well—we're hoping to go to heaven, aren't we?

Ruth: Yes, and if we go to church every Sunday, and believe that Christ died for us, that's all that's necessary.

Jean: I disagree with you there, Ruth.

Ruth: In what way?

Jean: I believe there's more to it than that. I believe that a person's religion should become his way of life, interwoven into every thought, motive, and action.

Paul: But that's impossible. I don't see how that attitude will ever get you anywhere. You can't go around with a long face talking religion all the time. Besides, in this day and age it's every man for himself.

Arthur: That's just the trouble, Paul, it does seem as though it's every man for himself. But Jean didn't mean that religion was a way of life in the way you meant it. Our church believes that man's concern should not be for himself, but for others. We believe that God meant it this way, and has been trying to get men to follow his pattern for many ages.

Ruth: Oh, yes, we know that Jesus taught "thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

Jean: Yes, he did. But glancing over history proves to us that although a form of Christianity has been accepted in a large part of the world for centuries, and men have believed that Christ lived and died for us, men have not loved their neighbors as themselves, but have increasingly ignored the welfare of others till we have one war after another and each increasingly deadly. Paul just said that "nowadays it was every man for himself," yet you just said that men ought to love their neighbors. To my mind it is quite evident that the trouble with Christianity today is that it doesn't practice what it preaches.

Paul: Maybe so, but we have to make our own way in the world and support ourselves, and it seems to be the survival of the fittest. How can I help it, if I am forced to scramble for myself? Nobody's going to help me, that's certain. I think that's the way with nations, there's a certain amount of wealth to be had, trade, land, and so on, and the one that can grab the most gets the biggest prize.

Arthur: Should it be like that? Would Christ condone either individuals or nations for this attitude?

Paul: Perhaps not, but how can we help it? We have the Bible, all Christendom believes in it, and many of the countries fighting against each other go into battle quoting it. What's the remedy?

Jean: The remedy lies in two things, the re-establishment of direct contact with God, or revelation, and the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth.

Ruth: Whew! You don't bite off much, do you? Who ever heard tell of direct contact with God, outside of the Bible—and as for the kingdom of God, that's already here.

Arthur: What do you mean, Ruth, "already here"?

Ruth: Why, in the invisible church; or, to put it into simple English, it is made up of all the people in every church who believe in Christ.

Arthur: Do you think that the kingdom of God can be made of people who have dozens of different interpretations of the Bible, even to the extent of persecution and war? Christ said, "I come to bring peace not a sword." Can differences of opinion, fundamental and deep-rooted as many of them are, bring unity?

The Apostle Paul said in Ephesians 4: 5: "One faith, one hope, one baptism." In I Corinthians 12: 13, we read, "By one Spirit we are baptized into one body," and in the 20th verse, "But now are they many members, yet one body." He goes on to explain how, although the members perform different functions, that each function is necessary to the health of the body, and if one limb were cut off, the body would be impaired. The body mentioned here is a physical one, but just as it has many necessary parts, "and all members have not the same office," so the body of Christ, to which it is compared (I Cor. 12: 12), must have a definite form, with members performing various specified and necessary functions. How could an "invisible" church, with members believing and practicing what they like, working in many cases at direct variance with each other, be like a smoothly-running, healthy, complete individual?

Ruth: Why, I never thought of it that way before, in fact I didn't know the Bible said that.

Paul: But I thought we were discussing Christianity's failure to solve our problems. I can't see that discussing whether the church of Christ is visible or invisible makes any difference.

Jean: Well, if the church is a visible one, or one body of people, don't you think it would have a definite set of harmonizing beliefs?

Paul: Yes.

Jean: And if it was inspired by God, and in direct contact with him, would its teachings be wrong?

Paul: No.

Jean: If its teachings were right, and it was made up of a group of people dedicated to carrying out those teachings, would they not be in a better position, and constitute a much stronger force, than a group of people at odds with each other in beliefs and practices?

Paul: I would think so, the old saying says, "united we stick, divided we're stuck."

Jean: That's it. I think that is why Christianity is so impotent today. It cannot carry out its teachings effectively as it stands. You asked, "What's the remedy?" a little while ago. Well, I'd like to repeat that part of that remedy is in re-establishing contact with God.

Ruth: I pray to God, and I'm sure he hears me.

Arthur: Yes, I'm sure he does, Ruth. God hears honest souls everywhere, but worthy desires and ideals cannot avail much unless there is agreement and a united determined effort by a body large enough to accomplish these aims. We see that Christ's church would be more effective as a body of people, and it is Biblical to be such, but where would the value be if that body were as much at sea as the rest of Christianity? What would it teach and practice? If the Bible were authority enough, we'd have no confusion or doctrinal questions today.

Ruth: Yes, that's true. I'm sure I don't know definitely which church is right, and what's more, I've been secretly of the opinion no one else does.

Arthur: That's where divine revelation comes in. In 1830 a young boy named Joseph Smith felt exactly as you did, and decided to ask God which church in his neighborhood he should join. Some of his family favored one church, he favored another, but all claimed to be the way of salvation. Two personages appeared to him, and he was told to join none of them, as their doctrines were not those of God. From time to time after that he was visited by divine personages, and gradually the doctrine of Christ, in its original purity, was revealed to him.

Paul: Why, I never heard of such a thing. I always thought angels and things only appeared in the Bible (thoughtfully) but after all, would God neglect this day and age entirely?

Arthur: No, and he didn't. The church, as outlined by God to Joseph Smith was established in 1830, and has never lost contact with Him. In our church today we have the gifts as outlined by Paul in many places in the Bible, and through the present head of our church, Israel A. Smith, whom we call "Prophet, Seer, and Revelator," the will of God is revealed to the church.

Paul: Well, that's really something. But what's that got to do with the present world conditions?

Jean: Well, among other things, God has given us explicit instructions for the setting up of his kingdom on earth, or Zion, as it is called.

Ruth: The kingdom of God on earth?

Jean: Yes, it is not God's plan that there should be economic injustice, that "every man should be for himself," as you said, Paul. Christ meant what he said when he gave the great commandment that men should "Love the Lord their God with all their soul, mind, and strength and their neighbor as themselves," but because of the sinfulness of men, and the departure of Christianity from the original doctrine of Christ, men lost contact with God, and Christianity lost its value as a cure for the evils of the world, to a great extent. Indeed, for a time it was the perpetrator of many grievous ills.

Paul: That's right, there are a lot of pages in history that the Christian church would like to blot out. And your church proposes to correct these ills?

Arthur: Our church has the plan for doing so, revealed by God himself. A community will be set up, in fact is in the process of being set up now, where people will work for the community, where what they have will be a stewardship only, where the worthy poor will be cared for, and all will have their just needs and wants. There will be no thought of what the individual will get out of it, rather the thought will be "what will best serve the interests of all?" To that end doctors, teachers, manufacturers, farmers, musicians, and all others will work, and all factories, stores, etc., will be co-operatively owned. In time, the Bible says that the nations shall go up to Zion and learn of her ways.

Paul: I had no idea there was a church with such a plan in existence. But will this work? Will it ever get into operation, because goodness knows if ever we needed such an economic plan, we need it now, with the nations crying out for the "new order," and no one able to bring it to pass, seemingly.

Jean: Yes, Paul, it will work. It has worked before. Twice, at least, this plan has been in operation for about two hundred years, till the people began to forget God again. Satan has frustrated the purposes of God several times, but God has said that this time it will be established, and nothing can stop it.

Ruth: When was it in operation before?

Jean: During the time of Enoch, in the Old Testament days, and on this continent by the Nephites.

Ruth: This continent! Goodness sakes, I see where you and I are really going to have a discussion some night. Columbus and all that stuff's my dish. But how do you both figure in this Zion business? Are you going to go there, or anything?

Arthur: That's what Jean meant when she said that a person's religion should become a part of his life. You see, Ruth, Jean and I are looking forward with longing to the day when we will be in Zion. We are helping all we can now in our own branch work, also by keeping our financial records as the church has required, and paying what the Lord has commanded as his portion, a tithe, or a tenth of our surplus income. We are preparing to take our places, too, in the active work of Zion. Jean is studying to be a nurse, and I am planning to attend our church college, Graceland, in hopes of helping out in the priesthood work of our church, as well as becoming a teacher.

Ruth: Oh, (groan) and I thought religion was only going to church on Sunday!

Paul: If I could have the faith you both have, and really see some hope in all this present-day entanglement, I'd be the happiest man alive. I'd work, plan, study, and bend all my energies toward carrying it out.

Jean: You can have this hope and faith, Paul, if you will study and ask God to help you understand his will.

Ruth: (She and Paul rise from table and start toward door) May we come over another night and discuss all this some more? It's the most interesting thing I ever heard.

Arthur: You certainly may, any time you want to.

Ruth: It surely makes a difference what church you belong to! In your church it makes a difference in the way the individual plans and lives his whole life.

Paul: And the nature and mission of your church will make a difference in the ways of nations. It isn't just another Christian sect, but as you said, Jean, it is a way of life. God's way of life to men.

The Church and Its Young People

A Challenge From Santa Monica

By HARRIET JORDAN GLAZE

Several hundred women from all parts of Los Angeles county packed the large auditorium. They listened eagerly to the small, vivacious speaker, although hers was the last of a long list of speeches, and it was already past lunch time.

The occasion was the fall conference of the first district of the California Congress of Parents and Teachers, and the speaker was Mrs. Rollin Brown, president of the state organization. Her theme was a request that more be done for children in the coming year. But the high light of the speech was the challenge she issued, through those present, to the churches of America. It was a three-fold challenge.

1. Why don't you enter more into the life of the community?
2. Why do your pastors not spend more time with the young people?
3. Why don't you give more consideration to the children's and young people's quarters in the church?

Her challenge, of course, was directed to all churches. But if the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints has the destiny we believe it has, this was most truly a challenge to us. It was a crying out to us to save the children from being led along the same paths their elders have taken to war and other human sufferings.

Let us look at each one of her points separately. First—enter more into the life of the community. Why? In trying to keep ourselves uncontaminated by the world, have we held ourselves too much aloof? Christ didn't build himself a nice white church building and wait inside for people to come to him. He didn't even just send out missionaries to bring others to him. He went out into every place where there were people. He entered into whatever they were doing. He walked with the traveler, talked with the philosopher, fished with the fisherman, and so forth. Then he gave them his message in the way that helped their special need. Do we do likewise? Or are we so busy keeping the machinery of our own little branch or group running, that we have no time for mingling with our fellow men?

Pastors spend more time with the young people? How? Our pastors' schedules are already so brimming that one more activity would be the drop that spilled the cup. All right then, if we older ones have loaded down our "best men" with our own problems, take some of them back on our own shoulders. See to it some way that the youth within the church has the leadership it needs to find the satisfying way of life. Then there will be some hope that the youth outside the church will also see the signposts and find that right way also.

And finally—give more thought to youth's quarters in the church? Both why and how to this point. Why? Because children turn to beauty as instinctively as they do the out of doors. But there must be something beautiful to turn to. And turning toward the church is the first step in getting to the church. As for the how—if the budget limits the beautifying to only one part of the church, let it be the children's quarters. The oldsters should be well enough grounded to stay in the church even if the walls do need a little paint and the carpet is thin in places.

What are we going to do about this challenge? In many branches, I know, much has been done along one or all the lines mentioned in Mrs. Brown's challenge. But are there any who will say we've done enough?

Central Missouri Stake

The Central Missouri Stake Conference was held September 27, 28, and 29 at the Market Street Church in Warrensburg; attendance averaged 650. Apostle C. G. Mesley conducted a class on Friday evening, and another on Saturday. Stake President Ward A. Hougas was in charge of the Saturday morning prayer service and business session. Special meetings were held for the pastors, their associates, and high councilmen; church school directors and assistants; music directors; women's department; solicitors and bishop's agents; and young adults. Junior church was held for the children throughout the conference. A play, directed by Mrs. R. M. Hursh, was given Saturday night, followed by Howard Blatz' sleight of hand performance, and a travelogue by Apostle Mesley. Missionary Loyd Adams was in charge of the evening devotional. Sunday's activities included an ordination service at 9:30 a. m., a sermon by Apostle Charles Hield at 10:45, and the final service of the conference at 2 p. m., with Apostle Mesley as speaker. Meals were served by the women's department.

Grandview, Missouri

Pastor, Lester Bronson

The Jackson County Women's Chorus gave a concert of sacred music at the church on September 1. The annual business meeting was held September 4 with the following officers being elected: Lester Bronson, pastor; Russel Huffman, church school director; Mrs. G. H. Witzke, women's leader; and Mrs. Harold Morical, director of music. Missionary Loyd Adams has been visiting in the homes of nonmembers in preparation for the series of meetings he will hold soon. Approximately ninety per cent of the congregation attended the stake conference held in Warrensburg; L. K. Cockefair was ordained to the office of teacher at the conference. L. L. Bogue, who was seriously burned in an explosion, is steadily improving.

Ontario Thanksgiving Festival

The annual Ontario Youth Convention underwent a complete change this year. Organized in 1941 for the young people of the province, it has since outgrown its purpose. Rechristened the Ontario Thanksgiving Festival and held in London on the week end of October 12-14, it drew a record attendance of 600 people; all age groups and all districts of Ontario, as well as the neighboring States of Michigan and New York, were represented. Leaders for the convention were Bishops G. L. DeLapp and H. L. Livingston, and Apostles E. J. Gleazer and D. Blair Jensen. On Saturday evening the delegates attended a gala banquet in the Masonic Temple. Sunday was devoted almost entirely to classwork, with the guest leaders in charge of individual classes. In the evening sermon, Bishop DeLapp spoke on the festival theme, "The Stewardship in the Church in Ontario." The young people enjoyed a period of recreation at Springbank Park on Monday morning under the leadership of J. F. Sheehy. At 2 p.m., Dr. E. V. Shute of London delivered a health lecture. London Branch was host to the members of other districts at this convention. Through the co-operation of the local Saints, provisions were made for the billeting of all out-of-town guests.

Providence, Rhode Island

Pastor, A. A. Scherer

At a special business meeting held August 21, Mrs. A. W. Bradbury was elected church school director to replace Charles E. Cockcroft, who recently re-enlisted in the Army. Mrs. Bradbury's assistant will be Priest Earl Brown. District President Reed Holmes conducted "Morning Devotions" over station WJAR on August 27, a feature sponsored by the Rhode Island Council of Churches. A farewell party and shower were given Lillian Cockcroft on September 11, before she left to join her husband in Crestville, Florida. A combined meeting of the Loyal Workers and Marietta Club, with their husbands as guests, was held at the church on September 21. Gladys Loyd, women's leader, conducted the meeting. Talks were given by Florence Sinclair, district women's leader, Pastor A. A. Scherer, and Elder E. M. Brown, former pastor. Officers of both clubs also gave brief addresses. A program and social hour followed the meeting. The combined women's groups met on October 4 and elected the following officers: Mrs. Clayton Loyd, president; Mrs. A. A. Scherer, vice-president; and Mrs. H. A. Chelline, secretary-treasurer.

Hewitt, historian and publicity agent; Ellen Brown and Arlo Hodgson, auditors. J. V. Dent and V. E. Pritchard were elected members of the Erie Beach Reunion Committee to represent Chatham District. District President J. A. Pray succeeds Elder H. A. Engle who has been transferred to the Southern Michigan and Northern Indiana Districts. Meals were served by the women's department throughout the conference. A short fellowship service was held following dinner on Saturday evening.

Apostle D. Blair Jensen presided over the 9 a.m. prayer service on Sunday morning, and Apostle Gleazer spoke at 11 o'clock. After the noon meal on Sunday, members of the priesthood met in the lower auditorium, while the women held their meeting in the main auditorium. The Communion was served at 3 p.m. District President J. A. Pray spoke in the evening. Solos were sung by Gladys afternoon and evening services; other special music was provided by the Ferguson and W. J. Clark at the Chatham senior choir.

Chatham, Ontario

Pastor, Harry A. Engle

Chatham Branch church school held open house on Friday evening, October 4, at which time all teachers and officers were present to meet parents and friends of the children, and to display church school materials. At 8:30 a special parent-teacher conference was held with Edith Atkinson in charge. The solutions to various problems of the home and church school were discussed. Later the teachers, officers, and those interested in church school endeavor gathered at the home of Pastor and Mrs. Harry Engle for further discussion, and refreshments.

On Sunday morning, September 29, special promotion services were held in the main auditorium for the junior church school. John Bowman, church school director, read the names of the members of each class, after which the students accompanied their teachers in a processional to the various classrooms in the lower auditorium for a "get acquainted" session. At the evening service, church school officers and teachers for the coming year were installed. These two services introduced Religious Emphasis Week in the branch.

Members of the women's department have begun their fall activities; they were responsible for the meals served at the church during the Chatham District Conference held October 5 and 6. A fall "round-up" party, sponsored by the church school teachers, was held at the church, September 26, and the Zion's League held a social evening at the Bowman home on October 1. The two Oriole and Blue Bird groups have started on their activities for the year. The Men's Club held an organization meeting at the church on Wednesday evening, October 16, for the election of officers and planning of programs. A successful rummage sale was sponsored by the members of the local council of women on Friday afternoon, October 18; the funds will be used in promoting girls' work. Chatham branch was represented at both the Religious Education Institute and Ontario Thanksgiving Festival held in London, September 12-15 and October 12-14 respectively. Graceland College Day was observed at the evening service on October 20, with Elder J. A. Pray of Port Huron, Michigan, as speaker. Betty Engle also gave a talk, and the senior choir sang the Graceland Alma Mater Hymn.

—G. Ferguson, reporter.

Sparta, Wisconsin

The women's Zion's League meeting was held October 10 at the home of Phoebe Brockman. Officers for the coming year were elected, and Mrs. Lafferty exhibited a collection of handmade articles from various groups, which are to be sold at a bazaar in the near future. At present the Doctrine and Covenants is being used as a study course. The November meeting will be held at Electa Brockman's home.

—Mrs. Avis Ingham, reporter.

Hamilton, Ontario

Pastor, E. M. Kennedy

An installation service was held at 10 a.m. on Sunday, October 6. In the absence of the former pastor, F. J. Boyd, Patriarch B. H. Hewitt of Toronto was in charge. The officers of the branch and church school took their places, facing the altar as their names were called. A charge was given to both the members of the congregation and the officers by Brother Boyd; Sister Kniffen, branch secretary gave a response to the charge and read "A Latter Day Saint Pledge." All officers accepted the pledge, after which Elder E. M. Kennedy, newly-elected pastor, and his associate, Ashley McAninch, were presented to the group. Solos were sung by Austin Essery and Valerie Whitaker.

A farewell party and shower were given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Kennedy on Wednesday evening, October 9. They are moving to Ingersol, Ontario, where Mr. Kennedy will teach. Elder Essery, L. W. Hill, and members of the women's department were responsible for the evening's entertainment.

—E. M. Kennedy, reporter.

Wellsburg, West Virginia

Pastor, S. M. Zonker

The thirty-second anniversary of the founding of Wellsburg Branch was celebrated October 12 and 13. Saturday evening's service featured the dramatization of the first business meeting held in 1914 for the organization of the group. Charter members reviewed the hardships and sacrifices involved in establishing the church, and told of the campaign sponsored by the women of the congregation to raise money. Elders R. E. Rodgers and Williard Allen were in charge of the early morning prayer service on Sunday, at which the Spirit of God was present in great power. Church school was conducted by John Treiber; the theme, "The Lost Sheep," was set by the choir's presentation of "The Ninety and Nine," Lenora Nixon directing. Pastor S. M. Zonker gave the 11 o'clock sermon, speaking on "Why Love Church?". A basket lunch was served by the Live Wire Class at noon. Raymond and Robert Smith, and William Postlethwait were baptized in the afternoon by John Treiber. Eugene Chadwell was ordained to the office of teacher, Pastor S. M. Zonker and Otto Melcher officiating. Pictures were taken of both services. John Treiber gave the evening message. Printed programs and a floral arrangement of ferns and flowers added to the beauty of the service. Charter members present were Mr. and Mrs. Williard Allen, Cora Melcher, and Clyde Zonker.

Central Michigan District Reunion

The Central Michigan District Reunion was held August 4 to 11 at Liahona Park. There were approximately one hundred tents and seventeen trailers on the grounds throughout the reunion; attendance at all services was exceptionally large. Leaders included Apostle Blair Jensen, Elder John F. Sheehy, Virgil Billings, and Merle Howard, District President B. H. Doty, and many local workers from both the Central and Southern Michigan Districts. The reunion theme was "Forward with God."

Junior church was conducted each day, with Elder Clarence Dudley as junior pastor. The children's activities were supervised by Beatrice Cook and her assistants, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Twining, Emma Ouderkirk, and Myrtle Kintner. Virgil Billings and Merle Howard were in charge of recreation. The department of women was under the leadership of Mrs. B. H. Doty. Lectures were given each day on various subjects vital to the improvement of the home. One of the high lights of the women's activities was the annual bazaar; $922 was netted from the art work. The reunion fund was increased by $650 through the contributions of friends and members. Many improvements have been planned, which will make Liahona Park one of the outstanding reunion grounds. At present, a cottage is being erected for missionary quarters.

—Winnie Hulbert, reporter.

Parker, South Dakota

The annual reunion of Saints and friends in the Parker, South Dakota, area was held Sunday, October 20, at the C. R. Buller home. Thirty people were present, nineteen of them nonmembers. Following the dinner, Elder Buller talked to the group, and his daughter, Kathryn, sang a solo. Later the Communion was served, and three of the members received administration. In addition to the oblation, a collection was taken to buy new songbooks. It was a day long to be remembered by the isolated Saints who posed, as a group, for pictures before returning to their homes.

—Cora Emerson, reporter.

Cadillac, Michigan

A district meeting was held in Cadillac on Sunday, October 20. The day's services consisted of a social hour at 10 a.m., followed by a business session at which delegates to General Conference were elected. In the afternoon Elders H. A. Doty, Ray Dick, and Harry L. Doty spoke on education, the work of the church school, and branch co-ordination. A co-operative dinner was served at noon. Members from all branches in the district were present for this special meeting.

—Mary Tubbs, reporter.

St. Thomas, Ontario

On October 20, Ella Pearl and Ethel Irene Laur were baptized by Elder Nelson Kelley, and confirmed by Elders Duncan Clatworthy and Nelson Kelley.

—Hazel Ford, reporter.

Independence, Missouri

City-Wide Women's Institute

Over five hundred women attended the city-wide women's institute held in Independence October 16 to 18; many of them were from out-of-town, and several were nonmembers. Each day's activities included a 10 a.m. prayer service in charge of Charles Graham, R. V. Hopkins, and Glaude Smith; an 11 o'clock sermon with William Patterson, John Darling, and Charles Graham as speakers; and an afternoon class conducted by Mrs. V. D. Ruch of Council Bluffs, Iowa. On Friday, Mrs. Ruch presented a pantomime depicting family worship. Mr. and Mrs. Clair Green, their son, Kenneth, and daughter, Marily, and Sharon Mills portrayed the family. The institute closed with a rededication and consecration service. Mrs. Clayton Wolfe was the pianist throughout, and planned the special musical numbers for the services. These were given by Jeannette Nichols, Helen Baird, Sue Thoman, Thea Leonard, Dorothy Fry, Florence Simmons, Imogene Robison, Norma Smith, Eloise Steele, and Dorothy Hamilton. The planning committee for the institute included Mrs. Alice Kelsey, Mrs. Blanche Gault, Mrs. Bea Darling, and Mrs. Blanche Green.

Enoch Hill Congregation

Pastor, Everett West

The annual election of officers was held August 20. Pastor Lawrence E. Martin introduced the new pastor, Elder Everett West, Elders A. Elmo Boos and Alma T. Whipple were elected associate pastors. Other officers are James Daugherty, church school superintendent; David Young, junior church pastor; Richard Maloney, director of music; Vera Boos, women's leader; Nina and Richard Maloney, young people's supervisors; J. C. Alexander, bishop; Frances Hartman, secretary; and W. H. Stevens, custodian. At the evening service on September 29, Pastor West and each of the officers gave short testimonies of consecration. Following an instrumental prelude by Helen Griffin, Robert Young sang a solo, and President Israel A. Smith gave a charge to the officers and the congregation.

—Frances Hartman, reporter.

Saint Paul, Minneapolis

Pastor, Dudley Moody

Robert Cassidy was ordained recently by his brother, Donald Cassidy, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Special music for the ordination service was provided by Mary Cassidy and a quartet. Following his ordination, Brother Cassidy gave the Sunday sermon using John 3: 16 for his text.

Southern Indiana District Reunion

Approximately 130 people registered for the Southern Indiana District Reunion held in Rivervale Park, August 10 to 18. An early prayer service was held each day, followed by classwork. Afternoons were devoted to recreation and evenings to preaching. The young people were responsible for a short entertainment feature after the sermon. Apostle M. A. McConley, Patriarch F. A. Smith, High Priest E. F. Robertson, and Elders Hayden and Breckenridge were instrumental in making the reunion a success. Over 2,400 meals were served from the reunion kitchen, and $300 worth of books was sold in the bookstore.

Detroit-Windsor District

The annual conference of the Detroit-Windsor District was held Sunday, September 29. The day began with a prayer service presided over by District President W. Blair McClain, Apostle E. J. Gleazer, and Elder James Pycok. Apostle Gleazer was the 11 o'clock speaker; his topic, "The Church's Program for Us." Dinner was served in the lower auditorium by the women of Central Church. After the reading of district reports, officers for the coming year were elected at the afternoon business session. The present staff of officers is as follows: W. Blair McClain, district president; Clarence Heaviland and J. A. W. Kettlewell, counselors; Harry Depew, secretary; Eldon V. Osborn, director of religious education; Glada Crinzi, women's leader; Richard L. Gault, director of music; J. A. W. Kettlewell, historian; Richard K. Wood, young people's supervisor; S. C. Sharer and Herbert Voltman, reunion committee. The district bishopric was unanimously sustained. Five recommendations for ordination were approved by the conference; they were: Carl Heaviland, elder; Clarence Severn and Howard McKenzie, priests; Albert Dahlstrom, teacher; and Kenneth Nevels, Jr., deacon. The evening meal was again served by the women's department. Ninety-one persons attended the worship service held at Central Church in the evening. W. Blair McClain was the speaker, and Joseph and Esther Salonimir sang a duet, accompanied by Verna Gustavus.

Blood, Sweat, Tears--And Progress

By ELAINE CARSON

Ours is a funny world. It is so big, and yet it's so small; so wicked, yet so potentially good; so bound by nature to law and precision, and yet by man's agency, so free, so inconsistent, so ever-reaching upward, but somehow so eternally unsatisfied. It is God's world and yet it is man's world. He gave it to us, to have dominion over it, to use it, and to grow. He gave it to us for much the same reason a mother gives a little child a toy—a part of his growing up.

And we are growing up! "The good old days" were not as appealing as some of us might think when we see portrayed on the screen the grace of a Johann Strauss waltz and a lacy hoop skirt; or the purity of soul somehow always credited to white-haired grandmothers bedecked in a shawl and swaying back and forth in a rocking chair; or the old family Bible, much better dusted than nowadays, recording all six boys' names as Joseph and Peter, Sam and Matthew, Levi and maybe Benjamin. They were good days, admittedly, but in the same sense that kindergarten is a mighty enjoyable part of school life. A progressive, normal human being cannot play with blocks and Plasticine all his years.

Moses was a good man, a rugged leader, and an exceptional organizer. But those were days of slavery for the poor. We even find recorded in Deuteronomy a law limiting to six years the period of bondage for one Hebrew to another. During the seventh year, the slave-owner set up the serf with stock, flour, and products from the winepress. He became a free man . . . Moses hoped! Some slaves liked the irresponsibility of being told what to do and the security of belonging to someone, especially if they had a good master, and they didn't want to get out "on their own." So they just went on being slaves—it was a much less bothersome arrangement to both slave and master!

But it did not develop free men, and Moses got mad. He wrote into his law that anyone failing to leave his master after the sixth year was to have an aul driven through his ear, marking him a slave for life, an ignoble fellow, lacking the moral stamina to work on his own. No self-respecting Hebrew would stand for that—hoped Moses, the law-maker—and they didn't. A few masters set up their slaves as free men, and a few slaves somehow got to like the feel of independence, but the idea was new and strange, and the majority of the people thought Moses was crazy. They beat him at his own game by trading or selling the slaves during the fifth and sixth years. Making free men out of slaves was not an easy chore, and it is little wonder that Moses went up to Mount Nebo to die.

But we can get a lot closer to home than Moses. Looking at thirteenth century England, we usually see castles and moats and superb archery; Robin Hood and his merry men robbing fat bishops to feed the undernourished poor; gallant knights on white horses and pale, beautiful, ammonia-sniffing heroines. This isn't what the "Mr. You and Mrs. Me" of that day saw, however. They lived in a one-room hovel, with little or no furniture, except possibly a rough-hewn table and benches, a dirt floor covered with grass, and an open fire made of moss from the commons. The utensils were homemade; the food consisted of a coarse black bread and meat—maybe pork, a rabbit, or venison. To have the latter was illegal, but none-the-less palatable and intriguing.

They knew nothing of sanitation, and it was thought perfectly safe for the children, the pigs, and the flies to play in the same puddle. If anyone got sick, the cause was either the wrath of God or the curse of a witch. Disease was rampant, and epidemics like the Black Death struck down whole villages with such suddenness that there was none to bury the dead. They couldn't read, and they couldn't write. Legislation was to deter them only. When famine and disease struck, wiping out nearly one half the laborers, a maximum wage was set to prevent the workers demanding a higher pay. When they couldn't find work, when the children were starving, their only recourse was to beg or to steal.

The law recognized that there were poor people, and it did something about it. Badges were handed out, licensing the individual to beg in certain districts, and anyone begging without the "listing" was asking for trouble—maybe a week in the stocks or a "whipping through the town." Of course, after a while they got "soft" and limited the sentence in the stocks to three days.

Time marched on and laws grew more complicated, but the poor "were with them always." Philosophers, "thinkers" of the progressive 1780's and '90's, waxed eloquent on why there were these wretched urchins. Joseph Townsend¹ proclaimed that poverty and hunger were a necessity to keep a proper balance between population and production of foods; that relief spread misery to the whole community by allowing everybody just enough to stay alive, instead of a few living well and permitting poverty to find its proper channel with the rest; besides that, there had to be poor people to perform the ignoble tasks in the community; and how would they ever get men to join the army and navy if they were well off at home?

However, here and there, new voices were heard in the wilderness of chaos. There was Robert Owen and his ideas of co-operation; labor began to speak for itself, weakly—almost inaudibly, but it spoke. John Green, Baldwin Leighton, and others outdistanced their contemporaries with ideas about schools, and paid teachers, and helping people help themselves—utter nonsense to be sure!

But the climax came in 1832: Robert Peel shoved a bill through Parliament, forbidding the employment of children under nine years of age, and limiting their day to twelve hours. There it was for the first time—protective legislation for the working class! From then on there was just one whirlwind of change after another! Extension of franchise—by the 1880's, nearly all men over twenty-one could vote, and in the early twentieth century they even went so far as to give women a vote.

Dear Editor:

What does American youth think of the world today? I venture to say that most young men and women don't do much thinking about it; if they did, there would be some changes made.

How many Latter Day Saints, both old and young, have a gay time on Saturday night, then go to church on Sunday and condemn their actions? An "honest confession" may prove beneficial, but not when it serves only as exercise for the tongue. How many of us have stood up in a testimony service and dedicated our lives to God's work? Does that dedication go out the door with us? Does it last throughout the week? Is it soon forgotten—or does it find fulfillment in actual service?

Being an ex-GI, I find myself near the danger line, as do many other veterans. We may feel that, upon our return from the armed forces, we didn't receive the inspiration and help from others which would have encouraged us to resume our work in the church—a work that was interrupted or forgotten during the war. Perhaps we, alone, are responsible for not having renewed our acquaintance with the one thing which will preserve peace. Perhaps we have been too reluctant to replace the undesirable habit acquired in service with the good habits of Christian living.

Fortunately, there IS a program for youth in the church, which, if followed, will put an end to war and moral corruption. Let us make today our day of accepting and following that program.

New Horizons

George Bernard Shaw and the Fabians made their presence felt; Louis Pasteur and others discovered the microbe and all "his cousins and his aunts," and public sanitation programs came into being. In 1895, or thereabouts, a fellow named Lansbury said: "decent treatment of the poor, and hang the rates" (we'd say taxes). I don't know if he said, "I say," before, and "You know, old boy," at the end of his statement—but wasn't it a radical idea!

While all this was happening in England, it was also happening in her colonies. It is true some of those colonies got real naughty and "sassed" Mother Britain, saying, "We hate your imperialism, and your taxes, and your stuffiness. We'll have our own tea party," and they did. The other colonies were younger and hung on to Mother's apron a little longer, but they also "sassed" in many ways, and they threw eggs at the governors, and they rebelled at this, and they rebelled at that until Mother finally admitted they were mature. She called them dominions, and they said: "O. K., mom, just don't forget we're grown up." But all of them remembered how some things were done back home, and we see a generalized growth of human worth in all the English-speaking countries.

Crowther, editor of the London Economist, says: "The citizen should be guaranteed as a right, enough food to maintain him in health. He should be assured a minimum standard of shelter, clothing, and fuel. He should be given full and equal opportunities for education. He should have leisure and facilities for enjoying it. He should be secured against the risks of unemployment, ill health, and old age. Above all, the presence of children should not be allowed to bring with it misery for parents, deprivation for the children, and poverty for all. All these things inhere in the citizen as his citizen rights!"

Oh, it has been a long road, and we could sit back delightfully happy, maybe play a few holes of golf in our Utopia, if we didn't have newspapers boasting headlines of riots in Jerusalem and Bombay, Negro lynchings in Georgia, strikes in every industry existing (even the good-natured and long-suffering farmers), war atrocities in Germany, starvings in Greece, and contentions in the Peace Conference. Once in a while, by careful perusing, we read of a murder, or a neglected child, or a beaten wife, or a robbery in our own backyard. But why? Why? Why?

We've struggled so hard, and we've come so far.

I do not agree with the idea that our civilization is on the verge of utter oblivion. To some the noise, the tumult, the wars, and contentions are the "death rattle," and good old earth is about to give up the ghost; but I think the world has many times faced just as grim and terrifying crises, the only difference being that people of other days were not as well-equipped as we are to meet them.

I know we're facing difficult times, and as far as that goes, I believe "we haven't seen anything yet," but it's only because we're waking up. It's because people everywhere are saying, "We can live better than this, and we're going to." Our methods in many ways are all wrong—we carry clubs and guns, and we "get tough," but the idea is right. It's just as right as Moses was when he said: "You've got to be free men"; or as Robert Peel, when he said, "The law should protect these youngsters," or just as right as Christ when he said, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." Many people are still slaves, many children are suffering terribly, and few of us love our neighbors as ourselves, but the percentage is growing.

Christ knew the answer when he said, "Ye do not have me always." Our basic philosophy is still pretty much "rights" and "fights" and "retribution," because we still do not have Christ as our prevailing guidance. We're a long way yet from doing for or giving to our fellow man because we love him.

But let's not be too downhearted.

"This is not a perfect world," nor is it a hopelessly evil one—for better or for worse, it's the only world we have. If you close your eyes to the actuality of evil, you refuse your opportunity to do something about it. You live in a fool's paradise." We cannot ignore poverty, hunger, injustice, stupidity, disease, cruelty, war, ugliness, and death, but let's not ignore either the actual and potential goodness, beauty, and truth which is also existent. In comparison with the broad expanse of time, the leaven of Christ was thrown in the world batter only a few years ago. Only a small percentage of the people have heard of it, and an even smaller number have grasped its meaning. But it's working, and spreading, and changing. Let's not be too impatient, too hurried. Human nature can be changed, has been changed, must be changed—but not over night.

Ours is a growing and expanding world, but as long as it is growing, and as long as it is expanding, it is potentially good. It is only dead things that can't fight the infection and decay in their own bodies.

Religious Verse at Its Best Over the Sea, the Sky

By Edwin McNeil Potteat

Here are poems by one of today's most distinguished writers of religious verse. Written with vivid imagery, significant content, and technical perfection, they show a remarkable combination of the qualities of beauty, tenderness, irony, and prophetic passion. They spring from a founded faith. Sympathy for man and devotion to God underlie the whole. $1.50

Our Departed Ones

ROCKHOLD.—Oscar, passed away at the age of seventy-nine on October 21, 1946, at the home of his son, Raymond H. Rockhold in Independence, Missouri. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church for forty years. Besides his son, he leaves two sisters, Mrs. Adaline LaMar and Mrs. Bell Shoup, both of Independence. Services were held at the Speaks Funeral Chapel. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

PITSENBERGER.—Mollie S., was born June 19, 1875, in Hancock County, Iowa, and died October 20, 1946, in a Topeka, Kansas, hospital. She had been a resident of Topeka since 1922, and a member of the Reorganized Church since 1908.

She is survived by her husband, Henry C. Pitsenberger; two sons: Lyman of Topeka, and Leonard of Gardena, California; two grandchildren, a stepgranddaughter, and three brothers. Services were held at the Wall-Diffenderfer Mortuary. Interment was in Mount Hope Cemetery.

WARNOCK.—Mrs. Alta, passed away on March 31, 1946. She is survived by her husband, Julian; four daughters: Mrs. Katherine Blankenship, Anderson, Indiana; Mrs. Josephine Jones, Salt Lake City, Utah; Mrs. Mary Powell, Pasadena, California; and Mrs. Alta Seal, Merced, California; one son, Corporal Stanley L. Warnock, U. S. Navy; two sisters, and three brothers. Burial was in Independence, Missouri.

WOLFE.—Mrs. Oro, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. B. W. Ordway, died at her home in Altadena, California, on September 7, following several months of illness. She is survived by her husband, Lee Roy; a daughter, Mrs. Beverly Leiva; a son, Hubert; one brother, Clifford Ordway; and a sister, Mrs. Ada Morris.

MOORE.—William M., passed away October 9 at Pasadena, California. He is survived by his wife, Carrie; four sons, and four daughters. Mr. Moore was a native of Massachusetts.

FRANCIS.—Dudley G., was born in Clay County, Missouri, on February 9, 1884, and died April 7, 1946, at Lee's Summit, Missouri. As a young man he moved, with his parents, to Platt County where he attended public school and college. In 1910 he was married to Minnie Grieder; for seven years they operated a cleaning business in Kansas City, Missouri, moving from there to Clarksfork, Idaho, and returning to Kansas City in 1925. Mr. Francis was instrumental in organizing the Farmers' Union Elevator and Creamery Business; several years before his death he retired to his farm near Lake City, Missouri. While in Idaho he was president of the State Fruit Growers Association. He was a member of the Reorganized Church, and attended services at the Lee's Summit branch.

He is survived by his wife, Minnie; four sisters: Mrs. Tait Witt, Mrs. Tom Witt, Mrs. Matt Fickle, and Mrs. Forrest Ireland, all of Parkville, Missouri; and a brother, Charles Francis, of Republic, Missouri. Reverend C. R. Adams and Reverend C. D. Pearce were in charge of the funeral service. Burial was in the family lot at Walnut Grove.

GITTENS.—Raymond Wilson, was born October 19, 1886, in Neola Township, near Underwood, Iowa, where he lived all of his life until 1945, when he retired from the farm and moved to Council Bluffs, Iowa. After a brief illness, he passed away on October 16, 1946. He was married to Eva Johnson on March 4, 1908; three children were born to this union. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on August 10, 1924, remaining faithful to this covenant until his death. He was also a member of the West Pottawatomie County Farm Bureau.

He leaves his wife, Eva, of Council Bluffs; two daughters: Mrs. Lauretta Tey of Dallas, Texas, and Mrs. Lucille Driver of Neola, Iowa; one son, Harry Gittens of Tabor, Iowa; three brothers: William, of Crescent, Iowa; Frank of Council Bluffs; and Lee of Underwood, Iowa; one sister, Mrs. Pearl Williams of Council Bluffs; and six grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Council Bluffs. Elder V. D. Ruch and Charles F. Putnam officiating. Burial was in Walnut Hill Cemetery.

BECKLEY.—Nancy Anne, was born May 5, 1879, in Saginaw, Michigan, and died September 22, 1946, at Ribstone, Alberta. She was married to James R. Beckley, now deceased, and was the mother of three children, two of whom preceded her in death. She became a member of the Reorganized Church in 1890, and was ever a devoted worker.

She is survived by a son, James Albert, of Twig-inn, Alberta, eleven grandchildren, and twenty-five great-grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elgin Clark, Alberta district president. Interment was in the Oxville Cemetery in Paradise Valley, Alberta.

LETTERS

Testimony of an Isolated Saint

I take this means of bearing my testimony, since I am isolated and not privileged to attend prayer services. I have been greatly blessed this summer, and am thankful to my Heavenly Father for his kindness. I cannot understand why some do not feel it necessary to pray, when so much can be accomplished through prayer.

Although I have been unable to attend services with those of my faith, I have frequently gone with a neighbor to the Baptist Church. In the past few months, however, my health has been failing, and I can only listen to the sermons which come over the radio. I have the Herald, too, and find much comfort in reading it; the letters are especially interesting to me. I enjoyed the account of spiritual gifts at the Woodbine Reunion which appeared in the October 19 issue. It reminded me of the reunions I have attended at Devil's Tower in past years. God was always with us in our meetings there.

I ask an interest in your prayers.

Dear Brethren:

Your kind letter of March 18, came to hand on the 30th of June. In the meantime a letter came from Brother and Sister Land of Independence, Mo., to members in Mokoszyce, and we heard about the death of President Frederick M. Smith. We regret sincerely the departure of President Smith.

Our situation remained unchanged. We have been expropriated and have lost our citizenship in Poland. Some of our members have emigrated into Germany and we who remained here are expecting a turning out into Germany, too. In this condition it is impossible for us to emigrate into America from Poland. But we will try to do it when we shall come into Germany. When this has taken place, we shall write to you immediately.

Our mental and spiritual conditions are of course not very pleasing. We have no possibility to hold meetings and sacramental services. We would be very glad if you could send us some copies of the Saints' Herald, especially about the last General Conference, and if you would instruct us about the important events and the progress of the church. If possible, please send the letters and other materials by air mail.

Expecting your kind news very soon,
I remain with kindest regards,

Yours in Gospel Bonds,
JOHN STEBEL.

From a Member in England

I have taken the Herald for fifty-three years—ever since I came into the church. I would not be without it, even if I had to go without food.

I am now in my seventy-eighth year, and I remember Apostle John Rushton as a young man in Manchester. I see that Gomer Griffiths has celebrated his ninetieth birthday. It was through him I was called to the priesthood. I was ordained an elder under the hands of Apostles Griffiths and Gillen, and Brother Dewsnup, Sr.

I send my kindest regards to all.

From the Saints in Thayer, Missouri

Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Germon of Fair-dealing, Missouri, met with us in our beautiful rock church on October 6; Brother Germon is one of our district officers. We were much benefited by his ministry. After the Communion had been served, prayers and testimonies were offered. Brother J. F. Cunningham, better known as "Uncle Johnnie," told some of his experiences in the church. Pastor J. W. Adams also gave his testimony; Sister Adams is bedfast and cannot attend services. We are all praying that she will be healed, so that she can again worship with us. After the basket dinner at noon, Brother Germon spoke. The Ozarks are beautiful, and we will be happy to have any Saints who may be driving through or vacationing in this vicinity stop and worship with us.

Invitation From Saints in Columbia, Missouri

The Saints in Columbia are now meeting at the Dan Belcher home, 1504 Windsor Street. Under the leadership of Brother Belcher and Gerald Gabriel, the group has grown from a membership of eight to eighteen in the past year. Church school classes are conducted every week, and Communion services are held every first Sunday of the month. Arrangements are being made for guest speakers to occupy the 11:30 service on the intervening Sundays. A young people's social group has been organized with Rudolph Richter as chairman. Any members who live in or near Columbia are invited to join in the activities of this newly-formed mission. For further information contact Dan Belcher at the above address, or call Columbia 3535.

To Nonresident Saints in Kentucky and Tennessee

I wish to inform the nonresident Saints in Kentucky and Tennessee that I have been selected district pastor for all isolated members. I will appreciate having those who read this notice contact the Saints who do not take the Herald, and ask them to send me their name and address. Elder B. F. Ross and D. R. Dortch will assist me in ministering to the isolated members. If we cannot personally meet with you, we shall do all that we can through correspondence. We shall be handicapped in bringing this ministry to you, however, unless you tell us where you live and what your needs are.

Bulletin Board 15

The Saints' Herald is the official publication of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, with headquarters at The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, and is issued through the offices of Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage Street, Independence, Missouri.

Entered as second-class matter at the post office at Independence, Missouri, under Act of March 3, 1879. Issued weekly at Independence, Missouri. Price $2.25 per year and $1.15 for six months in advance in the U. S. A., its territories and possessions; Canada $2.50 per year and $1.30 for six months; other countries, $3.25 per year. Notice of a change of address must be given three weeks ahead of the date that it is to become effective. Accepted for mailing at the special rate of postage provided for in section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized July 21, 1921. Printed in the United States of America.

All checks for subscriptions to church papers, or for books and other materials sold at the Church Bookstore, should be made payable to Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

Suggestions to writers: Typewritten scripts, double-spaced, are preferred. Keep carbon copies to protect against loss. All articles and letters should be signed by writers. Please avoid use of post cards. News letters should be signed, approved by pastors, and should concern only church activities and workers. We find it necessary to edit most articles, and to condense news. No charge is made for one printing of the usual announcements of church meetings, births, marriages, and deaths; no memorial verse is used. Bulletin Board notices should be in our office at least ten days before date of publication. We cannot accept commercial or personal advertising. Articles for publication are gladly received, but there is no provision to pay for them. Those that relate to church work, doctrine, general cultural and educational subjects, personal development, etc., will be considered on basis of contents and literary merit. Writers should feel free to make independent presentations of their views, but should avoid criticism of the work of other writers appearing in these columns.

Letters: All letters and money for subscriptions and books should be addressed to Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage, Independence, Missouri. Articles and letters for publication should be sent to the same address, and marked "The Editors." Letters for all general church offices should be sent to The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Checks or Money Orders for contributions made to the General Church should be issued in the name of the Solicitor, Bishop's Agent, or Bishop in the district or stake in which the contributor lives.

If circumstances or conditions are such that it is more convenient to send contribution direct, Money Orders or checks should be issued in favor of The Presiding Bishopric, and mailed to The Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

This includes contributions for tithing, surplus, offering, oblation, Christmas offering, Auditorium, College Day, and The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

* COUNCIL OF YOUTH

Our cover picture this time shows a view of the Zion's League officers of Kansas City Central Church at work on their tasks for the coming year. They are, left to right: Dorothy Bunt, council member; Jerry Richards, first vice-president; Jean Hale, president; Beverly Hall, secretary; Wilbert Richards, second vice-president.

* SIR POMPOUS is feeling all the usual fall weather twinges in his bones: rain, snow, thunder, sleet, and typhoon. Or could it be that he has the weather mixed with the recent political excitement? He isn't positive, but he is of the opinion that the campaign tension has done him no good. Every time he tried to argue with Lady Gracious, his asthma got worse, so she had the last word. "Before it was over, I couldn't be sure who was converting whom," he complains. He adds: "Weather pains are always worst on Sunday morning. I suppose it's harder to go to church than to the office because one doesn't have to. If the pastor could install a good strong feeling of compulsion in the consciences of his congregation, he would have a lot better attendance at church."

* A NEW CAR is being sold that might be called "The Lookout" model. It has a tin roof supported by a few slender posts, and glass all around the sides as well as the front. There is no blind spot where a motorcycle cop can hide from the driver while sneaking up on him. It should save many a traffic ticket. . . . But what is really needed is something that will turn on a brilliant purple neon light when a drunken driver is approaching. On Saturday nights one would burn out a couple of bulbs at least.

* WRITERS

We are happy that our invitations have induced new writers to offer their contributions. Some are very good, and their work will be of real assistance to our publication. Others are good, but need a little further technical training. We feel encouraged that our policy of frankly sharing our problems with our people has proved to be, so far, a successful and satisfactory one. To those who are ambitious to write, we say, "Keep training. Keep thinking. Keep trying." Remember the story of Robert Bruce and the spider.

* PAPER

Reporting on the paper situation: paper for the "Herald" is not yet abundant, but we are able to keep going for a time with a few thirty-two page issues—two a month right now. Paper for our other printing is harder to get than any time during the war. Why? Big magazines have bought up their own mills, leaving less paper for the general market in which we buy. This is a case in which "free enterprise" kicks our shins.

* OPPORTUNITY

All the true philosopher needs is a chance to be heard. All the good workman needs is a chance to show his skill. All the student needs is access to good books and good teachers, and he will show his willingness to learn. These people will win recognition and credit, without benefit of laws and commandments.

* HALF THE SUFFERING of our world comes from the fact that so many of us are not satisfied when a thing is demonstrated to be bad for us or good for us; we insist on a law or commandment. And when we get the law or commandment, we break it. Ancient Israel, in all its stubbornness and folly, was not worse in this respect than we are.

Unfolding

By SYVELLA NEECE

Ten years ago (it seems so long),
When first I heard the gospel song,
I felt myself to be so strong,
That I could free the world from wrong.

But, as I grow more day by day,
I seem to shrink in every way,
My Master's been so good to me,
He's shown me what my work's to be.

A loving word, an outstretched hand,
A smile to say I understand,
A prayer of faith for those I know,
To help them as they onward go

PROTECTING OUR HOMES

A Need of Stability

Many people are still disturbed in their emotions and in their thinking by the strains of war. They were forced to make adjustments for which they were not prepared. They were put in new situations that severely tested—and sometimes crushed—their moral foundations and resistance to destructive and harmful types of conduct.

The disturbances which people have suffered have hurt them in many ways. Homes have been broken, careers have been blighted, the stain of sin has touched young men who might have been expected to be called to priesthood leadership, but who have disqualified themselves for such leadership by yielding to temptation.

One of our present great and serious concerns is to find what measures might be taken and what helps might be employed to strengthen the homes of newly married young people. We have a great responsibility toward them because they will be the mothers and fathers of a coming generation of the church. Some stabilizing powers are required to help in this emergency.

Why Homes Must Be Preserved

In every congregation and in every community, a fine, strong Christian home is a source of strength and help, by example and by encouragement, to every other home. Good homes can bring great credit to a church; poor and breaking homes can bring discredit to it. The church has the strongest kind of interest in the preservation of homes.

The individual, too, has a great interest in the preservation of homes. Men and women invest their time—which is the first essential of life—in the home. They devote so much of their lives to each other. If the home is broken, this investment is irretrievably lost.

Married life is a bank in which deposits are made, and from which rich dividends of happiness may be realized; but the principal investment can never be withdrawn; it can only be sacrificed and lost when the home is broken. The divorced man or woman can never recover the youth, the beauty, the strength, the power that has been given to the first companion. They seek new companions with reduced treasuries and lessened endowments. The individual has the greatest kind of need of the preservation of homes.

The children have a great need for stable, secure, orderly home life. In any broken home, the child is the victim who suffers most and loses most. His parents are his protection, the source of the greatest love he understands; when they fall apart, the center of his world is destroyed. It is very difficult for a child to recover, even in later life when he is grown, from the harmful effects of a broken home.

Forces That Preserve the Home

First among those powers that tend to preserve the home, we must list the personal feelings of responsibility which are given to a person by his philosophy of life and by his faith. In the final analysis, our actions are governed by our ideas, by our feeling of what God expects of us. Even where a given course is not consciously chosen, even where the ultimate consequences of an act are not foreseen, people are motivated by what they have long believed and thought. The church has a great deal to do with the development of such a feeling of responsibility, of such philosophy and faith. People who wish to preserve their homes should keep in close touch with their church.

The social group and the social life that centers at the church is a powerful factor in the preservation of homes. Only in rare instances is the opposite true. If young people, like people of all ages, will make a program of developing their social life among church members rather than exclusively among worldly people, they will find strength and help in maintaining their homes, even in the times of crisis and trouble.

A third important influence in the preservation of homes is the cultivation of the friendship of good people. Go with a loose crowd, and you cannot avoid looseness yourself. Cultivate the friendship of fine people, and you will find yourself absorbing strength and help from them.

A fourth important factor in the preservation of homes is education and culture. Regardless of what people say, the statistics have shown that educated people in general have more stable homes than the ignorant or uneducated. Many homes are broken by acts of ignorance and stupidity, which knowledge might have prevented. No education, of course, can assure a successful home; but it can help those who have already acquired the other qualities for good home life. We can encourage our young people to seek education before they undertake the responsibilities of home life.

Above all, we need an interested attention to personal problems in the branches, and a loving concern for the welfare of all our people. It is a mistake for us to watch homes go to pieces and not try to do something about it. Very often, the simple fact that friends are watching and really care, will restrain people from committing acts and adopting attitudes that are harmful. The fact that the church group observes and approves of good things, and disapproves of the bad, will exercise a strong influence of restraint and wisdom.

THE OTHER DAY I happened on a statement written by Charles Lamb, the great essayist, which seemed pertinent in view of the fact that Lamb was himself a victim of the drink habit. Here it is:

Could the youth to whom the flavor of the first wine is as delicious as the opening scenes of life, or the entering of some newly discovered paradise, look into my desolation, and be made to understand what a dreary thing it is when he shall feel himself going down a precipice with open eyes and a passive will—to see his destruction and have no power to stop it, to see all goodness emptied out of him, and yet not be able to forget a time when it was otherwise, . . . it were enough to make him dash the sparkling beverage to earth, in all the pride of its mantling temptation.

ELDER GARLAND E. TICKEMYER is making constructive local use of Brother Elbert A. Smith's tract, Faith of Our Fathers Living Still, in which Brother Elbert has embodied the substance of an address in which he explained our faith before the congregation of a midwestern Methodist Church. Brother Tickemyer has pasted into the front inside cover of this well-bound tract the following statement:

Dear Friend:

This tract is presented to you with the sincere hope that after reading it you will desire to make a further investigation of the doctrinal teachings and of the true history of the Latter Day Saint movement. If you desire more literature, please fill out the stamped post card attached to this inside cover page and return it to us for additional leaflets without obligation and without charge.

We also invite you to visit our Central Congregation at 39th and Grand Ave., in Los Angeles, and become acquainted with our people. Church school 9:30, Preaching 11:00 a. m. and 7:30 p. m. Midweek prayer service, Wednesday 7:30. You will always be welcome.

These tracts are distributed at the expense of our congregation, and when you have no further use for it, will you kindly pass it on to someone else.

Sincerely yours,

G. E. Tickemyer (Signed)

Our Roving Bible

By Lawrence E. Nelson

This book is a compact library of valuable and interesting information about the influence of the Bible garnered from incredibly wide, long, and alert reading. It is also a selective, readable history of English literature; a documentary evidence of the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures; and an unexcelled source book for speakers, teachers, writers, and preachers.

Organized in large chronological units, the material is presented in brief chapters, each carrying a striking caption and a quotation apt and whimsical. The whole is fully documented and completely indexed. $2.75

Just Another Institute?

By Lydia Wight

HARDLY! The January issue of GUIDE-LINES TO LEADERSHIP brings you something new in institutes. Have you ever wanted one in your district that's different? One where your district president, all pastors, church school directors, leaders, teachers, branch workers, old and young could have ample opportunity to think and plan as a group about common needs, problems, and possibilities in religious education of your specific district?

Can you imagine one or two hundred such workers coming together to look at the total task of the church school and all participating? Have you thought the entire group could be formed into separate commissions and that each small group then could tackle in dead earnestness, the needs and possibilities of a specific age or of the administration of the church school? Then would you like them to all meet together again to share their group conclusions, so that everyone may understand somewhat the total task and get a sense of togetherness on the job?

Order GUIDE-LINES TO LEADERSHIP now so that you will be sure to get the January issue. Then read Brother F. M. McDowell's editorial on his rich experience with such institutes this year. And read, too, the summarization of the fine workable ideas that came from institutes in Canada, Michigan, Illinois, and other districts. Then you can help get such an institute in your district.

Five Great Loves

By Robert J. Miller

Then one of them, a lawyer, tempting him, asked, saying, Master, which is the great commandment of the law? Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.—Matthew 22: 34-39, Inspired Version.

THE LAWYER of the Pharisees sought to tempt Jesus when he asked, "Master, which is the great commandment of the law?" But his question did not confuse the Master, or trick him as he had hoped; but rather, it gave him the opportunity to present the very essence of the whole law in a few words, easy to remember and understand.

Sometimes issues and truths become confused and lost in a multitude of words; and often give a shrewd man the opportunity to mislead others. Jesus was probably aware of this as he replied and stated simply the heart of the matter, which we know as the two great commandments of the law—easy to remember and treasure in the heart.

It is well for us to consider here the concluding statement of the Master, "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Note that Christ did not say, "this is the law and the prophets," which fact every Christian should remember—for there is a vast difference. It is this concluding statement that defeated the purpose of the Pharisee lawyer.

Christ said, upon these two great commandments of love hang or "depend" all the law. In other words, all the laws of God must support these laws, and be in harmony with them.

However, Matthew does record a commandment given by Christ, that is inclusive of all the law, and he so declares it: "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets."—Matthew 7: 21, Inspired Version. This is the Golden Rule as given by our Lord, but when repeated by man, we find that it is usually misquoted. We are prone to say "Do unto others as ye would have others do unto you." And that is often exactly the way we mean it; for we don't always want others to do unto us as they should. Sometimes we want them to cater to our passions, lusts, and selfish, greedy desires; sometimes we want them to encourage our faults and act towards us in harmony with them. But seldom do we welcome their honest effort to straighten us out when we need it; and seldom do we act in like manner toward others. Yet this is the way of love and the law Christ gave us, "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." We would do well to weigh carefully this commandment in conjunction with the two great commandments, and assess it at its true value, profiting thereby.

THE TWO great commandments of the law teach us five great loves, rather than the two that are so obvious, they are: Love of God; love of Christ, love of their creation, love of others, and love of self.

Love of self is clearly implied in the second great commandment "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," and will require but little thought on our part to understand and appreciate. Both of these loves are included in the love we should have for the creation of God and his Christ; for all mankind, including ourselves are a part of this creation.

It is the pleasure of God to see harmony prevail throughout his creation, and especially among men; and his laws are designed to affect that end. Harmony can only be achieved among us when we obey the laws pertaining to ourselves, and extend every effort to assist others in doing the same—when we learn to suffer with others, be patient with them, and consider their well-being essential to our own happiness and fullness of life. We should love our neighbors because God created them; we should love ourselves because God created us also; we seek full harmony through the processes of love, because our inter-relations make it necessary to the cause of Zion, and because God's Spirit suggests to us that this is right.

WE COME TO FULLER appreciation of the first, and great commandment of the law as our understanding of the perfect relationship between God and Christ becomes manifest to us.

We are told "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind." As your writer understands this, it means: With all the vitality and enthusiasm one possesses; with all the energy of spirit and body (or element) which constitutes the soul of man (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 4); and with the mind in complete harmony with the mind of God—open to his revelations and commands, rightly interpreting his purposes and wishes concerning us.

In such condition we are in complete rapport with God, and able to comprehend his will and the "fellowship of the mystery" mentioned by Paul. Within this estate there can be no room for anything mean or unworthy in the heart, soul, or mind of man. The way is opened for true love throughout his natural and spiritual course.

Christ is a very special and important person. He is "the Spirit of truth" (Doctrine and Covenants 90: 4); the Light, Word, Gospel, or Law (John 1: 1-10). He is the "Son of God"; for he is the Spirit of Truth (or law), born in the Mind of God, and come out from God (John 1: 1; 14: 10; 6: 57). He is also the Creator of all things: "All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made."—John 1: 3; "The worlds were made by him. Men were made by him. All things were made by him, and through him, and of him."—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 1; "And worlds without number have I created, and I also created them for mine own purpose; and by the Son I created them, which is mine Only Begotten."—Doctrine and Covenants 22: 21; "Who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature; for by him were all things created, . . . and he is before all things, and by him all things consist."—Colossians 1: 15-17; "And he shall be called Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Father of heaven and earth, the Creator of all things, from the beginning."—Book of Mormon, page 216, verse 102.

By careful study of the foregoing statements, we conclude that God is greater than all, because all divine purpose, thought, law, and will are born in the mind of God; and all these find expression in his only begotten Son, Jesus Christ (only begotten in spirit as well as of flesh¹), whom God hath highly exalted, and given a name which is above every name.

God and Christ are inseparable. They cannot be divorced one from the other; therefore, to love the one is to love the other—it cannot be otherwise. "For if there be no Christ, there be no God; and if there be no God, we are not, for there could have been no creation."—Book of Mormon, page 116, verse 13.

The wonders and mysteries of so marvelous a creation as we are privileged to see and know should

Are We Getting Soft?

Are Latter Day Saints getting soft? Has the ease of modern living weaned us away from our old-fashioned idea of sacrificing for what we want? Where is the "faith of our fathers" that enabled destitute and persecuted Saints to build the largest city on the Mississippi? Adversity seemed to be the meat and drink of early day Saints, mob violence and poverty only increased their determination.

I have just returned from homecoming at Graceland College. Those who attended realized the great need for increased facilities, and for a memorial student union costing around $60,000. The Herald has published articles explaining the multitude of uses for the proposed building; church officials have authorized the use of college-day offerings for this purpose; and Graceland's staff has made an appeal to the members of the church for support. Ten dollars apiece from 6,000 Saints would supply the necessary funds. Would ten dollars be considered a sacrifice to our great grandparents, some of whom subsisted for ten days on parched corn mixed with bark of the slippery elm? Are there 6,000 Saints in the church who hold as a sacred trust the devotion of those who huddled in the rain on the muddy banks of the Mississippi and watched their dream city of Nauvoo sent up in flames by a drunken mob? Are the sacrifices of our sons and husbands in this war worth a day's wages to us? Is it easier for us to submit to tar and feathers than to put a check in an envelope and leave it at the post office?

Perhaps I am still in the glow from homecoming; perhaps it will take years to raise the money for a memorial building; perhaps Latter Lay Saints are getting soft; or . . . just perhaps . . . we are united enough, do care enough, to flood the mails with our letters and in a month, or two weeks even, we will have contributed the money to erect a fitting memorial on our Graceland College campus.—BILOINE WHITING.

teach man to fear God, respect him, and love him. The magnitude of its scope alone should teach us to love it, for it has been created for the purposes of man by the wisdom of a generous and merciful God.

We find then in the two great commandments, not two great loves, but five, expressed or implied: love of God, love of Christ, love of his creation, love of others, and love of self. Five loves essential to a fullness of life. And in the master-law for human behavior to consummate that purpose, we have a sure guide to our proper course, "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets."

God and Christ have always recognized this Golden Rule of conduct in their dealings with mankind. Man can find God by recognition and obedience to this law, asking all things in the name of Jesus Christ, and practicing the five great loves commanded of God.

WHAT RESTORATION IS and what it means

By J. A. Koehler

Number 11 in a series of radio addresses on the subject:
"The Social Philosophy of the Modern Prophet"

RESTORATION, which is the name of the religious movement instituted by the modern prophet, is the genius of the Kingdom seeking to win all nations to the way of peace, prosperity, and happiness. It is the genius of prophecy striving to impress its character upon all governments. It is the elect in the process of mobilizing for an outright adventure in rightly constituted economic society. It is "God's people" seeking to accomplish its warfare. It is "the mother of the Kingdom" preparing to deliver herself of her own "man-child." It is a religiously-motivated people endeavoring to lead the way out of the greatest of all crises. It is the church making its supreme contribution to the advancement of civilization.

Restoration is not something that occurred on April 6, 1830, as many Latter Day Saints have supposed. It is not something that has been accomplished; it is something which is in the process of accomplishment. No one can say precisely when it began, and no one can say when it will end. It is not an uninterrupted forward movement; it has had its regressions as well as its progressions. Restoration peoples have slid backward as truly as they have pushed forward. At this very moment, the church of Restoration, in some of its parts, is endeavoring to regain lost ground.

Restoration is the modern phase of the religion of which prophetic Judaism is the only notable temporal manifestation of which we have any detailed information, and of which Messianic Christianity is the only notable spiritual manifestation. The truth is, Restoration is a union or combination of the Mosaic conviction that religious peoples, in common with others, may reach their ends only through the means of social institutions, and of the Messianic conviction that social institutions may be made effectual means to godly ends of peoples only through the indwelling of a holy spirit.

AS A SOCIAL PHILOSOPHY, Restoration is a recovery of the conviction that "man shall not live by bread alone"; that science and the practical arts, separately, unless guided by religion, will not promote the abundant life; but that industrial or economic affairs must be grounded in "every word of God"; that physical-world goodness must be united with social-world righteousness, or that government must be established "with justice" as certainly as it must be ordered "with judgment," if man is to have abundant life.

When one looks at Restoration superficially, he may get the impression that it is excessively utilitarian, or that it is a worldly affair. Indeed some get the impression that it is not spiritual or religious or Christian at all. They feel that it profanes sacred things. But the truth is, Restoration makes secular affairs sacred. As I shall point out later, the highest purpose of economic adjustment is to cultivate the soul or to enrich the spirit. Restoration economic adjustment is preparation for a place in the presence of God, and in that particular, too, it is a recovery of the Messianic conception of the saving processes.

BEFORE I speak of the meaning of Restoration, I wish to say a word about what it does to some men. It provides them with very much-needed anchorages of faith in God. It gives them an interest in religion, and particularly in the work of the church which they did not have before. It fires them with a new zeal.

Not a few men who had almost no interest in religious affairs before they got the Restoration viewpoint have said to me, "Well, I wish your Zion-building were under way. I would like to have part in an affair of that kind. I could do some good there." One state university representative said to me, after I had talked over some Zion-building plans with him, "We would be glad of an opportunity to work on a project of that character. We would like to put our engineers on the job with you for a year, two years, three years, any length of time. And it wouldn't cost you a red cent."

When some men contemplate prophecy as a revelation of God's long-range purpose in man from the Restoration viewpoint, they find real anchorages of faith in God. Some do not, of course, for some men are very different from others. Some do not have even an intellectual basis, much less a moral basis of faith in God's great purpose in man.

NOW, THE meaning of Restoration. Restoration means what the scientific awakening, for example, meant. It means that man needs something that must be provided if he is not to perish. It means that there is a great evil to be uprooted and a great good to be put in its place. It means that something needs to be done that is not being done to improve the condition of man. In general, that is the meaning of Restoration.

Moreover, as the word implies, Restoration means that something has been lost to mankind—something basic, fundamental, vital, essential. Something which we hold is in process of recovery or restitution or restoration—or, realization, if you prefer. And that something is the only mode of civil society, the only system of social principles, the only family of social institutions, the only form, constitution, and method of government which, in principle, can satisfy both the spiritual wants and the physical needs of man. That something is “the way, the truth, and the life.”

Manifestly, that something cannot be accomplished in one stroke. Restoration began when “a light began to break forth,” as Jesus said it would—when men saw that religious affairs were “off the beam,” and when they wanted to do something (not always the best thing) about it.

THAT DISCOVERY and endeavor led to three developments: (1) the concept of the kingdom as a “community” affair, a city, a mode of civil society grounded in the truth or in the will or word of God began to take form. And this means that a new philosophy of social life began to emerge in the thinking of the only genius who ever mastered the concept of the Kingdom, which is the prophetic genius.

(2) “The keys” to the business of the kingdom were revealed, recovered, or discovered. Religious leadership conceived a way of getting at the Kingdom-building business. A practical plan of social action was formulated—of which I shall write later.

(3) And a Kingdom-building agency was established. A new kind of church was organized—a church constituted specifically for the business of the Kingdom, and intended to have been composed selectively on the basis of fitness for participation in that business.

If affairs had developed as the genius of Restoration intended, the business of the Kingdom would now be well under way. The prophecy of Moses, in which he said that after his death the business of the Kingdom would be bungled by Israel’s perversity, was fulfilled. The prophecy of Jesus, also, was fulfilled—the prophecy that what remained of the business of the Kingdom would be utterly destroyed. So, for the time, and as requisite to the recovery of lost ground, we say much more than we do.

But there is more to say, at least specifically, about the meaning of Restoration. Restoration means that the time has come to answer the prayer “Thy kingdom come.” It means that the turns of human events have reset the stage for the rebuilding of that business. It means that the time has come for “Zion to arise and shine, and put her beauteous garments on.” It means that the prophecy of the coming Kingdom—which is “that which God hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began” is true. It means that God still is and that his purposes in man cannot be frustrated. It means that “it shall come to pass” in the latter days that “the mountain of the Lord’s house shall be established in the top of the mountain.” It means that the government shall be established with justice, as it shall be ordered with judgment. It means that the genius of true religion has been speaking the truth from beginning to end.

Restoration means that a calamity has been in the making for ever so long—a calamity which desperately needs to be averted. It means that the time has come for another forward push in the march of civilization—an unprecedented transformation in the constitution of human society. It means that the ways in which the race has been walking are the ways of death.

Restoration means what the surge of political theories of the recent past means. It means that what political theorists called economic “laws” are not truths; they are lies. It means that close as some philosophy has come to the truth, it is still not on the beam. It means that any social philosophy which is not at once a religious philosophy is inadequate to the requirements of the race. And restoration means that society is in chaos, that economic life is inefficacious, that we have injustice and confusion and civil strife and world wars for the very reason that our so-called philosophies of life are not true philosophies at all.

Restoration means that there is a critical need of religious convictions and religious sentiments respecting the conduct of economic affairs. It means that the light of the world which first shed its rays across the plains of Chaldea is shining again throughout the broad expanses of all lands.

Restoration means that the genius of righteousness and truth has been born again. It means that even you may live to see the fulfillment of the prophecy, “Righteousness and truth will I cause to sweep the earth as with a flood, to gather mine elect . . . unto a place which I shall prepare—a place on which the business of the Kingdom of God shall be re-established.

Christ and Man's Dilemma

By George A. Buttrick

We need Christ, says this outstanding religious thinker of our day, because our creaturehood needs a Creator who “has made common cause with man in all the energies of his suffering love.” “Christ or Chaos” is no longer a hysterical or histrionic plea, it is now a sober choice. Herein then, is the author’s best spiritual insight to the fundamental human problem. $2.00

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Radio Interview Program

By Mary B. Hill

Note: This is another in the series of supplementary program helps prepared by the author, who is Zion's League leader of the Hamilton, Ontario, church, for use with the book, "Does It Make Any Difference?"

(Have some of your mechanically minded young men set up an imitation microphone, using a music stand, some wire, and some cardboard or tin shaped to resemble a microphone, either painted black or covered with black crepe paper. On the wall, facing the audience, tack up a large shoe box with the letters "On the Air" cut out in the bottom. Paste red crepe paper behind the letters, and place an electric light bulb inside or behind the box, which may be turned on at the start of the meeting. Each participant in this service should step up to the microphone before taking part.)

Prelude

Announcer: This is station (H. O. Z. L., Hamilton, Ontario, Zion's League). We are pleased to bring to you this evening our regular Zion's League meeting. We have been very fortunate in securing the services of that well-known Latter Day Saint church school director, Elder Somebody, who is going to make this a special occasion for us by sharing with us some of his experiences and knowledge of Latter Day Saintism. Also with us this evening is that well-known (musician) Miss Harmony, whose contributions have previously given us so much pleasure.

Announcer: Let us all turn to Hymn No. 286, and, seated by your radio, join with us in singing this beautiful hymn.

Invocation: (By visiting priesthood member.)

Offertory: (Play Hymn No. 302, softly.)

Announcer: (reads Scripture) I John 5: 1-5.

Solo: Hymn No. 282.

Announcer: Now, ladies and gentlemen, I have great pleasure in introducing to you Elder Somebody. His life has been a very interesting one. He was born (give here the important facts of his life, especially those connected with his religious experiences. This part of the program and the interview following should previously have been gone over with the elder, so he may know what questions to expect, and have given thought to them. Questions are found on page 17 of the booklet, "Does It Make Any Difference," and additional questions are listed at the conclusion of this program. Ask any other questions which may be suitable.)

Solo: Hymn No. 264.

Announcer: Let us all sing together Hymn No. 260.

Benediction: (By visiting priesthood member.)

Announcer: We are happy to have had the privilege of bringing you this evening's program, and hope to join with all of you next week for another interesting meeting with our group here. Station H. O. Z. L. signing off.

(Sign is turned off.)

Additional questions which may be asked on interview program:

1. Do you think there is any advantage in having the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants in addition to the Bible?

2. Do you think, as Latter Day Saints, we have any special interest in American archaeology, and should further its development?

3. Do you think that Latter Day Saints should be interested in higher education, and study languages, science, etc.?

4. What is your comment based on your experience that Latter Day Saintism is a "Way of Life"?

5. Does your faith demand a growing personal revelation of the purpose and mind of God? Explain why.

6. What is your interpretation of present-day world events viewed in the light of Latter Day Saintism?

7. What difference has being a Latter Day Saint made to you?

TIMELY REMINDERS

for Church School Directors

By F. M. McDowell, Director of Religious Education

CERTAINLY by November 1, most of your many good resolutions made in September should be found to be in actual practice in your church school. How about it?

Does your church school give promise that as of this date, that week by week and month by month it will be the best year in the history of your branch? Why not?

Standards of excellence for church schools have now been clearly set forth. (See the Yearbook for Church School Workers.) There can be little excuse for ignorance of and neglect in this matter. Bungling, slipshod methods and procedures must yield to a craftsmanship worthy of the Master Teacher. How well does your school qualify?

We suggest the following slogans for your church school year:

Our Church School Will Keep in Step

The Department of Religious Education and the Herald Publishing

House spare no effort to make available for you a graded and attractive series of quarterlies and texts. Why not use them in the order and during the period for which they were intended? Why not keep up to date with your lesson materials from week to week and month to month during the year? Why not anticipate that on October, 1947, your classes will be ready for promotion and for the new materials available at that time? Remember, effective church schools "keep in step" with the general church and the church-wide program of religious education.

Our Church School Will Be a Genuine School

Conditions throughout the world, the forward-looking program of the church, the needs of your own people, the cry of humanity for a redemptive religion—all make imperative that our church schools shall no longer play at school. Adequate space and equipment, trained and prepared teachers, up-to-date methods, co-operation with parents and homes, all of such are necessary if church schools become genuine schools. Why not put school in "church school"? Each pupil should have his own quarterly, and make a serious effort to study the lesson before coming to the class.

Our School Will Use Materials and Services Available

All of the time, expense, all of the "sweat, blood, and tears" that go into the preparation of periodicals, teachers' helps, and the like is wasted unless such materials and services are placed in the hands of officers and teachers and are used by them to make their work more effectual. The Hope and Stepping Stones are the organs of the church school—indispensable aids to effective teaching. "Step-O-Grams" provide timely hints for leaders who care. Guide-Lines to Leadership is your professional journal. Current quarterlies provide notes for teachers. Why not make use of these publications? That's what they are for. Are all of your leaders and teachers supplied?

Pastor, L. W. Kohlman

Officers for the new year are L. W. Kohlman, pastor; O. A. McDowell and W. J. Sherman, counselors; Raymond Yeubanks, church school director; R. E. Beck, adult supervisor; Alan Kelley, Zion's League supervisor; Ralph Vanwy, children's supervisor; Mrs. Nell Hall, assistant children's supervisor; Mrs. R. E. Beck, women's leader; Mrs. Loretta Penrod, director of music; W. Evan Davis, treasurer; Lloyd Wilson, secretary; Clarence Bear, junior church pastor; S. R. Stephens and J. Arthur Dixon, auditing committee. Meetings for branch officers are conducted regularly each month with Raymond Yeubanks as instructor.

The annual Graceland banquet was held in the lower auditorium of the church on October 18. E. J. Gleazer, Jr., president of Graceland College, and R. Edwin Browne, director of public relations, were guest speakers. Musical numbers were given by Alice Johnson, Loretta Penrod, and Don Jones, all Graceland graduates. Dinner for the one hundred guests was served by members of the adult class under the supervision of Mrs. Tressa Magarity.

Missionary Glen H. Johnson and Pastor L. W. Kohlman are conducting a series of cottage meetings during the week, with missionary services on Sunday evenings. This series began October 27 and will continue for seven weeks.

Pasadena, California

Pastor, Blaine Bender

Following the regular monthly luncheon on September 15, Apostle John W. Rushton and District President L. J. Ostertag conducted a business meeting for the election of officers. Elder Blaine Bender was elected pastor, and Pearl Crum, director of music; with these exceptions there was no change in the corps of officers. Elder Bender officially assumed his duties as pastor on October 13. Before addressing the 190 persons attending the service, he dedicated and presented to the branch a new pulpit—a gift to him from the young people of Central Los Angeles with whom he labored for twelve years. In June a new organ was purchased for the church by members of the congregation. The young people are following an active program under the leadership of Elder Paul Moore; Elder Moore and Elder Warren K. McElwain are also serving as associate pastors. Kenneth Briggs, recently ordained to the office of priest, has organized a Junior Zion's League. Priest

N. Fred Cool enlisted in the Army on September 3 and is now stationed at Ft. McClelland, Alabama. A reception was held on the evening of October 20 for the new and retiring pastors. After a short musical program, tribute was paid to Elder and Mrs. F. A. Cool by Paul Moore; Elder Cool, in turn, presented Pastor and Mrs. Bender; 132 guests were present at the reception. Under the supervision of Zula Sheppard, the department of women will sponsor a bazaar on December 6; proceeds are to be applied to the building fund.

Northeastern Illinois District

The regular business meeting and conference of the Northeastern Illinois District convened at Aurora on August 25. Apostle Arthur Oakman and Seventy E. Y. Hunker were in charge of the 8:30 a.m. prayer service and priesthood meeting. Apostle Oakman was also the speaker at 11 o'clock. Officers elected at the afternoon business meeting are as follows: Dr. Dwight D. W. Davis, district president; Marion Blakely and Arnold Settles, counselors; Roberta Gregory, director of religious education; Ruth Wildermuth, women's leader; Iah Nelson, children's supervisor; Marvin Settles, young people's leader; Robert Anderson, Zion's League supervisor; Clarence White, book steward; C. C. Simpson, treasurer; Russell Rogers, director of music; Mary Blish, secretary; Richard Wildermuth and Clarence White, auditors; and Cleo Settles, historian and publicity agent.

A young people's rally was held in Plano on August 31 and September 1. Thirty-five young people met to study, pray, play, and worship together. Marion Blakely was in charge. Classes were conducted on Saturday by Dr. Dwight Davis and Harley Morris; A. J. Settles supervised the recreation and evening campfire service. An Indian ceremonial was demonstrated by the Plano scouts and their leader at the lighting of the fire. Seventy E. Y. Hunker was the speaker on Sunday.

Chicago District united with the Northeastern Illinois District for a workers' conference at the Bardwell School in Aurora, Illinois, on September 27, 28, and 29. A banquet was served on Friday by the Aurora Women's Council, followed by a program at which Tom Beal led the singing and Dr. Floyd McDowell was guest speaker. Saturday's activities began with a worship service, after which meetings were held by the various commissions. John Darling gave an illustrated lecture on the use of visual aids in teaching, and Dr. McDowell conducted several assembly sessions. On Sunday morning, another worship service was held, followed by meetings of the commissions. A special junior church demonstration was given by the children of Aurora under the supervision of Hattie Bell and Ethel Malcor. Dr. McDowell gave the final message of the conference. Those in charge of the commissions were Lillian Hadley, Frank Shank, Ilah Nelson, Tom Beal, Roberta Gregory, and Hattie Bell.

President Israel Smith met with the Saints of northeastern Illinois for a homecoming celebration on October 6 at the Stone Church in Plano, which his father helped to build. During the church school hour, Lillian Hadley presented a flannelgraph story of the Book of Mormon, the first in a series of lesson stories she is preparing for the church. President Smith spoke at the 11 o'clock service. A round-table discussion in the afternoon concluded the homecoming activities. President Smith had formerly accepted an invitation from Pastor Simms of the Plano Baptist Church to speak in the evening. The two ministers are tenth cousins.

"Christ's call to Womanhood" was the theme of the services held jointly in Sandwich and Plano by the women of the Northeastern Illinois District on October 12 and 13. Ruth Wildermuth, district leader, and Minnie Peterson of the general council of women, were in charge of the activities. Classes convened in Sandwich at 2 p.m., Saturday and continued all afternoon. The men served a 6 o'clock banquet. At 8:30 Sunday morning in the Stone Church in Plano, District President Dwight Davis and Marion Blakely, pastor of the Sandwich congregation, conducted a prayer service. Classes followed with Ilah Nelson taking charge of the children, Minnie Peterson, the adults, and A. J. Settles, the young adults. Harley Morris of Chicago gave the 11 o'clock sermon. A rededication service in the afternoon concluded the day's activities.

Texarkana, Arkansas

Pastor, Harold B. Schultz

Hughlon Loper, his wife, Rosa, and their two daughters, Patsy and Nelda, were baptized by Pastor Harold B. Schultz on October 13. The ordinance was performed at a small lake near Texarkana. Elder T. B. Sharp officiated at the confirmation service held in the evening. J. A. Withee, pastor of the Memphis, Tennessee, congregation, was the guest speaker on October 27.

Members driving through Texarkana are invited to contact Pastor Schultz, Route 1, Box 791, or telephone 1952-J.

New Liskeard, Ontario

Pastor, Wesley W. Shepherdson

Elder R. D. Weaver of Independence, Missouri, visited with the Saints in New Liskeard in April; he accompanied Pastor W. W. Shepherdson home from General Conference. Special services were held on August 4 in honor of homecoming; District President W. J. Bavington and Evangelist B. H. Hewitt of Toronto were guest speakers. A church school picnic was held at the beach on August 24. J. R. Vincent began a series of missionary meetings on September 1, continuing through September 8. Graydon Fielder was baptized on the closing day of this series, Brother Vincent officiating; he was confirmed by Elders William Archer and Albert Shepherdson. At the annual business meeting on September 4 Wesley W. Shepherdson was sustained as pastor, with Albert Shepherdson as his associate. Velma Shepherdson was elected secretary; Harriett Bartlett, church school superintendent; and Graydon Fielder, assistant superintendent. An outstanding prayer service was held on September 23 with J. R. Vincent and Albert Kosmack of Kirkland Lake in charge; thirty-two Saints were present for this meeting.

Southern Wisconsin District Conference

The Southern Wisconsin District Conference was held in Madison on October 19 and 20; theme of the conference was "Christian Ministry." The first meeting on Saturday was a fellowship service, followed by classwork; Missionary James Daugherty and Apostle Paul M. Hanson were the instructors. Other classes were conducted in the afternoon. Apostle Hanson gave a lecture at 3 p.m., and Elder Daugherty demonstrated missionary techniques in the evening. Sunday's activities included a meditation service at 8:15, fellowship at 8:30, church school at 9:45; a sermon by Apostle Hanson at 11; and a business meeting at 2 in the afternoon. Officers elected for the coming year are Ormond Kimball, district president and editor of News Letter, a district publication sponsored by the department of women; Frank Mussell and Harry Wasson, associates to the district president; Leda Colbert, clerk and historian; Cleo Kimball, women's leader; Howard Sheffield, church school director; Marabeth Ford, young people's leader; Lois Carpenter, director of music; Charles Hoague, treasurer; Robert Brigham, bishop's agent and examiner for department of religious education. A district officers' and missionary's budget was presented for approval by the various branches. The financial report showed 167 tithepayers in the district, with a total income from tithes and offerings amounting to $5,520.05. Howard and Hadley Sheffield were ordained to the office of priest, and the name of Ephraim Johnson was approved for ordination to the office of deacon; Brother Johnson was absent and could not be ordained. It was voted that a reunion be held in Luther Park, Chetek, Wisconsin, by the Saints of northern Wisconsin and Minnesota. The next district conference is to be held in Milwaukee; General Conference delegates will be elected at a special meeting.

—Leda Colbert, reporter.

Fortescue, Missouri

A social gathering was held at the church on Tuesday, October 1. The program began with a song fest, instrumental numbers, and readings, after which Missionary O. W. Okerlind was presented a blanket by the members of the branch in appreciation of his having conducted a two weeks' series of meetings. Moving pictures were shown by Mr. and Mrs. Byron Hinkle, Jr. The evening ended with refreshments of popcorn and apples.

Humber Bay, Ontario

Pastor, F. C. LeFevre

Recent improvements to the church have been the installation of a new heating unit, and a new Broadloom rug, purchased by the women's department. Harvest Home services were held on October 13; colored leaves and flowers, and a display of fruit and vegetables decorated the church building. Communion was served at 10 a.m., followed by church school at 11 o'clock. Pastor John Sheehy of Toronto was the afternoon speaker; Elder Bavington spoke in the evening. Meals were served by the women's department.

—Mabel Whitworth, reporter.

Maryland Heights, Missouri

The women meet every second and fourth Thursday of the month for a business meeting and study period; F. Henry Edwards' Fundamentals is being used as the present study course. Over $170 was cleared at a recent bazaar and supper sponsored by the women's department; part of the money will be applied to the improvement fund. Both members and nonmembers are helping to paint and redecorate the church. A combined Communion and prayer service was held Sunday, October 6, at the church.

God's Silent Preachers

BY DOCTOR MARGARET BARKER

EVERY MEMBER of this church has within his grasp a powerful means of evangelization, if he will but use it. Not all of us can serve as members of the priesthood, and of those who do, not all can be preachers of the word. We who are not gifted orators can serve too, however. We can live our lives so that our every word and act will eloquently proclaim to the world what our gospel teaches. We can draw the line of demarcation so clearly between right and wrong that no doubts will exist in the minds of others as to our beliefs.

There can be no shades of color in our choice between good and evil. Either it is right, or it is a sin. When we choose the second best in preference to the best, we are guilty of the sin of omission to a varying degree. When we choose the second best, we are announcing to the world that we are content with second best results and rewards. We show our sense of values to be slightly less than perfect. Our standing with others is lowered, for even though they decline to measure up themselves, they expect us to live by our ideals.

Fundamentally, we are not bad. We have very few murderers or swindlers in our congregations. Few have ever broken any of the laws of the land. But, although we are not bad, we are not good either. We fall far short of the mark set by Jesus. Consider the church member who bears false witness, who forgets the Sabbath, who idolizes his possessions to the extent that he refuses to pay his tithe to God, who takes the name of God in vain, who respects not his parents, who cheats the government when he pays his income tax, who "kills" his fellow men with unkindness, who plays fast and loose with his marriage vows and breaks his marriage covenant, who is so jealous and covetous of the good things of this world that he cannot rejoice when happiness comes to others. What about him?

Only this: such attitudes must not, cannot exist in Zion. And by the same reasoning, if they are a part of us, neither can we dwell in Zion, for even a few of these faults will render us unusable as Zion-material.

David, in the fifteenth Psalm, tells us who shall live in the holy city. "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill of Zion? He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart. He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbor, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbor. In whose eyes a vile person is contemned; but he honoreth them that fear the Lord; sweareth not falsely to hurt any man, and changeth not. He that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent.

He that doeth these things shall never be moved."

The support we did not give, the promises we didn't keep, the little white lie we told to save face, the gossip we helped to spread, the discouraging remark we were determined to make: these things keep us out of Zion. Elbert Hubbard says, "Speak well of every man, if you speak of him at all, for none of us are so very good." Remember that the next time you have the impulse to make a catty remark or a disparaging comment. And do you recall what Jesus said about letting our words be "yea" or "nay"? Isn't it our conversation which causes much of our trouble? Let's follow his advice and talk a little less.

Now is the time to go on record as being one who wants and is willing to work for perfection. Make your choice now between that which might be advantageous to you and that which is right; between selfishness and consideration for others; between a second-best standard of living and perfection. Commit yourself publicly by one means or another. It will give you the incentive to try to live up to your open avowal, and you will find yourself much strengthened for the tasks ahead. Let others know you have ideals for which you are willing to work and live.

Although we be not preachers of the word, we each can be doers of that word. And remember, if our missionaries have no group to which they can point and say, "This is what the gospel of Jesus can do for people," their work will be much less effective. The truly wonderful part of it is this: no one is denied the privilege of setting a good example. Your life is your testimony, unspoken, but heard and understood.

The Littlest Gate

BY JOSEPHINE SKELTON

THESE ARE THREE gates to Heaven. Each one is very big, and very shiny, and every morning two husky angels with brooms and buckets come out for the daily cleanup job. And twice a week a tall angel with a very wide wingspread goes around to each of the three gates to inspect them, and see that the hinges have been kept well oiled. (It has been found, after several eons of experimenting, that the Milk of Human Kindness does very well for this, being decidedly better, at least, than sewing-machine oil or mineral oil.) This is a very responsible position, for Saint Peter is quite particular about the way the gates are kept.

The first gate is Faith. This is a lofty, rather narrow gate of Gothic design. Two white marble shafts spire upward into the sky so far that the tops of them are never seen. (The workmen spray cleaning fluid up as high as cloud level and leave the rest to chance.) Of course, the actual gate is gold. Gold uprights, gold crossbars, gold bolts, and a gold lock, which, naturally, is never used.

Nobody, except the two husky angels who do the job, has any idea of how much the upkeep of the gate is. Gold polish, alone, costs a modest fortune. But business is fairly brisk here, with the gate clanging open and shut several times a year, and the management feels that it gets its money's worth. The gate opens into a nice district—a rather exclusive district—where only the best families live. Above the highest cross-bar, which is curved artistically as befits such a fine gate, rest a cherub and seraph that the heavenly artist caught in full flight.

The second gate is Hope. This is the largest and busiest of all gates. After every cleaning, the two husky angels wipe their foreheads and fan each other with their wings and wish that more people could get into Heaven without resorting to Hope. It is such a pity, they say, that so many try Hoping (which is the technical name for this method of entering the heavenly city) and so few take the harder and less-used routes of Faith and Charity.

Hope, the largest and busiest gate, leads to the largest and busiest section of Heaven. In fact, it leads to the heavenly slums, where all that one can hear is the discordant twanging of many harps, and all that one can smell in the crowded, golden hallways of the crowded, golden tenements which line the crowded, golden streets, are the fumes of stale nectar and boiling ambrosia. The slums of Heaven are not much different from the slums anywhere else. But Hope is a very fancy gate with scrolls and everything, and it does a rushing business—especially with the young.

The third gate is Charity. This is much smaller than the other two, and decidedly plainer. There is something of the Puritan in the architecture, with a dash of Grecian art, and it always clicks shut firmly after each new entry. Business is never rushing here, and so the gold never needs much polishing and the hinges seldom need attention. The two husky angels say proudly that this gate gives them the least trouble of the three, and the tall archangel with the wide wingspread never gives it a second glance during inspection, nor bothers to check the oil. Sometimes, due to this negligence, the Milk of Human Kindness runs low on these hinges, and they squeak and protest so that the gate remains closed for days, and even years at a time.

No wonder this gate leads into the most exclusive part of Heaven, with fine homes, and every street a boulevard.

There are three gates to Heaven. But if you look closely enough, if you get down near the earth and search, you will find a small gate, so overgrown with weeds that few people even know it's there. It isn't made of gold; it hangs on one hinge, and no one ever bothers to keep it in repair. But it opens into the garden behind God's palace, and every evening, just at dusk, the Son of the House walks with bent head, watching it.

"So few . . . so few find Understanding."

News Briefs

New Albany, Indiana

Pastor, Edmund Fouts

The following officers were elected at the business meeting on September 26: Edmund Fouts, pastor; Dallas Fouts, treasurer and acting deacon; Roland Prather, church school director; Nellie Sturgeon, church school secretary; Jane Breckenridge, clerk; Elsa Robertson, director of music; Minnie Martin, women's leader; Vernetta Fouts, chairman of ways and means committee and supervisor of the kitchen; George Maymon, Zion's League Leader; and Margaret Maymon, publicity agent. Later appointments include George Maymon and W. O. Robertson, associate pastors; Margaret Maymon, program director; Alvina Tretter, special music director; and Rita Sturgeon, pianist. W. O. Robertson, who served the New Albany group as pastor for twenty-six years, asked to be relieved of his local responsibilities; he is now serving as district treasurer and bishop's agent. Under his leadership the mission grew and was organized into a branch; the Saints originally held services in the Harry Thompson home, but now have a church which seats 200 in the main auditorium.

Recent out-of-town speakers have been John Scott of Los Angeles; Apostle Myron McConley; Missionary Allen Breckenridge; William Charles of Bedford, Indiana; and A. W. Gage of Indianapolis. Nearly all of the young people attended the district youth retreat at Evansville. The Zion's League has sponsored numerous suppers and entertainments during the year. Harry Tretter, Jr., has enlisted in the Navy and is now stationed at Key West, Florida.

Bonnie Jean, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bradford Quirey, and Susan Kay, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Marvin Stewart, were blessed at recent services by Elders

Chester Metcalfe and W. O. Robertson. Members of the women's department are planning a fall sale; numerous dinners have been served during the year, and a profitable rummage sale was held. Minnie Martin has contributed much to the beauty of the weekly services through her arrangements of pictures and flowers.

New Albany was well-represented at the district reunion; many of the attendants were young people.

—Elsa Robertson, reporter.

Windsor, Ontario

Pastor, Warren Chelline

The annual branch business meeting was held October 1 with Apostle D. Blair Jensen as chairman. Elder Warren Chelline was presented by Apostle E. J. Gleazer to the group to serve as pastor, and was unanimously accepted. Other officers are as follows: Beverly Grant, secretary; Lloyd Arnold, treasurer; Mrs. Lloyd Arnold, director of music; William Beacom, bishop's solicitor; Fred Reid, church school director; Mrs. E. V. Hill, children's supervisor; Laverne Perrit, junior church leader; William Garnier, young people's supervisor; and Irene Brent, women's leader. A vote of appreciation was given Elder and Mrs. Pycok for their services to the group during the past five years when Elder Pycok was pastor.

A large number of Zion's Leaguers attended the Ontario Thanksgiving Festival held in London. Ken Nevels was ordained to the office of priest at a special service held Sunday evening, October 20. District President W. Blair McClain gave the charge, and Jack Garnier, also ordained a priest recently, welcomed Brother Nevels into his office. The choir, under the direction of Mrs. Lloyd Arnold, sang three anthems suited to the spirit of the occasion. The evening service on October 27 was in charge of the young people. Wayne Booth, leader of the Detroit young people, was the guest speaker. At the close of the service, members of the League met at the home of Virginia Bennet for a social hour.

—June Grant, reporter.

Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario

Pastor, G. A. Edwards

Before the evening service on Sunday, October 27, Alvin R. Nott was ordained to the office of priest by Elders G. A. Edwards and W. A. Bushila. Brother Nott is church school director. Following the ordination service, Elder Bushila preached on the theme, "Where Is Thy Brother." Missionary Virgil Billings is to conduct a series of meetings in the near future.

Independence, Missouri

Gudgell Park Congregation

Pastor, Ralph G. Smith

Recent speakers have been Ralph Smith, Wayne Tucker, George Mesley, Edgar Byrn, A. K. Dillee, Harold Hattey, W. E. Wakeman, Harvey Minton, Robert Jones, Clarence Martin, Sr., Lester Flowers, and Walter Woodward. Charles Self is the new young people's leader, with Joy Harris as his assistant. Under the direction of these two people, the Zion's League began activities for the new year on October 27. A Scripture study and discussion class for adults is held each Friday evening at the home of Joseph D. Neill. The women of the branch meet every second Wednesday of the month at the home of Mrs. Ernest Soper. They are studying church history with Melba Troyer as teacher. Mrs. Alice Kelsey was guest speaker at the last meeting; she talked on friendly visiting.

Pastor, Harry A. Wasson

The following officers were elected at the annual branch business meeting: Harry A. Wasson, pastor; Oscar McGlosson, church school director; Pauline Johnson, women's supervisor; Wilber Johnson, treasurer; Luella Johnson, secretary; Dorothy Pinkerton, music director; Wilma Johnson, librarian and young people's supervisor; Alma Brookover, publicity agent; Grace Stone, adult supervisor; and Gertrude Wasson, children's supervisor.

A farewell party was given for Missionary James Daugherty on the evening of October 26 at the close of a month's missionary endeavor. As a result of his ministry, eleven persons were baptized and confirmed on October 27. They are Edward Jones, Arthur Getman, Robert and Lois Pike, Charles, Elaine, Jack, and Robert Kimball, Mary Jean Lansbery, Page Baptist, and Dean Beckus. Elder J. O. Dutton was the guest speaker both morning and evening on October 13. At the morning service, Ephriam Johnson was approved for ordination to the office of deacon. Oscar McGlosson, church school director, recently attended the institute for church school workers held at Aurora, Illinois. Under his supervision, the junior department has contributed much to the worship services. Both the Zion's League and women's department are engaged in active programs. Several from Beloit attended the district conference held in Madison on October 20. Leonard Davenport is now attending Teacher's College in Viroqua.

Recent speakers at the worship services have been Pastor Harry Wasson, Elders Clyde Funk and C. C. Hoague, and District President Ormand Kimball.

Low Banks, Ontario

Special services were held on Easter, Mother's Day, and Father's Day. Elder Wilson of Toronto, and Elder Dayton of Ridgeway were guest speakers. Homecoming was celebrated on October 20 with Elder Bavington, president of Toronto District, taking charge of the 9:30 prayer service and Elder Dayton giving the 11 o'clock sermon. Lunch was served in the lower auditorium by the women. The infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Cook was blessed by Elders James Wilson and Clarence MacDonald after the prayer service. The son of Vina and Frank Cook was blessed by Elder Dayton and Elder MacDonald. The annual business meeting was held in September; all officers for the preceding year were sustained.

Muskegon, Michigan

Pastor, E. V. Swager

The annual business meeting was held at the church on September 3. Elder E. V. Swager was sustained as pastor, with Charles Sheffer and William Farwig as associates. Other officers elected are Anna Farwig, clerk; William Farwig, church school director; Lavina Hooper, junior church school director; Ola Jacobs, women's leader; Harold Lathrop, young people's director; Nina McCumber, older young people's leader; Charles Hittle, president of men's club; Julia Sheffer, publicity agent, book steward, and librarian; Wilma Swager, director of music; William White, treasurer; Ola Jacobs, Nellie White, and Obediah Richmond, finance committee.

Several of the church school workers attended the institute held in Flint on September 22 and 23. The Southern Michigan District Conference was held in Muskegon on the week end of September 28, 29. Apostle Blair Jensen was in charge of the business session on Saturday; the combined choirs of the district presented a concert in the evening under the direction of Frances Carlson. At the close of the concert, the young people gave several skits, after which the women served refreshments. Approximately three hundred attended the Sunday services. Both Saturday's and Sunday's meetings were held at the Angell School auditorium.

An impressive candlelighting service was arranged for the installation of officers on the evening of October 6. A table was placed before the pulpit, with sixteen rainbow candles on it; in the center was one large, white candle representing Christ. When the office for which each colored candle stood was named by the pastor, the person holding that office took his candle and lit it from the center one. A pledge was made in unison by the officers at the close of the ceremony.

On October 13, Harold Lathrop and Charles Hittle were ordained to the office of priest, and Obediah Richmond to the office of deacon. Elders Homer Harvey and M. A. Ward of Grand Rapids assisted in the ordinations and were the speakers of the day.

Graceland College Day was observed with a program, special music, and a sermon by Harold Lathrop, a former Graceland student.

Saskatoon, Saskatchewan

An amateur hour was sponsored by the young adult group on October 4 to aid the cubs. Don Few acted as master of ceremonies; Maureen Harper won the largest number of votes for her song. A farewell party was held in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Julian Peterson in the lower auditorium of the church; the Petersons are leaving to make their home in Missouri. A new study group has been organized to study The Bible in Everyday Living; Mrs. Diggle is the teacher. Ernie Baker has been appointed bishop's agent for the district. A two-day conference is to be held November 9 and 10; James Menzies will conduct a series of meetings the following week. The Saints were saddened by the death of William Brant, a former pastor of the branch; Brother Brant was largely responsible for the success of the recent reunion.

Croswell, Michigan

Pastor, Myron A. Carr

The following officers were elected at the annual business meeting held September 24: Myron Carr, pastor; H. C. Swaffer and C. L. Levitt, counselors; Mrs. C. L. Levitt, women's leader; Herbert Swaffer, church school director; Mrs. Mae Swaffer, clerk; Clifford Levitt, treasurer; Mrs. Clifford Levitt, director of music; Mrs. Frances Jackson, pianist; Mr. and Mrs. Fred Dingman, auditors; Mrs. Myron Carr, historian; and Lewis Carr, librarian.

The women of the branch held a bake sale and bazaar on October 12. District President John Booth was the speaker on October 20; he will soon be leaving the district. Evangelist John R. Grice is expected to be present on November 3.

—Mrs. Myron Carr, reporter.

Special Services at Buffalo, New York

Seventy Donald E. Harvey will begin a series of meetings on Sunday, November 10, and continue through November 17, with the exception of Saturday. Week-day services start at 8 p.m., Sunday services at 7 p.m. All friends and members living in or near Buffalo, and those in Canada are invited to attend.

Anniversary of London, Ontario, Branch

November 17 and 18 will mark the seventy-first anniversary of London Branch. Special services are to be conducted on Sunday, with President Israel A. Smith as speaker. Evangelist W. I. Fligg and Elder J. Charles Mottashed, both former pastors of the congregation, will speak also.

Request for Prayers

Our Departed Ones

JARVIS.—Mrs. Isaac, was born September 20, 1876, in Ladywood, England, and died October 16, 1946, in Independence, Missouri. She united with the Reorganized Church on July 23, 1896, in Sparkhill, England, and was a member of the Priestly Road congregation. On August 6, 1901, she was united in marriage to John Edward Matthews in Birmingham; in June, 1904, they came to New York, where, six years later, Mr. Matthews passed away. On August 6, 1921, she was married to Isaac Jarvis; after spending several years in Iowa, they made their home in Independence, Missouri.

Mrs. Jarvis had no children of her own, but leaves two stepsons and two stepdaughters. She is also survived by a brother and four sisters, three of whom are in England.

DEAN.—Ebb, died Sunday morning, October 13, at the age of seventy-one in Texarkana, Arkansas. A native of Missouri, he made his home in Texarkana following his retirement from the oil industry. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church only a few years, but was an active worker during that time.

He is survived by his wife, three daughters, a stepson, three sisters, and one brother. Services were held at the Texarkana Funeral Home with Pastor H. B. Schultz officiating. The body was sent to Tyler, Texas, for burial in the Chandler Cemetery.

LETTERS

My Calling to the Priesthood

Rotterdam, 8th October 1946

(The following letter is printed verbatim as received from the writer. We believe any alterations would detract from the sincerity of it.—The Editors.)

With the present I want to tell you something about my appointment as a deacon of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints on the 19th of September, 1946. My name is Marinus Laban, and I live in Rotterdam. I am 18 years of age.

I have received many blessings from my Heavenly Father. This has made me a strong believer, and has given me the true conviction that there is a God. This God lives and gives generously and abundantly.

I have always felt that God wants to give of his love. He showed this when he gave his Son as a ransom for all the world. By doing this, he opened the way for us to show in turn that we love him. With this in mind, it has always been, as far as I can remember, my desire to do my utmost. I have tried to look for the things of the Lord, and to forsake the things of the world.

Many times I have had feelings about what God intends to do with his people. At those times I felt something like a burning fire in my heart, and I desired to have more of those experiences. I wanted to know and understand more about the gospel. In stillness I thanked the Lord, and then I often had a testimony that the Lord wanted to tell me many things. Not yet daring to speak frankly, I sometimes felt a little strange among the pupils at school, and also among the members of the church and of the priesthood. This was about three or four years ago. Later on I became more and more acquainted with the gospel and in consequence had greater liberty. I began to speak about the truth with nonmembers. I quite well remember the time when I first came to speak about our Gospel with boys of the factory where I was working. It was impossible for me to avoid the discussion, and I spoke to the best of my ability. The more I spoke, the happier I began to feel. I was able to teach them a little about the love of God for mankind. I have always strived to work for the gospel, and I hope to keep on in the future.

In 1945, just after the liberation, we were in our Friesland branch. During a meeting, it happened that an elder spoke to me, and he said that there was a glance in my eyes which told him that there was a desire in my heart to become a member of the priesthood. At another occasion, they asked me to stay there and become president of the Sunday school. These were great things. However it was impossible for me to settle down there, for I had to return to Rotterdam.

A few weeks ago it came to pass that our pastor told me he had written to Brother Davies in England to ask him if he could consent to call me to the priesthood. Two weeks afterwards I heard that it was all right. I was very glad, for the desire of my heart had been fulfilled.

That week, before my ordination, I had some difficult days, but my Heavenly Father came to my rescue when I prayed to him for help. In the afternoon, before the laying on of hands by the ministers of our branch, I thanked the Lord. I got my Bible and I read 1 Timothy, chapters 3 and 4. I cannot tell you how glad I was with my appointment, and I know that the Lord had helped me all the way.

The blessing which our pastor, Brother Mosterdijk, spoke over my head was very beautiful and instructive. Part of it sounded like the verses 14 and 15 of 1 Timothy, chapter 4.

I hope to go forward in our gospel, and, with the help of my Heavenly Father, I shall undoubtedly be able to do many things for his church. I hope that the Lord will bless you and us greatly.

Marinus Laban.

Enjoys The Herald

Credit is due the editors of the Herald for the selection of the valuable articles used; many good thoughts are presented for the spiritually hungry readers. I also enjoy short features like "So Black the Rose" from Sunset Magazine, and "American Animals" by Thomas Barbour, which appeared in the August 17 issue. The two best articles, I believe, were Robert Miller's "The Glory of God" and J. D. Andersen's "Creative Preaching." I used to preach from notes, but after this I shall have nothing on the pulpit before me except the Three Standard Books. I shall implicitly trust the Savior's promises, once I have filled my mind and heart with his word. I appreciate Brother Miller's explanation of Section 90:3, 6, of the Doctrine and Covenants. The Son of Man has dealt different gifts to the members of the priesthood, so that the whole body may be edified and become rooted in truth.

Seeks Explanation of Scripture

The Church of Jesus Christ becomes more precious to me as I study His word. I have been reading the Doctrine and Covenants, and have read the Book of Mormon three times. Each time I read it, it seems like a new book. I would like to have someone explain to me the meaning of 1 Nephi, chapter 3, verses 236 and 237, which tells of the signs of the last days. When will the "work of the Father" begin?

Please pray for my family; I have four daughters and a son who do not belong to this church. My hope is that some day they, too, will accept the gospel. Mrs. Mary A. Cross.

*M*OUNT OF MOSES, lord of the wilderness!
Whose silence, vocal as a thousand tongues,
Calls to that alien race who, waiting, stood
So far beneath the splendor of the cloud.
Within whose sacred fire was forged
The implement of God,
To fuse the baser metal into gold,
And bring to pass the holy covenant
Of human brotherhood:
O Sinai! O Moses of no less heroic mold!
Now, no more to worship wood and stone,
But God alone.

The Saints' Herald is the official publication of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, with headquarters at the Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, and is issued through the offices of Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage Street, Independence, Missouri.

Entered as second-class matter at the post office at Independence, Missouri, under Act of March 3, 1879. Issued weekly at Independence, Missouri. Price $2.25 per year and $1.15 for six months in advance in the U. S. A., its territories and possessions; Canada $2.50 per year and $1.30 for six months; other countries, $3.25 per year. Notice of a change of address must be given three weeks ahead of the date that it is to become effective. Accepted for mailing at the special rate of postage provided for in section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized July 21, 1921. Printed in the United States of America.

All checks for subscriptions to church papers, or for books and other materials sold at the Church Bookstore, should be made payable to Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

Suggestions to writers: Typewritten scripts, double-spaced, are preferred. Keep carbon copies to protect against loss. All articles and letters should be signed by writers. Please avoid use of post cards. News letters should be signed, approved by pastors, and should concern only church activities and workers. We find it necessary to edit most articles, and to condense news. No charge is made for one printing of the usual announcements of church meetings, births, marriages, and deaths; no memorial verse is used. Bulletin Board notices should be in our office at least ten days before date of publication. We cannot accept commercial or personal advertising. Articles for publication are gladly received, but there is no provision to pay for them. Those that relate to church work, doctrine, general cultural and educational subjects, personal development, etc., will be considered on basis of contents and literary merit. Writers should feel free to make independent presentations of their views, but should avoid criticism of the work of other writers appearing in these columns.

Letters: All letters and money for subscriptions and books should be addressed to Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage, Independence, Missouri. Articles and letters for publication should be sent to the same address, and marked "The Editors." Letters for all general church offices should be sent to The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Checks or Money Orders for contributions made to the General Church should be issued in the name of the Solicitor, Bishop's Agent, or Bishop in the district or stake in which the contributor lives.

If circumstances or conditions are such that it is more convenient to send contribution direct, Money Orders or checks should be issued in favor of The Presiding Bishopric, and mailed to The Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

This includes contributions for tithing, surplus, offering, oblation, Christmas offering, Auditorium, College Day, and The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

* UPSIDE DOWN

Have you noticed the inverted arrangement of the editorial page? And wondered, perhaps, what has gone wrong with us? The "Editorial" flag is down in the lower corner instead of up at the top. There is a reason for it. Our Technical Consultant, Harold Sandy, explains it this way: The title of the individual article is the main thing. The prominent display of a departmental heading time after time is monotonous. Play the heading up, and put the department head down, which will give an effect of newness to each issue. We think it works out rather well. What do you think?

* THE VOICE OF YOUTH

Since our September 7 issue, our publication has been stimulated and invigorated by "New Horizons," a department for and by the young people. This department, and related articles inspired by it, have brought us more correspondence and comment than anything that has happened to us in a long time. Most of it has been favorable, much of it consisting of high commendation, with a healthy percentage of dissent, and some criticism.

In any honest, vigorous discussion dealing with the truth, it is not expected that there will be unanimity at first. Understanding and agreement come later. The period of examination and discussion has its value. Should older readers be disturbed because they do not agree with all that young writers say? Really, no. Older readers do not agree among themselves.

Some seem to be of the opinion that our principal task is to keep the "Herald" harmless. Under such a program, we are afraid that our paper would decline in vigor and die. People will not pay for a publication that does not bring them something new.

It came as a surprise to some young people to discover that the voice of youth could and would be heard—that it would be given space. They had assumed, for some reason, that they would be excluded. This was very unfortunate, both for them and for older ones—and particularly for older ones.

Now, in "New Horizons," with editors of their own age, they have found their voice. They rejoice that they are permitted to speak; and they have something new, compelling, and significant to say. For this Editor, it will be wonderful to have these splendid young people as friends, readers of and contributors to the "Herald" in coming years. We hope that it is a friendship that will endure. It is a friendship that can endure as long as they have the right to be heard, and probably not longer. It is not this Editor's privilege to make ultimate decisions, but he hopes and trusts that the right to be heard is one that will never be impaired. It is a price that must be paid by every publication that would keep its friends.

Ten years from now, they may not think and write as they do now. Neither we nor they expect it. But we need to listen to them now. In ten years other young people will be in action, and will be pinning their ears back, too, along with ours. That is a part of the variety and interest of life. We must be able to take it.

We believe that we can trust our young editors not to use anything inferior, cheap, merely sensational, or harmful. They are searching for what is true. So far their discrimination has been keen, their standards of judgment high. They are trying hard. If they make mistakes, let the readers forgive them, as they have forgiven this Editor his many mistakes in the past.

We believe there are riches to come in these contributions of our young people. We hope readers will have the breadth of mind, the tolerance, the understanding, to appreciate what is good, and to go with us in this experiment in democracy with the youth of our church. You have helped us in many other matters. We believe that you will stay with us now. —L.J.L.

* THE WORD AND THE THOUGHT

A book in the store carries the ominous title, "Thirty Days to a More Powerful Vocabulary." This poor country has too many powerful vocabularies now. What it needs is a few more powerful minds.

Never Give Up!

A Famous Declaration

Horace Mann was a great power in the development of American education during the first part of the 19th century. Those who see his name cut in stone on schoolhouses across the nation today may not realize what he did; certainly they are not aware of the struggles he endured and the discouragements he met in his efforts to bring knowledge to the masses and to make democracy work in public instruction. But his fame will endure wherever teachers gather young people to prepare them for life.

In a letter written to George Combe on November 23, 1841, Mann related how he had gone from Boston to Walpole the preceding day (he was the first secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Education) to hold a county meeting, "the smallest and most discouraging I have had in the state" but went on to declare his determination to continue his efforts:

If I could allow aught to break down my spirit and hope, it would be the manner in which these efforts to arouse public attention seem to fail. Words, counsel, exhortation seem like substances thrown into an abyss. I hear no report giving assurance that somewhere there is a bottom upon which they strike. But continue to throw in I will. Perhaps it may be my own fortune, at some future day, to hear an echo from the depths. If I do not, some follower of mine in the glorious cause will do it; and at length the chasm shall be filled; but, above, the superstructure shall rise as high from the surface as its depths now sink below, and that structure shall be the glory of the world.

Mann revolutionized public school education, led in establishing the first normal school in the U. S., became a member of Congress, and was president of Antioch College when he died on the eve of the Civil War. He was elected to the American Hall of Fame in 1900. Let no one minimize the power of a teacher to leave his mark—a good and great mark—upon the life of his country.

There is power and glory, and some broad hint of the indomitable will and hope of the man, in his last phrase, "that structure shall be the glory of the world." Who now can say that it will not?

A Parallel

Born only a few years later, and contemporary with Horace Mann, was another American, also destined to become famous, but in a different way and for another purpose. Joseph Smith, under the inspiration that had come to him, undertook to found a movement that would effect the restoration of the church of Christ. How futile his first efforts must have seemed in the face of the bitterness of the opposition, the prejudice, and the violence that he met. How inadequate his forces—the mere legal minimum for organization—as he made the formal beginning of his work. He was pouring his resources into that same abyss which Horace Mann found. His efforts, after preliminary discouragements, brought a magnificent success, and then a terrible disaster that ended in his death. But he had planted something that could not be destroyed, and that made a slower but more durable growth under his successors.

His son, Joseph Smith III, must have felt some of the same discouragement in the early years of the Reorganization; but he was also endowed with the same indomitable will and determination. He, too, continued the apparently hopeless task of trying to fill the abyss. He was to realize that his efforts were not in vain before age compelled him to relinquish his task in 1914. He had built well. Yet it was reserved for some future time, and some leader still to come, to see the reality of that structure which should be "the glory of the world."

A Lesson to Us

We are still dealing with that same abyss that was mentioned by Horace Mann 105 years ago. We are more fortunate than he, in that we have heard some echo from its depths, indicating that it has a bottom, and that the material thrown into it is striking somewhere, and slowly filling up.

It is our task, like his, to continue incessantly to throw into it the work, the plans, and the hopes upon which the kingdom of God is to be built. It is possible, it is probable—yes, it seems almost inevitable—that some of us in our lifetime may see the structure rising, not to its ultimate heights, but increasing the breadth and the strength of its foundations upon which the future spires shall rise.

We face the gravest of conditions in the world today. The growth of harmful and even evil habits among the people—drinking, smoking, and other drug addictions; gambling, the decay of ethical standards, and the spread of immorality—is appalling. Even common honesty seems on the decline—honesty in business and in speech. People do not realize the tragic consequences of the ways they are following. This hardly seems to be a world in which the kingdom of God can be built.

Yet we have a nucleus of honorable people who can and will build a foundation. They may be few in number, small in power. But they are like a David in righteousness, contending against a Goliath of evil. All who behold them may think their cause is hopeless. Yet the time will

MANY OF US at headquarters are deeply interested in the growth of our work in Wisconsin. It seems to us that we ought to be strongly represented in the state where the Reorganization came into being and where so many efforts have been put forth during the years of the past. For this reason, and also because we are interested in the expanding ministry of Elder James Daugherty, we have been happy to learn that to the seventeen baptized at Soldiers Grove since General Conference and the four won at LaCrosse, eleven have now been added at Beloit. Brother Daugherty was in the office after a strenuous campaign at Beloit and reported that "there is nothing quite like the thrill you get when you see good men and women making their covenant with God, and meaning it."

Apostle George G. Lewis reports that on Friday, October 25, 1946, he organized the Saints on Beal's Island, Maine, into the Beal's Branch. The pastor selected is Elder Farrell Lenfesty, an excellent and devoted young man who has as his supporting priesthood, Erwin Alley, priest, Charles Lenfesty, teacher, and Marshall Kelley, deacon. The Beal's Island Saints were formerly members of the Jonesport Branch.

FROM SASKATCHEWAN comes word of a heart-warming example of administrative co-operation. Elder William J. Cornish, son of the missionary veteran, Elder J. J. Cornish, has been president of the Northern Saskatchewan District for more than twenty-five years and has given excellent service. He is a particularly good home visitor and is loved by the people of the district. When Elder James S. Menzies became available for the district presidency under full-time appointment, Brother Cornish very graciously stepped aside and urged the election of Brother Menzies. The situation is such that the range and importance of Brother Cornish's ministry will be in no wise decreased by this cooperative action. There will be plenty for him to do, and he does not need the prestige which sometimes goes with official position in order to commend him to the Saints. And by this action Brother Cornish has built for the future as he could not otherwise have done.

A MONTHLY REPORT from Elder John F. Sheehy, pastor of Toronto Branch, contains the following missionary news which I am sure will be of considerable interest to the readers of the Herald:

Last Sunday we had a special confirmation service at which six adults were confirmed members of the church, having been baptized the previous Sunday. You might be interested to know that the baptism united three families as members of the church.

A father and his two grown daughters were baptized, resulting from the splendid life of the good wife and mother. A young woman was baptized who became interested in her church so that their only child, three years old, might be started into religious training at some church. She wanted her husband, who was not at all actively concerned about his church, to go with her and join her church. Result—it awakened his interest in his own church, and through some personal ministry that I gave to the family, the young woman is now a member of our church, and they are now attending church regularly, and the little girl is attending Sunday school. A young man was baptized as the result of the faithfulness of his good wife. He was a Catholic, and will make a very staunch member and a very active worker.

The other individual is a woman who is the only one of all her relatives who is a member of the church. She has a husband, a married son, and three married daughters, and we hope through her to have her family on our prospect list. She has been attending one of our women's groups for many years, and it only required a little personal ministry to have her become a member of the church.

So when we sum it all up we find again, "a little child shall lead them," "a good wife can convert her husband," "a woman's group can be missionary minded."

February Class of Student Nurses

The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing plans to enroll a class of student nurses in February, 1947. It is necessary that applications be filed as soon as possible. Plans for this purpose, or more detailed information concerning the School of Nursing, can be secured from Miss Nelle Morgan, R. N., Director of Nurses, Independence Sanitarium and Hospital, Independence, Missouri.

We feel that the church is offering to young Latter Day Saints through the Sanitarium an excellent chance for professional training and advancement. Nursing is a profession with constantly widening vistas. Here is a calling in which devotion and skill go hand in hand and in which the graduate nurse has many opportunities for serving her fellows with distinction. Salaries and working conditions are constantly being improved.

We trust that those interested will not fail to get in touch with Miss Morgan without delay.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,

Faith in God

Whatever faith in God we have must be an open-eyed faith, a faith that can look the whole situation in the face, and drag the darkest fact from its hiding place and hold it up to the light. There is no commandment, "Thou shalt keep thine eyes shut or thy mind shut." The things that are in this world are here for us to look at and to reflect upon. The faith that we have we must have in the light of all the thinking and all the knowledge of our age.—Willard Brown Thorp.

The New Religious Outlook

By J. A. Koehler

Number 12 in a series of radio addresses on the subject:
"The Social Philosophy of the Modern Prophet"

ECCLESIASTES THE PREACHER said, "There is no new thing under the sun." He said that whatever is, was; and that things will always continue to be as they always were. I suspect he meant that there are no new divinely ordained provisions for the satisfaction of the wants of man; no new nature of man with new requirements; no new law of human life; no new religious truth.

But there are newly discovered truths—religious as well as scientific truths. There is a new outlook—religious as well as scientific.

Let us look backward a moment to remind ourselves of the old religious outlook. Not the old religious outlook of all persons, nor of all peoples (for religious outlooks were as certainly different in the past as they are in the present), but the old religious outlook that needed to be, and still needs to be supplanted, in some instances, by the new religious outlook.

It is not many generations ago that religion forbade the science of medicine (which at that time was not a science) to mitigate the horrors of childbirth. Religion did that on the grounds that science was trying to upset God's plans, who said: "In sorrow shalt thou bring forth children." It seems that religion believed the Almighty was so powerless to defend himself against the designs of doctors that the priests of religion had to step in and help him out.

You should recall without great effort that when Galileo, with the aid of his telescope, discovered that the earth was not the biggest thing in the universe—when he put Aristotle down a few degrees below the Almighty—religion said "Sacrilege," "Away with such a man," "Sign, Galileo, sign; or to the Chamber of Horrors you go." That was part of the old religious outlook.

Perhaps the old religious outlook is distinguished from the new more by its ideas of providences. I refer to the belief that disease is sent of God; that it is possession of the souls of men by devils that makes them sick; and such beliefs as that disease may be cured by charms and the worship of relics. According to the old religious outlook, men were either saved in the Kingdom of God or sent to perdition by acts of Providence.

Old religions were heavily laden with superstitions. The principle of causation, the law of cause and effect as we understand it today, had little place in the doctrines of many old religions. If it had had the place it has in modern religions, the Church would have been less engrossed with rituals and more devoted to righteousness; to social as well as personal righteousness.

Some of you may think that such beliefs belong only to the remote past. But in 1741, even Jonathan Edwards was a supplicator of heaven because he believed that "the God that holds you over the pit of hell, much in the same way that one holds a spider, or some loathsome insect, over the fire, abhors you, and is dreadfully provoked; he is of purer eyes than to bear to have you in his sight," and so on. And, finally, he believed that "There is no reason to be given . . . but that his mercy; yes, no other reason can be given why you should not this very moment drop down into hell." That was religion only two hundred years ago.

Note that characteristic. Religion of old believed it was wise enough to say the last word about everything—not only in heaven and on earth but in hell, too.

NOW, THINGS have changed. Religion is not so sure of itself as it once was. There are some things about which new religion is even surer than the old. But they are, for the most part, demonstrable things. For instance, the late president of our church, in presenting a matter to the body for deliberation and either rejection or adoption, said, "Whether that which has come to me [which he believed should be put to the test] will bring relief to the situation, I know not; but such as it is, I hereby present it." That is quite different from the old attitude of, "Take it; or else."

I do not say there are none of the old superstitions, authoritarianisms, etc., in any present-day religions. I only say that the characteristically modern religious outlook is very different from the medieval outlook in particular. There is none of the old "This is the word of God ipse dixit," in the distinctively new. Those who have the modern outlook say as the modern prophet said: "These commandments . . . were given unto my servants in their weakness, after the manner of their language, that they might come to understanding." Those who have the modern outlook say that truth is possessed line by line by line, here a little and there a little; and that it shall continue to shine brighter and brighter until the perfect day.

It may be that there will always be a mystical element in religion. Of that I do not know. Nor do I think anyone else knows. But the new religious outlook is much more heavily charged with realism than with mysticism. Whereas the old religion was richer in theological speculation, the new is richer in philosophical exploration.

THE REASON is not difficult to discover. For in modern times we are quite sure that the purpose of social institutions—religious institutions included—is to enrich the life of man in the garden of God. We are sure of that, even though we are not sure of the adaptability of our institutions. We are quite sure of some principles; but not so sure of our methods of applying them.

It is that certainty of the modern religious mind that God's Kingdom—which is His will done "on earth"—is an affair of this life; that it is the mode of society that will enrich life as it is established—it is that certainty that makes social philosophy a characteristic of modern religion.

Now please do not misunderstand. We do not say that the true religion of the past was not rich in social philosophy. We say just the opposite. The religious philosophy of the Kingdom prophets was a philosophy of social life. Indeed, that was its characteristic. Social righteousness, in the opinion of the prophets of the Kingdom, is the very essence of true religion.

THAT DOES NOT mean that the new religion (or rather the new way of thinking about religious affairs) puts a lower valuation on personal righteousness. It means quite the opposite. The new religion puts a higher evaluation on personal righteousness than the religion of even Moses did; because it holds that the social ends which Moses sought to reach cannot be reached, as Jesus put it, except as men are "born again." In truth the first test of fitness for the business of the Kingdom, as the modern prophet expressed it, is this: All those who "witness before the Church that they have truly repented of all their sins . . . and truly manifest by their works that they have received the spirit of Christ unto the remission of their sins, shall be received by baptism into his Church"—his Kingdom-building Church; which, in the language of the modern prophet, is a community building, or, literally, a "Zion" redeeming church.

Old Friends

Old friends, how wonderful when time

*Has put the silver in your hair,
Has slowed the step and dimmed the eye,*

And on the brow traced lines of care,

*To have the postman at your door
Bring news of friends of long ago,
Which brings back thoughts of days of yore*

And sets fond memories aglow.

'Tis sweet to know that old-time friends

Still think of you and wish you well,

As down the path of life you go.

These things within your heart shall dwell.

And when one day old friends shall part,

And pass to higher, better things, Kind words and thoughts within the heart

Shall give unto the soul its wings.

—Ermina Perkins Kearney.

THE IMPLICATION of the foregoing is clear: from the new point of view (new for the false prophets of medieval religion but not for the true prophets of ancient religion) religion is a society-building affair. And as a society-building affair it is in necessary alliance with science as well as social philosophy. Indeed, we may almost say in truth that that is the peculiarity of the new religious outlook, namely, its scientific and philosophical outlook. And that means its rational outlook.

Lest some may get the wrong impression, let me repeat, that the new outlook is, in principle, but not in method, the old outlook of the Hebrew prophets. The new religious outlook is a refinement of the old. It is the ancient truths of religion conceived in their applications to modern times.

I have already indicated that which we hold to be the pressing need of modern times. That need is not to make two blades of grass grow where only one grew before. It is not to invent ways to fill more corn-crisbs. It is not to master the arts of industry. It is to bring all the forces that have any proper place in society into an ethical union. It is, as Jesus put it, to establish the "righteousness" of the Kingdom. It is, as the modern prophet put it, to ground the economic lives of peoples in the moral order of the universe. The need of the age is to discover the true philosophy of social life and to implement it in the institutions of human society—specifically in the economies of peoples. Or, better still, that need is to make the economies of peoples implementations of the ethics of true religion.

As I intimated in the former part of this article, some of the old religious outlooks are instances of religious backsliding. Religion lost ground. It fell to the low estate of an onlooker of the practical affairs of organized civil society. Its advice was not wanted by the geniuses who shaped industry, business, politics, finance, etc. Indeed religion fell so low that it not only believed it had nothing to say that would be helpful in the conduct of the practical or vital affairs of peoples—with the exception of matrimony—but that it had no right to meddle in such affairs.

All that has changed. Now the contention is that, since social relations are essentially moral relations; since the need of business, finance, commerce, and all, is to be united in a system of moral relations; that religion, which is "the" authority on the righteousness of that whole body of vital affairs, is, therefore, the all-inclusive interest of man; it is, therefore, its function to bring labor and management, and all, into an ethical union. In other words, religion says its function is to put the impress of its prophetic genius on economic life. And the sum of its modern outlook is its social philosophy together with its plan for implementing that social philosophy in the economic life of its peoples.

CHALLENGES

By Norma Anne Kirkendall

—One—

There's a jingle, that was quite popular at one time, which said, "Big fleas have little fleas on their backs to bite 'em, And little fleas have lesser fleas," and so on ad infinitum. The Greeks had two words for this: para and sitos, which joined to evolve into our word, parasite. Biologically a parasite is a plant or animal which lives on, in, or with some other living organism from which it obtains the necessary food or shelter for it to continue its own life. Sometimes the parasite saps the strength of its benefactor until that organism dies.

There are many church members who are literal parasites upon the church and upon the faithful. Likewise, at times, we all have certain parasitical traits. Some of us go to a prayer and testimony meeting to gain new strength from others, but fail to share our brand of testimony with them, the very thing which they may need. Others pay tithes to support missionaries, or branch obligations to see that the local church is kept in adequate repair; then others attend and enjoy the advantages of this without having shared in the struggle to bring it about. There are those who stay away from business meetings or refrain from voting, because they do not want to become involved. Yet they criticize the actions of the officers thus elected. One may get rid of a leech only by burning him off, and some day the fire of iniquity or disinterest will become so strong that the church parasites will find themselves irretrievably lost to the advantage of the gospel of Christ. That same leech sometimes becomes stuffed so full of the blood of his victim that he reaches the point where he cannot longer exert any action. Thus, too, with the parasite of the church—sooner or later he will find himself left behind while the church moves forward.

Recently I talked to a church mother whose son had been seriously injured in an accident. She said, "Of course, I wish he could have been healed, but he hadn't lived the kind of a life to deserve a great blessing." It was tragic that this mother had to say such a thing. Then I asked her about some activities in her home branch, but she did not know for she hadn't been attending. Nor does she take the Herald.

Yes, this is a case where the neglect of a parent might so affect the life of a child that the possibility of a great blessing might be lost. No parent or teacher would purposely endanger the life of a child under his care or intentionally maim his body. Yet by our attitudes and neglect in their behalf, we often engender in them that same sort of attitude and neglect that may keep them from enjoying God's greatest blessings. Thus, without meaning to do so, we actually maim and kill the bodies and souls of those in our sphere of influence. This is a great responsibility upon every individual.

There is a new book on the market, the story of Lilly Dache, the tale of a little French girl who loved hats, and through her love of hats has learned to know people of every walk of life. She says—"This is my own recipe for happiness—to do what you love, with the people you love, in the place you love." And I believe she's right.

That's the reason why true happiness cannot be measured by wealth, possessions, fame, or beauty. True happiness can be found in any society, on any social level, in poverty, or in honest toil. The main thing is: Are you doing what you love to do—are you with the people you love?—Are you in the place you love? It is within your power to answer these questions in the positive.

The trees in the Sacred Grove are tall and straight. The wind gently rustles the leaves, and the quiet of nature relaxes and calms. We sat there in the silence after a hymn, and I watched those leaves dip under the gentle breeze. Suddenly I spied a greater movement. There was one tree, as tall as the others, but its trunk was only branchlike, and this tiny wind which only stirred leaves on the other trees bent this one back and forth, the whole tree bending with each small gust. Even when the strong winds came, this tree would bend and twist but its strong neighbors would protect it from the gales.

There are many church members who are like this. If they had to stand alone in life, the trials and temptations would be too much for them. Luckily there are others whose strength is so great that they act as protectors for those weaker ones. Yes, some seem constantly to be tossed back and forth, but never quite to the breaking point—for the strength of another saves.

Which are you?—the buffeted one, or the stanch protector of the weak?

—Five—

You've heard it often—"don't just be good, be good for something." I'm afraid there are a lot of us who are "just good" in a lot of ways. Too many people just exist, when they could live full lives. Most people only touch, when they should feel. Some individuals merely look, when they could observe. The usual person only reads, when he could absorb. The majority of humanity only hear, when they could listen. The mass of common folks just think, when they need to ponder. Practically all of us just talk, when we could say something.

—Six—

The coldest spot on earth inhabited by man is said to be Verhoyansk, in northern Siberia, where the thermometer (if they had one) would show around ninety degrees below zero for five months of the year. Cold, eh? But even that is not as cold as the unfriendly attitudes of a "divided branch."

The hottest place in this old sphere is in Death Valley, California, where the heat often hovers around 150°. Hot, isn't it? But not nearly as hot as some branch business meetings I've attended.

The wettest spot on the globe is Greytown, Nicaragua, where an average rainfall of 260 inches per year is not uncommon. Wet? Certainly! But really not as dampening as disinterest can be to the enthusiasm of a leader.

The driest location known is Port Nolloth, South Africa, where less than one inch of rainfall is known each year. Dry, assuredly! But I've heard some sermons with a drought of spirituality far exceeding that.

It might be a good idea to test the climate of your branch!

The optic nerve is a little thing, but it gives us sun, stars, and all the wonder of the earth. Prayer is the optic nerve of the soul; we we must not cut the nerve.—George A. Buttrick.

Narrow Is the Way . . .

By Frances Hartman

The author is very active in church work at the Enoch Hill congregation, Independence. She sings with the Clematis Chorus, and is a member of the White Masque Players. In business, she is an adjustment letter writer for a Kansas City publishing firm. She is taking evening courses at Kansas City University, and hopes to complete her academic work in this way. A recent project is to learn Braille to help the blind. We have published a number of her poems in recent months. She has been active in all departments of Zion's League.

THIS NEW ERA in which we live demands that we do our thinking on a larger and grander scale than we have done heretofore. The problems of today are universal, and great masses of humanity are looking to the United States to set the example of unity and brotherhood. But before we, as a people, can successfully think in terms of the whole world, we must be sure that our understanding has a firm foundation. As Saints we must re-examine our lives to see that we are not in any way disobedient ourselves before we can lead and expect others to follow.

The necessity for large-scale thinking is also a wonderful opportunity for spiritual growth. It is such attributes as opportunity, responsibility, honest effort, and earnest desire that will establish the kingdom of God upon the earth! Many Saints, consecrated to do the will of our Master, are securing the education necessary to carry the glad tidings of the everlasting gospel to all nations of the world. Many are preparing, or have long since prepared, to thrust in their sickles in the field which is "white already to harvest."

HOW HUMAN is our desire to show others the light we only glimpse ourselves! How zealously we long to bring all peoples to Christ—peoples to whom he spoke, saying: "Repent, therefore, and enter ye in at the strait gate; for wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be who go in thereat. Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."—Matthew 7: 22, 23, Inspired Version. The chosen people of God are indeed the people who have chosen God. We need to be careful that our enthusiasm for his great work does not cause us to forget our heavenly Father's words, so applicable to each of our lives: "And now a commandment I give unto you, if you will be delivered: you shall set in order your own house, for there are many things that are not right in your house."—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6.

Those who have chosen to take Christ's name upon themselves have chosen also to keep his commandments. Those seeking to keep his commandments agree that it is of vital importance to their own growth and understanding to keep all the commandments he has given us.

How strange, then, is the fact that of the Saints today, who have chosen to serve the Lord and keep his commandments, less than half are keeping one of his most basic laws—the law of tithing.

Perhaps it is well to review this law, a portion of which is here given from the Doctrine and Covenants, section 106: "Verily, thus saith the Lord, I require all their surplus property to put into the hands of the bishop of my church of Zion, for the building of mine house, and for the laying the foundation of Zion, and for the priesthood, and for the debts of the presidency of my church; and this shall be the beginning of the tithing of my peoples; and after that, those who have thus been tithed, shall pay one tenth of all their interest annually; and this shall be a standing law unto them for ever, for my holy priesthood, saith the Lord." The paying of tithing should not only be considered an obligation, but a privilege as well. It is the one material way in which each of us can assist in the advancement of the church, and the subsequent progression of God's kingdom on earth—though we may never leave our home branch.

YES, THE redemption of the world is huge and inviting, but there is a "narrow way" we must learn first. There are definite plans to be followed, old admonitions to be adhered to, new revelations to be received, and the setting of our own house in order before we can tell the world the wonderful tidings of great joy. If we would bring the world to Christ, we must send Christ into the world, represented by men who have dedicated their lives to that purpose, men authorized by the church, and sustained by our paying

Majoring in Righteousness

In the School of Living

By Florence W. Simmons

THE WOMAN who stood patiently before the pan of dishes was afflicted with nostalgia in one of those timeless moments when it shakes the soul and one becomes a part of memory. But hers was not the sort which typed with either moonlight or honeysuckle, though it did hark back twenty long years to one memorable autumn and the beginning of school. The tempo of the years had been slowed because such thrusts from that far autumn were halting her with every new experience. Everything that happened was measured with what might have been. And she would step out of time as on this day and, yearning, repeat the vain query: "Why, why couldn't I have gone on to the university?"

This time there was a softer tone color in the demand she made of heaven that may account for the manner of its settling: it was shorn of all bitterness to a naked longing for what the years might have held had she been permitted to complete her schooling. This tall, vital woman who radiated grace and power as part of her being was not asking aimlessly of herself or the steamy air above the dishpan, but putting it up to heaven. Heaven's reply inspired the answer by a question of its own. A voice, audible in the kitchen, made the moment a supreme one: "What would you have studied?"

Ah, after all the frustration, it was there in her mind. Quietly, instantly she knew! Without hesitation she whirled about and replied with certainty: "Lord, I would have majored in righteousness!"

That was it. Whatever the university might have yielded of facts, truth, wisdom, she would have made an accessory to this life course in the long semester of the school of living. Study at the university would have speeded up the processing, the becoming. She might have made a better showing sooner where the scrutiny is upon education alone. But though it had taken longer to make a comparative gain, the facts and skills she had acquired included with them the knowledge of their right handling under the guidance of the Supreme Instructor. And she was working for the highest degree in righteousness, for she had chosen this course as her major subject.

FROM THOSE who crowd the streets, there are few who attempt, as did this Latter Day Saint woman, to supplement formal education by study alone at home. Our current statistics on crime and divorce and our present trend toward continued war indicate that few who have crowded the universities have learned the best use of acquired facts. The curriculums of the past have not included courses that majored in righteousness; for like leaven, a little of it goes a long way.

We can be eternally grateful for the order of study our schools furnish. Equally thankful also, for the discipline of concentrated effort they open to those who would be handicapped by other interests and inertia if they remained at home after leaving high school. We thank the Author of all knowledge for good schools and the mental or parental urge for learning in them. But we are looking, not at one phase, but at the whole life set-up from a special vantage. This peak, niche, or vantage is open to all who have the fullness of the course for right thinking and doing; the gospel fullness and access to the infinite power of concept which makes its use possible in daily living.

Today we have no peak-equivalent in righteousness for the atomic concept. Our civilization (righteousness) has too low an average in spiritual strength for this scientific strength to be safe unless there is an immediate gain in spiritual power. There are many who are majoring in physics. But how many of them have broadened their scope with a safeguarding course in righteousness?

Most of us are partial personalities. There are missing qualities which are normal constituents of the human being created in God's image and of whom He said in Doctrine and Covenants 90:5, "every man whose spirit receiveth not the light is under condemnation, for man is spirit." When such powers as love, humility, and discernment are non-functioning, man is rendered something less than a person but not quite on the animal plane.

We are unfinished men and women, part-time persons who are not won to the truth that the principles of life should be operative full time. Many of us are shift workers in the art of living, engaged in useful pursuits and absorbing tangents: doctors, builders, teachers, artists, laborers, homemakers, or simply dilettantes. It is obvious to the discerning that those who may be skilled in these vocations are not

Shall we then be faithful stewards
And his tithing law obey?

There is joy and peace and plenty,
And his servants lead the way—
Follow them, the Lord commands it,
Help fulfill the law this day!

Come ye Saints, the Master calls us
Unto blessings we have earned;
Wicked pride shall be like stubble
But who tithe shall not be burned.

Zion yet shall shine with glory:
Windows open—heaven's light
Pours on us the promised blessings, Showing all his wondrous might.

proportionately developed in personality. The truly great, those who live less swiftly but more fully with whatever they may be doing, are the doctors, builders, homemakers, nurses who have included majoring in righteousness. And although some of us are handicapped with moted eyes, those who continue this course are recognized for their superior use of the precious gift of life.

WHEN WE CONSIDER the contributions to humanity of such persons as Percy L. Julian, the Negro chemist, who has made progesterone available for preserving the life of unborn babies, of Einstein and his theory of relativity, Madame Curie and radium, James and his teachings in psychology, Wagner and others with their sublime music, we are impressed that divine impulses are ministering to specific needs throughout the world. However, if you stand aside and look at this ministry you will make an obvious deduction: they are cures for violations of the body, appeasement for the overwrought spirit; but not a ministry for the prevention of the cause of illness of body or the discordant mind. Those qualified for that ministry are they who have majored in righteousness.

These may be ordained men of the priesthood or virtuous mothers in Israel whose right use of life is the leaven which causes others likewise to rise.

LATTER DAY SAINTS have a special calling. To do whatever they do best, of course! To cultivate their talents for service, to be sure! To forge to the first ranks in their chosen fields of work. But that is not the special call which pleads for their response. The first quality is expected with such a guide as the gospel fullness provides, and the power of action through faithfulness to its highest principles. Latter Day Saints are not expected to romp in the gutters. But they do have an open calling to this ministry of righteousness through the invitation of the Holy Spirit on acceptance of His plan for right living. The covenant at baptism is a ladies' and gentlemen's agreement to major in the life course of righteousness; and the stimulating fact about it is that it requires the noblest and best of such people.

They may become actresses, plumbers, or homemakers; but these vocations are not as effective without this quality course in righteousness. With the best proficiency their influence will be even more effectual in serving if it is done in an overall of righteousness. Can you imagine the comforting confidence one would have in their word, the security felt in such a person's care, the blessing shared in such uplifting fellowship? One thinks a bit about what Zion must be!

HOW MANY OF us thrill with joy that with the gospel plan we may make a unique contribution to humanity? Are we ever disturbed because we do not rise up and fulfill the obligation, since it does relate to that agreement we made? Indecision is costly. The service we fail to give robs us most. For more than a hundred years we have offered precept, with the ministry of a few who majored in righteousness. But so very few have not been adequate in such an era of fear and violence when the need was the social demonstration of peace.

With a talent surplus, not only in the world but in our own ranks, we are discomfited that a more vital need is not being met: the ministry of right living by at-all-time persons. whole personalities, people living to the highest principles all day in the family and out in the community. Men and women, young people who have risen above the don't level to the do level. At some level in the kingdom-creating process there must be a breaking away from such vices as stealing, drunkenness, adultery, vicious gossip, and the other disease forms of behavior to the high calling of purified, loving, life-giving service.

While the course in Righteousness is for life, we can learn and teach that life begins today! Not at forty! What a pity that one should wait to live well.

DOWN THROUGH TIME the emphasis has been on talent or obvious culture, rather than spiritual cultivation, and the consequent honoring of its possessor has been an enticement for such effort. Complexes grew out of self-striving over the enticement rather than service through unfoldment of the talent. The nature of the course in righteousness excludes this appeal as a violation of its integrity. Power is slow in accruing to the individual and is never attributed to the person, since honor and glory revert to God rather than to self.

The course in righteousness lays inducement on seeking the good of others; that in forgetting one's own quest for happiness in the joyous furthering of another person's is to find the very core of life itself. There is nothing spectacular in this course except at such times as one lays down his life for some friend or even enemy, possibly the course, with a plea for forgiveness on his lips.

The tenor of the course holds to a rather quiet key. Much of the practice work is out of sight, rarely appearing publicly except as just dealing, sincerity, giving one's advantage to another, helping the underprivileged. Of course the latter means risking prestige unless one is well fortified with a secure social position. But those majoring are such intelligent, magnanimous spirited persons they brush off this risk as though it were a piece of straw caught in the hair and go forward!

The course is based on loving the Creator with all of heart, might, mind, and strength. Then, the proof work is made by loving one's neighbor as himself in a one-world neighborhood.

Many give up the course as too demanding. They fail to catch the challenge of the high road. They think it too long to be sustained for life. Those who complete it, or are working at it say that it is only possible to hold to by daily repentance of even such sins as idle thoughts, that the heart must be drawn out in prayer continually, and a daily study of the course through the Bible (Inspired Version), Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants. Other good books are expected and required for intelligent living with the course.

The course is free, but there is some expense in personal sacrifice: giving to others, and by the way, the best gifts are required—the gifts of love.

The rewards of the course? Progressive abundance to be gained in the next semester if not in this first.

Are the gains of the course unique as an offering to humanity; what is the actual rating? The details of the extent we do not know, but it does involve the all and the best in man, and it is the only bestowal from all that might be made that promises life forever in joy.

He received a fullness of truth; yea, even all truth, and no man receiveth a fullness unless he keepeth his commandments. He that keepeth his commandments, receiveth truth and light, until he is glorified in truth, and knoweth all things.—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 4.

"Divineless" Discontent

By Nomie

My deepest sympathy is extended to the many unhappy people who comprise so large a part of our society. They are the victims of a vicious epidemic of dissatisfaction that had its beginning in the Garden of Eden. The distressing part of it all is that no one so far has been able to develop a cellophane-wrapped wonder drug to alleviate the suffering; the sufferers, however, would avoid a sure-cure if there were one—they'd rather be sick! Children are seldom bothered despite the contagious atmosphere in which they are reared. Afflicted parents often find cause to wonder when they see their offspring so apparently unaffected and carefree. Adolescence brings the first signs of allergy, which allergy increases with age.

This "ailment" is characterized by a constant state of discontent. If it is a sunny day, the "victims" are sure to have been praying for rain; if it rains, they suffer from a lack of vitamin D and predict disastrous floods.

They are filled with a vague anticipation of evil. They see race riots, depressions, labor disputes, and crime waves ready to descend upon the populace of every city; they see inflation, famine, crop failure, and poverty crippling the farmer. They pride themselves on being the disillusioners of youth. They call upon newlyweds and inform them that the divorce rate is one in four. They sit at bedsides in hospital wards and quote statistics on increased cancer and heart ailments. They tell vivid tales of atrocities to the family whose son is still "missing in action." They predict catastrophe for the church; they can't understand where all their tithes and offerings are going; they shake their heads and reminisce about the good old days when prophecy flourished and men preached on every street corner. They wax eloquent on the evils of government. They won't vote because they find more satisfaction in attacking the party in power than in sticking by the party defeated or party responsible for questionable administration. They cast a scornful eye upon humanity at large; the average intelligence, they say, is so far below their level of thinking and ability to comprehend that they are alone in their world of superior knowledge.

Perhaps it is easier to hide one's inhibition's and complexes behind an aura of disapproval than it is to correct them. In the long run however, such indulgence has a deadly effect; it attacks both mind and body, and kills the spirit. More strained-spinach and milk diets have been prescribed for stomach ulcers, resulting from unhappy thinking than from meat and strong drink. The psychiatric trade is on the increase because people are creating more and more phobias by permitting themselves to become the victims of unhealthy thinking habits. If the church is "slipping"—a matter of personal opinion—it is only because its members are lacking in faith and are unwilling to assume their share in the responsibility of making it worthy of spiritual blessings.

Secretly the doubters must envy the trusting souls who never admit defeat or depression or disaster—who, with their simple, unwavering faith in themselves and those about them, continue to work for a better world tomorrow. They are the architects and engineers and builders of a Zion the unbeliever will never know; he needs so many hours every day to criticize, no time remains for building.

We Improve Our

TEACHING METHODS

By John R. Darling

Associate Director of Religious Education

TEACHING, EITHER secular or religious, at its best is concerned with an ultimate goal, that of changing conduct to something that is better in the lives of both individuals and social groups. For Christians, therefore, the true goal of the religious educator is the major objective of understanding and practicing and teaching the way of life of the Master teacher, Jesus the Christ.

We recognize that competency in teaching requires a precise statement of objectives based on anticipated outcomes, a knowledge of materials, a sympathetic understanding of the characteristics and needs of the learner, a developing mastery of teaching techniques, a passionate interest in self-improvement through meditation and study and determined will to teach righteousness by both precept and example.

A developing recognition of and a growing appreciation for Christ's methods promote as a natural result:

1. Improved methods of teaching
2. Improved learning
3. Improved quality of living

TO UNDERSTAND and apply Christ's methods of teaching is not a simple assignment. Workers in the field of religious education, however, during the past 2,000 years have proclaimed three definite and closely integrated conclusions. These theories, we must admit, await the necessary verification that Zion will bring. Briefly stated, these are:

1. Successful pursual of Christ's method is dependent on both attitude toward and quality of living. Christ's method, as implied above, has been proved only half correct—that of his personal righteousness. While the truth of his method is yet to be confirmed, we are certain that it cannot unless we, his followers, apply it. Paul caught the vision of this concept when he wrote: "For the Grace of God which bringeth salvation to all men hath appeared; teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."—Titus 2: 11-14, Inspired Version.

2. Care must be taken in any proposed teaching program to see that expendable effort does not culminate merely in "much ado about nothing." However, at the opposite pole is a hesitancy to "do" that can only induce a state of indifference. We are admonished to "study to show ourselves approved." Specifically we are directed to "seek out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study, and also by faith" (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36). As we interpret "the best" source of direction as the Three Standard Books, we are immediately confronted with the necessity of fulfilling, as a church, some very specific requirements; for example: "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I am with you always, unto the end of the world."—Matthew 28: 18, 19, Inspired Version.

We do not, however, wish to imply that we should in any sense limit our study to a perusal of the Scriptures, for the Doctrine and Covenants implies a blanket admonition that each one of us can heed profitably: "Study and learn, and become acquainted with languages, tongues, and people." A "must" in our lives, therefore, is a recognition that evangelistic effort depends upon the breadth of information and application of truth wherever found.

3. We learn to do by doing. There is no acquiring or transmitting of Christ's way of life by passive contact, even with the Master Teacher himself. Proof of this truth is reflected in the response made by the rich young man to Christ's specific direction to sell his goods and give to the poor. The degree of response by the young man to this personal instruction in stewardship was most tragic. "He went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions" (Matthew 19: 22). Theory of any detail in the whole pattern of living, even though taught by a master teacher under the most favorable conditions, is incomplete unless the learner actually responds to the best he knows. This is true in all areas of living and in all ramifications of these areas.

In this article we hope to include besides the general beliefs so far expressed, a few specific goals and procedures drawn from principles of general educational method applied and adapted discreetly to church school teaching. We cannot over-emphasize our conviction that improved teaching awaits a qualified leadership, produced through consecration, study, trial, and error. To discount devices in good school management that crystalize learning can never be justified. To seek constantly to improve our total educational program, by every possible means, deserves our constant and hearty approval.

SOME FUNDAMENTALS OF CLASSROOM MANAGEMENT

1. Insofar as it is practical, do not begin any lesson, project or program or other activity in which all in the room are to share or participate, until all pupils are in their seats, or at their desks, or in chairs in an attitude of attention or readiness. This does not mean that pupils are to sit with arms folded, but their position and attitude should be similar to that expected of any well-trained adult in any group meeting.
2. See that no one else interrupts when you are talking, and that no one else interrupts when a pupil is talking to you when before the group, or when any one pupil is talking to the group.

3. Before pupils go to their work, or when they change from one type of work to another, be sure that everyone knows clearly what he is to do in the new work.
4. Begin in the kindergarten to give children opportunity to work in a concentrated manner on a task as long as they can or wish. On any grade level give children opportunity to work longer periods without interruption. In this age of multitudinous activities, interests, and distractions, it might be well for the church school to set up programs where children feel the sensation of quiet, relaxation, calm.
5. Keep in mind that there are times or types of schoolwork where all must be quiet, while there are other times when children may be free to talk with each other, move about the room unrestricted, and engage in undirected activity.

METHOD IS IMPORTANT IN TEACHING!

1. A teacher's method consists of everything he does in the classroom.
2. Method is also composed of contributory elements that can be isolated, examined, and perfected.
3. Method should be inconspicuous.
4. Each teacher's method should be selective and personal.
5. Each teacher's method should grow and become more efficient as progress in teaching takes place.
6. The aim of method is to help the teacher use information and activity to modify student behavior.
7. There is no general "best method," but for any individual teacher there may be a method which is "best" for him.

There are several elements that are present in every successful method. The following elements are conducive to good teaching:

Challenge and Interest: good teachers make their work vital. They tend to do this in two general ways. They implement the challenge that is inherent in all social studies work, and they utilize the interest of their students.

Meaningful Assignment: when interest has been aroused, the good teacher capitalizes upon it by encouraging the student to study the field of his interest in an orderly way.

Provision for individual differences: good teachers recognize that students vary greatly in ability, interest, maturation, and type of intellect. They try to fit their instruction to the child, so that every student will feel that he has some contribution to make.

Help in Study: good teachers do not assume that interest in a question is tantamount to the ability to study the question in an effective manner. On the contrary, most good teachers know that even the most brilliant students can be taught to study more effectively.

Provision for activity: good teachers do not lecture to their students day after day. Instead they vary procedures with different types of activity.

Encouragement of clear thinking: good teachers emphasize and extol evidences of rational thinking. Thinking processes can be taught, and effective teachers help their students acquire the habit of rational thought.

Provision for pupil participation: good teachers make their classrooms thrilling places in which students have a chance to participate in arguments, discussions, debates, formal programs, and informal meetings. This participation should follow careful study and accumulation of evidence.

Evaluation: good teachers are aware that they must test for more than mere presence of facts. They refer to the objectives of their courses and endeavor to discover the degree of success they have had in attaining those objectives.

WHAT SHOULD I KNOW ABOUT CHILDREN?

1. The teacher should understand the problem of maturation. For example, a child becomes four different people in pre-adolescence, early adolescence, late adolescence, and post-adolescence.
2. The teacher must understand normal student interests.

3. The teacher should understand and appreciate the various types of intelligence.

4. The teacher should know how to detect and provide for individual differences.

The following classification of activity is according to the type of students to whom it appeals.

1. Activities appealing to and satisfying primarily abstract or verbal intelligence.
 - a. Reading for pleasure or research
 - b. Writing
 - c. Formal discussion
2. Activities appealing to and satisfying primarily social intelligence.
 - a. Informal conversation
 - b. Listening
 - c. Interviewing
 - d. Observing
3. Activities appealing to and satisfying primarily mechanical or concrete intelligence.
 - a. Collecting
 - b. Constructing
4. Activities appealing to and satisfying primarily aesthetic intelligence.
 - a. Drawing
 - b. Painting
 - c. Dramatization
 - d. Music
 - e. Photography

HOW IS MY P. Q. (PERSONALITY QUOTIENT) AS A TEACHER?

In developing a good teaching personality, the following traits have been considered significant:

1. Sympathy
2. Understanding
3. Helpfulness
4. Humor
5. Truth
6. Competency
7. Control
8. Appearance

We sense the importance of the simple truth that efficient classroom management is impossible without (1) a growing understanding of children, (2) an expanding knowledge of good teaching methods, (3) an eliminating of personality traits that are negative in their influence, and (4) an abiding consecration for the privilege and responsibility of teaching.

Religious education is concerned with directing the pupils, both young and old, in the fulfillment of their needs. It, as a product, means not subject matter but new behavior or adjustments in terms of the pupil's needs and his particular environment. Behavior has three aspects, namely: thinking, doing, and feeling; hence behavior is modified by three kinds of "controls" or "outcomes": understandings, habits and skills, and attitudes and appreciations.

Since education as a process is a growing of the organism through experience, teaching is conceived as directing pupil experience in terms of planned objectives. From this point the problems become:

1. What are to be our clearly defined immediate objectives?
2. How shall we select and organize objectives and materials in a particular course? and
3. How shall we direct our pupils in a unit of learning?

The January issue of Guide-Lines to Leadership, the quarterly publication of the Department of Religious Education, will present five key articles prepared as specific helps to more effective religious education in the branch. These articles will present a summary including recommendations made by commissions considering the study program of the different age levels. Each of the religious education institutes held this fall was concerned with "these things we can and will do" to improve the educational work in our branch. The combined findings and recommendations will be included in these constructive articles. The yearly subscription to Guide-Lines to Leadership is $1.00, and can be ordered from the Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

Are we deeply concerned with immediate steps that lead toward our ultimate objectives as a church, i. e., the building of Zion and evangelizing the world? A vital concern for improved teaching methods is a wholesome sign.

HELL

What and Why?

By Maurice L. Draper

President of Seventy

From the original script of a radio address given last year on Station WALA at Mobile, Alabama. A related article was published in our issue of May 4. Other articles by the author will appear in the near future.—Editors.

"The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God."—Psalm 9: 17. This statement of the Psalmist introduces a subject related to the question of life after death, about which there has been tremendous interest. Some preachers have used the "fires of hell" to frighten the sinners in their congregations into church membership. Some pious mothers have used threats of hell to persuade their wayward children to attend Sunday school and church services, and many people have shuddered at the horrible descriptions in literature, sermons, and private conversations about the agonizing experiences of those who burn, blister, sizzle, and fry through the endless millenniums of eternity.

Hell, despite the popularity of its treatment in religious teaching, however, is one of the most abused concepts of Christianity. We shall do well to consider some of the many misconceptions about hell, and by so doing, we may arrive at the truth of the scriptural teaching about it. One of the most outstanding errors in popular thought about hell is that it is identical with the lake of fire and brimstone mentioned in the Revelation of John in chapter 20. In this connection, the idea has been commonly accepted that hell is a condition of fervid heat, produced by raging fires of sulphur, which scorches, blisters, and broils the unfortunate persons who are there.

This idea that hell is a place of literal fire, in which the rebellious burn without being consumed for all eternity, is in direct contradiction to the teachings of the Scriptures. In the first place, it should be pointed out that it is the spirit that goes into hell, not the body. The body remains here on the earth, and returns by the natural process of decay to the dust of the earth from which it came. It is the spirit which enters into hell. Now, can a literal fire harm an immaterial spirit? Can a fire which requires substance upon which to feed, and which itself is a physical process, having its own chemical nature and structure, harm in any way the disembodied spirit which has no connection with pain nerves, and which has no substance of its own? The three Hebrew children spoken of in the writings of Daniel were cast into the furnace which was heated seven times hotter than ever before. But when the guards looked in, they called the king who saw not three, but four; and the form of the fourth was like unto the Son of God. Ordering the Hebrews removed, the king could not even discern the smell of fire on their clothing. When quickened by the Spirit of God, not even the physical body was harmed by the fire. How much less would pure spirit be subject to the normal reactions to great heat, even as great as the fires of hell are sometimes described to be?

I have heard of a number of illustrations used by hell-fire preachers to illustrate what they think are the fiery conditions of hell. One of them goes like this. If we should pile together in one great pile all the combustible material in the world—coal, wood, gas and oil, phosphorous, sulphur, etc., and set fire to it, the heat of this great fire would be so insignificant compared with the fires of hell that a pail of water from hell would freeze in the midst of it. Another tells us that every one thousand years the Devil will come around to each of the miserable sufferers in hell and turn them over with his three-tined fork so they can bake and blister on the other side, and will whisper in their ears with fiendish glee, "This is just one second of all the eternity that you'll have to stay here."

Still another story tells us that if a bird began carrying the earth to the moon, carrying one grain of sand each trip, and making one round trip every year, by the time the bird had carried the entire earth to the moon, it "wouldn't be breakfast time yet in hell."

These stories indicate three great errors: one—that hell is a condition of literal heat where the unfortunate spirits of the wicked suffer literal agony from the torrid fires; two—that those who are sent into hell must remain there for all eternity, with no hope of escape from the horrible suffering there; three—that the Devil is in charge of hell, supervising its tortures and delighting in the suffering of the inmates.

Now, what do the Scriptures teach about these things? Isaiah, in verse 22, chapter 24, speaks of the wicked and rebellious being gathered together as prisoners and shut up in a prison. The fact that they must be restrained indicates that they are conscious, and that they are in a state of suffering. We do not attempt to deny that there is suffering in hell. But it is not the suffering of a literal blistering by a physical fire. It is the suffering of restraint, imposed because rebellion against law has made those who are restrained dangerous both to themselves and to others. But hell is more than just a place of suffering. In I Peter 3: 18-20 we read how Jesus suffered for the world in order to bring us to God, and how by that same spirit he went and preached to the spirits in prison. In the next chapter, sixth verse, Peter tells us that the gospel is preached to them who are dead that they may be judged by the same standards as we who receive the gospel in the flesh, but live according to the will of God in the spirit. What reason could there be for the preaching of the gospel to the dead, those in hell, and the visit of Jesus there unless it would be possible for them to respond and receive the benefits of the gospel to the extent that they may still be capable of receiving them?

The words of Canon Farrar give emphasis to this thought. "Shall nature fill the hollows of her coarse rough flints with purple amethyst; shall she, out of the grimy coal over which the shivering beggar warms himself, form the diamond that trembles on the forehead of a queen; shall even man take the cast-off slag and worthless rubble of the furnace and educe from it his most glowing and lustrous dyes—and shall God not be able to make anything of his ruined souls?" Then, in the words of F. Henry Edwards, "Hell is the furnace in which these ruined souls are recast. Because they are living people, who have become what they are by the lives they have lived, the process is painful. There are no anaesthetics for moral surgery, but it can be effective if there is moral co-operation. Hell is our last chance for such co-operation."

The Scriptures, then, indicate clearly, that hell is the place of restraint for rebellious persons between death and their resurrection. It is a place of suffering, because rebellion against law always causes suffering. But it is a place of teaching and preaching of the gospel of Christ, so that while the dross and impurities of sin are being cleansed away, that which is still worth saving can be rescued by obedience and repentance. But what does this do to the idea of the eternity of the suffering of hell? In Revelation 20: 13, we read this statement, which to many will be amazing, yet it is undeniably in the Scriptures, "And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell gave up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works."

Hell, then, is a place of restraint, of moral suffering, and spiritual punishment for rebellion against law, of teaching and learning, of repentance on the terms of the gospel, and from which, finally, the wicked shall be released.

Now, who is in charge of hell? It is popularly supposed that the Devil is its keeper. But in Revelation 12: 8 we are told that Satan was cast out of heaven into the earth, not into hell. Again, in Revelation 1: 18, when John saw the Master in vision, he was told by Jesus, "I . . . have the keys of hell and of death." Jesus, then, is in charge of hell. He has the keys, unlocks the gates, determines the policies, and supervises the activities there. This is why he could preach the gospel there, and why some day he can open the gates and release the prisoners.

Hell is a condition prepared by God to save what may still be worth saving of the lives of those who just wouldn't be saved in any other way.

"I shall seek to save my house to the Lord through personal conviction and testimony."

TO THE MOTHERS IN ISRAEL God has entrusted the responsibility of building Zion in their generation. Zion is not the assemblage of a mass of people, but the aggregation of godly homes. It is the chief responsibility of the mothers of the church to establish these Zion homes.

CRISES MUST BE MET BY GODLY HOMES

We discover that every crisis has been met by the product of godly homes. As the great leader, Joshua, approached his declining years, he realized that a crisis had developed in the life of the Israelites, because they had refused to execute the commands of Jehovah. God had told them to acquire certain properties and establish themselves in righteousness on these inheritances, but by procrastination they became disobedient, weak, and indolent. In this state of affairs, Joshua called a supreme council and warned that the only way they could accomplish the will of God was by family solidarity in righteousness, devotion, and obedience. Joshua remembered what happened to Israel after the conquest of Jericho, because of the sin of the Achan family. When they went to capture weak and limited Ai, the Israelites were scattered, and hundreds lost their lives. They were made to know that Zion properties must be obtained in righteousness or the people would not be blessed on or by them. They were also to learn that there were no insignificant families in Israel, and that the sin of the seemingly most humble family was a deterrent to the progress of God's purposes.

This incident should be a lesson to the church in our day. No family of the church may sin without affecting the life of the church and the progress of the building of the kingdom. The sin of a family in Zion, like that of Achan in Israel, impedes the progress of Zion. After Joshua had counseled with the people, he offered them that spiritual leadership which spiritual leaders must give if Zion is to be established: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

The statement of Joshua was prefaced with a strong admonition: "Now therefore fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and in truth." Our children must be inspired to fear God and to serve in sincerity and truth. Of all people, Latter Day Saints should be sincere and truthful. When people come to your home and stay a little longer than they should, don't give them a welcome to return, and then when they leave speak disparagingly of them before your children. Parents who practice sincerity and honesty are apt to have their children do the same.

AMMONITE HOMES MEET NEPHITE CRISIS

A great crisis had been produced by the Nephites because of their sins of omission and commission. Their enemies, the Lamanites, had infiltrated into their lands and had captured their cities and killed and captured their men, women, and children; and they were about to be destroyed as a nation when two-thousand and sixty youths from their godly homes restored the morale of the Nephites and contributed such military strength that they turned defeat into victory and saved the nation and the church from destruction. If you haven't read the story of this people you have missed one of the most fascinating and gripping stories of the Scriptures. You will find this story in the Book of Alma, 25 and 26 chapters. I would like to read a few selective statements regarding these remarkable people:

They were men who were true at all times in whatsoever things they were entrusted; yea, they were men of truth and soberness, for they had been taught to keep the commandments of God, and to walk uprightly before him. . . . Yea, they had been taught by their mothers, that if they did not doubt that God would deliver them. And they rehearsed unto me the words of their mothers, saying, we do not doubt our mothers knew. . . . And they were strict to remember the Lord their God from day to day; yea, they do observe to keep the statutes, and his judgments and his commandments continually; and their faith is strong in the prophecies concerning that which is to come. . . . Yea, and they did obey and observe to perform every word or commandment with exactness.

The foregoing statements are a vindication of the Ammonite mothers and the homes from which their sons emerged and of our theme, "that crises in the life of peoples are successfully met only through family solidarity in righteousness, devotion, and obedience." These Ammonite mothers must have been highly devoted and deeply spiritual, with a broad understanding of child psychology. They must have known the power of discipline, and used it in the rearing of their children. They were not plagued with the philosophy that children should be permitted to do what they desired. From mothers who had learned personal discipline as a result of their conversion to Christ, these sons learned the art of self-control and guidance; and when they entered the army under Helaman, with no military training, they were ready to "obey and observe to perform every word or commandment with exactness."

Recently I visited the home of a family who had a fifteen-year-old delinquent. While I talked to the mother, her five-year-old son continuously whined, "I want a nickel." Finally the mother took the child into the kitchen, and emphatically told him to stay in the kitchen; but with the return of the mother, emerged the boy to continue his whining. He needed more than a nickel's worth of discipline.

SMITH FAMILY MEETS CRISIS OF 1844

In the crisis of 1844, Emma Smith stands magnificently as the custodian of the home and family which preserved the heritage of the Restoration Movement. Can you see this woman standing immovable in the greatest crisis of her family and the church, and in the midst of her enemies within and without because of her personal convictions and testimony of the Restoration? From the home of that mother came three sons, Joseph, Alexander, and David, who delivered the church from the great latter day crisis. People are not convicted by knowledge but by experience. This was true in the life of Joseph Smith. In the midst of conflict of opinion, like his father, he turned to God for direction and obtained it in the revelation: "The people reorganizing at Zarahemla and other places, is the only organized portion of the church accepted of me, I have given them my Spirit, and will continue to do if they remain humble and faithful." In the light of this revelation, I cannot understand why members seek other movements of the Restoration.

Our experiences accumulate with increasing obedience. Our spiritual experiences are the measure of our spiritual growth. As we grow spiritually, our experiences increase and not the reverse. There are some who think the more knowledge and growth they attain the less they need God; and some have advanced so far that they feel they don't need God at all, or very little. I believe the more one knows and grows, the more he needs God.

Zion will be built and redeemed by people with strong personal convictions and rich and abiding spiritual experiences. It is the responsibility of the parents to see that the family environment is conducive to this end. We may develop in the fields of science, but these will avail us little unless we have the Spirit of God. "Not by might but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

I am indebted to my maternal grandmother who, having been converted to the church, bargained with my father to take care of us children (following the death of my mother) if his home could be opened to the Latter Day Saints. It was in this home as a very small boy I heard the gift of unknown tongues and felt the accompanying power, which I shall never forget as long as I live. I have heard some say that children should not be taken to adult prayer services because they do not know nor appreciate what is said. This may be true, but if the adults by their righteousness and devotion bring the Spirit of God into their meetings, the children will know what they feel. I have heard some make light of others who had attended a preaching service and said, "We had a wonderful sermon," but who "couldn't tell you the text." I imagine those who "felt the sermon" gained more from it than those who went there "to analyze it." The late Joseph Smith, said: "It has been said that a Mormon elder, though but a stripling, possessed a power unequalled by almost any other preacher. This arises from a depth of feeling, and earnestness with which they believe the doctrines they teach; and it is this feeling I do not wish to trifle with." Yes, we must get the feel of things.

The fortunates: Fortunate is the child whose parents are consecrated to the church; fortunate is the home whose doors are flung wide to Christ and the church; fortunate is the child whose parents seek divine guidance in their daily affairs; fortunate is the child who thinks of olive oil as the symbol of the healing power of God, and fortunate is the child whose parents attend church regularly.

WE FACE THE GREATEST CRISIS OF ALL TIME

The world and the church face the greatest crisis in the history of man. This fact is attested by statesman, teacher, professor, and minister. We may meet this crisis as Joshua advised his people to meet the crisis in his day: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." Or we may leave the family to the undermining influences of sin in its varied forms and go down to defeat as a nation and as a church. The nation and the church can be saved again by family life based upon righteousness, devotion, and obedience. God must be received in the homes of his people if he is to be found in the church.

A Short Story

by Vera L. Holseid

The Easy and the Hard

"Well, son, are you soon ready to go to bed?" called Mr. Miller as he looked into the room where Bill was doing his homework.

"Yes, I guess I am, only I found a poem in my grammar book that has set me thinking. Tell me, dad, why is it easier to do the wrong thing than to do what is right?"

Mr. Miller looked at his son gravely and pulled up a chair and settled himself before answering.

"That's a pretty serious question, Bill. Just what do you mean?"

"Here, listen to this poem," Bill replied, and picking up his book read to his father:

THE EASY AND HARD

By CHARLOTTE PERKINS STETSON

It takes great strength to bring your life up square
With your accepted thought and hold it there,
Resisting the inertia that drags back
From new attempts to the old habit's track.
It is so easy to drift back, to sink;
So hard to live abreast of what you think.

It takes great strength to live where you belong
When other people think that you are wrong;
People you love, and who love you, and whose
Approval is a pleasure you would choose.
To bear this pressure and succeed at length
In living your belief—well, it takes strength—
And courage, too.

"That poem really hits the nail on the head, dad. You know, it's hard to live your religion. I know what a Saint should be, but being one is something else again. Why should it be so hard to live the right way? I'd think that would be the easiest."

Bill's father sat in silence a moment, thinking, then replied,

"Well, son, you know life is a game, just like a game of football. There are certain rules to follow if you're going to play the game right. You know you could go out on the field and just run around, keeping out of the other fellow's way so you wouldn't get hurt—that would be the easy way to play it, wouldn't it? But what of the result? You know you'd never win a game that way. So you get in there with all you've got and play it the hard way—to win. What do a few bumps and bruises matter? It's a real thrill if you win, and if you don't, you have the satisfaction of knowing you did your best and gave the other team a run for its money. It's the same way with this game of life. You can play it the easy way, sliding along, not making much effort to live up to your ideals—but what's the result—just a lot of wasted time. Get in there and play it right, and you'll have the victory. The prize for playing the game right is worth so much more, son, that's why it is harder. The peace, the satisfaction, and the wonderful joy in your heart that come from knowing you have truly served God is worth fighting for the hard way."

"Yes, I believe that, dad, but I can't understand why it has to be so hard. I'd think it would be easier, we know it's the best way," Bill said slowly his forehead wrinkled in thought.

"Let's get back to the football game. You don't send a team out on the field by itself to run the ball through. When you play the game right, there is an opposing team.

Well, in life Satan is the opposing team, and he's mighty tough opposition. He doesn't want you to get through to the goal post any more than does the other team in football. He's going to do everything in his power to stop it. That's why it seems hard. You're fighting him every time you try to live as you know a Latter Day Saint should."

"But it seems so easy for you and mother—" began Bill.

"No, you are wrong about that. It is just as hard for us as for you. Many times it would be easier to neglect our study of the church books, or to slide over our family devotions when we are tired and worn from our daily work. Many times it would be easier to forget our accounting to God—just spend our money as we get it and forget about it. Many times it would be easier to go back to sleep on Sunday morning than to get up and go to Sunday school and church, or to say, 'let someone else do it' when asked to aid in God's work. No, it isn't easy, but I've tried both ways, and I know the discontent, the misery that comes when you go the easy way and try to forget God. He just can't be forgotten. You always feel guilty about it. Words can't describe the joy you experience when you live in tune with the Master."

"I'd sure like to experience that joy once, dad, but I guess I'm too young."

"Not at all, Bill, what makes you think that? Joseph Smith was only fourteen when he received a heavenly vision. But he didn't get it by going the easy road. You can have real experiences with God, too, but it takes a lot of faith, study, and prayer. You can't expect to pray over something once or twice and receive an answer or a vision. It takes a lot of right living, thinking for yourself, and going the hard way."

Bill and his father sat in silence for a while, each occupied with his own thoughts. Finally Mr. Miller again spoke:

"To play football the hard way, you go right in and buck the line, and that's the way it is in life. God needs strong, courageous men and women to carry the ball—his gospel—for him. Men and women who aren't afraid to buck the line. The best way I know to carry the gospel is to live it. Men can see it better than they can hear it. So live it the hard way, son. Take that extra time to study the word of God, have faith to believe it. Go to the extra work of keeping track of the money you earn and the way you spend it. Make your accounting to God. Humble yourself by going on your knees to God. Thank him for your blessings, ask his help in solving your problems. Learn to love your fellow men and consider them. Go right through the line, my boy, it's worth every bump and bruise you may get."

"Well, dad," said Bill, rising from his chair, "guess I should go to bed. And I want you to know that when I get up tomorrow I'm going to start living the hard way—I'm going to carry the ball for God—right through the center of the line!"

For Workers With Children

By Lydia Wight

The church suffers when the workers with children are not in touch with the General Department of Religious Education which prepares quarterly a specific magazine for all workers. GUIDE-LINES TO LEADERSHIP brings you the trends in religious education, the interpretation of church doctrines and objectives that they may be more effectively caught up in your teaching and living with your pupils in the church school.

The church gains when you make every effort to keep informed. Your order placed NOW will give you the January issue of GUIDE-LINES TO LEADERSHIP which will help you to start the new year with fresh vigor and a better understanding of your

The Spiritual Handicap of Tobacco

Not one tenth as much has been said of the physical harm caused by tobacco as its serious importance deserves. However, this is the responsibility of our men of medical science. But there is another side to this tobacco habit which cannot be analyzed chemically nor measured by precision instruments. How does it affect us spiritually.

Let one who felt its curse speak out of experience. Most all of us have our start with this evil in secret or isolated surroundings. A feeling of shame seems inevitable, for no one has ever been able to give one good reason for using the stuff. Science and society have condemned its use as a vice. This consciousness identifies us with a different stratum of society. We are henceforth of the world, and worldly.

After I began smoking, a barrier was gradually but surely erected between me and the nonsmoker. I sought the companionship of those whose habits were similar, and avoided those whose eyes and voices would reproach me. I resented the goodness and virtue of my church friends. A mutual aversion, fancied or real, kept me from church fellowship. I affected a nonchalance which was in reality only a camouflage for a blighted soul.

Five years of spiritual wanderings followed. I knew it was injuring my health and alienating me from God and God's people, but I could not get the desire to quit. Oh, I toyed with the idea at irregular intervals, but it took much unhappiness and punishment to bring me around to the conviction which finally resulted in my declaration of independence.

Today, as I see dozens of those who know the gospel, and have made solemn covenant to follow Christ, being lured into soul-sickness by an innocent-looking cigarette, my heart aches. The appeal of radio, movie, and billboards to snare our boys and girls I resent with all the vehemence of one who has learned by bitter experience.—(Author's name withheld at his own request.)

important task. The following articles in that issue offer you specific help:

"More Effective Religious Education for Children," by Edith Atkinson contains the high points in the findings of the Children Commissions that functioned during several institutes held this year in various sections of the country. They deal with present day needs and solutions.

"When Children Listen" by Vera E. Smith will be a definite help as you seek to develop in your children a progressive ability to worship. The reverence and decorum you want them to have will come as the natural result of such a growth of this ability. The results of a better year in your department with new impetus, clearer insight and devotion to your task.

HELPS FOR WRITERS

By the Editorial Staff

News Briefs

It is difficult to make hard and fast rules for news writing; it is especially difficult to say what will or will not be used in a report, because the amount of space allotted for news in the Herald varies frequently. Items which would be included in a thirty-two page edition are, of a necessity, omitted when a sixteen-page issue is printed. The following rules, however, apply in either case:

1. News articles should be headed by city, state, congregation, and name of pastor, e. g.:

Independence, Missouri
Liberty Street Church
Pastor, Howard Timm

If there is just one Reorganized Church in the city, only the city, state, and pastor's name are necessary, e. g.:

Indianapolis, Indiana
Pastor, Lloyd Cleveland

2. Dates of various services and activities should be given.
Wrong: A business meeting was held this fall.....
Right: The branch business meeting was held September 20.....

3. Use complete names (or both initials) and designate calling when referring to ministers.

Wrong: J. Smith, J. Jackson, and E. Jones (or Brothers Smith, Jackson, and Jones) were in charge of the service.
Right: Elder John Smith, Bishop James Jackson, and Evangelist E. W. Jones were in charge of the service.
Women deserve the same distinction. Say either Mrs. John Smith or Mary Smith, rather than Sister Smith or Mrs. Smith.

4. Give parents' names when reporting the blessing of a child.

Carol Ann, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Smith, was blessed August 15, by Elders

5. News must be written in third person.
Wrong: We had Bishop James Jackson for the morning speaker.
Right: Bishop James Jackson was the morning speaker.

6. Editorial comment has no place in a news column.
This is editorial comment:

We have sacrificed and God has blessed us so that now we are able to have a new organ and redecorate our church. We hope that we may continue to move forward in his work, and someday help in the building of the kingdom.

This is news:
The interior of the church has been redecorated, and a new organ is being installed.

7. Eliminate lists of visitors, participants in plays or programs, committee members, games played at parties, reports given in a business meeting, etc. Showers, picnics, parties, holiday celebrations, and other purely social activities should be given very little space. While these items are of interest to readers, there is not sufficient room in the news section to include them.

8. In reporting officers elected to several positions, state the name only once, followed by the various offices held.
Wrong: Officers elected to serve during the coming year are as follows: John Smith, church school director; Ned Young secretary; Jane Jones, women's leader; Ned Young, treasurer; John Smith, auditor; and Jane Jones, director of music.

Right: Officers elected to serve during the coming year are as follows: John Smith, church school director and auditor; Ned Young, secretary and treasurer; Jane Jones, women's leader and director of music.

9. Spell out all words and numbers up to 100, with the exception of Mr., Mrs., dates, and hours.

Wrong: 58 people attended the special meeting held Wed., Oct. 9, at 4 p.m. in the Springfield, Mo., Church.
Right: Fifty-eight people attended the special meeting held Wednesday, October 9, at 4 p.m., in the Springfield, Missouri, Church.

10. Excerpts from sermons may make interesting reading, but they are not to be included in the news.

11. News is what has happened, not what may (or may not) happen. Forecasts of events, especially the hoped-for variety (i. e., It is hoped that Evangelist E. W. Jones will hold a series of meetings in the near future), should be avoided.

12. In general, news reports should include branch achievements; special services, projects, building improvements; baptisms, ordinations, and blessings. Births, engagements, weddings, obituaries, and announcements go in the "Bulletin Board." The frequency of reports depends on the branch; large congregations, which are quite active, may be represented every month; smaller and less active groups, every two to six months.

Bulletin Board

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF SPECIAL MEETINGS

These should reach the editor three weeks in advance of the event being publicized. This allows a week for printing, a week for mailing, and a week for those readers who will be affected by the announcement to make plans. Inasmuch as the Herald goes to press on Friday, announcements arriving late in the week are held over until the next edition.

BIRTHS

Birth announcements should give the parents' names and address, the child's name, and the date of birth. The mother's maiden name may also be included.

Ex. A daughter, Carol Ann, was born on July 14 to Mr. and Mrs. John Smith of Centerville, Ohio. Mrs. Smith is the former Mary Jane Brown.

ENGAGEMENTS

Engagement announcements should include the names and addresses of the engaged couple, their parents' names and addresses, and the wedding date (if it has been set).

Ex. Mr. and Mrs. James Jackson of Centerville, Ohio, announce the engagement of their daughter, Marie, to Lee Taylor, son of Mr. and Mrs. William Taylor of Johnstown, Illinois. The wedding will take place in December.

WEDDINGS

Wedding notices should state the bride's and groom's names, their addresses, their parents' names and addresses, where and when the ceremony took place, and the name of the officiating minister. Such optional items as where the couple will live, where they attended college, and what their occupations are may be included.

Ex. Marie Jackson, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Jackson of Centerville, Ohio, and Lee Taylor, son of Mr. and Mrs. William Taylor of Johnstown, Illinois, were married December 12 at the Reorganized Church in Centerville. Elder John Smith performed the double-ring ceremony. Both Mr. and Mrs. Taylor are Graceland graduates; they will make their home in Johnstown where Mr. Taylor is assistant postmaster.

REQUEST FOR PRAYERS

The afflicted person's name and address is all that is necessary. The affliction may be mentioned if so desired.

Ex. Prayers are requested for Paul Adams of Weston, Idaho, who received severe injuries in a recent automobile accident.

OBITUARIES

Give the deceased's full name (last name first), date and place of birth, date and place of death, when baptized, office held at time of death (if a member of the priesthood), marital status, survivors, funeral data, and place of burial. Additional information on cause of death, life's work, outstanding service to church, etc., may be included.

Ex. ANDERSON.—Frank J., was born June 15, 1910, at Weston, Georgia, and died of pneumonia at his home in Ashville, Kansas, on September 9, 1946. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in 1918, and was ordained a priest when a young man. He was influential in organizing the Ashville church orchestra, of which he was director for the past seven years. In 1935 he was married to Anna Milton; two children were born to this union.

He is survived by his wife, Anna, and two daughters: Julia and Elizabeth, of Ashville; his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Hubert Anderson of Landsford, Kansas; and a brother, Robert, of the home. Services were held at the Landon Funeral Home in Ashville, Elder N. J. Harvey officiating. Interment was in the Fairview Cemetery.

NOTE: In listing survivors, it is not necessary to include nieces, nephews, aunts, uncles, or cousins.

Letters of Testimony

Letters are a personal matter and, as such, few rules can be laid down concerning them. The main requisite is that the letter "say something," rather than being a rambling dissertation on nothing in particular. Anything which borders on the indelicate or unbelievable should not be used.

Remember: This Is the House of God

SUNDAY MORNING I arrived at the church several minutes before the time set for opening the church school worship service. As I looked about at my friends and neighbors who had already assembled, I noticed that most of those present were visiting with others sitting next to them. There was a continuous buzz and hum of voices.

The organist was playing a most beautiful selection, the type of music that tends to draw one away from the cares of the world and bring him in sweet communion with our Maker. That was the object of the music.

It seemed as I sat there listening to those beautiful strains that I experienced a peace more wonderful than I had ever experienced before. Then my mind was drawn back to the buzz and hum of voices around me.

I recall a statement that I read recently. It appeared at the beginning of a worship service program of the church to which I formerly belonged. It read like this: "Whosoever thou art that entereth this church, remember it is the house of God. Be reverent, be silent, be thoughtful, and leave it not without a prayer to God for thyself, for him who ministers, and for those who worship here."

One of the things that I still cling to that impressed me most while still a member of one of the popular churches was this reverence for God and for his house.

Just stop and think, try to comprehend what it means to be thoughtful, peaceful, and quiet on entering the house of God. We are troubled in spirit by the cares of the world. We need those peaceful moments of quiet meditation. In this way we draw closer to God and permit him, invite him to draw closer to us.

What a beginning for any service, whether it be a service for study, worship, a preaching service or a fellowship service. If for study, how much greater would be our capacity of understanding. If a preaching service, how much more he who ministers could bring to us. If a fellowship service, what a peaceful communion with God and with Saints.

Coming from another church and viewing this failing in our people to reverence the house of God, shows me what others not of our faith must think of our lack of reverence.

We enter the house of God with a promise: "Wherever two or three are gathered together in my name, there will I also be to own and to bless."

"Whosoever thou art that entereth this church, remember it is the house of God. Be reverent, be silent, be thoughtful, and leave it not without a prayer for thyself, for him who ministers and for those who worship here."

Preaching Without Notes

"PREPARE YE"

By Irene Carson

MOST OF US have heard this advice many times from the pulpit; we have read it in the Herald and other church publications; we are constantly being admonished to prepare for the future—the time when we, the children of God, shall be required to stand before the judgment seat of the Almighty.

Let us consider "Prepare Ye" as a topic for today and everyday, especially with regard to church school. I honestly believe that all too often our teachers take a fleeting glance at their quarterlies, fix in their minds the title of the lesson, and then stand before their classes with no further preparation or prick of conscience.

Teaching church school is a Sunday occupation. Though not well paid, nor even appreciated at times, it is an important task and a tremendous responsibility. Think for a moment about other occupations. How often do you suppose a bank manager walks into his office without a fairly clear picture of his day's activities? Wouldn't the consequences be rather disastrous if a surgeon had no idea of the way he was to perform a serious operation? Wouldn't the situation be rather trying and expensive if a baker had no idea how many loaves of bread to bake in order to fill his customers' needs? Do we, as church school teachers, give sufficient thought to the consequences of our teaching? Experts have said that every teacher leaves with every child something of himself, be it good or bad. What are we leaving with our classes? Are our students looking at life a little more intelligently because of our instruction? Are they developing a vital interest in the work of God, or are they merely being exposed to incoherent statements and shallow questions, or, perhaps, meaningful paraphrases which have been used so often that they have become bywords? Church school classes were not designed to be time-killers; they are to fit our members better to live this busy life closer to the pattern set down by Christ. If we must kill time, let's work it to death, and in this way increase the knowledge, deepen the faith, and broaden the outlook of everyone of our students, be they young or old.

Our biggest task is preparation. If a teacher, trained or untrained, goes before the class with a well-prepared, interesting lesson, in which he firmly believes himself, it is impossible for him to leave that class without having accomplished at least part of his original objectives. Let us not be discouraged if we don't accomplish everything we set out to do, but keep aiming high, and take each defeat as a challenge to do better.

Do not think that all the limitations of our church schools rest with the teaching staff. There are many members who consistently come to class with no quarterly, or one which has remained untouched in a handbag or suitcoat pocket since the preceding week. It is impossible for a teacher to impress a class with the divinity of present-day revelation when one of the group smacks gum, another passes around the most recent snapshot of the "big moment," and still another sleeps and blissfully dreams of the rather tiring activities of the night before.

Let us, both teachers and students, work toward and pray for a more meaningful church school session. This is our chance to learn more of the church and its work. Make the best of each opportunity that we may grow and develop into the type of Christians who can and will live up to the standard which God expects of his people.

Prepare to take an active part in church school, and you will help not only yourself but others to attain a greater appreciation of our Heavenly Father and his divine purposes.

Little Things

A little act of kindness
May lighten someone's day
A smile a friendly handclasp
May make a sad heart gay,
The little things along life's road,
May brighten up the way.

For after all, the little things
May make up quite a sum;
When all the toil is ended,
And all our life's work's done,
And all the little, little things,
Are added one by one.

Golden Wedding Anniversary

Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Barss of Lansing, Michigan, were honored on their fiftieth wedding anniversary by the fellowship group, which sponsored a reception for them at the Women's Club House on the evening of October 28. The guests took their places as music was played by a stringed trio; Mr. and Mrs. Barss were seated before a large tiered gold and white wedding cake. Elder Percy Farrow of Toronto, Canada, offered the invocation. At the conclusion of the dinner, the traditional wedding march was played, and the couple met before Elder John A. Luce to repeat their marriage vows. Gold rings for this occasion were the gifts of their children. Scenes from their life together were pantomimed with appropriate songs telling the story. In the last scene, Mr. and Mrs. Barss appeared in a large picture frame while "Through the Years" was sung. A golden wool blanket was presented them by members of the Lansing congregation.

Holland Members Visit England

Brother Jan de Mik, who holds the office of teacher in the branch in Rotterdam, visited England, spending the first two weeks with Brother and Sister W. Bailey. The last week was in the company of Brother Davies, and places visited included Nuneaton, Gloucester, and Enfield, winding up with a sight-seeing tour of one day around London. Jan found Wales, where he spent one week in the hills, a veritable paradise for his artistic tastes, and some fine paintings were forthcoming. Gloucester, with its old buildings, was also found very interesting, and these, along with features of London, made our England a place he was loathe to leave. His appreciation of the hospitality and fellowship of the Saints in their homes and church, made it hard for him to leave. Jan spent two years in Germany in the labor camps, chiefly near Stuttgart. He mixed with all nationalities, and added a little of the Russian language to his English, French, and fluent German, and thus with his mother tongue he is well equipped. He is also a musician, favoring the mandolin mostly. He spoke at the Birmingham Zion's League, the Gloucester Fellowship service, and the morning service at Enfield, and his ministry was well received. Along with Marius and Jansji, he makes a very fine representation from our members in Holland.—Mission Courier, October, 1946. (Note: The two other visitors mentioned were M. V. Oorschot and Jansji Velthuis.)

Letter From Sister Napier

Note: Our readers will recall a letter from Sister Hazel Napier, published some weeks ago, relative to the loss of her eyesight. Another letter has been received, indicating somewhat better news, but she must still work under a serious handicap. She has written many inspiring articles for publication, and it is a tragedy that she must endure this affliction to her eyes.

Her letter was not written for publication. We present part of it below. It is apparent that if she were provided with a typewriter she could continue to do a good work for the church, and have the happiness of knowing her life is not spent in idleness. If anybody feels the urge to help her by sending a typewriter, may we suggest that it should be a good standard office model, which she is trained to operate without use of sight. It would be best to write to her first. Relatives help her with the correspondence.—L.L.

It is becoming easier to compose and revise in my mind, though I am going to have to work out some way to put my articles on paper other than by long hand. I use the touch system and am praying for a typewriter.

My eyes have improved a little, and the threat of total blindness seems to have passed. For this I am grateful. I know I have happy, useful years ahead of me. Thank you for your interest and your kindness.

HAZEL NAPIER.

Receives Blessing Through Prayer

I am grateful for the prayers of the Saints in my behalf. After writing President Smith the request, I was given assurance that I would get better. Thanks to my Saviour, I am steadily regaining my health. I rejoice in this wonderful gospel, and my faith grows stronger every day. I take this means of thanking all who were so kind to write me letters of encouragement; may God bless each one.

From a Mother

God has been good to me. My husband, who served in the Navy during the war, has returned home safely. When my young son strayed away one day, God sent an angel to keep him from harm and show him the way back. We now have a baby daughter; our prayer is that she will grow up to help spread the gospel. We want to assist in the establishment of Zion.

ADVENTURES IN LATTER DAY SAINTISM

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Panel Discussion Outline

By Mary B. Hill

Note: This is another in the series of supplementary program helps prepared by the author, who is Zion's League leader of the Hamilton, Ontario, church, for use with the book, "Does It Make Any Difference?"

(See page 16, "Does It Make Any Difference." Add any other points desired, and develop each point more fully.)

What Difference Does It Make What Church I Belong to?:

What does the Latter Day Saint church do for me:

1. IN MY INDIVIDUAL LIFE:

- (a) Gives me faith in a personal God to whom I can come in prayer, who will guide me inasmuch as I attune my will to his.
- (b) Helps me overcome fear. I can hope, despite the fact that the world is in such an unsettled condition, and in danger of atomic destruction. I know God's promises are sure to those who do according to his will.
- (c) Creates mental and emotional stability by providing a pattern of life and a constructive goal toward which to aim my life.
- (d) Determines what I shall do in my spare time. My spare time shall be spent constructively, in pursuits which build me mentally, physically, and morally. These activities are balanced.
- (e) Determines the type of friends I shall associate with. I do not choose only those of my faith, but I choose those who can add to my enjoyment of the better things of life.
- (f) Helps me discipline myself. In the keeping of my financial records, paying my tithing, in being prudent in my personal finances, in being moderate in all that I do, and careful in my conduct toward others.
- (g) Helps me live a pure, wholesome life, and enjoy the best things in life.

2. IN MY HOME LIFE?

- (a) I share with others the rich experience of the family altar.

- (b) My family life is one of happiness and harmony because we participate in the family council. Problems and differences in the family are satisfactorily solved.

- (c) We are mutually helpful and cooperative, remembering that by developing this quality we are building Zion's characters. Thus I share in carrying out the home tasks and in financial responsibility.

- (d) I respect the rights of the other members of my family, realizing that each of us is equal before God.

- (e) I refrain from criticising, grouching, or other habits equally unpleasant, realizing that I also have faults, and if I expect tolerance from others, I must be tolerant with them.

- (f) I understand the love of God more as time goes on, because of the growing love and understanding of human nature which I gain from my home life.

3. IN MY SCHOOL LIFE?

- (a) I do not consider school as a fleeting phase of my life which will soon pass by. It is one of the most important phases of life, for here I am learning the lessons which will enable me to launch into my life's work.

- (b) I consider my life's work at present as the most important thing in my life, because it will determine my contribution to the church, as well as to society. Therefore I plan my course of study carefully, taking a long-time view, and realizing that extra time, money, and effort at the present time, at the sacrifice of a little ready money, may mean a much greater contribution, more valuable service, and a richer life later on.

- (c) I don't cheat in class, neglect my homework, or do shoddy lessons. I am at school to prepare myself as well as possible, and I cannot build anything enduring on a crumbling foundation.

- (d) I play fair in the school games and on the school team. I realize that a Latter Day Saint must be honorable and clean in all his actions, as others will judge my church by my conduct.

- (e) I help my schoolmates in their work, and am not envious of those who attain higher marks or other awards. I realize that by doing my best I will attain the commendation, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

- (f) I do not participate in many of the things the other young people do. I do not smoke, indulge in alcoholic drinks, spend my time or money on frivolous things. I do participate in all school events which are worth-while, such as the track meet, basketball team, glee club, orchestra, dramatic society, etc.

- (g) I am courteous to my teachers and considerate of my schoolmates, as I realize I have much to learn from all with whom I associate.

4. IN MY COMMUNITY LIFE?

- (a) I am neighborly; friendly. I am tolerant, considerate, and helpful to all my neighbors. I help any who need it during sickness or other times of difficulty, and do not see another's lawn uncut or garden needing attention without doing something about it, if I am able to do so.

- (b) I set an example of quiet, clean living. "Wild" parties and rowdiness are not part of our life.

- (c) I am interested in the welfare of my community. I realize that the individual cannot be better than the community of which he is a part. I take what steps I can to eradicate the evils of my community, or help in what might better it.

- (d) I actively participate in community welfare work, such as Red Cross, Y. M. C. A., W. C. T. U. (or whatever organizations are in your community).

- (e) I study the candidates for elections to public office and their platforms, so I can vote intelligently. I intend to use my franchise, realizing that only by the intelligent use of this can this nation remain democratic.

- (f) I help in keeping the grounds

News From England

A timely appreciation of the activities held at the Mission Reunion was contained in Elder F. O. Davies', mission president, address at the last meeting of this gathering at 6:30 p. m. on Sunday, August 11. He mentioned the impossibility of measuring results in terms of facts and figures; e. g., the number of pounds spent represents a far greater number of testimonies borne to those who did not previously know the church; this is work of a worth-while kind, which will one day bear fruit.

Turning then to his subject "Why the Reorganized Church?" Elder Davies indicated that he wished to treat this not merely as a survey of historical events, but to answer the question "Why?" For a reading, there was chosen a letter of appeal to Joseph Smith, (the son of the Prophet Joseph Smith martyred in 1844) from the members of the church who waited for his leadership. Elder Davies extolled the faithfulness of these people who, when numerous factions—each claiming to be the successors to the original church—arose on the death of the first leader, were around our home clean and beautiful, as the occupants are usually judged by the outside appearance as well as the inside of the home, and beautiful communities are spiritually elevating.

Summary, "Does It Make Any Difference That I Am a Latter Day Saint?":

Leader will note the various points listed by each speaker, pointing out that in each case, each point is definitely the result of the conviction and putting into practice of Latter Day Saint ideals.

1. Note that the course and pattern of life of the average person is different than that of the first speaker. Draw brief comparisons.
2. Present-day breakup of home life and widespread juvenile delinquency may be contrasted with the ideals of home life outlined by second speaker.
3. Note the hopes and ideals of the third speaker in contrast to the indifference and aimlessness of many present-day students.
4. The lack of consideration for others, and indifference in the happenings of his community of the average citizen may be pointed out in contrast to the attitude of the fourth speaker.

Conclusion will be that it does make a difference that I am a Latter Day Saint.

not deceived, but prayed for no less than five years that the properly designated leader would come to them.

After careful consideration, for he had to contend with persistent attempts by the other factions to persuade him to become their leader, "Young Joseph" in 1860 accepted the responsibility which was his, and the church continued its work. To distinguish it from the other factions previously mentioned, some bearing the original church name, the word reorganized was added to the name of the church. Elder Davies emphasized that the most significant reason for the Reorganization was that the work of God, for the salvation of man, might continue.

Elder M. Van Oorschot from Holland was the speaker at the morning service, and chose for his subject "Unity." In simple terms and assisted by that divine spirit which makes all nations as one, this brother conveyed a helpful message, stressing the importance of Christians being one in Christ and his Father that they might fulfill the task of "lighting the world."

Another visitor from Holland was Miss J. K. Velthuis. A total of 120 visitors were accommodated for the Mission Reunion.

Healed Through Administration

Some weeks ago our twenty-two months old child had the measles, which left her with a cough and a kidney ailment. Later, she developed a high fever and lung congestion, which threatened pneumonia. We took her to the hospital for an X ray, and the doctor said we could bring her home if we followed his prescribed treatment. She gradually improved, but did not sleep well at night. I had lost so much sleep myself since her first illness that I was nearly at the breaking point.

On the morning of October 26, when Apostle Charles Hield was preparing to leave for Fairview, Montana, I called him to administer to my daughter. He walked from his hotel room, a distance of a mile or more, to perform the administration. God heard and answered that prayer. In the afternoon, our little girl slept for two hours without waking. That night she rested peacefully, and since then her health has improved greatly.

I am thankful that we have a Heavenly Father who looks down upon us with mercy in our hours of need. I am also grateful for his servants who go forth in his footsteps to feed his sheep.

We cannot grow with Christ unless we are fed. May God bless those who feed the flock—those who are undershepherds for the greatest of all shepherds, Jesus Christ.

Grateful for Prayers

About a month ago I requested prayers for a friend of mine who was suffering intensely. Although she passed away soon after, I do believe her suffering was cut short because of the prayers of those answering the request, and I want to thank all who remembered her. I should also like to ask the Saints to pray for my husband who is ill; he has received wonderful blessings in the past as a result of prayer, and I believe he will be blessed again.

The first things I look for when I receive the Herald are the letters and the requests for prayers. I am an isolated member, and the Herald must serve as my weekly church service. I enjoyed reading the account of the Woodbine Reunion; to me it was a testimony that God is still willing to help us if we trust him and obey his commandments.

To the Saints in Ottumwa, Iowa

At the close of college last May, my daughter, Geneva, joined her husband, Zane Conine, who was stationed at Ottumwa, Iowa. Since our church is not listed in the directory there, they wrote to President Israel Smith. He forwarded the letter to Pastor T. E. Stark in Ottumwa, and they were immediately contacted. My son-in-law, who is a non-member, said, "I like to go to church there; it isn't a large congregation, but everyone is so friendly." I want to thank all the Saints in Ottumwa for this kindness. May God bless our people everywhere in my prayer.

To Saints in Brisbane

I should like to request the Saints in Brisbane, Australia, to visit my brother, Robert Lee McDonald, and his family at Tay Street Ashgrove. They are nonmembers, but I believe they will be interested in meeting with the Saints.

This Year I Thank God ---

For these familiar walls.
I touch them often to make sure they're real.
I touch them and remember other walls —bleak, broken walls which stood beside great heaps of shattered glass and stone, artless and ugly,
the monuments of war.

I close my eyes and see the unforgettable design of endless caravans of tanks, the sun obscured by clouds of planes, and men—grim, bearded robots, ready to destroy.
I thank God it's a memory—that I no longer pack the tools of death, nor wonder what it is to die upon some nameless beach.

Surely there is much to prayer, for, through those tensioned days and nights,

I prayed for this:
for these familiar walls,
three meals a day, clean clothes,
a bed.
—But they were little prayers;
most of all, I prayed for you.

God has kept you for me
as you always were,
smiling and golden.
And this fair replica of you—bright eyes, soft shining hair, and music in her laugh—
she is the answer to another prayer.

Perhaps it cannot last.
Perhaps the dangling and contention and misunderstanding, born of men's small minds will end my day of peace;
yet, with all my heart, I thank God for the blessings of this hour—for you, for her, for these familiar walls.

Even the Least of These

By Ruth Midgorden

ELEANOR CAUGHT the look in the driver's eye as he helped her out of the cab. In her most brisk, professional voice, she said, "There you are, sixty-five, seventy-five. Right?"

"That's right, ma'am," he replied, tipping his cap.

And Eleanor certainly didn't like the way his voice sounded. She watched the redcap pick up her luggage and muttered under her breath, "—guys with flirty-flirty eyes!"

"—quite a mob. Lots of people going to eat turkey at home this Thanksgiving from the looks of the train crowds," she heard the redcap say amiably.

"Yes, I imagine." Eleanor's heels tapped impatiently behind him. "Isn't the Santa Fe 13 at Gate 10?"

"Yes'm. And it's going to be jammed. I think I can get you down there ahead of the crowd, though."

"For a slight consideration," Eleanor thought to herself, settling her Russian turban more firmly over her dark hair. "But it will be worth it, to get a seat."

The redcap ducked through Gate 8 and Eleanor hurried after him. The trainman on duty at Gate 10 hadn't opened it yet. She breathed a sigh of relief. She had beat the crowd.

"None of this making me feel like a stinker," she told her conscience harshly. "I'm just as tired as those other people, probably more so, and if I can pay for the seat, that's my business."

"Where to?" inquired the conductor.

"Denver."

"This car, please." He helped her up just as the rush from Gate 10 began.

With a sense of well-being she hadn't known all day, Eleanor watched the redcap set her luggage on the rack. She tipped him well—yes, it was almost too much—and settled back in her seat. But the first moment of relaxation passed when she saw the people hurrying past the window. Not so many! How could she stand it, especially if she had to talk to any of them? The week had been nothing but people, and not normal people at that—thickheaded copywriters, insufferable advertising solicitors, harrassed stenographers. Eleanor wondered what she did to people to make them behave so.

"After all, Miss Eleanor Winders," she chided herself sarcastically, "you didn't expect a whole car to yourself." But she did wish she could have got a Pullman. It was bound to be a bad ride. She wondered just how sensible it was to spend so many hours on a train just to see Harv and Julie and the new little nephew. And she knew she'd have to go through the bitterness of Julie's cautious questions about Ed.

Her nerves probably wouldn't stand it this trip, Eleanor thought. If Julie asked, even indirectly, why she and Ed had broken up, she knew just what she was going to say. With great control, she would tell Julie—she'd even rehearsed the speech—"I'm a career woman. I work for the middlewest's most exclusive clothier. I associate with all kinds of people every day. I love the city. I love my work. I'd rather look over an advertising campaign and approve models than eat. How do you think I could get along as the wife of a small-town lawyer who's constantly itching for a fight?"

Eleanor crossed one knee over the other under the smooth black gabardine of her suit. It had been designed especially for her before her last trip to New York. She wished she hadn't thought of Ed. He just wasn't the right man, she told herself firmly again, as she had so many times. But the disturbing thoughts of the way he'd looked at her the night he slipped the engagement diamond on her finger, the wonderfully bright days they had spent riding horseback on the farm, the way he had picked her up, set her on the kitchen table, held her face close and said softly, "I love you, honey," and then impishly asked her to make him some waffles—

Eleanor touched her left hand lightly, a sharp ache rising in her throat when she brushed the ringless third finger. She was actually glad when a well-dressed middle-aged woman sat down beside her.

"Are you going far?" Eleanor asked, horrified to hear herself introducing a conversation. She was the woman who didn't want to be bothered with people this trip. But it was better than thoughts of Ed. And besides, she felt so lonely all of a sudden.

"Just about fifty miles," the woman answered in a warm Texas drawl. "I'm nearly there now, but I've been traveling since yesterday. I'm going to spend Thanksgiving with my niece and nephew."

"How nice." Eleanor hoped she sounded pleasant.

News Briefs

Springfield, Missouri

Pastor, Joseph Breshears

Apostle Paul M. Hanson and Bishop C. A. Skinner visited Springfield in October; Bishop Skinner gave a series of lectures on money management. The junior church school supervisor is substituting for one of the teachers each Sunday; she feels this will give her a better understanding of the problems faced by the teachers, as well as giving the teacher supervisory experience. A monthly church school newspaper will soon be published. A group of young people attended the youth retreat at the new reunion grounds in Racine, Missouri. The Orioles spent a day visiting the city water works and picnicking on the spacious lawn of the water company. Pastor Joseph Breshears is presenting a series of illustrated sermons on the apostasy.

Lansing, Michigan

Pastor, F. H. Boman

On October 1, Elder Francis H. Boman was installed as pastor of Lansing Branch, with Elders John A. Luce and Glenn H. Foster as associates.

Early in October the young people, under the direction of their supervisor, Everett Berndt, held an organization meeting; Mary Lou Dudley was elected president of the Zion's League. October 6 was promotion day for several classes of the church school. David McDonald, church school director, was in charge of the short program preceding the presentation of certificates by Mrs. Ercel Trescott, children's supervisor. Velma Horaney will direct the activities of the children during the coming year.

Speakers for the month of October were Elders Clarence Dudley and G. H. Foster. Everett Berndt was in charge of the College Day program. The Junior League, under the direction of Mrs. Everett Berndt and Gloria Foster, brought Graceland to the attention of the branch in an interesting way. The League members asked questions concerning Graceland activities, which were answered by Marjorie Muir and Everett Berndt, both Graceland graduates. Colored slides of the campus and buildings were shown at the close of the program.

Dennis Alan and David Aldis, twin sons of Pastor and Mrs. F. H. Boman, were blessed on Sunday morning, October 20. A solo, "Suffer Little Children," was sung by Betty Fiscus. At 11 o'clock

Elder Percy Farrow of Toronto, Canada, preached the first in a series of sermons given the last half of October; only three services a week were held. Special music was provided by the choir, under the direction of George Whitmore.

On Monday evening, October 21, the young people sponsored a "spring board social" so that they might be better prepared for the missionary services to follow. The first part of the evening was spent in recreation, after which they sang songs and listened to a talk by Elder Harry Engle. The early morning service of October 20 was well attended. Several young people attending Michigan State College are worshipping with the Lansing Saints.

Maine District Conference

The Maine District Conference was held in Jonesport on October 19 and 20. Officers elected for the coming year are Newman Wilson, district president; George Knowlton and Chester Gray, counselors; Louise Eaton, secretary; Pearl Billings, treasurer; Gertrude Kelly, director of music; Mabel Waas, women's leader; George Noyes, historian; Virginia Pliskowski, young people's supervisor; and Frances Look, director of religious education. Reports were given by District President Newman Wilson, Apostle George Lewis, and the secretary and treasurer. Recommendations for the ordination of three young men to the priesthood were approved, and delegates to General Conference elected. A prayer service was held at 9:30 on Sunday morning, followed by preaching at 11. At 2:30 in the afternoon Alcide Pelletier, Jr., and Erwin Alley were ordained to the office of priest, and Charles Lenfesty to the office of teacher. Apostle George Lewis was the evening speaker. Special music for the services was provided by the district choir. A one-day conference was held in Stonington the following Sunday.

Dallas, Texas

Pastor, Clyde F. Hastings

A total of $75 was raised, through various projects, by members of the Zion's League this summer. Part of the money was used to pay the expenses of seven young people who attended the reunion at Camp Ben McCullough; a tent to be used in future years at the reunion was purchased with the remainder. Classwork for the Leaguers was conducted weekly throughout the summer; courses completed were "Know Your Church," "The Financial Law," and "Make Leisure Time Creative." A social was held once each month.

The women, under the leadership of Mrs. Verna Livingston, sponsored a birthday party, rummage sale, bazaar, box supper, and covered dish dinner; proceeds from these projects plus donations amounted to $307.83. The department sent one child to reunion, and organized a young matrons group with Mrs. Margie Williams as leader. The women meet twice monthly for a devotional period, study, and business session. During the year they sent out 297 cards and made ninety-two visits.

Merle Hallenberger, music director, has organized a Zion's League choir which sings alternately with the adult choir on Sunday mornings. Worship services are conducted each week by the church school director, Mayme Dallas.

Missionary J. Charles May held several services in September. Pastor Clyde Hastings is teaching a class before the Wednesday evening prayer services.

Richard Lewis, Harold Lewis, and Wendell Wilson have returned from service overseas. All members of the Dallas congregation who served in the armed forces have been discharged. Robert Maxwell and Donald Everett are attending Graceland College.

Newcomers to the group are Mr. and Mrs. Paul Hacker, formerly of Rich Hill, Missouri; Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Green and family of Akron, Ohio; Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Lawson, and Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Johnson and children of Lenox, California.

—Mrs. Chattie Everett, reporter.

Clio, Michigan

Pastor, James McBride

A special meeting was held recently for the members who attended the teachers' institute held in Flint. Potential improvements to the branch were discussed. Officers elected at the annual business meeting are as follows: James McBride, pastor; S. E. Horton and Robert Luce, counselors; Elwood Hester, treasurer and deacon in charge; Robert Luce, secretary-treasurer; J. L. Lannin, clerk; Eldon McBride, church school director; Nelson Cheney, associate director; Rose Cook, church school secretary; Evelyn Smith, pianist; William Smith, adult supervisor; Ida Ross, young people's leader; Eva Decaire, children's supervisor; Lucille Reed, assistant supervisor and publicity agent; Ervin Cook, book steward and auditor; Mary Griswold, women's leader; and Dorsey Ross, junior church pastor. William Fligg conducted a series of meetings on "The Destiny of Man, Here and Hereafter"; the services began October 5 and continued through October 20. Two Halloween parties were held, one for the children on October 25, and one for the young people on October 29. Mr. and Mrs. James Horton, Sr., celebrated their sixtieth wedding anniversary recently. A supper was given in the lower auditorium of the church for them, after which a gift was presented to them by the congregation.

Canton, Oklahoma

Pastor, Lester Dike

The following officers were elected at the business meeting held September 8: Lester Dike, pastor; E. D. Allinger, church school director, and adult supervisor; D. E. Goodman, assistant church school director and financial clerk; Kenneth Goodman, church school secretary; Mrs. Nina Goodman, children's supervisor and publicity agent; Francis Foley, kindergarten teacher;

Maud Smith, cradle roll supervisor; Sarah Barnes, secretary; and Robert Long, librarian. Officers for the women's department are Sarah Barnes, president; and Nina Goodman, assistant president, secretary, and treasurer. A baptism and confirmation service was also held September 8 when Audry Allinger united with the church.

—Nina Goodman, reporter.

Boston, Massachusetts

The Southern New England District Priesthood Institute was held in the church at Boston on October 12 and 13. President F. Henry Edwards and Apostle G. G. Lewis were the instructors; District President Reed M. Holmes presided. The theme of the institute was "Feed My Sheep." Beginning at 9 a. m. with a fellowship service, the first day's activities included an address by President Edwards at 9:50; a lecture by Apostle Lewis at 10:50; "question box" from 11:40 until noon; afternoon classes at 1:30, and 2:30; "question box" from 3:20 to 4; and a sermon by President Edwards at 7:30. Another 9 o'clock fellowship was held on Sunday morning, followed by a lecture by Apostle Lewis; the adults and older young people also participated in this class. At 10:45 a service for the blessing of children was held, after which President Edwards spoke to the entire congregation. The pastors of the district assembled at 1:30 for an hour of discussions and instruction. President Edwards again conducted a class at 2:30, outlining the major elements or current church procedure. The final session of the institute was a fellowship service held at 3:55. Meals were served in the lower auditorium of the church by the women of Boston branch.

Skinnertown, Alabama

Lone Star Congregation

Zion's League officers for the next six months were elected on Sunday evening, September 29; they are as follows: Aubrey Booker, director; Juanita Grace, president; James McClamy, vice-president; Frances Booker, secretary-treasurer; Drucilla McClamy, reporter; Voncile Booker, recreation chairman. Juanita Grace, Frances and Myrite Booker compose the program-planning committee for the coming three months. There is now $54.60 in the League treasury; this money will be used to help install electric lights in the church and purchase other necessary equipment. The young people are in charge of a thirty-minute devotional service every third Sunday of the month.

—Drucilla McClamy, reporter.

Columbus, Ohio

Second Columbus Congregation

Pastor, John E. Booth

By action of the joint council, Elder Donald V. Lents was transferred to Walnut Park congregation in Independence, Missouri, and Elder John E. Booth of Michigan was assigned to take his place as city pastor. Elder and Mrs. Lents were given a farewell party on October 28 by members of the congregation; Apostle D. Blair Jensen was present for the occasion. A purse of money was given the Lents as a token of appreciation for their services.

At a recent business meeting, Martha Swanson was elected leader of the women's department, Jerry Glandon was retained as church school director, and Norma Anne Kirkendall was selected secretary to succeed Helen Lents.

—Ethel Kirkendall, reporter.

Owen Sound, Ontario

Pastor, F. B. Belrose

Special services were held on September 21 and 22. Seventy H. I. Velt gave an illustrated lecture on Saturday evening, after which members of the Zion's League social committee served refreshments in the lower auditorium. A prayer service was held at 9:30 Sunday morning, followed by a sermon at 11 o'clock. A business meeting was conducted at 2 in the afternoon. Meals were served by the women's department both at noon and in the evening. A 7 o'clock preaching service concluded the day's activities.

On September 26 the annual branch business meeting was held at the church. Officers elected are as follows: F. B. Belrose, pastor; W. J. Crawford and L. Belrose, counselors; Mrs. H. Belrose, secretary, publicity agent, and book steward; Max White, treasurer and Zion's League president; Elmer Rydall, Zion's League supervisor; G. T. Furness, solicitor and director of music; W. J. Crawford, librarian; Violet Vance, women's leader; and L. Belrose, church school supervisor.

Halloween parties were held by the women's department and Zion's League. A shower was given for Mr. and Mrs. Perry White in honor of their marriage on September 25; another shower was given for Irene and William Kell on November 1. Mr. and Mrs. Leslie Silverthorn celebrated their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary on October 27. A debate was held at the Zion's League meeting on October 23; participants were Margaret and Elinor White, Muriell Houghton, and Helen Belrose.

"Yes, they're all the family I have now—since my husband died."

Eleanor noticed the bright tear glistening in the woman's eye and turned to look hastily out of the window. It was almost as if she were looking through the windows of someone's house. A lonely rich woman with nothing in the world but the large diamond rings on her fingers, an eighty-dollar chapeau, and lots of time to waste.

Nervously, the woman pulled out a package of cigarettes. She held the pack toward Eleanor.

"No, thank you," Eleanor replied. "I don't smoke."

"I shouldn't," the other woman said frankly. "I never did—until Jack died. Then I just didn't have anything else to do." She lit it shakily. "Oh, I could have offered you one," she told the girl across the aisle.

Eleanor, straight from her office of well-groomed, efficient people, pushed her disgust back into a corner of her mind. "A little tramp—about nineteen, round flabby face, brown hair that needs shampooing, pink blouse—who'd ever wear a pink blouse like that—dirty blue slacks, obviously pregnant. And the character with her—mother or sister?"

With an effort, Eleanor again tried to look pleasant. "After all, she probably doesn't have money enough to dress decently," she reasoned, and felt hopelessly inane.

"I know I shouldn't," the girl was saying peevishly. "Mom here says it'll make me sick, carrying my baby and smoking, but it don't make any difference with me. I like a fag now and then."

"She just does as she pleases anyhow," the mother said, accepting a cigarette from the proffered pack. "She's draggin' me along with her now—going out to join her husband."

Eleanor watched them silently. She thought of her own childhood and of the time when she was nineteen. It had been nothing like this. She had felt clean and eager for life. What had happened to her? Eleanor almost sat up with a jerk. It was so long since she'd felt clean and warm inside, since she'd really taken time to be eager for life. Everything was tense, hurried, blasé—the same old story day after day. Business men and business women rushing around to sell more ads to sell more clothes to buy more clothes and houses to live higher—It never ended.

"And where is your husband?" the lady from Texas asked, leaning forward.

"He's at Fort Warren in Cheyenne.

He just got back from the army and now he's re-enlisted. Don't know just why he did. But he likes it, so I've got to go, too." The girl leaned back against the seat and balanced one moccasined foot across her knee.

"Say, bud, would you mind—"

The conductor's voice, cool but courteous, was right behind Eleanor's seat. She had seen the big Negro board the train. What was the conductor saying? Oh, he was probably asking the Negro to move back in the car. There was another colored man toward the rear, if Eleanor remembered the people who had got on.

"Must be no go," she remarked to herself as the conductor moved back down the aisle. The big Negro was looking stoically out of the car window when Eleanor sneaked a glance at him. A few minutes later, she heard two voices, soft with husky warmth, speaking. She leaned back thankfully. The second Negro had co-operated with the conductor.

"Isn't it awful," remarked the Texan woman, "to have niggers riding in the same car with you?"

Eleanor folded her gloves nervously. Awful, why? she thought. "Why, it doesn't make any difference to me. Everyone has a right to ride the trains."

Eleanor thought of Ed's intensity about racial prejudice.

"And our people, Eleanor, of all the people in the world," he'd told her one day, his face intense with anger, "go around preaching the ideals of the kingdom of God, passing out so much spiritual palaver, but they don't even try to live Christ's principles of 'all men are brothers.'"

"Don't get so excited, Eddie, and don't be so hard on us," she'd told him. "Not all of us are such hypocrites and lousy examples."

He'd sunk his head on his hands. "Forgive me, Ellie. I know, but we've so far to go to learn what Peter had to learn at the home of Cornelius, that God is no respecter of persons and that whatever God hath cleansed, 'that call not thou common.'"

"—but do you expect to follow him all the time?"

Eleanor shook the memories and looked at the young girl. The lady from Texas ground out her cigarette on the floor.

"As long as I can," the girl answered.

"She don't know what she wants yet," interrupted the mother. "She can't leave me and she can't leave him and she can't have a mother and a husband at the same time."

"That's right, honey, you'll just have to make up your mind which you want and stick," the Texas widow commented.

Eleanor looked at the other faces in the car. People were sitting on suitcases in the aisles now, and the conductor called his "all aboard." There was an elderly lady trying to make herself comfortable on a flimsy cardboard case. Eleanor felt a pang of remorse. She would get up and give the lady her seat as soon as the aisles were at all traversable.

And there was a couple silently watching the lights of the city rapidly passing by, not seeing, not noticing. It was later that night when Eleanor almost wept to hear their story via the chair car grapevine.

"—and all four of their children were killed in the explosion. Just think how horrible! It must feel like murder to them, having their stove blow up in their own home and kill their kids. The woman was in the hospital for a couple of weeks, the shock was so bad."

The lady from Texas had explained it all. "They're leaving now—can't stand it in the middlewest now, you know. I think someone said Alaska's where they're headed—to begin life all over again."

The story had sunk far into Eleanor's consciousness, probing her heart for feeling. And she had answered it with tears that seemed to rush from some place so deep she would never know their source. It was hard to feel tears inside and know they were flooding her eyes without letting them spill over and run down her face.

Eleanor got up then, unable to stand the emotional pressure rising inside her. After seeing the old woman comfortably settled in her seat, Eleanor had stepped over people and suitcases until she reached the vestibule. She stood there now, leaning her aching forehead against the cool metal of the door.

The Texas widow's story had moved her, too.

"We were so happy, Jack and I. You see, my eyes haven't been very good for years. We've been to doctors and specialists all over the country, but they can't find what's wrong. I can't see well enough to read or sew or go to movies or play bridge. I just listen to the radio and work in my garden. Live all alone in my house with nothing to do except run up here to see Frances and John every once in a while."

Eleanor had felt the beginning of the slow, throbbing ache when she first heard the little girl across the aisle talk about joining her husband. And the ache had grown into an emotion strong with tears and—Eleanor didn't know how to explain it. She just felt as though someone had taken hold of her at the roots of her being and shaken her hard. Nothing fitted into its proper perspective. She thought of Ed, of Harv's and Julie's happiness. She thought, with a sense of revolt she'd never felt before, of going back to work Monday and living in the tight, exclusive wall of business and professional people.

"Trouble, lady?" The conductor stood beside her in the swaying vestibule.

"Trouble? No, no, nothing at all. It's so stuffy inside," she told him, holding her face so he could not see the tears in her eyes.

She heard the door bang and leaned again against the cold metal. She let the tears fall on the lapels of her suit and roll off to the creaking floor beneath.

"I can hardly pray, God," she whispered, "because it's been so long since I really tried to. But forgive me, Father, oh, forgive me!"

She leaned there, feeling the warmth beginning to bathe her and thinking and praying at the same time. She almost felt clean inside again.

"It's funny, God, that you can put me into the middle of other human selfishness and dirt and intolerance and ignorance and make me feel how I rate on the same scale," she mused reverently. "Only it's worse that I should be so low because of the opportunities I've had."

She looked out of the window at the lights flashing by from some small town. She wondered about Ed. Perhaps he would never take her back now, but if he still wanted someone to crusade with him and to try to live the way Christ lived, she'd be ready. It wouldn't be easy to shake the habits of years, but she'd try.

"Say, lady, you're going to get awfully cold out here."

It was the conductor again.

"Oh," she smiled, "I hadn't really noticed."

"You will," he warned. "Better come in here. There'll be a seat at the far end of the car after the next stop."

"All right," she agreed. But she took one last look out of the window. "Thank you, Father, for everything, and especially for the ability to love people and care about them."

Macartney's Illustrations

By Clarence E. Macartney

So vital and suggestive are these anecdotes that they will not only give life and force to sermons abounding but in many cases will also furnish ideas and texts for new sermons. Poems, stories, incidents, and parables all have been carefully selected and arranged alphabetically with cross references.

Pageants . . .

THE QUEST OF THE EAST

By Edward Thomas Kirkley

The familiar Bible story of the three Wise Men who followed the star to Bethlehem has been developed into a Christmas pageant of real quality and effectiveness. Classic Christmas hymns furnish a background to the action and make it possible to utilize the church choir in connection with the presentation.

The pageant is divided into six parts, requiring twenty characters (thirteen men and seven women). Playing time is approximately one hour.
Price 10c each; $1 a dozen.

THE CHRIST-CHILD

By Edward Thomas Kirkley

This pageant (also included in the "Standard Christmas Book No. 5") presents the events surrounding the birth of Christ in a dignified and effective manner. The use of the classic hymns, Scripture reading, and prayer adds a most worshipful tone. Arranged for 6 men and 7 women, 1 junior high girl, 2 primary boys, and a group of kindergartners. Each of the 16 members of the main cast should have a copy of the printed pageant.
Price 10c each; $1 a dozen.

CHRISTMAS

A Fifteen-minute Pageant by Henrietta Heron

This pageant provides a unique and effective feature for any Christmas celebration service. It has been prepared to meet the need expressed by leaders of young people for a program feature that will utilize the talent of older boys and girls and thus enlist their interest and service.
Price 10c each; $1 a dozen.

THE SPIRIT OF CHRISTMAS

Edited by J. E. Sturgis

A simple, but effective, service pageant for the Christmas season. Full instructions are given for production, including suggestions for stage setting, costumes, music, etc. One act, 12 characters. Time, 10 minutes.
Price 10c each; $1 a dozen.

THE HOLY NATIVITY

By Mary A. Litsinger and Mattie B. Shannon

A reader tells the Christmas story with scenes pantomimed through different episodes. Pageant. Music. One scene, 1 man, 1 woman, reader, groups of men, children, and choir. 1 hour.
Price 35c each; $3.60 a dozen.

"THE COMING OF CHRIST" IN LIVING PICTURES

A pageant in eight tableaux. Approximately 25 characters, 45 minutes. Scripture and familiar carols tell of the prophecy and fulfillment of the coming of Christ.

Price 30c each; $3 a dozen

A STAR IN THE SKY

By Kathryn Knos

A sacred pageant telling the story of the Nativity in 10 pantomime scenes. 5 men, 1 woman, reader, and several groups. 40 minutes.
Price 30c each; $3 a dozen.

Entered as second-class matter at the post office at Independence, Missouri, under Act of March 3, 1879. Issued weekly at Independence, Missouri. Price $2.25 per year and $1.15 for six months in advance in the U. S. A., its territories and possessions; Canada $2.50 per year and $1.30 for six months; other countries, $3.25 per year. Notice of a change of address must be given three weeks ahead of the date that it is to become effective. Accepted for mailing at the special rate of postage provided for in section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized July 21, 1921. Printed in the United States of America.

All checks for subscriptions to church papers, or for books and other materials sold at the Church Bookstore, should be made payable to Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

Suggestions to writers: Typewritten scripts, double-spaced, are preferred. Keep carbon copies to protect against loss. All articles and letters should be signed by writers. Please avoid use of post cards. News letters should be signed, approved by pastors, and should concern only church activities and workers. We find it necessary to edit most articles, and to condense news. No charge is made for one printing of the usual announcements of church meetings, births, marriages, and deaths; no memorial verse is used. Bulletin Board notices should be in our office at least ten days before date of publication. We cannot accept commercial or personal advertising. Articles for publication are gladly received, but there is no provision to pay for them. Those that relate to church work, doctrine, general cultural and educational subjects, personal development, etc. will be considered on basis of contents and literary merit. Writers should feel free to make independent presentations of their views, but should avoid criticism of the work of other writers appearing in these columns.

Letters: All letters and money for subscriptions and books should be addressed to Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage, Independence, Missouri. Articles and letters for publication should be sent to the same address, and marked "The Editors." Letters for all general church offices should be sent to The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Checks or Money Orders for contributions made to the General Church should be issued in the name of the Solicitor, Bishop's Agent, or Bishop in the district or stake in which the contributor lives.

If circumstances or conditions are such that it is more convenient to send contribution direct, Money Orders or checks should be issued in favor of The Presiding Bishopric, and mailed to The Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

This includes contributions for tithing, surplus, offering, oblation, Christmas offering, Auditorium, College Day, and The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

The Great Plan

What matters if today is dark,
For soon the sun will shine;
The fair assurance "All is well"
Beats in this heart of mine!

All men know strife ere they are free
To vision bonds of earth—
The heavens know a thousand joys
When angel-souls find birth.

The troubled waters roar and dash
Before they know the calm—
And only bodies tired of pain
Can feel the Master's balm.

FRANCES HARTMAN.

 THE ATOMIC BOMB

It is a long time since we have had an article from Brother John Blackmore, and some of our readers may like an introduction. He came from Australia as a part of one of the classes in religious education that was established to prepare young people for church work. At that time he was known for his brilliant and analytical mind, a charming likable way that won him many friends and an American bride, and for fine qualities of leadership. He served ably in general church work, and in the Department of Religious Education at headquarters. When the depression came, he found employment in the school system, and was highly regarded as a teacher of history, and loved as a leader of youth.

The time came when the church was taking on more men, and he felt moved by a spiritual power to leave his very successful teaching work, and go under church appointment again. Church leaders accepted him, and gave him various assignments. He served well in pastoral work in the Los Angeles area. His latest appointment is in pastoral work with his headquarters at Omaha, Nebraska.

We have heard many references to prophecy in relation to the atomic bomb. Brother Blackmore relates these to his theme. But he adds something original. He says that the atomic bomb itself is a prophecy of things to come, unless we organize against them. We know that the events of the world do foreshadow other events to come, and that there is an element of prophecy in contemporary history. We trust that you will enjoy his fine article as we have.

 STORY WRITERS

A short while back we invited story writers to contribute religious and character fiction for our pages. First to respond to the invitation is Vera L. Holseid, whose "The Easy and the Hard," appears in this issue. Let story writers remember the difference between an article and a story. Each may deal with a problem. The article may be abstract, or may deal with the problem after it is solved. It can be interesting, but there is no drama in it. The story puts the problem into the lives of people before it is solved, while they are still struggling with it, and while the issue is still in doubt. The reader is held in suspense with the characters until the climax or decision is reached. This is the drama out of which stories are made.

 THE HARD TASK

The real difficulty of the hard task is more often our unwillingness to do it than any hardship involved. And the hardest part is beginning. Whether it is preparing a sermon, washing the dishes, building a fence, or clearing up a pile of rubbish, we are well on the way to completing it if we can only make the start. Once begun, habit carries us through, and we are soon done.

 THE GLOOMY DAY

Winter is coming, and in many parts of the country there will be cloudy skies—sometimes weeks when we live much of the time in the dark, or when we may see very little of the sun. But there is a great deal of difference between a cloudy day and a gloomy day. A cloudy day comes from overcast skies; a gloomy day comes from an overcast heart. No day need be gloomy if you carry sunshine in your heart. Some will scoff, "Pollyanna!" at this thought. But Pollyanna has the advantages over her skeptical neighbors. She can always turn on a light, while they cannot.

You Do Not Have to Worry

About God

A Cause of Concern

Some very good and sincere people have been worried about the nature of God. They struggle between the trinitarian and the unitarian viewpoints. This struggle is not something peculiar to our generation; others have wrestled with it, and have failed to provide a satisfactory explanation. Some sectarian churches declare for the Trinity; some for the unitarian viewpoint.

In our own church work and literature, we find many positive statements in the Book of Mormon, and some elsewhere, that lead some members to believe that God and Christ are identical. Yet others refer to the Bible for instances in which Jesus prayed to God in heaven, was answered, and when others were present when God spoke to him. They refer to the vision of Joseph Smith, in which two personages appeared, one addressing Joseph concerning the other, saying, "This is my beloved Son, hear him."

We believe that there is a level of understanding from which it will be observed that all the statements concerning God in the Holy Scriptures, and in the utterances of the prophets, are true, consistent, and reconciled. It is impossible for us to believe that there are contradictions in these sources. One has apprehended one part of the truth; another has apprehended another part of the truth; they are all part of the same truth.

Our trouble is that few of us, if any at all, have reached that high level of understanding. It may not be attainable for us in this life.

One writer has expressed our human limitations in this way: he has said that man is a creature "condemned to measure infinity with a yardstick." Something in man's nature impels him to try to understand the infinite, the eternal. But he has only a yardstick in his hand—a yardstick made up of the concepts, ideas, and capacities of perception of this earth. He had no measure adequate to arrive at a description of the great spiritual forces, the original causes of the universe. He not only has no adequate measure—he does not have the mental equipment for understanding that knowledge, even if he could obtain it.

For the intelligent person, this should quit striving and worrying. He should accept things as they are.

We Do Not Understand

We do not understand what electricity is. All our concepts are of liquids, solids, gases. These are things we can feel, taste, weigh, or smell. Yet here is something that flows along or through a solid copper wire, great distances, at something like the speed of light. It seems to need no space in which to flow; yet it reaches the point somehow. It can kill or heal. It can turn wheels, it can fuse metals, it can make a brilliant light. To use it we have only to turn a switch or push a button. We do not question it. We accept it every day. It is a miracle born out of a laboratory, and we cannot explain it.

We do not know why the liquid, water, turns to a solid when it is reduced ever so slightly below 32 degrees Fahrenheit. It is a part of the behavior of all liquids to solidify at some temperature, each one at its own precise and invariable point on the thermometer. But we use water and the other liquids, and we do not worry. We do not question nor strain our minds.

We do not understand what gives the spark of life to a tiny cell, nurtures it, and brings it forth at the proper time as a miracle of new life. This occurs millions of times over, in human life, in animal life, in plant life. This is a miracle out of nature; we accept it, and we do not worry about it. We go on with our lives, quite happy that things are as they are.

The little child does not understand his parents. He receives food, shelter, care, and love. Sometimes he is corrected; sometimes punished. He does not understand why. He doesn't know why he must take some things, and why he can't have others. But if his parents are good, he knows that they love him; he thrives under this love. He simply accepts his parents, his home, and the entire situation.

We Can Accept

So it is with all questions concerning God.

We live in a world in which there are many evidences of arrangements for our welfare and happiness. God has given us the world as our home during this life. We accept all the gifts and blessings gratefully; and if we have faith, we thank God for them.

We see evidences of God's love. Like little children in relation to their parents, we stand in relation to God. We can accept him and his love. We can try to understand as far as our powers of comprehension may reach, but always we will reach a place where we can go no farther, and where boundless unknowns lie beyond us. We feel the presence of God here where we are, and we are sure that he is out there where we cannot follow. Questions will occur to us—questions for which we find no answer. But we can abide with God in love and trust.

God Has Called You

AN ORDINATION HYMN

By Goldie M. Zion

God has called you, you are chosen
For a mission set apart,
A divine and holy calling;
You have shown a willing heart.
Hands are laid this day upon you—
Aaron's way in days of old.
Angels witness, yea, record it,
God will give you joy untold!

God has called you, you have answered,
You have pledged to do his will,
Sacrifice of self and pleasure,
If you would this mission fill.
Men of old have sealed this promise
With their life's last drop of blood,
This they did in faith believing
That their sacrifice was good.

God has called you; he now bids you
Work for him in this last hour,
While the powers of evil strengthen
Save men from this awful power.
Oh, how sweet, when in his glory
Men will look to you and say,—
"T'was by him we heard the story,"
Great will be your joy that day!

(May be sung to the tune "Admonition," which may be better known as "I will sing of my Redeemer.")

"God Is So Good to Me"

F. G. Pitt's Favorite Song

A considerable amount of interest has been expressed by correspondents in the song, "God Is So Good to Me," which the late Patriarch Frederick G. Pitt sang wherever he went. A number of requests have been received for the words. Mrs. L. J. Midgorden of Lamoni kindly responded and lent us her book, which contains the song.

The book is entitled Great Gospel Hymns, and Selected Sacred Songs and was published by the Hall-Mack Company of Philadelphia and Chicago, copyrighted in 1915. Some say it is out of print now, though we have not investigated this report. The song is number 363 in the book; and both words and music are by Lida Shivers Leech.

GOD IS SO GOOD TO ME

By Lida Shivers Leech

I cannot doubt my dear Saviour's love,
As on the mount I stand,
And looking back I plainly see
The leading of his dear hand.

Chorus

God is so good to me,
God is so good to me,
I'll love and serve him faithfully,
He is so good to me.

Walking with Christ is sweeter to me
Than all the world's vain charms,
Tho' rugged be the path I tread,
I'm leaning on his strong arm.

He is so good to me ev'ry day,
Keeping me in his care;
His blessed sunlight floods my way,
My burdens and joys he shares.

I'll cling to him whatever may come,
And thro' eternity,
Round the white throne where praises
ne'er cease,
I'll tell of his love to me.

Stumbling Blocks

By Nell Clarke

*No wonder Christ admonished me
To watch and pray,
So many little stumbling blocks
Are in my way.*

*Blind tripping, falling far mayhap,
His cause is hurt;
God's banner high so dear to us
Lo, trails in dirt.*

*Christ's friends lament, foes scorning Him;
I thus press thorn
Anew on my Redeemer's brow;
By that same scorn.*

*My soul be spent and suffering,
To place e'en now,
One added pain sin's penalty,
On that pure brow.*

*Oh, bleeding brow's keen anguishing;
Print on my heart,
A stamp so deep and burnishing;
Of me a part.*

*Dear Saviour, this my guidance plea;
Make my weak gait;
By sacrifice so freely paid,
Secure and straight.*

The Way of a Teacher

BY LYDIA WIGHT

We can all recall the teacher who made the deepest and most persistent impression upon us and from whom we learned the most helpful truths. That teacher was successful with us no doubt, because his was a teaching personality. He knew many good ways to make a lesson strike home. We said, "That teacher surely has a way!"

Would you not like to be a teacher with a way? You know that every pupil, whether child, young person, or adult, is eager for classtime when the teacher has a way. Attention and participation by the class comes naturally for such a teacher, and the hour is all too short.

Teachers who study GUIDE-LINES TO LEADERSHIP and use the many specific leads on the right ways to teach various ages are developing teaching personalities. Why not place your order with the Herald Publishing House this very day so you can get the January issue which is full of fine suggestions. One worth the price of the magazine is the article by John R. Darling of the Department of Religious Education Office entitled "Hints for Improving Church School Teaching."

(GUIDE-LINES, published quarterly, by the Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri. One dollar a year.)

Charles Lamb and the First Glass

Charles Lamb, one of the brightest spirits extinguished by drink, wrote mournfully, looking back upon his childhood: "Could the youth, to whom the flavor of his first glass was delicious, look into my desolation and be made to understand what a dreary thing it is when a man feels himself going down a precipice with open eye and a passive will, to see his destruction and not to have the power of will to stop it, and yet to feel it all the way emanating from himself, to perceive all goodness emptied out of him and yet not to be able to forget the time when it was otherwise — HOW HE WOULD AVOID THAT FIRST GLASS!"—The Voice, October, 1946.

These Days of Crisis

or

The Prophecy of

THE ATOMIC BOMB

By John Blackmore

A sermon delivered October 13, 1946, at Omaha, Nebraska

"This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come."—II Timothy 3: 1.

"IT WASN'T RAINING when Noah built the ark." These words came to the mind of Sister Blackmore as she read a letter from the late President F. M. Smith advising the Saints to gather around their church homes to increase their solidarity for the crisis to come. They have a significance and a meaning that are worth pondering over. I expect as the crowds mocked Noah for preparing for a catastrophe to come they called him a "calamity howler" a "pessimist" an emotional religionist.

Many people today would like to bury their heads in the sands of forgetfulness and would ignore the critical problems of the world which seem to be leading us into an unparallel catastrophe. Ignoring the trends of the times does not solve the critical problems which seem to be forming into a stream of events which are flowing into an uncertain future. Please remember, "It wasn't raining when Noah built the ark."

PAUL'S PROPHECY

Paul's prophecy to Timothy needs little amplification: This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. We know without doubt that we are living in most dangerous times. However, we have become so accustomed to dangers that in psychological self-defense we laugh off and joke away the sense of the danger. Only occasionally do we become very serious, and then some of us want to turn to the Scriptures for the "voice of prophecy." May I remind you that there are many "voices of prophecy." Some are in the Scripture, some are crying to us through the very events of the day.

Another of Paul's prophecies we read in I Thessalonians, 5th chapter,

But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write you. For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. For when they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: . . . therefore, let us not sleep as do others; but let us watch and be sober.

Watch and be sober and ponder the events of the day. Think deeply regarding the trends of our national and the international problems.

CHRIST'S OWN PROPHECY

But as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be, For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be.—Matthew 24: 37-39.

I want to emphasize particularly those words "and knew not until the flood came and took them all away." May I intimate to you that the flood of a great catastrophe is coming. Remember, "It wasn't raining when Noah built the ark."

PETER'S PROPHECY

But the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up.—II Peter 3: 7, 10.

IDEAS TO NOTE IN THESE PROPHECIES

There are a few ideas to note in these prophecies.

1. In the last days perilous times shall come.
2. Scoffers shall arise walking after their own lusts.
3. There will be a widespread denial of Christ and Christianity. In some countries this denial of Christ and Christianity has become a national policy adopted by governments.
4. There will be terrific destruction with heat. We are living in tremendous times. Man may yet become the victim of his own knowledge.
5. Always in these prophecies there is the hope of the coming of a "New Earth" wherein dwelleth righteousness; always after the great catastrophe.

Saints, there is not enough room in the world for national and international wickedness and the atomic bomb. Now the atomic bomb has come—wickedness, national selfishness and racial envy must be eliminated or else sudden destruction will come.

THE PROPHECY WITHIN THE ATOMIC BOMB

This is the prophecy resident within the atomic bomb. Here is the "writing on the wall" the writing within the bomb itself. The very "voice of prophecy" which speaks in thundrous tones across the oceans and continents.

Wickedness, selfishness, greed for power, national unrighteousness, international rivalry must be eradicated from private and national lives, or else sudden destruction will come with war such as the nations have never before witnessed.

General Marshal has said "Prepare or perish," but military preparedness is not sufficient or equal to the task. Only a world wide Christian preparation will be adequate. Men and nations must live together as co-operative brothers or they will destroy each other, and their own civilization.

Please let me repeat: This is the prophecy contained within the bomb itself. Its very existence is a prophecy of what might and perhaps will happen. For some folk a spoken prophecy is required, a "Thus saith the Lord" by some prophet. Others demand a verse of Scripture from the Bible, an ancient prophecy. But please, read the prophetic fact of the existence of this instrument of destruction in the hands of men. It is significant that its first use was by the United States of America, a very highly civilized nation.

THE PROPHECY IN RECENT HISTORY

I have read prophecies from the Scriptures. I have referred to the prophecy contained in the existence of the bomb. May I now refer to the prophecy contained in recent history. About thirty five years ago the English Channel had not been crossed by the "air route." Now as is well known the channel has not only been crossed by airplanes, but by rockets and flying bombs directed with accuracy to their targets at terrific speed. A year after the war those missiles of destruction are completely outmoded. If those "flying bombs" sent over England by Germany during the war had contained Uranium, England would have been completely destroyed. She would have rapidly become a desolate island. "There always will be an England" if atomic bombs do not fall on her. Again, if those super-bombers, American made and, piloted over Germany with devastating effect had carried "atom bombs" Germany would be a desolate lifeless waste today. Mark you, there was enough hate in the world to commit such destruction.

Here speaks a "prophecy" of the future, not in human voices alone, or in any ancient literature, but in human actions. It is a "thus saith mankind." Thus saith history, thus saith the bomb.

WILL MEN GET TOGETHER?

Will men co-operatively settle their international differences? The history of the nations says, "NO." Even in the field of religion churches have fought and still fight in bitterness and prejudice. Congregations in our own church sometimes are torn asunder because of conflicts. In the field of business, men are fighting very bitterly today—strikes with violence. In international relationships the shooting has stopped but the "contest" is still with us. The "Paris Peace Conference" was really "The Paris International Contest" for power, prestige, and position. In that "Peace Conference" we witnessed a struggle for favorable position—strategic bases, and spheres of influence. It was not a "Peace Conference" but a diplomatic war.

CONCLUSIONS

The atomic bomb by its terrific power and heated destruction cries aloud to us in thundrous tones.

Mankind must forget his selfish ambitions. Mankind must place his brother first, must live together in co-operative brotherhood, or he will shower upon himself widespread devastating destruction. The very mountains will melt with fervent heat.

Saints, believe me when I say the atomic bomb has made Zion an imperative. The time has passed for foolish disputations. Men must join together in a spirit of mutual helpfulness or else they will cry "peace," but sudden destruction will be upon them. Zion is a universal imperative. I see before us a forbidding picture. Another war will bring wholesale destruction, "The Abomination of Desolation" spoken of by both old and very modern prophets. Our large cities with their congested populations will be both targets and traps. Yes, Atomic Power is bringing to a close one age and introducing another. What shall the new age be? To be sure, I have painted a dark picture. But it is not all dark. Zion is now the universal imperative. The Saints are pioneers, or they should be. For out of Zion the perfection of beauty God may shine.

May God help us in the task is my prayer.

The Mohammedans used to bring so much incense into the Mosque Omar at Jerusalem that anyone going from it carried everywhere the sweet odor, and men could tell where he had been. So men will know where we have been if we spend much time alone with God. Let us not neglect the coming to the Lord's table. Let us commune with him. It will prove a blessing in our lives, and it will help us to prove a blessing to others.—A. Bernard Webber.

The Fine Art of Selling Religion

By Naomi Russell

RELIGION, LIKE life insurance, has to be sold. Both depend on advertising and salesmanship for their success—policy is only half the story; the other half is playing up that policy to the public.

No insurance company would pay for a page in a popular magazine and then fill the entire space with a fine-print story of its creditable reputation—no one would read it. The usual advertisement leads off with an appealing picture of a worried-looking (but very attractive) widow and her child (also very attractive) staring at a stack of unpaid bills—unpaid because John failed to take out insurance. You read the whole account (which isn't difficult, because it's in large print) right down to the "Don't let this happen to you" finish. If you've just paid your monthly dues, you smile confidently and turn the page; if you aren't yet a subscriber, you swallow hard and mentally rearrange your budget to include insurance. Just then you aren't thinking about the technicalities of the policy—but you are thinking about insurance.

SO IT IS with the church. Too often we have been so concerned with the fine points of doctrine that we have overlooked the human appeal. We have burned the midnight oil, combing the Scriptures for a point to prove our superiority, while the best of prospects wander by our door to some revival meeting down the street. If we hope to sell our particular "brand" of religion, we must first direct our attention to the man himself—we must point out to him that his security and welfare are at stake, and that we are able to help him; those are the things about which he is vitally concerned. There will always be time for the fine points.

Successful insurance companies are represented by successful agents. The man who gets you to sign a policy is a skilled salesman; he begins by selling himself, and then his insurance. He knows that first impressions are extremely important, so he buys the best-looking pin stripe he can find to make his debut. From his Stetson hat to his Florsheim shoes, he is immaculate—and that includes a star-bright Kolynos smile, which is indispensable to his subtle approach. He does not begin by ringing your doorbell and shoving circulars at you when you answer. He breaks down any resistance you may have by making you like him—and he does that with casual conversation and a show of genuine interest in you. Before he leaves, he convinces you that you're a very special customer—one that deserves the best there is in the line of insurance (which is, of course, just what his company has to offer).

SUCCESSFUL CHURCHES are represented by successful ministers. The religious salesman begins by winning friends, and then converting them. More than one pastor has used his personality as well as his doctrine in selling people on the idea of becoming a part of his congregation. With missionaries, who must accomplish their purpose in a few weeks and then move on to a new field, the matter of salesmanship is even more important. They must be the models of clerical neatness and dignity, possessing a willing ear as well as an eloquent tongue. Preachers of the old school were considered well-equipped for the job of saving souls if they had a Bible and a loud voice. Today's minister must be as familiar with the dictionary as the Holy Scriptures, and he no longer needs to beat the pulpit or out-shout the other preachers. Sincerity is, of course, the keynote of success in winning converts. A minister must be thoroughly sold on his belief before he can hope to convince others of its worth.

Advertising experts have found, also, that slander never pays. Back in the early days it was considered a good trick to mud-ball a competitor, but it doesn't set well with the public any more. It doesn't work with religion, either—people are more interested in what a church has to offer that will benefit them, than they are in knowing what's wrong with all the other churches.

Religion, like life insurance, is a highly competitive enterprise. The churches and the insurance agencies which will do the million dollar business this year will be the ones that know best how to sell the world on what they have to offer.

Social Institutions of Bible Religion

Number 13 in a series of radio addresses on the subject:

"The Social Philosophy of the Modern Prophet"

By J. A. Koehler

ST. JAMES said that pure religion is a kind of doing. It is an action or an activity. Pure religion is not a mere belief. It is not even predominantly a belief. Nor is it only sentiment or feeling. It is a kind of moral conduct. It is a quality of human behavior, or a way of living. It is a kind of good-doing which arises from certain beliefs and feelings. It is a life or function. It is an action.

Persons may be religious, and so may peoples. In truth there could be no religious persons; just as there could be no family life if there were no man and woman to join in matrimony. Peoples as well as persons may be religious because, just as a person may conduct his private or individual affairs, or conform his personal life to the will of God, so may a people conduct its public or communal affairs in accordance with the will of God. And, as you know, religion is man seeking in all relations to do the will of God. I treat only of Bible religion.

The Preacher said, "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: [which is] Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man." And that means that religion is a way of life.

Jesus said, "On these two commandments [of God] hang all the law," or specific commandments of God, namely, to love God and to love neighbor. And since that love consists in doing whatever may be done in the circumstances, at any given stage in the march of civilization, to promote human welfare, or to enrich the soul of man, "On these two commandments" to love means that true religion, pure religion, is a good-doing action.

BUT NOTWITHSTANDING true Bible religion is just one thing, namely, loving God and man, the religion of a people and of a person cannot be precisely the same thing, or the same kind of action. And, as I shall show in a moment, the difference between the religion of a person, or of any number of persons and the religion of a people, is the thing which gives rise to or necessitates the social institutions of Bible religion.

Perhaps I may best reveal my thought with an illustration, which may in truth be an analogy. For the moment, then, instead of a religious people, think of a family: a group of persons consisting of parents and children. Before there can be a true Christian family there must be a man and a woman who have ideas and feelings, or convictions and sentiments, about the marital relationship. Those beliefs and emotions are absolutely personal. They can have no existence except in persons. Out of these personal characteristics arise the domestic family; which, by the way, is the most primary of Bible religion's social institutions.

THERE IS NOTHING in that family situation that is not put there by the persons who compose it. And yet you know that there is a fundamental difference between the life of that family—which is a social affair—and the lives of the persons who compose it. Those persons severally or separately or individually are incapable of the family way of life. And the difference between the life of the family and of the persons who compose it, plus the incapacity of persons severally for such action, is the thing that makes necessary the family institution.

Since this is the crux of the whole matter, I wish to use another illustration; another illustration which, too, may in truth be an analogy. You have heard cornet solos and violin solos and clarinet solos and many other kinds of solos. You have also heard instrumental symphonies. In any of those instances you heard music; only music; nothing more nor less. But did you hear the same kind of music in all those instances? Were the musical aims of the persons who played the solos identical with the musical aims of the persons who played the symphony? No, they were not. And the difference between the aims in the latter instance and in the former is the very thing that makes necessary that institution which we call the symphonic orchestra.

In a symphony orchestra you witness a different kind of action, a different way of doing, a different activity, from what may be seen in a drum corps, even; and a drum corps itself is a musical institution. In other words, through the means of social institutions it is possible for persons to express a way of religious life, it is possible to do a kind of good, it is possible to love neighbor, in ways in which persons severally cannot love. And, as you should know, love is good-doing.

IT IS BECAUSE there are different kinds of good-doing, or distinctive possible manifestations of love of neighbor, that Bible religion seeks to build a whole family of social institutions. Bible religion cannot perfect its expression simply by establishing the domestic family. It must do that, of course, to perfect its expression, or to do some of the good it wishes to do. But it must build other institutions. Bible religion needs a church. Do you need to be told, Why? I think not. Paul said, "How is it, then, brethren? When ye are come together," in a body, many things are done to the edification of all. And there have been religious peoples, churches, even in this generation, who had positive knowledge of the specific values which inhere in "church" action.

The church is a religious institution. It is at the same time a social institution. It is a settled way of doing things, or of getting things done, as positively as the domestic family or the symphony orchestra is. And that is one of the reasons St. Paul was a church builder. That is one of the reasons Jesus said, "I will build my church." That is the reason Methodists and Latter Day Saints and many other religious peoples have built churches. The church, which is a social institution, is a necessary instrument of Christian religion. And those Latter Day Saints who have tried in vain to "bring forth and establish the cause of Zion" without the offices of their church, should have some idea by now of its distinctive importance.

Incidentally, one of my concerns in this talk is the manner in which some people underestimate the values of some of the social institutions of Bible religion, the while they greatly overestimate the values of others. Indeed there are people who seem to think that the church is about the only religious institution that matters, or that it is about the only social institution of importance to Bible religion. When the truth is that the first social institutions which Bible religion sought to establish as doing the will of God, are matrimony, industry, and government.

I DO NOT UNDERSTAND how one can contemplate the first chapter of Genesis without being convinced that these three affairs of all peoples—religious or not—are the most basic of Bible religion's social institutions. Book of Genesis or not, we should know that positively. I do not see how anyone who understands human nature and its requirements—which he cannot know without having an idea of the order in which human wants require to be satisfied—can believe that the church is the most primary of Bible religion's social institutions. Surely if vital needs demand to be satisfied before the administration of the sacraments, and all such like, then the vital social institutions of religion rank first in order of importance.

Please keep in mind that I do not say that cultural values are not of a higher order than physical values. All I say is that the satisfaction of cultural wants must be postponed to the satisfaction of the wants that sustain life. And I never knew either a "priest or prophet" who did not act as if that were true, notwithstanding the protestations of some "priests" to the contrary. All religious beliefs respecting any phase of human life—whether those beliefs are about matrimony, industry, government, the sabbath, or any other living together situation—anticipate and contemplate the building of social institutions. And the whole career of Israel is a demonstration of that truth.

When Beethoven wrote the score of his symphonies he intended a symphony orchestra. When the genius of Bible religion wrote the score of its social symphony, it intended a whole family of industrial and governmental and marital and cultural institutions.

It is impossible that the Almighty should have said: "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion . . ." without intending or contemplating or anticipating marital and industrial and governmental institutions which are at once religious institutions. It is as impossible as that he did not intend the church when He said, "Remember the Sabbath day, and keep it holy."

I use the term "a whole family of social institutions," which is at once a family of religious institutions, advisedly. What I mean is that Bible religion cannot attain its objects, it cannot promote its purposes, it cannot reach its ends, except through the promotion of a whole system of social institutions; a system adapted to the whole range of religion's intentions. I speak of God's intention that man should do His will in the total life situation. Not on Sunday. Not on Monday. Not at work. Not at play. But in the whole body of human relations that must be promoted to promote human well-being; specifically, to enrich the soul.

What does all this have to do with the social philosophy of the modern prophet? Or, rather, what does the social philosophy of the modern prophet have to do with all this? Nothing more nor nothing less than the score of Beethoven's symphony has to do with a symphonic performance. There can be no religious social symphony which is not an implementation of a religious philosophy of social life.

The prophets have a philosophy of social life which is at once a religious philosophy because they are convinced that religion is the all-inclusive interest of man. And to implement that social philosophy, religion must promote a system of social institutions.

News Briefs

Boston, Massachusetts

Pastor, Reed Holmes

A priesthood institute was held October 12 and 13 with President F. H. Edwards and Apostle George G. Lewis as instructors. Saturday began with a 9 o'clock prayer service, followed by class-work. Sunday's activities included an early prayer service, church school at 10 a.m., a sermon by President Edwards at 11 o'clock, and a pastors' meeting, instruction, and fellowship in the afternoon. Kenneth Urban, infant son of Helen and Urban Black; Carol Louise, daughter of Dorothy and Reed Holmes; and Robert Dale and David Wallace, sons of Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Cedric, were blessed at the 11 o'clock service. Special musical numbers were provided by the choir. Meals were served by the Monday Club throughout the institute. Priesthood members from every branch in New England attended this two-day session.

Pastor Reed Holmes gave the Graceland College Day sermon on October 20. Evening services throughout the month were devoted to a study of the Book of Mormon. Hazel and George Frost of Dover, New Hampshire, were baptized on the morning of October 27 by their father, Carl W. Frost. Music for the service was furnished by the choir.

Council Bluffs, Iowa

Pastor, V. D. Ruch

The annual district conference was held in Council Bluffs on September 29 with Apostle Arthur Oakman as guest speaker. V. D. Ruch was sustained as pastor by a unanimous vote at the business session. The world-wide Communion service was observed on October 6; a capacity crowd attended. In the evening, Seventy Roscoe Davies gave the first in a two-weeks' series of sermons, using colored slides to illustrate his lecture. Despite inclement weather, the meetings were well attended. The Cecillian Singers, under the direction of Grace Doty, presented a concert which netted $52; the money will be used to purchase robes for the singers. A three-day retreat for the young people was held at Camp Sheldon in Columbus, Nebraska, on August 31, and September 1 and 2; Dr. Roy Cheville was the instructor. On October 29 the adult choir, under the direction of Lela Ranney, sponsored an evening of musical entertainment. Lila Livingston, contralto; Floyd Fisher, baritone, and Calla Bernice, blind pianist, were the guest artists. Proceeds from the concert were added to the organ fund. Elder J. W. Worth was the speaker at both morning and evening services on October 28; he remained to visit with the Saints the following week. Beginning November 6, a three-day institute for women was held at the church under the supervision of Zella Ruch. District President Nels P. Johnson, Pastor V. D. Ruch, Elder John Blackmore, Blanche Currie, district women's director, and Donna Mae Olson were the speakers. A tea, arranged by the Rosetta Group, was given at the close of the afternoon session on Thursday. A summer festival sponsored by the women's department netted $1,700. Plans are now being made for a dinner and bazaar to be held December 7.

The Boy Scouts meet each Monday evening with their scoutmaster, Don Lainson. Eugene Currie is assistant scoutmaster, and Merle Spence, chairman of the scout committee. Members of the Men's Club meet for a dinner and program the first Tuesday of every month.

—Mrs. W. T. Spanswick, reporter.

Dow City, Iowa

Pastor, Elvin Baughman

Nine new members have united with the church; they are Martin and Lois Smith; Lucille Thompson, John Glassburner, Patsy Thompson, Jerry Anne Stewart, Eldon Argotsinger, Edith and Marilyn Wingrove. Dow City is represented at Graceland College this year by Beth Griffin. Six young people from the local congregation attended Graceland Homecoming.

Richard Weiss, U. S. Navy, is stationed at Pearl Harbor and Bryce Argotsinger, U. S. Army, at Enid, Oklahoma.

The choir, under the direction of Mrs. June Griffin, is contributing regularly to the musical part of the services. Phyllis Anderson is pianist. The children, assisted by Mrs. Elvin Baughman and Mrs. Paul Argotsinger, presented a play, "Learning About Jesus," on November 3. Religious movies are shown alternately twice each month at the Methodist and Reorganized Churches in Dow City. The films are secured through the public school, and the projector is operated by the superintendent of schools. Recent young people's activities include several skating parties and a Halloween party; Keith Weiss is leader. The women's department will sponsor a bazaar and supper in late November. A Thanksgiving prayer service, followed by a group dinner, will be held in the lower auditorium of the church.

Visiting speakers have been Lyle Winans, Clem Adams, Walter Weldon, Earl Yeager, and John Jensen.

—Bessie Pearsall, reporter.

Rock Island District Conference

The Rock Island District Conference assembled October 27 at the Scottish Rites Cathedral in Moline, Illinois. A priesthood meeting and women's round-table discussion took place in the Rock Island Church, and a Zion's League Halloween party was held at the Moline Church on Saturday night.

Sunday's activities began with a fellowship service at 9 a. m., followed by a worship service at 11 o'clock in charge of Elder John Stiegel; Apostle A. A. Oakman gave the sermon. Music was furnished by the district choir under the direction of Mrs. Clarence Tyree. The following recommendations for ordination were approved at the afternoon business session: Elmer Cousineau, Richard Martins, Paul Edwards, and Ammon Sartwell, priests; Everette McFarlane, Ralph Motejl, and Clifford Wakeland, elders; Irwin Gunlock, Leo Sheppard, Loren Pratt, Elvin Duke, and Clifton Nichols, teachers; and Richard Sackfield, Jack Powers, Charles Gritton, John Holmes, and Thomas Saul, deacons. Apostle Oakman gave the charge to these men. The bishop's agent's report showed a total of $12,018.26 paid in tithes and offering for the first nine months of 1946. Winifred Stiegel, director of leadership training, reported 115 people enrolled in classes at Joy, Moline, Rock Island, Muscatine, and Peoria. Five persons are taking correspondence courses. The statistical report showed sixty baptisms, a net gain of thirty-one members, and a district enrollment of 2,016. Officers elected for the coming year are W. W. Richards, district president; John Stiegel, treasurer and bishop's agent; Ruth Shippy, secretary, nonresident secretary, publicity agent, and Herald correspondent; Evert McFarlane, church school director; Lillian Williams, young people's leader; Avis Tyree, director of music; Florence Cady, women's supervisor; Gladys Hegwood, historian; O. E. Lindsay, auditor; Winifred Stiegel, children's leader and director of teacher training. A vote of thanks was given Elder L. W. Stiegel in appreciation of his service as district president. President W. W. Richards selected E. J. Lenox and Harry Jones as his counselors. Appreciation was also expressed to William Shaffer of Moline who provided the floral arrangement, and to Winifred Stiegel and her assistants who cared for the children during the services. Twenty delegates were elected to represent the district at General Conference. It was voted that a reunion be held in 1947.

The Sunday evening service opened with a musical program presented by the young people of Rock Island and Moline. Apostle Oakman was again the speaker.

Louisville, Kentucky

Pastor, James B. Welch

The annual branch business meeting was held September 17 and the following officers were elected: James Welch, pastor; H. W. Burwell and Morgan Stacy, associates; Beulah Lewis, secretary; Robert Burwell, church school director; Elmer Kreutzer, associate church school director; Marie Weyler, women's leader; Leroy Oliver, young people's leader; and Mary Stacy, director of music.

Louisville was well represented at the district reunion, and attendance has increased noticeably at local services since then. Present quarters are inadequate, and a special effort is being made to construct an upper auditorium to the church. The building fund has reached five thousand dollars, an amount which must be doubled before actual construction begins. Two young people have joined the church since reunion, and two more will be baptized November 3. Missionary Allen Breckenridge is to conduct a two weeks' series of meetings beginning November 4.

Daniel Stacy, now in the armed forces, was ordained to the office of priest by Pastor James Welch on October 20. Additions to the congregation are Byron Constance, a student at Louisville University, of Omaha, Nebraska; Robert Brown of Oakland, California, who is stationed at Fort Knox; Dick Dunlap, a member of the university faculty, of Vancouver, British Columbia; and Jean and William Anderson.

—Mrs. Nita Burwell, reporter.

Everett, Washington

Pastor, Elliott Gilberts

Mrs. Agnes Johnson, her daughter, JoAnn, and Larry Roberts were baptized on the morning of August 25 in Silver Lake by Elder Elliott Gilberts. They were confirmed at the 11 o'clock service, Elders Carl Oliver, George Brundage, and Elliott Gilberts officiating.

Officers elected for the coming year at the September 29 business meeting are Elliott Gilberts, pastor; Luella Foster, church school director; Ada Rossert, women's supervisor; George Brundage, adult supervisor; Harold Johnson, young people's leader; Agnes Johnson, children's supervisor; Maud Foster, cradle roll supervisor; Roy Davis, clerk; and Ben Pilbeam, custodian. A table lamp was presented by the congregation to Elder and Mrs. Brundage in recognition of their faithful service. Elder and Mrs. Ernest Ledsworth visited Everett on Sunday, October 20; Elder Ledsworth gave the 11 o'clock sermon. Evangelist J. F. Curtis conducted a series of missionary meetings from October 20 to 30. Plans are being made for a rummage sale and bazaar, the proceeds of which will be applied to the building fund.

—Thelma Roberts, reporter.

Northern Michigan District Conference

The Northern Michigan District Conference was held at Lachine, Michigan, on October 12 and 13. The theme of the conference was "The field is white already to harvest; the laborers are few." Officers elected for the coming year are as follows: Allen Schreur, president; Elmer Parkes and Rex Stowe, counselors; Ada Alldread, secretary and historian; Ella Nulph, church school director; Joseph Engmark, young people's leader; Elizabeth Brown, women's director; Helen Fritz, assistant women's director; Bessie Brown, stenographer; and Edith Engmark, director of music. Elder Allen Schreur brought to the conference recommendations for the following ordinations: Ernest Willey, elder; Joseph Engmark, priest; and Clayton Barber, deacon. After individual consideration by the group, each recommendation was accepted.

An impromptu entertainment was presented Saturday evening. Sermons were given by Missionary Virgil J. Billings and Pastor Rex Stowe of Gladstone on Sunday. Two prayer services were held during the conference. District President Allen Schreur spoke at the closing session, outlining the objectives for the coming year.

—Bessie Brown, reporter.

Toledo, Ohio

Pastor, Lloyd Lynn

The Toledo Saints are now meeting at 2526 Lawrence Avenue in the church purchased and dedicated in November, 1945. Additional classrooms will be added to the building as soon as materials are available. Elder Lloyd Lynn was retained as pastor, and Kenneth Floro was elected church school director at the September business meeting. During the past year the women, with Wilda Roush as their leader, contributed $503.36 to the building fund. Cleone Lynn was elected leader for the coming year. The Zion's League has been reorganized under the supervision of Blake Liston. A number of veterans have returned to the congregation, including Matthew Holmes, Bill Roush, Blake Liston, Kenneth Floro, Evan and Melvin Dussia. The Northwestern Ohio District Conference was held in Toledo on October 27; District President Blair McClain was the guest speaker.

THE DECEMBER READER'S DIGEST PRINTS

AN ADAPTATION FROM

MAN DOES NOT STAND ALONE

By A. CRESSY MORRISON

The editorial staff of the READER'S DIGEST thought enough of this book to include an adaptation in their December issue on page 11. The article is headed, "Seven Reasons Why a Scientist Believes in God." The author is a former president of the New York Academy of Sciences.

If you read the article in the DIGEST, you'll want to read the complete book. MAN DOES NOT STAND ALONE is a small book in which, avoiding ponderous scientific terms, the author talks on the deepest problems of the universe in language that makes the book read like an adventure in wonderland.

Books, Professors, and Jesus' Teachings

"Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding."—Proverbs 4: 7.

"The glory of God is intelligence, or, in other words, light and truth; light and truth forsaketh that evil one."—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6.

In college, it is never so important what you take, as what takes you. How many have left the church, how many have preached confused and confusing sermons simply because they did not "understand all they knew." Education is very much like fire, it can be a disaster or a blessing, depending on its control and use.

"Well," you may be saying, "that is all very epigrammatic, but does it mean anything?"

It means just this: In the first place, it is perhaps even more important for a good Latter Day Saint than for others to learn more than the surface of any subject which he studies. For, if he learns enough and learns it well enough, it will deepen his appreciation of the restored gospel and enrich his personal and official ministry.

"Light and truth forsaketh that evil one." You cannot know too much for God. He is always ahead of you. But you can certainly think you know too much. Whenever you meet a man who thinks he knows it all, you may be sure he knows very little. Our self-importance is usually a good measure of our ignorance. Only one who has not yet assimilated his knowledge and has not "learned" the gospel will found his teachings, or his life philosophy, on a book, a course, or a body of subject matter. Any sermon in which a book or a course is primary and the teachings of Jesus incidental is usually neither an accurate presentation of a body of knowledge nor of the teachings of Jesus.

This brings us to a second consideration: The genuine expert will not answer questions outside of his field of specialization, and within his field, he will be exceedingly cautious. He does not wish to make himself ridiculous by "getting out on a limb," and he does not feel qualified to speak on other subjects.

An atom bomb scientist would never attempt to explain the atom bomb and its significance in a half-hour discourse, yet ministers in all faiths have blithely attempted to do just that. Furthermore, whatever his personal opinions might be, this same scientist would refuse to lecture on psychiatry.

Yet ministers gaily preach their own conception of mental hygiene, and members of the congregation just as gaily advise friends and strangers alike about personal problems. Ministers have tried to present a digest of enough material in abnormal psychology to fill a semester's course, with additional readings by the student. If they did not know so little, they would hesitate to say so much in what is, at best, a controversial field.

In other words, it is imperative that Latter Day Saints know a great deal about the teachings of Jesus as found in the Three Standard Books, and a great deal about their own fields of work or study, whether it be plumbing or dentistry, house-keeping or teaching. But, more than this, the two bodies of knowledge must come together in a workable fashion. Why else was the ministry instructed in the ninetieth section to obtain knowledge in many fields "and all this for the salvation of Zion." And why else in another place were they instructed to "seek learning even by study, and also by faith."

Here Is the Writer

. . . . Eveline Burgess, who likes books, plays, music, people, and practically everything except boiled cabbage, turnips, and oysters—who not quite by accident knows something about her subject because she's attended Graceland College, Missouri University, University of California at Berkeley, Kansas City University, and is enrolled at Washington University, Saint Louis, right now for another psychology course—who has written many things for the church, has a master's degree in psychology, and is a visitor (social service worker to us uninitiated) for the Missouri State Board of Public Health and Welfare, welfare division. And that isn't all. She's jolly good company, knows lots of humorous stories, and cheers Missouri U's football team on to victory.

Horizons

If our study is purposeful, we cannot say, "Religion is religion and education is education, and never the twain shall meet." The whole philosophy of Latter Day Saintism and of a Christian community hinges upon a religion which does not put God in a compartment and shut the door of logic upon him.

It is possible to read the story of Moses and see in it only the story of a man. It is possible to read this same story and see in it only a few points of theology. But it is also possible to read the drama of Moses and see in it a human and moving lesson in Christian leadership which combines divine instruction with trial and error learning. It is possible to see in it God moving in the lives of men and men groping for a more Godlike life. Assimilated knowledge, whether of the gospel or of the affairs of men, will be expressed in terms of the speaker's own experience and in terms which his friends and hearers can understand. God has set forth as his aim the enrichment of human life. This God-life must be an intelligent life if we are to believe that "the glory of God is intelligence." But it must also be life itself in its more prosaic phases. Christianity offers no academic ivory tower existence. If our purpose is in line with God's purpose, and his purpose is the bringing to man of eternal life (or God-life), then our lives must be a meeting of the human and divine, and our studies must be an exploration of the laws of God and his scheme for the universe, whether we be studying forestry, geology, medicine, journalism, psychology, or any other subject.

If God is the master scientist, or as one bacteriologist put it, "the great mathematician," then all study is a study of religion, and all study of religion is a study of God's universal plan. According to this conception, our creed is indeed "all truth," and our learning is continuous and circular. All truth is one. We do not learn subjects and facts, but we grow constantly into a richer working philosophy and into a greater skill with human tools until the end of all our learning is accomplished in the realization of "thy kingdom" coming and "thy will" being done on earth as it is in heaven.

The Trouble-Shooter Apron-String Breakers

QUESTION:

I am nineteen years old and have been employed as a stenographer for the past four months. Since returning from college, I have made my home with my parents. Now, however, that I am capable of supporting myself, I should like to try a few of my own ideas in homemaking, but mother and father insist that I remain with them. They are wonderful parents, and I am very fond of them—still I should like to be on my own. It's an experience in budgeting and management I shall need if I get married. How can I make this break, yet keep everyone happy?

ANSWER:

By Mrs. Audrey Stubbart

You are nineteen, have gone to college, and are now capable of making your own decisions . . . good for you! Have you, however, considered all the angles? Have you learned to budget your money? Have you been paying room and board at home, or have your parents provided these gratis so that you could spend your salary on other things? Who will care for you in case of illness, or if you should lose your job? Are you saving for further education or buying for a future home? Perhaps it is understood that if the venture proves unsatisfactory you may "go home to mother."

Still, in the view of all these doubts, there is much to be said for your being on your own. Most girls at nineteen experience the homemaking urge—a factor which cannot be ignored. If they are free to try their ideas at home, fine! If not, there is no better way to satisfy the urge than to get actual experience in an apartment. The best arrangement is for several "nineteen and independents" to share expenses and the responsibility of housekeeping. Two can wash dishes faster than one.

Experiments in homemaking are much better made by breaking away from one's family and establishing a temporary home, than by marrying inadvisedly, simply because it seems the only means of severing the family ties. Sociologists maintain that if young people do not break away from the parental roof before they reach their twenties, they will become less and less inclined to as they grow older. Girls who can experience home-making in an apartment are less apt to make hasty marriages, and certainly when two, three, or four go together, the plan is a practical one.

As for keeping everybody happy, one mother says it can't be done. But as a step in that direction, you might expose your parents to all arguments in favor of daughters leaving home, and when they have learned to accept the situation as a perfectly normal one, pack your suitcase and kiss them good-by. As long as you are living in the same city, have them over for Sunday dinner occasionally, or invite them in for a late snack after a show.

—But before you start house-hunting, think of the many veterans and their families who are having to make their homes with mother and father because of the housing shortage. Is it fair for you to take up much needed space during this emergency period when so many are desperate for shelter?

Consider all of these things wisely—and that means objectively—then make your decision. It's your life to live, but other people must live theirs at the same time.

Why I Am a Total Abstainer

I am a total abstainer because I know our country and the world are entering the most difficult period of human history—a period when the stakes for civilization or chaos are the highest they have ever been; a period when we can drift into the utmost brutality and confusion or move forward into the most glorious period the human race has ever known. Whether we shall do the one or the other will depend upon the integrity and self-discipline of our people. We cannot work out the problems that face us with minds befuddled and lives wrecked by drink.—JOY ELMER MORGAN, Editor of Journal of the National Educational Association.

ON THE

Doctrine and Covenants

ENLARGED AND REVISED

By F. HENRY EDWARDS OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

The Book of Doctrine and Covenants holds a high place in the esteem and affection of our people. It is the Word of God to our dispensation. To it we look for guidance on major questions of thought and conduct. Our people will find this Commentary an important help in their study.

The book is suitable alike for group and class study, and for private work. It is of especial importance to the priesthood, whose duty it is to understand that they may properly guide, instruct, and lead the people of the church. Now it has been enlarged and revised in some parts, and improved in a number of ways.

Notice of a change of address must be given three weeks ahead of the date that it is to become effective. Accepted for mailing at the special rate of postage provided for in section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized July 21, 1921. Printed in the United States of America.

All checks for subscriptions to church papers, or for books and other materials sold at the Church Bookstore, should be made payable to Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

Suggestions to writers: Typewritten scripts, double-spaced, are preferred. Keep carbon copies to protect against loss. All articles and letters should be signed by writers. Please avoid use of post cards. News letters should be signed, approved by pastors, and should concern only church activities and workers. We find it necessary to edit most articles, and to condense news. No charge is made for one printing of the usual announcements of church meetings, births, marriages, and deaths; no memorial verse is used. Bulletin Board notices should be in our office at least ten days before date of publication. We cannot accept commercial or personal advertising. Articles for publication are gladly received, but there is no provision to pay for them. Those that relate to church work, doctrine, general cultural and educational subjects, personal development, etc., will be considered on basis of contents and literary merit. Writers should feel free to make independent presentations of their views, but should avoid criticism of the work of other writers appearing in these columns.

Letters: All letters and money for subscriptions and books should be addressed to Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage, Independence, Missouri. Articles and letters for publication should be sent to the same address, and marked "The Editors." Letters for all general church offices should be sent to The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Checks or Money Orders for contributions made to the General Church should be issued in the name of the Solicitor, Bishop's Agent, or Bishop in the district or stake in which the contributor lives.

If circumstances or conditions are such that it is more convenient to send contribution direct, Money Orders or checks should be issued in favor of The Presiding Bishopric, and mailed to The Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

This includes contributions for tithing, surplus, offering, oblation, Christmas offering, Auditorium, College Day, and The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

Maybe You Could Do This

(From Seattle comes this picturesque and "savory" description of the social side of a young people's retreat. The account may set the reader to drooling, but will also give him an idea.)

Over one hundred young people enjoyed a week-end retreat at Coronet Bay in the foothills of Puget Sound. The camp is ideally located for mountain climbing, hiking, swimming, and boating. A large stone fireplace, which faces the beach, provided a setting for even-song. The camp has two large dormitories, five guest cottages, a dining room, and a large recreation hall.

Saturday night's dinner was an event long to be remembered. L. R. White of Mount Vernon went to the LaConnor Indian reservation early in the afternoon and returned with sixty pounds of fresh salmon. He prepared the fish with salt and garlic for barbecuing, and for two hours tantalizing odors filled the air around the outdoor fireplace. At six o'clock Chef White served his specialty to the group. Needless to say, there was scarcely a piece of skin left to tell the tale of the marvelous meal.

Wana McDole, reporter.

Freedom

O masters of the world, set free your slaves!

The chains that bind your fellow men to you

Bind you to them.

It matters not what kind of chains they are—

Or if they bind men's bodies, souls, or thoughts—

There are two ends to every chain
And one end holds the master shackled fast

As surely as the other holds the slave.
O masters of the world, set free your slaves,

And thereby let yourselves go free!

* It is easy to meet the emergencies for which you are able to make some preparation. The emergencies that bring distress are those you can see coming, and for which you are powerless to build a defense. Then the only thing that can be done is to prepare mind and spirit to take the shock.

* I saw two autos crash the other day. Neither driver was going fast, neither wanted any trouble, and both of them were very unhappy that it had occurred. It was simply a case that the responsible driver was old and tired, his car windows were not as clean as they should be, and his eye glasses may have been in the same condition. He failed to look in all directions before crossing an intersection, and plowed into the side of the other car. The other driver was angry, and broke out in profane language. After he had finished swearing, I looked at the damage again to see if it had changed in any way. It had not. So swearing apparently did nothing to help, and made the settlement even more difficult.

* Wherever you go and see the rocks, you will observe two things about them: they are very hard, and they are generally broken. They have no elasticity, no resiliency. They make no adjustments, they will not compromise.

* Nature works in circles. She takes mud—just soft mud—and puts it under heat and pressure for millions of years until the mud becomes rock. Then she puts the rock up into the open air where the elements can work on it, and in a few million more years it is back to mud again.

Some Fruits of Freedom

Written large in latter-day philosophy is the affirmation, "It is not right that any man should be in bondage."

In the light of this tradition and truth, our people are most appreciative of every liberty attained, be it religious, political, social, or economic; sensing as they do that the fuller the freedom, the greater the possibility for human development and achievement.

A case in point is the attainment of the new Japanese constitution adopted October 7, in lieu of that of 1889: a document built on democratic principles, stripping the Emperor of attributes of Divinity, and of absolute power, and centering authority of government in a lower house elected by the people.

Political freedom is hereby visioned for the Japanese people, and may be fully attained and maintained, providing economical and social freedom be likewise attained and maintained. A herculean task is this confronting the Japanese, ravaged by war, dependent for sustenance on a few stony and congested islands, required to rebuild their industry and commerce, inexperienced in government, and under the obligation of establishing for themselves again a place of respectability among the nations. Nor is there a guarantee that when reparation claims have been satisfied, Japan shall have left to her the wherewithal to implement her economy towards social and therefore real and sustained political freedom.

A very great responsibility is here posed for the conquering nations, as for the new Japanese government and the Japanese people. May each and all be found worthy and capable of the trust.

To put our thesis affirmatively, It is right that every man should be free. Only in freedom may one come to a knowledge and appreciation of the truth. And to know, and do, and fulfill the truth in life is to be free indeed.

People in the Coal Strike

The Miner—Out Again

A picture of a dejected man appeared in the papers a few days ago. He was a coal miner, out of work because of the strike. Sixty years of age, wiry, strong, but nearing the end of his productive years, he was little interested in the great struggle of the unions against the coal operators. All he knew was that the annual strike season was on again; that a time in which he could have enjoyed some good pay checks would find him unemployed, probably for some weeks; that he didn't like it; and that he could do nothing about it but strike. To have tried to work would only put his name on the blacklist, and then he would be fired when the trouble was settled.

All this man and thousands like him know is, "Out again." They and their families will bear the brunt of the suffering. Will the pay increase make up what they lose? Did they get a chance to vote—freely, secretly, and without fear—for the strike?

You—Cold Again

You are in this strike, too, whether you burn coal or not. Shortages in production will reach you. Through the war, you suffered from many shortages, some of them unavoidable, some of them created by the alphabet agencies. This coal shortage seems unnecessary to you, and very unfortunate. You are not in any way responsible for the situation, but you will suffer along with others. Sometimes uncertain of the truth, sometimes uninformed, you may develop a great deal of feeling about the strike. About all you can do is to complain to your neighbors, and to your congressman, with the request that he "do something" about it.

The Newspapers

You will not find the whole story of this strike trouble in the newspapers. Few reporters have time to give adequate investigation to the facts to write a complete story. Few papers would have space to print it. Some good magazines may do better, but it would take a book to cover the significant elements, the historical background, the social conditions, the economic factors, and all. Moreover, our reading public do not demand of their publications a high quality of information in such a case; few of them would read it carefully.

Government Responsibility

The government should not be too severely blamed for what has happened. You kept voting for this kind of Government, and you knew something of its policies when you voted. If you don't like the results, you should let your wishes be made known to your representatives.

Government always faces a difficult situation. Economic and social maladjustments cannot be anticipated. They cannot be met until they arrive, and the public suffers. Remedies are tried, and sometimes they do not work. They must be replaced by other remedies. The government will respond to the demand of the citizens when the will of the citizens is sufficiently clear and strong.

Labor Czar

The dictator in the present situation was, according to some writers, very nearly a broken figure on the national scene, until the government picked him up, gave him protective legislation, and put him on his feet. Your government, they say, made him what he is, or, to put it more accurately, gave him power to make himself very inconvenient for the rest of us. That may or may not be true. Anyway, we seem to be caught in a trap of our own making, and we must try to find a way out of it. When we find the right way, the labor dictator will not be able to hurt us anymore.

Need of Education

One great need is for the general public to be better educated in labor problems—in the side of labor, in the side of capital, and in our own public interests. We shall need to know the truth in this situation before we can work intelligently to make ourselves free. More enlightenment is needed in the ranks of labor, too, and a better, higher quality of leadership. Above all, there is a need of some ethical and moral convictions, of responsibility for the welfare of others as well as our own good. When our thinking mounts to the plane of national welfare, transcending personal and group gains, we shall all be able to find a better way to the more abundant life.

Check Your Blueprint

By Lydia Wight

You are building a new church? Your congregation is working hard to support the building fund? Why? Because the church is to be built for them! You, the planning committee, have the architect's blueprint really in your hands? And you are about to turn the first spadeful of dirt and begin actual construction?

Then, please, pause a moment. But of course you have looked very carefully at your congregation and have seen its children, its youth, its adults young and old. You have considered them as families and as age groups as well as individuals. If you haven't, it might save later expense and bitter disappointment to check your blueprint against the check list and space requirement for church school needs given in the GUIDE-LINES TO LEADERSHIP for January, 1947. It will soon be off the press. The article for which you will watch appears under the heading "Building for Religious Education."

Your subscription placed now will put it into your hands.

The Duke of Wellington said that the British soldier was not braver than the soldiers of other countries, but he was brave five minutes longer, and, of course, the result could be only one thing, namely, victory. Needlecraft

To Raise Missionary Funds at General Conference

The Needlecraft division of the General Women's Department is an organization for church-wide benefit, namely, to enlarge the missionary fund.

As in former years, there will be an exhibition booth at the Auditorium during the coming General Conference next April.

Because of the generous response of the women of the church heretofore in sending their contributions of needlework for sale, we again solicit your co-operation for the benefit of the missionary cause. Last year $700 was turned over to Bishop DeLapp for this purpose.

MRS. D. J. KRAHL, Secretary.

Not long ago there died a benevolent doctor, and it had been his custom as he went through his books and saw this debt and that debt, one after the other, and realized that it was not paid because the patient could not pay it, to put a red pen-mark through the debt, and write by the side of it, "Forgiven; unable to pay." That man died, and after his death his wife looked through his books, and she came upon these marks. She said, "My husband has forgiven people a lot of money. I could do with that money very well now," and she took it into the county court, and there sued every-one of those debtors for the money. The judge said to her, "How do you know the money is owed," "I have it here in my husband's books," she replied, and showed the books to him. "Oh, yes. Is this your husband's writing," he asked. "Yes." "Then," he said, "no court in the world will give you a verdict against people when your husband with his own pen has written 'Forgiven; unable to pay.'" —Life of Faith.

PROPHECIES OF THE FUTURE

Past and Present

By John Blackmore

The second of two sermons on the meaning of current events. Delivered at Omaha, Nebraska, October 20

And verily I say unto you, that it is my will that you should . . . obtain a knowledge of history, and of countries, and of kingdoms, of laws of God and man, and all this for the salvation of Zion.—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 12.

SOME FOLK DEMAND, as I have commented earlier, a “Thus saith the Lord” for the expression of prophecy. Others insist that this must be accompanied by an emotional evidence of the spirit. Others I observed demand quotations from the sacred writings—the Scriptures—written in olden days by prophets of long ago. We are always intrigued by the prophecies uttered by a past generation. They are always enlightening and often of great worth. But to me the “voice of prophecy” or the prophetic enlightenment may come in many ways. So this morning we shall look into the “book” of past experience, the “book of history” for both the past and the present are prophetic in terms of the future.

HISTORY IS ITS OWN PROPHET

History is its own prophet. We may look forward and peer into the future by looking backward over the past. Walking one morning with the late President Frederick M. Smith across the “Temple Lot” when the Auditorium was being built—the foundation was being laid—we picked up a piece of limestone rock quarried out for the foundation. Encased in the specimen were some fossilized crinoids. This piece of limestone told a wonderful story of the presence of an ancient sea which had flowed over the very place upon which the Auditorium was being erected. It told of ages of geological processes which stirred the imagination. As the geologist can read the history of the past as it is recorded in the rock strata, so the historian can interpret the trends of the past and interpret the social movements of the present. As the astronomer can plot the course of the stars and the planets based upon their habits of the past and their present movements; so the historian—student of the past—and the social scientist—student of the present—plot the trends leading into the social future. May I suggest that we all become students of the past and the present, and by looking backward glimpse the possibilities of the future. There is no substitute for this type of prophetic education. To know and quote Biblical prophecies is not sufficient. To listen intently to the limited prophetic utterances of both past and present prophets is not enough. In this modern age each one must obtain a degree of knowledge of history, countries, kingdoms, and the laws of God and of man. “All for the salvation of Zion.”

ALL SAINTS DESIRE ZION

All Saints desire Zion—a real Christian economy. But, few desire the conditions requisite for Zion. Five centuries ago Thomas à Kempis summed the situation up in these words: “All men desire peace, but few desire the conditions requisite for peace.” All men desire peace but few are prepared to pay the full costs for peace. Business men want peace but they want profits. Both English and American business sold to Japan millions of dollars of war potentials at the very time when our own State Department was protesting Japan’s war on China and trying to avert war in the Pacific. In time of war neutral nations are anxious to sell to the belligerents “war goods” for profits. During the war it is well known that our own government was robbed by both management and workers—management hiked the costs in the cost-plus system, and workers who drew high wages failed often to give a fair day’s work.

Men want peace, but they do not desire the conditions of peace.

Saints want Zion, but they do not want to abide the conditions of Zion. We love the church. We love the gospel. But, we do not love the work requisite for Zion. Those my friends are prophetic statements significant in their implications.

THE PROPHETIC STORY OF HISTORY

Approximately five thousand years ago, man built in Egypt a majestic civilization. Over the centuries of the Pharaohs, it was rich and grew strong and became a great empire. Its learned architects designed the pyramids. Dikes and reservoirs were built. A canal from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea—the first Suez—was constructed. It took thousands of years to build the Egyptian civilization and empire. It was destroyed within a comparatively short time, a few hundred years. Egypt went down into the dust, not into oblivion to be sure. Her civilization disintegrated because of internal wickedness and inter-racial strife.

Mesopotamia

We cross the Arabian desert eastward, and we come to the valley of the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers. Here in this fertile country, another great civilization was created. While Abraham was tending his flocks in Palestine, Hammurabi—a great ruling king—was governing the great cities of Mesopotamia which had reached a very high level of civilization. Hammurabi wrote the laws out of which grew many of the later Hebrew laws. Mesopotamia (Babylon) survived until Nebuchadnezzar; then, because of internal strife and outside aggression, she too went down into the dust. Her civilization disintegrated, and a people of lesser culture conquered her cities. Many of the great cities were burned and lost.

So the endless struggle continues. One people builds a civilization, and another tears it down and destroys cities and governments.

Greece

We pass by the civilization of the Phoenicians, and we come down in history to the time of Greece. Often termed "Immortal Greece." Not the Greece of today—not even the same race of people. We are talking now of the Greece of Athens and Sparta, the Greece of Pericles when Athens in all her glory was a type of "democracy," the Greece of Homer and of learning, the Greece of Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle. She was then the seat of learning of the whole world. It was the Greece of magnificent architecture and beauty, the Greece of intellectual power. But again, history tells the same story. Internal strife amid the cities of Greece weakened her. She was conquered by Alexander the Great; and finally humiliated she was brought into slavery by a cruder, less learned but ruthless people. Greece henceforth became a pawn in the unceasing wars of the Near East.

Romans

Rome now rises, builds her mighty empire based on arms and force. She rules the world—Pax Romana—peace in the world maintained by Rome. This great Roman Empire grows stronger, strong as iron. Her legions march and march through many countries, conquering many lands. She crosses victoriously many seas. The coasts of Britain are assailed and conquered. She gives to the world an appreciation law as Greece before her gave philosophy.

Rome was wealthy, so wealthy that many of her citizens lived without working. Her government satisfied the crowd with the dole and with games. But the evil day came. Internal graft, wickedness, and "fifth column" influences weakened her fiber. External pressure in war came, and Rome fell. Her vast empire disintegrated. The barbarians invaded her cities, burning and destroying. For a while the "dark ages" covered her one-time glory. Under papal patronage she again arose only to be subdued and to disintegrate.

So history once again tells the story of fame, national pride, and disintegration. We have a period of contest among the nations for supremacy. Now we are in what may be termed Modern times.

Britannia

To be brief, we pass over much history to the time when "Britannia ruled the waves." A mighty British Empire arose. Her flag flew in every clime. The great boast was that "the sun never sets on her empire." But evil days have come. Wars have weakened her. Her financial house is not as strong. We are now witnessing the retrogression of England. Like other empires, Mother England is growing old and a little feeble. Of noble birth, her children are growing strong in their own right.

America

England's firstborn child (colony), America is now "ruling the waves" with the mightiest navy of all time. Her eldest child has become the strongest nation of the Anglo-Saxon family. The United States is the richest nation on earth. Regardless of our claims to the contrary, we are building an empire of territory and influence. We are aggressive, believing in our "manifest destiny." But, we are opposed by another congregation of peoples. Russia challenges our influence and our financial empire.

The Present

Today we find two great peoples, often outright and at other times by inference, challenging each other across the conference tables, across the lives and governments of smaller nations. Russia and the Anglo-Saxon peoples are in opposing camps. If leadership fails—and it might fail as in the past to maintain peace—history will continue her story of civilizations which crumbled because of internal strife, war among the nations, with ruined cities and a lost culture.

The peoples of the world stand at the threshold of a great disaster or the greatest of all triumphs. The power of destructive armaments is so great that another war will crush not only cities and towns but transportation and communication systems. Atomic bombs, jet propelled missiles, war waged with germs as the destructive agent will wipe out the cultured peoples of the world.

A Conclusion

If war comes, we shall once again go back to the village type life. Small communities will have to depend upon their own productive resources and their co-operative ability. In other words, a local Zion has become an imperative. To me it appears that we have a few years in which to make the essential preparation and to gather into "co-operative communities" for the establishment of Zion and her stakes. To delay will mean irreparable disaster. For the prophecy of history is that the nations will continue their rivalry and will destroy each other in the future as they have done in the past. The prophecy of the present is that in the near future the Anglo-Saxon bloc and the Russian bloc will engage in mortal combat with destructive results never before paralleled in all history. National economics will crash, and local economies will be established under the impact of the conflict. Under these circumstances our philosophy of Zion will become an imperative.

A PRAYER

May God lead us and guide us to interpret the authoritative voice of history, and to understand the trends of today so that we may read the "Prophecy of History and the Prophecy of the Present." Amen.

Do not have your concert first, then tune your instruments afterwards. Begin the day with the Word of God and prayer, and get first of all in harmony with him.—J. Hudson Taylor.

Making the Christian Spirit Effectual

By J. A. Koehler

Number 14 in a series of radio addresses on the subject:
"The Social Philosophy of the Modern Prophet"

WHEN ST. PAUL said that Jesus "went about doing good," he said that the Christian spirit is the spirit of good-doing. I suspect that you will not deny that. When Jesus said, "Except a man be born . . . of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God," I think he said that the Christian spirit is the spirit of the Kingdom. Perhaps there are few men who will deny even that. "Pray" that the Kingdom may come, surely must mean that the Christian spirit is a Kingdom-building spirit.

If there is one term which signifies the sum total of the good which the Christian spirit would do, if the summum bonum of Christianity can be represented in a name, I suspect that name is "the Kingdom of God." For the outcome of all the endeavors of the genius of Bible religion throughout the ages, the end that is to be reached through the workings of the Christian spirit, is this: "The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth," or what is the same thing, "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever."

Well, we are still praying "Thy Kingdom come." We are still hoping that the fruitage of the Christian spirit will be "peace on earth." We still look forward to the time when, through the establishment of the righteousness of the Kingdom, or through Kingdom-coming good-doing, "all these things shall be added unto you." We still long for the age when "violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders." And perhaps every one of us will say that that glorious social estate may be achieved only through the workings of the Christian spirit; only if "this mind be in you which was also in Jesus Christ."

I NEED NOT dwell on the ineffectiveness of the Christian spirit or, rather of the various spirits which have been called the Christian spirit. "The kingdoms of this world" have not become "kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ." Nor is there anything doing anywhere which promises that they soon shall; nothing of which I know, except the awareness of some men of the church of the ineffectiveness of its spirit and their impulsion to do something about it, and the voice of the prophetic genius crying again in the wilderness of our civilization: "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert [of our civilization] a highway for our God." "Organize my Kingdom upon the promised land." "Seek to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion."

Perhaps I may best bring out more sharply the essential question through the use of an illustration. Everyone knows of the musical genius of Kreisler and of Paderewski, which genius is an aptitude for a special kind of good-doing. Call that genius "the spirit" of Kreisler and of Paderewski; for any human impulsion to any kind of good-doing is a spirit.

That spirit of good-doing may make itself effectual only through its own implementation. But to implement that spirit a Kreisler must have use of a violin and a Paderewski a piano; he must have an instrument on which to perform. And no matter how burning the desire of Kreisler to please his audience, his spirit would be utterly ineffectual if he had no violin. But give Kreisler a good violin, and there is hardly a limit to the effectiveness of his spirit.

As I said in my last article, the Christian spirit is the spirit of good-doing in the sum of all the relations that men may sustain one to another. It is the spirit which would enrich the life of man through the right and good conduct of matrimony, industry, government, the sabbath, and of all the affairs that arise out of those primary pursuits or which need to be promoted to make those affairs effectual.

The question then is, Are there any instruments which the Christian spirit must use to make itself effectual? And, if so, what are those instruments? They are not primarily violins and pianos. We know that. For that is not the character of the things the Christian spirit must do, primarily, to make itself effectual. Manifestly to make itself effectual in the relations which we call organized society—and matrimony, industry, and government in particular are affairs of organized society, or of peoples, are they not?—to make itself effectual in these relations the Christian spirit must implement itself in the primary social institutions of all peoples. Without a system of social institutions, the Christian spirit can be no more effectual than the spirit of Paderewski could without a piano.

The next truth which needs to be brought to light is that, to make itself effectual, the social institutions of the Christian spirit, or of Christian peoples, must be adapt. Suppose that instead of a violin Fritz Kreisler had only a bass drum; could his violin spirit be made effectual? It could not. Suppose that instead of a piano Paderewski had had only a very common guitar; could he have made his spirit effectual? He could not. To make itself effectual the Christian spirit must have suitable instruments on which to perform. It must have social institutions which are adapt.

The negative side of this question is not pleasant to dwell upon. But to refer to it is an effectual way of throwing light on its positive side. If we should form a general concept of all the specific things that the Christian spirit would do, I believe we would have the score of a social symphony. And, as you may know even though you may not be an accomplished musician, there can be no perfect symphonic performance without a symphonic orchestra; and you would not call a bass drum and a guitar a symphonic orchestra, would you?

WHAT WE HAVE supposed was "the Christian spirit" has tried to perform the social symphony of true religion, so to speak, with a guitar and a bass drum. Christian peoples provided themselves with churches of one kind and another. The peoples of those churches have had their impresarios, and those directors have beaten the air with their batons. But what we call Christian peoples have not had the social violins, and all, with which to perform the social symphony of true religion. They have had neither the industrial nor the governmental institutions—they have not had a full organ of economic instruments—with which to perform their social symphony. And, consequently, there neither was nor is a performance. "The Christian spirit" is not effectual.

Why do you suppose that peoples who are supposed to be Christian have tried to make their spirits effectual through the means, figuratively, of only a bass drum and a guitar? Do you believe they would have done that if their idea of the sum of Christian good-doing had involved uses of violins and wood and brass instruments and so on? Do you think Paderewski with his minuet idea would have tried to perform on a one-stringed ukulele? He would not.

We may judge of the ideas or repertoire of the people of any church by the instruments on which it seeks to implement its spirit. And the conclusion to which we are driven by the facts of religious life is that peoples who were called Christian did not have the Christian philosophy of social life; nor are there any clear indications that, even at this late day, notwithstanding this is the age of social philosophy, they have mastered that social philosophy.

I AM THINKING of the church situation in all its parts. But my thoughts are more in the direction of my own church than of any other, for the reason that I believe the laity of our church is much like the laity of other churches. They have not yet arrived at a condition of thought and agreement to perform the Christian social symphony. For that reason their implementation designs or institutional ambitions do not involve them in the building of the economic institutions which would bring forth and establish the cause of Zion; which is our way of speaking of the Kingdom of God. And that is the reason why the spirit of our people—which, like that of other Christian peoples, is supposed to be the spirit of kingdom-building—is not effectual.

Just as Christian peoples generally, instead of getting into the heart of the business of Kingdom-building, have played on the fringes of incidentals; just as they have tried to make novelty and variety a substitute for Christian progression; so have many of our people played around with small-time business and industrial ideas. And that is the reason that, in our church as in other churches, the Christian spirit has been ineffectual.

THAT IS THE dark side of the picture, of which there is also a bright side. Indeed, I would not be making this group of talks if there were not a bright side to the story of religion. Things are happening in our church, as they are in other churches. We are quite as dissatisfied with the advancement we have made as others may be with the advancement their churches have made. And what is more, in our church there are undercurrents as well as upper currents working to set aright the things which have stood in the way of our progression, or which have made our Zion-redeeming spirit ineffectual.

We had thought that the prophecy had been fulfilled which said: "A light shall break forth among them that sit in darkness, and it shall be the fullness of my gospel." And we thought—I suspect that almost every member of our church had thought—that that prophecy had been fulfilled in him. But now we are not so sure that, instead, there has been fulfilled in us the prophecy which said "But they received it not, for they perceive not [that] light."

That, I believe, is a good sign. It is part of the bright side of our religious picture. The other part, as you may judge by the content of this group of talks, is that not a few Latter Day Saints are going places in their thinking. We are on our way to a mastery of the social philosophy of true religion. And if we continue in that way, which I am sure we shall, the day is not so far distant when the spirit which gave birth to our religious movement will provide itself with the instruments of making itself effectual.

THE MISSION OF CHRIST

"I have spoken . . . that ye might have peace."—JESUS.

THE MISSION AND MINISTRY of Christ carries with it much more than ritual or profession; it brings to humanity the dynamics of life. The peace Christ offers is creative, enduring, and satisfying. It lifts man out of the elements of selfhood, and transplants him into the eternal purposes of God. By this we mean to say, that peace to be effective must begin its unfoldment from within. Peace is not something to be put on as one would a garment, nor is it something to be gained by coercive methods, such as the victor dictating to the vanquished. Peace, the peace that Jesus offers men, must spring spontaneously from the inner precincts of the soul; it must be carefully entwined as an integral part of one's everyday life; it must become life itself.

In a word then, peace must make man one with God by first making him one with himself, one with his fellows, and one with the very universe in which he moves. Peace, therefore, must of necessity become the real quality of life if it is to serve its real purpose, and become effective in the relationships of men. It is quite obvious then, that there is no such thing as peace for one who is at cross purposes with the universe about him; it is right relationships with everything. This, and this only, can insure harmony, tranquility, and satisfaction in the soul of man. Peace therefore becomes the ripened fruit of the tree of life that has been properly cultivated, pruned, and nurtured, until it has reached the maximum of its intended purpose here on the earth. Peace then comes as a result of obedience to law; it can never be gained through caprice. When men discover and carefully apply the law in their lives nothing but peace, eternal peace, can follow them.—J. E. VANDERWOOD.

A COMMENTARY ON THE Doctrine and Covenants

By F. HENRY EDWARDS OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

The Book of Doctrine and Covenants holds a high place in the esteem and affection of our people. It is the Word of God to our dispensation. To it we look for guidance on major questions of thought and conduct. Our people will find this Commentary an important help in their study.

The book is suitable alike for group and class study, and for private work. It is of especial importance to the priesthood, whose duty it is to understand that they may properly guide, instruct, and lead the people of the church. Now it has been enlarged and revised in some parts, and improved in a number of ways.

Northern Indiana District Conference

Apostle D. Blair Jensen presided at the conference held in Buchanan, Michigan, on October 27. The following officers were elected at the 2 p.m. business session: S. M. Nichols, district president; Forest Myers and James Best, counselors; Myrtle Johnson, secretary and auditor; Ed. J. Grigg, treasurer; Lydia Myers, women's leader; Dale Wismer, director of religious education; Iona Cease, director of music; Geneva Swain, young people's supervisor; Glenn Cease, historian; and Cecil Wismer, nonresident pastor. William Wisner, Ivan Allen, Ned Tarney, and John Rees were approved for ordination to the office of priest; Walter England was approved for ordination to the office of elder. It was voted that a budget of $250 for district expenses be continued for the coming year. Delegates to General Conference were elected. Apostle Jensen preached both Saturday evening and Sunday morning; he and Elder F. E. Myers were in charge of the 9 o'clock prayer meeting. Dinner was served by the Buchanan Saints.

Byrneville, Indiana

Pastor, J. R. Byrn

The annual business meeting was held at the church on September 27. Officers elected for the coming year are Frank Martin, church school superintendent; Bertha Mosier, Zion's League leader; Alma Harrison, women's leader; Dorris Maymon, director of music; Myrtle Maymon, publicity agent; Aldon Utz, treasurer; and Alma Utz, clerk. J. R. Byrn was sustained as pastor of the branch. The women met at the home of Bertha Mosier on October 2 to elect officers. Hazel Byrn was elected assistant leader; Lois Harrison, secretary; Perla Maymon, friendly visitor; Louise Utz, teacher; and Bertha Mosier, assistant teacher. A play, "Blest Be the Tie," was given October 17 by the women.

The installation and dedication service held at the first of the church school year was beautiful and inspiring. Each teacher and officer came forward at the beginning of the service and placed a lighted candle on the altar as a pledge of loyalty and support. The Religious Education Institute held in New Albany on November 8, 9, and 10 was well attended. A banquet, sponsored by the women's department, was held on Friday night. Thelona Stevens of Independence, Missouri, was the instructor. Nine young people represented Byrneville at the youth retreat held October 19 and 20 at Evansville.

Sympathy is extended by the Saints to the family of Elder E. F. Robertson who died October 24. His advice and counsel will be greatly missed.

The following officers were elected for the coming year at the September business meeting: Willard Green, church school director; Bernadine Muir, women's leader and director of music; Floyd Silverthorn, assistant church school director; Myrtle Isles, clerk; Edward Gardner, treasurer; Everett Finken, young people's leader; Carol Green, church school secretary; Lottie Murray, librarian; Elizabeth Muir, historian; Ralph Braidwood, solicitor; Mrs. Willard Green, publicity agent; and Shirley Isles, pianist. Elder H. C. Muir was unanimously elected pastor for the fortieth consecutive year.

Visual aids are now being used in the church school department to improve teaching methods. The annual harvest home supper was the largest ever held; a profit of $175 was realized. Recent speakers have been Elders John Booth and Ted Weaver. Newcomers to the congregation are Elder and Mrs. Earl Falconer, formerly of Midland.

—Carol Green, reporter.

Santa Rosa, California

Pastor, Herbert E. Hinton

Rally day was observed October 13, with Bishop E. C. Burdick setting the theme for the day's devotions. A potluck lunch was served at noon by the young people. A consecration service was presented by the church school workers in the afternoon, in which a plea for teachers and leaders was made. The evening vesper hour was built around the story of Bertha Valerius' painting, "The Christ." High Priest Robert L. Bishop gave the sermon.

Zion's League activities for October included a rummage sale, a Graceland College Day vesper service, and a Halloween party, to which the entire branch was invited. Having finished the task of cataloging all books in the church library, the Leaguers are now preparing to paint the bookcases recently purchased by the branch. The Blue Birds and Eagles also sponsored Halloween parties.

Under the direction of Mrs. Etta Holst, a half-hour devotional is being presented each Sunday evening prior to the class study. Christmas cards are being sold to raise money to purchase a mimeograph so that a monthly church bulletin can be published. —Romla Hinton, reporter.

Southern Nebraska District Conference

The Southern Nebraska District Conference was held in the Grand Island, Nebraska, church on October 12 and 13. The theme of the conference was "A Consecrated People." Apostle Paul M. Hanson and members of the district presidency were in charge.

The conference opened with a prayer service on Saturday afternoon, District President Ernest G. Keller presiding; classwork, with Elder Charles Fry as teacher followed. Apostle Paul Hanson was the evening speaker. Sunday's activities included church school at 9:30 a. m.; a worship service; a sermon by Apostle Hanson at 11 o'clock; a district women's meeting at 1:30 p. m., with Mrs. Grover C. Wall in charge and Mrs. Harry Niehaus as guest speaker; a men's fellowship meeting with Elder Francis Schrunck giving the address; and a business session at 2:45. The following district officers were elected for the coming year: Ernest Keller, district president; Mrs. Gladys Hathaway, secretary and historian; Dave G. Krahl, treasurer; Mrs. Blanche Preston, director of religious education; Wayne Smith, young people's leader; Mrs. Edith Niehaus, women's leader; Mrs. Capitola Mechling, director of music; and Grover C. Wall, auditor. All district reports were presented and accepted. The conference approved recommendations that Harry E. Niehaus and Lawrence A. Rife be ordained elders; Wayne F. Smith, a priest; R. Devere Collins and John L. Weller, deacons. The ordination service was held in Lincoln, Nebraska, on Sunday evening, November 3. Donald Savage was also ordained a priest at that time.

A basket dinner was served Sunday noon in the social room of the church. The conference closed on Sunday evening with Elder Charles Fry giving the sermon. —Mrs. Ernest Keller, reporter.

Chatham, Ontario

Pastor, J. A. Pray

The Chatham Branch anniversary services were held Sunday, October 27. Evangelists John Shields, John Grice, and Richard Jones, and Elders J. A. Pray and H. A. Engle were in charge of the 9:30 a. m. prayer service. Church school was held at 11 o'clock; preceding the classwork, a devotional was presented by the young people.

Elder J. A. Pray, formerly of Port Huron, Michigan, was installed as pastor of Chatham congregation at a special business session held in the afternoon. Elder H. A. Engle, former pastor, has been transferred to the Southern Michigan and Northern Indiana Districts. Pastor Pray spoke at the 3 o'clock service; special musical numbers were given by Harold Neal, William Clarke, Marnie Neal, and the choir. Elder Engle preached his farewell sermon in the evening; the senior choir, under the direction of William Clarke, sang two anthems with Leta Pritchard as soloist.

Meals were served by the women of the branch in the lower auditorium of the church. Mary Armstrong, one of the oldest members of the congregation, provided the floral arrangements. The newly-organized girls' choir, directed by Gladys Ferguson, made its first public appearance at the morning devotional.

On Wednesday evening, October 30, a spook party was held in the church basement. Elder R. R. Wood was in charge of contests and games; prizes were awarded for the best costumes.

Seventy H. I. Velt arrived in Chatham on November 6; services were held at the church on November 6, 7, and 8 preparatory to a missionary series which began November 10.

Sympathy is extended the family of Percy Stanton, a devoted member of Chatham congregation whose sudden death came as a shock to his many friends. Funeral services were held November 6.

St. Clair, Michigan

Pastor, Harvey H. Grice

Officers for the coming church year are Harvey Grice, pastor; F. W. Feske and G. O. Coburn, counselors; Mrs. F. W. Feske, secretary; W. A. Lively, treasurer and church school director; Ervin Sibilla, financial secretary; Mrs. W. A. Lively, women's leader; and Mrs. David Chisnell, director of music. Pastor Harvey Grice is the son of Elder and Mrs. John R. Grice of Port Huron; he is a graduate of St. Clair High School and Ohio State University, where he received his Doctor of Philosophy degree in 1941. He is also a veteran of World War II.

A social was held at the home of Elder and Mrs. G. O. Coburn on the evening of October 18 in honor of the retiring officers. Gifts of appreciation were presented to Elder Frank W. Feske, who has served as pastor for the past five years, and Mrs. Harry Lively, women's leader for the past fifteen years. The evening closed with a prayer and the singing of "Blest Be the Tie That Binds."

The men of the congregation meet at the church each Tuesday evening to work on the basement; construction should soon be finished.

—Mrs. Roy Easton, reporter.

Missouri Valley, Iowa

Pastor, Charles A. Skinner

Officers for the coming year are C. A. Skinner, pastor; L. E. Meade, church school director; and Harlan Mickey, who was recently ordained a priest, Zion's League leader. Don McCurley will be in charge of all work in the lower auditorium. A profit of $650 was made at the food stand sponsored by the church at the annual county fair. Plans are being made to refinish the lower auditorium; a picture projector to be used at the evening services will also be purchased.

—Mrs. C. A. Skinner, reporter.

Flora, Illinois

Pastor, Eddie Colvin

The annual branch business meeting was held September 18; Eddie Colvin was sustained as pastor, with Elder D. H. Milner and W. W. Brown as counselors. Other officers are John Kurtz, church school director; Moyle Colvin, women's leader; Marie Henson, director of music; Clarice Fitzgerald, pianist; Noel Kurtz, young people's supervisor; Burl Luttrell, treasurer; Dorothy Milner, publicity agent; and Norma Colvin, librarian.

John Etchison was baptized Sunday, September 22, by Otto Henson; the baptismal service was held at the Poplar Creek Church. Patriarch Richard A. Baldwin, D. H. Milner, and W. W. Brown were the speakers for October. Work on the new church building began September 21 and is progressing rapidly.

—Dorothy Milner, reporter.

Elgin, Illinois

Pastor, Harry Passman

Officers elected at the annual business meeting are as follows: Harry Passman, pastor; Rufus Ottinger, church school director; Ruby Blay, secretary-treasurer and women's leader; Ruby Huette, pianist; and Blaney Blay, teacher of the adult class. District President Dwight Davis was in charge of the meeting. Recent speakers have been Harry Passman, Russell Rogers, Harley Morris, Dwight Davis, and Elder Honker. Elgin Saints miss the ministry of Russell Rogers who, with his wife, moved to Kankakee, Illinois. The women of the group are studying The Enduring Word by Christiana Salyards.

New and Good Reading!

On Being Fit To Live With

By

Harry Emerson Fosdick

These twenty-five sermons, of all those delivered by Dr. Fosdick, have a special mark upon them. They have been selected from among those heard during the two-and-one-half years which capped his active ministry.

During this period in which the world and nation alternated between hope and doubt, fear and confidence, Dr. Fosdick's sermons were steadily insisting upon and illustrating a mature, practical and triumphant religion. Only those messages which seem to speak to all time have been included.

Compensations of Stewardship

by BISHOP WALTER N. JOHNSON

Early in the new year, thousands of church members will file annual tithing statements. Some branches will have a special service at which the completed statements are handed to the representative of the Presiding Bishopric. We might well raise the question, "Why do these members go to all the trouble involved to complete these annual statements?"

Undoubtedly some members file because they believe that material blessings follow the filing of the financial statement and the payment of tithes and offerings. Some may even believe that failure to comply will bring misfortune upon them. Some members file because others in the family or branch are doing so. It is easier to conform than to be constantly reminded of one's failure to do so. Some few may file from the motive of fear. At times the text, "He that is tithed shall not be burned," has been used in a manner reminiscent of the arguments of a salesman selling fire insurance.

Many of us complete our statements because the church teaches that we should do so. The clearest expression of this church belief was given in the form of a resolution of the General Conference of 1923, "That the Order of Bishops believe it to be the duty of every member of the church to acknowledge his stewardship by complying with the law as given in the Scripture: (a) filing his inventory; (b) paying his tithes; (c) paying his surplus; (d) making his offerings; (e) and thereafter giving an account of his stewardship annually as required by the law of God."—Resolution 847.

This seems to be a good reason for filing a financial statement. As members of the church, we feel some sense of obligation to comply with its requirements in much the same manner in which we subscribe to the regulations and general ment of stewardship attitudes in the lives of its members. This has been done with the realization that stewardship begins first of all in the hearts and minds of men and women, and that individual stewards must, of necessity, be developed before the more complex group stewardship organizations can be established. In the task of developing a membership with a genuine stewardship philosophy, the church has undertaken a tremendous task, for it has to transform our worldly viewpoints concerning our talents and possessions to an attitude that is essentially Christian. Such a task is not accomplished overnight.

Stewardship is impossible without some understanding of the infinite love of God for us and for all mankind. It means conversion to the way of Christ, and acceptance of him as our Lord and Master; it means the catching of a vision of the future world for which he works. A steward is engaged in the work of his Master. Life with its opportunities and potentialities is accepted as a trust from our Heavenly Father, and it is to be aligned with his ongoing purposes as we grow in understanding of his will for us. Time, talents, and possessions become sacred in our eyes because they are the basic elements of our individual stewardship.

We accept rather naturally the idea of a stewardship of time and practices of other organizations to which we belong.

For many years our church has been engaged in its stewardship program. A very important phase of this program to which the church has set its hand with vigor and some measure of success is the develop-talent, but it is not always easy to carry the stewardship viewpoint over into the handling of our material possessions. All of us know how easy it is to wax eloquent when talking about stewardship in terms of some other person's surplus! The test comes, however, in our individual assumption of stewardship responsibilities over our own possessions. Something of the genius of the Latter Day Saint teaching concerning stewardship lies in the fact that it does not advocate some easily-achieved Utopia, or some impractical plan of sharing the wealth at the expense of one class of people, but it places stewardship responsibility squarely on every person, regardless of age, wealth, or social position.

We believe further, that material things should be used for the spiritual uplift of men and nations. Through the centuries, the misuse of the wealth of the world has so consistently brought war, suffering, and disaster on succeeding generations that many religionists and philosophers have declared that all material is essentially evil. The philosophy of stewardship says, in effect, that material things cannot be evil of themselves. When used aright, they are a source of blessing. To preach the message of stewardship, and to demonstrate its truth in the life of individuals, families,

QUESTION:

During my wartime high school years, I was convinced that I wanted to be a nurse. Now that the war is over, I'm not so sure. I think I would like taking care of patients, and I know I couldn't choose a vocation of higher social value than nursing, but I expect more than that of the work I choose. I want to do something that will assure a good living and security for the "twilight" years, and offer opportunity for professional growth along the way. If nursing can promise me these things, I'll sign up for it; if not, I'll choose some other career, because I can't afford to follow a dead-end street when it comes to a life's work. I'd like to have a clear, compact, over-all picture of the opportunities in nursing. Can someone help me?

ANSWER:

By Nelle Morgan, president of the Missouri State Nurses' Association and director of nurses for the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

In September, I attended the biennial convention of the American Nurses' Association held in Atlantic City. Approximately 5,000 nurses from all parts of the United States were there. Many held administrative positions and were the employers of nurses. They all voiced the same cry, "More Nurses!" Each day's mail brings to their desks, as it does to mine, an appeal for nurses. These requests come from hospitals, schools of nursing, industries, government institutions, and private homes. The present demand for nurses is great, and with the current social trend toward better medical and nursing care for everyone, this demand will increase.

The American Nurses' Association is concerned with meeting this demand. It realizes that the profession must be made attractive to intelligent young women, and an effort is being made to increase salaries, shorten working hours, improve personnel relations, and promote legislation which will be advantageous to the profession. Scholarships are being established for nurses who want to do graduate work, because the demand for specialists and nurses qualified to fill administrative positions is also increasing.

In October, I had the opportunity to preside at the Missouri State Nurses' Association held in St. Joseph. There I found that the nurses in the state are eager to co-operate with the national organization in any activity which will result in good for the profession and the individual nurse. You can see that professional nursing organizations not only stand behind the nurse herself, but go ahead and pave the way for her. That could hardly be labeled a vocational dead-end street.

A postcard, addressed to me at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital, Independence, Missouri, will bring you a chart which has been prepared by the Nursing Information Bureau of the American Nurses' Association in co-operation with the National League of Nursing Education and the National Organization for Public Health Nursing. This chart will show you the various nursing positions, with minimum and maximum pay for each type of work. Our nursing school catalog will be sent to you also if you wish. A February class will be organized in our nursing school if as many as ten applicants are approved. Entrance requirements are listed in the catalog.

If all questions are not answered satisfactorily in these circulars, I will be glad to hear from you personally.

and communities is a major task of our church. It is a message of which the world stands in dire need.

We are forced to the conclusion that if stewardship is to be significant as a force in the world, it must concern itself with the right uses of possessions. It cannot be meaningful until, individually, we make Christ the Lord and Master of that vast area of life which is concerned with the getting and spending of money. There is spiritual significance in the attitudes which we have toward our material wealth. Our spending of money for any purpose is of importance in the total picture of our stewardship for Christ. Nor can we avoid our stewardship of the gospel which calls us to preach the message of Christ in all the world.

What, then, is the relationship of the financial statement to the stewardship program of the church? It is an expression of our individual stewardship of possessions. It should be the "outward sign of an inward grace." The amount of money in-olved is less significant than our acknowledgment to God of our acceptance of trusteeship responsibility for these material blessings. It is a pledge that a designated portion of our wealth is to be devoted to the specific task of carrying on the work of his church. The primary purpose of the financial law is to develop character, and, when complied with in the spirit of stewardship, it is a potent factor in our spiritual and moral development.

Because the educational, administrative, and missionary work of the church is financed by the tithes and offerings of its members, the financial statement is of immediate practical value. It enables the individual to determine his annual increase and compute the tithing due. The future of the church is largely dependent on the manner in which its young people respond to this challenge. The yearly church budget must be expanded tremendously if we are to make any rapid progress, but such expansion must wait upon our fuller compliance with the financial law. When the financial law is honored, not only is the church enabled to finance its work throughout the world, but its beneficent effects are seen in the lives of the members. There are those who testify that material blessings have followed the keeping of the law. While this in itself would be an unworthy motive for keeping the law, the testimonies are too numerous to be treated lightly. It goes without questioning that many members, by keeping the law, have been blessed materially because of the abilities and skills developed in the management of individual and family finances.

The great values of the financial law, however, are always spiritual. It does something for the sense of dignity and worth of a member to know that his service goes beyond nominal attendance and participation in church activities. He cannot help but feel deep satisfaction in the thought that in his daily toil he shares in the work of God. Wherever the church functions in its pastoral, missionary, teaching, or healing ministry, the tithepayer is at work. He stands behind the missionary and makes it possible for him to devote his full time to the church. He has a stake in every missionary sermon that is preached throughout the world. The keeping of the law brings spiritual vigor in its wake. "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

The filing of a financial statement should be, and can be, an event of spiritual significance in our lives. The payment of tithing is an investment of life itself in the work of God. Many complex problems of stewardship are before us, but they shall be solved as we learn to walk in the light which we now have. The financial law provides an opportunity for every young person to develop the attitudes and practice of stewardship, and to participate in a significant way in the work of the church.

Our Departed Ones

WILLSIE.—Leo James, son of Charles and Alberta Willsie, was born February 2, 1898, at St. Thomas, Ontario, and was killed October 20, 1946, when his car was struck by a train at Strasburg, Missouri. He was married to Gladys Macauley on September 25, 1919; six children were born to this union. The family resided in Detroit, Michigan, for a number of years before moving to Missouri. Mr. Willsie was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church when a young man, and held the office of elder at the time of his death. He served as pastor of several branches throughout his life. He was employed as chief fire inspector for T.W.A. at the Fairfax airport in Kansas City, Kansas. During the First World War, he was a soldier in the British Army; he served two years as a member of the U. S. Coast Guard reserve during World War II.

He is survived by his wife, Gladys, of Pleasant Hill, Missouri; four daughters: Mrs. Harry McCallum, Strasburg; Mrs. E. Wheeler, Detroit, Michigan; Mary Lee and Betty Lou Willsie, both of the home; two sons: Leo M., a student at Graceland College; and John, of the U. S. Navy, stationed at Milton, Florida; two sisters: Mrs. Reuben Gibson, Detroit, and Mrs. Beulah Proos, Sacramento, California; and two brothers: Otto, Saskatchewan, and Mario, Dallas, Texas.

ROBERTS.—Hattie May, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. O. N. Dutton, was born May 5, 1870, at Janesville, Wisconsin, and passed away November 8 at Rest Haven Home in Beloit, Wisconsin. She was baptized June, 1887, at Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, and remained a devoted member of the Reorganized Church throughout the remainder of her life. On March 31, 1908, she was married to Herbert Roberts, who preceded her in death in April, 1936. Their one daughter, Tula May, died in infancy.

She is survived by a sister, Mrs. Ava Woldemuth of Independence, Missouri; a brother, Jasper O. Dutton of Galva, Illinois; and an adopted daughter, Mrs. Minnie Ward of West Allis, Wisconsin. Services were held at the Renning Funeral Home in Janesville, Wisconsin, Elder Robert H. Brigham officiating. Interment was in the Oak Hill Cemetery in Janesville.

HENDRICKS.—Dolly Jean, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Earl Hendricks, was born March 11, 1931, in Kent County, Michigan, and died October 12, 1946. She was crushed to death while helping harvest potatoes. She lived with her parents on a farm in Kalkaska County, Michigan, and was a devoted member of the Reorganized Church. Although she was only fifteen, she had been selected teacher of the primary class in church school a short while before her death. She was a sophomore in high school, and was a favorite of all who knew her.

She is survived by her parents; two sisters: Shirley and Doronda; and two brothers: Ival and Carl of the home; her maternal grandmother, Mrs. Laura Whittemore, and her great-grandmother, both of Grand Rapids, Michigan. Services were held at the Berg Funeral Home in Kalkaska; Elders A. R. Ellis and Glenn Wiley officiating. Students of the entire school attended as a body. Interment was in the Evergreen Cemetery in Kalkaska.

FARLEY.—James A., was born May 2, 1868, at Pelton Fell, County of Durham, England, and died November 11, 1946, in Los Angeles, California. He came as a boy with his family to the United States. On July 11, 1892, he was married to Hannah Robinson at Lucas, Iowa; six children were born to this marriage. One son, Joseph, died in April of this year. Mr. Farley was baptized into the Reorganized Church in 1892, and was ordained to the priesthood in 1919. For many years he resided in Los Angeles and was an active member of the congregation there.

He leaves his wife; two sons: James W. of Orange, California; and Wallace M. of Independence, Missouri; three daughters: Mrs. Sarah Bender and Mrs. Bessie Williams of WILLS.—Lewis George, was born June 12, 1889, in Toronto, Ontario, the son of George and Emily Hancock Wills. He died July 14, 1946, at Takoma Park, Maryland. On December 26, 1921, he was married to Edna Benedict at Crosswell, Michigan; one daughter, Dorothy Jay, was born to this union. Mr. Wills was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in 1907, and served his church as elder for over twenty years. During World War I he was with the A.E.F. in France.

He is survived by his wife and daughter; his mother; and two sisters, Mrs. C. F. Wakely of Detroit, Michigan, and Mrs. Roger Palmer of Moncton, New Brunswick. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Ray L. Hurst. Burial was in Arlington National Cemetery.

BEDFORD.—Eva Jasper, was born October 21, 1873, at Santa Ana, California, and died suddenly at home on November 13, 1946. On September 3, 1891, she was married to William A. Bedford; four sons were born to this union. She became a member of the Reorganized Church on July 29, 1894; she will be remembered for the work she did in the women's department during her life. Mrs. Bedford belonged to the American War Mother's organization, serving as president of the Loyal Chapter and a state officer. She was also a charter member and officer of the American Gold Star Mother's association. Her husband and two of her sons, Sidney and Roy, preceded her in death.

She is survived by two sons, William and Carl, and two grandchildren, of Los Angeles, California; a brother, Claude Jasper of Fallbrook, California; and four sisters: Mrs. Alma Knuckles of Pasadena, California; Mrs. Ada Pohlman, Mrs. Lulu Cokely, and Mrs. Marguerite Dye, all of Los Angeles. Funeral services were conducted by Apostle John W. Rushton and Elder G. E. Tickemyer. Interment was in the Inglewood cemetery.

WATKINS.—Edith Batten, daughter of Parley and Elizabeth Batten, was born May 4, 1889, and passed away at the home of her mother in Chariton, Iowa, on November 7, 1946. She was united in marriage to Lorenzo Watkins on July 4, 1908, at Chariton, Iowa; three children were born to this union. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since July 2, 1899.

beth Batten; a daughter, Mrs. Claud Feite of Storm Lake, Iowa; two sons, Wayne and Delbert Watkins of Chariton; two sisters: Mrs. Harvey Maxwell of Knoxville, Iowa, and Mrs. Harry Ribbing of Oak Park, Illinois; two brothers: James Batten of Moline, Illinois, and Edmund Batten of Kansas City, Kansas; and four grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Bishop Lewis E. Landsberg of Lamoni, Iowa.

DAY.—Orpha Mabel Strand, was born February 25, 1889, in Indianapolis, Indiana, and died November 9, 1946, at Centerton, Indiana, where she had resided for the past fifteen years. She was a faithful member of the Reorganized Church for many years.

She is survived by her husband, Ira B. Day; six children: Maurice E., Lois Ellen Clark, Jesse L., Ira Milburn, Paul E., and Florence B.; her mother, Mrs. Etta Strand; three sisters: Mrs. Della Hall, Marie Foor- send, and Margaret Betge; three brothers: Donald, Everett, and Aaron Strand; and three grandchildren. A Prayer

God, help me to be tolerant.

When men oppose my charted way,
Help me to hold my tongue, I pray,
—I may find they were right . . . someday.

Help me to be forgiving, too.

When I would let some grievance grow
Until it turns to hate, God, show Me where I'm wrong. I want to know.

And please, God, help me to be fair.

When prejudice or jealousy
Would warp my thinking, make me see
How very fair you've been with me.

 APPRECIATION

It was a very happy experience a few days ago to lift the phone and hear one of our contributors say to me, "Let me read you a letter I received today."

This letter was from another contributor, a very able writer. As able an author as he is, this was one of the finest, loveliest things he ever wrote. It was sincere, graciously written, strong, effective. As a result of it, those two men will always be a little closer to each other. Life will be that much richer for both of them. What a wonderful experience it was for me to be a witness of it!

These men are very different. Each can do something the other cannot do, and both recognize it. No competitive spirit exists between them. Each makes his own contribution and feels humble about it. I think that men grow in stature themselves when they appreciate each other.

Effective Monday, December 2, the Morning Devotional service on KMBC, 980 KC, will be heard at 6:30 a.m., instead of 6:45 a.m. each week-day morning, as heretofore.

The Sunday schedule of church radio programs is as follows:

- 7:45 a.m. Thoughts for the Day
- 11:00 a.m. Stone Church Choir; Sermon, Dan Sorden
- 5:00 p.m. Wayside Chapel
- 9:45 p.m. Studio Service; Sermon, Evan Fry

Appointment of Bishop's Agent, Northeast Illinois District

Notice is hereby given of the appointment of Brother Clarence M. White, 469 Grand, Aurora, Illinois, as Bishop's Agent of the Northeast Illinois District, succeeding Brother A. O. Skinner. Solicitors are hereby notified to send their reports for the month of November and each succeeding month thereafter to Brother White at the above address.

We take this opportunity of expressing our appreciation to Brother Skinner for the devoted service he has given in this office. He will continue to serve as Bishop's Agent for the Chicago District.

We have also appreciated the support given by the Saints to Brother Skinner during the period of his service and take this opportunity of commending Brother White to the Saints for their favorable consideration and support.

 PEOPLE

A man is a creature who can cook for himself if he must, but he will live longer if you don't let him do it. . . . Women are often very efficient workers and wage-earners, but they rarely really like it. . . . People could get along in peace and harmony, but they seem to prefer the occasional excitement of trouble. . . . Those who start trouble often find that it goes farther than they intended it to. . . . People are willing to wear anything, if only it is a little better than what the neighbors have. . . . Millions of generalizations like these are written about people, and you can find exceptions to all of them.

The Saints' Herald is the official publication of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, with headquarters at the Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, and is issued through the offices of Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage Street, Independence, Missouri.

Entered as second-class matter at the post office at Independence, Missouri, under Act of March 3, 1879. Issued weekly at Independence, Missouri. Price $2.25 per year and $1.15 for six months in advance in the U. S. A., its territories and possessions; Canada $2.50 per year and $1.30 for six months; other countries, $3.25 per year. Notice of a change of address must be given three weeks ahead of the date that it is to become effective. Accepted for mailing at the special rate of postage provided for in section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized July 21, 1921. Printed in the United States of America.

All checks for subscriptions to church papers, or for books and other materials sold at the Church Bookstore, should be made payable to Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

Suggestions to writers: Typewritten scripts, double-spaced, are preferred. Keep carbon copies to protect against loss. All articles and letters should be signed by writers. Please avoid use of post cards. News letters should be signed, approved by pastors, and should concern only church activities and workers. We find it necessary to edit most articles, and to condense news. No charge is made for one printing of the usual announcements of church meetings, births, marriages, and deaths; no memorial verse is used. Bulletin Board notices should be in our office at least ten days before date of publication. We cannot accept commercial or personal advertising. Articles for publication are gladly received, but there is no provision to pay for them. Those that relate to church work, doctrine, general cultural and educational subjects, personal development, etc., will be considered on basis of contents and literary merit. Writers should feel free to make independent presentations of their views, but should avoid criticism of the work of other writers appearing in these columns.

Letters: All letters and money for subscriptions and books should be addressed to Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage, Independence, Missouri. Articles and letters for publication should be sent to the same address, and marked "The Editors." Letters for all general church offices should be sent to The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Checks or Money Orders for contributions made to the General Church should be issued in the name of the Solicitor, Bishop's Agent, or Bishop in the district or stake in which the contributor lives.

If circumstances or conditions are such that it is more convenient to send contribution direct, Money Orders or checks should be issued in favor of The Presiding Bishopric, and mailed to The Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

This includes contributions for tithing, surplus, offering, oblation, Christmas offering, Auditorium, College Day, and The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

Demise of June Whiting Lea

We have stopped our presses in order that we may notify most of our readers of the death of Sister Lea, the wife of Brother Leonard Lea, our Managing Editor. She was stricken but a few days ago and was taken at once to the Independence Sanitarium where every assistance by way of medical aid and careful nursing were provided, as well as ministrations of the elders. The end came suddenly and quite unexpectedly, a severe shock to her devoted husband, her mother, sister, other relatives, church officials, and her many thousands of friends. Thus a talented companion and friend to the cause is called to her rest, and her untimely passing will be mourned throughout the church. A more complete account of her life and work will appear in a later issue of the Herald.

Funeral services were held at the Walnut Park Church at two thirty in the afternoon of Tuesday, December 10th.

people have had worse troubles, and were powerless to seek a remedy. When we complain, let us remember this.

Warnings

There have been warnings enough of troubled times to come. We have long considered the general warnings of the Scriptures, ancient and modern, and in the word of revelation. More than fourteen years ago, when the general public anticipated no such industrial disorder and international concern as we have now, President Frederick M. Smith addressed the General Conference in terms of events that are finding their fulfillment now. The Presiding Bishopric issued advice to the members of the church, which many have sought to follow, and which more should heed. We have had the series of articles by Bishop J. A. Koehler, pointing out the weaknesses of the present economic structure and the inevitable difficulties that would come; a part of them are here. Very recently we have had the two articles by John Blackmore, who has significantly pointed out the fact that events of current history contain prophecies within themselves, if we can understand them; and this should stimulate an interest in such studies, which may help to prepare us for other circumstances yet to come.

Refuge

The nation's most eminent "escapist" seems to be the statistician, Roger W. Babson, who has lately chosen a site in Kansas for a new school in which he hopes to be safe from atomic bombs in future wars. Years ago he had selected Arkansas as a proposed retreat; what caused him to change to Kansas he has not announced, so far as we know.

A great many of our people are moving inland from the coasts to

The Time of Troubles

The Russians

There is a certain period in Russian history that their writers call, quite frankly and without apology, "The Time of Troubles." It was at the beginning of the seventeenth century. Rival persons and factions contended for power, there was no leader who had the authority and ability to do what needed to be done, the peasants suffered terribly, there were disorders and insurrections, and the life of the country was disrupted. Russians do not mean that they had no troubles at other times, for everything has happened to them that could happen to any nation except that nobody has ever been able to exterminate them. They mean that this was a time that distinguished itself for trouble.

Our Time of Troubles

Will future people look back to this time in America and in the world and call it "The Time of Troubles"? Or, if our multitudes of journalistic scryers could actually see the future in the crystal ball they love so well, would they see even worse troubles to come?

Certainly this could be called a time of troubles, even for prosperous America. It is true that most of our troubles are of our own making, speaking of the nation collectively and not of individual cases. In the midst of abundant natural resources, we have shortages of supplies. With great numbers of skilled laborers, we have enforced unemployment. People are cold here in the United States, and if the present situation continues, some will be hungry. One of the worst features is that our supply of goods to the suffering people of Europe is halted; and where there were many starving and cold before, there will be more now.

While striving to do something about our trouble, we should not pity ourselves too much. We have never witnessed, we have never felt, the want and trouble that have afflicted other peoples in our own time. And when we search the pages of history, we can easily realize that, even in our present difficulties, we are among the most fortunate people of all recorded times. Our troubles are not nearly so bad as they could be, and we at least have the chance to do something about them if we will. So many other

What Happened to the Rainbow?

At the close of the war, many Americans saw a rainbow of hope that orderly production, with peace and plenty, might be realized. What has happened to that rainbow on our economic and social horizons? Too many individuals and strongly organized minority groups have about obliterated it in their mad scramble to grab for themselves the pot of gold at the foot of the rainbow, without much regard for their country and the rest of the people in their country. The rainbow does not rest on a pot of gold but on certain sterling moral qualities of our citizenship that are not enough appreciated.

At this writing the apparently badly timed and ill-advised strike of the coal miners threatens disaster to the whole country and to the people of the country, including all the workers, and may jeopardize the cause of organized labor. And labor does have a just cause. Not a spoonful of food or a shred of clothing can be produced, or a brick be laid or a wheel turned without labor.

SECURITY WITHOUT RESPONSIBILITY?

We have heard a great deal of late years about social security; security in old age or sickness or unemployment, assured by pensions, insurance, investments, and so on. Security is greatly to be desired—to alleviate misery, fear, and want. But there is something in human nature that too often craves security without responsibility and effort.

A highly placed government official not long ago said that for some years he had seldom gone through any one of many government offices in Washington without observing that too many of the employees were idling or absent. Here was a class of white-collar workers, mostly unorganized, content to feel secure as government employees without any adequate sense of responsibility to work for their government. Some of them trusted to political "pull" to protect them.

A young man of my acquaintance, employed in a large aviation concern in the middle West, recently complained that it hurt him to observe the number of his fellow workers who really are not workers. They put in time and shirk while others work. They are alert only on payday. The company for which they work fears to discharge them, lest another strike be precipitated; and they feel secure in their union membership but feel no sense of social responsibility or even responsibility to their fellow workers. They throw an added burden of work on their fellows, discredit the cause of organized labor, penalize the company, increase the cost of production and so levy tribute on the public. Reports of such conditions in many industries and localities indicate that this economic loss is no small matter. It is one thing that has dimmed the rainbow of hope.

Continuing with the liability items on our national balance sheet: some business and industrial concerns have been obsessed with a passion for quick and big profits—regardless. Men and women who have large fortunes, inherited, or easily acquired, have felt security in their wealth and have felt little or no responsibility to spend themselves and their fortunes wisely and constructively; they have lived riotously and flaunted their extravagances in the face of God and mankind at a time when much of the world is engulfed in a sad era of cold and starvation, rags and hopeless poverty.

Perhaps even below these "respectable" wantons and playboys there are the gamblers, gangsters, thieves, murderers, a great army of criminals more dangerous to our peace and security than any army of invasion that has threatened us of late years.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE BALANCE SHEET

On the other side of the national balance sheet, among our most vital assets, we have millions of men and women of a different class who do not make the headlines as often or as prominently as do the grafters and the gangsters. Men and women of the industries, the business world, government services, the professions, of various classes and ages, who have worked hard and long to keep their country running and secure while men and women of the armed forces were making the greater sacrifices required by war.

These people are loyal, temperate, industrious, frugal, honest. They are willing to work hard and economize, to build and create. They have a sense of responsibility to society that goes along with their own craving for security.

It will be well with the nation if there are enough of these sane, dependable people to solve our problems and hold in check the irresponsible individuals and groups that would tear democracy apart. Mob insanity and anarchy unchecked may bring any nation into the strait jacket of Fascism or Communism. The Book of Mormon warning that we shall remain free only if we are righteous is still pertinent and portentous. The best safeguard of social security is a sense of social responsibility which is gathered up and sanctified under the ideal of stewardships.

The Bases of

REASONABLE FAITH

By Apostle Arthur A. Oakman

INTRODUCTION

The writer is not a theologian, nor is he the son of a theologian. He does not claim any special gifts which might qualify him to be designated as a theologian. But he has a fairly good idea of what he believes and why he believes it. So far as the constitution of his mind has enabled him to analyze his experience, and assimilate the experiences of a few other people, he has come to the settled conviction that there is a God, a supreme intelligent Spirit, who is also a Person, who is immanent and also transcendent, working in and through his creation, but existing prior to and apart from it in his own self; and that there is purpose in what he has done and is doing about the creation. He believes also that God came into human life in the form of his Son Jesus Christ, who was prepared aforetime, and was the only-begotten of God, miraculously conceived in the body of Mary, was dead and buried, and, as the creed says, "rose the third day from the dead." In fact, the writer could recite the Apostles' Creed (which you will please note was used many, many years before the apostasy by our former-day brethren, and so should not be discarded by us now), with full purpose of heart. Being thus under conviction, and feeling that such conviction should answer to intelligent scrutiny, he has endeavored through the years to find reasons for his faith. So far as he has endeavored, in his limited way, he has yet to find his faith successfully assailed by the sophistry of men, or weakened by the advance of knowledge consequent upon the extended dominion achieved by men over the physical universe. The writer is not without prejudices. But not all prejudice is bad or undesirable, and so far as possible these prejudices have been subjected to the best scrutiny of which he is capable.

"This fellow is ambitious," you will say. Yes, he is. He has always cherished a desire to minister on as high a plane as he is capable of doing. He would find reasons for the hope within him, and share those reasons so far and so widely as he can. Perhaps in another thirty years, he will be able to find bigger and better reasons for believing as he does, and he is ambitious to do just this. Perhaps then, too, he will be able to write without giving so much offense.

Bishop Livingston has, in public address and in private conversation, often vigorously affirmed that our Zionite enterprise is doomed unless it stems from a sound theology. If the writer apprehends him aright, the Bishop would not have the kind of theology which is bookish, and which echoes the reasons other men and women have, and which rattles around in the mind without ever affecting the conduct of mankind. He would affirm, surely, that whatever beliefs the church has must grow out of experience with God, and be constantly refined therein. We need experience with God. But we need also, cogently and intelligently, to penetrate our experience with the light and power of reason, and use our reasons in our work as a means of bringing others to the divine throne. The writer believes that the church finds itself in a situation which requires such cogent and intelligent statement. Unless the past can be crystallized and transmitted to the future, no progress whatever is possible. These four studies look in that direction. They are not in any sense final. They are suggestive of the lines along which progress appears to be possible.

Our gospel is a gospel of a sound mind. There is more reason for believing it than for disbelieving it. Let those reasons, then, appear in this day of enlightenment. Let them multiply themselves through the efforts of good men in the church everywhere, so that the sum total of our spiritual attitude may be made articulate.

The world needs a new revelation of Christ like that which came to Joseph Smith the Martyr, and which came anciently to Paul and John and the others, to convince men that the Saviour was before all time, that he is coming again, and that he is indeed their Saviour here and their Judge hereafter. If a sound mind can aid us (as the writer believes) in gaining this vision, then pray God for strength to endure those disciplines which bring such understanding.

I. OPENMINDEDNESS

MANY OF OUR beliefs and convictions about life and religion have grown upon us. We have not thought much about them, and very often there is no order in the way they grew, nor do they have any mutual relationship. Most of them have been imbibed or soaked up as we have passed through the changing scenes of life.

Recognition of this fact should not throw us into confusion or make us discouraged. It should stimulate a careful analysis of our cherished convictions, and a determination to examine them in the light of what we know to be true, being ready as we do this to accommodate ourselves to the truth from whatsoever source it may come.

There is a disposition in our age to substitute one attractive idea for another. When we think of the various fashions of thought which have swept over us from time to time, captivating and enthralling for a brief period, and then passing into oblivion, there is quite a legitimate cause for concern as to our mental stability. Mental indecision is never openmindedness. Some great thinkers have even affirmed that the search for the truth was to be preferred to the finding of it—that "anticipation" was better than "realization." But it is the truth that will save us, and unless the search ends in the acquisition of it, it profits but little. Those who prefer looking for the truth to finding it, have a deep-seated disease of the mind.

We must divest ourselves from any passion or attitude bred of disappointment or antagonism. It is quite easy to acknowledge this must be done, but it is far more difficult to do it. It is easy to become "offended" at the church when one finds a minister in a prominent position who has a narrow outlook, or who is obscurantist in temper, or who is proud and appears to condone misconduct for a consideration, or who might "play politics." Some ridicule the church because of its supposed paucity of intellectual honesty or its narrow culture, and wish to take reprisals and attempt to do so, using their wit to destroy the faith of others less clever than they are. This attitude is not new. Bishop Butler (1692-1752) speaks of the attitude of people of fashion in his day toward the church, thus:

It is come, I know not how, to be taken for granted, by many persons, that Christianity is not so much as a subject for enquiry; but that it is, now at length, discovered to be fictitious. And accordingly they treat it as if, in the the present age, this were an agreed point among all persons of discernment; and nothing remained, but to set it up as a principal subject of mirth and ridicule, as it were by way of reprisals, for its having so long interrupted the pleasures of the world.

Some are resentful of the moral restraints which the church seeks to impose, and against which they struggle within themselves. Calm and reasonable judgment cannot be expected from those who attempt to justify themselves in wrongdoing, for they will distort the truth to salve conscience, and the inevitable result is that they create a God in their own image. They substitute argument for morality.

Openmindedness is a fruitage of honest worship. It grasps firmly with one hand that which experience has confirmed as true, veracious, and "worthy of all acceptation," while, with the other, it reaches upward for new hold on richer manifestations of the divine nature. It is a state of suspended security. It seeks ever to build "more stately mansions" for the soul. He who would know the truth cannot revel in self-pity, or resentful prejudice. Paul enunciated the great principle of openmindedness in matters of religion when he said, "He that cometh to God, must first believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Openmindedness is not empty-headedness. It is simply to be alert to the truth—as one holds fast to that which he knows and assuredly believes. It is an indispensable condition of sanity in things spiritual.

II. NECESSITY OF DECISION

There are a vast number of questions upon which it is impossible to make a decision. Theology and philosophy abound with such questions. They are material for specialists, and the most one of average intelligence can do is to read after the experts as far as he can and form his opinions as best he may. But in matters of morality we ought to have a clear faith, which rests on sane propositions about God, man, and human destiny. It is idle to assert as some do that "It doesn't matter what you believe, so long as you do unto others and practice the golden rule." When one feels called upon, as he very well may often be, to pursue a course of conduct which runs counter to the popular opinion around him, and is therefore difficult to do, he must be sustained in such endeavor by a sound theology. Moral standards that are not sustained by a clear faith about God, about man, and destiny, tend always to decline. And while there may be questions of philosophy or general knowledge about which we are not competent to form opinions, in matters of moral conduct the stern necessity of reaching reasonable decisions devolves constantly upon us.

There are, of course, the pragmatists who insist that high standards of morality are absolutely essential because they are the only workable basis on which society can exist. But the last fifty years have shown a gradual lowering of moral standards, due not to the fact that they have been found unworkable, but because the theological bases on which they rested have been dealt such devastating blows by the advance in general knowledge and the churches have been unable to reinterpret their theology. Darwin, Marx, Renan, and others have done much to destroy in the popular mind the ideas of sin and the fall of man which justified a strict moral code. After all, if sin is merely the relic of man's rise, and his further rise is inevitable, what use is there in undergoing the difficult process of restraint of natural impulse? The pragmatists fall down at this point; for what man conceives as his moral duty depends precisely upon his convictions about God and the moral order of the universe.

In making decisions in such matters, we must recognize that occasionally we may have to hold in toleration apparently conflicting views. Sometimes evidence which might enable us to compose such conflicting views is lacking, or perhaps we may need the counsel of time and experience in order to arrive at mental peace. Some questions we may outgrow. Others may require the judgment of specialists. But while such questions of philosophy or metaphysics remain unanswered so far as the plain man is concerned, in matters of moral and religious conduct he must have assurance which is constantly reinforced as he inquires about the moral nature of God and the fitness of things. There doubtless are many instances where people profess atheism or agnosticism whose lives bear no relation to their profession, and who act in life's crises as devout believers would. Here we must distinguish between a conventional profession and a practical creed. And, as we do, we see how manifestly foolish it is to assert that it doesn't matter what you believe. For a man's real creed, what he really believes about the unseen foundations of life, whether the basal assumptions upon which he acts are apparent to his intellect or not, determines the character of the man. Who can doubt that in the long reaches of history, the Jewish, Christian, Mohammedan, Buddhist, and Brahmin faiths have resulted in different types of civilizations? And what is true of groups and epochs, is true of the individual and his brief "three score and ten." Take pains then, to distinguish between a real and a conventional creed, and you will discern a man's life is based on his real creed. It is a real creed we must seek. It is about this real creed we must decide. We may entertain wrong decisions, and if we do, let us trust that, as we cultivate openmindedness, experience and growing knowledge will correct our mistakes. It is well to remember that life goes forward, and decisions, practical judgments, have continuously to be made. It is not permitted that any of us escape.

III. MANIFOLD GROUNDS OF CERTAINTY—ART, MYSTICISM AND REALITY

The soul has other windows than thought or reason through which man may view the universe and experience reality. Consider the great artists. Consider Beethoven:

William de Morgan describes in a wonderful passage the effect of a sonata of Beethoven on a man without special musical gifts or knowledge in an hour of desolation and despair. It reasoned with him, after its manner. It conveyed to him reassurance which nothing else could convey. "I have ever since regarded the latter [Beethoven] as not so much a Composer as a Revelation. How often have I said to myself after some perfectly convincing phrase of Beethoven, Of course, if that is so, there can be no occasion to worry. It could not be translated, of course, into vulgar grammar or syntax; but it left no doubt on the point, for all that." Those who have any appreciation of music, however deficient in musical science, must feel after long listening to Beethoven what this means. He conveys to us a temper of mind, almost a philosophy—though not such as can be made directly articulate in intellectual propositions. It is by feeling or intuition that this supreme artist gains his profound vision of experience and of God. But it seems to me quite impossible to deny that it is insight into reality, the sort of insight which at bottom involves a philosophy of rational meaning or purpose in the universe. "The rest may reason and welcome: 'tis we musicians know."—Gore.

Of his own music, Beethoven is reported to have said:

I must despise the world which does not know that music is a higher revelation than all wisdom and philosophy, the wine which inspires one to new generative processes. . . . Well I know that God is nearer to me than to other artists; I associate with him without fear: I have always recognized and understood him—and have no fear for my music—it can meet no evil fate. Those who understand it must be freed by it from all the miseries which others drag about with themselves.

Beethoven does not communicate to us his mind-content or his life history. He communicates to us the spiritual states based upon them so that, as Sullivan says, "we may share with him that unearthly state where the struggle ends and the pain dissolves away." We need know but very little of the struggle, and we do not have to experience his pain. Yet we can share the fruits of his victory over them. His universe is richer, better, and in some ways far more terrible than ours. But as we listen to his music, we feel kinship because his attitudes are prophecies of our own peace and triumph. Greater consciousness he undoubtedly had of certain aspects of our life which we but dimly perceive, and this greater understanding blesses us as we are joined to him through his art.

Art communicates to us states of consciousness and attitudes consequent upon the perceptions of the artist, and the greatest art is that which has the power to make us feel that these attitudes are valid and are part of the warp and woof of life itself. We need not dismiss these feelings or states of consciousness nor need we belittle the processes by which they are conveyed to us. They are real. Experience is reality as felt.

The Abolition of Man is the arresting title of a little tract written and published in England recently by C. S. Lewis of "Screwtape" fame. The tract was occasioned by the following passage which appeared in a textbook on English:

When the man said "That is sublime," he appeared to be making a remark about the waterfall. . . . Actually . . . he was not making a remark about the waterfall, but a remark about his own feelings. What he was saying was really "I have feelings associated in my mind with the word 'sublime,' or shortly, "I have sublime feelings." This confusion is continually present in language as we use it: We appear to be saying something very important about something; and actually we are only saying something about our own feelings.

Mr. Lewis rightfully rejects the implications here, namely, that beauty is only a figment of human imagination and that actual reality has no intrinsic, spiritual values. Science gives us knowledge of structure, but not of substance, or the spiritual world of values. There is no doubt but what excessive pre-occupation with intellectual pursuits tends to one-sided development, and we must guard against it by recognizing that structure is the vehicle of value and that exclusive preoccupation with structure tends to that intellectualism which as von Hugel says, "seems habitually, instinctively to labor at depersonalizing all it touches."

What is true of the artist and of the sense of beauty generally, namely that they have access to reality and can tell us the truth about the universe as well as the scientist and the scientific attitude, is true also of the poet, the prophet, and the mystic. These men experience reality as well. We must, of course, guard against delusive imagination and false "hunches" of good men, and in stating this we are trying to accommodate the intellectuals who inherently mistrust mysticism. Many gross errors have arisen and, in the name of religion, have been fostered and taught, simply because someone "felt" strongly about something that was not true. In our church, for example, we occasionally run into "false prophecy and spiritual gifts." Against them we must carefully guard ourselves, and do so by certain basic criteria, two of which are here presented: (1) Spiritual insight of poet or mystic should, if valid, commend itself over a long period of time to a wide range of humanity and show itself capable of conveying new power to mankind. Judged by this standard, the prophets of Israel, the poets, and musicians of quality may be accepted, and their work commended as conveying truth. (2) The intuitions of mystics should be accepted only when, as they are restated in propositions upon which reason may be founded, they are seen to be not out of harmony with all that, by other faculties, men have discovered about the universe.

We should not be hasty, however, even in our judgment in these matters. Sir William Bragg said:

We are obliged to use each theory as occasion demands and wait for further knowledge as to how it may be possible that both should be true at the same time. Toleration of opinion is a recognized virtue. The curiosity of the present situation is that opposite opinions have to be held or used by the same individual in the faith that someday the combined truth may be made plain.

His attitude is necessary even in the limited field of science. How much more will such suspension of judgment be required when we address ourselves to the whole range of human insight and knowledge?

We should not, of course, remain forever in suspense. But we must recognize that "if we want to reach the whole truth, so far as we can, concerning the world we live in, we must trust the whole of our faculties—nor our powers of abstract reasoning only, or only our powers of scientific discovery higher or lower, but also the more emotional and active powers of our nature—its capacities for intuition and feeling and willing."—Gore.

Man lives first, and thinks afterwards. Not only as an infant does he breathe and take nourishment and grow, long before the dawn of conscious reason; but his reason, even when developed, can only act upon experience, that is upon something which has already been lived through. He makes history by his action, before he can reflect upon it and write it. He takes notice of the facts of nature before he can compare and criticize and shape them into science; while history and science in their turn supply material for further thinking, and are examined and sifted and generalized and gathered up into philosophy. And though, of course, reason has an eye to the future, and works with the view of preparing for fresh developments of life, its foresight must spring from insight; it can only predict what is to come by discovering the law of the phenomena, the formula of the curve, the lie of the strata in the past. It follows from this that thought is always in arrear of life; for life is in perpetual progress, and, while we are reflecting on what happened yesterday, some further thing is happening to-day. "When philosophy," says Hegel, with a touch of sadness—"when philosophy paints its grey in grey, some one shape of life has meanwhile grown old: and grey in grey, though it brings it into knowledge, cannot make it young again. The owl of Minerva does not start upon its flight until the evening twilight has begun to fall." Consequently no system of philosophy, no intellectual explanation of things, can ever become adequate or final. Reason is incessantly at work, to render more and more explicit the implicit principles, or principles which are implied in life; but there is always an unexplained residuum, an unfathomed abyss in the background, from which new and unforeseen developments may at any moment, and do from time to time, arise.—J. R. Illingworth.

Thus we must recognize that Christian theory arose, like all other human thought in meditation upon the facts of experience. Those facts are the life, death, resurrection, and teaching of Jesus Christ.

So, also, any thought we may develop must have some ground in our own experience. We may, vicariously, identify ourselves with the experience of others, and sympathetic imagination should play a large part in our system. Thus we may carry forward the spiritual gains of those who have preceded us. But no man can be a true theologian if he is a wicked man. "Light and truth forsaketh that evil one." It is in the very nature of truth that it is conveyed to us only as we do rightly. All we ever really have, is what we do. "Truth is not a theory, or philosophy might find it. Truth is not a formula—or science might discover it." Truth is a life, which only life can know. Truth is a spirit that is apprehended as it appeals to our whole nature, goes to the very center of our being, and as we respond to what it demands of us.

I know that God must be
By all that he demands of me.

IV. THEOLOGY AND RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE

Theology, in its comprehensive sense is that science which treats of the attributes and character of the Deity, and of his relation to nature and to man. It is concerned in a philosophical way with any explanation of the universe which deals in terms of the supreme mind or spirit.

It includes a study of epistemology, that is, a study of the grounds and limits of knowledge and valid inference in such matters.

It must address itself to a study of religions comparatively.

It deals specifically with the psychology of religious experience.

Christian theology, with which we are more directly concerned, deals specifically with the contents and with the implications of the revelation given in Jesus Christ: a study of Christian literature; a knowledge of church history together with the creeds, sacraments, ministries, and institutions of the church.

It is held by many, among whom are a large number of eminent theologians, that religious experience is unique; and that it contains information other than that to be obtained by the natural senses; that man possesses a unique faculty which enables him to arrive at knowledge about the universe and about ultimate reality unattainable in any other way. The natural sciences are based upon observation, classification, and generalization of phenomena in the outer world which comes to man through the gateway of the physical senses. Many theologians claim, however, that other information as legitimate as the scientific, may be derived from the universe from unique emotional states and dispositions of the human spirit; and that this unique information contains propositions for the intellect and supplies philosophy with data which cannot be apprehended alone by the five senses.

According to the first view, that is, that the only valid knowledge comes through the senses, the only true inferences about God and immortality and therefore the only valid theology is to be derived from and mediated through a study of the natural world and through history and the ideas which have possessed mankind. It will be seen, then, that the prejudices which rule the investigator will interpret his information. If, for example, his belief in the reign of law is such as to prevent his believing in miracles, he will read the New Testament, as many have done, with an entirely different bent than one not so prejudiced.

According to the latter view, extra-sensory experience may, at any time, break through the physical senses and present unique information about reality which will radically alter the interpretation of life and of mind.

We must, therefore, hold fast to the doctrine of the manifold grounds of certainty, and trust all our faculties as has previously been pointed out. Based upon Christian experience the injunction has come to us, "Come, let us reason together." Let us then, reason with our whole man, seeking knowledge by study, also by faith.

V. THE DEFINITION OF TERMS

"If you wish to converse with me," said Voltaire to a friend, "you must define your terms." Wise counsel from a wise man. When one undertakes to study in any branch of knowledge, he has to learn to talk a new language. Not only do new words have to be mastered, words peculiar to the particular aspect of science or philosophy he wishes to place under review, but very often he finds old words infused with new meanings, and these new meanings have also to be understood. Every field of study and investigation has its own special terminology. And theology is no exception. It has a language all its own, a language born of experience with religious truth and spiritual reality. We must learn this language and define our terms, as Voltaire said of philosophy, if we wish to converse together.

In this first study, we have prepared a glossary of terms with their meanings briefly (very briefly) indicated. Fuller exposition of these may appear in the body of the text as the words are used to express the point of view to which they relate. But they should be met and recognized now, and then their character will be appreciated more fully later.

Man has no celestial language. He has had far too little celestial experience from which a celestial language could stem. Some things "are not lawful to be uttered" because the attempt to communicate them would render them liable to misinterpretation; and their beauty would be sullied by very fact of attempting to convey them in a language which itself is soiled by sin. But the things of the Spirit can be understood by the Spirit; and if the Spirit be present in our study, then our sordid vehicle of expression may be cleansed and to some extent redeemed.

GLOSSARY OF TERMS

THEOLOGY:

The study of the Gods.—W. Durant.

The science of God or of religion. The science which treats of the existence, character, and attributes of God, and of his laws and government. Divinity. The knowledge derivable from the Scriptures, the systematic exhibition of revealed truth, the science of Christian faith and life.

"Many speak of theology as a science of religion (instead of the science of God) because they disbelieve there is any knowledge of God to be attained."—Prof. R. Flint, Encyclopedia Britannica.

ATHEISM:

Disbelief in, or the denial of the existence of God or of a supreme intelligent Being.

An atheist was formerly denied the right to a seat in the House of Commons in England, and could not qualify as a witness.

THEISM:

Belief in the existence of a God or gods, as:

- a. Belief that there is but one God—monotheism.
- b. Belief in superhuman powers or spiritual agencies in one or many gods.
- c. More exactly, belief in the existence of one God, transcending the universe in his personality, yet immanent in it in his knowledge and action.

In all sense "Theism" is opposed to "Atheism."

AGNOSTICISM:

- A. "I invented the title of 'Agnostic,' it came into my head as suggestively antithetic to the 'gnostic' of church history who professed to know so very much."—Thomas Huxley.

The doctrine of agnosticism is that "neither the nature nor the existence of God, nor the ultimate character of the universe is knowable," was also formulated by Huxley to distinguish his position from Atheism which positively rejects God's existence.

Atheism says, "There is no God."

Agnosticism says, "There may be a God, but he is not knowable."

- B. Any doctrine which may affirm God's existence but denies to a greater or less extent the knowableness of his nature.

1. Mansel said, "Man is compelled to a belief in God's infinite being, though he is unable to comprehend it."

2. Spencer affirmed the existence of a great Unknowable.

POLYTHEISM:

The doctrine of, or belief in, a plurality of gods.

DUALISM:

The doctrine that the universe is under the domination of two opposing principles, one good and the other evil. Zoroastrianism is the typical dualism.

The view of men as constituted of two original and independent elements, i. e., matter and spirit.

In philosophy it is used to express any theory which considers the ultimate nature of the universe to be twofold and constituted by two mutual irreducible elements, such as thought and matter.

EMPIRICISM, EMPIRICAL:

Pertaining to or founded upon experiment and experience, depending upon the observation of phenomena. Depending on observation and experiment alone without any regard to theory.

(i. e., medicine by practice alone—trial and error—without any reference to science or theory. A "quack" is an empiricist.)

"In philosophical language the term 'empirical' means simply what belongs to experiment or observation."—Sir W. Hamilton.

METAPHYSICS:

"Beyond Physics," i. e., having to do with the nature of being—the supersensible or that which is beyond the five senses. The primary meaning is derived from Aristotle's discussions on the nature of being or God, on the cause and genesis. Bacon defined it as the quest or study of formal or final causes, contrasting it with natural science.

"Metaphysics is that fertile field of delusion propagated by language."—John Stuart Mill.

"The science conversant about all such inferences of unknown being from its known manifestations is metaphysics."—Sir W. Hamilton.

EVOLUTION:

A thing or series of things evolved—as the flower is the evolution of the bud. An unfolding.

In biology, however, the field in which the term is used in relation to theology, it refers to race and species as well as to individual. It means in its broadest sense the process by which the higher forms of life came from the lower—the complex from the simple. Many types of animals and plants have had their origin in pre-existent types. Paleontology (study of fossil remains) has lent color to the theory.

The theory of evolution presupposes the descent of man from some pre-existent type; but the popular idea that man, at some time in the remote past came from some existent form of anthropoid ape is completely erroneous.

NATURAL SELECTION:

The natural process tending to cause the survival of the fittest. (i. e., survival of those forms of animals and plants best adjusted to conditions under which they live.) It tends to the extinction of poorly adapted forms. Process is dependent upon the variability in individual characters. If the individual possesses peculiarities which are advantageous, the chances for long and healthy life for that individual, and hence for the reproduction of advantageous peculiarities through heredity, are greater than if the peculiarity is a disadvantageous one. In succeeding generations the modification may proceed further, gradually resulting in great changes in structure—and if the environment gradually changes, races of organisms adapted to new conditions may result.

Darwin considered natural selection the most important factor in organic evolution.

Later biologists do not attach so great importance to it.

EPISTEMOLOGY:

Epistemology is a study of the bases of knowledge. An analysis of knowledge.

What We Can Do

While church officers are wrestling with the many problems before the church, and while the members are trying to help (or interfere, as the case may be), what is there for church people to do? At the present time, while the veterans' training program is in effect, there is a great opportunity for young people to pursue studies that will qualify them to help. Every field of educational endeavor yields something that contributes to human welfare. The social sciences are particularly important: history, sociology, economics. The sciences must be included. Business and commerce are basic in our plans, too. Cultural knowledge has its place. If every member of the church will advance his own education wherever it is possible (and this means right up into the later years of life), or help some young person or encourage him to seek better training, we can have the personnel we need for any kind of joint and co-operative effort the church may call us to participate in. Danger and opportunity alike urge us to make the best use of our time while we have it.

What is morally wrong is socially dangerous.

The Will of God

By Leslie D. Weatherhead

In this small book there is straight thinking about God's part in personal loss and world disaster—the basis for a firm faith in divine power and love. Here is a message to give the sorrowing an abiding comfort, the despairing a renewed courage, and the doubting a stronger faith. 75c reach central areas of the country for their location; many have moved to Independence and adjacent areas.

Yet we must have something more to come to than a place. What makes any area good or bad for human life consists as much (or more) in its social and economic organization and institutions than in its physical environment. What else could account for the vast differences that exist in a few hundred yards across national boundaries?

Basic principles of organization have been given to us. Application of the principles to situations and institutions are being studied and planned, resources are being gathered for various projects. More of the membership should strengthen themselves economically, complying with the financial law of the church, to enable us to make the progress we should when the time for definite action arrives.

THE INSTITUTION DESIGN of the Modern Prophet

By J. A. Koehler

Number 15 in a series of radio addresses on the subject:
"The Social Philosophy of the Modern Prophet"

AS I RECOLLECT, it was Mark Twain who said, "Everyone talks about the weather, but no one does anything about it." Of course no one can do anything about the weather of which he spoke. But there is a weather of our own making—a social, moral, or spiritual weather—about which someone (some people, rather) could do something more than to temper its wintry blasts to "shorn lambs." Some people could do it, that is, if it had the spirit of good social weather and if it had an effectual way of controlling the forces that make weather good.

Even the Christian world has been having bad social weather for ever so long. The church said it had the spirit of good weather and that it knew what to do about it. But if we are to judge by the harvests which Christian nations are now reaping, what the church knew amounted to little more than nothing. For, as a rule, from beginning to end, Christendom's social weather has been cyclonic. During the last few decades, there has been a veritable avalanche of social-world tornadoes. And in their wake, we see ruins of what we had supposed were "Christian" social institutions.

The social weather of the Christian world has been so bad that the church has made some admissions. In 1927, in London, England, a bishop of the Anglican Church said that, in part, "The cause of this disappointment [in the social weather conditions of the Christian world] is to be found in the vagueness of our ideas and in the consequent uncertainty as to our methods [of dealing with social weather conditions] and our objectives."

"We are embarrassed," said that bishop, "by the uncertainty as to what the principles of Christ, such as admit of being applied to society, really were and are."

In other words, Christian church leadership neither knew what to do to improve the bad weather conditions of Christendom, nor did it know how to do it. It did not have a clear vision of the shape of social things to come. Some church leaderships were sure that society needed to be reconstructed, but they had no plans and specifications of The New Christian Community, no adequate social institutional design.

If the church had had an adequate institutional design it could have revealed it to the people who would long since have implemented it, if (and don't overlook that "if") that people had had the spirit of that enterprise. But the leadership of the church, its class of ecclesiastical impressarios, was unable to train men's voices (so to speak) for participation in that social symphony, The New Christian Community, which Restoration calls "Zion," because that leadership itself had not mastered the score of that symphony. It did not have a vision of the shape of things to come. It was uncertain (as it still is) as to what "the principles of Christ, such as admit of being applied to society, really were and are." It had no adequate institutional design; no institution-building plans.

ONE OF THE greatest French historians, M. Guizot, said that two accomplishments are requisite to the realization of what Christianity calls "the Kingdom of God." Call that Kingdom "Zion," or The New Christian Community or whatever you wish. He said (1) that personality must be improved or "ameliorated," and (2) that the laws, institutions, and customs of peoples, that society itself, must be improved.

M. Guizot said what religious teachers—educators, supposedly—belatedly are coming to sense; which is that these two improvements must go on together. He said that it is quite as necessary to improve society, if personality is to be improved, as it is to improve personality, if society is to be improved.

The Christian church undertook to improve personality, because it believed it knew what the principles of Christ are, such as admit of being applied to persons. It harped eternally (as some of its educators still do) on the righteousness and unrighteousness of this and that personal affair. But when it faced the problem of conforming the whole family of social institutions, the community, the government of industry and all, to the will of God, its hands fell down by its side in despair, and it gave up the task of real Kingdom-building—which is institution-building—with a facility which was equaled only by its impatience to attain its social objects.

You have seen people who did not know what they were about try to erect buildings only to see them fall to the ground. Those people built on sandy foundations. They neither understood constructional principles, nor did they know how to apply them. They could make no real headway in the work they had elected to do.

KINGDOM-BUILDING, Zion-redeeming social reconstruction, call it whatever you will, until very recent years, was like that. Perhaps you may say it is still like that. But that is the reason the modern prophet arrived, little more than a century ago, with his institutional design; with his plans and specifications of "The City," the "Kingdom," the "Zion" of latter day. That is the reason the prophet said that if The New Christian Community is to be built at all, it must be done according to prophetic plans and specifications. And that is the reason the peoples of the Church should heed that prophetic voice.

I shall try to unfold the institutional design of the modern prophet in this group of talks. And as I do so, anyone may see that that prophet did not hope to build "The City," the new community, the Kingdom of God, simply by polishing stones for that temple. His design was not simply a log-cutting and a timber-seasoning design. He did not hope to get the Kingdom built, he did not hope to redeem Zion, by gathering material from here and there and piling it up at convenient places. He did not hope to perform that social symphony by crowding people into a choir loft. His institutional design was an organizing design; not a business-organizing design; but a society-building design.

I can hardly get the consent of my own heart to try to represent that institutional design—which is a social philosophy implementing design—piecemeal or fragmentarily. But that seems to be the only possibility in the circumstances; so I recite a few passages from that social philosophy.

IN 1832, the modern prophet said "There must be an organization of my people . . . [a communal organization] to advance the cause which ye have espoused"; which is the cause of social righteousness, and particularly economic righteousness.

The year before, the prophet had made it clear that that was the essence of his institutional design. His communication of May, 1831, (which is section 51 of our book of Doctrine and Covenants) is a rough outline, but a clear or intelligible outline, of the system of economic principles in which The New Community is to be grounded. It is a rough outline of an economy, a system of administration of the economic affairs of "a people." It is a revelation of his institutional design. It is a witness that the modern prophet knew something of the score of the new social symphony, or of the shape of society to come. Always he tried to drive home the truth that there must be "an organization of my people" to advance the cause of Zion, or to establish the business of the Kingdom.

In the communications which followed, he elaborated upon his institutional design. He said, for instance, that in The New Society "you are to have equal claims upon the properties (of the people, or of the community) for the benefit of managing the concerns of your stewardships."

As the need for adventure in Christian community-building became greater, the prophet revealed more and more of the particulars of his institutional design. He said, for instance, that "all moneys that you receive in your stewardships, by improving upon the properties [entrusted to individuals for management] . . . shall be cast into the treasury [of the community] as fast as you receive them." He knew what the causes of Christendom's social tornadoes are—one feature of which is the present epidemic of strikes—and he planned to uproot them. So runs the message of the modern prophet.

In later articles I shall call attention to the bearings of this institutional design upon the present strike situation, for instance. I will try to complete the picture of the modern prophet's institution design.

That institutional design is not a church-building design, in the common acceptance of that term, even though it involves church-building.

It is not what sociologists call an "associational" institutional design. It is not a Consumers' Co-operative design, for example, even though Consumers' Co-operatives, in some cases, may serve to further that design. Of that I am not certain. What I am certain of is that the modern prophet's institutional design is a "community building" design. It is concerned with the total living-together situation. It is a design of an outright adventure in rightly constituted economic society.

With that explanation, it should be easy to understand why I represent the social philosophy of the modern prophet. For no people that does not have a philosophy of social life is competent to promote that institutional design.

Religious Education Advances in the Australasian Mission

THE following paragraphs are quoted from a letter addressed to the General Department of Religious Education, by Allen S. Frater, director of Religious Education, of the Australasian Mission.

This letter while somewhat informal and personal, contains an unusually splendid summary of the emphases and progress of religious education in that mission.

In one of the unquoted paragraphs of his letter Brother Frater says "I realize that in many things this mission is far behind the general church and the religious education program as developed in the U.S.A." He also reminds us that many times we have neglected or overlooked the interests of his mission in the preparation and distribution of materials, etc.

About all we can say to Brother Frater and his associates is this; "Don't be too sure that you are behind or out of step in the work of religious education. Indeed your emphases are timely and your progress most commendable."

The reader should note especially:

1. The clear recognition, in the administrative setup of this mission, of the work of religious education as an integral part of the total church program.
2. The systematic promotion of religious education at reunions, conventions, and the like.
3. The clear-cut emphases upon the "place of the child in totality of church work."
4. Long-time program of teacher training.
5. The co-operation between the several departments and especially between church school and the home.
6. Methods used in promoting the entire program of religious education throughout the entire mission.

(We have frequently received samples of attractive mimeographed leaflets representing many of the important areas of the work of religious education.)

Most certainly this report should spur us all to greater activity in these matters. This should include more long-time planning, more creative leadership and more sharing of helps with our co-workers in distant missions. We congratulate Brother Frater and his associates on their good work, and hereby resolve, without waiting for the new year, to do a better job of co-operating with him in our mutual tasks.

—F. M. McDOWELL.

It is quite a long time since I last wrote to you and gave you a report on the work of Religious Education in the Australasian Mission. During the past year, not as much has been accomplished as I would have liked, but stress of other duties has limited my personal activities, such limitation being reflected to some degree throughout the mission. As you are probably aware, I had to share my work in this department with the management of the Board of Publication's Publicity Department, managing editor of The Standard, mission statistician, and such like, with the result that Religious Education often had to give way to other pressing needs.

However, following my appointment, at the recent General Conference, to full-time missionary activity, I feel sure that this department, so vital in the life of the church, will receive much greater emphasis. In spite of my regrets at past inactivities, there have been some accomplishments that are worth-while. The first has been to develop a greater appreciation for the place of children in the totality of church work, breaking through an unconscious but none-the-less very evident adult-mindedness. At reunions and conferences especially has my new emphasis borne best results. In the past, beyond a church school session (often with adult emphasis) no provision was made at district gatherings for children. Now, the opposite is the rule, with proper care for little ones, and expressional activities for primaries and juniors as a definite part of all such gatherings.

At Tiona, our mission reunion, a definite move towards more adequate care of children over the past two years has resulted in a system, which, I hope, will never be taken from future gatherings there. I will make a special report to you of our junior church program at Tiona last year.

The question of teacher-training is also one phase that has received considerable emphases. In addition to my own series of lectures in this field, and the publication of my brochure "Teachers and Their Training" about two years ago, several centers have conducted special classes, and there is evidence that the standard of our teaching will improve. There is, however, another aspect of the question that I have been stressing—we should not only have a higher standard of ability among our teachers, but our parents (and in fact the church as a whole) should expect such higher standard. Over the years there has developed the policy that "just anything will do," . . . and the breaking down of such a defeatist attitude is one of our major problems. Church school teaching has been the 'ugly duckling' of our lives that demands efficiency, ability, and authority in every other walk of life, from the breeding of stud sheep to the raising of roses.

To foster a closer co-operation between the church school and the other departments of the church, including the home, I have arranged an exhibit of church school materials. It has already been on display in two centers—Euroa, Victoria; and in Adelaide, South Australia—and the response and interest shown in the exhibit have been very gratifying. I have incorporated several sections—books, which include quarterlies, and their associated leaflets, workbooks, etc., textbooks, and references of all sorts, church published and otherwise; charts; pictures; maps, bought and student-made, pictorial, and cartographic as well as the ordinary type; models; many types of handwork; and teaching aids of all sorts. In association with the display, I distributed a leaflet "Do not Angle for Success . . ." a copy of which is enclosed for your information.

I have just completed a month's mission in Adelaide, South Australia, where my whole emphasis was on the relationship between the church school and other departments. I spoke to the women's circle, the young married group, and both junior and senior Zion's League on this aspect, and, in my home-visiting, I stressed the need for co-operation. The attached pamphlets on Our Christian

Home and The Home and the Church School were compiled to help me in this phase of my work. I have made a start on several other similar leaflets.

During my ministry in Adelaide, I gave foundation lectures on teacher-training, and I am sure that the leaders and all interested will continue in study of this vital phase of our work. As a culmination of my ministry, a teachers' dedication service was held (program attached), the fine spiritual tone of this service being a fitting climax to my ministry there.

Gives to Graceland

Biloine Whiting's challenge, "Are we getting soft?" in the issue of the 16th, just won't be dismissed from my mind.

I gave two dollars toward the memorial building at Graceland on College Day, so enclosed is my check for $8.00 to make the ten dollars that our sister suggests that 6000 Saints should give to make this building a reality.

Frankly, the sacrifice attached to a $10.00 contribution is very small compared with the sacrifices of my fathers in the early days of our faith.

A Conversion

For a long time I prayed that my husband would come to appreciate the gospel message as I did, and understand why I liked to go to church. It was not until our son was getting ready to go overseas, however, that I received any encouragement as an answer to my prayers. Just before our son left for camp, after spending his last furlough at home, my husband asked the boys to kneel while I offered a prayer. After that he used to ask me to pray before we went to bed at night. Last October, when he came home from the hospital, following an operation, he read The Call at Evening, The Solid Rock, In His Steps, Joseph's City Beautiful, and other church literature. On the last day of September this year he said, "I am going to be baptized."

God has many ways of accomplishing his purposes. Early this fall I broke my arm. After wearing a cast for three weeks, I noticed that the pain became steadily greater, so I went back to the hospital for an X ray. The doctor said that the bones had slipped out of place, and it would be necessary to rebreak it. My arm is still in a cast, and I am not able to do many of the things I formerly did. I now have time to read the Herald. I want to thank the friends who have remembered me with cards and personal messages. I won't be able to answer them all, as writing is very difficult for me. May God bless all is my prayer.

Grateful for Prayers and Letters

I should like to inform my many church friends of the outcome of my recent illness. I entered the hospital for observation on October 2; after three operations, I was permitted to return home on November 24. While I had the best surgical skill obtainable, my recovery was uncertain. During the darkest days, it was the prayers of the Saints and administration that gave me strength and hope. The scores of letters and cards meant much to me too. For these things I am deeply grateful.

I am still very weak, and it may be several months before I can again resume my usual activities. The Lord has seen fit to spare my life, and, if I am permitted to recover fully, I hope to be able to again make a contribution to his work. I have tried, in the forty-four years of my ministry, to be a good servant, and I shall continue to do my best.

A Divine Warning

Today I was impressed to write a letter to the Herald. I have been helped many times by the testimonies of others, and I write this in hopes someone may profit by reading it.

I have been a member of the Reorganized Church for twenty-four years. Since I seldom have the opportunity of attending church, I read as much as I can. The truth of the Book of Mormon was revealed to me while I was reading it, and God has permitted me to receive other spiritual blessings.

Several years ago my husband built a storm cellar. It seemed to be a very safe one, and we were proud of it. One night, however, I dreamt that a log in the center had weakened so that it would be a hazard if a severe storm should occur. I told my husband about it the following morning, but he thought little of it. I resolved never to enter it again. The very next night a storm came, but no one suggested that we go to the cellar. In the morning I saw that my dream had been a warning. The log in the center was broken, and the ends were resting on the seat where I would have sat had we gone to the cellar. Mud and water filled the dugout, and I'm sure we would have been killed if we had taken refuge there.

God has been very good to me. Sometimes it seems I have more than my share of sorrows, but he is my unailing source of comfort. Recently I was on the verge of a nervous breakdown, but after praying one morning, I felt God's Spirit resting upon me, and the words of the song "Blessed Assurance" came to me. I began singing, and soon experienced a joy such as I had never known before. Truly God hears and answers prayers.

From a Herald Reader

I would not want to miss a single copy of the Herald; I enjoy each page. The letters and testimonies mean much to me, as I am an isolated member and seldom see another of my faith. Many times the letters are by someone I've met.

I am thankful to my Heavenly Father for the blessings of this gospel. May we soon put on the whole armor of God, that our spirits may be quickened, and we can show the world what He will do for his people. My prayer is that He will bless and comfort the sick and lonely, and guide each of us by his holy spirit.

News of Belleview Saints

The Belleview Saints are again holding church and church school after three months of inactivity. Heman Cooker, pastor of the Pensacola congregation, is in charge. They had an outstanding Communion service on November 3 with A. D. McCall, C. C. Rummul, and G. Barnes in charge. They ask an interest in the prayers of other Saints that they may grow in faith and be pleasing in the sight of the Lord.

Information Wanted

Will pastors or other Saints in Arizona please communicate with the undersigned in regard to location of doctors, clinics, and hospitals? We are moving there early in December because of child having asthma, respiratory and rheumatic infection. Husband has machine shop experience, also farm experience. Any information on employment possibilities greatly appreciated.

Hopes to Visit Independence

I am still enjoying life at the age of seventy-nine, and am trying to keep God's commandments. I have the Saints' Herald and the Three Standard Books of the church here on the table; they all teach that the important thing is to be doers of the word, not hearers only. It has been my experience that the nearer we live to God's teachings, the greater peace of mind and contentment we shall have. I am many miles from any branch of our church, but I someday hope to visit Independence. If it is God's will, I shall.

Do You Teach Young Adults?

By Lydia Wight

We quote: "Church schools are asking, 'What lack we yet? We have kept the laws. We have gone through the routines since our infancy; we have opened our doors every Sunday on the hour. We have sung and prayed; we have passed out quarterlies. We have asked and answered questions (sometimes to be quite sure we have left nothing out, we have even read the text in class); we have taken up collections for the school and once a year for the missions. What lack we yet? . . . authors, editors, and religious education officials are leading the way toward an action program."

Does this strike a responsive chord in your hearts, teachers of adults and young adults? Do you stop to think whether the church school class study changes the lives of your pupils? Why not read on? The stimulating article from which we quote the above words appears in the January issue of the leaders' magazine, GUIDE-LINES TO LEADERSHIP. It is entitled "More Effective Religious Education For Young Adults and Adults" by Olive Mortimore, church school director of Lamoni, Iowa.

Place your subscription NOW for this magazine needed by all workers in the church school, then you will not miss the January issue.

(One dollar per year. Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.)

Life tests your character in many ways, some of them unexpected. It is hard to be strong, wise, restrained, unselfish, and kind at all times. But it is a Christian duty to try.

The Church and Home Together

I BELIEVE IN THE CHURCH

An article from the creed of a Christian educator

I Believe in the Church.

The church has been my spiritual home.

I have memorized its Scriptures.

Its hymns have nourished me in defeat and fortified me in temptation.

Its history has thrilled me as I have followed its fortunes down the centuries.

Its persistence and its power, in spite of so much folly and wrong in its human leadership, make me believe that God believes in it, too, and has yet some great work for it in the world.

I know well the mistakes and weaknesses of the church. I am saddened by its pursuit of foolish whims, distressed by its fatal divisions, discouraged by its absorption in materialistic ideals that it is set to oppose.

But, also I know well the latent idealism of its members.

I am aware of the vision and courage of its wisest leadership.

I am conscious of its unused powers of costly plants and working membership and growing persons.

I see what it can become in transforming the world if it ceases to serve itself and once becomes enamored of its power as a servant of human good.

I Believe in the Church.

I BELIEVE IN THE HOME

An article from the creed of a Christian educator

I Believe in the Home.

I looked into the Past, and saw the crude beginning of the Home.

I saw it being nurtured in struggle, surviving through social change, maintaining its inner spirit and its essential ministry to mankind even through transformations in its outward forms.

I looked into the world about me and saw the Home stricken hard by changing standards, threatened by the collapse of its economic system, and fighting for its life against machines and false cultures.

But still I found it going on its way, changed and yet unchanging.

It remains the one complete and effective democracy.

It provides security for tossed and confused spirits.

It affords, in its own life, practice in putting ideals into action.

It takes the strange mixture of experience that an aimless society tosses into every growing life, and gives them meaning, weeds out their dross, and centers them around some single purpose set attractively in the soul.

When this purpose becomes Christian, the home becomes Christian and through it society itself becomes more and more fashioned into the kingdom of our God and of his Christ.

Quoted from Home and Church Work Together by special permission of the International Council of Religious Education, Publishers.

RECENTLY there convened in London, Ontario, a great youth conference. Assembled were five hundred young people and their leaders. For three days they pooled their prayers and thinking on the theme, "Present-day Resources Available to Youth." Three groups of such resources were considered: resources within ourselves, resources with others, and resources within the church.

WHAT IS THE CHURCH?

The discussions of the conference concerning the meaning and nature of the church lead to the following conclusions:

The church is a fellowship of men and women, boys and girls, with common ideals, convictions, and purposes—all striving together in a common cause.

The church is a fellowship of worship, study, thought, work, service, witnessing, and love. All of this to the end that persons might grow in Christlikeness.

The church is an experiment station, a proving ground. Here under sympathetic and helpful supervision and guidance, learners may actually try out new ventures in Christian living.

The church is a demonstration center of Christlike living where people learn to live together in the light of the gospel way of life—may collectively witness that light to others.

The church is a school of Christian living where the spiritual life is being stimulated, guided, and increased, and where persons are found growing always "to the measure of the fullness of the stature of Christ."

It was emphasized in these discussions that the above was not to be interpreted as an indication that the church was held to be a human invention—or a sort of glorified social club. On the contrary, the church is conceived as the veritable body of Christ. The church bears his name, teaches his laws, transmits his life, seeks his children, acts with his authority, builds his kingdom, i. e., carries forward the business of God.

By Dr. F. M. McDowell

WHAT THE CHURCH PROVIDES

Exploring the church further, the following resources were suggested and evaluated:

Material resources. Attention was called to the fact that the material resources of the church, even though ours is a relatively small denomination, were not to be underestimated or unappreciated. Figures were presented to show that the net worth of the church was over six million dollars. Appreciation of this material worth, however, seemed to grow when the institutions of the church were listed. These included the Sanitarium and Hospital, Grace-land College, the Herald Publishing House, church buildings throughout the world. To this was added farm lands and missionary reserves.

Now all of these are available in a certain very significant sense to the smallest branch, to the humblest church member, or family everywhere. Each is indeed part owner. Each may definitely benefit from the utilization of these resources by the church as a whole.

Social and moral resources. The worth of the church is not to be measured wholly in material terms. This was clearly evidenced as the young people above referred to began to think of the social and moral resources within the church. Here they named friendship, fellowship, common ideals, purposes, and tasks; stimuli to growth and education, opportunities for such, and a high quality of human fellowship made available to them through the church. In a word, they found that if we were to consider the church merely as a social grouping of persons, purely on the human level, that its resources could hardly be overestimated. It was brought out that the church measured on this level was certainly among the very best of social institutions generally.

Spiritual resources. It was when these human resources and values were lifted to the divine level that the resources within the church came to be appreciated in their true light. What words can measure such resources as friendship, fellowship, and common endeavor when they are shared with others who are heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ?

Consider here the gifts of God made available through the church: Christ, redemption, revelation, priesthood. Add to these the sacred literature, hymns, testimonies, the accumulating witness of the ages, the power of stabilizing convictions, the opportunity of sharing in God's purpose and work. Consider too the assurance of final victory.

Other resources suggested by the young people as found within the church were the ordinances and sacraments of the church, the provisions for instruction in many fields, for counseling and guidance, parents of honor and industry and thrift, homes of kindness and love and co-operation, the long view of life, high ideals and purposes; the example, Christ, the perfect assurance of God—these and many others.

Apostle F. H. Edwards in his "Personal and Family Evangelism" presents a splendid analysis of what the church gives. This may be briefly summarized as follows:

Before we were born, the church won our parents to Christlike living, made available to us homes of Christlike quality, provided a setting for the supremacy of spiritual values over material, of the eternal over the temporary. While we were yet children, the church provided priesthood, teachers, and leaders for each age. She taught us to hold love high, to value self-discipline, to honor marriage, and thus laid the foundation of a stable home life.

As we grew older, the church made available to us a store of rich spiritual traditions, hymns, buildings, books, testimonies, experiences, and friendships.

Under the tutelage of the church, we gained the desire for and experience in sound relationships with God and man.

Again and again the church has furnished us solace in time of sorrow and despair, stimuli to and implements of worship and service, together with incentives to education.

All of such and more are available to those families and members of families who will qualify.

BASIC POSTULATES CONCERNING THE HOME

The social order is changing all the time. The home does not exist in a vacuum; it, too, will change. Change in itself is not necessarily good or bad. The direction of change is of major importance. The home will not and cannot attain a "fixed status" something achieved once and for all. Eternal vigilance will be required.

The home is indispensable to the "good" life. It is therefore immensely worth saving. We can and must do something about it. Almost unlimited resources are available for grappling with the problem.

The home has survived as an institution through change and chaos. It is not helpless—it can help itself. It need not be passive. It can be and must become an active agent.

Home and family life cannot go back to the yesterday even if such were desirable. Neither can it be maintained as it is at present. Changes will come. Must come! These cannot be left to blind chance.

Our only course then is purposeful direction and control of the changing family. For this purpose we shall need both religion and science, both faith and knowledge, and we must have intelligence, patience, and skill. For this purpose the church and home must unite in co-operative endeavor, which is indispensable to each.

THE KIND OF HOME WE HOLD TO BE DESIRABLE

There has been emerging from certain more or less recent studies a description of the sort of homes which we as a church would appear to hold desirable. This picture has for the most part been presented as "norms for the Latter Day Saint home and family." Norms have been defined as the "standards by which we shall estimate what we have and by which we shall set the direction of our course."¹

THE LATTER DAY SAINT HOME

The home is divinely patterned. Its purpose and character are written into the very nature or structure of life itself. Our human achievements in home-building, even at their best, are but approximations of this eternal pattern.

The home is rooted in strong affection. Its members are cemented by an understanding and comprehending love. In a word, the home is founded, unified, and motivated by love, both human and divine.

The home is personality centered. It exists for persons. Its purposes are centered in the welfare of the persons. Each member of the home or family must be made to count for something. In the home, everybody is somebody.

The home is the place of mutual sharing, where each is for all and all for each. It is a place for shared opportunities and shared responsibilities. A place where "each receives according to his needs and gives according to his power." In the home things are done together.

*The home builds for health—*physical, mental, social, and moral health. Such a home is law-abiding, it willingly pays the price of obedience for the blessings it would enjoy. The home is a balanced relationship. It emphasizes the wholeness of life. It neither negates nor glorifies one aspect of life; i. e., material goods, sex, emotions. All such are recognized for what they are—opportunities, values, powers—when utilized for the good of all, but death-dealing when selfishly exploited.

The home is intelligently purposeful. It recognizes the need for conscious planning. It has a clear vision of desirable ends or goals and intelligently and consistently builds that such may be achieved.

The home is alert and adjustable. Recognizing that it does not exist in a vacuum, it is keenly conscious of social change and meets those changes with patience, skill, and courage, making capital of whatever happens as a conditioning of progress toward cherished goals.

The home is spiritually centered. It has a central spiritual nucleus. This spirituality is not something apart from all the other elements of the family life, rather it conditions all that goes on there, giving meaning and purpose and value.

WHAT THE HOME PROVIDES

The resources within such homes are of incalculable worth. Consider, for example, the following:

The power of early influences. Homes have chance first, and during those years that count for most in establishing the rootage of all that goes to make up personality, success, or failure in latter years. Certainly the basic influences of life can be traced to the cradle years.

The time available in the home. For several childhood years the public school gets less than fifteen per cent of the child's time, the church scarcely one per cent. The home thus has available most of the remaining hours to make or break the growing life.

Intensified association. No other relationship can quite equal the quality of fellowship within the family. Here are found affection, sharing, a sense of care and of belonging, and the assurance of being loved. Here indeed is an opportunity for socialized education in its truest and best form.

Opportunities for life-centered education. In the educational work of the church and public school, we theorize a great deal about lifecentered education but the home best of all provides the opportunity to put into practice our theories, to make the ideal real. Here the shared activities of leisure, work, culture, worship may be found growing out of actual life situations. This constitutes education at its best.

The opportunity to capitalize upon example. In the home the child is provided with daily and long-time patterns of character. Nothing later can quite destroy or nullify the effects of right example in the home. Nothing can ever quite compensate for the tragedy of bad examples in the relationships of the family.

The actual experiencing of love and good will as a means of knowing and loving God, as promoting growth in brotherhood and the appreciation of the worth of persons.

The actual experience of sharing resources and responsibilities in the home as projects in democratic understanding and practice.

The opportunity for worship that is God-revealing and life-transforming, since in the home worship arises naturally out of the experiences and problems of daily life and relationships.

POSSIBLE MUTUAL ATTITUDES OF HOME AND CHURCH

Each may ignore the other, trying to carry on as though the other did not exist.

Each may neglect the other. While recognizing mutual needs and values, each may simply neglect to do anything about it.

Each may tolerate the other—permit the other to exist and carry on its work, but do nothing constructive to help.

The two may compete for time, energy, finances. In this way the individuals and families are often pulled in two directions by two great loyalties.

The two may co-operate superficially. They may work together if such is convenient for the time being or if selfish interests are temporarily served.

The two may co-operate creatively. This involves a long-time program which requires that each shall grow in understanding and appreciation of the other. It involves, too, the willingness and ability to express this mutual understanding in the creative endeavors of a great common cause. This requires in turn a growing mastery of essential methods and skills. Mutual ideals, purposes, and needs must increasingly find expression in intelligently planned and skillfully administered joint endeavors. Such is the purpose of this series of lessons.

AREAS OF COMMON INTEREST AND CONCERN

We have considered briefly some of the standards and resources of the kind of home and church life which we as a people hold to be desirable. As thus conceived, the church and the home have much in common. For them there are many areas of intense mutual interest and concern. Consider the following:

Common ideals

Respect for persons as of sacred worth.

Love, the ideal way of life.

Abundant living for each and all as life's rightful heritage.

A common cause

The cause of God and Christ, the highest fulfillment of life for man individually and socially.

The evangelizing of the world and building of the kingdom of God's good will.

Common functions

The promotion of a rich and integrated growth of person through the nurture of teaching, guidance, and example.

Common materials with which to work

Human life itself.

Infinitely varied and complex human personalities with seemingly unlimited potentialities — indeed the potential children of God.

Common destiny

For the home and church together either life or death, victory or annihilation, as together they walk or fail to walk the way of God or Babylon. With God, the destiny of both is the Father's kingdom.

Common enemies

Self-seeking, coercion, lust, greed, hatred, conflicts, war, are alike the deadly enemies of the church and home.

The home and the church experience much the same joys and sorrows, much the same values and disvalues. What promotes one promotes the other, what injures one injures the other, what thwarts one thwarts the other. Each needs and supports the other.

THE HOME NEEDS THE CHURCH

The home needs the church if it is to perform at all adequately its basic functions.

The home needs the church:

1. When a new family is established
2. When children are born
3. When the multitude of problems of child nurture arises
4. When life becomes confused and the way uncertain
5. At all times when the family requires the voice of a dependable authority, not mere opinion or expediency
6. At those times when the family needs to discover its deepest and most abiding realities
7. At the times of distress and strain; i. e., death and disaster
8. When the healing agency is required
9. In a time of great social upheavals
10. When a fundamental and dependable working philosophy of life is required
11. When nothing is more essential than that the family shall be able to interpret whatever happens in the "highest values that mankind knows"

The home needs the church if it is to endure.

Shortly before the opening of World War II, Dr. Regina Westcott Wieman, in her book The Modern Family and the Church, says:

The family is the orphan institution among the organizations of modern civilization. It is regularly utilized, exploited, disrupted, or despoiled as an incident in the climb to power or to wealth which are the obsessions of this ruthlessly competitive, individualistic age. The single family is a tiny, relatively short-lived institution which has increasing difficulty in establishing and maintaining sufficient social status to permit the fulfilling of its functions. . . . Homes that are overstraining or breaking because of the present impossible conditions of living. Both aspects are evident: the family growing lax, sinking, breaking, disintegrating; the family struggling spasmodically, haphazardly, fearfully, yet desperately, for the essentials of human fulfillment.²

All of the lust, greed, and hatred, all of the selfish materialism and nationalism of human folly were caught up and expressed in World War II. Here again we see in clear relief how all of such pagan forces are and always will be the deadly enemies of family life. War menaces the family more than any other social institution. Witness family migration and separation, witness the decay of moral standards, the menace to marriage, the murder of children, the increase of juvenile delinquency and the like, which accompanied the late war.

It is clear, therefore, that the only hope for the preservation of the home is to be found in substituting for that hatred, lust, and greed which have always made for war; that love, good will, justice, and brotherhood which constitute the Christ way of life and these virtues which make for peace. But these virtues are like cut flowers, fresh today and withered tomorrow, for, like cut flowers, they are without rootage. Ethics must be rooted in religion, and religion in turn endures only through the church, the one institution which recognizes such religious nurture as its first and only purpose.

THE CHURCH NEEDS THE HOME

For its constituency. For its field of operation. For a medium in which to work.

For its financial support, which in turn depends upon a growing sense or scale of values among its members.

For a fruitful point of attack upon the larger and long-time social issues, evils, and problems. In the family these all exist on a smaller scale. Here the church gets in its best licks by being able to strike at the very roots of social ills and needs.

For its future membership. If the family fails here, in the religious nurture of children and youth, the church withers and dies.

For the fostering of that peculiar environment in which religion flourishes.

For the constant challenge of life's persistent and perplexing problems as they press upon the family and from which the church itself is too often remote.

In his "Preparation for Marriage and the Building of Zion Homes" the author has expressed this dependence of the church upon the home as follows:

We have seen that much of modern life may be characterized as a "conventionalized, routinized, specialized, impersonalized system." Men in such a world desperately need kindness, fellowship, a feeling of personal worth, a sense of community interests, an opportunity for sharing and sacrificing together for ends which are held mutually desirable. This may well be summed up by stating that men need the genuine experience of love as over against the many false manifestations of love in which they are often invited to share, such as infatuation, lust, self-love, jealousy, etc.

But love is and love grows only in an atmosphere of confidence, trust, sympathy, fellowship, mutual service, sacrifice; that is, in an atmosphere that is characterized by "an interweaving of all interests and activities." Now such relationships at their best define the Christian family at its best. There love is, there God is, for God is love: "God is the interweaving of the interests of men into larger holds, which increase the abundance and meaning of all of living."

The family becomes, then, the place where the growing human learns first to share significant interests, learns first to join in creative endeavor, learns first the true nature and significance of love. The family thus becomes the means par excellence for fostering the kind of relationships that must characterize the kingdom of God. The family is in very deed a working laboratory unit where these relationships are practiced and hence expressed.³

ALLIES FOREVER

Indeed, the church and the home are allies forever. Elsewhere, the author has summarized this essential relationship as follows:

We have now witnessed the family and the church struggling desperately to survive. Because of their common enemies, their common needs, their common ideals and standards of value and their common goals, they must join forces. The church and the family will survive or perish together.

The interests of the church and the family are deeply immeshed. What promotes one promotes the other. What endangers one endangers the other. They are one in essential purpose—the highest human fulfillment. They must share both joys and sorrows, and their best work is done with the immature.

The family is dependent upon the church for support, guidance, and the source of authority without which it will be lost. It needs help in the emergencies of life, in its attempt to find and keep life's highest and supreme values uppermost.

Without the stimulation, inspiration, guidance, fellowship, the ever-fresh experience of God and ever-revitalized sense of values, and the mutual reinforcement which the church furnishes, the family will not survive.

The church depends upon the family for its membership and its financial support. The relationships of the family are productive of religion at its best. In the family the teachings of the church are constantly being worked out. The family is thus a working laboratory for the church.

Without the early religious nurture of the family, the church will not later hold its young people. In the family the church can get down to the root of its problems and purposes.

The church and the family belong together. They live or die together. Each is an indispensable source of strength to the other. In the building of the kingdom of God especially are they inseparable.⁴

SUGGESTIONS FOR THOUGHT, STUDY, DISCUSSION, ACTION

1. Present evidences of the vital and mutual obligations of the church and home in religious nurture.
 - a. Evidences from Scripture.
 - b. Evidences from human experience.
 - c. Evidences from personal observation.
2. The writer urges the necessity of breaking down the ultimate objectives of the church into more immediate and tangible objectives as essential to our progress as a church.

- a. Do you agree? Why? Why not?
- b. Formulate some immediate objectives for the church, i. e., objectives in character-building; objectives in marriage and family life; objectives in the work of the branch.
3. a. State three "norms" or characteristics of a healthy branch.
 - b. What are some of the resources available in such a branch — available to individual members and available to the families of the branch?
 - c. Why are these resources essential to persons and families in the world today?
4. a. State three "norms" or characteristics of a Latter Day Saint family.
 - b. What are some of the resources available in such a family for individual members of the family and for the church?

- c. Why are these resources essential to individuals and to the church in the world of today?
5. a. Give several needs of the church which are provided by the Latter Day Saint home.
b. Give several needs of Latter Day Saint homes provided by the church.
6. The author believes that the home cannot survive without the church, neither can the church survive without the home. Do you agree or disagree? Give reasons. Discuss.
7. A tested method of stimulating discussion is the following: Call attention of the members of the class (in advance of the class session) to the following outline, urging each member to complete at least one section of the outline and be prepared to support such in class discussion.

1. The interrelationship of the church and the home in religious education is important today because:
 - a. The breakdown of family life.
 - b. The family is the basis of society.
 - c. The church cannot survive the decay of family life.
 - d. Let the students give additional reasons.
2. Family life is especially potent in religious education because:
 - a. It is a fellowship of love.
 - b. Its associations are most intimate.
 - c. Let the student give additional reasons.
3. The church cannot survive without the home because:
 - a. The church has very little time to devote to religious education.

- b. If the home fails, the church would soon be without members.
- c. Let the student give additional reasons.
4. The home cannot survive without the church because:
 - a. The home is often isolated and alone without anchorage or security.
 - b. Families need fellowship as well as persons.
 - c. Let the student give additional suggestions.
5. The home and the church have much in common.
 - a. They have common motives.
 - b. They have common problems.
 - c. They have common enemies.
 - d. Let the student provide additional ones.

From a Lonely Mother

I am eighty-one years old and live alone. All of my children are married. My son, who was with the Army for three and a half years, returned home safely, but has left to establish his own home.

I have been a member of the Reorganized Church for many years; I believe it is the only true church of God. Although I am weak and apt to wander away from the Lord, I do want to live so that my life will be a good example to others. I attend services as often as possible; we are hoping to organize a group in Ponca City soon.

Pray for me that I may be content with my lonely life. My prayer is that God will bless his people everywhere.

ONIHAI: A street merchant whose wares are pottery and baskets.
NAPHTALI: A street merchant.
SEBUS: A street merchant whose wares are toys or fruits.
ABINADI: A purchaser.
LEAHONI: A purchaser. These could be either boys or girls.
MULEK: A pedestrian.
PAANCHI: Also a pedestrian.
ZARA: A child.

ACT I.

SCENE I. Samuel, the Lamanite prophet, had been cast out from the land of Zarahemla. He was told to return again.

Reader (steps forth between closed curtains): (This could be read as from the Book of Mormon): It came to pass in the fifth year before Christ, the Nephites did still remain in wickedness, while the Lamanites did observe strictly to keep the commandments of God according to the Law of Moses.

And it came to pass in this same year there was one Samuel, a Lamanite, came into the land of Zarahemla, and began to preach unto the people. Yea, he preached many days unto them, pleading with them, and prophesying unto them that they must repent of their wickedness and turn again unto the Lord.

But behold, they reviled against him and hardened their hearts insomuch that they laid hold upon him and cast him out of their city. (Reader steps back from view.)

(Music very soft and low. This could be No. 292 in the Hymnal.)

(Curtains part, revealing Samuel in an attitude of prayer. Stage is darkened. In a few moments a spotlight shines upon him. Music ceases as a voice is heard.)

Voice: (clear, mild) Samuel, look up! and listen to the voice of your Lord! For I bring unto you glad tidings of great joy.

Samuel (Rises to his feet. Looks up towards light): Lord, is it thou?

Voice: Yea, Samuel, but I bid thee return again and prophesy unto the people.

Samuel: But Lord, they have stoned me and shot arrows at me and did cast me out.

Voice: Yea, Samuel, but I bid thee return again and prophesy whatsoever things come into thy heart, and I shall go with thee.

Samuel: Yea, Lord, I will go and do the things which thou hast commanded, for I know that the Lord giveth no commandments unto the children of men, save he shall prepare a way for them that they may accomplish the thing which he commandeth them.

(Samuel sings with feeling the first stanza and chorus of hymn No. 292.)

CURTAIN

SCENE II. A selection of music can be played while making the stage ready for scene two. This can be done quickly if rightly planned.

(Curtains part revealing the market place within the walls of the city of Zarahemla. All are active and busy, passing to and fro, buying and selling. All are talking at once, laughter is heard. The merchants are at their places of business trying to interest passers-by in their wares. The gatekeeper is at the gateway equipped with a sword. The guard is also at his station equipped with a bow and arrows. The traveling merchant passes from one side of the stage to the other, he has a heavy load upon his back. As he is about to make his exit, Samuel appears. The gatekeeper quickly draws his sword and refuses Samuel entrance. This must be seen by the audience. Samuel then mounts a stepladder outside of wall and speaks with a loud voice.)

Samuel: Behold I, Samuel, a Lamanite, do speak the words of the Lord which he doth put into my heart. (All activity ceases, all are attention.) And behold, he hath put it into my heart to say unto this people, that the sword of justice awaiteth over you, yet, and nothing can save this people, save it be repentance and faith on the Lord Jesus Christ, who surely shall come into the world, and shall suffer many things and shall be slain for this people.

And behold, an angel of the Lord hath declared it unto me, and he did bring glad tidings to my soul. And behold, I was sent unto you to declare it unto you also that ye might have glad tidings, but behold, ye would not receive me.

O ye people of the land, that ye would hear my words, that ye would repent and be saved. (General discontent is shown.)

Behold, I give unto you a sign: for five more years cometh, then cometh the Son of God to redeem all those who believe on his name. (Someone laughs mockingly.)

And behold, this will I give unto you for a sign at the time of his coming. (All are listening now.) There shall be great lights in heaven, insomuch that the night before he cometh, there shall be no darkness. And it shall appear unto men as if it were day. Therefore there shall be a day and a night and a day, as if it were one day; (this causes much mirth.) And this shall be unto you for a sign, for you shall know of the rising of the sun and of its setting, therefore ye shall know of a surety that there shall be two days and a night, nevertheless the night shall not be darkened and it shall be the night before he is born. (Someone throws stones at him—use paper or something light.)

And there shall be a new star arise, such a one as ye have never beheld; and this also shall be a sign unto you. And it shall come to pass that ye shall be amazed, and wonder, insomuch that ye will fall to the ground. (The captain enters from left stage.) And whosoever shall believe on the Son of God, the same shall have everlasting life. (The guard quickly approaches the captain.)

Hagath: Captain, let us take this fellow and bind him, for behold he hath a devil. And because of the power of the devil which is in him, we cannot hit him with our stones and arrows.

Captain: Take him and bind him, and away with him.

Guard (leaves and returning says): He hath fled out of our land.

(The following may be sung by someone in the play as a solo or by several as you choose, Hymn No. 149, Zion's Praises, the first and last stanzas. Changing the line "And love the sweet council they find in his word!" to "And list to the angels who bring us the word!")

ACT II.

SCENE I. The market place four years later.

Reader (steps forth between closed curtains): There was but little alteration in the affairs of the people, save that many began to be hardened in iniquity, and do more and more that which was contrary to the commands of God. And angels did appear unto me, and declare unto them glad tidings of great joy; thus in this year the scriptures began to be fulfilled.

There also began to be many signs and wonders in the land, nevertheless the people began to harden their hearts, all save it were the most believing part of them. (Reader steps back from view.) (Curtains part revealing same market place. The merchants are at their places of business. Card tables may be used or low benches. The gatekeeper at the gateway. The guard at his station.)

Onihah, a street merchant: (Sebus is standing near her table) Did you notice the signs in the sky last night?

Sebus (She has a small child. With excitement.): Yea, I did. It seemed that I saw a babe nestled among the clouds on yesterday. It was so clear. It was as though it were alive. When I turned to look again it was gone.

Naphtali: How strange! I, too, saw a babe while I was dreaming in the nighttime. I am troubled much because of it, for I saw the babe in the arms of a beautiful young lady, yet as I watched this child, he grew and became as a cross upon a lonely mount.

Sebus: Oh, but the babe I saw seemed to bring great joy to all people, and as I looked I felt a great peace, and love for all mankind came into my heart.

Abinadi (near the table of Naphtali): Ah, yes, and angels have appeared unto some and brought glad tidings to their souls. Oh, why will people harden their heart against these things? For verily I believe that Christ shall come into the world, for the heavens have been full of signs and wonders.

Mulek (rather disdainfully): Truly many strange things HAVE been coming to pass of late.

Shiblon (also enters from left stage with his wares; he is about to pass by) (sarcastically): Some things they may have guessed right among so many. (He remains with the two.)

Paanchi: It is not reasonable that such a being as a Christ shall come.

Shiblon: If so, and he be the Son of God, and the Father of heaven and earth, as it has been spoken, why will he not show himself unto us as well as unto them who shall be at Jerusalem?

Mulek: Behold we know that this is a wicked tradition which has been handed down unto us by our fathers.

Shiblon: Yea, to cause us to believe in some great and marvelous thing that shall come to pass.

Mulek: But not among us, but in a land that is far distant, a land which we know not.

Shiblon: And they desire to work some mystery which we cannot understand.

Paanchi: They think to make us servants to their words and to them.

Shiblon: Yea, they desire to keep us in ignorance, for we cannot witness with our own eyes that they are true. (He passes on to right. He meets Nephi who stops to notice the child with Sebus.)

Paanchi (motioning towards Nephi, speaks in loud undertone): Behold, Nephi hath preached many strange things of late.

Mulek (loud undertone, holds hand to face): Yea, he desires that we shall repent and yield ourselves up unto him all the days of our lives. (They pass from the left stage, but before doing so Paanchi replies.)

Paanchi: But many do believe his vain and foolish teachings and are led away by his flattering words.

Leahoni (who has been standing near Onihah looking over her goods, looks up and sees Nephi. Goes toward him. Calls out): Nephi! Nephi! we desire to have speech with thee.

Sebus: Yea, we have heard your prophecies and saw the many signs and wonders in the sky.

Leahoni: Therefore we know that thou art a true teacher over the people, but there are many who do not believe your words.

Abinadi: We know we are sinful creatures; we want to confess our sins, for we have suffered much in our souls this day because of them.

Leahoni: Yea, we believe that Christ shall come as spoken by the Prophet Samuel, and that he will redeem us from our sins.

Abinadi: Yea, we desire that we may follow the Christ with full purpose of heart.

Nephi (warmly): Yea, glory be to God on high and Jesus Christ his Son.

(Nephi, Abinadi, Sebus, Leahoni, or others on the stage sing first two and last stanzas of hymn No. 114.)

CURTAIN

SCENE II. The market place one year later.

Reader (as before): And it came to pass that five years had passed away since Samuel, the Lamanite prophet, stood upon the wall and prophesied unto the people, and it was six hundred years from the time that Lehi left Jerusalem; it was in the time when Lachoneous was the Chief Judge and governor over the land.

Behold, the prophecies of the prophets began to be fulfilled more fully: for there were some who began to say that the time was passed for the words to be fulfilled, which was spoken by Samuel, the Lamanite. (She steps back.)

(Curtains part, revealing same market place. It can be changed around. The gatekeeper is in place. The guard at post of duty. All are busy as Paanchi and Mulek enter from gateway at rear of stage. They approach the merchants. They pick up some pottery, look at it, finally Mulek speaks to Naphtali, a smirking smile on his face.)

Mulek: Behold, the time is past, and the words of Samuel are not fulfilled.

Paanchi (also to Naphtali): Therefore, your joy and your faith concerning this thing hath been vain.

Naphtali (with conviction): We know not the time when he cometh, but we are all waiting and watching for him. (Mulek and Paanchi leave at left stage, but before doing so):

Mulek (mockingly): You'll be waiting and watching a long time, a very long time.

(The traveling merchant, Shiblon, crosses the market place with his wares.)

Onihah (sorrowfully): It does all seem so strange—I wonder—I wonder.

Leahoni: Yea, I wonder lest by any means those things which have been spoken might not come to pass.

Sebus: Could it be possible that we have been mistaken?

Abinadi: Ah, dear people, why have doubts in your hearts? Have ye not seen many signs and wonders of late? Do we not know that these things speak of that which is to come to pass? For the very heavens declare the glory of God, and the stars shine forth in greater brightness because of the great blessing that is about to come into the world.

(Nephi enters as Abinadi finishes speaking.)

Nephi (eagerly): Behold, Jesus shall come soon, and we shall rejoice exceedingly, for an angel of the Lord did appear unto me, and it came to pass that he said unto me, "Look!" And I looked and beheld the great city of Jerusalem, and also other cities. And I beheld the city of Nazareth; and in the city of Nazareth I beheld a virgin, and she was exceeding fair and white. And it came to pass that I beheld that she was carried away in the spirit for the space of a time. And the angel spake unto me again saying: "Look!" And I looked and beheld the virgin again, bearing a child in her arms. And the angel said unto me: "Behold the Lamb of God, yea, even the Son of the Eternal Father."

Sebus: Yea, let us all be faithful and murmur not.

Leahoni: Yea, let us all be waiting and watching for him.

(A duet or others sing No. 30, Zion's Praises. The first two stanzas.)

SCENE III. (Lachoneous, the chief judge and governor of the land, issues a decree. The stage is cleared. Gatekeeper still at the gateway. The guard is not on the stage. Curtains part, revealing Lachoneous at center of stage, either standing with folded arms very dignified or seated at a table with documents in his hand. The captain enters and salutes.)

Zoran (goes to judge and bows): I would have word with thee. Behold there is a great uproar in the land. There is much disturbance because of this thing that they say will surely come to pass. This day and a night and a day in which there shall be no darkness, which they say will cause such great astonishment.

Lachoneous: Yea, we are greatly troubled these days because of those who believe the foolish and vain words of the prophets.

Zoran: Yea, judge, they have exceeding faith that this Christ will come, and they worry us with their much preaching, yea, and many do believe on their words.

Lachoneous: Lest their strength should become too great in the land and they overpower us, I will send forth a decree.

Zoran: Yea, judge, thy decree? That will I observe to carry out. (If the judge is seated, he arises and stands with folded arms.)

Lachoneous: Behold, this is my decree: Three days shall pass away and at sundown, except the sign shall come to pass which has been given by Samuel, the Lamanite, all those who believe in those traditions shall be put to death. (He turns, passes off left stage. The captain turns right facing the guard who has just entered.)

Zoran (to guard): The governor hath issued a decree, and this is the decree: Three days shall pass away and at sundown except the sign shall come to pass which has been given by Samuel, the Lamanite, all those who believe in these traditions shall be put to death. Therefore go thy way, and cause that this decree should be sent out in all the land.

Hagtho: Yea, captain. (Captain is about to pass through the gateway, he speaks to the gatekeeper.)

Zoran: And guard the gate well, that no one may pass through, thinking thereby to escape. (He leaves.) (The guard passes across the stage and off, calling in a monotone as a town crier.)

Hagtho: Hearrrr — Yeeeee! Hearrrrr — Yeeeee! The governor hath sent for—th a decreeeee (Drag out the words till he has reached back of stage and voice dies down as of distance. One or more singers come to front of stage and sing the following words to the tune of No. 163, Hymnal.)

Hark! 'Tis the captain's voice we hear,

'Tis the decree the wicked gave.

It fills our hearts with doubts and fear,

It fills our hearts with sorrows grave.

Oh, grief that wrestles lone with fears,

'Tis hope we need. O wilt thou give

A faith that shines through grief and tears?

Oh, help us bear the storm and live.

Soon sundown in the garden lee.

Faith must bear up this heart of mine,

A lasting faith that comes from thee

And fills my soul with love divine.

CURTAIN

SCENE IV. (The gateway is closed. Appropriate music is heard as curtains part revealing people in fear passing to and fro. Panic-stricken mothers hug their children to them. Some are weeping. The traveling merchant passes by. The guard passes near the wall as on parade. Music ceases.)

Onihah (fearfully): Two days have passed away, and still the sign has not come to pass.

Naphtali: Oh, my heart is full of fear. What will be our fate on the morrow? Why will they put us to death because we believe the traditions of our fathers?

Sebus: Yea, did not the prophets of old speak of this same Jesus that our father Lehi did declare would come in six hundred years from the time he left Jerusalem?

Naphtali: And according to the records that have been kept, six hundred years have already passed away.

Sebus: And according to the words of the prophet, Samuel, the time must be near at hand.

Leahoni: And we are living in the very day he is to be born, and yet we are to be put to death and will not see the thing come to pass that is to bring glad tidings of great joy to all people.

Sebus: There is still today left.

Naphtali: And after the day passeth away, then what cometh? Oh, if they would wait a little longer, perhaps he will come soon, perhaps on the morrow.

Leahoni: But we must not despair, our faith and our courage must carry us through. Were not the prophets of old stoned and beaten and slain because they dared to speak the things the Lord revealed unto them? And how much better are we than they? For lo, we know that angels hath declared these things unto us.

Onihah: Oh, that my faith were as thine.

Worship Suggestions for January

By Florence Freberg

Theme for the Month: BEGINNINGS

January 5, 1947

Theme: IN THE BEGINNING—GOD.

Prelude:

Fifteen minutes of instrumental music (preferably two instruments).

Call to Worship:

IN HIS FOOTSTEPS

I cannot help but know
There is a God,
For I have seen the footsteps
Where he's trod.

They've left their mark on Valley, hill, and sea,
On hearts and minds and Souls—and me.
—Ramona Sartwell.

Theme Talk Thoughts:

In the beginning—God! He is the first to love; he leads the way in being holy, in being kind, just, patient. God first had all the knowledge which has made possible the accomplishments of science in every age of the world. He has throughout time been the LIGHT of the world.

Hymn: "This God Is the God We Adore," Saints' Hymnal, No. 100.

Story:

Brother Frank Fry's experience, as told in his own words: "I know this experience is real; there is nothing imaginary about it. Just three years ago, before my father died, he verified the experience before the whole family. "When I was nine years old, I lived on a farm between Woodbine and Logan, Iowa. My father had a twenty-seven-acre tract of land from which the timber had been removed but a short time, and of course there were many stumps, which we were removing, preparing the land for a corn crop. We met in the middle of the field and stopped to let the horses rest. As we talked, I turned around and let my feet hang over the back. After a while my father said for me to unhitch my team and go to the house. He started his team, but before I could turn around, my team started off at a fast rate. The jerk sent me over backwards. My heels landed on the doubletree in front of the disc, and I grabbed the brace rods. I was dragged for some distance, calling for the team to stop. They kept going fast and faster. My father heard my cries, and ran toward me, just in time to see the disc run over my head and face. He turned his back, thinking I would be cut to shreds. I looked up and saw the disc running over me just as plainly as I can see you. I lay flat on my back, and it ran its full weight on my face first. I didn't feel the weight of the disc. I got up after it ran over me and spoke to my father. He turned around, as white as could be, trembling all over. He looked at me, and there was not a scratch on my face or body, not a thread of my clothing was torn. We looked to see if there were any possible way for the disc to be held off of me, but there was nothing within a hundred feet. The disc was set at full disc, so there was no space left, and it had just been sharpened. It was weighted down on each side with stones weighing a hundred pounds.

"My father put his hands on my shoulders and said, 'Frank, always remember that the angels of the Lord protected you and held the disc off of you. You have a work to do for the Lord. There just isn't any other answer.'" An Observation:

After reading this story to a ten-year-old boy, he looked up and said, "I'd probably have been cut to shreds, because I don't know God as Brother Fry does," but the answer to him was: "When he was a boy he probably did not know God any better than you do now. But God is like that. He first loves and cares for us."

Solo:

GOD IS SO GOOD TO ME

I cannot doubt my dear Saviour's love
As on the Mount I stand,
And looking back I plainly see
The leadings of his dear hand.

Chorus:

God is so good to me,
God is so good to me.
I'll love and serve him faithfully,
He is so good to me.

Walking with Christ is sweeter to me
Than all the world's vain charms.
"Tho rugged be the path I tread
I'm leaning on his strong arm.

He is so good to me every day,
Keeping me in his care.
His blessed sunlight floods my way;
My burdens and joys he shares.

I'll cling to him, whatever may come,
And through Eternity
'Round the white throne where praises ne'er cease,
I'll tell of his love for me.

Theme: BEGINNING THE YEAR WITH GOD.

Prelude:

Fifteen minutes of instrument music prior to the worship service.

Scripture Reading:

"I will go and do the things which the Lord hath commanded, for I know that the Lord giveth no commandments unto the children of men, save he shall prepare a way for them that they may accomplish the thing which he commandeth them."—1 Nephi 1: 65.

Meditation Thoughts:

"To work throughout the year with God, he desires holiness of me. Is it possible for me, filled with human weaknesses and errors, to reach the plane of purity he has pointed out? If I think not, then would I assume that God errs in judgment regarding what he desires, or that Nephi was misled by revealed knowledge? I am unwilling to concede either, and so must believe that God does not beckon me to heights I cannot reach, nor invite me to a feast of happiness I could not, with effort, attend. It is only for me to equal Nephi's faith and devotion, his integrity and humility, and then I may expect, as he found, that God will open the way for me to accomplish the thing he expects and asks of me. Each day becomes a steppingstone, each lesson a clearer vision of the upward path, and each consecration a new dedication of myself as a pilgrim therein, determined to press onward and upward, at whatever cost, in order that no man may rob me of my reward—a good conscience towards God and man."—Audentia Anderson.

Scripture Reading:

"O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter saith the Lord. Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel."—Jeremiah 18: 1-6.

Story:

PETER'S SECOND CHANCE
by Vesta Towner (for adults)

After Peter had denied his Lord, he suffered great remorse. As the days passed by, there was just one thought in Peter's heart, "Oh, if I only had another chance! If I had just one more chance!"

"Yes, I could brag enough. I bragged about the way I would stand by him, if all the others should forsake him. I would stand by even unto death. And then that night at the trial that maid servant came to me as I was warming myself by the fire and accused me of being one of his disciples. I denied that I ever knew him. Oh, why was I such a coward? Three times I denied him! Oh, if I had only another chance to prove to the Master, and to the world, that I do love him!"

But the days passed, and Peter's chance did not come.

There were a few wonderful times when the risen Christ reappeared to his disciples, and their hearts were filled with gladness, hope, and joy. But the intervals between were long, and there was no settled program of things to do, and Peter had too much time to think, and to live again the dreadful night of the betrayal, and the night he had denied the Lord; and at every sound of the crowing of the cock, he could see again his Master's eyes fixed on him in sorrow. He had too much time to think.

And one day he said, "Boys, I am going fishing," and instantly they spoke up and said, "We go, too."

There were seven of them all together, and they took the old fishing boat that night and went out upon the lake, just at sunset. They went out where the blue water was still and deep, and just the right sort of spot to fish. They went to work and threw in their nets.

But when they drew them in, they were empty—not a single fish in the net, just the bare, dripping nets.

"Let's try again," they said, and again and again they let down their nets, and when they pulled them up, always the nets were empty. It seemed as if there were no fish in the Sea of Galilee.

They were there all night long. They worked on and on until the stars began to fade, and the waters that had been black all night took on a greenish color, and they could see the shore. And finally they could see the little white houses along the shore. Then in the misty dawn they spied a figure standing on the shore of the lake. He cried out to them, "Lads, have you any fish?"

"No," they answered; "we have toiled all night long and have not caught a thing."

"Cast your net on the right-hand side of the boat, and you will find fish," he said.

They had toiled all night. They looked at each other, but there was something in that voice that caused them to obey. Instantly, when they had done as they had been bidden, it seemed as if every fish in the Sea of Galilee swam for that net. And John turned to Peter, and said, "It is the Master standing there on the shore."

Peter looked, and forgot all about the fish. He leaped into the sea, swimming just as fast as he could toward the figure on the shore, leaving the others to bring in the fish. As he neared the shore, he saw that indeed it was the Master, but he did not venture to call out to him.

There was a little fire, a little charcoal fire, with fish broiling on it.

Just then the others came to land dragging the net full of fishes after them. Then Jesus said to them, "Bring me some of your fishes." Instantly Peter sprang and helped to bring the fish. There were one hundred fifty-three of them, they found as they counted them, and the net had not even broken. But just now they gave little heed to the fish.

"Here is the Master," they whispered to each other. And yet they did not venture to question him.

"Come, lads, and have some breakfast," said Jesus. And so they sat down upon the sand, around the little charcoal fire—those seven fishermen who had toiled all night and taken nothing—they sat around the fire, and the Master took of the bread and the fish and gave them to eat.

No food ever tasted better than did that to those seven hungry men who that morn received their breakfast from the hand of the Master himself. But no wonder, for their food was more than bread and fish that morning. The quiet beauty of the scene itself was never to be forgotten. There was the rosy blush of the dawn, the savory smoke arising from the glowing coals, and the stillness of the early morning broken only by the soft lapping of little waves on the sand. All this, and the very presence of the Master gave them peace.

But Peter—Peter couldn't eat much that morning; the hunger in his heart was too great.

And when they had finished breakfast, the Master said, "Simon, Simon, dost thou love me more than these?" Now Peter remembered all too keenly the night when he had denied his Lord, and with his humiliation strong upon him, Peter did not quite dare answer that he loved the Master, so he very humbly used another word, and said, "Lord, thou knowest thou art dear to me."

And Jesus said unto him, "Feed my lambs." Then once again he put the question to him, "Dost thou love me more than these?" "Then," said Jesus, "be a shepherd to my sheep." And once more Jesus put the question to him, for the third time, and "Yes, Master, you know all things, and you know that you are dear to me," was Peter's answer.

Then with an infinite yearning in his voice the Master said, "Then feed my sheep." In a voice of tenderness, "My much-loved sheep."

And then at last Peter understood. His great chance that he had been longing for had come. Not this time to bear witness in a crowded courtroom of his love and loyalty to the Master, but day by day to prove his love, to serve even as his Master had served, giving the bread of life to the hungry, being a shepherd to the much-loved sheep and the lambs. And a great resolution grew in Peter's heart. No words came to his lips, but this was the thought of his heart, "This time I will be true, this time I will prove to the Master and to the world how great is my love."

And the Master looked at him and read the answer in Peter's heart.

(Miss Towner's explanation of the use of the word "dear" is that it was taken from the "modern speech" translation of the Bible. That in the original there were two words used of different degrees of meaning, hence the translation of "love" for one of them, and "thou art dear to me" for the other.)

Challenge:

"T'WAS A SHEEP NOT A LAMB

'Twas a sheep, not a lamb, that strayed away
In the parable Jesus told;
A grown-up sheep, that had gone astray
From the ninety and nine in the fold.

Out on the hillside, out in the cold,
'Twas a sheep the Good Shepherd sought
And back to the flock safe into the fold,
'Twas a sheep the Good Shepherd brought.

And why for the sheep should we earnestly long
And as earnestly hope and pray?
Because there is danger, if they go wrong,
They will lead the lambs astray.

For the lambs will follow the sheep, you know,
Wherever the sheep may stray;
When the sheep go wrong, it will not be long,
Till the lambs are as wrong as they.

And so with the sheep we earnestly plead,
For the sake of the lambs, today;
If the lambs are lost, what terrible cost
Some sheep will have to pay.

Note: For a worship center, one could have the picture, "If Thou Hadst Known," (see Christ and the Fine Arts, page 706). Then, for the Call to Worship, tell the name of the picture and add: Qualifications for service with God seem at times too difficult, but were we to fall away from God's orbit, we would find ourselves in a more sorrowful condition, and we would be lamenting, "If we had only known."

Theme: BEGINNING THE WEEK WITH GOD.

Prelude: Fifteen minutes of music prior to the opening of the service.

Call to Worship:

Each week we thank thee, Lord, for little things to do.

Please help us to do them as though we were doing them for you.

Scripture Reading:

"... behold I say unto you, that by small and simple things, are great things brought to pass; and small means in many instances doth confound the wise. And the Lord God doth work by means to bring about his great and eternal purposes; and by very small means the Lord doth confound the wise, and bringeth about the salvation of many souls."—Alma 17: 33, 36.

HOW KINDNESS WON SEVERAL GENERATIONS

Patriarch E. A. Smith tells this story: "I was guest speaker at a rally day in Burlington, Iowa, where I began my first official pastorate thirty-seven years ago last May. . . . Among the happy experiences those past years brought to mind was this one: Of a sacrament Sunday there came to church a widow lady, who introduced herself as Mrs. Wilson, and bringing with her two married daughters, Mrs. Ed Kuntz and Mrs. Al Kuntz. They partook of the sacrament and were happy to be with the church and we to welcome them. The next day Sister Smith and I went to call upon them. We found them quite downcast and rather distant in manner. They had discovered that we were of the Reorganized Church, while they were Utah Mormons. They had not known the difference when they introduced themselves as members. As soon as I could rally my wits from the surprise, I said to Mrs. Wilson, 'By all means continue to come to church. We will try to make you feel at home, and I will never make any attack on your faith or even start an argument with you. If the time comes when you feel that you wish to ask questions, be free to do so.'

"This good woman of whom I have just written did continue to come to church with her daughters and their husbands. After perhaps six months, she invited me to come to her home one evening to talk matters over. I did so. To make a long story short, I baptized her and her two daughters and their husbands, two of her sons, and later other members of the family. Altogether some thirty members of the Kuntz family have been baptized, and they continue to come in as fast as they grow old enough. At this meeting I met the youngest member of the family to join, now nine years old, a great-grandson of Mrs. Wilson. Her grandson, Fred Kuntz, is now pastor of the branch and doing a very fine piece of work as pastor."—Saints' Herald, October 28, 1939.

A WAYSIDE KINDNESS

It was nearly a year ago when Miss Gray got off the street car near a home for the aged. As she reached the pavement, she was met by a tiny old woman who extended to her a scrap of newspaper, saying, "Could you tell me how to get to that place where they want a dishwasher?"

"But you can't do that kind of work," remonstrated Miss Gray.

"Oh, yes, I can," asserted the diminutive person. "I have scrubbed and washed all my life, and I am as strong as ever I was."

Miss Gray could not assent but took the little woman to her home and learned her story. She had come from Switzerland to Kansas City thirty-six years ago and had worked all those years in kitchens and laundries. Now she was old and out of work and needed to earn a living. To her newly found friend she confided that she had a sister from whom she had been separated fifty-four years before in her native land. The sister had been last heard of in Philadelphia. Miss Gray set herself to the task of finding this sister, and finally succeeded in locating her in Florida, well and prosperous and ready to open her arms to the sister from whom she had been so long lost. A letter from her says: "How glad our hearts will be to have you share our home with us as soon as possible!"

The little wayside kindness of Miss Gray brought a great happiness into the life of the little woman she found in the city streets.

Hymn: "Oh, Master, Let Me Walk With Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 213.

Prayer:

Challenge:

He drew a circle that shut me out
Heretic, rebel, a thing to flout.
But love and I had the wit to win.
We drew a circle that drew him in!

January 26, 1947

Theme: BEGINNING THE DAY WITH GOD.

Prelude:

Fifteen minutes of music before opening the service.

Call to Worship:

Daily worship in the home is recognizing the presence of an Intelligence far beyond ours;

A Power greater than we shall ever comprehend.

It is a gracious invitation to our Dependable Guest.

Scripture Readings:

Deuteronomy 11: 19, 20.

Mosiah 2: 25-27; Alma 16: 219; 3 Nephi 8: 52.

Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4; 90: 6.

A Worship Service in the Home:

Worship in the home is an easy way as well as a splendid way to teach our children.

Setting: A home which has on the wall a picture of Sallman's "Head of Christ." The Three Standard Books are on a table.

Junior Choir or a group sing "Take Time to Be Holy," Saints' Hymnal, No. 322.

Enter: The father, who lights the candle by the picture of Jesus, and then takes the Book of Mormon and opens it to page 652.

The mother enters with her Bible storybook. The two children follow and quietly take their places.

The father: (turning to the boy) What was your lesson about yesterday in junior church?

The boy: Oh, Ray told the story about Elisha bringing the axhead up from the bottom of the River Jordan.

The mother: We have another story about the power God gave Elisha, and this time Elisha's kindness to his enemies saved him from further trouble with them.

(She reads the story from a child's Bible storybook, if the children are small, of the account given in II Kings 6: 8-23.)

The father: (to the younger child) What did you learn yesterday at church?

Younger child: A poem.

Said the robin to the sparrow,
"I should really like to know
Why these anxious human beings
Rush about and worry so."

Said the sparrow to the robin,
"Friend, I think that it must be
That they have no Heavenly Father
Such as cares for you and me."

The father: That tells us to have faith in God and pray to him. This is what Jesus told the Nephite people, "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, which is right, believing that ye shall receive, behold it shall be given you. Pray in your families unto the Father always in my name, that your wives and your children shall be blessed." Let us pray.

The family stands and with hands clasped, each offers a short prayer. During this time the junior choir hums, "Let Us Pray for One Another," No. 311.

Leader:

Brother Elbert A. Smith has said that if you do not have faith enough for a year, have faith enough for just one day, and the next day have faith enough for that day. Then if you continue that way for three hundred and sixty-five days, you have had faith enough for a year.

News Briefs

Southeastern Illinois District Conference

The Southeastern Illinois District Conference was held in Mt. Vernon, Illinois, on Sunday, November 10. The conference began with a prayer service at 9:30 a.m., at which District President M. E. Loving, Apostle Arthur Oakman, Seventy Z. Z. Renfro, and Missionary James Daugherty presided. The small daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Leo Holman of Wayne City, Illinois, was blessed by Z. Z. Renfro and James Daugherty. The business session convened at 2 p.m. Following the reading of district reports, three recommendations for ordination were approved; they were Eddie Colvin, elder; Orion Hill, teacher; and Earnest Burklow, deacon. Officers elected for the coming year are: Z. Z. Renfro, district president; M. E. Loving and Dr. W. E. Phillips, counselors; Betty Deselms, Zion's League supervisor; Mabel Phillips, women's leader; Ed Knapp, treasurer; Ruby Ellis, secretary; Rufus Rockett, church school director and auditor; Eddie Colvin, young adult supervisor; and Marie Henson, director of music. Delegates to the 1947 General Conference were also elected. A basket dinner was served in the lower auditorium of the church at noon. Elder O. C. Henson of Decatur, Illinois, was the speaker on Sunday evening.

A turkey banquet will be held Tuesday evening, November 26. Seventy Z. Z. Renfro is to be in charge, and Apostle Arthur Oakman, the speaker.

—Ruby Ellis, secretary.

The Southern Michigan District Conference

The Southern Michigan District Conference was held September 28 and 29 at Muskegon, Michigan. The conference opened at 4:30 p.m. with a business session and the following officers were elected: Edward R. Carter, district president; Charles J. Mottashed and Glenn Myers, counselors; Doris Ludden, secretary; Margaret Case, women's leader; Clarence Dudley, church school director; Jack Hodge, young people's leader; Elmer Evans, bishop and district treasurer; Garnett Smith, counselor; Velma Horaney, historian; Edward Premoe, nonresident pastor; and Frances Carlson, director of music.

The entertainment Saturday evening consisted of a concert by the district choir, and skits and musical numbers by members of the several branches represented. Sunday's activities began with a young people's fellowship, followed by a general fellowship service. Apostle Blair Jensen was the speaker at 11 o'clock. The conference was brought to a close with a priesthood meeting and a women's department meeting in the afternoon.

Colorado Springs, Colorado

Pastor, J. D. Curtis

Richard Doyle, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Doyle Miller, was blessed by Elders J. D. Curtis and Floyd Engstrom on July 21. The following Sunday, Shirley Ann, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Marvin Leullen of Hawthorn, California, was blessed, the same ministers officiating. Mrs. Anna Smith was baptized by Pastor Curtis on Wednesday evening, July 24; Mrs. Smith is eighty-two years old. Joanne and Richard Ebeling united with the church on August 28, Priest Ray Ebeling officiating at the baptismal service. Three other converts, Thomas Novinger of Springer, New Mexico, and Floyd and Roger Reid of Seibert, Colorado, were baptized by Pastor Curtis on August 25. The annual business meeting was held Tuesday evening, September 10; Elder J. D. Curtis was elected pastor, and Ray Ebeling, church school director. Graceland College Day was observed October 20; the Zion's League, under the supervision of Myrtle Stephenson, presented the evening service.

—Martha Downs, reporter.

Minneapolis, Minnesota

Apostle Charles Hield was the 11 o'clock speaker on Sunday, November 10; he also gave an illustrated lecture several weeks before. One hundred thirty-five children from the community attended the Halloween party held in the church basement; games, movies, and refreshments were features of the evening. The men of the congregation have finished painting the exterior of the church. On Thursday, November 14, a community dinner was sponsored by the women's department; the older Zion's League girls held a bazaar on the same evening.

Senlac, Saskatchewan

Artland Congregation

Pastor, A. J. Cornish

The following officers were elected at the business meeting held August 18: A. J. Cornish, pastor; W. A. Levitt, church school director; Vernon Cornish, clerk; Glen Harper, treasurer; Rudolph Cornish, organist and young people's teacher; Mrs. R. J. Cornish, adult teacher; Mrs. Vernon Cornish, junior high teacher; Bertha Cornish, junior teacher; Mrs. A. J. Cornish, primary teacher; and Mrs. W. A. Levitt, kindergarten teacher.

Many of the Ribstone, Alberta, Saints were present on September 15 to hear Elder Clyde Walrath of California speak. A basket dinner was held at noon, after which Stewart Dallyn, Ivan Millar, William Levitt, Vernon Cornish, George Miller, W. J. Cornish, and A. J. Cornish gave short talks. Special music for the service was provided by a quartet.

October 14 was observed as Thanksgiving Day in Canada; a worship service was held at the church in the morning. Lynne Denise, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Cornish, and Derryl James, son of Mr. and Mrs. James Carson, were blessed on October 27. The annual fowl supper and bazaar were held November 7. The Oriole girls assisted in waiting tables.

Springfield, Massachusetts

Pastor, James W. Barton

The Saints of Springfield Mission are holding their meetings at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Candage, 10 Kelly Place, East Springfield. The children's classes are held near by at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Pearl Philbrook, with Virginia Philbrook as teacher. James Barton, Ralph Candage, Archie Begg, Alex Begg, Roger and William Candage attended the priesthood institute held in Boston recently.

—Mary Begg, reporter.

Mobile, Alabama

Pastor, A. Orlin Crownover

The theme for the month of October was "Prayer." Pastor A. O. Crownover held open house at his home on Sunday, October 20. The women's department sponsored a supper at the church on Tuesday, October 22, netting a profit of $326 for the building fund. Members of Mobile congregation welcome Emile Scarcliff back to the group; Emile recently returned from service.

—Melgwin Miller, reporter.

Regina, Saskatchewan

Pastor, J. W. Mountenay

Elder J. W. Mountenay was sustained as pastor at the annual business meeting; Kenneth Carson was elected church school director. Apostle C. R. Hield and Seventy Phillip Moore visited Regina during the summer. The Southern Saskatchewan Young People's Rally was held in Regina on October 13 and 14; it was attended by members of the Saskatoon, Birsay, Weyburn, DuVal, and Bethune congregations. Missionary James Menzies, guest speaker, gave illustrated lectures on the life of Christ and the Book of Mormon.

Arthur Bergensen is now in charge of the Zion's League. Nellie Carson is leader of the women's department.

—G. M. Taylor, reporter.

Warton, Ontario

Pastor, Gordon Farrow

Seventy Harold I. Velt presented a series of illustrated lectures on the Book of Mormon early in October. Several nonmembers attended the services regularly; Harry Meredith, a veteran, was baptized by Brother Velt at the close of the series.

Officers elected at the branch business meeting are as follows: Gordon Farrow, pastor; Mrs. Gordon Farrow, secretary; Robert Humphries, treasurer; Garnet Farrow, church school director; John Bradley, assistant church school director; Lillian Yager, pianist; Mabel Farrow, director of music; Mrs. Ivan Thompson, young people's supervisor; and Rosalind Reid, women's leader. Home, Sweet Home in Tacoma

BY LOUISE SCOTT WRIGLEY

I write from a "new horizon." My small son and I are in Tacoma, Washington, where my lieutenant husband is stationed with the army. Though it is not the first new horizon we have encountered by any means, still it certainly had its own particular set of obstacles all ready and waiting when I arrived.

My dear husband, with the child-like trust of all males, had turned down an offer of quarters on the post at Fort Lewis, because they were unfurnished and not too desirable. He felt that we could find something better and less expensive in Tacoma. I did too—at first! We philosophical about the whole thing. Something will turn up, I told myself smugly. What if the housing situation is a little tight? Obstacles like these make us stronger and more appreciative. Pooh to the housing shortage! Surely nothing is insurmountable. I smiled.

My smile became slightly worn around the edges at the end of a month of house-or-apartment-or-just-anything-hunting. Everywhere the answer was the same, "No children!"

Then my good humor and patience faded abruptly. I got a little grim. I answered ads. I traipsed from house to house. I questioned people on the street. I pestered the pastor to death. I'll bet I looked into hundreds of faces and talked to hundreds of people. Fat ones, skinny ones, tall ones, short ones, nice ones, nasty ones. They all had something in common—"no apartments" or "no children."

Someone said I didn't know the right people. I wondered, a little wildly, if the right people hid out somewhere, because surely I had contacted everyone of the 139,000 people in Tacoma.

I began to get rebellious. My faith, so strong and sure in the beginning, had begun to limp a little. I jabbed it sharply and said, "Hey, I need you now! Don't be a sissy."

The motel, lovely as it was, was doing terrible things to our budget. In fact, I had tossed the budget out of the window altogether. Things couldn't be any worse. They just had to get better.

Then one afternoon, as many other afternoons which followed unsuccessful days of house-hunting, I left my poor, tired, long-suffering little son in the car for the umpteenth time. I walked up the steps to a large frame house. I had done this perhaps ten times before. The man who lived in that large frame house is said to own fifty apartments in Tacoma. I had a glint in my eye. I intended to wear him down.

Once again I said, hopefully, "Hello there. I'm back. Any apartments today?"

"Yes," he said, "I have two."

"I'll take one," I said promptly.

"Any children?" he inquired cautiously.

"One—a boy, two and a half years old."

"Oh, I'm sorry. We don't take children." He didn't sound the least bit sorry.

I had heard all the arguments against children a thousand times. They tear up things—they need a place to play. Yes, but my baby needed a place to live first! I thought bitterly, "I guess you were born grown-up!" Aloud I said, "Would you like to have me drown him? Then could I have the apartment?" I was mad enough to hit him.

He looked as though he might be considering the idea, but I just couldn't bear the thought of drown-

Here Is the Writer . . .

Louise Scott Wrigley

The "Louise Scott Wrigley" by-line is not an unfamiliar one to "Herald" readers, although it usually appears with a poem. Louise is a regular contributor to "Stepping Stones" and "Zion's Hope" also. She is vitally interested in the Blue Bird program, and, while in Independence, directed the Blue Bird chorus and taught expression. In her spare time, she planned showers and parties (a very profitable hobby) and helped out at the Herald Publishing House on rush days. The helpful husband in the accompanying story is First Lieutenant John Wrigley (Medical Detachment, 23rd Infantry); "Pookey" is John, Jr.

were to live to regret that blithe refuge of shelter.

Firmly ensconced in an attractive motel bungalow, I was disgustingly

Horizons

ing our Pookey who trusted us, so I turned on my heel and left.

The search continued. It was now six weeks since I had so eagerly driven into Tacoma for the first time. Finally a major and his wife, who were leaving for overseas, mentioned that we might get their house. When I talked to the owner about it, she said, "Children? We love them. We even fenced in the yard for any little ones we might have around. Of course you can have the house."

I nearly fainted.

Well, we are all moved in. The house is a converted garage with a living room, kitchen, bath, a large bedroom for us, and a tiny bedroom for Pook. The owners have done everything possible to make it charming and livable. We have a sneaking suspicion they are angels in disguise.

Of course our problems aren't over. The first thing that confronted me was a wood stove. I approached the thing with something like panic, for nowhere in my background of experience was there a wood stove.

I reasoned that it would probably have a mind of its own. Believe me, it did! One evening my helpful husband, with an eye on the chocolate chip cookies I was stirring up, built a fire. Being a little over-anxious, he built too hot a fire. The oven temperature shot up to 600° and my first sheet of cookies was burned to a crisp. After the rest of the batch was safely in the cooky jar, we could laugh about it though. I only dream occasionally about the shortening I wasted.

And then there are our mice! Every night they scamper around between the walls as though Satan himself were after them. They sound like an army bent on bringing the house down around our ears. In spite of that, we are very happy here. The wood stove and I understand each other. The mice and I have declared a truce. The ones that have escaped me stay clear of my kitchen where baited traps await them, and I, of necessity, let them go on living in my walls with a minimum of protest. After all, we all have to have somewhere to live!

The Trouble-Shooter

The Reluctant Church-Goer

QUESTION:

My fiance is a Latter Day Saint, but he does not attend church. He is very gracious about taking me to services and coming for me when church is over, but when I suggest that he come with me, he always insists that he has to do something else or simply says, "I'd rather not." Inasmuch as I have always been active in League, choir, and church school work, I find it disconcerting not to have him an enthusiastic worker, too. Is there any way I can tactfully convert my future husband into a "church-goer"?

ANSWER:

By Evangelist Ray Whiting

My heart goes out in sympathy to the writer of this question and thousands more who are in a similar position. In a way, this is one of my problems, too, for as an evangelist I am deeply concerned over our many members who do not attend church. But the situation is not hopeless. The problems, to a large extent, can be solved. The source of the difficulty may not lie in the individuals at all but in the very services they refuse to attend.

No one, especially an energetic young man with life before him and a lovely bride in view, would refuse anything that would help him to succeed and assure him happiness in his home if he could see in it that which would bring him these blessings. But people in every church are tiring of going to Sunday school and church out of a sense of duty. And Latter Day Saints are tired of hearing the same old, shopworn ideas on the some old subjects, with no new knowledge, light, or inspiration.

I have discovered that our youth are not much concerned about what happened in ancient America, but they are vitally concerned about what is happening in modern America. Nor are they much worried over when the Gadianton Robbers appeared, but they are worried over the Gadianton Robbers that are appearing in our present political and economic system. I find little interest in the Nephite migration northward, but a great interest in the Latter Day Saint migration Zionward. Some think they have spent too much time discussing the golden age of the Nephite history, and too little time in actually doing something to bring about their own golden age. And others are tired of years of talking about stewardships, but would gladly become stewards in some intelligent church-sponsored economic program.

If you want to interest your prospective husband in his own church, organize a group of young people that will do something concrete about their own lives and their problems, such as developing a small industry which will furnish employment and income for the lean days ahead. Or let the group buy a tract of land for future security, or promote a building program so that when a man marries he won't need to put his wife in a house trailer or a renovated chicken coop. Promote these or one of a hundred other co-operative movements which are being sponsored by the youth of other churches, and watch the interest grow within the group while antagonism grows without.

The Apostle John tells us God loved us so much that he sent his Son, that we who really believe in him might not perish on the earth. And when the Son came, he said he came so that we might live bounteously, and he commanded us to seek first to build up a community life in which right relationships could be established, and the promise was that in this community the needful things would be added. In Acts we are told that when the gospel was fresh and unchanged, it had to do with lands and houses and money and the needs of people. In latter day revelation we are told that it is still God's purpose to provide for his Saints.

Yes, start something like this in your group of young people and you will have a hard time keeping up with the young man in your life as he heads for church.

But I will not deny that Christ shall be born into the world as a little babe and shall die for the sins of men.

Sebus: No, no, we shall trust him, though this night we shall be slain. (All pass from the stage. Music resumes. Nephi slowly enters, walks to center stage with head drooped. He lifts his head as music ceases.)

Nephi (with emotion): Oh, the evils and the wickedness of this people. Why do they harden their hearts against these things? I will bow down and pray unto my God, yea, I will pray all the day long in behalf of my people; yea, those who are about to be destroyed because of their faith in the traditions of their fathers. (He kneels, soft music resumes, and curtain closes slowly.)

Reader: And it came to pass that when Nephi saw the wickedness of his people, his heart was exceeding sorrowful insomuch that he cried mightily unto the Lord all that day. (Curtains part revealing Nephi still praying.)

Voice: Nephi! Lift up your head! Be of good cheer! For behold the time is at hand, and on this night shall the sign be given, and on the morrow come I into the world, to show to the world that I will fulfill all that which I have caused to be spoken by the mouth of my holy prophets.

Nephi looks up, rises to his feet, sings feelingly, No. 121 Hymnal, the first stanza as it is and the second thus:

Praise the Saviour, all ye nations,
Praise him, all ye host above;
Shout, with joyful acclamations,
His divine, victorious love.

ACT III.

SCENE I. The sign given by Samuel, the Lamanite prophet, comes to pass.

Reader: And behold at the going down of the sun there was no darkness; and the people began to be astonished, because there was no darkness when the night came. There were many who had not believed the words of the prophets who fell to the earth and became as if they were dead, for they knew that their great plan of destruction which had been laid for those who had believed in the words of the prophets had been frustrated, for the sign which had been given was already at hand, and they began to fear because of their iniquity and unbelief.

And it came to pass that the sun did rise in the morning again, according to its proper order; and they knew it was the day that the Lord should be born, because of the sign which had been given.

(Curtains part revealing happiness and joy.)

Onihah: Oh, our lives have been spared, and we have lived to behold this day.

Sebus: Yea, what blessings are ours, our joys are complete, glad tidings of great joy have indeed come to us.

Naphtali: And many of those who did not believe have now repented of their sins, and they desire to be forgiven and to be baptized unto the Lord.

Abinadi: Yea, and many now are in search of Nephi, desiring that he should baptize them for the remission of their sins. Yea, that all might be brought to the full realization of the power, the glory, and the honor of God!

Naphtali (pointing off-stage excitedly): Look! Behold in the east, the sun hath arisen, this is another day.

Leahoni: Truly the sun hath risen again, yet all night long it has been as if it were day.

Onihah: Yea, this is the day that Christ is to be born, according to the sign that has been given.

(Music of hymn No. 136 softly.)

Sebus (with hand up to ear): Hark! I hear singing, angels singing from on high. (A chorus breaks into singing three stanzas of hymn No. 136.)

Hagoth (steps forward pointing heavenward): Look! Look! The Star! A new star appears! Did not Samuel, the Lamanite, say there would be a new star appear, such a one as we have never beheld? (All gaze intently at the star.)

Nephi: Yea, to us is born this day in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. And if we could follow this star over mountain and plain and sea, it would lead us to the place where the Christ child lay.

(Either solo, duet, or chorus sing No. 172, Zion's Praises, all three stanzas, making the following changes: In the first stanza change "Beth le hem's" to "Zara hem la's" and "shepherds" to "Nephites." In the third stanza change "wise men" to "Nephites" and "Bethlehem" to "Zarahemla's.")

SCENE II. (A short selection of music may be played while stage is being prepared for scene two. Or it could be done while the last song was being sung. The vision may either be a large painted picture of the Nativity at rear of stage or made up of people, with Joseph, Mary with babe in her arms or in a manger. As the curtains are drawn, singers hum "Silent Night, Holy Night," very softly. Samuel is sitting on the stage in meditation, at the side opposite from the scene. The lights are out. The spot is upon him. He slowly raises his head as if to listen to the singing. The spotlight then slowly shifts to the vision. He sees the vision of Mary and the babe before him. He rises to his feet.)

Samuel (breathlessly): Ah, a vision. 'Tis a vision of the Lord. (The singers begin singing the words. Samuel reaches out to the vision, takes a step forward and remains till curtains close after singing ceases. Hymn No. 147.)

CURTAIN

(All players assemble on stage, not obstructing the vision, as curtains part, sing joyfully the Christmas carol, as it is in the book of Carols, "Joy to the World.")

A COMMENTARY ON THE Doctrine and Covenants

By F. HENRY EDWARDS OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

The Book of Doctrine and Covenants holds a high place in the esteem and affection of our people. It is the Word of God to our dispensation. To it we look for guidance on major questions of thought and conduct. Our people will find this Commentary an important help in their study.

The book is suitable alike for group and class study, and for private work. It is of especial importance to the priesthood, whose duty it is to understand that they may properly guide, instruct, and lead the people of the church. Now it has been enlarged and revised in some parts, and improved in a number of ways.

A Heritage

By Mrs. E. B. Blett

When the silver cords are broken
And the soul shall take its flight
To the land of light and gladness,
Where there will be no more night
Will a mother's heart still linger
With her children here below,
Pleading always for God's mercy,
To be with them where they go?

For they, too, must meet temptations,
Pain and sorrow hard to bear;
But a mother's prayers will lift them,
To a Heavenly Father's care,
Trusting He will ever guide them,
No matter where they roam,
Until at last we meet together
In a place we may call home.

The Saints' Herald is the official publication of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, with headquarters at The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, and is issued through the offices of Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage Street, Independence, Missouri.

Entered as second-class matter at the post office at Independence, Missouri, under Act of March 3, 1879. Issued weekly at Independence, Missouri. Price $2.25 per year and $1.15 for six months in advance in the U. S. A., its territories and possessions; Canada $2.50 per year and $1.30 for six months; other countries, $3.25 per year. Notice of a change of address must be given three weeks ahead of the date that it is to become effective. Accepted for mailing at the special rate of postage provided for in section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized July 21, 1921. Printed in the United States of America.

All checks for subscriptions to church papers, or for books and other materials sold at the Church Bookstore, should be made payable to Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

Suggestions to writers: Typewritten scripts, double-spaced, are preferred. Keep carbon copies to protect against loss. All articles and letters should be signed by writers. Please avoid use of post cards. News letters should be signed, approved by pastors, and should concern only church activities and workers. We find it necessary to edit most articles, and to condense news. No charge is made for one printing of the usual announcements of church meetings, births, marriages, and deaths; no memorial verse is used. Bulletin Board notices should be in our office at least ten days before date of publication. We cannot accept commercial or personal advertising. Articles for publication are gladly received, but there is no provision to pay for them. Those that relate to church work, doctrine, general cultural and educational subjects, personal development, etc., will be considered on basis of contents and literary merit. Writers should feel free to make independent presentations of their views, but should avoid criticism of the work of other writers appearing in these columns.

Letters: All letters and money for subscriptions and books should be addressed to Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage, Independence, Missouri. Articles and letters for publication should be sent to the same address, and marked "The Editors." Letters for all general church offices should be sent to The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Checks or Money Orders for contributions made to the General Church should be issued in the name of the Solicitor, Bishop's Agent, or Bishop in the district or stake in which the contributor lives.

If circumstances or conditions are such that it is more convenient to send contribution direct, Money Orders or checks should be issued in favor of The Presiding Bishopric, and mailed to The Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

This includes contributions for tithing, surplus, offering, oblation, Christmas offering, Auditorium, College Day, and The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

A Little Bit of Zion

While others talk of the way to Zion—their way—

I shall tend my own home fires,
Hang clean curtains at shining windows,
And set good meals on a gay table.

There shall be time enough here for all,
And love enough,
And the laughter of a baby
Shall bless its walls.

There shall be sympathy and understanding
For all who seek it.
There shall be family prayer
To keep us close to God.

There shall be a warm-hearted sharing with our children
And their friends.
Each joyous holiday or birthday will add its own sweetness
To the richness of our lives.

I shall work hard and long,
And who knows—
One day I may find a little bit of Zion
Beneath my own roof.

—Louise Wrigley

P. S.

It's Christmas all right. . . there is plenty of evidence in every store window; the sidewalks are crowded with shoppers loaded to eye-level with sundry bags and packages, and "little people" with nickels and dimes held tightly between thumbs and forefingers stand on tiptoe at the toy counters, wishing they could buy the big trucks and dolls instead of the smaller ones. Even the calendar says it's almost Christmas—but the weather doesn't! The past two weeks, in this fair city at least, have been April in December. For a while it looked like fate vs. John L. Lewis, but now that the strike is over, that theory doesn't hold true. Well, there's still a chance, but if something doesn't happen soon, we who are dreaming with Mr. Berlin of a white Christmas are going to be mighty disappointed.

Strange, isn't it, that Christmas carols never lose their popularity? Each year we sing "Silent Night" and "The First Noel" and "Oh, Come, All Ye Faithful" with as much enthusiasm as we did when we learned them for our first Christmas program. Always there are the same reassuring tones that make the singer and the listener grateful to be sharing in another season of remembering the Bethlehem story. Maybe it would be good for us to include an occasional carol in our song services throughout the year. —It's so easy to forget the warm feeling of peace and good will that comes with Christmas, we could stand more than just an annual reminder.

This Christmas is going to be the nicest ever for a lot of people. There will be bigger and better family reunions than any time since the war. Instead of saying "Merry Christmas" with a package not exceeding five pounds in weight and containing no perishables, Mother can serve a twenty-pound turkey fresh out of the oven to her boy for Christmas dinner, and Dad can match capacities with him at the table. Lots of youngsters are finding out for the first time what it is to have a father at Christmas. It is for them we are most glad. Whatever our individual role in the great Christmas pageant may be, we can look at them and be happy because this is their shining hour.

Food for Thought: The person who stoops to get even is rarely able to stand up straight again.

A Christmas Message

As we approach the anniversary of the birth of our Saviour, we extend to all our very best wishes for a Christmas made happy by glad fellowship with loved ones under the benign influence of the Lord Jesus Christ.

It is probable that never before have men all over the world been so hungry for the coming of peace on earth, good will toward men. For many, many people the grim meaning of war is not a memory but a current heartbreaking experience. For many others the threat of war has already cast its shadow across the brightness of the coming years. There is scant peace on earth, since there is so little invincible good will. Even in this land, so richly blessed of heaven, the hearts of many are failing them for fear.

Yet we would remind you that it was in a day which knew many parallels to our worst fears that the Son of God chose to be born, and so to set forth before all mankind his declaration of the matchless love of God and his revelation that an outcast child might still embody in his baby self the wonder and glory of Divinity. And it was not long thereafter that John affirmed with bated breath, "We beheld his glory," and Peter echoed, "We were eyewitnesses of his majesty."

In the light of the great things which God has done for men throughout history, and out of the richest treasurers of our own experience, therefore, we bid you be of good cheer. There is much to be done, but we are laborers together with God. There are giant evils to be overcome, but we go forth in the strength of his might. The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but they are mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds. The issues of time and of eternity are in his hands. The "good tidings of great joy" which shall be to all people is not the word of some further advance in the realm of physical science. It is still the word that unto us was born that day, in the city of David, "a Saviour who is Christ the Lord."

The work of the church is definitely onward, and our hearts are warmed by the knowledge that many of you to whom these greetings are addressed are daily offering your lives as gifts to Jesus the Lord, and that as a result of your offering, many are being won to faith and service. There is a splendid spirit in the councils of the church, and we accept this as a prophecy of the enlightened unity for which we strive and through which the spirit of Christmas can be carried through the years.

May the rich blessings of heaven be with you all.

Your servants for Christ's sake,
ISRAEL A. SMITH,
JOHN F. GARVER,
F. HENRY EDWARDS.

JUNE WHITING LEA

The personal regard which accompanies and warms our relations with members of the HERALD staff has made the passing of Sister June Lea, wife of our managing editor, an occasion of more than ordinary sadness for the members of the Presidency. Each of us had known June for more than a quarter of a century, and each of us had worked with her in college, community, or General Church affairs. We shall miss her able contribution in many ways. Among other things, we shall miss the sense of security which was ours as editors of the HERALD by reason of the fact that on the few occasions when her husband was indisposed, Sister Lea was ready and qualified to step into his place until he was again able to shoulder the burden.

Sister Lea was a member of the Whiting family, and therefore a descendant of early members of the group which followed Alpheus Cutler for a time and which settled in and around Clitherall, Minnesota, before many of them came into the Reorganization. She was related by blood to Birch Whiting, Ray Whiting, J. D. Anderson, and other prominent and devoted ministers, and with them illustrated the rich contribution which can be made by a single family whose members are true to the faith through the generations.

Brother Lea is obviously being strengthened to carry the heavy burden of this dark season by his own firm faith. This faith has not changed the stark fact of his loss, but we have confidence to believe that it is giving him hope and courage plus something even more abiding. We feel sure that through his faith God is even now blessing this ultimate trial to our brother's eternal good, and that in time the somberly beautiful tones which grief gives to love will be sounded forth to the good of the work so deeply cherished by our Brother and Sister.

Christmas Bells

Listen to the bells of Christmas
Ringing in the morning skies,
"Come, oh, come," they gently call us,
"To the place where Jesus lies."

"Bleating sheep and cattle lowing
Still the new-born baby's cry—
Mingled with the tender humming
Of the Virgin's lullaby."

"Wise men travel over deserts
Till they find the lowly place;
Shepherds kneel in adoration,
Worshipping with humble grace."

Through the ancient years we wander
To the stable of His birth,
And we hear the angels singing
"Peace, good will to all the earth."

Bells of Christmas softly chiming,
Tell the story once again—
Bring the message of the angels
Into troubled hearts of men.

The Christmas Guest ☆ ☆ ☆

by MARGARET SPERRY

IT WAS CHRISTMAS EVE. All the houses on the block were lighted; Christmas trees and candle wreathes were reflected colorfully on the snow outside the windows.

It was nine o'clock, and the street was lined with parked cars, for almost every family was giving a party, or at least entertaining guests. Only one person was visible; a tall, spare man standing hesitantly at the corner, as if wondering whether or not to turn down this particular street.

At last he pulled his overcoat more closely about his tall body and started down the sidewalk, leaning forward a little as he faced the chill wind.

He turned up the walk at the first house. If anyone could have seen his face closely in the shadow of the closed front door, he would have seen the gentle, patient face of a man who wonders what his reception will be—not the face of an invited party guest in cheerful anticipation of the activity on the other side of the door.

Slowly the man reached for the bell.

The host, an enormous man with a round, jovial face, called out in a booming voice: "Come right on in!"

The stranger hesitated. "Is this a birthday party?" he asked.

The host laughed heartily. "He asks me if it's a birthday party! Wonder how he got loose!" Still laughing, he closed the door.

THE NEXT FRONT DOOR opened before he reached the steps. A little girl rushed out, then started back in disappointment. "I saw someone coming," she explained, "and I thought it might be Santa Claus. He's coming tonight, you know."

"Are you having a party for Santa?" the man asked kindly.

"Oh, no," she replied, "it's just a family gathering, but Santa always comes and gives presents to us."

"Sounds as if it might be someone's birthday," the man continued.

"Oh, no, it's just Christmas."

"What is Christmas," he wanted to know.

"Well, it's a day on which everyone gives presents to his friends and relatives. And I guess it is someone's birthday. It's the anniversary of Christ's birth."

"Is Christ coming to his party?"

"Of course not. How could anyone invite him to a party? He's been dead for hundreds of years."

"Who was Christ anyway, that his birthday should be celebrated for so long?"

"Oh, he was the Son of God. But he was crucified. You ought to go to church tomorrow and hear about him."

The man smiled, said a polite "Thank you," and turned away.

He had stopped at every door, so he was rather weary when he reached the last house on the street.

IT WAS A SMALL COTTAGE, and the Christmas tree at the window was the smallest in the block.

A bright-eyed girl of about eight answered his light knock.

"Merry Christmas!" she called. "Come right in."

"I've been looking for Christ's birthday party," he explained.

"This is it," she assured him.

A little surprised, he walked on in.

A little old lady, with eyes as bright as the girl's, sat by the open fire. She got up quickly and extended her hand.

"Welcome to Christ's birthday party," she said warmly. "We were so afraid no one would come."

"Did you invite anyone?" the man asked.

"Why, yes, we did. We invited Christ. And we said that if he couldn't come, we'd like for him to send us some hungry stranger. Are you hungry?"

"Yes, I am."

Plates for three were already laid on the small round table with its red-checkered cloth. The elderly woman raised the lid from a fat round pot waiting on an electric grill and ladled out three big bowls full of thick, fragrant stew.

"What is it?" the man asked, sniffing the pleasant aroma.

The old lady laughed. "It's my own recipe. There are twenty different kinds of vegetables in it, and plenty of butter. I call it my 'Cow-in-the-garden' stew."

She had managed to keep the pot at just the right temperature for eating—not hot enough to burn, just a pleasant warmth to the palate and stomach.

For several minutes no one spoke. Then the stranger said, "There's something I'd like to know. How did you go about inviting Christ to his birthday party? Someone up the street told me he was dead."

THE OLD WOMAN gave a disgusted snort.

"That's the trouble with the world today! They think God created the world, later sent his Son down among men. Then they seem to think that God and Christ both died. So they're trying to run the world in their own selfish way. If they'd put the world back into the hands of God and Christ, they'd find the way to peace. Didn't the angels sing at Christ's birth: 'Peace on earth, good will toward men'? Christ brought peace, but the world refused to accept it. They don't even accept him. Believing in him doesn't mean anything, if they think he is dead!"

Her eyes snapped and blazed. "Too many people think of Christ as I think of my little dog that died last month. I think my dog is dead—so I don't expect him to chase rats out of the basement any more. Human beings think Christ is dead—so they don't expect him to chase the 'human rats' out of the world. But he will some day, I think! You asked me how I invited Jesus Christ to my party?" she smiled, and the sweet look came back into her face. "I prayed to him. That's what!"

When the clock chimed eleven, the man rose to leave.

The old woman and the straight young girl stood together in the doorway as he faded into the darkness. They smiled understandingly at each other as his soft voice floated back to them, seeming to be a part of the wind and the night: "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me."

Christmas

by FLORENCE W. SIMMONS

*Oh, holy night!
That touched the candles of the earth
With perfect light,
Again, again! your rapture sing!
Thy fire makes altars of each hearth,
On Christmas eve thy peace bewing;
White doves before each humble lintel top.*

*Oh, holy night!
Whose stars proclaimed the gift sublime,
Thy heavenly paean indite—
Again, again! each kneeling heart,
With love divine,
To all who homage here, impart Christmas! Christmas!*

Lost and Found

A Christmas Story

by NORMA ANNE KIRKENDALL

IT WAS the eighth bomb. Once again scientists set up their complicated instruments to measure the stress and strain, the effect on flora and fauna, and seismographs were disconnected for the duration of the blast. The only thing to be different about this atom-bomb test was the locale of the explosion—this time over the north pole, as isolated a spot as anyone could imagine. The newspapers carried a quarter-column story of the preparations, and Molotov insisted on a Russian inspection of the site; otherwise the whole procedure was a mere repetition of former tests. The date was set as June 25.

You saw the pictures. The same mushroom cloud appeared, the same smoke, the same atmospheric pressure. One month later the test was forgotten except in a passage in the Congressional Record by Senator Sott, whose grandson got hurt by a roman candle on the fourth of July. The good senator had a theory that all gunpowder should be voted out of existence.

Two months later there was a sandstorm in Kansas, and one farmer remarked that maybe it had been caused by the bomb. Three months later Mayor O'Dwyer's favorite cat died, and Billy Rose remarked that her passing was as monumental as the last atomic bomb. By October 25, the bomb was ignored even by the historians.

After the Thanksgiving turkey hash was finished, most mothers reluctantly began to get ready to take the kiddies to see Santa Claus. Dad began to calculate the strength of his Christmas-saving account, and even little brother began to wear a forced angelic look.

THEN IT HAPPENED. Walter Winchell scooped the world: "Good evening Mr. and Mrs. North and South America and all the ships at sea. Your reporter today was informed that there will be no Christmas this year. Think of that—no yule log, no angel hair, no candy canes."

The news was stupendous. Reuters immediately confirmed the fact that Father Christmas was not to be found in England, Pere Noel was absent from France, San Nicolaas had disappeared from Holland, Kriss Kringle was shunning Germany, Babouscka was not in Russia, and the Italian police were on the hunt for Belfana. The Hearst papers syndicated the story that Santa Claus was in seclusion and would not admit reporters.

The stationers packed up their huge stock of greeting cards, and confectioners piled away their sugar sacks. Many big department stores had to close their doors, and most drug stores were compelled to return to the policy of selling drugs.

You can imagine the bedlam. Fathers at first felt huge relief in the pocketbook area, and mothers breathed a sigh of freedom from shopping fever. The children were not as easily placated, for visions of sugar plums and electric trains are not easily erased. The snow fell, but nobody dared sing Irving Berlin's "I'm Dreaming of a . . ." hit.

Public opinion soon condemned the violators. One woman in Iowa made Christmas cookies, an old maid in Georgia was seen dressing a doll, and a beautiful park was planned in Washington to use up the unwanted Christmas trees. December 25 came and passed with only a tiny tinge of nostalgia. The press condemned a group of Christmas fanatics who insisted on exchanging gifts, although every man suspected his neighbor of surreptitiously hanging up his stocking.

By the time another year came, only the aged grandmothers remembered. The Dies committee had tried all of its cases except the man who claimed he knew that the government was keeping a Christmas-tree light among the gold bars at Fort Knox. The next year Funk and Wagnall condescended to add another word to their dictionary: "Christmas, an extinct custom among civilized tribes." Somehow the calendar lost its meaning, for never again in the following decade did you see a sign: "Thirty shopping days until . . ."

I WATCHED this happen, nor was I immune to this international trend. Somehow my days went by too fast, and I was saving up my money for a newer superultra streamlined rocket ship. One scientifically-controlled perpetual spring-time day, I found that the helicopter mail-robot had brought me a cute plastic engraved invitation to drop over for tea to visit my friend in Tel Aviv. With nothing to do before the opera in London that evening, I decided to accept. Atmospheric conditions caused me to overshoot my mark, and I landed in the ancient and tumbledown city of Jerusalem.

I started out on foot to look for a U-Drive It rocket shop, or a sky taxi, but that spot was curiously deserted. I walked among the antiquated buildings and saw no person. Finally I heard a sound as of mumbling and followed it to its source. There I saw an old man kneeling in a queer attitude—I searched my mind for a word of description, yes, I had it—"prayer." He was a funny, fat little old man, dressed in red and white, with big boots and a long white beard. His cheeks were red and wrinkled as if he had laughed a lot in his younger days. I stood silently, and presently he turned toward me with a searching look.

"What are you doing?" I said. "Have I met you before?"

"Yes, my child, in your youth," he replied.

"Why are you here amid these ruins?" I asked.

"Because they are ruins," he answered with sadness reflected in his quivering voice.

And then I knew him, for the Britannica had a picture in its section on ancient history.

"You are Santa Claus," I exclaimed, and a sudden smile lighted up his face.

"What in the world were you praying for?" and "Why are you here?"

There was wisdom in his accent, and he said, "I was praying to the Christ child. Yes, I'm old-fashioned I know, but we have so much in common. We each stood for love for our fellow men, and I was a symbol of that love. Parents gave gifts to show parental affection; children shared toys to prove brotherhood. We brought happiness. Love always bring happiness."

His words touched me, and I softly questioned him again, "Then why did you leave us without happiness?"

Once more he smiled and haltingly explained, "I did not leave of my own accord. Commercialism and selfishness actually displaced me. The nations thought more of the strength of arms than of their salvation, and both the Christ child and I found ourselves forgotten."

He turned his gaze toward the wall, and I too saw his altar—a manger with shimmering white swaddling clothes draped over its side. Somehow forgotten chords

Priority

THE HOUSING SHORTAGE AT BETHLEHEM

By Grace L. Krahl

WE HAVE heard a great deal the past few months about the housing shortage in our country.

We shall hear at this season of the year in story and song of another housing shortage that occurred in a foreign land many centuries ago. It was in Bethlehem of Judea where two prospective guests, Joseph and Mary from Nazareth, sought lodging and found there was "no room at the inn." Fellow travelers who had preceded them had secured priority rights and maintained them, for no one was disposed to waive his claim of shelter to the young expectant mother and Joseph.

It was an untimely call, seemingly, to leave Nazareth then; but the decree of Caesar Augustus had gone forth that a census be taken of all his subjects in the kingdoms and provinces of his empire, that he might know the number of soldiers he could levy, and that he could acquire a list of citizens for the concealed purpose of taxation, later. Therefore it was imperative that Joseph and Mary should return to their home town of Bethlehem where they were inscribed and where they must now register.

BUT THERE had gone forth another decree, this one from a divine source: "For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a welled into my heart, and once more I heard the wondrous words:

Oh, come all ye faithful, come let us adore Him,"

All is calm, all is bright
In this dark street shineth,
The everlasting light.

And then I knew:

The hopes and fears of all the years,
Were met in Him that night.

Saviour which is Christ the Lord." Bethlehem was in the environs of Jerusalem, situated some six miles southwest of the city, and was known as the "City of David," because it was the scene of that king's early life. And then there was the utterance of the Prophet Micah which must be fulfilled: "But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting." —Micah 5: 2.

Doubtless it was these contemplations that made the journey from Nazareth to Bethlehem less arduous, and exclusion from the inn was received with resignation, though with perplexity.

What expectant mother of today would hazard even those few miles in the manner Mary did? Although the slow-footed ass was the customary means of transporting travelers, it was nonetheless laborious and inconvenient. A mattress was strapped on the animal's back where Mary sat; necessary provisions in leathern bags were slung over his shoulders, and with these few accessories, and the stalwart Joseph walking at the side, they reached their destination.

There were other virgins in Judea, but perhaps none so sweet, so amiable, and devoted as the chosen Mary. And then the Christ child must descend from the lineage of Abraham and David, which was her ancestry.

Attached to the inn, arched stalls were provided for the beasts of the guests, if there were any, and to one

Mother and Child

THE smell of popcorn in the air, the crisp, December air, Excited voices, happy faces, people everywhere,
The gaiety of mistletoe, the waxy green of holly,
Children shouting on their sleds; who could not be jolly?

From the windows, every one, the candles' burning glow
Sends its friendly greeting through the softly falling snow;
Lighted trees and tinsel sparkling through the evergreen,
Age-old carols, strangely new, echo the Christmas scene.

A thousand wondrous things so full of mystery and fun,
That I fain would capture all of them and give them to my son;
To him I'll emphasize, not Santa Claus, but giving,
The simple joy of sharing toys and gracious, happy living.

He needn't know not long ago the world was bathed in blood,
And brothers slain (who said in vain?) could not hold back the flood;

Among his toys on Christmas morn there'll be no tank or gun,
He must learn peace, tomorrow's man, today my little son.

Our Christmas holds so much this year, so much that's good and true,

Above the clouds, so newly rift, the star is shining through;
Within my heart a bright new hope has stirred, so strange and wild,

Perhaps this year the world will hear the story of the Child.

The Curriculum of the Modern Prophet

By J. A. Koehler

Number 16 in a series of radio addresses on the subject:
"The Social Philosophy of the Modern Prophet"

ONCE ASKED an ecclesiastic what the church had to say about the labor problem. He replied, "The church says a man should do a fair day's work for a fair day's pay." Whereupon I asked, "And what does the church say a fair day's work is? and what is a fair day's pay?" I also asked some more followup questions, whereupon that ranking churchman excused himself from further discussion of the labor problem on the grounds that the course of studies of his church does not explore the field in which that problem lies.

If that were a true representation of the whole church situation, the impotency of the church in the face of the modern world problem might be accounted for without further statement. For without question the church can do nothing effectual to resolve any problem if it does not understand it. And it can hardly understand it unless its thoughts are about it, or unless its studies explore the field in which that problem lies.

IF YOU wished to be a great physician, what course of studies would you pursue? Would it be architecture? or floriculture? or electrical engineering? Would it be politics? or business? or finance? It would not. You would pursue studies in the field of "medicine."

What would you seek to know about medicine? Would your engrossing concern be the identity of the parents and brothers and sisters of Galen and Hypocrates? Would you seek first to inform yourself about the sizes and shapes of the various containers in which apothecaries of old stored their drugs? You would not. You would study the human body, the diseases to which it is subject, the symptoms of those diseases, the ways of treating those diseases, and all such like. In other words you would seek the knowledges which physicians may put to practical uses. You would seek functional knowledges.

I have done studies for the Christian ministry. I learned a lot of things about Palestine and homiletics and apologetics and so on. My little cup was filled to overflowing with incidental ideas, the most of which no one can do much about. But about the business of "the Kingdom," and particularly about its establishment, I learned from my teachers little more than nothing. And if we may judge by the accomplishments of Christian churches in general, if we are to judge by the state of affairs of Christian peoples and nations everywhere, the other men who pursued those studies did not learn much more.

Perhaps we should not expect the church in all its parts to explore the field in which the modern world problem lies. It may be that some segments of the church, for reasons which it is not necessary to state here, should pursue less basic and less comprehensive studies. In any case we intend no invidious comparisons when we call attention to the curriculum of the modern prophet and say that our section of the church must pursue that course of studies if it is to fulfill its special mission.

THERE ARE three aspects of religious life: the personal, the ecclesiastical, and the civil. In the present stage of religious progress, or in the present state of religious affairs, one segment of the church may properly devote itself almost exclusively to the improvement of one or the other of these religious affairs. St. Paul was a church man. He lived in a church-building time. He was concerned more about the institutionalization of Christianity than anything else; though he did have much to say about the improvement of personality. But the circumstances of the children of Israel were such that Moses was engrossed primarily with the establishment of the civil-mode Kingdom. In the present circumstances of the Christian world, one church may properly have one principal object and another church another.

Observe that I do not say that Moses was engrossed exclusively with civil aspects of religion. Nor do I say that Jesus was engrossed with only personal affairs. Both Moses and Jesus were civil-mode Kingdom promoters. But one specialized in social affairs and the other in personal affairs, for the reason that that was the thing that needed to be done in the circumstances.

A CIVIL-MODE Kingdom-building church must have a care about personality even more than an ecclesiastical-mode Kingdom-building church must. Our church may not be less careful about what persons have in their hearts and minds to do about the total life situation, because it is a Zion-redeeming or civil-mode Kingdom-building church. If it is to fulfill its mission it must be more careful. Personality is a bigger question in the civil-mode Kingdom-building church than it is even in the church which is primarily or exclusively personal-mode Kingdom-building.

I believe that is the meaning of these two edicts: (1) "All those who humble themselves before God and desire to be baptized, and come forth with broken hearts and contrite spirits, and witness before the church that they have truly repented of all their sins, and are willing to take upon them the name of Jesus Christ, having a determination to serve him to the end, and truly manifest by their works that they have received the Spirit of Christ unto the remission of their sins, shall be received by baptism into the church"; and (2) "The elders or priests are to have sufficient time to expound all things concerning (this) church of Christ to their understanding, previous to their . . . being confirmed"

Those rules, in reason, must be interpreted in the light of "the message" of the modern prophet and in the light of the mission which his people is elected to fulfill. That mission is "to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion." So that "having a determination to serve him to the end" must mean having a determination to "seek to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion," or the civil-mode Kingdom. And have "sufficient time to expound all things concerning the church" must mean that the members of this church—the functioning parts of this church, that is—must understand the civil-mode Kingdom-building business.

THE BURDEN of teaching the laity rests upon the priesthood or clergy. The priesthood of this Church could not teach the laity "all things concerning the Church" unless it had been schooled in its distinctive doctrines, or in the social philosophy of this church.

That is the reason for the curriculum of the modern prophet, which embraces all studies that have to do with the total business of human living together, or with the conduct of the affairs of human society. See whether or not that is true as I read the outline of that course of studies.

"Teach ye one another the doctrine of 'the Kingdom' that ye may be instructed more perfectly in theory, in principle, in doctrine, in the law of the gospel, in all things that pertain unto the Kingdom of God, that is expedient for you to understand; of things both in heaven and on earth, and under the earth; things which have been; things which are; things which must shortly come to pass; things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and perplexities of nations; and the judgments which are on the land; and a knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms, that ye may be prepared" to fulfill your Zion-redeeming or civil-mode Kingdom-building mission:

Translate that language into the common language of today, and it will be found to embrace philosophy, science, political economy, the history of social institutions, current events, social trends, domestic and foreign affairs—in a word, everything that has to do with the business of peoples; which properly is the business of economic self-governance.

Now that is a comprehensive curriculum. But Restoration could no more complete itself without such a curriculum than the medical profession could perform its function within society without a course of studies which includes everything that is essential to the cure of diseases and the promotion of the health of the body.

A course of studies is an indication of the work to be done. So the curriculum of the modern prophet means (1) that the task of this Church is to establish the Kingdom of God in its civil mode; (2) that the state of affairs of the world must be understood, transfixed, in the light of the message of the modern prophet; and (3) that the message of that prophet must be understood in the light of the state of affairs in the world. It means, too, that this church has no time for "vain babbling," as St. Paul put it, about things that only "increase unto more ungodliness."

A church which would do the effectual thing to make civil society an embodiment of the will of God, must not be a surface-skimmer, it must not be a fusser about things that don't matter. It must know a lot of things about the organization of economic life. It must have a care about the basic ethical principles in which the affairs of civil society—especially the affairs of industry and government—must be established to avert an even greater calamity than that which has already come upon the world. And that is the reason for the curriculum of the modern prophet.

No one can study chemistry and see the wonderful way in which certain elements combine with the nicety of the most delicate machine ever invented, and not come to the inevitable conclusion that there is a Big Engineer who is running this universe.—Thomas Edison.

President Israel A. Smith in the News

From the Hamilton (Ontario) Spectator for November 27, the following news item is taken:

ISRAEL A. SMITH IS SPEAKER HERE

Israel A. Smith, president of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, with headquarters at Independence, Missouri, was speaker at the Hamilton Branch, 346 Wilson Street, last evening.

Mr. Smith, at the present time, is on a tour from the head office and is contacting the various branches throughout Canada and the United States.

In his speech to the congregation last evening, Mr. Smith gave a short background history of the Book of Mormon, Plurality in God, and of the misunderstanding of some about polygamy in connection with his grandfather, Joseph Smith.

The speaker spoke of the claims made by Utah Mormons regarding Joseph Smith's alleged connections with polygamy.

STARTED NEW RELIGION

"The principal trouble," said Mr. Smith, "is that the clergy of my grandfather's day resented the impudence of a man who dared to start another religion. My grandfather managed to obtain the Book of Mormon and made his revisions of the scripture. The world thought that this was terrible for him to try such a thing."

Mr. Smith stated that he was not concerned with what doctrines his grandfather had unless they were backed by the Church.

Speaking to the congregation in regard to Plurality in God, Mr. Smith said that there were no records to show that his grandfather, Joseph Smith, had brought this doctrine before the Church.

The speaker concluded his talk by saying that the Church has never taken any steps that it has had to back up from, and that it has never had to recant or apologize.

Mr. Smith was introduced by the pastor of the Hamilton Branch, E. M. Kennedy.

OH! LET ME SEE!

by LYDIA WIGHT

The young man was perplexed. He was teaching a class of boys—restless, inattentive boys, many of whom didn't listen to what he was saying. What could be the matter? He was full of his subject; he knew it well, and he told it, he thought, in an interesting manner. But even the eyes of those who were listening at times were drawn away by distractions.

He opened his briefcase, drew out a picture and held it up. Immediately came demands and questions: "Oh, let me see!" "Who's the man?" "Why does he look so sad?" "What's the matter with his clothes?" "And who are those others?"

Ah, now he has a reason for telling the good Samaritan story. And how they listen! Soon he draws out another picture. It shows a figure lying in the street and an automobile fast disappearing. That is all they need to talk freely of present-day strangers and thieves and good Samaritan opportunities.

That's one answer to lack of interest—capture the pupils' thoughts through their eyes as well as their ears. Movies are doing it. Public schools are doing it. Why, oh why, church workers, do we so easily abdicate the field of visual education thus favoring commercial recreation and advertising? Just because visual aids cost something in time and effort and money? Or is it because we are not actively aware of the variety to be had, or of their significance in religious education!

Let's get our thinking up to date. Read what Marvin McDole of the Herald Publishing House staff has to say in his article "Recent Trends in Visual Aids." It appears in the GUIDE-LINES TO LEADERSHIP for January, 1947. Order yours NOW.

Priority

of these enclosures Joseph and Mary were directed for temporary abode.

HERE THE Saviour was born. If his birth was mean on earth below, it was celebrated with hallelujahs by the heavenly host in the air above. "Glory to God in the highest" rang out over the hills of Bethlehem, shepherds hastened to where the Christ child lay, and Wise Men from the East brought their gifts in adoration.

But priority dwelt in the heart of the king, as in the heart of the peasant and the lord. There must be no other king but Herod, whose suspicions were aroused by the inquiries of the Wise Men: "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" Thus the flight of Joseph and Mary with the Christ child was made into Egypt.

Following the death of Herod, Joseph and Mary with Jesus returned to Nazareth where the child grew to manhood and waited upon the Lord for the time to declare his message. When his legal age to become a teacher arrived, he entered upon a ministry such as the world had never known. But, charged with blasphemy and disturbing the people, he was condemned to die upon the cross. And although it was customary at the yearly Passover to release a prisoner, priority fell to Barabbas, a robber. Christ who was sinless, of his divine love for mankind and of his own free will sacrificed his life as a ransom for sin.

Bethlehem gave him a manger for a cradle in his infancy. One day it will prepare for him a throne in his kingship.

"August 6, 1945, brought back normality however much believers may lose themselves in the engulfing fear of unbelievers. The normality which the atomic blasts over Japan brought back to Christian believers consists of the rightness, the correctness, of not only contemplating but also expecting world's end."—Dr. Wesner Fallaw.

It's Christmas...

www.LatterDayTruth.org

... for the 1,946th Time!

BY BILOINE WHITING

The great Christmas holiday is almost upon us. The list of things that we can't buy is longer than ever, more than the usual number of charities are besieging us for money, and the children still haven't learned their parts for the Christmas program. For most of us the holidays bring back annually rehashed memories of the dear, dead days when we were kids, (it always snowed more then) waiting breathlessly for the great morning. Oh, what a truly beautiful morning it was, after lying awake the greater part of the night to at last get up, sniff the exquisite odor of a Christmas tree, and with shaking fingers open the packages. If anything was "like Christmas," that was the highest possible tribute.

Then, somewhere in the painful process of growing up, we found that Christmas lost some of its original charm. The church pageant didn't take on the proportions of an M.G.M. technicolor, but was only a pantomime of the birth of the Son of God, with little boys in bathrobes, and bags of cheap candy for everyone under twelve years old. The stores that once seemed so full of everything beautiful now didn't have a thing we wanted; Christmas shopping was one big headache, and we were extremely glad when the whole business was over.

And yet, lest this profane the great holiday, let me hasten to say that we have been most sincere in our adoration of the infant Jesus. The drama of the scene has inspired our finest poetry and art; it has spurred us to take long pilgrimages, barefooted and otherwise, but it hasn't prompted us to look beyond the kneeling shepherds to the very next page in our Bibles where the boy Jesus asks, "Know ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

The "Father's business" has been interpreted in a number of ways. The Crusaders of the middle ages thought it meant regaining the Holy Land; modern Christians seem to think that it means sending a basket of fruit to the poor at Christmas; and Joseph Smith felt called to re-establish Christ's social doctrine that could, if only put into practice, bring peace on earth to men of good will. What overtones there should be in the Christmas message for a Latter Day Saint! Even the imagination of youth is staggered (and that is something) by the magnitude of the task entrusted to so few. If we seem so few marching to Zion as to be lost in the traffic, meditate on the power resident in that little babe lying in the most unpromising of all places, a barn. Who, other than an Old Testament prophet, would have dared to suggest that this infant was to change the course of human history?

It is Christmas again, for the 1,946th time since the angels first sang of peace on earth. Three billion children will not be feeling the delicious excitement that we knew on Christmas eve, and the sullen eyes of their parents refute the angel's message. Surely Christmas isn't going to be relegated to a habitual ceremony where we pass out a few alms under the emotional build-up of a beautiful service. Having weaned us from Santa Claus, Christ seems to be pleading with us to release him from the manger, and prove that he knew what he was talking about when he said, "I have come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly."

The Saints' Herald is the official publication of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, with headquarters at The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, and is issued through the offices of Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage Street, Independence, Missouri.

Entered as second-class matter at the post office at Independence, Missouri, under Act of March 3, 1879. Issued weekly at Independence, Missouri. Price $2.25 per year and $1.15 for six months in advance in the U. S. A., its territories and possessions; Canada $2.50 per year and $1.30 for six months; other countries, $3.25 per year. Notice of a change of address must be given three weeks ahead of the date that it is to become effective. Accepted for mailing at the special rate of postage provided for in section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized July 21, 1921. Printed in the United States of America.

All checks for subscriptions to church papers, or for books and other materials sold at the Church Bookstore, should be made payable to Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

Suggestions to writers: Typewritten scripts, double-spaced, are preferred. Keep carbon copies to protect against loss. All articles and letters should be signed by writers. Please avoid use of post cards. News letters should be signed, approved by pastors, and should concern only church activities and workers. We find it necessary to edit most articles, and to condense news. No charge is made for one printing of the usual announcements of church meetings, births, marriages, and deaths; no memorial verse is used. Bulletin Board notices should be in our office at least ten days before date of publication. We cannot accept commercial or personal advertising. Articles for publication are gladly received, but there is no provision to pay for them. Those that relate to church work, doctrine, general cultural and educational subjects, personal development, etc., will be considered on basis of contents and literary merit. Writers should feel free to make independent presentations of their views, but should avoid criticism of the work of other writers appearing in these columns.

Letters: All letters and money for subscriptions and books should be addressed to Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage, Independence, Missouri. Articles and letters for publication should be sent to the same address, and marked "The Editors." Letters for all general church offices should be sent to The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Checks or Money Orders for contributions made to the General Church should be issued in the name of the Solicitor, Bishop's Agent, or Bishop in the district or stake in which the contributor lives.

If circumstances or conditions are such that it is more convenient to send contribution direct, Money Orders or checks should be issued in favor of The Presiding Bishopric, and mailed to The Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

This includes contributions for tithing, surplus, offering, oblation, Christmas offering, Auditorium, College Day, and The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

 KINDNESS

Be very kind to those you love. You can never know when your time together will be cut short. Give them each day, as if that day were to be your last, the full measure of your love, respect, and consideration. Be assured that the time will come when they will pass away before you expect it, and they will be placed so far beyond your reach that though you shed oceans of repentant tears, you cannot wash out of memory the stain of a single hurt you have inflicted. And every bit of love and kindness will shine like stars in your night of sorrow and sustain you in the hard way you must walk alone.

Every bit of good you do carries its own recompense and reward, since it gives you an extra portion of happiness that you have shared in creating with another one of God's children; just as every wrong carries its own punishment for having caused a wound.

This life is so full of pain and struggle, much of it unavoidable, that it is tragic that any of us should add one bit to the vast burden of trouble resting on the shoulders of us all. Marriage is above all a great opportunity for two people to be kind and helpful to each other, and if each does his utmost to make the best of that opportunity every day of his life, all will go well.

Be very kind to those you love.

I held an electric light bulb in my hand. It was completely useless there for any purpose whatever, yet it was a good bulb. When I put it into the socket and turned the switch, it gave out a flood of light that enabled me to continue my work in the evening hours of darkness. The bulb can give no light unless it is attached to the source of power.

Suppose you have joined the church; it is comparable to the purchase of an electric light bulb. But do you live near the church? A light bulb cannot help you unless you live near the power line. Neither can a church.

Finally, you must go to church if you are to receive spiritual power, just as you must turn on the switch if you are to receive light.

In Retrospect

We look backward now and again for sake of a clearer projection of ourselves into the future. This we tend to do especially at this year's end as we move into another, or the New Year.

A more-than-usual year, 1946 has been to our people and movement. At its beginning we had with us the late President Frederick M. Smith, after thirty years of service as head of the church. He was not in good health, but no one of us anticipated that ere the General Conference convened, he would be taken from us by death. And yet after a few short weeks he walked with us no more.

Many things demanded attention. The General Conference was upon us. A new administration must be provided. The ministers and Saints of the church must be quickened for that which was to be done, both at once, and in days ahead. The Cause must go on.

In response to these challenges, the church officers and councils, and the General Conference arose, and their best was given to the tasks awaiting consideration. And when the test came in the conference in the selection of a successor to President Smith, unity and brotherhood characterized the occasion in marked degree. Associates for the new president were also chosen, and the remaining work of the conference was carried on and concluded in like harmonious spirit. The fraternity here manifested found its way out among the people of the church. The reunions were marked by the same response and fellowship, as were other gatherings of the church. The Appointee Institute held in late August and early September was without doubt, in spirit, in response on the part of the men in attendance, and in content of things taught, beyond anything the church had before done in this field of endeavor. Then came in September the Joint Council of First Presidency, Quorum of Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric with its far-reaching plans as cited in these columns October 26, the significance of which shall appear as they are put into effect in the years to come, to the strengthening of the church, its ministry, and its people.

The good spirit of the year is evidenced also in tithes and offerings in an amount to bring it well to the fore among the very best years of the church in this regard.

The church institutions have carried on in keeping with the pace set by the activities above mentioned. And to Graceland College has been called a devoted and outstandingly capable young man in the person of E. J. Gleazer, Jr., to serve here in the spirit and genius of his predecessors, and who is making a very fine start with full support of his fellow staff members.

All these things bode good. Their fruitage, however, is to be found only in painstaking, persistent, and intelligent endeavor on the part of a humble people, touched by the grace of God, and motivated by love for him and for their fellow men.

Thus have we as a people borne well the grief incident to the passing of our president of three decades, closed up our ranks for carrying on the Cause in which he was for so long and so capably joined with us, and given promise of diligence through the days ahead.

So has been 1946 for us as a church and people. What shall 1947 be?

THE following was recently received from Elder Almer W. Sheehy, pastor of the London, Ontario, Branch:

Your visit and ministry here on the occasion of the London Church anniversary has done immeasurable good already, and as the days come and go, such is being increased. Attendance, activities, baptisms, and priesthood visits have been spurred on by your ministry. You did a masterful piece of work in the presentation of your sermon on Sunday night, and all your ministry here was excellent.

On December 6 we had 181 people at a Victory Banquet. A check of $1,500 was presented to Bishop Dent, who will pass it on to the Presiding Bishop as final payment on our loan from the general church. This loan was made to purchase the annex. We have paid $6,900 in less than a calendar year and thereby paid in full for the annex. Besides this, we have kept up an operating budget of $3,700, and the tithing is $1,400 over 1945. The solicitor informs us that this year's tithing report is the best in the history of London Branch.

I am also pleased to report that the attendance is good and unity abounds. There will be at least five baptisms on December 29; there will be three calls to the priesthood presented to the branch in a business session on December 11. The membership is now over five hundred.

This good news from Brother Sheehy is in line with reports being received from almost every section.

I. A. S.

The monthly report of Elder H. J. Simons shows nine new members baptized in Flint, Michigan, on November 17. They were confirmed the following Sunday. Brother Simons also tells of the missionary work he has been doing at Otter Lake in addition to his ministry as pastor at Flint. The Otter Lake meetings constitute the first step in the attempt of the district presidency to revise the work in that area, and present indications are that these efforts are likely to be crowned with success.

Thoughts on Hearing "The Messiah"

THERE ARE many hopeful threads interwoven among all the apparently gloomy scenes in the tapestry of human history. One significant theme has been the great love which man has frequently revealed himself capable of bearing. When man has found Deity to worship and to challenge his best abilities, no gift or sacrifice has been too great for him to offer as proof of his devotion. Because man has been stirred by Jesus, he has made important contributions to civilization in service, architecture, literature, art, and music. Even those who lack creative abilities have learned to appreciate beauty in their reverence. Perhaps it is the prevalence of such love that lends pervasive appeal to Handel's oratorio, The Messiah.

Each year, literally thousands of performances of this masterpiece are given among English-speaking peoples at Christmas, yet the music never seems to lose its freshness or its appeal either for performers or for listeners. It is sung by the music lovers in small churches, by community choral groups, by great cathedral choirs, and by immense choruses occasioned by combing many choral organizations for a performance of The Messiah. Some of these groups have made a tradition of singing this work. One reads that some choruses have memorized the work so well from frequent rehearsing that they could give a creditable performance with only one copy of the music for every twenty singers. An expert has estimated that if the lowest royalty paid for musical work had been paid for presentations of The Messiah since its first rendition in London, it would have earned more than eight millions of dollars on British performances alone. What goes into the writing of a musical offering like this to make it so inspiring? It seems as though the answer is, "The best that a man has must be given unstintingly."

Handel, without making conscious preparation for his best-loved work, brought to the task a life of rich experience. His was an indomitable spirit. As a boy, he had to struggle against his father's wishes, for a musical career. That same spirit during all his life urged him through disappointment, success, bankruptcy, wealth, oblivion, popularity, jealousy, friendship, health, paralysis, and blindness. His spirit breathed hope and faith into his music. He traveled about the continent, studying and creating musical forms, listening to folk music, storing in his memory the tone coloring of instruments and voices in every conceivable combination. His failures and his successes taught him to recognize the pulse of public opinion. Such experiences showed him how to emphasize the message he wished to present. His operatic experience gave him a sense of the dramatic. He mastered the techniques of using recitative, air, and chorus. His religious training and the wisdom which he gained through his own suffering enabled him to appreciate to some degree the sacrifice and the example to be found in the life of Jesus. The Messiah proclaims his belief in Jesus as a Saviour. It sings his assurance of man's eventual salvation. Yet it took more than all of these valuable lessons of experience to create The Messiah.

Life for Handel looked dark in 1741. Bankrupt and unpopular, he faced the world. In the summer, the words for The Messiah were submitted to him for his approval. He began work in August. The first part of the oratorio was done in seven days, the second part he finished nine days later, added the third part in another six days, and spent two days filling in the instrumentation, a total of twenty-four days. He felt that the inspiration given to him in those busy days came from God. "I thought I did see all Heaven before me, and the great God Himself," said he of his experience when he wrote the "Hallelujah Chorus." Such lofty moments are to be cherished. Through his inspired writing he has given to all men a means of recapturing these moments of exaltation. Throughout the remainder of his life, he loved The Messiah above all his other works.

To create so wonderful an offering as this music for his God is ever a worthy aim for man. It enriches not only his own life, but the lives of all who are permitted to share its beauty. Who can deny that even the Creator himself is not interested in a gift when the giver says, as did Handel, "I should be sorry if I only entertained; I had hoped to make men better." That seems also to be the purpose of Deity.

Christmas Symphony

By LOUISE SCOTT WRIGLEY

As Earth, in cloak of snowflakes kneels
At Christmas prayers, a clear note steals Through midnight's stillness, drowsy, deep,
And melts into the town's calm sleep.
The soft, warm melodies begin,
Their bell-notes long and sweet and thin.
The silver-throated Christmas bells
Are ringing out! Their anthem swells
In joyousness and pure delight
Upon the cold and frosty night.
In praise and jubilation ring—
"The Prince of Peace is come," they sing.
And then a sweeter, softer strain
Breaks through—an old, beloved refrain.
Their music dies to whispers now
Yet leaves great echoes still, somehow.
And melting in pure harmony,
'Tis gone—this Christmas symphony.

The Fruits of the Spirit and the Little Foxes

By Reed M. Holmes

The Author is Pastor of the Boston Congregation

MY BOYHOOD DAYS were blessed with ample opportunity to enjoy the products of the orchards. We lived in the fruit country of the great Northwest. In the springtime we waited impatiently for the trees to burst into bloom. What is there to match the beauty of vast orchards in full blossom?

In the summer Bing cherries ripened first, and what a beginning! Then, as summer was transformed into fall, there were many other fruits to be enjoyed. The kitchen was a scene of constant activity as the orchards yielded their fruits to be canned and placed row upon row in well-stocked cellars.

In the winter, at bedtime, one member of the family was commissioned to bring up a bowl full of apples, and I shall never forget how we used to pare the peelings thin and long. My clumsy little fingers used to vie with the strong, sure hands of my father as our knives cut sparingly into those large Delicious, Winesap, or Jonathan apples. What a wonderful way to learn patience! Different kinds of fruit, with different flavors and different textures—each brought its own contribution to our pleasure.

BUT THERE is fruitage of a different type which brings greater satisfaction. The fruits that really make life worth living are those which bring lasting enjoyment. An apple may satisfy a momentary craving. Other fruits can tickle the taste buds for a while; but I'll take the fruits of the Spirit for lasting happiness.

Any thoughtful consideration of the world in which we live will bring realization that the fruits of the Spirit are desperately needed in our day. The world can stand a more equitable distribution of the fruits of the vine, too, for it is hungry physically. But we have a deeper craving, for the spirit and inclination which will bring security and good will among men.

And we who dream of a Zion know that it will never be realized nor enabled to fulfill its function until it is achieved first in our lives. Only as we acquire the basic virtues and thus become in character the type and prophecy of the kingdom of God, only then can Zion as a joint endeavor be achieved. Zion is the fruitage of the Spirit, and only that life, or that home, or that community is Zion which is characterized by the fruits of the Spirit.

Name these fruits as they are given to us by the Apostle Paul, all the while noting the kinship of these fruits of the Spirit with the virtues and attributes mentioned in the Beatitudes, in the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians, and again in the Doctrine and Covenants, section 4:

But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law.—Galatians 5: 22, 23.

THE LORD repeats that which he considers to be important. Consistently he has caused the prophets to testify of the imperative urgency of these virtues. Our development of them, however, has not kept pace with our development in scientific and mechanical ingenuity. And therein lies our problem. While we have acquired some dominion over the things of the earth, we have not yet acquired dominion over ourselves. We still lack the spiritual vigor and vision which could and must qualify our motives, our desires, and our intellect. Our spiritual quotient is low as witnessed in the stunted development of our virtues.

The virtues are not the result of our own ethical push-ups. They are response to a higher power. They are the fruitage of the Spirit. The fruits of the Spirit, like the fruits of the orchard, are a product of growth and development. They are the result of cultivation and care. But they are more than this. As a tree forces its roots down deep and reaches its leafy arms to the energy of the sun, so must we dig deep the foundations of our lives and reach constantly upward to the source of our strength. The Bible testifies that we, like the branch, cannot bear fruit of ourselves. We must be suffused by the radiant Spirit of Almighty God.

It is the purpose of our creation to bring forth fruit unto God. Fruit of the tree is not produced for the benefit of the tree, although that production is beneficial to the tree and the sign of its vigor. The fruit of the tree is devoted to the purposes of God. It is for the benefit of the seed, and for the nourishment of other life. We ought, likewise, to bring forth fruit, dedicated to the purposes of God. To augment this purpose, we wed ourselves to his church and become his covenant children. As his covenant children we are known by the fruits we bear.

Unfortunately, many times the fruits of the Spirit are spoiled by evil little influences which disturb growth. In olden times the foxes were known as pests because of their aggravating habit of trampling the vines and spoiling the fruit. The jackals, sometimes classed as foxes, even ate the fruit. And the little foxes were very hard to capture.

THE LITTLE FOXES beset us. We say with Solomon, "Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines." We draw attention to them because they have a direct bearing upon the effectiveness of our Zionie endeavor, the peace, security, and functioning power of our branches, and the happiness of each individual. We shall name but a few and characterize them briefly. Each of us could add to the list and bear testimony of their nipping influence.

Pride is one of the little foxes. There is a kind of provincial self-satisfaction which finds harbor within most of us. We tend to become inordinately proud of our accomplishments, our possessions, and sometimes our other attributes. We even display arrogance in our possession of the gospel, feeling it to be restored to us, when in truth it is restored to the world through us. There is no room for arrogance in the kingdom of God. The Son of God inveighed against it continually. His displeasure in it is dramatized in the story of the Pharisee and the publican. Pride will blind any and all of us just as it did the rulers of the synagogue in His day. "Blessed are the meek" was the Master's message and promise. Pride is evil. It is idolatrous. It destroys our better selfhood. It obstructs our vision.

Prejudice is another of our little foxes. Many of us act on the basis of pre-judgment. Something we hear—an ill-founded or distorted rumor—may set our emotions at such an angle that even our better judgment and sense of decency can't straighten us out. Sometimes we lump people together under headings which become epithets like "nigger," "Jew," "jockey," or any one of a number of disagreeable names. Thus we lower the standards of the church and do dishonor to our Christian heritage. Jesus loved the individual. It is essential to the kingdom way that we must respect the dignity of the individual as an individual. When we act in prejudice, we reveal a littleness of spirit which betrays the distance we are from our goal, and the distance we place between ourselves and our God. Prejudice is evil. It injures those whom we should help. And, it presumes upon the right of Deity to judge.

Pride and prejudice are the offspring of a parent fox, no longer little. He is vexatious in proportion to his size. This fox is Selfishness. He is well-fed and coddled. It is small wonder we are selfish. We are self-centered in babyhood, and the world pampers and trades on our selfishness from then on: advertising ditties and billboards all conspire to make us self-conscious and self-concerned; we must have well-groomed hair, we must be careful of body odors; our clothes must flatter us; we must put our money in banks which lend prestige. Our environment promotes an attitude of primary concern for self and family. That life is frustrated which finds no deeper rootage than its emotions and no higher upreach than the tips of its grasping fingers. How pertinent is the lesson taught by the Man of Galilee when he told his disciples that the Lord knew they had need of "all these things" and that they could be had not alone for themselves but for all men if they would but "seek first the kingdom." Zion awaits the day of our learning His lesson.

Disloyalty to our brothers and sisters within the church is another of the little foxes. It is illustrated simply: During the Sunday morning service a man of the priesthood differed with another on some trivial matter. By the time he reached home, his injured pride had begun to warm up the pot of trouble. Like so many of us, he let off steam in his own house. We who would protect children from any and all physical injury oftentimes do incalculable harm with the tongue. In the midst of his words of criticism, his little daughter tugged at his coat and said, "Daddy, how do you expect to me love Brother So-and-So if you don't?" Differences of opinion are to be expected in the church as elsewhere and need not be considered as a personal slight. Voicing our criticism with our emotions showing does not resolve our differences. At times we may even detect a spot of sin on the garments of our brethren. We need not condone the sin, but it would be most helpful if we'd hold our tongues and refuse to advertise all that we know. Occasionally this little fox bares his fangs and growls at the church. Ugly and ill-tempered, he brings good to no one, and generally seems most unhappy himself.

One of the most disagreeable of the little foxes is rather hard to name. Let's call him "Overfamiliarity with the Saints." In consequence of our lack of evangelism, there are generally few strangers in our midst, especially in the smaller branches. Our association is largely with those in the faith. With long association in the church, when the extent of that fellowship has been in the services, rather than the service of the church, each one comes to know the others almost too well. Many times there is a disturbing overfamiliarity in which we presume upon each other. Sometimes this overfamiliarity creeps into the pulpit. Here it takes on an even more dangerous aspect, for it lowers the standards of ministry. Occasionally we have been too familiar with the things of the Lord—even to the point of presuming to speak for him when he would prefer that we remain silent until we more fully understand his will.

There are other little foxes. Apathy is one of them. Not infrequently "a change comes o'er the spirit of our dreams," and we grow unconcerned and negligent in testimony and good hard spiritual labor. An appetite for spiritual sweets is another. Sometimes we long so much for the manifestation of personally specified gifts that we neglect the weightier things of the gospel, and especially neglect such common things as the tithe and the study of the Standard Books.

None of us wants to be characterized by the little foxes. They alienate us from our friends and destroy the potentialities of the kingdom of God within us. We'd rather be known for our gentleness, goodness, and all the other fruits of the Spirit. We know this is the better way—the way of the abundant life.

We need to be characterized by repentance as a strong, undergirding spirit which desires to bear fruitage of the Spirit, which understands the yearning of the heart of God for his children, which sees with clarity the conditions of today in the light of the prophetic spirit and responds with love and concern and competence. The spirit of true repentance will destroy the little foxes and will elevate and develop the Christian virtues in our lives.

We need to become a people of integrity, a quality which catches up the meaning of the fruits of the Spirit. "For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness and righteousness and truth."

One day our Master hungered and sought nourishment from a fig tree. It was luxuriant with foliage, but fruitless. The tree was condemned by the Son of God. The heart of Christ hungers now for the fruits of the Spirit. If we do not bear them, we shall not only be condemned, but others must be sought by Christ to do his work. That means more time, and time is valuable now, when every year brings more of woe and perplexity.

There is work to be done. We must overcome the forces which disrupt and delay our work—the little foxes.

The Apostle Peter was beset by the little foxes. He was subject to pride and prejudice, selfishness and impatience. His vision was distorted until one day the Spirit of the Christ prevailed within him. Then, with compassionate understanding, Peter addressed himself to the prime need of mankind, that of developing the fruits of the Spirit as they were demonstrated in Christ:

And besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge;

And to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience, and patience, godliness;

And to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity.

For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Pharisees at Pentecost

BY KATHERINE KECK BEAR

THERE IS A great deal of speculating in our church on the nature of divine revelation. Too much speculating, probably, and not enough faith.

A study of revelation in Bible times and in the present, reveals the fact that God always withholds his direction when approached by sign-desirers. People in doubt have never been given assurance through revelation. This they are expected to attain by their own efforts, with the assurance that through prayer, their own private prayer, will they eventually come to a knowledge of the truth. Those people in the church who have lived years seeking this can attest to the fact that it is the only way one can know. Momentary assurance, if it were given, would last a moment. About as long as it would take a music teacher to tell you how to play the piano. You become master only by painstaking practice.

Where revelation has come to, or for, an individual, it has come when the actions of that individual will have effect on a group. When revelation comes to a group, it is given by the leader of that group. Revelation to the church in general comes to the prophet. All other divine promptings, either to the priesthood or individuals, have had to do with their personal enlightenment, to be used in their private lives for the glorification of God in them. For if a man be made in the image of God, each one must be expected to have the endowment of his spirit—enough to cause him to grow to whatever stature he may require of himself. It's the seeking that develops stature, just as practice on the piano brings understanding.

Thoughtful church members see a change, in reading through the Doctrine and Covenants, in the manner of divine instruction. From explosive power in the first Joseph, to fatherly persuasion in the second, to Fred M. Smith's scholarly "by inspiration I am permitted to say . . ."

This development, I believe, can be laid at the door of the membership. If a whole group is in accord, sensing their need, having confidence in their spokesman before God, he can't conceal himself. The brother of Jared saw God's finger, without God's knowing it. So we could find him if we had the desire and purity of purpose. God can't speak to a group in controversy, except in admonition—or final condemnation.

"I dislike a demonstration," said one member. There had been tears at a prayer meeting. A demonstration of weakness. The only strength in a church is group strength, the confidence of knowing the support and love of each for the other. Only then can the individual member display the fine jewels in his soul, ask for group help to rid himself of flaws, and listen with confidence when the prophet speaks.

Our pockets are full of money. We are neither hungry nor cold. We perform multitudinous jobs of lip service. We have everything the ancient Pharisees had. We need to guard against their type of smugness.

The Significance of the Sacrament of THE LORD'S SUPPER

By Guy Armstrong

In our church we place high value on the sacraments of baptism, confirmation, and ordination; but the sacrament of the Lord's Supper occupies a unique place in our lives, as indicated by the interest we manifest in it. It stands out with clear significance as the ordinance which from its character and the frequency of its recurrence, does most to unite the Saints with each other and with God.

Matthew, Mark, Luke, and Paul all tell us the story of the origin of the Lord's Supper. From Paul's account, we learn that on the night he was betrayed, Jesus took bread and when he had blessed it, he broke it and said, "Take, eat; this is my body which is broken for you; this do in remembrance of me." After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, "This cup is the new testament in my blood; this do ye as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." Mark says that the blood of Christ was shed for many and was the token of the new covenant. Matthew agrees with this and adds that it was for the remission of sins.

The next glimpse of the Lord's Supper that we get from the New Testament is given us by Paul in the First Epistle to the Corinthians which was written about A. D. 55. From careful reading of this letter, it appears that it had become customary to partake of this sacrament in connection with a fellowship meal and that some abuses had entered in this way. Paul therefore instructs the saints very carefully that this sacrament should be separated from other meals, that those participating should be worthy, and that it should be partaken as a memorial and a symbol of the unity of the saints.

The Apostle John was very much concerned about the sacrament. He gives us the words of Jesus to Nicodemus which we use most frequently in discussions about the importance of baptism. He tells us of the Lord's command that we must be born of water, but hastens to add that we must also be born of the Spirit; and he makes the clearest statement in the New Testament on the importance of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper: "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you" and again he quotes the words of the Master: "It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing; the words I speak unto you they are the Spirit and they are life." This is not a contradiction, but an amplification of what is meant by a sacrament. The form is important, for it has been chosen by God for a specific idea. And the Spirit is important too, for this is an essential part of the sacrament and carries home the meaning which lies behind the material emblems used. It is not the material bread and wine which matters most, but the service of which they are a part, and the fact that this service is graced with the presence of Jesus Christ the Lord.

There are, therefore, three outstanding things about the Lord's Supper which we obtain from the New Testament. First, Paul and the writers of the first Gospels show us the Lord instituting the sacrament as a memorial of his death. Second, Paul rescuing the sacrament from abuse and seeking to preserve it as a memorial and a symbol of the unity of the body of Christ. Third, John shows us its importance by the emphasis he places on recognizing the sacrament as a spiritual experience.

There are certain requirements which precede participation in the Lord's Supper. The first of these is baptism. We do not give food to those who are "dead in trespass and sin" but only to those who have been born again.

The second prerequisite is that the Communion shall be partaken worthily. This requirement has given rise to a serious misunderstanding upon the part of some of the members of the church. These Saints feel, as it is right, that they ought not to participate in the Communion service so long as any difference exists between them and their brethren. They therefore refrain from partaking of the Communion until these differences have been healed, and in some places they have refrained for several months on this basis. This is the very reverse of what is intended. The Lord wishes us to partake of the Communion at regular intervals, and we should hasten to accept this great invitation of the Lord. In preparation for this, so as to be in the spirit of the occasion, we should take special care to see that all hardness of heart is removed. No Christian has the right to harbor such enmity against his brother as would prevent his meeting that brother at the table of the Lord. It is our duty to forgive each other and to assist others to forgive us. The frequent repetition of the sacramental service is designed for this very end.

It is interesting to note that immediately after Judas had left the upper room to inform the soldiers against Jesus, the Master said significantly, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." The Communion, then, was to be a sign and instrument of love among the brethren as well as love toward God. So while it is a means of fellowship with Christ, it is also a means of fellowship with the Church of Christ, because the Lord's Supper is an ordinance of the family of God. When people are unworthy of this fellowship, they are excommunicated; that is, they are cut off from the benefits of communion and the most vivid symbol of this communion is the Communion service. They are therefore, excluded from this service.

When we partake of the Lord's Supper, we renew our baptismal covenant. As forgiveness of sins follows the first covenant, so it does the renewal of that covenant. Yet it cannot be said that our Heavenly Father waits until the Communion service in order to accept our repentance. He forgives us individually whenever we truly seek him in humble contrition for sins. But he restores us to the fellowship of the Saints, which is one aspect of forgiveness when he permits us to feel the spirit of the brotherhood and to share with our associates in the sacramental meal which units us at his table.

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper means a great deal to the Saints. It can mean infinitely more. This service should be as beautiful as possible, but artistic effects must never detract from the central sacramental purposes.

Contention destroys the central purpose of the service. Principles should therefore be safeguarded carefully, but the spirit of contention should be rigorously excluded.

No member of the church is justified in refusing to partake of the Communion because ill feeling exists. It is his Christian duty to eliminate the ill feeling and partake.

"The race of mankind would perish if they ceased to aid each other. We cannot exist without mutual help. All therefore, that need aid have a right to ask it from their fellow man; and none who has the power of granting can refuse without guilt."—Walter Scott.

The Prophetic View of God

By J. A. Koehler

Number 17 in a series of radio addresses on the subject:
"The Social Philosophy of the Modern Prophet"

IT IS RECORDED that Philip said to Jesus: "Shew us the Father and it sufficeth us." In other words, one naked-eye view of God would have been adequate to Philip's purposes. But if that were true it would have been because Philip's purposes were not God's purposes. For if they were, God would have made provision for naked-eye views of himself.

Whether Jesus is more than a prophet or not, evidently the view of God which he wishes man to get is the prophetic view, for he asked Philip, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me? If ye had [truly] known me, ye should have known the Father also." For "the words that I speak unto you" are a representation of God, as also are "the works that I do."—John 14: 8-10.

If any man but saw with his mind's eye the implications of the words and works of Jesus, he would have the best kind of view of God. He would have the only view that, for the present, conserves God's purposes in man.

THERE WERE JEWS who got a naked-eye view of John the Baptist. They saw a few common clothes wrapped around a man; a very uncommon man. But that which was uncommon in that personality they did not see. They did not get a mind's eye view of the "messenger" who was sent to prepare the way for the coming of the Lord. They did not get the only view of God that matters. If they had their house might not have been left unto them desolate.

You might know people who would give their right arms for a naked-eye view of God. They would pay almost any price—except the price that must be paid. For they do not prize highly the only view of God (the mind's eye view) that matters.

The Scripture may not proclaim that truth in just so many words. But the meaning of what it does say is that the view of God that can serve His purposes in man is a view of Him in His Kingdom-coming. It is a mind's-eye view of God.

Unprophetic people may say of the naked-eye view of God, "That will be glory for me." Well, whatever it may be for "me," we are sure that such views are not glory for "God." For the glory of God, as the modern prophet said, is "intelligence." And intelligence is a mind's eye view of God. It is more than mere cognition. It is comprehension of God as truth plus an irresistible impulsion to implement that truth for man's sake and for the glory of God.

GOD MAY BE seen in His creations, for his creations are exhibitions of His mind, or spirit. To transfix those creations with the mind's eye, to see in them the eternal purposes of God in man, to see His Kingdom both in its coming and as triumphant, is to have the prophetic view of God.

If you ask for the scriptural proof of that contention, I can only refer you to "that which God hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began."

I said that the naked-eye view of God is not the prophetic view. The prophetic view is depicted in part by the modern prophet in these words: "The earth rolls upon her wings [it revolves in space]; and the sun giveth her light by day, and the moon . . . by night; and the stars also giveth their light, as they roll upon their wings, in their glory, in the midst of the power of God" "And any man who hath 'seen' the least of these, hath seen God" They have apprehended His mind. They have caught a vision of His purpose.

To see God as he may be seen in his creations, and especially as he may be seen in man, is to see God moving in his majesty and power. It is to see him with the eye of understanding and of faith. It is to see him as the prophets see him.

THE MODERN PROPHET said that "all things which cometh of the earth . . . are made for the use and benefit of man, both to please the eye, and to gladden the heart; yea, for food and for raiment, . . . to strengthen the body and to enliven the soul." Add to that the modern prophet's concept of the manner in which man must relate himself to the physical world—his concept of the right manner of "using the things of this world"—and the sum is his view of God.

Review the careers of the prophets, if it is necessary to do so, and you have the testimony that that is truly the prophetic view of God. For from beginning to end the prophets have said that to promote the well-being of the soul, to reap the harvest of the truly human life, man must dress the earth and keep it as his nature requires; he must order his relations to the earth aright; he must conform his conduct—his social life—to the moral order of the universe. All the prophets have said that to cultivate the soul effectually man must cultivate the "soil" aright. He must use the things of this world "in the manner designed of God." That is the testimony of all the holy prophets since the world began. And that is the prophetic view of God.

Since discrimination is the beginning of knowledge, contrast the view of the unprophetic medieval priests in particular with the view of the Hebrew prophets. That priestly view is a mess of contradictions, for it said in one breath, for instance, that God is no respecter of persons, and in the other that he either saves or damns men as it pleases him. As we contrast these views with the view of Moses and his company, the distinctive prophetic view of God becomes apparent.

THE PROPHET SEES God in the course of human events as truly as he sees Him in his natural creations. In whichever direction a prophet looks he says: "All kingdoms have a law given: and there are many kingdoms; for there is no space in which there is no kingdom And unto every kingdom is given a law; and unto every law there are certain bounds and conditions."

There is law in the social world as certainly as in the physical world. There are laws which operate to perfect human nature as certainly as there are laws which operate to produce better flocks of laying hens. Laws form character as certainly as they form rocks. And whoever tries to work out the crooks in human nature by the forces which operate only to shape rocks on seashores misses the mark entirely. The washing of waves may polish pebbles, but it is impossible that they should purify the soul. Say the prophets, "Unto every law there are certain bounds." Beyond its bounds no law can operate.

So as we come to have the prophetic view of God, we say with the holy prophets, that "all beings who abide not those conditions [under which specific laws operate] are not justified." We say as the prophets say, that a human life that does not abide the moral law "cannot be sanctified" by law. Nor can it be sanctified "by mercy, justice, nor judgment: therefore they [it] must remain filthy still." No prophet was ever persuaded that ritual could be made a substitute for righteousness.

In the prophetic view of God, then, all things—religious things and all—are governed by law. Not by arbitrary statutory laws. Not by laws of Congress. But by the eternal laws of the universe, which are the laws of God.

In the prophetic view of God no people that does not have a true philosophy of social living in which it grounds its conduct of the whole business of human-living-together can possibly achieve the abundant life. In the prophetic view of God "If Zion do these things"—if she master the true philosophy of social life and implement it with judgment in her system of economic institutions in particular, or in her industry and government—"She shall prosper and spread herself and become very glorious and very great, and very terrible [not very horrible, mind you]; and the nations shall honor her [for her contribution to their well-being] and shall say, Surely Zion is the city of our God; and surely Zion cannot be moved out of her place." God's mode of society, once it is established, "shall endure forever."

What is more, in the prophetic view of God, "if Zion do not these things" she shall be visited [as all other peoples have been visited] according to her works, with sore affliction, with sword, with vengeance, with devouring fire." For in the prophetic view, God is not to be mocked—not even by the U. N. O.

In a word, we have the prophetic view of God if we see him in his Kingdom-coming. If we see that Kingdom-coming as conditioned in the willingness of peoples to make their systems of social institutions implementations of the true philosophy of social life, we have the prophetic view of God.

Sympathy is two hearts tugging at the same load.—Charles Parkhurst.

The Doctrine of Christian Stewardship

A radio address by Bishop A. B. Phillips

THE MESSAGE OF Jesus Christ has revolutionized the thinking and the ideals of man. He brought into the world new concepts of the meaning and purpose of life, and so great has been the transformation wherever his teachings have been entertained that his word to the Pharisees has been abundantly proved true when he said:

I am the light of the world, he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life.—John 8: 12.

In view of this remarkable and almost startling statement of Jesus, we may well ask what is that "light of life" which those who follow him shall have? Volumes might be written on this very theme, but careful study and reflection will show that no man can obtain from life its greatest treasures unless he clearly sees his proper relationship to God and to mankind, for in the working out of that relationship is his own destiny. The light of life, then, is that enlightenment which reveals the supreme goal that he may reach and the pathway by which he shall be able to attain it. It is the light that dispels the distorted shadows before him, that distinguishes the true from the false, that discerns the worthy among the unworthy, and that perceives the difference between things that endure and those which shall decay and disappear.

OUR RELATIONSHIP TO GOD

When God made man in his own image he placed him in a world that he had created. In this world we find abundant resources of every kind necessary to happiness and proper achievement, and which we are privileged to use so long as we employ them according to the laws which govern the earth. The message of Jesus tells us what our proper and intended relationship is to God and to our fellow man, and also how we may use the things around us to promote the well-being of these relationships. The exercise of our powers with respect to them is termed by Jesus stewardship. In the final sense, therefore, all men are stewards of God. This principle involves four important elements—the elements of ownership, agency, responsibility, and accountability.

To understand our place in the divine scheme of existence is an essential of success in that existence. God has therefore revealed to us the fact that all things were made by him for beneficent ends. Man is capable of growth and improvement. He can increase his powers and enlarge the activities of life here to reach greater and better realms where life endures because it is made of enduring things. Life is not static, it is dynamic, and temporal life is designed as a steppingstone to eternal life. But eternal life is possible only in an environment of goodness, perfection, love, and justice. This is therefore the aim of God, the true purpose of life, the divine goal of man.

GOD OWNS HIS UNIVERSE

We often hear men speak of owning absolutely various things in their possession. But in reality ownership is a myth, or at least only an inaccurate term of convenience. In any absolute sense we do not own any of our temporal possessions. Once when I had made this statement, a man challenged it and asserted with considerable emphasis that he owned absolutely, free and clear, the house and land where he lived, and he declared that anyone who tried to take it from him would find that he was absolute owner. To make the matter clear as I had stated it, I asked him who would protect him in his so-called ownership if he refused or neglected to pay his taxes to the government, and how long his boasted ownership would then continue? I asked him if he was sure he would not soon die and leave it all to the possession of others? After some thought he admitted that he guessed he did not own it absolutely after all, but that his ownership was at best subject to the sufferance of his government and of God.

The Scriptures repeatedly declare that God is the owner of all things, but that he placed man in the world and gave him "dominion" over the things of this earth. It is this temporary dominion that we possess, and not ownership. And to enable us to choose how we will exercise this dominion, God has endowed us with certain godlike powers, qualities, and capacities. The Scripture presents no meaningless phrase when it states that (Genesis 1: 26) God made man in his own image and likeness. As the owner of all things, God provided man with the proper equipment to use them and the power to employ discrimination in that use. This power constitutes the agency of man.

MAN'S AGENCY IS A TRUST

The Psalmist in poetic language declares that man was made but "a little lower than the angels." The power to know good from evil, with which God endowed our father Adam, would be of little benefit to man without the added power to choose his moral course in life. With man's dominion over the things of earth is therefore associated agency to act in accordance with the knowledge which he possesses. For this reason when God gave man instructions concerning his duty to his divine Creator and to mankind, he reposed in him the trust that made his agency a real test of worthiness and honor. A distinction should be recognized in this respect between the power to do as he

ADVENTURES IN LATTER DAY SAINTISM

For Young People

Helps for Your League Study of

"Does It Make any Difference What Work I Choose?"

By Mary B. Hill

Listed below are a number of suggestions which can be developed to provide a month's programs, illustrating that it does make a difference what work is chosen. These are in addition to the suggestions listed under "Why Not Try This?" pages 25-27 of the booklet, Does It Make Any Difference?

1. Have one group of the League act as a class in career planning, with the group leader as "teacher counselor." The teacher may call on various members to report on the assignments made previously to members of the class. The different vocations thus reported on may be discussed briefly after each report.
2. Arrange an attractive setting on a platform, or at the front of the hall. The following is a suggestion: a large frame illustrating a doorway, with a cross and floral decoration in the background; colored light from a projector may be spotted on the doorway. Use amber, yellow, orange, light blue, and pink lights. Various League members, dressed to represent different professions—doctor, schoolteacher, stenographer, nurse, etc.—framed in the doorway will tell the challenging features of their work. Suitable music may be played or sung after each presentation. The Sanitarium and Grace-land may be represented here. This seems like a lot of work for this type of program, but will result in an interesting and inspiring meeting, instead of the drab recitation of facts it might otherwise be.
3. Interview with adult counselor. An adult in the branch may be rehearsed in advance, and four or five members of the League, either separately or in a body, may consult him with their problems. He will briefly discuss aptitudes, interests, scholastic requirements, and job possibilities, also the value of a prospective vocation in church work.

If desired, a poll may be conducted to find out the vocations in which the young people are most interested.

4. Youth council meeting. A "director" and "board of governors" gather in round-table discussion on "Vocations and Christian Stewardship" (what place the church should have in the choice, preparation for, and actual work of one's vocation).
5. A hobby fair may be held at which each member displays or illustrates his hobby. The leader here may take the opportunity to emphasize the necessity of a well-rounded personality, the value of worth-while interests and activities, and the importance of character growth in leisure time.

Worship Service

(If possible, obtain a picture of the boy Christ, working as a carpenter in Nazareth, and place it at the front of the room in a suitable setting.)

Instrumental Prelude.

Call to Worship: "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."—II Timothy 2: 15.

Hymn 287.

Poem:

O Thou who dost the vision send,
And gives to each his task
And with the task sufficient strength,
Show us thy will, we ask;
Give us a conscience bold and good,
Give us a purpose true,
That it may be our highest joy
Our Father's work to do.

O Jesus, Prince of life and truth,
Beneath thy banner bright,
We dedicate our strength and youth
To battle for the right;
We give our lives with glad intent
To serve the world and thee.
To die, to suffer, and be spent
To set our brothers free.

(Two verses usually omitted from "O Jesus, I Have Promised.")

Scripture: (excerpts from Proverbs).

Leader: A wise man will hear, and will increase learning; and a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels.

Response: My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother.

Leader: Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding.

Response: For the merchandise of it is better than merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold.

Leader: Get wisdom, get understanding; forget it not. And the beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord.

Quartet: Hymn 352.

Message: (In referring to the picture, stress the following points, and add suitable thoughts of your own.)

When Christ was only eleven years old, he realized the importance of his mission, and was even then preparing. "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

In his youth, he lived a life that was exemplary, that would enable him to give his best to his future task. "And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man."

Although he looked forward to accomplishing great things, he learned all he could as he went along. He learned carpentry, received the formal Jewish schooling, learned by observation, personal study, and private devotion (as was apparent in his later ministry).

He was thirty years preparing for the work of three.

God cannot use people who are unprepared. Moses was 80 years in preparation for his task. Similarly others (who may be mentioned) in Scriptures and of the present day.

Hymn: 305.

Prayer: O thou Master of all men, we have promised to serve thee, but many times we have allowed the desire of the moment, and the pull of the crowd to keep us from our high resolves. Grant unto us a renewed vision of the things we can do to speed the coming of thy kingdom in this world. Show us how thy purpose may be best fulfilled in our lives. Give us the strength to follow through to the high plain of light and truth to which thou dost beckon us. Teach us to be patient as we work in companionship with thee. Forbid that we should ever be a stumbling block to any who are searching for the way, but help us to glorify thee in our lives until all men are drawn unto thee.

In the name of Jesus, we pray. Amen.

This Day I Choose

(A Playlet)

Setting: A table, extreme right, with several books and notebooks on it. A chair beside it facing downstage. A sofa is at the center back with a chair at each end of it. A floor lamp is at the left back, and another chair against the right wall.

Gail and Doris enter slowly, talking.

Doris: This business of what vocation I should choose gets me more confused every day.

Gail: Not me! I can't get out of school fast enough. I'm sick of not being able to do as I like. I want lots and lots of pretty clothes and things. Imagine being able to travel wherever you want to and stay out as late as you want to, without having to worry about homework or school the next day.

Doris: What about having to get up for your job?

Gail: Oh, that! If I get fired from one job, I'll get another one.

Doris: You must think jobs grow on trees!

Gail: Well, I'm not going to worry about it now. Say, what was Elder Goodwin getting at tonight?

Doris: Explaining about preparing ourselves for Zion.

Gail: Oh, that again! What are we supposed to do? Go around with long faces, whispering approaching doom, or pack up and move, or what?

Doris: Oh, Gail, sometimes you make me provoked! You were there. What were you thinking about?

Gail: About Sister Jones' new hat!

Doris: If I didn't know you better, I'd say you were hopeless. Well, he was talking to the young people, telling them the great need that exists in the church for trained personnel and leaders, and how it must be an enlightened people who will build Zion. We cannot be blind leaders of the blind. The people of the world must look to a hill that is lighted, not standing in darkness. He pointed out that the young people of the church must take advantage of every opportunity to improve themselves, physically, mentally, and spiritually. You can't do that, Gail, if you leave school now.

Gail: Who said I wanted to improve myself?

Doris: But it's such a shame if you don't. You always get the highest marks when you put forth the least effort, and your family is looking forward to your amounting to something worth-while.

Gail: Then what a shock they're in for! But don't preach, Doris. I know what I want.

Doris: Well, you may think you do. Oh, dear! I forgot the time. I'll have to go right away, I still have some math to do.

Gail: I should finish mine up, too, but I'm too tired tonight. That skating party last night wore me out completely.

Doris (moving toward the door): Well, so long! See you tomorrow morning, if you manage to get there before the last bell.

Gail (yawning): Oh, me! Nine o'clock comes around so soon. Be seeing you.

(Doris exits. Gail goes over to chair, sits down. Languidly picks up notebook in front of her. Looks at it for a few moments, yawns, slowly drops her head on the table. She remains in this position for the rest of the scenes that follow.)

SCENE II

Enter elderly woman, with teen-age boy and girl, all in Dutch costume.

Hansel: Mother, what is to become of us, our land, and our people? I thought when the war was over we would rebuild right away, and have food and clothing and all be happy again.

Norca: These things take time, my son. We must all be very thankful to God for the mercy he has shown us. Remember, we are still alive, and much better off than many people.

Greta (bitterly): Yes, still alive, but for what? What have we to live for?

Hansel: As if life were such a great blessing when nobody is happy or secure. Greta and I have been denied the one great thing we desired in life—an education. Life is useless without it.

Greta: I can't think of anything worse than the prospect facing Hansel and me. Hansel would have made a great surgeon, like daddy, and I wanted to teach.

Hansel: Now you can be a drudge, while I dig ditches.

Norca: Hush. Do you think your father would like to hear you talk like this? He taught you courage and fortitude. Have you forgotten?

Greta: No, mother, we haven't forgotten. Neither have we forgotten that the Germans killed him, and took all our money, and burned our home. I ask you, what have we left?

Norca: Hope, children, hope. Have you forgotten the great hope that is ours? in the gospel? in Zion?

Hansel: No, mother, we haven't forgotten, but so much has happened to weaken our faith, and Zion seems so far away. Here we are, without money, without even the means to acquire much in our lifetime, among people as poor as we.

Norca: But do you not realize, Hansel, it is not money nor position you need to make a successful life, but to live so you will build a worth-while character. The qualities we must now exert: courage, fortitude, cheerfulness, resourcefulness, and neighborliness are the things which will make your life successful. You and Greta cannot now fulfill your desire to attend university, but what is to stop you from being well-read? Can you not get books from the library, learn various handicrafts, and go on learning as long as you desire, in many ways? You may have to work at something you don't like for a while, Hansel; but if you take every opportunity open to you, you can soon better yourself without formal schooling.

Greta: I never thought of that. I could learn a lot that way, too. I wanted to be a teacher, mainly because of my interest in people. I could read psychology books, and study teaching methods, and take what Bible courses I can. I could teach in the church school here.

Norca: Of course, and I can teach you to be a good cook, among other things.

Greta (laughing): On the little we have to cook, I certainly need to know how to make it more appetizing.

Hansel: I feel better already! Although Greta and I may never accomplish what we originally desired to, we may yet accomplish some good, and feel our life has not been worthless.

Norca: Yes, often we plan our own lives, but God sees further than we, and our course is changed. God's ways are not our ways, but we know this, that if we seek his guidance, his way will be best in the end. "All things work together for good to those that love God, who are called according to his purpose."

(Curtain)

SCENE III

Nurse is taking temperature of patient, who is lying on sofa (or if no sofa is available, is sitting, wrapped in a dressing gown and blanket, on chair, rear center).

Patient: How can you be so cheerful when you are always working around people who are anything but cheerful?

Nurse (laughing): Oh, maybe I like gloom. You know, I might be one of those people who revel in misery.

Patient: Oh, if you were like that, you'd be as gloomy as your patients.

Nurse: Perhaps it's because I love to feel I'm helping people. Even when I was a little girl, I looked forward to the time when I would be able to ease pain and suffering, sort of like a ministering angel. Maybe I read about Florence Nightingale somewhere. Say, that's an idea; wait till I get a lamp.

Patient (laughing): Oh, you're bright enough without a lamp. But it's rather odd to find somebody who has trained to help OTHER PEOPLE. I thought everybody trained now-a-days to help themselves.

Nurse: I've no doubt a great many people do, but my parents taught me there was more in life than personal gain. And gradually as I grew older, at church I learned that the only worth-while thing was the development of a Christlike character. If our plans and actions did not contribute towards that, then we were cheating ourselves of the only true personal gain there is. Christ taught us, you know, that if we gain the whole world materially and have lost our own soul, or stunted its growth, we are really very poor.

Patient: This is very interesting, go on.

Nurse: Well, I decided, as I told you, to plan my life so that when I had completed high school that I could enter nursing school. I figured that gave me the best chance to develop the talents I had, build a worth-while character at the same time, and help others.

Patient: Is there anybody else like you?

Nurse (smiling): Why, are you contemplating putting me in the zoo?

Patient: No, nothing so drastic as that. But say, you think then that a person should plan his life and education with three things in mind: the best development of talents, the opportunity for developing a worth-while character, and the amount of service to others?

Nurse: Definitely, yes. That is the only way a person may live life on its highest possible level, and secure the greatest happiness. If we neglect to take any one of these points into account, we shall someday see the detriment it has been to us, and to others, in this life, and the heights we might have attained.

Patient: Then if you—

Nurse: No more talking just now. I'm certainly not helping you by letting you talk like this. Come on, now, time for another dose. (Takes up bottle, which has previously been laid on chair, right, pours some colored liquid into spoon, gives it to patient who makes a face.)

Patient (after a pause): You know, it reminds me of that verse in the Bible, "He that would save his life shall lose it, and he that would lose his life shall save it."

SCENE IV

Two middle-aged men enter. One is Elder Goodwin, and the other a prominent salesman.

Elder Goodwin: Well, it's certainly good to see you again, Tom, after all these years. Come, sit down for a while. (Takes chairs, and places them slightly right center, partially facing each other.)

Tom Wooding: I haven't very long to stay, but since I was passing through town, I couldn't resist the temptation to call on you. What have you been doing all these years?

Elder: Plenty. So busy most of the time I can't get time to think.

Tom W.: Well, that's a good way to be, I find. Wish I didn't have time to think.

Elder G.: Why, are your thoughts unpleasant?

Tom W.: Bitter, Bill, bitter.

Elder G.: But Tom, you've been very successful, I see. That car you have, that new house and swimming pool in the pictures you sent me, don't belong to a poor man.

Tom W.: No, I'm all right that way, but I'd give it all to be in your shoes right now.

Elder G.: In mine?

Tom W.: Yes. Remember when we were deciding what vocation we'd like to follow? You decided you'd be a teacher and go to Graceland, because you wanted to eventually dedicate your life in service to God?

Elder G.: Yes, and you wanted to travel.

Tom W. (bitterly): I wanted to travel! So I quit school, got a job as a salesman, and I've been traveling ever since!

Elder G.: Well?

Tom W.: But don't you see, Bill? I don't feel that I've accomplished anything worth-while. My whole life has been practically useless. Oh, I've made some money, but I've never been able to live a normal life at home with my wife and family. The only thing I ever knew was selling. During the depression I didn't dare quit, because I'd never have gotten another job. Then during the war years the money really rolled in. But I had to be away from home so much that my family have grown away from me, and now, Bill, my home's broken up altogether.

Elder G.: Oh, Tom, I'm really sorry to hear that.

Tom W.: You've got a good teaching job, a

A Talk With God

By Aleta Runkle

“MY GOD AND I walk through the fields together.”

—And now it is eventide. The brisk, night wind sharpens my anticipation for this daily walk with you, God. It has not always been on these quiet, familiar streets that we have developed this strengthening comradeship. Alone in a dormitory room, I have been advised through your word. In the congestion of clamoring crowds, I have felt you standing at my elbow. You have poured courage into my frightened heart in the presence of terrifying pain. That night when a loved one slipped away from the family bonds, your comforting nearness eased the sting. When joy has lifted me to peaks of exaltation, I have heard your singing. I didn't see you in those intimate moments, but I knew you were there as we walked and talked together.

At first, I did not accept your invitation to develop our acquaintance. “I think I would like having you for a friend, God,” I explained, “but my schedule is too full. There just isn't a moment when I can squeeze in any time to be with you alone.” Depriving myself of the richness of your company, I walked alone in my perverse way. Annoyances and petty disturbances mounted in my heart. I recoiled from unintentional offenses of friends, and pounced back with retaliating anger. My frustrated spirit urged harsh words that drew quick tears. Bitter disappointment struck, and I had no treasury of content on which to draw. Impoverished in spirit, I asked, with Peter, “Lord, to whom shall we go?” Humbled, I fell to my knees and begged admittance to your fellowship. I was only an initiate, but you welcomed me without question. Nor was there any word of, “I told you so!”—only your kind smile inviting my penitence.

It was anguish that forced me to discover the stimulating strength of uninterrupted moments alone with you each day. Because sorrow pushed me to these quiet recesses, I thought of those conversations with you, God, simply as a refuge from pain . . . a source from which to receive solace. When the day was bright, my feet could find the way. When joy was my companion, I was strong. I stumbled through busy days again until involved problems returned me to you. In more maturing experiences, I learned the wisdom of consistent, purposeful, daily fellowship with you. Now, when days bring sunshine, I share with you its warmth, and find it multiplied to divide among my friends. When my heart knows deep content, I fortify myself against the cold, cheerless day of discouragement and despondency.

I need not tell you how I feel when I come. You understand, and I find you waiting. At rare moments, God, you don't come down to meet me, but call me to the summit of a hill where we can look at the countryside, and you tell me a little of what you wish to accomplish. You patiently explain to my immature mind some of the work you would like to have done down here. You discuss the risks involved, but you remind me of the strength that has always been given those who have sought your help. You show me the superiority of the forces of faith, joy, love, and wisdom, over those of constant sorrow, discouragement, and pessimism.

A Letter From Holland

The difficult days of the occupation are over; everything is changed now and is still changing to an even better future. It is hard to believe that such a short while ago we were suffering because there was no food nor fuel. Worst of all was the German patrol; many of our friends were imprisoned, and some died as a result of the beatings they received. Every day we prayed to our Heavenly Father, and we knew that the Saints overseas were praying too, but even so we wondered if God had left us. Sometimes it seemed to make little difference who won, as long as the war would end. I can remember well how my father went to work day after day, so starved that he finally became ill. People everywhere in Holland were dying of starvation when, after we had almost given up hope, the word of Germany's unconditional surrender reached us. The first thing we did was to offer a prayer of gratitude for our freedom. We won't forget what the Americans did for us. We hope to do something in return someday.

During the war it was almost impossible to hold services; our bicycles were stolen by the Germans, and there were no trains. Now there is a new horizon, and we are beginning again. There is no branch here in Greetingen, but we are trying to establish one. Our membership is only seven, but twenty-one people attended our first meeting which was conducted by Brother Eastma of Friesch. Before the service, we took pamphlets to several homes and put an invitation in the newspaper. We sincerely hope the church will send missionaries to Holland soon, because we need them so much.

Let us all work together and, with God's help, we can establish Zion.

Heart's Treasure

by LOUISE SCOTT WRIGLEY

*A time might lie ahead
Beyond the bend of the road—
A time when I could see no more,
Or walk no more among the seasons;
Breathing springtime fragrances,
Feeling summer sun,
Hearing the rustle of falling leaves
And the crackle of the merry Yule log.*

*So let me drink deeply of these joys.
Let me hoard these treasures,
These well-loved sights and sounds of every day
Which God created for me.
Let my heart truly know them now
While I am young—
That they may be with me Forever.*

About That Tithing Due

This is AFS-Day. New Year's Day is almost here, and that means more than resolutions and page one on the desk calendar. To many church people, AFS-Day means the completion of annual financial statements, and a clean page in a new ledger to enter 1947's income and expenditure.

We belong to the church. The church teaches stewardship. We're pledged to obey the laws of the church. Recitation of that little formula means that the product of the equation is filing a statement, or an inventory, if you've never complied with this law of the church before. This law holds for students struggling through college and stenographers making low wages, as well as the man who owns a new Buick. Fill out your statement, assess your tithing, and pay it. It's essential to the things in which you believe.

New Horizons

A Talk With God

And in these nobler moments with you I say, "God, give me clear vision. Help me to see the sin of choosing the lesser good. So often I have demanded entrance at locked doors, only to find, in your silent denial, avenues to richer treasures. Point my eyes to the distant horizon, and share with me a measure of your understanding spirit that I may see in this long-range vision the wisdom of momentary self-denials. I do not ask the way to be made easy. Protect me not against sorrow's pain, but rather against my selfish desires to shrink from its refining processes. When experiences strike too closely, I do not ask escape, God. Only let me lift my head and smile."

As I breathe the words, I feel your power witnessing that this is a dedication. To keep these words inviolate, I shall need, with others, to daily seek the solitary places of prayer.

pleased and the right to exercise it regardless of instructions. The very principle of agency implies some limitation as to the right to exercise it. Every agent employed and sent by a business firm or corporation is authorized to act for his concern in carrying out the purpose of his agency. He may have power to willfully do that which injures the business he represents, but he does not have the right to use his agency in that manner.

Properly, then, man is a steward to act as an agent of God, according to his will and instructions, and this trust is reposed in him subject to these conditions. He who does not observe them violates the trust reposed in him and becomes unworthy of reward or further confidence in the important affairs of life.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF STEWARDSHIP

So vital to the purposes of the kingdom of God did Jesus consider the responsibility of a steward that he presented a parable to illustrate it. He showed that the unworthy steward will be deprived of his stewardship, saying to his disciples:

There was a certain rich man which had a steward; and the same was accused unto him that he had wasted his goods. And he called him, and said unto him, How is it that I hear this of thee? give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward.— Luke 16: 1, 2.

Jesus came as the divinely appointed Messiah both to teach and show men how they ought to live. The divine laws of life and all human experience prove that it is sin, injustice, and selfishness that produce human need and suffering in such abundance. The earth is full of resources for food, shelter, and raiment. If used and provided according to the law which says: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," everyone would have enough and to spare. It is the great stewardship of life for each of us to help make the world a better place in which to live.

God has given to us both temporal and spiritual resources to use with equity and kindness for the blessing of mankind as well as for ourselves. Jesus had no place to lay his head, so far as wealth of this world is concerned, yet he enriched many millions of people of all walks of life down through the ages. Such wealth is imperishable, and it is our stewardship to labor for the same unselfish ends as human need demands.

It is interesting to know that when St. Paul's Cathedral was being built, Sir Christopher Wren, the architect, caused a printed notice to be affixed to the scaffolding, threatening with instant dismissal any workman guilty of swearing within those sacred precincts.—A. Bernard Webber.

nice home and family. You've been an elder for years and accomplished a wonderful work here in the lives of the young people, all because you planned your life with the proper goals in mind, and carried them out. I can't think of a happier state to be in at fifty years of age.

Elder G.: But Tom, you could still accomplish a lot.

Tom W.: How? I've never been in one place long enough to go to church. In fact, I forgot about church altogether after you and I went our separate ways. I'd have to give up my job, and what could I do? I'd have to start all over again—at my age! When I think of all the years of church activity and good I might have accomplished, I feel like stopping right where I am.

Elder G.: I realize that what's lost can never be regained, but why not try to do differently now? There are a number of church people here who would be able to help you, I'm sure.

Tom W.: Well, I'll have to think it over. It's too big a step I'm afraid—perhaps a few years ago—(looks at his watch, rises). I'll have to go now, or I'll miss my train (moving to door). I'd give all I've got to live my life over again, and hear what I believe you will hear someday, Bill.

Elder G.: What's that?

Tom W.: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." (Curtain)

Gail shakes her head, and slowly sits up in the chair, looks around, puzzled.

Gail: There's nobody here! But I'd have sworn all those people were right in this room (rises).

That Dutch family, why I never realized before what a privilege it was to have the opportunity of an education. Oh, I wish I could send them money or something. That nurse, why she looked like Doris—education—for the development of our talents, for the growth of our characters, and for service to others. It really is important, after all.

And Elder Goodwin—who in the world would have thought of envying him. I've always thought of him as positively stuffy. I felt so sorry for that poor Tom Wooding—but that's just what I wanted to do, travel—and have lots of money! (Sits down on sofa.) I'm going to do a lot of thinking from now on. I see there are a few things I have to learn! (Curtain)

A Minister for Fifty Years

Special services honoring Patriarch Richard Baldwin were held September 22 at the Sharon, Pennsylvania, Church. Brother Baldwin began his ministry as a young man, being ordained on July 27, 1896. He has represented the church in many States, the British Isles, and Canada. Although superannuated, "Uncle Richard," as he is affectionately called by his friends, still is active in the work; his wife, Inez, is also a devoted worker.

Visitors from Youngstown, Warren, Niles, New Hamburg, and New Castle attended the all-day meeting. Following the morning service, a basket dinner was served at noon. The afternoon activities were arranged by Roy Jones of Sharon.

News Briefs

Independence, Missouri

East Independence Congregation

Pastor, Wynne Jones

The Zion's League installation service was held at 8:30 p.m. on October 6. New officers are Mary Thatcher, president; Medella Bickle, vice-president and music chairman; Bobby Carver, assistant music chairman; Angela Heide, secretary-treasurer; and Richard Bickle, recreation chairman. Pastor Wynne Jones and Lyndon Wagener were in charge of the early morning League prayer service on November 3. Apostle C. George Mesley taught a class at church school and delivered the pastoral address at the Communion service. The Wayside Chapel Quartet provided special music for the hour.

The young matrons and older women sponsored family night on October 29, entertaining with a Halloween party at the Giger home; Mrs. Virleen Carver was in charge of the games. On October 10 the older women met with Mary Firkins for a covered dish luncheon; Mrs. John Darling was the guest speaker.

Tuesday evenings have been designated as priesthood visiting nights. Members of the priesthood meet at the church at 7:15, going from there to the homes.

The Blue Birds, under the direction of their leader, Pauline Jennings, presented a musical reading and song, "The Challenge of the Blue Birds," on October 6. Recent speakers have been William Sheffer, Harley Nagel, Harry Friend, Carl Thompson, Frank Minton, Sr., William LaGrece, Lyndon Wagener, James Stowell, and Max Thorne. Musical contributions were made by Donald Pyper, Robert Moran, Earl Carlile, Margaret Mauzey, Shirley McGueen, Elsie Sutterfield, Barbara Green, Kenneth Wagener, Philip Stark, Milford Nace, Virleen Carver, Annabelle Prell, Thelma Hershey, Clifford and Robert Carver.

Liberty Street Church

Pastor, Howard Timm

An ordination service was held at the 11 o'clock hour on November 10. Edgar Gard, Floyd Chapman, and Hale Bunten were ordained to the office of deacon; Leonard Hanson was ordained a priest, and Carl Thompson, an elder. The charge was given by Elder Charles Graham, after which members of the priesthood sang, "Rise Up, O Men of God." Paul Herrick sang, "God Has Called You," the words of which were composed by Mrs. Goldie Zion. Elder Amos T. Higdon gave the ordination prayer.

Judith Adele, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George E. Munro, was blessed October 27 by Elders C. R. Walker and Howard Timm. On November 3, Andrew Charles, son of Mr. and Mrs. Hubert Mills, was blessed by Elders John Zion and Hubert Mills, and La Juana Anne, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Bridges, was blessed by Elders William LaGrece and Howard Timm.

Members of the Zion's League were in charge of family night on October 19. Features of the evening were a Halloween party, a program by the juniors, and moving pictures, shown by Joseph Frick. November's family night, also in charge of the League, began with a covered-dish supper, followed by stunts, songs, a program, and discussion on the home. Joseph Frick again entertained the children with moving pictures.

In October, the junior department began the publication of "The Busy Bee," a monthly paper. Barbara Petre is editor, and Martha Fye assistant editor. The purpose of this publication is to stimulate interest and keep the juniors informed of the various services and activities. Lela Bennett is the class teacher.

The Orioles and Blue Birds received their awards and honor badges at a special service on Sunday evening, November 17. Ruth Zion, outstanding in Girl Scout activities, has the honor of having won more awards, including the Light of Life pin, than any other girl in Independence.

The Zion's League was in charge of the evening service on November 24. Elder Charles Graham gave the sermon, and the William Chrisman Girls' Chorus sang several numbers.

Tacoma, Washington

Pastor, Ray Sowers

Officers for the coming year are Ray Sowers, pastor and young people's supervisor; Ray Stewart, church school director; Della Towle, secretary; David Patterson, treasurer; Gladys Patterson, director of music; Leda Eaton, women's leader; and Lucille Gilmore, publicity agent. An installation service for these newly-elected officers was held Sunday, October 6.

Seventy and Mrs. Ernest Ledsworth were present on October 27; Brother Ledsworth gave both the morning and evening sermons.

The following Zion's League officers were elected on October 11: Lois Sprague, president; Arnold Dahl, vice-president; Beverly Monthieth, secretary; and Merrill Gilmore, assistant to League Supervisor Ray Sowers. The group is divided into four committees: each committee is responsible in turn, for a Friday evening social. A Halloween party was held November 1, sponsored by the women's department with Mary Dahl in charge of the entertainment.

Choir rehearsals are held weekly, and workers' council meetings will again be held regularly the first Sunday of each month.

Portsmouth, Ohio

Pastor, Walter Culp

The annual business meeting was held September 15 with District President Floyd Rockwell of Dayton in charge. Officers elected for the coming year are Walter Culp, pastor; James Cheffins, church school director; Nelby Rexroad, secretary-treasurer; William Kroger, church school secretary; Samuel Rexroad, assistant; May Crabtree, women's leader; and Hodley Copas, young people's leader. As there is no deacon in Portsmouth branch, Elder O. A. Rexroad volunteered to serve in that office. Elder Francis May, who was elected assistant pastor, died a few days after the election; M. L. Crabtree was appointed to succeed him.

Hodley Copas is conducting a three-weeks' series of meetings at Hiland Bend, assisted by Elder Rexroad. A supper and party was held October 30 to raise funds for the young people's treasury.

Stratford, Ontario

Pastor, Howard G. Schlotzhauer

The annual branch meeting was held on September 16. The following officers were elected: H. G. Schlotzhauer, pastor and missionary supervisor; Russell Atkins, counselor and church school supervisor; William Leney, counselor and financial secretary; Walter Eastwood, solicitor, counselor, and historian; Mrs. William Leney, auditor and secretary; Bernard Galbraith, auditor, publicity agent, and book steward; Duncan MacDermid, treasurer and deacon; D. A. Withrow, director of music; Mrs. D. A. Withrow, pianist and women's leader; R. W. Powell, Zion's League supervisor; and David Smith, church school director. Church school officers are David Smith, assistant superintendent; Mrs. David Smith, secretary; Mrs. Russell Atkins, superintendent of temperance; Mrs. D. A. Withrow, librarian; Duncan MacDermid, treasurer; Mrs. Duncan MacDermid, pianist; Mrs. H. G. Schlotzhauer, superintendent of junior department. Zion's League officers are David Smith, president; B. A. Galbraith, first vice-president and teacher; Albert Maslen, second vice-president; R. W. Powell, secretary-treasurer; Mrs. Albert Maslen, social chairman; and Gordon Robinson, projects chairman.

Guest speakers during the past two months were Evangelist B. Hewitt of Toronto and Elder Anthony Hewitt of Chatham. Many of the Stratford Saints heard President I. A. Smith speak in London on November 17. Several attended Dr. F. M. McDowell's leadership institute held in London in September.

Members of the Zion's League sponsored two out-door socials recently. F. H. Edward's Overviews of Church History is being used as a study course.

Donna Elaine and Kenneth Robert, children of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Robinson, were blessed on September 8 by Elder H. G. Schlotzhauer and William Lenev.

—B. A. Galbraith, reporter.

Dayton, Ohio

Pastor, R. H. Hunter

Early in October Evangelist Ray Whiting conducted a series of meetings on "How to Sell the Gospel." Average attendance was more than doubled at these services.

The Graceland College Day program was directed by Anna Belle Hunter, young people's leader. The organ prelude by Franklin Reiske, Jr., was a medley of songs from Graceland and other colleges. Kathryn Ankney read "These Things I Have Seen," and Myrtle and Priscilla Boeckman sang "Graceland Beloved." Other participants in the service were Ann Voltman, a former Graceland and now a student at Antioch College, and Myrtle Boeckman. Another feature of the day was a display of campus pictures, Acacias, Towers, novelties, books, and scrapbooks from Graceland.

A Hawaiian dinner and party was held by the young people on November 9. Each guest was presented a lei by Anna Belle and Allie Vee Hunter. The evening ended with group singing; the singers were accompanied on electric guitars by James and R. B. Dickson.

Brooklyn, New York

Pastor, E. LeRoy Squire

The annual business meeting for the election of officers was held October 2. President F. Henry Edwards and Apostle George Lewis were present on October 8. Following an address by President Edwards, the congregation assembled in the lower auditorium of the church for refreshments and to personally meet the two ministers. Visitors from Newark, New Jersey, and Norwalk, Connecticut, attended the special service.

A committee composed of Mary Rasmussen, Lorraine Milner, and Adeline M.

Harris was appointed to be in charge of the activities of the choir for the coming year.

Max Wise was the speaker on Graceland Day. Other Graceland alumni present were Winifred Milner, Thomas Thatcher, Jr., Marion McDowell Wise, Mary Jones Rasmussen, Betty Jean Black, and Lois Williams.

Margaret Ruth, infant daughter of Henry and Frances Keene, was blessed on Sunday, October 27, by Elders Ephraim and LeRoy Squire.

The Loyal Club, which is composed of the women of the branch, held its first meeting of the new year at the home of Mrs. Ethel Squire, president. The Book of Mormon is being used as a study course.

—Betty Jean Black, reporter.

Bemidji, Minnesota

Pastor, George Day

Eight new members were baptized on June 9 by Frank Sims. They were confirmed by Elders Joseph Yager and George W. Day. Ada Carson, youth leader, was a welcome visitor to the branch. Elders Burch Whiting and Samuel Case were guest speakers during the summer. Mr. and Mrs. Earl Petrie of Joplin, Missouri, spent six weeks in Bemidji. Apostle Charles Hield gave illustrated lectures on ancient America November 2, 3, and 4. Missionary Joseph Yager spent four days visiting and preaching from November 10 to 14.

Wichita, Kansas

Pastor, D. J. Williams

The annual business meeting was held September 18, and the following officers were elected: D. J. Williams, pastor; E. A. Schmidt and J. C. Shannon, counselors; Mrs. Dean Holder, church school director; Mrs. D. J. Williams, women's leader, and J. C. Shannon, Zion's League supervisor.

The Southwestern Kansas District Conference was held on October 5 and 6; the conference theme was "The Christian Ministry." Apostle Arthur Oakman was in charge. On Friday evening preceding the conference, a banquet was given for the young people. Apostle Oakman was the guest speaker, and Vern Davis, toastmaster. Patriarch John Worth was present and gave four blessings during the conference.

The women of the branch have been sponsoring various projects throughout the year to raise money for an organ; to date $1,200 have been contributed to the fund. Plans are being made for the building of a new church also.

The Blue Birds, under the leadership of Mrs. Vera Allen, and the Orioles, with Betty Ward as supervisor, are planning an active season.

Five young people from Wichita are attending Graceland; they are Ronald and Donald Manuel, Elaine Sheppard, Norma Ginn, and Charles Jackson.

—Marvel Westwood, reporter.

San Leandro, California

Pastor, William Hall

Officers elected at the annual business meeting held October 17 are William Hall, pastor; Charles Mottashed and Mark Fonda, associate pastors; Nellie MacDougall, secretary and recorder; Oral Hartwig, treasurer and bishop's agent; Lielani Reid, director of music; Mardel Holden, women's leader, publicity agent, and reporter; James Reid, director of religious education and auditor; and Paul Stanfield, Herald representative. Apostle John Rushton, Alma Andrews, and William Hall were in charge of the meeting.

Owen Morgan, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Hall, and Frank, Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Isola, were blessed on November 10 by Evangelist Will Dawson, assisted by Pastor William Hall. Brother Dawson has also ministered to the Saints through his sermons; other out-of-town speakers have been Brother Hartsaugh of Redwood City and Brother Savage of Berkeley.

On November 7 the women of the branch held their election of officers. Carrie Fonda was elected vice-president; Pearl Hinton, secretary; and Nellie MacDougall, treasurer. Chairmen of the various committees were also elected. At the close of the meeting, a talent survey was conducted and each member dedicated her particular talent to the work of the church for the coming year. A homemaking shower, sponsored by the women's department, was recently given for Mrs. Mark MacDougall at the home of Ruth Nelson.

—Mardel Holden, reporter.

Fall River, Massachusetts

Pastor, A. M. Coombs

Elvin Baldwin, Doris Heap, Donald Heap, and Edgar George were baptized in July at Watuppa Lake, Pastor A. M. Coombs and Charles Pillsbury officiating. All were confirmed by Pastor Coombs. David Louis, infant son of Elbert and Marietta Heap, was blessed at the November Communion service. Mr. and Mrs. Heap are the church school directors. Seventy Albert Scherer recently visited Fall River, calling on the Saints in their homes. Elder George Robley of Providence was a recent guest speaker. Pastor A. M. Coombs is teaching a class, using Elbert Smith's Restoration, a Study in Prophecy, as a text. Thelonia Stevens'

Bible Studies is also being taught by Carrie Cross. Deacon John Henderson and his wife, Alice, have moved to Attleboro; for many years he served the Fall River congregation as treasurer and bishop's agent.

Elder Edmund Brown of Providence will conduct a series of meetings in the near future on "Infallible Proofs" and "God's Law." The eightieth anniversary of the organization of Fall River Branch will be celebrated on December 8.

—Gladys V. Coombs, reporter.

Wellsburg, West Virginia

Pastor, S. M. Zonkers

The Armistice Day service was directed by John Treiber. Several appropriate poems were read, and the choir sang two anthems; R. E. Rodgers presented and dedicated a roll of honor plaque; his message was one of challenge to the returned veterans and consolation to those parents who had lost sons in the war.

Many repairs have been made and improvements added to the church building in recent months. A mimeograph machine was purchased so that the Sunday programs could be printed; Louis Zonker and Robert Allen are responsible for this service.

The adult class, with Catherine Rodgers as president, and the Live Wire class, with President Elmer Vincent, sponsored suppers to raise money for the branch treasury. The choir meets weekly under the direction of Lenora Nixon; the present ambition is "a robed choir by Christmas." Council meetings are held regularly each month.

R. E. Rodgers, S. M. Zonker, John Treiber, Williard Allen, Louis Zonker, Otto Melcher, and Paul Lannum were recent speakers.

—Leona Hanes, reporter.

Bremerton, Washington

Pastor, A. W. Lundeen

The following officers were elected at the quarterly business meeting: A. W. Lundeen, pastor; Eva Lundeen, secretary; Paul Duvic, church school director; Ray Chapman, solicitor and treasurer; Ella Chapman, women's leader; Mary Ellen Turner, junior church school director; Anne Brown, adult social leader; Vera Westgren, young people's leader; and Frances Aldrich, librarian.

The women's department recently sponsored a progressive luncheon and short musical program. The Zion's League held a Halloween carnival. Proceeds from both projects were applied to the building fund. Many of the Leaguers attended the district youth retreat held at Deception Pass State Park on Whidby Island in September. A children's banquet was given by the mothers of the church school department early in October; a party for the children was held Halloween night.

At the district conference held in Seattle on November 17, four men were approved for ordination to the priesthood; they are Iral Chandler, Robert Nims, and Harry Turner, priests; and Ray Chapman, deacon. Mrs. Eva Lundeen was elected district women's leader for another year.

Apostle D. T. Williams visited Bremerton on November 19 and 20, preaching both nights. Seventy and Mrs. E. A. Ledsworth are making their home in Bremerton.

—Vera Byrd, reporter.

Kentucky-Tennessee District Conference

The Kentucky-Tennessee District Conference was held at Paris, Tennessee, on September 28 and 29. The conference opened Saturday morning at 10 o'clock with a prayer and testimony service; Elder Jerry Fitch and District Missionary Allen Breckenridge were in charge. Brother Breckenridge was the 11 o'clock speaker. District officers elected at the 2 p.m. business meeting are as follows: Jerry Fitch, district president; C. B. Gallimore and E. Y. Bumpas, counselors; Flossie Gallimore, secretary; Curtis Ross, financial agent and director of religious education; H. A. McClure, director of music; Edna B. Hicks, women's leader and young people's supervisor; Louise Walters, assistant young people's supervisor and pianist; Myrtle Sutton, publicity agent; O. S. Caldwell, nonresident pastor; Barney Ross and Dan Dortch, assistants. Apostle M. A. McConley gave the evening sermon.

Sunday's activities began with a Communion service at 9 a.m. with the district presidency in charge. Apostle McConley was again the speaker at 11 o'clock. The newly-elected district president, Jerry Fitch, addressed the conference at 2 p.m. The closing feature was a sermon by Missionary Allen Breckenridge.

Music for the conference was provided by the Paris choir.

Los Angeles, California

Central Congregation

Pastor, Garland E. Tickemyer

A reception in honor of Pastor and Mrs. Garland E. Tickemyer and family was held at the church on October 2. "Rethinking Central Congregation" was the slogan proposed by Pastor Tickemyer for the coming year; committees were appointed to study all phases of the local program in view of developing plans.

Seventy George Njeim conducted a series of cottage meetings from September 15 to October 6. Pastor Tickemyer, assisted by members of the priesthood, is continuing these meetings. Carla Davis and Mary Clayton were baptized recently.

President E. J. Gleazer and Ed Browne, public relations representative, of Graceland College were guest speakers on October 13. They were given a party by Graceland alumni during their visit to Los Angeles.

Elder Blaine Bender, director of Central choir, was elected pastor of the Pasadena congregation on October 13. Luella Wight has been appointed to take his place as music director. Leona McDole will succeed Helen Bender as children's director. The Benders were given an appreciation party by the members of Central congregation on October 22.

Australia

Victoria District Conference

The Victoria District Conference was held September 21 and 22. Seventy H. Peisker, assisted by District President S. Jacka and his associates, Elders A. W. Robinson and G. Cuthbert, presided over the two business sessions. Visitors included Alan Frater, mission director of religious education, A. J. Corbett, Mona McLaughlin, and Maisie Waters of Sydney, and Elders Broadway and C. Grayden of Perth, West Australia. A minute's silence was observed in memory of Alan Eden, posted as missing during hostilities and now presumed to be dead. A budget of 227 pounds was approved, and it was voted that 300 pounds be allotted for the purchasing of a reunion ground. The district building fund, including Carnegie congregation's 800 pounds, totals 1,787 pounds. Euroa Branch reported the purchase of additional land adjacent to the church. The Bendigo Saints must find a new meeting place, since the church they have been renting was sold. A total of 654 pounds was paid to the general church during the year. Three hundred pounds were given anonymously by two members to help establish a mission home in Victoria.

Final figures show that sixty-five Victorians served in the armed forces. Three were killed, and three died of illness. Two young members are now with the Australian Forces in Japan.

Preceding the Saturday evening business session, a fifteen minute "question time" was held. Junior Communion and junior church were held for the children. Adult activities included a Communion service; a discussion on "Making a Church School Grow"; a session for men conducted by Elder A. J. Corbett; a young people's class, "Developing a Balanced Life," taught by Elder Frater; a meeting for women arranged by District Leader Ethel Robinson; a vesper service directed by Bessie Harvey; and a sermon, "The Challenge of Life," by Elder Peisker. Six recommendations for ordination were approved.

Food for Britain

An appeal for food for the Saints in the British Isles has resulted in ninety-nine families being adopted. Regular monthly parcels are sent to them by Australian members.

Vacation Bible School

Vacation Bible schools, stressing phases of church life and doctrine, have become an established feature in Australia. One was held in Euroa, one in Victoria, and one in Adelaide. Elders F. Potter and A. Frater were in charge.

Central Michigan Conference

Apostles D. Blair Jensen and E. J. Gleazer, assisted by the district presidency, presided at the Central Michigan Conference which convened at Midland on November 17. The conference began with a fellowship service at 9 a.m., followed by a business meeting at which the district was officially declared disorganized. Lunch was served at noon in the homes of the Midland Saints. The conferences reconvened at 2 p.m.; Apostle Gleazer spoke relative to the organization of new districts, after which all members living south of U. S. Highway No. 20 assembled in the lower auditorium. Those living north of the highway remained in the main auditorium for their meeting; this group will be known as the Central Michigan District. Officers elected for the coming year are B. H. Doty, district president; Leora Gussman, secretary and publicity agent; John Barr, treasurer; Christy Doty, women's leader; Leon Methner, director of music; Roy Seymour, young people's leader; Myrtle Kitner, church school director; Mary Harder, historian; Leon Methner and David Bailey, reunion committee; Frank Sly and Albert Seymour, auditors; and Byron Doty, John Barr, and Otto Bartlett, budget committee. A courtesy vote sustained Otto Bartlett as bishop's agent. Three ordinations were approved: Elmer Stewart and John Barr, elders, and Gordon Roberts, priest. Marshall McGuire and Albert Seymour were sustained as counselors to the district president. Thirteen delegates to the 1947 General Conference were also elected.

Central Nebraska District

The annual Central Nebraska District Conference was held at Inman on November 2 and 3. Apostle Arthur Oakman, Seventy A. L. Loving, and Patriarch John Worth were in charge of the various services. An organization meeting was held at 3:30 p.m. on Saturday; Apostle Oakman spoke in the evening.

Sunday's activities began with a prayer and testimony meeting at 9:30 a.m., followed by a Communion service. Linda Rae, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Orlen Moore, and Marlene Mabel, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Elvin Alton, were blessed by Seventy Loving and Patriarch Worth preceding the 11 o'clock preaching service. Three people received their patriarchal blessings, and several were administered to during the noon intermission. The business meeting convened at 2:30 p.m.; officers elected are Jay Butler, district president; Elsie Balyntine, secretary; Willis Hague, director of religious education; Lulu Butler, women's leader, Zada Payne, director of music; and Pearl Moore, publicity agent. Delegates to General Conference were also elected. Joseph Coon was recommended for ordination to the office of elder. Seventy A. L. Loving was the evening speaker.

Vancouver, British Columbia

Pastor, N. V. Morrison

District President Samuel Clark was in charge of the annual business meeting. Elder Norman Morrison was sustained as pastor, Elder Edwin Spargo as church director, and Deacon Charles Stanbridge as junior church pastor. Recent baptisms include Norman White, Loretta Shrank, John Taylor, Clifford Denike, Gordon Spargo, Wayne Keeler, Dennis Gregory, and Catherine Hanrahan.

The canning program sponsored by the Daughters of Zion has reached a successful close. Over 5,000 pounds of scarce items, such as peas, beans, corn, and salmon were canned and divided among those participating in the project, leaving an adequate supply for branch dinners and social affairs. The women gave a chicken dinner on September 27 and are now planning for a bazaar. In addition to these activities, regular class sessions are held with Sister Gerrie as teacher; Evan Fry's articles on the Restoration are being used as a study course.

Vancouver Branch sponsored the third annual banquet for the British Columbia District priesthood members and their wives. Over fifty persons attended. The Zion's League catered, and Elder G. Miller acted as chairman. Inez Coates is League president, and Dorthea Spargo is young people's leader.

Patriarch Frank Curtis recently visited Vancouver; his ministry was greatly appreciated.

—Bert Embleton, reporter.

Kimball, Ontario

Pastor, J. H. Harkness

Seventy Harold I. Velt recently gave a series of illustrated lectures on Christ in ancient America. He also officiated at the baptism and confirmation of five new members. While in Kimball, he was invited to speak at the War Service Club in Brigdon.

Other guest speakers for the past year have been Elders S. Philips and Basil Freer of Sarnia; Elder Freer of Petrolia; Elder R. D. Weaver of Independence, Missouri; Elders H. A. Engle and J. A. Pray of Chatham; Bishop S. C. Dent of London; and Elder W. A. Alford.

Officers elected at the branch business meeting are J. H. Harkness, pastor; R. Johnston and Joel Shaw, counselors; Glen Dailey, church school director; Joel Shaw, assistant church school director; Reta Ashton, director of music; Gordon McDonald, young people's leader; and Mrs. Marie Bishop, women's supervisor. A project of the women's department is the visiting of each child that is born in the group. This past year a cradle roll certificate was presented with each visit; from now on a present will also be given by Janet Lye, cradle roll supervisor. Seventy-five dollars were raised by the department to cover the cost of the district women's reunion. Following the Halloween party in the lower auditorium on October 31, the women sponsored a bazaar. A country store, apron and fancy-work booth, bake sale, white elephant booth, and fish pond were features of the bazaar. Refreshments were served by the young people at the close of the evening.

—M. E. Hackett and W. H. Kimball, reporters.

Calumet, Oklahoma

Pastor, Donald Elwell

The annual business meeting was held September 10. Harlan Armstrong, pastor of Calumet Branch for the past four and a half years, stated that there had been an increase in attendance. Donald Elwell was elected to succeed Elder Armstrong as pastor, choosing Collin Clevenger as his assistant. The Armstrongs are moving to Osborn, Missouri; they will be greatly missed in both the church and community.

An all-day meeting and basket dinner was held November 10. District President Ralf Wilt of Claude, Texas, Lester Dyke of Eagle City, and Glen Limb of Buffalo were present. Donald Elwell was ordained a bishop and Harlan Armstrong an elder at the 11 o'clock service.

—Augusta Powell, reporter.

San Jose, California

Pastor, Elbert D. Guilbert

Apostle John Rushton and Elders Alma Andrews and Russell Ralston were in charge of the annual business meeting held October 16. Officers elected for the coming year are Elbert D. Guilbert, pastor; L. H. Adams, B. R. Gilbert, and L. E. Cline, counselors; Lloyd Cline, director of religious education; Harold Cline, young people's supervisor; Gertrude Sessions, director of women and historian; Harry Waters, treasurer; Ray Elam, secretary-recorder, auditor, and bishop's solicitor; Lena Guilbert, director of music; Edith Young, assistant director of music; Mary Lee Guilbert, librarian; Bill Hays, publicity agent; May Hays, book steward; Agnes Elam, children's supervisor; and Ray Elam, Hugh Anderson, and Lloyd Cline, finance committee.

—Ray Elam, reporter.

Evansville, Indiana

Pastor, Thomas Wareham

A candlelighting installation service was held at the church on October 6. Officers for the coming year are Thomas Wareham, pastor; Maurice Thompson, treasurer; A. J. Glenn, building fund secretary and treasurer; Evelyn Harding, clerk; Vivian Wareham, director of music and Zion's League leader; Daisy Glenn, women's leader; J. P. Miller, director of religious education; and Ann Miller, church school secretary.

Two new members, Sam and Irene Oxley, were baptized by Missionary Allen Breckenridge. The branch enrollment was increased by two more when Eddie and Richard Miller transferred from another congregation.

The district young people's retreat was held in Evansville on October 19 and 20;

Elder John Darling of the Department of Religious Education was the teacher. Over forty members from the district and several nonmember friends attended.

Recent visiting speakers have been Allen Breckenridge, F. A. Smith, and District President Chester Metcalf. Apostle M. A. McConley was present the latter part of August to help formulate a building program for the branch. Nearly $2,000 are in the building fund.

Maxine and Delores Glenn are attending Graceland College. Mrs. Katherine Hamelton left recently to join her husband, who is stationed in Texas.

Silver Lake Reunion

Over 600 hundred regular campers attended the 1946 Silver Lake Reunion, the first to be held since 1941. As many as 1,000 were present for several of the services, coming from Oregon, Idaho, and Canada, as well as various cities in Washington. Apostle Charles R. Hield, Bishops Henry Livingston and Monte Lasater, and District Presidents Alma Johnston of Seattle, Samuel Clark of British Columbia, Harold Constance of Spokane, and J. L. Verhei of Portland were in charge. Missionaries Houston Hobart, James Kemp, and Ernest Ledsworth assisted in teaching, preaching, and supervising the activities for youth. Classes in religious education were taught by Mrs. Effie Verhei. Wanda McDole was in charge of the nursery and young women's class. Ruby Fishel directed the activities of the junior division. Melba Crum of Seattle was director of music for the reunion, and Elliott Gilberts was camp supervisor. Mrs. Royce Chapman and Eva Lundeen were in charge of the women's work. Evangelists in attendance were J. Frank Curtis of Spokane, A. C. Martin of Seattle, and W. H. Barker of Portland. Meals were served from the "cookhouse" at a very low cost.

The final prayer service of the reunion was an outstandingly spiritual one; the general church representatives, district presidents, and evangelists were in charge. The 1947 Silver Lake Reunion will be held July 25 to August 2.

San Antonio, Texas

Pastor, H. E. Winegar

The annual business meeting was held September 11. Officers elected for the coming year are H. E. Winegar, pastor; Fantley P. Hall and Rouss Eastham, counselors; Mary Hall, church school director; Albert Holder, young people's leader; Mildred Holder, secretary; Fantley Hall, treasurer; Emma Jackson, director of music; and E. Winegar, women's leader. An installation service was held October 13 with Elder Floyd E. Jett in charge; each newly-elected officer gave a short talk.

Seventy J. Charles May conducted a series of missionary meetings from October 20 to November 3. The collection of colored slides he showed on life in the Pacific islands was interesting and inspirational. Even-song was held each night with Brother May playing the guitar and leading the congregation in singing.

Graceland College Day was observed October 27; Pastor H. E. Winegar, a former Graceland, spoke at the 11 o'clock service. A collection of $112.73 was taken. —Florence Berry, reporter.

Northern California District Women's Institute

The women of northern California held their second annual institute in Berkeley on October 26 and 27. Mrs. Emma Appel, district women's leader, of Stockton presided. The theme was "Women's Opportunity to Serve." A 9 o'clock prayer service on Saturday morning was the opening feature of the institute. Classes were conducted by Apostle John Rushton and Mrs. Russell Ralston of San Francisco, California. After lunch, Mrs. Elva Petz of Stockton lectured on child delinquency. A banquet was held in the evening; Ona Andrews, chairman of the banquet committee, was the supervisor. A program of music and readings was presented for the 106 guests following the dinner. Sunday's meetings included a 9:30 a.m. class taught by Mrs. Elizabeth Schall of Sacramento; an 11 o'clock sermon by Apostle Rushton; and a dedication service with District President Laurence McDonald presiding in the afternoon.

Celebrate Golden Wedding Anniversary

Mr. and Mrs. Reuben Ard of LaMar, Colorado, celebrated their golden wedding anniversary on November 22. A reception honoring them was held at the home of their daughter, Mrs. James Clark, in Pueblo. They were married at Amity, Missouri, in 1896 by Charles Faul. Three of the eight children born to them are living; they are Richard of San Fernando, California; Gilbert Ard and Mrs. James Clark of Pueblo. They have nine grandchildren. At the reception, Mr. and Mrs. Ard repeated their wedding vows with Charles Class, a grandson, as the officiating minister. Both have been members of the Reorganized Church since childhood.

Central Michigan Conference

November 17 was a date of historical significance to the Saints of Central Michigan District. At the annual conference held on that day, the original Central Michigan District was disorganized, and two new districts created. Sensing the importance of the occasion, the Saints met at 9 a.m. for a prayer service, led by District President Byron H. Doty. A business session followed with Apostles E. J. Gleazer, D. Blair Jensen, and the district presidency in charge. Branch and committee reports were submitted, as well as the reports of the district officers. Outstanding among these was the bishop's agent's report which listed the total tithes of the district at $17,557.97. Lunches were served at noon in the homes of Midland Saints. The district band played several numbers in the lower auditorium of the church, preceding the afternoon session. The conference reconvened at 2 p.m. with Apostle Gleazer in charge. Resolutions submitted by District President Doty were considered first. Among these, one was adopted which designated that future reunions would be known as Liahona Park Reunions. On behalf of the Joint Council, Apostle Gleazer formally disorganized the Central Michigan District, listing the groups which would form the new districts. Members of the South Central Michigan District assembled in the lower auditorium with Apostle Gleazer; this included Saints from Alma, Bay City, Burt, Midland, Mt. Pleasant, Saginaw, and Vestaburg. The new Central Michigan District, composed of the Saints from Butman, Clare, Coleman, Farwell, Gladwin, Glover, Harrison, Houghton Lake, Iosco, Mikado, Tawas City, Twinning, West Branch, and Whittemore, held its meeting in the upper auditorium under the supervision of Apostle Jensen. Officers elected for this group are B. H. Doty, district president; Leora Gussman, secretary and publicity agent; John Barr, treasurer; Christy Doty, women's leader; Leon Methner, director of music; Roy Seymour, young people's leader; Myrtle Kittner, church school director; Mary Harder, historian; Leon Methner and David Bailey, reunion committee; Frank Sly and Albert Seymour, auditors; and Byron Doty, John Barr, and Otto Bartlett, budget committee. A courtesy vote sustained Otto Bartlett as bishop's agent. Three ordinations were approved: Elmer Stewart and John Barr, elder, and Gorden Roberts, priest. Marshall McGuire and Albert Seymour were sustained as counselors to the district president. Thirteen delegates to the 1947 General Conference were elected.

Officers elected for the South Central Michigan District are Merle Howard, president; Alene Wood, secretary; William Ash, treasurer; Ruth McCray, director of women; Harry Runkle, director of music; Ray Rosevear, young people's leader; Calvin Martin, church school director; Winnie Hulbert, historian; John Wiley and Otto Bartlett, reunion committee; Lewis Grice, Carl Hill, and John Rae, auditors. Otto Bartlett was sustained as bishop's agent, and a budget committee consisting of the district president, treasurer, and bishop's agent was empowered to act. Ten delegates were named for General Conference.

The evolution of these two districts from one created several problems. The Liahona Park reunion grounds, now jointly owned as general church property, required a new type of reunion committee; this will be composed of the two apostles in charge, the two district presidents, and two elected members from each district. Elder Otto Bartlett will continue as Bishop's agent for both districts, pending action of the Presiding Bishopric.

(Because of the reorganization, reports of the joint meeting were received from both Alene Wood, secretary of the South Central Michigan District, and Leora Gussman, secretary of the Central Michigan District. To avoid duplication, these have been combined. Future reports will be handled separately. Our thanks to these correspondents for their good work.—Editors.)

Chicago, Illinois

First Chicago Branch

Pastor, H. T. McCaig

Speakers for the month of November were Pastor H. T. McCaig, Dr. Floyd McDowell, and Elders Frank Shank, A. Neal Deaver, and B. A. Lenox. Special music for the services was provided by the choir and soloist Donald Mee. Theme for the month was "Go Ye." The following officers were elected on September 20 to serve during the coming church year: H. T. McCaig, pastor; B. A. Lenox, director of religious education; Elbert Chandler, children's supervisor; Violette Jones, women's leader; June Green, Zion's League president; D. M. Wiessen, director of music; Rena Ricker, secretary; Hulda Edstrom, bishop's agent; C. E. Huntley, business administrator; Hans Benhke and Douglas McPeeke, auditors; and Velya Castins, Herald correspondent. A Thanksgiving fellowship service was held November 28 at 10:30 a.m.

Chicago District Conference

The Chicago District Conference was held November 2 and 3. The Saturday evening schedule included registration, a play by the Ssenippah Guild of First Chicago congregation, and evensong, held at Central Church. Sunday's activities, at the Masonic Temple, began with a prayer service followed by a combined Communion and memorial service; President Israel A. Smith gave the Communion message. The district choir, under the direction of David Weissen, sang the anthem, "Thou Wilt Keep Him in Perfect Peace." In the afternoon the assembly was divided into three groups: the children were taught by Hattie Bell, who used visual aids to illustrate the lesson; Tom Beal led the young people in a round-table discussion; and President Smith addressed the adults. An interlude of organ music by Mrs. Tom Beal preceded the business session. District officers elected for the coming year are Joseph Baldwin, president; Roy Smith and Lyman Jones, counselors; Judith Smith, secretary; A. O. Skinner, treasurer; Hattie Bell, director of religious education; Genevieve Lusha, women's leader; Melvin Fowler, young people's leader; David Weissen, director of music; Ray Zinzer, historian; and Ruth Dickens, publicity agent. Three recommendations for ordination were approved: Bert Kidd, deacon; Malcom Fowler, priest; and Vasco Webb, elder. The final session of the conference was a dedication service.

London, Ontario

Pastor, A. W. Sheehy

Anniversary services, commemorating the thirtieth year since the opening of the present church building in November, 1916, and the seventy-first year since the organization of the church in London in October, 1875, were held on the week end of November 17, 18. Special speakers included President Israel A. Smith, Evangelist W. I. Fligg, and Elder J. Charles Mottashed. The latter two were both former pastors of the branch. President Smith paid tribute to the thirty-one members of the congregation who had been in the church for fifty years or were born before 1880. Clara Hardey, who was baptized sixty-six years ago, holds the record of longest membership in London Branch. Ellen Harrison has been a member for sixty-five years.

During the 11 o'clock service on Sunday, Dr. E. V. Shute of the branch presidency received a Red Cross certificate in recognition of the service rendered by members of the organization during the war years. A special award was presented to Mrs. Annie Sheridan who served as general convener. Group convener awards were given to eleven other members.

An institute for the women of the district was held November 30 and December 1. Music was provided by the St. Thomas women's group, and a review of the Book, Dawn of Peace, was given by Edith Nichol. Guest speaker for the institute was Mrs. Crinzi of Detroit. Mrs. Lily Winegarden is district leader.

—Josephine Skelton, reporter.

Northwestern Iowa District Conference

The Northwestern Iowa District Conference convened at Moorhead, Iowa, on November 10, beginning at 9:30 a. m. with a fellowship service. Apostle Paul M. Hanson was the 11 o'clock speaker. At 1:30 in the afternoon, the young people met to select a leader. The annual business meeting was held at 2; district officers elected for the coming year are as follows: Guy Johnson, district president; Elvin Baughman and Walter Weldon, counselors; Ruby Adams, secretary; Francis Harper, director of religious education; Bessie Shumate, women's leader; Fern Thompson, director of music; Walter Weldon, nonresident pastor; L. D. Weldon, young people's leader; and W. R. Adams, bishop and treasurer. This is Ruby Adam's twenty-second year as district secretary. A budget of $300 for 1947 was approved for the district. Tithes and offerings for the year amounted to $15,875.87. Twenty-two delegates to General Conference were selected. Four ordinations were approved: Charles Swift, deacon; Harold Kenyon and Phillip Furgison, priests; and Lewis Winey, elder.

—Ruby Adams, reporter.

Gary, Indiana

Pastor, D. H. Smith

Elder Kenneth Lusha of the district presidency was in charge of the October Communion service; Pastor D. H. Smith was the evening speaker. Six members of Gary Branch attended the International Council of Religious Education classes held in Chicago during October. Paul Frisbee gave the Grace-land Day message. Other recent speakers have been Lamont Mair, Roy Davey, and Brother Morris. A conference for Religious Education workers was held October 29. The women's department sponsored a Halloween party at the Y. M. C. A. on October 31, clearing $57.25 for the building fund.

—Ida Kidd, reporter.

Marlin, Texas

Recent speakers have been Missionary J. Charles May, and Elders J. M. Nunley and C. M. Mitchel; their sermons were inspiring to all who heard them. The work of the church is progressing under the direction of the priesthood. Wilma Dean Cooper, eleven-year-old daughter of Mrs. Pearl Cooper, was killed in an automobile accident recently. Eldredge Brown met his death in a fire at the McGregor Rubber Plant on September 6. Elder J. R. Allen officiated at both funeral services.

BULLETIN BOARD

Requests for Prayers

Anna Wall of Olympia, Washington, requests the prayers of the Saints that she may be healed, if it is God's will.

Mrs. Samuel Hunt of Emmett, Idaho, asks the prayers of the Saints for her son, Clyde, who is suffering from a disease which he contracted while serving with the armed forces in India. Since she is unable to obtain olive oil for consecration, she would greatly appreciate receiving it from any who care to send it, and will amply repay them.

Priesthood Journals Wanted

D. V. Lents, 304 South Fuller, Independence, Missouri, needs the following copies of the Priesthood Journal to complete his library: July and October, 1934; January, 1935; and April, 1936.

Correction

In the November 14 issue of the Herald, (page 28, Southeastern Illinois District Conference) the name M. E. Loving should read M. E. Lowry.

Our Departed Ones

BICKNELL.—Roy E., died November 8, 1946, at his home in London, Ontario. A good companion, father, and churchman, he was well-known and loved by all who knew him. For many years he served as financial secretary of the London Branch. Pastor A. W. Sheehy was the officiating minister, assisted by Evangelist J. E. MacGregor and Bishop J. C. Dent.

LEA.—June, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George W. Whiting, was born September 13, 1897, at Clitherall, Minnesota, and died December 7 at the Independence Sanitarium following several weeks of illness. She was graduated from the high school at Fergus Falls, Minnesota, took a year's work at the University of Minnesota, and went to the University of Montana for her Bachelor of Arts Degree. She taught at Graceland College, and later took graduate work in the school of speech at Northwestern University, the Columbia College of Expression, and the University of Chicago, receiving her Master's Degree there. She taught several years at Western Illinois State Teachers College, and enjoyed a trip to Europe before her marriage on September 24, 1930, to Leonard J. Lea. After her marriage, she took a year of graduate work in history at the University of Kansas. The remainder of her life was spent in Independence, Missouri, where she was active in a number of organizations, including the Independence Music Club, the White Masque Players, the American Association of University Women, the Independence Sanitarium Gray Ladies, and the women's department of the Stone Church. She coached plays, taught private pupils in expression, and judged many debates and contests at the schools. She was the author of the Easter pageant presented annually at Floral Hills. During the war emergency, she assisted in substitute teaching at both William Chrisman High School and the Junior High School in Independence. Until the time of her illness, she assisted in dramatic and expression work at the St. Mary's High School and St. Anne's School. At her home, she collected antique furniture, painted china and tapestry, and made needle-point upholstery. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since her youth.

She is survived by her husband, Leonard; her mother, Mrs. Ellen Whiting; and a sister, Mrs. George Lund, all of Independence. Funeral services were held at the Walnut Park Church; President Israel A. Smith gave the sermon, assisted by Pastor Glaude Smith and Apostle C. George Mesley. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

LUNDY.—Sterling Price, son of Pascal F. and Missouri L. Lundy, was born February 27, 1862, at Fortescue, Missouri, and died November 25, 1946. He grew to manhood on the home farm and in 1886 was married to Anna Boyd; two children were born to this union; Roy, who died in infancy, and Mrs. W. A. Anton of Chicago, Illinois. On April 4, 1901, he was married to Mrs. Mary E. Coonce who lived on the adjoining farm; it was here that they established the home where he spent the remainder of his life. Four children were born to this second marriage: Sterling Price, Jr., of Forest City; Mrs. Marie Stone of Craig; Mrs. Jennie Kent of Bigelow; and Sarah Elizabeth, who died in infancy.

In addition to the above mentioned, he is survived by one stepson, Noah Coonce of Rulo; two brothers: C. C. Lundy of Falls City, and George W. Lundy of Bigelow; two sisters: Mrs. Sam Goolsby and Mrs. Ann Coatsney of Bigelow; eleven grandchildren, nineteen step-grandchildren, ten great-great-grandchildren, and six step-great-grandchildren. Elder Emery E. Jennings officiated at the funeral service. Burial was in Mound City cemetery.

CHURCH.—Edward Pettis, was born July 4, 1879, at Lexington, Missouri, the son of William and Mary Church, and died November 29, 1946. He was a member of the Reorganized Church.

He is survived by his wife, Nancy Jane; two sisters: Mrs. A. P. McKee of Youngstown, Ohio, and Mrs. James Iles of Lexington; and two brothers: Eugene and Frank, both of Kansas City, Missouri. Services were conducted by Elder Ward A. Hougas at the Winkler Funeral Home in Lexington. Interment was in the Lexington cemetery.

FAULK.—Grace L., was born near Skiatook, Oklahoma, on June 13, 1889, and passed away at the home of her sister, Mrs. Ruby Stone, in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on November 17. She was the oldest of a family of twelve children, all of whom survive her except one brother. After the death of her parents, she made her home with a sister, Mrs. Mary Proffit of Ava, Missouri, except for the last week of her life which she spent in Tulsa seeking medical care. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church when a young woman.

Funeral services were held at the church in Skiatook, Oklahoma. Elder Jeff Davis was in charge, assisted by Elder L. W. Kohlman; Elder O. A. McDowell gave the funeral sermon. Interment was in the cemetery at Ramona, Oklahoma.

PARKS.—LeRoy Sanderson, was born March 17, 1874, at Omro, Wisconsin, the son of Overt and Jenny Parks. He died November 27, 1946, at his farm home in McLean County, North Dakota, following a heart attack. On March 30, 1904, he was married to Martha Addison, four children were born to this union. He was a member of the Reorganized Church.

Surviving are his wife; a daughter, Mrs. Nate Thompson of Kindred, North Dakota; three sons: Addison of Turtle Lake, Overt of Crosby, and Paul of Lisbon; a sister, Mrs. Charlie Jensen of St. Croix Falls, Wisconsin; and eight grandchildren. Asks Prayers for Family and Friends

I am an isolated member and do not have the privilege of attending our church. I am fortunate, however, in having had a mother and an uncle who taught me the Latter Day Saint doctrine.

Once, when I was suffering with a heart ailment that seemed incurable, I was administered to; the pain left, and I have seldom been bothered since. Being a wife and mother, I was concerned about the future of my loved ones, because they are non-members. My greatest blessing has been gaining the interest of my husband in this great work. I'm asking the prayers of all that I'll be able to keep this interest growing, and that both he and the children will soon accept the gospel. There are some isolated members in this community, but none hold the priesthood. I have attempted to interest them in meeting regularly for study and prayer; the children, especially, need the influence of the church. I believe we could accomplish much, though we are all students instead of teachers. Pray for us please.

From Azalia, Michigan

Though few in number, the Azalia Saints have experienced many blessings in the past year. The most recent one was the healing of Brother Theodore Helmich who was stricken last May with arthritis. The doctors said that all they could do for him was to give him drugs to ease the pain. Elder W. B. Cramer administered to him many times and on September 9, Elder George Booth of Carlton, Michigan, assisted by two other elders, came to his home to pray for him. The power of God was present to bless and heal him, and he is now able to worship with the Saints again. He has also returned to his job. Truly God hears and answers the prayers of his people.

Healed Through Administration

I have been reading about Sister Hazel Napier and her problem. Fifteen years ago I had a similar affliction. At first, I saw double, then all I could see was light and dark. We consulted the best physicians in the city of Spokane, and I was fitted with double-lensed glasses. At last, the doctor told my husband that medical science could do no more, and in a matter of perhaps three months I would be completely blind. When I heard that I was very rebellious, for I could not reconcile myself to the idea of living a life of darkness. For some reason I felt that I could not ask for administration, until one day when I was at my daughter's home. She was very ill and requested that she be administered to, so I called my husband, an elder, and asked him to come. He brought another elder with him, and my daughter was healed immediately after the ordinance had been performed. I could feel the healing spirit filling the room, and I said, "I want to be administered to at once." During the administration, I was admonished to have more faith. I received a blessing, and ten days later my double vision disappeared. Now, at the age of eighty-five, I use glasses only for reading and close work. Some months ago the optician told me that I was getting my second sight.

In closing I wish to send greetings to Joseph Luff, who baptized me fifty-five years ago, Fred A. Smith, Amos Chase, and Gomer T. Griffiths.

From an Isolated Member

It has been some time since I last wrote for this column. During the war I cared for seven small children whose fathers were in the service and whose mothers worked in a defense plant. It was a trying task, but God granted me strength to do it. Now that the war is over, I have moved to eastern Oklahoma where I can rest. I miss meeting with the Saints of the Central Los Angeles congregation, but even in this community where few have ever heard of the Reorganized Church, I find opportunity for service. If I can but kindle a spark of interest in the hearts of these people, I shall feel that I have blazed the way for missionaries who may come in the future. I love to take the light of Jesus into the homes of those who have not known him.

Golden Wedding Anniversary

A special service was held at the Ft. Scott, Kansas, church on Sunday, November 10, in honor of the fiftieth wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. F. A. Hawley of Deerfield, Missouri, who were married November 15, 1896. After the service, they were given a dinner at the Cohn Coffee Shop. Open house was held at their home in the afternoon. Their three daughters: Mrs. Zeno Booker, Mrs. Byron Wilkinson, and Mrs. Robert Hass; two sons, Harold and Hale Hawley; and eight grandchildren were all present. Mrs. Joe Swartz of Eve, Missouri, who was bridesmaid to Mrs. Hawley fifty years ago, was one of the guests.

Mrs. Hawley is the former Clara Thomas, daughter of Missionary and Mrs. James Thomas, of Ravenwood, Missouri. Mr. Hawley originally came from Dow City, Iowa, and is the son of Missionary John Hawley. He is the third person in his family to celebrate a golden wedding anniversary.
