When a member inadvertently falls into error, it is his immediate responsibility to put himself right with the law. If the error involves another person or the church, it is the duty of the injured person also to see that the erring one is restored to spiritual health.

It should be the daily effort of every person who seeks to build the kingdom of God to "give none offense, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God,"⁵ but to "have always a conscience void of offense toward God and toward men."⁶

Probably the offense most offensive to God is to "take offense." In few, if any, areas does man overstep the rights given him by his Creator more than in the area in which he becomes indignant and offended because he feels someone has trespassed upon his rights. It cannot be said too strongly that man has no such right given him. He is protected by law, and under no circumstances should he go outside the law to find retribution for some real or supposed injustice. By taking offense, or by seeking vengeance, punishment, or apology, he himself becomes a lawbreaker. The lawful course for him to follow is clearly set forth in the Scriptures, "go and tell him his fault between him and thee alone."⁷ "Thou shalt take him or her between him or her and thee alone; and if he or she confess, thou shalt be reconciled." If this effort at reconciliation is unsuccessful, the law still does not allow the injured party to become offended. He is to take one or two others who have

A Miracle of World War II

PERHAPS SOME OF the Saints have read Margaret Lee Runbeck's The Great Answer; it is composed of a series of incidents having no other explanation than the intervention of divine providence in the affairs of servicemen and women during World War II. No doubt many young Latter Day Saints who were in the service can testify to divine help received in moments of peril during the recent conflict.

Simply and humbly, I desire to submit the facts of a testimony that has become a part of our family faith and spiritual heritage.

The week end of January 20, 21, 1945, I was in Attleboro, Massachusetts, as guest speaker at a youth convention. About 8 o'clock Saturday morning, I received a telegram from my mother, Mrs. Alma Broadfoot of Toronto, Canada, stating that my younger brother, Flying Officer Raymond R. Broadfoot of the Royal Canadian Air Force, was listed as missing in action after a bombing mission over Magdeburg, Germany. I called mother long distance, and during the conversation she told me of a spiritual experience she had had in which Ray appeared to her, assuring her that he was all right, giving her reason to believe that he was alive and that God was taking care of him.

One can image my feelings after receiving such news and having the responsibility of ministering at the youth gathering. I was staying at the Percy Wood home; their many kindnesses in that hour will be long remembered. While praying in my room, the assurance that my brother was alive was strongly impressed upon me.

Sunday came with its responsibilities of ministry: spiritual help was present to bless my efforts. During the following days, with their severe New England winter weather, I somehow could not shake off the feeling that Ray was somewhere in Germany, suffering from the cold. This was true, we discovered later.

Assurance came through one of the local elders that my brother was alive and that God would bring him home, as there was a work for him to do.

Early in April came the assurance that word would soon be received concerning Ray—word that he was a prisoner of war followed. A little later, a dream given to my sister, Helen, assured her that he would be home the latter part of June. This was fulfilled.

His part of the testimony is as follows: When the first shell struck the plane, he was stunned by the shock and slumped forward. While in this position, a large piece of flak tore through the fuselage at such an angle that, had he been sitting in his usual, upright position, he would have been seriously wounded. Fire broke out in the plane, and the crew members started to bail out at a height of thirty thousand feet. As the tail gunner ran past Ray to jump, his foot caught Ray's paraphernalia in such a way as to tear the harness and parachute off, and the rip cord could not be reached.

With no cord to pull, all fear was taken from him; offering a prayer that

It is only the careful and sincere application of the spirit of this part of the law that makes it possible for a people to live in the presence of each other without continual strife. While it is true that men should not be ignorant of the rights of others, as they are guaranteed to all in the law, yet in their humanness, they will often trespass against others. Only a people informed about that part of the law which denies to men the right to take offense at a brother's erring can succeed in building the kingdom. It is axiomatic among kingdom-thinking people that every opportunity to keep or to break the law is an opportunity to grow, if the right choice is made. One takes a step toward spiritual death with each wrong choice. This being true, it follows that one who is sinned against should have in his heart not only sorrow and concern for the offender, but also gratitude to God that he has provided the way to turn even the mistakes of men to some worthwhile purpose.

Personal Righteousness in the Business of the Kingdom

Number 35 in a series of radio addresses on the subject:

"The Social Philosophy of the Modern Prophet"

By J. A. Koehler

WHEN I WAS a boy, it was our custom to have a burlesque serenade—a charivari—whenever there was a wedding in our neighborhood. The instruments we used were tin horns, cowbells, and dish pans, together with our vocal organs, which sent forth a veritable bedlam of raucous noises. Anyone who could make ungodly, ear-splitting sounds was welcomed to take part in that affair. He was a logical candidate for membership in our gang.

In later years, some of the members of that gang elected to put on a Messiah performance. And when they did, you may be sure that they had no place in their musical organization for frog-croaking and cowbelling mock serenaders. For, as you surely must know, Messiah choirs cannot be formed of persons who have cracked voices, who have poor ideas of harmony (and so on) and no taste for artistry. No one who has any capacity for the higher levels of musical expressions would think of forming a symphony orchestra as we formed our gang of mock serenaders. It would be ludicrous to do so.

The goal of the church formed under the leadership of the modern prophet is the civil-mode Kingdom of God. We call it the Kingdom of Zion. This kingdom may be likened unto a Messiah performance. It is a kind of social symphony. It bears no resemblance to a social charivari or to a Babylonish economic society. And to elect to perform that symphony with a gang of Babylonian merchants and other customary moralists, or to elect to redeem Zion—to establish the righteousness of the Kingdom—with the kind of persons who are made to beat others in the game of business and politics as it is now played, would be little short of border-line insanity. For that reason, one of the features of the practical plan of social action of the modern prophet is the principle of selectivity, or of the gathering of "the elect."

The elect are the persons of whatever nationality or blood whose desires for righteousness fit them for the business of the Kingdom. In other words, the elect are the persons to be found in every quarter of the earth whose spirits, whose personalities, whose state or temper of mind is an impulsion to a peculiar or more excellent quality of righteousness, and whose election it is, therefore, to implement the will of God respecting the right conduct of economic affairs in a community of their own building.

Jesus had said, nearly 2,000 years before the advent of the modern prophet, that entrance into the Kingdom is impossible to persons whose righteousness does not "exceed." Jesus was a Kingdom-building "maestro." Manifestly, his people had not attained to the quality of personal righteousness, which is the stuff out of which social righteousness is made and of which alone the Kingdom may be built. So he instituted a program of personal regeneration that in time there might be a people whose personal righteousness would make them competent to adventure in kingdom-building righteousness.

The modern prophet said, by implication, that the work of Jesus had succeeded. He said that in 1830 there were to be found in "the four quarters of the earth" enough persons to "bring forth and establish the cause of Zion." So he instituted a Kingdom-building agency—a church constituted for the business of the Kingdom—and he instructed his disciples to gather those elect "from the four quarters of the earth" unto the place where the business of the civil-mode Kingdom is to be established. His plan was, as it still is, to form a Messiah chorus, so to speak, selectively on the basis of personal fitness for participation in that social symphony.

"The gathering of the elect," then, means that Restoration is engrossed—not less, as many have supposed, but more than any other current religious movement—with the question of personal righteousness as it pertains to the business of the Kingdom.

What I have in mind here I shall try to make clear with this illustration: here and there are men who are good for the auto manufacturing business or the farming business or any one of the many businesses which are engaged in for the purpose of earning a living. But, of these men, some are not good for the business of matrimony. For the state of wedlock involves, besides the qualities which make a good businessman, the qualities of husband companionableness. And many a good businessman is deficient in this quality. So the adventure of these men in wedlock is not highly successful. Some of them are tragic failures. They have yet to cultivate the personal qualities which fit them for the business of matrimony.

Just so, there are many men who know medicine and manufacture, and so on and on from "a" to "z." They are not to be beaten in such businesses. They know everything that needs to be known to make such businesses successful. But they do not know the business of the Kingdom. They may know medicine or plumbing or breadmaking, but they know very little about Zionitic citizenship. And to adventure in the business of the Kingdom with such men—men in that state of mind, or on that level of personal righteousness—is to do what our church did in the past; it is to make a failure of that business.

Many generations ago the wise man, Solomon—whose level of personal righteousness was far below the level of Kingdom-building righteousness—said, “Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life.” He said that the set of the mind shapes the course of action. So that when the Church tried to go in the direction of the Kingdom with men whose minds were set on the attainment of private objects which did not accord with the social objects of Restoration, it got off the beam. It got on the wrong track.

It is to avert such miscarriages of purpose that Restoration speaks so pointedly on the question of personal righteousness. You may find much in the message of the modern prophet of this character: “All those who humble themselves before God and desire to be baptized, and come forth with broken hearts and contrite spirits, and witness before the church that they have truly repented of all their sins, and are willing to take upon them the name of Jesus Christ, having a determination to serve him to the end [which has a very special meaning in the language of Restoration], and truly manifest by their works that they have received the Spirit of Christ unto a remission of their sins, shall be [or may be] received by baptism into his church.” And the elders or priests are to have sufficient time to expound all things concerning the Church of Christ to their understanding (to do which they must expound the business of the Kingdom) previous to their partaking of the sacrament (of the Lord’s Supper), and being confirmed by the laying on of the hands of the elders; so that all things may be done in order. They shall have a care about personal righteousness, so that the purpose of the church to establish the righteousness of the Kingdom shall not fail. There is much in the message of the modern prophet to that effect.

Whatever the level of the personal righteousness of anyone—of even the elect—it is to be raised through devotion to the business of the Kingdom—which is an adventure in social righteousness. Restoration has a care about the righteousness of the Kingdom as a means of promoting the righteousness of persons as positively as it has a care about personal righteousness as a means of promoting the righteousness of the Kingdom. For no person can hope to rise to and maintain a level of righteousness which greatly exceeds the righteousness of the society in which he lives. For society is the milieu or matrix in which personality is formed.

The truth is that the reason for adventure in the business of the Kingdom is that personal righteousness may be advanced. It is, as the modern prophet said, through devotion to the cause of Zion—which is a great enterprise grounded in moral considerations—that the moral nature of man may be perfected, or that persons may prepare themselves for “a place in the celestial kingdom.”

So says the modern prophet, since the goal of this church is to build the Kingdom, it must have a care about the righteousness of persons. It may not be less concerned about the righteousness of persons because its goal is a rightly constituted society; it must be more concerned. Such are the teachings of the modern prophet as they pertain to personal righteousness in the business of the Kingdom.

The great trouble with rich men in this country is that they have so much to retire from, and so little to retire to.—Andrew Carnegie.

God would watch over and protect mother and comfort her in the hour of sorrow, he stepped into space. After a few seconds, he became aware of the fact that he was not falling as fast as he would be without the benefit of an open parachute. Looking up, he saw his parachute open above him, functioning perfectly. A miracle indeed!

Landing on his feet in enemy territory, he started out in the bitterly cold weather for the Dutch border. He walked nearly 160 miles in ten days, and was nearly into Holland, when, with hands and feet so badly frozen he could hardly creep along, and only a few concentrated food tablets left, the Gestapo caught up with him and made him a prisoner of war. He was put in the basement of an old building for several days; when the German doctors finally examined his feet, gangrene had set in, and they thought amputation was necessary. But the skin formed a hard crust, cracked, and peeled off, leaving not even a scar.

Mention should be made of terrible conditions in the prison camp, the comfort obtained through prayer, of that long forced march into the interior as the Allies closed in, of a giant American corporal who carried Ray on his back for many miles, ministering to his need with infinite tenderness, pleading with him not to give up, while others dropped out of the line of march, collapsing from weakness and left to die.

Eventually release from prison camp came under General Patton’s men, a period of recuperation in the British Isles, and then home the latter part of June.

Today, Ray holds the office of priest, to which he was called after his return, and is active in Toronto Branch and Zion’s League activities.

We do not know why some of our worthy young people were spared, while others were called upon to make the supreme sacrifice. But out of these things we do know that when God gives us the blessing of the Holy Spirit, a calm, unshakable serenity and faith can be ours so that, come life or death, we may say, “My times are in thy hand! Why should I doubt or fear?”

With this letter I should like to send greetings to my many friends in the mission field, especially to the Saints in Kirtland, New York, and Southern New England Districts.

The Lord's Prayer

5. "Thy Will Be Done"

By J. D. Anderson

President, Kansas City Stake

This is the fifth in a series of meditations presented at the Appointee Institute held at Independence, August 28 to September 14, 1946. The first four appeared in the issues of January 18, January 25, June 14, and July 19.

"Thy will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven"¹ was no idle phrase with the Master, but rather an expression of the "magnificent obsession" which motivated his every thought and deed. Again and again we read of the Lord's reference to this basic principle of his life. Jesus told the angry Jews on one occasion, "I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father who hath sent me."² Another time, he shocked an excited sign-seeking multitude who would have declared him king by saying to them, "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me."³ Again, when the Master should have been hungry, he amazed and puzzled the disciples as they offered him food, saying, "I have meat that ye know not of." Then he explained the great purpose of his life with these words, "My meat is to do the will of him who sent me and to finish his work."⁴

This all-consuming, dynamic obsession to do his Father's will was the driving force in the life of Jesus from his childhood until his death on Golgotha. At twelve, he asked his parents, "Know ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"⁵ About twenty-two years later, he cried in his hour of agony and bloody sweat, "Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me; nevertheless, not my will but thine be done."⁶ No wonder John said of him in later years that God's "word was made flesh, and dwelt among us."⁷

It behooves us who aspire to follow in his footsteps to understand more clearly and feel more deeply this great principle by which he lived and died. That we do not ordinarily understand very clearly nor feel very deeply is apparent when we compare our usual attitude toward the achievement of God's will with his attitude.

Our attitude is generally one of passive acquiescence, mournful sacrifice, reluctant submission, and often at best half-hearted, doubtful obedience. While Jesus' attitude was one of hungry searching, determined fidelity, impassioned loyalty, wholehearted obedience, and joyful sacrifice, we passively sing, "Have thine own way, Lord, have thine own way; Thou art the potter, I am the clay, Mold me and make me after thy will, while I am waiting, yielded and still." Jesus said, "My meat is to do the will of him who sent me."⁴ "I seek . . . the will of the Father."² "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work. . . . What he seeth the Father do these doeth the Son likewise."⁸

When we say, "Thy will be done," we usually think of God executing his will while we bow in more or less willing submission. When our Saviour said, "Thy will be done," he thought of personally performing God's will by seeking, speaking, working, and doing.

An experience from life will illustrate this contrast. A certain elder was deeply concerned about doing God's will in the work of his ministry. Among the families in his congregation was one whose members were selfish, easily offended, indulged in many worldly pleasures, attended church irregularly and contributed to the cause very infrequently. The elder had visited them often, urging, encouraging, and challenging them to Christian living, but without success. Then tragedy entered that home in the form of a deadly disease. The elder was called every day for several days. The child was taken to the hospital, but neither prayer nor medical science prevailed. The child rapidly grew worse and endured considerable pain. The family finally in desperation asked the elder to pray that God's will might be done whatever the cost. The child passed away soon after this, and the family wept in reluctant submission. Later they took comfort and some pride in the assumption that they had yielded to God's will. Yet they never changed their pattern of living.

Such an attitude is certainly not Christian. The Christian attitude is one of hungrily and passionately seeking to understand and do God's will. Even a gracious and appreciative yielding to the execution of the will of God is not sufficient.

Our Father does not want us to be slaves, who bow to his will only because it is absolute, inevitable, irresistible, and from it there is no appeal. He longs, rather, for free men who will voluntarily and eagerly learn and obey his will because they sympathize and agree with it and long to bring their lives in harmony to it. The Master knows no pleasure in those who refrain from sins of commission largely because they fear his wrath. He longs, rather, for men who will follow him and grow in his likeness because they love him and his way of life. May our prayer that his will be done be interpreted by our loving, seeking, and doing.

Presenting: Gomer Wells

The second in a series of personality sketches of Auditorium employees

By BILOINE WHITING

Contact man with the touring public, Gomer Wells is the official guide in the Auditorium. With him in the foyer, the church has its best foot forward, for Gomer can out-show, out-talk, and out-walk the spriteliest of visitors—and he celebrated his eightieth birthday on July 10.

"This job is a natural for retired men in the ministry," he says, "but I seem to be the only one around here not feeble or sick."

Brother Wells has been an ordained minister since 1888, and he was under General Conference appointment from 1890 until ten years ago when he became Auditorium guide.

He spent fifteen years in Australia, where he almost lost his voice preaching to crowds out-of-doors. Back in the States, he became the first full-time superintendent of church school work.

In spite of all the people he met while in the mission field, Brother Wells estimates that he contacts more nonmembers in a given time as a guide than he did in any other way.

"Since the end of the last General Conference, I've shown approximately 1,000 visitors through the building," he reported. "When they come out of their way to see us, they are in a receptive mood—they're interested, and I present the gospel in a tabloid form while I conduct the tour."

One of the most common questions asked him is if the Auditorium is patterned after the Salt Lake tabernacle. Another question asked in all seriousness is if Latter Day Saints believe that when Jesus returns to earth he will land with his feet on the Auditorium roof. He has ready answers for those questions as well as for the visitors who wonder if President Truman is a member of the church, and if the Utah and the Reorganized churches will join forces.

The main auditorium, seating 8,000, is the main point of interest, though many are amazed to learn that there is a mile of corridors. However, by the time they have followed Brother Wells on a tour, the mile doesn't seem nearly so incredible.

Up to a year ago, there were some assistant guides, but for the past year he has been on duty all day, seven days a week, with only the Sunday afternoon assistance of Glen Cargyle. Brother Wells' slim figure, only slightly stooped, strides up and down the ramps, and his brown eyes have all the snap of a man's half his age. Due to a mastoid operation, he wears an inconspicuous hearing aid. His hair, though thinning, is still dark.

Lately he has become converted to the idea of using young women as guides. A few weeks ago, a group of 120 Mormons on a chartered bus tour from Utah arrived at 6 in the evening. It was past closing time, his voice was hoarse, and his feet hurt; so Lucile Esgar volunteered to relieve him.

"You know, she did a bang-up job of it. She has a powerful voice and the kind of personality to put it over," he said enthusiastically.

Every visitor to the Auditorium is presented with a descriptive folder, and such tracts as Brother Wells thinks advisable. The collections left in the offering box have always been more than enough to pay for the literature given away.

The scattered Saints whose summer itineraries take them through Independence should visit the Auditorium, not only to see the building, but also to meet Gomer Wells, who demonstrates that age and retirement only open up new horizons of service.

Corrections

A mistake was made in the Herald of July 12, page eleven, in the item relating to Brother Gomer R. Wells. The name was given, "Sister Ruth (Waller) Henrichs." This should have been, "Ruth (Haworth) Henrichs." We are sorry for this error.—Editors.

An error was made in the Herald for June 21, regarding the date of the baptism of Sister Sara L. Dempsey of Council Bluffs, Iowa. The date given was 1866, but Sister Dempsey writes and says that the date was 1876.

Baptismal Experience

George Moore, aged eight, a descendant of several generations of a church family, son of Mrs. Bessie Moore, 16027 Hartland, Van Nuys, California, had the interesting experience of seeing in a dream the place of his baptism, although he had never been there. The family attend Burbank Mission, and the baptism at Central Church, followed by confirmation by Brethren Louis J. Ostertag and John W. Rushton made a strong and lasting impression on this young member.

Colorado Springs Reunion

The Colorado Springs Reunion will be held in Colorado Springs, Colorado (1015 Cheyenne Road), August 15 to 25. Apostle C. R. Hield, Dr. Roy Cheville, Pauline Arnson, C. H. Hobart, and Herbert Scott are to be in attendance. Meals will be served on the free-will-offering basis, but specific charges are made for rooms and tents; rooms, $1.50 to $2.50 per day; tents, $6.00 for the entire reunion period. Write Herbert M. Scott, 878 South Logan, Denver 9, Colorado, for reservations.

District President.

Liahona Park Reunion

The Liahona Park Reunion for Central and South-Central Michigan Districts will be held at Sanford, Michigan, August 1 to 10. Apostle Maurice Draper, Bishop E. L. Kelley, and other general church appointees will compose the principle leadership personnel.

MYRON DOTY, JOHN W. BANKS, District Presidents.

WHEN Mary sat down at the piano, she had no idea what she was going to play for a prelude. This Sunday morning ritual was so much a habit with her that lately she'd gone at it in a more or less haphazard way. If she planned her music ahead of time, fine; if not, she could always pick up something at the last minute. No one appreciated it anyway. No one ever bothered to stop her and say, "That was a lovely prelude, Mary," or "What was that beautiful piece you played, Mary?" Of course, her family always said something about it, but the other people just didn't seem to care one way or the other. She wondered what they'd say if there weren't any prelude this morning.

She took one of the hymnals she had grabbed at the last moment before she left the house and opened it to a number she had played often before. It was a soft, peaceful tune, but she scarcely knew what she was doing. Her mind was miles away from the little church on Chestnut Street.

Old Mrs. Parks and her husband sat together in the same place and on the same bench they had occupied for the past forty years. Mr. Parks was nodding quietly in time with the music, as was his custom to do every Sunday morning, and Mrs. Parks smiled absently into space. The song Mary was playing brought back many tender memories to her of the days when she'd been a strong young girl, carefree and happy. It reminded her of her meeting with Tom and their marriage in this very same room. It recalled to her mind the time when she had walked down these very same aisles with Tom to have their first baby blessed. She could see Jenny and Peter and Timothy all being baptized and later, Timothy and Helen taking the same solemn marriage vows which she and Tom had taken so long ago. She saw children and grandchildren blessed, baptized, married and ordained within these sacred walls of her church. She felt the peace and the quiet which pervaded it now, and felt again the wonder which knowing God intimately had brought to her. The music swelled and her heart swelled with it. Thanksgiving arose in her breast, and she found herself thanking God for all that he had given her. When the piece ended, she felt a little sad. It had been so beautiful and Mary seemed filled with the power to make her music speak.

Tom Parks listened to the music rise and fall and could not help looking down at the wrinkled gnarled hands lying quiet in his lap. Once those hands had been brown and strong. Once he'd walked down the street with arms swinging loosely at his sides, head held high, and his back straight and tall. Once he had been a reckless, "not-caring" boy from the other side of the tracks, until Elder Thomas had taken him aside and told him about all the beautiful things which the world possesses when one takes time out to find them. He remembered how he had felt when Mr. Thomas had submerged him in the waters of baptism—clean and pure and holy—filled with an unbearable longing to make something of his so-far useless life. And his first sacrament of the Lord's Supper! They had sung the very song Mary was playing now.

More than friend or life to me.*

Wave over wave of memories engulfed him as he remembered all the wonderful things which had happened to him from that day forth. How that girl could play! How still the room always became when her fingers touched the keys. God had surely sent her as a spokesman for himself. Whenever Mary's music reached his ears, it was as if God was speaking.

Carrie Adams was thinking almost the same thing. She always sat near the piano on Sunday mornings so that she could watch Mary more closely when she played. Ever since she had been a little girl, she'd wanted to play, but there'd never been enough money for lessons, and the Adamases had never owned a piano. She could pick out a few of the hymns on the neighbor's piano, but it wasn't the same. Sometimes she wondered for what purpose God had intended her. The things she wanted to do most, she was not capable of doing. She had wanted to serve the church with her every ounce of strength and her whole heart and soul, but she never seemed to be able to do what she felt needed to be done most. The big important things! Instead she always found herself doing the insignificant things in the church program like washing dishes after a potluck supper or varnishing chairs and cleaning the basement. Not that she really minded! Quite the contrary. She enjoyed her job, but it didn't seem big enough or important enough to her. If only—suddenly she realized what Mary was playing. One line of the song stood out in her mind!

New Horizons

*Gladly will I toil and suffer,
Only let me walk with Thee.*

After all, wasn't that the important thing—walking with God? What if her tasks weren't big ones? What if they weren't important ones? What did it matter as long as she was doing her tasks and doing them well? If God was satisfied, then why shouldn't she be? From this day on, she'd strive to overcome her feeling of insignificance, but for just one moment longer she watched Mary's fingers move across the keys and thought, "Oh, to be able to play like that! Oh, to be able to take to God such a gift!"

Doris Baxter looked at the beloved faces about her and began to wonder as usual, at the different expressions which met her guarded glances. Where had all these people managed to acquire the calm they now seemed to radiate? Where had all their problems gone to? As she looked at their quiet faces, she saw peace written there, and strove valiantly to put herself into that same mood. She knew their problems to be as great as her own, but there was not one who seemed to be thinking of them now. It was as if something in these few minutes of prelude music had reached out to them and relieved them of their burdens. If only that something could relieve her of her sorrow. It had been weeks since her mother's death, but it was as poignant in memory to her as if it were only yesterday. It had been her mother who had advised her in every problem she faced. It was her mother to whom she turned for guidance and wisdom. She had been like a ship lost at sea since the day they had laid her mother to rest beside her father. How did one overcome such grief?

How could one meet the problems of the day with no one to guide and direct?

She looked around her again. "No one?" she asked herself. But of course there was someone—God! God was always waiting! God was always willing to help. That was the secret these people knew. She must learn to cultivate a closer walk with God. As Mary played, Doris listened intently, and something in her mind became alert to the words:

*Lead me through the veil of shadows;
Bear me o'er life's fitful sea;
Then the gate of life eternal,
May I enter, Lord, with Thee.*

Young David Taylor recognized the hymn the moment Mary struck the first few chords.

*All along my pilgrim's journey,
Saviour, let me walk with Thee.*

He almost hummed the words aloud. It was surprising how much meaning a hymn could have to one about to leave his home and family. He remembered how thrilled he had been as a youngster when his mother spoke of the missionaries of the church and the good work they did in carrying the gospel story to people all over the world. He had promised himself then that he would always live the kind of life which would enable him to qualify for that position if God should ever call upon him to do so. Last Sunday he had been given his appointment. It had been the happiest and proudest moment in his life. He was going to be a missionary like the ones his mother had spoken of. He was going to be a good missionary! It was almost as if the song was being played just for him this morning.

*All along my pilgrim's journey,
Saviour, let me walk with Thee.*

Mary straightened up with a start! She had been so engrossed in her thinking that she had not realized until this moment what she was playing. It was as if her subconscious mind had led her astray. For the first time that morning, she really looked at her music and the words of the second verse caught her attention.

*Not for ease nor worldly pleasure;
Nor for fame my prayer shall be.*

Hadn't she been thinking in terms of fame? Expecting people to compliment her playing? her selection of pieces? Wasn't it a desire for fame that had directed her petty thoughts this morning? It was easy just to sit down and play "any old thing" for a prelude, but it was a task to find the right kind of music and fit it into the right atmosphere. What if it wasn't the most important thing in the world? What if people didn't recognize her ability? God had recognized it. He had given it to her that she might use it in service to others. She was doing her part—she was doing what was right. That was the important thing.

A new feeling of belonging and a new spirit of service arose out of her humbleness in that moment, and as she entered into the chorus of the hymn, she felt herself climbing to new heights and gaining new ground. Unconsciously, she put into the notes before her all the fervor and love which she possessed for the church and its people.

*Close to Thee; close to Thee;
Close to Thee; close to Thee;
Then the gates of life eternal,
May I enter, Lord, with Thee.*

Musings

P. S.

He gives us rain and wind and sun.
He does not ask what we have done.
He gives us grass and trees and flowers,
He gives us birds and shady bowers,
And all the earth we dwell upon.

But we are creatures dumb and blind,
We give a frown, a word unkind.
We hate to lend our hoarded gold,
We think we'll need it when we're old,
To satisfy our peace of mind.

Some of us live a bigot's creed.
Some fail to see a brother's need.
Some worship gods of power and might,
Some like the darkness, hate the light,
And ponder why the nations bleed.

We're often fools, then wonder when
The earth will be at peace again.
We want to smile, we want to sing,
We want each day to be like spring,
Yet keep our special kind of sin.

—WINIFRED MILNER

* Beauty

After dinner at our service club, a member showed a number of Kodachrome pictures of Jackson County, and commented on what pretty sights we have close to our homes, to be seen with little effort and no cost. The views on the screen picked up and accentuated all the colors and tints of nature in a most effective way.

There are many lovely scenes on the bluffs and shores along the Missouri River, and though the inhabitants of these prairie lands may travel far, they love their homeland best. Visitors are not exempt from the spell. One exclaimed, "This whole country looks like a park!" Another said, "In our state it would take a lot of gardeners and an ocean of water to keep it this way." And a lady declared, while we were touring, "I love these gentle, rolling hills and long slopes of the Middle West, with the trees growing clear to the tops." How precious and imperishable such memories are!

Why is it that people pay more attention to a picture than to nature itself? Several reasons. Nature is so big that the eye is lost in masses of details. The picture selects a small bit of beauty and puts a frame around it, so that the eye can attend to it and not be distracted to other things.

Once you understand this trick of selection practiced by painters and camera artists, you can do it yourself. If you haven't a telescope, get a cardboard tube, or simply cup your hands about one eye to see as the camera does. It will give you a pleasant surprise. Keep mind and eyes alert, and you can see beauty everywhere. Nature is as artistic as the Old Masters, as clever as the most recent modern. Try it!

* A Postage Stamp

Today we received a letter bearing a four-cent Canadian postage stamp which gives honor to Alexander Graham Bell, the inventor of the telephone. Immediately the thought occurred, why should the Canadians be so generous as to honor an American inventor? It seemed like a fine gesture, and wouldn't it be a good thing for our country if on our special issues of postage stamps we also could honor distinguished men of other nations whose contributions have done so much to contribute to the welfare, happiness and strength of our country. This is an example of international courtesy that might well be extended.

Curiosity sent us to the encyclopedia to see what might be of interest in the career of this scientist and inventor. Immediately it was apparent that the United States owes a great debt to Scotland, England, and Canada for the development of this great man. He, like many others, acquired his scientific training and the development of his splendid mind and gifts elsewhere, and brought a rich harvest for us to reap. Certainly Americans should be humble and grateful for what has been given us by other countries. It should make it easier for us now to be generous in giving something back to them in return.

* Abbreviations

Among the petty annoyances of an editor's life is the abbreviation. This literary short-cut may save the writer two seconds and cost the editor five minutes. Especially if it is scrawled, it may appear to stand for several words or names; unless he is psychic, the editor cannot know which one. It is a mark of courtesy and culture to write things out clearly, so that others may understand. The busiest people, whose time is valuable, are not too important to make their meaning clear. Often it is those who have little to do and no reason for hurry who use illegible and incomprehensible abbreviations.

(Revision of Editorial by President Frederick M. Smith, Herald of October 23, 1943.)

SINCE THE CHURCH debt was liquidated there has been a growing inclination to look to our goals. As a result there has been a quickening of the always present interest in the gathering of the Saints into "the regions round about." This is a part of the establishment of Zion. Without doubt there has been an augmentation of the desire on the part of the Saints to act in the matter; and cases have developed, now, as in times past, where there has not been sufficient care taken in solving the problems arising from such movements. It should be apparent to all that moves which have not been wisely considered are likely to be followed by undesirable results and our Zion program be retarded. So it becomes necessary once more to warn the Saints against such unwise moves and urge them to give due observance and consideration to the instructions given in regard to gathering into the central regions of the church as a step towards Zion development.

We are deeply interested in the gathering and firmly believe in it as a necessary part of our Zion program. It is a practical reality with great spiritual significance; but unless it is carried out in harmony with instructions and due care is given to preparations for the necessary moves, disaster is quite likely to follow. So once again we join our predecessors in office in urging the Saints to seek advice, counsel, and needed information in making preparations to move towards or to Zion. "Let the way be carefully prepared before you," has been an admonition repeatedly presented. We must give greater heed to it than ever before.

Before us as a people, religiously concerned with the problems of composing present perplexities arising from world conditions, and more particularly with the answering of social questions, lies not only a great task but what will also be one of our finest opportunities to present a demonstration of our social ideals as factors in solving social and economic problems and composing the confusion and conflict of many ideas and theories. In order to be in position of advantage in contributing towards greater social and religious security we must be in position collectively and as groups, to demonstrate our social theories. A prerequisite to that is the gathering.

But that gathering must be in harmony with the divine instructions to us received over the years. It is one thing for our people, individually and as families, to move from one locality to another in efforts to better their financial or economic situation. In such cases the church officials may have little or nothing to say, though their advice and counsel can be secured. But for the Saints as persons or as families or as groups, to move from outlying posts into the center place or the regions round about, as a part of the program of the church looking towards Zion establishment, is quite another matter, and one in which the question of preparation arises, and in which that counsel should be sought which has so many times been indicated.

Some members of the church have demonstrated they are nomadic in inclination. Very many of them have moved from place to place with no intention of moving to the places indicated in the instructions to the Saints. Obviously the motivating purposes are closely related to self-serving interests, moves made to better economic or financial conditions. The general church officials would not presume to give counsel in such changes of locus or habitat, more especially when they were not asked for advice or counsel. It is likely in many instances that such moves have proved beneficial. There are undoubtedly many instances when improved conditions were not realized.

No one questions the right of the Saints to go where they would like;

but we have often been puzzled that some Saints have moved so many times, bought land and property, without honoring the instructions given, as we believe, from divine sources, which pointed to the center place and the regions round about as the places where land should be purchased and Zion begin her habilitation.

But where Saints transfer their interests geographically with the gathering in view, there can be no question of their need to confer with the proper church authorities as to the wisdom and timeliness of such move. This may well include local church authorities in places from which movement is made as well as those toward which movement is contemplated, and between the local authorities, branch or district, and the general officers there should always be close co-operation.

We think it well to include an editorial from the late President Joseph Smith which appeared in the Herald for December 11, 1886, under the caption "Gathering":

God said to the Saints in 1831, when they were gathering to Zion and "the regions round about," that they should not gather "in haste, nor by flight; but let it be done as it shall be counselled by the elders of the church at the conferences."—Doctrine and Covenants 58: 12. In December, 1833, this was further enjoined in these words: "Let not your gathering be in haste, nor by flight; but let all things be prepared before you."—Doctrine and Covenants 98: 9. And in 1873, He said: "Let my commandments to gather into the regions round about, and the counsel of the elders of my church guide in this matter," etc.—Doctrine and Covenants 117: 11.

The instruction herein given should govern all the Saints in the matter of gathering or removing into "the regions round about." Those who do not "have all things prepared before" them when they remove, are neither wise nor safe; and if they meet with disappointment and loss, and severe trials of faith, they will have themselves to blame. The "elders" should seek to have these matters well considered and complied with by those who they know are gathering "into the regions round about," and thus prevent confusion and evil; and no member should remove from one place to another till they know what awaits them, and how they can find affairs in their proposed new home. Be prudent; be wise.

If such as intend to remove would consult with the Bishop, the leading authorities of the church in the locality where they wish to gather to, or with the chief authorities of the Church, stating their wishes, needs, conditions, and in-

Facts, Fables, and Fiction

I am always puzzled when reading about so-called "Mormon" history to know what is fact. In many matters of which we have dependable history, we know that there is a plethora of fable, and often outright fiction. These observations apply to early church history as well as that applicable to 1844 and since.

Carry Longmire, who we note is one of the "owners" of '47 (magazine of the year), has told an interesting story, "Centennial of an Epic," in the August number of that periodical which is remarkably free from error of fact.

Error Sometimes Persists

The "Mormon Caravan" now under way (July 18) noted by the daily press, is the occasion of numerous articles in papers and magazines. They are generally fairly accurate, but occasionally there are inaccuracies.

The Globe-Democrat (St. Louis) of July 13 gives a good account, but the reporter, Mr. Justin L. Faherty, in referring to the Nauvoo troubles, places the blame of the Expositor incident solely on Joseph Smith. The undersigned deemed it proper to enlighten Mr. Faherty, and it may be helpful to our members also to know the facts. Our letter of July 17 addressed to him is as follows:

I have read your account of the "Mormon Caravan" in your issue of Sunday, July 13.

As president of the Reorganized Church and as a grandson of Joseph Smith, I note you have made a pretty fair report. However, you have repeated an erroneous report about the destruction of the Expositor office at Nauvoo:

You say, "Joseph broke up the printing shop of a newspaper which attacked him and was jailed at Carthage, along with his brother, for vandalism."

A report of proceedings by the Nauvoo City Council held on June 8 and 10, reported over the signature and seal of Willard Richards, city clerk, and published in extenso in the Nauvoo Neighbor (Nauvoo) on June 19, 1844, shows that the City Council acting as a quasi-judicial body, found the Expositor was a nuisance and ordered its abatement. Joseph Smith, though Mayor, did not even preside at these sessions. He as Mayor had to see the order carried out, and it was done—not by him, but by the city marshal.

The evidence of my own father, who was twelve years old at the time, was that he heard his father say he thought the order too drastic, but he could do nothing about it. But, he said, he, because he was mayor, would get the blame for it.

I have examined the laws of Illinois, as also the charter of the City of Nauvoo, and the City had the unquestionable legal right to consider and abate nuisances (which included anything threatening the health or welfare of the citizens).

The matter is not very important, but Joseph Smith has been charged wrongfully with so many things I could not resist the idea of writing you.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

P. S.—The Smiths were charged with treason, not vandalism.

What Education for World Evangelism

By President F. Henry Edwards

AT THE VERY beginning, let us determine what we mean by "World Evangelism." There is no point in seeking an exhaustive technical definition, but a brief exploration of the phrase will probably prove a short cut to clearer understanding.

Let me remind you that Christianity is essentially a matter of loyalties. By world evangelism, therefore, I mean winning men to new loyalties wherever we can and as fast as we can in all the world—loyalties to Christ and to the society of the redeemed which is being built by him in and through men who serve happily and intelligently and devotedly under his leadership.

World evangelism means, moreover, the extension of the Christian way of living, and, therefore, of the kingdom frontiers in every direction as rapidly and as widely as they may be extended, while yet maintaining and developing the stability and coherence of the area already won for Christ. This does not necessarily mean the extension of the American way of living, or even of the Anglo-Saxon way of living, but of the kingdom way of living. World evangelism is concerned with things of the spirit, with love and mercy and compassion and justice and truth, and with honesty, and sobriety and charity and chastity and reason, as these may be incorporated into and manifested through the cultures of mankind all over the world. It is not concerned with customs and procedures and traditions, except as these influence and are influenced by the word and the way of love which we proclaim. World evangelism proceeds on the premise that what is important in a convert is not a change in his manner of eating or speaking or dressing but in his attitude toward God and toward his neighbor and toward his own destiny.

World evangelism means, or at least implies, something else, too; something almost uniquely important. The phrase implies not only world-wide geographical outreach, but also a fundamental unity pervading this world-wide outreach. World evangelism means evangelism for all the world—evangelism that enriches a man here and wherever else he may go, and there—wherever else "there" may be. It is evangelism for all men as citizens of one world. Its principles and requirements are without respect to persons. It is evangelism of the people and for the people in the dignity of their status as actual or potential sons of God. It is addressed to men of every race from the God and Father of all.

And yet, world evangelism does not mean "foreign missions." In the sight of God and the world evangelist, there are no foreign missions. There are only missions to persons who are aliens from the commonwealth of the kingdom. Since our own neighborhood is part of the world, world evangelism means evangelism here as well as in other lands. It is evangelism wherever the message is needed and the word can be preached. The frontiers of the kingdom are not drawn in far-off lands, but between the quick and the dead in the things of the spirit no matter what their race or habitation.

After having thus examined the chief phrase involved in our discussion we may well ask, "Is world evangelism important enough to warrant spending time and effort in setting forth an educational program to achieve it?" The answer is a decided affirmative. In light of the nature of Christianity and of the meanings of "World Evangelism" which we have noted, it is apparent that world evangelism involves the development of a service attitude toward every part of our one world. It does not require that our immediate field of action shall be extensive or far flung; but it does require that what is done anywhere shall be done in the light of our common humanity and, therefore, of our common need of redemption. We who live in the United States of America and others who live in the United States of Soviet Republics, and still others who live in the United Kingdom or in any of her associated nations, or dependencies, or in China or India or Africa or in the remotest islands of the sea, all need desperately to share in a deep feeling of brotherhood. World evangelists are convinced that this sense of brotherhood can be achieved under Christ, and that it can be achieved in no other way. If we are justified in this conviction, then no enterprise on earth is more important than world evangelism.

In these present, difficult days we are prone to become too nearly exclusively interested in the attempts of publicists and statesmen to build a better world order. Truly the work of such internationalists is important. But the shape of the world to come is likely to be much more significantly influenced in schools and laboratories than it is in chancelleries and council chambers. Speaking generally, educators and scientists have much wider horizons than do politicians. Those who love their fellow men have much keener insight into the contribution to world co-operation which these fellow men might make, than do those who merely rule over mankind. This is not idealistic exaggeration but actual, sober truth. For example: no other Anglo-Saxon knows the Chinese or the Japanese or the Hindoos or African Negroes or the Polynesians—not to mention the so-called "civilized peoples" of the world—as well as do the missionaries who have worked with and for these people in love and so have discovered for themselves the hidden possibilities within them. "Do nothing without Peet," cabled the United States Government to the Ambassador at Constantinople during World War I, Peet being treasurer of the American Mission. Close identification with Near Eastern affairs during forty years had given weight to the opinion of this man beyond that of the diplomats of Europe or America. I venture to assert that the present leaders of world missionary movements could name from their own number a better informed, better disposed, better trained, and better qualified world-governing council, if occasion arose, than could the combined cabinets of the Big Five. Such men as John R. Mott, Robert E. Speer, Albert Schweitzer, William Paton, C. F. Andrews, Basil Mathews, W. A. Visser't Hooft, and others of similar caliber need take second place to no other candidates likely to enter this field.

But these world evangelists whom I have named are not ignorant sentimentalists. They are highly cultured men whose wisdom and learning and experience are controlled by their consuming spiritual passion. They are noble lovers of mankind who know that ignorance and superstition, prejudice and selfishness are among the worst enemies of the race. They are concerned about education, not as a guarantee of redemption from these evils, but as a valuable tool for all who wish to serve as pioneers of true freedom for all mankind.

In this connection, it is well to recall the tenor of the great appeal made by Mr. Lloyd George and the premiers of the British Dominions, in their message to the British people in 1921. These gentlemen said:

It has become clear today, both through the arbitrament of war and through the tests of rebuilding a life of peace, that neither education, science, diplomacy, nor commercial prosperity, when allied with a belief in material force as the ultimate power, are real foundations for the ordered development of the world's life. These things are in themselves simply the tools of the spirit that handles them.

Even the hope that lies before the world of a life of peace, protected and developed by a League of Nations, is itself dependent on something deeper and more fundamental still. The co-operation which the League of Nations explicitly exists to foster will become operative insofar as the consenting people have the spirit of good will. And the spirit of good will among men rests on spiritual forces; the hope of a "brotherhood of humanity" reposes on the deeper spiritual fact of the "Fatherhood of God."

In the recognition of the fact of that Fatherhood and of the divine purpose for the world, which are central to the message of Christianity, we shall discover the ultimate foundation for the reconstruction of an ordered and harmonious life for all men. That recognition cannot be imposed by government. It can only come as an act of free consent on the part of individual men everywhere.

We would, therefore, commend to our fellow-citizens the necessity that men of good will, who are everywhere reviewing their personal responsibilities in relation to the reconstruction of civilization, should consider also the eternal validity and truth of those spiritual forces which are in fact the one hope for a permanent foundation for world peace.

The years which have intervened since the leaders of the British Commonwealth made this significant appeal have but served to strengthen the convictions of wise public leaders all over the world that religion is fundamentally involved where living issues are faced. There is a widespread and constantly growing distrust of materialistic culture which neglects the primary importance of values. As we look toward the coming industrialization of India and China and then Africa in the wake of a world-shaking demonstration of the power of naked physical might, we see that it is not science nor invention nor commerce, which of themselves threaten our peace, but the materialism which everywhere seeks to control them. And we should be almost hopeless as we contemplate the ever-widening reach of materialism if we did not also know that, where it has been given an opportunity, Christianity has again and again saved and controlled the material world. Our own characteristic Latter Day Saint approach to this problem is not to deny the marvels of science, invention, organization, and communication—of which our age is so justly proud—but to subdue these in the service of the kingdom of God through application of the principles of stewardship.

We need world evangelization, then, to win men to new and eternally valid loyalties—loyalties to Christ and to the kingdom. Only through such evangelism, practiced here and elsewhere as we have strength and opportunity, can our common Father deliver the minds and hearts of men from hatred and fear, encouraging them to claim all the goods and opportunities with which our age is being blessed, and building a consistent moral universe where men are free, responsible, and co-operative.

Now, obviously, in such a comprehensive program of evangelism as we have been considering, education is an indispensable junior partner. We need education for the enlargement of soul to which it ministers when sought in the right spirit. Education involves stern disciplines of mind and heart, patient search for underlying principles, eager regard for truth wherever it is found, frank facing of facts, and an equally frank disregard for imposing trivialities—all of which are of the very essence of the spirit of Christianity. We need education for our own development as evangelists with a world outlook.

Obviously, too, we need education which will help us to understand men, to serve them, and to enlighten them. It is difficult to appreciate the point of view of a man who can understand that a physician should be highly educated in order to make his good will effective in caring for our bodies, but who does not see that it is also desirable for a minister to be well educated in order to make his good will effective in caring for our souls.

This brings us, at last, to our question: "What Education for World Evangelism?" Long ago one of the great men of all time, a spiritual and intellectual giant, proclaimed that God "hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us; for in him we live, and move, and have our being—for we also are his offspring." Now with Paul's dictum that men are of one blood, modern science is in full agreement. There is absolutely no scientific basis for the idea of intrinsic racial superiority or inferiority. Christian people ought to be happy to know this and to find that local leaders can be found and quickened anywhere, among any people, to lead their fellows toward that abundant life which is the life of the kingdom.

World evangelism, and particularly world evangelism after the Latter Day Saint pattern, is an adventure in world transformation through discovering Christian leadership possibilities in millions of seemingly average people. We do not hope or intend to impose our own leadership on others of our own race or of any race. We only hope and expect to awaken men to their own possibilities, and then to share the results of their growth under God. It was with such hope and expectation that the early missionaries of our church went throughout this land and other lands with the message of the Restoration and their faith was confirmed in results.

Basic to all education for world evangelism, then, is reinforcement of the Christian conviction regarding the innate possibilities of our enterprise. We must study men as men. I am convinced that as we work in the fields of history, sociology, psychology, race relations, world literature, and comparative religion—and do so without prejudice, i. e., in the scientific spirit of hunger for truth—we cannot fail to be both enlightened and empowered thereby. Christianity is revolutionary and our studies will convince us that, like all genuine revolutions, it is capable of disclosing immense reservoirs of human power which would otherwise have no opportunity of effective expression.

Once our attitude toward our fellows is right—rooted in faith and confirmed in study and experience—every educational approach which we make to the enrichment of our personalities and the enlargement of our skills is an advantage. If we are to make evangelism our profession, a liberal education with emphases in such fields as theology, language, music, pedagogy, economics, agriculture, medicine, and the social sciences is of major importance. Equally important is the necessity that such education shall make us practical builders in life situations and not mere theorizers, demonstrators and not just lecturers, leaders in the abundant life and not just preachers about it.

Few evangelistic situations at home or abroad are so simple that they can be fully met by the ministry of preaching. Almost invariably some additional ministry must be exercised. It has been said that man is like an island, and that if we would land a valuable cargo, we must row round him several times to find the best beachhead and then do the actual work of landing with both foresight and skill. The best beachhead in evangelism has generally been the point of the greatest need of the person or group concerned. Thus, as far back as the fourth century, Ulfilas gave both Christianity and letters to the Goths north of the Danube. Prior to Ulfilas' mission, the Goths were without books or writing. In order that they might have the Scriptures, Ulfilas invented for them an alphabet in which he used modifications of the Greek letters and added some additional characters to represent the Gothic sounds for which the Greeks had no signs. Then he translated the whole Bible for them, omitting only the Books of Kings, since he felt that these would tend to feed the warlike passions of the Goths. The Upsala copy of his "silver Bible" is invaluable as the earliest existing form of Teutonic speech, the mother-language of all Northern Europe and America.

Two hundred years after Ulfilas' ministry among the Goths, Columba crossed the Irish Channel into Argyllshire, Scotland, and, with twelve companions, founded at Iona a settlement which became one of the most famous missionary schools in history. One writer says,

"For two centuries or more Iona was the place in all the world whence the greatest evangelistic influence went forth and on which, therefore, the greatest blessings from on high rested."

Since the days of such pioneers, but most notably during the past one hundred fifty years, ignorance and disease have provided important beachheads, which world evangelists have exploited skillfully in many lands at great cost to themselves. Some of the best schools and hospitals in the world have been built as means of evangelism and are maintained in the spirit and joy of witnessing for Christ by devoted and excellently trained teachers and doctors and nurses.

"Preach, teach, and heal" are the watchwords of evangelism, but wise and well-trained evangelists have varied basic approaches in a multitude of effective ways. Livingstone did it by making himself indispensable to the African natives; doctoring them, teaching them, and amusing the children with his magic lantern. John E. Paton did it by sinking a well through the soil and rock of a coral island, and when he was successful the jeering natives turned from ridicule to gratitude as they realized that the water would be free to all. The back of heathenism on Aniwa was broken from that moment. Samuel Higginbottom did it with his farm and agricultural institute, which made famine a back number in the region of Allahabad. Cyrus Hamlin did it with his forge, his power mill, his bakeshop, his phonograph. Dr. Albertus Pieters did it through newspaper evangelism which reached the key people of Japan, those who could read and write. James M. Hess of the American College, Madura, South India, did it by interesting his students in English classics such as Shakespeare, Wordsworth, and Tennyson, where the many Christian allusions and quotations they met required them to read the Bible and especially to familiarize themselves with the life of Christ.*

But world evangelism is not primarily either a professional ministerial enterprise or a foreign missionary adventure. It is a basic Christian vocation to be entered into with energy, devotion, intelligence, and skill. To this vocation, all are called according to the gifts of God unto them—gifts of capacity and possibility, as well as gifts of native talent. In this vocation of winning men to abundant living through Christ, education is a major means of implementing our kingdom purpose. Every saintly and well-educated man and woman can play an appropriate part. In Graceland, in the Sanitarium, and in many a personal situation, this fact has been demonstrated again and again. Consider, then, what any Graceland man can do in his community if he has the faith and courage and imagination for which abundant life calls. He can himself share in the hopes and joys and challenges and prophecies of the kingdom. And he can encourage and help specific persons to achieve the kingdom spirit, and to lay hold on life and make it yield beauty, truth, and power.

The spirit of world evangelism expressed by our people in Hawaii in the past has already resulted in the enrollment of a significant number of Hawaiian students at Graceland. Let us suppose that one out of every two such students goes back to Hawaii fired with the vision of the purpose of Christ for the people of that lovely land as part of His purpose for the people of every land. Let us suppose, moreover, that these Graceland students still continue to nourish and to refine their kingdom life and purpose through sincere and earnest and frequent worship experiences. Then let us suppose that during the next twenty years these Graceland graduates make it their absorbing hobby to discover, stimulate, and enlarge the finer spiritual and cultural possibilities of the people around them. What a delightful time these Graceland people would have, what a power for good they would become, what evangelists they would make, what a fellowship they would build, and how wonderfully their will-to-good would be multiplied by their own education and by the education of others whom they might tempt upward. Education in itself projects no such glorious possibilities, but education as the handmaid of religion can guarantee them. And what can be done in Hawaii can be done in England and in Continental Europe and in Australasia and in China and in the islands of the sea. It can be done wherever men love God enough to qualify and to serve.

World evangelism begins anywhere in the world that we can reach men who need God. At its heart is testimony by word and in deed that Jesus is the rightful Lord of life. Among its most worthy handmaids is such education as enriches the understanding and strengthens the hands of those who want to serve at the points where men most need help.

Illness of Sister E. J. Gleazer, Sr.

On the eve of the scheduled departure of President Edwards, Bishop DeLapp, and Apostle Gleazer, the latter was detained by the sudden illness of his wife. Sister Gleazer was taken to the Sanitarium on Sunday, July 6, and returned to her home on the 12th; but will return to the hospital for further treatment.

Under these distressing circumstances, decision has been reached that Brother Gleazer should not make the European trip. Brethren Edwards and DeLapp are already in England.

We are all hopeful that Sister Gleazer will make a speedy recovery.

The Lord's Prayer

6. "Give Us This Day Our Daily Bread"

By L. Wayne Updike
Bishop, Kansas City Stake

This is the sixth in a series of meditations presented at the Appointee Institute held at Independence, August 28 to September 14, 1946. The first five appeared in the issues of January 18, January 25, June 14, July 19, and July 26.

IT HAS SOMETIMES been stated that the greatest prayers are those of gratitude, praise, and adoration. Those sections of the Old Testament which extol the grandeur and the majesty of God have been considered outstanding. Prayers of petition have been termed "give me" prayers and are often rated as of lesser worth.

What, then, shall we say of this petition, "Give us this day our daily bread," which is found in the prayer suggested by the Master for our use? Is this a prayer of lesser quality? Did Jesus instruct us in ways less than the best? Is this only a "give me" prayer?

To anyone who has given any time to becoming acquainted with the nature and purpose of Jesus, the answers to these questions are obviously negative. When Jesus directed that we use this form for our prayers, he did so with full knowledge that God has provided for man all the material things we need. As he strove to plant the kingdom idea in the hearts and minds of men, he was seeking not for material things which have already been provided but rather for a relationship between men that should make it possible for all to share in these provisions.

There are probably three levels of interpretation of meaning of this "give me" phrase in the Lord's Prayer. The first is the view which holds that this is simply a request for the food and shelter and other necessities of life. Further, that we are asking God that they be provided today. Some have even gone so far as to state that it is against the Master's wish for us to pray for anything which shall not be needed until tomorrow. Scripture such as the story of the rich man who built bigger barns, and the directive, "Take no thought for tomorrow," are used to support this view. Undoubtedly, this interpretation is an intelligent one, and people who have such straightforward faith in God's ability to provide shall find their faith rewarded as they put forth a reasonable effort to seek the answer to their requests.

A second interpretation holds that Jesus was referring to spiritual food, that since he had stated, "I am the bread of life," he was suggesting men should pray for spiritual food in the words, "Give us this day our daily bread." Oft quoted in this connection are the words from the parable mentioned above, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee. Then whose shall these things be?" Another bulwark of this view is the scriptural excerpt, "What doth it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" There can be no question that this view is also sound. Whenever men reach the position that they can sincerely pray for spiritual food, they are by that very prayer made the partakers of "meat that the world knows not of." To men who accept the prayer in this light and use it with sincere purpose there shall come much good. The food they receive—spiritual food—shall make them strong—morally strong. Well can we say that this prayer is one to be emulated.

The third view, however, is one which holds that the prayer of Jesus ranks with the greatest even when measured against prayers which express praise and adoration and gratitude, for it was out of such an attitude of mind that the prayer was dictated. Jesus recalled that God has provided all the earth for the use of man. To mankind he gave dominion over all that exists in the world. How grateful men should feel for the gifts of the sun and the rain which make food and shelter possible! The purpose of the Master was not to ask for things which God has already provided. His purpose was to teach men the kingdom way of utilizing all these abundant gifts. True, this would take spiritual and moral strength, and for these we should pray. But such strength can have real meaning and effectiveness only as it finds implementation in a righteous society. The admonition to seek first the kingdom was directed at the same problem as the prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread." Men who pray this prayer most intelligently and understandingly do so out of a background of gratitude that God has provided the wherewithal for men to live each day. The focal point of the petition is the task of so relating men that the things provided shall be used to the maximum for the building of the kingdom.

Give us all mankind enough to eat. Give us all mankind clothing and shelter. Give us these things every day, and with them a release from the sense of concern about tomorrow. Give us these things in the only way they can be given to all men, by the establishment of Thy kingdom. We thank Thee for all that has been provided. Now teach us to use it wisely. We praise Thee for Thine unending Divorce means only a broken home to adults, but to children—a shattered world.

Without Tears

By Holly Sherrington

MARY BETH knew something was wrong again the minute she got home from school. She and Buster, her red-haired brother, had just come in and set their lunch pails on the kitchen table when she noticed it. She knew at once what it was. Mamma and Daddy had been quarreling again.

"Come on out and play," Buster was urging, tugging at her arm. "I'll show you how to make a rubber gun just like mine. Come on, Mary Beth."

She shook his arm away, impatiently. "I don't want to," she said grouchy, "You leave me alone; I have to see Mamma about something."

Already lost in contemplation of the new gun he was going to cut out, Buster lumbered away in his sheepskin coat and high boots. He was too young to know what was going on, Mary Beth reflected briefly, looking after him. She began to unwind the heavy woolen scarf teacher had tied for her under her upturned coat collar. Mamma always believed in dressing them warmly and watching their diets and seeing that they didn't repeat the language they heard around the barn. Mamma was what you would call a very conscientious mother. But even so, Mary Beth was never quite at ease about her. Mamma was a great one for crying and going off by herself and not talking to anyone at all, and secretly and fearfully, Mary Beth had long been troubled with thoughts of what Mamma might do. There had been a neighbor man once who had climbed up in the hayloft of his barn and tied a rope around a rafter and around his neck, and had stepped off the loft floor and hanged himself. She had heard them say—the hired men and her parents—that he did it because he was having trouble with his wife. The thought of him hanging there in the barn had shocked her so at the time that she had gone away from the table quickly with terrible little chills racing up and down her spine.

It was even worse than the time she had peeked into a third grade reader when she was in second grade and had found the awful story of Bluebeard, who had murdered all his wives. She would never, never have admitted it out loud—not even to Buster, who was her closest confidant—but she was always afraid that Mamma would hang herself, too. She had taken it upon herself to check on Mamma at all times when she was home so that no such thing could happen.

Now she went through the rooms of the house slowly, wondering where Mamma could be. Maybe she was in the bedroom, sewing. She was going to make three new school dresses for Mary Beth, maybe she was working on them. At the beginning of each school year Mary Beth always got three new ready-made school dresses from the store, and she wore these until about the first of February, when Mamma would buy some goods and make her three more to wear until the term was out and for the rest of the summer. Mary Beth was always thrilled when Mamma started her spring sewing. She was the best sewer in the world. She always matched the bias tape to one of the colors in the material and then she piped the collars and sleeves with it, sometimes making sashes edged with the tape. Once she had even made a little bolero that looked as if it would come off, except that its back was also the back of the dress. Sometimes when Mary Beth went to school in the morning the material would be on the sewing table, and when she came home at night, there would be an almost completed new dress on a wire hanger, waiting for her to try it on so Mamma could pin up the hem. On these occasions, Mary Beth had difficulty concealing her joy. Mamma always told people she could not sew very well and didn't know the first thing about fitting anything, but Mary Beth always thought she was being modest—as when she said she had just had good luck with her bread. Everyone knew she was the best bread baker in the neighborhood.

She hurried on into the bedroom. Mamma was not there, and the sewing machine had not been opened. But there was a sort of dent in the bed as if Mamma might have been resting, and on the pillow there was a funny looking little book that Mary Beth had never seen before. She picked it up and looked at it. It was like a catalog, only not so thick, and it had pages and pages of colored pictures of houses in it. Mary Beth thought it was very curious. Under the descriptions at the bottoms of the pictures there were prices. Enormous ones. People must order these houses, just like they ordered things from Montgomery Ward or Sears, Roebuck. But why should Mamma want to buy a house? She already had a house.

She went to all the other rooms, hurrying now, because she found them empty. It was awfully quiet in the house, and it was getting just a little bit dark. Sometimes it was almost dark when she and Buster got home from school. Daddy said the days were getting longer now, and she was really glad, because she had always been afraid of the dark, although she would never have admitted that either.

Mamma was not in the house. Not even in the basement.

Maybe she was gathering eggs at the barn, or maybe she was out feeding the hens. Mary Beth looked up at the kitchen clock, and it was time for Mamma to be starting supper. Daddy and the hired men would soon be finished with the chores. Mary Beth reached up on the cupboard, got down the kerosene lamp, lighted it and set it on the table. Its feeble light made things a little brighter, but she was beginning to be badly frightened. She ran outside.

First, she looked in the hen house. Mamma was not there—nor in the barn—but she found Buster, whittling away on a stalk for his new rubber gun. Now thoroughly frightened, she grabbed him and shook him, sobbing.

"Where's Mamma?" she asked hysterically. "Do you know she had a fight with Daddy today and went and hung herself, maybe?"

Buster was always quick to fall into her moods. Now he began to cry too.

"How'd you know? How'd you know, Mary Beth?" he blubbered.

The two children looked at each other woefully.

"I know because I looked all over the house for her," Mary Beth said earnestly, "and in the basement and in the yard and out here, and she isn't anywhere unless she's in the tool house. And she's prob'ly hung herself, and I'm scared to look in there."

Sobbing, both children started for the tool house. They saw their father through the open door of the barn, going from stall to stall with feed for the horses, but they did not approach him. He was talking to the hired man about what the Democrats were apt to do if they were elected again, and he did not notice the children.

"How'd you know Mamma and Daddy had a fight?" Buster demanded, panting along beside his sister.

"I always know," Mary Beth said. "I can tell, every time. Mamma always goes off by herself, and Daddy just looks funny, and they don't talk to each other but just to the hired men and us kids. And after they go to bed sometimes Mamma tells him she's going away, and Daddy says to go ahead, he doesn't care because he can get along without her, so I think she is either going to hang herself like that man did, or else buy a new house and go away and live by herself."

The door to the tool house was almost closed. The inside looked forbiddingly dark to the two worried children. Mary Beth reached the door first, but Buster, always the braver of the two, pushed it open. They looked inside timidly, and sure enough, there was Mamma. But she was all right. She was just sitting on a sack of binder twine left over from last harvest, and she had her hands over her face. She must have been crying, because her eyes were all red, and she couldn't talk very well. The children looked at her with the tears drying on their cheeks.

- a home column feature -

It was an awkward moment, and Mary Beth experienced both relief and embarrassment. Now that she had found Mamma, her fears of a moment before seemed silly, and she wished she could think of something to say to make Mamma think they had not been looking for her, but had just happened to open the tool house door.

"I lit the lamp," she faltered, clutching Buster's hand.

Mamma wiped her eyes on her apron.

"Run on to the house and get yourselves washed for supper," she said.

That night Mary Beth listened to her parents talking after they were all in bed, but they were in the other corner of the room, and she could not understand much of what they said. She knew they were both very cross. She went to sleep, puzzled and unhappy. One of them must be wrong, but she didn't know if it was Daddy or Mamma. But she did know that she loved them both. Daddy was so much fun when he wasn't tired. On long winter evenings he would put Buster on one knee and Mary Beth on the other, and read them stories out of their library books that teacher brought to school and let them check out, or else he would get out some of the old books he had when he was a little boy. And he used to sing them songs, although they were a little too big for that now, and he would rock them after they were in their pajamas and ready for bed. He was a wonderful Daddy! But Mamma was nice, too, only things were always making her cross and unhappy.

The next day at school she tried to tell Junie Anderson, her best friend, about it. Only she didn't know just how to begin, and besides Junie was just the same age as Buster, and probably too young to know about quarrels, anyway. Mary Beth did not talk much about serious things to Junie. Once Mamma had told her about how things were born, and she had cautioned Mary Beth not to tell Junie or any other child about it, because that was for their own mothers to tell them, just as she had told Mary Beth. So Mary Beth was always very careful about her conversations with Junie.

Now she ventured, "Does your Daddy ever get mad at your Mamma?"

Junie, across the teeter-totter, nodded vigorously. "Yea—he does. He gets as mad as an old bull sometimes. That's what Mamma says," she amended hastily, in case Mary Beth might think this was her own opinion.

Neither little girl said any more. They went off to play Indian tepee with their arms around each other. A few days later, Junie had a birthday and got an autograph book. Teacher helped Mary Beth find a little verse to write in it.

*Merry have we met,
Merry have we been.
Merry let us part,
And merry meet again.*

Mary Beth was first to write in the new book, after teacher, and now that they had shared a confidence about their parents and exchanged autographs, she and Junie were inseparable friends.

There was no one at home that Mary Beth could talk to about her problems. Mamma did a lot of talking, but mostly it was to Grandma, who came and stayed with them every few months. Frequently Mamma said things like if she had known before she was married what she knew now she would never have married at all, and sometimes she said that if she were a widow no man would ever change her name again. Mary Beth suspected that Grandma agreed with Mamma about this. Mary Beth guessed from what Grandma said that Grandpa had been a very wicked man. She was glad that he had died when she was a little baby.

One summer day, Junie's mother and Junie came over to visit. The two girls went out to play, and after a while, when they came back indoors, Junie's mother looked very strange, and Junie went up and put her arms around her, and hugged her tightly. Mary Beth noticed and she thought that probably Mamma had been telling Mrs. Anderson about men again. But she did not worry about it because for quite a while now Mamma and Daddy had been getting along all right. Sometimes Daddy even kissed Mamma when she was working around the kitchen. Once at the table, though, he had said something about only one couple in a thousand being meant for each other, and Mamma had got very cross and said sharply that she wished he had been a woman.

That summer, Junie and Buster and Mary Beth organized a club and held meetings every time they could get together. This was a very exclusive club, and they were the only members. Each one was an officer. To the imaginative Mary Beth, just plain presidents and secretaries seemed far too commonplace, so she made a motion that they have a king, a yell leader and a life guard instead. They made up books of bylaws interspersed with club yells in the backs of their school composition books. They practiced life-saving on the roof of the barn and in the attic. At the end of the summer, they were even going to have their own fair. This would be about ninety per cent Mary Beth's work, since Buster leaned to horseback riding, and Junie took to climbing trees and running through deep water. Mary Beth was always stuck with the bookwork, but she got around this by making a motion that whoever did the bookwork was also the king.

When you are only ten years old, you forget things easily. You don't pay much attention to details. Unless an event is especially outstanding, you do not remember. But as long as she lived, Mary Beth was sure she would never forget that day in July.

She could close her eyes and see everything that happened. First, Mamma had hurried through the breakfast dishes, Mary Beth helping. Then Mamma had put on a fresh house dress and her straw hat, and told Mary Beth they were going over to Mrs. Andersons.

"You come along," she said to Mary Beth. "Mrs. Anderson wants you to play with Junie while we take up the living room rug."

This had not seemed especially odd. When they arrived at the Andersons, Junie's father was in the field, and her mother was folding down some towels and putting dishes in a paper lined bushel basket.

Junie, in blue denim overalls, came out of the house with her hands full of cookies, and she and Mary Beth wandered off to the chicken house to look at the hens. Mary Beth did not like chickens, but she liked to play in the feed bins. They liked to chew the wheat into gum. Each took a tiny handful and began to chew slowly.

"Gee," said Mary Beth, swinging one leg over the side of the bin, "school starts pretty soon."

"Uh, huh," agreed Junie without enthusiasm.

"Wonder who our teacher will be this year?" Mary Beth speculated. "Maybe Miss Parker again."

"Maybe," said Junie.

"You ought to know, if anybody does," Mary Beth said, "the school-teacher always boards at your house."

"Let's go look at the garden," suggested Junie.

While they were in the garden, Junie's mother called her, and Junie turned around immediately and started for the house. Mary Beth lagged along behind. Mrs. Anderson had her car out, and her hat and coat on. There were lots of things sticking up in the back seat of the car—boxes and pails, and ironing boards.

"Are you and your mother going somewhere?" Mary Beth asked stupidly.

"Uh, huh."

"Well where, f'hevvin's sakes?"

"Hurry, June," Mrs. Anderson said edgily. "I want to get started before dinner time."

Junie got in beside her mother. Mrs. Anderson looked around at Mary Beth and her mother, then glanced at the field. She let out the clutch and the car rolled slowly forward.

"Good-by, Mrs. Phillips," she said.

Mary Beth stood there watching. She saw Junie sit up on her knees and turn around to wave. She heard her shrill good-by. She even waved back languidly at the small, departing figure.

"Where are they going?" she asked then, turning to Mamma.

Mamma had a funny look on her face. Mary Beth was suddenly unexplainably afraid.

"They're going back east, to Junie's grandmother," she said, not looking at Mary Beth's stricken face. "Mr. and Mrs. Anderson are going to get a divorce."

A great wave of pain swept through Mary Beth. It was even worse than the time she had taken ether to have her tonsils out. If Mrs. Anderson was not coming back, Junie would not be coming back, either. She had been tricked! They had taken away her best friend!

She grasped at a straw. "But — what about school?" she faltered, not daring to even put her awful fear about Junie into words.

"Junie will go to school back there."

All hope left Mary Beth. All hope, and for a moment, all faith. What would become of the club? Where would she and Buster go to play? And what had been the matter with Mr. Anderson? Mary Beth decided she would never marry—she would grow up and teach school like Miss Parker. Married people were always unhappy. But why hadn't she known about Junie's mamma and daddy? Then she remembered that time on the teeter-totter at school. Junie had known all along!

Mamma drove in the yard and picked up the basket of berries Mrs. Anderson had given her. She took them into the kitchen, looked at the clock and remarked matter-of-factly that she had better get some potatoes peeled for dinner. Just as if she didn't know the whole world was upside down! Mary Beth was choking with resentment, but she said nothing. There was a great ache in her throat, and she fled from the kitchen and the presence of her mother. Not caring where she went, she climbed up into the attic where she had made herself a playroom.

No matter what she looked at, all she could see was Junie sitting up on her knees and looking back and waving. She put her head down in her hands, but she could not cry. She knew that tears would not help her now. It was the first real tragedy Mary Beth had known in her short life. Her childish heart was for the first time so full of despair that she could in no way express it.

The Answer to the Modern World Problem

The last in a series of radio addresses on the subject:
"The Social Philosophy of the Modern Prophet"

By J. A. Koehler

SUPPOSE YOUR family were face to face with the problem of reconstituting itself so as to uproot the causes of its chaos, its inefficiency, or wastefulness, and, more than all, of its injustices. Suppose it faced a problem of reorganization which, if it were not soon resolved, would lead to ruination—in what could the answer to that problem be found? Could it be found in a device for making more money, or in a scheme for serving a greater variety or even a better quality of foods on the table? It could not. The answer to the problem of a bad way of living together as a family is a good way of living together as a family. That, and only that.

Surely you must know that marble halls are not the cure for bad domestic relations. Nor are they the cure for the evil spirits which give rise to those relations. There has been more "heaven" in the "log cabins" of the past than we have in the "marble mansions" of the present. Electrical gadgets and larders filled with viands are not the causes of domestic peace and happiness. It takes a lot of living—a lot of right living—to make a contented and happy home.

The human family today is neither contented nor happy in its earthly home. With the passing of the years, particularly since the scientific awakening and the advancement of the practical arts, the affairs of that family have become more and more chaotic. The manner in which the business of peoples is conducted has come to be more and more wasteful, burdensome, and oppressive. And the injustices which have either increased or become more acute with industrial advancement or technological progress, threaten to make instruments of human degradation of some of the means of temporal welfare. The race is face to face with a problem of government. And the question we ask today is, "What is the essence of the answer to that problem?"

Suppose the church had the answer to that problem of ordering human relations aright, or of grounding the economics of peoples in the ethical principles which we call "the righteousness of the Kingdom," could it exhibit that answer in rituals and sacraments? Could it exhibit the answer in ecclesiastical novelties and varieties? It could not.

Could the church exhibit the answer to the problem of the "righteousness" of industry and government in experimental business devices designed to increase the productivity of farming and the techniques of manufacture, and such like of its members? It could not.

Could any religious agency or genius reveal the answer to the modern world problem in anything short of a model community—a godly mode of economic self-governance—"a City out of which our God shall shine"? It could not.

I may speak as representing only one religious agency. Some of the assumptions of the genius of our religious movement are: (1) That true religion consists in conducting the affairs of this world—primarily the vital affairs of all peoples, or the eternal affairs of man—in the manner designed of God. True religion is the intentional or willing doing of God's will primarily in those relations. (2) That the function of the church with its sacraments is to promote the doing of God's will in all the relations that condition the welfare of the soul. And (3) that it is, therefore, the mission of the agencies of true religion to exhibit in the life of its own peoples the design of God respecting the uses of the things of this world. That is the testimony of the prophecy of the ages.

That is the expectation of reason. There is no reason, so, therefore, no one can think of any reason why religious peoples should not conform their own conduct of their own affairs, as they have opportunity to what they believe to be the will of God. But everyone may think of many reasons why they should, because there are many reasons.

Now, if there were a religious movement grounded in such convictions, to fulfill its mission, it would have to have a true philosophy of social life, would it not? And if it had such a philosophy which it was implementing in a "City," or community of its own building, it would be the answer to the modern world problem, would it not?

Let us reflect a moment on the aspects of that problem with a view to judging of whether the social philosophy of the modern prophet together with his practical plan of social action, or his way of implementing that philosophy, bears any resemblance to the answer to the modern world problem. Does Restoration attempt, in fact, to resolve that problem?

Speaking in a very general way, we may say that the modern world problem is a problem of government. It is the problem of adapting governmental institutions to the requirements of the new conditions under which peoples must seek to promote their prosperity, their happiness, and their peace. And, to break down the problem of government into its parts, we may say that the factors in that problem are (1) property organization, (2) financial institutions, (3) business customs and practices, (4) political controls, and (5) governmental personnel.

It seems evident to us that the roots of our problem have their anchorages in our forms of ownership of wealth, our monetary devices, our profit-making or acquisitive practices, our forms, constitutions, and methods of government, and the character and capacities of the men who dominate the economic lives of peoples. Of course, all these institutions arise from and are sustained by the spirits of peoples. They represent what goes on in the hearts and heads of men, or in their minds—which are their spirits.

If you have listened to this group of radio talks or if you have read the prophetic message of Restoration, you should know that the essence of the social philosophy of the modern prophet is its concept of what is right in the sum of all the relations which we call economic life. That philosophy is a pattern of a system of administration of economic affairs. It is concerned, not with the "goodness" of this or that way of planting corn or making shoes, nor with any other problem which it is the function of persons to solve, but with the "righteousness" of the whole business of human living together. It is concerned with the conduct of the business of "peoples." It begins with the assumption that only right spirited men, only a competent citizenry, can hope to achieve a rightly constituted society. And from that it goes on to say what is right in respect to property, in respect to money and finance, in respect to motives of business activity, in respect to units of economic controls, and in respect to the kind of men who should serve as organs of government, or of the social purpose of peoples.

We do not say that the social philosophy of the modern prophet represents a body of new truths. We say, rather, that it reveals the applications of old truths which need to be made in the circumstances of invention, mass production, specialization, or the division of labor, the interlocking of economic interests, and the interdependence of both persons and peoples in the business of living.

That social philosophy strikes at the basic causes of imperialism, of unemployment, of civil strife, of poverty in the midst of plenty, of ignorance of government, of public and private debts, of oppressive taxation, or racial animosities, of warfare in general. In brief, it lays the axe to the roots of the modern world problem.

That, of course, is a representation of the essence of a religious philosophy of social life as such. It does not represent the reactions of the people of any church to that message. It says nothing about what this or that church has or has not done about it.

I am nearing the age of seventy. I have spent most of my years in seeking to give an interpretation of Restoration as a social philosophy and as a practical plan of social action. My anchorages of faith in that practical message have become firmer with the passing of the years, notwithstanding the failures of performances of peoples. The more good books I read, and the more I learn about the turns of human events, the deeper does the conviction become that the social philosophy of the modern prophet, together with his practical plan of social action, is the answer to the modern world problem.

Human society is the limited and legalized struggle of men and women to get the better of one another.—Wells, quoted in Victorious Living, by E. S. Jones, page 155.

tentions, they could obtain council and direction which would be of great value tending to prevent bad feelings, and unity and mutual benefit be secured to all concerned. "Look before you leap."

In the light of the document accepted at the late General Conference, it is even more important that the Saints should observe the instructions to prepare the way before them when moving toward Zion or the regions round about as a part of the gathering and the realization of Zion's goals.

Opportunities for Young Women

At Independence Sanitarium and Hospital

"Requests for the Nursing Packet offered in the Saints' Herald of July 12 are being received in gratifying numbers, mostly from prospective students, some of them still in high school," reports Nelle Morgan, R.N., Director of Nurses at the Sanitarium. "May I suggest that parents, pastors, women's leaders, vocational counselors, and all others having the responsibility of counseling young women, send for the Nursing Packet and be prepared with the latest facts about the nursing profession. A post card addressed to me at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital, Independence, Missouri, will bring the Nursing Packet immediately."

Applications are now being accepted for the fall class of laboratory technicians at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital. Requirement for entrance is at least two years' college credit, the major part of which is in the biological sciences. The length of the course is one year under the supervision of a diplomate of the American Board of Pathology. Address all inquiries to Miss Gertrude Copeland, Superintendent, Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

IT ISN'T CHARITY

But the Campus Shop Is Big Business

In Human Relations

By Biloine Whiting

Photographs by Marvin M. McDole

A WEARY SCHOOL OFFICER plodded along the dingy street at the edge of town, looking at numbers. She stopped at the smallest, poorest house there.

"You Mrs. Patrick?" she asked the heavy woman who answered her knock. "Four of your children have been out of school. What's the matter? Are they sick?"

A glance around the room revealed the children in question playing on the rough boards of the floor. Some were barefoot, others wore but one garment.

"As soon as the snow melts, we'll send 'em," replied the woman. "They haven't enough clothes to go to school now."

It was the same old story to the social worker. Children seemed to wear out clothes before they could outgrow them, and with no hand-me-downs for large families to depend on, clothing bills became cancers on the pay checks of laborers like Mr. Patrick, who worked too irregularly to clothe nine children through a rigorous Missouri winter.

In the city of Zion, children were missing school (and church) because they hadn't enough clothes to wear, and they probably would have gone on getting frost bitten if it hadn't been for Mrs. Russell Rowland, a driving little woman with sunny blond hair.

FROM THE SIDELINES she had watched the spasmodic local relief projects, mostly inadequate, failing to meet many a need, and reducing self-respecting people to objects of charity. In fact, Mrs. Rowland had such emphatic views on the subject that in 1939, the church put the whole Commodity Shop problem in her lap and gave her a free hand.

"Poor people don't want charity," she reasoned. "They want to pay for what they need. Why don't the older women of Independence, the grandmothers and great-grandmothers, establish a clothing store with prices low enough for anyone?"

Her idea was simple. The women would merely collect cast-off garments, remodel them (children weren't to be humiliated by having to wear someone else's old clothes), and sell them again for a nominal sum. With careful managing, they could make the store self-supporting.

Business men told her she was crazy. There would have to be a tremendous turnover to make any money, they said, and older women operating a business was silly, they were doing well to propel a rocking chair.

They had figured without Mrs. Rowland's personnel methods, for "by prayer and hard work" she got workers. While much of Independence scoffed, she copied the rolls of clubs and sent printed cards to the women, asking for contributions of old clothes. She gave luncheons where she outlined her plan.

"No one will be paid for her labor," she explained. "We will give our time every Tuesday to fashioning attractive clothes from the donations we receive."

Even while her enthusiasm recruited workers, there was still one point that she wasn't sure about—the location of their store. Its former home in the basement of the Graphic Arts building wouldn't begin to house the expanding plant Mrs. Rowland was visualizing, so she sought use of the church-owned Swope mansion on the Campus, the scene of the notorious Hyde-Swope murder case years ago.

EVER SINCE Dr. B. Clark Hyde had been accused of the murder of Colonel Swope and Chrisman Swope, and the attempted murder of the four Swope daughters, their red brick home had been virtually deserted. The Saints were using the ground for summer services, but the mansion rose dark and forbidding in the background. It was almost with a sigh of relief that the bishop gave Mrs. Row-

Old couples, struggling to live on a pension, became steady customers, while burned-out families and disaster victims were outfitted at 1c up. The women formed a policy of charging something for everything, but in verified cases of need, they gave whole crates of garments with no thought of payment.

With the customers came new workers, and departments mushroomed as every woman wanted to experiment with her own idea. One worker envisioned piles of quilts when she saw the great heaps of cotton scraps left from the dressmaking, so a quilt department with four frames was installed in a second floor bedroom.

"One thing just led to another," related an officer, "like the time a visitor noticed that the scraps left from the quilts were the size pieces used in weaving rugs."

The next week the visitor had her eighty-year-old "Weaver's Friend" loom installed in a turret of the mansion, and was busily instructing eager volunteers in the art of weaving.

While cotton pieces were salvaged for quilts, wool scraps were saved for comforters. The pieces from the comforters were used for braided rugs, and the scraps from the braided rugs went into oriental rugs. The final ravelings were collected and sold with waste paper for scrap.

All the specialization at the top took co-ordination at the bottom, and that was where Mrs. Rowland displayed her genius for organization. Since they operated only nine hours a week, there could be no wasted effort; raw materials must flow steadily in the right directions.

She had bins built in the sorting room where women wearing surgeons' gauze masks received the discarded clothes and pigeon-holed them under: rippings (for comforters and rugs), cottons (for quilts), knit pieces (for punched rugs), white rags, children's clothes, adults' clothes, and shoes. From there they went to the ripping room where eighty-two-year-old Joshua Phay and his seventy-five-year-old wife bent over the material, cutting hems and trimming seams before it was sent to the laundry rooms.

"We like the ripping room," declared their seventy-two-year-old co-worker as she wielded a pair of razor-sharp shears. With their failing eyesight, needles just aren't safe.

Through these basement departments flowed the life stream of the Campus Shop and, though they had regular donors, entirely too many loaded junk wagons were being hauled out of Independence to suit Mrs. Rowland. How to detour them to the Campus Shop was her problem. Somehow material was found—a grass-stained tent. While the women were puzzling over whether to file it under rags or rippings, someone thought of bags—official Campus Shop bags—that could be filled in the homes. They cut it into suitable pieces, and everyone took the day off to sew them into sacks with "Campus Shop" stenciled in large letters on the sides. Soon 300 bags were distributed in Independence homes with instructions to call the Campus Shop truck when they had been filled.

Those bags precipitated a town-wide housecleaning. The pickup truck shuttled land the key to the Swope home and the commission to establish a store

On that first Tuesday in 1939, five women helped Mrs. Rowland force open the door of the mansion.

The women dropped their brooms to go in with shovels, and as they cleared away the debris, began arranging their store. The expansive living room with its high windows would make an inviting salesroom for the racks of clothes they hoped to make, and the cavernous hall fireplace, when boarded up, would accommodate a desk and a cash register.

The Swope estate included several acres surrounding the house, popularly referred to as "the Campus," so when the women moved their borrowed sewing machine into the third floor ballroom, they named their store "The Campus Shop."

ON OPENING DAY, two departments rattled around in the mansion, a sewing department and a salesroom. In the center of the sewing room they dumped all the clothes they had collected, and by pooling patterns and pedaling the old sewing machine sent a stream of finished garments down to the women in the showroom where they were tagged and displayed.

Activity in the salesroom soon equalled that of the sewing department, for the first timorous customers learned that Campus Shop dressmakers were of the old school. Dresses, priced at 15c, had good lines, deep hems, and bound seams. The wool suits were carefully tailored with fine, handworked details. Cleaned and pressed, they ranged from 50c to $1.

Every Tuesday the cash register clanged in the hall fireplace as mothers bought supplies of corduroy trousers at 5c a pair, and little boys' jackets for 10c.

A girl working her way through business college entered the shop with misgivings and was about to retreat when a clerk nabbed her. Together they selected her school clothes, and then sent her to the sewing room to have them altered to fit.

between home and shop day after day, and when the sorting room women arrived on Tuesday, they found bags literally stacked to the ceiling.

The workers waded into those heaps of material. One designed aprons from neckties, another made baby shoes from felts hats, while a third braided silk hose into rugs.

The burst of activity brought new customers to the old Swope mansion. Shoppers in comfortable circumstances wanted to buy the patchwork quilts for colonial bedrooms, others brought in designs they wished "punched" into rugs. As they exclaimed over the fine needlework, the officers began to see their way more clearly. If people who could pay moderate prices were interested in buying fancywork, soon they could get more sewing machines and a hemstitching machine and maybe another loom and . . . here they stopped speculating and began taking orders.

"Yes, the Campus Shop would finish quilts. Certainly they could make rag rugs. Just place your orders with the department heads."

THE CAMPUS SHOP swung into mass production. Women who supposed that their usefulness was over found themselves managing a profitable business, not for themselves, but dedicated to everyone who needed help.

They developed a kind of esprit de corps that, as one woman said, "is a tie that binds us together here. We just can't go any place else on Tuesday. Sickness is the only thing that keeps us away."

Reminding them of her "prayer and hard work" slogan, Mrs. Rowland instituted a morning devotional before going to work. Grandmothers sat on the grass to sing "Joy to the World," and visiting ministers voiced their prayers. They refused to allow any criticism or gossip to be spoken in the building. On election day, politics were taboo.

Dazzled by their own success, they struggled for new peaks of production, like the woman over ninety years old who wound 900 one-pound balls of the string that forms the foundation of woven rugs. If they talked fast, they worked faster, as attested by the eighty-seven quilts pieced by one seventy-six-year-old woman and the 155 braided rugs that grew in spirals under the gnarled hands of an eighty-eight-year-old grandmother.

The Army-Navy "E" didn't float from their flagpole, but President Harry S. Truman, learning of the shop just eight blocks from his home, took the time to send a note of congratulation and encouragement to the workers.

EVEN PRESIDENTIAL SUPPORT couldn't make up for a woman power shortage in the new departments, so Mrs. Rowland again went in search of personnel.

Young women would work, she discovered, if their children could be cared for, and very old people could come if they had transportation. She solved the first problem by starting a day nursery to care for the children, and a local funeral home offered the use of its limousine for taxi service, regardless of funerals.

Then someone suggested the old folks' home. Women with palsy couldn't operate the button-covering machine, but they could unravel sweaters and wind the yarn into balls for hooked rugs. Invalids, confined to their beds, had materials taken to their homes where they pieced the tops for quilts. Soon they were supplying all the tops for the quilt department, in fact, almost swamping those ladies; at one time they had 150 tops waiting to be quilted.

Since the day the first attic was rummaged for the shop, hats were among the salvage. At the time, there were no facilities for reclaiming them, so they had been heaped in an ever-growing pile in the storeroom. It was time for a new department.

"Who would like to go to school?" the workers were asked one Tuesday morning. The Campus Shop could send volunteers to millinery school in Kansas City to learn how to block and decorate hats.

"A hat must be pretty," Mrs. Rowland said. "It should provide a spiritual lift as well as keep the ears warm." So the women studied the aesthetics of hats and when they finished, a millinery shop was fully supplied with models from grandma's day down to our own. Campus creations, patterned from models in fashion magazines, were priced from 25 cents to 50 cents.

An unexpected visitor at the shop sent a member of the board of directors scurrying to the hat department to select a bonnet, remove the price tag, and reappear appropriately dressed for lunch in the city. Two hours later, the visitor on a tour of inspection was startled to see the lovely hat displayed in a showcase and marked for sale at thirty cents.

LAST APRIL, the Campus Shop celebrated two great events. The first was when they shipped eleven crates of clothes, including 1,000 pairs of shoes, overseas for world relief, and the second was their Conference open house.

Besides General Conference visitors, the people of Independence had long been curious about the activities at the Swope mansion. The funeral car driving up every Tuesday, and the peculiar history of the house tickled their imaginations, so when an invitation to visit was extended, the town turned out. Showcases were dusted off, rugs and quilts displayed on the walls, and their carefully kept records were opened for examination.

Guides conducted the visitors through the thirty complete departments, including a shoeshop, and introduced the department supervisor, who explained the work of her unit to the visitors. The largest department was the sewing room where twenty sewing machines and a hemstitching machine filled the former ballroom. Sharing a corner of the ballroom by the orchestra platform was the button lady, who spent all of her time sorting and stringing buttons and operating the button-covering machine.

The two quilting departments were staffed by twenty-eight quilters, a supervisor, and a seventy-six-year-old marker, while the rest of the floor was devoted to comforters and varieties of rugs. In the basement, a washing machine and two mangles laundered and ironed everything before it was used.

With understandable pride, the guides announced that 23,144 pieces of merchandise had gone out of the shop in 1946. In their eight years of operation, they had spent $5,000 for equipment and repairs on the building, $900 a year for new materials, and had $12,000 laid aside for a new building and cleaning plant.

None of the Patricks were among the visitors who roamed through the Swope mansion that day. Papa Patrick was at work, wearing Campus Shop shoes; the Patrick children, in Campus Shop clothes, were attending school. But dozens of others, many who had come too regularly to be considered visitors, were there, some of them busy explaining to Conference visitors the workings of the departments, and how they served to make the Campus Shop a model of good will and Zioniac endeavor.

beneficence. We are struck with awe as we see the majesty of the great universe created by Thy power. We are moved by the love that has prompted Thy goodness to us. And because we sense the great debt we owe to Thee we desire that as Thou art by these things shown to be our Father, so may we become Thy sons indeed. Give us, then, our daily bread by teaching us to be one with each other.

God at the Center

By Blair Jensen

Now Moses kept the flock of Jethro his father-in-law, the priest of Midian; and he led the flock to the back side of the desert, and came to the mountain of God even to Horeb. And again, the presence of the Lord appeared unto him, in a flame of fire in the midst of a bush; and he looked, and, behold, the bush burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed. And Moses said, I will turn aside, and see this great sight, why the bush was not consumed. And when the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called unto him out of the midst of the bush, and said, Moses, Moses. And he said, Here am I. And he said, Draw not nigh hither; put off thy shoes from off thy feet; for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground. Moreover he said, I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. And Moses hid his face; for he was afraid to look upon God.—Exodus 3: 1-6.

IN THIS STORY of Moses' burning bush, we have a picture of the ideal and satisfying life. It is a life with a divine purpose. "God called unto him out of the midst of the bush . . . the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." The secret of this mystic life—of this mystic bush which could burn without being consumed—was that God was at the heart of it. And so with our lives. The secret of the lives of those people who are filled with consuming and enduring purpose is to be found in the fact that God dwells in their hearts.

The one thing that will actually put real and abiding purpose and splendid ideals into life is to become aware that it is being lived with God and for God. As long as we possess this consciousness of divine motivation and relationship, nothing else matters. If we possess this, we own everything. If we possess it not, we are utterly poverty-ridden. We are undone. Consciousness of its possession prophesies of the acquisition of courage. It produced just that in Moses.

No man could have been more fearful of the task to which he was called than was Moses. Hear him as he cries aloud, "Who am I that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should deliver thy people Israel?" But God understood all that he felt, understood well enough to smile upon him and to give him the all-encompassing promise, "I will be with thee." With this pledge, Moses gave himself to the great task and accomplished it.

With the promise of divine companionship, one has nothing to fear. Fellowship with God gives a man supernatural courage. Such a courage is the spirit of the martyrs. It helps a man to be unafraid, even though alone, and to unhesitatingly attack entrenched evil and sin wherever it is found. With such companionship, obstacles are cast aside. Towering hindrances are circumvented and thrown down into the sea, for, "with God, all things are possible." Of such a one Berton Braley speaks,

Got any river they say isn't crossable?
Got any mountains that can't be cut through?
We specialize in the wholly impossible,
Doing things nobody ever could do.

God at the heart of your life will mean that your life will become one of power and strength. No man is as strong as he who has given himself up to the learning of the will of God and then doing it. A fruitful life is one which has fulfilled the purposes of God.

With God as your companion you never hear the command, "Go." He beckons to you, saying, "Come, let us work together to help a frail one, to protect a weak man, to save a sinful world." God takes the heavy portion of the load upon his shoulders and then invites you to come in with him and share his strength and his burden. The burdens and problems of life are always easy when we recognize this fact. It is easy when we work in harmony with the laws of God. It is extremely hard to work against them.

When you defy God's law of gravitation by trying to strike a hammer high above your head, you find that you are able to put little or no power into the stroke. If on the other hand you direct the blow at something beneath your feet, then you are working in conjunction with God's law of gravitation, and you are able to put much power into the stroke. And so it is with life.

Companionship and attunement with God means that you will endure, for he will put something of his own eternity into the work that you do for him. There is a glory and an honor in the work that you do for God. You can never even measure its possibilities. You cannot see its end, for work done for God is eternal. Sometimes God takes the life of a man, writes it large and posts it for all of the world to see and to read. He did this with Saul of Tarsus. His work will never end, but neither will yours.

This then must be the manner of your life if it is to be purposeful and worth-while. It must be one of white-heat enthusiasm, never failing and never ending. It must be a life that burns fiercely but does not burn out, and all because of the consciousness that God dwells in your heart and that the "place whereon thou standest is holy ground," for our God is indeed the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. He is eternal, without beginning or end. His purposes are enduring and divine.

Worship Suggestions for September

Theme for the Month: SOURCES OF JESUS' POWER

SEPTEMBER 7, 1947

THE POWER OF FAITH

Zion's Praises, No. 21.

Call to Worship: "O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: because his mercy endureth for ever. It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man. It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes. This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it. Thou art my God, and I will praise thee: thou art my God, I will exalt thee. O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever."—Psalm 118: 1, 8, 9, 24, 28, 29.

Hymn (seated): Saints' Hymnal, No. 100.

Scripture Reading: "And the apostles said unto him, Lord, INCREASE our faith."
—Luke 17: 5.

Instrumental Solo: "Higher Ground,"
No. 241.

Hymn (standing): "Higher Ground,"
No. 241.

Prayer: Of thanks for faith, asking that we might appreciate more fully the power of faith.

Scriptural Suggestions for Talk: "Surely faith is a steppingstone to higher ground. What did Jesus say about faith?"

"... without faith you can do nothing."—Doctrine and Covenants 8: 3.

"... without faith no man pleaseth God."—Doctrine and Covenants 63: 3.

"FAITH, hope, charity, and love, with an eye single to the glory of God, qualifies him for the work."—Doctrine and Covenants 4: 1.

Also: Matthew 6: 27-36, Inspired Version. Luke 17: 6. Matthew 23: 20, Inspired Version.

Leader: Every act of Jesus' ministry testified of his faith—his healings, his miracles, his teachings, the calling of the Twelve, and his dependence upon God for daily care and sustenance. But the great faith that he had in us is well expressed in a brief story.

Story: There is a story told of a talk the angel Gabriel is supposed to have had with Jesus when he returned to his Father. It will help us to understand why Jesus didn't stay longer.

Gabriel said to Jesus, "So you have been down on the earth for a long time?"

"Yes," replied Jesus.

"And you have lived and suffered and died for the people?" asked Gabriel.

"Yes," was the reply.

"And I suppose that everyone knows about what you have done," continued Gabriel.

"No," answered Jesus.

"Well, what arrangements did you make for spreading the news and for carrying on the work which you have begun? Have you any plan?" queried Gabriel.

"Yes," said Jesus. "I gathered a small group of followers and trained them as best I could. I lived with them and worked with them, and now they are going out to tell others. Those others will tell still others, and so the work will go on until the whole world is encompassed."

"But suppose that the little group does not prove faithful," asked Gabriel. "Suppose Peter goes back to his fishing and John gets discouraged and that the others give up their work? Have you any other plan?"

"No," said Jesus. "I have no other plan. I am depending on them."

Instrumental Solo (softly): "My Jesus, I Love Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 12, stanza 1.

Prayer: Of thanks for the faith that Jesus has in us; asking that we may not fail him; that our works may prove that ours is a LIVING FAITH.

Choral Response: (Chorus of Zion's Praises, No. 162.)

He will know, will know

If I give my best.

And knowing he knows

I am truly blest.

SEPTEMBER 14, 1947

THE POWER OF PRAYER

Picture: "Christ in Gethsemane."

Prelude: A medley of prayer hymns, ending with "Take Time to Be Holy," Saints' Hymnal, No. 322.

Call to Worship:

THE SOURCE OF POWER

There is an eye that never sleeps

Beneath the wing at night;

There is an ear that never shuts

When sink the beams of light.

There is an arm that never tires

When human strength gives way;

There is a love that never fails

When earthly loves decay.

That eye is fixed on seraph throngs,

That arm upholds the sky;

That ear is filled with angel songs,

That love is throned on high.

By Camilla Collins

But there's a power which man can wield
When mortal aid is vain;
That eye, that arm, that love to reach,
That listening ear to gain.

That power is prayer, which soars on high,
Through Jesus to the throne,
And moves the hand that moves the world
To bring salvation down.

—James Cowden Wallace.

Or

THE POWER OF PRAYER

Lord, what a change within us one short hour

Spent in thy presence will prevail to make.
What heavy burdens from our bosom take;
What parched grounds refresh as with a shower.

We kneel, and all about us seems to lower;
We rise—and all the distant and the near,
Stand forth in sunny outline brave and clear.

We kneel, how weak!

We rise, how full of POWER!

Why therefore should we do ourselves
this wrong,

Or others, that we are not always strong;
That we are ever overborne with care,
Anxious and troubled when with us is prayer

And joy and strength and courage with thee?

—Richard C. French.

Instrumental Solo (softly): "One Sweet Hour With Jesus Every Day," Saints' Hymnal, No. 318.

Hymn: Same as above, stanzas 1 and 2.

Prayer: Of thanks for prayer; that we might sense during this service the beauty of the prayer life of Jesus.

Talk: The disciples sensed Jesus' power of prayer when they said, "Lord, teach US to pray." They had witnessed his many trips up the mountainside to be alone with his Father. They recognized through the ministry of Jesus that prayer has power to HEAL, COMFORT, ENLIGHTEN, STRENGTHEN, and BLESS. Climax with the need of each one to sense this power of prayer.

Instrumental Solo: Chorus of Zion's Praises, No. 60.

Duet: "My Saviour Is Praying for Me," Zion's Praises, No. 60.

Scriptural Story: "Jesus Prays for the Nephites," 3 Nephi 9: 16-39.

Duet: "Yet Still to His Footstool in Prayer I May Go," Saints' Hymnal, No. 150, stanza 3.

Personal Testimony: Of the power of prayer.

Challenge: Jesus said, "And as I have prayed among you, even so shall ye pray in my church, among my people who do repent and are baptized in my name. Behold I am the light; I have set an example for you. Pray in your families unto the Father, always in my name, that your wives and your children may be blessed."—3 Nephi 8: 48, 49, 52; or Doctrine and Covenants 18: 4, first sentence.

Prayer: That we might share with Jesus his power of prayer, not only at church but daily in our homes; that we might meet him at the family altar; and attempt to help in the building of the kingdom by establishing Zion homes in which prayer is a joyous experience.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1947

THE POWER OF MEDITATION

Picture: "The Head of Christ," Sallman.

Instrumental Prelude: "Come Learn of the Meek and Lowly," Saints' Hymnal, No. 258.

Call to Worship: "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord."—Psalm 122: 1.

Instrumental Solo: "Come Ye Apart," Saints' Hymnal, No. 108.

Prayer: Of thanks for the house of worship and the Sabbath that we can come to meditate and worship.

Scripture Reading: At one time God commanded Elijah: "Go forth and stand upon the mount before the Lord. And, behold, the Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord; but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind was an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake; And after the earthquake a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a STILL SMALL VOICE."—I Kings 19: 11, 12; or Doctrine and Covenants 131: 1.

Brief Talk: Jesus sought to meditate that he might hear the still, small voice by the seashore (Matthew 13: 1), or upon the mountains (Matthew 4: 1, Inspired Version). Many times Jesus asked his disciples to depart while he went into the mountains to pray and meditate.

Jesus recognized the power of meditation, for, to the Nephites, he gave this instruction: "Therefore, go ye into your homes and PONDER upon the things which I have said, and ask of the father, in my name, that ye may understand; and prepare your minds for the morrow, and I come unto you again."—3 Nephi 8: 3.

Hymn: "Come Ye Apart," No. 108, stanzas 3 and 5.

Scriptural Challenge for Meditation:

"Be STILL and KNOW that I am God."—Psalm 46: 10a.

Instrumental Solo (softly): "This God Is the God We Adore," Saints' Hymnal, No. 100, or "My God, How Wonderful Thou Art," No. 133.

Prayer: That we may each one, as Jesus, find time for daily meditation, and testify of its power; that each one might be able to hear the still, small voice which gives light and understanding, and use this light in the building of his kingdom.

Benediction: "Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and my redeemer."—Psalm 19: 14.

THE POWER OF STUDY

Setting: Arrange a picture: "Christ Among the Doctors," "The Boy Christ," or "The Head of Christ," and the Three Standard Books.

Instrumental Prelude: "Wonderful Words," Saints' Hymnal, No. 335.

Call to Worship: Father, "Open thou mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law. . . . Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path."—Psalm 119: 18, 105.

Instrumental Response (softly): Chorus, No. 335.

Leader: Let us sing the chorus, "Beautiful words, wonderful words," after each stanza is read.

Reader: The words of Hymn 335 (with chorus sung by congregation between each stanza). After last chorus is sung, read the words of Hymn 404, stanzas 1, 2, 4.

Leader: Remain standing for response.

Prayer: Of thanks for the light of God's word; asking that we might more fully appreciate the power of study.

Instrumental Response (softly): Chorus of No. 335.

Scriptural Suggestions: (From which to organize a brief but inspiring talk according to the needs of the group.)

The influence of study in the life of Jesus:

1. In youth—
Luke 2: 40
Luke 2: 46, 47, Inspired Version
2. In his ministry.
 - a. Many times Jesus gave this ready reply, "It is written."
Matthew 4: 4
Mark 11: 17 (verse 19, Inspired Version)
 - b. He admonished the Jews: "Search the scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me."—John 5: 39 (verse 40, Inspired Version).

3. In his concern over our stewardship of time.

a. WHAT to study:

Doctrine and Covenants 10: 10; 85: 21. (All these things to be studied in connection with the building of the kingdom.)

b. HOW to study:

Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36a; 9: 3. (Oliver Cowdery's experience in translating.)

Climax talk with Alma 12: 1-8. (The sons of Mosiah study with prayer and fasting.)

Personal Testimony: Of power of study.

Vocal Challenge (duet): "The Scriptures," Zion's Praises, No. 178.

Prayer (all standing): That each one, as stewards of God, might search the Scriptures diligently with prayer and fasting to KNOW the word of God that he might have the power and authority of God, that with this power obtained through STUDY each might do his part in the building of Zion.

Closing Hymn: "Onward to Zion," Saints' Hymnal, No. 436, stanza 2.

Note: You may choose to use the picture, "The Light of the Bible," by Bisschop, and substitute an interpretation of it in place of the personal testimony.

Reunion—A Family Affair

"Reunion," they said with a tone of reverence. But to me, a new member who had never attended a reunion, it seemed hardly worth the effort. It meant traveling over 300 miles, and camping out with small children seemed too much trouble. Then, too, the word "reunion" to me meant a family reunion. The average church member I knew had brothers, sisters, aunts, uncles, and cousins scattered over the state—and for them, reunion really was a family affair. But I had no relatives in the church, and our children weren't old enough for membership. Why should I go to someone else's family reunion?

But then, as I said, I was a new member and hadn't yet discovered all my relatives. After attending several reunions and district conferences, I find that I, too, have many sisters and brothers.

Latter Day Saints, in their better moments, are the happiest people in the world. It's a wonderful experience when they meet together in those better moments, for then their Heavenly Father meets with them. Reunion is a family affair, and what a happy family!

A Covenant With Life

By Nettie Chappelow Lake

Just how life was begun has been the subject of inquiry through the ages. The question is of value in that once known it would of necessity throw much light on the meaning of life. The fact is that the world is uninformed as to the origin of life, except for what is given by revelation.

And yet, life is odd. All of us, so far as we now know, were born without our consent. Not one of us could control in the slightest just what kind of person he might be or who should be his parents. Only once have I found anything offsetting the priceless value of having been born and that was the observation of Jesus that it were better not to have been born than to have offended one of his little ones—which broadly means that in his mind life has purpose and meaning.

To be born is one thing; to keep alive is another—which means that our task is to stay here, and that is no small undertaking. But most of us do pull through. With the development of hygienic undertakings, the possibilities of survival, our chances of living have been greatly increased. The adjustment of ourselves to the world is, however, a primary concern. And it is adjustment rather than compulsion.

Can one forget that a certain sacred book reminds us that God made the world and looking upon it was pleased with his own handiwork and called his creation "good." And can we not, therefore, remember that this is God's world, and being good, we should not be afraid to go around in it? This is health of body and of mind. And good health we must have if we are to stay here very long. We can have good health if we live and follow the precepts of our Heavenly Father.

In staying alive, we must be kept busy all the days of our lives. Working keeps our bodies active since exercise is a requirement for health. Without work we are no use to God's world. The things we strive for in work enables us to survive the existent vicissitudes of life.

Another factor in the covenant of life is this: we are trustees of life, not only of our own, but of human life on this planet. We are responsible for the continuity of life, for the people and the kind of people who are yet to live. Here we are trustees of posterity, not for material or immaterial, nor for the physical and spiritual resources alone; but even more than these is our trusteeship for life itself.

Here enters naturally our concern with marriage and the home, both of which are being tried as we have not known them to be for generations. Around them has been thrown the tenderest and bravest thought of mankind, a sanctity which lies at the very basis of Christian religion—"and they twain shall be one flesh," a sanctity which undergirds our present civilization. And if one might become a bit sentimental in an endeavor to keep one's covenant with life, remember James Whitcomb Riley's little poem, known and loved throughout the land, "That Old Sweetheart of Mine."

Still another factor in this covenant of life deals with our fitness to live, and this presents the problem of education. The world into which we come is more or less a fixed affair. It is like a large apartment house where people are constantly arriving and departing, the house remaining very much as it was. We start life with varying degrees of advantages and disadvantages as to backgrounds. The world makes available very much the same privileges and opportunities for all who can reach them. It is simply a question of our willingness to meet life on its own terms and determinedly face the issues which arise. In a day like this no one can truthfully feel aggrieved. If we get away to a poor start we must remember that thousands have recovered from any disadvantage with which they began; and there are many heroic stories of people who seem to have every right to surrender and quit the game, but whose courageous achievements are a constant inspiration to us. Now, get ready to live and keep your covenant with life.

Education primarily is of a two-fold character—acquired information and mental power. It is one thing to have acquired information, it is another to know how to use it. It is one thing to have acquired facility of hand or brain in the doing of things; it is quite another matter altogether to relate all one may do to the development of one's own soul and the souls of his fellow men, who are his companions by the way.

The last and most important factor in the covenant of life is that we must remember that God is the primary fact of the world. This is the foundation of the Christian religion, and not of religion alone but of understanding the world in which we live. It is the basic law of the universe. One can thoroughly sympathize with these adventurous souls in pursuit of truth, religious or unreligious, who cannot accept revelations as a sufficient basis of authority. We shall certainly know more about our world because of them, but the very best any of them can do, by whatever course they follow, will at last be a confirmation of the fact of God, the first fact, the primary source of the world's existence. Christianity is content to do with revelation and therefore provides a philosophy of life on which to build. "In the beginning God." Here is an adequate authority for all existence and the fact of God, of all things known to us, is the best supported and the most universally accepted. On this is built the church and its multitudinous activities, the fact of God, requiring and receiving allegiance.

To the accomplishment of such a covenant with life, God has not left us without a witness to show how it can be done, having sent his own Son in the likeness of flesh that we through him might have everlasting life. It is therefore just as futile not to start at all, as starting to make this journey of life without the aid of the only One who has known life and how to master it; who on his own authority declares that he came that we might have life, and that we might have it more abundantly. For in him is life, in him is truth, in him is the way.

There is only one inference in a statement of this kind; that is, apart from him we do not possess life abundantly—even more, we do not possess Life at all—we do not know what it is to live. It is the same as not having been born. One can readily understand that, coming into the world, Jesus came to do something which otherwise was not being done; to give something which otherwise was not to be had. It is simply that Christianity is a way of life; or to put it another way, Christianity is the only way if one would live. Of course one may exist in a different way—follow one's own lead, or another—but that does not prove he has come into Life.

Behold the great reconstruction of life itself, redeemed in the assurance of newness of life, and unto life everlasting.

The Church at Flora, Illinois

Remarks of Rex W. Dale, principal of the Flora, Illinois, High School, given at the laying of the cornerstone of the new Reorganized Church in Flora.

I AM VERY glad to be here today and join with you in the happy occasion in which you are about to lay the cornerstone of your new church home. I am glad for several reasons. First, because I know a number of your young people by reason of association with them in our high school. I have found them to be a fine group—serious-minded, ranking high in scholarship, and co-operating well with fellow students and faculty members. Their attitude reflects superior home training and a good religious background. We shall look forward to their further achievements in our school. Then, too, I am happy to be here because I am somewhat familiar with your movement. As I read my history, I find that your people have always had a wholesome attitude toward education. I believe that your church received the first—or one of the first charters for a university in Illinois, which was to have been established in Nauvoo.

The fine building you are erecting will be an asset to our community. It fits nicely with the architecture of the near-by schools and will add to the value of the real estate of this community. However, the important thing is that it will add to the spiritual growth of our city. Some few days ago, I read an excerpt from a college publication labeled, "Education to Meet the Challenge of Tomorrow." I should like to add one word to that title so it would read, "Christian Education to Meet the Challenge of Tomorrow." I do not believe we will ever reach the peace we want—the peace we talk about—until we take God into our meetings and ask for his guidance in all things. I do not find this being done by our leaders as they meet around tables to discuss world affairs and attempt to arrive at a satisfactory agreement whereby people throughout the world may work together as fellow men. Too often our statesmen rely upon their own individual judgment instead of looking to God for inspiration and wisdom and guidance.

Today, as never before, man holds his destiny in his own hands. Within his grasp is enough knowledge to enable him to release forces in nature so enormous that they render insignificant all past conceptions of man-made power. If they are mishandled, they can speedily destroy whatever hopes and aspirations humanity has ever known. But, if used advantageously, these forces can create a world of opportunities inconceivably rich and varied. Man is at the crossroads. He must make a choice and make it soon. President Robert Hutchins of the University of Chicago says that he gives mankind three years to prepare to work out his destiny. There are, he maintains, enough atomic bombs to destroy every large city in the world. Bombs that make those used at Hiroshima and Nagasaki seem trivial by comparison, and, in addition to those, there is the dreaded germ warfare. This is a sad commentary upon our civilization. Here we are faced by boundless achievement on one hand and certainty of violent disaster on the other. How mankind fares will depend on how thorough his knowledge is and how wisely he uses this information. What man does with his discovering of atomic energy depends upon his choice between good and evil. If he accepts the scriptural quotation, "Man shall not live by bread alone," and the fact that he is placed upon this earth for a far nobler purpose—a life of service to others—he will use this great, new power to reduce the drudgery of hard work, to relieve the suffering from disease, and to eliminate the frustrations that keep people and nations apart. This can be accomplished only when people are willing to look to their Creator for enlightenment and put into practical living the precepts as taught in his word.

In closing, I compliment you for having taken a forward step in the advancing of his kingdom in this place. Your church will soon be materially finished, but you will continue to build. Your tools will be the minds and souls of men, women, and children.

Dealing With the Erring

2. Labor

WHENEVER an offense has been committed and has been recognized by the offended, it is the duty of the offended one to try to bring about reconciliation. It is unlawful to have any motivation in making such an attempt other than that which grows out of a spirit of love and concern for the erring brother or sister. Only a desire to save the offender from his sins should prompt one to point out the fault of another. If there is a desire to embarrass or belittle, then the approach is unlawful and should be postponed until through prayer and worship and meditation the proper attitude can be genuinely achieved.

The first step in labor, then, is the development of the proper attitude toward the offender. Immediately upon the acquisition of such an attitude, which carries with it the complete removal of any desire to expose or to punish the offender, the decision should be made as to the best time to approach the supposed offender. In many instances, the development of the proper attitude will result in a decision to "forgive and forget," and the case is closed. But if a real offense has been committed, from which an offender is in need of being saved, it will be necessary for the offended party to discuss the matter with the offender, because to fail to do so will be tantamount to abandoning him to the power of his sinning. Only upon the development of the proper attitude of concern for the offender can the decision be made as to whether the matter should be discussed or forgotten.

The second step is to go to the offender alone, and without having stated the matter of grievance to anyone else, kindly explain to him what is considered to be his error, and seek in a peaceful way for a settlement. To demand apology suggests strongly that there is an unhealthy attitude. Magnanimity is indicative of the proper attitude. If this private discussion succeeds, the erring one is saved from his sin. He is also saved from the reproach which he must suffer if his offense were publicly known. The statements of the law directing this procedure are:

"Go and tell him his fault between him and thee alone.¹

"Thou shalt take him or her between him or her and thee alone and if he or she confess thou shalt be reconciled."²

If private conversation is ineffective in bringing about reconciliation, the offended must then make a second visit, this time taking with him one or two persons who have heard nothing of the trouble. These witnesses should be told nothing at all about the matter except in the presence of the offender. The law states: "take with thee one or two more."³ "If such effort shall fail, the complainant shall take with him an officer of the church or member, as may be practicable, but in no case shall it be a party in interest, and shall again seek an adjustment of the matter, stating it before the witness only in the presence of said offender."⁴

Should this second attempt at reconciliation prove unsuccessful, the commandment is to "tell it unto the church."⁵ "Thou shalt deliver him or her up unto the church, not to the members but to the elders."⁶ "After the full performance of labor . . . if such labor be without avail, the proper officer, if a church action, or the one offended, if a member action, may file complaint with the administrative officer having jurisdiction of both parties."⁷

There are a number of common failures in the approach to the problem of labor which should be carefully guarded against. The first of these is the tendency to seek to secure a reconciliation when one is angry. This is not only unlawful, but is likely to increase the estrangement rather than to restore harmony. It is human nature for anger to arise when one is injured, but this must be removed before the injured one is in a position to seek reconciliation.

Offended persons must discipline themselves to make sure that the labor they perform is not done in a perfunctory manner, keeping the letter of the law but ignoring the spirit of it. Furthermore, to make these visits with a view to punish a brother for his offense by getting him "cut off," or in the hope that it will be possible later on to legally expose his errors to the public makes the visitor himself an offender, for such an attitude is in itself out of harmony with the spirit of the law. The visit must be made with the sole purpose of helping the brother to see his fault and turn therefrom. Anything less than this should not be termed labor, and should not be so accepted by the courts.

Care should be used, also, to avoid taking as a witness on the second visit, any person who might be a party in interest, or who might not be impartial in his judgment. The witness should not be told about the trouble except in the presence of the offender. It is important that the offender shall not feel that the witness is prejudiced by previous information or by any particular friendship or other influencing relations with the complainant. If the offending person has such feeling about the witness, he might be restrained in his conversation about the difficulty, and the reality and effectiveness of the labor performed would be invalidated to this extent.

Labor should be diligent and timely. In some types of offense, it is necessary that a sufficient time elapse so that anger can subside and an unheated conversation can be held. In other kinds of offenses, it is best to make the first attempt at reconciliation as soon as possible. If for example, two brethren have a business dealing and one discovers that an error has been made to his injury, which error appears to have been intentional, the time to make a visit or the correction of such error would be immediately, as delay would tend to justify the offender. The time to perform labor must be determined both by the nature of the difficulty and the dispositions and immediate feelings of the persons involved. No effort can correctly be called labor which casts aside all diligence in the matter and merely makes the two attempts that are required in the law as quickly as possible. Sometimes it is necessary to make several calls before it is fair to adjudge that labor has been performed. The Lord says to "go and tell him his fault between him and thee alone," and if, when a member seeks to make this visit, he finds the offender in anger and unwilling to meet him, or in the association of other persons from which he cannot conveniently free himself at the time, or busily engaged in some work or duty which he cannot leave, or so limited in time that he cannot receive the visitor, it would be the duty of the member to repeat his attempt as many times as necessary to give him the opportunity of talking over with his brother the matter of difficulty. Failing this, the member must assure himself that his brother was deliberately planning to evade the meeting.

One of the greatest hindrances to the erring member becoming reconciled to the church and to the offended is the reproach placed upon him by the circulation of his wrong to the people of the community. If the offense is a public one, the offender can blame no one but himself for being reproached; but if his offense be private, no person has the right to make it public except as it becomes necessary through due process of law. "If any shall offend in secret he or she shall be rebuked in secret, that he or she may have opportunity to confess in secret to him or her whom he or she has offended, and to God, that the church may not speak reproachfully to him or her. And thus shall ye conduct in all things."⁸

Sometimes it occurs that labor in person is made difficult or impracticable because the parties are separated by great geographical distance or by other obstacles over which they have no control. In such cases, it is permissible for labor to be performed by correspondence. Such correspondence should be by registered mail with return receipt so that the offender is protected against action about which he knew nothing, and so that the complainant will have evidence that such attempts actually have been made.⁹

the elimination of sin. If possible, this should be done without removing the sinner also. Thus every member becomes, when he is an injured party, an administrator of the law. In most instances, he has a task of administration to perform that none else can do for him. Except to act as a witness, none else can even assist him, until he has exhausted his own ability to settle the difficulty. Only when this diligent effort has been made, with prayer and earnest concern for the erring one, can he rightfully say that labor has been performed in accordance with the requirements of the law of Christ.

HERALD PUBLISHING HOUSE

"Let Nothing Separate You"

THERE is a story in one of the McGuffey Readers of a father, who, in his declining years, was concerned about the welfare of his twelve sons. He knew, from years of observation and experience, the perils that faced these lads. They were good boys, and he had been a good father; yet, he feared something might happen to separate them after he was gone. He had seen that happen in other families, and he knew it could happen in his own.

So he gave the matter great consideration. Finally, he decided upon a plan calculated to impress these boys with the importance of living in harmony and complete unity.

First, he collected twelve sticks of wood of equal length and size; then he called his sons to him.

After they had assembled, the father took the twelve sticks, bound them tightly together with cords and gave the bundle to the son nearest him to break. The lad tried with all his might to accomplish this feat but failed; so the father asked him to let the next boy try it.

One after another these sons—and they were stalwart sons—tried to break the band, but they could not; and so finally returned it to the father unbroken. Whereupon he cut the cords that held the bundle, and easily broke the sticks one by one. Then he proceeded to explain this lesson to them.

"My sons," he said, "as long as you love one another and remain true and loyal to each other, no one can destroy you or break you; but if you allow suspicion, greed, hate, or any of the powers of evil to separate you, then your enemies can destroy you with ease. So remember this lesson, and let nothing separate you one from another—then you will prosper and grow strong."

This same lesson might just as well have been given by God to the patriarchs of old, by Israel to his twelve sons, or by Jesus the Christ to the twelve apostles. It is certain that this admonition was given to the First Presidency, the Quorum of Twelve, and the Quorum of High Priests at Lamoni on April 15, 1894, through President Joseph Smith.

It is contained in the concluding paragraph of section 122 of the Doctrine and Covenants, and reads as follows:

"Continue in steadfastness and faith. Let nothing separate you from each other and the work whereunto you have been called; and I will be with you by my Spirit and presence of power unto the end."

Although given to members of the priesthood, this counsel is to all of those who are of the household of faith.

Absolute unity among the members of the church of Christ can only be had by living the law. Living the law is the work to which all are called. It embraces all the virtues—all that is good. It includes no tenet that will disrupt society or estrange man from God.

The strength of the church depends upon the unity of its members. The strength of the church depends upon obedience to the law—the work of God.

Satan knows these things are true and exerts his full power to the task of drawing the disciples of Christ from the paths of truth. He knows that every sin he can induce a Christian to commit is a possible means of stirring up contention among the members—of weakening the individual and slowing up the work of God. He is shrewd, clever, implacable, and a hard-working enemy of God and the church. He is a real entity—and not a myth.

In the vigor of your youth, or the strength of full manhood or womanhood, does your soul cry for a high challenge; a job worthy of your best; a task that will test your strength, your courage, patience, self-control, fidelity, faith, humility, mercy, and love? Do you really want to know how big you are, and how big you can become? Do you want to be your best self? If so—then address yourself to the work of God. His work—the business of living in conformity with all the laws that embrace truth—is no small task. It means a fight to the finish with Satan, and a fight to the finish with your baser self. It also means the most wonderful victory of all (if you succeed)—victory over self. It is the biggest job we can tackle—it is Zion-building.

Have you even looked into the mirror of self-appraisal and watched yourself go by? Have you ever been able to review a single day, and at its close say, "This day I have lived as God would have me live—this day I completely ruled my spirit, and wholly obeyed the law"?

Every time we lose our temper, cheat a neighbor, bear false witness, or commit any act of transgression, we lose contact with God; we "separate ourselves from each other, and from the work whereunto we have been called." Every time this happens, we stand in need of repentance.

Yes, the work of God is our highest challenge. We who accept it ally ourselves with a race of champions, the sons of God; we become distinctive—a peculiar people set apart. We may lose some of our battles, but we will win the war. For God will be with us to the end. That is his promise and our assurance. To this fellowship and work may we consecrate our lives and "continue in steadfastness and faith . . . unto the end" under the blessing of God.

Appeal

By Arthur A. Oakman

There is a view which dwells in God,
Pervasive, and appealing;
Existence all ruled by its rod
While deeps of love concealing.

A longing heart on high is set,
Broken intelligently;
Its riches withheld in stern regret
By man's base contumely.

God's good will is angels' theme,
Pointed manward ever,
But God alone, nor purposed dream
Binds heaven and earth together!

Apart they dwell in love and grief
While still redemption's lay
In Christ portrayed—for man's relief—
Is shunned for sin's vile way.

O Thou! Who art! In light sublime,
Move on these hearts of stone;
Engrave within thy grief divine—
Again for us atone!

New heaven and earth shall then be placed
With prophets' light—within;
Emerging as each soul is graced
By righteous discipline.

Elder Amos Milton Chase

ELDER AMOS MILTON CHASE came of a pioneer family as both the Chases and Silsbys came over from England in the seventeenth century: Aquila Chase in 1660 and the Silsbys in 1628. His father, Amos S. Chase, was born in Bristol, Vermont, in 1820. His mother, Sarah Silsby, was born in New York, in 1823. Brother Chase's grandfather was the founder of the town of Lincoln in what was then the wilds of Vermont. Salmon P. Chase, who was Secretary of the Treasury under Lincoln and later Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, had a common great-grandfather with Amos S. Chase.

Elder Chase's father, Amos S. Chase, was baptized into the early church, was ordained an elder in 1840 and was sent as a missionary to Maine that same year. Both of Elder Chase's parents were living in Nauvoo shortly after its establishment. Sarah Silsby Chase sang in the temple choir. Elder Chase's family left for western Iowa about the time of the exodus to Utah. His father was the first white man to take up a claim on the Little Sioux River. The Chases were among the first settlers in Harrison County, Iowa, and their oldest child was the first or second white child born in that county. Amos S. Chase established a mill about forty miles away, so was often away from home. His wife, a typical frontier woman, staved off a party of twenty hungry Indians in war paint, set a wolf trap, dragged in trap and wolf and finished him off with a hatchet. She stated that she was never afraid but once in her life, and the leader of the Indian war party cited above left her in peace because she was a "brave squaw." They associated with Charles B. Thompson at Preparation, but differed from him. Later they went to Nebraska, across from Yankton, South Dakota, where Amos became a member of the first territorial legislature. But at the time of the Spring Lake Massacre by the Indians, they returned to Harrison County. On the hurried trip back, with the Indians close behind, Sarah Chase sat in the buckboard wagon with a child on her lap and two rifles cocked across her knees. There in Harrison County, near Calhoun, Amos Milton Chase was born on December 28, 1862. One of his earliest memories was that of his mother standing in the doorway of the log cabin singing, "I Came to the Spot Where the Two Martyrs Lay." In 1862, she was baptized into the Reorganization, and his father was baptized and ordained an elder in 1863. Amos was baptized on July 17, 1875, at Little Sioux.

conducted by her brother. There they learned to read music by syllables, and this early training laid the foundation for a musical ability which was to stand him in good stead in his missionary work. He was able to improvise chords to fill out a melody and to transpose music into any key at a moment's notice. In his early street preaching days, when he was alone and without an organ, he would conduct singing schools as a means of getting a hearing for his message, especially among the young people.

As a young man, he taught a neighboring country school. At the age of twenty-one, he went with his brother to Omaha to study photography. Not long afterwards, he moved to Lamoni where he continued as a photographer. He was a member of the Student Society which met at the home of Marietta Walker. He was also choir director for a time in the church as well as in the church school. With J. A. Gunsolley, he helped to organize church schools in the surrounding territory. On May 1, 1887, the young choir leader and the soprano soloist, Eliza France, were joined in the holy bonds of matrimony by President W. W. Blair.

On June 5, 1892, he was ordained a priest and felt strongly urged to offer himself for the missionary work of the church. He worked with the Decatur District officers for a season. In the fall of 1895, he arranged to take some courses at the newly-opened Graceland College, but he was called to labor as a full-time appointee and, after some local work, in April, 1897, he was sent to Oregon and Washington where he worked with Elder Hiram L. Holt. He was ordained an elder on February 21, 1897. In 1900, he was called to the office of seventy. He continued to labor in the northwestern States until 1902, when he was appointed for two years to Utah.

He made a careful study of the situation there and of the teachings of the Mormon church. He had received corroboration from an atheist of the truth of the story which his mother told him of the situation in Nauvoo in the 1840's, and this knowledge was a source of strength and power to him in his labors in this field. This was to be a prominent part of his missionary work, since he returned to Utah again in 1910, where he served until 1913, and finished his work with three years there from 1929 to 1932. It was in Utah that he sang and preached on the street and established himself as a master of this type of ministry. Reverberations of his work there reached as far as Germany.

The first sixteen years of his ministry, from 1897 to 1913, were in the west and included California, Colorado, Idaho, and Oklahoma. He and his family were together as often as they could be, and all assisted in the work. Even a five-year-old child distributed tracts. Later, the four formed the Chase quartette with Elder Chase or his daughter at the organ. Between 1910 and 1913, his son, Charles, a priest, did missionary work with his father in southern Utah. Then he and the daughter, Alice, attended the University of Utah, singing and taking part in the services on the street.

The years 1913 to 1916 were spent in western New York, and 1916 to 1918 in northeastern Missouri. Then, for over two and a half years, Brother and Sister Chase were in charge of the Children's Home. Shortly before the dissolution of the home in 1920, Elder Chase was appointed to the New York and Philadelphia District. In 1922, he was appointed to Fremont District. In 1923, he was ordained a high priest, and in 1925 was sent to Hilo, Hawaii. On his return, he spent two years on a farm to rebuild his health and was then assigned to Nauvoo District with headquarters in Fort Madison, Iowa. Finally he was again sent to Utah. Because of failing health, he came to Independence about 1933. In April of 1934, he was superannuated.

Upon his arrival in Independence, Elder Chase began to look for missionary opportunities. He inaugurated summer missionary meetings on the lawns. He became supervisor of district seven, and threw himself into the group work with all the pastoral zeal which he had formerly expended in outlying districts. He taught a church school class at Stone Church for some time, and prepared an outline for study of the Inspired Version. He raised large victory gardens during the war. In every way, he continued to assist in the work of the church as much as his health would permit.

He took a great pleasure in the fact that those whom he had baptized were well converted, and many of the young men were engaged in the work under general church appointment. Many testified that he had converted them though someone else had performed the baptism. He continued to lend his very complete notebook on the Utah question. His only regret in his last years was that he was not able to do more for the church. After nearly a year's illness, he passed peacefully to his reward on the morning of May 17, this year. He had always expressed confidence that death would only mean passing on to larger fields for the gospel.

Let's Co-operate

By FRED YOUNG

MANY CO-OPERATIVE movements have been started, but most of them have failed. The Brook Farm movement of a hundred years ago was a failure, and the large citrus co-operatives of today are only partially successful. Here in Columbia, Missouri, we have a different sort of co-operative—one that cannot fail. It is a service organization, the foundation of which is brotherly love.

Co-operatives usually require an immediate investment of money before membership is granted. Those interested in the plan must buy something to be shared, and if the movement fails, everyone suffers a financial loss. There is no money invested in our co-operative. The only investments are time and skill. These cannot be taken away from us by others. The only way we can lose them is by not using them. If you invest money in a co-operative, your returns will be in money. Should the amount of your investment be small, your returns are limited. Most organizations have hired help to administer these investments and returns, thus reducing the returns to the members. In our co-operative, we "invest" service and receive the personal satisfaction of having helped a fellow member. In addition to this satisfaction, we improve our skills through use. No one's returns are limited except by the amount he is willing to do.

Members of most co-operatives are interested in one line of work only. Ours is different; its personnel includes a doctor, a mechanic, a cabinetmaker, a floriculturist, a home economist, and others. Not all are professionals, but every man's need offers an opportunity for improvement.

The co-operatives you have read about probably followed a carefully outlined plan in which agreements were drawn up and papers signed, with each member knowing exactly what to do and what to expect. Again, our movement is different. We have no plan of work or formal organization. "Service for service" is our motto. The return service may be to someone other than the person who did the initial work. This is not just being friendly; it's being friendly with a purpose.

When Dr. John Blumenschein came to Columbia, there were patients waiting in line for him to "hang out his shingle." But, starting from scratch, he didn't have an office ready for business. The word wasn't long passing through the group that he could use some help. We all pitched in building, painting, and cleaning. Sometime later, when Hugh Crownover hurt his ankle, Dr.

B. returned the service by treating his leg.

The effects of this program have already begun to be noticeable. I have flowers that I wouldn't have otherwise had, and the Pratts have new kitchen cabinets. One of the greatest compensations of the co-op has been the effect on personalities. You can't help someone without becoming a better person yourself.

We believe our plan offers excellent opportunities for missionary work with people we might otherwise never reach. Through our co-operative service, we go into their homes and, by our actions, show them what kind of people our church is composed of. When we work together, the discussion invariably turns to religion, and we have a chance to let them know what we believe. Doing things for people often melts the ice and provides a basis for carefully-planned missionary work.

Exchanging services has caused a change in our outlook on life. When we see how much satisfaction others get from doing things for us, we want to help them. We are also stimulated to improve our skills and learn new ones. Frank Pratt helps me when I do cabinetwork, and I help Ben Vance when he works with flowers.

few, as yet, due to our lack of free time and the small number interested, but, as time goes on, we expect to see the organization grow. In the future, we may set up a directory in which our needs and abilities are posted. Of course, no one can spend all his time working for others, but a lot can be accomplished in a few hours each week.

Why don't you try it in your community? Begin by helping your neighbor, and remember — every man's your neighbor.

Young Love

Hush, heart, be still! Thou knowest not
To what thy eagerness
Might lead—be calm, let nothing stir
Nor make thy poise the less.

How couldst thou know that all is false?
Thy hopes and dreams are young.
Thou canst not know that Ships of Life
Are wrecked by idle tongue.

And shoals of Fate wait ever near
When surging tempests rise
Through which, a barque, to safely sail
Must have a skipper wise.

Be young and gay, but cautious, too;
Let mind thy throbbings rule,
That thou mayst not be grieved at last
To find thou art a fool!

—LOUISE.

Why climb a mountain? The question has been asked many times and indeed is a hard one to answer in a few words.

The famous climber, Mallory, when asked why he wanted to climb Mt. Everest, gave the simple classic answer, "Because it is there." That towering mass of rock and ice presented to him an irresistible challenge to climb and conquer. The land above the treeline, with its fantastic towers and peaks reaching into the blue, offers to those who climb a sense of freedom and true joy of living seldom found elsewhere, except through devotion and prayer to the Creator of this universe. In the Canadian Rockies, the climber can tread ground never before trodden and find limitless scope for adventure in higher places. Likewise, in prayer, he reaches the loftier peaks through lifting his thoughts above the turmoil of everyday living.

Each day is another step in the great mountain of life we climb. At first, we are helped over the rough and uneven surfaces by our parents, but halfway up, when the rocks become more formidable and the peaks more jagged, we're left to struggle by ourselves. Those loose stones we slip and fall on determine what type of personality and character we will build. It isn't easy to get up with bruised knees and aching shoulders, smile bravely at the world, and try the same things we failed at a short while before, perhaps only to fail and have to try again. But success does not come to those who merely stand by watching for a chance to get something for nothing; were that the case, it would mean little. It's only when you put long hours of endurance, hardships, and a few tears into attaining your goal that you learn what real success is.

On the mountain slope, you either climb higher or slip lower; no one stands still. Time taken for rest is lost time that cannot be regained. It's easy, of course, to become absorbed in the mass of falling rock and rubble that those who climb higher stumble over and step above. The real test lies in overcoming every obstacle.

Perhaps the upward ascent is broken occasionally by hidden valleys and beautiful canyons. Sometimes the ridges are quite broken or narrow, and the ledge beneath the ridge must be resorted to. Sometimes there are towering peaks, row on row, marching up to the horizon.

A truly great climber doesn't start with poor equipment. He plans very carefully all of his supplies so that he can adapt himself to any circumstances. Nor does he rush madly up the mountain, giving no thought to which course he should take in order to reach the top in the shortest time and with the fewest blunders.

Are you planning your everyday living just as carefully? Are you going to make a record climb and reach the highest point. Or are you going to be content to stop halfway and spend the rest of your life in the broken rock left by more ambitious climbers?

LETTERS

Thanks From Norway

Since I last sent a letter of thanks from the Saints in Norway to the Saints in America for the many packages of clothing sent us, several more packages have come to my address. It is impossible for me to write to each person who had a part in this worthy project, so I take this means of thanking each one most sincerely. Though nearly everything in Norway is still rationed, conditions are well with us now. We have plenty to eat, and there is some clothing to be purchased. I would, therefore, suggest that if there are others who still wish to send packages, that they send them to the Saints in Holland and Germany. I believe that they need things more than we do. Once more let me thank you for all that you have done for us.

THE NORWEGIAN SAINTS,

The Word of Wisdom

The Word of Wisdom is neglected. We have only to look about to see how far we have gone astray. With ill health we hurt our church, our community, and our families. We eat, and our bodily needs are not satisfied, no matter how sumptuous the meal may seem to be. Foods are robbed of essentials for our health. A majority of us are suffering from varying degrees of malnutrition, or "hidden hunger."

Starvation in the midst of plenty? As individuals, we can corroborate the facts in our own intermittent or chronic lack of health. Three causes are recognized for the inadequacy of our food: 1, the depletion of our soils by the abuse of our land; 2, incorrect processing of food for the sake of profit; 3, wrong methods of cooking.

God hasten the day when mothers will care for the health of their families more righteously and intelligently in obedience to the Word of Wisdom.

To Members in Albuquerque

One of our nurse graduates at the San, Sister S. Rosemary Bishop, R.N., 1004 Grand, Emmetsburg, Iowa, writes that her mother has been directed by physicians to seek a dry climate. The vicinity of Albuquerque, New Mexico, has been recommended. Sister Bishop would like to know of any church members who may be living in that area or near it.

From an Isolated Member

Many times I have thought of writing a letter for the Herald. After reading such helpful letters from others, it seems selfish to always receive and never contribute.

I was baptized twenty years ago and received my patriarchal blessing soon after. Since then, I have had many trials; being isolated from all church privileges has made them hard to bear. However, the promises in my blessing have enabled me to carry on, and God has been merciful.

My father, William Rumel, was one of the early missionaries. With Brothers Caffal, Gamet, and others, he preached throughout Nebraska. Memories of him and his loyalty to the church have helped me many times.

If there are any members near Reed Point, Billings, or Columbus, Montana, I shall appreciate their writing me. My daughter lives in that vicinity and is anxious to meet with the people of her faith. Pray for us that the way will be opened so that we will again be permitted to enjoy the fellowship of the Saints.

Note of Thanks

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Fisher of Birsay, Saskatchewan, wish to express their gratitude to the Saints in Independence and Canada for prayers in behalf of their daughter, Iola Fisher, during her recent illness. She has been greatly blessed and is making a satisfactory recovery.

A Divine Healing

About five years ago, while employed by the War Department in Washington, D. C., I was seriously injured in an automobile accident. I received cuts, bruises, a concussion, several fractures, and a spinal injury. During those first few days and nights, I indeed felt that I was "in the valley." Only God knows of the suffering I endured and the discouragement I felt when I learned that I might never walk again. The elders came many times, and often I would feel complete relief from pain while they were administering to me. I can also remember the strength I received through a friendly handclasp, the cheer of a friendly smile, the encouragement of a card or letter from across the miles, and the peaceful quiet in the midst of a ward of suffering people when prayer was offered at my bedside.

After many miserable weeks, the cast was removed from my body, and ten days later I took my first step. The doctors were amazed. God in his infinite mercy healed my broken body. I am thankful now for each step I take; I am also grateful for the lesson in patience I learned and for my increased faith.

Since then I have undergone two major operations with the renewed assurance of God's loving watch care. It is my desire to live a life worthy of these blessings.

A Catholic Convert

I was a Catholic until I joined the Reorganized Church ten years ago. Conversion was a long process, and I wonder now at the patience of those who told me of the gospel; they certainly didn't give up easily. After my baptism, I remained a Latter Day Saint in name only for nearly eight years. I think I owe my awakening in this work to the little group of Saints in Bagley, Minnesota. When I first met with them, they were needing a church school teacher for the junior class. Although my pupils knew more about the Bible than I did, I accepted. By teaching others, I learned, too. Soon I was reading everything about the church I could find—and enjoying it. To those who are "drifters," I dedicate this letter with the hope that they, too, will be inspired to take an active part in the work of the church.

In closing, I would like to ask if anyone knows the address of Lester Whiting, who baptized me. I am anxious to contact him.

On Getting Along With People

There are many reasons why people cease to be friends, but the most common is "wounded feelings." Don't let your emotions govern your judgment. When you are told that a friend has said an unkind thing about you, change the subject and wait until you are alone to think about it. Your friend may or may not have said it, or perhaps the statement is an exaggeration. Always remember that no one is qualified to tell you what someone else thinks of you.

Even if you have been offended, only you are hurt. Forget it! To make an issue of the remark may drive you and your friend further apart and do you both harm. Rudolph Scott says, "Defeat is only for those who acknowledge it," and Edward Sheldon says, "God will look you over, not for medals, degrees, and diplomas, but for scars."

DEATHS

WHITE.—Mrs. E. L., daughter of Mr. and Mrs. U. R. Welsh, was born in Texas and died, at the age of thirty-five, in an accident at Sabetha, Kansas, on July 2. She and her husband operated a food market in Hiawatha, Kansas, before moving to a farm near Sabetha. A member of the Reorganized Church, she assisted Elder White in his work as pastor of the branch.

Surviving are her husband; three sons: Marvin and Mervin of the United States Navy, and Leland of the home; two daughters: Marjorie and Gail, both of the home; her parents, Mr. and Mrs. U. R. Welsh of Robinson; four sisters: Mrs. Orval Gordon of Hiawatha; Mrs. Lawrence Mauslein of Robinson; Mrs. Will Bumpus of Inglewood, California; and Mrs. David Lortscher of Bern; and a brother, U. C. Welsh of the Navy. Funeral services were held at the Church of the Brethren in Morrill, Elder Emery Jennings and the Reverend Kinzie officiating. Interment was in the Sabetha cemetery.

KIMMEL.—Dove D., was born November 24, 1910, in St. Louis, Missouri, and died July 2 in Sabetha, Kansas, following an accident. While enrolled in nurses' training at the Palmer Chiropractic Institute, she met Dr. Owen Kimmel, to whom she was married on June 8, 1944. She was a capable assistant to her husband in his work. Several months ago, she was baptized into the Reorganized Church at Sabetha, where she was active in young people's work.

She is survived by her husband; a daughter, Betty Jo Trump; her parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Sanders; four sisters, and two brothers. Funeral services were held at the Church of the Brethren in Morrill, Elder Emery Jennings and the Reverend Kinzie officiating. Burial was in Morrill cemetery.

MARSHALL.—Joseph, was born in England on July 16, 1855, and died at Highland Hospital, Belvidere, Illinois, on June 20, 1947. He had been a resident of Boon County since coming to this country at the age of twenty-one. He was married to Ida Dezell in Beloit on January 26, 1884; three children were born to this union. Mrs. Marshall preceded him in death in 1941. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on September 12, 1883; through his influence many were won to the faith.

He is survived by a son, George Marshall of Beloit; two daughters: Mrs. T. D. McQuiston and Mrs. C. H. Vickers, both of Belvidere; six brothers; four sisters; four grandchildren, and five great-grandchildren. Services were held at the Witbeck-Wheeler-Sabien Funeral Home, Elder Jasper Dutton officiating. Burial was in Belvidere cemetery.

BAYLESS.—Alice C., was born April 28, 1865, in Bruce County, Ontario, and passed away June 12, 1947, at her home in Toronto, Ontario. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church at Owen Sound forty-five years ago. Surviving are her husband, William; a son, and three daughters.

MAHAFFEY.—Lola B., daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles White, was born January 11, 1899, at Runnells, Iowa, (date of death not given). She attended elementary school near Hastie, Iowa, later moving with her parents to Des Moines where she was graduated from East High. She then attended Drake University, after which she taught in rural schools in Polk County intermittently for a period of nineteen years. At the time of her death, she was serving as principal of the junior high school in Runnells. At the age of thirteen, she became a member of the Reorganized Church which she always served with deep devotion and loyalty. She was united in marriage to Joseph Mahaffey on June 27, 1931. Following the death of her sister, she became legal guardian of the three children, Ione, Raymond, and Richard Miller.

She is survived by her husband; her mother, Samantha White; her niece, and two nephews. Funeral rites were held at the Reorganized Church in Runnells with Pastor Clyde McDonald in charge and District President Frank Fry giving the sermon. Interment was in Lowman Cemetery.

RAIN.—Jesse John, was born February 18, 1873, in Council Bluffs, Iowa, where he lived all of his life except nine years which were spent on a farm in Harrison County, Iowa. He died in Mercy Hospital in Council Bluffs on June 29, 1947, following an illness of two months. On July 2, 1895, he was married to Carrie Alberti. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since February 20, 1927.

Surviving are his wife; two brothers: Robert L. and Arthur L., all of Council Bluffs; and one grandson. An adopted son preceded him in death eleven years ago. Services were held at the Woodring Funeral Home with Elder V. D. Ruch officiating. Interment was in Cedar Lawn Cemetery in Council Bluffs.

CLARK.—Selina Elizabeth, was born September 12, 1862, in Utah, and passed away May 1, 1947, in Oakland, California, where she had resided for the past twenty-eight years. She was a member of the Reorganized Church for seventy-five years, having been baptized by her father, Elder T. J. Franklin, near Turney, Missouri. In 1879, she was married to William W. Clark; seven children were born to this union. Mr. Clark and two children preceded her in death.

She leaves four sons: Will W. of Boise, Idaho; Ancel, Tom, and Rodney of Oakland; a daughter, Lois Richardson of Oakland; a sister, Julia Mockler of Fresno, California; thirteen grandchildren, and twelve great-grandchildren. Interment was in Mountain View Cemetery in Oakland.

BEAMAN.—Emma Green, was born June 5, 1867, at Canton, Illinois, and died April 2, 1947, at the Horton, Kansas, hospital. She joined the Reorganized Church as a child and remained a faithful member throughout her life. On May 28, 1891, she was married to Herman Beaman; they established their home on a farm near Horton and were residing there at the time of her death.

She is survived by her husband; a son, Henry J.; three daughters: Mrs. Edna Nelson, Mrs. Anna Heitmann, and Mrs. Audree Whipple; and three grandchildren. Funeral services were held April 4 at Netawaka, Kansas, with Elder William Twombly officiating. Interment was in the Netawaka cemetery.

CLARK.—Floyd Leslie, youngest son of Thomas and Emma Clark, was born November 8, 1899, at Ottawa Lake, Michigan, and died June 10, 1947, at his home in Sylvania, Ohio. He united with the Reorganized Church on August 5, 1917, was ordained a teacher in 1919, and an elder in 1938. He served as pastor of Sylvania Branch for nine years preceding his death and was an active member of the Sylvania Association of Churches and Doherty's Fraternity. He was employed by the Toledo Edison in the meter department for nearly twenty-five years. On November 8, 1918, he was married to Susie Yeager; five children were born to this union, three of whom preceded their father in death.

He is survived by his wife; two sons: Elwood L. and Ronald; a brother, John; two sisters: Mrs. Edgar Creque and Mrs. Ray Hollister; and two grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Sylvania. Elder Robert Brown gave the sermon; he was assisted by Elder John Grice and the Reverend Birney Roberts of the Association of Churches. Burial was in the Toledo Memorial Park Cemetery.

PROFFIT.—La Lar Jules, was born December 9, 1907, and died at Lakeside Hospital in Kansas City, Missouri, on May 23, 1947, following a lingering illness. She was married to Dr. D. M. Proffit on April 14, 1944, and was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on June 16 of that year.

She is survived by her husband, two brothers, and two sisters. Funeral services were held in Trenton, Missouri, Elder Paul Sparks officiating. Interment was in the Trenton cemetery.

Be Kind

Be kind;
The moment passes swiftly
And is gone;
But words, though sharp or kindly,
Linger on.

Kindness,
Like faint perfume of flowers,
Fills the heart,
And remembering is sweet
When friends must part. . . .

Be kind;
This life is short at best;
Sifting sand
Soon runs the glass, and darkness
Is at hand.

By CARRIE A. BAIRD

Moisten
Each soul found withering
From the blast
Of criticism and unkindness
In times past;

And watch
The warming glow of friendship
Light tired eyes
And downcast spirits thus refreshed
Mount and rise.

Be kind;
The moment passes swiftly;
Use it well.
The blessing you may bring another—
Who can tell?

* Too Many Churches

There are people who say, as they look at any small city, "Too many churches."

This is a mistake. There are not enough church buildings. If everybody went to church, thousands would have to stand outside in the streets. They couldn't even get on the church lawn, let alone inside.

Our country has never had too many churches. Too many pagan citizens, yes. Too many weak, indifferent, lazy, selfish, once-a-year Christians, yes. Too many children roaming the streets without knowledge of Sunday school or God, yes.

But too many churches? NO!

* Missionary Edward Butterworth

In this issue we are using the first of a group of illustrated sketches prepared for us by one of our younger missionaries who has returned with his wife from several years of service in the Society Islands. The pictures are excellent, and Brother Butterworth has condensed the information into a very agreeable form and style. One purpose is to inform our people of the membership of the church in the Islands, and of their many fine activities, promoting a friendly interest and understanding.

* It is Uncle Joe's candid opinion that some of these mysterious "flying saucers" have been seen by men who had too many drinks, and received the wrong kind of welcome on arriving home.

* A woman was speaking about the liquor evil and repeal. "My husband was sober and a good man as long as we had prohibition. However, he had a weakness for drink, and when _____ gave us repeal my husband made a practice of getting drunk twice a week. He was kind when sober, brutal and vicious when drunk. He often beat the children, and once we spent hours standing outside the house in a driving rain because we didn't dare go in—it was three o'clock in the morning. I think he spent as much money on liquor as he paid for our home. His heart was weak, and now he is dead because he drank. I have to thank those who brought repeal for all this."

* I heard the other day of a teen-age girl who, on seeing her mother pick up a novel, said, "Mother, you shouldn't read that book. It has a very sad ending. In the last chapter he has to leave her and go back and live with his own wife and children."—Roe Fulkerson, in "Kiwanis Magazine," April, 1947.

* A sure way to ruin your happiness is to spoil somebody else's. . . . No matter what a missile looks like when you pick it up, it turns out to be a boomerang when you throw it.

The Gifts and the Gathering

It is of concern to general church officers that in the matter of the gathering, Saints are moving to Zion and regions round about without adequate preparation or counsel; it is of particular concern that certain of these are stimulated by and yield themselves to the leading of expressions purported to be of divine origin, without regard to the reliability of such expressions, or consideration of the law given of Deity and adopted by the church to govern all Saints as to the gathering.

That part of the law referred to is clear, concise, and direct, as follows:

As the saints have heretofore been instructed in reference to the gathering, they are now again admonished that the gathering must not be in haste, nor without due preparation, and must be done in accordance with the revelation given to the church upon Fishing River and in accordance with the counsel and advice of the elders of the church whose duty it has been made to counsel and advise the saints.—Doctrine and Covenants 127: 7.

And on Fishing River (Doctrine and Covenants 102), the direction given was that the work of preparation for the gathering and Zion includes experience, with a knowledge of the duties and responsibilities devolving upon those who gather; that those already gathered be faithful, prayerful, humble, and worthy, with the promise that, by following counsel, such would have power “to accomplish all things pertaining to Zion.”

The law as here expressed is clear-cut. As to its meaning, there is no dubiety. Yet, in disregard of the direction given and of repeated and long-time teaching of the church that Saints coming in should do so only after due and adequate preparation, and only as serviced by competent, authoritative counsel, some continue to come without counsel, some even in disregard of counsel given, and some in haste as well as without counsel or other preparation, thinking thereby to avoid untoward conditions anticipated from the basis of current pronouncement laying claim to inspiration and prophesying calamity, even chaos, from which the only escape is in hastening to Zion.

Let it be said there is herein no disallowance of light in the measure of the needs of people desiring to gather. We are committed as are all understanding Saints to the principle of divine direction, and open for such as may be given. We, however, cannot, nor do we admit as light to govern our people, pronouncements not in consonance with that already given to govern the Saints and the church. And we caution all Saints against yielding themselves to declarations claiming to be inspirational as their sole guide, in contravention of the clear direction of the law that all things be prepared beforehand, and that counsel be sought with a view to wisdom in gathering. And it is specifically advised that this counsel include that of general church officers, the First Presidency and Presiding Bishopric, whose responsibility it is to counsel in these matters.

The concern here is twofold:

1. Indiscriminate crowding into centers creates a problem for the church at these places of gathering by putting an overload on the ministry available to serve the influx of members in addition to Saints already there, and a problem in assimilation of the gatherers into the body and life of the church at these places. And at points of departure that should be maintained, now and again the church is left weakened for tasks ahead of it by the removal of persons to centers of the gathering. Whereas, in counsel, the church might maintain itself to better advantage in outlying areas, and at the same time deploy the gatherers to better advantage in Zion and the stakes.

2. Then there is sometimes harm done the gatherers by ill-advised moves.

It is a serious matter, one's gathering to Zion or one of the stakes, affecting, as it does his remaining life and that of his dependents; and it may be the life of his descendants. Much depends on one's readiness for such a move, on his ability to adjust himself to a new environment, and on his adaptability to conditions that may be new and even strange to him. Whatever the situation, one needs the over-all view and understanding available in the knowledge, the experience, the wisdom, and the devotion of the general church officers having to do with the gathering.

These and other considerations afford ample reason for care to be exercised in connection with contemplated moves as a part of the gathering. And, whatever the light or inspiration in the field of what is known as “the gifts,” one is yet under the clear direction of the law of God to seek counsel, and to move only as preparation has been made, lending assurance that the person moving and the church as well if it may be so—shall be helped thereby. No locally or otherwise expressed pronouncement held to be inspirational should be yielded to, only as it is on careful scrutiny found to be in harmony with the law of the gathering. And then, only as one seeks counsel as to his readiness for the gathering, to the place of gathering, to the availability of business or employment opportunities, to his adaptability to the church and community life into which he would move, and as to the likelihood of his equaling or bettering his condition, and continuing to serve the church to its advantage.

And for the sake of re-emphasizing the basic requirements, may it be suggested that one and all, whether outside or inside geographical Zion, take to heart the admonition given on Fishing River that readiness for the gathering includes a knowledge of duties and responsibilities to be assumed, experience, prayerfulness, humility, and worthiness; for to such and such only shall it be given "to accomplish all things pertaining to Zion."

There is not the least inclination on the part of the general church officers to be arbitrary in these matters. Nor do they lay claim to all wisdom or light. They, however, desire

Church Officers Abroad

Late advices from Europe indicate that President Edwards, Bishop DeLapp and Apostle McConley are in Oslo, Norway, as I write, and would be in Sweden July 24 and 25 and in Denmark from July 27 to 31. They expect to enter Germany on August 9. On account of lack of accommodations by ship, these brethren have been forced to plan all travel by air.

Brother McConley writes, "The brethren are rendering a very fine ministry," and adds, "but we are all sorry that Brother Gleazer was unable to come also. We hope and pray that Sister Gleazer is improving and may soon be well again."

We are pleased indeed to inform our readers that today Sister Gleazer was dismissed from the Sanitarium.

We have just about completed our work in Norway, and this evening will move on to Sweden, where we expect to be met by Brother Lundstrom, who will act as interpreter.

As you know, our members are very few, but the quality of the Norwegian Saints will compare quite favorably with that of the average branch elsewhere. These people are intelligent, industrious, thrifty, and devoted. The war has left obvious marks in their depleted forests and to be helpful to as many as may be, and are in a position to give or provide counsel and other service as needed by persons in preparation for, or in the actual process of gathering to places appointed and chosen for this purpose.

In the work of the gathering, light and wisdom join in one ministry. Wisdom counsels that we make sure of light—light that we give full place to wisdom. More than this, we are not to expect. Less than this, we cannot abide.

stock, and some who were here through the war years evidently know the meaning of suffering, but I find no bitterness. Food, clothing, and utensils are closely rationed, but the people take these things for granted and work together in cheerful co-operation.

We have been fortunate indeed to have Elder Olaf Fossum of Oslo as our interpreter; he has done excellent work in this capacity. We have also made his home our headquarters, and this has been most helpful. He was in the midst of his vacation when we arrived, but gladly gave up his time to travel with us. This is indicative of the spirit of all the Saints we have met.

Here in Oslo, we also met Brother and Sister Johann K. Andersen and enjoyed their generous hospitality. They later accompanied us to Porsgrund and Krager and contributed very markedly to the services held there.

At Porsgrund, we were guests of the Carl Carlsens. Brother Carlsen is an elder and is evidently a man of some standing in this city of about 10,000. He is keenly interested in the work of the church.

We also visited in Krager and had an opportunity to worship with the Saints there and to eat lunch at the Neilson home. Brother Neilson is the father-in-law of Brother Forsum. Brother Anderson is an elder and is reported to be a good speaker. At Bøn, we met the branch president, Brother Anderson, and a few devoted Saints who worship in the small but clean church we own there. It was a pleasant and profitable experience.

The stability of the work in this mission is astounding in view of the long time which has elapsed since any appointees were here. Nevertheless, we face some urgent problems of man power, housing, literature, etc., and it is imperative that we give these immediate and planned attention. I will report in greater detail as opportunity affords.

Norway is one of the most beautiful countries I have ever visited. Its scenery is a constant source of inspiration and delight.

Across the Desk

THERE IS a very live question in the minds of our members. It has to do with "ways and means" to better house our congregations. Recently the Presiding Bishopric in answering an inquiry from Brother Lloyd Hadley, River Forest, Illinois, so aptly stated the position of the administrative councils, we believe we should give Herald readers the benefit of it:

The question raised at the district conference was whether or not there would be some method worked out for underwriting local houses of worship on other than the present fifty-fifty basis. This was discussed to some extent with the First Presidency, and I think that which I write represents our joint conclusions.

We do not have enough money to cover all of the projects that would be desirable throughout the church; therefore, the money that has been made available for this purpose has been allocated or will be allocated to those projects where we have every reason to believe there is financial strength sufficient to carry it through. It has been our experience over a number of years that congregations that are unable to raise at least half the cost of building are not sufficiently strong to engage in building projects; there are, of course, some exceptions.

There is a possibility that as funds become more plentiful and we are able to make appropriations to increase the Houses of Worship Revolving Fund, projects such as you have referred to might be helped by the General Church. It is also our hope that sometime in the next few years when building projects are

Why Go to Church?

"If thou hadst known . . . the things which belong unto thy peace."—Luke 19: 42

By Apostle Charles R. Hield

A CHARACTERISTIC of the modern age is the questioning attitude of people. Everything is weighed and has to justify its existence. This is very beneficial, and we are not surprised that some are asking the question, "Why go to church?"

Several magazines have featured articles on this subject. Letters by various writers have been published, listing the reasons for not going to church. A couple of months later there was published a series of letters from people telling why they did go to church. It is a little surprising that the replies from the churchgoers did not indicate that they went to church to serve. Their reason for attending church was that they got something out of it. If the Christ were to tell why he went to the synagogue regularly, it would not be for what he got out of it. What did the Christ come to the earth to get? He obviously did receive great personal joy in his ministry, but he came to minister, not to be ministered unto.

Those who wrote that they did not go to church, gave a number of reasons. (1) They got all the contact they needed with God in nature. (2) They did not believe in habitually going to church every Sunday. (3) They did not go to church because there are hypocrites in the church. (4) They had no time; Sunday was taken up with other activities.

THE ATTITUDE of going off by oneself to enjoy the beauties of nature may be very selfish. Christ was very fond of nature. He often spoke of the birds, the water, the grass, and the flowers. He spent hours alone on the mountain in meditation and prayer. But he always came back with new spiritual strength to attack the problem of sin in the world, and to renew his efforts to teach people his Father's program. To seek to commune with God without sharing it with anyone is to resist one of the main laws of happiness and social reconstruction. This selfish attitude is ruining the world. Man needs to share his joys to get the most from them. "A joy shared is doubled." It is interesting to watch a fond parent at a circus try to point out to his children all the different acts. He seems to feel that they will miss something. An elderly lady on the train recently reached across the isle and touched my arm, calling my attention to a beautiful sunset seen from her side of the train. We like to share even the little joys.

Christ shared his experiences in the wilderness—else we would not have known of them. He also told the words of his prayer and related the agony he felt in the garden that last night. The Apostle Paul mentioned his experiences on the road to Damascus, telling of the voice of Christ heard only by himself.

Sharing is one of the characteristics of successful living. A mother will share with her children—not only will she share but she will frequently go without in order that her children may be better nourished and better clothed. A frail little mother in Pensacola came to my attention. She was working late hours in the family grocery store, ruining her health. Yet she was happy in the sacrifice, for she was able to send her daughter through a hospital training course for nurses.

MEN RECOGNIZE THIS urge for fellowship and sharing. Many of our community-spirited business clubs devote money and time to helping others. They enjoy their associations together. A member may not use the term of "mister," but must address other members by their first names. They slap each other on the back and relax from the stress and strain of their stores or offices. They find joy in the association of men who are not meeting for profit, but mainly for service. So they sponsor dog shows; Red Cross, Salvation Army, Community Welfare drives, boys' camps, hobby shows, model airplanes clubs, Christmas food baskets, Teen Town, etc.

Fellowship in a church is this service motive at its best. The tie among people who are members of an organization which is dedicated to making the world better and helping others to develop their best qualities is nowhere found stronger than among the followers of the Christ. It is with such friends that you wish to share your joys. When sorrow strikes, there is no comfort equal to that given by the church. In the presence of death, we think through the meaning of life together.

To any fellow who has a spark of manhood in him, the greatest thrill

Dealing With the Erring

By L. Wayne Updike

3. Repentance

THE CHURCH is commanded that when one who offends wishes to be forgiven, he must establish that he has repented. Reconciliation should always be effected by this process, except in the case of some few specific sins, which shall be discussed in a later article entitled "Forgiveness."

Men who look forward to the kingdom of God to be established on the earth see all of God's creation as one great harmony. Everything has its place. The principle factor that is out of order is man. The lack of harmony among men is occasioned by their trespassing upon the rights of one another and God. Such trespasses—especially specific acts or failures to act which cause estrangement between men or hinder the building of the kingdom when taken cognizance of by the offended, are retarding and disharmonizing influences. The kingdom-building task is the task of relating men to each other and to God in the way that these relationships were intended by the Creator.

When men are fit for the kingdom, they are more Godlike than now; and, as men become Godlike, they become fit for the kingdom. The task is one of reducing the distance between us and God in terms of the quality of living.

Repentance deals with overcoming this separation. It is concerned with renouncing what we now are, in favor of what we can become, with making good for what we have cost other people and God, with resolving about what we shall be tomorrow and acting in that direction today. It has claim on all our potentialities and demands that they be developed to their full extent. No one is excluded from the call to repentance for "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God."¹

"God commandeth all men everywhere to repent."² "Surely every man must repent or suffer."³

When treating the subject of repentance under the heading of "Dealing with the erring," it becomes necessary for us to see this principle, which applies to all of life as it has bearing upon the working out of reconciliation after some specific offense has been committed.

As soon as an offender discovers that he is in error, if he is interested in re-establishing rapport with his estranged brother or with the church, his first move will be to admit his error. In some cases, this confession will automatically carry with it all the restitution that is necessary. If, for example, a man lies, confession of this offense is all that is necessary to restore him. But if the case were one of stealing, then he would need not only to confess, but also to return that which he had stolen or its equivalent value.

The test of repentance is found in modern revelation in these words: "By this ye may know if a man repenteth of his sins, behold, he will confess them and forsake them."⁴

A common error is to believe that repentance is to cease to do wrong. The cessation of wrongdoing is really only a beginning. The center of repentance is the activity which follows a recognition of error and seeks to make right all that has been wrong in the past. One never repents when he thinks he is right. He does so only when he becomes aware of the sinful nature of his act and, being convinced that he is wrong, realizes that he has reason to repent.

The first reaction to such recognition is sorrow, but this, in itself, is not repentance. "Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrow to repentance; for ye were made sorry after a godly manner For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of; but the sorrow of the world worketh death."⁵ It is obvious from this that there is both godly sorrow and worldly sorrow. The one is an attendant quality of repentance. The other has nothing to do with it.

It is apparent that there can be no real repentance except as men are instructed in the right. This gives purpose to the task of carrying the gospel to every creature.

True repentance always causes a desire to make restitution for all loss or suffering caused to others. In some cases, such restitution is possible. Property stolen can be returned or replaced by other property of equivalent value. Losses caused by fraudulent dealing may be made up. Reputations injured may be mended (to some extent) by full confession on the part of the slanderer. In some types of offense, however, restitution cannot be made. Life once taken cannot be replaced. Virtue destroyed cannot be restored by the destroyer. The law given to Moses required restitution.⁶ The Lord confirmed the principle, commending Zacchaeus for declaring his obedience to it.⁷

The question is sometimes raised as to whether one can really repent if the offense is one of the types in which complete restitution cannot be made. It is interesting to note in this connection that the Lord has reserved to himself the right to "forgive whom he will forgive,"⁸ but of us it is required to forgive all. Especially is it required of the church to forgive all who confess their sins and forsake them. It is possible for one to confess and forsake a sin for which he cannot make full restitution.

Probably the most common offense which vexes administrators of the law is the one involving an unlawful divorce followed by another marriage. One view holds that since restitution is required for true repentance, it is necessary to sever the new relationship in order to fully repent. Yet, the church cannot well recommend the severance of this new relationship, especially if it is apparently a successful one and the previous one had been considered "impossible," even after due labor had been performed by the ministry of the church.

A possible solution to the seeming dilemma presents itself which is in harmony with the spirit of the law, but which also requires certain specific interpretation of the letter of the law.

When Jesus declared, "Whoso shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery; and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery,"⁹ the word "fornication" had the meaning of unfaithfulness or desertion, somewhat as it is used in Isaiah 23: 17; Revelation 17: 2-5; 18: 2, 9, and 19: 2 to mean spiritual unfaithfulness or desertion; it was not restricted to an adulterous act for, had it been, he would have used the word for adultery (Matthew 19: 9) in both places instead of at the last of the verse only. He first used fornication (perneia), then adultery (moichae), showing he had in mind a distinction between the two words. This opens to us the possibility suggested by some who have studied the matter carefully, that it should be the duty of the judicial arm of the church to determine which of the parties of a severed marriage relationship was the breaker of the covenant. One might have broken the covenant by "spiritual desertion," or by being an "impossible" companion, long before the other legally severed the union. Such an arrangement would require great wisdom, and, like every other thing of value, could do great damage if not properly used and protected from corruption.

The church is required to forgive its erring members when they repent. Such repentance is to be determined by the degree to which the offender is willing to confess and forsake his KEEPER OF THE keys of the Auditorium is Odess Athey, the office accountant and internal auditor. The books under his supervision present a bewildering library of neatly figured columns, hopelessly complicated to your reporter, but Mr. Athey shuffles through them with nimble dexterity to present monthly reports to the bishops on tithing, the Central Development Association, oblation funds, missionary reserve funds, church building accounts, and general funds.

Also among his books are the financial reports from missions overseas. "Australia sends in tithing and offerings as well if not better than parts of this country," he said.

Besides being accountant and sinning. If there be no repentance, offenders shall be cast out. A member of the church refusing to repent of a wrong committed is thereby violating a gospel principle and putting himself in a position similar to that of a nonmember who refuses to repent. Since the latter is unworthy of membership while preferring to remain in sin, so is the former unworthy of remaining in the church while he prefers sin and error.

Confession and repentance are made easy by maintaining a humble spirit. A Saint should keep himself in that condition of contrition so that he will be willing to repent whenever he has need, keeping sin from his life so far as possible, and if, at any time, finding that sin has entered into his life, being ready to remove it in harmony with the law which God has given.

auditor, Mr. Athey has charge of all office equipment from the keys in the doors to the electrical book-keeping machine. When a stenographer gets her typewriter ribbon stuck or a forgetful employee locks himself out of his office, Mr. Athey is the trouble-shooter who gets them out of their difficulties.

After office hours, Mr. Athey "gets away from it all" by collecting antique furniture and gardening on a five acre "ranch" with his wife, Vivian, and two children, Charles, eleven, and Vera June, two. The Auditorium employees have a special interest in that garden for he shares his harvest with them. In July, he came to work with two gallons of dewy fresh raspberries for the staff; another time, when his cow was in the mood, he provided thick cream to go with them. Even during the interview, he found a bag of sugar cookies for us to crunch on.

Before "gathering to Zion," Mr. Athey lived in Warrensburg, Missouri, where he received a bachelor of science degree with a commercial major at the Central Missouri State College there. He took graduate work at Denver and at the University of Kansas City, and taught school for eighteen years. In January, 1941, he began working at the Auditorium, where he has become almost as necessary as the supporting pillars. If you doubt that statement ask someone who forgot his key one morning or a bishop who wants some late figures for an immediate board meeting.

No matter what the rush, how high the temperature, or how many machines stop working, Mr. Athey is calm and patient, running his affairs as smoothly as a new car. The girl at the next desk said, "Mr. Athey works awfully hard at his job." Smiling, he countered, "And why not? I like it very much."

Campaigning for God

By Joseph Richard Meloan

WHEN AN advertising agency fails to get results from an advertisement, experts examine the creation and its presentation to discover the cause of its failure. Churches, contrarily, are inclined to blunder on their way, spending more time, money, and energy. The lack of results generally is blamed on the sinful condition of the people—their “prospects.” They even have an “out” in the alibi that it is merely their duty to witness the gospel to the masses of the world. If they don’t accept, well, it’s their own fault, and they will, at the very least, be damned.

But is the gospel really preached as a witness until it is presented to each person in a manner conducive to his understanding and subsequent acceptance?

We are in an age that materially differs from the old missionary days. Men like Oliver Cowdery who struggled three hundred miles through one of the most severe winter snows ever recorded to pioneer in the West was using every means at his disposal to present the gospel message. Today, with our ability to instantly reach the whole world—a condition that has never existed before in history—we fail to take full advantage of the opportunity.

While there is no doubt that the personality of the direct sales approach is still the most effective and a necessary final step in any campaign, it is nevertheless extremely limited in the amount of people it reaches. The widespread use of all modern methods of dissemination and presentation by our competitor, the Devil, coupled with our general lack of the use of these methods is a strong determining factor.

The dramatic effectiveness of the motion picture makes our preaching methods often pale by comparison. Skillfully edited, the movies do not feature their most potent characters in any single dynamic close-up for more than six seconds, yet a minister attempts to hold the attention of his congregation for as long as an hour.

Millions now living have never heard the gospel and are not likely to the way we are preaching it.

Too often ministers’ preoccupation with Biblical times causes them to be unaware of the circumstances in which their audiences now live. A preacher calls us to hearken to Christ dying on the cross—an audience whose husbands, sons, and brothers died by the thousands on the beach at Tarawa—and he fails to see their equal sacrifice or the urgency of making that sacrifice worth-while now, lest it escape and be in vain.

Zionist preaching must reach the needs of the people. Academic theology is little balm to listeners who are in the throes of desperate social and economic conditions.

Millions of really fine people are not going to church because they were never reached—or the church failed to progress with them and they drifted away. Remember, there is a way to reach every human being and bring about his salvation—or many are damned from the beginning. It is the responsibility of the church to find that way.

Recently, in a large southern city, I paused in the hurry of the downtown night life to listen to a Salvation Army preacher. It was an episode I will not soon forget in a place where the churches are not reaching thousands of even religiously inclined people.

There were other examples—the man with his three children who stood on the street corner and preached with conviction—certainly with the earnestness of real personal sacrifice for the cause of God—a sincerity that could not be rejected by any person. Then there was the funny little man who preached rather wildly each afternoon on the busy streets, crying in the wilderness of that great city like John, warning the people. Few stopped to listen, yet each day—snow, rain, or shine—for twenty years he stood on that corner to carry out his special mission. As I listened, the thought came to me that no matter what our blind loyalty to the purposes of God, how consistent our effort, or how great our sacrifice, we must not fail in the manner of our presentation to the people. Certainly here was the wrong way, yet that man had reached me and caused me to give thought to the whole of religion and how it was not reaching the people. Perhaps in this alone, his efforts had actually borne good fruit.

Somewhere in between those who stood in the city’s gutters to preach to the passing multitude and the “reverends” who stood ensconced in their ivory towers, preaching to those who either came by duty or for social prestige, was the answer. It indeed was an accurate observation that the preacher in the street was obeying a fundamental law of advertising, he was reaching the people. If this was not too effective, then the manner of presentation should be improved.

In this city were a million people. Surely some whom God loved and wanted saved, but our branch there had an attendance of twenty. I was ready to relegate the whole city to some sinful destiny until I wandered one night to a park in which five thousand young people cried out for the direction of God. I saw a leader who, by the sincerity of his purpose and belief, kept this huge audience on its feet for a half hour as he pleaded for converts and a massive choir sang, "I'd rather have Jesus than anything this world affords today." Nowhere in Zion had there been anything like this yet. As a bystander, I was probably the only person present who knew the message they were hungry for, yet I was unable to reach them.

Wherein have we failed? Why are we cast down? We are not meeting the people on their own ground with their own needs as did Jesus. We have not adapted our evangelistic technique to changing conditions.

Most of us believe it is "yet a little while" and millions must hear the gospel. An advertising agency given the job would at least be sure those millions had the message before them in every tested way. Lacking the power and direction of God, they might fail to convince. But, with us, the modern means for disseminating knowledge is the answer.

We must tell the story in terms the people understand and through methods that reach the multitudes. This necessarily means the widespread use of radio, motion picture, and every visual method. This calls for every talent our people possess—drama, art, music, engineering, photography, journalism, and the more than three hundred other skills necessary to these media. Not only must we make use of these modern inventions, but we must also apply them to a new type of direct presentation.

This means reaching all the places that people frequent. It must reach people whose natural resistance to the "goodness" of the ecclesiastical church would prevent them from ever getting near one. (Seminary-nurtured preachers with naught but a sheltered, sin-free background would not understand this.) It means a thorough appreciation of the many desirable attributes that nonchurchgoers may possess and meeting on a common ground with our own few saintly virtues in not

"Te Evanelia"

THE LITTLE white schooner of Section 123 in the Doctrine and Covenants was called "Te Evanelia." "Te Evanelia," literally "the Gospel," is still being spread from island to island, although the brave little ship of that name lies somewhere submerged between the islands of Rairoa and Tikehau.

Often, as we traveled on the small schooners pictured above, we recalled the many hardships and sacrifices of our earlier missionaries, who faced even more dangers than we in small craft surely to be classified today as unseaworthy.

As we were about to go aboard the "Maoa'e" (largest boat pictured above) we received word of the arrival of Apostle Mesley and family at Papeete. It was impossible to return in time to contact him, so we sailed on to the neighboring island of Niau to continue our missionary activities.

The sea was unusually calm, which was indeed fortunate for us, for half-way en route, our engines stopped. For four hours, the ocean swells rippled under us and wafted us dangerously close to the outer reef of the island of Kaukura. Repairs were finally made, and we arrived safely at Niau where we were marooned for seven weeks.

The boat which eventually touched that island was the "Aito," a small schooner about the size of an ordinary streetcar but somewhat wider. We shall never forget our return to Papeete on this flimsy craft. We encountered a storm only one day out to sea. We were tossed about as a toy. The gigantic waves charged mercilessly upon us, lifting us high then spilling us in a side slip down the opposite side. For two days and one night we never voluntarily moved from our cramped space. Our protection against the sea was only a four-inch rail against which we braced our feet to avoid being dumped into the sea. Again we arrived safely at our destination, shaken only physically.

Through wind and wave and rain and heat, "te evanelia" is spread.

too great a prominence but with an interchange of these things.

Nothing in advertising is so effective as testimonials. Our church knows this and has testimony meetings. But, unfortunately, they too often succeed only in keeping convinced those who have already been convinced and do not reach new prospects. Show the world even a small community of people living and working together on a Zioniac plan—happy, secure, content, free—and you will get a most enthusiastic response plus action ending in results.

But having the example, be sure your presentation is adequate and far-reaching, with results profitable to God.

A PLEA By Elbert Dempsey

This is no roadmap to Zion. It is only a plea—a plea to study and find a practical plan that offers concrete hope for achievement, and then to act. It is a plea to give our great adventure some hope of success.

WE ARE TO build Zion. We are to establish Christ's kingdom on earth. We are to make the brotherhood of man a reality, an ensign to the nations!

The flattering terms we use to describe our mission are right because it is a great and desperately needed work.

And how are we going to achieve this great work? What is the next step, and the next? Any group that wishes success in any endeavor must know where it is going and how to get there. If we are to put into our church-work something better than pious incompetence—if we are to make its hopes more than a delusion—we, too, must find the way and start moving.

Is it our calling to wait for God to smite our enemies and bring us together and stir us to righteousness in his own due time? Waiting for God is one of the great evils which plagues us. He has cried his impatience a hundred times. If we don't grow toward Zion, we don't deserve his help, and he has made it clear that we won't get it.

Does this mean we should call everyone together and set up all the machinery of Zion? That would be bedlam, not Zion. Zion will not be a miracle that descends from heaven. Nor can we order it into existence from the four corners of the earth.

It has been said that if 300 people would gather together and live in accord with the laws of God in nature, they could enjoy the benefits of Zion. Apparently we do not have 300 people capable of Zion in any one place. Yet this is all the miracle we need.

THERE ARE MANY reasons why we do not have Zion.

I know a member who has sacrificed for the church most of her life. But she loves gossip—the spicier the better—especially about people who have offended her. The cause of Zion is retarded because she leaves behind her a trail littered with malice and contention.

I know a girl who does not like Latter Day Saints as a group, although many of her best friends belong. She complains that Sunday morning crowds going to and from the Stone Church often push her off the sidewalk. If the other churches in town had such congestion, they would no doubt be as bad, but that doesn't help her opinion of us. We don't have Zion because people thoughtlessly crowd each other on the sidewalks.

I know a man who says he would lay down his life for Zion—but Zion may never be worth the sacrifice, because he is easily offended. A slight affront, even when he knows it is accidental, will throw him into a frenzy of injured pride. He retires to the sidelines to lick his imaginary wounds and think angry thoughts. We don't have Zion because his sensitive and suspicious little mind flatters itself as being the victim of a conspiracy every time misfortune threatens.

I know a man who is quite sure he is a good man. Of course, he was careless about burning his wastepaper when the neighbors had their family wash on the line. When one of them suggested he be more careful, he remembered what a good man he was. They couldn't tell him what to do. They are a bunch of troublemakers and so is anyone else who crosses him. We don't have Zion because his side of a dispute always seems to be God's side.

I know a man who, upon ordination to the priesthood, seemed more heavily endowed with the spirit of grandeur than the Spirit of God. People were antagonized and disgusted by his newly found sense of wisdom and importance. We don't have Zion because he isn't big enough to see himself and his achievements in their proper place.

I know a woman who refused the mailman a cold drink on a hot day. He could wait till he got to a store or maybe drink from a hydrant. Anyway, why should she be bothered; She paid taxes. We don't have Zion because—

I must stop this sort of thing somewhere. We don't have Zion because we aren't capable of producing it.

WE HAVE the place, we have more than enough people in it, we have a desperate need, but we aren't big enough to make it work. In the face of this catastrophe, nothing else is worth talking about. We worry about the history of the Book of Mormon, pretty flowers for church, and the theory of evolution and restoring Nauvoo. They are important and deserve more support but—with the world going to ruin and us with it—Zion is the imperative. It is also the impossible until we change the quality of our living. Therefore,

Elbert Dempsey, Jr., is a native of Independence, Missouri. Following graduation from William Chrisman High, he attended Graceland College, after which he served for nearly three years as an electronic technician in the Navy. In June, he was graduated from the University of Iowa where he majored in economics.

changing the quality of our living is the supreme task of the church and ourselves.

A group of men recently went to study archæological ruins in Mexico. I know the trip was very worthwhile. But a similar expenditure of money and personnel to study the latest findings of science relative to human behavior and society would have been more profitable.

Many of our people engage in presenting the story of the resurrection on slides, or making the principle of the sacrament more understandable. Fine, but the church still stagnates, waiting for those who will engage in projects to make the principles of wholesome living more understandable.

Some ministers make a fetish of baptism by immersion. Zion would Zion's League Can Do Something About Race Relations!

BY MARTHA FORD FLORO

The area of race relations is one in which we as young people can make our religion vital and effective today. Latter Day Saintism, which for over a hundred years has stated in no uncertain terms its concern in the everyday problems of life, now has an opportunity as never before to justify the forward-looking insight of its early leaders.

The Toledo, Ohio, Zion's League sponsored an evening's program in the field of race relations which may inspire other groups to tackle this problem.

On Sunday evening, June 29, we observed "family night," the last of a series of three for which Zion's League assumed responsibility. On this particular night, we built our evening program around the problem of race relations. Beginning at 5:30 p.m. with a vesper service on the theme of world brotherhood and understanding, we served a simple supper in the basement. During the hour following, choir practice was held upstairs, while the children and remaining adults visited and played games. At 7 p.m., we began the informal program with a solo by Mrs. Mary Fredericks, Negro soloist. Pastor Lloyd Lynn then introduced Mrs. O. G. Knoke, executive secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation in Toledo, who in turn introduced the other four members of the panel: Eugene Sagen and Arlene Kaufman, both Jewish, of Antioch College; Bill Gibson and Theodore Parr, both Negro students at the University of Toledo.

The members of the panel were all familiar with the subject and did an excellent job of stimulating interest in the elementary aspects of the problem of race relations. Several of the participants had had previous experience in a number of Toledo churches during the war when they were accompanied by a Japanese-American girl. Mrs. Knoke, as leader of the panel, tied the discussion together effectively. Such factors were discussed as what is meant by the term "race," how it is misused, how we can correct our thinking, how minorities can be assimilated in a democracy, and what we can do that is practical and helpful. Also discussed were projects of various other groups which are working earnestly on this problem of ending discrimination and breaking down barriers which separate peoples.

At the close of the panel, Mrs. Fredericks sang another solo, followed by a short talk by District President Alvin Wadsworth. He brought an excellent challenge to Latter Day Saints to get out in the stream of life and join with others in the solving of these and other similar social problems which are common to all of us.

We could not help but feel that this small beginning is prophetic of a new wave of thinking in our church and that other young people, and older ones as well, would be interested in our project. Here is something vital for Zion's Leaguers to undertake, and it is basic in our heritage of faith that all the divine resources of the universe shall be ours as we make a sincere and consistent attempt to further human brotherhood.

be better served if they were as resourceful and persistent in teaching the dignity and satisfaction of the Christlike life.

Some of our congregations teach new priests how to serve the Communion and visit homes. Splendid, but we rarely equip them to deal effectively with the petty personal problems of people. Yet, that is where Zion is failing.

We pray for Zion. Good, but these prayers are meaningless unless we pray for tolerance and consideration, humility and charity. Zion will be ours only as these are. As we achieve these, we will achieve Zion.

ZION WILL differ from what we have in Independence today only in the gracious quality of living. This may make possible greater prosperity and grandeur, but the basis of it all will be a body of people whose lives are adjusted for the greatest satisfaction of all.

We work hard today at this job of making ourselves capable of building Zion, but we never give it the absolute priority it requires. We certainly have never carried it far enough to give us success. If we are to flourish, or even survive, we must give this problem enough emphasis to assure success no matter what the cost to our other activities.

Limitations

By D. BLAIR JENSEN

And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished these parables, he departed thence. And when he was come into his own country, he taught them in their synagogues, insomuch that they were astonished, and said, Whence hath this Jesus this wisdom and these mighty works? Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? And his brethren, James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us? Whence then hath this man all these things? And they were offended at him. But Jesus said unto them, A prophet is not without honor, save in his own country, and in his own house. And he did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief.—Matthew 13: 54-59.

EVERY DAY in every land many die because they cannot be convinced of their peril. Floods and disease as well as fire and shell gather into their ghastly arms countless people who heed not voices of warning and save themselves while there is yet time. The desires of God are constrained by the desires of men, and the powers of God are circumscribed by the incredulity of men. The limitation of godly accomplishment rests with the people.

God is limited by the amount of faith we have and express. The New Testament again and again emphasizes the place of faith in the great Christian movement. Christ was wont to place the soothing hand upon the fevered brow, breathe the healing breath and affirm, "Thy faith hath made thee whole." Faith was evidenced in the very presence of the women at the cross. Faith was glorified as Paul the Apostle, chained to his guard in a Roman dungeon, penned his solemn charge and his testimony of great assurance to the Gentiles, "I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing in his kingdom; preach the word; be instant in season, those who are out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine. But watch thou in all things, endure afflictions—make full proof of thy ministry. For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only but unto all them also that love his appearing."

The aged revelator, returned from his Patmos exile, bore witness of those marvelous visions and views of the last things which were given to him by the power of God and evidenced his great faith. In deep, commanding tones he said, "Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein: for the time is at hand." And, "Behold he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him: And all kindreds of the earth shall mourn over him."

God is limited in what he can do for us by the limitations of our faith. Our faith is not revealed so much by what we say, but rather by what we attempt to do and the manner in which we do it. If our faith is sufficient, then God and Christ can do mighty works in us.

God is limited by our indifference. It is so easy and often so comfortable to be indifferent. How long has it been since we have talked to another concerning the welfare of his soul? The facility with which we become indifferent prophesies that the sun can readily set upon our day ere our tasks are done. God says, "Try me. Whatsoever things ye desire, When ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall receive them."

God is limited by our selfishness. Malachi asks the question, "Will any man rob God," and straightway speaks the answer that God is robbed of tithes and offerings. Selfishness on our part keeps back from God's use the time and talents and lives which are ours to control. When we emphasize the fact of possession instead of use, when we are concerned with receiving rather than giving, we restrain the hands of God with our selfishness. In the twelfth chapter of Luke's Gospel is found the story of the foolish rich man who tore down his barns and built them new and larger that they might store up more wealth for him, and then in the very day of this accomplishment—he died and was gone and left all things behind him. As the story is recorded in those few verses, this rich man six times speaks the word "I" and six times uses the word "my." In the preceding chapter, Jesus teaches his disciples to pray. The contrast is very marked. Nothing of selfishness is in that prayer—"Our Father, give us, forgive us, lead us, deliver us, and finally thine is the glory." We are admonished not to be concerned with the gathering up and amassing of earthly treasures which are apt to be destroyed by decay, breakage, and theft. Rather, we are to recognize the purpose and stewardship of life.

God is limited by our hardness of heart—or we might say God is limited by our stubbornness. If we continue to resist his promptings, there comes a time when we no longer can hear him. Life here for the most part gives us that which we are worthy to receive; this also applies to the life which is to come. Stubbornness here and now—withholding obedience to the call of God—can but withhold and limit our joy in the life to come.

I read a story of a proud and stubborn rich man who dreamed that he died and went to heaven. The guide considerably conducted him along the golden streets and through endless rows of beautiful mansions in which happy people were living. Impatiently he asked to see his new abode and was led from the place of in life is to be able to assist some other person to find the true values in life. It must have been a great source of pride for the architect who designed the Empire State Building in New York City to view the completed structure. An artist must receive a warm glow of satisfaction to have his painting or his statue receive universal acclaim. Tourists obviously get a great deal of pleasure traveling in many parts of the world. Yet there is no greater joy than that which comes to a person's heart when he learns that because he cared, a fine young man has grown up, married, and is a credit to his friends and community. What is more beautiful than life? Many have seen the wonders of the world; yet being able to assist a happy, clean, intelligent family group is one of the most satisfying joys we receive. How can anyone worship God only by walking in the woods alone? The best contact with God is found not in nature, but when we contribute to the character, personality, and righteousness of man.

A SECOND REASON some gave for not going to church was that habitual going was against their principles.

It is easy not to go to church if we have no service motive behind our attending. Habitual action, however, is the backbone of all successful living. Our trains run on schedule. Our electric lights may be turned on any time of the day or night. We demand consistency in our service trades. No one would say that honesty should not be habitual. Would we trade with a store or a bank that was beauty along a side street to a little shack facing an alley. When he remonstrated, the heavenly messenger replied, "Sorry, sir, but we did the best that we could with the material you sent ahead to us." God is always limited and bound by the heart that is given to him.

Of Jesus, when he came to his own country, it was recorded, "And he did not many mighty works there—because of their unbelief."

The work that he would bring to pass in our lives is limited by:

*our lack of faith in him,
our indifference, our selfishness, and

only honest fifty per cent of the time, or ninety per cent of the time, or even ninety-five per cent of the time? A good husband and father is regular in his care and attention to his family. Suppose a husband sees his wife and children only twice a year—Christmas and Easter—like some people attend church! We would expect love to cool. When a couple's habitual and consistent concern for each other stops, their home breaks up in divorce.

The successful personality is well-rounded. A fourfold activity is required. We need some work, some play, some love, and some service in the building of God's kingdom. The successful person is the one who serves others; he has skills and habits that are devoted to assisting world betterment.

Business is not a hit and miss affair. It is not a question of working if we feel in the mood or staying in bed if we feel lazy. The mailman must be dependable. He does not feel that his personality is ruined if he is habitually on the job. The bus driver, the telephone girl, the ten-cent-store clerk, the newspaper workers, are consistent workers.

Religion rightly understood is not just a Sunday affair. Religion should take in all phases of our activities. It should govern the ethics and good will in our homes, farms, factories, schools, stores, and professions. Religion is not believing certain things but the doing of exceptional facts. It is the ordering of things in exceptional ways. Religion is a way of life, even more so than Nazism was to Germany. It is not a passive mental state like reading the names on freight cars as they go by. It is behavior; it is an affair of ups and downs. It is adventure. It is not an heirloom, old china, or a golf trophy to be brought out on certain occasions. It is not a Sunday dinner only, but daily bread!

SOME SAY THAT they do not attend church because there are hypocrites in the congregations. One would have to go to live on a desert isle or hole in a cave not to find people who wish others to think they are something which they are not. Where can you go and not find hypocrites? Are there no hypocrites in politics? Is there no one sailing under false colors in the factories, banks, schools, Chambers of Commerce, barber shops, etc.? The church is probably freer of this type than any other institution. In the church we seek to judge people for what they may become, rather than damning them for what they are. In the church we generally have sincere people. Some of them make failures in their attempt to learn the laws of eternal living. They fall sometimes, but, had we been more helpful to them, the fall could have been prevented. People who fall are not all hypocrites. Students in university fail sometimes, but they are not hypocrites. Blunders do not necessarily make people cheaters; they may make men out of them. The kingdom of God way of life is an exacting way. It is as hard as our fight against polio, but it is the only way to act.

We cannot imagine the Christ quitting because there were hypocrites everywhere he went. It is a grief difficult to bear, for some parents, when a child disgraces himself and the family. But parents never desert—they never cease loving; they always have hopes for a change for the better. The true Christian instills confidence in the discouraged. He lifts the weak to the place where they can stand by themselves.

Some say they have no time to help the church. In one of the large universities I attended a lecture on the use of the radio tube. The scientist had an instrument with which he could pick up the waves sent out by the human voice after we could no longer hear them. Then the lecturer commented on the future possibilities of this invention. Perhaps someday, he said, we may be able to tune in and hear an address by George Washington. The audience smiled, as did the speaker. But when we reflect on the power of God, we had best be careful if we think we can convince him that we have had no time to assist him in building a righteous community here upon the earth. Could he show us a movie of how we spend our time? May he be able to tune in on a machine and let us hear the exact things that we talk about? Will we be able to prove to God that we were too busy elsewhere to help him build the kingdom?

WHEN WE SAY that we do not have time, we generally mean that we are indifferent. We choose to use our time some other way. Indifference is one of the most difficult things to combat. It is the mass of inactive people that make possible the crimes and tragedies of life. That was true at the time of the crucifixion of the Christ. His enemies were only a handful, a few hostile priests, some scribes and Pharisees, a few businessmen who felt that the teachings of Christ might hurt their profits. Then at the cross were a few friends of the Master—too few friends. The mother of Jesus was there, and a disciple or two. Most of his followers remained afar off. The majority of the people—perhaps ninety-five per cent of the masses—were indifferent. They would not have killed the Christ themselves, but neither would they defend him. They merely allowed the crime to take place. They had not time or inclination to assist Christ's program of righteousness. The people who allowed the crucifixion of the Christ were so modern!

SOME SAY THAT they do not go to church because they do not understand the Scriptures. They cannot understand death. The origin of the Bible puzzles them. They do not comprehend the significance of prayer. Immortality and the future life raises questions in their minds.

We need not know all about God and his rule in order to enjoy his love. It is doubtful that husbands and wives ever learn the complete mystery of each other's personalities. We may not know all there is about nature, but we can enjoy it. Storms, cold and heat waves can be foretold a few days in advance, but the actual reason for a cold snap or a hot spell is still largely unsolved. It may originate at the poles. We do not know all there is to know about grass or birds or the formation of mountains, but we can find happiness and peace in their presence. Air is a mystery, but we can enjoy a good breeze. We may not know all the intricate technical problems of Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony," or Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," but we may find pleasure in listening to them. It is not necessary for us to know all about Shakespeare—where he found the plot and the versification of his lines—to enjoy the love scene between Romeo and Juliet. It was Mark Twain who said: "Most people are bothered by those passages of Scripture which they cannot understand, but as for me, I have always noticed that the passages in Scripture which trouble me most are those which I do understand."

People do not intentionally remain away from church in order to defy God. Indifference is not a purposeful or studied way of life. One does not have to go to a technical school to be indifferent. It is so easy to remain in bed longer on Sunday. The Sunday paper takes longer to read than on week days. Indifference is an attitude that creeps slowly like the sands of the desert, until we lose interest in building a righteous society. We run down much like the batteries in a flashlight which has been left on the shelf for a few years without use.

MANY DO NOT help God in building the kingdom because they delay the time of entering his service. They are always going to help as soon as business is better, etc. Procrastination is one of our worst sins. The way to hell is paved with good intentions. The story is told of a conference held by some devils. They were discussing how best to defeat the program of Christ. One devil suggested that the people of the world be told that the Bible is a fable—that it is not God's word. A second devil thought the best way to stop the Christian movement would be to tell people that Christ was human—a mere man. A third devil advised that they deny everything, explain to people that there is no God, no Saviour, no heaven, no hell. But a fourth devil recommended a method that was finally accepted as the best one. He advised his colleagues to tell people that there is a Bible, there is a God, and Christ is his Son; there is a heaven, even a hell, but that there is no hurry in building the kingdom. He told them to have people think of themselves today, and to tell them they could always assist God next week, next month, or next year!

Religion is not something that we can accept or reject and expect life to go along as usual. Religion is as important as good health. It takes as much care and attention to keep our civilization from the disease of sin as it does from microbes. The greatest enemy of Christianity in the time of Christ was religion. The greatest millstone Christianity has now are Christians who show no fruit of the gospel in their lives. They demonstrate no mastery of the art of living. ". . . this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil." —John 3: 19.

Aristotle said, "The true nature of a thing is the highest that it can become." We do not judge all homes by the loveless and dirty hovels. Neither should we judge all Christianity by its worst examples. All things are caricatured. We need not accept the caricature as the real thing.

THE MEASURE of a man is the good things to which he is indifferent. Some are indifferent to classical music. They care nothing for the great symphonies, operas, and concertos. They are satisfied with boogie woogie at some road house with their beer-and-hot-dog friends. Our newsstands sell thousands of the tabloid newspapers and sensational magazines, while our libraries are full of the best novels and biographies of the ages. Recreation should re-create with clean, healthy entertainment and activity. Yet so much of our recreation is sex-motivated and leaves our youth full of false ideas as to the best standards of life. Even some foreign nations are protesting the importation of our movies because of the crime, graft, and love-triangle features of the plots. Other people are indifferent to good speech—are content with street slang and off-color stories. Poor health is a direct result of not making a proper study of the laws of health. Many do not exercise enough. Most sick people know that some of the things which they are eating and drinking are not conducive to good health. Some poor health habits are born of ignorance and often result in sore eyes, poor teeth, nervousness, rickets, hunchbacks, etc.

This indifference to the task of making a better world is spreading even into the factories. Some employers are accusing the laboring man of indifference; he displays no skill or pride in his work. They say he is lazy and slows down production. Of course, a greater share in the profits may give greater incentive to the discouraged laborer.

Radio programs are made to fill the demands of the public. The fact that we have so much trash on the radio is indicative of a demand for programs that have no cultural or uplifting value. Yet one may, with careful selection, pick out symphonies, debates, news, and plays which are instructive and uplifting. A home can be judged by the type of radio programs to which the family listens.

CHARACTER can be developed. Truth, honesty, and virtue may be the possession of all. It is easy for teachers and camp supervisors to tell what type of a home children come from. Some children are clean, mannerly, polite, thoughtful of others, courteous, careful in speech, and unselfish, while others are dirty, rude, selfish, greedy, and quarrelsome. God judges people also by the number of his kingdom-building laws to which they are indifferent.

Ninety per cent of the Christians give a mental assent to the teachings of Christ, but refuse to be governed by his laws. They wish a more materialistic God, one who flatters their godlessness, smiles at their sins, praises their skepticism. His main value is to help us make money. Age after age it has been proved that man cannot break the laws of the universe, and yet each new generation makes the attempt, expecting that God will ignore their violations.

In the Sermon on the Mount, Christ spoke of the wise and foolish builders. One built his house upon the rock and the other built his house upon the sand. It should be carefully noted that the rain descended, the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon both of the houses in this parable. Having our lives built upon a solid, righteous foundation does not excuse us from the storms and temptations of this civilization. However, it does keep our lives from collapsing.

Man is made to live kingdom-of-God laws. He is discontented, frustrated, and fearful until he does so. When he is a good citizen of God's society, he gains dignity, equality, ability, and poise. He has drive. Life has a purpose and meaning.

WHY GO TO CHURCH? Go in order to join militant, courageous people who are seeking to prove in their lives, their homes, and their business, that co-operation is better than conflict, freedom better than bondage, kindness better than cruelty, health better than sickness, harmony better than discord; beauty better than ugliness, truth better than lies, virtue better than sin.

Our churches are seeking to bring justice to all people and all races. The kingdom life should assure equality of opportunity. There should be jobs for all who can work—security for those who need it. There should be no special privileges. All should have their needs and just wants, and the surplus may well be used for group welfare!

We need to go to church to learn better how to be peacemakers. Christ does not say "blessed are the peaceful," but "blessed are the peacemakers." Peace can be obtained only by large numbers of people who are convinced that co-operation and good will are better than force. The Nazis are now a sad and disillusioned people. Hitler had told them that war was glorious, thrilling, while peace was drab and colorless. War, the dictators preached, called for courage, hardships, sacrifices, and danger, while peace was tame, narrow, and trivial. "War makes us one-world minded," their propaganda proclaimed. Christianity is composed of a group of people who find the battle against sin and stupidity a thrilling, challenging contest. The victories in Christian warfare are much greater than victories by force. There is no higher joy than the knowledge that we have contributed to the building of righteous lives whose qualities last through eternity.

WHY GO TO CHURCH? Because the church is God's workshop in which kingdom-of-God people are created. We go to church to co-operate with others in getting the most out of life. Why should chickens eat gravel? In order to live. Why do birds fly south? In order to live. Why must fish have water? In order to live. Why must trees have roots and leaves? In order to live. Why should people go to church? Because a real church fits our needs and the needs of this century. A civilization which is not obeying the laws of God is a "cut-flower" civilization. It may look nice for a while, but having no roots in kingdom-of-God soil, it soon wilts and dies. That is the record of history.

God trusts us. Does not that mean anything to us? He has put the world in our hands.

Christianity is not a call to believe in Fascism. We do not ask you to follow the teachings of Nazism. We do not ask you to be a Communist. Religion does not plead with you to be a Democrat or a Republican! Christianity asks you to accept the teachings of the Christ!

Why go to church? Because building the kingdom of God is the only solution for life. It is life. God has no hands, no feet, no voice—but our hands, our feet, and our voices. Going to church, we follow the pattern of the Christ. We dedicate our time, skills, and money as God intends them to be spent—in making the world a better place in which to live.

contemplated in branches such as those you referred to (like Aurora, Deselm, etc.), the church would be in a position to send in a missionary who could spend enough time in building up the branch that the General Church would then be in a better position to come to its financial assistance.

In other words, the building up of these smaller branches to a point where they have adequate houses of worship is both a missionary and a financial problem.

Whether this will answer the questions raised, I do not know, but you may rest assured that we are moving forward as fast as we can, and we believe that the step taken to establish the Houses of Worship Revolving Fund was a step in the right direction, and that as we grow stronger as a church financially, the service of this fund can be extended.

ISRAEL A. SMITH

Independence, Missouri
July 18, 1947.

Elder Casimir Nikel, Cleveland, Ohio, under date of July 12, says:

One thing I have decided to do during the coming year and that is to tie up more closely to the work of the departments at each congregation. During my two years here I have found that the pay-off has been more abundant through that channel than any other. True that my personal visitation, missionary cottage meetings, and missionary family meetings have interested some individuals in the church, but, by actual count of baptisms, the church school and Zion's League have resulted in the biggest dividends. I shall by no means relinquish pressure on what is commonly called missionary work. However, I shall increase pressure in regard to the departmental activities which experience proves as a source of fruitfulness.

P R A Y E R

God knows me very well, but, lest he overlook some need of mine,
 I tell him, carefully, about my pains, and, to his throne of grace,
 I take my problems
 —one by one—
 for him to solve.
 I tell him of my griefs and ask for comfort.
 I pray for him to keep me from all harm and save my soul.
 If I am not too tired,
 I pray for friends and family.
 Then, just before "Amen,"
 I say, "And thank you, God, for blessings great and small."
 These I do not name,
 each, separately,
 for that would be imposing on God's time.

* Writers

Vacation time affects all professions and occupations. The writer is not exempt from the common human temptations. In the heat of summer, perspiration makes paper stick to his arms, ink smudges his fingers, and flies distract his attention. The windows are open, and a breeze wafts the clean smell of growing trees and plants to his nostrils, and the scent of brown soil under the sun. So the writer chucks his last literary failure into the wastebasket and goes outdoors. The editors, poor things, cannot lightly dismiss their duties, for they have pages to fill, and light mails bring them gray hairs, and furrows in their brows. Religious editors write more letters of appeal in the summertime, or in desperation resort to prayer. Secular writers, having no such resources, are simply led away by psychiatrists, muttering things nobody but a printer would understand.

Writing for the church publications is one of the great volunteer services that qualified members can perform. It is a mission, as truly as going to foreign lands to preach the gospel. The writer reaches thousands, where the speaker reaches only dozens or hundreds.

We need leading articles. Good lead articles. Really top quality articles. Articles that will carry a message to people of the finest intelligence and education. These are hardest to write, and require the best learning and training in the writer. Many fine people are qualified by experience and training to write these articles, but they are too busy in local work to take the time. So we go without. We plead for a part of the time and effort of these workers. Their help is needed.

We get a moderate supply of articles that are of good quality and workmanship, and we appreciate these. We could use more of them.

We receive many articles in which the author has a good idea, but has not been able to complete his task of putting it into form for publication. The regret of an editor's life is the articles that almost, but not quite, make the grade. So many good things are lost in this way. The editor can make small corrections, but he cannot do for the author what the author is not trained to do for himself.

We appreciate the fine contributions of our writers. We need more of them who are trained and qualified for this branch of church work.

* The untidy gentleman on the street corner was discussing the difficulties of the United States Treasury, and he knew the exact solution for its problems. It was quite apparent he did not know the solution for his own financial problem.

* Most of us need lessons in how to make the best of life. And because we have failed to seek the truth and learn the lessons, we spend all too many of our little allotment of days and years in unnecessary illness and discouragement. The first thing we need to know is how to take care of ourselves.

You and God

MY TWO FRIENDS, just past middle life, stood talking to me as they were preparing to leave the city to take up a mission at a distant place. Their children were grown and no longer a care to them. They could leave the safe church position they had and launch out once more into missionary work where they would have to struggle for existence. They faced their uncertain future with pleasure and a spirit of adventure. There was something invigorating in their hopeful smiles.

Then the woman spoke: "We think this is what the Lord wants us to do. And so we are doing it."

They were both well-educated people. They knew all that skeptical science might say to corrode such a belief as was represented in their unpretentious statement of faith. Knowing all that men can know of the world and the universe, they still believed in a personal Heavenly Father who loved them and had a work for them to do.

THE MAN was dying, and knew it. He wanted to talk about his soul and the future life. Yet all his friends spoke with a false and pretended optimism, as if he were going to get well, and of what he would do then. It was a kind of benevolent hypocrisy that he saw clear through immediately. He wanted to talk about God, but nobody would give God more than a sentence or two, before turning back to golf, or the late baseball score, and a lot of trivialities of no interest whatever to a man who was facing eternity.

Disappointed, he gave it up. He submitted to their conspiracy of silence on eternal things. He obtained no comfort from them. But he wondered about these friends—were they sparing him, or were they sparing themselves the discomfort of considering the future?

HER HUSBAND had died some years before, and she was all alone. Most of those who had been very precious to her in life were now on the Other Side.

"Nobody will talk to me about it," she said. "They all turn me away, and chatter about a lot of things and activities in this life. I can't get any help or comfort from them. I know that this life is important now, and that we must carry on our work while we are in it. But I can't help thinking about my loved ones, too. And I want to talk about them."

The Preacher of Ecclesiastes said, "To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven. . . . a time to weep, and a time to laugh." And there is a time to comfort the bereaved, which is not to be done with idle chatter and inconsequential affairs of this world.

So we talked of God and heaven and of loved ones now committed to his care. And there is a vast amount of comfort to be derived from facing serious things seriously, and from considering eternal things while we are still the subjects of time.

PROBABLY IT HAS been a long time since anybody said to you, "Let's talk about God," or "I'd like to speak to you about your soul." If anybody did, you would be surprised, and maybe a little shocked. Wouldn't you consider it an invasion of your personal privacy, like being asked if you held family prayers or paid your tithing?

But there are times in life when we must answer personal questions. If not here, then when we reach Eternal Judgment. Better here, too, because it might improve the quality of our answers when we are called before that celestial bar.

If anybody asked you to talk about God, what testimony could you bear for Him? Could you help anyone on the welfare of his soul? Or could you give a bereaved person comfort concerning a relative who had been taken by death?

YOUR WHOLE LIFE simmers down, eventually, to the personal relationship that exists between you and God. Your status as a Christian and a church member depends upon it. Your responsibility as a homemaker, a parent, a citizen, rests on it. Your understanding of your obligation to God forms your code of ethics, your charity, your mercy, your forgiveness, your kindness. If you think of it, you have built your whole life upon a concept of your link with Eternal Goodness.

Your ability and willingness to help build the Christian community, the kingdom of God on earth, also depend on how close you have been to your Heavenly Father, and how well you understand him.

It is one thing to know God for yourself. It is another to be able to talk about him to others, and help them. It would be wonderful for you, and it would save many another soul if, through study and prayer, you could be so well informed that when somebody says, "Let's talk about God," you would not have to hand out stones, instead of the Bread of Life.

If you know people only as casual acquaintances, they may speak lightly and carelessly of many things. This is a mask to conceal deeper thoughts and feelings. They don't spread the plans of the inward citadel of life out for the world to see. Some simply avoid thinking very much of things that most deeply concern them. But on occasion and under necessity nearly all people have serious thoughts about life and eternity. They need to think of such things even if they do not talk of them.

New Catechism Opposed

In the light of present attempts to revise catechisms, we wonder how "wrong" Joseph Smith was about creeds in general. From recent press accounts of the general conference of the Presbyterians recently held at Grand Rapids, we cull the following: In complete unity on the budget, the delegates went through a "stormy period" in discussing a revision of their catechism.

A national "poll of the presbyteries defeated a proposal to ordain women by a close vote, without any flurry of feeling"; but when an attempt was made to "streamline" their catechism, the commissioners, it is reported, "broke out in shouts, boos, and applause." The proposed amendment was to the effect that "civil laws should be obeyed when they are in accordance with divine will."

A second fight took place when Dr. Clarence E. Macartney, pastor of First Church in Pittsburgh, took issue with questions centering around the theory there were three branches of "The Holy Catholic Church": Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and Protestant.

Dr. Macartney, moderator of the 1924 assembly, following his nomination by William Jennings Bryan, held Presbyterians historically adhere to the idea of a "universal, visible Christian church, consisting of all those who profess the true religion."

Saying he did not imply Roman Catholics were not part of "The visible church," he did declare the proposed revision would constitute "a wholesale endorsement of Roman Catholics with the Greek church thrown in for good measure."

Across the Desk

We quote from Statistician C. L. Olson's report on baptisms, dated July 25:

The total baptisms reported for the month of June of this year numbered 419, which, however, is about twelve per cent under the average for June for the past ten years. Nevertheless, there is an encouraging sign in that the total baptisms for the first six months of this year amount to 82 more than the same period in 1946. . . . It would appear that the downward trend, which started in 1940 and 1941, reached its lowest point during the last year of the war, may now have changed to an upward trend. In other words, the year 1946 was substantially better than the year 1945, and it would appear that the year 1947 may show a further continued improvement.

During the month of June the outstanding branches outside of Independence and stakes were Council Bluffs, Iowa, with twenty-nine baptisms; Long Beach, California, with fifteen baptisms; and Des Moines, Iowa, with eleven baptisms.

OLD HABITS OF THE MISSOURI RIVER

During the recent spring season, the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers made front page news day after day. Newsweek reported: "For forty days and forty nights the Mississippi and its tributaries have roared with anger . . . All through June the Missouri has been at flood stage." The Mississippi was at its highest crest in 103 years, and the Missouri broke a lot of records.

Reading back into the early history of the church, we discover that our early pioneers to Missouri found this habit of the "Big Muddy" already well established. In the Story of the Church recounting events in Independence and vicinity in 1831, Inez Smith Davis quotes from T. G. Omstot in Pioneers of Mason and Menard, who reported that the flood waters on the Missouri were "higher than they had been since Noah's flood." This paragraph is inserted from The Story of the Church describing the experiences of those Saints that season:

In the meantime the little group left alone in the 'wilderness' were trying faithfully to adapt themselves to pioneer life. They found much different conditions than they had in their home in the East. The frequent arrival of the missionaries now created much diversion, but the summer of 1831 had been as unseasonal as the winter of 1830. Dark, cold, and stormy from the time spring opened with waters "higher than they had been since Noah's flood," the summer had been one succession of floods and disasters until the people were afraid to venture on the water. The scientific papers of the Smithsonian Institute show torrential rains that summer such as were known only in the tropics. At last in August there came a "killing frost," nipping the corn so severely that it did not fully mature. Only a few grains were ripe enough for seed, so that seed for the following year's spring planting was scarce and very expensive. Many of the vegetables counted upon for winter stores failed, so the gathering Saints, who had no crops, found supplies hard to obtain as the season advanced. Deer and wild game still abounded, however, so there was no danger of actual starvation.—Page 81.

The destruction wrought by the floods of 1947, naturally, was far greater than in 1831. There is so much more to be destroyed now. Newsweek reported 35,000 persons driven from their homes, thousands of acres of priceless, corn-belt soil inundated, and the immediate loss running well into millions of dollars. The long-time loss is much greater. Enough valuable topsoil to make thousands of acres of farm land was washed away and went down the river, reminding us of the Biblical statement, "Whose land the rivers have spoiled." This could not have happened in 1831. Nature had taken care of that. In wooded areas, the soil was held down by a blanket of decayed leaves and a tangle of tree roots. The prairies were carpeted with the toughest conceivable wild prairie sod. I know by experience that it required three or four horses and a very special and very sharp type of ploughshare to cut through that sod and turn it over. Nature had her own program of soil conservation. Today, with the soil broken up for cultivation, it is very easily washed away. Flood prevention and soil conservation are among our greatest national problems. We developed those problems since we took the land from the Indians. It boils down to this: How can we have our corn and wheat and keep our soil?

"Gather My Saints Together Unto Me"

Sermon By Bishop G. L. DeLapp

(Reported by Rosamond Sherman and Gladys Gould, June 29, 1947)

The mighty God, even the Lord, hath spoken, and called the earth from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof.

Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined.

Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence; a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him.

He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people.

Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice.

And the heavens shall declare his righteousness; for God is judge himself.—Psalm 50: 1-6.

THERE IS ALWAYS the possibility that when one administers certain aspects of the work of the church, there is apt to be an over-emphasis in his pulpit ministry on those things which pertain to his particular responsibility. That may be true with me.

I wish to talk about the gathering. I make no apology for this discussion because consistently, day after day, hour after hour, there come to the desks of the members of the Presiding Bishopric letters having to do with certain questions affecting the relationship of the individual outside of Independence to the general program of the church, and, also, in respect to the question as to whether or not he should leave the branch or the district in which he lives and respond to the call of the gathering.

Because these problems are current, and because there is within our philosophy that which indicates that every individual has some sense of responsibility in respect to this great movement, I wish to present this discussion now.

The idea of the gathering together of those believing in God has been implanted in the minds of men almost from the beginning of time, from the beginning of those relationships between God and men. It is of this principle that the Psalmist wrote as just quoted; Isaiah referred to it in chapter 43, verses 4 to 9:

Since thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honorable, and I have loved thee; therefore will I give men for thee, and people for thy life.

Fear not; for I am with thee; I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west;

I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back; bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth;

Even every one that is called by my name; for I have created him for my glory, I have formed him; yea, I have made him.

Bring forth the blind people that have eyes, and the deaf that have ears.

Let all the nations be gathered together, and let the people be assembled; who among them can declare this, and show us former things? Let them bring forth their witnesses, that they may be justified; or let them hear, and say, It is truth.

As I have stated, there is inherent in the philosophy of the Restoration Movement, the belief that the gathering is a part of the divine plan for men. We find this set forth in the revelations which have been received by this church, as a divine principle, but it is also pointed out that its fruition can come only through the process of consecration. This we find pointed out and emphasized in Doctrine and Covenants 100: 6:

Let no man be afraid to lay down his life for my sake; for whoso layeth down his life for my sake, shall find it again. And whoso is not willing to lay down his life for my sake, is not my disciple. It is my will that my servant Sidney Rigdon shall lift up his voice in the congregations, in the eastern countries, in preparing the churches to keep the commandments which I have given unto them, concerning the restoration and redemption of Zion.

This prefaced the statement that it was the will of God that Parley P. Pratt and Lyman Wight should not return to the land of their brethren until they had obtained companies to go up unto the land of Zion, "by tens, or by twenties, or by fifties, or by an hundred, until they have obtained to the number of five hundred" in order to strengthen the body of the church to assist in the building of Zion.

THE PRINCIPLE OF the gathering, therefore, has been amply proved as essential to the establishment of Zion. In view of this it seems appropriate that we examine this principle in the light of present conditions. As we look about us in the world of today, we are inclined to raise certain questions.

People are asking these questions as they look abroad: "Will it be possible for the members of our church in foreign fields to gather to this country? What are the processes that the church is to follow in bringing about the gathering up of our people from all over the world? What obstacles will we meet, and how will we overcome them?" Of the many questions that could be raised, there are three that I shall try to answer now:

1. What are the aims of the gathering?
2. What is the attitude or policy of the church in respect thereto? (And in using the term "the church," I am thinking of the attitude of those who are in positions of administrative responsibility.)
3. How is the gathering to be accomplished?

It must be recognized that one could spend hours in the discussion of any one of these three questions, but as they are all related, perhaps in the discussion we can cover some phases of them which will stimulate us to further consideration, not only of the problems of the church as a whole, not only in respect to how the church is to carry out this movement of the gathering, but how we may relate ourselves to it individually.

FIRST: "What are the aims of the gathering?" In a general sense, they have been defined as the building of a community of people with like ideals, with a similar concept of God and of his Son, Jesus Christ, but with a theology supplemented by the development of business and economic relationships through which there is evidenced reasonable assurance of intent to observe the rule taught by Jesus Christ, the Son of God, when he said, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise." This is even more clearly defined in a revelation which we find given in Doctrine and Covenants 36: 2, "The Lord called his people Zion because they were of one heart and one mind, and dwelt in righteousness; and there was no poor among them."

in his sermon at the Stone Church emphasized that the great objective is to develop a community which will give expression to the Christian way of life. I think the definition which I have given indicates the fact that there can be no expression of the Christian way of life unless there is belief in a theology—in a doctrine—which is supplemented by some phase of organization having to do with our economic and our business affairs, and that those relationships shall be established between men which will eventually result in that condition described in the revelation given defining Zion.

Zion does not necessarily mean a segregation of individuals into a community living separate and apart from others of the world, but it does suggest rather definitely that communities shall be built in which there are sufficient numbers who believe in this way of life that their influence shall dominate every activity of that community. There must be, in fact, a majority of that kind of people in such a community if it is to exemplify the Zionite ideals in which we believe as a church.

This last statement does not suggest, either, that it is not the responsibility of this church to build a community wherein shall be found an example of a spiritual and economic life blended to such a point that there shall be harmony and good will expressed in our everyday relationships with one another. Zion cannot be established—that type of a community life cannot take place or be developed—except where there is a gathering of people who are of like minds and have similar ideas, who believe in God and in his Son, Jesus Christ, and are willing to work and associate themselves together in a fraternity and fellowship of life through which may be given expression in everyday relationships of good will one toward another.

These general aims call for the preparation or the laying of a foundation upon which such a community can be built. In the economic sense, this calls for the acquisition of land areas, the development of economic resources, the training and utilization of skilled workmen, and the development of trained management. In the spiritual sense, it calls for consecration, for those who are to assist in building should gather in the spirit of sacrifice. There is also need for adequate church buildings which can be provided only as members respond in supplying resources by contributing according to their ability. Spiritual growth is also dependent upon consecrated leaders.

All of the foregoing is basic to the gathering. These are, in fact, the general aims of the gathering—the gathering of God's people, organized in their economic and spiritual life, living together in a community where they shall have the spirit to give expression to such good fellowship and fraternity.

IN ANSWER to the question, "What is the attitude or the policy of the church in respect to the gathering?" I think perhaps the best way to explain the position of the church is to call attention to a statement made by the late President Frederick M. Smith, as published in the Saints' Herald of October 23, 1943:

With the church debt liquidated, there has been in general among the membership a rather rapidly growing inclination to look to our goals. As one result of this there has been a re-arousing of the always present interest in the gathering of the saints into the "regions round-about." This is a part of the establishment of Zion.

In addition to this statement, let me call attention to that portion of the report made by our present First Presidency to the last General Conference, when reference was made to the gathering under Point 3 of the program:

Advance the gathering with vigor, while yet doing our utmost to retain in points distant from Independence those ministers and members whose services are necessary in the development of those centers.

The gathering has been taught (and the policies relating to it have been quite consistently similar) by all the Presiding Bishoprics of the church, and the procedures have been, for the most part, similar. Perhaps, over the period of years, there has been some refining in some of the procedures and policies reflecting the relationships of the individual members of the church in respect to the gathering, but insofar as general purpose and intent is concerned, and consideration of the gathering as a divine movement, there has been no drawing away on the part of any of the administrative officers of the church at any time. Today there is the declaration that we have made from the pulpit from time to time that the gathering is a part of the divine movement of God's church among his people. So there is this degree of unanimity in the attitude of the general church officials, both past and present; and as we look to the future, we see no reason whatsoever, despite conditions throughout the entire world, that there shall be any drawing away from this major emphasis, nor from this movement of the gathering of God's people.

I trust that this explanation will cover briefly, but nevertheless clearly, the position of the general administrative officers of the church relative to the need for the gathering of God's people from all quarters of the earth.

THE THIRD question is, "How is the gathering to be accomplished?" In this realm of our thinking there may be some lack of unity because there are those in the church today who emphasize the need for the gathering without explanation, without analytical study, or due consideration of the responsibility of the individual, first to the church, secondly to himself, and thirdly to the movement of the gathering. But I believe that even in recent years this lack of unity in respect to procedure to be followed has largely been eliminated, and today the councils of the church are in agreement in respect to the policies which are to be followed in the movement of individuals, families, and groups from other areas into the central place.

I want to emphasize that there is great need for consideration of the development of nuclei in various centers throughout the world. Shortly after the Conference it was my privilege to travel in some seven of the nine districts under the supervision of Apostle Jensen. This took me into Canada and Ohio, contacting thousands of people. Many of our people are thinking of their responsibility to the church. Should they leave their branch? Should they leave their district and move to Independence or to one of the supporting stakes?

It was necessary for us from time to time to emphasize this one fact—that there are certain responsibilities that we have as a church to people everywhere. We owe something to people throughout the entire world who have not heard the gospel message and who have not known of the existence of a church like ours that holds a social philosophy such as we have. As long as there are these untold millions of people throughout the world who have not heard or known or come in contact with the gospel message, it continues to be the responsibility of the church to establish itself in every metropolitan center in the United States and Canada, and in every large metropolitan area in foreign fields, that we may reach out through the entire world, preaching and teaching the gospel of Jesus Christ. And in that preaching and teaching may be found those who through the selective process may be asked or encouraged to move to these central areas, to where they can make a contribution to the community which we think of as Zion.

It is essential that, as one of the first steps in our policy, we not only maintain those branches in outlying centers and in countries abroad, but that we develop new nuclei around which we can build and through which we can disseminate information relating to the gospel of Jesus Christ. The doctrine and philosophy of the church can be taught to individuals interested, in such centers, and information can be disseminated to stimulate interest in others.

OUR DOCTRINE has been defined, our Epitome of Faith agreed upon, but our philosophy has been in the process of growth. We have nevertheless achieved a philosophy of life, and by philosophy I mean a systematic body of general concepts which from experience we have developed to some degree until there are implications of the fact that they may be applied to life as we find it. Among these general principles may be considered belief in stewardship, man's responsibility to God to be expressed through the consecration of all the resources he possesses, recognition of the ownership of God, and of men's responsibility one to another. We have also developed as a part of our philosophy the idea that there must be competence on the part of individuals, that God-given talents are to be developed and utilized in the service and interest not only of self, but of men everywhere, and to be consecrated and dedicated to the great and eternal purposes of God, and to the establishment of his kingdom here upon the earth.

In other words, we have developed a philosophy of Zion, and we believe that philosophy—if it is to stand the test today—must have some practical application, as there must be evidence of the practical possibilities within a movement if it is to attract the attention of intelligent men and women everywhere throughout the world.

If we are correct in asserting the need for the establishment of branches and missions throughout the world, it necessarily follows that our missionary endeavors must be given major emphasis, and that the gathering can proceed in about the proportion that we establish such centers. In those centers we must train men and women in a way of life which will materialize in a fuller expression in a gathered condition. If our organization is to have influence

An Inquiry Into Facts

By Israel A. Smith

THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST of Latter Day Saints was organized at Fayette, New York, on April 6, 1830, by Joseph Smith and others. He was selected to be its head and served as its president until his death on June 27, 1844. Controversy among the members as to procedure and other questions broke the church into several separate groups, each claiming to be the rightful and lawful successor to, or continuation of the original church. Of these there still exist two major and some three minor groups. My purpose is to consider briefly and conclusively the question of lawful succession as related to the major organizations, which are the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, with headquarters at Independence, Missouri, and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, with headquarters at Salt Lake City, Utah, commonly called the Mormons.*

The courts of the United States, federal and state, have followed the decisions of the English courts in litigation wherein factions set up conflicting claims as to succession to a parent church. The rule has been long recognized and is, therefore, fully established, and it is as follows: That organization among members of the original body, regardless of its numbers, which adheres to the practice, tenets, and doctrines of the original church will be held to be the lawful successor. This rule, then, should and, in fact, does simplify our task, and it remains for us to determine which of these organizations, if either, has abandoned original beliefs or has adopted other tenets that are either adverse or inconsistent with them.

RULE ESTABLISHED

It is of vital importance to know the method by which the church originally adopted its code of doctrines and tenets:

Five years after it was organized, on August 17, 1835, a General Assembly of the church convened at Kirtland, Ohio, for the express purpose of considering the report of a committee appointed to select the revelations to constitute the doctrine and covenants of the church. The proceedings of this authoritative body were published in an official book of the church, called the Doctrine and Covenants, published first in 1835, which proceedings have been included in every edition of that book (of both the Reorganized and the Mormon churches), so there is and can be no dispute as to the facts relating to what was done by that General Assembly.

The record shows that each section was adopted by the unanimous vote of each and every quorum constituting the General Assembly, and then by the unanimous vote of the entire assembly. This procedure then fixed and forever established the rule by which the tenets and doctrines of the church could be approved, modified or changed: They could not be approved, modified, or changed except by action of a General Assembly or a General Conference (of equal authority in legislative matters).

OUR CLAIMS

We allege (and no claim has ever been made to the contrary) that the Reorganized Church has adhered and does now give its allegiance to the doctrines and beliefs of the church adopted on August 17, 1835, and to no doctrine or tenet or belief in any sense contrary to or inconsistent with them. We stand ready to defend our organization against the claims of any who challenge this statement.

We charge, however, that the Mormon church does now and for many years has given approval to doctrines and practices which were never the doctrines or practices of the church during the lifetime of Joseph Smith, but expressly and indisputably contrary to and inconsistent with them. If we can support this claim, then it is obvious that the Mormon church was and is a departure and therefore is an apostate body.

While there are in fact a number of innovations advocated by the Mormon Church from 1844 on, I shall deal with but two of them.

INDICTMENT NUMBER 1

The Mormon Church openly practiced polygamy or plural wifery as a religious principle or doctrine for many years. This doctrine and practice was predicated on a document which they allege came from Joseph Smith, prophet and founder of Latter Day Saintism. This claim, made public for the first time many years after his death, was immediately challenged and denied by many of his associates and by his family, so it has always been a controverted matter.

While our position has never changed, and we still deny Joseph Smith was responsible for either the doctrine or practice of polygamy or that he was a polygamist, and have always demanded proof by competent evidence, and are always willing to resist such claim whenever or wherever made, yet, for the purpose of this inquiry, Mormon claims about plural marriage and its inception are wholly immaterial and irrelevant unless they can and do show that the church during the lifetime and leadership of Joseph Smith, by action of a General Conference or a General Assembly, approved and adopted as a doctrine the principle of polygamy. THIS WAS NEVER DONE, and that fact was obviously confessed and admitted by the proceedings of a Special Conference of the Mormons at Salt Lake City, Utah, held on August 29, 1852, when their then leader, Brigham Young, "proclaimed" the new principle and declared it was well known what his people had been doing in a "social way." Even then no effort was made to approve, neither was any motion to approve offered, asked for or invited.*

NO ACTION WAS TAKEN.

That plural marriage was a departure, a heresy, is conclusively proved by the fact that the same General Assembly which met on August 17, 1835, unanimously approved the following resolution:

Inasmuch as this Church of Christ has been reproached with the crime of fornication, and polygamy; we declare that we believe that one man should have one wife; and one woman but one husband, except in case of death, when either is at liberty to marry again.—Doctrine and Covenants 111: 4.

In the light of these incontrovertible facts, how can the Mormon Church escape the charge made years ago and restated again that polygamy was not a doctrine of the original church? Its practice by them as a doctrine of belief was an undeniable apostasy.

INDICTMENT NUMBER 2

The Mormons believe in a plurality of Gods; they not only believe it, but they ardently advocate it as a principle or doctrine. This none will deny.

We charge that such a belief or doctrine is contrary to the beliefs and tenets of the church during the leadership of Joseph Smith and therefore is an apostasy.

The first statement of the Epitome of Faith prepared and published by Joseph Smith in 1842 contained the following:

We believe in God the Eternal Father, and in his Son Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Ghost.

Like polygamy, this strange doctrine—strange because new, to say nothing of its similarity to the beliefs of heathen peoples—is premised on documents attributed to Joseph Smith, denied by many, but in any event of doubtful authenticity.

We consider them but briefly, in fact,

*The dilemma would have been aggravated had this conference been asked to vote on it. The implications would have been obvious.

casually, and that for their historical aspects only.

First, a translation (correct, or not, I do not know) by Joseph Smith of what he said was a "purported" document, which appeared from its language to have been written by Abraham, deposited with a mummy in Egypt and brought with the mummy to this country. The whole story is fantastic, to say the least, but there are certain facts which to us are convincing is not indeed conclusive on vital questions involved.

In the first place, when Joseph Smith published it, he was the sole "editor and proprietor" of the Times and Seasons, official church paper at Nauvoo, Illinois.

1. He did not allege the document was in fact a writing by Abraham.

2. He did not allege it contained anything relating to church doctrine or that it was a change of doctrine (as it certainly was, if the Mormons are correct in their interpretation of it*).

3. Strange to relate, he did not even say he had translated the document.

But outside and beyond all this, the fact that speaks so loudly and conclusively is that this doctrine or the document on which it is based was never presented to any General Conference or General Assembly of the church for adoption or approval.

If Joseph Smith recognized anything in it as intended for doctrine, he owed a duty to say so when he published it; but he did not do so. There was no other publication of it by him. Seven years after his death, it was published in Liverpool, England.

This new and strange doctrine is premised also—in part at least—on a sermon alleged to have been given by Joseph Smith on April 7, 1844, at the funeral of a church member by the name of King Follet. No reliable or authentic report of this sermon was made. Years later it was published as a "hearsay" document made up by some four men who had taken notes in longhand, not one of them being a stenographer.

Besides this, the General Conference was in session at the time, and Joseph Smith would undoubtedly have presented anything in the way of doctrine, new or modified, to the Conference for its approval. We have a right to assume he would have done so. If a change of doctrine, he certainly should have done so.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons we hold the Mormon Church to be in apostasy from the original Latter Day Saint faith. If it is, neither in law nor logic could it possibly be considered the true church in succession to the one organized by Joseph Smith.

*Joseph F. Smith, Jr., Mormon Historian, in a baccalaureate address within recent weeks, advocated the principle as distinctively Latter Day Saint doctrine.

MRS. MISSIONARY LOOKS AHEAD

THE JOHNSONS—GLEN, ALICE, AND DAUGHTER, GLENDA FERN.

One of the happiest moments of our life as a missionary family was this April when we were asked to accept an appointment to Great Britain. My husband and I had been striving to fit ourselves educationally and spiritually in order to best serve our Master and the church. This appointment overseas gave us the feeling that perhaps our efforts were acceptable, and we would be given the chance to tell the story of the Restoration to others who may not have had the opportunity to hear it.

We partially understand the hardships our service may involve, but I am sure the work will be so rewarding spiritually that it will make up for whatever physical comforts we may have to give up. We do not feel we will be making a sacrifice. This is another assignment in our appointments through life. Such has been our experience in the past that we place our lives in the care of our Master and have faith that he will take care not only of our own immediate family but all of our missionaries in their efforts to serve.

My earliest recollections are of life in Australia where my father was missionary, then Hawaii for a few years, and different sections of the United States. This background gives me a slight indication of what we are to experience. I hope I will be as helpful a missionary's wife as mother was. It seems to me she could do anything. I know I fall short in many respects, but I am more than willing to try. I hope the Saints overseas will bear with me.

Glen and I feel a thrill of pleasure at our chance to prove "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord." Glenda Fern is a part of this, too. She talks constantly about going to England. Every morning we hear this question, "Is today the day we go to England?"

We certainly appreciate the Zion's League goal for the year—we still feel that we are a part of the organization. We're sure the work the League is doing here is a big step forward in tying the young people in with the vital work of the church.

A drama of destiny, played in the presence of eternity, with characters living and dead, great and obscure, examining a man's responsibility to his God, and to his people

(Beat of the drums heard in marching cadence.)

Senator (reading letter): "And I feel that I cannot again run for office. I trust that you will take this letter as a complete, absolute, and irrevocable refusal to allow my name to be submitted." There. That should be satisfactory.

Spirit of Statesmanship: It is not satisfactory to me.

Senator (registering surprise in voice): Who are you?

Spirit of Statesmanship: I am the spirit of statesmanship. I am very old and sometimes have almost died; but in 1776 I was born anew. Listen.

(Beat of drums again, dying away as voice begins.)

Voice from Past: We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal.

Patrick Henry: I know not what course others may take, but as for me, give me liberty or give me death.

Senator: I know all those things. I used to be thrilled with the idea of serving my country. That is why I consented to leave my thriving business and go to Washington six years ago. Six years of striving. Six years of running small errands for my constituents. Six years of trying to find time to study deeply into public needs. Six years of trying to make right choices in voting upon issues affecting the lives of people at home and abroad. Six years of being misunderstood, misquoted, and often unappreciated. Six years of agony.

Spirit of Statesmanship: And six years of being a statesman instead of a cheap politician. Look. Yonder is a woman who voted for you. Let her speak.

Woman Voter: I voted for you, Senator, because I thought you were a man of understanding and ability. I felt that you were honest and that I could trust you. I have a little boy at home, Senator. His father lies under a white cross in an island of the Pacific. Sir, I want what he died for to live on. I want life for my little boy—not death in another war. I voted for you because I thought you were strong enough to help put the world to rights.

Senator (in tired voice): But I am not strong. Honest, yes—and I hope I have a little understanding. But the situation is hopeless.

Spirit of Statesmanship: Listen. (Beat of drums, dying away in a moment.)

Abraham Lincoln: A nation cannot exist half slave and half free. (Beat of drums.) And government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

Senator (in impatient tone): I know. I know. But times are difficult now. Never before have selfish interests been so brazen. Pressure groups—ever hear of them?

Spirit of Statesmanship: And never before has the country been in such need of honest men to guard its ideals.

Senator: Ideals that languish and almost die.

Spirit of Statesmanship: Ideals that grow. That are still growing. When ideals grow there is friction and conflict. It is inevitable. When our forefathers spoke of men being free and equal, they did not vision the ideal in its wholeness. They wanted freedom for themselves, the while some of them owned, without thought, slaves and indentured servants. A man who hadn't a specified amount of money or property could not vote. But the idea, once crystalized into words, grew in meaning. (Rhythm of drum.) Listen to voices from the past.

Voices from the Past: All men are created equal. (Drums.) Liberty or death. (Drums.) Slavery must go. (Drums.) There must be decent wages and working hours for men and women. (Drums.) I call for a law banning child labor. (Drums.) We must improve our schools. (Drums.) We need public health nurses. (Drums.) We must fight to make the world safe for Democracy. (Drums.) I am my brother's keeper—he must not starve. (Drums.) United Nations—one world. (Drums beat in slightly quickened tempo for seconds longer.)

Statesmanship: See how the ideal, once expressed, expands and grows? Now it has encircled the world. Why, even little children of the very poor in countries far across the sea look to us. What do you see now?

Senator: Two small children, dressed in queer clothing, and they look hungry and tired.

Statesmanship: They have no home. And they are tired and hungry. They are victims of old world greed and oppression where men who could be statesmen are engrossed in their own concerns, leaving their lands to tyranny or chaos. But listen.

Little Boy: Let us walk father, little sister. Maybe somebody will ask us in and give us bread and a place to sleep.

Little Girl: But I'm so tired. (Whimpers.) I want my mother. I know she's dead, but I want her. And I'm hungry.

Little Boy (stoutly): Don't cry; we'll find food, and by and by we'll somehow get to America. And I can work there and give you all the potatoes and turnips and bread you can eat—and even milk.

Little Girl: Milk? What's that?

Little Boy: I forgot, you never tasted milk. It's the best stuff you ever drank. There's lots of it in America. (Voice trails off.)

Senator: That's just it. They think we're wonderful and they come here, thousands of them, and find there is a struggle for a living here, too. They find the streets are not paved with gold. They find wickedness and corruption among government officials. They find—

Statesmanship: They find many other things, too. Let me show you something else. Look yonder. What do you see?

Senator: I see what looks to be a poorly furnished living room in some foreign quarter of a large city. I can see streetcars and busses passing the window. I see a woman who looks not old, not young, but somehow lacking in personality—a vacant expression on her face. She rocks to and fro in her chair, now and then starting up in fear. I see another woman working busily at some household task. She sings little snatches of song, but her face is grim. Now a young man comes in. He seems very proud of something. Ah, now he goes to the table in the center of the room and places some money on it—a little pile of bills.

Young Man: Look, Mother—a raise. Now I make forty dollars every week.

Mother (wonder in her voice): Forty dollars. Now we can save a little.

Young Man: Yes, and before long I start in my own business. And here I do not have to make shoes just because my father made shoes and his father and grandfather also made shoes. I am free to do as I like.

Mother (with a sigh): But you wanted to be a doctor.

Young Man: And I will be a doctor—in time.

Mother (bitterly): In time. Yes—you are free—free to work like slave all day, to study like slave all night—if I had the President here, I tell him what I think. Just what I think—

As Sounding Brass

By M. J. Crowley

Woman (who has been rocking, with a scream): No—oh, no—do not talk so. There are people listening, always listening—

Young Man (gently): You keep forgetting Aunt Trina, that you are in America. In America we can talk as we like and say what we want.

Aunt Trina (hysterically): I knew it, I knew it, police, police—

(Enter policeman carrying little girl. He is followed by a public health nurse.)

Policeman: Good day to you. This little girls says she lives here.

Aunt Trina: Oh, please, sir, my sister talks too much but she means no harm. Do not take her away, sir, I beg you—she wouldn't hurt the president, sir.

Policeman (puzzled): What's she talking about?

Mother (in alarmed tone): What's wrong with my little girl? Why are you carrying her? What happened?

Nurse: Do not be alarmed. I am sure she is not hurt seriously. There was a car accident on the next street where the children play a great deal. Your little daughter was thrown to the ground and scratched up a bit, but I think she is more frightened than hurt. But you might bring her to the clinic tomorrow and let the doctor check on it.

Aunt Trina: She is really a very good woman, sir, and very patriotic, but she gets tired and says things that sound bad. But she means nothing by it. Please don't take her away.

Policeman: My good woman, I've no intention of taking anyone away.

Young Man: Don't let her annoy you, sir. She was very sick after we got her here in America, and her memory was affected. Sometimes she thinks she is back in the old country.

Policeman: Oh, I see.

Mother: She and I were daughters of a physician in Germany. We were well-educated and married well. My husband did not like Hitler from the very first, and he brought us over here before the war. Her husband opposed Hitler, but he stayed on. The Gestapo got him. Her oldest boy was killed in the war. A bombing raid killed the rest of her children. We sent for her and managed to bring her here a few weeks ago. Then came her illness—and now (Bitterly.) she doesn't remember whether she's here or there.

Nurse: Bring her with you when you come to the clinic tomorrow. We have a fine nerve specialist there. He may be able to help her.

Mother: Thank you, thank you.

Policeman: I must go. After this, little girl, watch out for the cars.

Young Man: Mother, I went to the courthouse today. The boss is very kind; he let me have two hours.

Mother: And you are now a citizen?

Oh, I am glad! This country may have its faults, but it's the best on God's earth.

Young Man: No, Mother, I did not pass the test.

Mother: Not pass! Why, you knew it all—could quote it all from memory.

Young Man: That is what the judge said, Mother. He said I had concentrated on remembering the words, and now he wants me to study their meaning—especially the Bill of Rights. And he is right. Mother, he said that when we have rights, we also have responsibility and a good citizen must understand that. I studied the meanings of these rights on the way home: Freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of religion, right of trial by jury, right to go into our homes and feel secure—no one can come in and search you without plenty of legal reason, and they can't take away your property. They can't torture you or inflict unusual punishments on you, even if you're a criminal. I watched the faces of the others at the courthouse today, Mother, and I saw the hope shining in their eyes. People of many nations were there and of all shades of color. A brown Hindu sat beside a pale-faced Catholic nun. I watched them as they took the oath of allegiance. It was solemn—like being in a wonderful church.

Mother: Yes, America is the world's hope—the only hope. I know it, too. We must know our rights and our responsibilities. Then we will know how to vote and how to talk and keep our freedom. Then we can help give hope to the world.

Young Man: That's the word, the good word, Mother—hope. It is what I have in my heart and why I do not get sad when things are hard. What are difficulties? I am young, I am strong, and I am free.

(Beat of drums as they retire and senator and spirit of statesmanship step forward.)

Statesmanship: Well, Senator—how about it? Have you no hope? Have you no freedom? Have you no responsibility?

Senator (greatly moved): Spirit, I thank you. You have given me back my better self—take this letter. I will submit to the desires of the people. I will serve to the best of my ability as long as they wish me to. I feel—I feel as if I had been on a real journey into foreign lands—makes me think of a poem I learned in school long ago—

Statesmanship: Quote it, Senator, quote it. It is good for us to express our better feelings sometimes.

Senator:
Breathes there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said:
"This is my own—my native land"?
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned,
As home his footsteps he hath turned,

I WONDER if we are fully conscious of present conditions, politically, morally, and economically. The world has leaned heavily on scholastic training to bring about a state of Utopia. That this can be brought to pass is a fallacy, and the proof of it lies in the fact that men in high places and of good repute are deeply concerned about the future. If man's mind is growing more keen and much more alive because it is motivated by the desire for material progress or worldly gain, then, by the same token, the heart of man, from which springs the issues of life and the directive force of the universe, is lagging behind because of lack of spiritual desires and a deep conviction relative to the purposes of God in man.

"Man was created that he might have joy," and joy is not a product of the mind. That man's progress and growth might be properly balanced to reach the stature of a man in Christ Jesus, it is absolutely essential that the directive force on those dominant desires in life be endowed with the vision which floods the soul revealing the glory of God and bringing an unmistakable conviction that through him and him alone comes security from the ills of mankind. "That man's inhumanity to man" might become a relic of the past, it is fundamental that brotherly love be preached and practiced. This is the task of the ministers of Christ through the gospel.

But there is more to it than that; the gospel came not in word only but in power and much assurance. If we have nothing to present to the world but the word, then we may as well close up shop because we are just another church adding to the theological confusion and worldly chaos. Men's hearts are failing them because of a cramped horizon. Within the bounds of that horizon there is no assurance or manifestation of spiritual power. The church must lift that horizon by creating within the souls of men a vision that transcends all worldly desires in bringing the love of God into everyday living.

It matters not how erudite we may become, we are as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal in a world gone mad unless we have the Spirit of God to demonstrate with power the truth that Jesus is the Christ—the only Saviour of the world.

From wandering on a foreign strand?

Roy A. Cheville

A brief biography of Dr. Cheville, the personal friend of thousands of young people during a lengthening span of years in service at Graceland College. This sketch was prepared for the Fiftieth Anniversary of Graceland, which was celebrated in 1945.

It is impossible to judge accurately the influence Roy Cheville has had on Graceland College. Since he came to the college faculty in 1923, he has exerted great influence in the lives of individual students. Hundreds think of him as the one who guided them to an understanding of their church, and he—more than any other person—represents “religion” and “the church” at Graceland. “He didn’t tell me what to do, but he helped me to decide for myself,” is the expression of many young people who, when puzzled, disillusioned, or awakened by a little learning, dropped in to “have a talk” with Cheville.

Roy Arthur Cheville, son of George and Charlotte Bachou Cheville, was born on a farm near Maxwell, Iowa, October 2, 1897. His mother was born in Yorkshire, England, and his father near Guelph, Ontario. They made their home in Rhodes, Iowa, in 1911. Before this, Roy attended rural school.

He has not only talked about the church and its message, but his life is a living testimony of the power of the gospel of Christ, for from the time Roy Cheville joined the church, it has been the central force in his life, giving purpose and unifying all the other many activities. Most Gracelanders are familiar with the story of the Latter Day Saint series of meetings held in the Rhodes town hall in 1914. Roy and his sister were invited to help with the music. At the close of the series, both were baptized on January 14, 1914, in a little pond from which a large block of ice had been sawed to provide a baptismal font. He became an active member of the small local group, and in 1915 was ordained a deacon.

Next followed a long period of training, beginning at Drake University, then Iowa State Teacher’s College, Graceland, and the University of Chicago. College life was broken by periods of school-teaching, first in a rural school and then in a small town school in northern Iowa. During this time he was also active in the church, serving as a deacon for two years, a priest for one year, and then as an elder. For a time he served as pastor of the branch at Nevada, Iowa.

In response to his desire to serve the church, Roy enrolled in Graceland College in the first class in religious education. He was twenty-one years old. His plans were to go to Norway as a missionary. Shortly after school began, a six weeks’ siege of typhoid fever effectively stopped his college life for that year, and he became a missionary in the Des Moines District. He was made counselor to the district president.

The next fall found him at Graceland again, this time majoring in Spanish. He planned to study in Spain or South America for at least two years after leaving Graceland, then to return to this country to teach Spanish to young missionaries. The church abandoned that plan of missionary attack, however, and before Roy left Graceland for the University of Chicago, President Briggs had asked him to prepare to return to the Graceland faculty. He received his Bachelor of Arts degree from Chicago in 1922, his Master of Arts in 1923, and as a result of summer schools his Bachelor of Divinity in 1925.

Mr. Cheville was the first member of the Reorganized Church to receive a degree in religion. His experience in the university has been unusual because there was no precedent in the church for him to follow. The subject of his Master’s thesis was, “The Function of Music in Religious Education.” When, after tedious years of delay because of the depression and home responsibilities, he resumed work toward his Doctor of Philosophy degree, he was granted the rare privilege of writing about his own church. This is a remarkable tribute to his open-mindedness and his mastery of the objective approach to research, even in an area which exerted the strongest emotional pulls. He received his doctor’s degree in the summer of 1943.

The routine life of the young professor was changed when a certain California co-ed enrolled at Graceland. Nell Weldon and Roy Cheville were engaged. It was their secret, but somehow it slipped. Roy’s club brothers in the Royal 13 cut two long poles, built a rather precarious throne draped with a club blanket, and lay in ambush. As Roy left class that afternoon he was quickly surrounded, placed on the throne and hoisted to the shoulders of the enthusiastic students. Others had abducted Nell, and she was hoisted to a shaky position beside him where, to keep from falling, she had to cling to his embarrassingly public embrace. Then the parade started, picking up more students by the second, until the campus had been covered and classes for the afternoon hopelessly interrupted. Roy and Nell were married December 23, 1929—just a little early for a Christmas present. The Chevilles have two children, a son born in 1931 and a daughter born in 1937.

“I don’t see how Cheville keeps going at the pace he sets.” “I never knew a man who got as much work done as he does.” “He can do anything and do it well.” These are statements frequently uttered by the friends of Roy Cheville. In the winter months, students can look out of the windows of Marietta Hall as they sleepily shut off the alarm clock and see the light burning in Cheville’s office. “That’s when I get my work done,” he says, “when nobody is around to bother me.” And students on the way to breakfast look in his window and see him bent over his desk, preparing for the day’s classes, planning the student social program for the coming quarter, outlining the assembly program for the week, preparing for the student fellowship meeting Wednesday evening, writing a new quarterly for the general church, or answering a letter from a lonely, bewildered young person. He’s the busiest man on the campus. During the day, there is a constant stream of students trickling into his office. When he isn’t there, they poke their heads in the next door and ask, “Does Dr. Cheville have a class this hour? When will he be back?”

Students with romantic problems, students confused about life in general, student committees wanting help, students just wanting to talk, students of former years returning for a visit, and a dozen faculty committees conspire to prevent him from doing very much personal work during the day. In spite of all this, his work production schedule continues to amaze all who know him.

What are Cheville's contributions to Graceland? A partial list reveals his versatility at once. To most students he represents THE CHURCH at Graceland. Not only does he teach courses in religion, but the religious life of the students is under his guidance. Ever alert to changing conditions and student attitudes, he has gradually, over a period of years, evolved the most distinctive service in Graceland life—the student fellowship. This meeting, uniquely fitted to student needs, has the warmth and fervor of the old-fashioned prayer meeting from which it evolved, the sincerity and high ideals of youth, and the spirit of worship heightened by aesthetic appeals and meaningful symbols. It appeals to students because it frequently rises from the concerns of their immediate problems; it is educational; it answers their questions concerning the church and its philosophy; it is infinitely varied, providing intellectual stimulation and emotional warmth. The man who is almost singly responsible for these meetings is Roy Cheville. His concern for them is shown by his confession, "These meetings take a lot out of me. I spend literally hours getting ready for one."

As a teacher, Roy shows his interest in foreign languages. He has developed a strange sign language all his own, and unless he has a piece of chalk in his hand and a scrawl-and-diagram covered blackboard at his back, he isn't quite at home. His courses have been popular because students have a genuine desire to learn about religion. They find the vitality and application of the Chevillian teaching a welcome relief from adult sermons, and haphazard "Sunday school."

The social life on the campus also bears the stamp of Cheville's personality. Students soon discover that his spontaneous laughter makes any party more fun, and his reputation for originality makes him in constant demand to help plan social activities of all kinds. He never shows that he is bored. He has a boundless enthusiasm which overflows and sweeps others along with him. As director of student life at Graceland, all activities of the campus stem from his office. Recitals, concerts, lectures, banquets, parties—large and small—sports events, and commencement activities all find their way to the student activity calendar on his bulletin board. As sponsor of the student council, he guides that organization and helps it plan policies and activities for the entire student body. Graceland wouldn't be quite the same without the group singing under his enthusiastic leadership. All sorts of songs from the most soulful of lyrics to the most ridiculous of ballads are in his repertoire. One moment he is stomping his feet and waving both arms like a cheer leader; the next he is gazing wistfully toward the heavens with an agonizing, sentimental, yearning expression on his face. Once he gets the crowd warmed up, they really sing. Many a student party would have dragged miserably on to boredom, but Roy, or "Unk," as he was known in earlier days, rescued it, spiced it up on the spur of the moment, and turned it to fun. His emphasis on adequate planning for everything has resulted in his being involved in almost all school social affairs, both student and faculty.

Another of Cheville's many accomplishments is writing. When he is planning a special service for the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, a Lamoni Reunion, or a Graceland Religious Emphasis Week, he spends long hours working on the needs to be met, the purpose, the theme. Then, very frequently, he catches up the central idea in a special hymn composed for the occasion. The best known of his hymns arose from his love for Graceland. When he joined the college staff there was no Alma Mater hymn adequately expressing the spirit of Graceland. Roy thought about this problem for a long time. Finally, as he sat in a Pullman car on the way to a summer session of the University of California, he gathered his thoughts of Graceland, past, present, and future, and sketched the skeleton of a poem. One evening later on while at Berkeley, he took his sketch of lines and went up the hills just back of the campus. Stretched out under the eucalyptus trees and looking toward the Golden Gate, he wrote the lines as we now sing them. The tune went right along with the words—it was not an afterthought. He felt that a steady, dignified air with a stately tempo should be the musical setting. He sketched off the notes and passed them on to Franklyn Weddle, then a student at Graceland, who worked out a tentative arrangement that was used until Verna Schaar effected the form that is used today.

Roy Cheville's influence has been felt far beyond the bounds of Graceland's campus. As the only professionally trained specialist in religious education in the church, he has generously contributed to the educational materials used by the general church. He has helped shape courses, has written innumerable quarterlies for all ages from junior high to adult, has written the church's only scholarly book on the Bible, has contributed frequently to the Saints' Herald, has planned youth programs for the entire church for a complete year, time after time, and has served unofficially and without recognition as an adviser to the general church Department of Religious Education. He has traveled all over the United States and parts of Canada to reunions, institutes, and youth conventions. His appeal to young people makes him in constant demand not only by our own church folk, but by neighboring towns. He has taken an active part in the work of the local church in Lamoni while doing all these other things. As early as 1925, he was chosen as counselor to Lamoni Stake President Wilbur Prall. He has continued in the stake presidency almost continuously since that time, working with T. S. Williams, Blair Jenson, and Dan Sorden. At a time when he was almost hopelessly overburdened with college, general church, and community responsibilities, a time of crisis arose in which Lamoni Stake had no president. And for nearly a year Roy Cheville acted as stake president, carrying out a vigorous and successful program. For years he has been responsible not only for the religious education of the college students, but also for the entire Lamoni congregation. And when, after a dozen years of waiting and doing without a church home, the Lamoni congregation started activity toward building a new church, it was Roy Cheville as chairman of the building committee who spent untold hours working and praying over church plans and problems, and turned a great problem into a valuable experience in group education and a means of spiritual growth.

Sometimes the intellectual and spiritual life of Roy Cheville has been a little lonely. There are so few in the church who share his vision and understanding. Perhaps one of his greatest contributions is that he is a pioneer in church theology and philosophy. Never content to rest on the laurels of the past, he will always be pushing forward into the uncharted regions. And in his conversations he will continue to make others aware of some of the areas in which we need constructive thinking. He doesn't know all the answers, but he recognizes many of the problems much more clearly and quickly than most of us. And the recognition of the nature of a problem is the first step in solving it.

If there is one danger in the contribution of Roy Cheville, it is that he may become almost a legend, especially among Graceland alumni. He is so competent himself in so many areas that others feel self-conscious and inferior and therefore hesitant to try to do things which they feel he could do much better. No one would deplore this more than Cheville

By L. Wayne Updike

4. Confession

WHILE CONFESSION has found no prominent place in the ritual of our church, yet the principle involved is a principle of spiritual life. It is worthy of particular note in any consideration of the problem of saving erring people to the church, and in the reconciliation of difficulties among members. "The confession of evil works is the first beginning of good works."¹ The purpose of the church being definitely related to the bringing forth of good works, we have raised before us the following questions: What is the purpose of confession? To whom shall confession be made? What happens if the offender doesn't confess his error?

Confession has a number of purposes, the first being to signify repentance. "By this ye may know if a man repenteth of his sins. Behold, he will confess them and forsake them."² An unrepentant man usually seeks to justify himself in the wrong he has done, while the penitent is willing to confess his wrong.

Sometimes confession counteracts the effects of the wrong. Sin is a reproach to its author and to the church to which he belongs. Confession is a renouncement of the sinful act which takes away, in a large measure at least, the cause of reproach. If the sin be against an individual, such as falsehood, the confession will also take away all reproach from the offended.

Often confession effects reconciliation. Where wrong exists among two or more persons, estrangement is inevitable, and persons estranged cannot dwell together peacefully in this world or the next. If they would be brothers in the kingdom of God, they must be reconciled. Confession of wrong is one of the steps that makes reconciliation possible and puts the erring one in the right attitude before man and God. When confession is made, it becomes the duty of the offended person to be reconciled, as stated in the law: "And if he or she confess, thou shalt be reconciled."³

In some cases, forgiveness is secured by confession. The Lord says: "I the Lord forgiveth sins, and am merciful unto those who confess their sins with humble hearts."⁴ And again in the Book of Mormon: "And if he confess his sins before thee and me, and repenteth in the sincerity of his heart, him shall ye forgive, and I will forgive him also."⁵ Confession completes the removal of the sin and its effects, so far as possible, upon the part of the sinner, and it is not right that any should hold that sin against him thereafter, nor refer to it to his injury. God forgives, and he requires of man also to forgive his brother.

Confession shall be made to various persons, depending upon the nature of the case. When the difficulty is between two persons only and does not involve others, confession should be made to the offended only. "Take him or her between him or her and thee alone; and if he or she confess, thou shalt be reconciled." "If any shall offend in secret, he or she shall be rebuked in secret, that he or she may have opportunity to confess in secret."⁶

"If anyone offend openly, he or she shall be rebuked openly."⁷ In the case of a member's being charged with theft before a number of persons and later found to be innocent, a private confession would not meet the requirements of the matter. The offended has a right to be justified before his friends, and the confession must be public enough to reach those who knew of his accusation. The offense may be against a family, a party of men working or traveling together, a committee, or other small number of persons, in which case confession made to the same group of persons would be sufficient. If the offense is given publicly against a person, a committee, a family, or other group of persons, the confession should also be made publicly. The general rule is that the confession must be made as public as the offense.

Sometimes offenses are against the church. Faults of a general or indefinite nature, such as neglect of some duty, or inactivity in the church, and all such minor faults may be confessed informally before the church. "Remember that on this, the Lord's day, thou shalt offer thine oblations, and thy sacraments, unto the Most High, confessing thy sins unto thy brethren and before the Lord."⁸ Confession of a specific act of transgression should come before the church in a formal way. Such confession places the church under obligation to forgive the offender.⁹ A willingness on the part of the church to grant forgiveness is signified by a vote to that effect.

In all cases, confession—to be complete—must be made to God. Every sin offends him and causes or increases estrangement, and all estrangement between God and man must be removed before one can dwell with him. Hence, in the humbleness of prayer, the erring one lays his sin before the Lord, confessing all.

The Scriptures teach that he that offends in secret should "Confess in secret to him or her whom he or she has offended, and to God."¹⁰ "And if he confesses his sins before thee and me, and repenteth in the sincerity of his heart, him shall ye forgive, and I will forgive him also."¹¹ If confession is not made, the offender is to be brought before the church. "And he that repenteth not of his sins, and confesseth them not, then ye shall bring him before the church, and do with him as the scriptures saith unto you, either by commandment or by revelation."¹²

Defeat in Method

By James F. Keir

The church may not forgive a transgressor who does not repent or confess, but "He that receiveth my law and doeth it the same is my disciple; and he that saith he receiveth it and doeth it not, the same is not my disciple, and shall be cast out from among you; for it is not meet that the things which belong to the children of the kingdom, should be given to them that are not worthy."¹³ Six times the Lord says in section forty-two of the Doctrine and Covenants that "He that repents not shall be cast out." Other Scriptures upon this point are:

"Let him be unto thee as an heathen man and publican."¹⁴ "And those that would not confess their sins and repent of their iniquity, the same were not numbered among the people of the church, and their names were blotted out."¹⁵

"If they repented and confessed not, their names were blotted out, and they were not numbered among the people of Christ."¹⁶

When confession is made, the offended one must be reconciled. "If he or she confess, thou shalt be reconciled."¹⁷ When the erring one has done all possible to correct his error, the offended one can ask no more; and if he refuses to be reconciled, it is he who is perpetuating the wrong and continuing the estrangement. This becomes a matter of offense in him which, if persisted in, will inevitably result in spiritual death.

The confessing one must be forgiven. "And if he confess his sin before thee and me, and repenteth in the sincerity of his heart, him shall ye forgive."¹⁸

"And ye shall also forgive one another your trespasses; for verily I say unto you, He that forgiveth not his neighbors trespasses, when he says that he repents, the same hath brought himself under condemnation."¹⁹

"He that forgiveth not his brother his trespasses, standeth condemned before the Lord, for there remaineth in him the greater sin."²⁰

When a man puts himself in such an attitude of humility and penitence

THE manner in which we do things may sometimes defeat the accomplishment of them. This fact can be illustrated by reciting some incidents in my own experience and from observing the experiences of others.

When a young man, I served as cashier of a manufacturing company, and prepared all checks issued in payment of goods and services. As a safety measure, all checks of less than a dollar were written, "Only fifty-nine cents," or whatever the amount happened to be. Later, when I entered church work, I thoughtlessly carried that practice over into writing receipts for tithing until one day I issued a receipt to a little boy for "only thirty cents." I was pleased that this little lad had the desire to honor God's law, and it was my aim to cultivate that desire; but by my thoughtlessness I almost defeated before God, and receives forgiveness for his sins, it would hardly be consistent for his brother, who has need of the same forgiveness, to refuse him that which God has granted.

Confession is thus seen to be not only a requirement on the part of the offender, but also it becomes the means by which he may restore himself to full fellowship with the church. When properly used, with complete sincerity and penitence, it takes its place as a functioning part of the divine law which gives life. Since "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God," it would be well for all who seek to serve his work to become acquainted with the benefits of the act of confession that they may use it to their own advantage and for the good of the church.

my purpose. As I handed him his receipt, he turned to his mother and with pathos in his voice said, "Only thirty cents!" placing emphasis on the word only. I learned then how carefully we must consider the importance of methods in our work.

At another time, an ambitious and well-meaning bishop who had introduced the envelope system as a means of encouraging weekly contributions for local expenses, sent out at the end of each year a statement showing the amount each member paid during the year for tithing and branch expenses. On one statement that was brought to my attention, the amount of tithing was correctly stated, but under local expenses was written "None." This did not represent the facts. This member had not used the envelope system but contributed more to the collection plate than if he had pledged himself ahead. Needless to say, this method which did not set well with the contributor had the element of defeat in it.

The importance of methods carries over into our ministerial work. I have seen men of outstanding ability as teachers and preachers neutralize their efforts by riding some pet hobby at every possible opportunity or by harping continually on some mooted question until even their best friends would not support them.

In the field of religion, speculation is sometimes interesting but not always convincing, nor is the matter of the speculation often important. Our time and abilities, if spent on things that are vital, will yield much greater returns in joy and peace.

I recently told a class of children that my mind was not able to fully understand the works of God, much less God himself. As I look into the heavens, my reason tells me that space is endless, but my mind does not have sufficient capacity to appreciate the vastness of the creations of God. Why, then, should I become embroiled with my fellow men about God or what he looks like. It is in such subjects as this that there is danger, and in our method of approach we may find the element of defeat.

I must tell you of my appreciation for the Herald. It has helped me in many ways since I have been in Japan. Without it, I don't know what I would do. I am a long way from my church, home, and friends, and the Herald helps to bring them all much closer to me.

"On Higher Ground"

By Margaret W. Gibson

MY HUSBAND IS an entomologist, working in the mountain areas of eastern Washington, northern and western Montana, northern and western Wyoming, and Idaho. His hours are largely at the beck and call of numerous tiny insects which emerge in the spring at about the time boys feel the urge to play marbles. They multiply quickly, spreading great destruction to the timber during the summer and then retire beneath the bark in cocoons late in the fall.

The entomologist's life is a lonely one. He must be away from his family during a great part of the year—the loveliest part—when he would like to be at home with his children, free from school. It is a dangerous life. Once, coming down hill over smooth and slippery rocks, my husband caught his foot and hung, head downward, for several minutes. He was alone and miles from aid. With the help of God, he managed by twisting and writhing to loosen his foot from his shoe and free himself. It was all in the day's work for him.

This year, the children will be away for most of the summer, and I am not needed too much at home. So it was with a great sense of anticipation that I heard my husband say, "I want to have you down on the project with me for a few days.

The "project," tussock moth, is attracting national attention. Great areas of beautiful, flourishing trees have been turned into acres of black ghosts by the little caterpillars which emerge from cocoonlike nests in the spring—and start a career of destruction. They are about an eighth of an inch long and only a trained eye can see them. But they are lively and ravenous—and they set to work on the nearest needles of the trees which they prefer.

So devastating has been their work that the federal and state governments, and some lumber companies have appropriated about $750,000 to eradicate them. Twenty airplanes are employed to spread a fog of DDT over whole areas. It is dangerous business for the pilots. The planes are heavily laden, and they must fly at low altitudes over the trees—sometimes only 50 to 100 feet above them. Four planes have crashed and one man has been killed. But it is a necessary and beneficial work.

I WAS VERY much interested and set out early in the morning with a holiday anticipation of a vacation shared with my husband. Our not-too-new car was at its best. The country, fresh from recent rains, was beautiful beyond words. The fields of wheat, peas, and clover were lovely and fragrant.

And then we entered the woods—cool, spicy, majestic. We followed little trails over soft, slippery pine needles. Majestic cedars with their branches—like green hands poised in blessing—grew by the trails. I counted forty-four different varieties of wild flowers and saw the lovely coral fungus twice on the woodland trail.

All the while my husband worked. He turned back the needles of trees to see whether these areas, which had been sprayed, were responding to treatment. He looked for the tiny caterpillars, one-fourth of an inch long now and colored so like the twigs that they were hard to find. He found them, dead or dying. He looked on the grasses and plant leaves and found the telltale spots of DDT, which showed that the pilots and spray men had been thorough and careful in their work. These beautiful trees, and thousands of others, would live. The march of the black ghosts would not reach these areas.

"Do you see that lookout station over there?" asked my husband. "That's where we're going next."

I said nothing. I don't like great heights—at least, not great barren heights.

BUT WE WENT. It was so lovely on the road that I forgot the unrest, but it gripped me again as we swung out into the open space at the top of Moscow Mountain. Above us was a lookout tower—beyond us, a few feet, were lichen-covered rocks, and below—well, it was far below!

My husband walked ahead toward the point of rocks. "Come out here," he said calmly, "I want you to see the view."

I approached a few steps and stopped. It was too big, too awe-inspiring. "Let me sit here," I begged. "It makes me dizzy, I don't think I dare go any farther."

"All right," he said, and helped me find a comfortable place among the rocks. "You'll be in no danger here and can still get a good view. I'll be back in about twenty minutes—as soon as I've checked this timber."

Resting my arms on the rock before me, I could gaze out over hundreds of square miles of breath-taking beauty. I could see where God had spoken, and majestic forests had broken through the soil to answer him; where he had breathed, and green fields had waved at his breath. In the distances little towns clung like flecks of foam on the crests and in the troughs of hills and valleys. Clouds that had hung over us a few minutes before, were now almost on a level with the eye.

I was conscious of a different attitude. The rough roads that had bounced and jostled us looked like soft ribbons over the green hills. The trees that had seemed so tall looked tiny and remote—almost like some of the mosses which we had seen earlier in the day.

I found the words, "I want to live above the world," beating into my mind. I could understand their meaning now. "I want to scale the utmost height."

AND I WAS ASHAMED. Those few feet of rock on the brink had beaten me! It had happened to me before. When we visited the R.C.A. Building in New York my husband and children had dared to go the last few feet, but I had not. They had enjoyed something I had not quite had the courage to share.

As I sat there thinking, I heard a baby's cry—and from above me! I had forgotten the lookout tower. One hundred feet above me, a woman was living, making a home for her husband, sharing the danger, the loneliness, the storms.

I think that baby's cry did it. When my husband came back a few minutes later I said, "If you'll take my hand, I think I can go out farther on that rock."

Because he was unafraid and because I prayed earnestly for the courage, I could crawl out and stand beside him.

As we stood there, he pointed to places that could be seen only from that spot. From there, the grey-black spots in the timber where the tussock moth had been at work showed plainly. From there, towns lost in the distance before sprang into view. To get a clear view, one must "scale the utmost height."

As we went back to the car, my husband said, "I know just how you felt. From childhood, I have been afraid of great heights. But I've had to school myself against them. This height bothered me too. To train myself, I climbed to that look-out tower and ate dinner there. It was very windy and the tower often swayed."

MY HUSBAND had had to conquer himself to go up to the heights. As he said simply, "I must go up to those places to map the territory where the insect infestations lie." And, because he mapped in that territory, plane pilots and sprayers are saving the timber for much-needed homes.

The forest rangers—those watchmen in the tower—how brave they are! Day after day they stay there, watching for the puff of smoke that tells of fire in the timber. We cannot estimate how much they have done for mankind. We may owe our very dwellings to them. Some are unmarried. It is very lonely for them, and very dangerous, too, in storms. But then is when they are particularly needed.

As I thought of these things, there came to me a new understanding of human life and of our relationship to God. Here in the grandeur and beauty that was spread before us, visible only because I had gone up higher to a point I had previously feared to attain, I found a lesson of vast importance. We must go up higher to obtain a better, truer view. We must face the danger and fear, but the reward is priceless.

Moses had to ascend Sinai to get a better view of God and of the world to be able to return to his people and endure their pettiness because of what they might become. Peter, James, and John went up the mountain with Jesus; and because they had gone, they saw him there in the Transfiguration. From that experience, they gained the strength by which they were later able to proclaim, "We were eye-witnesses of his majesty, for we were with him in the Mount." Later they died for him. And even Jesus, in order to die for men had to go to a mountain height to pray for them.

Kirtland Temple in the News

A fine double-page spread of beautiful pictures of Kirtland Temple and adjacent historical properties appeared in the "Cleveland Plain Dealer Pictorial Magazine" for July 20. Brethren E. A. Webbe and R. J. Ashenurst are presented with the chair used by Joseph Smith, and it is apparent that they have contributed in substantial measure to the very good text that was written by the reporter to accompany the pictures.

Catholic and Protestant Conversion

The Omaha Council of Churches has made a study of the ratio in which Catholics are joining Protestant Churches, compared with the numbers of Protestants joining the Catholic Church in that city. The report states that for every Protestant joining the Catholic Church, there are 4.57 Catholics joining the Protestant

The Church in Tahiti

While seeking an interview with the Governor of Tahiti, I was handed a form printed in French and was requested to fill it out and return it on the following day. To the question, "What are your reasons for desiring a conference with the Governor?" I replied, "As a representative of the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church, and as a recipient of the protection of the flag of this republic, I desire to personally converse with His Excellency to spread briefly before him our desires to be of service to him." In a few days, I received a notice of the day and hour of that appointment.

The manner and appearance of His Excellency was not unlike that of the late President Frederick M. Smith. He was indeed a born leader of men. He permitted me to speak to him in English, for which I was deeply grateful; however, French and Tahitian are the only two legal languages in Tahiti.

I handed the governor my Doctrine and Covenants opened to section 112, and requested that he read this short section on governments and laws in general. (I later sent him a French translation of that section.) A very warm and heartening conversation followed. We briefly discussed the history of the church, along with other local problems with which I was then faced.

His final words were, "You may be assured of the good will and support of my government in the projects which you may desire to undertake here."

I learned from the governor and other of the officials that we are a respected organization in Tahiti. Our 2,000 members scattered throughout Tahiti and the Tuamotus have always supported their government. Being much cleaner in their habits than most of the natives, our people are sought out as leaders. We have touched six different islands since our arrival at Tahiti, and five of those islands have Reorganized Latter Day Saint governors.

Brother Sorensen and I, upon returning from a trip to the island of Makatea, were pleased to note that the phosphate company, which has an enormous project there, has placed our members in charge of each and every department of their work. That island also is governed by one of our elders.

The missionary work here in Tahiti has not been a liability to the church, but a true missionary endeavor, successful in that it has assisted greatly in suppressing cannibalism and has promoted intelligent support of society and, consequently, of mankind at large.

—F. EDWARD BUTTERWORTH.

Churches. Roman Catholic publicity in national magazines has given an impression of a strong wave of conversions recently. A study of nation-wide figures on a comparative basis like that in Omaha would be very interesting. To preserve our national balance, to keep religious interference in politics and government at a minimum, and to assure perpetuation of free democratic institutions, a strong Protestant movement is necessary.

So Your Child Is Sick

SUSIE HAS THE measles or Johnny has the chicken pox? Then this article is for you. Sick little folks often present a problem in behavior and entertainment. You know yourself that it's no fun to be cooped up in bed when you'd rather be outside!

So let's see what we can do to make that stay-in-bed time a little more pleasant for both mother and small patient.

"Props" make most anything fun for the normal child. These need not be expensive—all mentioned here can be purchased at a 10 cent store or found in the house—but it is sometimes a good thing to have them on hand ahead of time and save them for certain uses. We cannot anticipate illness so it is wise to be prepared.

In my opinion these props are almost as important as the hot water bottle and the thermometer in the home where there is a child. And sometimes they are more effective than either.

"Tray time" is often where youngsters balk. Can you blame them? A hurriedly fixed tray can be anything but appetizing. By all means start with a clean napkin for the tray—or better still, a paper napkin in a bright shade to add cheer. Try a few tricks such as a little hen dish with a top that lifts up to reveal soup, vegetable or what-have-you. Bunny or chicken cookie cutters (or any shape) make fascinating sandwiches for a sickroom tray. Jello in molds make good looking-at and better eating. Milk in a tall, tall colored glass with a bright red "stirrer" looks tempting. Or pineapple juice in a tiny glass with some ice and a cherry in it looks "special." A radish rose impaled upon a green toothpick and anchored in a wedge of cheese makes a "practically growing" flower for the luncheon tray.

Cut the top off an apple, cut out the insides, fill with mixed fruit and replace the lid. Something different for dessert. Cheese on colored toothpicks is fun to eat. Radish roses and celery curls make a salad look important. Don't save all your entertaining ideas for your grown-up guests. Your children will like them too.

A plastic, flat-bottomed boat with a white sail holds almost anything. And how about a paper hat and a cardboard sword for your sick "sailor." He can battle the bedsheets with them later.

Of course there is more than ever to do with a sick child in the home. Yet, if he isn't as comfortable and happy as possible to begin with, you are certainly not going to get anything else done anyhow so a few extra moments of preparation may save you precious minutes later.

And now what about the long hours between eating. For the very small child bright spools to roll on the bed are fun. A color book and a brand-new set of crayons will help pass the time. Scissors and different colors of construction paper produce surprising results in the hands of those just a little older. Little cars to whiz up and down over the humps in the bedclothes are fun as the humps become mountains, valleys, bridges, or tunnels at will. Whatever the game, you can count on the child's imagination to help you out. If there are other children in the house, it can become a game to help fix the trays for brother or sister and to think up new games that will be fun.

Move the bed near a window where the child can see outside and watch all the myriad happenings in his world. (This of course is not advisable for a child with measles or an eye ailment.)

Don't forget to smooth the bedclothes often, and rinse tired face and hands. Lumpy pillows and wrinkled sheets make a child cross, while a clean, fresh face can lift little spirits.

A small surprise package on the lunch tray each day can do wonders for a child's morale. Or if he's the don't-want-to-take-a-nap kind the package may be saved for the dinner tray and thus be an incentive for a quiet nap. The gift need not be expensive but it should be bright and suitable for playing with in bed. A puzzle or a game for an older child—a picture book or some bright wooden beads to string for the younger child. Whatever it is, take a moment to wrap it as a gift. It will seem twice as wonderful.

The child with a long or continued illness is a different sort of problem, one which demands long-range planning and versatility. Trays can be fixed in much the same way, and a growing plant or a bowl of goldfish provides hours of pleasure.

This article cannot include all the interesting ideas and possibilities. When your child gets sick, you can take it from here.

For the mothers with children suffering from prolonged illnesses—an "entertainment and idea" service is offered through the Herald and sponsored by the women's department. Upon request of the mother, suggestions will be provided to fit the individual needs. State age, birthday, sex, child's likes and dislikes, type of illness, and expected length of illness (if known) when writing.

Also available for mothers is a sheet of suggestions for fixing attractive sick-room trays.

Writers Needed

—A plea from the editor of Stepping Stones—

There in your living room, sitting in your rocking chair, is a man or woman who may be able to offer a service to the church. That person is you. How many times have you felt in your heart that you would like to "help in some small way"? Did you ever stop to think about your church periodicals? It is a well-known fact that many people never realize they have literary talent until someone approaches them and says, "I enjoyed your letter very much. You write so convincingly." If you can write good letters, you can write for publication. Among the people of the church is much talent which has never yet been directed to any of the church papers.

One of the outstanding fields for service is the junior and junior high story paper, Stepping Stones. Here is room for all sorts of contributions. Young folks like stories with plenty of action and conversation. The stories may be on any subject from horses to thimbles as long as they are modern and up to the minute. "Teen-agers" know more about the sphere on which they live than their parents did about their home state. They think big and act with much energy.

Articles are needed, too. One-column epigrams and episodes make good reading, particularly if they are typically Latter Day Saint in outlook. And young people like poems, puzzles, and "how-to-do's." All material should be double-spaced type-written.

You will enjoy the feeling of accomplishment when you contribute—it's good to be discovered. Why not try today? Address all material for Stepping Stones to Sadi Moon, Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri.

It's Your Baby

REMEMBER WHEN your child was tiny? Remember how pink and white and perfect he was? Remember how you wondered in your own heart at the miracle of it and felt a deep, spiritual sense of creation?

Remember how you vowed to keep this child as perfect as he was then, clean and sweet and bubbling over with health and good humor? Remember how you determined to give him every advantage because he was precious and beautiful and all yours!

Well, now he is three. His strong little body is a delight to you. He gets dreadfully grubby, but by stint of much hard scrubbing he still comes out clean and beautiful. His mind is reaching out to grasp the most amazing things—his questions are endless—his ability to express himself is charming.

Are you giving him anything fine and firm with which to build a good life? Are you giving him anything lovely and lasting to carry through his little boy and adolescent days into an unfolding life? He's only a baby yet, you say. Maybe, but it's not too early to begin. It is not fair of you to waste a single one of his precious years while you dillydally and don't get at it!

Do your children get any religion at home? Or are you the type of parent who believes that this is the job of the church school teacher and you just don't enter into it at all?

And by religion I don't mean just reading to the children out of the Bible. And I don't mean just keeping the Sabbath. I mean translating religious truths into everyday experiences for them, and teaching them how to live to the fullest capacity they possess. I mean guiding your children skillfully—remembering that they are people and have their own thought and being—rather than merely preaching to them and wishing they would stop their incessant questions and give you some peace!

Even if you are busy, the work will wait. Childish minds seeking information will not. They are impatient. If Johnny asks "What is God?" and you don't tell him, he is apt to come home quoting what the Presbyterians or the Catholics think God is. Which is all very well, but wouldn't you rather he had the Latter Day Saint concept of God?

Now, you suddenly say defensively, "I'm not all-wise, I don't know how!" Who among us is? We often must depend on the wisdom of others, more experienced than we. When Children Ask by Marguerite Harmon Bro should be required reading in every home with children. Mary Alice Jones' three wonderful children's books, Tell Me About God, Tell Me About Jesus, and Tell Me About the Bible are a rich source for reading aloud to your offspring.

If you feel the need of further reinforcements, call on God. But don't forget, he won't do it for you. That isn't his way. This is your responsibility, your work, and it should be your pleasure!

A Visit to Hill Cumorah

By W. E. PITTS

Lowering skies could in nowise dampen the high spirits of expectancy manifested by the members and friends of the Primrose Class, the largest single class in the Sunday school in Toronto, as they gathered in the church on May 24 to make a pilgrimage to the historical areas at Palmyra, New York.

Under the leadership of Elder J. L. Prentice, we boarded a chartered bus. We traveled via Niagara Falls, Ontario, and Rochester, New York, to Palmyra, and were directed to the Martin Harris homestead. It was stated that at the time Martin Harris owned the farm, it consisted of six hundred acres, with a fifteen-room house. The present acreage, however, is about eighty-seven acres. The barns are fairly modern in appearance and equipment. In front of the house stands the old-time pump that marks the well dug by the Smiths, and it was here during the digging of the well, that Martin Harris first became acquainted with the restored gospel. That he was completely converted, is to be noted by the fact that he mortgaged his farm for three thousand dollars to cover the cost of the first publication of the Book of Mormon. The house is sturdily built of limestone with walls fourteen inches thick, and was later covered with cobblestones gathered from the shores of Lake Ontario, some seventeen miles distant. Uniformity of size was attained by dropping these stones through a hole pierced through a board for this purpose. The corners of the building have plain buff-colored cornerstones, and this denotes the stopping place of each day's work, for the mixture was allowed to dry thoroughly before another layer was added to the superstructure. We learned that the men labored from daylight till dusk, for the wages of one dollar and twenty-five cents a day, and there were no strikes.

It was four miles more to Hill Cumorah. Emotion left us devoid of words, as we first sighted the illuminated statue with the figure of the Angel Moroni pointing skyward. We proceeded to the base of the hill and the bureau of information, where we were greeted by Elder Stott, missionary-in-charge, who, in conjunction with Brother Prentice, had laid the plans for our visit. Elder Stott stated that the statue is the only known memorial to a resurrected being. He told us of the intricate lighting devices controlled by an electric eye, that lighted the shaft of the statue at dusk each night, for two and one-half hours in the wintertime, and for two hours in the summertime. These devices are housed in the Bureau of Information. After this time has elapsed, the light from the shaft is cut out, and the pilot light illuminating the figure of Moroni remains on till dawn, when the electric eye shuts off the lights again. The lights of the shaft can also be manually operated. We made the ascent in the bus, the hill being quite steep, the contour is six hundred feet, and the height from the base approximately one hundred and twenty-five feet.

Alighting from the bus at the crest of the hill, we made our way down a flagstone path for a close-up view of the monument. It is a work of great beauty, executed by a Norwegian convert to the church, Torlief Knaphus. The shaft of the monument is of Vermont marble, intricately worked, with each marking symbolic of a quorum of the organization of the church. The large bronze figure on the top of the monument represents Moroni, his right hand is pointed heavenward, and his left hand holds the Sacred Record. The west bronze panel depicts Moroni delivering the plates to Joseph Smith, after taking them from the ancient place of burial in the Hill Cumorah. The south panel depicts Moroni showing the record to three others. The east panel represents eight more witnesses, who were shown the record by Joseph Smith. The north panel bears an inscription taken from the writings of the book, a quotation from the words of Moroni, directed to those who should read the book (Moroni 10: 4).

The dove in conventional design hovers over the entire shaft, and represents the Holy Ghost, whose presence has ever blessed great spiritual occasions, from early antiquity until now, whenever and wherever the truth of the gospel has been upon the earth to enlighten and guide mankind. The shaft has the appearance of a pillar of light with upward-leading lines. Near the monument are marble benches and well-kept shrubbery.

The following morning we returned to Hill Cumorah to view the grounds by daylight. Due to the rain, the service which had been planned for that time was postponed. Some of the sturdier souls who didn't mind the coating of "Joseph's Land" on their shoes, ascended the hill again, and were rewarded with a perfect view of the encircling countryside. We returned to the Smith homestead, which we were informed was built for Joseph's father by Alvin, one of the older brothers. It is the intention of the church to restore the house as it was in those early days.

A quarter of a mile due west from the Smith homestead lies the Sacred Grove, carpeted with clumps of white violets and fragrant flowers. On entering the gateway, we felt there a spirit that invited reverence. We followed the well-defined pathway to the clearing where stands the tree under which Joseph Smith prayed and was blessed by the ministry of the Eternal Father and his Son Jesus Christ. Here it was that Brother Fred Long led us in prayer that seemed to be immediately answered by the Spirit of the Comforter, which rested on the bowed head of each one assembled there.

Crossing the border, we availed ourselves of the opportunity of meeting with the Saints of Niagara Falls, Ontario, in their evening worship, and with the singing of "Consecration," the true spirit of the work was felt, creating in us a oneness in our desire to become more effective in promulgating the work of the Restoration, and making a fitting climax to our pilgrimage.

Misses Church Friends

My only privilege to meet with other Saints is on the second Sunday of each month when I travel forty miles by bus to the home of Elder and Mrs. J. W. Lea where a Communion service is held. I greatly miss my friends in the East Bay Church of Berkeley and send greetings to all of them.

My companion and I are caretakers of an estate on Clear Lake which formerly belonged to Captain Floyd. It is a beautiful place, but that does not compensate for the loss of church association. I am trying to become adjusted to this new life and pray that I may make the most of my opportunities to serve although I am isolated. I know God does hear and answer prayer, and I want to live worthy of his blessings.

Letter From Norway

Translated by E. Y. Hunker

One of our younger members in Norway, Sister Ragnhild Tonstad, Skogring, Dal Station, Norway, under date of March 11, 1947, wrote me a letter on behalf of her foster parents and herself.

This family, together with some near relatives, had received bundles of clothing sent by members of the church in America. They requested that their expression of gratitude be printed in the Herald, and that I translate it from Norse into English.

She wrote:

"We wanted most to thank each one who contributed, but are not able to write English. We shall, therefore, request you to kindly express our thanks to all who have sent us bundles. Perhaps it can be done through our church publication.

"The Tonstad family, the Davidsen family, and Bernt Fjellberg, of Dal Station, Norway, hereby wish to send their most hearty thanks for all the good clothing we have received from our spiritual brothers and sisters in 'the promised land.' For each garment we ourselves wear, or that we give to someone who needs, we shall send an affectionate and grateful thought across the ocean to you. May an especial blessing accompany this clothing in such a manner that we shall be warmed in soul as well as in body."

Signed: Olea, Torkild, and Ragnhild Tonstad.

Helped By a Dream

Although my parents joined the Reorganized Church when I was a child, I can remember that my father was reluctant to give up playing cards. He was also greatly influenced by an infidel who visited our home frequently. I used to listen to their conversations and was gravely troubled when I heard my father's friend say that there was no good in any church, and that there was no heaven or resurrection of the dead. My mother, however, assured me that there was and that if I would pray over the matter I would receive divine assurance myself. One night, soon after I fell asleep, I dreamt that someone came to my bed and asked me if I would believe in heaven if I were given a chance to see it. I said that I would, and so we began to walk. After traveling quite a distance, I saw a light, then I beheld a most beautiful place and I felt a peace I had never known before. I asked my guide if I might stay and he said, "No, I brought you here only that you might know there is a heaven."

Although I had this experience in 1903, it is still fresh in my memory. I have never since doubted that there will be a resurrection or that the pure in heart will be rewarded.

Asks Prayers for Friend

I am grateful to all who have remembered me in their prayers; my health is much improved, and I am able to do my work. I am writing now to request prayers for a nonmember friend, Mrs. Fred Mock, also of Burwell. She is interested in the Reorganized Church and believes in divine healing. Letters and church literature from other members will, I think, increase her interest. I also wish to ask the Saints to pray for my son, Merlin Crandall of Amelia, Nebraska.

Warming Arctic Climate Melting Glaciers

Faster, Raising Ocean Level, Scientist Says

LOS ANGELES, May 29—A mysterious warming of the climate is slowly manifesting itself in the Arctic, engendering a "serious international problem," Dr. Hans Ahlmann, noted Swedish geophysicist, said today.

Dr. Ahlmann, Professor of Geography at the University of Stockholm and director of the Swedish Geographical Institute, discussed the phenomenon, on the basis of personal research over two decades, at a seminar of the Geophysical Institute at the University of California here.

Since 1900, Dr. Ahlmann said, Arctic air temperatures have increased 10 degrees Fahrenheit, an "enormous" rise from a scientific standpoint.

In the same period, ocean waters in the militarily strategic Spitsbergen area have risen 3 to 5 degrees in temperature, and, apparently because of the accelerated melting of glaciers, one to one and one-half millimeters yearly in level, he said.

"We do not even know the reason behind this climatic change in recent years," Dr. Ahlmann added.

If, however, the cause were of global nature, and "if the Antarctic ice regions and the major Greenland icecap should be reduced at the same rate as the present melting, oceanic surfaces would rise to catastrophic proportions," he said. "Peoples living in lowlands along the shores would be inundated."

The climatic change was not implausible, Dr. Ahlmann suggested, in view of the fact that "we know that the tropics have felt a marked climatic change in the last fifteen or twenty years, especially in the vicinity of West Africa. Many smaller lakes have actually disappeared and larger ones are drying up. Even huge Lake Victoria has dropped seven inches in the past decade."

The Arctic change, the scientist asserted, "is so serious that I hope an international agency can be formed to study conditions on a global basis. That is most urgent."

One effect of the change, he said, has been to improve navigation conditions along the northern rim of Europe, a development of chief interest to Russia.

"In 1910 the navigable season along western Spitsbergen lasted only three months," he said. "Now it lasts eight months. This is of world strategic importance."—Gladwill Hill, in The New York Times.

The Lord's Prayer

By Charles V. Graham

7. "Forgive Us Our Trespases"

The seventh in a series of meditations presented at the Appointee Institute held in Independence, August 28 to September 14, 1946. The others appeared in the issues of January 18, January 25, June 14, July 19, July 26, and August 2.

WHEN WE ASK forgiveness of our Heavenly Father for our trespases, we acknowledge that: (1) there is a supreme being in the personage of God who created the universe, including man, who is all powerful both in heaven and in earth, and to whom we are responsible; (2) this Supreme Being has the knowledge of all we do, think, and say; (3) we must be aware of what our trespases are; (4) the principle of repentance must first operate in our lives before the Creator is free to forgive us; (5) man will continue to fall in the errors of sin until he acquires the qualities of Christ; (6) we are "our brother's keeper," for we not only ask forgiveness of our personal sins but we petition Deity for our brother's sins when we pray "forgive us our trespases"; and (7) this phrase indicates that man is gregarious and sins not only individually but also collectively.

Man is also considered to be selfish by nature. Therefore, this phrase of the Lord's Prayer, when included in our devotions and daily life, tends to lift us above our personal interests, selfish desires, and lusts to a higher plane of living. In this higher plane of living, we sense the need of fellowship with others and our responsibility in association with them if humanity is to achieve its full purpose in this sphere of life.

Asking God's forgiveness requires that we try not to commit the same sin again, that we give full allegiance to him, that we earnestly try to grow from day to day, and that we cease sinning after once recognizing it as such.

On one occasion, the Prophet Isaiah said, "Cease to do evil, learn to do well." Thus, if a person expects forgiveness, he must of necessity turn from the evil and do that which is good and righteous in the sight of God.

To ask God to forgive us our sins denotes that we must be worthy, that we desire to give our best to him, that he has the power to save us and use us in his divine plan, and that he has a great love for us and for all mankind. Even though we break his heart, yet will he forgive us when we come to ourselves and forsake sin and follow him.

In his Sermon on the Mount, Christ gave us the following admonition, which is the key to the heart of God and, if used, will make it possible for him to forgive us when we err: "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets." In the light of this statement, we must first forgive others their trespases before we can expect forgiveness for our own.

As a young man, I was inclined to be very critical of our ministers in their sermon presentations. In the small branch to which I belonged was a minister who had not finished elementary school. He used very poor English, but his life and his message were filled with the Spirit of God. At this particular time, I was attending junior college. I felt that I knew about all there was to be known and that I was above this particular brother in intellect and knowledge. I was particularly opposed to his poor speech. Consequently, whenever he was scheduled to speak, I would be absent from the service. I carried this attitude in my heart, but I did not mention it to anyone.

A few years went by. I was ordained a priest, and to my chagrin the pastor assigned me to visit with this particular person whose ministry I had failed to accept. Like the prodigal, I came to myself and realized how hopeless my ministry would be unless I would first repent of my past attitude toward my fellow minister. I went to the home of this brother, apologized to him for my unspoken attitude toward him, and offered him my hand in fellowship. He was very surprised at my testimony and admitted that he had never heard of my saying anything against him, but he accepted my earnest attempt at restitution. As a result of asking forgiveness for my inner thoughts and attitudes, we became the closest of friends. We worked together successfully and, greater still, I found that whenever I was in need of personal spiritual ministry, he was the one who was always able to give it to me. After this experience, I always found his sermons to be of personal benefit to me.

As we develop in the gospel, we find a growing worthiness for forgiveness, for we ourselves learn that as we forgive others, we grow in the image of our Maker. Then are we able to say with our Lord, "Thy will is done." Thus, as the principle of forgiveness and restitution works in our lives as the Lord has intended it, we move toward perfection and Zion comes nearer to being a reality.

A hundred years ago only about 2,000 different articles were offered for sale, whereas today there are 300,000 different kinds of articles being offered by someone to somebody. (Quoted from an unnamed source book by R. W. Sockman, in Christian Herald for June, 1942.)

The Marvelous Work

By Frances Hartman

"Now, behold, a marvelous work is about to come forth among the children of men, therefore, O ye that embark in the service of God, see that ye serve him with all your heart, might, mind, and strength, that ye may stand blameless before God at the last day." These were the awe-inspiring words of our Lord which were revealed to our church progenitors. What a wonderful privilege we have today of sharing in and being a part of the work that our Lord deemed marvelous!

There is in the heart of each true Saint the desire to serve God and to promote his goodness in the world. Each understands that he bears this name because he is consecrated to serving God and doing good. He understands that to promote good, he must seek to set his life in order and habitually perform tasks of consecration, which will aid in the ultimate establishment of Zion—the kingdom of heaven made manifest upon the earth.

Yet, in the fulfilling of worthy duties and helpful tasks, we sometimes forget to keep our eyes upon the glorious vision of stewardship, and we often cease to be consciously aware of the fact that we are engaged in a work so noble and so marvelous that the Lord praised it and promised eternal life to those who aid in its completion, if they remain ever faithful to their covenant with him.

The heavenly kingdom must exist in each individual heart before it can be established as a church-wide project. Its coming is delayed because we find various degrees of wisdom and spiritual development among our people. There are those of us who wish "the church" would redeem Zion so that the people might receive their divine heritage; and there are those of us who firmly believe "the people" must progress before the church as a whole can express the authority given it. Actually, each is dependent upon the other; they are so closely interwoven that the unified co-operation of Saints would soon produce such startling developments in spiritual growth that soon we would scarcely be able to contain the satisfying result. We need only to work in this cause to make it the success we dream of.

Consecrated Saints, desiring to serve their Heavenly Father in the last days, must develop adult personalities. They must "put away childish things." There is no place among us for the frightened or the weak. Ours is a man-sized job. We rejoice in it; we are glad for the divine plan of proving our sonship to God and our right to be joint-heirs with Christ in our Father's kingdom.

Who is there among a consecrated people who would accept blessings continually without giving a part of himself in service in return? Who is a Saint that would desire every good thing without sharing with his neighbor? Jesus the man became Jesus the Christ as he labored to teach his followers the beautiful unfoldment each person may manifest as he becomes attuned to divine laws. His was no easy task. His was a life of sacrifice—the giving up of home, family, and even physical life that he might fulfill his mission among the former saints. Can we expect to be included among those citizens united in his cause if we refuse to tithe our time, talents, possessions—even our lives for his work? To have faith that his kingdom will eventually exist, and to assume that we will share in its glory is without bearing our part of the responsibility, fall far short of our calling.

It is written in James 2: 17, "Even so faith, if it have not works is dead, being alone." To claim our heritage is one thing, but to prove it is indeed a "marvelous work."

With Christ at the head of his people, and the church as the body through which he ministers to them, with the authorized priesthood to interpret his laws, the Saints will advance. Service in his name becomes a pleasure to those who accept it with a willing heart. There can be no greater joy than to have a knowledge of a wonderful plan and to work together with others for its accomplishment.

Reunion Wisdom

(From a report of the Fairview, Montana, Reunion, by Joseph H. Yager.)

"Now is the time to serve God."

A seven-year-old boy said, "I am certainly going to do what God wants me to do."

"We cannot get too young a start in church work, but we can certainly get too old a start."

"I have been doing the odds and ends that no one else wants to do."

Little girl in a missionary family, concerning a five-year-old boy: "Daddy, I think you should keep your eye on him; he may be missionary material."

Boy: "I used to be a bad boy, but now I am five years old." A good suggestion on when it is time to grow up.

"It isn't enough to do what we want to do; we must do right even when we don't want to."

in the world, it must establish itself throughout the world. There can be no withdrawing from these areas that we call the “outlying areas” of the church. It is essential and imperative that we maintain ourselves wherever we have become established, whether in the United States and Canada or in missions abroad.

This does not suggest the idea that we are not to proceed with the gathering. It does suggest the possibility of the development of a corps of workers of sufficient strength, of people of that same strength to which the Prophet referred in the revelation to which I made reference—that same strength which will enable us to so organize our spiritual and economic affairs that we may indeed establish the kingdom of God.

IT MEANS, THEN, the enlarging and expanding of our missionary goals, but it means also the development of a trained personnel to give guidance to such groups where we can continue our established centers. There is a major need for leadership, for if ministry is to be given to these groups, it will require the best that our young men and women are capable of giving. As workers, they must be conversant with our doctrine and our theology and have an understanding of our social ideals and the contribution God expects his church to make to the world as a whole.

In the final analysis, consecration is the most important of all the considerations affecting the gathering, for with consecration, the following can be accomplished: First, the dedication of men and women to the accomplishment of the goals of the church. There was a time in our experience when it was said of the church that it offered little opportunity for the youth to develop, to reach out, to come to an understanding of those things which were of worth in life as they found it. If there ever was such a time I think it is past, for the objectives of the church challenge the best that any person can give to it today—more than any of us are capable of giving; and it offers to us the opportunity for the development of those talents and consecration of those talents while growing spiritually and mentally. This is a tremendous task to which the church has set its hand—the task of the gathering—the mobilization of economic resources and utilization of those resources for the attainment of a Christian community. Who can say today that such a task is not beyond the ability of the average person, and that for those who accept the challenge there is not the opportunity for great intellectual, spiritual, and economic growth?

The assumption of stewardship responsibilities can be achieved only as individuals become consecrated. The payment of tithes and the giving of offerings to support the broad movement of the church—the gathering—are needed to further both the missionary and the economic aspects of our work. The storehouse ultimately is dependent upon the consecration of surplus and then the intelligent application of that surplus to productive use in the interest of the Christian society which is the objective toward which we are all working.

IT IS ESSENTIAL that there shall be additions to our land holdings. Not so long ago someone asked me the question, “Don’t we have enough land to establish the ideal community?” I could but answer in this fashion, that if we are to establish a community which shall give expression to our ideals, we do not as yet have adequate land holdings, and, therefore, it is essential that we continue to accumulate resources—that we continue our policy of land purchase until we have adequate holdings that will assure us, once having undertaken the project, of being able to complete it. I believe that it is within the range of possibility to complete that phase of our project within the next ten years.

It is imperative that our institutions be enlarged and developed, for with the gathering movement, there will continue to be thrown upon these institutions an everincreasing load, and we must recognize them as our institutions built and established for the purpose of serving a Christian community.

It is essential that our ministerial force be increased and added to as qualified men become available. It is a part of our program in making provision for the gathering to plan and build new houses of worship and to provide other physical facilities for our people as they gather into these central areas. The church, in fact, is moving forward, and the accomplishment of even greater goals is within the range of our ability. The extent to which each person responds to this need for consecration will determine to a large extent the future progress of the church.

IS THE GATHERING a part of the divine plan? Down through the ages there has been scriptural authority given, indicating that it is the will of God, that those who believe in him shall gather together that his kingdom may be established, looking toward the time when there shall come to that kingdom his Son, Jesus Christ. Do we believe in that as Latter Day Saints? We believe in it so deeply and with such great faith I am sure nothing shall swerve us from the responsibility which is ours of seeking to build a Christian community, a Zion, giving due consideration to the various aspects of that building and the need for the accumulation of economic resources to the need for training and specializing in these various fields of endeavor.

This we believe in. We have believed in it from the beginning, through the break in 1844 when some departed westward to different purposes as well as locations. We maintained with those who remained in these central areas, a faith in the original doctrines and purposes of the church, which brought about the Reorganization. And in that Reorganization the central objective, the central theme of our thinking, led toward this center place, this place which we call Zion. It was and is to build a community called Zion, having a people who lived in righteousness and where there shall be no poor among them.

We believe in this today. We believe that it is within the range of possibility, despite all of the conditions which seem to confront us as obstacles. We believe that it is our responsibility to move forward in the building of such a Christian community. And because we believe in it, we move forward in the utilization of resources, in the consecration of time and talents, participating in this gathering movement and yet, even while participating, reaching out throughout the entire world in the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ, that men can be called to accept the challenge of participation in the building of a community such as God intends shall be builded.

himself, but it is true. The balancing factor is that while many people stand in awe of his abilities and accomplishments, very few stand in awe of him as a person. He is infectious cheerful, friendly, and sincere. He puts on no airs; he wears his doctor's degree as though it were a pair of overalls. He has much in common with the most common folk, with farmers, laborers, clerks, and housewives. He is careless of his dress and all artificial mannerisms and gestures of high society. Yet, his instinctive sensitivity to social situations and his natural concern for other people make him at home and at ease in any company.

Gracelanders all over the United States and many other countries will always think of Roy Cheville with deep respect and sincere, personal devotion.

Cornerstone Laid at Flora

We are pleased to note progress by the Flora, Illinois, Saints and give our readers the complete story of the services held there on Sunday, June 29 as it appeared in the Flora Daily News-Record of June 30:

At interesting and inspirational services held Sunday morning and afternoon under a tent on the church lot, the cornerstone for the new Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints was laid at a ceremonial, with Apostle Arthur A. Oakman of Independence, Missouri, officiating.

At the morning services, with Pastor Ed Colvin in charge, the audience heard Rev. Robbins of Decatur give an excellent address on the Bible and church history. The song service with Mrs. Herbert Henson directing, was followed by special numbers, an introduction of guests, and the sermon.

The afternoon services were opened by song followed by a short address of welcome by Mayor Leo R. Allen; "The Church's One Foundation," by a quartet; an exceptionally fine talk by Rex W. Dale, principal of the Flora High School on the topic "Educational Philosophy;" a solo, "My Task," by Mrs. Paul Fehrenbacher; and the address by Mr. Oakman.

Just before the cornerstone was laid, Jesse Swango of Chicago, a former Xenia resident, sang a solo, and then with Harry Hemphill using the mortar, four stalwarts of the church raised the stones in place, and the ceremonial was ended by group singing and prayer.

At the noon hour more than one hundred members and guests greatly enjoyed a basket dinner in the church basement.

This building located at the corner of South Locust and East Washington, will be a beautiful addition to the south side of Flora. Of buff brick, it is ideally situated just north of the Washington grade school. The basement is almost completed, and the upper part of the church will now be erected.

The membership of the church is about eighty, and they are to be congratulated on their courage, enterprise, and spirit in building this church edifice, which will entail a lot of sacrifice for the membership.

As an icicle grows one drop at a time, and takes on the color of the water which forms it, so our characters are growing one deed at a time, and taking on the color of the deeds that form them.

Tributes to Sister Kate S. Scott

(From Ray-o-lite, Omaha, Nebraska)

A very appropriate memorial to the late beloved Kate S. Scott was established in the public library of Omaha. The memorial was in the form of a section of the Children's Library dedicated to her memory. The library purchased a large number of children's books, her name was inscribed on the fly leaf of each book; also twenty phonograph records of children's stories were purchased, and Sister Scott's name was inscribed on each.

Sister Scott had served for twenty-five years as children's librarian in the main library of the city. We, therefore, consider this a very fitting memorial dedicated to her memory.

A memorial address in behalf of Sister Scott was given at the Hanscom Park Garden Club Tuesday, May 13, here in Omaha. A bouquet of white iris and white tulips occupied a prominent place at the speaker's table. The memorial discourse was given by Mrs. Robert Clinefelter. We quote from the address:

"This memorial bouquet in a small measure is a symbol of the beauty and purity and loveliness of Mrs. Scott. It was my privilege to have known her more than twenty-five years. I first met her when I joined the Omaha Story League of which she was also a member. She was then Miss Kate Swartzlander, head of the Burgess-Nash book department. She was a librarian and had worked in the public library. When she married and came to live in our neighborhood, my husband and I were delighted to find that Mr. and Mrs. Scott were interested in raising dahlias. Thus they came into the H. P. G. C. Mrs. Scott served as secretary of our club at one time and was librarian for a number of years. Always, she was a faithful co-operative worker.

"In her last days she endured an unpleasant affliction, but through it all she always expressed patience and loving-kindness. It seemed to me that as we went to see her from time to time, she grew more beautiful, for true beauty is from within. We who have worked with Mrs. Scott, I am sure, feel that we are better persons because of her, and I am sure the world is a better place in which to live because of her."

What Is Man?

By Maurice Draper

There are many who do not share with us our faith in God and our belief in an eternal divine purpose in life. They are the people who take life as it comes, in the easy-going belief that there is nothing they can do to change the course of events anyhow—so why spend their energies and time trying to do so? They are the ones who say that what they do is their own business, and that nobody has a right to suggest to them what they should or should not do. Among them, also, we find the lower moral standards, even though they may not be caught at their acts of immorality if they happen to belong to the more financially favored classes. And, significantly it is among these folk that life takes its greatest toll in times of crisis. For it is among them that suicide, insanity, nervous breakdowns, and other symptoms of spiritual and moral insecurity are most often manifest.

Probably one of the reasons for such a class of people is that there is widespread misunderstanding about the nature of man. Many of us take the point of view that the only part of us which is real is that which is flesh. Even though we realize that there is more to life than the body, yet the satisfaction of our bodily needs occupies so much of our time we fail to give proper consideration to our total nature.

Both observation and the Scriptures, when we pay any attention to either, will testify to us that there is more to this thing called life—even physical life—than the body alone. Let us for a moment observe some commonplace experiences, then let us turn to the Scriptures to find the explanation about the mysteries we observe.

When a body dies, strange things happen to it. It may be that the strangest part of all is what the body does while it is alive, but the point to be made here is that there are changes accompanying the experience called death. Before death, the body is able to move and express itself. Even more marvelously, there goes on constantly in your body the wonderful mystery of the creation of living tissue. As you engage in the activities of life, your body constantly wears away, both on the surface and internally, and it is necessary those parts which are worn away be replaced. In order to do so, you eat vegetables, fruits, meats, etc., and by the processes of life within you, the forces and powers which once occupied the dead cells being cast off is passed on into the new ones being constantly created. By this process, physiologists tell us that we have a complete change of substance in our bodies every seven to nine years. The body of a growing child is even more remarkable in that it does not only replace its worn tissues, but actually has the ability to add to itself so that it increases in size and function until maturity.

At death, the body loses this power. Not only has it ceased speaking, moving voluntarily, expressing itself in normal living procedures, but it even loses the power to retain its size and shape, and so it begins to decay. Eventually, it entirely decomposes and becomes lost in the great cycle of eternal changes in the chemistry of the universe.

What is it that has departed from the body, this strange power which makes it possible for us to move, and breathe, and to have our conscious abode in the tabernacle of flesh? It has been called by various names. Some call it electricity, others refer to it as "The Cause," others simply call it life. Religious people call it the spirit, and there has never been an improvement on that name. What we call it really makes little difference, as long as we can agree that we are thinking about the same thing—that something which makes us physically conscious and physically capable of doing those things which are normal to the conditions of life.

It requires very little thought for us to come to the obvious conclusion that the spirit leaves the body at death. We don't know what it looks like, even if it has a shape or form, because we cannot see it. We doubt that it has weight, for it seems to have no substance, yet without it, the body cannot live. Without it, the body goes through the strange changes which are commonly associated with death.

Man is obviously composed of flesh. But, in this line of reasoning, we have also discovered that man as we know him in the living estate, conscious, self-controlled, capable of free choice, and characterized by all the marvels of a living body, is more than just flesh. He is flesh quickened by a power which seems to abide in the body, but which may exist independently of the body, as it seems to depart in death. Now let us turn to the Scriptures.

We read in the first chapters of Genesis the stories of creation. Your personal beliefs about the details of creation, as to the time it required, as to the identity of Adam and Eve, as to the details of the Garden of Eden, are not important in the matter we now have in mind. We want to learn what the processes and results of God's creative acts are in an effort to answer the question, "What is man?" We are not concerned with how man come to be, but what he is. As we read the story in the first chapter of Genesis, we learn that God created light and darkness, separated the waters, created the earth, plants, animals, and man. In the last verses, we find that God rested from his labors and blessed a certain day, one in seven, for man also to rest. But in the second chapter of Genesis, we read the strange statement that there is not yet a man to till the ground, and that there are no plants yet, for God had not yet caused it to rain upon the earth. Then we are told in Genesis 2: 7 that God formed man of the dust of the earth, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; not until then did he pronounce the words, "And man became a living soul." The Inspired Version declares that the reason why two processes of creation are mentioned here, why there were no plants on the earth even though the story of their creation has been told and completed, why there were no men on the earth, even though they had been mentioned in the first chapter and commissioned to have dominion over the earth, and so forth, is that all things were created spiritually first, before they were naturally upon the face of the earth. It tells us that all men were created in the spiritual sense and that the physical work of creation came afterward.

The significant words in the second chapter of Genesis are that it was not until he had a physical body that God declared man to be a living soul. He existed spiritually before, but he could not be considered a complete product of creation until his spirit was clothed with a body. Thus, it appears to have been the purpose of God from the beginning to give us bodies by which the spirits may express themselves. And because this is true, the words of the latter-day prophet, "The spirit and the body is the soul of man," have deep significance. Moses said this many years ago, yet the real meaning of the statement of Moses, emphasized by Joseph Smith, seems even yet to escape us.

The spirit and the body are both important in the sight of God. The laws he has given us through Moses, Jesus, and all his divinely appointed prophets have to do both with spiritual and physical processes of living. If we could grasp the meaning of this, we would think more than we do of the care of our bodies. We would refrain from filling them with the poisons of nicotine and alcohol. We would give more attention to the formation of habits of health. We would be more inclined to dedicate not only our prayers and meditations to the Lord, but would seek to spend every energy and talent, including our physical blessings, in the work of his kingdom.

Man is not complete either in the flesh or spirit alone. His salvation is not complete if it is concerned only with the spirit; it must also make itself the means of sanctifying the body and consecrating physical powers to the great cause of Christ and the eternal purpose of bringing peace and happiness to men. This means physical peace, health, vigor, economic welfare, bodily cleanliness and the skills of the body, as well as spiritual peace and comfort. For the spirit and the body is the soul of man.

Winds of God

The winds of God are ever blowing Toward his desired port.
Soul, you have need to be no longer
Of time and chance the sport.
Arise and set your sails today,
His winds shall bear you on your way.

There is no time for vain regretting
Over the vanished years,
Nor yet to dream of shadowy future
With either joy or fears.
Today is yours, with glory crowned,
Just where you stand is holy ground.

At every dawn your will lay open
Unto the will divine,
And you shall bear no aimless burden,
No task without design.
O wondrous thought! when all our days
Express his purpose, and his praise.

Lost and Found

By VIRGINIA MOORMAN

During the war years when patriotism was running high, I wanted to be right in the midst of everything. Although I wasn't accepted by the Red Cross, I couldn't be content to stay at home and work in the understaffed hospitals, so I decided to do something spectacular. Surely they could use nurses somewhere in a more exciting area, Hawaii perhaps. And Hawaii it was.

After a great deal of red tape in addition to the usual preparations for a long trip, I was on my way to Queen's Hospital in Honolulu. I felt that I was at last headed for a land of adventure and excitement. I looked forward to the missionary opportunities this adventure could offer. I let myself dream about using my nursing as a wedge into the lives of these people and letting them see the results of my religion in my activities. As I became more and more enthused, I decided that I could go on into China and help the people there. Then, why stop at China? I included India for a brief visit (I didn't want to stay long there because I don't like the abundance of snakes reported to abide there) then off to Africa and on through Europe before I came home. It was a lovely dream with more possibilities than I could ever have attempted, but somewhere on this lovely island in the Pacific I lost the feel of that dream.

My first impressions of Diamond Head would hurt the feelings of the people who have grown to love that landmark of Oahu, which was my first introduction to the island. Pearl Harbor didn't look too grand as we passed, and Waikiki Beach was hemmed in with rolls of barbed wire that certainly did not add to its beauty. But after the first few weeks of confusion in trying to learn to pronounce the names of these places, I began to see the beauty of the islands.

Mountains were the background to the beautiful white sands and shore line. The Pali, a cliff where King Kamehameha drove the enemy off, provided a scene I shall never forget of the valley floor below the cliff and across to the waters' edge and out across the Pacific looking toward home.

As I became busier with my nursing at Queen's Hospital and also more acquainted with my associates there, I gradually spent less time enjoying the natural beauties of the islands and spent more time pursuing the artificial life which was so abundantly provided for during those war years. In spite of the adventure and excitement I was engaged in, I wasn't fulfilling the dreams I had designed. What was worse—I didn't care much. In fact, I didn't care a great deal about anything. Life was growing dull, and I decided I had been away from home long enough, so I made preparations to come back.

During the last few weeks I spent in Honolulu, I stayed at the Mission House with Brother and Sister Miller, helping them out as best I could, and learning that it was the little detail of everyday living and giving that made real missionaries out of these people.

When I was home again, I began to search for things I could do, and it wasn't long until I found instead of a trip to China, I had a job assisting in an Oriole Circle; there were many things I could give to the girls in this capacity. My "India" became work with an interdenominational group, the Christian Youth Council; I found there was plenty that such a group could do without infringing on the various creeds and practices. "Africa" and "Europe" became the work in local and city-wide Zion's League.

Every day I offer my services in one way or another, I get not only what I give, but such an inner satisfaction that every time I do some-

The Trouble-Shooter

What Is a Wise Investment

QUESTION:

Where can I invest money so that it will be safe and yet bring a fair profit? Bonds and land, usually considered the best bet, will both decrease in value if the much-talked of depression comes. What, today, is a wise investment?

ANSWER:

By Bishop L. Wayne Updike

Investments are made on the basis of returns and security. When one seeks to determine whether or not a proposed investment is a wise one, he needs to ask some pertinent questions about these two factors. He must also endeavor to give each its due consideration. Some people are so interested in the amount of returns that they don't think about security. This results from a spirit of speculation, which we, as a church, have been specifically instructed to avoid. Other people are so concerned about security that they do not invest at all. Like the man in the parable, they bury their talent, and it does not increase while it is in their possession.

How should we invest during these times of high prices? Should we buy land with our savings? Should we buy bonds? These questions should be answered only against the background of the total matter of investment principles.

Everything that we have been given is a part of our personal stewardship, and we are charged with the responsibility of using it wisely and making it grow. Life itself should be thus treated, and so, also, should the various abilities and gifts which we possess. As we decide in other matters, so should we decide in matters of money.

Suppose we look at each of the above questions with these two factors in mind. Should we buy land? On the basis of security, it would seem there is little that we know of which is as enduring as the earth upon which we walk. Regardless of the changes in the business cycle, the land is always there. True, it can be misused and made unproductive, but, up to the present, the owner's continuing right to possession of land is as permanent as his life and continues as long as there is government which protects him in that right. Only when a person dies or becomes incompetent, or when government fails to function or finds it necessary to expropriate the land for the public welfare can one's land be taken from him.

From the standpoint of returns, however, the situation is not so unchanging. Some land produces, some doesn't. Some land is good, some is poor. Some land is well cared for, some is run-down and eroded until years of work and heavy investment will be required to restore it. Any investment in land should be made not only with the idea of security in mind, but also with thought as to the returns that can be expected. Those who are skilled in the ways of agriculture are able to compute the productive value of any farm. When they have considered all the factors involved, they are able to say what returns can be expected on the purchase price. No wise investor buys a farm without first giving consideration to the matter of returns. The fact that the church has been admonished to buy land has not removed from men the responsibility to use their own wisdom and knowledge.

In the matter of buying bonds, we are investing in the United States of America, or in some other governmental or business institution, as the case may be. The worth of the security is not in the piece of paper, but in what that paper represents. We in America have taken the position that our government is built upon principles which are permanent and enduring. Our investment is, therefore, as good as the people who put enduring principles into effect. We can conceive of nothing safer. If we do not have confidence in the continuing good faith of a democratic form of government, then the only remaining place to put our confidence is in ourselves. No man is able of himself to hoard enough to last very long. At any time, one who is stronger may come along and deprive such a person of his savings. "Cursed is the man who trusteth in man and maketh flesh his arm."—Jeremiah 17: 5. In finality, then, the good investment is one which is made in qualities which are eternal.

Money loaned to a man in business is only as good as the integrity of the man who borrowed it. True, something may be salvaged from a bankrupt business of a dishonest or lazy borrower, but the investment has been a poor one both from the standpoint of returns and security. Money loaned to the government is only as good as the principles of right and truth and freedom, and shall be secure only as long as these qualities are allowed to dominate our national situation. There is no alternative. Investments made in eternal spheres measure up both in the matter of returns and in security. We may ask greater returns on a short-time basis, but we risk great losses. We may seek greater safety in other forms of protection, but there are no returns on wealth that is just hidden away.

What, then, is a wise investment? It is one which places confidence in the qualities which endure. It is one in which the investor has looked beyond his own desires and has sought to make that which he has to invest bring some returns not only to himself but to the God who gave him possessions over which he now is the steward. It is one which is made with full recognition that men and conditions shall change, but the foundation of God stands sure.

thing I almost feel guilty because I am the one who is rewarded the most.

Beyond the Hill

By Aleta Runkle

*The doubter knelt to pray.
"Ob, God, if I had known
Beyond the hill lay verdant meadows,
I would not have turned again
To the lights of the village.*

*"But on the desolate plain,
Chill winds stung my cheek;
Briars clutched my flesh;
The walls of the fog pressed close upon me,
And I could not see your face.*

*"Through the darkness, I cried for you
To speak to me,
But the shrieking wind returned my words
From the hill.
I thought you would not hear the pleas of those On the plain.
I turned back.*

*"But now, in the village, God, they tell me
You walk with the traveler.
He may not see your face, nor hear your voice,
But you are there
They say.*

*"Ob, God, now that I believe
Beyond the hill lie verdant meadows,
Help me to turn not again
To the lights of the village."*

P. S.

* The Hairy Ones

Citizens of Independence are becoming used to the sight of moustaches, beards, whiskers, sideburns, vandykes, imperials, goatees, in all varieties, sizes, and colors. Kansas City people have the idea that the church, moved by some new outburst of religious zeal, is responsible. This is wrong. The Independence Chamber of Commerce is responsible, currently sponsoring the Santa-Cali-Gon festival for the early part of September. This is to celebrate the three pioneer trails that departed from civilization at Independence and fanned out to cross the great plains in early days.

The women, who cannot participate in whiskers, show their interest in the festival by wearing long skirts, poke bonnets, and bustles on Thursdays. Wives who do not sympathize with whiskers regard them with mixed feelings, ranging from amusement to disgust. One woman gave the name of Judas to a certain whiskered horror. The men, in bland superiority, pretend that the women's trouble is jealousy. Only masculine vanity can account for that.

So, if you are missing some of your friends, just investigate any convenient bunch of whiskers, and you may find one of them there. Almost anything, from a swarm of bees to forged passport papers, can be concealed in them. The "Herald" has been gradually losing a linotype operator by the whisker route for the past several weeks. Right now there is a fair replica of King Edward VII working on the machine in his place.

One critic says that when the ladies change their appearance, they try to increase the world's scant supply of beauty; but when the men do it, they try to make cartoons of themselves. This, we think, is a matter of opinion.

Macedonia Calling

"Help Wanted" in the Work of the Kingdom

GOD'S "HELP WANTED" signs do not appear in the usual places. But if you look for them, you will find them everywhere. Wherever you see human need, wherever there is a civic duty to be done, wherever a church is short of workers, wherever a good cause languishes for lack of friends, there, if you look for them, you will find God's "Help Wanted" signs.

One of the early "Help Wanted" calls came to Paul in a night vision, when a man stood up and said, "Come over into Macedonia and help us." Young Dr. Luke, who was the traveling assistant of St. Paul, recorded that the response was immediate, "And after that he had seen the vision, immediately we endeavored to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us for to preach the gospel unto them."—Acts 16: 9.

If you don't mind a startling use of the term, Paul and Luke were good "yes men"—God's yes men. They said "Yes" to the divine call.

ALL OVER THE world, and in the church too, there are many people saying "No" to the call of the Lord. They cripple and frustrate their lives, they hinder the work of the gospel in doing so. A refusal to serve is always a cause of blight to the soul. When humanity asks us for bread, we cannot pass out stones without getting ugly callouses on both our hands and our hearts.

From one viewpoint, the important part of the experience was not the call of God, but the response of the two men. They were ready for instantaneous action. They answered "Yes" promptly, and went to work. There were no long delays while they consulted their consciences, wrestled with the spirit, demurred and delayed until they wore out the impulse and the Power that gave it. They were good "yes men."

How tired the Eternal Father must be of people who murmur, "Thy will be done," but say "No" when the call to service and action comes.

DOES GOD always find his "Yes Men" among those he has most richly blessed in life? Too often they are well-satisfied, self-sufficient, and content. All of us have spent some part of our lives in this classification. We say "Yes" to God occasionally, when it is convenient, or when we feel like it. The rest of the time we are tired; we invent excuses to still our consciences and turn the needy away. We comfort ourselves with the thought that we are doing all we can. We give a little service, we take it easy, assuming that we are paying for our salvation; that "when the roll is called up yonder, we'll be there." We forget that our very complaisance may cause us to miss the train. We forget that as long as there are souls suffering from wrong and sin, our work is not done. The hours of ease and pleasure we take so lightly may be costing someone else his eternal salvation. When the hour of judgment confronts us with our dereliction, what shall we answer?

God's yes men, on the contrary, are often found among those who have suffered trials and loss. Perhaps they have fought illness for years or suffered from handicaps. Sometimes death invades the home, so that they must turn to other people for companionship, and occupy their time in service to avoid grieving over their losses. They are no longer self-sufficient. They must learn to lean on their fellow men. And those they have served occasionally may prove to be towers of strength in their time of need.

The pathetic figure of the humble Caspar Milquetoast man who must always say "Yes" to his boss causes us to smile in mild contempt and pity. It is easy to feel superior to him. There is something degrading in having to say "Yes" to any earthly boss.

BUT WITH GOD it is different. For he has given us our agency, which includes the privilege of saying "No" on any occasion. He has given us an unlimited veto power. So, when the call comes from him, there is something noble and free in saying "Yes," because you don't have to and you aren't under any compulsion. You know, however, that there are rewards of service, and that you will miss many a precious blessing if you refuse.

It may seem anomalous and paradoxical that one who has tried to serve God during the happy part of life, is expected to do more when trials and losses come. But it is nevertheless true that this is the only way one can be saved. He must find something to replace the precious and beautiful values that have been lost. The only place he can find them is among his fellow men. Perhaps heretofore he has not depended on his neighbors; now he has a desperate need of them; and he can reach them by serving them.

This is advice that can be offered to every Christian, every church member. Say "Yes" to God when he calls you. Answer every call to service, accept every invitation if the date in your appointment book is open. Fill up your calendar if possible. Be one of God's "Yes Men."

God's servants have one tremendous advantage. While engaged in his work, they are under his protection, and he will take care of them until they have finished the work he has given them to do.

Recrudescence

The term connotes a revival of things unpleasant or not desirable, and it exactly fits what we are now experiencing as an aftermath of the Utah centennial and the motor caravan along the line of the Mormon trek in 1847.

If the tale could be told without dragging Joseph Smith through the mire of polygamy, it would not be objectionable. Why mince words about it? We know the evidence did not prove, and we, as also thousands of Latter Day Saints, do not believe he was responsible for it.

To keep on good terms with neighbors is desirable; but to do so by stultifying your judgment is another thing. We have some things in common with the Mormons in Utah, but the things wherein we differ are so grave we cannot identify ourselves with them and will never do so—cannot do so without departing from the doctrines of the church established when it was organized in 1830.

We would not cumber our columns unduly, but some of the things alleged against Joseph Smith are actually fantastic. For instance, News-week says:

"That church and state should be separate was never the dream of Joseph Smith, founder of the Latter Day Saints. The visions he claimed to have of the angel Moroni, who in 1827 delivered to Smith the book written by his father, the angel Mormon, called for a state subservient to the church in every interest—social, economic, and political. This was the premise on which Smith organized the first gathering at Kirtland, Ohio, in 1831."

We confess this is as unfounded a claim as was ever put out about the Prophet in the light of the resolution on government adopted in 1835, which has been incorporated in the Doctrine and Covenants, from which we quote:

"We believe that all men are bound to sustain and uphold the respective governments in which they reside, while protected in their inherent and inalienable rights by the laws of such governments, and that sedition and rebellion are unbecoming every citizen thus protected, and should be punished accordingly; and that all governments have a right to enact such laws as in their own judgments are best calculated to secure the public interest, at the same time, however, holding sacred the freedom of conscience."—Section 112, paragraph 5.

The things for which the Prophet's name is had "for evil" are forever being pushed forward, which reminds us of the old saying, "A lie travels ten leagues before truth gets its boots on."

We have the following inspiring letter from Elder Charles V. Graham:

Dear President Smith:

We recently completed our local business meetings among our thirteen congregations in the City of Zion. These meetings were held for the purpose of selecting pastors and other officers for each group.

In each case, the pastor that the officers in charge of the Center Place nominated was elected by the congregation, subject to ratification at the Conference in Zion. This was very gratifying. However, there was something even more gratifying; that was the spirit of unity, love, confidence, and the expressions of desire to follow the leadership of the church in building the City of Zion.

Where the pastors elected the rest of their local leaders and department heads after they themselves were elected, the same spirit of confidence, unity, and fellowship prevailed. In some instances, the congregations expressed their desires to approve in one motion the entire list of local nominations by the pastor.

Finally, these local business meetings culminated in the Conference in Zion held July 28 at the Stone Church. The same spirit of unity and co-operation prevailed there.

Brother Smith, the fine quality of our people and their desires to follow leadership and build Zion as revealed in these recent business meetings is a revelation to me of God's hand in this work.

This experience strengthens me and challenges me to give the very best ministry I am capable of giving to our people in their striving to build the kingdom.

I consider it a special privilege as well as a great responsibility to labor in Zion. To this privilege and responsibility, I sincerely pledge my all.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

How To Increase Church Income

By Weldon Crossland, Abingdon Cokesbury Press, 1947, 159 pages, price $1.50.

The author of this book is an authority in the field of church finance and gives many practical plans not only for raising money but for developing good will in the congregation and in public relations for the support of the church.

While our church has its own plan of tithing for the raising of money, we know that additional information in this field is helpful. The principles expressed in this book will be useful to every pastor and church financial officer where a local congregation and church are involved.

THE Red WARRIOR

By D. T. Williams

WE THANK the Herald for a liberalized policy which now allows those who have long been seeing the dangerous course pursued by Russian communism a right to speak up in defense of our democratic way of life. As one who has been refused such right in the past, this opportunity comes as a happy surprise. Such a change of policy signifies that we have recovered at last from an intoxication which has plagued many less worthy journals.

One of our writers, perhaps he should remain nameless, gave us the following under the spell of a dictator's conquest:

"THE RUSSIANS are not hard to understand, once you see their point of view. American newspapers that have made a mystery of Russian policy are, however, hard to understand."

To such it is not hard to understand why mighty Russia wanted to carve up honest little Finland and divide with the ruthless Hitler a Poland which had been persecuted through the ages. To such thinking it is described as a "neat trick" when Poland heroically strives to save her capitol city, Warsaw, from the heels of two conquerors—Stalin and Hitler. This murderous act is described as "brutal but necessary." Brutal? Yes, the brutality of beastliness. Necessary? No more than the gang slayings of a blood-thirsty Capone or the conquests of an avaricious Hun.

We might reflect that if men are to be judged on their past behavior, it would be quite difficult to paint Stalin as white as the proverbial lily. Why should we be drawn into defending such a doubtful history as that of the Russian man of steel? Still, some of us have tried it. I am sure I would not want my hands as red with the blood of my fellow man as are those of this so-called "strong man."

Recent history has not suddenly become so ancient that we have forgotten that Joseph Stalin signed a pact with the enemy of our civilization to furnish him with oil, steel, and the munitions of war to slaughter our democracies. Stalin remained true to that vicious pact with the Nazi hangman as against the democratic nations up to the very moment when his erstwhile friend, Hitler, turned on him like a mad dog.

I wonder where the magician is who could stand up to assure us now that Stalin would not have continued furnishing our enemy with all the equipage of war had he not been attacked by his brutal paymaster of the day before. Make no mistake about it, Stalin was not fighting the battle for democracy any more than we were fighting the battle for communism.

Communism and democracy are as far apart as the poles, but war composed the atmosphere for some very strange bed-fellows. Communism did not change its stripes because it associated with liberal governments against a common enemy. And as Mr. Roosevelt said in 1940, "The Soviet Union, as everybody knows who has the courage to face the fact, is a dictatorship as absolute as any other dictatorship in the world." While these words were being spoken, Hitler was going strong, and Mussolini was in the heyday of his glory. Yet here was another dictatorship as strong as that of either of them—as powerful and as ruthless as Hirohito's godship. Do we have now the "courage to face the fact," as Mr. Roosevelt bade us do?

We quote Mr. Davies, one of our ambassadors to Russia, as saying of conditions among the Russians themselves:

"The terror here is a horrifying fact. There is a fear that reaches down into and haunts all sections of the community. No household, however humble, apparently but lives in constant fear of a nocturnal raid by the secret police. . . . Once the person is taken away, nothing of him is known for months—and many times never thereafter."

What a description from the pen of a diplomat who then came out in a book and motion picture, Mission to Moscow, to whitewash the man who heads up such a state of affairs. No, the leopard has not changed his spots, but some among us have.

And who are we to put the hush-hush on such matters simply because the principle concerned happened to be fighting the same enemy with ourselves. I would not say fighting in the same cause, for that would be too self-evidently untrue. Communism is the enemy of freedom and of all that we hold most precious.

Mr. Wilkie in his One World made it clear enough that the Russian government, as presently constituted, is in no manner of imagination a democracy. It is governed by a few ruthless party members and by no vote of the masses of the people. With this knowledge from so high a source, why should we throw our arms about Mr. Stalin's neck as though he were the savior of our democracy and civilization?

Was Stalin so great a friend of democracy when he so brutally attacked unoffending little Finland? Did any patriotic American think of him then as the savior of our war-ridden world-community? Every American should read recent articles in the Reader's Digest and be informed on matters that will yet be vital to our future as a nation. There are some very real dangers before us.

While some are defending Stalin, I quote Churchill in his baring of the philosophy of communism and its murderous application. He says: "No faith need be kept with non-communists. Every act of good will, of tolerance, of conciliation, of mercy, of magnanimity on the part of governments or statesmen is to be utilized for their ruin. Then when the time is ripe and the moment opportune, every form of lethal violence, from revolt to private assassination must be used without stint or compunction. The citadel will be stormed under the banner of liberty and democracy; and once the apparatus of power is in the hands of the Brotherhood (Communists), all opposition, all contrary opinions, must be extinguished by death. Democracy is but a tool to be used and afterwards broken."

Should we depend for our freedom on a man who implements this kind of philosophy? Mind you, I have nothing to say against the Russian people. I am only sorry that ninety-seven per cent of them must be in slavery to the three per cent who make up the party in a one-party system of bondage. I hope the day will come when they can put the proverbial skids under Stalin as they previously did under the Czar and, from the ruin of their present serfdom, develop a democracy of which

Doing "Nothing Much"

A "Between You and Me" Feature in the Lamoni Chronicle,
by the Editor,

KATHRYN C. METZ

Just about every time we see any of our metropolitan friends they always arrive at the question, "What have you been doing?" and "Where have you been keeping yourself?"

Somehow we never think of the right answers until too late, and we lamely admit to doing "nothing much," and "just staying at home."

"Nothing much" includes walking home from a visit with friends and in those unhurried moments looking skyward, filling our eyes with the beauty of the night. The sky is a vast area of twinkling stars instead of a patch of heaven bordered by skyscrapers and dimmed by smog from a thousand smoke stacks. It's breathing air that is without carbon fumes left by hurrying, broken-down taxicabs.

"Nothing much" is exchanging a friendly "hello" through the dust with a neighbor who is sitting on the front porch, rocking and resting after a busy day. It is walking down the street, meeting friendly faces instead of elbowing your way down an avenue filled with worried, tense, and disinterested strangers.

"Nothing much" is having time to watch the clouds in the distance drift like smoke from hill to hill. It's walking in the rain and stopping to admire a double rainbow that rises in the east, spreading a promise over the sky. It's having cut flowers from your neighbor's garden instead of a greenhouse and daily offerings of fresh vegetables and fruit.

It is eating lunch, secure in the knowledge that the people around you are good, honest, law-abiding folk and not Louie the "Ox," Loud Mouth Hymie, or some other south side gunman. . . . It's sleeping with the windows open and screen door latched, and it's going to parties where women do handwork, stem gooseberries or quilt for the hostess instead of chain smoking.

It's calling the children in the neighborhood by their first names, watching them lose their teeth, and grow skinny and tall without realizing that they have lost their cuteness for the time being.

"Nothing much" is reading a book instead of a review . . . listening to songbirds instead of pavement sparrows and pigeons. . . . It is getting a sun tan without exposing oneself on a roof top or crowded beach.

"Nothing much" just happens to suit us exactly, and despite an occasional tug of ambition for bigger things, we intend to keep right on doing just that until the old rocking chair claims us for good.

Next time our hustling, bustling friends ask us, "What have you been doing lately?" we will vaguely answer, "Oh, nothing much," and let it go at that. They wouldn't understand, anyway.

the world can justly be proud. If they learn to think as they have learned to fight, I believe they will do it. In the meantime, I shall not be one to give encouragement to the enemies of the democratic way of life. I would rather be with Churchill who, while he accepted the fighting strength of Russia against the common enemy, did not think it necessary to change his opinion of communism or its ruthlessness.

I have kept my fingers crossed as to what would happen with Stalin when Hitler at last was conquered. Every nation, including our own, was in this fight for the sake of its own principles and not for the defense of another. Everyone who is realistic in his thinking must know this to be true. Russian communism has made no statement of change of principle, so we are justified in believing it still stands for the things for which Roosevelt, Davies, and Churchill condemned it.

If all of this seems to some of you unjust to Stalin, why not balance things a little by remembering how many millions of injustices the Red Warrior has heaped upon myriads of his fellow men. I am sure that God's hand was in the series of events which turned the two greatest dictators on earth against each other, thus giving a breathing spell in which the democracies could adjust themselves to meet the tremendous blow which has been leveled at them. Yes, God has turned our enemies against each other. It is not Stalin who is to be praised for this great gift of resistance to Hitler, but God whose gift it is. For I do believe, had it not been for God's intervention, England would now be suffering the fate of Poland or any one of the other nations whose neck is under the feet of the conqueror today.

Go make thy garden fair,
Thou workest not alone,
For he whose plot is next to thine
Will see and mend his own.

Murder Clinics

I have reason to believe that a very young lad of my acquaintance had been listening to murder stories over the radio and seeing them enacted at the movies. He secured a length of small rope, took the family cat to the back lot, threw the rope over a limb of a tree, western fashion, and hung the cat by the neck until it was dead . . . almost. His mother, getting wind of what was up, came charging to the rescue. She rebuked the boy, cut the cat down, and administered first aid. The cat had already lost eight and a half of its lives and rigor mortis had set in. But the cat came back as cats do, though nations perish. The boy, after the fashion of adults, had a belated repentance. He told his mother, "I knew the cat would live. I prayed for him on the bed, and I prayed for him on the chair, and I prayed for him in the automobile."

Radio has many fine and wonderful programs to offer, but there are hours when, no matter what station you tune in to, you will get either a murder story or very bad music. If you choose the bad music, it may induce thoughts of murder. Most adults who enjoy their murders vicariously, no matter how gruesome they may be, prefer to do so in a comfortable armchair at home or in a not so comfortable chair at the movies. Children and young people are different. They have not much use for armchairs, and they crave action. Many of them are imitative, open to suggestion, highstrung, nervous, emotional, excitable, ambitious, with scarcely an ounce of good judgment concerning life, but with the making of excellent citizens if their interest is not diverted to crime.

The young lad mentioned in the opening paragraph had learned just how to conduct a hanging. He had seen it in the movies and had heard it over the radio. Fortunately, he chose to begin on a family cat. Somewhat older boys and girls have actually and very successfully hung playmates. A sixteen-year-old farm boy went with three neighborhood playmates hunting wild flowers. He took with him his .22 rifle to hunt squirrels and killed all three of his youthful companions. His assigned reason was that he just had a hankering to know how it seemed to kill someone. Where did he get such an impulse? Another teen-age boy murdered the sexton of his father's church and explained that he just had an urge to kill. Still another teen-aged boy engaged in a regular movie-style gun battle with the police, using a younger companion as a shield in the most approved style. Two boy gangs in a city obtained weapons of various sorts and had a regular gang war such as they heard over the radio, leaving one of their number dead. These examples might be multiplied over and over again.

Juvenile delinquency has law enforcement officers all the way up to the FBI very seriously worried, and the offenses of these juveniles include crimes of violence as well as immorality. The pattern they follow is suspiciously like the pattern of things they hear over the radio and see in the movies.

The movies and the radio actually conduct a sort of clinic in murder methods. There is not a conceivable method of doing away with human beings that is not very vividly set forth in great detail. There is the shot, the scream, the thud of the falling body, the sound of retreating footsteps, and so on and so on. The methods delineated include the stand-up-and-fight, bang-bang of gangsters in gun battles among themselves or with the police, the more subtle approach in the dark

In a Chinese Cemetery

The "Oiseau Des Iles" (Bird of the Islands) slid silently to her moorings just off the remarkable island of Makatea. One first encounters a solid rock cliff some 300 feet high where great caves filled with coffins of the ancient inhabitants are plainly visible.

One early morning, Brother Sorensen and I decided to explore the island. We soon learned that it was impossible to leave the main road for the sharp jutting limestone feo loomed everywhere. The rich phosphate deposits had been removed, leaving only a limestone shell. The sun had baked them to a razor-sharp edge. Needless to say, we kept on the narrow path.

Upon our arrival at the opposite edge of the island, we found a long winding stairway through a narrow and extraordinarily steep path. After several minutes' descent, we arrived at the bottom. Again we were at sea level. The atmosphere was very heavy. The sun beat down mercilessly upon us. We brushed through humid thickets and found a narrow and seldom traveled path. Only three native huts were erected on this side of the island. All three seemed deserted. As we pushed along this path, we came upon the strange cemetery pictured above. All graves at sea level are above ground. These, however, seemed grotesque, as row upon row revealed the oriental symmetry of a strange race.

There must be some religious significance in the fact that these graves were thus arranged—hid in a dense jungle and at sea level. This mystery remains unsolved as do many of the strange customs of this Oriental race.

The Salvation of

The Rural Church

IN THE EARLY years of our nation, people settled in groups, and even the farmers lived in town. Each home had its garden, orchard, and a barn which was located on the rear of the lot for stock. Many of these villages were of one denomination, the people often coming into the United States as a group and settling together. The church was the chief center of interest and was frequently the sponsor for the schools, social activities, and in general the hub of the whole form of association. Continued immigration, as well as migration within the states, caused these homogeneous church units of the east coast to break down or "become diluted." New denominations springing up converted members until the day came that there were more churches than the people could support. In the state of Ohio there were four churches for each community.

The coming of specialization called for bigger and better churches and a better trained ministry. In the West, the land survey system—the government selling to individuals—and the minimizing of the Indian problem caused people to begin settling on dispersed farmsteads. The few compact settlements existing were those which moved in a body or were built around some industry. In this period, people became less concerned about the church—they desired to own a piece of land, if for no other reason than exploitation. The churches of this time attempted, and to some degree succeeded in taking the gospel to the people. The circuit rider became famous, meetings were held in the homes, the village square, or any place where a crowd could be gathered. The church that was the most flexible in this day of transition was the most prominent, which is one reason why there are so many Methodist churches throughout the land. Too, this was the period in the history of our country that "camp meetings" became so popular, some of the more emotional type boasting an attendance up to 30,000. These meetings marked the first attempt of the churches to co-operate, as each denominational minister was given the opportunity to expound and gain as many converts as possible. Many were "saved" and were allowed to have their names on the book of the church that appealed to them. There were some evidences of conflict, but, on the whole, it was an adjustment of their problem.

TODAY, because of this new settlement condition—as well as the loss of interest or the divided interest in other institutions—we have too many churches for the number of members. Less than half of the people of the United States belong to some church. In 1936, the average church in Missouri had less than 110 members; almost twenty per cent had less than thirty-five members; about fifty per cent had less than seventy-five members (Ohio rural church studies indicate that a church under seventy-five members has small chance for growth); and about sixty per cent less than 100 members. These churches have under an average attendance of seventy for each preaching service and only a little over seventy-five for the church school. The optimum sized church for all denominations is believed to be around 200 (though some sociologists and denominations claim 1,000 as optimum). This is the approximate size of the membership of the church in towns of 1,500 to 2,500 population.

The average church has, by far, too few members to support a pastor and maintain a church budget; it is too small to attract and hold the youth. As a result, the few churches surviving are inferior. More and more country people attend church in the cities, or stay at home to listen to better church services on the radio; some even sever all church connections. Many of those remaining faithful to the small churches do so because of the call of duty rather than interest.

The decline of these churches has reached appalling figures. In the state of Arkansas alone, over 1,000 have died, over 300 in Iowa, and a figure somewhere between these two for the state of Missouri. This does not include the hundreds that are declining in efficiency. Only twenty-five per cent still open to conduct regular full-time services; less than fifty per cent conduct only one service a month. In the last twenty-five years, attendance has dropped almost seventy per cent. Only half have a resident pastor, and forty per cent of these have attended no higher institution of learning than high school. Many are open for only church school, the funeral service, or the once-in-a-while wedding. Many of these boxlike structures have been turned into barns or other farm buildings.

CHURCHES, regardless of the denomination, have made some contribution to society. They have given valuable moral and ethical teachings to their members. In studies made in Carolina, there was found a direct relationship between church membership and living conditions. Countless studies have indicated that churchgoers have a smaller percentage of divorces and crimes and a larger percentage of leaders than nonmembers.

The decline means more than we like to consider; we prefer to think that these people attend more efficient churches; however, this is seldom the case. In neighborhoods or communities that have no church, it has been found that only four per cent of the people ever attend elsewhere. Where the church has died, only 4.8 per cent go to church elsewhere. Prior to 1935, the average church-going family in Missouri traveled only 2.08 miles to church; if this trend continues, it means that there must be a church within an approximate distance of no more than three miles. Those who attend church the least are not those who live in town or the open country, but the town fringe people—the area adjoining the town.

Much can be done to help solve this problem of the rural church. In an article in Country Gentleman for February, 1943, William F. McDermott described how Pastor Calvin Schnucker built a community in Titonko, Iowa. In a period of six years, he lifted the percentage of owner-operated farms within his parish from thirty-four to sixty per cent. He increased church attendance from seventy to over 400, changed a run-down, leaky, mortgaged structure into a modern $35,000 edifice, and a dying rural church into one that is much alive. Eugene Smather's article, "The Church in Rural Reconstruction," October, 1946, issue of Soil Conservation tells of a small, isolated village in eastern Tennessee that built a community through the church.

THE RURAL CHURCH has a place in the life of its people, and its function of "life-giving" can grow out of the following musts:

1. It must have well-trained, rural-minded pastoral leadership.
2. The church must become the center of activities in the community.
3. It must attract the youth—for therein lies its future.
4. It must become the stimulator of better living conditions.
 - a. In better farming and marketing methods.
 - b. In encouraging farm improvements in keeping with modern living conditions.
 - c. In stressing Stewardship—especially in relationship to the care of and the preserving of soil fertility for present and future generations, as well as stewardship in all other phases of life.
 - d. In encouraging better roads, electricity, and attractive farm homes.
5. It must be voluntary in its methods and teachings rather than authoritarian, or laissez faire.
 - a. be purposeful in the minds of the members.
 - b. be planned by the members—under guidance.
 - c. be executed by the members—under guidance.
6. It must become sufficient in size (200 to 1,000 members)
 - a. not undersized because
 - (1) it can be neglected without notice.
 - (2) it will be of little public attention.
 - (3) it will not attract good leadership.
 - b. Not oversized because
 - (1) of the tendency of members to form cliques.
 - (2) of the tendency to become over-organized—too many good things going on at the same time—overlapping or duplication of activities.
 - c. Sufficient in size to have good subinterest groups (choir, men, women, and youth organization)

- (1) to appeal to the different age groups of youth.
 - (2) to utilize leadership and talent.
7. It must be flexible enough to meet the interest and needs of the people and yet represent God.
 8. It must show a lively interest in helping families, especially the youth, to own property. It must
 - a. give or get reliable information on prospective farm sales.
 - b. give or help obtain credit for those who are not able to finance the whole purchase price of farm, equipment, stock, and sufficient capital until an income is realized for the farm.
 - c. help industrious, able-bodied men who do not have sufficient capital for "down payment" to climb the "agricultural ladder" from laborer-share or cropper-renter to owner.
 - d. discourage tenancy and large land holdings.
 9. It must develop and encourage better educational and health programs.
 - a. religious education in the church.
 - b. stimulating preaching services.
 - c. vocational training.
 - (1) youth in 4-H, FFA, or vocational agriculture.
 - (2) Adult in Balanced Farming or institutes conducted by county agents, home demonstration agents, or extension specialists.
 - d. adequate schools consolidation when necessary.
 - e. balanced program in religious, vocational, or avocational and secular education.
 10. It must organize a church community in the sociological unit—the natural community, where associations are on the face to face level.

11. It must develop a sound but silent (as possible) financial program—not a constant plea for money—by planning a yearly budget financed by
 - a. subscriptions to members according to ability and willingness to pay or,
 - b. "God's Acre Plan." An acre of crop, a calf, a pig, or other unit pledged for the support of the church.
 - c. If pastor is paid a small salary, supplement with a small farm. (This helps him understand the farmers' problems.)
 - d. (Plus one or more of the above.) Use of the women's organization through sales, dinners, and other means, to be used for social effect as well as income.
 - e. DO NOT OVERWORK THE COLLECTION PLATE! (Members can see these down town in the hands of the omnipresent beggar.)
12. It must develop a sound gathering program. (Latter Day Saints are not alone in this; it is being done by Presbyterians and the United Brethren.)
 - a. Watch for salable farms, appraise, then help members to purchase.
 - b. USE FAMILY SELECTION.
 - (1) Families with sufficient capital to purchase, equip, and develop farms.
 - (2) Families with experience
 - (a) in that area or similar.
 - (b) in the type of farming being considered.
 - (3) Families with favorable attitudes—especially toward farm life
 - (a) those who are tolerant
 - (b) those who compromise
 - (c) those who have successful marriage experience
 - (d) those who are good neighbors and are confident.
 - (4) Discourage or rebuke the unfavorable.
 - (a) those of low suffering.
 - (b) those who are hypocritical.
 - (c) those who are slow to compromise.
 - (d) those unsuccessful in marriage.
 - (e) those who are poor

The Lord's Prayer

By Donald V. Lents
Pastor, Walnut Park Congregation

8. "And Suffer Us Not To Be Led Into Temptation"

The eighth in a series of meditations presented at the Appointee Institute held at Independence, August 28 to September 14, 1946. The first seven appeared in the issues of January 18, January 25, June 14, July 19, July 26, August 2, and August 16.

Of all the portions of the prayer Christ gave us as an example, this phrase—"And suffer us not to be led into temptation"—is perhaps the most controversial. As recorded in the King James and Moffatt translations, it has been the cause of much confusion, most of which, however, has been cleared up with the translation of the Inspired Version of the Bible. In such a prayer, we may be brought to the highest communion with the source of our strength.

The climax of this searching prayer is found in the heart's sincere desire, "And suffer us not to be led into temptation." We are brought to the realization of our weakness and our instability, and we recognize our need for a guide. This makes it wise for us to pray as Christ taught—to "Our Father in heaven." We must be aware that there is always the danger of failure. Those who recognize this danger are much less likely to fail than the overconfident.

In the experience of a young country minister, we find a good example. His was a small parish in which twenty-five to thirty people were considered an overflow crowd. A friend of his—the pastor of a large congregation in a neighboring city—asked the young minister on a certain occasion to come to the city to speak. He accepted and started preparation on his sermon. The Saturday preceding the appointment found him in the city looking over the large church. Because of its size, he became nervous and decided to practice his sermon. Finally, the old sexton who had been working around the building all this time said, "Pardon me, young man, you seem to be concerned as to whether or not your voice will fill this auditorium. If I may be so bold as to make a suggestion, it would be this: I have seen ministers come and go—good ones, bad ones, old ones, young ones—but those who have been successful have always stood squarely in the pulpit and kept their eyes on the stained-glass window at the rear of the church." As the sexton turned and walked away, the young minister tried his suggestion and discovered he was looking at a life-size picture of Christ. He learned a profound truth that day.

If we learn the truth of keeping our eyes on Christ, we will have guidance and help in all of our experiences and will not be upset or unduly concerned with the temptations of the world. We must check and recheck so as to be certain we are making no unwarranted leap.

The chief call in this prayer is to awaken! That note of urgency was present in the life and ministry of Christ; it guided the activities of the early disciples; and it must be with those interested in the things of the kingdom today. Tomorrow is too late—NOW is the time. The following verse helps us realize this note of urgency:

The clock of life is wound but once
And no man has the power to tell

Just when the hands will stop—
At late or early hour.
Now is the only time you own.
Love, live, and toil with a will;
Place no faith in the morrow
For the clock may then be still.

Man cannot escape temptation. Christ recognized this fact and taught us to pray for strength to avoid the way of sinners. The temptations that we must seek to overcome are not so much those that we blunder into, but those that come to us in the line of duty. "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God that giveth to all men liberally" is actually what we are doing as we pray "and suffer us not to be led into temptation."

So together we say—"Oh, God, lead us as thou seest fit, but we pray that because of our endeavors we might be led to thee always."

neighbors, suspicious, or fearful.

- (5) A size and age-sex composition that is adjusted to the size and type of farm. The probable future growth or decrease in size of the family and its needs must be considered. If an elderly person, there should be a son or daughter whose interest is with the church and who can take over in case of death.
- (6) The family should have character, stability, and a sense of responsibility.
 - (a) should be intelligent, alert, resourceful, and have good judgment.
 - (b) should show interest in co-operative buying and selling, and in productive enterprises.
 - (c) should be loyal to the church. This includes the law of tithes.

If these "musts" are promoted, the rural church has a future—a place in Zion. These are the problems of rural life—its needs. When the church can find itself ministering to these, it shall not be lost.

Maxine Friend

The third in a series of personality sketches of Auditorium employees.

By Biloine Whiting

She sits behind the little window in the Auditorium foyer opposite the front doors. The austere portrait of Young Joseph and a cracked scene from the 1930 conference hang stern and distant beside her window, but blonde Maxine Friend, the cheery Auditorium switchboard operator, is a warm center of friendliness in that wall of cold cement.

Maxine, from Flint, Michigan, lacks the mechanical-man look of so many telephone operators, partly because she doesn't wear the wire headpiece any more than necessary, but mainly because—when the switchboard lights aren't flashing—Maxine is smiling at everyone who goes by her window.

Auditorium workers and church officers can always expect a wave from Maxine to start off the day, and the board is seldom so busy that she can't keep up her half of the conversation when someone wants to lean in her window and chat.

Visitors gravitate toward her window as soon as they step through the doors, and she is the source of information for everyone who comes in the Auditorium. She knows which doors of the Stone Church are open, where to deposit the Oriole money, what time the next bus leaves for Chicago, and where President Smith eats his lunch.

Maxine handles the sales of candy bars and gum for the Auditorium typists, and receives packages sent to the church officers. This includes, besides telegrams and special delivery letters, bushels of Texas grapefruit, Florida oranges, and coconuts sent by the Saints to President Smith.

"The church officers are all easy to get along with," she says. "Except when several people are trying to call the bishop's office at once, I don't have any trouble."

Besides tracking down busy bishops, Maxine plugs into such posers as, "Hello, may I speak to Daddy?"

The other day Walter Johnson's 4-year-old daughter, Kay, called the Auditorium and asked to speak to her grandfather, President Garver. Maxine connected her with the Presidency's offices, and Kay explained very seriously that "Grandpa" had forgotten to wave good-by to her that morning.

Estella Wight's

Forty Years

of Service

FORTY YEARS AGO last May, Estella Wight came to the Herald Publishing House at Lamoni as an editorial assistant to the late Marietta Walker. Her work was to be in connection with Zion's Hope, the only juvenile periodical of the church at that time. In addition, she handled correspondence and secretarial work for the editors of the Herald, including Elbert A. Smith. Three years later she succeeded Sister Walker as editor, and has continued until the present time of her retirement.

It was while serving as assistant editor of Zion's Hope that Miss Wight became aware of a growing need for supplying the boys and girls of the church with more reading material. One paper could not provide adequate reading for so wide a range of juvenile ages. After a year and a half of planning a paper for older children, she prepared the first copy of Stepping Stones on July 2, 1913. In 1915, her first book, In the Shelter of the Little Brown Cottage, was printed. Its sequel, The Vineyard Story, was published nine years later. These stories were printed in serial form in Stepping Stones and Autumn Leaves before they appeared as books.

From the beginning of her editorial career to the end, Sister Wight consecrated her life to the service of the church in the field of publication. She has never claimed anything for herself, has always been more concerned about contributing her part to the total success of the church. She has lived on a self-planned stewardship basis, asking only her "just needs and wants" which have always been on a very moderate scale.

Both in the organization and abroad in the church, Sister Wight has won a host of loyal and devoted friends, many of them contributors to the publications. As she retires, the affection and esteem of her fellow workers go with her, and they express their best wishes for her.

A farewell reception in her honor was given on August 10. More than three hundred friends attended.

Watching the close of this chapter of service to the church in Sister Wight's career, many friends will remember with gratitude the good she has done, the lives she has influenced, the people she has inspired to make their contribution to the cause she loved.

Dealing With the Erring

By L. Wayne Updike

5. Forgiveness

THERE is a difference between the duties imposed upon individuals and upon the church by the law of Christ with regard to forgiving others.

Of individuals, it is required that they forgive all who trespass against them. In fact, the forgiveness we receive from God for our own errors is at least partly determined by the degree to which we are willing to forgive others. The seeds of bitterness growing in a human soul, if unremoved, will bring spiritual death. It is, therefore, essential that man shall have a forgiving spirit and be able to overlook the mistakes of others, even until "seventy times seven."¹ An abundance of Scripture testifies that this is the will of God in the matter.² Notable among these is the phrase "as we forgive those who trespass against us."

Those who insist that an offending brother shall come and ask forgiveness before they forgive him find no warrant for such a course in the law of God nor the rules of the church. Repentance and confession are the requirements necessary to entitle one to forgiveness, and, when they are shown, forgiveness should be granted without further requirement.

Should an offender refuse to repent, it still remains the duty of the offended to forgive, for "of you it is required to forgive all men."³ Of necessity, forgiveness granted under such conditions must be of a different kind or degree than that granted upon a true repentance. Forgiveness of the unrepentant may still require the forgiver to administer justice, though the same must be done with mercy and compassion; for the interests of the body, the church, must be considered as well as those of the individual, and one unwilling to repent cannot but endanger the welfare of others by remaining in the church.

"Ye shall bring him before the church, and do with him as the scriptures saith unto you, either by commandment, or by revelation. And this ye shall do that God might be glorified, not because ye forgive not, having not compassion, but that ye may be justified in the eyes of the law, that ye may not offend him who is your Lawgiver."⁴

no proper place in the heart of a child of God, no matter what the provocation, but a merciful heart must not prevent true justice. Bitterness results in spiritual death as certainly as the germs of disease, if unremoved, cause death to the body. There is no point at which men become justified in being unforgiving in spirit.

"Yea, and as often as my people repent, will I forgive them their trespasses against me. And ye also shall forgive one another your trespasses."²

Many offenses are against society or the church rather than against individuals, in which cases the church is to act the part of a brother in laboring with the offenders through its officers. When the offender repents and confesses, the church must forgive. The proper procedure in granting such forgiveness is to allow the church at a regular or especially called business meeting, due notice of which had been given, to express by vote its willingness to forgive.

There is no warrant whatever in the law for a repentant member having forgiveness withheld for six months or any other period of time. If he repents and confesses his wrong, he has done all within his power, and the duty is at once laid upon the church to forgive him. Some may urge that perhaps his repentance is not sincere and it would be better to wait a while before forgiving him in order to prove him. If there be reason to believe that he has not truly repented, that his confession is not complete, or that he is insincere, then forgiveness would not be in order. The church has a right to be satisfied that the offender has truly repented and that his confession is such as covers the offense; but, when such satisfaction is given, the penitent member has the right to forgiveness, and that immediately.

The church is not permitted by the law to forgive any transgressor who has not repented and confessed; on no other grounds can forgiveness be granted by the church. The law on this point is specific: "He that sinneth and repenteth not, shall be cast out."⁵ To forgive unrepentant sinners is to give place to sinners in the church or kingdom of God, and if it be permissible to retain such in the church, then consistency would require that we receive people from the world on the same basis, e.g., without repentance.

There are a few crimes which the church may not forgive under any circumstances. They are:

1. Murder. This crime must be proved according to the laws of the land and, when so proved, is not to be forgiven.

"He that kills shall not have forgiveness in this, nor in the world to come."⁶

2. Adultery, second offense. It seems to be the general understanding that this offense refers to the second one of which the church has taken cognizance. The statement of the law is:

"Thou shalt not commit adultery; and he that committeth adultery and repenteth not, shall be cast out; but he that has committed adultery and repents with all his heart, and forsaketh it, and doeth it no more, thou shalt forgive; but if he doeth it again, he shall not be forgiven, but shall be cast out."⁷

3. Leaving companion in wedlock for the sake of another. This does not refer to the crime of adultery, though adultery is a part of it. The real offense is leaving an innocent companion in wedlock, perhaps with children, without the support and care which a husband and father, or wife and mother should give a family, and remarrying. An offense of this kind is not committed on the impulse of a moment, but upon deliberate consideration and planning. There are none who have intelligence enough to be at the head of a family, but who know of the seriousness of such a violation of the marriage vows, and of the injustice, the anguish of mind, the burden and pain of the increased responsibility, and the loneliness and sorrow of a blasted life, which are all placed upon the deserted one. To do all this for the sake of another person, who has no claims upon the deserter, constitutes a heinous crime second only to murder itself. The scriptural statement follows:

"If ye shall find that any persons have left their companion for the sake of adultery, and they themselves are the offenders, and their companions are living, they shall be cast out from among you. And again I say unto you, that ye shall be watchful and careful, with all inquiry, that ye receive none such among you if they are married, and if they are not mar-

The Gospel to All the World

By E. Y. Hunker

Even a casual reading of the life of Jesus will serve to reveal that his mission and plan to save mankind have always been universal in nature and scope. Any person, or people therefore, who claim discipleship with Christ are by that very claim under divine responsibility to assist in the labor of preaching the gospel "unto every creature," of teaching the gospel message to "all nations," and of proclaiming the good news of the love of God and the truth of life unto "every kindred, and tongue, and people." Jesus himself declared: "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a and his gospel that they can and will go on missions abroad to preach and testify to peoples of other nations throughout the world.

This sending of missionaries is of primary importance. Nothing is more effectual than the personal contacts of the representatives of Christ. It requires much—sometimes the utmost sacrifice. To go from home to peoples whose ways, viewpoints, and languages are different from our own, necessitates great mental and physical readjustment. Those whom we send certainly need and merit our continual, sympathetic understanding. They need our spiritual and

There is another definite need in addition to the personal phase of missionary representation in these missions. We need to establish well-equipped headquarters and facilities in vital centers. These should have permanence. It is important that people should know that there are permanent points where our representatives and our literature are always accessible—places that are like beacon lights, sending out their guiding rays for those "honest in heart" who seek for God's eternal truth. For these vital needs, sympathetic spiritual support is not sufficient. Temporal means to finance such projects are likewise essential. You may rest assured, then, that the interest of the church youth in these missions abroad to the extent of materializing in financial support will be heartening, indeed, to the missionaries who leave homeland to labor in fields afar.

The spirit and desire to aid materially the Missions Abroad Program, accompanied by the active applying of the principle of self-denial on the part of the youth of the church, will enrich the spiritual life of the entire church. It will, furthermore, augment the spiritual power of our representatives. The practice of restraint in the matters of pleasures and unnecessary wants, and the giving of many dollars we now spend for goods of inferior spiritual values will be a means of bringing salvation to many souls as well.

The promulgation of the gospel abroad has been fraught, in times past, with hardships unrealized by many of us. Prejudice and opposition are often bitter and persistent witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come, or the destruction of the wicked."

The "Missions Abroad" project adopted by the Zion's League was given special presentation in our issue of May 31. This is one of a series of articles by church leaders in support of the missionary work by our young people.

Our church positively asserts that we have been established by Deity and made the custodian of the great Restoration Movement—the "fullness of the gospel." On the basis of such assertion, we, the members of the church, are today more responsible for carrying out the "great commission" than any other body of people on earth.

To preach this gospel of the kingdom in all the world for a witness requires witnesses—message bearers—missionaries who are consecrated, devoted, and so imbued with the conviction of the divinity of Christ temporal support. Some of the factors that intensify the loneliness of a missionary in a strange and distant land are the feelings that may come to him that he is forgotten and that very few care. Surely, with the army of the youth of the church, growing in the concept of their responsibility to share in the work of missions abroad, our missionaries to other lands can realize that they have a genuine backing. This cannot but inspire them in the giving of their best to the tremendous task before them.

MISSIONS ABROAD

The Truth About

Universal Military Training

Universal military training would be a serious change in our national policy. It deserves a careful investigation and coolheadedness. Following are some evaluations:

There is security only in co-operation. As far as increasing armaments or the size of an army is concerned, what makes for security for one country makes for insecurity in others. A mad race in building up armies and armaments would be fatal, for such inevitably leads to conflict. It seems to me that U.M.T. shows to the whole world that we are playing this suicidal game. As one of the most powerful nations in the world, we would be setting a poor example for our neighbors.

The defense against an atomic war can be achieved only by preventing war itself. Our scientists tell us that forty million people could be destroyed in a few hours. There is only counter-offense and revenge for the country that will not be the aggressor. There was no defense for Nagasaki and Hiroshima. England didn't intercept the V-2 bombs. Their warheads could be used in atomic warfare. In addition to the atom bombs, experts tell us there would probably be germ sprays and other such vicious weapons. It seems to me in such a war of technicians and experts, one 4-F might do more than hundreds of men in a mass army. Still we hear talk of mass armies and military bases.

A more accurate name for Universal Military Training is Peacetime Conscription. The thing that makes it conscription is the fact that it is compulsory. A young person must take it or take the consequence for breaking the law. Such penalties already suggested have not been very light. I realize that there has been much said about military training being different from military service. Somehow I haven't been able to see a difference. U. M. T. is military indoctrination and part of the training is spent in camp life. It is training to kill people.

Health and education are civilian responsibilities. It is true that we have failed somewhat in each. I don't think there is any question about this however, it can best be remedied by social and educational reforms. In the light of figures recently released showing the disproportionately high rate of venereal and mental diseases in the armed forces during the last war, one questions the validity of the War Department's argument. There seems to be little doubt that the health and educational proposals were of considerably less importance in U.M.T. than military indoctrination.

Trust and confidence in our fellow man can best be taught in civilian institutions. One year of military training will not make every man a firm believer in militarism. Most of them may not like it at all (especially after the model U.M.T. experiments with persons already favorable to it are finished); however, they will be taught that force between nations is essential. Such attitudes held by a vast part of our population will lead to anything but understanding and co-operation.

The War Department has a most difficult job, that of selling U.M.T. to mothers, fathers, and young people of the country. This does not mean there are no top government officials working for it. President Truman, the late Secretary of Navy Knox, Major General Hershey, J. Edgar Hoover, and many other military men in top positions in the national, state, and local governments have been working for it. On the other hand, there are many churches and other organizations expressing grave concern over this state of affairs.

Those who tell us that we must change our traditional policy in regard to conscription in peacetime have the responsibility of telling us why. It is not enough to try to frighten us about Russia. We are a powerful country, too—the first to use the atomic bomb, and certainly we have some responsibility in lead-

The Trouble-Shooter

How Can I Help My Friend?

QUESTION:

I am troubled because a very good friend of mine, also a Latter Day Saint, is patronizing cocktail bars. At first, he drank only occasionally, but now he spends several nights a week there. I have quoted facts and figures about drinking, and I have referred him to Section 86; still he drinks. Despite this weakness, he has many good points, and I believe he is worth saving. What can be done?

ANSWER: By Dr. Roy Cheville

It would be easy if we could go to a book and get "the answer," but there is no all-inclusive reply that will apply to every instance. First, let's be honest and see that your friend is no isolated case. This problem is pretty widespread, and among young Latter Day Saints at that. Many a youth is needing "a very good friend" who can approach the situation intelligently and sympathetically. Each situation, each person must be diagnosed as a separate study. Any counselor, therefore, ought to know your friend. Let's call him Don.

I doubt that quoting from the Doctrine and Covenants will get you very far with Don. I think of a mother who talked to me about her daughter's sex delinquencies. I asked if the ing the way to peace. Fear just isn't good motivation—not even hell-fire. Fear leads to frustration. In religion, it leads to other-worldiness or some other escape from the present world.

I hope international problems don't seem too far away. This, too, will lead to frustration. There are already too many people batting their heads against stone walls. Our part of the world is where we are, and we are not completely helpless. As a matter of fact, the hope of the world depends upon the work of small groups. May our Father help us in our responsibilities, continuously giving us optimism and courage.

parents had discussed the matter with the daughter. "Certainly," said the mother. "Only last night her father told her such conduct was 'an abomination unto the Lord.'" I wondered about the daughter's response. "Sure's a lot of fun though," was the daughter's evasive reply.

Nor will General Conference resolutions get far. This would probably build up in God the idea that the church is a behind-the-times sourpuss that occupies itself with saying "Thou shalt not." I venture Don is probably thinking that already. He must see that the church has good reasons for denouncing liquor.

Can you identify the motivations that prompt Don to drink?

Take a look at these main types and see where this case falls. Then you are partially ready to go to work.

1. Escape. Liquor becomes a way out from problems, unpleasantness, fatigue, etc.

2. Sophistication. "Gentlemen of distinction" drink, it is said. They do so in Bohemian cafes.

3. Socialization. Drinking supplies a way to get the party started. It relaxes and releases. Offering a cigarette is such a gesture.

4. Individualization. This registers reaction against prevailing morals and announces, "I do as I please."

5. Stimulation. It heps up the party. It gives a lift. There is also the stage of victimization when the drinker has lost the will to refrain. If Don were in this condition, I would refer him to Alcoholics Anonymous. Each of the foregoing must be studied on its own. Each involves personal weaknesses and needs. Some for instance need a richer social background and larger initiative to move in social circles without having to rely on a cocktail.

I am thinking that Don needs to be drawn into something that is so significant that he comes to see that liquor does not square with such activities. It is one thing to say that drinking does not fit in with "the good life"; it is another to discover that it does not accord with this job, specific and significant. One youth was drinking when he started in training for track. He saw with the help of his friends on the squad and the coach that sprinters cannot drink. Another found that he could not balance the budget at college with an item for drinks. Still another was drawn into happy association with church youth at reunions. He discovered a girl that he considered indispensable. There was no place for beer and wine in this new comradeship. I think the Salvation Army works pretty soundly here. They do not argue; they draw converts into a new circle of associations.

Is there anything in the church that can challenge Don? I do not mean abstract causes with generalized writing. That may merely lead to outlining what is wrong with things as they are. I have in mind something in which Don will touch lives of others. If he has concern for humanity, he cannot squander money for liquor while children starve in Europe and Negroes raise delinquents in slum districts. Talking about this will not enlist Don. He will need to get to work with living persons. Then he will lose himself and in doing this may not have to indulge in cocktails. He will save himself by getting outside himself. Now can you find something in the church that will do this? Can you find any circle of associates that will take him in? I mean a circle that is stimulating enough to prompt Don to want to be with them.

I am glad you still want to "save" Don. We need to think not only what we want to save him from. We need to picture what we want to save him to. It is not merely liquor we save him from. It is the self-centeredness and self-indulgence that drinking involves. You want to save him to the manhood he is capable of becoming. Of course he is worth it. Never lose that conviction.

with a pistol that can be muffled and avoid detection by wearing gloves and taking adequate precautions that there shall be no fingerprints left. This is impressed upon youthful minds. There is the blackjack, the lead pipe, the knife, the ice pick, strangulation, carefully planned accidents, and very clever arrangements to make the crime look like suicide. Nothing is omitted. Young people are quick to learn, impressionable, open to suggestions.

Someone has said that with a great many people their favorite theme song seems to be, "Home, Sweet Homicide." Of course, this interest in sudden death by violence goes back a long way. Shakespeare usually left the stage littered with recently deceased persons at the end of his play. Edgar Allen Poe and Conan Doyle developed more modern methods of raising goose pimples on their readers. A multitude of crude and brutal imitators are writing script and scenarios and "true detective stories." Those ancient worthies, going back to Shakespeare, had a limited audience and did not appeal to children of tender age. Today, the radio and the movies reach all ages in most families, down close to the kindergarten, and too many of the programs come close to offering both advanced and primary courses in murder. There is reason to believe that they do graduate youthful practicing disciples.

on the part of peoples who have a fierce pride in the old established forms of religion in which they have been nurtured and which their countries have fostered for centuries. A type of ostracism is often imposed on our representatives by people of other lands and faiths. Some of our missionaries have been required to meet death. And it is not altogether improbable that the same may be required of some of us today.

Despite the certainty of hardship and adversity in the work of developing missions abroad, there are rich compensations. One of the most satisfying experiences of life is to have been able to help in bringing someone to Christ. Today, in Norway, there are some who write me expressions of sincerest gratitude for the part I played in enabling them to find the fuller light of Christ through the latter-day work. Of the five male members I was privileged to baptize during the time of my ministry in Norway, four of them are at present members of the priesthood and active in the work. They are my brethren, and a deep bond of affection and fellowship exists among us. It spans distance and survives the passing of time and the tide of events.

If, while I was in Scandinavia, I could have been aware of a definite interest and support from a splendid body of church youth such as now is evident through the program of Zion's League, it would have added immeasurably to the spiritual buoyancy and fellowship I so often needed.

May God bless Zion's Leaguers in their labors to promote the cause of Missions Abroad.

ried, they shall repent of all their sins, or ye shall not receive them."⁸

The church is here warned in regard to this crime not to receive into membership any who are guilty of it "if they are married, and if they are not married, they shall repent of all their sins, or ye shall not receive them." If such persons have married again, they cannot be restored to fellowship, for if one in such a position desired to forsake the condition of adultery, he could not do so without again breaking a covenant. Also, he cannot keep his present marriage covenant without continuing in adultery. Because of this, the church is commanded as the above-mentioned scripture states, that "they shall be cast out from among you" and that "ye receive none such among you if they be married."

It is expedient, therefore, that men should keep clearly in mind that while individuals are required to forgive each other their trespasses without restriction, yet it is necessary for the church to withhold forgiveness until the proper conditions have been met. Only thus can the laws which govern the conduct of the members of the church be kept in harmony with the requirements for entrance. And only by such adherence to the law can the people of the church be kept spiritually close enough to their Creator to sense his leadership toward the kingdom of God.

Note of Thanks

I wish to express my gratitude to the staff members, the doctors, nurses, and nurse aides who made my stay at the Independence Sanitarium such a pleasant experience. I also wish to thank all who remembered me in prayer, and by visits, flowers, cards, and letters. I received administration twice following the operation and began to recover rapidly after that. However, I feel that I could be helped by continued prayer. I believe that my life has been spared because I have yet a work to do for God. I sincerely hope that I may fulfill my mission.

I would that I might have the strength to stand Against the shock and strain of adverse days;
Grace in this being that I might forgive
My enemies the cruelty of their ways.

Courage that I might ever sing Thy praise,
Nor fear the scourgings of the worldly throng;
Of friends now lost, because they do not know
The truth, the simple beauty of my song.

I would that from my lips might fall such words
As bring to threadbare hearts, reprieve from pain;
And that these hands, and that this heart might give Nor think of having back their gifts again.

Faith that though prayers oft said have seemed to fail,
I yet shall kneel to seek Thee once again;
Like Launfal searching for the Holy Grail, Unknowing how reward should come—or when!

I would that Thou wouldst give me, here, to know
The pain of loss, the anguish of defeat;
That I might know the burden of the cross,
That I might learn to worship at Thy feet.

God grant that all these things may be my lot,
My mission, till I come to eventide.
Then, though my earthly bed be laid of thorns
I'll rise up in Thy morning, glorified!

 It is Always a Pleasure!

To receive an article like that by Alice Crossan, which is presented in this issue, is always a satisfaction. Here is a younger church member, trained, experienced as a teacher, keenly alert, intelligently aware of the social problems in the world about her, and conscious of the responsibility of Christians and church people to do something about them.

No matter how they are decorated, publications fail or succeed according to the quality of the manuscripts they publish. The manuscript is the life or the death of the periodical. That is why editors are always alerted by the appearance of a good story or article in the mail from a young writer who has new ideas and experience to back them up.

We need more such articles, relating to real problems of life, intelligently written, by both men and women.

Thousands of our young folk have now received, or are receiving, college and university training. They are thinking, working, gaining experience. They are serving in the branches and in many lines of church and civic work. They should write, too. We'd like to hear more from them.

 Winter Pictures

Church photographers have set a high standard in submitting pictures for use on our cover pages. Serious study of the art has produced excellent results. At the present time we are looking forward to our winter issues, and need a number of photos of good technical and artistic quality. Pictures of homes, churches, and nature scenes are desired. A few good scenes showing children and their pets in winter scenes can also be used. Reader appreciation of our pictures has been excellent.

 Movie Title

Driving down Broadway I glanced out of the car window and saw a title on a movie marquee—"Nothing Sacred." Probably not.

Isn't it one of the causes of the world's trouble that people hold nothing sacred any more? They forget that our happiness and security in life depend so much on the things that should be held sacred—marriage, home, womanhood, childhood, and God. When people discard sacred things and treat them as common, they discount the great values of their lives at a tremendous loss.

A thief steals a valuable watch, and sells it to a pawnshop for only three dollars. A child takes its mother's jewels and sells them at dime-store prices. A man on a spree lets a costly suit go for the price of a few more drinks. The people who hold "Nothing Sacred" are those that cast pearls before swine.

Family Life

In the Church

Family life is important to the church. It is from the families that the church receives its steadiest most consistent attendance and support. People identified with families are happiest, most orderly and dependable, and make the best Christians.

Anything that helps the family should be of interest and value to the church. Anything that hurts, threatens or endangers the family should also be of interest to the church. We should be ready to do something for the preservation of the family, the home, and the individuals who are part of them.

In the Nation

Family life in America receives much attention, but not much promotion. The divorce rate goes up, ministers worry aloud, jurists denounce, social scientists explain, but nobody does anything very effective about it. The public does its little bit of worrying between soap operas on the radio, which seem dedicated to ferreting out new ways to cause family trouble.

Sociologists took up the problem after the First World War, and are still working on it. After extensive scientific research, they have verified what the papers knew years ago—that there is a divorce problem and it is getting worse. It is nice to know that these two great sources of public information are in agreement. There is just one difference between them: anybody can understand the newspapers. You can get the same thing out of the scientific reports with the aid of a college education and a Phi Beta Kappa key.

When Addison started the Spectator early in the eighteenth century, he informed his readers that he did not propose to reform the world; he wished only to observe it, to be amused by it, and in his own way to record it. That attitude persists to a large degree today. There are many experts who are not interested in saving either the family or the world, but who wish simply to record the processes by which they fall to pieces.

So, in a little while, we can call off the experts and bring in the historians, to tell us about what was, not what is, a great social institution—the family.

A Home on Fire

The weather is hot, and it may relieve the tedium of journalism to depart from generalities.

One evening last month, a young married man was eating supper with his wife and their small children. The small apartment was too warm, and the children got food in their hair, on the tablecloth, and everywhere but the place in which it would do some good. The wife was tired, ill from the heat, and not her usual attractive self. Not too attractive himself, the man felt a distaste for everything.

While she was in the kitchen washing the dishes, he decided to go out. That he was responsible for the situation, his wife's condition, and the existence of the children did not occur to him nor trouble what he called his mind. All he knew was that he had not asked for this. Then he remembered a girl friend he had dated before his marriage. In fact, he had jilted her to marry his present wife. He remembered that she was always cool, sweet, and as fragrant as a bouquet of violets.

So he put on his hat and lit a cigarette. He did not know it, but in that same gesture he set fire to his home, not his house, certainly. Just his home. If it had been the house, the fire department would have come sooner or later, and would have saved more or less of it, particularly the expenses. But there is no outfit devoted to the business of saving a home threatened by the fire of di-voice. Nobody, of course, except the church, which is not always fully equipped, generally understaffed, and sometimes not alert.

Mentioning the church reminds us of some other factors. The young man was a church member. He had converted his wife, by dint of considerable anxiety and sweating. The babies had been blessed in the church. Now he was about to show his wife how little his religious principles actually meant to him.

Another item: He had seemed like such a nice young man that folks at church were watching him, hoping he would be steady, and that he would turn his attention to some line of church work. Certainly, such a type would be excellent material for ordination. Now, that hope would be utterly lost.

Ironically enough, he was pleasantly received when he arrived at the door of his friend. She was not scornful nor indignant. She cared nothing about the wife and children. She welcomed him. A little later they went to a movie, and had so pleasant an evening that they decided to repeat the experience. Incidentally, she was also a church member. Like the young man, she had no thought of a responsibility imposed by her principles.

When the young man spent more of his evenings "out" and fewer of them at home, the wife worried. Neighbors observed what was going on and told her. The wife was angry and tearful; the man was angry and defiant, the neighbors angry and indignant. It was not until this time that the pastor was notified and called in to make everybody behave and fix everything nice as it was before. It is remarkable what faith both sinners and saints have in the miraculous powers of pastors. The pastor arrives when the damage is done, when trouble is at its worst, and when it would take the power and tact of an angel to put things aright.

Putting Out the Flames

When they are getting into trouble, people say, "What I do is my own business." The world knows little of the beginnings of trouble, but it always comes in for the finish. And you can't shut out the world. You can get into sin privately, but getting out is a public affair, with the lights on, the bells ringing, and a thousand pairs of eyes, hostile and cold, watching you.

Trouble and public pressure sometimes bring people to their senses, send them home, make them apologize and behave. Sometimes not. Intelligence is sometimes left out of the human kit.

The pastor, harried and driven by many problems, does the best he can. He labors unselfishly and without thanks. Often he succeeds. Occasionally he does not.

What can the church do? The pastor cannot carry the burden alone. Churches need abler members who will study problems of the home. There should be classes for young people in the study of marriage and home problems. Young people and their parents should take this phase of life very seriously. Young people should try to prepare themselves for the wise selection of a companion, and for rational, intelligent home-life.

Every time a member's home breaks up, the church suffers along with the member family. It is a tragic loss, an evidence of defeat. A divorce is not just something that happens to husbands and wives and children. The church, the community, and the nation all suffer a loss in every divorce.

This is not the time to be content with fixing the blame. It is a time to do something about the disease, the distress, and the causes. Surely it is time for church people to wake up to the danger and do something to meet the needs of our time.

THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC.

Bishop Albert Carmichael Recovering

(The following letter, dated August 12, is from John W. Rushton.)

The many friends of Bishop Albert Carmichael, who was the victim of a serious accident several weeks ago, will be happy to know that he went through the ordeal of the operation very well indeed. The doctors are pleased with his progress.

He now seems to be suffering from the shock of the severe experience but, although he is in pain, there is no cause for alarm, the doctor says. Our brother is well cared for; he has the skillful attention of surgeons, and the efficient and tender care of Dr. Teel, whose love and respect for him is widely recognized.

Brother Carmichael wishes it to be known that he greatly appreciates the many messages of sympathy and the prayers in which so many have expressed their affectionate concern for him. He would like to acknowledge each one he has received, but at present that cannot be done.

Our brother feels deeply the separation which is enforced because of his accident; he misses the association at reunions and prays that he may soon resume his ministry.

When he is able, Brother Carmichael is anxious to return to the Independence Sanitarium and his home, although he is being cared for at present in the very modern and adequate Physician and Surgeons' Hospital in Glendale. He is indeed in the heart and mind of many who have enjoyed his excellent ministry and have learned to love him for his unswerving devotion to the cause to which he is committed.

Those who wish to write to him may address their correspondence as follows: Albert Carmichael, Room 109, Physician and Surgeons' Hospital, Laurel Street, Glendale, California.

A BOOK REVIEW

Cyclopedia of Bible Illustrations

By Paul E. Holdcraft, Abingdon Cokesbury Press, 1947, 326 pages, price $3.00.

The material of this book is presented under topical headings which are arranged in alphabetic order. The material is in medium-sized type and averages from five to seven items per page arranged in double column formation. It is a book that should be useful to those who have frequent engagements to deliver sermons and feel the need of a supply of new material. Purchasers of such books all recognize that not all such material can be used by any one man. The purchaser of such a book is justified if the reader finds a number of good, helpful illustrations in it.

A novel by Norton S. Parker, Ziff-Davis, 1947, 452 pages, price $3.00, illustrated by Joe Tillotson.

This is a highly dramatic and imaginative story of the life of Joseph in Egypt. There is more than drama in the story, however, and the reader will acquire from the book a considerable fund of information about the life and times of the Egyptians and of the Israelites during their stay on the Nile. The book is a popular type and will make a good gift item.

Basic Qualification For Missionary Work

By Apostle Paul M. Hanson

WHAT IS THE basic qualification for missionary work? First, what is the cause of the world's terrible plight? A number of reasons are given by the Lord in his preface to the Doctrine and Covenants:

"The voice of the Lord is unto the ends of the earth that all that will hear may hear; prepare ye, prepare ye for that which is to come, for the Lord is nigh; and the anger of the Lord is kindled, and his sword is bathed in heaven, and it shall fall upon the inhabitants of the earth; and the arm of the Lord shall be revealed; and the day cometh that they who will not hear the voice of the Lord, neither the voice of his servants, neither give heed to the words of the prophets and apostles, shall be cut off from among the people; for they have strayed from mine ordinances, and have broken mine everlasting covenant; they seek not the Lord to establish his righteousness, but every man walketh in his own way, and after the image of his own god, whose image is in the likeness of the world, and whose substance is that of an idol, which waxeth old and shall perish in Babylon, even Babylon the great, which shall fall."—Section 1, paragraph 3.

Where there is no seeking of the Lord to establish his righteousness, every man walking in his own way—God exiled from human life—what can be expected other than the state of the world into which we have been projected? One cannot make a success of life detached from the One who is the author of life. Mussolini could not do it. Hitler did not succeed. Apart from God there is a lack of power to discriminate among the divine, human, and evil forces of life. A lack of knowledge of God, or an absence of assurance of his reality, is followed by a loss of self, and in such a condition one moves without knowing one's latitude and longitude on the sea of life.

What an unspeakable loss to live in such a world as we are in without God!

IT IS INDEED a most startling forecast which the Lord has made of what is to follow a refusal of Christ in the latter days. The Apostle Peter on the day of Pentecost quoted similar language from a prophecy by Moses:

"For Moses truly said unto the fathers, A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you.

"And it shall come to pass, that every soul, which will not hear that Prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people."—Acts 3: 22, 23.

The nineteenth century prophet, Joseph Smith, who we believe was divinely raised up to have a leading part in inaugurating God's work in these latter days, in reporting the visit of an angel of glory to him in the year 1823, says:

"He quoted also the third chapter of Acts, twenty-second and twenty-third verses, precisely as they stand in our New Testament. He said that that prophet was Christ, but the day had not yet come when 'they who would not hear his voice should be cut off from among the people,' but soon would come."—Church History, Volume 1, page 13.

More than one hundred years ago the angel said the fulfillment of the prophecy quoted by Peter "soon would come."

Have not Babylon's walls begun to crash around us?

H. G. Wells, the eminent historian, says:

"Religion is the first thing and the last thing, and until a man has found God and been found by God he begins at no beginning, he works to no end. He may have his friendships, his partial loyalties, his scraps of honour, but all these things fall into place, and life falls into place, only with God."

In order for life to fall into place, in order to have a beginning from which to start, and an end to which to look, one must have assurance of the reality of God.

Respecting missionary work, fine buildings, music, financial reserves, and well-arranged programs alone do not meet the needs of the world nor of the church, although all are important in their places.

WHAT WAS the basic qualification for missionary work in New Testament times?

The Apostle Peter was a man of fine ideals and courage, but there was something in addition to these virtues that qualified him to stand amidst a vast throng on the day of Pentecost and declare to people, some of whom had a part in crucifying Jesus: "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ," and also "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost."—Acts 2: 36, 38.

We trace the source of Peter's essential qualification as a witness for Christ to a series of experiences in which he perceived divinity in Christ. On one occasion, Jesus asked him and others of his disciples, "Whom say ye that I am?" Peter replied, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." The value of such knowledge was indicated by Jesus when he said in answer to Peter:

"Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven.

"And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."—Matthew 16: 18, 19.

Upon the "rock" of what comes from God and knowledge that Jesus is the Christ, the church was to be built, and its progress unretarded even by the "gates of hell."

Peter's preaching on Pentecost without such knowledge would have been a mere performance.

ONE GREAT contribution of our church to the world's thought has been its doctrine of the unchangeability of God, that he lives, is accessible, speaks to men in this age, and wills to be known by all men.

The Prophet Jeremiah emphasizes the need of understanding and knowing God:

"Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches:

"But let him that glorieth glory in

O soul, what wondrous knowledge dost thou hide?

A secret in thy inmost recess dwells
That I can faintly glimpse in silhouette,

And almost hear the story that it tells!

The quiet dusk brings rest to weary ones,

Yet in the calm, a lonesomeness finds birth—

On wings thou seekest ways ethereal,
Forgetting limitations of the earth.

Vast spaces hold the echoes of thy voice,

And wandering along the isles of time,
Thou findest star-lit temples built for thee

With age-old beauty glowing, still sublime.

What sorrow of the night hast thou not known?

What joy less radiant than flaming dawn?

And when the silver cord is loosed from thee

Unto all mystic truth shalt thou be drawn?

O soul, thou vibrant, never-ending life,
A surging melody, yet haunting strain.
Akin thou art to Christ, the Son of God—

Eternal are his ways, his life, his reign!

this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness, in the earth; for in these things I delight, saith the Lord."—Jeremiah 9: 23, 24.

In Proverbs we learn how such understanding and knowledge may be obtained:

"My son, if thou wilt receive my words, and hide my commandments with thee;

"So that thou incline thine ear unto wisdom, and apply thine heart to understanding;

"Yea, if thou criest after knowledge, and liftest up thy voice for understanding;

"If thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures;

"Then shalt thou understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God."—Proverbs 2: 1-5.

We are living in one of the most thrilling and challenging periods of the world's history. The world's crisis should be a great opportunity for the living church of the living God to move in blessing into the lives of myriads of people.

THE FOLLOWING are some of the blessings flowing from a knowledge of God:

A feeling of security, such as is expressed in "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want."

Courage, as was possessed by Peter on the day of Pentecost.

Confidence, as indicated in "The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? the Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?"

Power of testimony, illustrated in Peter's words, "And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount."

A feeling of being in a winning cause.

Appreciation of the word of God.

Power to advance the church and its work.

Ability to interpret the age in which one lives.

From where is leadership to come to meet the world's greatest need? Where, except from the church? It is for the church, divinely instituted, moving in triumph, to lead men to feel the incoming of the Creator's love, form covenant relationship with him, receive his guidance and forgiveness, and join with Christ in establishing his work, which in due time will cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

9. Deliver Us From Evil

The ninth in a series of meditations presented at the Appointee Institute held in Independence, August 28 to September 14, 1946. The others appeared in the issues of January 18, January 25, June 14, July 19, July 26, August 2, August 16, and August 23.

BORN INTO an environment of sin, we sin. Innocent at birth we are, yet ignorant of the ways of the righteous life. Living among imperfect and erring men, we adopt their habits as ours and their ways as "the" way because it is the only way we know. Paul said (Romans 3: 23), "For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God."

Often, however, we fail to recognize our sins. We sit in darkness, not realizing there is a darkness because we do not see the light.

Have you ever sat reading a book in the late afternoon? The sun goes down, and the light gets dim. It is only when someone comes along and turns on a light that you realize how dark it was.

It was only when the light of God came into the life of Paul that he was able to see the evil of his deeds in persecuting the followers of Christ, for Paul said, "I verily thought I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth." It was the things Paul had done "in all good conscience" that caused him to refer to himself as the "chief of sinners."

That is what happens when God comes into our lives. He turns on the clear light of truth and righteousness, and we are able to see ourselves as doers of evil.

When we catch a vision of this divine light, our souls cry out unto God, "Deliver us from evil."

Sin has a way of covering up its own wickedness. We become so accustomed to wrongdoing that we accept it as being harmless or even beneficial. God recognized this problem was common in the lives of men, so he sent his Son into the world to "save his people from their sins." God alone can deliver us from evil; of ourselves, we have not the clarity of vision that enables us to see what we ought to be. It remains for God, through his Spirit, to show us "the way, the truth and the light."

We must not only be made to see, we need to receive the power to overcome. We all find ourselves resolving over and over again to adjust our lives or habits in one way or another, but we discover a tendency to drop back into our old way of doing things.

As a small boy, I went deep-sea fishing with my father. The boat was little and the ocean rough. After a time I became seasick and lost all interest in fishing. In my boyhood outlook on the situation, I promised God in prayer that if he would relieve my distress and make me well I would never again take any fish from his ocean. In a short while I did feel better, and the first thing I did was to drop my line back over the edge of the boat to catch more fish.

We are inclined to be like that. We forget our promises to God and neglect the good things we ought to do. We are constantly dependent upon God for the strength and help to overcome the evil that attempts to drag us down and for the power to build into our lives the good that the Master has shown us ought to be there.

Seeing but a portion of the light of God and admitting our weakness, we cry unto God as the only source of our deliverance, "Deliver us from evil!"

In this novel we have presented in story form the account of a group of Jewish people who have survived the horrors of the concentration camps of Europe going by ship and making illegal entry into Palestine. Of course such entry is against the law, but for these people it is their only hope. It tells about their struggles with the land and with other people who do not want them there.

There are three sides to the question of the Jews in Palestine. First, there is the viewpoint of the Arabs to whom Palestine has been a homeland for many centuries. They have no other place to go. They are related to the Jews since they also are a Semitic people. Wherever the Jews move in the Arabs must move out. It is a situation in which somebody must lose. Second, there is the viewpoint of the Jews who have been harassed and persecuted in many lands and almost destroyed in some countries in Europe. The anxiety of Jews to leave these countries is understandable, and Palestine is to them a haven of hope despite all the trouble they met there. Third, there is the viewpoint of the British who know that if they relinquish the Holy Land with its precious minerals and oils that either the French or the Russians will take over. They also know that neither the Jews nor the Arabs are strong enough to keep them out. The British would like to preserve peace and justice among all parties in Palestine.

This novel, naturally, is a presentation by a Jew of a sympathetic approach to the Jewish viewpoint. The story is interesting and dramatic. The reader who wishes to be impartial will read this story and keep an open mind for the problems of other parties involved in the Palestine problem.

Dealing With the Erring

By L. Wayne Updike

6. The Complaint

AN OFFENDER, with whom the offended person or the church has labored who is unwilling to repent, confess, and make restitution, should be required to answer before the church for his sin. To effect this, it is necessary that the offended party shall file with the proper officer a formal charge or complaint, accusing the offender of the specific act or failure to act, which is the cause of the action. Such accusation corresponds to the indictment in the civil courts, and the rules governing the latter may in a general way apply also to church court procedure. An indictment is made by a grand jury and charges one or more persons with the commission of a crime; to insure justice, the law is very strict as to its character and form. The sixth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, which is by means of the indictment."

"No subject shall be called to answer for any crime or offense, until the same is fully and plainly, substantially and formally described to him."¹

It is a rule of common law that no one shall be held to answer to an indictment or accusation, unless the crime with which it is intended to charge him is expressed with reasonable precision, directness, and fullness, that the accused may be informed as to what he has to meet.

An indictment must contain a certain description of the crime and precise and technical allegations of the facts and circumstances which constitute it. The law has always required a specification of time and place as to every material fact in the indictment constituting the offense. Where the offense consists of words written or spoken, such words must be stated in the indictment. If a crime cannot be stated with complete certainty, it should be stated with as much certainty as the circumstances will permit. The matter constituting an indictment ought to be full, definite, and certain, and not be maintained by argument or implication.²

In the rules of the church, as well as in the civil law, it is required that complaints shall be accurately and carefully stated, and that certain essential facts must always be included. None of the following can be omitted: First, the names and jurisdiction of the parties to the action, specified as plaintiff and defendant; second, a plain and concise statement without unnecessary repetition of facts which, if true, would constitute unchristian conduct of the accused (and member actions must show that such conduct wronged or injured the plaintiff); third, the time and place of each offense stated so far as justice requires; fourth, the time and place that required labor was performed, and that the accused failed to make restitution or reconciliation.³

Instances sometimes occur in which both complainant and defendant are guilty of wrong in the matter charged, when it is not only proper, but the duty of the defendant to file in his answer to the court a counter charge setting forth what he considers to be the facts of the complainant's error. This will enable the court to consider the whole matter, and place the responsibility for the wrong upon either one or both. Without the counter charge, the court might learn that the complainant was more guilty than the defendant but would be powerless legally to declare him so.

If one finds it necessary to file a complaint, he should inform himself as to the proper officer to whom such complaint should be given and should refer to the suggested forms for use in drawing up such complaint.⁴ If a complaint is filed with the wrong officer, such officer should immediately transmit the matter to the officer having jurisdiction of both parties.

Actions between members of the same branch shall be by complaint filed with the branch president. If such president does not hold the Melchisedec priesthood, he shall at once transmit the complaint to the next higher officer having jurisdiction. Members of different branches of the same district or stake shall file complaints with the district or stake president. Members of different districts or stakes shall file complaints with the minister in charge of said mission. Members of different missions shall file complaints with the First Presidency.⁵

If a vacancy exists in the specified office, or if the officer refuses or neglects to act, complaint may be lodged with the next higher officer having jurisdiction. No complaint shall be dismissed because of failure to act with the proper officer but shall be transmitted to the officer having jurisdiction of the parties.

One who is made defendant in a case may file written objections to the complaint on any of the following grounds: 1. That the required labor has not been performed; 2. That the court has no jurisdiction of the defendant; 3. That the court is barred by limitations of the law; 4. That the alleged facts, even if true, do not constitute unchristian conduct; 5. That a like action for the same cause is pending, or that it has been adjudged, or that it has been dismissed, or that it has been finally adjusted between the parties; 6. That parties are made plaintiff or defendant who are unnecessary.

Objections must be filed promptly so that if sustained by the court, an amended complaint may be filed prior to the trial of the cause. All rulings of any court on objections, except a court of last resort, may be appealed by the adverse party.⁶

The laws and rules governing in the matter of church court procedure are framed to maintain the rights and privileges of both the accused and the accuser. As such, they are specific. One who is genuinely interested in protecting the interests of the church in the search for justice will strive to see to it that these rules are followed carefully. Technicalities should not obstruct justice, but the dangers to the church in allowing complaints which are carelessly drawn or indefinite in nature make it imperative that there shall be no departure from the accepted procedure. Only by strict adherence to the rules can all be treated equally before the law.

The World's Great Madonnas

By Cynthia Pearl Maus, Harper, 1947, richly illustrated, with frontispiece in colors, 789 pages, price $4.95.

This book is by the same compiler who arranged the very popular volume entitled, Christ and the Fine Arts. Our people purchased copies of that work very liberally, and those who liked it are sure to be pleased with the new book. It is built upon the same plan classifying the Madonnas according to the countries in which the pictures were painted, and giving interpretations in prose and verse. There are also some songs with music included. It is of particular use to those who like to arrange practical studies for worship programs. Many people will enjoy it as a library volume. Those who arrange worship programs for children will find many pictures of mother and child inspiring and full of good lessons for the little ones.

Viewing Tahiti From the Cloudlines

THE French Army recently announced to the public that anyone who cares to view the beautiful mountain resort made by the soldiers during the war may do so by hiring an Army truck for twenty francs (40c) a person. It was the pleasure of our missionary force in Tahiti, consisting of Brother and Sister Sorensen and their young daughter Beth, Lilly Raye, and me, to escort the Taronas' Chorus to this elevated resort.

The road, ceasing to be further accessible by automobile, necessitated our abandoning the Army truck and hiking the remainder of the distance on foot. Our path was all too narrow and slippery, yet we braved our way until the clouds finally won out. Had it not been for this interference, we believe we could easily have made it to the top.

We recall passing some spots, between peaks, where the path was no wider than two feet with a sheer drop-off of at least 1,000 feet on either side.

One is recompensed, however, by the beauty which he beholds from this lofty resort. A rich, green verdure is matted over the entire range of mountains, since their height is but a little over 7,000 feet at the highest point of Mt. Oraphena. It was noticeably easier to breathe, since we were no longer under the tropical pressure at sea level.

We spent several restful and refreshing hours in the rugged mountains, viewing Tahiti from the cloud line. Descending about 4:30 in the afternoon, we announced—almost with one accord—that none of us desired another outing over that same route. We have branded it a most precarious and frightening experience. Each curve was made amid discordant screams from an otherwise harmonious girls' chorus. There were no rails of protection at any of the danger points, and on some curves the truck had to reverse in order to clear the embankment on the one hand and keep from toppling over the edge on the other. No one kept his seat on these curves. We must admit that, although the missionaries tried to remain calm and force confident smiles, their hearts were beating considerably faster than normal when they arrived safely at Taronas.

One Hundred Stories for Boys

By Archer Wallace, Abingdon Cokesbury Press, 1947, 171 pages, price $1.75.

There has always been a great demand for stories to tell to young people of various ages. These stories are also of great interest as illustrative material for adult congregations.

The author of this book is a Canadian religious editor, closely in touch with young people. His wide reading and depth of learning will qualify him to produce this excellent collection of materials. The stories are about the lives of famous people.

Why Does Johnny "Take Things"?

By ALICE CROSSAN

NOT LONG ago I was reading some material sent to me by a friend, who is the child welfare consultant in our state. I had written to her, asking for literature that would explain why children "take things" that do not belong to them.

What do welfare workers—those trained in dealing with all forms of delinquency—believe to be the cause and cure of this altogether too common fault among children? I found one primary reason. A problem child is always a child with a problem—some problem that perhaps to the casual observer is not apparent, or if it is apparent, is so totally inconsistent with the nature of the misdeed as to seem absurd. But this does not lessen its reality to the child. And it is something with which he has neither the means nor experience to cope. He feels insecure and unloved.

What are we, as teachers and parents, to do about stealing? Shall we punish? Shall we threaten? Shall we hold up the life of some criminal as a horrible example? Or shall we be wise and look first into the whole life of the child, finding the problem that is causing him to behave as he does?

The great majority of children who steal, as well as those who commit other delinquent acts, are from homes where some emotional problem exists. We are wont to gloss over these homes, knowing they exist, but considering them only those extreme cases where death, divorce, or drink is involved. But if we wish to be honest, and little can be done without complete honesty, we must admit that they are from homes, too, where bickering, jealousy, and mistrust are rampant. In such homes, there is little or no security for a child.

"But what can we do about it?" they ask. They are busy keeping house, washing, ironing, marketing, working away from home. They have neither the time nor the inclination to even recognize the problem, much less solve it.

Well, what can we do about it? We are intelligent, adult human beings, capable of bearing children and providing for their upbringing. Then why not do it as well as we can? If we lack wisdom, there is no reason why we cannot seek it. We teachers must continually do professional reading. It assists us in our work. Let us show that we are adult, then, by first realizing that in instances of bad behavior such as this, we are confronted with a problem. (Yes, even in our good, Christian homes there will be problems.)

Is he jealous of a smaller or perhaps "cuter" brother or sister?

Our first task, then, might be to look into the home life of the child. What troubles him? Is he jealous of a smaller or perhaps "cuter" brother or sister? Has some physical deformity made him feel inferior to other children with whom he associates? Perhaps he feels that his mother or his father, or both, do not love or want him. He begins to feel that he is being cheated out of something that is rightfully his. So, in an effort to make up to himself what he feels he is not getting, he "takes things."

Now we have found the problem. How do we find a remedy? Let us say the child in question is jealous of a baby brother. The baby is getting all the attention; the older child is resentful. The first thing, then, to correct the situation is to assure the older child, by word and deed, that he is loved quite as much as the baby. Let him help care for the baby. Give him some little task to perform, and praise him when he does it well. He will soon take a new interest in the baby—not as an intruder who has usurped his place in the family, but as a brother. Perhaps this might even be the foundation of what we glibly term the "brotherhood of man."

Show the child that you love him.

- a home column feature -

He will never know it unless you do. This does not mean that the child must become the only thing in your life. "Mom-ism" was a detriment to many of our servicemen in the recent war. But it is important that he feel secure in his relationship with you—that he knows you love him, and will continue to love him, even though he makes mistakes.

Children who feel inferior because of physical or mental disabilities are perhaps a greater problem. Although readjustment is somewhat more complex, there is no basis for believing they cannot grow up to be healthy, happy, well-adjusted individuals. Help these children discover their assets—in this way they will cease to dwell so much upon their liabilities. Help them to learn to do something really well. If they have a talent, see that it is developed. This will do more to develop self-confidence than any amount of pampering "because Johnny isn't well."

How does the child behave at school? A teacher knows who the problem children are from the very first day. But there is little she can do about it. If she is extremely wise and tactful, she may be able to suggest remedies to the parents, but even then she runs the great risk of being misunderstood or resented, even if she can find time to talk with them.

If a child is not getting along at school, why not? Has he been babied at home? Is he overly aggressive? Shy? Unable to adjust to classroom situations? Few of these traits will be exhibited by children who, in their six preschool years, have known love and security.

A tried and true method of overcoming dishonesty in a child is to give him some special mission of trust. Ask him to take care of some valuable possession for you. Entrust him with a sum of money. Let him take care of the baby in your absence. Show him at all times that you think him a capable and trustworthy person. Never let him know you have the slightest doubt about his ability to carry out the task assigned. How would you react under the same trust? Wouldn't such faith bring out the best in you? You will find that the child will all but "break his neck" to justify your confidence.

What shall we do, then, about the child who steals? We shall first recognize that we are faced with a problem. We shall seek a solution to the problem. We shall work to do away with the problem. We will realize that it is better and far less expensive to expend a little effort and time now than to let a maladjusted child grow up into a social menace before attempting correction. We will do this because children are the most precious possession with which God has entrusted us.

Bittersweet

JUNE IS ELEVEN—that unpredictable age which one day produces a child all wrapped up in bubble gum and the next day, a woman—almost—surprisingly gracious and deeply concerned with personal appearance.

Yesterday — our anniversary — June spent the afternoon at the swimming pool. I got home at the usual five-fifteen and was in the process of arranging the roses which had come in honor of the occasion when June walked in and flopped—wet suit, towel, and all—on the couch. "I'm so tired I could die," she announced, stretching out for a pre-dinner nap.

"'Spose you could put off dying until after you've hung out the wash?" I asked, pointing to the bundle of dampness beside her.

"Golly," she moaned, "my feet hurt so bad I don't think I can walk—and my legs ache something awful." She stumbled out to the line and back again, barely making it to the couch.

Half an hour later, I suggested, "Junie, my sweet, wouldn't you like to take these potato peelings out to the garbage? They keep getting in my way."

No answer.

That spoiled my tactful approach. "June," I said firmly, "please take this out to the garbage."

"Oh, golly," she whimpered, using her favorite "word" again. "You just think up things for me to do, and my legs and feet hurt and my shoulders do, too."

She sat on the step, nursing her sore muscles and wounded feelings until dinner. After eating, she complained that she didn't feel well and promptly stretched out on the couch again.

"How about lending a hand with the dishes tonight?" her father asked.

"Dad, I just can't. My legs are simply killing me."

"Don't bother," I said, and started gathering up the silverware.

Dishes done, I sat down to read my favorite monthly. June suddenly regained her strength, went to the kitchen for a drink, returned to the living room and brightly suggested, "It's only seven-thirty; why don't we go out and play some miniature golf?"

"But, June," I reminded her, "your legs are simply killing you. I think you'd better go to bed."

* * * * *

I am sorry for my yesterday's misgivings.

This evening when I got home, I found an apple pie—complete with criss-crossing and, as an added attraction, generous gobs of marshmallow cream on top. On a note, anchored firmly to the marshmallow, was this inscription: "HAPPY ANNIVERSARY LOVE JUNE."

I read it three times and got a lump in my throat as big as any of the marshmallow ones on the pie.

"Bless her heart," I said, reading the note again. And then she came in, smiling. I hugged her up real tight and whispered, "It's beautiful, Junie. Thanks a lot."

Then she led me to the couch and said, "Take a nap. I'm going to get dinner tonight."

"OK," I yawned, patting her on the back. "If any potato peelings get in your way, just let me know."

Letters From the Isolated

The following letters were received in response to the feature, "Are You Isolated?" which appeared in the June 28 issue of the "Herald."

FOR YEARS I have been an isolated member. The nearest branch is fifteen miles away—a seemingly great distance when traveled by streetcar. Only those who love the gospel and are denied the privilege of meeting each week with others of like faith can appreciate the distress of being isolated. In such a state, it is easy to lose all perspective of the church and its program. Self-pity takes over, and you can soon find yourself thinking, "Something is wrong with the church or it would be doing more." It doesn't help, either, to have your neighbor ask, "Why go so far to church—and such a little one at that—when there are others all around you?"

Fortunately, another member with a car recently moved near us. In addition to that, I have quit feeling sorry for myself; I am thinking affirmatively instead of negatively. People judge our religion by the way it affects our lives; if we appear unhappy and discontented, they are not apt to be attracted to our creed.

Since it is necessary to keep in touch with other people of the church, I have subscribed to the Herald, and I read it religiously. Through it, I have made friends with whom I correspond; I have several letters that I cherish very much. I have also gained a great deal by reading the Three Books.

I have found happiness in being of service to others. Anyone can develop the talent of friendliness—help a sick neighbor, keep a child so that its mother is free to shop, bake a pie for the folks next door. Be cheerful in your own home, and your family will bless you.

Give as much as you can to the financial support of the church and its projects. It will make you feel that you have a part in the work of Zion-building. In every way, pattern your life as nearly like the Master's as you can. After all, the only isolation you need fear is isolation from the Spirit of God.

In answer to your query about how nonresident pastors can best serve isolated Saints, I would like to suggest that a monthly visit—if conditions permit such—would greatly help the morale of those who are not able to attend services with others of like faith. I believe the isolated members themselves would give generously to promote this service.

As for participation in the activities of other churches, I think it is a good idea as long as it does not interfere with one's own beliefs. Where children are involved, it necessitates a faithful teaching of the gospel at home, so that when they are old enough they will be ready for baptism in their own church.

I have been a member of the Reorganized Church a little over a year. At present, we live three miles north of Alma, Arkansas, on Highway 71. We operate a cafe and grocery store and are unable to attend church. We invite any Saints who may be driving through this part of the country to stop and visit with us.

It is indeed unfortunate that some of us must, of necessity, be isolated from church privileges, but none of us need to be isolated from God and the manifestations of his love. For the past three years, I have lived in communities where there is no Reorganized Church. The pastor of the church I used to attend sends me program sheets occasionally, which helps to keep me in contact with the activities of my friends. I am sure other isolated members would be helped by such remembrances.

At first, I was reluctant to participate in the activities of other churches. This spring, however, I was asked to help plan and direct a Children's Day program. After working with those youngsters, I wondered if any other person at the performance received as great a blessing as I. Consequently, I feel both obligated and privileged to help these children along life's way.

I believe isolated members have a very definite work to do in their respective communities. In the absence of a church, they have the responsibility of being evangelists. The Herald is helpful in spreading the gospel; share it with your neighbors. I have loaned every piece of church literature I have in the hope that it will help others find the thing for which they are seeking. May God bless them and all isolated members who have a desire to serve, as well as the more active Saints.

I am the only member of my family who belongs to the Reorganized Church, and I have always been isolated from church privileges. I often wish we could have a missionary represent us at the community building as the ministers of other faiths do. I believe we could make good use of tracts here, too.

My husband and I have been isolated only five months, but even in this short time we feel a great need for the church and its fellowship. Many of the people with whom we come in contact have never heard of the Restoration. We can tell them of the gospel and pass out books and tracts to them, but we realize the thing of greatest importance is for us to live challenging lives. We are interested in contacting other members who may live in or near Easton.

Presenting: Thelona Stevens

The last in a series of personality sketches of Auditorium employees.

By Biloine Whiting

Like most of the rest of us, Thelona Stevens put off the urge to study the Three Books. She herded her family to services in Miami, Florida, paid her tithing, and subscribed to the Herald. Though she wanted more than anything else in the world for her husband to be converted and then move to Independence, she supposed that the ceiling had been reached for her in church work—that is, until she had a dream.

In her dream, she saw herself in the midst of a celebrating company, but instead of joining in the festivities, they seemed distasteful to her. Presently she saw herself leave the room and stroll out into the yard, where—gazing into the sky—she saw the Saviour looking down at her. She herself suddenly seemed to be ascending, and as she looked down, she saw the throng of people from the party watching her. In her hand was a Book of Mormon, and she knew that her mission was to go back and teach them.

“The power of the Spirit that was with me was so great that for about three days I could scarcely do my work,” she related. “I just wanted to sit and live over and over again that experience.”

Mrs. Stevens felt that she knew nothing about the Book of Mormon worthy of a teacher, so she wrote to the Department of Religious Education for a course of study and devoted one hour a day to her reading. She wrote papers and made notes to send in for corrections, and soon she was writing worship suggestions for the Herald.

An important assignment came when C. B. Woodstock asked her to prepare a Bible study course. The one hour a day system was wholly inadequate for that, so for nine years she studied and prepared to write what later became the blue-bound Bible Studies, now in its second printing. While she was working over the manuscript, the opportunity came for her to move to Independence. There in the association of church people, Mr. Stevens became converted and was baptized.

After that, there wasn't enough Thelona could do for the church. She was asked to help in the office of the Department of Religious Education, and became director of leadership training.

She, herself, never misses a chance to explain the gospel. While on one of her trips to Mexico, she found an opening to discuss Latter Day Saintism with her young Catholic hostess, Margarita. The rigid Catholic dogma forbade Margarita's listening to Mrs. Stevens' religious beliefs; yet her Mexican code of etiquette prevented her from being rude, so she had to sit there and listen.

“I realized that I was taking unfair advantage of the girl, but I pushed on anyway, and talked for nearly an hour,” said Mrs. Stevens. Margarita never mentioned the incident until a year later when Thelona was leaving from another visit. Then Margarita stepped up on the platform, and just as the train was ready to pull out said, “I want you to know that I've never forgotten a word of what you told me about your church last year.”

Other “pupils” of Mrs. Stevens were young servicemen. Though they came from Latter Day Saint homes many knew very little about what was in the Three Books, so they asked Mrs. Stevens for a course of study. While in the service they wrote regular papers on what they had learned and sent them back to her for correction and comment.

In her work in the Department of Religious Education, Thelona Stevens has written The Light of the World, a quarterly, a Short Course for Teachers, a number of Study Guides, and many Herald articles. She edits the Herald Worship Suggestions and directs the leadership training curriculum.

Piled on her desk are stacks of manila folders with interesting bits of information tucked in them, files of the Herald, a massive concordance, and various reference books, all of which point to the preparation of a new manuscript, but as to what it is or when it will be ready, Thelona Stevens just isn't saying.

THE WAY BACK

By
FLEECHARTY

I'm not sure exactly when or how I made the radical change from a narrow-minded religionist to a slightly atheistic individual, and then slowly found my pathway toward an increasingly healthy conception of religion. I only know that all this took place some time during the past five years.

In 1942, I lived in a community in which there were only three families who associated themselves with the Reorganized Church. Our meetings were, of necessity, held in the homes of the Saints. There was only one member of the priesthood. Happily, however, he had unusual interest in the church and ministered well to the needs of his "little flock." It was my privilege to have spent the year or two following my conversion in this man's home. Here the seed of responsibility to the church was planted and made to grow under the training which I received. The opportunity to function in the church organization, however, was cramped by the simplicity of our small group.

Then one day came my opportunity to move to a city where our church maintained a branch of nearly 150 members. My enthusiasm and intense concern for the work which was mine to do was immediately recognized. My inexperience was graciously overlooked by the older, more capable members of the branch, and I was given a variety of tasks to perform. I was publicity agent for the branch, which involved ordering and distributing the Saints' Herald, familiarizing myself with quarterlies, nursery materials, pictures, etc., as well as other responsibilities pertaining to the literature of the church. I have always had a particular liking for book work and finances, and, therefore, was much engrossed with this first challenge which the church afforded me.

Soon, I became very fond of a number of the children in the branch and was given a class to teach. This was an experience which I shall treasure throughout my entire life. I'm not sure just how much I was able to influence the children in this group; but the sheer joy and satisfaction which I received from the preparation and presentation of their lesson

*You don't amputate a sore thumb—

I later became interested in other fields of teaching and was presently selected as the one to conduct a Sunday morning worship service for the entire children's department. Included in this group were approximately thirty-five youngsters ranging in age from two to sixteen years. I discovered many things in my search for material to be used in this work. Among the abstract things I discovered was that teaching children requires a great deal of preparation and thought, yet they are tolerant, refreshingly forgiving, and unassuming. Were it not for this, I'm sure they would have looked about for another instructor a short time after I began; instead, they learned to love me almost as much as I loved them. They reassured me of this fact on several occasions. One of them plucked a bouquet of dandelions on the way to church school and proudly presented them to me all wilted from the heat and moisture of her little hands. Often they engaged the seat beside me weeks in advance. These things are not easily forgotten.

Besides the church school work, my sister and I were responsible for cutting the grass and digging the dandelions in the church yard, opening and closing the windows in the summertime, and often building a fire in the furnace in the wintertime. We loved being depended upon for these simple services. You see, we lived directly across the street from the church, while most of the other members lived some distance from that vicinity. It was also our responsibility to keep the bulletin board outside the church up-to-date from week to week.

I received heart-warming praise from the appreciative parents for the work I was doing. This was nice, and I was pleased with the compliments, yet in some ways the experience was very unhealthy for me. I allowed my days to become so busy that I had no time to think of anything outside the realm of my occupational work and church activity. I became careless in my stewardship of time. I completely severed myself from the association of those my own age. Since there were no young people in that branch and I would have been forced to go outside the church to find them, I decided not to make that extra effort. I neglected all forms of social life except those I found valuable to my work in the branch. You have already guessed the result. I became narrow-minded. My experiences became so limited that it greatly impaired my personality.

Then came Graceland. It was my dream come true! For the first time in my life I was privileged to associate with those my own age. I gathered a new zest for learning and a new interest in people. I was able at last to see the horizons of experience open to me. I enjoyed most of my subjects, but my favorites were psychology, sociology, and philosophy. This was despite the fact the study of these subjects and the discussion of them in class seemed to tear down my narrow conception of religion. It seemed to place a new emphasis on all cultures instead of religion alone. I became confused. The God I knew before I came to Graceland became a different kind of God. I began to see that religious experiences can come about as a result of association. Why, I even laughed in fellowship meetings, and still felt the Spirit of God permeating every fiber of my being. What a relief this type of religion was to me. I began to become concerned about the work I had done while teaching the children. Had I given to them a wrong conception of God? What was different about this God I found at Graceland? Could it be that the spirit which came to me so forcibly here at this school, among those associates I had learned to love so much, was false? No, I would rather have believed I was wrong in my pre-Graceland conception of religion and of God.

Many things happened during my two years at Graceland which tended to continue the disintegration of my earlier conception of Divinity. It seemed that the more I studied and discussed the subject, the more confused I became. Soon, it was no longer possible for me to pray. To

Getting Along With the World

By HOWARD MOORE

MANY times I have seen the Spirit of God working in the lives of young people of the church. I have attended League prayer services in which wonderful experiences were related. We, the youth, have a great challenge in the accomplishment of Zion—a challenge which, I believe, we are willing and ready to accept.

We do, however, have a problem: How can we "have fun" and yet live up to the true standards of the church? The average young person has a desire to participate in the activities the rest of his friends enjoy; few people sit at home with a book evenings in preference to being with the "gang." Frequently this involves dancing, drinking, and other "worldly pleasures" condemned in every Latter Day Saint pulpit.

The past four years I was a student in one of Kansas City's largest high schools. Of the 1,700 people there, only three belonged to the Reorganized Church. Since we had few classes together, we seldom saw each other during the day.

I was perturbed to find that so many students smoked, drank, and swore, yet I could not ignore them if I expected to have any social life at all. I prayed very earnestly for guidance. As time passed and no direct answer came, I began to feel that God was disinterested. I continued to pray, however, and after two years, I began to realize that He had been guiding me all along. I gained many friends and they seemed to respect me for living up to my religious ideals. Although most of them considered their flasks as an essential part of every ball game, I went "unflasked" and never failed to have a good time. I also patronized Teepee Town and enjoyed myself there, although I didn't dance. I played ping pong, shuffle board, chess, and checkers, went to the movies and boxing matches.

Now that I'm out of high school, I look back at it with happy memories. I am grateful to God for having helped me find a way of life that left no regrets.

I believe the big reason many young people find no answer to their problems is that they go only half way in trying to solve them. They pray for help and expect God to do all the work, but he doesn't often play the game that way. He wants his people to use a little initiative along with their faith.

The church can help by establishing youth centers where young men and women can spend their leisure time. It can sponsor projects that will utilize youthful energy. It can emphasize the importance of Zion's League activities, rather than permitting the League to become a "take it or leave it" organization which has no definite place in the general church program.

God is always with us when we do our share. Let us go forward in the work of making our dream of Zion a reality.

Here Is the Writer . . .

Howard Moore, brother of Seventy Phillip Moore, was graduated from Southwest High in Kansas City this spring and will enroll at Graceland in September as a major in public school music. He has studied voice under Dr. Mabelle Glenn and for seven years sang in the Memorial Boy Choir at the Grace and Holy Trinity Episcopal Cathedral in Kansas City. He is now living in Independence and is a member of the Stone Church Choir. His ultimate goal is to teach voice in high school.

what or to whom was I praying? I re-read my patriarchal blessing many times, each time pondering long over the part which admonished me to pray always. I tried praying, but there seemed to come a denseness through which I could not break.

Because of the absence of prayer, I became critical, pessimistic, and irritable. I lost interest in everything. The things which were unlovely in persons took a prominent place in my mind, which was the exact opposite to my former experience. I gave up my quest for an understanding of this whole business of religion, after which on some occasions I actually denied there was a God or that he was interested in either me or the progress of this church. My copies of the church books became as unmolested as a guest towel.

Although contrary to my whole feeling and attitude, I continued to go to fellowship and to each meeting which was made available to me. But I was aware that I needed something more than this to carry me through the time of decision. Where would I turn? I needed to build up a philosophy of life to take the place of the narrow one I had brought to Graceland—which had been torn apart and thrown away to make a place for the greater one. Many people befriended me during that time of trial, but I appreciated it only with my heart and not by my works.

School was out in June, and I came to Independence to live and work. At that time, I did not want to come to Independence. I scoffed at the idea of Zion, but, as the position for which I had asked a year before was in Independence, I had no choice. I decided, however, that I would rest from any spiritual responsibilities and that if the Saints in Zion wanted me to come to church and to help them with this proposition of Zion-building, they would have to come after me and ask me.

I lay in bed on Sunday mornings and pretended to love it. I continued to become more and more critical, self-centered, and irreligious. Yet, somehow, there remained a spark of something which made me regret the way I was responding to life.

Then, one day I made an observation which jarred me out of the rut I was in. A young man came into the doctor's office where I was working, carefully guarding a thumb which had been injured and which was wrapped in a cumbersome dressing. The dressing made his whole hand look awkward and uncomfortable. As I watched him perform such simple acts as picking up a magazine, I sympathized with him. Then, suddenly, I was struck with the idea I was A SORE THUMB. I was a sore thumb to the church. I was not only failing to aid the church, but I was actually hindering the function of the church just as surely as the man's sore thumb was hindering him in doing simple things with ease. I carried the analogy a bit farther and decided that if there were no thumb at all, it would have caused the man less concern than the sore one did. Also, that just because the thumb was sore, its owner did not have it amputated, but rather set out to find the way which would bring about its healing. Then I thought, "I must never sever myself from the church simply because I am spiritually ill; I must set out to find a way in which I can bring about a healing of my spirit."

I found in my quest for a cure that I objected to not being asked to participate in church activities and, at the same time, resented being asked. On two or three occasions I was invited to do something within my range of ability, but only set my teeth in bulldog fashion and replied, "May I be excused this time? I'm awfully busy, you know."

Finally, after many attempts to humble myself sufficiently, I asked for administration. God was able, then, to reach down and help me. His counsel was plain. It was a suggestion to do the thing I had fought against—participate. Nothing could have been harder for me at that time, yet what could have been a more logical answer? I had cut myself off from the source of life by failing to comply with the laws of life; and then I was being asked to reconnect by reassociating myself with the source through participation. My opportunity came almost immediately.

Rather reluctantly and shakily, as an arm just taken from a cast, I responded. One by one I accepted the opportunities which were afforded me to participate. I am now gradually climbing my way back up the hill toward a well-balanced life of activity and, thus, toward a healthy conception of religion. If you are experiencing like feelings, perhaps participation is your answer, too.

The West Virginia District Conference will be held in Parkersburg Church (Twenty-fifth Street and Murdock Avenue) on September 13 and 14. The first service is scheduled for 7:30 Saturday evening, at which time Merle Guthrie will preach. Sunday activities include a 9:30 prayer service; sermon at 11; and a 2 o'clock business session. District business and the election of officers will be taken care of at this meeting. Members of the priesthood and present officers should send their reports to the district secretary immediately. Dinner will be served at the church.

The World's Children

BY LOUISE WRIGLEY

Their great, pain-filled eyes look up
Out of thin, little faces,
And hungry mouths open wide like hopeful little bird mouths.
They know no hope and yet they ask and ask
As is the way of little ones
Not understanding
Driven by the fearful gnawing
In empty stomachs.

They should be all golden and plump,
And run in the sweet wind,
And feel the warm, glad rain.
They should make long, white daisy chains and whisper secrets
While threads of silver laughter bind them invisibly
To childhood's innocence.

But they do not!
They wander in a sick and bleeding land,
Gashed and hacked by the sadist knife
Of War—the butcher.
Their piteous pleading
Echoes hollowly upon the night.
The children's need rises on a great crescendo of sobbing
To break across the world!

* New Ideas

The basic purpose of any publication is to convey ideas. No matter how artistic it may be, no matter how it is dressed up, no matter what language is used, the value of a paper rests upon the ideas and thoughts that it represents.

In recent times we have been finding some excellent new ideas and thoughts coming from some of our young readers and writers. Stimulating discussion, the exploration of new fields of inquiry, alertness to the trends of world thought have characterized their contributions. It is a changing world that we live in, and young people seem to be more responsive to the changes than their elders. We have found evidence in our correspondence and contributions that our church young people, many of them well-informed from college and university studies, all of them interested in the attitude of the church toward modern trends and developments, have something very significant to say about what they think and feel.

We should be very glad if our readers would think over the scope of subject matter that we have been treating in the "Herald." Of course, our primary duty is to keep our people informed about the church, its doctrines, aims, and ideals. But we have another line of duty—to help our people meet and solve the problems that confront them everywhere in the world. We should be glad if our readers would think over the work we have been doing, and if they see any field of thought or endeavor in which we have failed to enter in a way beneficial to our people, we would like to hear from them. Perhaps you have been thinking about some particular problem facing you and would like to write an article on it or ask someone else to do so. If so, please write and let us know what you have been thinking.

We have found in past experience that it is best to share our problems with our readers. We have learned that they can give us excellent help in the work we are trying to do. Our purpose is to serve the people in the ways that they need to be served. If they will share their thoughts with us we can do our work better, strengthen the church and help our people.

Our appeal is not exclusively to any one age group. There are thinking people in all ages of life. Some of them young, some of them older. The help of all thoughtful groups is wanted and needed. Your idea may give someone else the help he needs.

* Standard rates only now for "Herald" subscriptions. Special rates for nonmembers and servicemen discontinued August 1.

* Why does the world suffer so much? Because people continually poison their bodies with tobacco, alcohol, and wrong food; and because they poison their minds with hate, selfishness, fear, and sin.

* H. L. Mencken invented a happy formula for answering all controversial letters. It is final, courteous, and can be employed without reading the letter to which it replies. He merely says:

"Dear Sir (or Madam): You may be right."
—Alexander Woollcott, "Letters" (Viking).

* Learn to bear pain. You will meet it often in life. And you will find that some of your best experiences come to you only because you have had it.

* The silver lining remains long after many a cloud has melted away.

Look Both Ways

PAUL SENT the Saints at Rome a very practical piece of advice. He said, "Be not conformed to this world" (Romans 12: 2).

There are many good reasons why church members should not conform to the world. People of the world guided by wrong principles frequently make costly, selfish, dangerous, and harmful mistakes. The ways of the world have always led to trouble. If the ways of the world had led people to peace, security, righteousness, honor, and happiness, there would have been no need for this advice. Paul was a man who traveled and understood the world very well; he knew that its ways were often ruinous to individuals. Christ had given another way which would lead to eternal life and peace.

This advice of Paul's has often been used as an argument for our members to be a "peculiar" people. God is not interested in having us become merely a peculiar people, but he is interested in having our lives characterized by righteousness and good works.

NOW THE TIME comes again when it seems necessary to repeat the advice that we must not be conformed to the ways of this world. Our world in these days is living only in and for the present. It is not looking ahead nor preparing for the future. It is not looking back nor learning any lessons from the past. Latter Day Saints must learn to look both ways. We must look to the past to learn whatever it can teach as a warning against what we should not do. We must avoid the old mistakes. We must look to the future to prepare ourselves for whatever changes the rotation of the economic cycles may bring.

Looking at the past we can see the factors that have caused trouble for our people. When the last depression came, we found our people suffering from over-extended credit, too great indebtedness, lack of financial reserves, complete consumption of income, or even living on anticipated future income. When the depression came and employment decreased, many families were without the means of survival. These are mistakes that our people should not make again.

We should live within our means. We should save something and accumulate reserves against unknown future emergencies. We should provide for our economic security in an individual way. The church has set the pattern and example and will continue to do so. The people should take heed and follow the example.

During the depression, it was pitiful to see the condition of the membership in some of our congregations, particularly among those dependent upon daily labor for their income and livelihood. It was pitiful to see mothers and little children suffering from malnutrition, lack of clothing, insufficient fuel and protection in their homes, and lack of medical and dental care.

WE HOPE that no such conditions will come about again in our country, but we know that these conditions and worse exist in many other great countries in the world today. Human want and suffering have increased to a degree unknown since the Dark Ages. Even among enlightened, civilized people, great populations are now helpless in the grip of economic disorder and material shortages.

LET US LOOK AHEAD. We are under no illusions as people were twenty years ago that a depression cannot come to us again. In fact, many conditions point to the possibility of another depression. We would be wise to prepare ourselves against it.

The first to suffer in another depression will be those who are completely dependent upon industrial employment for their income and food. Unemployment strikes first and other major economic disorders soon follow. People who must buy all of their food from a grocery store are the first to fall into want. Those who have small places at the edge of town or in rural areas can at least find a means of providing some of their own food supplies. They are able to live on reduced income. They can often find something to do to provide part-time income where specialized city workers dependent upon the operation of factories cannot.

The standards of family life set by church leaders in Nauvoo should provide an example for us today. There the city was built with many of the homes surrounded by land where there was ample space for gardens, a few chickens and a cow, for trees and lawns where children might find space to play and maintain their health under good conditions.

BRICK WALLS and pavements are not the final answer to the problem of providing human happiness. People are healthier as they are able to live in more natural conditions. Fresh air, sunshine, the growing things of nature all contribute to health and welfare, to peace of mind, to quietness of nerves and to happiness. These conditions provide a kind of insurance against the troubles of a depression. And they are good for children and young people.

FOR ANOTHER REASON we are admonished not to be conformed to the world. The worldly way is for every man to look out for himself and to care nothing for his neighbor. The Christian way is for us to work together, to co-operate, and to help each other. In the Doctrine and Covenants the people have been admonished to organize themselves to provide for their security, to make economic arrangements that would enable them to help each other in times of want and need.

Looking forward, we can see that we face the future with the same inadequate economic equipment and institutions that produced the last depression and made us suffer from it. Are we satisfied now to plunge into the future with no better protection than we have had in the past? The message of the Restored Gospel calls many to a new and different way of life. Not the worldly way that produces want and suffering, but the Christian way that produces help, co-operation and security.

Albert Carmichael Does Well

Friends of Elder Albert Carmichael, of whom there are many throughout the church, will rejoice to know that according to last report he is doing well, and hopes reasonably soon to be removed from California to our Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

Our good Brother Carmichael sustained a broken hip some days ago—a misfortune, indeed, for one of his years. He, however, is holding up with his usual fortitude and sense of humor, and these with his other characteristics as a man and Christian gentleman bode well for his recovery.

JOHN F. GARVER.

In Appreciation of Contributions

Announcement of the office of the Presiding Bishopric is to the effect that the church income for the first six months of 1947, January to June inclusive, totaled $591,539.15, as compared to $532,640.27 for the corresponding months of 1946; an increase over 1946 of $58,898.88, or 11.9 per cent.

This word will be encouraging not only to our bishops but to all who are devoted to the cause, as an indication of continuing moral as well as financial support to the church. And the church is in need and worthy of every support given it.

It is well that Saints who have the wherewithal to contribute to the material needs of the church do so as and when they can. It is well, too, that the church conserve, as it is doing, funds received in excess of current budgetary needs. The church shall find a place for every dollar, and more. And a day is quite likely to come, perhaps sooner than some of us think, when many Saints shall not be as well situated to contribute as they are today.

Let the good work go on.

JOHN F. GARVER.

Where Are the Statements?

A communication from the office of the Presiding Bishop indicates that the number of financial statements filed with the church is below what one might reasonably expect, in consideration of the consistent and persistent teaching of the law in this regard during recent years.

Of 115,503 members of the church in Canada, the continental United States, and Hawaii as of January 1, 1947, only 8,779 have filed statements for 1946. And when husband and wife join in a statement, it is counted as two.

One can but wonder, "Where are the statements that ought to be, but are not filed?"

Golden Wedding Anniversary

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Merrill celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary on Sunday, August 17, at the church. Elder W. J. Williams used "Anniversary" as his sermon topic for the morning service. Special songs and decorations were also in keeping with the event. A dinner for the couple was held following the 11 o'clock service.

Mr. and Mrs. Merrill were married on August 18, 1897, at Rich Hill, Missouri. Their son, Chester Merrill, of Florence was present for the celebration. They

Christian Education Through the Church

This is an informative and stimulating text for those concerned in the educational ministry of the church. It is based on the current program and best thinking of Protestant churches today. Written in concise, fast-moving sentences, its 158 pages hold one's interest and broadens his understanding of church school work.

Concerning "Modern Evangelism" he says:

We have learned to be more systematic, to make actual lists of names of people who ought to be reached, to enlist the services of many church members in missions to their neighbors and to the unknown within their communities, to organize the "seventy" as Jesus did, and send them out in "twos" to press the claims of Christ and the church.—Page 75.

On the subject of "Providing More Time" he declares:

Another significant opportunity to increase the opportunity for religious instruction being embraced by local churches is the vacation church school. Here in several weeks of intensive training the church may provide as much religious instruction as the child normally receives during a year of attendance upon the Sunday church school.—Page 108.

His "Barriers to Christian Fellowship" contains this:

Many people are naturally shy and reticent, find it difficult to take the initiative in forming friendships. Others are mastered by fears, fear of not being accepted or liked, fear of being shunned or disregarded. Some feel insecure or inadequate in dealing with others and hence are inclined to keep to themselves.—Page 63.

The twelve chapters would make a good short course for church school supervisors and teachers. Price 75c.

I Married

Outside the Church

By Bettye Fredrick Kuhnert

MARRIAGE "outside of the church" is an important problem for many of our young people. I wish to offer a few comments and suggestions on the subject, perhaps to try to have acceptance put on such a marriage or to defend it. I am a young church member and have lived the major part of my life in isolated territory; I'm married (happily, I might add) to a young man who isn't a member.

It is said that parents of "marriage-age young people" should make plans to "expose" their children to church youth in order that they might meet, fall in love, and subsequently marry. That may, and often does, work—and yet I attended Graceland for two years and found that better friendships are found and fostered there than marriages. Don't misunderstand; there are some lovely Graceland romances each year which culminate in marriage and which are, for the most part, successful; however, friendships are vitally important, too, because it is from our friends and associates that we develop many if not all of our ideas, ideals, and a pattern of life. One cannot really expect our young people to meet, get acquainted, and fall in love in a few short weeks, such as at reunion, and yet it probably happens.

Many years ago my good friend and adviser, Apostle Charles Hield, learned and approved of a certain outline I had—a rather strange and somewhat lengthy list of flexible, yet definite qualifications for "my ideal man." He often commented on it (without mentioning my name) and agreed with me that the idea was sound. Now that I have found my ideal—and married him—I am convinced that this "must and want list" is an excellent idea, and I want to tell others about it. Every young person knows what he admires, respects, and desires in a life partner and should insist upon those qualities when contemplating marriage. My husband fits the entire list of requirements with two minor exceptions—he isn't six feet tall and isn't a year older than I. One might ask just where church membership fits into my statement of requirements. I have long since misplaced the list, but I know that I didn't specify that my ideal must belong to the church; however, I did state that he must be "in sympathy with it," or not prejudiced against it in any way, and that he must not be a dyed-in-the-wool something else. It was also agreed upon before marriage that he would attend church with me when possible and that our children would follow my faith.

In friendships, I weigh what I like about a person against what I do not like and act accordingly. If everyone had a personal list (actual or only in the mind) and would make a private survey of every young person he became attracted to, he might be a little more particular and possibly not overlook some of the basic ideals he desires, as is so often the case. Church membership is desirable and certainly agreement on religion is a must before marriage; however, when my year-old daughter gets ready to be married, I'm not going to insist she select someone "in the church" (a ceremony in a church is definitely a must), but he must have all or most of her other qualifications.

Many believe that there are numerous persons who are capable of making an individual happy (think of the second marriages which bring happiness), because, after all, husband and wife must mold their lives together into a happy, completely harmonious partnership. Some may contend that one should wait until a suitable person belonging to the church comes along—even if the member is a weak lackadaisical person—since the subject of religion would, presumably, automatically be agreed upon. However, I'm almost convinced that the chances of converting a non-member (providing you have discussed your differences in belief and find them not too far apart, and providing the person will attend church with you when possible and/or study the subject with you) and re-converting a not-too-interested member are about even. Of course, the church member does supposedly have the fundamental beliefs in his heart.

Marriage outside the church is a question—a grave one. Marriage itself is a step which must be carefully and prayerfully considered from every angle, be it in or out of church bonds. Our church believes that marriage is a sacrament and should be regarded as such. Marriage is a responsibility to the church and community as well as to ourselves and it must not be taken lightly. Some schools have courses in marriage. Certainly a young person should discuss its aspects with others interested before taking the step. But I don't mean letting someone pick out your partner for life; that's up to the individual! Those who have a church and a kind, understanding leader (not always the pastor) should take advantage of the available counsel. Church leaders should prepare themselves and be able and willing to assist. They should meet with the young people. Perhaps they can convert the young person. He may have hidden talents which could be put to good use in the church. Anyway, we all had to be converted and baptized.

My hope may be fruitless, for there are many who consider any and every "marriage outside the church" as wrong; however, if the other desirable qualifications are there and the topic of religion has been agreed

Joe Little

By Emma M. Phillips

JOE LITTLE, unaware of the great discovery that he was soon to make, sat on the front porch of his home. He was discouraged and sad. For twenty-five years he had faithfully served the church as a deacon—just a deacon. During those twenty-five years, he had witnessed others come into the priesthood and pass by him to higher and more important offices. But he had remained just a deacon.

He rose slowly from his chair and went down the porch steps. Perhaps if he walked around the block, he would feel better. He met Neighbor Brown, but Joe Little was too absorbed in his personal sorrows to return the neighborly greetings. He saw an old lady who needed assistance in crossing the street, but she was too far away for him to bother helping. A stranger stopped his car and asked for directions, but Joe Little was too impatient to be annoyed with giving detailed directions. The Smith children asked him to retrieve their toy parachute from a tree, but it seemed too far beyond his reach. A group of juniors from the church began a conversation, but Joe Little could not forget his sorrows long enough to talk to them. He saw a newspaper scattered on the lawn of a church; however, since the church represented another denomination than his, he walked on upon as mentioned previously, I contend it is better to marry and raise a family tentatively for the church than to remain single and endure life alone.

Yes, whether or not to marry outside the church is a question—just one of many confronting Latter Day Saint young people today. It is especially important to those who are in isolated territory, because they have no church facilities to assist in efforts to interest others in their religion—before or after marriage.

around the block. The Dunns were moving, but Joe Little saw no reason why he should help lift the heavy furniture. Instead, after he had walked around the block, he returned to his chair on the porch.

A book of quotations lay near by, so he picked it up and opened it at random. He began to read the words of Abraham Lincoln. "I am not bound to win," he read, "but I am bound to be true. I am not bound to succeed, but I am bound to live up to what light I have." Joe Little read these words again. He repeated the last few aloud, "I am bound to live up to what light I have."

Suddenly Joe Little realized he had a lot of "light" that he had never tried to use. Why, he had walked completely around the block and never used any of his light. He would take that walk over again, and he would use the light that was in him. He rushed into the back yard and grabbed the clothes prop. That would be the very thing to use for getting the toy parachute from the tree. As he hurried down the street, he made mental notes as to how he could rectify his walk around the block. He could give Neighbor Brown a hearty greeting. If some kind soul had not already helped the old lady across the street, he would go immediately to her assistance. Joe Little rejoiced when he saw the stranger still sitting in his car, a road map spread out before him. The toy parachute was still in the tree, and the juniors were still on the street corner. If he asked all of them over to his house this Saturday afternoon, he could tell them a story and perhaps start a new church club at the same time. It wouldn't take long to pick up the newspaper on the church lawn. If he hurried, he would still have time to help the Dunns with their moving.

Rushing down the street, Joe Little came to the conclusion that he had missed a lot of opportunities in his twenty-five years of service, and he had the pleasant sensation of knowing that light which shines on others must reflect back to the giver of the light.

Our Dream of Zion

By John R. Grice

"Thy kingdom come!"

Those words should cause each child of God to be filled with a divine discontent, to dream of the future, and to find no real happiness or satisfaction until the dream is fulfilled. We should be a people whose dream of the kingdom of God possesses us until every activity is planned to "build up the kingdom of God and establish its righteousness," which is the first great task given to us by the Christ (Matthew 6: 33, I. V.).

Such a dream should cause us to see beyond our difficulties and personal sacrifices the empire of the redeemed, a condition wonderful beyond human imagination, as David said, "Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined."

No doubt the Psalmist was alluding to the "Zion" that Enoch, with God's help, had built as he walked and talked with him. Such having been a reality, in the past, gives promise of fulfillment, if faithful, of our dream of "Zion" of the future.

Back of every great achievement is a great dream. Back of the victorious resurrection of Jesus, back of Calvary and the empty tomb, was a dream of things to come.

The path to the Cross was not easy. "He was despised and rejected and acquainted with grief," yet he finished the work his Father gave him to do.

Back of all this, Jesus no doubt dreamed of glory awaiting him. He saw rising out of the religious intolerance and blindness, a new world of light and tolerance and hope. Out of the depths of sin, he saw men and women rising to build a new world based on equality and justice. He gave them sympathy and forgiveness, and pointed them toward eternal life.

He also saw the day when some, who had enlisted against him, would turn their backs upon all that had once seemed important and preach the gospel.

He foresaw the day when the cross, on which he was to die, would be lifted up to become an emblem of hope, righteousness, purity, and salvation.

Men celebrate the great events of Christ's passion—the trials, the Crucifixion, the Resurrection. Then they turn back to the ways of the world, and Easter and Calvary and the empty tomb are forgotten until revived at the next Lenten season.

Shall we also forget? Or shall these victories remain realities, keeping our lives radiant with hope and our faith strong in the ultimate triumph of truth? Are we willing to sacrifice that our dream of Zion shall yet find its fulfillment? Will each one seek the interest of his neighbor, doing all things "with an eye single to the glory of God"? Christ sought our good unselfishly. When we are truly converted and become like him, our virtues will shine out and be a light to others as his life has been, and still is, "a light to the world."

So many things we do may not be sinful, but they are so unnecessary. They take up valuable time that could be spent to much better advantage, even to the honor and glory of God. With such things we slow the wheels of Zion's progress, and clutter up the road so unnecessarily that we do not reach Zion.

God grant that an awakening may soon come. The world needs the light that many of us are keeping hidden under a bushel. May we manifest a willingness to sacrifice that the greater light may shine out to sin-sick souls. We cannot attract others to a light that is not shining out, nor can we point men to the Lamb of God while we indulge in all the things in which worldly people find pleasure. The line must be drawn somewhere! Some quibble and evade by asking, "What is sin?" The word of God admonishes us, "Avoid the very appearance of evil!" What a different world it would be and how different our church, if we would all heed those few well-chosen words.

Paul wrote the saints at Ephesus: "The eyes of your understanding being enlightened, that ye may know what is the hope of his calling and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints."—Ephesians 1: 18.

If we are his inheritance, what kind of inheritance are you and I providing—"His inheritance in the saints"? Is it a worthy one? Are we fulfilling the measure of our creation? Are we building Zion into our life and character? We fail to realize "What is the hope of his calling and what the riches of his glory," or what "his inheritance in the saints." We should try to become more skillful in performance of the work God has called us to do, and should labor in the true spirit of sacrifice and consecration that our dream of Zion might be fulfilled.

God grant that back of the sufferings of the early church fathers we may see the fulfillment of that dream accomplished, for, in the light of that glory, the shadows of suffering vanish and "Zion the beautiful beckons us on."

Dealing With the Erring

By L. Wayne Updike

8. The Trial

TO PROVIDE AN orderly method by which to arrive at justice when the rights of the church or any of its members have been trespassed upon, the organization of the church includes a system of courts whose duty it is to hear the pleadings of all parties, to decide as to the validity of evidence presented, and to render judgment.

In branches and districts, the court of original jurisdiction is known as an elder's court and is appointed by the presiding officer of such jurisdiction. Usually three elders are selected to act, although two may be sufficient.

A bishop and his counselors form a standing court in a stake, district, or branch in which they have jurisdiction. Cases may be given to them for original trial. Any two of these officers constitute a court, although all three usually serve. A bishop's court may be appointed for jurisdiction without a bishop in such cases as it is deemed essential or desirable.

Elders chosen for a court must organize by choosing one of their number as chairman, and by choosing a secretary, who may or may not be a member of the court. They are to appoint a time and place of the hearing or trial, which should be as convenient as practicable to all concerned.

"The first named elder appointed to hear a cause shall preside at its meetings until a permanent chairman has been chosen. A bishop's court shall be presided over by the bishop thereof. All church courts shall be conducted in a solemn and orderly manner and all sessions thereof be duly opened with prayer."¹

Should either person involved in the trial find that the time or place set for the hearing is impracticable, it is his privilege to file reasons, which, if considered just by the court, would necessitate the designation of another time and place. The court must give notice of the time and place of meeting to all concerned, including the witnesses whose names have been given to the court by either or both parties.

The court has the power to require the attendance of witnesses who are members of the church, and should any such witnesses refuse to appear or to testify, they may be held to be guilty of a breach of church discipline and fellowship, and may be dealt with as for any other act of unchristianlike conduct, unless excused by the court.²

The Stake High Council and the Standing High Council serve as appellate courts and also as courts of original jurisdiction in some general or official matters. When no competent court exists, having jurisdiction of both parties to an action, the First Presidency may in its discretion appoint a bishops' special court or an elders' court to hear a cause. The matter of jurisdiction of various courts is set forth in the church procedure approved by the General Conference of 1932 and should be studied and understood by every member of the Melchisedec priesthood, for each member of this priesthood is subject to appointment on a court. It is to these same men that the members of the church usually look for guidance when they become involved in any such legal or official matter.

Each member of a court should be present during the entire hearing. When an elder is appointed to a court, if he is absent from the trial, he should not take part in making the decision.

The sessions are to be orderly. All persons present should be required to be respectful in their attitude toward the court and each other. Should anyone persist in showing disrespect or causing disturbance and disorder, he may be held to be an offender and dealt with according to the law. Confusion tends to distort justice, and all persons attending a trial should aid the court by keeping themselves strictly in order and avoiding disagreeable situations.

Should either person fear that he might not secure justice because some member of the court was prejudiced against him, or was disqualified for any reason whatsoever, it is his privilege to file with the court his objections to such member, stating the reasons why he should not sit on the case. It is the duty of the court to consider the objection with the arguments and decide whether it is a valid one. If such objection is sustained, the proceedings stop, and another court must be appointed; but if it is not sustained, the court proceeds to try the case. If the one raising the objection is still dissatisfied with the decision, he may have his protest against the proceedings entered in the record, and make it the basis of his appeal.

If the case is to proceed, the chairman or secretary of the court reads the complaint, and the defendant is required to enter a plea of "guilty" or "not guilty." If he pleads "guilty," no further trial is necessary; but if he pleads "not guilty" the complainant must proceed in person or by his counsel to present the testimony of his witnesses, followed by the defendant or his counsel with his witnesses, all the witnesses being subject to cross-examination. Should the principals be without counsel, and they themselves be unable to handle the case, the court may call the witnesses and ask such questions as will draw out the evidence touching upon the facts at issue.

The court is to decide the matter according to the evidence presented, so it is quite essential that the only evidence admitted be such as should be justly considered in the matter. To admit and consider evidence which is not just and fair is conducive to an unjust decision.³

Evidence may be placed before a court in three forms, viz: by the oral testimony of witnesses; in writing or printing, which may include depositions, legal documents, contracts, letters written in regular correspondence, charts, building plans, newspapers, periodicals, and books; or by material objects, which includes any article that has direct bearing upon the facts of the case and can be brought before the court. A photograph, a stone, or weapon of any kind, a stolen article, a torn garment, are illustrations of material objects which might be presented in evidence.

Evidence may also be divided into direct and circumstantial. Direct evidence is that which is based upon the actual knowledge of the witness, or furnished by documents or objects without resort to inference or assumption. Circumstantial evidence is that which tends to prove the thing charged, not directly, but by establishing other facts, leaving the fact at issue to be determined by inference.

Direct and circumstantial evidence are both admissible to establish proof of a fact, but all evidence must have a "logical connection with or relation to a fact in issue so as to assist in getting at the truth of it"; otherwise, it is said to be irrelevant, and is not admissible.

Competent evidence is "that which is by the rules of law fit and appropriate to establish the matter of fact in dispute, or that which the very nature of the thing to be proved requires," and is, of course, admissible; incompetent evidence is to be excluded.

Hearsay is the kind of evidence which does not derive its force solely from the credit due to the witness, but rests also in part upon the veracity and competency of some other person, from whom the witness may have received his information. Such evidence is considered as having no value and is not admissible. The term "hearsay" is applied to that which is written or done by others, as well as that which is spoken.

Spearing Fish in Tahiti

Standing among the "pahua" shell, a young brown-skinned spearman takes aim to send his light needle-sharp "patia" toward a school of flying fish.

This I have found to be a very difficult sport for the foreigner. Perhaps because it remains a sport to him, while the very existence of the native depends entirely upon his accuracy. It is not at all uncommon to see the swirling spear of the Tahitian come bobbing to the blue surface of the salty sea with the reward of his keen accuracy—a fish or an eel.

While at the island of Hikueru, my wife and I were included in a fishing party. The natives handed each of us a long knife used for cutting away the dense underbrush and instructed us to slash at any fish we might see come to the surface.

It was about nine o'clock at night when we set out through the thicket toward the encircling reef. Our path was illuminated by flashlights and a torch made from burlap sacks soaked in kerosene.

Despite the fact that we wore thick-soled shoes, when we arrived at the reef we began to pick our way to keep from cutting our shoe soles to shreds. We marveled at the way the barefoot natives leaped from coral to coral completely ignoring the razor-sharp path upon which we walked. A close examination of the soles of their feet, however, reveals the reason for this unconcern.

We beheld all types of beautifully colored and queerly shaped fish, ranging from the long, blue-nosed racer to the round black fish covered with quills similar to that of the porcupine. Others emitted a phosphorus glow which was greatly accentuated when they were struck with a knife or spear.

Our first efforts were feeble, indeed, but after considerable practice we did gain a degree of accuracy in this new type of fishing.

We were impressed immeasurably by the precision and skill with which our spearman moved. He rarely missed a target despite the fact that the ever-increasing force of the waves, which broke over the reef as the tide moved in, was continually over-balancing him. The rest of us remained on our feet only by locking arms as the large waves crashed over the reef. Leaning into it, we would invariably see a new draught of fishes deposited at our feet with each wave.

—F. Edward Butterworth.

Hearsay evidence is to be excluded because the party against whom such evidence is offered has no opportunity of cross-examining the original source from which it is derived. The person testifying may have heard imperfectly, misunderstood, or inaccurately remembered the thing which he attempts to repeat. In giving such testimony it is easily possible for the witness to testify falsely without danger of being apprehended. The original statement is not delivered under oath, and hence the person making it would not be as careful as he would be before a court to state exactly the truth and the whole truth. The court sitting in judgment, may not always discriminate between original and second-hand evidence, so that the danger of an unjust decision would be increased.

There are a number of exceptions to the exclusion of hearsay evidence; we mention only the following as most likely to come up in church courts:

1. When the fact at issue is whether a certain statement was made or not, and not as to whether the statement was true, the evidence of witnesses who heard it may be admitted. This exception applies in the case of slander where the accused denies saying the thing charged against him and witnesses are brought to testify of what they heard him say.

2. Declarations which accompany and are a part of the fact or matter in controversy and tend to illustrate or explain it, such transaction being itself admissible is also admissible as being so connected with the transaction as to be a part of it.

3. Declarations relating to bodily and mental feelings. A statement of a person as to how and where he was hurt, made at the time of an accident, would be admissible under this exception. This rule would seem to apply to statements made in public or private, showing the belief of one who was being tried for apostasy.

4. Testimony given in a former trial where the witness is dead, or perhaps unobtainable, provided the trial is between the same persons.

5. Evidence as to one's general reputation, though hearsay—being what others say about him—is admissible as showing his reputation. General reputation is admissible when the truth or veracity of a witness is attacked. Otherwise general reputation is only admissible when the very nature of the proceedings, or the pleadings themselves are such as to make the character of the party an issue upon any particular subject.

6. Other hearsay evidence may be admitted if there is no objection by the contending party. The failure to object to evidence which would be excluded under the rule as to hearsay evidence waives the objection to such evidence, and the court may consider the evidence along with the rest, giving it such weight as is seen fit.

The statements of persons who cannot attend the trial may be taken in writing when both parties to the case, or their representatives, are present and have equal opportunity of asking questions and having the answers incorporated in the statement. Such a statement is called a deposition and is admissible. Ex parte statements are not admissible—ex parte meaning “upon or from one side only” and refers to all evidence where only one side was represented in its taking.

Depositions may be taken by mail when it is impracticable to do so otherwise (since persons are not required to take oath when testifying in a church court) by furnishing the adverse party in the case with a copy of the questions to be submitted so that he will have the privilege of submitting questions in cross-examination.⁴

Manifestations of the spirit—real or imaginary—can not be introduced as evidence, except as they might be the facts at issue. Human testimony is the basis of proof. This is in harmony with the law which says, “Branches and districts are to be conducted according to the rules given in the law as directed in a former revelation: They shall take the things which have been given them as my law to the church to be my law to govern my church. And these affairs are not to be conducted by manifestations of the Spirit unless these directions and manifestations come through the regularly authorized officers of branch or district.”⁵

It is the duty of a member of the church to be present and testify before a church court when legally called upon to do so, for should members refuse, the innocent would in many cases suffer wrong, the guilty go unpunished, and the church could not be cleansed.

When the court has heard all the evidence from both sides which is proper to be admitted, its duty is to decide as to the truth or falsity of the matters inquired into, the guilt or innocence of the member accused, and to report the result of its inquiry to the authority appointing the court. It must also present a copy of the findings to the parties in the case.⁶

The decision may be briefly stated, sustaining the charge or charges, or the court may write out at length its opinion, giving the reasons therefor. It is not proper for the court to find the defendant guilty of any other offense than the one of which he was charged.

In its decision, the court may recommend to the appointing body whose duty it is to pass final sentence, any action relative to the accused which it may desire—of mercy or otherwise.

Either party in any action may seek a new trial. If such request is based upon grounds deemed by the court to be sufficient, such new trial may be granted. If, however, there is no good reason accompanying a request for new trial, the motion shall be denied. The dissatisfied party can then appeal to a higher court. Notice of appeal shall be filed with the officer who appointed the court within thirty days after the judgment is rendered. Reasons for appealing should be clearly stated and signed. The appellate court must be given all papers and records in the case and will decide whether the appeal shall be granted or denied, or whether the original court shall conduct a re-hearing. If justice requires, the court of appeal may annul the proceedings of the court of original jurisdiction and order a new trial before another court.⁷

When the case is completed and the time has elapsed during which any further action could lawfully be brought upon the matter, all the records of the court should be transmitted to the office of the First Presidency for permanent filing.⁸

10. "Thine Is the Kingdom"

By Casimer Nikel

The tenth in a series of meditations presented at the Appointee Institute held in Independence, August 28 to September 14, 1946. The others appeared in the issues of January 18, January 25, June 14, July 19, July 26, August 2, August 16, August 23, and August 30.

SIMILAR TO the other brief phrases from the Lord's Prayer, "thine is the kingdom" presents a fundamental and all-pervasive principle. The initial word suggests divine ownership of all life and property which falls within the realm of the kingdom. It was no doubt thinking of this sort that prompted the Psalmist's utterance: "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof." The admission that ownership is resident within God's province is the setting up of stewardship. Building the kingdom of God according to this scheme, therefore, gives fabric to the relationships of material things as well as to human behaviorism.

Divine ownership suggests sacredness of property. In early human experience this was a guiding light. The ancient mariners by kissing the soil upon landing expressed reverence for that which belonged to God. In my own experience, my father had taught me that bread was a holy gift which must not be abused. And after all these years of absence from the family circle, I still resent seeing picnickers or outdoor workers carelessly tossing on the ground an uneaten sandwich. Such deep emotional respect for the material things, which fall under our control, is bound to throttle abuses and careless extravagance.

Inasmuch as the earth and the fullness thereof is the Lord's, our life is also a holy gift from God. The kingdom is made up not only of industrial economics; it is also a social economy. Apostle Paul tells us, "ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building." A deep consciousness of this divine ownership of our very body and soul will profoundly affect the behavior of an individual. There comes to my mind a personal experience which takes me back to the time of my traveling appointment. As a missionary for the church, I found myself alone in a popular restaurant in the city of Chicago. The waiter presented me with the menu which consisted of a large variety of alcoholic nectars and Oriental foods. The cultural customs of my boyhood life began to assert themselves. Temptation suggested imbibing of a delightfully delicious and exhilarating nectarean entree. My reasoning rebutted with my ministerial standing and the attitude of the church and my friends. Temptation persisted. Not a soul of the four million persons in that metropolis knew of my presence. There was no likelihood of anyone's ever finding out about this act of mine. There wasn't going to be any irreparable injury as a result of this simple act. The final resisting thought was, "But what would God think about it?" Not wanting to argue the merits or demerits of the whole experience, let me point out only this one fact: it was a consciousness of God's relationship which governed my final decision in not yielding to the temptation. A deep-seated emotional appreciation that our life, our body, and our soul is part of the kingdom and, therefore, belong to God has a tremendous influence upon our individual behavior.

To recognize that "THINE is the kingdom" is to do more than to utter a phrase. This recognition is an admission of a profound and pervasive principle into the whole scheme of human experience—a principle which gives sacred value to property and dictates a holiness of purpose in human behavior. The length of time before this principle becomes a working force in human experience will determine the proximity of the kingdom. May God grant therefore that his kingdom will come soon because we have recognized his ownership and lived accordingly.

A BOOK REVIEW

The Choirmaster's Workbook

By Dayton W. Norden, Augustana Book Concern, Rock Island, Illinois, price $2.00.

Mr. Norden has succeeded in incorporating in this little book a great deal of good common sense for choir directors as well as a surprising amount of good practical material. There is a goodly amount of liturgical material which would not be of a great deal of benefit to the choir directors of our faith but, even with this material omitted, the book contains much that could be used in the way of short cuts, material suggestions, rehearsal and performance techniques and ideas for making the choir director's job easier and more effective. There is also a good bibliography of additional material.

Preach the Word

By Roy L. Smith, Abingdon Cokesbury Press, 1947, 128 pages, price $1.00.

One of America's most interesting and popular editors, leader, and lecturer was invited to give the Payton Lectures at Southern Methodist University. All who have read his editorials know how stimulating and helpful his material is. For those who like to read current lectures and sermons, this little book will be very welcome.

Worship Suggestions for October By Camilla Collins

Theme for the Month: JESUS SHARES WITH US

OCTOBER 5, 1947

JESUS SHARES HIS SPIRIT OF LOVE

Prelude: "Come, Tell the Story of His Love," Saints' Hymnal, No. 286.

Call to Worship: Psalm 18: 1, 2, 3a; or Psalm 68: 19; or Psalm 108: 1-8.

Hymn (standing): "Oh, Jesus the Giver," Saints' Hymnal, No. 31, stanzas 1 and 2; or "There's No Love to Me Like the Love of Jesus," Saints' Hymnal, No. 336.

Prayer (standing): Of thanks for the spirit of love, asking that we might have a greater desire to share.

Choral Response: Duet, Chorus of "Come, Tell the Story," Saints' Hymnal, No. 286.

Suggestions for Compiling Talk:

Jesus said there must be love:

Love for God—love for neighbor, Mark 12: 35, 36. (Verses 30, 31, King James' Version.)

Love for enemies, Matthew 5: 45-49. (Verses 43-47, King James Version.)

Love—a test of discipleship, John 13: 35.

Love—a qualification for service, Doctrine and Covenants 4: 1.

Love—a prerequisite for assisting in the building of the kingdom, Doctrine and Covenants 11: 3, 4.

Love—requires: Obedience, Doctrine and Covenants 42: 8; John 14: 21-25. Chastening, Doctrine and Covenants 92: 1.

Duet: "Oh, to Be More Like Jesus," Zion's Praises, No. 128, stanzas 1, 2.

Story: Jesus Shares His Spirit of Love with the Nephites, 3 Nephi 8: 5-12.

Duet: "Oh, to Be More Like Jesus," Zion's Praises, No. 128, stanza 3.

Scriptural Challenge:

A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another.—John 13: 34.

Vocal Challenge (all remain seated): "Admonition," stanza 6.

Scriptural Pledge: (Read, then repeated by all.)

"All that the Lord hath spoken we will do."—Exodus 19: 8.

Pledge to Service:

Poem: Zion's Praises, No. 83, "Loving Each Other," to be read by leader. After each stanza is read, congregation sings the chorus softly.

Closing Hymn (seated): "Is Thy Cruse of Comfort Failing," Saints' Hymnal, No. 345.

Prayer: Of thanks for the joy we have found in service of LOVE; praying that this joy might be increased as we continue to SHARE the spirit of love with Jesus.

Hymn Response (without books): "My Jesus, I Love Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 12, stanza 1.

OCTOBER 12, 1947

JESUS SHARES HIS SPIRIT OF TRUTH

Prelude: "Stepping in the Light," Zion's Praises, No. 100.

Call to Worship: Psalm 33: 1-5; or Psalm 25: 1-7, 10; or Psalm 100.

Hymn (standing): "O Word of God,"

Saints' Hymnal, No. 402, stanzas 1, 2. (Remain standing for Scripture and prayer.)

Scripture Reading (standing): Jesus said, I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me.—John 14: 6.

Prayer (standing): Of thanks for the word of truth, asking that we might more deeply appreciate the meaning of the spirit of truth as we worship, and desire to follow in Christ's way.

Instrumental Response: Chorus of Zion's Praises, No. 100, "Stepping in the Light."

Thoughts for Compiling Talk:

A. What is truth?

"Ye were also in the beginning with the Father; that which is Spirit, even the Spirit of truth; and truth is knowledge of things as they are, and as they were, and as they are to come; . . . This Spirit of truth is of God. I am the Spirit of truth."—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 4.

"The glory of God is intelligence, or in other words, light and truth; light and truth forsaketh that evil one."—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6.

"The light of truth, which truth shineth. This is the light of Christ."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 2.

"I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me."—John 14: 6.

"When he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth; for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak; and he will show you things to come."—John 16: 13.

B. Where may truth be found?

"The word of the Lord is truth, and whatsoever is truth is light, and whatsoever is light is Spirit, even the Spirit of Jesus Christ."—Doctrine and Covenants 83: 7.

"The Book of Mormon contains the truth and the word of God."—Doctrine and Covenants 18: 3.

"Truth will I send forth out of the earth . . . righteousness and truth will I cause to sweep the earth as with a flood."—Doctrine and Covenants 36: 12.

C. Endurance of Truth:

"And the truth abideth forever and ever."—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 8.

"Truth abideth and hath no end."—Ibid., 85: 17.

Duet: "We Limit Not the Truth of God," Saints' Hymnal, No. 416, stanza 1.

Scriptural Promises: (Read from books without explanation.)

Jesus said: "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; And ye shall know the truth, and the TRUTH shall make you free."—John 8: 31, 32, I. V.

Again Jesus gave this wonderful promise: "John bore record of me, saying, He received a fullness of truth; yea, even of all truth, and no man receiveth a fullness unless he keepeth the commandments, receiveth truth and light, until he is glorified in truth, and knoweth all things."—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 4.

Duet: "Thy Rich Promises in Me Fulfill," Saints' Hymnal, No. 314, stanza 4.

Prayer: Of thanks for the wonderful promises of Jesus, expressing a desire to keep all the commandments, that our joy might be increased, and that we might have more truth and light to share daily with our neighbors and friends.

Instrumental Response: Chorus of Zion's Praises, No. 100.

Closing Hymn (standing): "We've a Story to Tell to the Nations," Saints' Hymnal, No. 397, stanzas 1, 4.

OCTOBER 19, 1947

JESUS SHARES HIS SPIRIT OF FORGIVENESS

Prelude: "Safely Through Another Week," Saints' Hymnal, No. 62, or, "Come, Ye That Love the Lord," No. 5.

Call to Worship: Psalm 86: 1-7.

Prayer (standing): The Lord's Prayer (in unison). Remain standing to sing the Doxology.

Choral Response (all, without books): The Doxology, Saints' Hymnal, No. 14.

Instrumental Solo: Saints' Hymnal, No. 65.

Vocal Solo: "Heavenly Father, We Adore Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 65, stanzas 1, 2.

Scriptural Suggestions for Compiling Talk:

Many times we ask the Lord to forgive us, forgetting that much depends on us. The Lord has made us a promise: "Forgive, and ye shall be forgiven."—Doctrine and Covenants 81: 1; Luke 6: 37.

WHOM must we forgive? "I, the Lord, will forgive whom I will forgive, but of you it is required to forgive all men."—Doctrine and Covenants 64: 2.

HOW OFTEN, Matthew 18: 21, 22.

WHAT MORE is required?

Repentance: ". . . they repent of the evil, and they shall be forgiven."—Doctrine and Covenants 64: 3; Mosiah 11: 138.

Love: Jesus exemplified this forgiving love in Mark 14: 52-54; Luke 23: 35 (both in Inspired Version); Mosiah 11: 139.

Hymn (seated): "Come Ye that Love the Lord," Saints' Hymnal, No. 5; or "Heavenly Father, Grant Thy Blessing," No. 86, stanzas 1, 2, 3.

Story: "Jesus Explains the Part LOVE Has in Forgiveness"—Luke 7: 36-49.

Vocal Solo: "Look for the Beautiful," Saints' Hymnal, No. 209, stanza 4.

Challenge: "And be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."—Ephesians 4: 32.

Instrumental Solo: "My Jesus, I Love Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 12.

Prayer: Of thanks for the forgiving spirit exemplified by Jesus; praying that we might be worthy of his forgiveness because of our refusal to harbor grudges or hard feelings against anyone.

Closing Hymn: "My Jesus, I Love Thee," stanzas 1, 2.

OCTOBER 25, 1947

JESUS SHARES HIS SPIRIT OF INNER PEACE

Picture: "Head of Christ."

Prelude: "I Need Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 314.

Call to Worship: "Give unto the Lord . . . give unto the Lord glory and strength. Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name; worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness . . . The Lord will give strength unto his people; the Lord will bless his people with peace."—Psalm 29: 1, 2, 11; or Psalms 84: 1, 2; 85: 8.

Hymn (standing): "Prince of Peace," No. 278, stanzas 1, 2.

Prayer (standing): Of thanks for the peace of Jesus; asking that we might more fully understand as we worship that inner peace increases as we continue to grow like the Master.

Hymn (seated): "I Need Thee," No. 314, stanza 1.

Scripture Reading: Jesus promised, "Peace I leave with you. My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."—John 14: 27.

Scriptural Thoughts About

Inner Peace for Talk:

Upon what does this inner peace depend? "He who doeth the works of righteousness shall receive his reward, even PEACE in this world, and eternal life in the world to come."

—Doctrine and Covenants 59: 5.

"See that ye love one another . . . and above all things, clothe yourselves with the bonds of charity, as with a mantle, which is the bond of perfectness and PEACE."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 38.

Personal Testimony of Inner Peace: (As a result of obedience and love.)

Instrumental Solo (softly): "I Need Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 314, chorus.

Poem:

PEACE

Father, take not away
The burden of the day,
But help me that I bear it
As Christ, his burden bore,
When cross of thorns he wore
And none with him could share it;
In his name I pray.

—James Mudge.

Duet: "O, Master Let Me Walk with Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 213, stanza 1.

Poem:

PEACE (Continued)

I only ask for grace
To see that patient face
And my impatient one;
Ask that mine grow like his,
Sign of an inward peace
From trust in thee alone,
Unchanged by time or place.

—James Mudge.

Duet: "O Master, Let Me Walk with Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 213, stanzas 3, 4.

Prayer: Of thanks for the inner peace that we have experienced; praying that our peace might be increased as we give ourselves daily in obedience and love.

Closing Hymn: "Lord, Let Thy Blessing Rest in Peace," Saints' Hymnal, No. 83.

Benediction: "Peace be with you all that are in Christ Jesus . . . the Lord will give strength unto his people . . . The Lord will bless his people with peace." Amen.—I Peter 5: 14; Psalm 29: 11.

Choral Response: Duet, "A Parting Blessing," Zion's Praises, No. 90, stanza 1 and chorus.

Appreciates Remembrances

I wish I were able to personally thank everyone who remembered me on my seventieth birthday, but since that is impossible, I take this means of expressing my gratitude. I received over 200 cards and gifts from friends and relatives, and I am truly appreciative of them.

Galva, Illinois Mrs. J. O. Dutton.

Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Yantke of London, Ontario, announce the birth of a son, Wayne Richard, born July 7. Mrs. Yantke is the former Eva Ebsworthy.

From the pages of the Book of Mormon and the celluloid of Hollywood Westerns has marched a group of young people determined to master the ways of the palefaces. Bearing such fascinating names as Eugene Bighorse, Emerson Buffalo Head, Billy Bowlegs, and Helen Hailstorm, they have discarded their blankets for bobby sox and enrolled in the Haskell Indian Institute near Lawrence, Kansas. Since 1884, Haskell has been training young Indians in the trades of the white man, and last year 811 students, representing sixty-six tribes from thirty-one states and Alaska signed up for the high school and commercial college work. One hundred forty-eight veterans, four of them girls, returned to study trades varying from baking to masonry.

When the new student arrives on the campus, he is taken, not to a tepee, but to one of the large stone dormitories. Here he is initiated into the mysteries of boarding school life, such as no war whoops after 9:30 p.m. and severe penalties for boys who whistle at girls. Incidentally, that regulation is strictly enforced by the senior lettermen themselves. Every Sunday afternoon, all offenders are run between a double line of boys wielding paddles. Even the most beautiful Minnie-ha-ha is ignored after this treatment.

However, discipline and dormitories are no cure for homesickness, so at the psychological moment, the student council announces a stomp dance. The stomp dance has much the same effect on an Indian as the singing of "The Old, Old Path" has on a homesick Gracelander. It is doubtful if Arthur Murray could prepare one for his debut at a stomp dance, but for an Indian youth it is second nature. Forming a long line behind the leader, the dancers mimic his actions and reply to his chant. Starting slowly, they pace in and out, taking slow deliberate steps. Then the chant rises in pitch, replies are quicker, and the dancers bend almost double, their feet pounding to the rhythm of the chant. When they glide out into the football field, the dance has reached its climax. As one person, the twisting line spurts forward, then rears back to shake its fist at the sky, much as its predecessor must have glared toward the Great Spirit. To the uninitiated, the stomp dance combines the religious fervor of a Negro spiritual with the wild abandon of a college snake dance.

An essential part of the educational system at Haskell is the industrial assignment. Every student, regardless of his financial situation, must work one hour and forty minutes a day, which pays for his room and board. At the close of a student assembly, a staff member arose and announced that the campus was becoming increasingly cluttered with candy wrappers and other refuse and this was the opportune time for a clean-up. Eight hundred laughing students swarmed over the campus and in ten minutes every scrap of paper was whisked away.

In spite of their preoccupation with the culture of the white man, their own heritage of Indian lore is not neglected. Tribal costumes handed down from generation to generation were pulled out of closets for the Pageant of the Peace Pipe, probably the most lavish Indian program ever given. Nearly 1,000 Indians of seventy-six tribes presented the program on May 20, 1946, in honor of all braves who served in World War II. Tableaux and dances followed each other in frenzied succession, but one of the most touching and typically Indian of the memorials was that of the "Empty Saddle" for Pvt. Clarence Spotted Wolf. Before going into battle in the Pacific theater, Private Spotted Wolf had written a letter in which he asked that, if he shouldn't return, his horse be allowed to walk in the parade—he would be riding it in spirit. A year later the spectacular parade of the Peace Pipe wound down Lawrence's main street, and visitors wondered why someone didn't ride the white horse walking alone in the procession. It took an Indian to know that it bore a spirit in the saddle.

The visitor to Haskell is surprised, not so much by the differences that persist between the white and Indian schools, but by their similarities. Here are found the same outlandish blue jeans, the jam-packed drugstore, and the universal aspirations of youth. Contrary to the popular conception of the stoical, silent Indian, Francis Logan of the Winnebago tribe of Nebraska was eager to explain his profession of interior decorating and painting. "White people have a misconception of Indian dress," he said. "Different tribes have different costumes, and when I

A Matter of Duty

QUESTION:

I have been teaching a class of juniors on Sunday morning. I don't dislike the task, but it does keep me from a young people's class which I should like very much to attend. Will I be neglecting my duties if I resign as teacher and become a "student" again?

ANSWER: By Thelona D. Stevens

The answer to this question lies between you and God.

Why are you now teaching this class of juniors? Did you take the class because no one else was available? because you wanted to please a special friend, the church school director, pastor, or someone else? because you wanted to serve the church, and teaching juniors seemed a good, easy place to start? Or did you take this class because you have an overwhelming love for God and for his Son, and for the church and all it has come to mean to you? Have you a great love for the children you are teaching, with whom you truly wish to share these things? In other words, are you teaching because you wanted to teach when you accepted this class? Jesus chose to come and teach us. Those who truly teach for him must choose to do this service, if it is to be acceptable to him.

You don't dislike the task! But do you love it? Do you feel your teaching to be a sacred service to God because of your great love for him? Do you feel it a call? That is what we must feel, according to Doctrine and Covenants 4:1—"Oh ye that embark in the service of God . . . if ye have desires to serve God, ye are called to the work . . ." Do you feel the call to teach these children?

Every individual who accepts the terms of membership in Christ's church "embarks in the service of God," and therefore upon him rests a holy obligation to serve.

The words of Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," may well be applied to teaching, and it is from this angle that your decision needs to be weighed. If you attend the young people's class, what will be your purpose—to give, or to receive? Perhaps it is that you wish to receive more instruction now in order that you may give better service later. That must be determined by you, for you know the Doctrine and Covenants reference named admonishes those who embark in his service to "see that ye serve him with all your heart, might, mind and strength, that ye may stand blameless before God at the last day," and then there is added the statement, "the field is white already to harvest." If you give up this class of juniors, will someone else work dependably in that "harvest field"?

If you are truly wishing to qualify for greater service by attending the young people's class, that is most commendable, but have you considered that the best teacher is the Holy Spirit of promise, the Holy Ghost, who will teach you even if you do not attend a class for instruction? Compliance with the admonition to study, to pray over your work, to live a life worthy of example, in all things being obedient to God's commandments makes you eligible for the leadings and direction of that Holy Spirit. My personal experience is that I have learned more when teaching and really trying to qualify myself for my task than I ever learned sitting at ease in a class. In fact, at times I have thought, "What a pity everyone can't be a teacher!" because of the great experiences of truth unfolded by the Holy Spirit when one honestly, diligently seeks truth and knowledge.

Too many times the ease with which we attend classes, feeling little personal obligation for preparation precludes the possibility of the great blessing that comes to real teachers. (Real teachers are those who study and learn in order that they may teach.) There is no thrill like the light, joy, and the sense of direction which comes when God sends his spirit to bless those who serve him. What joy can be greater than that of teaching "as the Master taught"? Therefore, from the standpoint of true enjoyment, consider what you may be losing if you give up your juniors to attend the young people's class.

Pray over your decision. Much is at stake, more than one's human knowledge and insight is able to measure. You represent a great investment on the part of God. He is extremely interested in you, in your service, and in those whom you serve. Pray for direction, and while praying, keep studying the things of God, for as a teacher or as a student, it is imperative to learn.

see pictures of scantily clad Indian women it really makes me angry. Our women are always fully clothed." Recently returned from serving in the armed forces, Francis told about his homecoming to the Winnebagos. "Among our elders," he said, "the wounded boy who returns is regarded as careless and is to be pitied, while the guy without a scratch is the hero."

Haskell Institute is serving the youth of a lost nation who are struggling to give their race the recognition and dignity to which it aspires. Amid atomic bombs, their people live by superstition, and these young folk have refused to go on being Hollywood's red villains while, as a race, they exist in ignorance. Looking back to the glory with which they once ruled the Americas, they are resolved to lift themselves out of their dark ages and become again a people with a voice.

Choices

BY LILLIE JENNINGS

The things we do oft crowd
And push aside the things
We should have done; aloud
We cry when ev'ning brings
To close a day not filled With worthwhile deeds nor wise.

Who would the kingdom build Reveres Isaiah's eyes.

With sight so keen and strong
In voice of prophecy
That speaks to heedless throng,
Isaiah speaks to me;

As—"Wherefore do ye spend
And gain not bread of life,—
Or labor without end
And have not peace, but strife?"

Isaiah's God is nigh
To make his covenants
With us if we'll but buy
The joy and peace he grants.
If bread of life we'll taste,
We'll leave for aye the throng
Who time and money waste
In useless things or wrong.

P. S.

* Shards

On a shelf of books rest a few shards given me by a friend who is devoted to archaeological interests. They were picked up in a field where there were apparently in ancient times a number of dwellings. Even though they are broken, and the material has been exposed for centuries to the action of the elements, there are still evidences of skilled craftsmanship and beauty of design.

With what patience and care the artisan sketched his pattern, and applied the minute bits of color, all so gracefully and harmoniously. What must have been his thoughts, his hopes, his purpose in working.

The maker of these shards is gone, his bones are dust and his name unknown. But he left behind a goodly piece of work, which gives him a kind of immortality. He lives on in what he did.

* If

If you must wear a coat to church
While all the world's perspiring,
And let yourself complain of it,
You'll find it very tiring.

Don't be a victim of the heat,
So hot and tired and fretted,
Just go ahead and do your work
And you will soon forget it.

How many little ills of life
That hurt us if we let them
Can be dismissed without a sigh
If we will just forget them.

* Troubles

About this matter of troubles, Doris Oakman has some interesting observations concerning them. She says some people nurse and nurture their troubles and pains, lick them and pet them and treat them gently, carry them to the cross and lay them at the feet of Jesus; pick them up and drag them home again. Is it any wonder that Jesus can't do something about them?—Sadi.

"Trouble is something that happens when your mistakes catch up with you."—Uncle Joe. "Not always," objects Sir Pompous. "Trouble often comes when other people's mistakes catch up with you!"

"The only way to deal with troubles," says Aunt Molly, "is to forget them as much as you can. When they bother you, go out and help somebody else. You'll find plenty of people with troubles worse than your own."

* Small things annoy and irritate. Only the big things can hurt you. Don't become confused about them. It is easy to think you have been hurt when you have only been annoyed. A good defense against anything that bothers you is to look at it and see how little it is in comparison with the great concerns of life. Then it is easier to say, "This isn't big enough to hurt me."

* Detour

When the going is rough, console yourself with the thought that it can't last forever.

The worst road in the world is the detour. But you know that the purpose of the detour is to make way for a better road than you had before.

* WOMAN'S POWER to change her mind has often been noted by men commentators. They haven't said nearly as much about her power to change a man's mind!

* THE HERALD BOOKSTORE, the part of it specializing in the local retail trade, has been moved around the corner to a fine location in the battery block, where it has been decorated in the most modern manner, neat as the proverbial bandbox, whatever that is.

Weggie, the lisp artist, noted the confusion in the old store and exclaimed, "Thith plathe lookth like a weckl!"

LET'S SAVE THE SHIP

When a great ship puts out to sea, all the people on board share a common fate, and are dependent upon one thing—the safety of the ship. If it goes down, they all perish together. If it stays afloat, they all survive.

Many kinds of people ride the ship. There are the crew—the workmen, sailors, servants, and others—who are paid to take the risks and do the work. There is the captain, who by the code of honor of the sea must be the last one to leave it in case of distress or disaster. Many a captain has given his life rather than leave his ship.

Another class of people is on the ship: the passengers. They pay their fare. No labor is expected of them. In case of storm they could assume that they have no obligation to do anything. It is up to the captain and the crew to deliver them safely to their destination. Yet the time may come when they will be needed to save the ship and all its precious human cargo. Jonah was only a passenger on the ship to Tarshish, yet when the captain discovered that Jonah was morally responsible for the storm that threatened the ship, cargo, and crew, he required Jonah to act accordingly, which Jonah did.

S. S. Civilization

Civilization today is like a people upon a ship at sea. This is "One World" to quote Wendell Willkie. In the storm battering at the sides of the vessel, we cannot save ourselves without also saving others, because to save ourselves, we must save the ship in which all of us are riding, whether as passengers or crew. The steerage passengers are having a much worse time of it than the cabin passengers. The fact that fortune and circumstance have placed us in the position of cabin passengers does not alter our responsibility. If the waves of the sea batter a hole in the sides of the ship and pour the waters in upon the steerage passengers, it will not be long before the cabins also will go under the waves.

There is no possibility of returning to the "splendid isolation" which seems to be the dream of too many blind politicians, and of too many blind citizens. Eventually, we must accept the fate of all the world. We shall surely survive or perish, politically, economically, and culturally with the other peoples of the world.

The Human Cost of War

We are just beginning to realize the terrible cost of war in terms of human life. Every week reports come from Europe of the enormous difficulties encountered there. The people have not enough food, clothing, medicine, or the necessities of life. Consequently, they are weak, and their labor production rate is very low. They have not enough goods to sell to the world markets to retrieve themselves from economic want. We in the United States who have known very little of the real cost of war cannot understand the desperate conditions in which many millions of the world's people are living.

There was considerable lamenting when the war was going on at the terrible waste of commodities, supplies, and natural resources. People were starved and exhausted in order that every available thing and possession might be thrown into the operation of the hungry machines of war.

Now we find that not only have the resources of the nations involved been exhausted—the people are nearly exhausted, too. Many of them have reached a point where they cannot help themselves; or at the best they are able to do very little. But given a new start, they are capable of contributing many fine things for human welfare and comfort. They can be our customers for the products of our resources and labor. They can also furnish many things we need and like but do not produce for ourselves. Without them, it will be a poorer world. Helping them is only good sense. In the final analysis, it is helping ourselves.

Gifts?

There are voices in America crying out against the great gifts and supplies of funds that are required to help these war-stricken nations get back on their feet so that they can begin to work and again produce goods for their own needs and goods for world trade in order that a wholesome and beneficial commerce, destroyed by war, might be rebuilt.

But the help we give to other nations is more than a gift. It is something that will have a return—an important return. It is no more a gift than seed planted is a gift to the soil. Without the seed there can be no crop. Help to the struggling nations is seed by which they can survive and by which we, too, will be helped. These people with the best of intentions are pointing out a real truth: we cannot support the nations of the world indefinitely. But they forget one very important fact: if Europe is allowed to fall into ruins, the rest of the world including our country, is in danger of going down with it.

Two Systems

There are two great political and economic systems in the world today. They are struggling for mastery and survival. They are so different that both could survive only by the will of both sides in the struggle. There is no present indication that the power that opposes us will ever be content to let our system remain alive. Its founder, Karl Marx, preached a ruthless class warfare, and the destruction of all our kind of society. This code of destruction has been the creed and the faith of his followers ever since. It is the creed and the faith of communism today.

There is no inevitable conflict among peoples. They can reconcile their differences and be friendly. There is no really unfriendly people in the world. But the systems, the great political and economic powers, fight a war to the finish.

On the eastern horizon of Europe, and advancing steadily over it, taking up into its grasp the helpless nations in its path, is a great power that is based upon the idea of the supremacy of the state, and the subordination of the individual. From the very beginning, it has made a religion of its intention to destroy every other form of government, every other kind of power. You have only to read their literature to know that. Any other idea is a delusion leading to ruin, propaganda to quiet opposition, to accomplish the deadly purpose.

A pirate power is aboard our ship. To accept it means ruin.

How important to us then are the friendly nations that need our help. We shall need these friends in time to come when they will be strong again, and will help us in the struggle for freedom and for the rights of the individual soul.

WHO IS MY BROTHER?

ONE OF MY favorite hymns contains the words, "He who serves my Father as a son is surely kin to me." H. G. Wells, famous author and historian, made the succinct remark, "True nationality is mankind." These two statements are wholly synonymous and reconcilable. But ever since the question, "Who is my brother?" was first asked, the world has been giving the wrong answer.

The Romans said, "Oh, no, the Christians don't belong to our family." The Crusaders declared, "Certainly not, the Moslems are foreigners, not worthy to set foot in our holy city." The slave traders thought, "These men are no better than animals. We shall sell them in the market place." The Nazis roared, "There is no race but the Aryan." And these were all wrong answers.

Oh, we've learned our lesson—America is the melting pot. The big-hearted United States holds open arms to anyone, any nationality, any race. Fine! Wonderful! That's the reason why there are no "Jim Crow" cars, no signs declaring, "We reserve the right to deny service to any individual," and we have no segregation of any race. We're all one big, happy family. Don't you believe it. We're still getting the wrong answer.

Oh, we've learned our lesson. From now on, all nations will be equal; there will be no more wars, no boundary disputes, no international trade complications. We love everyone! It's perfectly obvious when a peace conference stalls for days on deciding who shall sit in on the conference that we still have the wrong answer.

It's easy to add two and two, whether on slide rule, by means of a complicated calculating machine, or by counting on the fingers. One need not be a statistician, physicist, or philosopher to arrive at a solution of this simple arithmetical problem. And the answer to this world-embracing problem is as simple, within the grasp of understanding of every human being no matter how uninformed his intellect. We all know the right answer!

No person of normal mind function would deny his actual family responsibilities. No matter what the difficulty, he will stand by the mother, father, sister, brother, or family ad infinitum, while the unpleasantness is cleared up. He will go out of his way, actually inconveniencing himself, to assure the settlement of the situation. Even the utter orphan is not desolate of family, for somewhere along the line are individuals who have performed the functions of that family lost.

After family association, come those mere acquaintances or cordial friends made in some organized fashion—at a club, at school, or at church. When a man finds common interests, he finds friendship. Then come casual nodding acquaintances—someone you see daily on the streetcar or bus.

Somewhere along the line comes the realization that men have certain common characteristics. When these same characteristics are fully understood and appreciated, the differences become minimized. This is the solution!

When color of skin becomes less important than quality of mind, then men are brothers. When birthplace is overshadowed by intelligence, then all mankind is kin. When spiritual outlook hides sect, then there is only one family, with God, the Father.

There's your answer. The right answer! "He who serves my Father as a son is surely kin to me."

Prophet of God

An interpretation by Ted Linder

THE DUST that rose from the scuffling feet of thousands of people added a choking sensation to the stench of the blood of the freshly killed bullock.

Sickened, Obadiah turned his head and sent his gaze up Mount Carmel. But he was not seeing the sharp outlines that rose up before him, for the wheels of his thoughts were turning back to preceding incidents.

The fields that stretched out before Obadiah, as the horse upon which he rode moved wearily forward, had no sign of life. His master, King Ahab, had sent him to look for grazing land for the horses, but none was to be found anywhere. To Obadiah, a believer in God, there was a deep understanding of the significance of the great drought, for had not Elijah prophesied to King Ahab predicting such conditions? It could probably have been avoided if Ahab had not listened to his wife, Jezebel (who worshiped the heathen god Baal) nor heeded her sinful ways. She had been a degradation to Israel and had slain the prophets of God. Obadiah himself had hidden one hundred and fifty of them and had stolen bread from the king's table to feed them.

OBADIAH REINED in his horse and dismounted to inspect what had once been a good spring of water. Not a bit of moisture in the cracked waterway could he find.

With the reins in his hand, he trudged on hoping the tired, hungry horse would gain a little respite with his weight out of the saddle.

It was while traveling in this manner that he saw a tall, slender figure approaching him from the opposite direction. With a sudden burst of joy, Obadiah dropped the horse's reins to run forward and throw himself at the feet of the traveler.

It was a prepossessing figure whom Obadiah had recognized. His stride was lithe and athletic, and he walked as one who loved to walk. Long arms extended to strong supple hands; thick, dark hair fell down his back to form a shaggy mane; his beard was also thick and dark. The thing most outstanding about him, however, was the piercing quality of his eyes which were set under heavy brows.

As Obadiah prostrated himself on the ground he cried, "Art thou my lord Elijah?"

Elijah took him by the hand. "I am," he said. "Rise, go quickly, tell thy master, behold, Elijah is here."

"But I am afraid," answered Obadiah. "The king would slay me, for he sent men everywhere to find thee and they could not. And they swore by the kingdom that you could not be found. If I say that you are here, and when I go you are taken away by the spirit and the king find thee not, then will he slay me. I say all this for I have feared the Lord from my youth up. You no doubt have heard how I hid and fed the prophets when Jezebel sought to slay them, and now you are asking me to take another risk with my life?"

Elijah answered, "I will surely show myself unto him today."

Obadiah accepted Elijah's promise, mounted and hurried away to find Ahab, King of Israel.

IT WAS NOT until late in the evening that the anxious Obadiah discovered the reason for Elijah's strange action. And it was yet strange that Obadiah, who was most impatient to know what was going on, did not hear until messengers had already hastened to all Israel to gather the people together. A test was to be made to find out who was God of Israel.

Obadiah noticed that the crowd was tense as the priests of Baal with horrible moanings bursting forth from their lips laid the freshly dressed bullock upon the wood which had been placed on the altar of Baal. One of the priests started a chant, the others joined in. Round and round the altar they went chanting and calling on Baal to consume the offering. As the time passed and the offering still lay there raw and shiny in the hot sun, the people became restless. Elijah apparently noted it and seized upon this opportunity to goad the prophets of Baal.

"You are not crying loud enough. Your god cannot hear you. He must be on a long journey," he said again and again.

One priest started a fanatical dance before the altar, another took up the dance and with a knife slashed himself until the blood came, then another and another. The blood dropped in the dust under their scurrying, dancing feet and dried into the hot earth.

NOONTIME CAME and passed. The sun beat down relentlessly, and the people sought what shade they could find. Tired children cried to go home to food and rest. A young mother with a newborn babe in her arms fainted and had to be taken away from the nauseating scene. An old woman leaned wearily upon the arm of her stalwart son.

A wandering donkey worked his way forward, brayed loudly as if in contempt of what was going on, looked wisely all around at the people, brayed loudly again and walked aimlessly away.

Obadiah felt that expectancy had gone out of the minds of the people and had been replaced with contempt.

He shifted his weight from one foot to the other. The shadows lengthened. Night was close at hand. Very methodically Elijah, the man of God, placed twelve stones for an altar. On it he put the wood, then around it he dug a trench. As water and more water was poured upon the offering the people aroused themselves again.

There went a murmur of astonishment through the crowd. Was the man mad? The whispers flew as though they were winged.

He was praying now, "... let it be known this day that thou art God ..."

Suddenly, there was a flash of fire. The people gasped.

A cry went up: "The offering is consumed. Even the water is gone. Elijah's God is the God of Israel."

As one person, the people buried their faces in the dust and worshiped God.

The Power of Prayer

I had a dream. High on the rugged side of a mountain I saw a mist-veiled personage. It was climbing upward, but it faltered and had difficulty in the ascent. I could not reach it, so I could not help it. But I could pray for it. I knelt, bowed my head, and prayed. I looked again at the mountain side. The personage seemed rested and moved with greater ease. "How glorious is the instrument of prayer," I sighed. And I wondered who the personage was who had been helped by my prayer. Then the deep woodland seemed to whisper, "Look again. Look again." I looked and behold it was I who climbed the mountain side. I had been given strength by the prayer that I had said for another.—Emma Phillips.

Gift Boxes to Europe

By Biloine Whiting

IN ANY day but Tuesday, the stage in the lower auditorium is in a marvelous state of confusion. Rough tables and planks on sawhorses are scattered around, and stacked to the ceiling in one end is a huge heap of pasteboard boxes. It resembles nothing more than the untidy storeroom of a super market with a month's supply of cartons waiting to be burned.

But, before you condemn the caretakers, pay a visit to the lower auditorium on a Tuesday and meet the folk who are making the litter. There you will find about thirty volunteers, mostly women and Boy Scouts, working under the supervision of L. R. Holmes to send gift boxes to the Saints in Europe.

The scattered tables form an efficient assembly line which each week turns out 200 fifteen-pound boxes for the church people in Germany, Norway, Denmark, and Holland. Trade restrictions prevent their being sent to other countries.

Mr. Holmes, who was appointed to supervise the relief work, obtains the boxes from local grocers and starts them down the assembly line. A worker sets the box on the scales and packs in five pounds of canned meat and milk, dried fruits, and vegetables. Another worker lists and prices each item on a label for the government. Next, clothes are added, sometimes bedding, and always two pairs of shoes. The shoes, 1,300 pairs so far, are donated by the Campus Shop. Before they are packed in the boxes, each pair is sent to the National Trade School of Kansas City for new soles and heels.

Then the boxes are wrapped, tied up by men and Boy Scouts, and at the very end of the assembly line a girl applies the customs declaration, dispatch notes in three languages, and ties on the address.

"Members all over the country have been wonderful about sending in clothing," said Mrs. Reuben Porter, assistant to Mr. Holmes. "We have received boxes from as far away as Pennsylvania, Utah, Oregon, Illinois, and Michigan. A woman in Iowa sent a box of beautiful comforters that must have represented a real sacrifice. Of course, the people of Lamoni and Independence have contributed a lot of clothing. Sometimes it is a whole branch or a women's department that sends clothing, and again private Saints just want to help."

"As far as we can find out, practically all of our boxes reach their destinations," commented Mr. Holmes. "Apostle McConley, now in Europe, is following them up and also sending us more names. We have nearly 300 names, and we are trying to send a box a week to each family. We vary the contents each time, and then the Saints overseas bring their off-size garments to a clothing exchange where they trade for right sizes."

All of the clothing is contributed, and the general church pays for having the shoes resoled and heeled, buys the food, and pays postage. Each box costs about $2.10 to mail.

Auditorium employees coming to work Wednesday morning can look down the underpass and see Mr. Holmes and some helpers loading the boxes in a pick-up for delivery to the post office. As they watch the packages, each return-addressed to the Auditorium, rumble off on the first lap of their journey, they feel that even though the overseas Saints can't gather to Zion, they can at least have a box of Zion sent to them.

There Is a Way

—Some words of wisdom to the woman who is trying to convert her husband.

By MARGARET W. GIBSON

ONE OF the major ambitions of every real Latter Day Saint is to have his or her companion share the blessings of membership in the church. The church has, very wisely, advised its youth to seek companions within the faith. Ideally, homes built by people with a background of church training should produce the best environment for spiritual growth. But frequently Latter Day Saints marry nonmembers and, while a few tragedies occur as a result, numerous fine homes have been established and some splendid people have been converted. The church does not forbid such marriages; it only calls our attention to the possibilities of unhappiness in them.

A person to whom our faith is the most important thing in life would not be wise to marry someone actively opposed to it. Both should be open-minded on the subject of religion, or better yet, each should be informed of the other's spiritual beliefs and be tolerant of them.

A church ought to feel an especial sense of responsibility to its young married people. The branch that has a well-balanced program of worship, study, and wholesome fun will very probably draw into its membership some valuable converts. Much of our missionary work should be with the men and women who have married outside the church.

Among our older married members, it is frequently the case that the husband, wife, or some of the children do not belong. The sincere desire of the Latter Day Saint in that home is to see the others baptized.

This is a righteous desire and God appreciates it. However, our methods of trying to execute it are so very often unwise and, at times, unkind that they hinder rather than promote conversion.

Let us consider the case of the wife who would convert her husband. In the first place, the average man is a fine fellow blessed with a good deal of intelligence. He is not as emotional as a woman and likes to reason things out for himself, arriving at his own conclusions. He does a great deal of thinking, but not much talking. When he is sure of his ground, he acts.

What may seem a genuine spiritual experience to his wife may not appeal to him as being a good reason for joining the church. He approaches the matter from a different angle. Religion appeals to both the spirit and the powers of reason, and it is well that it does. A woman's spiritual experiences may convince her, but she must let the man become convinced in his own way.

Then, too, a wife often makes the mistake of talking too much to her husband about the church. She wants to be so sure he doesn't miss any point of proof that she keeps continually dinning the subject into his ears until all he wants is a little peace.

Homes which were formerly happy have actually been made miserable by wives who have so wanted to convert their husbands that they forgot to be the cheerful companions, the understanding pals, and the good homemakers they were intended to be. The husbands of such women are not likely to be favorably impressed by a church which they feel has made their homelife less desirable than it used to be.

The first step for wives of nonmembers to take is that of being real Saints themselves. Conversion, if it means anything, should mean a changed life. It should result in more understanding wifeness; gentler, wiser motherhood; cleaner more comfortable and better managed homes.

A young Latter Day Saint wife complained once to her father because her husband, a member of the Methodist Church, had never accepted the Restored Gospel. "My dear," said her wise old father, "this is why he hasn't. He is a better man as a member of his church than you are a woman as a member of yours, and he can't see that he would be bettering himself."

No, we can't do it by talking. A woman who was anxious to have her husband become a member was rather startled one day to hear her little daughter singing, "I'll say what you want me to say, dear Lord, I'll shut up when you want me to shut up!" Shutting up sometimes gives our husbands a chance to hear the voice of God.

- a home column feature -

Such was the case of a woman who had talked for many years with no apparent results and finally decided to keep still. In a very few months she noticed a change in her husband's attitude. He appeared thoughtful—even a little worried. "What's bothering you?" asked the good wife one day. She was genuinely startled when he replied, "The Lord has shown me that I've really got to make up my mind about joining the church!"

This doesn't mean that we must never talk about our religion. Husbands are not, as a rule, unreasonable, but a continual harping on any issue arouses a very natural and understandable resentment.

Brother Marcus Cook once gave this advice to a woman whose husband seemed indifferent to the gospel message. "Consider the pendulum—a heavy weight on a delicate string. If you jerk that pendulum in an attempt to get it swinging, you may break the string and accomplish nothing. But start the pendulum swinging very gently in a little arc, and soon it will be swinging well throughout its whole, great course."

Often, when women become converted, they sincerely seek to change their lives, and in so doing deny their husbands of some innocent pleasures which they are used to. For a newly converted wife to suddenly stop joining her husband in his preferred sport or recreation is to create antagonism. After all, a man has a right to decent amusement in his wife's company. She can improve herself in a thousand ways without depriving him of any pleasure. Eventually, he may find her way of life more appealing and wish to pattern his after it.

Start the pendulum in a little arc first.

And, oh, how difficult we make it for missionaries who visit our homes! Often our generous, broad-minded husbands are kind enough to be willing for the visiting missionaries to be our guests. And what do we do? We clean the house as if we were preparing for a wedding and serve a dinner that is like nothing we ever serve for just our husbands. Then after grace is said and the missionary is trying for an opening remark that will put us all at ease, we say brightly, "Well, Brother Jones, I'm so glad you're with us. Maybe you can make John see the light. I've tried for fifteen years!"

That settles it. John gives us a dirty look and we have it coming. Brother Jones, if he dared, would give us another. From then on both poor men are awkward, embarrassed, and on the defensive. And when the series of meetings is over, we weep because after all our work, our fastings, and our prayers, John wasn't baptized.

If we had only shut up when He wanted us to and let those two good men get acquainted in their own way—over the crops, the chickens, or fishing rods—it might have been a different story.

There is given in the Scriptures counsel and a beautiful promise to us women—one that will bring results unless, perhaps, our faith is, in the wisdom of God, to be put to a test by our husband's behavior. In the book of Proverbs, chapter 31, we read, "Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above rubies. The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil. She will do him good and not evil all the days of her life. . . . She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness."

And the promise? "Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land . . . Her children arise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her."

If we strive to be like that, speaking when God wants us to, keeping quiet when it's time to be quiet, and putting the rest in his hands, he will grant us our heart's desire.

For This I Wait By LOUISE WRIGLEY

The clock says five.

The great moment has arrived.

Dinner simmers calmly on the stove—

Product of an afternoon's planning.

Two places laid with careful artistry,

Fresh flowers smile benignly from a copper sugarbowl,

And here am I—

Breathless and impatient

At the small delay, in traffic perhaps,

Which thus detains him.

Here he comes!

Through the gate he strides and slams it

Jubilantly behind him.

I watch with warmth and love familiar signs:

His grin that shows he's happy to set foot again

On his own land, in his own door—

The gleam of hunger in his eyes as dinner smells

Brush past his nose—

And then that long, sweet kiss that says,

"I've missed you so!"

For this I wait

At end of day.

Dealing With the Erring

By L. Wayne Updike

9. The Penalty

WHEN a member of the church has weakened the ties of fellowship by giving offense to a brother or to the church and has stated his case before one or more of the courts of the church, it becomes necessary that the conditions be set upon the fulfillment of which he may be restored to full fellowship. If the law has been kept in the matter of bringing the complaint, and if the hearing has been conducted with the proper attitude on the part of the participants, the effort of all will be to the end that complete reconciliation can be had. Only upon the failure of these combined efforts to arrive at reconciliation within the realm of justice and mercy does it become necessary for a penalty to be affixed.

In civil law, one who is found guilty is penalized by fine, imprisonment (or both), or by death. The church is not authorized either by the law of God or by the law of the land to inflict any such penalty, though in serious offenses the church is directed to turn the aggressor over to the law of the land.

There is but one penalty which the church can place upon any of its members, viz., expulsion. A modification of this penalty, known as excommunication, is often affixed for lesser offenses. This is not, however, a different penalty. It merely provides that the rights of fellowship shall be suspended until such time as the offender determines by his action whether he will fulfill the requirements of returning to full fellowship, or whether the penalty of expulsion shall apply to him. It would not seem unreasonable to urge that every court which designates excommunication as the penalty should also set a time during which repentance should take place, or a date after which return to full fellowship must be made by application to the proper officers and a ruling by a court at least equal in authority to the highest court before which the case was brought for adjudication.

The frequent mention of penalties in connection with elders' courts might cause one to feel that it is the duty or province of the church to affix a penalty of its own choosing for the various classes and degrees of offense, but the law has stated only one regardless of what the offense may be. In using the word penalty in this connection, it is with considerable latitude, for strictly speaking, expulsion from the church is not a penalty in the sense that it forces one to pay for his offense. It is provided for the protection of the innocent in the church. The man who pays the penalty of the civil law is then free from that law, but the man who violates the law of God is not made free in any degree by being expelled from the church. The real penalty of the law yet awaits him. Strictly speaking, expulsion is not, therefore, a penalty. The penalty for sin is still to be paid after expulsion is complete. In this writing, however, the word is taken in its broadest meaning, granting that expulsion is a penalty, applied to the transgressor by the church under legal conditions.

Some of the statements of the law are: "He that stealeth and will not repent shall be cast out." "He that lieth and will not repent shall be cast out." "He that looketh upon a woman to lust after her, shall deny the faith, and shall not have the Spirit, and if he repents not he shall be cast out." "He that committeth adultery and repenteth not shall be cast out." "He that sinneth and repenteth not shall be cast out." Of one who has been convicted of adultery the law says: "The church shall lift up their hands against him or her, that they might be dealt with according to the law of God . . . and thus ye shall do in all cases which shall come before you. . . . If he or she do any manner of iniquity, he or she shall be delivered up unto the law, even that of God."¹ "Whosoever will not repent of his sins, the same shall not be numbered among my people: and this shall be observed from this time forward."²

A number of offenses are specified for which the penalty must be expulsion. If there is no repentance, this rule is made to apply to "all cases which shall come before you," for it is plainly stated in the word cited above, "If he or she do any manner of iniquity, he or she shall be delivered up unto the law, even that of God," and "he that sinneth and repenteth not, shall be cast out."³

The law of God operates by justice and mercy. "Mercy hath compassion on mercy, and claimeth her own; justice continueth its course, and claimeth its own." The only means by which the law of justice can be set aside is repentance, which makes it possible for the law of mercy to take effect. When men truly repent they come under mercy, and they receive a remission of their sins, or forgiveness. Biblical authority for this is clear, notably in the words of Peter, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins."⁴ Testimony as to the availability of forgiveness is also borne by the Book of Mormon: "Yea, and as often as my people repent, will I forgive them their trespasses against me. And ye shall also forgive one another your trespasses."⁵

By the justice of God, mercy is granted to those who repent and forsake their sins, and they enter into his favor and are redeemed. But sin can not dwell with God, nor can the sinner. He who chooses to continue in sin cannot receive forgiveness, for the law of mercy does not apply to him. He remains under the law of justice and must receive the penalty which justice demands. Alma speaks of this quite understandingly: "Therefore, according to justice, the plan of redemption could not be brought about, only, on conditions of repentance of men in this probationary state; yea, this preparatory state; for except it were for these conditions, mercy could not take effect except it should destroy the work of justice. Now the work of justice could not be destroyed; if so God would cease to be God."⁶

"But there is a law given and a punishment affixed, and repentance granted; which repentance, mercy claimeth; otherwise, justice claimeth the creature, and executeth the law, and the law inflicteth punishment; if not so, the works of justice would be destroyed, and God would cease to be God. But God ceaseth not to be God, and mercy claimeth the penitent, and mercy cometh because of the atonement; and the atonement bringeth to pass the resurrection of the dead; and the resurrection of the dead bringeth back men into the presence of God; and thus they are restored into his presence; to be judged according to their works; according to the law and justice; for behold, justice exerciseth all his demands, and also mercy claimeth all which is her own; and thus, none but the truly penitent are saved."⁷

The law of God is operative upon all men, whether in the church or out of it. "Every man must repent or suffer."⁸ If one has been brought into the light, has learned what repentance is, has partaken of the mercy of God through forgiveness, has been made a member of the body of Christ and blessed with his Spirit and then turns away to sin and refuses to repent, the church should not stand in the way of the justice of God by forgiving him when the law of mercy does not apply to him. The church should not and cannot stand in the way of justice. The authority delegated to men is authority to act within divine law but not to break it. This should be seriously considered not only by those who must officiate when men leave the church but also by those who use the keys to the doors by which men enter.

Since justice claims the unrepentant, the sinner must pay the penalty of his sin, even though he retain his membership in the church through the neglect of the church to remove him, or through an illegal forgiveness. Neglect or refusal upon the part of the church to fulfill the law upon this point cannot make void the law in its final effect, for the Lord has said of transgressors in the church that they "shall be detected and shall be cut off, either in life or in death, even as I will."⁹ To forgive an unrepentant sinner, or through neglect to leave him in the church, is directly contrary to the law. It brings the church itself under condemnation. Furthermore, it adds no blessing to the sinner, nor does it deliver him from the justice of God.

No person can legally gain admission to the church without repentance. It is one of the essentials of membership. The church is supposedly made up of penitent persons who have, by the ordinances, taken upon themselves the name of Christ and whose sole purpose is to serve him and keep his commandments. A member who loses this purpose, who becomes unrepentant and chooses to walk in sin, is a menace to the rest of the membership. His influence is disastrous to the weak and innocent. His presence is a reproach to the church before the world. God has stated that the faithful members have a right to be protected from such.

With reference to the divine law, the Lord has said, "Behold, I give unto you a commandment, that ye shall assemble yourselves together to agree upon my word, and by the power of your faith ye shall receive my law, that ye may know how to govern my church, and have all things right before me . . . and ye shall see that my law is kept. He that receiveth my law and doeth it the same is my disciple; and he that saith he receiveth it and doeth it not, the same is not my disciple, and shall be cast out from among you; for it is not meet that the things which belong to the children of the kingdom, should be given to them that are not worthy, or to dogs, or the pearls to be cast before swine."¹⁰

"These words are given unto you, and they are pure before me; wherefore, beware how you hold them, for they are to be answered upon your souls in the day of judgment."¹¹

Even though such firm and unvarying commands have been given to uphold the law, harshness and haste have no place in the administration of the law, for, as has been shown, the motivating purpose should be kindness and compassion and a sincere desire to save. The spirit of vindictiveness in the officer will endanger himself. The officer or member who vindictively works for the expulsion of another, and then gloats over its accomplishment, has already opened his soul for the admission of evil, and unless he speedily repents, will be overcome by it. The motive which should activate the administrator of the law is clearly set forth in the following:

"And he that repenteth not of his sins, and confesseth them not, then ye shall bring him before the church, and do with him as the Scriptures saith unto you, either by commandment, or by revelation. And this ye shall do that God might be glorified, not because ye forgive not, having not compassion, but that ye may be justified in the eyes of the law, that ye may not offend him who is your Lawgiver."¹²

A member convicted of transgression may be spared a reasonable length of time in which to repent. That period of suspense should depend upon the nature of the offense and the attitude of the member, but such suspense cannot be construed as being a penalty. There is no warrant in the law for suspending a member for six months, more or less, as a punishment for some wrong he has committed, for if he repents he is to be forgiven, otherwise the law itself states the penalty.

If the church had a variety of penalties, justice would require that they be graded according to the seriousness of the offense. But there is no such variety provided. The man who is unwilling to repent of a small offense would not repent of a greater one. The duty of the church is made plain. It must do all in its power to save the faltering one from his own error. But the unrepentant and willful sinner must be cast out, not for his act of sin, but because he has become dead to the law—a dead branch which can bear no fruit. The church is not authorized to do more, nor is it justified in doing less.

An Open Letter To Pastors

Dear Brethren:

Because it seems forever impossible to visit you personally or even to reach you with a personal letter, we have chosen this method of conveying to you our sincere greetings, best wishes, and assurance of our desires to assist you at every opportunity as you endeavor to carry forward your pastoral ministry.

We feel sure you will agree that the spiritual nurture of our people of all ages constitutes a divine imperative which rests squarely upon our shoulders collectively. It constitutes work which must be shared increasingly with a growing, mutual understanding and co-operation.

Clearly, as stated by the First Presidency, the administration of this shepherding ministry of teaching and leadership in your respective branches constitutes your basic stewardship. Just as clearly, it is for us to make available study and activity materials and programs to train leaders and to provide any other "helps" which may be found desirable or necessary.

We have endeavored to do this with all the intelligence, devotion, and skill at our command. We are therefore happy to present in the current issue of Guide-Lines and in other publications the product of our labors. These quarterlies, textbooks, yearbooks, and various guides to their effective use constitute the "tools" which we have made ready for you.

Obviously, these tools are absolutely without value unless used. Which ones you will select and use depends upon the job you have to do, the needs of your people, and the goals you have in mind. Whatever it is, you decide; you set up your goals, and you plan and administer your program. We help by preparing the tools and making them available for your use. Only through such co-operation can we expect the work of religious education to advance.

Dear brethren, with all the warmth and earnestness at our command, we now invite you to join with us in a long-time, far-reaching program of teaching and learning that God's purposes may be realized in and through our ministry.

The Lord's Prayer

11. "Thine Is the Power"

By H. J. Simons

The eleventh in a series of meditations presented at the Appointee Institute held in Independence, August 28 to September 14, 1946. The others appear in the issues of January 18, January 25, June 14, July 19, July 26, August 2, August 16, August 23, August 30, and September 6.

That portion of Scriptures to which we refer as "The Lord's Prayer" reveals first of all a spirit of acknowledgment of greatness, majesty, might, power, and beneficence. As one reads or recites it, he loses all sense of time. It makes him conscious of eternity and brings depth and vision to his feelings about God and his purposes in and for man. From the very beginning until the end of the prayer, there is the thought of eternity. "Our Father who art in heaven . . . thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever and ever." These thoughts reveal the eternal mightiness of our Maker.

It is impossible for us to understand all about the power of God. We reflect upon man's accomplishments, achievements, abilities, and think of him as being a strong, able, intelligent, powerful being. The world has been made different because of what man has done. He has walked on the floor of the ocean, gone into the depths of the earth, sailed the seven seas, encircled the globe, climbed the highest mountain peaks, and flown miles into the heavens. He has harnessed the Niagara, cured dreaded diseases, and made new limbs, ears, and noses. His powers on earth are great, but he does not have power in heaven. The strength and best of man is not even the weakness of God. God's power is not the power of man enlarged or extended to the nth degree. God's power is an eternal and everlasting thing. To the Son of God was given all power in heaven and in earth.

I don't know much about the power of God. I read the early chapters of the Book of Genesis and discover that all things were created by Him. I don't know how, but they were. I read John 3: 16, and I learn something about the profound love of the Father. As I meditate upon it, I feel satisfied that his power of love extends to me personally. He gave his Son for me. I believe that same power of love extends to all men. I read about Jesus performing some of the miracles of healing, and even find that on one occasion "all were amazed at the mighty power of God." The power of healing resulting from administration is in the hands of the Great Physician. I administer to a sick one and believe the Father will heal and make well. If such is the result, I am not surprised, although I may be amazed at the manner in which it came to pass. I am at a loss to explain how it came about but know that it was because of a power from above. I read the first chapter of Saint John's testimony and discover that the gospel was preached through the Son in the beginning; that the gospel was the life, and the life was the light of men; that the Son is the true light which lights every man who comes into the world. The Holy Spirit of the Father can bring to the knowledge and intelligence of man things of which he has never been aware and which exceed even his greatest imagination. I don't know what takes place in one's mental and spiritual mechanism, but I know it happens. In section 83 of the Doctrine and Covenants we are told, "For the word of the Lord is truth . . ." I don't know all the truth and am not aware of the extent of the power which might come if all the truth of God were well-established in my life and the lives of other people. But I do believe such an expression of truth in the flesh would lead us closer to our Father.

All the power of God has not yet been given to man. Some of it is ours to a considerable extent, and much of it is ours in a small degree. "To those who receive him gave he power to become the Sons of God." A marvelous promise but contingent upon the works of the individual. No man has the capacity to make such a promise.

There is power in righteousness. There is a power of godliness promised in obedience to the ordinances of the church as they are observed by the priesthood. I shall experience some of the power of the Father only as I exercise those conditions of Deity which will bring power. One grows in discipleship in proportion to his use of the virtues of mercy, compassion, love, forgiveness, patience, and forbearance. Our strength becomes a power only as it is sustained and supported by the Spirit of God. It is folly to attempt to resist the will of Deity. Only God is able to make all grace abound in us to our everlasting good, for—"thine is the power."

Songs My Mother Sang

By Zealia Jennings

I can still hear her singing in that high, sweet voice, made all the more charming because of the emotion with which she sang those beloved words:

*Stand up, stand up for Jesus,
Stand in his strength alone;
The arm of flesh will fail you,
Ye dare not trust your own.*

Somewhere along life's way she had learned that you could not depend entirely upon your own strength. The arm of flesh would fail you. But little did I know, as a child running around the house playing and doing small tasks, that I could not depend completely upon the arm of flesh. I had always felt secure with Mother and Dad to do for me the things my small world demanded. Then came the day when they could do nothing about the fact that someone had hurt me. My first reaction was to strike back, to hurt as I had been hurt—but I found I could not—my whole soul rebelled. Here was something the security of home could not recompense. Then those words came back to me, and I knew in whom I could trust. The ache and humiliation wore off in time—I now had a new fortification. My mother's song meant something special to me, and I could sing right along with her. The years have brought it back to me again and again with added meaning.

Lovingly she sang the words:

*When we walk with the Lord,
In the light of his word,
What a glory he sheds on our way.
If we do his good will,
He abides with us still,
And with all who will trust and obey.
Trust and obey, for there's no other way
To be happy in Jesus, but to trust and obey.*

Where she learned this lesson I cannot say, but the warmth that glowed inside me when I obeyed my parents made the meaning quite clear to me. I trusted them and felt that they would never fail me in any situation. Maybe it would not be the exact way I wanted to do things, but at least it would always be right. Finally life brought to me a problem that made me feel confident to leave the decision entirely to Him, because I trusted him. It was much easier to obey his will, because of the trust I had. There was no other way to be happy in Jesus, but to trust him to make all things right, and then obey his will.

I have seen Mother sitting in the morning stillness after finishing her early work. On her lap a big book would lie open, and sometimes she would stop reading to gaze out over the washed, green earth. What her thoughts were, I was too young to guess or understand; but whether it was in summer in the shade of the house, or in winter by the light of a lamp burning on the table beside her, she seemed to love this time of day for reading—before the family came to claim her attention. I know to a degree what she felt when reading—often I have heard her sing with rich feeling in her voice:

*Sing them over again to me,
Wonderful words of life,
Let me more of their beauty see,
Wonderful words of life.
Words of life and beauty,
Teach me faith and duty,
Beautiful words, wonderful words,
Wonderful words of life.*

These are only a few of her favorite songs; and even though I have no record of her voice, all my life I shall vividly recall exactly how she sounded as she sang the songs that taught me so much about faith, love, and obedience.

Limited

By Betty Lou Clark

One summer day, I wandered into the temperate coolness of a mountain haven. Peace from the daily kaleidoscope of burdens was the reward I sought.

There before me was a moss-covered path following a prancing stream. It seemed to be seeking the beginning of the stream. Caught up by its curiosity, I, too, hurried to find the source. On and on I walked, keenly aware of the silent communion the good earth held with its Creator. I thought, "If we would only partake of this spirit, our lives would be a more joyful experience."

Then, I looked up and saw the beginning I was seeking. It was the beginning and the end—the end of mortal's explorations. The stream was born of a rushing waterfall which came from an underground river.

"So," I philosophized, "is our knowledge of our beginning and our Creator limited. Also our end. Or does such a state as beginning and end exist? From this encircling wall, must our knowledge be by faith alone—faith in some greater power?"

Feeling weak and uncertain, I sought a grove of trees and knelt to pray.

The Parable of the Cricket

By Robert Emmett Madden

MY HANDS were soiled from the day's work, and I went to the lavatory to wash them. When I reached for the faucet to draw water, I saw a small cricket like a black cameo against the white enamel.

Now the good God has endowed us with a love of all his creation, and we shrink from giving hurt to any form of life. The smallest creature has a desire to live, and there is something appealing about one of them trying to save his life against odds that are too great for him.

The cricket was in danger and knew it. He could not escape from his prison. The sides of the bowl were too slick to give him a foothold. He could not jump, for his feet skidded. Every effort to escape brought him back to the bottom. Eventually he was released and put outside, where he could live and thrive. But next day, either he or a relative was back in the bowl, in exactly the same trouble!

HOW LIKE the crickets people are. We paw the air and hop around, beating our heads against problems that seem like impregnable walls, moaning and groaning at our lot. God looks down in compassion and offers us rescue with his way of life. Do we welcome the help? No. We distrust him and our fellow men, and we flail about in frenzy.

Poor stupid creatures. We never learn that victory comes through courage and faith. God fills the earth with the means of the abundant life. He tries to help us out of the prisons into which we have foolishly fallen. He has given us instruction to help us in all phases of our life—physical, mental, moral, social, economic, industrial, and spiritual. The principles of the gospel would rescue us from our man-made prisons, but we are afraid, we do not understand, and we will not try.

We face many troubles, storms, and trials in life. They close us in like prisons. If we could look up and recognize God's help when it is offered us, we would find many of life's trials to be blessings in disguise.

This Is Tahiti

—A description of life in the South Seas.

By F. Edward Butterworth

HISTORY

TAHITI IS SOME 3,400 miles in a straight line from San Francisco. The group of islands, known as the Society Islands, is divided into two clusters—the windward and leeward. They are often referred to as the upper and lower archipelagoes, stretching for about 200 miles in a northwest-southeast direction. They are composed of volcanic rocks, well-wooded with belts of fertile soil along the shore. Tahiti, a French possession, was acquired about 1842; Queen Pomare was the last independent sovereign. The population of the island is approximately 40,000. The largest city, Papeete, has a population of 8,000 people, most of which are French and Chinese.

CLIMATE

The temperature in Tahiti stands at about eighty-five degrees the year around. It is difficult for a visitor to note any marked difference in seasons until he has been there long enough for his blood to thin. He then feels both the heat and cold and is subject to chilling much the same as in a temperate climate. The sun is extremely hot in Tahiti, which places it in the Tropical zone, but the temperatures are not torrid by any means. The atmosphere is generally clear, and if one keeps in the shade, he will be refreshed with the slightest breeze. We, frankly, have felt the heat more in Oklahoma and Missouri than we did in the South Seas. The reason, we have decided, is that there are no sea breezes this far inland to clear the atmosphere. There is but one stormy season when tidal waves and typhoons sweep over the islands. This season begins in February and lasts until May. There are about three times as many sunny days as rainy ones during the year.

DISEASE

Disease is quite prevalent in the islands, but in relation to population, the percentage is not too much higher than our own. I have found that we are prone to give the wrong impressions of Tahiti by telling the more unusual happenings in isolated cases. There are less than 200 inmates in the leper colony which is located about fifteen miles outside Papeete. Elephantiasis is one of the most prevalent diseases. When infected with this disease, the body swells from six to twenty times its normal size. No serum has ever been developed to reduce the swelling, but a serum is being used now, with great success, which checks it. Tuberculosis, both of the bones and lungs, is the most common disease encountered by the missionaries. With the introduction of modern medicine, venereal diseases are on the decrease in the islands.

RECREATION

There are few organized activities for the natives. The missionaries have succeeded in teaching them how to play volleyball, baseball, and ping-pong. We recently finished translating a book of games for children and young people. When this is printed, we believe it will add greatly to the interest in young people's activities in the islands. The natives are marvelous swimmers, so we have translated a number of games that can be played in the water. If they could be supplied with adequate recreational equipment, we believe it would aid us in our missionary work. Nothing in the line of recreational equipment can be bought in Tahiti. It must be purchased in America or

New Horizons

Australia with American dollars. This should make us redouble our efforts to raise the $25,000 missionary fund set as a Zion's league goal for the year.

INDUSTRIES

The export of phosphate is one of the most important sources of income for the islands. Pearl-diving is another important occupation. The pearl shell is taken from the floor of the ocean by the native divers at about seven cents a pound. This shell is used to make buttons and is shipped abroad for that purpose. It is also used to make trinkets which are sold on the native tourist market. The occupation in which most of the natives engage is, of course, the gathering of copra. Copra is the dried coconut meat used in making soap and coconut oils used as bases for the many coconut oil ointments. Copra is obtained from the coconut after the husk has turned black and has begun to wrinkle. After the ground is cleared of the underbrush so that the coconuts will not escape the eye of the native, the coconuts are piled in heaps under the meager shade of the palms above. The worker uses an ax and a curved knife to obtain the copra. The husk and shell of the coconut are first split with the ax and the meat of the nut is laid bare to the penetrating sunrays. The milk is thrown away, because at this stage it is sour and tainted. When the white coconut meat pulls away from the shell, it is ejected by use of the curved knife. Copra must not be left out in the rain or it will spoil. Coconut fiber made from the husks of the nut is sold by some of the more industrious natives.

LANGUAGE

The native alphabet is composed of thirteen letters, the vowels being more profuse than the consonants. Every consonant must be separated by a vowel, but quite frequently two vowels will be used together. It is a flowing and beautiful language. There are several dialects of the Tahitian tongue: the pure Tahitian, which is fast becoming obsolete; the Paumotuan, which is quite profuse in the letter "K"; and the modern Tahitian are most important. The phrase, "Sit down upon the mat" in Tahitian is, "A parahi oe i raro i nia i te peue." In the Paumotuan tongue it becomes, "A noho koe kiraro kirunga i te pakarere."

DIET

Pork, rice, bread, and tinned beef are the staple foods in the native diet. Coffee grows everywhere on the islands and is consumed in large quantities. The Chinese produce most of the vegetables in their gardens and sell them at the market each morning. Tomatoes, corn, sweet potatoes, radishes, green beans, black-eyed peas, and lettuce may be had daily. Cabbage, eggplant, beets, and peas are available occasionally.

Here Is the Writer . . .

Seventy F. Edward Butterworth, a graduate of the William Chrisman High School, is a former Zion's League president and supervisor, and missionary from Zion to the great northwest, Oklahoma City, and the South Sea Islands. While in Oklahoma City, he met and married Lilly Raye Howard. Both attended Oklahoma City University and at the conference of 1944, were given a "honeymoon" mission to Tahiti. Now on furlough from duty in the Islands, they are working with Apostle Mesley in the Stakes of Zion.

Native roots and breadfruit are also used as vegetables. The breadfruit, if baked properly, can be a good substitute for Irish potatoes. Many of the roots are sliced very thin and used as French fries and potato chips. Vegetables can be obtained only by pushing through the enormous crowds which gather at the market each morning at 5 a. m. All are gone by 6:30.

FRUITS

Oranges, several types of bananas, limes, grapefruit, and other native varieties of fruits are available all day long at the market. The pear-shaped mango is very delicious, but tastes faintly of turpentine to me. Apples, pears, and cherries are never available.

MEATS

Fish is the most common of meats consumed by the natives. Although there is a wide variety of fish, tuna is most desired. If you can persevere by standing in a long, waiting line, you may obtain a nice beef roast or a steak. Hamburger, wieners, and a fair variety of meats may be had also. Meat is not, however, inspected or handled as expertly as in the States. Pigs thrive on the island of Tahiti, in fact, in all of the South Sea Islands, so pork is available daily.

BREAD

The Chinese bakers provide plenty of bread unless the cargo ships fail to bring flour from abroad. The ships arrive in the islands with supplies about once every three months. We have often witnessed the baking of bread and consequently have little appetite for it. In place of salt, sea water is used. I ate several pieces of warm bread just out of the oven and was soon doubled up with indigestion and diarrhea. The baker came over to cheer me up—not realizing that his bread was responsible—and explained that his father had passed on to him his great knowledge about bread-making. I asked where his father was, and he replied, "Father is dead. He died with a sort of diarrhea like yours." I could quite understand that, but it didn't cheer me up much. The bread is never wrapped and, when delivered, one must be alert or the birds will get more than their portion. Before eating the bread, it is a good policy to singe it over a hot flame to destroy any germs which may have accumulated on it. We used tinned biscuits (crackers) as a bread substitute; these are shipped in from Australia.

A Beach in Tahiti

CHURCH SERVICES

The Sunday services are not unlike those held in the States, starting with an early morning fellowship, except for Communion Sunday when priesthood meetings are held. Church school and preaching follow the early morning service. In the afternoon, the young people of the glee club hold their regular practice. They sing songs in French, English, and Tahitian. Because of their beautiful harmony arrangements, they have gained a reputable place in the social circle of Tahiti. The evening services are well attended. The first is a service of song, followed by preaching. Monday evening is children's night. Brother and Sister Sorensen of Australia are in charge of this; they conduct classes and recreational activities adapted for the very young. Tuesday is Zion's League night. About twenty-five young people, most of them girls between the ages of twelve and twenty, attend regularly. A talented young man by the name of Abarahama a Fauura is their leader. Wednesday, of course, is prayer service evening. On Thursday afternoon, the women of the mission meet for their service—which is quite different from our women's meetings here in America. Before leaving Tahiti, we organized a young men's fellowship group which meets on Thursday nights; it is being conducted by Brother Sorensen during our absence. This group studies the Scriptures, history, geography, physiology, and current events. Friday night is reserved for band practice. Those loyal musicians have a repertoire of some thirty numbers. There are now only twelve pieces including trumpets, trombones, baritone horns, a clarinet, and a bass horn. We are in need of more instruments as there is a long waiting list of musicians who are eager to join the band when instruments are available.

CONCLUSION

There are many needs in the islands. We should redouble our efforts to meet the $25,000 goal set as a missionary fund to assist those in foreign fields. I can assure you the needs are real, and unless we meet them, our work will be greatly hampered.

BULLETIN BOARD

Notice to Danville, Illinois, Saints

A baptismal and confirmation service will be held at the home of Fred Collins, 817 Texas Avenue, in Danville on September 7. All members in or near Danville are urged to attend.

Admiring glances? Flattering words?
Thou knowest I ask not, Lord, for these.
My praise shall be a baby's smile
Like elfin cloud-mist on pink seas.

I ask no mirrored carriage, Lord,
Nor entrance cued to great drums' roll.
My heart leaps forth to muted notes
Transcribed upon a small boy's soul.

I ask for patient wisdom, Lord,
When trusting eyes are turned to mine,
May guiding hand or soothing word
Be somehow, Lord, akin to thine.

Bless now these tranquil, shining lives
I write upon with each day's pen.
And this, Lord, be my epitaph:
She was the mother of good men.

Parents, Think On These Things

The adults of society, loosely classified as parents, have come in for much scolding and other unfavorable publicity in recent months.

"There has been too much talk about juvenile delinquency," said a nationally known social authority. "Behind every delinquent child there is a delinquent parent."

A teen-age toast runs: Here's to our parents. We couldn't get on without them; we can't get along with them. Long live our parents!

As one looks with patronizing pride on a second generation of posterity it is hard to maintain a purely objective and detached view on this subject. Someone to whom Lincoln was pointed out said in surprise, "Why, he's a common-looking person." The President is said to have remarked, "Friend, the Lord prefers the common-looking people. That is the reason he makes so many of them." He made lots of parents, too, and I'm sure he loves them.

Unless one is on his guard, he is likely to be drawn into the chorus of detractors of modern parents in general and delinquent ones in particular. This is profitless except for the satisfactions of self-expression. The net result is usually to convince those of like mind. The others will not listen to nor read your stuff.

Making the Headlines

Bad parents, those who neglect or abuse their children, are still the exceptions. Mistreatment is unusual enough to make the headlines. There is an account of some young parents who locked their infant children in their San Francisco house and went out on an all-night drunken spree. The next day Judge Peter Mullins gave them a tongue lashing and a sixty-day jail sentence. But, for every couple like this, there are at least a hundred who love their children and are spending themselves in daily service for them.

For us to give a few anecdotes of parental virtue and say they prove that most parents are good, or better than formerly, is as lacking in logic as it is to accept as final that the social illness reflected in a headline story of parental delinquency proves society is nearing calamity. If one had to choose between these two philosophies, most of us would be in favor of the Pollyanna type. It has the weight of the Scriptures on its side, at least in part. Paul told the Philippians, "Whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." This advice is an invitation to forget the wedding knots which have slipped and glory in the millions which draw tighter as they are pulled.

A few years ago the papers carried the story which will never get in our history books but is full of "the greatest thing in the world." A young man was touring through the San Bernardino mountains of California with his wife and baby. It seems that he lost control of his car, and it plunged off the road and down the mountain side. When they were found four days later, the young father was dead, the mother died soon afterwards from exposure and loss of blood, but somehow this heroic mother had protected her baby from injury in the fall and had sustained its life by opening an artery in her wrist and giving it her own blood to drink.

Practical Christianity

Parental love with self-effacing art is portrayed in this incident growing out of the late war. Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Johnston, Parkersburg, Pennsylvania, turned their only son's GI life insurance into a scholarship fund with only two qualifications: they wished that it should benefit Oriental students, preferably Japanese, and that no publicity be given to them because of it. After much screening, a Japanese who was in training as a kamakaze (suicide) pilot was selected. This "enemy" had received his early education in an American mission school in Japan. His wife was a Stanford University graduate. As he came to the campus of Lafayette College, Easton, Pennsylvania, Robert Nishiyama pledged his benefactors "to live worthy of your trust and of your son's fine ideals." In breaking the story to the public, the Christian Herald said that loving one's enemy, like all practical Christianity, is "front-page stuff."

This church has produced parents by the hundreds who deserve a place in the space in our Hall of Fame, should we reserve such a chamber in the completed Auditorium. Usually it is in poor taste as well as risky to pick out our contemporaries as examples of parental virtue, but we will venture a nomination for a choice spot. Through the reading of Brother Elbert's contributions of over two score years to our church literature, we have shared intimately the lives of Elbert A. and Clara Smith. There is one chapter in the story of their lives which he will never write. Perhaps no one else can begin to do it justice. It concerns their success as parents. It is the key to God's choice of Brother Elbert as father to the church. Their sons have been taught to love righteousness and the church of God. They have "caught" also some virtues by daily exposure.

On the wall of my memory hangs a beautiful picture from my first acquaintance with the Center Place back in the early twenties. Elbert A. was a member of the First Presidency then. At regular intervals the family had some tithing business to take care of in the office of the Presiding Bishop where I was employed. I can see this fine couple sitting in the outer office side by side on straight-backed, hardwood chairs waiting their turn "to see the bishop." On some occasions Vernon Reese would suggest, "I'll tell the bishop you are here." Brother Elbert would remonstrate, "We'd rather just wait our turn."

This was a sermon to me. God's temporal law applied equally to all. It was serious and important business. The family tithing was regarded as a personal matter and no ex-officio rights were permitted to intrude; no favors were asked nor accepted. The paradoxical saying of Jesus that the least among you shall be the greatest was made clearer to my understanding as I thought on their humility yet their greatness.

The church has an imperative need today. Our Zion awaits the production and growth of better parents. The children of the church must have them. Some clinics on parenthood are now in operation in certain of the great centers of our nation. These are available to only a few of us. The "Church and Home" course in your local church school could help. As a more simple beginning and more immediate goal, I commend the use of Paul's formula: seek for the many evidences all about you, in the church and in the world of good, true, and virtuous parents and think on these things.

"Pass It On!"

"Pass it on, my dear, pass it on!" From the time that I was a very small child I can remember hearing these words repeated many times. When people, tongue-tied with gratitude, faltered over their thanks to my mother for any indebtedness, large or small, her quick reply was always the same. She always said, "Pass it on, my dear, pass it on!"

Behind this sincere, admonitory phrase there was a simple story. It was a story that affected my mother's whole life, and, through her, the lives of many others.

When my mother was only a young girl she went to a neighbor to borrow a sunbonnet pattern. Upon returning the pattern to the owner, Mother said earnestly, "Thank you so much, Mrs. Anderson. Perhaps some day I can do something for you."

The white-haired neighbor laid a gentle hand on Mother's arm and said quietly, "My dear, don't wait to return the favor to me. There may never come a time when you could be of assistance to me. Pass it on, my dear, pass it on! Do something for somebody else!"

This unusual response made so deep an impression upon my mother she never forgot it. Many times I have seen her go to the aid of some unfortunate whose startled gratitude always invoked the same response from her, "Pass it on!"

Often I have wondered what cosmic changes might ensue if we all did just that; if each of us passed on unhesitatingly and joyously all the good, the kind, the generous, the loving service others gave us. No single imagination could envision the result. Here, indeed, is a world re-

P. S.

* Guest Editor

C. B. Hartshorn, our Editor of Church School Literature, has been invited to write the editorial for this special Parents' Issue of the "Herald." Readers will enjoy his fine contribution.

The reason for the change? Old Faithful, who usually does this chore, never became one of those fortunate people called parents, and didn't feel qualified to write. However, he is uncle (by relationship or adoption) to some very fine youngsters.

* Dedicated to Dad and Mother

This issue is meant to help parents with their job, to make them like it, and be proud of it. We have invited the best people we know to contribute to it—well, as many of them as we could. Out of their experience and wisdom has come something fine that should be of value to all who have growing families in their homes.

* A New Prayer

Prayer tackles the housing shortage! It was inevitable that it should, sooner or later. A member, requesting prayers for other reasons, added this note: "And please pray that I may be able to keep my apartment, because I have just found it."

All over America, just plain shelter from the elements, a thing always taken for granted, has become so difficult to obtain that it has entered the list of precious blessings.

* Tribute

Walker Trumble, one of the "Herald" pressmen, became the father of a baby girl just last week. All the company employees gathered around on "his" first day back at work to ask the usual questions about weight, name, time of arrival, and how much hair. One asked, "And what do you want her to become when she grows up?"

Walker smiled broadly and without batting an eye said, "Just like her mother."

* An act of kindness is worth ten words. A word of kindness is worth ten silences. A kindly silence is worth ten words of criticism. This is the metric system of the soul.

* When you are very young, you are sure that the important thing at the dinner table is the food. But after years of experience you learn that the most precious thing there is the companionship of your friends, the love and kindness of those that God has given you to make your home happy. You can get food for yourself, but only your friends can give you happiness.

Dads Are Parents, Too

By Roy A. Cheville

MOST FATHERS would like to be more than the sires of their children. They would like to be parents, too. Many do not know how. Many are hemmed in by society, so they are not free to be parents. Of course, there are some who do not want to take the time. In recent months, however, there has been a growing awareness of the need of giving Dad a chance to be a parent, and also of giving him a push to get into the business of being a father. At a recent conference on family relations, there was a roll call of teachers of homebuilding courses. Replies about enrollment sounded as if signs "For Girls Only" had been posted. More than once the question was asked whether boys might not be interested in family life. Our public mind has expected them not to be. Some cities have been offering clinical courses for "prospective fathers." Alert social leaders are wanting to give dads an opportunity of being parents.

DADS ALSO BRING FORTH

A PARENT is one who "brings forth." At first, this meant biological birth. In this sense, the father never seemed to have a primary place. Now we have come to think of "bringing forth" the person as well. Modern social science informs us that the person emerges through human relationships. The cradle of personality making is the family circle. Dad is part of this nursery. Societies like Nazi Germany stressed the biological bringing forth. The big concern was that the child be born with a sound body. The state might take over from birth on. No wise society will ever discount the importance of this physical well-being, but there is something more. There is a social—a spiritual bringing forth. And this cannot be assigned to Mother, Aunt Mary, and Grandma. When Dad is not in the circle, the child is cheated.

OUR SOCIETY THWARTS DADHOOD

AS A RULE, we fit into the picture that society has created for us. See what it has done to Dad. We have pictures of mother rocking the baby and singing lullabies. Father seldom makes the camera unless it is to stand aside and look on admiringly. We need some good portraits of fathers who are happy at being dads to their babies. The public school has shut out the man for a long time. Women might be foster mothers in the schoolroom, men would have to wait until high school. Then they might teach "masculine subjects." Even the church has done its part. It is small wonder that many a boy comes to look upon the church as a women's society. It is not too much to hope for the day when dads may be included in the staffs of kindergartens. I cannot vision a more important position than the pastorate for children.

DADS ARE SO BUSY

THE FATHER who amounts to much does not have time to throw away. Business pressures are strong in both time and energy. If he participates in community building, seeking to make the neighborhood a wholesome place for all children, he is busier yet. Let him be a loyal Latter Day Saint and supporter of his branch, and his working hours are increased. In such a social world, dads are tempted to excuse themselves with the plaint, "If only I had the time." Money is not the only thing that has to be budgeted; time calls for it, too. Some fathers plan to have a date with the family and then tell those who request their services that night that they have a previous appointment. At least this raises the business of being a dad to the level of other occupations. Actually, it ought to head the list.

MAKING TIME COUNT

PERHAPS I have exaggerated my own busyness, but I have classified myself as a dad who does not have much time to spend with his family. I made a discovery that has given me heart. I found that having lots of time does not insure good parenthood. Not even spending many hours around the house makes a first-class father. I came to conclude that it is not how much but how that matters most. Fifteen minutes wisely utilized can be more fruitful than five hours of aimless or misaimed association. A conversation that gets to the point can accomplish more in ten minutes than hours of meandering about numerous fields that never find the wells of companionship. One excursion that gets somewhere is worth more than numerous trips to town with dad which do little more than furnish transportation.

SOME THINGS ARE CONTAGIOUS

WE HAVE no word for indicating what happens when a junior member catches what a magnetic adult passes on to him. The spirit of a dad is contagious. Here is something that cannot be shifted over to mother or to anyone. One day I read the biographical sketch of Evangeline Booth. The verve of her soul has carried through the world of the Salvation Army. It was something of the quality of her father and mother who had started the movement. She confessed that her father seldom talked in a formal way to her about her personal faith. Her parents lived so intensely, so happily in their work, that she could not help catching how near God was to them. This article gave me heart. I had been thinking that I was not doing my duty. Some fathers have taken their sons aside to tell them "the facts of life." Others have taught formal courses in the family circle. All this never seemed the natural way for me. I had preferred to join in reunions and talk about what happened, to go to General Conference and live with my family the life of the church. Now I am sure that this is the healthier way. If I ever grow sour and cynical, I hope I can break contact with my children just before this happens. Whatever joy in creative work, whatever satisfactions in spiritual fellowship comes my way, I want to share with them. These things are contagious.

MORE THAN PROVIDING THINGS

ONCE WHEN a youth was getting pretty twisted in his conduct, his father talked to me about the boy's situation. He could not understand why things had turned out as they had. "I've always been a good provider," he lamented. In a sense he had. He had always supplied good food, a comfortable house, plenty of clothes, spending money, and even a car. Only one thing he had left unprovided—companionship. If the dad and son had been sentenced to spend an hour together just talking, both would have been bored. The football, the dates, the bow ties of Jack would have been as meaningless to Jack's dad as the father's bonds, insurance policies, and business offices would have been to the son. I am thinking of the case of a father whose teen-age son ran away from home. When the boy came back, the parent wanted to make some gesture of sociability. He took the boy to a movie and to dinner. He had to rely on what money could buy to entertain his own son. Here was the son's comment: "Dad was not any more at home than I was. The picture show went all right, but both of us ran out of anything to say after the meal was ordered." Dad has to provide more than bread and butter.

DAD HAS TO BE A LINGUIST

THE EFFECTIVE dad has to know at least two languages. This does not mean German, Chinese, and the like. It means the language of two generations, or more. Persons cannot be companionable until they speak a common language. Dads—mothers, too—have to keep up on the languages of children and youth. Interpreters will not do. Conversation has to be firsthand. It is quite a linguistic education when dad keeps up with the "line" of adolescent romance, the "lingo" of the gridiron and basketball court, and the "lyric" of popular music. There are still many families in which conversations between children and their father is routed through the mother. Especially is this the case when requests for money and permits for privileges are involved. Many children feel that dads do not "understand."

THERE ARE NO SUBSTITUTES

OF LATE years when so many functions that used to be cared for in the home have slipped away into other agencies, we have been asking what is to remain for the family to do. Many can remember when all sewing, breadmaking, laundry, soapmaking, and hundreds of other activities were cared for by the family as a unit. We have been inquiring whether anything was going to be left. Russia once advocated that the care of children could be carried on more efficiently in state institutions than by parents who were untrained for their work. For some time after the revolution, this was tried. There was efficiency in diet and medical care, but the children missed something that is deep seated in the wants of our nature. The new constitution recognized this. There was no substitute for the affection, the sense of security, the feeling of being wanted that the healthy family provides. It takes the complemental participation of both mother and father to round out this circle. Nothing can take the place of the stimulating conversations of the two parents with children listening, asking questions, and offering their bits of information and opinion.

GOD IS OUR FATHER

WE HAVE found a few children who cringed at the interpretation of God as a parent. Whatever they had in their own homes that passed under this title was harsh, vindictive, unimaginative, and domineering. If God was anything like the dad they knew, they would rather have nothing to do with him. Children who had a companionable relationship with their fathers found it easy to commune with their Heavenly Father. It would be very revealing if we could see how our boys and girls go from the conception they have of us as dads to the picture they construct of their Father-God. We would range all the way through dictator indulgent Santa Claus, whimsical fellow who has to be pampered, sourpuss, understanding counselor, lawgiver, provider, and companion. It is a tribute and also a challenge to dads that when Jesus addressed his parent, he called him "Father." He was a parent in every way.

WHEN DAD IS PRESENTED

IN THE course of a year, I meet many dads and their children. When fathers come to the campus, I

A Job for Mothers

By VERDA E. BRYANT

I'm a mother, and I'm glad of it.

Our boy is emerging into a young man, at just the age when what he doesn't know isn't worth knowing—the wise old age of fifteen. Our girl is entering into that period of extreme modesty, tinged with a new feeling of inadequacy—the expectant age of thirteen.

I haven't lived long enough to have experienced the pride of a family well-reared, nor to have felt the pangs of regret for having been a failure as a mother. But this one thing I have learned—long before her children have reached adulthood, a mother suddenly awakens to the fact that she has done about all she can in the way of training; that teenagers just will make their own decisions, and that all she can do is to hope and pray her training has been sufficient to carry them over the rough spots.

In analyzing what it means to me to be a mother, I think not so much of the innumerable tasks, the anxious hours, and the grave responsibility, but rather of the realization of dreams, the satisfaction, and the opportunities motherhood brings.

If, as Emerson has said, "Men are what their mothers made them" (and that goes for women, too), then the mothers of today have a great opportunity to make a better world for posterity.

In past generations—so I remember my grandmother saying—the inflexible rule was that "children should be seen and not heard." Psychologists have agreed that this approach to child discipline is wrong, and, in attempting to correct the mistakes of past generations, the present ones have allowed the pendulum to swing to the other extreme and have arrived at a "he knows what he wants" rule of discipline. Overindulgence of the children of today has presented a definite threat to the future of the world. This threat may be one cause for the headache and the fevered brow which the cartoonists attribute to the World in their caricatures.

It is not uncommon to see a mother who literally gives her life for her children. She grants their every whim, denies herself many of the necessities that they might bask in luxury, and is intent that they shall have all the privileges (with none of the struggle and heartache) that she herself would like to have had. In short, she smothers her family with love. Such a mother is storing up trouble for herself. She is paving the way through her sacrificial unselfishness toward life as a perfect "doormat" for her offspring. Things which come too easily are seldom appreciated; it is the struggle for success that builds character.

Love and fellowship in the home, for which every mother in her own way is earnestly striving, cannot be based alone upon the unselfishness of the mother (or the father), but rather upon the mutual sharing, giving, and taking of each individual in the family.

The opposite of the "smother love" parent is the one who, to all appearances, believes that her children are the perfect answer to the servant problem. This breeds anything but a healthy attitude, for children are quick to recognize injustice.

Then there is the mother who is constantly "covering-up" for her children. She seems to see no evil in anything they do, and, with excuses and alibis, she shields them from the natural consequences of their misdeeds. Perhaps she actually believes that they don't mean any harm—that when they are older they won't do such things, but though her intentions are undoubtedly honorable, by this continued practice she is veritably training them to be dishonest.

Contrasted with this is the mother whose children develop definite inferiority complexes because they are made to feel that nothing they ever do is quite right or good enough.

Every mother really wants to be an ideal mother. She has great plans for her children. She would not knowingly deprive them of happiness, yet often in her very desire for their best interests, she robs them of that which they most need—the ability to stand on their own two feet, to accept responsibility, to make their own decisions, and to carry through to the culmination of those decisions.

The ideal mother is one who can look at her children, objectively remembering, as Milton says, "The childhood shows the man as the morning shows the day."

She is one who is able to achieve the proper balance—the right amount of indulgence coupled with the carrying of responsibility, the proper discipline and the acceptance of the consequences of misdeeds, coupled with the fairness of a just protector, a generous sprinkling of constructive criticism united with a goodly bit of honest praise for a job well done.

The ideal mother realizes that her interests cannot remain within the four walls of her own home, and it seems to me that herein lies the solution to the ever-apparent evil of "family" overindulgence.

There is a time, necessarily, when a mother must devote her all to her children. In the days of their early childhood, she is weighted down with the innumerable tasks connected with the constant care of babies, the worry and sleepless nights when she bends all her attention to fevered brows and glassy eyes as the youngsters pass through the inevitable childhood diseases, and the responsibility of training little hands and feet, little minds and hearts, in the way they should go.

But as the children grow older and are taught to rely more and more upon their own initiative, there comes a time when mother's interests should go beyond the home—both for the good of her children and for the peace of her own soul.

The character she is building in their lives is important, but every mother should ask herself this question:

"What characteristics are being acquired by the children next door, around the corner, in the next block, on the other side of town?"

In the times in which we live, it is impossible to keep children entirely to yourself. You cannot choose with whom they shall associate and, though you may guide and counsel with them as to their companions, when all is said and done, they themselves will choose their own friends. And every person with whom your children come in contact will leave an indelible print upon their lives!

The little girl down the street who is such "a nuisance and a pest" today might, a decade or so from now, become an important cog in the wheel of the future of "Son." The big boy around the corner may, in the years to come, hold in his hand the future happiness of "Sister." How, then, can mothers complacently say that if they take care of their own families they are doing their duty and needn't be concerned with what happens elsewhere?

It seems to me that children in general should be the central thought of a mother—not just her own, but all children; and home should be a gathering place for the youngster's friends. A few games, plenty of good records (even an old "wind-up" Victrola will be a "swell" record player to teen-agers who are accustomed to electric ones), and a pitcher of ice-cold fruit juice are all you need to make your home the gathering spot of the neighborhood. Here, your children can learn the principles of fair play, kindness, sharing, and friendship.

Yes, they may track in mud. They may appear to do more tearing up in five minutes than you can straighten in an hour. They may even mar the finish on your new table top in spite of your careful warnings. But in the years to come, you will polish that table (still attempting to cover the scratch) and recall the happy hours of their childhood with pride in your heart for the kind of men and women they have become. How much better such memories are than those tinged with regret.

Becoming interested in the neighborhood children paves the way for interest in all children. A mother becomes more and more interested in working with children in an organized manner. She may become a church school teacher, a den mother, a Blue Bird, Oriole, or Girl Scout leader. If she tackles the P.T.A. with vigor, other mothers become her good friends and she is recognized as an individual rather than "just a mother." She begins to see how other children act and why, and takes stock of her own youngsters. She becomes a better mother because these other children have helped her to see her own with unprejudiced eyes. It becomes necessary for "Son" and "Sis" to take more responsibility in the home so that mother can have more time for these interests, and a healthier family relationship is established.

This outside interest, when continued, acts as a stimulation. While every mother realizes that the day will come when her children leave home (either for college or to make homes of their own), seldom is she prepared when the actual day for the break-away arrives. Pitiful, indeed, is the mother who has no other interests to fall back upon.

Hours, which would otherwise have been lonely, may then be filled with purposeful endeavor, because she has paved the way for a gracious middle age with widespread interests.

Being a mother is more than being just a parent. Or, as Webster's New International Dictionary says, Mother, noun. 1. a female parent, especially of the human race; specific, one's own mother. 2. That which has produced or nurtured anything; source of birth or origin.

On the other hand, we have the poet's view:

For such as you, I do believe,
Spirits their softest carpets weave,
And spread them out with gracious hand
Wherever you walk, wherever you stand.

For such as you, of scent and dew
Spirits their rarest nectar brew,
And where you sit and where you sup
Pour beauty's elixir in your cup.
—From Herman Hagedorn's Mother.

Somewhere between the two extremes—the flowery words dripping with honey of the poets, and the cold as ice, hard as nails, tough as shoe-leather dictionary, let us find a happy medium. Let's make it our business to prepare for this sick world of ours a generation of men and women with unquestionable integrity, ready to share, to give and take, able and willing to shoulder responsibility, flanked with plenty of stick-to-itiveness, who will remove the bandage from the fevered brow and bring back the smiles that belong to the earth.

Children of Privilege

By ALICE M. EDWARDS

A COLLEGE campus is about the most beautiful place there is—not just because of the physical surroundings, though usually those are lovely, but because of what it means. Whether it is an endowed college with hundreds of acres of self-sustaining environs, a group of university buildings caught up in some growing city, or a small, struggling school, adding building to building by the sacrifice of its alumni and friends, a college represents a dream. Someone once had the vision to recognize a need above the necessity for securing food and clothing, the ability to organize people of like mind, the courage to venture, even a very small beginning, and the faith to adapt the growing needs of an institution to the changing needs of a community.

Most college sites are chosen with loving thought to their future beauty, as well as their convenience and adaptability. Traditions are interwoven with the buildings that spring up year after year to house the growing student bodies. My college was a huge, sprawling cluster of squat, red-sandstone buildings, connected by long arched cloisters. Its acres of rare and beautiful trees offered sanctuary to the birds and small animal life of the region, and behind it the tawny hills rose tier after tier toward the Pacific Ocean. Maybe your school was an old Eastern university, steeped in the traditions of our country from its beginnings; or maybe it was a small, community-minded college, which had grown up behind ivy covered walls, while the traffic of a busy city rolled by its gates. Or maybe you went to one of the state universities, which were brought into being by a group of public-spirited men in the belief that education should be made possible for every man's sons and daughters, if our nation is to become great as well as prosperous. Or maybe you did not go to college; but are determined that your sons and daughters are going to get there, no matter what you have to do to send them. Whoever you are, or wherever you are, I think you will agree with me that a college campus is a very beautiful place.

IN 1941, when the Second World War knocked at our back door and caught us taking a nap, a lot of young men were looking forward, more or less casually, to going to college. Some of them were already there, doing first, second, or third year work. Some were almost ready for graduation; while others had their degrees and were going on into special fields; but wherever they were, and whatever their desires and ambitions, they were obliged to put down their schoolbooks and take up arms. Some of these men were away from home for only a year or two; some were gone for five or six years. Some of them returned unfit for further schoolwork, as they are for life; they will spend such years as are left to them in a hospital or institution, quite forgotten by the complaisant people for whom they fought. Others did not come back.

And then there were a lot of men who did come back, eight or ten millions of them. They came back to find their jobs taken, their homes occupied, and their families growing up. Most of the men who were going to college five or six years ago are married now; their children are no longer even babies. What can they do? Get a job? Find a house? Move in with somebody else? Go back to college?

A great many have gone back to college. The government has made it possible—just—and while the colleges are dazed and a little scandalized, they have tried to co-operate in every way possible. But some people are not sure they like the idea at all. "Go to school with a wife and children?" "Why, it isn't decent." "When a man has children," says Mrs. Jones, or Green, or Brown, "he should get a job and support them. And besides, a college campus isn't any place for children."

Isn't it? Many GIs and their families have tried it, and have found their university homes an excellent place for children. Not long ago I was visiting the campus of a middle-western university. It was a beautiful place, too. Old buildings of native limestone with peaked red roofs clung to the brow of a sunny hilltop, while the newer buildings, concrete, roomy, and modern, spread away toward the fertile valley.

IT WAS Sunday; the shady roads were lined with strolling students, as they always have been—but there were changes. Among old buildings, and beside the new ones, converted army barracks have been assembled to house married students, while quonset huts are sandwiched between science buildings to afford classroom and laboratory space. Trailer camps hug the edge of town, and an old war plant has become a GI village, complete with stores and a laundrette. Up on the hill, a choice spot has been converted into a children's park, where a student's small sons and daughters may enjoy supervised play.

In the evening, we went to a concert. The summer session band and orchestra students, under the direction of a famous leader, were giving an open-air demonstration, topped by an exhibition of baton twirling. Down in the front, serious students and faculty members sat in closely arranged rows. A little further back on the hill the families sat in groups, with children playing around in the grass at their feet. One very small lady in a blue ruffled dress became bored with proceedings and went in search of amusement. She found a small girl in crisp organdie, who looked like a rosebud with her curls combed back and tied with a dotted ribbon. Rosebud and Ruffles played quietly for a little while, and then caught sight of a lad in a blue sailor suit who was hanging over the back of his chair to watch them. Encouraged by his attention, they began to pull grass and pat it into the seat of a vacant chair, with loud slappings and pattings, exactly in time with the music. Small Sailor Suit in his eagerness went headfirst over the back of his chair into the pie, and loud wailings arose—which were not in time with the music. There was a flurry to rescue, and Rosebud and Sailor Suit were claimed by their families, while a large brown man tucked Ruffles into the corner of his seat. But she had had her taste of freedom and wouldn't sit still, whereupon Father picked her up, threw her over his shoulder and started out with her.

"I don't want to go home," shrieked the small one, but Father had not been a sergeant in the Marines for nothing. Ruffles went home. A friend waved at him, and he smiled back in complete comradeship and contentment.

"There," I thought, "is a happy man." And why shouldn't he be? Here, at least, among some millions of GIs, is one who has achieved the dream that sustained him during those long years overseas. He has what he was fighting for—his home and family, and a chance to go on and fit himself for the kind of life he wants to live, and to be the kind of man that he wants to be, and to make the contribution to society that he wants to make.

And the children? Who said they didn't belong on a college campus? Where could they find a better place to be? In the overcrowded towns, where four or five families are occupying one small house? In the tenements and old apartments and reconverted homes where harried landlords are overlooking all the laws of safety and sanitation and decency, in order to crowd in just one more family?

WHOMONG the busy and overworked and unambitious people of this world have a better right to have children? GI students have their faults and problems, certainly! But they are men of courage and intelligence and vision, or they would not be spending their time trying to catch up with what they lost during those years. GI wives have their problems, too; but they are for the most part trim and efficient and remarkably happy. Most of them have adjusted to the abnormal conditions in which they find themselves, and are letting opportunities for companionship and cultural satisfactions take the place of better salaries and more convenient houses. GI homes are certainly not ideal, but they are clean, modern, and more often than not crowded with love and laughter—as well as just crowded. And GI children are brown and sturdy, and not too badly spoiled. What more could they ask?

Something new has been added to the beautiful old college campuses that we all love. The time will come again, I hope, when our upside-down world will maintain its peace and educate its young men and women in the proper sequence. Until then, children on the college campus are sociologically a sound idea. And besides, it works!

What Makes Sally a "Bad" Girl

By ALICE CROSSAN

She was a bright little thing, and lovable, too. She could have been saved — if someone had understood and cared!

I was Sally's second and third grade teacher.

THERE APPEARED, quite a number of years ago, a popular song entitled, "I Wonder What's Become of Sally?" I think of that title as I write about this little girl who was so much in need of proper guidance and love.

Sally was what the other children and their parents called a "bad girl." Sally "played dirty." Sounds like the beginning of real trouble for her parents and teacher, doesn't it? And for Sally, as well.

What kind of child was Sally? Not the tough little brat you may be imagining. She was precocious, alert, red-haired, full of wide-eyed wonder, and EIGHT YEARS OLD. I was Sally's second and third grade teacher.

When I discovered what Sally was doing (she was so truthful that I at once believed in her innocence), my first thought was to have a talk with her mother. This was not the easiest thing in the world for me to decide to do, but under the circumstances I felt it would be best. Accordingly, one evening I asked her mother to stay, and I told her exactly what Sally had been doing. Sally's mother was embarrassed, angry, and resentful. She said crossly that since it had happened at school, the situation was mine to deal with—she had "whipped Sally hard" for similar offenses at home, which she insisted Sally had learned from other school children. As a parting shot, she informed me that she and her husband wanted me to know that they didn't raise their children to do such things.

My county superintendent was surprised when I told her Sally's story. She said she had never heard of such a thing in a rural school. But the truth is, rural children have the same natural curiosity that other children have—and all children, it seems to me, have the right to expect the truth about life from their own fathers and mothers. Although the teacher can often co-operate with the parents, the first duty is not hers. Of course I talked to the other mothers whose children were involved with Sally, but since she was the only little girl in the case, it is her story that lingers in my mind. I hope that it may have a happy ending.

About two years later, Sally and her family moved from that neighborhood, and I do not know what sort of girl she grew to be. But of one thing I feel certain: if she had been given a little more parental love and information, it would have done more for Sally than any number of "hard whippings."

RECENTLY THERE was published a very revealing article in the Ladies' Home Journal, for June, 1947, dealing with the problem of the unwed mother. According to the statistics cited by Miss Younger, the author, one out of twelve babies born in the United States today is born to an unmarried girl. Of these, almost all are born to mothers beaten and bewildered, poor in purse and spirit, and with none but strangers near when the great miracle of life occurs once more—under the most unhappy of circumstances. She states that half of these mothers are from ten to nineteen years old, more than half are from small towns or rural areas, a vast number are from broken homes, and scarcely one in a hundred reveals a happy childhood and a satisfying mother-daughter relationship.

Should not these statistics alone shock us into taking immediate steps to prevent similar occurrences in our own schools, towns, and homes? Being Latter Day Saints, are we necessarily immune to these problems?

In her excellent article, Miss Younger tells the story of a typical girl named Katie. Katie says of her mother, "Whenever I hear a woman yelling at someone some place, I always hurry away very fast, because it reminds me of how my mother used to scream rather than talk. She lost her temper over everything. Everything we kids did could always have been done so much better if we had done it her way. I don't think there was one of us who didn't start when we were about ten years old to plan to run away from home as soon as we could."

INNOCENT little girls like Sally have every opportunity to grow up and be condemned by society like this young mother, Katie. These uninformed children are our "bad" girls—girls whose guilty feelings give them neither approval of or enjoyment in what they are doing. In such cases we might well reverse the old saying to read, "The sins of the children be upon the father."

What can parents do, after giving proper sex instruction, to remedy the situation? Perhaps the best answer comes from Miss Hazle Corrigan, chief psychiatric social worker of the San Francisco City Clinic.

Tell them, says Miss Corrigan, if they are worried about their children's behavior, not to scold or punish. The more guilty the children are made to feel, the more likely they will be to take out their conflicts in promiscuity. Tell parents that we have found that when young people, whatever their behavior, are given respect and affection as individuals, when there is an honest attempt made to understand them and help them to work out better solutions for their problems than they have found for themselves, even the habitually promiscuous can be straightened out. They aren't inherently "bad." They are confused and emotionally insecure and unhappy.

DO YOU know a child like Sally? Is she your daughter, your granddaughter, your cousin, your niece, your pupil? Now is the time for you to make sure that your Sally will never have to lie awake at night, eaten with remorse, repeating over and over, "I just didn't know, and I wish that somehow, somewhere along the line I'd learned more about things, why marriage is, and what love means, and how you can protect yourself from being carried away by your emotions."

If we are wise and kind, one day there will be no need to wonder what's become of Sally. She will be the well-adjusted and happy young wife and mother in the house next door.

Love

Happiness comes more from loving than being loved; and often when our affection seems wounded it is only our vanity bleeding. To love, and to be hurt often, and to love again—this is the brave and happy life.

The Tahitian Language

The term Ia ora na (May you have life!) is both a greeting and a farewell phrase and is almost universally used throughout the whole of French Oceania.

Tahitian is essentially a vowel language. Every consonant is separated by vowels. This is almost without exception.

One might naturally think that there would be few rules of grammar governing the native tongue. This is quite untrue, as there are in the Tahitian language nine parts of speech whereby the subtlest shades of meaning are expressed. Moods, and voice, even to irregular verbs, enhance the beauty of this unique language.

In the lower archipelago, quite a different language is spoken. The "k" becomes more profuse and the tempo of enunciation is speeded up considerably. Were it not for the fact that those in the Tuamotus understand the pure Tahitian, our missionary work would be very difficult indeed.

A few hours in Tahiti is like having visited the Tower of Babel. One hears a jibberish composed of French, Chinese, English, Japanese, German, several different dialects of Tahitian and Spanish, and even a low form of American slang.

The Tahitian language is no longer pure. It is a dying language being fast supplanted by French—which is as it should be. However, of the three terms, Bon jour, Good day, and Ia ora na, "May you have life" to me holds a deeper and more reverent meaning than the greetings of the Romance languages.

The late Apostle Clyde F. Ellis translated our beloved hymn, "The Old Old Path," and, as an example of the Tahitian language, it is printed below.

The Lord's Prayer

12. "Thine Is the Glory"

By Glen H. Johnson

The last in a series of meditations presented at the Appointee Institute held in Independence, August 28 to September 14, 1946. The others appeared in the issues of January 18, January 25, June 14, July 19, July 26, August 2, August 16, August 23, August 30, September 6, and September 13.

IN THIS prayer, Jesus is reiterating a similar statement made to his Father in the beginning of man's creation. When asked who would go and save mankind, Jesus offered his life willingly for this tremendous task. In spite of the consequences to himself, he said, "The glory be thine." This majesty of the Christ was manifest from the beginning in the offering of the lamb. It was culminated in his own sacrifice on the cross. Even today, he is ministering to the church to the glory of God.

One of the primary functions of the church is to promote the worship of God. That worship must be directed to understand the nature of the Father. The whole scheme of salvation is based upon the fact of man becoming like God in the range of his own capacities and capabilities. If man is to become godlike, he must understand the nature and content of the Great Mind. That Mind is the understanding and right use of all truth. This is his glory or intelligence. It is the emphasis which gives content and meaning to our worship.

Spiritual darkness has filled the whole world through meaningless adoration of God. He has become a symbol to ignorantly adore, rather than a Saviour to follow. Jesus taught that the two great commandments were ". . . love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, might, mind and strength . . . and thy neighbor as thyself." This represents the vertical and horizontal in worship. Men attempt to live vertical lives without the horizontal, that is, they worship God (so called) and do nothing about righting human relationships. Such an experience in worship is impossible. It is true that men come to know God through worship, but true worship involves communion. That communion at its best is centered in Jesus' statement, "They that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." The way men live with themselves and others is an identification of their worship experience. It can be one of hypocrisy or helpfulness. Worship and brotherhood belong together. Life would go to pieces without the relationship of these two. Worship, to have meaning, must approach upward and express itself outward. Such an experience makes for balance and spiritual health. The glory of God (intelligence) must become incarnate in man in individual and corporate relationships.

Our worship should assist us in making incarnate the word—the life and message of Jesus. Then worship becomes meaningful. The church becomes the kingdom of God on earth, because we permit him to rule in our individual and collective experiences. By this God has residence below, because he has residence in us—first in intelligence, then in righteousness.

The Apostle Paul emphasized the key to the glory of God in this statement. "Have your mind renewed, and so be transformed in nature, able to make out what the will of God is." (Romans 12: 2, Moffatt.) My observation is that the church has been founded upon a necessity in human nature. This nature demands a center of worship if it is to become transformed. The center is God. When Jesus taught his disciples about the glory of God, he did not mean that that glory was to be forever resident in the Great Mind. It was to become incarnate in the human mind through the experience of progressive revelation. However, Jesus recognized that the ultimate in intelligence rests with the Father. He also knew that this glory was to be shared with his children. Through this sharing, through worship, we are to become glorified in truth if we so choose.

Our faith demands that we should constantly rely upon the possibility of our immortality and eternal life. "This is my work and my glory, to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man," said the Father through the latter-day prophet. Who can measure the infinite intelligence and power in the work of such majesty and greatness? If we but catch a glimpse of this movement, our faith is challenged greatly in the need of our co-operation with him in our salvation. His glory is revealed in this work of man's salvation.

We are back again at the problem of the nature of God. For "in him we move and have our being." That nature can only be understood as God takes the initiative in revealing himself. As man reaches upward, God reaches downward and manifests his majesty and glory so that man might come to know him. "This is life eternal, that they might know." God wants to make himself known to his children, but he wants to make something of his children in this process. If the process of man's salvation takes an eternity, what a worthy achievement! When we come to understand the processes of salvation, we are constrained to acknowledge his grace and majesty and say as did Jesus, "Thine is the glory."

On the Move -

LIKE EMERSON, who once wrote an essay on the subject, we have come to stress the value of self-reliance—especially in our children. We know of nothing more vital to a child's happiness, whether at home or on the move, than his capacity for making rapid adjustments to new situations and new faces. Our two boys, aged four and seven, have traveled thousands of miles by air, sea, train, and automobile, respectively. In looking back over these miles in the company of our children, we can honestly say that we would not hesitate to recommend the pleasures of traveling as a family to any who will take proper measures with their children before planning a trip.

There are parents who pride themselves on the fact that their child will not go to strangers and is unhappy when either mother or daddy is out of sight. This condition in the life of a child can produce much distress, for both the parent and him, when necessity removes the family or any part of it from home. While still babies, our children learned to go to other grown-ups, to meet other children, and to make their world out of various things; not only encompassing mother, daddy, and delights of home, but also the exciting adventures of sights from a car window, the roll of a ship, and the appreciation of kindness in other people.

Parents should instill a hands-off rule at home with regard to books, knickknacks, and whatever objects might be within the reach of the child; then, when visiting, or traveling, the children's behavior reflects home-training and parents have no need to be embarrassed. We have usually made some special point in reviewing our children's behavior, after a trip, expressing our appreciation to them for their manners or pointing out failures so they might not commit them next time. All this training of the child bears immediate fruit and eliminates many travel problems.

WE BEGAN OUR children's training in self-reliance by accustoming them to the care of other people, getting their own drinks at night, dressing and undressing themselves. We even taught them how to get down safely from chairs or steps while still in the creeping stage. As soon as they could talk plainly, we taught them to recite their own names, that of their daddy, and their home address to any adult who might ask; this prepared them for the possibility of being separated from us in a crowd.

One of the first things we came to punish for was any propensity of our children, when still toddlers, to wander into the street. This brought out the little switch, even for the minor misdemeanor of stepping over the curb. Early in their process of training they vindicated our strictness in this matter, and we can let them play in any yard, in cities domestic or foreign, without fear of possible injury to them in busy traffic. Contrasted to this kind of training, many parents in our island home—especially European parents—penned up their children to shield them from problems of street and stairs. To make a trip or even to visit a near neighbor with such children required nerve-wracking oversight on the part of the nontrusting parent. Many such children were sheltered from the facts of streets and traffic lights until of school age.

ONE OF the very hard problems for small children is that of sitting still for any extended period of time. In our island home, it was decidedly uncommon for parents to take small children to the community church service. We did take our children, long before they were able to understand the words the minister was saying. No doubt they made some disturbance at first; the adults whose own children were dismissed after Sunday school may have questioned our wisdom in requiring the children to sit quietly through the service. Nevertheless, we put the idea across well enough that we can now enjoy Latter Day Saint sermons in the company of our children; they understand that God's house is a place to sit still and listen, and their present standards of deportment would do credit to those of any adult. Aside from its intrinsic value, this training is vital to the problems of air and train travel, where the child may be confined to his place for long periods of time. It teaches him the impropriety of racing up and down the aisle of a train, annoying fellow travelers, for he has been taught that as in church services, there are times when it is necessary to remain quietly in his seat. We have marveled time and again how two small boys can improvise small games without the aid of a managing adult, and while away hours of tiresome travel absorbed in a color book, a toy or two, or even in counting various things along the way.

If we take pride in the travel manners of our youngsters, we are not giving all the credit to ourselves. Fellow travelers are usually wonderfully kind to children, and a boy or girl who shows his capacity to enjoy travel without disturbing others is often the recipient of many friendly gestures. In fact, the multiplicity of attentions paid to such children often makes a kind of problem in itself. Train travel to such children is an adventure that may begin with the little old lady across the aisle who cuts out string after string of paper dolls, and carry on through to the sailor lad down the way whose pockets are bulging with chewing gum. There is no doubt that virtue—at least travel manners—has its own reward.

MONTHS before a trip materializes, the children are living in anticipation. Food previously left on the plate is now scrupulously cleaned up to convince mother and daddy that the children do know how to eat what is set before them and will make no food problems for the family traveling. Clothing is folded up when taken off to practice for the days when living out of suitcases demands economy of wearing apparel. Trips to the doctor for shots, inoculations and physical checkups have some special point—that of preparation for travel—and the children take them as routine necessities. Even now, a trip to the photographer with the family is more likely than not to suggest passport or visa—hence travel—to the children.

We are still on the move with our family. We have tried to plan our moves to come between school terms for the sake of the older boy; however, we do feel that a great part of his education is in the making outside the classroom, as well as in. He learned his ABC's on his own, reading Spanish signs in a foreign fishing village. We believe that he and his brother may live sane healthy lives in Missouri or Mexico, as long as their parents are engaged in preparation to serve the church. Don't you?

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY will either take a downward drop in the Jennings' neighborhood, or else the sociologists will have to figure out other reasons why children get into crime, for the Jennings' family has a home that is trouble insurance for the whole neighborhood.

The Jennings family—Frank S. Jennings who operates a furniture concern in Independence, Mrs. Jennings, who is his partner in the business, and the two Jennings children, Sandy, 15, and Virginia, 12, live in a large Victorian house, built in Independence in 1886. When they moved into the historic old mansion, neighbors wondering how the family of four and a grandmother could ever fill the three stories, surmised that they would probably furnish the high-ceilinged rooms with period furniture and hang a huge "no trespassing" sign over much of the house. Children would tiptoe down the center of the wide halls, and be warned frequently that the wing chair by the drawing room fireplace was only for their spacious house, and that especially includes the children.

"We purchased our home with the direct idea in mind of adapting it to the needs of the children," Mrs. Jennings explained. "After all, they are our most precious possession, so why not live and build for them?"

Children so often play away from home because it is a sanctuary never to be disturbed by children's friends, they reasoned. One home had all kinds of libraries and workshops for adults, but no playroom for the younger generation. Surveying their mansion, the Jennings decided that this was their opportunity to put into practice some of their pet theories on child rearing. They even called the house their stewardship. Both being interior decorators, they furnished it in period furniture, but were careful to select dark colored rugs that could camouflage childish boot tracks.

Sandy decorated his own room, selecting a wall paper with trains, boats, and horses. His is a typical boy's room with twin beds, and plenty of space for arrow heads, birds nests, and ship models.

Virginia's room, with its Godey's Lady's Book paper and draperies, was designed by her. It lacks the professional touch of her parents, but it is Virginia designed, and therefore Virginia enjoys it. A cabinet in one corner of the room houses her doll collection, and in the hall outside her door is a long open bookcase with space for volumes of magazines.

Even with the Jennings family comfortably installed, there was still room for living in the big house, so the children's friends were invited in.

Aileen Franklin was persuaded to do the art work, and she painted a big "Welcome" in multicolored letters on the outside of the door between the kitchen and back porch. Since the screened-in porch was so convenient a place to serve milk and sandwiches to young visitors, Aileen painted a picture on the wall of a singing tree, (an old folk legend) and galloping blue horses.

Through the welcome door children can enter the house at any time and climb the stairs to the third floor where a blue staircase and a sign "The Land of Enchantment" in pink, green, red, and blue letters a foot high greet them. Walking through a short hall decorated with paintings of fairyland, they enter a playroom 25x40 feet, equipped for almost any activity.

In one corner is a marionette stage and professional dolls, in another a radio and record player, and scattered about the room are ping-pong tables, shuffleboard markings, screws for a volleyball net, room for a stage, and a wardrobe of costumes.

ment get pretty noisy, but what of it? We know where our youngsters are, and what they are doing."

A home so equipped and so graced with hospitality is naturally kept occupied. Several boy scout troops meet weekly in the playroom, and the girl scouts hold award meetings there. Classes and other organizations give parties in the Jennings home while 18 to 20 boys meet every Wednesday evening to build model planes. Rained out picnics and after football game parties convene at the playroom, assured of a welcome.

A neighbor, horrified to learn that children had trooped into the Jennings living room in snowy boots to drink cocoa before the fire, asked if they weren't afraid the children would spill chocolate all over the furniture? Mrs. Jennings admitted that the possibility had occurred to her, then turned to ask what value a home where child guests couldn't enter and enjoy it? They have a theory that their children are representatives of the church in whatever

Yes, there's a kitchen for the children, too, opening off the main room, and equipped with a long oilcloth covered counter, a sink, and hot plate. Here they make their own hot chocolate and serve themselves over the counter.

Some young people, when they come in the door with the welcome sign run downstairs instead of up. Here they use the photographic dark-room or build model airplanes, running their miniature plane motors on the testing table.

Child Conservation and Growth

By BESSIE TAYLOR

THE HOME is the heart of the world. Schools, churches, clubs, courts, prisons, hospitals, all exist only to conserve the successes or to redeem the failures of the home. The home in which the responsibility of parents toward their children is not fully recognized is really no home. Children are the victims of their environment. In generating the proper atmosphere for home, there is no agency so important and helpful as good literature. There is nothing more potent in shaping human life than reading. We must have the best books in our home, because we cannot hope to raise first quality men and women on second quality mental food. All the world's greatest, deepest, and noblest experiences have been preserved in literature. Good books in the home are more important than fine furniture.

To children, reading is highly impressive, because it is generally done in solitude. This makes an immediate demand upon the imagination, the intellect, and the moral sense. Even the adult favors the authenticity of the printed word over the spoken word. What children read, they dramatize in their play. In social games, they imitate the traits of their heroes and heroines. This is one great advantage of city life. The city child is much freer in assuming personalities and carrying them out than the country child, who feels self-conscious, and hardly dares to "let go" lest he be lost. He is more limited in the range of his expression, but ranks superior to the city child in his observation and investigation.

There is such an abundance of reading material available that it becomes a problem what to choose for our children. We need more charts to direct us over the shoreless sea of printer's ink, to help us winnow the wheat from the chaff, and aid us to discriminate what is so subtly venerated.

Too many parents forget their inalienable educational office and turn their children over to the schools. No teacher can rival good parents' influences.

THERE HAS never been an age in which the choice of variety was so rich. Kings a hundred years ago could not have what we have now. In choosing books for our children, the first consideration is to choose that which is on the level of their stage of mental development. They need books founded squarely on the facts of life—books that will give to them the Christian ideals. They need companionship with heroes—people who have endured, suffered, experienced, and achieved. In order that a child may believe in the good, the true, and the beautiful, he must have vital contact with high and noble personalities. If his playmates become too quarrelsome, he should have a retreat where he can enjoy the boys and girls of storyland and history.

One of the child's stumbling blocks in the march of civilization is the false economy practiced by parents who say, "When my child is older, I'll buy books"—forgetting that they can never turn back the leaves of time and give the child those rare opportunities for development when his mind is so receptive, his imagination so vivid, and his desire to learn so great.

We must have the best books in our home. We can't hope to raise first quality men and women on second quality mental food.

Books have a real influence and may become a factor in the choice of good and evil. They can make or mar a life. Children want and crave the best. They want to know all about themselves and never stagger at the thought of God. There is no mystery from which they will turn.

The small child is first introduced to the treasures of literature by the little rhymes and stories read to him. In the beginning, wise parents will lay the groundwork for future character development. There are many mistakes which begin in childhood that do not seem important until marriage.

IT IS natural for every baby to notice and be interested in everything about him, and to be cheerful under most circumstances. Cheerfulness and interest are the first two links in the chain of character development upon which parents may construct. The instilling of these little traits is caught rather than taught. As the child's interest widens, his imagination becomes the kingdom in which he lives; and everything is real. That the hero of a story is an animal does not spoil the story; rather, it adds interest. During these impressionable years, children are influenced more by their imaginary companions than by the actual children with whom they come in contact. As they play "pretend" their pretensions should be based on noble and worthy characters—not the crooks and rogues of crime. Good, imaginative stories develop the image-making power and clarify inward sight. By it, the mind pictures the future. Here it is that the ideals of life begin to form, and a child's ideal is the prophet of his destiny. His fantasy and reason give extraordinary completeness and vitality to the mental image, thus laying the foundation for effective and creative thinking in later life. All the best fairy tales and classic myths and legends are in the broadest sense moral; the good are rewarded, and the bad are punished; obedience, honesty, kindness, helpfulness, perseverance, courage, resourcefulness, patience, and love, receive their just dues. Thus, in the mind of the child is gradually established certain ideals of conduct, a faith in a moral order, and a conviction that in the long run things will come out right. It is impossible to overestimate the value of these fundamental philosophies, arrived at not through dogmatic teaching or preaching, but through the inevitable activity of the child's own mind under the stimulus of the imaginative story. Life is not only what we make it but what we think it. To be at our best, we require an ideal world as well as a real world in which to live.

The first idea of morality arises in a child's mind through sympathy. Beneath the mother's smile and the father's appreciative words, a child's regard for his parents ripens into affection. Children must learn early to be kind and sympathetic to one another and then to reach beyond the walls of the home into the vast world of all living creatures. Good animal stories stimulate interest and acquaintance with animals. Children think of them as friends and wish to see them happy.

WHEN A CHILD reads, his mind is given wings. He is no longer a citizen of one time or place but of all times and all places. He enjoys by proxy the thoughts, the sentiments, ideals, aspirations, and knowledge of the best minds of all lands and all ages. The acquisition of this power devolves a new responsibility upon the parents. They must realize the many traits of character that must be fed and yet harnessed in the conservation of their child. No chain is stronger than its weakest link, and no character is stronger than its weakest trait.

Emulation is a trait that early manifests itself in imitation of visible movements; the mother's smile calls for a smile. Imitation of the outward act soon passes over into imitation of individuals. From here,

Manners for Mothers

Jimmy forgot? So, he made a mistake. Are you perfect? Think it over before your frayed nerves goad you into whipping him for a little thing that won't matter tomorrow.

imitation becomes emulation—the desire to imitate not the acts but the spirit of another—to hold his ideals. When a child reaches the point where emulation is possible, the best and safest models are in books. Through them, he gains the vision of Christ as the perfect one. We must help him to find other models in the biographies of good men. We must teach the actual facts of uneven qualities as found in all—that every good person has some weakness. We must make it plain that good character is grown and that high ideals are the basic essentials for doing good deeds. After the youngster has learned to emulate an actual character, he can learn to copy after the ideal character of Christ.

When the older child leaves home for school, his scriptural heroes and spiritual friends are of supreme importance. The direct influences of the home and parents are removed. During this period of transition and re-adjustment, the boy or girl is safe whose conduct is influenced by the lofty ideals of spiritual companions. The friends in one's head determine the kind of friends he will make at school and the type of companion he will choose.

THE EMULATION of worthy ideals will foster the habits of industry—another important link in the conservation and growth of our children. Industry is, in its earliest stages, mere activity. And what healthy child is not active? In each is the possibility of construction or destruction. Alfred Adler in The Science of Living contends that, as a rule, parents decide what the child shall become, long before he is old enough to go to school. He emphasizes that all evidence points to the fact that the fixing of goals and ideals takes place in early life, during the formative period of early childhood, and that a kind of prototype or model of a matured personality begins to develop at this time. When the prototype—that early personality which embodies the goal—is formed, the line of direction is established and the individual becomes definitely oriented. Norman V. Peale says, "The main current of our life is fed by tributaries originating back in the hidden mystery of our childhood." In their early years, children should be taught that all honest work, either by hand or brain, is noble and honorable. They should be taught to do honest work in mastering school and college studies. David Seabury says, "There is no queerer fact in life than the neglect we show towards efficiency." He also states that intellectual malnutrition is caused by just nibbling at learning and counting the flavor more than the calories.

The natural tendency of an industrious child is to be aggressive. His ideals of life germinate early. He has the fundamental sensations of the great mysteries of life. These urges invite observation and encourage investigation—two more great links in the chain of child conservation and growth. Observation, early learned, is life's schoolmaster.

Since life is short and the world large, one cannot hope to see much of it through his own eyes; but by reading, he can acquaint himself with any topic, know any land, become an authority on any subject. The world needs an aggressive goodness that has the courage of action and an intense moral indignation for wrong standards and selfish motives. Good literature is one of the means for quickening these latent ideals and for nourishing them into fruition.

THE PERNICIOUS effect on the mental and moral condition of parents who read only shallow and superficial material and pass their time in haphazard fashion is little realized. There is many a mother—good natured, kind to a fault, a homebody that works from sun to sun, whose only intellectual activity is neighborhood gossip, cheap fiction, radio opera, and the movies. Too often she permits her child to grow up as he pleases. When he is only a year old, he ignores her wishes; when he is three, he rules her; when he is six, he has no respect for her; and when he is twelve, he has no further use for her. Long before he goes to school, he comes to believe that his will is supreme. A man is not a man until he sees himself as a part of the great whole—until he is vitally and helpfully related to his immediate neighbors socially, industrially, politically, intellectually, and religiously. David Seabury says that we, in all our behavior, come the closest to sheer feeble-mindedness in our manner of handling evil—greed in particular; that the price of corruption, graft, crime, and war threatens man's very life and challenges all that science and religion have done. We can never be rid of greed save by the efficiency of stewardship. The church is the chosen instrument by which God expects to establish stewardship. The commandment of God places responsibility upon parents to teach their children the principles of the financial law. Early participation insures a growing interest in the church. Faithful adherence to the principles of the financial law will leave little room for selfishness in their lives. It will help them to develop ability and skill in the management of their personal finances and bring them up to a higher plane in spiritual growth. The personal advantages are many, but a greater good will be the enabling of the church to expand its work so that the whole world will be socially benefited.

TODAY the social question is of supreme interest. We see, as our forefathers did not, that everything has its social aspect; we have found out that no man lives unto himself alone. There is a social implication in every physical, educational, economic, political, moral, or religious question. The problems of the social world can be solved in no other way than by the embodiment of the Christ Spirit in individual human lives. Social interest is a slow growth. Only those persons who are really trained in the direction of social interest from their childhood and who are striving on the useful side of life will actually have social feelings. Organization and legislation can focus influence that otherwise would be scattering and ineffective, but organization and legislation, to achieve results, must have behind them the energy of earnest people who believe wholeheartedly in the ideal of the kingdom of God.

The social training of our children includes all the positive character traits listed in the dictionary. Each trait needs a foundation of home-training and mental hygiene to accomplish it. Success in our work-a-day world demands the practice of honesty, truthfulness, trustworthiness, thoroughness, alertness, accuracy, efficiency, thrift, orderliness, etc.—and to all these ingredients must be added the spice of a "sense of humor." H. W. Beecher says, "Good humor and a sense of humor make all things tolerable." Children begin early to see the funny side of things, and this sense of humor should be developed and cultivated. We should see that smiles, fun, and laughter are daily accompaniments to the family meals. Little rhymes, limericks, and stories encourage a sense of humor. There is much clean fun in this world that is a source of joy and happiness. Because children laugh so easily, there is danger that they will laugh over triumphs or teasing or the misfortunes of others. Such laughter should be suppressed. It takes time for a child to learn what constitutes worthwhile humor and what is ridiculous. An old French proverb states: "A man may be measured by what he finds amusing." A well-developed sense of humor will have no barbs to injure others and will disperse ill temper and iron out the difficulties.

THE DEVELOPMENT of the child's power of thinking commences when he begins to observe. Experiences and observations multiply—memory plays a part, too. The small child's reasoning is very simple. As he grows, it becomes more logical and, if his thoughts are directed, will continue to grow. Reason, another element in child conservation and growth, is the glory of human nature.

How can we help our children? First, we can answer their questions truthfully, patiently, and simply. We can correct their errors without ridicule. We can help them to recognize their problems and discuss them frankly. We can help them to plan and experiment. We can let them make decisions; if their decisions cannot be carried into execution, we must show them clearly the reason why, so that they will not become discouraged. We can point out the experiences of others. We can encourage them to stop and think when a new situation arises.

All this, of course, is much harder than doing a child's thinking for him, but that would not develop his reasoning power. We can think only in fields in which we have had experience, and, for this reason, we ought to help our children to the greatest possible number of useful experiences and a wide training in thinking. How can we expect children to grow up and appreciate the church if they have had little or no church experience? Herodotus once said, "Those who are guided by reason are generally successful in their plan." Thinking and reasoning upon facts of physical things prepares the mind to grasp the significance of moral and spiritual truths. There is nothing more revealing in one's character than his choice of values.

FROM THE moment a child begins to observe the acts of his mother and father and to reflect on what he sees, his character is being molded by example. The roots of two priceless links, fidelity and patriotism, may be traced down to the very subsoil of infancy. Every time a parent fails to keep a promise, he teaches his child disloyalty to truth, unreliability, and faithlessness.

At the first possible chance, let the child serve. Help him to make gifts. From service to members of the family is but a step to service for people out of the home, the church, the community, and the country. Service is possible in all fields and experiences of life. But the habit of service is not likely to be taken out into the world of adult life unless it is established in early childhood. The spiritual companionship and examples of heroes and patriots become, through reading, a perpetual inspiration. Emerson says, "Be our origin never so low there is no height to which we may not lift ourselves, if we have but will to give us wing, and ambition to supply the motive power."

AMBITION STARTS with parents. They should have high aims for their children but not a special ambition of fixed terms. Ambitions that lead to the attainment of culture and spirituality are the glorification of achievement. The accomplishment of these two is the goal of our creation. Spirituality names an attitude of mind which has become habitual; culture, a state of mind which is the result of many habitual activities. Progress along these lines demands a philosophical basis. One may "get religion" at a protracted meeting, but to be "spiritually minded" is quite another thing. One may imitate people of culture in points of dress, and in manner of life, but such imitations will never make him truly cultured. The evidence for Christianity is a Christian.

During their early years, almost all children show occasional gleams of spirituality. To multiply these transient experiences, to cultivate these intermittent perceptions, to make habitual the responses to the highest through prayer is the exacting task of parents. They must not forget that the library is a toolbox, a place of supreme importance in the quest of spirituality and culture.

Manners for Mothers

Don't look suspiciously at all your children's friends. They'll learn early in life whether you're a gracious and friendly mother or a nervous and picky one. Don't disappoint them.

The Three Standard Books are our leaders, and they are to be supplemented. "Yea, seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study, and also by faith. . . . And study and learn, and become acquainted with all good books, and with language, tongues, and people." (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36; 87: 5.) Harry Emerson Fosdick says, "The quality of a man's reading is one of his foremost responsibilities . . . that the shame of many of us is that, with great books waiting to be read, we stop to barter gossip with every corner loafer on our way."

Human nature begins modestly on the animal plane, then progressively responds to the influence of vision and will to become "but little lower than the angels." No child's morals remain stationary. They rise or fall in the scale of development. Man is always in the making, his "nature" is not fixed and final but infinite in its possibilities. Our hope of Zion is dependent on this fact. It took seven generations of clergymen to produce an Emerson. How many generations will it take us to build Zion?

The moral and spiritual nature comes to full power through exercise and the tests of actual experience. Every day is a crucial test in the game of life. If we help our children, we ourselves shall succeed. To pave the way for another's success, is also success.—Emerson.

Does your child get even a minute during the dinner hour to tell Daddy all the fascinating things the day has brought? Or do you monopolize the conversation with "You've no idea how hard I worked," or "I put out a huge wash and my back aches." Maybe Daddy would be glad to know that Junior caught a live frog which is now in the bathtub and Mary Ann jumped rope sixty-three times without missing. Don't cheat your child of dinnertime companionship.

Home Is a Happy Place

in the efficacy of childhood prayers, in fact, as Mrs. Jennings says, "We overwork the Lord.") their home has become a place where childish quarrels and animosities are forgotten in the pure joy of playing in a home expressly designed for childhood.

A Faith to Understand

Dedicated to those parents who have loved and lost an only child.

THEY WERE nearly home, and Anne was glad that Jonathan did not hurry the driving. He was guiding the car with his hands lightly touching the wheel. She sat prim and straight in her corner of the seat and watched him silently. Suffering had etched lines of age in his young face. She also felt old—she had not thought it possible to feel so drained of life at twenty-six. Was Jonathan thinking of their empty house, too, and wondering how they were going to make a home of it now that little Jimmy was no longer in it? She wanted to say, "I can't enter those empty walls, Jonny. I want to keep driving and never stop. I don't want to think. I don't want to see anybody. Why can't life stop for us, too?" The same wrenching pain must be tormenting Jonathan, but he looked so calm, as if some spirit outside himself was bearing him up.

His hand reached out and covered hers in a quick gesture. He glanced at her, the lines in his strong face softening. "Your hands are cold, Anne."

"I'm—fine."

"Good girl." His smile brushed her gently, then his eyes moved back to the road again. "The flowers were pretty. There were so many." He had said it twice before since they left the Talbot's. His voice had a quality of gratefulness, as if he were thanking their friends for remembering to make the chapel beautiful—as if he had not expected such lavish floral offerings. "He looked nice."

"Yes." Suppose someday she should forget how he looked, the freckles across the bridge of his nose, the small perfect hands, never still except in sleep.

"Grace and Jack are swell people."

"I know." She hadn't wanted to go to Grace's and Jack's after the funeral. She had only gone because her sister Phyllis had urged her. Grace had insisted on fixing lunch for them. She had fixed everything nice. Anne had tried to eat the food that somehow wouldn't get past her throat, and Jonathan had sat nibbling at his food, too. All through dinner and afterward, friends had kept coming and going as if they couldn't bear to leave them alone.

THEY TURNED into their driveway, and Jonathan said, "The lawn needs cutting."

"It's been four days—" She knew Jonathan didn't care about the lawn. He was only pushing against his loneliness, while his mind kept seeing Jimmie. No other five-year-old could equal him—soft auburn hair, features carefully chiseled like Jonathan's. The Great Sculptor had made his body and mind perfect. To what end? So that a drunken driver could go too fast? She closed her eyes, but the darkness did not shut out the pain. She should have watched Jimmie, made certain that he was not in the street. That was what mothers were for. She had been reading a magazine when it happened—resting in a chair with a thirty-five cent magazine!

"Anne," Jonathan said gently, "we're home, dear."

She dropped her hands to her lap. Her eyes stared vacantly straight ahead. She did not stir. Jimmie had come in excited and hot from playing next door with David. "I can catch a ball good, Mommie. So can David. Come out and see."

She had glanced up and then back to her reading. "In a little while, dear."

By Winifred Milner

"What if David's mother calls him in? Then you can't see us play until tomorrow."

"If she calls him I can toss balls for you. I'm pretty good."

"Please come now. It will only take a minute."

"Jimmie—" She had frowned at him, and he had gone out reluctantly, closing the door behind him. A little while later there had been a crash and the grinding of brakes.

If she had gone out to see Jimmie play ball, he would still be alive. Her careless indifference had killed him.

"Come, Anne," Jonathan urged her. "You can't sit in the car forever. Don't look so stricken—please, darling—I love you."

She clung to his hand. As they walked past the iris bed, she paused. In the soft dirt was the perfect imprint of a small bare foot, five little toes, a heel, and the gentle curve marking the fine arch—Jimmie's. In a little while rain and wind would take it away. Jonathan was looking at it, too, staring as though the spot were consecrated ground. She wanted to break from him and comb the yard, looking for other small footprints, but Jonathan was leading her forward a step at a time toward the house.

"Why don't you cry, Anne? It would be so much better for you if you could cry. I'm going to phone Doctor Green to come and give you something to make your rest."

"I'll rest, Jonathan."

"I know what you are doing. You keep going over and over the accident. You can't hide your thoughts from me, dear. You keep seeing David throw the ball that rolled into the street, and Jimmie chasing it without even looking where he was going. And Sam Rivers' boy, drunk, driving too fast." He stopped. His eyes moved to David's yard. "Isn't that Jimmie's tricycle David is riding?"

AROUND the corner of the house came a red trike and a sun-browned lad. The boy's small legs were pumping fast, and his mouth made the sound of a car motor with his lips pressed against his teeth. Anne felt a tug when she saw him. Jimmie had been very fond of David.

David saw them and stopped riding the tricycle. He waved. "Hello, Mrs. Bishop—Mr. Bishop. Did Jimmie come home yet?"

"No, David," Jonathan said.

"Why? He's been gone a long time."

Jonathan didn't try to answer. "Isn't that Jimmie's trike?"

"I'm keeping it for Jimmie till he wants it."

Anne looked at Jonathan. "It was in the house. How do you suppose he got it?"

David gave her a big smile. "I went in your house through the cellar. Jimmie and I do it lots of times."

From inside David's house came Peg Nevin's shrill voice, "David!"

"I'm out here, Mom," David called back.

PEG CAME to the window. "You have to come in now." Then she saw Anne and Jonathan. "Oh, hello. I didn't know you were home. I had to come away right after Jimmie's service. The girl who was staying with the children had to leave by one-thirty. She would. Now I'll have the children underfoot all afternoon, and I'm having my bridge club." She stopped suddenly and blushed. "I hope you know I care about Jimmie. I wouldn't have club today, only it's my turn, and I only have a few more months to look good in dresses." She drew her mouth down in a grimace, and a frown edged her pretty discontented face. "I swore when Sally was born she would be the last—I guess you think I'm perfectly awful—"

"You are." A smile touched Anne's lips. Peg had grumbled this same way before Sally was born.

Peg gave a short laugh, but the frown stayed. "Sally and George both have colds. I think they're running temperatures, and I still have sandwiches to make. Would you mind coming in and taking a look at them, Anne? And bring David with you. He's beginning to snifle. I don't want him to get too much wind."

Jonathan put a restraining hand on Anne's arm. "Let Peg manage her brood alone once," he said in a low voice. "It will do her good."

"She's such a kid," Anne whispered back.

"Kid!" Jonathan muttered. "She's older than you. She's always dodging responsibilities. She pushes her work off on somebody else whenever she can."

"I'll only be a minute."

"You aren't up to it—not after what you've been through."

"Sure I am."

"Shall I wait for you?" he said.

She kissed him. He looked so worried. "No, not unless you hate going into the house alone. It will be nice to have you there to open the door for me."

He pressed her hand. She watched him walk slowly across the grass. His shoulders drooped, and his hands dangled at his sides as though moving his body were an effort.

DAVID got off the tricycle, and it stood abandoned and alone for lack of a rider.

As they went toward the kitchen, he put his small hand in hers. "Do you like me?"

"Very much, David." She felt his small fingers so like Jimmie's tighten around hers.

"I've got sore throat," he said. "Mom says I'm just saying that because Sally and George are sick." He glanced up at her and the smile on his face became a cupid's bow. His dark, clipped curls gleamed in the sun, but it was Jimmie's face that she saw—two inquisitive brown eyes probing the mysteries of earth and heaven.

Peg opened the back door for them. "Don't get dirty, David. I just got him cleaned up before you came home. Get yourself a book and sit in your blue rocker."

"I want to stay with Mrs. Bishop."

"David, do as I tell you."

Peg had everything tidy. Ordinary days the place was cluttered and the children had the run of the house. But today, because there was going to be company, it was too neat, and the household was under the strain of Peg's restrictions.

The sound of Sally's crying came from the living room. David walked along with Anne, holding tightly to her hand, in spite of Peg's command to sit in the blue rocker.

Sally was lying on the floor with a doll and teddy bear unnoticed beside her. Anne picked her up and kissed the hot, flushed cheek. She stopped crying. "She's got a fever, Peg."

"Wouldn't you know? And George has, too. You wait, when he wakes up he'll raise the roof—and me with seven women coming to play bridge."

"Couldn't you call the party off?"

"How could I? The women are due here in half an hour."

"When they come, say the children are sick, and let them all go home again. They won't mind."

"I couldn't do that."

No, Anne thought, remembering Peg's tireless pursuit of pleasure. Being the kind of person you are I suppose you couldn't. "The baby needs a doctor."

"I'll call Aunt Charlotte and see if it's all right for Uncle Dick to come and take them out to her for the afternoon. She's better with kids than most doctors. Anyway, it's hard to get doctors now, the hospitals are so overcrowded in this town."

"I hope you know what you're doing," Anne said.

"It will be all right. Dave can bring them home tonight after he comes from work. They will be fine with Aunt Charlotte." She sighed and added with a twinkle in her eye, "Children are such nuisances—always getting off schedule and upsetting plans."

"Don't say it, Peg; not even in jest."

"I'm sorry, Anne. But when the children go to school, that's when I'm really going to enjoy life." Peg walked toward the telephone, her high heels clicking.

IT CROSSED Anne's mind that she could take the children. But would it be fair to Jonathan? She knew what his reaction would be if she had them all afternoon while Peg played bridge.

Peg was coming back. Her high heels clicked in triumph, and Anne knew before a word was said that Aunt Charlotte was going to take the children.

"Uncle Dick will be by for them in ten minutes. Would you mind holding Sally that long? I have to pack a bag with

*The night is chill:
I stand alone in sore distress
Within a cluttered room, all gay
With toys and trinkets to delight
A little boy.*

*A bitter ghost
Waves icy fingers at my heart
For no sweet, curl-betumbled head
Is bent in childish prayer Tonight.*

*Tonight, there's just
A loneliness and depthless pain—
Bewildered grief within that room.
My empty arms echo the cry
Of my numb heart.*

I find in humble prayer what tears,
However deep, could not avail—
Submission to the will training pants and things. And I still have those sandwiches to make."

"I don't want to go to Aunt Charlotte's," David said.

"Who said you were going?" Peg was on her way to the children's bedroom. "You aren't sick, and you're clean. You're going to stay home and recite Little Boy Blue for the ladies." She disappeared into the bedroom. In a few minutes she came out carrying a bag.

Sally had gone to sleep again in Anne's arms, and David was sitting at Anne's knee showing her a picture book when Peg came out of the bedroom.

"I'm sicker than Sally and George," David told his mother. "I'm going home with Mrs. Bishop when she goes."

"You are not." Peg put the bag down. "I don't know what you do to children, Anne, but you put a spell on them." She disappeared into the kitchen.

Anne felt Sally's fevered breath on her hand. Peg had such beautiful children, but the only time she seemed to really enjoy them was when she stood them up for her friends to admire, the way little girls displayed dolls. Other times she felt tied down, burdened by the endless cooking and work required to keep babies healthy and happy. She couldn't seem to see that a child was the most fascinating—

"Please look at the picture book, Mrs. Bishop. Don't you want to know what happens to the little gray squirrel?"

"Yes. Read about the squirrel, dear." Her eyes fastened themselves on the book. Peg's children weren't exactly neglected. It was more a shifting them from her shoulders to the shoulders of somebody else, the way she did her washing and ironing.

Uncle Dick was in the kitchen. Anne could hear Peg giving him instructions. "We'd better make a bed for George in the back seat of your car, and one for Sally in front with you. I'll give you blankets and pillows. You don't mind fixing the bed for me, do you, Uncle Dick? I'll carry George out when you are ready. Nearly everybody in town has colds. It's been such miserable spring weather—one day hot and the next cold."

When Uncle Dick came back from making the car seats into beds, Peg came through the living room on her way to pick up George. "We're ready to go," she said.

Anne walked along beside her to the car, carrying little Sally. Behind them, David and Uncle Dick carried the bag between them. George was still asleep. He wasn't acting normal for a three-year-old. She reached out and touched his hand, and her breath came sharply. This was no common cold, this fever burning him.

Anne tucked little Sally into the seat bed Uncle Dick had made for her. "If you don't need me, I'll go home, Peg. Jonathan—"

"Sure, I understand. It's too bad you don't play bridge. A little fun might—"

"Oh, I couldn't—"

"Of course, you couldn't." Peg's voice was full of sympathy.

ANNE dragged her feet toward her house. What did women without children do? How did they spend their time? If Peg had lost a child, she would still have three, and she could have other children.

Jonathan opened the door for her. "Did Peg solve her problems?"

She nodded and moved past him, her footsteps carrying her toward Jimmie's room.

"I wouldn't go in there," Jonathan said gently. He followed along behind her. "Something has happened. You aren't going to like it."

She stood in Jimmie's bedroom doorway where she had stood a thousand times before. It was a lovely room with animal murals on the walls and small child's furniture that Jimmie had loved. At first she thought the room seemed different because Jimmie was out of it, because he would never be coming back. And then she noticed that somebody had removed all the toys and books from the shelves that Jonathan had built for him—low shelves that he could reach, along the four walls. The closet door was open. The closet was empty! All Jimmie's clothes were gone!

She opened her mouth at the sight of the emptiness, but no sound came. She didn't move. Her body felt numb, and she knew she was going to have a chill.

"Your sister—" Jonathan began.

Anne straightened suddenly and found her voice. "Why should Phyllis do such a thing to us? She loves us." All at once she was angry—angry at Phyllis for daring to carry off Jimmie's things—angry at Jonathan for letting her do it.

He pulled her gently toward Jimmie's bed and made her sit down, then he sat down beside her. "I want you to listen to me, Anne, until I am through. Phyllis got the things while we were at the Talbot's."

"She'll have to bring them all back—tonight. If you knew she was going to do this to us, why did you let her?"

"I didn't know she was going to do it. She told me about it on the telephone while you were at Peg's. She wanted to talk to you."

His voice had an odd sound, and her eyes flew to his face. It looked strained and peculiar.

"Phyllis isn't a woman given to fancies," Jonathan said. "We've always admired her intelligence and sound thinking. She isn't the kind to imagine a supernatural experience."

"What are you trying to say?"

"While we were in the chapel and Brother Winters was preaching the funeral service, she said she had an open vision of Jimmie's room, and saw herself removing all his clothes and personal things, books, and toys. That's why Phyllis didn't go with us to Grace's and Jack's. She said she felt such a rage to fulfill the vision that she could hardly wait until the service was over. She made four trips with her car, bringing the things out through the cellar, the way David got the trike."

Anne stood up breathing hard. Her face was white and stricken. "The vision Phyllis had doesn't make sense. I want Jimmie's things. I don't want anyone, but us, saying what is to be done with them."

"Maybe—" Jonathan said gently, "it may be—after a few days—we'll find it will be easier to adjust ourselves to our loss—if his things are not here to remind us."

"Give me the keys to the car, Jonathan. I'm going to go and bring everything back."

He shook his head. "I can't let you do that."

"God hates us." Anne spoke through stiff lips. Then she threw herself on the bed, shaking with sobs. It was the first time she had been able to cry since Jimmie's death.

ALONG TIME afterward she went into the bathroom to bathe her swollen eyes. When she came out again, Jonathan was standing outside the door. She knew he was waiting just in case she needed him, and she knew she ought to say something gentle to him, but no words came. The house seemed too empty, as if everything she cared about was gone. He smiled at her as she went past him, and she thought, maybe he could eat something. He's eaten only a little since— She started for the kitchen, and he followed along.

As they passed through the dining room, on the floor in front of her she saw one of Jimmie's books—The Little Engine That Could. Phyllis had dropped it out of Jimmie's things, or maybe David had carried it this far when he came to get the trike. She stooped and picked it up. Jimmie had loved the story of the red and blue and yellow train that carried toys to children who lived on the other side of the mountain. Slowly she opened the book. Jonathan stood behind her, looking over her shoulder. She turned the pages one at a time, and her mind saw Jimmie's hands moving from page to page—Jimmie's brown eyes scanning the pictures. Her ears seemed to hear his gay laughter that always came during each reading, even when he had heard the story so often that he knew it by heart. When they came to the last page, Anne was smiling. She glanced at Jonathan. He was smiling, too.

"Anne, that's the story I read him last Monday night. He made me read it four times before he changed to The Rooster, the Mouse, and the Little Red Hen.

He looked at the book again, reading parts of it aloud while she took green vegetables out of the ice box for a salad, and sliced cold cuts of beef for sandwiches. He read it the way Jimmie had liked it best, with plenty of dramatic expression. She said parts of it with him, from memory, while she put food on the table. They chuckled over sentences that had always made Jimmie laugh. When they sat down at the table, the sight of the food made them suddenly hungry.

He helped her wash the dishes. "I feel good," he said. "Maybe we could take a little walk down past the church."

"No, Jonathan—not the church." The moment of peace they had captured was gone. The weight that had slipped from her shoulders for a little while had come back again. She had lost her faith. "I don't know when I will go to church again," she said. She expected him to scold her, or at least try to convince her that she was wrong, but he only smiled. "How about a walk through Washington Park?"

"I think I would like to do that."

THEY WENT to get their coats. As they were going down the porch steps, they saw Peg running toward them across the lawn. When she saw them she began gesticulating wildly and calling incoherently. She was crying, and when they hurried to meet her, she caught Anne's arms. "I have to go to Aunt Charlotte's. Pray, Anne. Pray hard."

Peg looked as if she was going to fall in a frightened heap, and Jonathan reached to support her. "What is it? What's happened?"

"I don't know." Peg's voice was growing hysterical. "Aunt Charlotte said I must hurry. And I'm not to bring David. Will you keep him for me, Anne—till Dave comes home, I mean?"

"Of course I will."

"I knew you would. Thanks. Thanks a lot." She turned to run.

"Wait!" Jonathan caught her shoulders. "I'll drive you over."

"I've ordered a taxi. That's my car now, stopping in front of the house."

"Let us know if we can help," Jonathan called after her.

"I will." She was halfway across the lawn, running fast.

"I'll take good care of David," Anne shouted after her.

"He's in the house eating ice cream." Peg was disappearing into the taxi.

"I've never seen Peg in such a state before," Jonathan said as they stood watching the taxi drive off. "Do you think I should drive over to her Aunt Charlotte's and find out what it's all about?"

Anne shook her head. "She'll telephone us if she needs us. I'm going to get David."

Jonathan turned back to the house, and Anne moved across the lawn. Peg said pray. She lifted her face to the clouds.

I can't pray. Her heart was heavy with bitterness, and she began to run toward David's house, stretching her empty arms out in front of her. If there was a God, he didn't hear, or if he heard, he didn't care. She opened the back door and flung herself into the kitchen. She was lost. It was like being alone in the woods in the dark, without a light to guide her.

DAVID was at the kitchen table with four empty ice cream dishes beside him. The fifth dish had melted ice cream in it, which he stirred lazily with a spoon, while he rested his head in his other hand. He looked heavy-eyed and sleepy.

The four empty dishes made Anne gasp. "David, did you eat all that ice cream by yourself?"

David shook his head.

"Where is it then?"

"Peter took it home in his hat." David's voice sounded thick and fuzzy.

"We don't even have a neighbor named Peter." She looked in the ice box, thinking that perhaps Peg or someone had put the ice cream back into one of the trays, but all she found was an unopened quart. There was no sign of anymore anywhere.

"My throat hurts," David said.

"You mean your stomach." Anne took the empty dishes to the sink and began washing them.

David's chin trembled, then he put his head down on the table and began to cry.

Anne went to him and gathered him in her arms. What was Peg thinking of to leave so much ice cream where he could get it? "Come on, honey, we're going to my house."

"My legs are heavy."

"I'll push you over on Jimmie's trike."

"No," he said.

"Do you want to ride piggy back? Jimmie used to love that."

"No."

She went to the telephone and called Jonathan. "You'll have to come and carry him over. I think he's going to be sick. He ate four dishes of ice cream."

Jonathan whistled, and muttered something under his breath that Anne couldn't make out. Then he hung up.

WHEN Jonathan came to carry David, Anne pushed the red tricycle home.

David was sick, there was no doubt about it. He whined and moved restlessly from room to room. Anne gave him some medicine, and tried to interest him in the trike and The Little Engine That Could, but he wanted Jimmie's toy automobiles or the electric train or the airplane—innumerable things which he looked for on Jimmie's empty shelves.

"Jonathan," Anne finally burst out, "what do you make of Phyllis and her heavenly vision now?"

"I'll go and get some of David's toys," Jonathan volunteered.

"I don't want my toys, I want Jimmie's."

"He's spoiled, Anne. Let him alone, he'll amuse himself," Jonathan said.

But he didn't. At six-thirty when Dave phoned to say he was at Aunt Charlotte's with Peg, and would they please keep David all night, David had Anne half crazy.

"Did you find out about George and Sally?" she asked when Jonathan came away from the telephone.

"They've had Doctor Green."

"But didn't he say what was the matter?"

"No, I asked, but Dave seemed worried and in a hurry to hang up."

Anne put David to bed early. He was hot and feverish. "Maybe we ought to have Doctor Green ourselves," she said once to Jonathan.

"He'll be all right. Kids always get upset when they overeat."

It was a long time before David could go to sleep. He asked for Jimmie's fuzzy rabbit, and when she said she didn't have it, he said Felix the cat would do. He cried when she said they were both gone. She sat on the edge of the bed, holding his hand and singing him a dozen different songs, and all the time she did it, her heart was heavy against Phyllis for taking Jimmie's things away.

IT MUST have been after midnight, because she and Jonathan had been in bed quite a while. She knew by Jonathan's breathing that he had gone to sleep, but she had been lying awake, thinking about Jimmie and crying. Suddenly she heard a wild call coming from Jimmie's room. Habit sent her feet flying. David lay choking and gasping for breath. His face was a scarlet red color, and when she lifted him to a sitting position, he began to cough and spit up phlegm and cry. She touched his flesh and drew her hands away from the burning heat. She was thoroughly alarmed now and began calling for Jonathan. Whatever it was that Sally and George had, David had it, too.

Jonathan came, yawning and running his fingers through his hair, but when he saw David the sleep left his eyes. He snapped to attention. "I'll call Doctor Green."

David tried to speak, and Anne knew that his throat was too sore to frame the words. A mucous was running from his mouth, and Anne brought absorbent tissues. This was not a sickness caused from eating too much ice cream.

Anne could hear Jonathan coming back. His feet moved swiftly along the hall. He came to the bed. "Doctor Green isn't home." His hand reached out and touched David's hot cheek. "How are you, fellow?"

Anne's face was white. "What are we going to do?"

"I left word. Mrs. Green said she would find him or send another doctor. I'm going after Elder Winters—"

"You'd better call Peg." Anne could hear him pulling himself into his clothes.

"I'll bring her back with me." In a moment he was gone, and Anne was alone with David.

She coaxed him to lie down, went to get a sack to hold the tissues as he used them, then she sat on the edge of the bed to watch him. The minutes ticked slowly by. All afternoon David had been telling them that he was sick, but they had not listened or even bothered to examine him or take his temperature. They had thought he was only trying to get attention for himself. She remembered the empty ice cream dishes. Probably he hadn't eaten any at all. She hadn't seen him eat any. Maybe Peg had given it to someone, or some boy may have taken it as David said. She thought of the way he had sat with his head in his hand, lazily stirring melted ice cream in his dish with his slowly moving spoon.

SUDDENLY, without any warning, David threw his head back, flexed his arms at the elbows and at the wrists, clenched his hands over enclosed thumbs, and extended his legs. His spine began to twist. His head retracted, his face contorted, his eyes squinted and turned upward, and his face became a dusky, livid hue. Anne sprang forward. It was all that she could do to hold him on the bed. "He's dying." She spoke the words between tight lips, and her frightened heart pounded in her throat. She looked around wildly, feeling the emptiness of the silent house. Then her eyes came to rest helplessly on David's moving form. An involuntary cry framed itself in her throat and moved out, echoing through the quiet room. "Please God—let—him live! You have the power—let him live!"

A noise came through David's lips like a call, then as quickly as the convulsion came it was gone. David lay motionless, his face still and pale.

Anne dropped to her knees, weeping gratefully. She had prayed! She thought she had lost her faith—now she knew that God was a part of her very being. She had reached and found a power greater than herself.

She touched David's hand. The fever was burning him still, but now she was no longer afraid. David's fingers closed over hers. He smiled. She sat in deep thought, her soul quickened by the holy spirit that enveloped her. She felt her doubts dissolving. God had answered her, she could trust her past and her future to him now.

For a long time she sat beside David, holding his hand, then she heard Peg's high heels running along the hall. Jonathan and Brother Winters and Peg had come.

When they came into the room, Anne had never seen such a subdued and quiet Peg.

"How is he?" Peg's eyes seemed too big for her face.

"He's going to be fine," Anne said.

Peg was on her knees beside the bed. "Somehow—I knew—he was going—to be all right. All of them are—getting better. I thought at first that George—"

Letters From the Isolated

To the Saints in Zion

It is with happiness and a thankful heart that I write to you these few lines and in the name of the Hannover congregation express gratitude for all the nice packages we have received. The war is now over, but still food is hard to get. You have helped to make our burdens lighter by giving us the things we stand in need of so very much. But what can we do for you? We can only pray for you each day; that is our gift from us to you. We hope that the hour will soon come when we can meet with you in Zion. God be with you until then.

We'd like to have the nonresident pastor visit us occasionally, but we can understand that it would be a tremendous task for him to see all isolated members. Perhaps a letter to each small group would be the next most encouraging thing; it could be passed from family to family, so that each isolated member would receive the message.

Reunion has proved a highlight in my life. Between reunions, I attend the Baptist Church. I feel it is better to go there on Sunday mornings than to just stay at home. My children are benefiting from the Bible studies in church school; the knowledge they receive can easily be applied to their own religion. Church attendance also gives them a chance to associate with better playmates than they would probably know if they didn't go. When my eight-year-old decided she wanted to be baptized during a revival meeting, I told her she should ask God about it. After praying for several days, she said she would wait. Then at reunion, she was baptized into the Reorganized Church. The following year, my husband joined, and then my son. Now we are all members and strong believers in the Latter Day gospel. We hope, of course, that we may some day have a church of our faith in Ft. Pierce. In fact, we have already started a building fund, although there are only six of us in this community. We shall appreciate hearing from other small groups. If anyone has suggestions on how we can build up our organization, we'll be happy to receive them.

She looked up at Anne, smiling through her tears. "Do you know how I've held myself together while I've been so scared? I've kept thinking—Anne is praying. I knew you had enough faith for both of us. It's scarlet fever."

Anne's eyes sought Jonathan's. She knew he was thinking of Phyllis. Once when she was a little girl she had had scarlet fever. Afterward everything in the room had been washed and sunned to kill the germs. And some of her things had been burned. God in his own way had prepared Jimmie's room for David's illness. And Jimmie's things were safe.

The few Saints remaining in Wagner Branch have been ministered to by various members of the priesthood from Sioux City, who come once each month for an all-day service. A great effort was made to spread the gospel in this community early in the century, but the result was not what was hoped for. I have been rather an isolated member since 1893, and I am still anxious for the work to succeed. If there are any who would be willing to hold services here, my home is open for that purpose. God has blessed me many times, and I want to help his cause in any way that I can.

I am not isolated now, but I was so recently that I can't forget it. Truly, such members know very little about nonresident pastors or reunions.

I think it is fine to participate in other churches—as long as one does not absorb their doctrines. Sometimes it is possible to subtly present the gospel message to those about you, although they are of another faith.

Our pastor used to teach at the Union church school in his community. Scenes have changed, and a member of the class is now my mother-in-law. The fairness, sincerity, tact, and enthusiasm of Brother R. fashioned an unforgettable picture of Latter Day Saintism.

My grandparents took their children to a popular church and then told them the differences in beliefs at home. Very often the minister was invited to dinner and learned with the children. My aunt took her family to her husband's church. For several years, she taught a church school class and recently three asked for baptism—in the Reorganized Church.

Participate in the activities of other churches, but work for the truth. Perhaps some day the children in your class will ask for baptism, too.

Member for Seventy-one Years

I have been isolated since 1900 when we moved to Oklahoma. My husband died three years ago, and I am all alone as far as the church is concerned. I am ninety years old and have been a member of the Reorganized Church for seventy-one years. I shall be glad to get letters from any of the Saints who care to write.

MRS. SARAH SCOTT.

To the Saints in Southern California

Garland Tickemyer, pastor of Central Church in Los Angeles, is now conducting a series of cottage meetings in our home. We hope with this beginning to interest our neighbors in the work. If there are Saints in San Fernando Valley, Reseda, Canoga Park, or Van Nuys, who would be interested in such meetings, we suggest they contact us. We are hoping to be able to establish a mission in this locality.

Will others of the faith support us with their prayers?

Looking to Zion

We are all looking forward to the redemption of Zion, but few of us are doing anything about it. We have not learned to love our neighbors as ourselves, and we do not love God with all our heart, might, mind, and strength. Until we are willing to share our food, clothes, and other worldly goods with those in need, we cannot hope to have a world at peace.

I want to do all that is in my power to speed the day when there will be no war and the nations will come to Zion to learn of her ways. Pray for me that I may have the wisdom to rear my children in a manner acceptable to Christ. My prayers are ever for the Saints.

A Letter From Holland

I have been regularly receiving the Saints' Herald for a long time. As I didn't order it myself, I know that someone must have done so for me. I am very thankful for this kindly deed. Since I am not able to attend church very often, the Herald means still more to me.

At the moment, I am on night duty in our hospital and reading the book by Inez Smith Davis, The Story of the Church. I am grateful that I am a member of this church. I know that my Redeemer lives, and my desire is to serve him always. Whatever happens, nobody or no power in the world can take our Father from us.

My sincere prayer is that God will guide his children wherever they are and help them to build his kingdom on earth.

Request for Testimonies

Two years ago, while confined to my bed and unable to walk, I started making a notebook of letters and testimonies which had appeared in the Herald. I was helped so much by these good thoughts, that I decided to make a collection of as many such testimonies as I could obtain.

At the 1946 and '47 General Conferences, I told my plan to many of the Saints who visited the Descendants Pioneer Booth and asked them to contribute to the collection. Some have responded, but others have not. I am directing this appeal to those who have had rich experiences in the church. Only when they are shared can they be of value to others. I would especially appreciate hearing from missionaries.

Grateful for Prayers

Some time ago prayers were requested for me in the Herald. I have tried since to acknowledge all the letters and cards which were sent to me, but I have been unable to, so I am taking this means of expressing my gratitude. My health has greatly improved, and I know that the prayers of my friends have helped.

Note of Thanks

I wish to thank each and every one who prayed for me during my recent illness and operation. My health has been restored, and I believe the prayers of my friends have been largely responsible for my recovery. I am truly grateful to all who remembered me.

At Home on the Campus

An introduction to Graceland's summer crew

It's a good life on the summer crew—good, that is, if you consider a table creaking under the weight of the Midwest's choice food and the fellowship of men in overalls and girls in print dresses worth more than the money you could earn in some unionized factory or large city office. Let me tell you about it.

We rise at six—with exception, of course, to those outstandingly ambitious people who get up at five to do battle on the tennis courts, and those late sleepers who can't get their eyes open a minute before six-thirty. Breakfast is served at seven—fruit, cereal, bacon and eggs, Aunt Jemima pancakes, and milk fresh from the college farm. A lot of work goes on behind the scenes to make possible the fine meals that are served. Each day, some girl vows she will start watching her figure and some fellow swears off third helpings, only to break their resolutions at the next meal. Then there are birthdays and other events calling for special fare; these are usually observed with fried chicken and banana splits.

But there's work to be done, too.

At seven-thirty, the office personnel heads for the Administration Building, and the "ground" workers go to their designated projects. It is quiet in summer along the sidewalks which, throughout the rest of the year, send up the echo of a thousand hurrying feet. There is no din of voices in the air—just the lazy chirp of a cricket or the staccato buzz of a grasshopper headed for the field.

Inside the building it is warm, stuffy—in need of ventilation. From the business office comes the mechanical click of typewriters and adding machines. The registrar's desk is camouflaged with catalogs and transcripts—prelude to the 1947-48 school year. Across the hall is a public relations worker, and to the right is the dean's office. The promotion department is a busy place, too. Arrangements must be made for the hundreds of students who plan to attend Graceland this fall.

Briggs Hall is subdued by the summer heat. Abe Lincoln keeps his post without the usual decorations—no hats, no scarves, no textbooks. In the library, a stack of books awaits inventory, and a girl works by herself on the far side of the room.

Outside, the grounds are being prepared for action—this year will feature a new tennis court. There are other projects, too—a new classroom building, new offices, a liberal paint job on the old buildings, and new lights.

Summer crew spells more than working and eating, however. There's an atmosphere of friendliness that is seldom found elsewhere. A two-day vacation for any member of the crew means a farewell party and a grand welcome home. If a girl gets married, she is "showered" with ceremony, and all hands are on deck for the wedding. If a prospective father is pacing the floor, the crew paces with him. Even "T," the office boy, finds a place in everyone's heart, although he is notorious for fishing mice out of wastebaskets and freeing them to roam the campus. "T" has also contributed numerous snakes, toads, and baby turtles to the fountain.

Evenings are always looked forward to. On Wednesday nights, there is fellowship service. On Thursdays, swimming at Leon and a cool trip home on a blanket in the back of the college truck. Friday is skate night in the college gym, and it's an excellent chance for beginners to learn "among friends." One summer session is ample time to make a steady skater of anybody who wants to learn.

Independence Day will be among the unforgettables. Crew members joined with the Lamoniites to stage an old-fashioned Fourth of July celebration, complete with parade and fireworks. The all-purpose truck became a float for the occasion, with various representatives of the crew riding in glory before a crowd of ad-

Youth and the Prayer Service

Young people and their relationship to the church have always been regarded as somewhat of a problem, especially in the matter of prayer services.

Unfortunately, many young people overlook the privilege of going in prayer to a personal God, a hearing God, a moving God, who is vitally interested in them and their well-being. Too often, he is regarded as a monarch who sits with folded arms, oblivious to any problems, pains, or heartaches of his subjects. But, as President Edwards has said, God doesn't force himself into our lives. It is up to us to take the initiative, and prayer is the avenue of approach we must use to establish contact.

ming spectators. Then there was reunion with its hundreds of worshipers climbing the hill daily to attend meetings in the tent. It was good to hear the drone of voices and the shouts of children making the most of a chance to play before settling down to another year of school. The quietness that followed was like the day after commencement; a sort of nostalgia sweeps over you as you wave good-bye to the last car rolling down the hill in a cloud of dust.

The best thing of all about this summer at Graceland has been the association with people who share a common goal. Although business is transacted in much the same way as at any other college, it is common to hear a review of the high lights of last Wednesday's fellowship or such questions as, "Have you heard from Brother C. lately?" or "Is that this week's Herald?" while bits of a Latter Day Saint hymn drift in the window from the workers outside.

Soon the sidewalks will be crowded again, and we'll be caught up in the whirl of college routine, but through it all, we'll keep a shining memory of the many happy hours summer brought.

Christ was weary like the disciples on the night they slept while he prayed, yet he knew that his Father would help him. This the disciples failed to realize, just as we fail to realize that we can be helped by appealing for divine assistance. Huge amounts of money are spent every day for legal advice; without money, that council is not available. God has no office hours. He keeps the light burning incessantly and, although he asks a price, it is one we can all pay. He asks only our love and service.

Christ told his followers to go to their closets and pray. The importance of silent prayer is not to be minimized, but we are also admonished to assemble in the house of the Lord, to minister to others as well as to receive strength ourselves. This opportunity is offered to laymen and priesthood alike.

Seeing the deceit and hypocrisy in the hearts of the Pharisees and Sadducees, Christ told his followers, "Thy Father who seeth in secret, himself shall reward thee openly." This statement by the Master does not discount the value of prayer service, however. In the vicissitudes of life, many falter and lose faith. They yearn for God, they want him, but they seemingly cannot come as near to him as they desire. God, understanding this human tendency, has said, "Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees." Prayer service offers us this opportunity. Perhaps the man or woman sitting beside you is looking for someone who can re-establish his faith. God intends that we share our gifts; if one of his children is without, we must give wholeheartedly of ours.

By LARRY HAWK

Young people invariably will support their own services in preference to general prayer services. They not only attend—they participate. Some of the most sincere prayers and testimonies originate in youth fellowships. Unfortunately, many young people feel they have no place in a mixed-age group. If they do attend, they seldom contribute. More often they stay at home.

Here Is the Writer . . .

Larry Hawk was born, reared, and educated in Clinton, Iowa. He attended the Methodist Church until he was twelve, where, he says, "I rang the bell and did other janitorial duties." He became a member of the Reorganized church in 1931. During the war, he served in the Eighth Air Force, one year in the States and two years in England. He is at home again now in Clinton.

Certainly, all phases of work and worship must dovetail in this kingdom-building program. Youth and age must recognize their dependency upon each other and learn to worship together. Perhaps the key to successful prayer service is sincerity. Young people are not inspired by long and repetitious supplications for deliverance or a series of memoirs, recited complacently week after week. Every word must be vital and meaningful.

A pillar in the church of tomorrow may be maneuvered into place more quickly through the conscientious contribution you make in the church of today.

like to greet them. I feel I never quite know a student until I meet the parents. Usually, when parents visit college, students introduce them to me. I know that this may be a turn-around of technical etiquette, but I always look to the spirit rather than to the form. Sometimes the dad is not at home in the academic situation. Often the student is not practiced in the art of introductions. All this is secondary. I shall always get a thrill when a youth says proudly and happily, "This is my Dad!" When the tone of voice reveals that son or daughter and father are glad to be together, have something in common, and then sit side by side as we gather for worship, there is a thrill that warms my heart. Somewhere in that family circle, parent and child have planned together this going away to college, this life together in the Church of Jesus Christ, this social communication that prompts the visit. The name becomes secondary. It is the title that matters—the title "Dad." On these times I find myself resolving to be a parent so that my own son and daughter will be able to consider me a companion and gladly say, "This is my Dad."

Married Sixty Years

Mr. and Mrs. Harm Alles, Sr., of Rockford, Michigan, celebrated their sixtieth wedding anniversary on Sunday, August 24, at the home of their daughter, Mrs. Florence Schultz, in Rockford. They were married on August 26, 1887, at Grand Rapids, where they resided for five years before moving to a farm at Little Pine Island Lake. Twelve years later they made their home in Cannon Township, moving from there to Rockford, where they have lived the past twenty-five years. Both Mr. and Mrs. Alles (the former Wilhelmina Vos) are natives of the Netherlands. They have two sons, Jacob of Howard City and Adrian of Rockford; two daughters, Mrs. Florence Schultz and Mrs. Anna Christiansen of Greenville; fourteen grandchildren, and seven great-grandchildren.

She was married to George William McCormick on December 2, 1900. She became a member of the Reorganized Church in 1914 and was always a devoted worker.

She is survived by her husband, George, of Sheridan; four sisters: Mrs. Costa Cease, West Columbia, South Carolina; Mrs. Maggie Jasper, Jefferson City, Missouri; Mrs. Mary L. Brown, San Diego, California; and Mrs. Geneva B. Garretson of Sheridan; and three brothers: Roy of St. Louis, Missouri; Selsus and Wiley of Columbia, Missouri.

Pastor Paul Sargent officiated at the funeral service. Burial was in Sheridan Municipal Cemetery.

TWOMBLY.—Bettie Williams Hopkins, was born June 7, 1861, in Atchison, Kansas, and died at Highland, Kansas, on August 25, 1947. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since she was eight years old. Her husband, Patriarch Samuel Twombly, preceded her in death thirteen years ago.

She is survived by four daughters: Mrs. Maud Hixon of Highland; Mrs. Ida Jeschke, Troy, Kansas; Mrs. Fannie Jeschke, St. Joseph, Missouri; and Mrs. Vera Ratcliffe, Arlington, Virginia; three sons: George Hopkins of Troy; Ray and William Twombly of Sparks, Kansas; a sister, Mrs. Ida Banks of Highland; a brother, E. J. Williams of Denver, Colorado; thirty-seven grandchildren, and twenty-seven great-grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted at the Reorganized Church in Fanning. Elder O. Salisbury was in charge, assisted by Elder W. F. Bolinger. Interment was in the Troy, Kansas, cemetery.

DOZIER.—Thomas M., was born in Yell County, Arkansas, on May 10, 1870, and passed away July 18, 1947. He moved to Oklahoma in 1887, where he took up residence at Caston. On September 9, 1890, he was married to Nellie Clanton. Joining the Reorganized Church in 1905, he was an active worker until 1932 when ill health forced him to retire.

He leaves his wife, Nellie, of Okmulgee,

Oklahoma; two sons: W. O. of Okmulgee and J. H. of McAllister, Oklahoma; two daughters: Mrs. Hattie Hegwood of Dayton, Texas, and Mrs. Exie Clanton of Macomb, Oklahoma; a sister, Mrs. Martha Lewis of Pauls Valley, Oklahoma; twenty grandchildren; and eight great-grandchildren.

EVANS.—David A., son of Francis A. and Elizabeth Evans, was born October 4, 1886, at Taylorsville, Pennsylvania, and passed away August 21, 1947, in Kansas City, Missouri. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church when he was eight years old. In 1907, he was married to Lillian West; five children were born to this union. A daughter, Lillian, died in infancy.

Surviving are his wife; three sons: David G., Robert A., and Francis A.; a daughter, Margaret V. Conners; five sisters; two brothers; and five grandchildren. The funeral was held at the Freeman Parlors in Kansas City, Apostle Blair Jensen officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery in Independence.

EBSWORTHY.—Emilie, was born December 23, 1879, in England and died April 28, 1947, in Canada. Coming to Canada in 1909, she lived in Guelph, Ontario, for eleven years and London for twenty-seven years. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since February, 1918.

She is survived by her husband, Samuel; two sons, Archie and Percy; a daughter, Eva Mae; a sister, Alice; three brothers: William, Jack, and James; and two grandchildren. One daughter preceded her in death in England. The funeral was held in London, Ontario, Elder A. W. Sheehy and Evangelist J. E. Macgregor officiating. Interment was in Mount Pleasant Cemetery.

BUSH.—Donald Paul, son of Ernest and Mildred Bush, was born December 9, 1925, and died at his home in Doylestown, Ohio, after an illness which lasted three and a half years. A graduate of Doylestown High School, he was also a member of the Barberton, Ohio, Reorganized Church.

He is survived by his parents; three brothers: Frank of Barberton; Richard and Jack of the home; and four sisters: Helen, Doris, and Marcene of Doylestown, and Betty Ann of Barberton. Funeral services were held Saturday afternoon at the home; Elders James McConaughy and Grover Douglas officiating. Burial was in Chestnut Hill Cemetery.

MCGUIRE.—James T., of Mobile, Alabama, died July 13, 1947. He is survived by two sons: James T., Jr., and Russell McGuire; and one grandson, all of Mobile. Elder A. Orlin Crowover conducted the funeral service at the Reorganized Church in Mobile. Interment was in the Pine Crest Cemetery.

PAGE.—Mattie Mae, daughter of James Stewart and Ladonia Fitchett Stewart, was born September 15, 1893, in Wewoka, Oklahoma, and died August 4, 1947, at Greenville, Texas, following an illness of several months. She was married on October 16, 1910, to W. F. Page, who survives her. A member of the Reorganized Church, she was a devoted worker throughout her life.

Besides her husband and mother, she leaves three sons: Delmar Lee of Tonkawa, Oklahoma; Doyle and Roy of Greenville; four daughters: Mrs. Dorothy Simpson of Mesa, Arizona; Mrs. Betty Mackie of Greenville; Mrs. Gladys Jones and Mrs. Juanita Lewis of Tonkawa; a brother and sister; and nine grandchildren. Elder H. E. Davenport of Dallas, Texas, officiated at the funeral, assisted by Paul Hacker.

BRANT.—Minnie Alleen, daughter of Otto and Mary Elizabeth Baumgartel, was born April 30, 1875, at Cave Springs, Kansas, and died August 7, 1947, at Winfield, Kansas. On May 23, 1896, she married William Brant; three children were born to this marriage. One son, Ervin LaVern, preceded her in death in 1935. She was an active member of the Reorganized Church for as long as her health permitted. She also belonged to the Royal Neighbors Lodge.

She leaves her husband, a son, Earl W., and a daughter, Mrs. Nona Bellman, all of Winfield; a sister, Mrs. Cora Richardson of Howard, Kansas; a brother, Lou Baumgartel of Fall River, Kansas; four grandchildren; and one great-grandchild. Services were conducted at the Morris Funeral Home by Elder D. J. Williams.

NIEMAN.—August H., was born in 1865 and died June 4, 1947, in Columbus, Ohio. He was an elder and one of the first people to establish the work of the Reorganized Church in Columbus.

The Country Preacher

He stands, his big, work-hardened hands
Grasping with sternness the crude pulpit,
His hands that till the soil,
That sow the seed, and guide a plow,
His hands which can be gentle for all their strength
And tender on a newborn calf;
His eyes look out upon his listeners,
His eyes which gaze across great fields of waving wheat
And tasseled corn,
Knowing them to be the bounty of the Lord.
And then he speaks,
Not flowing phrases from a poet's tongue,
Nor smoothly spoken thoughts as from a book,
Just the simple beauty
Of the gospel
Pours in a golden torrent
From his lips,
Blessed with the spirit of sincerity
And truth.
And listening souls are touched with tears—
—And light—
Because he knows,
He knows!

Rebirth of History

IN CELEBRATING the pioneer days and memorializing the three great trails that fanned out across the unsettled prairies toward Sante Fe, California, and Oregon, the city of Independence revived the color and drama of its historic past. In a spirit of complete friendliness and good will, descendants of the Indians and the pioneers of all races participated in the celebration. Old border tensions and animosities were forgotten, the strife and danger were left behind. In its revivals, history is ingeniously (and sometimes ingenuously) transformed to fit the modern mood of tolerance and co-operation.

Independence barred its main streets, banned automobiles in the blocks around the square, and gave the space to thousands of visiting pedestrians, and to the ox teams, the floats, and the cavalcade of horses and horsemen during the parades. Certainly it is refreshing to the nerves to be free for even so short a time from the noise, the fumes, and the strain of motor traffic. It makes one wish such occasions could occur more frequently, or that some designer of cities of the future would arrange certain streets with steps, blockades, and terraces so that motor traffic could never go there, reserving special traffic arteries for them.

Some Independence men grew beards to give atmosphere to the celebration. Ladies, catching the spirit, dressed in long skirts and bonnets. Pioneer camps were set up in the streets, an Indian village was established, the façade of a fort was built. It was a changed city—a combination of historical pageantry, circus, county fair, carnival, and resort life.

HISTORY, AS such, was treated respectfully, but with a light touch of sentiment and fantasy, and not a little whimsy and fun. We like to remember the things that were good and pleasant, and to forget those that were hard.

The passing of the years brings many changes. Some of them are altogether good and admirable, regardless of what the critics may say. Church members participated in all city affairs, did their share of the work, bore their share of the responsibility. Several of the young ladies who served as queens on the various days, and presided over various functions, were our own young people, and were as beautiful as any.

Some may regard the Santa-California Festival as not important in the more serious work of the world. But such a celebration does a great deal to unite a community, to broaden people's appreciation of each other, to engage them in cooperative activities. When the confetti is swept up, the horses are sent back to their pastures, the costumes returned to their museums and closets, and noisy motors once more permitted on the square, the city of Independence will return to its serious work in a happy mood, and with pleasant memories.

BELEATEDLY, MANY people are beginning to realize the great interest and importance that exists in the early history of our country, especially pioneer times in definite localities. Unhappily, some families cling to old diaries, letters, and records, only to have them burned when someone dies and the survivors know nothing of their value. Such things should better be kept safe with college and university historical departments, or with state organizations. All documents relating to church and branch history should be given to the general church, its library, or the historical department.

Our own young people attending the universities are beginning to turn their attention to our history, some of them conducting serious historical researches, some of them writing novels. Many good things will come as a result of their work. These efforts would be facilitated if historical items were available for them to study here at church headquarters. Every record has a potential usefulness for future historical research workers.

ONE OF our prominent Independence pastors commented appreciatively on the increase of inter-church co-operation and good will, and expressed the belief that all parties benefit by them. If history has taught us any lessons, it has taught us the futility of competition and strife. In history we find that we have a common heritage, common problems, and many worthy goals and objectives alike. Christian people have one great task to share—to make this a Christian country, a Christian world. The same dangers and foes threaten us. We must work to solve many of the same problems. Christian people have more in common with each other than they have with the pagan world. As they help each other, they all become stronger. It will be a good day for the church when our people everywhere engage and help in all good community efforts and live as genuine friends of all men.

The Christian faith has always fought a struggle for existence against the pagan forces of the world. Every church that bears the name of Christ has felt its share of the burden and danger. What a pity churches have expended so much strength opposing each other, leaving them so weak before the greater enemies of mankind! While standing for the truth, we need to know and appreciate our friends, working with them for a better world.

Notice of Appointment of Bishop's Agent, Wisconsin District

September 12, 1947

Notice is hereby given of the appointment of Brother W. E. Ford, 3038 North 36th Street, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, as Bishop's Agent of the newly organized Wisconsin District. Solicitors are hereby notified to send their reports for the month of September and each succeeding month thereafter to Brother Ford at the above address.

With the organization of the new district from the former Southern and Northern Wisconsin Districts, we regret to advise that the services of Brethren R. H. Brigham and A. H. McCormac, who served as Bishop's Agents in these districts, will no longer be needed in this capacity. Both men have served the church ably and devotedly in the past, and we take this opportunity of expressing our sincere appreciation to them for the services given and to wish them every success in their continuing ministry in the new district.

We have appreciated the support given by the Saints to Brethren Brigham and McCormac, and take this opportunity of commending Brother Ford to the Saints for their favorable consideration and support.

THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC,

We don't want sympathy

We Want Support

Says Seventy Albert A. Scherer, Missionary to Holland

ONE OF the biggest challenges that ever confronted us came at the recent General Conference, when we were asked to go minister to the Saints in Holland. Our feelings at the time were indescribable. When we accepted the challenge, we could feel the inward assurance that God was pleased with our decision. And so we have set our faces toward the new task, and each day we pray that we may continue to be humble, and shall wisely utilize every moment that we may be better prepared to serve.

Already, many people have extended sympathy to us. While we appreciate the concern of our friends, we do not want their sympathy. Every church appointee gives himself to the cause of spreading the gospel and establishing the kingdom of God on earth. Our particular assignment is not greatly different from that in which we had been engaged—only the field is different. We will be among people such as we find in America. In Holland we expect to meet all types of people—kind and unkind, rich and poor, proud and humble, devout and carefree, righteous and sinful. But we find these in America, too.

All reports indicate that we have some very fine church workers in the Netherlands. There are some 320 members on record as of December 31, 1946. Those who know these Saints speak of them as a devoted and zealous people. We are told that in the past six years, five of which Holland was under Nazi occupation, our church maintained a percentage of baptismal increase at least equal to ours in America for the same period of time, and without the help of general church appointees!

No, we do not want sympathy; we want support. We need support. To measure up to the demands of a group so active, and to bring such comfort and encouragement as may be necessary, will require an alert and satisfying ministry. Nor is it this demand alone that prompts us to ask for your support. We are going to a nation that has suffered terribly from the ravages of war. We will be carrying the banner of Jesus Christ to a country that is threatened to be overrun by militant godlessness.

Now it is logical for you to ask, "How can we support you?" In answer to this question, we suggest three ways. First, build into your lives the principles of Zionite righteousness. You can begin on yourself, then let it reach into your homes, your branches, and your communities. For, after all, our objective is Zion and the preparation of a righteous people to meet Christ. As we grow in righteousness, spiritual strength shall be generated in increasing measures and even those abroad shall partake of its stimulating ministry.

Secondly, you will be supporting us by reaching out in missionary endeavors. This gospel of the kingdom is to be preached to everyone in all parts of the world. Do you realize that inasmuch as you share with your friends the message and Spirit of Jesus Christ, you are aiding in the fulfillment of a prophecy and vision of the Saviour of the world? And you are supporting us, because as more people are won to Christ, more will in turn serve him, both in America and abroad. It is to this work that we give ourselves. Will you support us by doing your share at home?

The Scherer family: Albert, Twila, and son James Michael

Last, but by no means least, you can give support by financially strengthening the church. Keep paying your tithing. Besides being your "reasonable service," it is also a great privilege.

It is indeed reassuring to us to know that the Zion's League is so deeply interested in missions abroad. The project it has undertaken is a definite indication of the young people's support. We deeply appreciate this. It's going to take much effort and perhaps some sacrifice for them to raise $25,000, but as they do this, they can truly feel that their efforts are being united with ours, and that together, with the help of God, we can accomplish the work that is before us. The church is expecting us to do our part well in Europe; likewise, we are expecting the members at home to serve faithfully in their areas.

It is our testimony that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God. We love him, and into his hands we entrust our lives. We feel that membership in his church is both the greatest privilege and responsibility in our life. We would let nothing hinder us from giving of our time, talents, and loyalties to it. While we

Say Nothing But REPENTANCE

A Message to the Youth of the Church--by Arthur A. Oakman

DURING THE years of preparation for his ministry, Jesus had many times compared those idealisms which were born in communion with his father with the kingdoms of this world. He found that there was an enormous difference among them. This was confirmed to him through the preaching of John, and He accepted baptism at the hands of his cousin, because he saw in the ordinance, which typifies death and resurrection, the means by which the gap between the two worlds—this world and his father's kingdom—could be effectively bridged. After his baptism came the testing in the wilderness. In this experience, he had to think through, in light of his communion with God, what means and methods were to be used in bringing heaven to earth. He came from the wilderness of temptation (which, strictly speaking, was more of a wilderness of communion) and began to cry, "Repent; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."—Matthew 4: 16.

So radical was the difference between what Jesus had seen and what those around him understood, that he saw those who composed the sinful world order were unfit for the kingdom of God. But in spite of shall be praying for you, we shall be strengthened in our work to know that you are praying for each other, for us, and for the Saints in all our missions abroad.

We shall be pleased to hear from you while we are in Europe. We especially invite those who have friends or relatives there (whether or not they are members of the church) to send us their names and addresses, and any other information concerning them.

this, the kingdom-spirit was seeking men, for an invitation such as he offered could mean only that God wanted to share it with them. Here, in this proclamation, was the fruit of his triumph over temptation—a divine offer—without compulsion—which respected utterly the free will of humanity, and yet demanded adjustment upon man's part. God will not consort with or condone sin; yet he will not force us to be righteous. It is the revelation of his goodness that leads us to repentance. (Romans 2: 4). We can only be led to repentance. We cannot be driven to it. As Studdert-Kennedy has aptly put it, "You cannot make a man fear hell until you have made him love God."

This respect for man's freedom is one characteristic which is distinctive of all Christ's work. "Change your mode of life—because something better is coming." It is very important to note that Jesus did not accept men as they were. Evil men could give good gifts, but until they repented, they remained evil just the same. There is a vast difference between doing good and being righteous. Christ was eager to commend natural goodness or charity, but kingdom provisions are not to be varied or changed to suit us—no matter how much good we may do. We must make the adjustment if the higher glory is to be secured. The ministry of Jesus always demands repentance.

An alien cannot lay down the terms upon which he can become a citizen of the United States. Those terms are fixed by Congress. He may be able to recite the constitution and tell all about the history of this country. He may know how democracy works. But knowing all this does not admit him or even fully qualify him for admittance. Besides being willing to declare his allegiance, through definite acts and oaths that he does not devise, he must satisfy accredited representatives that he has no ulterior motives and that his record, in the country from which he seeks admittance to this one, was clean. The honest, upright subjects of other countries make the best immigrant citizens.

Similarly, we cannot determine how or on what grounds he may gain entrance into the kingdom of God. He determines that. We may know all the Scriptures, and be able to recite the Sermon on the Mount (which is the law of the kingdom), but unless we can assure accredited representatives that we have no ulterior motives and that our record is clean, and unless we are willing to conform to the terms Deity lays down, we can never participate in the constructive work of the kingdom.

The first requisite for admission to the kingdom is willingness to be done with past habits of life and thought, because we are convinced of the better way of life. We must freely, and wholeheartedly comply with the terms of admittance. No one can enter the kingdom unless he repents—no matter how many times he is immersed. In proclaiming the gospel to the kingdom then, in public places, in our homes, in private conversation, our whole motive should be to so witness to the glory and hope of the kingdom that men, seeing this, will be led to make the adjustment that the kingdom demands of them.

We cannot be effective in evangelism if we know nothing of the glory we wish to convey. Men talk glibly today of heaven and hell. They know nothing about either. The idea, being pushed forward now and heard frequently on the radio from eminent divines, that "it doesn't matter which road you go, we shall all get there just the same" is absolutely contrary to all scriptural teaching and violates common sense. We insist that what the government of this country has a perfect right to do, God has a perfect right to do with regard to admittance to his country, and that is to lay down the terms upon which one can enter. Those terms are, according to the One who revealed God to us, repentance and baptism—repentance that issues in baptism, repentance that is absolute with no reservations, repentance that sees in this life nothing but death and desires to rise to a new life, repentance that makes a man willing to go down into the "watery grave" and to be raised therefrom to walk in newness of life. Repentance which goes deeper than willingness to comply with formulas, repentance which changes our whole life purpose—motive, thought and interest—is the first prerequisite for admittance into the kingdom of God, and the first fruits of such repentance is baptism.

Let the young people tell that to this generation, without rancor, yet candidly, fearlessly, and under the providence of God.

A BOOK REVIEW

This Love of Ours

By Leslie R. Smith. Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1947, 100 pages, price $1.00.

This splendidly written little book is meant for the newly married husband and wife to help them make their home life a success. It has been written with fine understanding and good sense. It is at once practical, beautiful, and inspiring. In a tactful way the author deals with nearly all of the problems that are likely to arise in the life of young people establishing their home. The advice is kindly and wholesome and should be welcomed by all who take their married life seriously. Ministers who wish to make a small gift to the couple they have married will find this book more valuable than any more expensive presents for furnishing the home.

At the Business Session

By Emma M. Phillips

DURING the opening business session of the last General Conference, I sat beside one of those "dear little ladies." She wore a pert hat of lavender feathers. Her dress was a sedate black, trimmed with crisp, white lace. Her physical body was there at the meeting, but her mind was there only spasmodically.

She began her contribution to the meeting by writing six or seven post cards. The vacant chair at her side became a display table for her correspondence. After counting them, she nudged me and inquired, "Do you happen to have seven one-cent stamps, Honey?" When I answered in the negative, she seemed to deem it necessary to explain the circumstance that brought about her having no stamps. Her correspondence completed as much as possible, she collected her cards, filed them in her purse, and closed it with a "click." Then her head nodded, and she was asleep.

The business meeting progressed. At the height of the announcement about Apostle Rushton's being released from the quorum, she awakened and inquired of me, "What did they say? Is he being put into a higher office?" I started to answer her question, but stopped. If I took time to explain the announcement to her, I would miss part of the meeting—the first I had ever had the privilege of attending. I wondered whether it would be better to explain and miss the business meeting, or to tell her that I didn't know what was happening. I hastily decided upon the latter. So I sat there in our venerable Auditorium and told a little white lie. "I'm sorry, I can't hear what is being said. It must be the speaking system."

She agreed that there was still a lot to be done in perfecting the system. That, apparently, seemed sufficient reason for not listening. She opened her Conference Hymnal and began to read. Whether her mind was deeply engrossed in her reading, or whether it was with the folks back home, I'll never know. But at the time when Apostle Gleazer was speaking in favor of Maurice L. Draper's being ordained an apostle, she aroused with, "Oh, isn't that just too bad. Isn't that awful?"

I must have given her a most surprised look, for she breathlessly asked, "Did not they say Maurice Draper just died?"

It didn't seem as though another little white lie would adequately settle this matter. I explained that Maurice Draper was not dead, but that he was called to be an apostle. The answer proved satisfactory. She opened her purse, took out her cards and her pencil. She read the cards and returned them to her purse. There was a sharp little "click" again as the purse closed. A second after it snapped shut, she opened it and took out her small blue notebook. She made a series of notes, and counted something on her fingers.

At the close of the meeting, as the congregation started to sing "The Spirit of God Like a Fire Is Burning," she collected her possessions and prepared to leave. But before she made her way in front of the line of standing people, she leaned over and explained, "Take my advice, Honey, leave when they start the last hymn. Then you can get out without being jammed in this crowd."

When I smiled at her, she added, "Looks like this is going to be a right, promising good conference." Then she was gone.

The secret of hypocrisy is the desire to appear well without paying the price it costs.

Gloucester Cathedral

ENGLAND

As We Saw It

By Earnest A. Webbe and Virginia Webbe Bricker

MANY OF OUR friends in the gospel work would like to know of our recent trip to England by plane and how it came about. We had become accredited delegates for several societies to represent the United States at the Eleventh International Vegetarian Congress held near Gloucester. There being no best passage available, it was a matter of air travel or nothing, so on July 24, we boarded a four motor clipper, making our first stop at Gander, Newfoundland. Then in the northern twilight, we made the long-hop (eleven hours), broken only by the green mosaic of Ireland's fields, and had breakfast at Shannon. An hour or so later we were in London, after a half century of citizenship in "Joseph's favored land."

Our objective was a conference embodying all that our own Word of Wisdom philosophy promises at its best, and our pockets were comfortably filled with leaflets and booklets of our faith, which the Lord gave us opportunity to use. At La Guardia Airport, we received a large basket of fruit, gloriously beribboned that we were to carry as a greeting from the societies of America to the Conference assembled from the Eastern World. As we carried this magnificent gesture about, we were offered assistance by an honor group of Boy Scouts from Haiti; they spoke French, so we could not converse well, but politeness is understood in all tongues, and we became acquainted on the plane and at stops, exchanging cards (and tracts) which were received graciously.

Settled in London, we reported to the society offices and then set out to view something of the city. We found the people lively and courageous in the face of many hardships. Long lines awaited the doling out of bread. If one wants cake, such as it is, it decreases one's bread allotment. Meat shops were well supplied, but only because points were so high that few could buy. Fish stores were widely patronized, as were the fruit and vegetable stalls. The inevitable "pub" was everywhere. Later, we saw great breweries and thousands of acres of grain being harvested by American combines and tractors. Because they must have their "spirits," the English use four fifths of the grain yield for liquor and cattle feed, while housewives stand in line by the hour for bread.

Seeing this field of humanity so "white unto harvest" amid the tumbled ruins of acres of what had once been stores and homes, I think I came nearer to the great White Throne that night as I flung open the casements and stretched out imploring hands over the streets and rooftops in the certainty that God will yet richly bless them and heal their hurts. They do not look at the great gaping areas now covered with wild flowers, vines and ferns like gigantic rock gardens. Rather they look at those who see anything of interest in it. They have no pictures to sell of its morbidity. They have other things to concern them: longer hours, lower purchasing values, the eternal struggle to keep within means.

Around St. Paul's is a wilderness of broken masonry, but the famous Cathedral, though hit twice, was not extensively damaged. All the bridges across the Thames are intact, but here and there are evidences of great blasts in its banks that tell how near destruction came. In the great rush of traffic, one forgets that proximity only to be reminded suddenly by huge gutted walls and timber-braced fronts that stand as monuments to the days and nights when hell rained out of the skies.

On a Sunday morning, when all was fair and a measure of Sabbath calm prevailed, we found our way by "tube" and bus out to Enfield to meet with the Saints there, getting acquainted with Apostle Arthur Oakman's father who presides there. We also saw Brother William Goullee who honored us with a visit years ago in the States. We were invited to dinner by the Judds and spent an hour or so with others, tracing the neighborhood for the coming reunion services.

The morning found us entrained for the Welsh borderlands, which we reached after an hour or so of express travel. There we located Brother and Sister Trapp who had just about got settled down after their visit to the States, including a short stop at Kirtland, where we met them and Brother Barrington of Manchester. Brother Trapp took us about town in the early morning, visiting the magnificent Cathedral and the humble home of the very first church school instituted by Robert Raikes in a quaint little side street. Raikes' more pretentious half-timbered home on a main street is usually shown tourists. Brother Trapp cheerfully used precious coupons to obtain potato chips for us when he learned of our weakness for them. The Trapps are fine people, and the Saints think much of them.

Our meeting place for the Congress had a large and well-appointed group of commodious buildings from which the students had been dismissed for their vacation. The committee of headmasters had placed the institution at the service of the International Vegetarian Union, of which one of the masters, William M. Sibly, was president and his own father a founder of one of the houses where half of the boys elected to live daily on what I can best describe as a strict Word of Wisdom diet and the other forty or so a liberalized diet such as some of our own thoughtful Saints observe. These two groups (with recorded results covering half a century) continually vie with each other in various college athletic and scholastic teams. The array of trophies, cups, and plaques won is amazing.

Here we were housed and dined without evidence of stint. As overseas delegates, we were accorded all privileges without cost, and government allowance was made for feeding the 150 or more delegates sojourning in this beautiful part of the Cotswolds for a week.

Many of these delegates had hard experiences to report, for the war had intervened since the last congress. Some spoke in measured, perfect English, later to revert, in the fervor of greeting, to their native tongue, which one of the presiding men would note and explain. Hence, there was had of necessity, "tongues and interpretation of tongues." There was an opening banquet at which toasts were drunk (in orange squash) to the various nations represented and responses called for in due order. Beside the British Isles (including both North and South Ireland) were Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, France, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Burma, India, and Zanzibar. It may not be amiss to "tell one" on us. The Danish representative (a tennis champion) ruefully remarked that he could follow the drift of all the speakers except the one from United States. We thereon valued more the deliberate and carefully worded phrases of our foreign confreres. There was pathos in describing what some of these people had suffered in keeping their association intact, when suspicion and persecution and political oppression abounded on every hand. To meet without undue recognition at a common coffee house and "conduct" the meeting by the way the cup was held or the coffee stirred, of the weakening of hale bodies when rations were shared with the less fortunate, of camp imprisonment and death—such were soul-gripping stories. There was a pause for silent prayer for those gone, and these yet under duress. Here were met on common ground: Quakers, Theosophists, Christian Scientists, Unitarians, Buddhists, Adventists, Latter Day Saints, High Church, and no church at all

But I must tell also of the motor coach trips to Shakespeare's land and lunch on the Memorial Theater Pavilion overlooking the beautiful Avon, of Anne's Cottage, and Tewkesbury Cathedral. We skirted Oxford and Banbury and spent a wonderful hour in Gloucester Cathedral; we were fortunate indeed to see it with its magnificent windows which had been put away for safety during the destructive days. It was richer by far in a spiritual way than Westminster Abbey, which to us seemed cluttered up with sarcophagi, chapels, and memorials of good and great men of all time. We made a short detour to visit an ancient beam-ceilinged barn, which tradition recorded had sheltered the coach and retinue of Queen Elizabeth when overtaken by a storm en route to the old Roman waters at Bath. The spacious "barn" would have made a beautiful church interior in any other part of the world than this country of cathedrals. This was the land of King Arthur and his nobles of the Round Table. We visited also an ancient British burial ground on the hillcrest and the ruins of Roman fortifications built in Christ's time. Legend maintains that Jeremiah the Prophet visited these parts. We made a side trip into Wales and visited Caerleon. Here, also, were druidical remains and fortifications of a walled citadel and a large arena without for the "sport" of the Roman garrison—sport that pitted its victims against the famished wild beasts of forest and moor. We saw the cell pits of the victims and cages for the animals they faced. After this it was heavenly to tread the green of the eleventh century church and hear the minister sing the Psalm, with the response by the congregation.

Then there were hikes over the beautiful countryside—a master canvas painted by divine hands with thatched cottages of stonewall and dainty-paned casements. All interurban busses are stilled on Sunday morning, and the air is silvered with the chimes and carillons of scores of churches echoing from the hills.

Back in London we saw services being conducted under blackened beams or no roof at all. Commenting on it, an old neighbor said, "What of it? Wasn't God first worshiped in the open?" Let's thankful be we may worship God "in the open."

The Congress ended with a marked degree of fellowship. At the score of dining tables, each seating six or eight persons, we changed about daily, fraternizing with all. There was a farewell dinner after the final business meeting, at which Holland was selected as the next place for convening (within three years). The speeches of appreciation from each country were more readily understood than at opening sessions. After an early morning breakfast, we filled three special coaches of an express train to London, and a few gathered for a farewell lunch at the London Society Clubrooms in High Helborn.

We enjoyed a motor-launch trip down the Thames at high tide, sea gulls, and saw coastal steamers come up with its flow to London proper. London Bridge shows no sign of "falling down" yet. We viewed the famous tower and the new tower bridge. Later, we took an afternoon cruise up the river as far as Richmond, but the going proved slow, so the next day we joined a coach tour party, visiting the little churchyard made famous by Thomas Gray and his Elegy. Autos do not invade the quiet beauty of the grounds, and the little stone church of medieval times is a gem for study. We went on through the traditional Eton College buildings and came to Runnymede, where the first chapter of Monarchical concession was written. We visited Windsor Castle and toured its royal rooms of state—a magnificent show now accessible to the common people—then on to Hampton Court Palace and gardens which far surpass Windsor in beauty.

Our remaining days were taken up with short trips to old "stamping grounds" down to "Bomb Alley" or the rocket route from Calais to London. We visited the east Kent country, made famous by Dickens and Chinese Gordon.

From the perfect weather conditions governing flight both ways, we derived much inspiration and are safely back again in Kirtland to enjoy a sense of freedom unbelievable under the strained conditions of a battle-sensitive country.

What a wonderful thing this gospel could prove to the people of Britain—and what a blessing to the world in general. This we felt as we fraternized with the representatives of other lands and promised in best of faith to lead them to a better understanding of God's plans—his order and will for the good of man.

Planning the Fall Institute

A Home Column Feature

In the Rural Church

By MRS. ORRIS SALISBURY,
Far West Stake Leader

The first institute in Far West Stake was held early in November, 1945. The activities were carefully planned well in advance, and a program was sent to each pastor and women's leader. Pastors were invited and asked to publicize the institute in their congregations.

Being a rural stake, it was important to choose a central location so that the distance would not be too great for any to drive. Stewartville, Missouri, was selected.

In order to make it possible for all women to be able to attend, a co-operative lunch was planned with the hostess group providing one hot dish. Paper plates were used and each woman brought her own silver.

The institute began at ten o'clock with an assembly and devotional period. Objectives and the "minimum standard of excellence" were explained by various council members. A question period provided opportunity for any to ask for additional information.

Since this was the first stake meeting, a "get-acquainted" period was provided while the social chairmen prepared to serve the lunch. Following the group singing, each woman was asked to learn the names of ten new acquaintances and something about them, and to be prepared to introduce them to the group after lunch.

At 1:30, representatives of the various congregations were asked to stand. Then talks were given on "Active Participation in the Department," "Building a Balanced Program," and "A Functioning Cradle Roll." An address by the guest speaker followed this service.

The day closed with a dedicatory hour in charge of the stake president.

One year later, the second institute was held at Third Church in St. Joseph with the same general planning.

Since the stake was to stress missionary activity for the year, "The Missionary-Minded Home" was selected as the institute theme.

First was the annual report of the women's department, in which progress during the years was noted and groups reaching the minimum standard of excellence were commended. Objectives to be stressed in the stake program for the year were then discussed. These had been previously selected by the council and were approved by the president.

There were two class periods in the morning and two in the afternoon on subjects taken directly from the objectives. A worship service climaxed the day's activities.

The following suggestions are based on the experience gained at these first two institutes:

1. Choose best time of year for rural participation.
2. Plan institute well in advance of date chosen.
3. Choose theme carefully.
4. Select most convenient place.
5. Do not plan too close a schedule.

In the City Church

By MRS. C. C. PETERSON,
Kansas City Stake Leader

In planning the city institute, choose the church or churches that will be accessible to the largest number of women and those which will be large enough to accommodate all who may come. It has been found profitable in some cities to hold the meetings in two churches. One may have a large enough auditorium to accommodate classes, but no facilities for social activities, while a neighboring church may be adequately equipped.

It is always well to have a theme, and in making arrangements for the speakers, be sure to inform them of the theme so that they can plan their work in harmony with it. Some themes that have been used successfully are: "Christ's Call to Womanhood," "Having the Courage of Our Religious Convictions," "Home Partnerships," "Growing Together in Love," and "As for Me and My House, We Shall Serve the Lord."

It is advisable to schedule the institute in relationship to the activities of other departments. Too many of our church functions are so timed that attendance at all of them would be impossible. Above all, choose a time which suits the majority of the women. Also, appoint a chairman a month in advance to notify those who expect to come, so that they will have ample time to make necessary arrangements.

A competent person should be asked to care for the small children so that the mothers will be free to participate in the meetings. When all-day services are held, the noon meal should be very simple. In some cases, the women may want to bring sandwiches. To keep home schedules from being disrupted, programs should be planned from 10 to 12 in the morning and from 1 to 3 in the afternoon.

For the week-end institute, a class period may be held on Saturday from 2 until 4 p.m., followed by a forum discussion, and a social hour at 6. This may be a banquet at the church or a supper at some tea room. If time permits, a night meeting may be arranged for the businesswomen or those who, for some reason, are not able to attend the day meetings.

Sunday services should include an early fellowship, classwork, and a sermon on the institute theme by a member of the priesthood. The closing features are usually a class period and dedication service. Simplicity and beauty are imperative for this final service.

Planning an institute calls for prayerful consideration, detailed organization, and careful execution. With these, it will most certainly be a success.

6. Begin promptly at 10 a.m. and close promptly at 3:30 p.m.
7. Keep good balance between local and guest speakers.
8. Use women of all age groups.
9. Keep lunch simple.
10. Plan a balanced program of inspiration, education, and sociability.
11. Vary the type of program.
12. Always work in close co-operation with stake or district president.

Protestantism Faces the Future

Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam*

THE demand for the public support of parochial schools is a deliberate attempt to undermine public education and is a serious threat to democracy. Our public educational system is a bulwark of democracy. The teaching staff is a devoted, patriotic, highly-trained group of Americans whose contribution to the nation in terms of democratic character deserves high praise. In the public schools, boys and girls from Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish homes study together, and in the daily association the public schools afford, learn to live together as Americans, learn to respect each other, learn the contribution of all to the common life. This is essential to democracy. When they are divided into separate sectarian schools, particular emphases that are often prejudices are perpetuated, and the bigotry that becomes intolerance is too often inculcated.

Are we to have a separate school system for each church? Are the Methodists, the Baptists, the Episcopalians, and others to set up their schools and to demand that the public support them? The Roman Catholic Church insists that the parent has the God-given right to determine the education of his child. The American people, in their love of liberty, have granted the privilege of private education, provided certain standards are met. But the Roman Catholic Church now demands that the public shall support sectarian schools. The right to conduct a private school is one thing. The public support of private education is another.

If a parent has the right to determine the education of his child and if the state must support the private institution the parent thinks necessary for the education of his child, does this mean that a Communist father who wants his child trained in Marxian materialism has the right to call upon the people to support Communist schools across the nation?

To support a score of competing sectarian systems of education is to destroy the American public educational system. Protestants are unalterably opposed to the Roman Catholic insistence upon public support for parochial education. They are opposed to church control of public education, no matter what the church. They believe that control should rest in the people, not in a hierarchy, and they have reason to believe that Roman Catholic laymen acquainted with education hold the same view.

Pope Pius XI in the Encyclical of January, 1930, revealed the real intent of the Roman Catholic Church. He said, "Education belongs pre-eminently to the Church . . . the Church is independent of earthly sovereignty both in origin and the exercise of its educational mission, not only with respect to its specific aim, but also with respect to the means necessary to achieve it . . . the Church has the independent right to judge whether any other system or method of education is helpful or harmful to Christian education. . . . As for the scope of the Church's educative mission, it extends over all peoples without any limitation. . . . Civic education . . . must not contradict the doctrine of the Church, which is the divinely constituted mistress of such rules. . . . Attendance at non-Catholic neutral or mixed schools or of schools, that is to say, indifferently open to Catholics and non-Catholics without distinction, is forbidden to Catholic children and can only be tolerated at the discretion of Bishops in special circumstances. . . . Neither is it admissible for Catholics to attend mixed schools (worse still if obligatory for all) where religious instruction is provided and pupils receive the rest of their teaching from non-Catholic masters, together with non-Catholic children."

What the Roman Catholic Church seeks is the complete control of the mind of youth. It demands not alone the right to educate Roman Catholic children in parochial schools, but also that the public shall pay the bills. It informs the public that the church is supreme and not subject to the control of the people as far as the educational process is concerned. Its intolerance refuses even religious instruction unless it be under the control of the Roman Catholic church. It opposes religious instruction by Christians other than Roman Catholic Christians. In lands where it has the power to do so, it does control the educational system, does deny religious liberty to other faiths, does proceed upon its totalitarian way.

Unfortunately, the Roman Catholic Church has been characterized by an insatiable appetite for power, and power corrupts. Witness the reaction that has set in, in Roman Catholic lands, until the Pope must appeal publicly to the people for support, and the church must call upon government to imprison critics and suppress civil liberties. These activities must break the heart of the devoted priests and sisters, the splendid laymen and laywomen of the church, who love the Christ and would build the kingdom of God on the earth. Let the church cease trying to be state and church. Let it give us more men like St. Francis. Let it realize that when it is close to its Lord and reveals his spirit of humility and service, it possesses the power that is of great worth, but when it seeks to control governments, shackle the minds of men, lay up for itself treasures on earth and become the great tax-free landowner of nations, that it possesses many barns but loses its soul. All that I have said here applies to every church, Protestant and Catholic alike, whenever the practice is the same.

We will resolutely strive to maintain religious liberty for Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Jew. We shall insist that such liberty be maintained throughout the earth. We shall work for brotherly co-operation. We shall continue to pray and labor for the union of all Christians, realizing that Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, and Protestant are branches of the Church of Christ, and that in them all is heard the affirmation, "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church." Perhaps the day may come when Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant may kneel in penitence before our Lord and rise to heal the divisions of the centuries and to answer Christ's prayer that they all "may be one."—Social Questions Bulletin, June, 1947.

Tribute to Frank Piedt

The Saints of Saskatchewan and Alberta have been saddened by the tragic death of Elder Frank Piedt. On the evening of July 24, he and several other men were cleaning a well on his farm. Deciding to make a final inspection before quitting work, he lowered himself by a rope to the bottom of the well, where he was immediately overcome by muriatic acid fumes. His brother, Alma, attempted to save him, but was also overcome by the fumes and had to be pulled back to the surface before reaching the bottom. An hour later, firemen with gas masks arrived, but all efforts to resuscitate the unconscious man were futile.

Baptized as a small boy and ordained to the office of elder in 1931, Brother Piedt organized and was pastor of the Floral Mission. At the time of his death, he was also a district counselor. He was admired and respected in his community; no controversial issue ended without a final appeal to him, and no entertainment was complete without his chairmanship. His business relationships, his daily conduct, his wisdom, and fairness brought honor to himself, his family, and his church. He was loved for his dry humor, his dependability, his immaculate neatness, and his eloquence. He had been a student and an ardent reader from early boyhood. Truly, he was a servant who spoke with the voice of his Master, and because he was humble and full of love, he could interpret the divine will to the blessing of those in his care.

He is survived by his wife, Mary; a daughter, Shirlye, age ten; a son, Fred, age nine; his father, Christ Piedt; a sister, Mrs. Annie Peltet; and four brothers: Edwin, Henry, Roy, and Alma Piedt.

Historical Pilgrimage

The first in a series of annual pilgrimages to places of historical interest by the young people of the St. Louis District began on August 17.

Under the leadership of the district president, C. L. Archibald, and the youth director, Wayne Smith, the young people organized a group known as the St. Louis District Boosters. Immediately after the fall conference of 1946, the various Zion's Leagues and the unorganized young people of the district started to earn funds for a project to be held this summer. The plan called for a trip from St. Louis to some of the points of historical interest in the States of Missouri, Iowa, and Illinois. To finance the trip, various items such as Christmas cards, electric irons, and electric mixers were sold throughout the year. Suppers and socials were given, a picnic was held, anything that would raise money for the general fund was tried.

A bus was chartered and after the morning service at the St. Louis church, twenty-nine young people and four adults started out. They visited the state capitol, and the University of Missouri at Columbia on the way to Independence, where they saw the Auditorium, Sanitarium, Herald Publishing House, and other church buildings in the center place. Graceland College was the next major stop, with visits to historical places en route. Here the young people were able to see the church college and attend the Lamonii Reunion for two days. They then traveled to Nauvoo, Illinois, where more church history was reviewed.

En route to St. Louis, they visited the home of Mark Twain; a fellowship service ended the very profitable week. The project will not be finished until all who took the trip write up their experiences. The group has been divided into two sections according to ages; a prize will be given to the boy and girl who write the best paper in each section. All papers will be published in the district young people's monthly so that those who were not able to make the trip will benefit from the experiences of those who could go.

Plans are now taking shape for the next year's project. Perhaps other groups will want to plan similar trips. They will find them beneficial in writing the young people of a district and in giving them some fundamentals of church history and background that they will not otherwise get.

Gospel Brings Happiness

Forty-five years ago, after marrying a fine Latter Day Saint girl, I accepted the Restored Gospel. I was the only one of my family to do so, but I have never regretted the step. I had been a member of the Church of the Brethren, and was baptized twice in the same creek at approximately the same spot. Some of my happiest hours have been those spent in locating places for our missionaries to speak; we were seldom turned down, and many souls were won for God as a result. Truly, this work has been a great pleasure to me and mine.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kenneth Calkins of Santa Ana, California, announce the birth of a daughter, Mary Elizabeth, born August 16.

A son, Steven Eugene, was born to Mr. and Mrs. Paul Stoff of Lexington, Massachusetts, on July 12. Mrs. Stoff is the former Dorothy Jones of Denver, Colorado.

A daughter, Norma Gladys, was born to Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Hill on August 24 at Quebec City, Quebec.

DEATHS

PEMENT.—John Harold, son of Philemon and Anna Pement, was born in Chicago, Illinois, on September 6, 1902, and died at St. Mary's Hospital in Chicago on August 12. Following his graduation from the Lindbom High School in Chicago, he attended Graceland College. On February 11, 1933, he was married to Mabel Shreffler, and they established their home in Madison, Wisconsin, later moving to Oregon, Wisconsin, and then back to Chicago. He was employed as an industrial engineer. At the age of nine, he was baptized into the Reorganized Church, remaining steadfast in the faith until his death.

He is survived by his wife, Mabel; a son, Donald Lee; one sister, Mrs. Phoebe Bright; and a brother, Paul. His parents, two sisters, and a brother preceded him in death.

NELSON.—Salena Marie, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Torrance, was born March 21, 1899, near Guilford, Missouri, and died at her home in Guilford on September 6. On February 8, 1920, she was married to Clarence R. Nelson; ten children were born to this union. A son, Melvin E., preceded her in death. In her youth, she was baptized into the Reorganized Church and remained a faithful member throughout her life.

She is survived by her husband; nine children: Mrs. Maxine Merlette, Clarnell, Ermel, Donna, Farrell, Marjorie and Lavona, all of the home; Cleo R. of Maryville, Missouri; and Mrs. Juanita Ellison of Peoria, Illinois; three grandchildren; her parents; and five sisters: Mrs. Annie Roberts of Bethesda, Maryland; Mrs. Mamie McKee of El Dorado Springs, Missouri; Miss Leola Torrance and Mrs. Florence Braun of Independence, Missouri; and Mrs. Wilma Jones of Guilford. The funeral was held at the Reorganized Church in Guilford, Elders Abe Heinrichs and George Baraclough officiating. Burial was in the Graves Cemetery near Guilford.

GARDNER.—Mary Rose Keller, was born August 22, 1886, in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, and died on September 6, 1947, in Flint, Michigan. She was married to Frank D. Gardner on June 25, 1915, and on October 7, 1917, she was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church.

Surviving are her husband; a son, Franklin; two grandchildren; her aged father; three sisters: Miss Margaret Keller of Wilkes-Barre; Mrs. Harold Bachman of Hillside, New Jersey; and Mrs. Florence French of Cliffside Park, New Jersey; and one brother, J. F. Keller of Detroit, Michigan. Funeral services were conducted by Elders H. J. Simons and A. Slater. Interment was in Sunset Hills Cemetery in Flint.

COX.—Sarah Evelyn, was born October 20, 1879, at McFall, Missouri, and died July 15, 1947, at Colorado Springs, Colorado. She was married to Schuyler G. Cox on January 5, 1896, at La Junta; eight children were born to this union: Mrs. Nancy Griffy and Mrs. Pearl Griffy of Phoenix, Arizona; Mrs. Ila Schnebeck, Mrs. Eva Stellwagen, and Mrs. Irene Costa, all of Colorado Springs; Wayne Cox of Canon City, and Paul Cox of Pueblo, Colorado. Her husband and one son preceded her in death. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since February 27, 1916. The funeral service was held in Colorado Springs, Elder J. D. Curtis officiating. Interment was in the La Junta, Colorado, cemetery.

VANMEER.—Elizabeth, daughter of the late John and Martha Campbell, was born May 16, 1886, in Osprey Township, Ontario, and died at her home in Armour Township, Ontario, on July 2, 1947. Although she had been an invalid for fourteen years, death came after an illness of five days. In 1875, she was married to James Vanmeer; thirteen children were born to this union, nine of whom survive. Mr. Vanmeer passed away five years ago.

She leaves four sons: William of the home; Ernest of Eaglesville, Pennsylvania; Earl of Creston, British Columbia; and Charles of Stamford Centre, Ontario; five daughters: Mrs. Arthur Jeffery, Cecebe, Ontario; Mrs. John Myers and Mrs. William Wigley, Niagara Falls, Ontario; Mrs. Donald Smith, Armstrong British Columbia; and Mrs. William Byron, Burks Falls, Ontario; a sister, Margaret Campbell, Berkeley, California; a brother, William Campbell, Alexandria, Virginia; twenty grandchildren; fourteen great-grandchildren; and one great-great-grandchild. Four sons, Edmund, Albert, George, and Norman, predeceased her. Funeral services were held at the home. Elder Martin Ware of Niagara Falls officiated. Interment was in the Burks Falls Cemetery.

CARPENTER.—Lida Bell, was born July 26, 1873, at Mount Sterling, Iowa, and died June 21, 1947, at the San Luis Obispo County Hospital in California. She and her husband were baptized into the Reorganized Church in 1901 and were active members of the Bandon, Oregon, branch until 1917. Although Sister Carpenter had been isolated most of the time since then, she remained a firm believer in the Restored gospel.

She is survived by her husband, Elder DeWayne Carpenter of Arroyo Grande, California; two sons: Asa L. of Carpentryville, Oregon, and Raymond K. of Bodega Bay, California; thirteen grandchildren; and twelve great-grandchildren.

MORRIS.—Ada M., daughter of B. F. and Clara Ordway, was born in Independence, Missouri, sixty-one years ago and died on July 28, 1947, in Altadena, California, of a heart ailment. She spent her girlhood in Peoria, Illinois, and was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church at the age of eight. She moved with her family to Altadena in 1903, where she spent the remainder of her life.

She is survived by her husband, Justin G. Morris; three sons: Griffith, Russell, and Richard Morris; a daughter, Mrs. F. R. Buskirk; a brother, Clifton Ordway; and eight grandchildren.

DUCKERT.—Orlo Robert, was born April 10, 1921, at Cash, Michigan, and died July 5, 1947, at Sandusky Hospital in Sandusky, Michigan, of a gunshot wound which he accidentally received.

He is survived by his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Duckert, and a brother, Willard. A sister, Dorothy, preceded him in death in 1931. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Cash; Elders John Booth and James Phillips officiated. Interment was in the Watertown cemetery.

HORN.—Phoebe May, was born August 17, 1883, at Ellensburg, Washington, and died August 2, 1947, at Ontario, Oregon. She was married on December 30, 1900, to Arthur Horn, and was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in June, 1916. For the past year and a half, she had lived with her daughter in Vale, Oregon.

She is survived by three daughters: Mrs. Eliza Burgess, Vale; Mrs. Edna McNeel, Coquille, Oregon; and Eunice Horn, Dallas, Oregon; three sons: Herbert J., Walla Walla, Washington; Oliver G., Eureka, California; and Harold C. Vale; three sisters: Mrs. Janie Floyd, Harrah, Washington; Mrs. Lillie Alexander, Yakima, Washington; and Mrs. Mandy Horn, Olympia, Washington; one brother, J. S. Fortney, Hyak, Washington; fifteen grandchildren, and one great-grandchild. Elder Cecil Gilmore was in charge of the funeral service. Interment was in the I. O. O. F. Cemetery at Ellensburg.

DAVIS.—Fred, was born July 18, 1871, at Herman, Nebraska, and died at the Mercy Hospital in Council Bluffs, Iowa, on September 2, 1947. He was married to Pearl Mendenhall on May 2, 1899; six children were born to this marriage, three of whom preceded their father in death. Mr. Davis was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on February 1, 1914, in Council Bluffs, where he resided for the past forty-six years.

Besides his wife, he leaves a son, Floyd Clay Davis, and two daughters, Mrs. Frank Kilbane and Mrs. Samuel Quakenbush, all of Council Bluffs; a sister, Mrs. Ada Unmack of Omaha, Nebraska; three brothers: Robert of Nevada, Iowa; Jess of Omaha; and Lute of Council Bluffs; eight grandchildren; and four great-grandchildren. Services were held at the Cutler Funeral Home, Elder V. D. Ruch officiating. Interment was in the Memorial Cemetery in Council Bluffs.

BRADY.—Grace E., daughter of Frank B. and Catherine Miller, was born October 5, 1888, at Runnells, Iowa, and died at her home in Des Moines, Iowa, on August 4. She was married on February 7, 1907, to James C. Brady; five children were born to this union. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church at the age of eleven and was an active worker in the women's department.

She is survived by her husband; four sons: Ray, Don, Ernest, and Carl; a daughter, Beulah; and three grandchildren. She also leaves a sister, Mrs. Blanch Park; and two brothers: Delbert and Homer Miller, all of Runnells.

LEWIS.—David, third son of William and Mary Lewis, was born April 8, 1879, at Stewartsville, Missouri, and died at his home in Horton, Kansas, on August 29, 1947. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on May 4, 1902, and was married to Orla McKenzie Cooper on March 20, 1920. He spent the early part of his life in northern Missouri, moving to Horton fifteen years ago, where he was engaged in the creamery business. Through his kindness, he made many friends for the church; while in St. Joseph, Missouri, he was an active worker with the young married people.

Surviving are his wife, Orla; two sons: E. D. of St. Louis, Missouri, and Jack of Horton; four daughters: Mrs. Gladys Hollingsworth and Mrs. Mary Foster of Los Angeles, California; Mrs. Ruth Tandy of Denver, Colorado; and Miss Violette Baity of Kansas City, Missouri; one brother, Robert Lewis of Independence, Missouri; three sisters: Mrs. D. C. Kinnaman of St. Joseph; Mrs. G. C. Johnson of Des Moines, Iowa; and Mrs. Mark Holman of Independence; and five grandchildren. Funeral services were held in Horton, Elder Claude A. Smith officiating. Interment was in the Horton cemetery.

DEHN.—Kenneth R. G., son of William F. and Cora A. Dehn, was born March 11, 1908, at Taylor, North Dakota, and died August 12, 1947, in St. Mary's Hospital in Kansas City, Missouri. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on July 14, 1918, at Burlington, North Dakota.

He is survived by his wife, Nellie; two sons: Kenneth Bruce and Donald; and two daughters: Willa Frances and Carolyn Ardeth; his mother, Cora Dehn of Hazen, North Dakota; and a sister, Mrs. Pearl Wilson of Moorhead, Minnesota. Elder Ephraim Brown and O. W. Okerlind officiated at the funeral. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

MURPHY.—Ella May Slanaker, was born in Chickasaw County, Iowa, in 1869, and died August 9, 1947, following a long illness. She was married to Richard Murphy in 1886; five children were born to them. One son, Frank, preceded her in death in 1887. In 1891, she and her husband homesteaded in Oklahoma, where they resided until her death. She was a member of the Reorganized Church, a good wife, mother, friend, and neighbor.

Besides her husband, she leaves four sons: Everett, David, Jerry, and Richard, all of El Reno, Oklahoma; a daughter, Mrs. Eva Fried of Calumet, Oklahoma; three sisters: Mrs. Millie Denny of El Reno; Mrs. Carrie Moore of Johnson, Kansas; and Mrs. Janie Lemons of Ponsford, Minnesota; ten grandchildren; and six great-grandchildren.

Dear Editor:

When you asked me to write about some of my summer's observations of the various groups of young people throughout the church, I thought the assignment was an easy one. I did some mental "two and twos" of the States represented at the camps and reunion where I worked--Oklahoma, Missouri, Texas, Arkansas, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Wyoming, Washington, Oregon, Canada--the only problem would be to select the most interesting and novel projects from each area. I began making comparisons. In Oklahoma, I was told, the Leaguers publish the branch newspaper with only a minimum of aid from older members. In Washington, they're doing the same thing. Every evening at Silver Lake Reunion, I could set my watch at 6 when the daily newspaper would come sliding under the tent door. The staff was composed of young people living in the camp and working under the supervision of one of the young appointees. Then I took out my "British Columbia Handbook of Zion's League Songs," compiled and edited by the young people. It was then that I began to worry about the article I had so lightly promised. Our young people are doing about the same things whether they are in Texas, Canada, or on an island off the west coast. They're working, worshipping, singing, studying, playing, and praying.

But, I thought, no vague generalizations will do. The truth is that I had no opportunity to see what was going on in the local Leagues. I can speak only of stimulating camp and reunion experiences. Perhaps you will be interested in the novel organization and administration of youth activities at Silver Lake Reunion.

Those in charge gave the two hundred and some young people (better known as the "200") the privilege of governing themselves during the reunion period. A young people's leader was appointed by the reunion committee, and the "200" elected officers at the beginning of the week to be their representatives on a League council, which acted in the triple capacity of an executive, legislative, and judicial body. The officers and leaders, with the approval of the "200," appointed four young people as chairmen of the worship, service, study, and recreation commissions. Each of these chairmen worked throughout the week with the reunion official in charge of his activity. The morning worship, hikes, moonlight beach parties, devotionals, and evensongs were under the joint supervision of the council and reunion staff.

The young people's leader, the four officers, and the four commission chairmen constituted the League council. This council held daily meetings to discuss general policies and to originate camp rules for the "200." The rules were then submitted by the president to the "200" for their approval. At the daily staff meeting, the president and young people's leader represented the "200."

It was all new--and fun. Everybody liked the idea. At the end of the week, several asked to have the same type of organization next year.

I think one of the greatest thrills of all, though, came at the end of the week when many of the Leaguers came asking for information about the best training methods for some very specific tasks in the church. These "200" and the other hundreds of young people in the church are awakening to their opportunities. They are not static, but sensitive to their changing environments. The modern "survivor of the fittest" must be active if he would live. This church must be active, too, if it would live. Perhaps my most enjoyable observation this summer of young people is that, as the word suggests, they are becoming "active."

--But now I'm preaching, and that is never correct correspondence etiquette. I hope you'll understand about the absence of an article. My lack of local observations made the subject one that I couldn't "essay" upon.

Sincerely,

Aleta Runkle

The Order of Administration

QUESTION:

I have always looked upon administration as a "last resort." When medical science could no longer prove helpful, I have said, "Now is the time for God to come to the rescue." Others, however, maintain that administration should precede medical care. Which is the preferred attitude?

ANSWER:

By Chris B. Hartshorn

Putting our faith in God and the ordinances of the church should never be a "last resort." The reason that some Saints call on the elders only when home remedies and science have failed to bring relief should be looked for in the individual rather than in the teachings of the church. Yet the question should not be brushed aside with a pat answer. It has deep implications and deserves our best efforts to give an effectual solution.

Some point to the experience of King Asa of Judah as evidence of God's disfavor with those who seek help of medical science.

And Asa in the thirty and ninth year of his reign was diseased in his feet, until his disease was exceeding great; yet in his disease he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians. And Asa slept with his fathers, and died in the one and fortieth year of his reign.—II Chronicles 16: 12, 13.

King Asa was a corrupt ruler and there is no promise that he would have been healed had he put his faith in the Lord rather than in the physicians. The brief obituary quoted above is misleading if it carries that conviction with it. The cause of his early demise was the foot disease. Perhaps he did not give the physicians nor the Lord a fair trial to bring about a cure.

ACCORDING TO YOUR FAITH

Some even among us have urged that one is weak in the faith if healing does not follow administration. These hold that any degree of reliance on medical science is evidence of turning away from God. This type of thinking has little scriptural support. The early day apostles complained when healings did not follow their administrations (Matt. 17: 16, 21). Paul left Trophimus sick at Miletum and even Paul himself had his thorn in the flesh which he sought in vain for the Lord to remove. These sects which give public demonstrations of their faith in divine healings after handling venomous snakes or drinking poison are properly classed as sign seekers whom Jesus denounced as "a wicked and adulterous generation." (Matthew 16: 4.)

It is a matter of common experience that many among the Saints do not have faith of the right kind or degree to be healed. Neither are the elders authorized to command the Lord in administering to the sick. They are to "Pray over the sick, anoint them with oil, as commanded in the law, and leave them in my hands, that the Spirit may deal with them according to my wisdom."—Doctrine and Covenants 125: 15.

Faith to be healed or any degree of trust in God becomes stronger as we have more and more satisfactory experience with divine forces. Like the physical laws, we must "use or lose." The "strong affirmations" recommended by some faith-healing groups have virtue only to the extent that they bring one nearer to God and the divine way of life. If these affirmations arise out of a desire to whip up one's courage, much as a small boy whistles as he walks through a graveyard at night, the net result will be the stultifying of one's conscience. God is not likely to have any part in the process.

The members of this church should not be troubled by false doctrines on this subject. The Lord pointed out to us in 1831 that,

Whosoever among you are sick, and have not faith to be healed, but believe, shall be nourished with all tenderness with herbs and mild food, and that not by the hand of an enemy. And the elders of the church, two or more, shall be called, and shall pray for, and lay their hands upon them in my name; and if they die, they shall die unto me, and if they live, they shall live unto me.—Section 42: 12.

BY WHOSE POWER AND WISDOM?

Joseph Smith III tells of a remarkable experience in Plano, Illinois, during the winter of 1878-79. There was an unusual amount of sickness. The elders were on the go night and day to answer the calls for administrations. Several nonmembers also were calling for laying on of hands. The physicians were just as busy. Often elders and doctors would pass each other on the porches of homes of the sick or one would wait in the room for the other to finish his ministry. This worked well for a time, and not many died.

President Smith began to have serious doubt that the Saints were justified in calling on both for help at the same time. One evening, after a long and tedious day and counseling with the other elders working with him, Joseph concluded he would refuse to go on any more calls to those who were employing physicians. "They appeal to medicine, let them take the benefit of their appeal or suffer the consequences," he reasoned. He told his wife of his conclusion and went to bed.

Before he fell asleep, a stranger came up the stairs and entered his room. He took the chair used to hold the door open, brought it to the bedside, and sat on it. His actions and appearance were all so natural that Brother Joseph was unperturbed.

In the conversation which followed, as quoted in Saints' Herald of February 10, 1897, this messenger recalled the situation which caused Joseph to conclude he would refuse to administer in homes where the physician also had been called. Then he asked Joseph, "By what power is the healing of the sick by the laying on of hands by the elders wrought? is it by the power of God, or is it because of some goodness or power in you elders?" Joseph next was asked and admitted the obvious truth that this was just as true when there "was a doctor in attendance." "By whose wisdom is it determined whether the power to heal shall be present and exercised, the wisdom of God or the wisdom of the elders?" After this experience, Joseph never hesitated to administer whenever he was called. "Whether this visitor was man, Nephite, or angel," Joseph had "no theory to advance." He knew that he was awake and in full possession of his faculties. He also knew that the understanding which came was divine wisdom.

GROWING IN FAITH

Perhaps the question now being discussed has been clarified to the extent that we can safely say that Latter Day Saints do not hold that it is either one or the other. In many cases it might be wise to have both the elders and the physician. But there is a further point on "which is the preferred attitude?" Does it not seem that we will be happier and better spiritually and physically as we develop the "faith to be healed"? This faith comes from its exercise through prayer and fasting (Matthew 17: 21). Too many Saints neglect to give God an opportunity; like Asa, King of Judah, they seek not to the Lord, but "to the physicians." The preferred attitude seems to be to follow the commands of the Lord in the things we eat (Section 86), to take rest in the hours set apart (Section 119: 9), and to be temperate in all things (Section 11: 4).

Some have said that they do not feel worthy to call on the Lord for divine healing when they think on their own shortcomings. Has he ever said that only the "worthy" shall call the elders? James wrote, "Is any sick among you? let him call . . . and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him."—James 5: 14, 15. It is well to remember that even if we are unworthy as judged by human standards, God has another standard of measure. He loves the sinner, the oppressed, and the downcast. He rejoices over "one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons which need no repentance." Let us give him an opportunity to show us how much he loves us. He is a rewarder of those who diligently seek him.

Taking It on the Chin

By Garland E. Tickemyer

In his book, He Upset the World, Bruce Barton tells an interesting story of a retired champion prize fighter who came out of retirement to battle a young challenger. He had been working on his farm, and his suntanned face and healthy appearance revealed that he was in the pink of condition. The audience was shocked, therefore, when in the third round, the champion was flat on the floor.

"Why did he go down so quickly when he looked so good?" asked Barton of an old fight fan sitting next to him in the arena. "He's been out of the game for a couple of years. A man can't take them raps on the chin unless he's taking them every day," was the reply.

A significant truth is contained in these few words. Unpleasant though they may be, experiences in which we take punishment may actually be real blessings in disguise. An occasional rap on the chin may keep a man in fighting trim.

In my experience, I realize that my greatest personal growth has taken place in periods when I had battles to fight. Likewise, my greatest satisfactions have come from those periods when I took the greatest punishment and was still able to stand on my feet.

I conclude, therefore, that the harder you have to struggle, the more resistance you will develop; and the more resistance you develop, the more you will achieve. Financial reverses, physical handicaps, and unsympathetic associates may be just the thorns in the flesh that we need to make us amount to something.

An excellent example of one who overcame opposition is the Apostle Paul. For more than thirty years he stood up under almost continual persecution. Five times he was brutally whipped, three times he was beaten with rods. He was stoned and left for dead; shipwrecked three times; was set adrift on a plank in an open sea; in peril of robbers, the heathen, of the city, of the wilderness, of the seas, and of false brethren. "In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness." But Paul counted it all gain, and in the end, still smiling, he said, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith."

A Parable

The Bread and the Stones

Matthew 7: 9.

And it was told among His servants of olden time that while he was with them He spake yet another parable.

There was a man that had great riches, and was old in years. He went unto his Lord, saying, Master, which of my two sons shall be steward over mine estate? And his Lord said unto him, Thou shalt try them with bread, and with stones.

And the man went to his sons, holding in his right hand loaves of bread, fresh from the baker's oven. And in his left hand he held stones, rare and precious. And he said, My sons, I would that you choose between the bread and the stones.

Now the younger son thought, If I take the bread, it will be eaten and gone tomorrow. Better an empty stomach than an empty purse. I will take the stones.

But the elder son thought, If I take the stones I shall be rich, but I shall die of hunger. I will take the bread.

Then the father said unto them, It is given to all men to choose either bread and life, or stones and death. Though a man have all the wealth of the world, it signifieth nothing if he perish for it. He who knows the value of life has true wisdom, and shall be a steward of property.

The Kingdom and the Gathering

THE GATHERING is a component part of the gospel plan, because it is a natural. As other forces having their rise in the nature of things may be turned to the advantage of mankind, so may the gathering be made a power and contributing factor in the accomplishment of the purposes of the kingdom of God.

The gospel has its rise in the nature of man. Man is gregarious. No normal person wants to live alone. Nor are people so made they can, working alone, achieve the divine purpose in their creation. So it is that men come together in expression of their nature and for their common good and establish an organized society expressive of their concept of life and adapted to the fulfillment of its purposes. And so has Deity adapted this normal life movement in the form of the gathering as taught among us, to the achievement of his purposes in the life of his people.

And what a purpose is this: To lay hold this man made in the likeness of God, in stimulating and comprehensive ministry for his growth in companionship with the Father who has created him!

In this cause, Deity enlists the best of the best of men; the best of the earth's forces; the best of the powers of the universe; His own good will, and his help in the measure his children conform to the law of life. And theirs it is to avail themselves of the same as opportunity may afford.

The gathering, then, is based in competency and quality of life. It presupposes a people capable of the best in themselves, of the best in other powers available to them, and of the appropriation of the whole of these in righteousness toward the realization of their heritage as the sons and daughters of God.

It was in consideration of these verities there came the word of God to the church at our last General Conference:

The church is admonished again that all movements toward Zion and the gathering and temporalities connected therewith are within my law, and all things should be done in order, the advice and counsel of the elders and of the Bishop and his council be sought and honored when received, as before enjoined, though of necessity their counsel when given is not intended to dictate or to deny any man his agency. The work of preparation and the perfection of my Saints go forward slowly, and Zion conditions are no further away nor any closer than the spiritual condition of my people justifies; but my word shall not fail, neither will my promises, for the foundation of the Lord standeth sure.

The gathering as herein indicated is to go forward within the law. To know and to teach the law of the gathering is therefore a responsibility of the church. To learn and to live by the law is an obligation of all Saints; for those outside the places of gathering as well as those inside are to contribute to its attainment. And the most potent contribution towards the gathering and Zion, let it always be kept in mind, is a life of righteousness, motivated by love, and ordered by intelligence. Once this is appreciated and attained, the remaining provisions of the law as pertaining to the gathering may be observed with assurance of results anticipated and required in the work of kingdom-building and functioning.

The gathering, like Zion, as further indicated, is conditioned by the life quality of the people of the church, being "no further away nor any closer than the spiritual condition of my people justifies."

And the gathering, as herein reaffirmed, is an orderly movement—one in which the people are not only to proceed in keeping with the basic law as given, but also to act as counseled by those whose calling it is, out of their over-all view and breadth of consideration, to give lead in these matters for the good of the gatherers, their fellow Saints, and the church.

And counsel has recently been given that the gathering shall go forward in wisdom and restraint. In restraint, lest outside places that ought to be maintained be left without the help essential to their purpose; in wisdom, so that moves are made only as "all things have been prepared," with both the gatherers and the church being blessed thereby, and the cause of the kingdom advanced.

The gathering is indeed a normal life movement, essential to the good of the Saints and the full functioning of the kingdom of God. It anticipates a social order adaptable to many people from many lands, a ministry to many needs, and a command in righteousness of many powers by which to meet them freely and effectually. It is, therefore, based in righteousness, in intelligence, and in integrity. And it demands the very best of the very best of men. In such a people and functioning order there shall be fullness of life for good men and women, and means for the carrying of the gospel to the ends of the earth.

Of such is the kingdom of God.

J. F. GARVER.

Be thankful for life and all that it gives you. Its blessings are not yours by right, but by the gift of God. Be grateful to him. If there has been someone you have loved and lost, try not to think of the injustice that has been done to you, but try rather to make a prayer of gratitude for the happy years you spent together, for the happiness and beauty this other life brought into yours, and for the splendid memories you have left. And even when conditions of this world have deprived you of a blessing, so many others of God's gifts remain that you should be thankful to him. Keep your mind upon what you still have rather than upon what is lost. Reach up for God's hand, and he will reach down for yours.

Conferences in Religious Education

 Leola Sheppard

The worship services that appear in this issue of the "Herald" were written by Sister Leola Lalone Sheppard of Pittsburg, Kansas. A few weeks ago this talented and devoted church member passed away—the victim of an ailment for which no cure is known. She continued to work and serve the church as long as she had the strength and ability to do so, and in the Pittsburg Branch there are many people who will long remember her leadership and be thankful for what she contributed. She had been warned that she was going to die, and prepared herself for it. She did not cease any of her activities so long as she could keep up. Last spring she was present with the others at the big annual banquet and program put on by the ladies of the church. In spite of her suffering, she bravely came and took her part in the events. It is a pleasure to pay a tribute of respect to such a member. She has given a great example of courage and dedication to her ideals.

 The Mean Tree

There was a little garden in an arid land. Fed by a spring, its flowers grew and blossomed, casting their fragrance upon the desert air, making a spot of beauty in the midst of desolation, pleasing the hearts of all travelers who went that way.

A seed fell into a corner of the garden, dropped by a passing bird. It grew, and the owner of the garden let it remain, thinking its shade would be good there. Then he went on a journey.

In his absence the tree continued to grow, crowding out the flowers and filling the space. But it turned out to be a mean tree, ugly, deformed, bearing no fruit and offering little shade. It had destroyed the beauty of the place.

So may a little fault, like a mean tree, have a small beginning in our lives, but grow until it destroys all that is good and pleasant in us. The mean tree must be rooted out and destroyed to save the garden.

* Many a time in my life I have found that to do a little act of kindness, or to go out of my way for someone has begun a friendship that has been worth a thousand times what it cost me.

* If you are very tired, shift gears and turn your attention to something else. Do good, and it will rest you. The person who is always resting is always tired. Only those who work know what it is to be really rested.

* If you can't find happiness for yourself, look at somebody else who has found it, or try to help some other person to be happy, and you will find with that effort strength to bear the load life has put upon you.

* No matter how thick the storm clouds are, no matter how high they may be piled today, no matter how black the gloom beneath them, remember that there are areas of clear air and unbroken sunshine above them, and that the light illuminates their upper formations with a golden glory. As light always outlasts the storm, so happiness is restored when trouble goes away, and peace returns after war. Sometimes it takes patience to endure the storm, but if we have faith in the future and hope for better things to come, we can live through the hard times.

THE SECOND ANNUAL CONFERENCE FOR CHICAGO-LAND, NORTHEASTERN ILLINIOS, AND WISCONSIN, AURORA,
ILLINOIS, OCTOBER 24-26

THE THIRD ANNUAL CONFERENCE FOR THE STATE OF MICHIGAN, FLINT, MICHIGAN, OCTOBER 31-NOVEMBER 2.

Arrangements have been completed between the Department of Religious Education and the administrative officers in the areas involved for the holding of annual religious education conferences.

The first of these will be held at Aurora, Illinois, October 24-26, for administrative officers and workers in the Chicago-land, Northeastern Illinois, and Wisconsin Districts.

The second will be held in Flint, Michigan, October 31-November 2, for administrative officers and workers in the various districts and branches of Michigan.

The theme this year will be "Building an Up-to-date Youth Program." Hence, the special appeal will be to district and branch presidents, young people's leaders and teachers, Zion's League officers and members, leaders and teachers of junior high girls and boys. These conferences will be in charge of F. M. McDowell, John R. Darling, and Edna Easter of the General Department of Religious Education.

For the purposes of these conferences, the term "young people" will apply to all age groups from twelve to twenty-four, or in some cases even thirty years of age. Detailed consideration will be given to official church programs as follows:

Scouting for boys, plus the "God and Country" award.

The Oriole program (or Girl Scouting or the Camp Fire program) for girls, plus the "Light of Life" award.

The Zion's League program, recently revised in organization, procedure, and materials.

The church program for youth camps.

The training program for teachers and leaders of young people.

Inquiries concerning these conferences may be addressed to the Department of Religious Education, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri; or, for the state of Michigan, to the local chairman, Harry J. Simons, 609 E. Baker, Flint 5, Michigan; and for the Chicago-land, Northeastern Illinois, and Wisconsin districts, to the local chairman, Arnold Settles, 378 Walnut Street, Aurora, Illinois.

The Place of Culture In the Zionite Life

By Franklyn S. Weddle

WE OFTEN sing and talk about "Zion the Beautiful," and we look forward to building a society wherein we might live, work, share, and worship. But singing, talking, and hoping will not find us any nearer that goal a hundred years from now than we are at the present—a hundred years since the kingdom way of life was first restored to man. We must not just wait for Zion to be.

A beautiful Zion can only be established by people who know and appreciate beauty—people of culture. A culture which is not superficial, but one which is deep and genuine and basic.

In the past, I am afraid we must admit, we have talked and sung and hoped, but we have not done enough towards accomplishing our God-given task. We must first become a people able to discriminate between the good and noble, and the ordinary and cheap. We, therefore, must become intimate with the good and uplifting.

Ours is a social gospel, so we must have a spiritual, social, and intellectual culture.

This is not easily acquired, nor can it be acquired at all without effort. And let it be said now that culture comes not alone as a result of formal education. It is a state of living and appreciation for life, people, and things. Formal school-training is one way in which we may be exposed, but there are other ways no less effective. The commandment, "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed"—II Timothy 2: 15, did not refer to school study, but rather to individual and continuing study throughout this life.

Our state of culture is our way of life. It is the things we like, the way we dress, the things we think and talk about, the quality of our home life, the way we treat our neighbors and friends, the way in which we perform our daily tasks, our attitudes. Christ came that we might have life, and that more abundantly (John 10: 10), so we might well look to him for a cultural pattern to follow.

As we study the teachings of Christ, we find that they fall into about four general categories with regard to the gospel as it affects man and God.

He talks to men about the spirit—spiritual attitudes, spiritual balance, and the awareness of God.

He emphasizes man's physical state—bodily health, healing, and the like.

He talks about man's intellect—learning, knowledge, mental development, and balance.

He is even interested in men's vocations, their skills, the things they do every day.

The gospel of Christ, then, concerns itself with man's spirit, his physical state, his mind, and his vocational activities. In each of these aspects, Christ was anxious for men to rise to a higher level of culture and to maintain a wholesome balance of these cultures.

SPIRITUAL CULTURE

Jesus left no room for doubt regarding spiritual righteousness. We read in the fifth chapter of Matthew, "except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." To put it in modern terms, unless we are more righteous than those about us who know not the gospel, we cannot enter into the kingdom way of life. Throughout Christ's teachings we find emphasis placed on a spiritual culture, a continual urge to become more aware of God and his plan of life. As the Zionite life is unfolded, there shall be more and more opportunity for a closer spiritual affinity with God.

Zion is, in fact, the pure in heart, living in the world but not of the world.

PHYSICAL CULTURE

Christ gave much attention and time to the healing of the sick, and the books of the gospel are replete with his works. We, in this day, have also been given instruction regarding the care of the body in the "Word of Wisdom" found in the Doctrine and Covenants (section 86). Again, in section 85, paragraph 38, we are admonished to ". . . cease to be idle; cease to be unclean; . . . cease to sleep longer than is needful; retire to thy bed early that ye may not be weary; arise early, that your bodies and minds may be invigorated."

Much has been written and spoken regarding the spirit and the body, and it is not our purpose to elaborate on these two subjects in this discussion. We shall be more directly concerned with a discussion of Zion-ic culture as it concerns man's mind and vocation.

INTELLECTUAL CULTURE

Both the ancient and modern Scriptures impress the followers of Christ to cultivate the mind. In the Old Testament, Book of Proverbs, can be found numerous verses extolling knowledge and understanding (education).

In June, 1831, in the very early days of the church, William W. Phelps was commanded to assist Oliver Cowdery in the work "of selecting, and writing books for schools, in this church, that little children also may receive instruction before me as is pleasing unto me."—Doctrine and Covenants 55: 2. "Seek ye diligently and teach one another words of wisdom; yea, seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study, and also by faith."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36. And in paragraph 21, "Teach ye diligently and my grace shall attend you, that you may be instructed more perfectly in theory, in principle, in doctrine, in the law of the gospel, in all things that pertain unto the kingdom of God, that is expedient for you to understand; of things both in heaven, and in earth, and under the earth; things which have been; things which are; things which must shortly come to pass; things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and perplexities of the nations; and the judgments which are on the land; and a knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms, that ye may be prepared in all things when I shall send you again."

"Study and learn, and become acquainted with all good books, and with languages, tongues, and people" (section 87: 5). In other words, our curriculum should include ethics, logic, philosophy, geology, astronomy, geography, history, current events, political science, law, medicine, sociology, economics, languages, sciences, educational methods, religion, and the arts.

It would seem that Zion could not be established by an ignorant people. It is a task for an enlightened and wise and learned people—people of broad cultural background. If the all-inclusive curriculum outlined in section 85 is followed diligently by the Saints, then indeed ours must be a church of high culture.

Consider with me two average families who live next door to each other. One is an average family of the world, good people; the other is an average Latter Day Saint family, also good people. Now let us compare their tastes and appreciations. Do they enjoy the same movies? Do they read and enjoy the same magazines, books, and comics? Do they spend their time listening to the same radio soap operas and other entertainment? Do they enjoy the same radio music, phonograph records, juke box selections, and music in general? Do they have the same audience decorum at plays, the theater, public or private meetings, concerts, etc?

The answers to these questions are important as an indication of what the restored gospel way of life is doing for people. The ideals and purposes of the church should elevate the cultural and social standards of our people. We should seek and choose the superior things of life. If we do not, the gospel has failed to help us. If we do, it is succeeding in bringing us to a better way of life. The "abundant life" includes an appreciation of the fine arts; and, indeed, it includes the ability to actively participate in artistic endeavor.

The Restored Church has long stood for education. Wherever the early Saints settled, one of the first projects was the providing for schools. Joseph Smith himself was a fine example to his people; though unlearned at the beginning of his ministry, he so educated himself and his associates that as a result of the establishing of the school of the prophets, they became proficient in Greek, Hebrew, history, and the other subjects of the curriculum as outlined by prophecy. He certainly was not an uneducated man at the time of his death. Education, in school and out, is one of the high-ways to the kingdom type of life. What we are saying is that if we follow conscientiously the Zion-ic pattern of living, we must become a people of culture; if we are not people of culture, we have not been following that pattern.

VOCATIONAL CULTURE

Nineteen hundred years ago, in the time of Jesus, "Manual labor . . . was deemed a religious duty, frequently and most earnestly insisted upon, to learn some trade, provided it did not minister to luxury, nor tend to lead away from personal observance of law." The Life and Times of Jesus, the Messiah—Edersheim, Volume 1, page 252.

In I Thessalonians 4: 11, we read, "study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you."

Christ said, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

The gospel of Christ even reaches into the attitudes of the individual toward his work. Zion-ic living implies an attitude of devotion toward one's vocation. If you are a lawyer, be the best lawyer you can be; if you are a teacher, be the very best teacher you can be. If you are a student, a mechanic, a painter, a contractor, or whatever, be the best you are capable of being, not for self-glory but as a matter of principle. Perfectionism? Yes! Why not? "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."—Matthew 5: 48. Make of your vocation an expression of the light of the gospel in your life, so that others may see your good works and glorify God.

There are too many people who half do their work, who try to "get by" with as little as possible, whose

The Beckoning Kingdom

By Melvin L. Fowler

Scripture: Psalm 15

THE CONCEPT of Zion has been a major part of our church belief since the beginning of the Restoration in 1830, but it has not yet reached a maturity befitting its age. We have never attained a stable and permanent concept of the kingdom of God. Zion has meant many things to different people at different times. We have been, as Paul said, "Looking through a glass darkly." Ideas of Zion have included everything from a place of physical refuge protecting us from the sinful, adverse conditions of the "world" to "a workshop in human relationships" where people learn the meaning of living fully by doing Christian acts. There has been an apparent tendency in recent years toward the latter viewpoints. People of our church have become more conscious of the imperative need of the Zion program; they have sensed a need for a program of Christian love in action as the only program that will bring true peace to humanity. We have turned toward the beckoning kingdom with greater hopes and a new anticipation in our hearts.

This has not come by any conscious effort. It has been a natural growth, the outcome of the times in which we live. In our present society, we recognize certain fundamental needs that almost force us to conceive of the kingdom as a dynamic force for the betterment of humanity.

We need social betterment; we need reform. Our present social system is blighted by some disease that eats at its core and causes the inequalities of wealth, allows ignorance and suffering to continue, permits greedy men to succeed in their exploitation, and sends thousands of men to die in warfare as diabolical as the mind of man can invent. In every newspaper the reader finds stories of murder and violence, greed and unhappiness. These things make us feel the beckoning of God's kingdom. Among the most prevalent of our many social ills are poverty and ignorance. They cause many evils. Why must people live crowded together in rat-infested firetraps? Our slum districts are as bad as ghettos. They are the only homes ever known by thousands, and they must be born, live, and die in such an environment. What causes the juvenile delinquency that has become so serious in the past decade? What about the divorce rate that is increasing tremendously month by month and year by year?

Broken homes, delinquency, slums—these are signs of a great need in our society of equalization and guidance to redirect society and check the inroads of poverty and ignorance.

ANOTHER SOCIAL evil is the domination and persecution of minorities. The papers of the past few years have been full of news about such persecutions. They have never reached the proportions in the U. S. A. that they did in Hitler Germany, but the fact remains that 445 Negroes have lost their lives to lynching mobs in the last twenty-five years. It is all but impossible for a colored person to get into certain fields of work in our country. It is a well-known fact that many (if not most) of our large universities have quota systems that restrict the number of Negroes, Jews, Catholics, and other minorities that can enter these schools, thus very effectively blocking these students from entering many professions. In many places the doors are closed completely to these groups.

This is a problem that has its roots deeply embedded in our present social system. The whole problem arises from the type of social hierarchy that we have developed. We find in our society exclusive groups and social snobbery. People ruin themselves "keeping up with the Joneses." A statement such as, "Oh, he's just not our social equal," is as damning to the condition of our society as a tirade by some bigot on the racial "inferiority" of Negroes. Such concepts make clear the way for Hitlers to climb to tyrannical power. Yes, the whole concept of superior and inferior peoples is one that causes us to see the need for social reform in our society.

Our whole social order seems to be weakened by distrust and suspicion. Behavior is based on fear. Law is enforced by fear of punishment rather than any realization of social weal. There is the unending struggle of capital and labor. The international situation is at its present explosive condition because no one nation feels free to trust another. These are days when "To Each His Own" seems to be more than a title of a popular song: it is a philosophy of life for modern people. Men pile up individual wealth and then lock the doors and bar the windows lest neighbors steal it.

WE HAVE A great need of a religious awakening. Through the ages, men have turned away from religion as a power to overcome the various ills of society. They have tried wars, threats, power politics, dictatorial rule, legislation, and many others, and our very imperfect society bears witness of the failure and futility of these methods. Men must now turn to religion for the answer.

Let us define religion before going any further. It is a way of life, not merely a set of rules to guide our behavior, but is a vibrant growing philosophy that gives us a basis for action in dealing with our fellow men. All the great religions started as personal philosophies of great religious leaders. It has often been the case that these philosophies have later become lost in the intricacies of rules, regulations, and ceremonies. Basic religion is a sound philosophy by which we organize our actions.

Our need for a religious awakening is not a call for a series of old-fashioned revival meetings, nor a sudden influx of people into the pews on Sunday mornings. The world is well acquainted with violent revivals and new churches. All too often emotions have been stirred and people moved to get "religion." The hundreds of battling denominations and sects that we now witness are evidences of the revival type of religious awakening.

WHAT WE need is a sober analysis of the concepts that we now teach; but we must re-tool and re-gear them to a 1947 society. We need a rediscovery of the foundations of our faith. A basic re-interpretation is necessary. I do not mean to say that we need a new interpretation, but only that we need to discover again what has been given to us.

We have the teachings of Christ before us. He unlocked the chest of successful social relationships when he taught prayer, humility, and love. Christ taught us that to live together successfully we must forget ourselves and seek to fulfill the needs of our neighbors. This is true humility. He gave us the key to race relations when he taught us of the good Samaritan. We don't need to develop a "functional" religion to put Christian teaching into practice in the form of a Christian community of man throughout the world. There is indeed a need for a religious awakening to meet the challenges of the ills of society.

These two great needs of social reform and religious awakening force

Autumn

A "Between You and Me" Feature

By Kathryn C. Metz

Autumn isn't a season; it's a lovely, giddy spell.

It's the time of year when nature puts her finger to her lips and quietly waits for the cycle to be completed. Telephone lines are dotted with birds making plans for the great mystery called migration; the wild grapes on the vine, plump and round, yearn for fulfillment that comes with the first frost, and the ground is carpeted with a sweet-smelling coverlet fit for the Babes in the Woods.

Autumn isn't a season; it's the day when a startled world looks up in wonderment at the sudden rush of feet toward the schoolhouses.

Inside the schoolroom, kids who have surrendered their freedom wiggle in their seats and their feet rebel against being encased in shoes. The slow-moving hands of the clock finally signal it's recess time; but in the schoolyard, the brown sharp stubbles of newly-cut vegetation reduce the delights of play.

Autumn isn't a season; it's a contradiction of the almanac. Nice days linger on, the insistent song of the katydid adds a grace note to the symphony of sounds, and the snake feeders swing their long, slender bodies in such beauty and grace that the spectator is bewildered and bewitched by the sight.

Autumn isn't a season; it's a restful pause.

The wind is fragrant with a sweetness that comes from loaded haymows and bins. The days are warm and languid. The meadow daisies burn a bright candle to fall, and the weary asters endure the midday sun because they remember the cool moonlight. Chickens dig for a damp spot under the rose bush, and the cows rest in the shade of the pasture trees.

No, autumn isn't a season; it's a farewell curtain call for summer. Things are at a standstill. The leaves are reluctant to part from their parent, the anxious sumac retains its green, and the harvest moon spotlights the whole performance.

to our attention the one great need of society in our times—the kingdom. It is the one thing that is adequate to meet the twofold need of society. Sharing, prayerfulness, love, and humility have already been mentioned as aspects of this kingdom message. Much more time could be spent in bringing forth interpretations and other aspects of this message. However, most of us are long familiar with these, and the message now seems to be the urgency for action. The very character of our living seems to be calling for the kingdom. Society in many places seems shaken by a death rattle. We must do something if the kingdom message is to be effective.

I LIVE with a group of theological students, and quite often our conversation will turn to the many problems confronting society today. Many times the conversation will end up with this challenge, "What is your church doing about it?" We must place ourselves in a position to answer! The Zion's League has pledged itself to the goal of raising $25,000 for the Missions Abroad. This is a start and a very worthy project. This money is to be used to bring the teachings of Christ to new peoples and to strengthen the faith of those abroad who have already heard his message. From this start we must go forward and beyond to lives of sharing not only $25,000 but all that we have. We must no longer sing "Onward to Zion, march on with a song," unless at the same time the trumpet is sounded and we move forward together to make the kingdom a reality.

The Place of Culture

interest is getting more than giving. That is not the way Christ taught us to live, yet we find evidence of such conduct among the Saints. Some even do their church work with that attitude.

The gospel, as enunciated by Christ, sets a pattern for Christian living that takes in all phases of life. If we accept it and live by it, we shall develop character and the very highest cultural level. Anything less than this is not worthy of those who profess to be the builders of Zion.

The Angel's Hand

By Emma M. Phillips

MY IRISH father tells an old folklore story that could well be applied to these times.

It seemed that a certain Mr. O'Casey, a young man of common means, was happily married to an attractive wife—that was until married life became boring to him. While he continued to seek new thrills and new companions, his pious wife cared for the home and the children, prayed and waited for an answer to her prayers.

Early one morning O'Casey was unsteadily making his way home when the road ahead of him suddenly became flushed with a brilliant white light. In the midst of the light stood an angel from heaven. As the angel looked at the Irishman, His holy countenance was full of gloom and misery. "Why are you an evil man?" he asked in such thundering tones that the ground rocked beneath the drunken man.

"I am not being evil," O'Casey defended himself. "I am merely trying to enjoy life."

The voice of the angel rocked the earth again. "Do you mean to tell me that you do not know the difference between evil and enjoyment?"

Thinking this might be the easiest way to avoid admonition, O'Casey admitted that he did not clearly understand the difference.

"I shall not tell you," the angel declared loudly. "I will let you tell yourself." He stretched forth his mighty hand and gripping the Irishman's trembling shoulder, held him firmly and steadily. Then spreading the fingers of his other hand, he pressed it against the face of O'Casey so that the hand practically covered the face. "I am leaving the impression of my hand upon your face. Your thoughts will control that impression. When you have enjoyment, your thoughts are clear and transparent. At that time the impression shall not show. When you do evil, you have dark thoughts. Then shall the impression be dark as your evil."

The angel released his grip on the shoulder, and the Irishman fell to the ground. Toward dawn he became conscious enough to make his way home. His wife, already up and preparing breakfast for the children, greeted him with cool indifference. She prayed much for her husband, but every day she had less love for him and less faith in him.

O'Casey took no time to eat, but went immediately to attend the plowing of his field. At first, he thought consistently of his experience with the angel. Gradually, however, his thoughts revolved to the earlier adventures of the evening, the drinks, the hilarity, and the young woman, Maureen. The plow struck a stone, and he bent over to remove it. Just at that time his son came into the field, and announced, "Mother said you could not plow without any breakfast. I've brought you a lunch she packed."

O'Casey stood up to take the lunch from his son. The boy took one startled look at his parent and backed away. "There's something black on your face. It's like the hand of a black giant."

"It's just the shadow of the tree branches," lied O'Casey.

"It got blacker as you spoke, Daddy. I'm going to tell Mother."

"No, no, don't do that," the Irishman shouted. But his son was off toward the house before he could stop him. O'Casey knew the indignation that his wife had developed lately. He did not want to see her while the impression of the angel's hand was still on his face. He must think pure thoughts before she came to the field to investigate. But since his numerous misdemeanors and wonderings, he found it difficult to find something wholesome about which to think. "I'll say the Lord's Prayer," he vowed as he gripped the plow handles. Over and over he repeated the prayer, as he followed the horse.

"Why are you an evil man?"

HIS WIFE came to the edge of the field, and casually called, "Are you feeling too sick to plow?"

"No, I'm fine," he answered briefly.

"Have you eaten your lunch?" When he shook his head in the negative, she admonished, "Then you better eat it before you grow to weak to plow."

As O'Casey watched his wife turn and leave, he meditated on how much more interest she would have shown in his welfare a few months ago. She was an attractive woman, but, of course, not as attractive as Maureen, his present choice. He watched his wife go toward the house, but Maureen crowded his thoughts. Moved by a sudden impulse, he put his hands to his face. The mark. It must be there.

He bellowed to the horse, gripped the plow handles, and began reciting the Lord's Prayer. The furrows he left behind were as uneven as the tone of his chanting. He could not go through life with the impression of an angel's hand showing on his face. The only solution would be to go back to the old routine of married life. The angel had left him no other choice in the matter. All the while these thoughts were going through his mind, he mechanically repeated the prayer.

THE JOVIAL shout of a neighbor interrupted his musing. "Are you plowing or having a race with your horse?"

O'Casey turned to see neighbor Hood, leisurely plowing his own field. O'Casey slackened to a more suitable pace. "Good morning, Hood."

"It is a good morning," came the cheerful reply, "mighty good morning for plowing."

As the plows went in different directions the prayer died in O'Casey's heart and evil thoughts entered. When the plows met again, O'Casey did not raise his head, but Hood called, "Are you sick? Your face is dark."

"Shut up," grumbled O'Casey and turned his horse into a field farther away from his neighbor. He cursed the angel for putting such a curse upon him. He was no longer a free man; he was ruled by a mark.

HE HAD not been long in the field before Maureen came to him.

"This is a beautiful necklace you gave me, Darling."

O'Casey looked longingly at her. "Then treasure it, for it is the last gift I can give you."

"Why?"

"I just can't."

Maureen looked dishearted, then she dimpled into an enchanting smile. "I don't care if you can't afford gifts. Just keep giving me your affection."

"I can't give you that any more."

"You mean you don't love me!"

"Oh, I love you. I love you more than anything else in the world. But I've got to—I mean I think I ought to remember that I'm a married man and a father."

"Don't lie to me. You aren't the type to show an interest in such trivial things."

"They aren't trivial things to me now. I am changing my manner of living. I'll not be coming to see you any more."

Maureen lifted her chin haughtily. "And I suppose you think that I will lament that. I'll not miss you in the least. There are other men who would like to enjoy my companionship. To the devil with you and your dirty face." She turned with a pert flip and was gone.

O'CASEY threw his hat upon the ground and kicked it violently. What a miserable life he was doomed to have. He would live a proper life—not because he wanted to, but because he was being forced to be good. The impression of the angel's hand must be like ebony upon his face, he thought. He pushed the plow handle with such force that the plow turned over, and the horse moved in a nervous, frightened attitude. As he righted the plow, he looked across the field for a last fond sight at Maureen. Instead he saw his heavenly visitor of the previous night.

The angel was sitting on a rock at the edge of the field, a most forlorn look upon his face. He motioned to O'Casey, "Come sit on this rock with me, for I have things to discuss with you."

O'Casey marveled that the voice that had boomed with thunder last night, could be so docile now. He would like to have cursed the angel, but he reasoned that that was not the proper way to treat a heavenly visitor—even an unwelcome heavenly visitor. Besides, the angel might put worse punishment upon him because of his misconduct. So he sat down on the rock obediently and said nothing.

The angel sighed with anguish. "I made a grievous mistake last night when I left the impression of my hand upon your face. I have been severely reprimanded for my improper behavior. I have come to take back the impression of my hand."

"You mean," ventured the Irishman, "that you will—that I won't—that this black hand—"

The angel nodded his head meekly. "It is not proper for you to be ruled by such a mark. Man is not to be governed by force. Man should govern his own behavior. That is free agency."

O'Casey moved closer to his visitor. "Take it quickly. It has caused me so much trouble that I hate it."

Again the angel gripped O'Casey's shoulder with one hand, and pressed the other hand against the face of the Irishman. "Now you are free to make your own decisions," he said as he released the man.

WITH ONE jubilant "Thanks," O'Casey left the bewildered and unhappy angel, and bounded across the field in the same direction that Maureen had taken.

When he reached her dwelling, his joy changed to sorrow. He had been freed of the impression of the angel's hand, but he had been freed too late. Maureen was in the arms of his neighbor. He returned to his home and meditated.

From then on the life of O'Casey was different. His wife thanked God that her prayers had been answered. Maureen gave him only little annoying attentions when they occasionally met. The neighbors claimed that O'Casey's reformation was because he had been the losing party of the love affair. For O'Casey returned to a normal life, neither too good nor too bad.

But the poor angel! Never again did he descend to earth to interfere with the life of a man unless he was divinely directed to do so.

Attaining Kingdom Caliber

JIM SHALL be regular in his church attendance. Perhaps we have been guilty of taking such action for granted—which is exactly the reason we're taking pains to discuss it now. The next time you walk through the door of the church, ask yourself this question, "Why did I come this morning?" There will probably be many different answers. "Nothing else to do." "Habit, I guess." "I like to be with my girl." These are some of the familiar surface reasons—but let's go a little deeper. Are your actions motivated by a desire to learn more about God so you in turn can be more helpful and productive for him? If so, then it is only natural that you want to go to church, and it should become one of your good habits.

DOES THIS cover everything? I most certainly hope not. If by this dissertation we have helped you to become one iota more determined

Port of Tahiti

The "Douanes" is the newest and most modern addition to Tahiti. It is a modern, cream-colored building which presently houses the bulk of the customs offices.

This photograph was taken upon the occasion of the celebration for the returning veterans.

The Governor of Tahiti is pictured at the left in front. He is the tallest of the uniformed men. Mayor Poroï of the City of Papeete (dressed in civilian clothes) is seen walking in front of the Governor and his staff. Although he does not belong to the church, he is quite friendly with the Saints. His brother is a member.

The port of Tahiti is taking on a very modern appearance. Suction machines are making previous methods antique of loading and storing copra. This accelerates considerably the work on the dock.

A device for extracting cocount oil may be installed soon. The docks have been lengthened to accommodate two and even three large craft at one time.

The newest innovation, however, was a sitdown strike by the natives. The last ship was entirely loaded and unloaded by soldiers.

The port of Tahiti is abreast of the times and is still, today, an oasis in a deserted sea.—F. Edward Butterworth.

to live like our mythical Jim, then our venture has served its purpose.

Somewhere I read that we often think of fun as the name of something someone else has more of than we do. And that's all wrong, as somebody else said, "Laughter is the most fun when you're the one who's laughing." That's true of all these other things we've been talking about. They once were alive and invigorating because of the life Christ lived. What has given them such an uninviting and worn-out sound to many people? Let us, as did the men who were closest to the Master, ask this question, "Lord, is it I?"

The Stranger Within the Gates

By Ella Buck

We Latter Day Saints often pride ourselves on the fine projects we promote. We should be proud of these achievements, still all too often we "miss the boat."

We send our old clothes to war ravaged families in Europe; we make a stab at creating unity among denominations; we try to cheer the unfortunate. All virtuous activities to be sure, yet there is something lacking. We don't have the proper degree of co-operation. If we were to infuse into all our associations a sincere touch of friendship, our efforts would prove much more effective.

People often say, "I'd go to church, but I feel out of place. Somehow, I've never felt very welcome." We all desire the fellowship of others. When we fail to receive it at church, we look for it elsewhere. This human factor has spelled defeat in many branches.

Charles Graham, in a recent sermon at the campus, spoke of a seventh principle—Christ's greatest commandment—"That ye love one another." Who can love and be unfriendly? Of course, we are interested in those we've known for years, but what about the person we see each Sunday, yet never get around to saying "Hello" to?

Fortunately, it is not difficult to remedy this situation. We have eyes with which to see, tongues with which to speak, hands to extend to others in greeting, and hearts that can expand to include other friendships.

Walk up to that new person—or one not so new—and ask his name, talk about the weather, the sermon—anything. There's no telling how many kindred souls you may discover.

The only way to eliminate the stranger within the gates is to make him your friend.

Blue Pencil Notes

BY ELBERT A. SMITH

Santa-Cali-Gon

CHILDREN naturally love to play at "pretending." That is the beginning of the drama. They play at housekeeping, teaching school, keeping store, at being cowboys, soldiers, nurses, doctors, policemen, cops and robbers. Their dramas look into the future. They play the things they hope to do and be. Years ago I had a small cousin, a farm lad, who played at farming. He had his miniature farm—his barn, fields, and fences—under a big tree. He even had an imaginary "hired man" to whom, by a strange whimsey, he gave the name, "Mr. Bogus." This Mr. Bogus was supposed to do farm work; as a matter of fact he did no work. No one ever saw Mr. Bogus, but to the boy, he was a very real person.

Adults never quite outgrow this love of play-acting, of pretending, of the drama. That accounts for the popularity of novels, the theater, the movies. Unlike children, adults are prone to recreate the past in imagination and dramatization. During this summer, Independence was very busy preparing for and staging the Santa-Cali-Gon festival and pageant. In the early days of the West, Independence was on the edge of the frontier, next door to the Indian and the buffalo and the "great American desert." Here began the historic trails to the West. Wagon trains were assembled and outfitted here and from our very door the Santa Fe, California, and Oregon trails took their way west over plains, deserts, and mountains. This is the "Queen City of the Trails." The name, Santa-Cali-Gon, obviously is taken from the names of the trails, Santa Fe, California, and Oregon.

THIS is the second time that Independence has celebrated and lived over in imagination and pageantry those stirring scenes of early years. The affair was home-planned and produced, and a great many citizens took part with the enthusiasm and zest of children at their play-acting. Girls and women put on old-fashioned bonnets, hoop skirts, and bustles. Men grew long hair and beards of every color and every style known to frontier days, and some that might have been outlawed. Preparation and rehearsal went on for weeks. Some men seemed to live the character day by day. Even in torrid August, they went about the streets with long hair and beards, wearing slouch hats, flannel shirts, and heavy trousers tucked into high topped boots. They looked as if they had just come in from the desert or the mountains or from a string of traps or were just ready to join a covered wagon train for the west. It was a bit incongruous when such a character sidled up to a drugstore counter and drank root beer from a glass through a straw—but the illusion still held, Mr. Bogus was very real in imagination—and so was Mrs. Bogus.

Presently Indians in costume appeared upon our streets—real Indians—and outlaws on horses. Also a varied assortment of old-time vehicles, including prairie schooners. Independence was play-acting, engrossed in the past which can live again only in imagination. Of course, the whole affair reached a climax in the three days of the festival and pageant—the Santa-Cali-Gon.

The Santa Fe Trail, an interesting book published by the editors of Look Magazine, remarks about Independence: "By 1830 it had a blacksmith shop and supply stores, and the caravans to Santa Fe left regularly in the spring to return in the fall." Those were caravans of pack horses. Wagon trains were to come later. The caravans left Independence for the eight hundred mile trip to Santa Fe over vast unbroken plains, deserts, and mountains. Sometimes they were attacked by wild beasts, often by wilder men—Indians and marauding bands of Mexicans. There was no job for Mr. Bogus. Each man took with him fifty pounds of flour, fifty of bacon, ten of coffee, and twenty of sugar—for his own use. The caravans carried cottons, woolens, silks, velvets, cutlery, and hardware; they came back with furs and buffalo robes. Trappers, traders, teamsters, mountain men, merchants, and gamblers visited Independence.

SUCH WAS Independence at the head of the Santa Fe Trail when our first missionaries entered the town on foot, January 31, 1831. Joseph Smith and numbers of others arrived during the summer, and the first conference was held in Zion on August 4, 1831. Could those old-time Latter Day Saint pioneers have revisited Independence during the Santa-Cali-Gon celebration of this year, they might have witnessed some familiar scenes—at least familiar-looking groups of men and women. But probably their entire attention would have been taken up by the modern homes, stores, and business offices, the strange and multitudinous automobiles, the planes flying overhead, the to them strange dress of most of the men and women not masquerading, and above all by the big Auditorium, the Stone Church, and our numerous other Latter Day Saint church buildings. They had looked forward to such a gathering—while just now we are looking backward. That is human nature. So often we try to turn the clock ahead or backward to escape the present for a moment. Paul had the right idea, "I press forward." It is good to dip into the past at times to learn its lessons, but the better part is to live well the present and thus press into the future, prepared for its dangers and its responsibilities as well as its blessings.

The "Zion's League Annual -- No. 1"

The Best News Ever for Young People

Girl Scout Cookies

By Emma Mereda Phillips

A junior girl, eager to sell her Girl Scout cookies, knocked on three different doors. The woman who opened the first door, smiled, bought a dozen cookies and closed the door. The woman who opened the second door said, "I'm too busy. I have company coming." And she closed the door on the girl. But the third woman believed in finding more joy in life. She not only bought a dozen cookies, but she talked to the child about the cookies, the campaign, and the Girl Scouts.

The first woman did not have the full knowledge of living. She was content that she had helped a worthy cause. She did not know or attempt to know the rich experience that was on her threshold when that small hand knocked. She has the pitiable life.

And the second woman did not have the full knowledge of living. The days of her life are as though they were cast in a diminutive mold. They repeat themselves in the same monotonous pattern. She unconsciously deprives herself and others of life's little pleasures. She has the paltry life.

But the third woman knows that the little things—like a junior girl on the doorstep—are the things that contribute to a rich, full life. With her purchase she acquired an experience to add to the collection that she made daily. She has the more abundant life.

And what did the Girl Scout think? As the first door closed, she rejoiced because she had made a sale. As the second door closed, she felt sorrow and remorse. As the third door closed, she thought, "I am helping to do a great work. And I sure like that woman. I wish there were more like her."

I have just enjoyed one of the great thrills of my church experience. On my desk before me as I write lies the very first copy of the new ZION'S LEAGUE ANNUAL, Number One. What a satisfying feeling indeed—just to look at it, and to browse through its attractively printed, richly illustrated pages. Truly it's one of those "moments" that makes one's work seem worth-while after all.

IT'S ALL THIS AND MORE

The ANNUAL constitutes undoubtedly the most attractive and practical single volume of helps ever provided for our young people. It represents—

- Dreams of many months at last fulfilled. Long hours of sacrificial toil by a few devoted workers whose chief compensation well be found in the consciousness of a worthy job well done.
 - The history-making enthusiasm and devotion of the general council of Zion's League—as manifested during the late General Conference.
 - The wholehearted co-operation of the Department of Religious Education and the Herald Publishing House and the many writers, editors, stenographers, artists, typesetters, and pressmen who were called upon to assist.
 - A prophecy of a church-wide revival of Zion's League activities, and the consequent participation and growth of many traditional hundreds of young people in branches and districts everywhere.
 - New and strengthened bonds of international fellowship, so essential to world-wide evangelism and brotherhood.
- Yes—it's all this and more.

WHAT IT CONTAINS

The ANNUAL consists of 242 pages, 8½ x 11 inches, beautifully covered in red and blue, its pages filled with practical helps in every area of League work. Here will be found—

- A unifying theme for the entire year: "Youth Explores the Church."
- A bird's-eye view of the Zion's League organized for acting.
- Well-defined objectives for the year.
- A League calendar.
- And for each month:
 - What we'd like to do.
 - How we'd like to do it.
 - A complete worship service.
 - Study program, recreational activity, and service project.
 - Supplemental suggestions and alternate programs.
 - First aid to commission chairmen.
 - Plans for next month,
 - Etc. . . Etc. . . Etc.

BUT WHY TRY TO TELL YOU ABOUT IT?

Pshaw, what's the use of writing all this? You'll be ordering yours at once, or better still, you're already using it and know why I am so enthusiastic.

It's on the MUST list. No League can afford to be without it. Nothing quite like it has ever been provided. It's the answer to every Leaguer's prayer. ORDER YOUR COPY TODAY—AND USE IT EVERY DAY.

Worship Suggestions for November

Theme for the Month: GRATITUDE
FOR JESUS

NOVEMBER 2, 1947

GRATITUDE FOR JESUS, THE SAVIOUR
Theme appreciation:

"For God so loved the world, that he gave his Only Begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved."—John 3: 16, 17. ". . . and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins."—Matthew 2: 4.

Hymn: "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," Saints' Hymnal, No. 33.

Prayer of gratitude for Jesus, the Saviour.

Hymn: "O Saviour, Precious Saviour," Saints' Hymnal, No. 34.

Talk:

King Herod might well have let his heart be troubled, for a power that could not be stemmed flowed forth that night the King of love was born. He came to save the world. Even as he saved the lives of his disciples during the storm on Galilee, so he extends that saving hand to all mankind. He died painfully upon the cross, still loving his fellow men. Nothing can separate us from the love of our Saviour. Even across this distracted world the voice of Jesus still comes to us like a cool wind. He is our Saviour still.

Jesus, thou joy of loving hearts!
Thou fount of life, thou light of men!
From the best bliss that earth imparts
We turn, unfilled, to thee again.

Thy truth unchanged hath ever stood;
Thou savest those that on thee call;
To them that seek thee thou art good;
To them that find thee all in all.

We taste thee, O thou living bread,
And long to feast upon thee still;
We drink of thee, the fountain head
And thirst our souls from thee to fill.

Our restless spirits yearn for thee
Where'er our changeful lot is cast;
Glad, when thy gracious smile we see,
Blest, when our faith can hold thee fast.

O Jesus, ever with us stay;
Make all our moments calm and bright;
Chase the dark night of sin away;
Shed o'er the world thy holy light.
—Ray Palmer.

GRATITUDE FOR JESUS, OUR BROTHER
Theme appreciation:

"And the multitude sat about him, and they said unto him, Behold thy mother

By Leola L. Sheppard

and thy brethren without seek for thee. And he answered them, saying, Who is my mother, or who are my brethren? And he looked round about him on them which sat about him, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and my mother."—Mark 3: 27-30 (verses 32-35, King James Version).

In Christ there is no east or west,
In him no south or north;
But one great fellowship of love
Throughout the whole wide earth.

In him shall true hearts everywhere
Their high communion find;
His service is the golden cord
Close binding all mankind.

Join hands, then, brothers of the faith,
Whate'er your race may be.
Who serves my Father as a son
Is surely kin to me.
—John Oxenham.

Hymn: "Teach Us, O Lord, True Brotherhood," No. 341.

Prayer of gratitude that Jesus is our brother.

Hymn: "Blest Be the Tie That Binds," No. 343.

Talk:

"The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God; And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be glorified together."—Romans 8: 16, 17.

When Jesus was here upon earth, he taught his disciples to pray, "Our Father." He came as a brother to man teaching that we are the children of God. Jesus said that all who do the will of God are his brothers. He is the perfect Son, and if we desire to be joint heirs with him, we must follow his example. For, in truth, we are all brothers. As we accept Jesus as our brother, we must accept all men as brothers. As Jesus served and loved mankind, so we must strive to love and serve our brothers.

What might be done, if man were wise,
What glorious deeds, my suffering brother,
Would they unite
In love and right,
And cease their scorn of one another!

Oppression's heart might be imbued
With kindling drops of loving kindness,
And knowledge pour
From shore to shore,
Light on the eyes of mental blindness.

All slavery, warfare, lies, and wrongs,
All vice and crime, might die together;
And wine and corn
To each man born
Be free as warmth in summer weather.

The meanest wretch that ever trod,
The deepest sunk in quiet and sorrow
Might stand erect
In self respect,
And share the teeming world tomorrow.

What might be done? This might be done.
And more than this, my suffering brother;
More than the tongue
E'er said or sung,
If men were wise and loved each other.

NOVEMBER 16, 1947

GRATITUDE FOR JESUS, THE TEACHER
Theme appreciation:

"The same came to Jesus by night, and said unto him, Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God."—John 3: 2. "And it came to pass, as Jesus was praying in a certain place, when he ceased, one of his disciples said unto him, Lord, teach us to pray."—Luke 11: 1. And Jesus taught them to pray.

Hymn: "Our Father Who in Heaven Doth Dwell," No. 315.

Prayer of gratitude that Jesus came as a teacher.

Hymn: "Come, Learn of the Meek and Lowly," No. 258.

Talk:

Jesus taught his greatest lessons by his own example. He did not tell his followers to do things that he did not do. Jesus was praying. His disciples heard him praying, and when Jesus ceased, he then taught his disciples to pray. Everywhere Jesus went, he taught his followers the will of God.

"And they went into Capernaum; and straightway on the Sabbath day he entered into the synagogue, and taught. And they were astonished at his doctrine; for he taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes."—Mark 1: 19, 20.

Jesus did teach with authority from God. God said, "This is my beloved Son, hear ye him." When Jesus spoke, people listened. He said, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." When we come to know Jesus through his works, we know the Father. The things he taught while here on earth are still the lessons we need to learn today. If we abide by his teachings, we will be worthy pupils of Christ, our teacher.

Lord, speak to me that I may speak
In living echoes of thy tone;
As thou hast sought, so let me seek Thy erring children lost and lone.

www.LatterDayTruth.org

O teach me, Lord, that I may teach
The precious things thou dost impart;
And wing my words, that they may reach
The hidden depths of many a heart.

O fill me with thy fullness, Lord,
Until my very heart o'erflow
In kindling thought and glowing word,
Thy love to tell, thy praise to show.
—Frances R. Havergal.

GRATITUDE FOR JESUS, THE PHYSICIAN

Theme appreciation:

He touched her hand and the fever left her,
O blessed touch of the man divine!
So beautiful to arise and serve him,
When the fever is gone from your life and mine.

It may be the fever of restless serving
With heart all thirsty for love and praise,
And eyes all aching and strained with yearning
Toward self-set goals in the future days.

Or it may be fever of spirit's anguish,
Some tempest of sorrow that does not dawn,
Till the cross at last is in meekness lifted,
And the head stoops low for the thorny crown.

Or it may be a fever of pain and anger,
When the wounded spirit is hard to bear,
And only the Lord can draw forth the arrows
Left carelessly, cruelly rankling there.

Whatever the fever, his touch can heal it;
Whatever the tempest, his voice can still.
There is only a rest as we seek his pleasure,
There is only a rest as we choose his will.

And some day after life's fitful fever,
I think we shall say, in the home on high,
"If the hands that he touched but did his bidding,
How little it matters what else went by."

Oh, Lord, thou knowest us all together,
Each heart's sore sickness, whatever it be;
Touch thou our hands! Let the fever leave us,
And so shall we minister unto thee!
—Author unknown.

Hymn: "Guide Me, O My Saviour, Guide Me," No. 266.

Prayer of gratitude for Jesus, the Physician.

Hymn: "How Gentle God's Command," No. 248.

Talk:

"Now, when the sun was setting, all they who had any sick, with divers diseases, brought them unto him; and he laid his hands on every one of them, and healed them."—Luke 4: 40. It was many such acts as this that make us think of Jesus as a great physician. He touched the bodies of sick people and healed them, and he touched the hearts of his followers and filled them with love and peace. So great was his love, that he shared each pain and caused the sufferer to smile. When he went home to his Father in heaven, he did not take away the privilege of coming to him for help. He taught us to pray and call upon his servants with authority, and through the name of Jesus we will still be blessed.

The little sharp vexations
And the briars that cut the feet,
Why not take all to the Helper
Who has never failed us yet?

Tell him about the heartache,
And tell him the longings, too,
Tell him the baffled purpose
When we scarce know what to do.

Then, leaving all our weakness
With one so divinely strong,
Forget we bare the burden
And carry away the song.
—Phillips Brooks.

O love divine, that stoops to share
Our sharpest pang, our bitterest tear,
On thee we cast each earthborn care,
We smile at pain while thou art near.

Though long the weary way we tread,
And sorrow crown each lingering year,
No path we shun, no darkness dread,
Our hearts still whispering, thou art near.

On thee we fling our burdening woe,
O love divine, forever dear,
Content to suffer while we know,
Living and dying, thou art near.
—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

GRATITUDE FOR JESUS, THE SHEPHERD

Theme appreciation:

"For I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine."
—John 10: 13 (verse 11, King James Version).

The King of love my Shepherd is,
Whose goodness faileth never;
I nothing lack if I am his,
And he is mine forever.

Where streams of living water flow,
My ransomed soul he leadeth,
And, where the verdant pastures grow,
With food celestial feedeth.

Perverse and foolish oft I strayed,
But yet in love he sought me,
And on his shoulder gently laid,
And home, rejoicing, brought me.

In death's dark vale I fear no ill
With thee, dear Lord, beside me;
Thy rod and staff my comfort still,
Thy cross before to guide me.

And so through all the length of days
Thy goodness faileth never;
Good Shepherd, may I sing thy praise
Within thy house forever.
—Henry W. Baker.

Hymn: "Saviour, Like a Shepherd Lead Us," No. 263.

Prayer of gratitude for Jesus, our Shepherd.

Hymn: "Jesus, My Shepherd," No. 272.

Talk:

"I am the good shepherd; the good shepherd giveth his life for his sheep."
—John 10: 11. Jesus came to earth knowing he would give his life for his sheep, but he is our Shepherd still. He is ever calling his flock together. He grieves after those who go astray. He desires to lead us in green pastures and beside still waters. We can never be separated from the love of this good Shepherd. He knows his sheep and cares for each one. We need have no fear if we follow Jesus, for he will lead us in safe places. We should be grateful to be in his flock.

Shepherd of souls, refresh and bless
Thy chosen pilgrim flock
With manna in the wilderness,
With water from the rock.

We would not live by bread alone,
But by thy word of grace.
In strength of which we travel on
To our abiding place.
—James Montgomery.

Letters From the Isolated

I have been a member of the Reorganized Church since 1929, but I have nearly always been isolated. Although I am seldom able to attend services, I have never doubted the truth of the gospel nor lost faith in it. I ask the prayers of the Saints that, if it is God's will, I may someday be privileged to live near the church which means so much to me.

The Goodness of God

By HAZEL NAPIER

“ALTHOUGH I believe in God, I simply cannot believe in his goodness,” my friend Ethel remarked one hot, summer evening. We were sitting on the lawn in hopes of finding a vagrant breeze. She slapped viciously at a mosquito, and viewed the crumpled remains with satisfaction and a little malice. “See what I mean?” she asked, flipping away the dead mosquito. “Insects, snakes, blistering heat, storms that destroy property and lives, suffering that bends the body, affects the mind, and breaks the heart. Yet, in spite of these things, you have always believed in the goodness of God. In spite of the things you have been through, you still extol him for his goodness. I wish I could believe as you do,” she cried plaintively, “but I can’t. As a result, I have almost quit going to church, and at times I’m thoroughly miserable.”

This article is written especially for the Ethels of the world who really want to serve God but whose faulty perspective and lack of understanding produces in them a delinquent frame of mind. To worship God fully and completely, one must be cognizant of his love and recognize his goodness in the works of his hand.

Such evidence is found in the glory of nature. It is true, as Ethel said, that ugly things fly above and creep upon and sweep the earth; yet, let us look at the other side of the picture. Let us concentrate on the beauty of the world about us. These lovely things, created for our benefit, proclaim the love of God and testify of his goodness: a bird’s sweet song in the flush of dawn; the soft rays of the rising sun caught like shreds and twists of pale gold in the semi-transparent emerald leaves of wind-stirred trees; a spider web silvered and strung with pearls by the dewy hands of night; peaceful, early-summer evenings cooled by flower-scented breezes; frosty, purple grapes hanging motionless in the warm stillness of a September afternoon. Can you look out over a blue lake silver-capped by whipping winds, or walk in the hushed quiet of a dense grove, or stand under the deep, black plush of a winter sky thickly embedded with jewel-bright stars and doubt the existence of a God who is great and good? The fact that man’s enjoyment of the universe is somewhat dimmed by its unpleasant aspects is, to my way of thinking, added proof of God’s goodness.

ADDITIONAL evidence of God’s goodness is found in the fact that men, created in his image, are inherently good and desire the finest things of life. Criminal tendencies are not inherited but acquired, the result of poor environment and unkind circumstances. This has been proved by the work of Father Flanagan, whose motto is, “There is no such thing as a bad boy.” Even hardened criminals can be reclaimed and rehabilitated. Of the several hundred once-vicious convicts, brutalized by inhuman treatment and animal-like existence on Devil’s Island, only three reverted to their evil ways on their return to France. The good in these men, dormant but not dead, was revived and cultivated by the love and kindness of one godly man. You may say that this was an unprecedented case, not likely to be repeated; nevertheless, it does show that people are fundamentally good and, under favorable conditions, can develop fine and noble qualities. Even in his fallen state, man is a glorious creature when he seeks to emulate his Creator. Neither wars nor disease nor hunger nor social sins nor the efforts of Satan can annihilate that bit of the good God which dwells in every human soul.

The goodness of God is further revealed in the decree given man through his progenitors, “In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread.” This was not a punitive measure but a privilege and an opportunity, for labor would counteract the evil brought into the world by transgression. Idleness produces inertia and spiritual lethargy, increases suffering, and invites destructive thoughts which take root in a mind dulled and twisted by inactivity. Work, therefore, is a prime requisite. It renews body and mind, mitigates sorrow, and strengthens the spiritual man.

TWO WEEKS after the birth of her baby, who died when a few days old, Cecelia became the victim of a strange, nervous ailment. Frightened by the possible symptoms of insanity, she consulted an eminent neurologist who lived in a near-by city. Although he confirmed her suspicions, he offered a ray of hope. If she would keep herself busy from morning until night, even when she sat down to rest, in all probability she would be spared the threatening disaster.

"But I can't," Cecelia protested feebly, attempting to wipe away the tears. "I'm so dizzy and weak I can hardly walk. I can't work. I can't."

"You have to," he told her kindly but sternly. "As you work, you will gain strength. It is your only hope. If you don't work, you will go insane."

Returning home, Cecelia plunged into cleaning, washing, ironing, baking, caring for chickens, raising flowers and vegetables. Her leisure time was taken up with needlework and music. When delusions and hallucinations made their appearance, she was quieted with a sedative. Friends and relatives did not voice their fears, but in the exchange of glances and the silent shake of heads they expressed their hopelessness for her.

But it was far from hopeless. Two years after she consulted the neurologist, Cecelia was not only well in body and mind but had also improved intellectually and spiritually. In prayer meetings, she frequently testified: "God has been so good to me. He was with me during all those terrible months. By praying constantly, I became the recipient of his love."

Prayer is the line of communication between God and us. It is the sun-bright cable which carries our words and even our unspoken thoughts to him, and brings an answer in return. God is ever willing to help the suffering, the sorrowful, the needy, and burdened, but he cannot do so if there is no channel through which his blessings may flow.

TWENTY YEARS ago, Rachel was the proud mother of two lovely children. When the boy was about three years old, he was struck and killed by a speeding car. Five years later, the little girl was killed in a similar accident. Dominated by bitterness and hate, Rachel quit going to church and refused to pray. For two years she mourned, turning a deaf ear to any word of consolation. As a result of this self-inflicted torture, she suffered a breakdown and was taken to a hospital for what threatened to be a permanent residence.

"After I had been in the hospital a year," she confessed when she related the incident, "I slowly came to the realization that I was living in a hell created by my own selfishness. Ashamed and repentant, I prayed for the first time in three years, asking for forgiveness, help, and strength. Instantly, I was comforted. After that, I continued to pray all day and when I woke up at night. I improved rapidly in body and mind. Within a month, I was able to leave the hospital. How good God was to me! To repay him, I have dedicated my life to his service."

This is the reason thousands of people gladly serve God—to repay him for his loving-kindness. No one willingly serves a severe taskmaster, a tyrant, or a dictator. God is none of these. He does not stand over his Saints ready to flail them with the whip of trouble or affliction every time they make a little mistake. He does not predestine some men to be saved and others to be damned. He does not send people to a hell where they will burn forever and ever. Such unscriptural beliefs, incompatible with the very nature of God, are false, deceiving the ignorant, the credulous, and those who are incapable of reasoning. When God created men in his likeness and placed them on this earth, he gave them their agency, for he wanted them to serve him willingly, and not through fear. From the beginning of creation, his purpose was the glory and immortality of man. The great plan of salvation could emanate only from the intelligence of a Being whose mercy and justice equaled his goodness and love.

WHEN DISTRESSING conditions or circumstances, such as the severe trials which beset even the most faithful people bring God's goodness into question, I am reminded of an incident of my childhood. One lovely spring afternoon I was wading in a stream that flowed beside a narrow, country road. Frightened by the determined approach of a wicked-looking crawdad, I hurried out of the water and sought safety on the grassy bank. While I reveled in the comfort of my position and the softness of the air stirring against my cheek, I picked idly at the grass matted so thickly beside me. To my amazement, I uncovered the most astonishing wild violets. They were not like the pale, scentless ones I had often picked on the hillside; they were straight, sturdy flowers of silken texture, deep purple in color, and delightfully fragrant. Almost reverently, I replaced the grass, concealing the violets as before. A hundred people, I thought, could pass this way without realizing the loveliness hidden in the grass. A few people, their spiritual senses sharpened by experience and understanding, can detect a faint fragrance and glimpse a bit of purple petal; but the majority—casual observers—see only the grass of trouble, catastrophe, or affliction. The time will come, however, when every eye shall behold the flowering of God's goodness in all its incomparable beauty.

Seek Ye First the Kingdom

By Maurice L. Draper

A radio address given over station WALA, Mobile, Alabama.

JUST AFTER he had spent forty days and nights in the wilderness in fasting and prayer, Jesus was tempted. He was tempted just as you and I are sometimes tempted, and his desire to yield was just as great as it is for us. He was hungry and was aware, perhaps, for the first time and certainly to a greater degree than ever before, of the great powers God had given him in order that his ministry of atonement might be effective. He was tempted to use the divine powers God had granted him for the blessing of others in order to satisfy his personal desires—his physical appetite. He was tempted to turn the stones into bread, not waiting for the normal course of events to provide him with the opportunity to satisfy his needs. That it was not necessary for Jesus to use his miraculous powers to provide himself with food is evidenced by the fact that he didn't, and that he still did not suffer death from starvation. There was a way, provided by the normal course of things within the structure of life as God ordained it, for his needs to be provided.

Because Jesus experienced this temptation, and because he triumphed over it, he established forever his authority to speak about such temptations whenever and to whomever they occur. He recognized that man "does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Bread is necessary, yes, but no more necessary than all the principles, laws, and processes by which God has ordained man shall live. It is just as important for us to realize that there are other principles to living as it is for us to be provided with the physical necessities of life. Indeed, many good men have found that it is better to do without some physical things, even to die, than to yield to the selfish temptation of supplying personal desires when such defeats the divine purpose of their God-given powers of life.

In view of his own temptations and successful triumph over them, there is a declaration of Jesus which takes on tremendous significance. Once, when it became apparent that his disciples were being disturbed by similar ideas as to the selfish satisfaction of their own desires, Jesus stated in no uncertain terms the principle of Christian abundance. He said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you." The things he was speaking of here were clothing, food, houses, and all that make physical life comfortable and pleasing. Note, he does not condemn them for wanting these things. He only advises that God knows we have need of all these things and that, in his wisdom, he has planned a way by which all men can enjoy them together to the extent of every person's need. But that way cannot be divorced from the total purpose of life, nor from the program God has designed.

THERE ARE many evidences that most of us come under the chastisement of Jesus for yielding to this temptation. Today, there are groups of people seeking higher incomes in order to be able to buy more of these things. In order to get more money, they will use coercion in the form of strikes and picketing. In the meantime, the very things we all want to buy are not even being made because of the selfishness in our economic order. We are trying to turn the stones into bread—that is, we use our positions in factory and shop where we have the power to produce as a means to satisfy our selfish desires. As a result, everybody suffers. We want to have nice homes. Yet millions today find it difficult to have a home at all. Why? Because the selfishness in international power politics has caused the whole world to squander its lumber and steel, its cement and bricks in building machines and installations of destruction. We have only so much productive capacity; when we use it for battle, we cannot use it for peaceful production. There are reports that Europe is suffering from a lack of food. This is because the land and man power which should have been used for producing food have been sacrificed to the God of War.

There must be something in the idea of Jesus which can be used to alleviate these conditions, or he never would have made such a statement. Seek first the kingdom of God, and these things—lands for production, houses to live in, food to eat, clothing to wear, and all good things to live with—will be added unto you. This means that there is something in the nature of the relationships between men urged by Jesus which will encourage their production of good things. We cannot have houses, food, clothes, and so on, unless they are made. And if, by seeking first the kingdom of God, we make possible the provision of these things, there must be something in the kingdom plan which facilitates production. And there is. That something, though specifically expressed in many details of a whole new set of social values and in an entirely different plan of economic adjustments than we have today, is broadly expressed in the words human service. Many of us don't have automobiles today because they haven't been produced. Why? Contrast the causes for our labor-management problems with this ideal of Jesus, and we can see why. Co-operation, arbitration, mutual concessions, with production continuing the meanwhile would have been more Christian, more like the kingdom, and the result would have been just as Jesus promised—more things to live with, in this case, more automobiles.

JESUS MUST have considered this idea of the kingdom of God as being very practical—that is, actually usable in attaining a worth-while life for all. He made it the heart and core of his message. When his disciples asked for instruction on how to pray, he said, "Our Father who art in heaven. Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." Note the emphasis given here. Even before any mention is made of forgiveness, of the supplying of daily needs, and of protection from temptation, Jesus turns our thinking toward the kingdom, knowing well that when once the kingdom enters a man's thinking, he is well on the way to achieving everything else mentioned in the Lord's Prayer. Those who seek the kingdom are seeking a way of life in which their daily bread will be provided. They are committed to a philosophy in which brotherly forgiveness is a cardinal principle. They are turned toward a life in which the temptations are upward toward truth and righteousness, rather than downward toward degradation and misery. It becomes increasingly obvious as we meditate upon the thoughts in the Lord's Prayer that the kingdom referred to by Jesus is the Christian life with reference to production, economics, politics, social planning, and community life. His kingdom is not a philosophy of "other-worldliness," but one with specific reference to this life in all its aspects.

Once when a hypocrite of the times tried putting Jesus to shame by entangling him in a discussion on the fine points of the law, Jesus turned the tables with the magnificent parable of the good Samaritan. Here was the gospel in operation. The sermons of the priest may have contained theological truth, the Levites may have served strictly according to the temple rituals, but it was the interpretation of love by the binding of the wounds, the strengthening of the body, and the provision of care until complete recovery on the part of the man who was hurt by sin that really portrayed Christianity. Only the Samaritan was really righteous. This is the righteousness of the kingdom which Jesus told us to seek. Somehow, we need to learn these lessons, not just in simple stories, but in all the complexity of modern business and industry. In some manner, we must learn these lessons in terms of modern international politics. For the sake of all mankind, everyone of us needs to learn these lessons in terms of our own attitudes and habits. We need to take time out from our insanely selfish seeking after many things to increase our own personal comfort and learn to seek first for truth and its expression in our lives. When we do this, we cannot fail in providing all the good things that men everywhere need and would like to have. Thus, as Jesus said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you."

Attaining Kingdom Caliber

By Charles Kornman

"GEE, I WISH I could play the violin like that!" . . . "I'd give my right arm if I could change places with him!" . . . "If only I had his physique!" . . . "What a personality!" These and other similar expressions are heard every day. They exemplify the discontent and dissatisfaction that is inherent in many of us. They also typify a disease, particularly among young people, which is so malignant as to warp entire lives. Many take such a negative attitude and, as a consequence, much positive accomplishment is irretrievably lost. They fail to produce as they could if they were to minimize their weaker points. This, by no means, is counsel to overlook one's weaknesses, but rather to put them where they belong.

There is not one of us that doesn't differ from everyone else in some respect. One person has weak eyes—another likes syrup on his sardines—and still another likes to wear Levis and bow ties. Look around and you'll see people with arms missing, enormous debts to pay, loved ones gone, any number of reasons to quarrel with life. But do they? This business of living is difficult enough without helping it to be that way—try playing tiddlywinks with boxing gloves!

Our tenure of office as a distinct personality is a rather short period but, during that time we as men in eons past have the privilege of sharing and participating in the most gigantic enterprise man has been invited to—the kingdom of God. This privilege, this call for men and women of kingdom-caliber has reverberated down through the ages, and it stands forth today, just as strong, just as clear, just as vital as it did in the days of Christ. Why is it that so few have been willing to qualify.

What do we mean when we speak of men and women of kingdom-caliber? Those who live pure lives? Those who can quote Scripture? Those who are regular in church attendance? All of these qualities, it is true, enter into the picture before one can be admitted to the kingdom.

Try playing tiddlywinks with boxing gloves!

But what do we really have in mind? Ask a group of young people what a Zion person is like, and many of them will say, in all sincerity, that he is one who lives a "pure" life—which is like telling a blind man that a lawn is as green as a field of corn.

TOGETHER, LET us discuss some of the attributes of a mythical person of kingdom-caliber. We'll call him Jim for sake of brevity and clearness. Perhaps we can discover some things that we can appropriate and integrate into our lives to help us become such a person. In our discussion, we are not going to attempt any chronological enumeration of the importance of these traits, and with good reason. Here in America, most of us would rather have a five dollar bill than five nickel candy bars, but not so in Italy. Rather than argue over their relative merits in trying to decide whether 'tis more blessed to be tall than short, let us "use" these ideas as they apply to our lives.

Jim shall be righteous. This means more than merely going to church and refraining from swearing. He is not concerned with just getting to heaven—to Jim, heaven is a by-product, not the "big goal" of his life here. Righteousness connotes that one is living his life with the motivating idea that the Christ-way is the highway to the most beneficial and the most productive life available to us.

JIM shall have the will to dare. Many will exclaim, "What's this got to do with kingdom-caliber?" On the surface, nothing, perhaps, but let us delve deeper. F. Henry Edwards gives us our starting point. In his book, God Our Help, he points out that truth is—we find it, adjust ourselves to it, and live more richly by reason of the adjustment. An example to illustrate our point: A large mining company had just completed a "drift" (a tunnel underground) nearly eight hundred feet long. Absolutely no high grade ore was found and the owners were ready to shut down. However, on the last day, they decided to drill around, cross-cutting the main drift, and discovered that they had been less than five feet from the main vein all the way in. Jim must have the will to dare,

www.LatterDayTruth.org

New Horizons

because so many times he will be close to the main vein and, were it not for this attitude, he would give up when the "taillight of progress looked like a danger signal."

JIM SHALL have the desire and the ability to pray. One summer, the supervisor of a group of young people in Lamoni had a unique idea. He was anxious for those young people to realize fully that they were made with the potentiality of becoming a true brotherhood—with God as the integrating force. In attempting to demonstrate his point, he gave an illustrated lecture in the form of a tumbling exhibition. His introduction had to do with the idea that this brotherhood can come about only insofar as we attune ourselves to God's way of doing things. The adjustment is best achieved through the medium of prayer. So, starting with simple fundamental stunts, he pointed out that our primary relationship with God is much the same—that of grateful subjects. We thank him for his kindnesses and ask that we can be as worthy of them the next day. Then, proceeding on to more and more seemingly complicated activities, this leader pointed out that they were merely combinations of the fundamentals already stressed and demonstrated. And, as we become more and more immersed in our relationship with God, we combine these fundamentals of prayer to evolve the comradeship between God and us. As John Garver once said, "As the branch goes, so goes the general church." And we might add, "As the individual goes, so goes the branch." At the close of his lecture, the speaker said, "To describe this comradeship is like trying to describe the blueness of a mountain sky to one who has never seen it. Only those who have seen can truly appreciate."

JIM SHALL have a stewardship attitude. One of the most remarkable things about our church is the number of accomplishments performed by men and women with absolutely no thought of pay except

The Trouble-Shooter

Praying in Public

QUESTION:

I find it difficult to pray aloud. Unless I first memorize the prayer, I just don't seem to have anything to say, yet I feel a prayer that is not spontaneous is of little worth. How can I overcome my complex?

ANSWER:

Prayer is the sincere desire of the heart breathed either silently or vocally to the Heavenly Father. It is the most intimate relationship we have with him, and because this is true and because he has the same relationship with all who will seek him, it is well that we share it by praying aloud. It helps us, and it helps others. That is the reason we are admonished to pray aloud as well as in secret.

Always remember that you are praying to be heard of God and not of men. They may hear your words, but he listens to your heart.

When you feel the impulse to pray publicly in a service, get on your feet, open your lips, and speak. If you can get to your feet, the victory is two thirds won. Your prayer does not need to be eloquent or studied, just sincere and humble.

The most beautiful prayers I have ever heard have come haltingly, often tear-that others may know of the gospel. Every member is in need of this "passion for souls." Evangelism was one of the keynotes of Christ's message, and it must become one of ours. Biblical instruction to generations long since gone emphasizes this, "Seek to bring forth and establish . . ." The instructions are just as explicit written in modern English as they were when they were written on the old Israelitish scrolls. Voluntary consecration of ourselves is the fundamental basis of the Christian religion. And to be most effective in the development of kingdom-caliber people, it must come through constantly growing love of God and an ever-increasing understanding of his purposes and our part in them.

By Patriarch R. V. Hopkins

fully from children and young people. They pray with the heart and not with the lips alone. Get to your feet . . . don't worry about what you will say.

As pastor in Zion, I attended a young people's prayer service several years ago. The meeting progressed slowly and was almost devoid of spirit until a young woman arose to pray. It was her first effort, and she was so emotionally overcome that she did not utter a word. She stood only a moment and then sat down. Because she had the courage to try, the whole character of the meeting changed. She prayed, and we heard her with our hearts, although she did not say a word. God heard her, too, for it was never difficult for her to pray again.

Children who are taught to pray at home and take their place with others at the family altar have little difficulty in praying publicly when they grow older. At the recent Woodbine Reunion, children from eight to twelve years old arose in a mixed congregation of three hundred to pray and testify. They had previously met in their own tent for devotion, where they learned to share their prayers and testimonies with others.

It is helpful to seek out quiet places to pray aloud. Once you get used to the sound of your own voice, your prayers will be natural and unaffected.

True prayer is the spontaneous outburst of a loving heart asking for itself and others the needed blessings from an all kind Father who hears and understands.

To Missions Abroad

President F. Henry Edwards and Bishop G. L. DeLapp have returned from their visits to our people in the British Isles, the Scandinavian countries, Germany, and Holland. They are deeply impressed by the courage, fortitude, and faith of our people. They are greatly concerned by the serious need of food, clothing, shelter, and spiritual leadership of all people in war affected areas.

Church members are sending food and clothing. More of us should be sending practical aids; we should make sacrifices and show our love in real ways.

Now that our leaders have prepared the way, and Apostle M. A. McConley is remaining to direct the work, the church is sending young men to Britain, Germany, and Holland. They are going "To Missions Abroad." Our cover picture represents the spirit and the strength of their effort.

Let us support them with our prayers and with our gifts, with love, and supplies for those whose need is so great.

A Mission Returned

A two-year-old boy of my intimate acquaintance, little David H., likes to say grace at the table. He has abandoned conventional prayers and voices his own, which are always sincere and generally unique. Here is a recent example: "God is great! Thanks for my meat and milk. But I don't like my squash and spinach. Thanks for my mommy and daddy. Amen." Probably many an American about to partake of an adequate meal for which he has paid far too much, being as candid as little David H., might pray, "Thanks, Lord, for our bread and meat and potatoes and apple pie—but I don't care for my carrots and cabbage."

"GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD"

In America bread is so taken for granted that the lad did not mention it in his prayer. Overseas, in Europe, India, China, Japan, the British Isles, those who pray may voice some form of the prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread." That was the theme of Bishop DeLapp's first sermon after his return from Europe. If, in England for example, there be some little extra treat to break the drab monotony of a slim and rationed diet, the devout are very thankful—for an egg, perhaps, or, happy day, a dish of rice, an orange, a peach, or a banana—things had back in the golden age when "the sun never set on British soil" and the English pound would buy anything anywhere. Back to those days when the Bard of Avon trusted "fat men" and was suspicious of thin men, like Cassius, who had a "lean and hungry look." When Bishop Trapp and wife from England dined with us at Conference time, Sister Trapp told us how pleased they were when some friend sent them a package of rice, another some butter. These gifts they shared with friends.

Here in America we have harvested the greatest yield of wheat ever harvested here or in any land. There seems no good reason that we shall lack for bread unless inflation puts the price beyond the reach of the common people—and that will not be a good reason. We have committed ourselves to help hungry people overseas find an answer to their prayers, "Give us this day our daily bread."

"MAN SHALL NOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE"

There is also the matter of the "bread of life." Readers of the Herald very well know that four young missionaries and their respective wives are sailing for Europe and the British Isles. These young people are quite well aware of the hardships and dangers that may await them during the next four years. Who knows what dangers lie ahead of those who remain at home? Yet these young men and women were not only willing, they were glad to go. They recognized the dangers, but they saw also the responsibilities and the opportunities for service in their calling and for growth and development. In a recent meeting which I was privileged to attend, the question of education came up, and several speakers pointed out that four years spent abroad may be more than the equivalent of four years in college, reckoning, of course, with the experiences gained, the opportunities to study the languages, the history, the customs and background, present conditions and prospective future of various nations: "a knowledge of things at home and abroad; the wars and perplexities of the nations . . . a knowledge also of countries and kingdoms."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21.

PAYING BACK A DEBT TO APOSTLE CHARLES DERRY

With one of the young men and his good wife, Brother and Sister Frank Fry, appointed to the British Isles, I had some intimate conversation shortly before they sailed. Brother Fry told me an interesting story, the details of which I hope to secure more accurately at a later time. It seems that his grandmother, when a little girl in England, was converted by the preaching of Elder Charles Derry, later called to be an apostle. Brother Derry went abroad as pioneer representative of the Reorganization. Financially he went "on a shoestring."

Brother Derry left his home in Western Iowa, a twelve by twelve log cabin, and with fifty cents in his pocket made his way East. In Illinois he visited Bishop Israel Rogers, from whom he received seventy-five dollars. This was in December of 1862. He sailed on the "City of Baltimore," and by traveling cheaply and eating sparingly arrived in England with some money yet in his pocket. He had many hardships but slowly won a hearing. At a time when he was very lonely and eager for news from the church at home, he learned that there were four copies of the Saints' Herald in the post office. However, there was four shillings and nine pence postage due on them—and at that time Brother Derry did not have that much money in his possession. He pawned his overcoat and secured money to redeem the Heralds, and with the reading of them warmed his soul. But back to our story of Elder Frank Fry's grandmother.

This little girl, destined to be Frank Fry's grandmother, was crippled. Her older sister attended some of Brother Derry's meetings and brought back a report that interested the small sister who was then taken to hear Brother Derry. She was administered to, was healed and walked home. The entire family was converted and presently sailed for America. Their ship was captured by pirates, and they were robbed, but were permitted to reach land and so

Graceland College Day, October 26

It has been found necessary to set Graceland College Day October 26, instead of October 19, as announced in the Pastor's Handbook. Pastors and others primarily concerned should take note of this change.

Traditionally, Graceland College Day offerings have been used for providing loan scholarships for worthy students. However, our most urgent current need is for completion of the Student Center building to which the College Day offerings of 1946 were devoted. We are informed that the 1946 offerings totaled approximately $25,000, and that an additional $35,000 is needed in order to complete the Student Center building. This will be our memorial to the young men and women of the church who served their countries during the recent war.

This year more than six hundred young people have registered as students at Graceland. The Student Center building is needed to care for many of their social and spiritual needs. We urge most strongly that the College Day offering be given the generous support of the Saints throughout the world in the hope that the offerings this year may make up the remainder of the $60,000 required, or $35,000.

Official Notice

We are informed that persons unknown to the undersigned have been selling Bibles to members of our organization and claiming that we have endorsed the book which they sell. This is a false and unwarranted claim; we having never at any time endorsed any edition of the King James Version of the Bible. In fact, we are not in the least familiar with the Bible thus sold among our members. ISRAEL A. SMITH.

Zion's League Annual

I have just taken a look at a new book. A fascinating, exciting book. Or maybe something different has happened. The book just reached up and took hold of me. Some books do that.

This one is the Zion's League Annual, Number One, a friendly, generous big thick book of 242 pages, in a lively red jacket, entitled, Youth Explores the Church. They say it has a complete program for every week in the year. I find a lot of other things in it too. Rich with illustrations, a wide variety of types, lots of practical stuff to do. It was prepared under the direction of the General Council of Zion's League. We can't begin to list the credits of those who worked on it—they are given in the book. The best available materials have been collected from many church publications, gathered here in convenient form, under one cover. You'll like the big 8½ x 11 inch pages. There's a handy index, songs, worship, activities, programs, plans, and a lot else of interest to young people's workers and leaders. It sells for two dollars, Herald Publishing House.

Across the Desk

Brother Charles Cousins, September 22, writes:

Just a few lines to say that our trip to conference and in this country has been of great benefit to us. It is good to see the work of the church moving on in the manner that it is, and despite the fact that there is a great deal to do, yet the movements of the church, by the direction of the First Presidency and Quorum of Twelve, are going in the direction which the Lord indicated many years ago, should go.

This visit to conference has confirmed me in the fact that the work of the church is going forward. The building of branches in close proximity to each other in the church's center, and in the Stakes around, and the resolution to develop men for the High Priesthood who will be efficient to take care of the branches, can do no other than hasten the work towards the ideal of the church, which is the Gathering and the building of Zion. This has been our ambition to see for many years. It cannot help but do one good when we see things going in the right direction. May the Lord help us all to give heed to the counsel of those whom he has set in the church to guide the affairs therein, and by that counsel be helpers in the work also, and in our sphere, help to relieve the onerous burden of those whom the Lord has set as watchmen in the Towers of Zion.

Sister Cousins and I desire to thank all our brethren and sisters for their kindness and generosity to us while we had the privilege to be among them.

We also regret that we were unable to fill the many calls to minister, as time and other things would not allow us to accept, and we hope none will be disappointed.

"I Want Youth to Have the Right Start"

says Dr. Glenn Cunningham

As an athlete and teacher of physical education, my advice to young people is to seek alcohol-free relaxation, regardless of what others may say or do. Your own responsibility toward your body and mind, your potential usefulness . . . and your possibilities in postwar achievement are all involved in the choice you make for wholesome fun and fellowship and against injurious, weakening, and toxic alcoholic drinks.

The more I see of young people, the more concerned I am that they shall have the facts on which to make right and healthful choices. In my work I am responsible for employing the coaches. These men and their teams have been making an exceptionally fine record in schedules that pit us against a number of larger schools. Our wrestling team, for instance, defeated Minnesota. Whether we win or lose, we engage in competitive athletics on the basis of developing the players and fitting them for the successes and defeats of life.

Of course, we expect the men to abstain from drinking. That is a matter of course in any serious effort to bring a man to condition physically and mentally, in active sports.

We have been delivering men of this quality to the camps and schools of the armed forces. The Army and Navy depend on the colleges and universities—yes, and high schools—to send them men of fitness, men who can take hard knocks, who are tough and ready for physical action, and cool, collected, proficient in their mental and nerve control.—The Missouri Counselor.

The Foundation of YOUR FAITH

By J. A. Koehler

ONE OF Christendom's popular hymns is, "How firm a foundation." Almost everyone sings, "How firm a foundation," if for no other reason than that in times of trouble, it is comforting; in the valley of doubt it is reassuring. "How firm a foundation" is dear to the heart of Christendom if for no other reason than that it is a faith-bolstering hymn.

But because it is a faith-bolstering hymn, "How firm a foundation" gives rise to much questioning—questioning that is sometimes as embarrassing to one as it is enlightening to the other. To the disinterested observer, to the critical investigator, to the real student of religion, and especially to the infidel, "How firm a foundation" is suspect. Like "All one body we," it is richer in feeling than in thought. And Christendom needs to judge of such questions with its "head" instead of its "heart."

For it is evident to the critic of religion that Christendom is not "One in hope and doctrine, one in charity," as it tries to make itself believe; it is a variety, even an opposition, of faiths. And what is of especial interest to the investigator is the fact that even those who build their religious houses on what, by any rational test, is sinking sand sing as fervently as any, "How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord, is laid for your faith in his excellent word."

FOR SOME TIME I have doubted that even all Latter Day Saints are of one faith. So, from motives of discretion, I went about questioning. The question I put to this person and that is: What is the sum and substance, the essence and crux, of your faith? And my suspicions were confirmed; I received a diversity of answers to that question.

Of some of the answers I could make neither "heads nor tails." But other answers were quite intelligible. The persons who gave them seemed to understand clearly what they were saying. Their religious beliefs and hopes—their faiths, that is—were definite. And, as might be expected, those who seemed to know what they were talking about were in fairly close agreement.

This is the tenor of their answers:

1. "I believe that we do have capacity to live the good life, to master the business of human-living-together. And my hope is that we shall yet cultivate that capacity. I believe that we can, and I hope that we shall yet learn to live together peacefully, prosperously, and happily." That is the faith of one of our young men who is trained to accurate observation and exact statement.

2. "I believe in the coming of the kingdom of God," "I believe that we [Latter Day Saints] have the key to that kingdom. And my hope is that we shall learn to use those keys, and that we shall unlock the door of the kingdom and enter in."

3. "I believe that the prophecies and promises in the message of Restoration are 'true and faithful,' and that they shall all be fulfilled. I believe, that is, that Zion shall be redeemed. And my hope is that the day of our procrastination shall come, before long, to an end."

MANY LATTER DAY SAINTS used the same key words in their attempts to answer the question, What is your faith? But I am not sure that all who use those words speak the same language. For to speak the same language the words that are used in common must have the same meaning.

But in religion, criticism is none too welcome. It loses friends. Some cannot "take it." So, in my questioning, I pulled my Socratic punches.

That left me in some doubt, of course. But if the words used in common by the persons who answered the question, What is your faith? have each one and only one meaning, and if that is true of all other persons whose answers are kindred, there are more Latter Day Saints in the field of my labor than I suspected who are roughly of one "faith."

But since, in the total membership of the Latter Day Saint Church, there is disagreement that is fundamental (respecting the field and function of religion, and the task of the Restoration Church, etc.) the questions I ask in this talk are:

1. What is truly the faith of the saints? I mean the saints of "the Lord."

2. Is there a foundation for that faith in "His word"?

3. Is that foundation firm?

In answering questions one and two we must adduce authority, we must use memory. In answering question three, we must use reason.

I have already indicated the meaning of "your faith." It is your religious beliefs and hopes. I say nothing about "works" as a component of "your faith," because there are no works about which to say—no works of consequence through which the hope of the "saints" is being realized. There may be novelty and variety, but there is no measurable practical progression. And, as we shall see, that means we are not yet actually "in" the faith. We have yet to set our hands to the practical task of building "A City" (Zion we call it) which the genius of Restoration says is "the good life." So, in this discussion, we say nothing about works as an element of "your faith."

But as to the identity of "ye saints of the Lord"—who do you say they are? Well, most of you may say, The saints of the Lord are the "Latter Day" Saints. There are many people who are in disagreement with that opinion. But we will not quarrel with them over that. All we wish to do in this discussion, for the moment, is to identify the "saints of the Lord." And we do mean ye "Latter Day" Saints.

As we said, to answer the question, What is the faith of the Saints? we must adduce authority. What authority? And I assume that we are in almost complete agreement when we say, the authority of the leadership out of which Latter Day Saintism arose. Call that leadership, the genius of Restoration, if you wish. In which case, this—this book of Doctrine and Covenants; this recorded message of Restoration—is the authority to which we must make our appeal. The proclamations in this book of Doctrine and Covenants are the authority which we must adduce. This book of Doctrine and Covenants represents, authoritatively, the faith of the Saints of the Lord.

We identify "his word" as the Holy Bible—since that is what Christendom means when it sings,

"How firm a foundation"; and since we mean that, too, when we sing that hymn.

IN THIS REPRESENTATION (made for the Saints' Herald) I cannot exhibit the symbol of "your faith" in one hand and the symbol of "his word" in the other. I cannot present "your faith" and "his word" to view. So the reader should try to do some visualizing. When I speak of "your faith," he should see in his imagination the book of Doctrine and Covenants held in one hand; and when I speak of "his word" he should see in his imagination the Holy Bible held in the other hand.

So, with this explanation, I say again that the questions of the hour are:

1. What is the sum and substance of "your faith"—represented in the book of Doctrine and Covenants?

The greatest help in the world is self-help.

2. Is there a foundation for that faith in "his word"—in the Holy Bible, that is?

3. Is that foundation firm?

This "faith"—this book of Doctrine and Covenants—cannot be examined in one sermon hour. Hardly one essential or fundamental can be elaborated in one sermon. As respects incidentals, and even instrumentals—we do not treat of them in this sermon. We treat only of the basic beliefs through the implementation of which we hope to promote the welfare of the soul. We treat only of the "faith" in God—call it the "Word" if you wish—that is intended to become incarnate in man. If you have doubts about this representation of this faith—this message of Restoration—the way to resolve them is to "consult" the book; the whole book; the book as a whole.

Firstly, Section 49, paragraph 3, of this "faith" says: "It is lawful that he [one man] should have one wife" and "they twain shall be one flesh." It says that God has ordained this. Section 42 of this "faith" says,

"Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart and shalt cleave unto her and none else." Here and there much more is said about matrimony as a feature of "your faith." One whole section—Section 111—treats of matrimony as one of the primary affairs of religion; as a destiny-determining affair; as a basic religious affair. A concept of marital relations is one of the fundamentals of "your faith."

Secondly: Section 112 of "your faith"—of this book of Doctrine and Covenants—says, "We believe that governments [earthly governments] were instituted of God for the good of man, and that he holds men accountable for their acts in relation to them." We believe, that is, that government is truly a religious affair. We believe that it is one of the primary concerns of religion. We believe that government must be conducted aright as in the sight of God to achieve the kingdom of God. Convictions of God and government is one of the features, it is one of the fundamentals, of "your faith." There is much in "your faith" (as we may see by contemplating the following feature of "your faith" that represents government as a primary concern of true religion.

Thirdly: But that which is more distinctive in "your faith" is its ethics of economic life, its blueprint of rightly constituted economic society, its concept of rightly ordered human relations (which does not merely involve the question of government, it is the question) and its practical plan of social action. This ethico-economic enterprise is the "cause"—the cause of "Zion"—which only Restoration has espoused. This "Kingdom-righteousness" (of which we have more to say later) is not only the most conspicuous feature of your faith, together with its "mother and child" concept, it is also the thing that makes "your faith" distinctive. The cause of Zion is the man-child. The Church is the mother. "Your faith" says that to establish that cause is the mission of The Church—the Church of "ye Saints of the Lord."

See Doctrine and Covenants 6: 3; 10: 3; 11: 3; 12: 3; 36: 12; 51: 1-5; 57: 1-6; 58: 4, 5, 10-12; 64: 7, 8; 72: 1-3; 77: 1-3; 81: 4; 94: 5; 98: 9, 10; 100: 5, 6; 101: 1-13; 102: 2, 8; 119: 8; 128: 1-9.

Contemplate these messages; note their mutual involvements, their necessary connections; for more than all else put together, regarded as one message, they reveal the sum and substance, the essence and crux of "your faith." Note especially (as you read 51: 1; 77: 1; 94: 5; 100: 2; and 102: 2, 3) that "ye saints of the Lord" are in duty bound under God "to bring forth and establish [this] cause of Zion"; that without that implementation of that message Zion cannot be redeemed; that "the saints of the Lord" cannot be saved in the civil-mode Kingdom of God without being in that faith.

Now, you or I may be weak in that faith; we may have "cold feet"; all of us may not be "in" that faith at all. Some may disavow it. Some may disclaim it. You or I may resolve that "If I can prevent it, this Church will never undertake to establish the cause of Zion." We may resolve that this Church shall be little more than "just another Church." Does that have anything to do with determining the sum and substance of this, "your faith"? Does not this voice of Restoration proclaim "your faith" regardless of the character of the works of "ye" saints of the Lord?

Fourthly: "Your faith" comprises ideas of the Sabbath and devotions and sacraments and such like. It comprises ideas of the Church and priesthood and other instrumentalities. Of these mention should be made in passing, for we are dependent upon the Church and all to implement the beliefs comprised in "your faith." We are dependent upon certain offices of Restoration's instrumentalities (of which we can say nothing that would be intelligible in the time allotted to this discussion) for the realization of our religious hopes. We only mention here that they are embraced in "your faith."

"Your faith" may be likened unto a circle. Any point may be regarded as the beginning of your description. And regardless of either the point of your beginning or the direction of your thought movement, when you have described that circle you have represented the faith of the saints of the Lord.

Now the question is: Is there a foundation for that faith in this "word"—this Holy Bible?

THE BIBLE may be read so that it seems to provide a foundation for almost any faith. It may be read as if it were a mass of fragmentary ideas and particular happenings which have no coherence, no necessary connection whatever. It may be read piecemeal.

The Bible may be read with thoughts about incidentals or it may be read to discover fundamentals. We may read it to discover "what it is all about" or we may read it merely to acquaint ourselves with that which this or that person was about.

We may read the Bible so as to see only that which is mysterious or spectacular or insignificant. Or we may read it as a quest of that which is significant and serious. But whatever the manner of the reading, in this discourse I shall refer to the testimony of this book as if you knew it well enough to judge of the truth of that which I have to say about it.

Now as it respects the conduct of man, or as it respects the "beliefs" which he must implement to realize the religious hopes of which "His word" is a representation, this is the first truth the most comprehensive truth, the most significant truth, of which the Bible treats. This is the first commandment God gave unto man:

(1) "Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth," (2) "and subdue it," (3) "and have dominion . . ." This is the first proclamation of man's business under God.

If it is not already known, a little reflection should reveal that, in the language of our day, the first or primary concerns of "his word," the practical affairs of which "his word" first treats, are (1) matrimony; (2) industry, and (3) government.

As instrumental in the promotion of righteousness in these relations, as means of inclining men to the doing of God's will in these relations, there was instituted (4) the Sabbath and its complementary institutions—the priesthood and the sacraments and all. With this part of the testimony of "his word" surely everyone who professes to be a saint of the Lord should be familiar.

If one will read the lamentations of the prophets—particularly the messages of Isaiah to the people of his times—he will see that "his word" testifies that the first responsibility with which God charged man—the responsibility of conducting matrimony, industry, and government aright as conditioning his realization of his religious hopes—is the very foundation of the "Faith of our fathers."

Is it not precisely those affairs that are fundamental in "your faith"? Is there not then a foundation for this, "your faith," in this "his word"? Do you know of any other faith for which there is more evidently a foundation in "his word"? There is truth, then, in what you say when you sing, "How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord, is laid for your faith in his excellent word," is there not?

But there is more to your faith than that—more that makes your faith notable, distinctive. That more is the peculiar responsibility which "ye saints of the Lord" accept in the crisis of civilization—the responsibility under God of lifting up a standard of government for the edification of the world's calamity-stricken nations, or of building the "Light of the world" City. We call it bringing forth and establishing "the cause of Zion." And if you have examined carefully, intelligently, the messages of "your faith" which pertain to the ethics of economic life (and to which we made reference in the presentation of item three), you should see that the saints of the Lord must of necessity accept that responsibility, because it is the only possible means of implementing those convictions. The implementation of "your faith" is at once an acceptance of that responsibility under God.

THE BASIC or primary affairs of "your faith"—the right ordering of human relations in matrimony, industry, and government—are the primary affairs of peoples only. Only "peoples" can honor the rights of persons in these relations. Only "peoples" can give direction to life in association—preserve order so as to promote economic efficiency and justice, that is. Persons severally cannot do that. Only "peoples" can administer economic justice. Only "peoples" can attend to the business of true government—which is self-governance. And peoples cannot attend to the business of government without constituting themselves communities. It is because "your faith" has to do with the business of "peoples" that to implement "your faith," "ye saints of the Lord" must accept the responsibility of building "the city," the community, which Restoration calls "Zion."

This "people" must be organized to implement "your faith." (See Doctrine and Covenants 51: 1; 77: 1; and 101 in particular.) And that organization "shall be called 'Zion,' a new Jerusalem." (Doctrine and Covenants 36: 12.)

The idea of accepting a kind of responsibility for the essential character of civilization is being publicized by the intelligentsia of Christendom. See the works of Dr. C. C. Morrison and others referred to in The Christian Century. But the kind of responsibility which all but a very few would have Christianity accept is not the responsibility which "ye saints of the Lord" must accept to implement "your faith." For, with few exceptions, the responsibility which Christendom's intelligentsia would have Christianity accept is the responsibility of persuading others—the whole nation—to conduct the business of human living together aright. Whereas the responsibility which rests upon "ye saints of the Lord" is the responsibility of conducting aright their own vital affairs, specifically their own internal economic affairs. It is the responsibility of letting their light shine in this manner that "nations" seeing their good works may be led to glorify God through their own implementations of his will in their own social institutions. It is the responsibility, that is, of bringing forth and establishing "the cause of Zion." That is "your faith." Is there a foundation for that faith in this, "his word"?

ABRAM "looked for 'a city' which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God." (Hebrews 11: 10.) And if you will consult his word with the aid of a Bible concordance, you will see that it is through the building of that "city" that "the seed of Abram"—those who are born of Abram's spirit—hope to bless all "nations."

The prophecies of Isaiah are especially enlightening — and the genius of Restoration banked heavily upon them. They are the prototype of "the prophecies and promises" of "your faith." The hope of that prophecy in particular is that "ye saints of the Lord"—ye "Latter Day" saints—will fulfill this mission: "It shall come to pass in the latter days, that the mountain of the Lord's house [which the prophetic genius of both former and latter days call "Zion"] shall be established in the top of the mountains . . . and all 'nations' shall flow unto it."—Isaiah 2: 1-4. Said the prophet, "ye" saints of the Lord—ye "Latter Day" saints —shall build the "City" which shall be called "Zion."

That is the "faith of our fathers" which is living still in "ye saints of the Lord." As the voice of modern prophecy admonishes us to "Get ye up into your mountain, ZION of this closing day," so does the voice of ancient prophecy say, "O Zion that bringest good tidings, get thee up into the high mountain; O Jerusalem that bringest good tidings [and Zion shall be called a New Jerusalem] lift up thy voice with strength; lift it up, be not afraid; say unto the cities of Judah [say to every people who from natural necessity are engaged in the business of government] behold your God." (Isaiah 40: 1-10.) This, says "his word," is the warfare of the saints of the Lord.

Is not "his word" identical with "your faith"? Is it not the prototype of "your faith"? Is there not a foundation for this, "your faith," in "his word"?

"Your faith," at the heart of which is the idea of "the City," is represented in the form of an economic code—which is at once a civil code, since only "peoples" can attend to the business of governing economic life. "It must needs be that he receive 'directions' how to organize this people" means that "your faith" requires to be represented in the form of a civil code—specifically an economic code. And so "your faith" is that "God who at sundry times spake unto the fathers by the prophets," revealing himself in the form of a civil code, "hath in these last days spoken unto us," revealing himself in the form of a civil code. And "your faith" is that it is through the implementation of that civil code that the religious hopes of "ye saints of the Lord" is to be realized. See Doctrine and Covenants 77: 1; 94: 5; and 100: 2 in particular.

Is that the manner in which "his word" says God revealed himself? Must we not look to the Mosaic code—for the most comprehensive and detailed revelation of God's will to be found in "his word"? And is not the implementation of that civil code made the grounds of the hope of the prophets as revealed in "his word"? Is not "his word" identical in principle, in method, and in purpose with "your faith"? Is there not then a foundation for "your faith" in "his word"?

The third question of this hour is, "Is that foundation firm?" Is it the truth? Is it that which is required by the very nature and being of man? May we build upon it with absolute certainty that in building we shall realize our religious hopes? Are we certain that it will not "let us down"?

HAS HUMAN well-being ever been promoted, has the condition of man ever been improved, has any people ever attained to peace, prosperity, and happiness in any degree, except through the right conduct of the affairs which are basic or primary in "your faith"? Has not every attempt that was ever made to promote the peace, prosperity, and happiness of peoples without resort to "your faith" failed? Conversely, has not the soul of man always prospered in the measure in which he has conducted these affairs aright?

What is the cause of the human misery, of the calamity which has come upon all the inhabitants of the earth, if not the failure of peoples to build on the foundation of "your faith"?

What would be the lot of man if peoples would build upon that foundation? if they would conform their conduct of matrimony, industry, and government to that which is written in "his word"? Is there any question about the certain outcome? Are not the fundamental beliefs in your faith related to the realization of the hopes of man as cause to effect? Is it not a firm foundation upon which to build? No other foundation can be laid than that which is laid in "his word." In the very nature of things that foundation must always stand. We do not need to accept this idea on faith, we know—we know by every test that ever has been made or ever can be made that that foundation is firm.

"What more can he say than to you he hath said?" What more is there to say than that the business of peoples must be conducted aright to achieve salvation in the Kingdom of God? There is elaboration to be done, of course. There is something to be said about applications of the principles proclaimed in this, "your faith" and in this, "his word." But as respects the identity of the field of true religion, or of man's business under God, or of the affairs which must be conducted aright to realize the hope of the saints, nothing more can be said. Either explicitly or implicitly all has been said in "his word."

There is, however, much more that we may do; more that "your faith" obligates us to do. There is more to do than any saints of the Lord—any Latter Day Saints—have every truly endeavored to do. For no Latter Day Saints of the Lord have ever built "the holy City" out of which our God shall shine. We know that, for "Zion" has never prospered and spread herself and become very glorious and very great, etc., so that the "nations" of the world have said, "Surely, Zion is the city of our God." Since none has ever reaped the fruit of Zion, we know that the cause has never been operative. We know that "ye saints" have something to do that has never yet been done.

But when that something shall have been done, even the scoffer who now derides you when you avow the faith of "ye saints of the Lord," will be constrained to say in his heart of hearts (whether for shame he shall confess it with his lips or not) "How firm a foundation."

But what is infinitely more important, when that "more" shall have been done, even "the nations of the earth"—the "nations," please note—shall say, "Surely Zion cannot fall, neither be moved out of her place." Yes, even "the nations" (anticipating their own peace, pros-

Tom's Town—Kansas City and the Pendergast Legend

By William M. Reddig, Lippincott, 1947, 394 pages, illustrated, price $4.00.

This story of Kansas City has national significance because it gives quite a bit of information about the political background in which President Truman grew up. President Truman has risen above and proved himself to be superior to many of these political influences, but they are nevertheless of interest to those who would like to get an intimate picture of the history and development of this thriving city which calls itself "The Heart of America." The author is a newspaper man and is well qualified to write the story. He does this in a pleasant and interesting way, relating the factors as he finds them, without prejudice or preaching. The illustrations are by the famous cartoonist S. J. Ray of the Kansas City Star.

More than this, the story of Kansas City is a social and political parallel of many another American community. Merely change the names and locations and you have something that typifies Middle Western America. The book paints a portrait of that unofficial part of our system of government which has no constitutional basis and which is made possible because of the limitations of our laws and the attitudes and moral standards of American people.

Are you keeping in touch with the church? Your children need the church school papers. You may order Zion's Hope for seven- and eight-year-olds from the Herald Publishing House. Single copy, per year, in United States $1.00; in Canada $1.25; in other countries $1.50.

came on to their destination. And now the grandson, Frank Fry, is paying the family debt to Apostle Derry by going back to England to carry on the work for which Brother Derry sacrificed.

Probably all of us are indebted to some missionary or pastor, or perhaps some good woman who first brought the gospel story to us or to our parents or grandparents. In my own case it was the young prophet, Joseph Smith, who first heard the story from angelic lips in Palmyra and on Cumorah. He went home from Cumorah and told it to his father and mother, my great-grandparents. He told it so simply and so convincingly, with the confirmation of the Holy Ghost, that they believed—the first evangel and the first converts of the Restoration. May we with equal sincerity and simplicity and power help to spread the gospel, and pay our debt to past generations. ELBERT A. SMITH.

How I Learned About "Missions Abroad"

By Aarona Booker Kohlman

AS A CHILD of twelve, ready to enter the eighth grade, I went instead with my parents on a mission abroad, to the British West Indies. For three years I had no formal schooling, as the schools were poor, and I was already beyond their highest grade. I missed the experiences of American children of twelve to fifteen; the general moral tone of the island was below our standards; my playmates and associates ranged from white through all the shades of mixed Negro and white blood to black. We were scorned and looked-down-upon by many. I knew the wrench of leaving friends and familiar places, and I experienced real homesickness, real loneliness.

That is not fair to a child, you may say, it is too big a sacrifice. No, for that is only one side of the picture.

In return for these small sacrifices, if such they could be called, I received, first of all, practical training in evangelistic experience. I learned that color of skin is of no importance in judging a person's worth—I'll treasure throughout my life friends who are "colored." I learned to appreciate my native land as only one far from it can. I learned to take my recreation without commercialism—there were no movies at all, no carnivals, no amusement parks, no radios. I gathered a wealth of experiences that helped me in my schoolwork after our return, and that will always be of value to me. I learned to take hardships of travel and of life situations and make them into enjoyable experiences. I learned that my actions reflected upon the church for good or evil, that I had a definite responsibility to live the gospel, and thus I learned to forego activities for which I longed. The list of blessings I received is so long, and so intertwined with my entire life's experience, that I could never complete it.

I returned to the United States, and because of the educational efforts of my parents while away, I entered high school as a junior—not even one year of school sacrificed! Now I am the wife of a church appointee, and I find that I still feel that I have never been allowed to make a real sacrifice for Christ and the church. As a family, we would not hesitate to go anywhere, at home or abroad, knowing that in so doing we receive so much more than we give, and that now our children are receiving the training that we pray will be used by them in turn for taking the gospel to all the world.

BULLETIN BOARD

Danville, Illinois, Meetings

Saints living near Danville, Illinois, are invited to meet on the fourth Sunday of each month at the home of Mrs. Fred Collins. Morning meet begins at 10. A second meet in the afternoon.

San Fernando-Burbank Mission

Services of the San Fernando or Burbank Mission are now being held in the Women's Club House at 10418 Scoville Avenue, Sunland, California. Church school at 9:30 and worship at 11 a.m.—Pastor Ed. E. Spencer, 10349 Arminta Street, Roscoe, California.

New York District Priesthood Clinic

The New York District will hold a priesthood clinic at the Church in Niagara Falls,

New York. Services will be Saturday night, October 18, and all day Sunday, October 19. We will have with us Apostle Lewis and Apostle Hanson. It is urged that all members of the priesthood of New York District as well as any other branches attend. These services are important and should prove a big help in your ministry. Please be in attendance. Church address, 17th and Willow.

Notice: Seventies, Missionary Elders, and Pastors

In order to develop better publicity methods and materials, the Quorum of Seventy is sustaining a publicity committee. At present this committee is composed of Virgil J. Billings, 121 East Felshaw Street, Gaylord, Michigan; Phillip W. Moore, South 231 Smith Street, Spokane, Washington; Arthur F. Gibbs, 3824 Southeast Grant, Portland 15, Oregon, and James C. Daugherty, 824 South Court Street, Sparta, Wisconsin. It is requested that all Seventies, missionaries, and pastors send copies of publicity materials and other information that would enable this committee to render a service to the church missionary program. Publicity materials used by other churches in their evangelistic efforts would also be appreciated and helpful.

VIRGIL J. BILLINGS,
Secretary, 1st Quorum of Seventy.

Portland District Conference

The Portland District Conference (State of Oregon and Southwest Washington) will be held in Portland, October 31 and November 1 and 2. The first service of the conference will be Friday evening, October 31, at the First Church with Apostle Roscoe E. Davey as the speaker. The services for Saturday and Sunday at the Odd Fellows Hall at N. E. 80th and Glisan. Services on Saturday will begin at 8:45, prayer services and classes throughout the day. The closing service Saturday will be a banquet at 7:30 p.m. in the same hall. Sunday services will begin at 8:30. The business meeting and election of officers will be held at 2:00 p.m. Sunday.

President Israel A. Smith will be the speaker on Sunday morning at 11:00 o'clock, with Apostle Roscoe E. Davey speaking Friday and Sunday nights. The teachers for the classes on Saturday and Sunday will be President Israel A. Smith and Apostle Roscoe E. Davey and district officers. The theme of the conference will be "Faith Is the Victory."

J. L. VERRILL,
Portland District President.

Southern Nebraska District Conference

Southern Nebraska District Conference will be held in Lincoln, Nebraska, October 11 and 12. Officers for the coming year will be elected at the business session Saturday afternoon. Apostle D. T. Williams is to be the guest speaker.

MRS. A. L. HATHAWAY,
Secretary.

British Columbia District Conference

The annual conference of the British Columbia District will be held in the new Westminster Church, 10th and London Streets, on October 17, 18, and 19. The business session will be taken care of on Sunday at 2:15 p.m. Apostle Davey will be present.

ISABEL DUCKWORTH,
District Secretary.

Flint-Port Huron District Conference

The Flint-Port Huron District Conference will meet in Pontiac, Michigan, at 19 Front Street on Saturday and Sunday, October 18 and 19. The program begins at 3:00 p.m., Saturday, with men's classes on "Objectives of the Church," and women's classes under the district women's leader; preaching at 8:00 p.m. by Apostle E. J. Gleazer. On Sunday at 8:30 a.m., pastor's meeting; at 9:15 a.m., worship service and talks by district departmental leaders; at 10:30 a.m., preaching; at 2:00 p.m., business meeting.

H. J. SIMONS,
District President.

Requests for Prayers

Prayers are requested for Sister Howard Burcham who, by the time this is printed, will probably have undergone an operation for a long-standing abscess of the lungs at a hospital near Boston. She has been a faithful member of the church, has experienced much suffering and many blessings, and trusts that she may be helped through this trial.

I am requesting prayers in behalf of my wife, who is suffering from several internal disorders. Unless God deems otherwise, she will go on the operating table soon. We are praying that she may be healed, subject to his wisdom and mercy.—S. E. Malone, Jr., McLean, Texas.

I request prayers for my sister who is very seriously ill, with an internal goiter and heart trouble. The doctor says she will need an operation. We pray she may have strength to go through it.—Mrs. Ida Millen, 2709 Dakota Avenue, Flint 6, Michigan.

I am requesting the Saints to remember my husband in their prayers. He is very feeble and has heart trouble and high blood pressure.—Mrs. Will A. Stoddard, Route 1, Box 113 CA, North Platte, Nebraska.

Mrs. Fern Marshall, North Platte, Nebraska, asks the continued prayers of church people for her mother, Mrs. Mary Snyder, Denver, Colorado, who has heart trouble.

Who Made God?

BY C. ED MILLER

SOME YEARS AGO, the late Apostle R. C. Russell and I held a series of meetings in a little town in Ohio. We had an average attendance of sixty-five nonmembers. At the door of the hall, we placed a box and invited written questions be placed therein. One evening when it was my turn to answer the questions, this was one of them: "Who made God?"

One could generally depend upon two questions being asked at such a series of meetings. The above and, "Where did Cain get his wife?"

When a young man arose in one of Billy Sunday's meetings and asked the last question, Billy replied, "Young man, I advise you not to be inquiring about other men's wives." (Laughter.) An audience generally expects a "snappy" answer to such tricky questions.

"Who made God?" I read the question to the audience, making the following reply. "This may be termed an assertive question. I have here in my hand my pocketknife. I ask, 'who made the knife?' I assert, do I not, that the knife was made, and I wish to know by whom."

"Who made God?" The assertion in this question is that God was made. If the person who wrote this will prove to me that God was made, I will promise to tell him who made God." (Laughter.)

This article is an attempt to place before the readers an appreciation of the startling scientific and other statements published in the 85th and the 90th sections of the Doctrine and Covenants, and other modern revelations.

And the light which now shineth, which giveth you light, is through him who enlighteneth your eyes, which is the same light that quickeneth your understandings; which light proceedeth forth from the presence of God, to fill the immensity of space. The light which is in all things; which giveth life to all things; which is the law by which all things are governed; even the power of God who sitteth upon his throne, who is in the bosom of eternity, who is in the midst of all things.—Section 85: 3.

And again verily I say unto you, that which is governed by law, is also preserved by law, and perfected and sanctified by the same.—Paragraph 8.

And now, verily I say unto you, I was in the beginning with the Father, and am the Firstborn; and all those who are begotten through me, are partakers of the glory of the same, and are the church of the Firstborn. Ye also were in the beginning with the Father. . . . Man was also in the beginning with God. Intelligence, or the light of truth, was not created or made, neither indeed can be. All truth is independent in that sphere in which God has placed it, to act for itself, as all intelligence also, otherwise there is no existence. Behold here is the agency of man. . . . The elements are eternal, and spirit and element, inseparably connected, receiveth a fulness of joy. . . . The glory of God is intelligence, or in other words, light and truth.—Section 90: 4, 5, 6.

An inventory of the universe, made by a Bible believer of ordinary intelligence would possibly result as follows: God, spirits, resurrected beings, unbounded space, unchangeable, universal laws, ninety-two elements, island universes, energy, time, chromosomes, genes, and a beneficent design.

Who made God? Why not ask who made space, time, the laws of the universe? When a carpenter builds a house, he provides for space so the rooms can be used. A design suggest a designer, order requires an explanation. But when the design is of an infinite character, we conclude the design always existed. Einstein, the scientist, believes space is a quaglobe that turns in on itself. If space has form, then outside of space we must have space minus! Or shall we say zero, minus! Even so, should we not conclude that space is an unformed part of the design, its purpose being to provide for the movement of the heavenly bodies. There seems to be plenty of room in space so these island universes don't get tangled up.

The 92 known elements were designed to be used to build the universes. Must we not conclude these elements always existed? Can we conceive of a time when there were no laws operating in the universe? I understand that space, time, elements, laws, energy, always existed with God. He uses these in a beneficial way, forever and ever. We understand that God is a personal being. He always was, he always will be. The uncaused first cause. The final cause. The ordinary mind possibly will come to these conclusions: The laws of the universe always were, they always will be. Space always was. The elements always existed.

Truth and right are not merely virtues that good people should practice. They are the dominating power of the universe. May I be permitted to express it this way: It is true and right that there should be a God in the universe. It is true and right God should be a God of love instead of an all-powerful monster of hate. It is true and right that God should have the power to use the assets of the universe for the benefit of the fish of the sea, the birds of the air, the animals on the earth, and for man made in his image. Everything God made seems to enjoy living when it is permitted to exist in the way he designed that it should. It is true and right that God should reveal himself to man and inform him what laws he should observe to meet with divine favor. When those laws for the salvation of man are revealed, they are as eternal as the laws of the universe. Hence we have the "everlasting gospel." And men have tried to change those laws!

Skeptics have arisen from time to time who can see no design in the universe. It is all chance and mechanistic. Einstein does not believe in a personal God. In a paper presented at a conference of science, philosophy, and religion, at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, he declared that "a legitimate conflict between religion and science cannot exist." Science without religion is lame, religion without science is blind. If God were omnipotent, Einstein argued, then every occurrence including every human action, every human thought and every human feeling and aspiration is also his work. The main source of present-day conflict between the spheres of religion and science, Einstein continued, lies in this concept of a personal God.

The 85th section will answer this view of a personal God. Einstein is evidently a better mathematician than a theologian. "A pygmy perched on the shoulders of a giant, can see farther than the giant." We have the giant in reserve, we will be the pygmy.

William J. Cameron, author of You and the Ten Commandments, pages 54 and 55, says:

I look over this physical universe and I see it producing things, but not persons, and yet I see persons produced on this very planet of ours. Do you know what that leads me to think? That a greater personality has produced all of us lesser personalities. To say that God is not personality but mere force whereas we ourselves are persons, is to say that God is less than we are; and that in creating us he has created something greater than Himself. If we are persons, a power possessing personality produced us. Physical forces that cannot think cannot produce a man that can think. Physical forces that cannot feel cannot produce a man that can feel. And a God that does not know and does not think, and purpose, and love—a God that is a blind force—cannot produce a man that does know and love and think.

Can an effect be greater than the cause that produced it?

The Reader's Digest published a review of Human Destiny, by Dr. Le-comte du Noüy. Dr. Robert A. Millikan, winner of the Nobel prize in physics and chairman of the Executive Council of the California Institute of Technology, says such a book possibly would appear only once or twice in a hundred years. The author, a biologist, believes man is free to choose the path he will follow. Du Noüy is classed as a new witness for God. In Man Does Not Stand Alone, published in 1944, A. Cressy Morrison, former president of the New York Academy of Sciences, gives seven reasons why he believes in God. It is one of those "good books" we should read. There is not a "dry" page in it.

Emerson is quoted as having said, "If the correct theory shall ever be proclaimed, we will recognize it by this token, it will solve many riddles." The scientists have carefully traced the physical development of the single cell to complicated man. But do they explain what makes the bird fly or the man to think? Professor Fath in Elements of Astronomy says,

The workers in the physical sciences attempt to study the physical universe. They recognize that they work in a limited field and that physical truth is not the whole truth. They leave to philosophy and religion the search for the absolute and the explanation of the purpose of all things.

Religion has the answer the scientists have been unable to supply. The prophet of this dispensation has given the correct theory, and it solves many scientific riddles.

The 85th section makes the following statements in such positive words they cannot be mistaken. The light which we receive is from God, it is the same light that quickens our understandings. It fills all space. It is in all things. It gives life to all things. It is the law by which all things are governed. It is the power of God who is in the bosom of eternity, who is in the midst of all things. A number of these statements seem absolutely impossible of proof and to say the least, fantastic. Light, intelligence, life, is in all things! One of the functions of a prophet is to reveal truths and secrets (Amos 3:7).

There are times when we believe poets, artists, composers have been inspired. In his day, John Ruskin was in a class by himself, as an artist and philosopher. In his Ethics of the Dust, he sensed a great truth. He has Dora say to the old lecturer, "You know, you always talk as if crystals were alive; and we never understand how much you are in play, and how much in earnest." And the answer by the old lecturer, "Neither do I understand myself how much I am in earnest. The stones puzzle me as much as I puzzle you. They look as if they were alive and make me speak as if they were. What is it to be alive?"

On November 28, 1891, the Scientific American Supplement published the following statements by Edison:

It is my belief that every atom of matter is intelligent, deriving energy from the primordial germ. Life I regard as indestructible. That is if matter is indestructible. All matter lives and everything that lives possesses intelligence. I cannot avoid the conclusion that all matter is composed of intelligent atoms and that life and mind are merely synonyms for the aggregation of atomic intelligence.

Professor T. Sterry Hunt, mineralogist and mine engineer, says: "Mr. Edison's hypothesis has nothing to fear from the physicists. Crystals certainly live." Dr. James H. Hyslop, professor of philosophy, ethics, and psychology in Columbia College says: "Mr. Edison's views are not without the warrant of philosophy. The great German philosopher, Loetz, for instance, holds that all atoms are conscious and of a spiritual nature. In this way he undertakes to account for the soul."

Considering the statements in the section cited with the opinions quoted, I think we are justified in believing that there is a universality of intelligence.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF LAW

In 1892, Henry M. Wood published a book on the Universality of Law. I quote: "What is the most important discovery of modern times?" He says some would mention the art of printing, others the use of steam or electricity, etc. "No; it is none of these. Of vaster moment than all these great achievements is the growing recognition that law is universal."

If this is a fact, then Joseph Smith must be given the credit of having announced this law in 1832, in these words: "And again I verily say unto you, That which is governed by law is preserved by law and perfected and sanctified by the same . . . All kingdoms have a law given; and there are many kingdoms; for there is no space in which there is no kingdom and there is no kingdom in which there is no space, either a greater or lesser kingdom. And unto every kingdom is given a law; unto every law there are certain bounds also and conditions."—Section 85: 8, 9.

Law reigns supreme in all the universe. The ministers of this church understand there are spiritual laws as well as what we call physical laws. These spiritual laws must be observed or we suffer. We can't break a law; the law breaks us. When the church which Christ established "transgressed the law and broke the everlasting covenant," God took a hand and in our age restored the church and the everlasting law, the gospel law.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF LIGHT

One hundred years after Joseph Smith gave the revelation on light, Walter Russell, president of the New York Society of Arts and Sciences, published in 1932, the following:

Science is likely to find a new conception of God and more tangible evidence of his existence. The universal nature of light is one of the keys to this new puzzle. Light, according to tests with scientific instruments, is not merely what human eyes see, but essentially the same radiation as heat, X rays, radio waves, and all other forms of radiation. Moreover, light is also energy. Getting down to the ultimate particles which form matter, which seem to constitute light and which carry energy, scientists find them all acting suspiciously like some of the processes of human thought.

We have begun to see something tangible and inspiring beyond place, mass, and dimension. There must be a limitless source of static energy somewhere back of dynamic expression . . . if energy belongs to space as the new cosmogony suggests, light would belong to space as Jesus inferred. When energy is found to belong to space, light will be understood to be an emergence from space, and God will have been found to be what Jesus said he was—LIGHT.

As we study Jesus's teaching from the point of view of science, we become convinced that he understood light, energy, motion, and space and knew what filled space. Jesus taught that life is eternal. Science may soon prove this to be literally true. If science proves this, it will give meaning to the words of Sir James Jeans that matter may eventually prove to be pure thought. Jesus did not teach that bodies are eternal, but that life is eternal.

How profoundly astonished would Professor Russell be if, after publishing this article I have quoted, someone sent him the 85th section, which claimed to be a revelation of Jesus Christ, through Joseph Smith in 1832! This is what he would read:

He that ascended upon high, as also he descended below all things, in that he comprehended all things, that he might be in and through all things, the light of truth, which truth shineth. This is the light of Christ. As also he is in the sun, and the light of the sun, and the power thereof by which it was made. As also he is in the moon, and the power thereof by which it was made. As also the light of the stars, and the power thereof by which they were made. And the earth also, and the power thereof, even the earth upon which you stand.

And the light which now shineth, which giveth you light, is through him who enlighteneth your eyes, which is the same light that quickeneth your understandings; which light proceedeth forth from the presence of God to fill the immensity of space. The light which is in all things; which giveth life to all things; which is the law by which all things are governed; even the power of God who sitteth upon his throne, who is in the bosom of eternity, who is in the midst of all things.—Paragraphs 2, 3.

John 1: 1-4, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made."

Professor Russell is convinced Jesus understood light, energy, and what filled all space. As he was the creator of the universe, he surely did understand and know what he was talking about. And he revealed to Joseph Smith what light was and what filled space, a hundred years before scientists caught a glimpse of the universality of light, intelligence, life, and law. But what a difficult matter the early ministers of the church had to prove these startling statements!

In 1930, Sir James Jeans, who is quoted by Russell, published in Toronto, The Mysterious Universe, page 148, said, "Today there is a wide measure of agreement, which on the physical side of science approaches to unanimity, that the stream of knowledge is heading towards a non-mechanical reality; the universe begins to look more like a great thought than a great machine. Mind no longer appears as an accidental intruder into the realm of matter; we are beginning to suspect that we ought rather to hail it as the creator and governor of the realm of matter—not of course our individual minds, but the mind in which the atoms out of which our individual minds have grown exists as thoughts."

Professor C. A. Chant, of the Canadian Astronomical Society, remarks as follows on the above quotation: "The things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal. Truly a mysterious universe."

How very similar the scientist expresses himself to the statement in the section when he says: "A great thought is the creator and governor of matter." Joseph Smith expressed it: "The light which is the law by which all things are governed; even the power of God."

In 1927, Michael Pupin, referred to as "one of the most distinguished living scientists," holds degrees from Columbia University, (where he is professor of electro-mechanics,) from the University of Berlin, and from Johns Hopkins. Last year he was elected President of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, one of the highest scientific honors in the world. In an interview by Albert Edward Wigam, published in the American, September, 1927:

Science is increasing our belief that the human soul will continue after the death of our physical bodies Science has found nothing in the universe which even compares in importance with the life of man. Compared to the human soul, everything else sinks into insignificance. Wherever science has explored the universe, it has found it to be a manifestation of a coordinating principle. It leaves us no escape from the conclusion that back of everything there is a definite guiding principle, which leads from chaos to cosmos. It seems obvious that there is some directing Intelligence behind all things.

Doctor Pupin refers to four outstanding scientific discoveries of past years. Of the third discovery of recent years, he says: "Then came the revelation of a third physical reality, a third glory, namely, radiant energy in motion. By that I mean that the whole universe is filled with the radiation of light and heat."

The professor calls these discoveries "revelations." Unknowingly he uses exactly the right word, revelations. Those revelations given to Joseph Smith in 1832-33 were a hundred years in advance of the revelations of our top scientists.

Dr. Pupin believes science is helping make better Christians; he says: "I believe science will make better Christians; I believe it will make better Christians of all men and women who try to understand its simple and beautiful laws, because they are the laws of God."

Referring to the electrons, Dr. Pupin remarks:

These little workers, infinitely small and infinitely numerous, by their combined activities make up the larger activities of that stupendous thing we call the Universe. And this busy little worker, the electron, is, so far as we know, the unchangeable, primordial building stone of the material universe. And this busy little worker, the electron, is the most law abiding creature in the universe. It loves, honors, and obeys the laws, and its eternal mission is to serve. God employed the heavenly host of electronic workers to build the atoms, the molecules, and the galaxies of burning stars. What is the only mystery today in electrical science? It is this: Where, when and how did the electron come into existence? The sensible man will answer, God created the electron, and therefor, only God knows, where, when and how.

Even as intellectual pygmies, compared to these intellectual giants, we can climb upon their shoulders and see further than they, if we have the spirit of truth to guide us. I don't believe electrons were created. I don't believe they could be. I think they are one of the assets of the universe that always was and always will be like space or like life.

The scientists have conceived a beautiful, a wonderful orderly way for the physical development of the universe. They call it "evolution." When Darwin and Wallace first published this theory, Bible believers were dismayed. Atheists rejoiced. Then we had a period of what was termed "The Dogmatism of Science." Now leaders in scientific societies are publishing their faith in God and in the immortality of the soul.

In 1945, A. Cressy Morrison, Past President of the New York Academy of Sciences, etc., referred to before in this article, published Man Does Not Stand Alone. On page 40, Morrison states that the origin of life is a scientific mystery. On page 44, he says he does not know how life came, but it is his belief it came by divine power and it can't be termed "material."

Some of these scientific writers who may be termed Christian, seem to evade, for scientific reasons, the very key to the puzzle, "From whence came life?" If we accept the Bible as authority, we must believe in the pre-existence of life. "There was a man sent from God whose name was John." John pre-existed. Christ pre-existed. A third of the host fell, they had their agency, and were disobedient to the laws of heaven, so the Lord had to send them to another neighborhood, across the tracks as it were. Christ came as the babe of Bethlehem.

The 90th section, verse 5, reads: "Man was in the beginning with God. Intelligence, or the light of truth, was not created or made, neither can be." I understand the use of "In the beginning" was a convenient term used to help explain a truth, difficult for mortals to comprehend.

I quote from Section 85, verse 21:

I give unto you a commandment that you shall teach one another the doctrine of the kingdom; teach ye diligently and my grace shall attend you, that you may be instructed more fully in theory, in principle, in doctrine, in the law of the gospel, in all things that pertain unto the kingdom of God, that is expedient for you to understand: of things both in heaven and in earth, and under the earth; things which have been; things which are; things which shortly come to pass; things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and perplexities of the nations; and the judgments which are on the land; and a knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms, that you may be prepared in all things when I shall send you again, to magnify the calling whereunto I have called you.

The individual who would observe this command could be an educated person!

In the above instruction, we are to try to reach the truth by a correct theory. We are on the right road when we assume intelligence was one of the assets of the universe which God uses. We may theorize there is a pool as it were of intelligence or life forces. When a fish or a bird or a sheep is being formed on this earth, a law operates that to that form the spark of life is drawn from that life pool. That spark of life is immortal. "Man was in the beginning."

If Darwin were living today, he would revise some of his theories.

ENROLLMENT BREAKS RECORD

Largest Student Body in History Finds
New Building, Increased Staff, New Courses,
As Graceland's Fifty-third Year Begins

Another year is under way at Graceland.

An enrollment of 640—which surpasses last year's all-time record by 40—converged at the West Door when Graceland began her 53rd year on September 12.

Awaiting them was one new classroom building partially completed, an enlarged faculty and staff, new courses, and a 52-year-old institution whose facilities had had a face-lifting.

FELLOWSHIP SERVICE HONORS MISSIONARIES

The Spirit of the Church became the Graceland Spirit as the Graceland student body gave its welcome and farewell to our European-bound missionaries in a special benedictory service on the campus Wednesday evening, September 17. The missionaries with their wives were the guests of the college and the students of Graceland. It was the first student fellowship of the new year.

Participants in the service called it one of the most outstanding in the history of Graceland fellowships—owing to the drama of the missions to which the young men of the church had been called.

Features of the service were testimonials by the missionaries and by persons representing the students and the faculty. Alice Folkes, a student from England, spoke for the students in a pledge for "those at home" and Velma Ruch, a member of the faculty whose home for many years was in Norway, gave a similar pledge.

Missionaries and their wives who were present are Frank and Zita Fry, Glen and Alice Johnson, all en route to Great Britain; Albert and Twyla Scherer, en route to the Netherlands; Eugene and Alma Theys, en route to Germany.

The students themselves came as in years past, from almost every state and from foreign countries. This year about 40 States are represented and eight countries, or territories, including the U. S. A. The countries and territories are England, Australia, New Zealand, Canada, Netherlands, West Indies, Canal Zone, and Hawaii.

Over two hundred members of the student body are veterans. Over forty are married.

Not all who applied were admitted. However, most applicants who failed to qualify this fall were not rejected because of lack of room, but because they did not meet the

THE STORY OF GRACELAND

With "The Graceland Story," Volume I, number 1, the "Saints' Herald" begins a new weekly series designed to tell the story of the church college as it unfolds, chapter by chapter.

Alumni of the college will find in these pages news about familiar people, familiar places. Other readers will come to know their church college.

COLLEGE ADDS NEW MEMBERS TO STAFF

New teachers and staff members have swelled the official family of Graceland to all-time highs.

Granville K. Thompson, formerly of Davis City, Iowa, has begun his duties as Business Manager, replacing A. Neal Deaver who resigned to enter private business. Thompson is an honor graduate of Graceland '40 and of the University of Chicago.

Richard F. Dunlap, of New Westminster, British Columbia, has joined the faculty to teach American history, European history, geography, and political science. He is a Graceland graduate of 1942 and received his Master's Degree at the University of Minnesota.

Charles E. Irwin has joined the staff of the engineering department. He graduated from Graceland in

GRACELAND EXPECTS BIGGEST ATTENDANCE IN YEARS FOR "INTERNATIONAL" HOMECOMING

The Graceland Homecoming this year is taking on the international flavor of a United Nations assembly. With students from most of the States and from eight countries and territories attending Graceland and with the church emphasizing its international mission, the Homecoming planners decided to develop a program designed to tell the story of the world mission of Graceland, both as a center to which come students from many lands and as a place out of which students go to serve throughout the world.

With travel conditions nearer to prewar levels, the college and the Alumni Association expect the biggest attendance in the history of Graceland Homecomings.

Featured speaker on the program will be Bishop G. L. DeLapp who is expected to bring an added international spirit to the festivities as a result of his recent trip to Europe.

Homecoming dates this year are Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 17, 18, and 19.

NEW CLASSROOM BUILDING, STILL UNNAMED, IS BIGGEST RECENT CHANGE ON CAMPUS

Additions and changes in the facilities of the campus have also been made.

A new concrete pathway leads to the new classroom building located east and south of Zimmerman Hall. The building, as yet unnamed, will house a large lecture room, the engineering and drawing room, two classrooms and six faculty offices. The building is of frame construction and is Georgian Colonial in design complete with fluted porch columns and cupola.

An office for the Registrar has been added in the Administration Building, and the business office has been shifted to the east half of the south side of the first floor, leaving the west side for the Dean and Registrar. An office has also been added in the Public Relations Department.

Two new tennis courts adjacent to the old courts are nearing completion, and lights for night playing have been installed, the gift of the class of 1946.

A new parking area and a straightened road are to be found behind Zimmerman. The roads leading to the campus have been black-topped.

Several of the dormitories have been redecorated. Sunnymede Hall has become the infirmary.

Fluorescent lighting has been installed in the library and reserve room.

A complete new electric kitchen featuring all the latest devices for eliminating kitchen drudgery, including automatic dishwasher, has been added to the teaching facilities of the Home Economics Department.

The dining hall furniture has been refinished, and new gas stoves, with an additional unit to the bake oven, have been installed in the commissary.

COLLEGE DAY IS OCTOBER 26

One of the most important events in the lives of Graceland students does not occur alone at Graceland. It happens throughout the church on College Day—October 26.

COLLEGE ADDS SOME COURSES MAKES CHANGES IN OTHERS

Changes and additions in courses are being offered this year at Graceland.

Hygiene classes for men and women are being taught separately. One hour credit is being given for membership in A Cappella, oratorio, orchestra, band, or other ensemble groups, and one or two hours credit are being offered for applied music.

Added courses include elementary German, a new homemaking curriculum for the student who wants to be a good homemaker but doesn't plan to go on to a four-year school for further study, two new courses in natural science for students having had no previous science or biology, a class in recreational leadership for children, and an arrangement whereby child psychology may be taken the first semester and adolescent psychology the second, and mental hygiene one or both semesters. Also announced are courses in advanced public speaking, religions of the world, religion in the contemporary world, modern social movements, races, and minorities.

1936 and received his Bachelor of Arts Degree in chemistry from the University of Iowa and his Bachelor of Science Degree in engineering from the University of Kansas.

Ruth York, of Boston, Massachusetts, has begun her duties as an instructor in romance languages. She graduated from Graceland in 1943, going on to receive her Master's Degree in French at the University of Iowa where she taught as a graduate assistant.

Raymond D. Zinser is teaching sociology courses and assisting Dr. Cheville. He is a graduate from Graceland with the class of 1942 and received his Master of Arts Degree from the University of Chicago.

Bethel Davis Knoche, of Independence, Missouri, a former student of Graceland with the class of 1938, has been added to the music staff on a part-time basis as an organ teacher. She has had training at Warrensburg

State Teachers College in Missouri; with Powell Weaver, organist, in Kansas City; and at the Eastman School of Music in Chicago. She is best known for her organ work on church radio programs over KMBC, assisting Evan A. Fry.

ENROLLMENT (Continued)

Of the 640 students, 300 are returning sophomores, and 340 are new students, mostly freshmen.

Among the new students are many whose high school records were outstanding. There is the girl who won first place for her violin solo in the national music contest, and there is the state high school champion in low hurdles of Oklahoma. There are valedictorians, straight A students, and the "best looking man in the senior class." There are class presidents, captains of football and basketball teams, editors of high school newspapers and yearbooks.

And there are the young men and women from many places whose chief claims to fame are that they are the kind of persons you would like to have for your friends.

These will know and become the Graceland Spirit of 1947-48.

The fact that has made Graceland loved through the years has been her care for the individual. Mass education is for others. Graceland students are personally helped, and encouraged as developing persons.

Who Made God?

scendant from such ancestors, or the reverse, that simians are degenerated humans. The author cites the useless thumb of the monkey as conclusive evidence that man's thumb was not the result of the very specialized thumb of the tree-living monkey. Nature does not restore lost facilities. On page 65 the author declares there is a directive intelligence which is not explained by science, and it cannot be declared as material.

Of all the discoveries of science, the chromosomes and the genes are among the most wonderful. Their discovery is among the greatest triumphs of the mind of man. The genes are responsible for the multiple characteristics of two billion human beings! Yet they are so infinitesimal they would not fill a thimble! Darwin apparently was not conscious of their existence. Evolutionists need a new, up-to-date Darwin. The spectroscope, which one can hold in the hand, is another marvelous aid to science. It reveals what kind of elements are on the distant suns. It reveals the same laws that are operating here are in operation out there. It reveals whether a star is approaching or receding from the earth.

Astronomers the world over are anxiously waiting for the completion of the 200 inch mirror to be installed in the great observatory on Mt. Palomar, California. This giant telescope is primarily a colossal camera, which will be used to photograph the heavens. Eventually photographs will be taken, negatives developed and prints made, possibly revealing suns, nebula, island universes, etc., no man has ever seen before. With this telescope, astronomers will be able to see the incomprehensible distance of 6,000,000,000,000,000,000 miles! So man has fashioned another instrument to assist him in viewing the wonders of the heavens. Modern revelation expresses it thus: "Any man who hath seen any or the least of these hath seen God moving in his majesty and power."

Sir Alfred Russell Wallace published, Man's Place in the Universe. He came to this conclusion, "That the stellar universe forms one connected whole; and though of enormous extent, is yet finite, and its extent determinable." The 200 inch mirror may reveal whether the universe's extent is determinable.

Moses was selected by the Lord to usher in a dispensation adapted to the requirements of a people who had been in slavery to the Egyptians. Possibly Moses had distorted conceptions of Jehovah because of his Egyptian environment and the Egyptian belief in a multiplicity of Gods. He was eventually permitted to have close association with God. Now he knew he was dealing with the one and true God of mighty power. That knowledge never left him during all his association and leadership of a stiff-necked people.

Joseph Smith, at the age of fifteen, was selected of the Lord to be the means in his hands to restore the church and primitive Christianity. The creeds of 1830 taught that God was a being "without body, parts, and passions." The late M. H. Bond described such a God as "a cipher with the rim knocked off." When the boy went to his father's woods to ask God which church to join, he was permitted to see in vision, God and Christ. His education to be a prophet to this generation now commenced. He knew God was a personal being. The angel with the message of Revelation 14:6 was now to be heard, "worship him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of water." A living God, a personal God.

The church was organized in April, 1830. In June, 1830, Joseph was permitted to receive the words which God spoke to Moses on the mount. This is section 22, Doctrine and Covenants. I quote verses 23 and 24:

And the Lord spoke unto Moses saying, the heavens; they are many, and they cannot be numbered unto man, but they are numbered unto me, for they are mine; and as one earth shall pass away, and the heaven thereof, even so shall another come; and there is no end to my works, neither to my words; for this is my work and my glory, to bring to pass the immortality, and eternal life of man.

And now Moses, my son, I will speak unto you concerning this earth upon which you stand; and you shall write the things which I shall speak. And in a day when the children of men shall esteem my words as naught, and take many of them from the book which you shall write, behold I will raise up another like unto you, and they shall be had again among the children of men, among even as many as shall believe.

Moses and Joseph, across the ages, had a similar mission: to proclaim the One true and Living God, and a proper conception of the universe. Has any modern astronomer done any better?

The education of Joseph continues. Section 36 is an extract from the prophecy of Enoch. I quote verse 6:

And Enoch said unto the Lord . . . seeing ye are holy, and from all eternity to all eternity. And were it possible that man could number the particles of the earth, and millions of earths like this, it would not be a beginning to the number of your creations; and your curtains are stretched out still, and yet you are there; and your bosom is there; and also you are just; you are merciful and kind forever. You have taken Zion to your own bosom, from all your creations, from all eternity to all eternity, and naught but peace, justice, and truth is the habitation of your throne; and mercy shall go before your face, and have no end.

What a glorious conception of the universe. What a reverent dignity in the tribute to Jehovah.

The Biblical World is published for ministers. In the issue of March, 1913, is this remarkable editorial on Easter.

Easter brings a challenge to every thoughtful man. If Jesus be not raised from the dead, he is still with the dead. The crucial question is this: Does anybody really know whether Jesus is still living, still man's companion, still our Redeemer. Easter challenges us to say whether he is, not what he was. At Easter we face the dark tower and demand a triumphant champion, not a fellow victim. Did Jesus conquer death or did death conquer Jesus? Does he still exist, still himself, or did he go back into some impersonal whole? An answer to such a question is either a gospel, or a summons to another forlorn hope.

The editor does not answer this very important question, Is Jesus still living?

In Section 76: 3, the Lord God has given the answer:

The Lord touched the eyes of our understandings, and they were opened, and the glory of the Lord shone round about; and we beheld the glory of the Son, on the right hand of the Father, and received of his fulness; and saw the holy angels, and they who are sanctified before his throne; worshiping God and the Lamb, who worship him for ever and ever. And, now, after the many testimonies which have been given of him, this is the testimony, last of all, which we give of him, that he lives; for we saw him, even on the right hand of God; and we heard the voice bearing record that he is the Only Begotten of the Father; that by Him, and through Him, the worlds are and were created.

Joseph bears testimony with Job and Moses, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

The Book of Mormon is a record of the ancient people of America. One of the most important and outstanding claims of the book, and one that would seem to be beyond the possibility of proof, is that Jesus Christ, after his resurrection, came to this land of America, in fulfillment of his statement as found in John 10: 16, "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice." Christ established his church here after the organic structure of the Jerusalem church. After instructing his disciples in the gospel plan he ascended on high.

Apostle Paul M. Hanson, after many years of travel and research, published, Jesus Christ Among the Ancient Americans. The book is a wealth of evidence, from archaeology, myths, traditions, etc., that a being, endowed with the characteristics of the Christ, visited these ancient Americans.

"Does anybody really know if Jesus still lives?" What world-wide ministry can give a more satisfying answer to this question than the ministry of the Restoration? Who can preach a more constructive Easter sermon, based on "Whether Christ IS, not what he WAS?"

GOD IN THE MIDST OF ALL THINGS

Saturn is surrounded by three rings. Some astronomers believe these rings are composed of tiny asteroids, who have their own individual orbits. The ten moons of Saturn, the three rings revolve around the planet, Saturn revolves around the sun, the sun is going places with his retinue of planets and moons. What holds these bodies in their orbits? Why don't they fly off into space? Men call it gravity. Gravity is a property of matter. Now scientists believe that electricity, in the last analysis, is matter itself. Now what is electricity?

Einstein startled the scientific world by declaring light was subject to gravity, and the dictum that light always travels in a straight line was not true. Light seems akin to gravity.

Possibly the time may come when a scientist will come among us who can see in these sections of the Doctrine and Covenants, revelations of a scientific character which will transcend the discoveries of any living scientist. He may find in these words, "intelligence cleaveth unto intelligence; wisdom receiveth wisdom; truth embraces truth; virtue loveth virtue; light cleaveth unto light." The law of affinity in operation! "Light seems akin to gravity," says science. "Light cleaveth unto light," says revelation. "Which light is in all things, which is the law by which all things are governed."

Space is susceptible to a variety of meanings. A printer uses a thin piece of metal and calls it a space. The mathematician refers to flat space. Einstein deals in round space. Locke, in his day said, "Pure space is capable neither of resistance nor motion." But is there such a condition as pure space? The popular definition of space would possibly be a condition in which objects can move unrestrained, as the space in a room or the space in the universe. But in the room is a gas called oxygen, which we breathe. The space and the air take the shape of the room. The old-time scientists conceived space was filled with a substance called ether. Webster gives this definition: "A medium of great elasticity and extreme tenuity, supposed to pervade all space, the interior of solid bodies not excepted, and to be the medium of transmission of light and heat." Whatever substance light, heat, sound, radio waves uses to move; it could have form.

Let us permit our imagination to have free reign. Instead of one space globe, let us conceive of innumerable space globes, revolving around a center globe; in a medium of what we will term a superspace, which has no limits. This center globe is so aglow with iridescent light that it could be impossible for the human eye to look upon it. This globe is the throne of God, the spiritual and physical power station of the universe. Here he is "in the bosom of eternity," "in the midst of all things," he is light and life. Yet it is written, "a sparrow shall not fall to the ground without your father knoweth it." "The everlasting arms are underneath." "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son that whosoever should believe on him shall have eternal life." This is GOD. To assert that he was made is childish.

Mother!

By LOUISE

YOU ARE peacefully doing your breakfast dishes when that agonized cry rings out, "Mother!" Your heart hits your shoes as you run frantically for the front door to find that next door Sally has hit your Sammy over the head with a piece of rusty iron pipe. Do you know what to do?

Janey comes in, her little face tear streaked, wailing, "Mother!" and holds out one small, scratched finger. Do you know what to do?

Bobby's yelp of terror and pain brings you on the double, and you quickly see that he has dropped a brick on his big toe, smashing it good. Do you know what to do?

Your neighbor's tearful call brings you hurrying to where she holds her screaming baby who pulled a pan of hot water over on himself. Do you know what to do?

During the war probably more lives than we know were saved by first aid, given by medics on the battlefields. Literally, first aid is the first aid to reach the victim and oftentimes becomes the most important aid in saving a life. It can be the difference between life and death!

But such small home accidents aren't life or death matters, you say. How do you know? Aren't hundreds of people badly hurt or killed in their own homes? Infection, too, is a sly enemy. It is meek and unobtrusive—for a while. It slithers in and keeps quiet, working insidiously and quickly until it is often conqueror before you realize what has happened.

Insurance tables constantly remind us that more accidents occur in the home than anywhere else. Yet we, as housewives who will be first on the scene most of the time, are very often not prepared to meet emergencies. Many of these accidents happen to us, and that makes someone else responsible for giving us aid. However, many of these accidents also happen to our children, and that is the moment in which they look to us for help. That is the moment when we may thank ourselves for foresightedness in realizing such things can happen to us, and we must not only guard against them but be ready for them when they do occur.

For Sammy's jagged, nasty-looking cut, first of all be sure that it is cleaned out. Warm water can't hurt it. Since a head injury can look innocent and be serious, the thing to do is keep him quiet. Make him comfortable and then call your doctor's office for advice. If there is free bleeding, a clean big handkerchief folded into a pad and pressed against the wound will help control it.

For skinned and scratched fingers, arms, and knees, the first rule again is to clean away the dirt. Usually after a thorough cleansing, painting with merthiolate or mercurochrome will take care of it. Never use iodine, it can burn the skin and be dangerous.

For a smashed finger or toe, investigate for broken bones. If there are none, cleansing and an application of a liniment is about all you can do.

There are many kinds of burns which require different treatment.

For small burns, ointment is the best. For large areas, soak sheeting or similar material in one quart of water to which has been added three teaspoons of baking soda. If you have no baking soda, use Epsom salts. Apply to the burned area. For chemical burns (such as lye) wash area well with water first to remove chemical, then apply ointment. For carbolic acid burns, sponge with rubbing alcohol, then apply ointment. For chemical burns in the eye, wash out with water or milk, then put a few drops of olive oil in the eye.

Do you know what it feels like to see men pull a seven-year-old boy out of the icy water, his small body limp and motionless? Do you know what it feels like to watch desperately as each person shakes his head and realize with horror that no one can give artificial respiration? Do you know what it feels like to be sick with fear as you see those vital first three minutes ebb away and know that his life is ebbing with them and you are helpless? Do you know what it feels like to see his shrieking, sobbing mother led away and realize that it is partly your fault that he lies there lifeless—because you are not prepared? I do . . . and it is not a pretty memory. It gave a grim impetus to my study of artificial respiration.

Your children are playing peacefully when Johnny tumbles out of the apple tree. You are jarred into sudden, unthinking action. You sweep him up into your arms and carry him, hunched against you, into the house. Do you realize that you may have complicated the fracture of his broken collarbone?

Jackie cuts his foot badly on a piece of broken bottle. Do you know that if the blood spurts it is arterial bleeding and is stopped by a tourniquet between wound and heart, and if it flows steadily it is venous bleeding and is stopped by pressure or a tourniquet between end of the limb and wound? Do you know that a tourniquet should be loosened every twenty minutes? If you are not sure how to apply a tourniquet, the safest thing is to use pressure directly on the wound with a clean handkerchief or a clean pad of gauze. It can be bound—not too tight so that it stops circulation entirely—while you phone a doctor. Never depend entirely upon your own skill to stop profuse or continued bleeding.

Your Betsy and her little neighbor, Martha, have taken their dolls out into the wide, side yard. Martha's sharp and sudden scream is pure terror. She stands, paralyzed by fright, staring at two tiny holes where her hand has been pierced by the fangs of a snake, coiled in the thick grass. Poisonous? You can't tell and certainly haven't time to wonder. This child is not your own, but she is your responsibility just as surely as if she were yours. Do you scream, too, and faint at the thought of the snake? We hope not. We hope you pick the child up gently, speaking calmly to her and carry her into the house, laying her flat on her back. Do not allow her to exert herself. Apply a tourniquet between the bite and the heart. Sterilize a sharp kitchen knife with boiling water and make two little cuts, one-fourth inch deep in the shape of an X at the point of the slits. Be careful not to cut too deep lest it be near an artery or a vein. Suck out the venom and, of course, spit it out. Then put a bandage over the wound and continue to keep the child quiet. There is time enough to call a doctor and the child's mother when your job is done, and the child is out of immediate danger.

All this is no substitute for calling a doctor. It is merely first aid when you are the first on the scene and the doctor seems a long way off. It is designed to help you meet that call of "Mother!" with calmness and the assurance that you are doing everything you can.

The object of punishment is prevention of evil; it can never be made impulsive to good.—Horace Mann.

Refrigerator Wisdom

When you make more whipped cream than you plan to use for one meal—and small families frequently do—put it in one end of a tray, or a small covered dish and place it in the freezing chamber of your refrigerator. There it will keep for days, will not separate nor spoil. It will slice easily to put on top of desserts, and soon melts, looking and tasting as if it were just freshly whipped.

* * * * *

When you wish to keep meat in prime fresh condition, put it in the freezing chamber of your refrigerator. It will become hard as a rock and will not spoil. You will not have to wait for it to thaw to begin cooking. Just put it in the pan and cook. Make hamburger into patties, separate them with waxed paper, and freeze them. Chops can be kept separate in the same way.

* * * * *

Keep a little water in the covered refrigerator pan where you store lettuce, radishes, etc. It will keep them frosty crisp.

* * * * *

Use baking soda in the rinse water when you wash the enamel interior of your refrigerator. It destroys odors and retards formation of molds and bacteria.

* * * * *

If you want to defrost freezing coils quickly, fill trays with hot water, changing them as soon as they cool. This will remove ice in a few minutes.

Maybe you won't agree with Mr. Wilkie—he uses some pretty strong language. Maybe, on the other hand, he'll help you see the picture a little more clearly. Whatever your reaction, we sincerely believe you'll find the following article one of the most interesting you've ever read.

THE AVERAGE observer looking at our church today might be led to believe that everything is fine and the goose hangs high, however, upon closer inspection with an eye to the goal of the church, one is forced to conclude that we are wandering widely from the path we must follow to reach the kingdom of God. This point of view is not hard to substantiate if we look for a moment at what the church has really accomplished in a practical manner toward the building of the kingdom. We have nothing that could be called position is shared with at least a dozen other faiths. But let us look further.

Along with the fact that we are not building Zion, most of us are engaged in an endless series of arguments about things that are not the important and primary business of the church. I have heard Saints in serious discussions on what they thought constituted heaven, where it was, or how to get there. Even if they could draw a conclusion on these matters, which is extremely doubtful, what on earth difference along well-defined paths of progress, but is being sent out and scattered aimlessly in a score or more fields. This state of affairs can mean only that the effect their work has on the world in general is very slight, and that they are not making the church the light on the hill it is supposed to be.

What is the reason behind the fact that our church is not building Zion? Why is it only a church in the same class with any other church or faith instead of Zion, the Beautiful? To answer these questions, we must ex-community stewardships, for the business methods of our people are the same as one would find in any other city, town, or state in the nation. There is no such thing as the Storehouse set up for the economic protection of our Saints who are in the same boat with all the other citizens as far as food, clothing, and shelter are concerned. The politics of Independence are not being ordered in a Zionite manner, for one can find here the same type of petty graft and back-scratching that goes on in any other town of like size. Here our church holds the position of a church and nothing more; this would it make to the situation we find ourselves in right here in Independence? Some of us rise up daily in righteous wrath, protesting against the sale and consumption of liquor. Granted these things and many more need fixing, but the problem of drinking is a subject for study by a person schooled in the handling of other persons and their problems. Obviously, very few of the lay membership are qualified to work in this field. The fact remains that such things as drinking, smoking, and dancing are not the basis of the problem upon which our church must act. Yet, every day, we find that the effort of many individuals in our church is not being directed amine the function of the church today and decide whether or not this function is right or wrong.

Our trouble lies in the fact that our church functions, services, and basic conceptions are fundamentally emotional and not intellectual. I do not mean to infer here that the foundations of the church are not intellectual, but I do contend that what is preached, what is sung, what is taught in our church schools, what our people think, what they say, and what their ideas are on matters of religion are emotional and not founded in intellectual thought and conclusions. We are not using our religion as a mighty tool for the reconstitution of nations; we are using it as a drug to relieve the pain of present-day social conflicts? Time and time again we listen to sermons dealing with life in the hereafter, in which the various glories are analyzed but seldom during the whole of these sermons is one word uttered about the forces right here on the earth that are sending men to their doom by the hour. The vast majority of our songs are sung today not for the message they bring, but because of the feeling we derive from singing music that is aesthetically beautiful. Again, in our church schools we find the same type of emotional presentation, and the real study of Zion as a mode of civil conduct is not taught as it should be. The intellectual level of many of our adult classes would not compare favorably with required courses in most high schools. I heard one lady say recently that she thought it was very possible to get too much education. The majority of our people cannot give a clear, composite picture of the and then applied to the world situation.

As long as the function of the church is kept on an emotional basis, the work of Zion will suffer. From the psychological standpoint, this business of emotion is a personal thing and varies with each person. From the emotional position, no two persons see alike, and that is why emotion is not a sound basis for the work of the church, which is by nature a science of the highest order. It would be impossible to get all men to agree on the type of woman they liked best, the type of music they would rather hear, or the type of sport they would prefer to engage in. The aforementioned things are all matters of emotion, and no two men would agree with each other on them. The church has all this time been trying to convince the world that a specific type of emotional experience is best to conform to. This is the same thing as attempting to tell each and everyone of us what type of person we shall love, what type of dessert we would like to eat, or any one of a hundred other things that are decided without the use of the intellect. Any proposed endeavor so based on emotion cannot be organized and made to function in a sane, logical manner. This is, I believe, the plight of the church as it stands today.

The building of Zion is not something that can be sung, preached, or wished into reality, for building Zion means the economic, governmental, and matrimonial reorganization of nations. We, the people of this church, can build the kingdom of God, but only if we put the whole thing on a sound intellectual basis and realize that Zion-building is a science—the science of teaching men to live together. This we shall accomplish through an example of right relationships in an actual, physical city we call Zion!

civil and social organs of Zion. Some of them think it is a state of mind, a mental image, or something one inherits when he dies. The great, alarming fact rears its ugly head that we do not agree on what Zion is or how it operates. We fail to think and only feel about these important issues. Zion is not something that needs to be cried about, rather it needs to be studied, thought through,

Halfway up Graceland's youth-worn path
I slack my pace,
For once when going up that hill
I knew God's face.

I look to Graceland from that holy spot
And feel her power
To stretch the dwarfish soul of me
Into a tower.

I look away, and see how far
She sends her light,
And know the path, uphill or down, nourishes
My feet with might.

The Fall Joint Council

The fall Joint Council of the Presidency, Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric convened in the Auditorium, Monday, September 22, having been preceded by preparatory sessions of the Quorum of Twelve. The brethren continued in council until Friday noon, October 3. Considerable important business was transacted, the major emphasis being in the field of missions abroad. All of the brethren were present except Brother McConley, who is at present in England following his recent arduous work in the European continental missions. The greetings of the council were sent to Brother McConley.

Elder F. E. Butterworth, who recently returned from the Society Islands Mission, was available for consultation, and some important agreements were reached, looking toward the future of our work in that important field.

An extended report from Elders Edwards, DeLapp, and McConley conveyed their recommendations growing out of their recent work in Europe. Mission homes and regional headquarters have been established in Manchester and Nuneaton, England, and in Rotterdam for Holland and Germany. We now have a better supply of tracts and other literature than we have ever before had in German, Dutch, Danish, and Norwegian, and further literature will be prepared as occasion arises.

Specific attention was given to the important part that must be played by the church school in the stable postwar development of the work in each of these missions.

As might be expected, the brethren were all interested in the relief ministry being extended to the Saints in Europe, and there is good reason to believe that the help being given by the church can be made much more effective without greatly increased cost by reason of the observation and checks made by the commission while on the ground in Europe. The area of greatest need continues to be Germany, and the field of greatest need is food. Oils, fats, sugar, canned milk, rice, soap, flour, cocoa, and chocolate are all very much in demand. Clothing is also greatly needed, especially in view of the approach of winter, but here, again, contact with the Saints in Europe has taught an important lesson. Indiscriminate sending of clothing in bulk does not solve the clothing problem of our people. Clothing should be sent to specific persons in accordance with their specific needs. Those desiring to participate should work in close contact with the Presiding Bishopric.

Numerous problems await solution before the work will go forward with the vigor which we all desire, but an excellent beginning has been made, and there is every reason to expect that the work in Europe will grow rapidly as the fundamental demands of these missions are met by the church. Certainly the Saints in Europe are to be most highly commended for their faithfulness during long years of danger and distress in every field.

Some further appointments were made, and these will be announced in due course.

Elder John Smolny, who has served as minister in charge of the German Mission, was honorably released and will be succeeded by Elder Eugene Theys, who is expected to be in Germany in about a month.

For several years Elder Carroll L. Olson, has been caring for the legal work in the office of the Presiding Bishopric, and it was felt that it was not fair to Brother Olson to ask him to continue longer to carry the heavy burden of this important work in addition to his work as statistician. Brother Olson was therefore released as Church Statistician. Correspondence should be addressed to The Statistician, as heretofore, and the appointment of Brother Olson's successor will be announced later.

The spirit of the Council was cooperative and forward-looking, and the brethren of the Presidency were happy in the growing sense of solidarity in the work entrusted to all.

While much of the attention of the Council was given to missions abroad, it was felt once again that there is no clear line of demarkation between work in the domestic fields and that in more distant places. The church is one. All are deeply concerned in all that the church seeks to do. We are blessed in common endeavor toward divinely indicated goals. Let us move forward as brothers.

Departure for Hawaii

Arrangements have been perfected for Brethren John F. Garver, of the First Presidency, Charles R. Hield, of the Quorum of Twelve, and Walter N. Johnson, of the Presiding Bishopric, to sail for Honolulu on the Steamship "Matzonia," leaving San Francisco on the 16th and Los Angeles on the 17th of the month. After a period spent in work in the Islands, President Garver and Bishop Johnson will proceed by air to Australia.

It is love in old age, no longer blind, that is true love. For love's highest intensity doesn't necessarily mean its highest quality. Glamour and jealousy are gone; and the ardent caress, no longer needed, is valueless compared to the reassuring touch of a trembling hand. Passers-by commonly see little beauty in the embrace of young lovers on a park bench, but the understanding smile of an old wife to her husband is one of the loveliest things in the world.

"Some an Hundredfold"

College Day, October 26

This is the time of year when we are reminded of an annual opportunity to invest in one of the finest possessions we have, the young people of the church. October 26 is Graceland College Day, and in practically all of our churches, pastors will co-operate by calling attention to the needs of our young people at Graceland. And when the collection basket is passed, each of us can remember a son or daughter, if not our own, then of a relative or friend, who is there now, or will be there in the near future. Thinking of an individual in giving will make it easier to do what we know we should.

Investments

In the Parable of the Sower (Matthew 13: 3-8) Jesus gave his disciples a lesson on investments. Everyone there could verify the truth of the statement that the success or failure of the harvest depended to a great degree upon the kind of ground on which the seed was sown—in other words, on the character of the investment. Seed thrown away upon rocks would be lost. That planted in deep, fertile soil, well watered, would yield, "some an hundredfold."

But Jesus was speaking of spiritual harvest as well as the harvest of grain.

Think of your investments. If you pile up wealth, the government taxes it away from you, providing some swindler does not reach you first and get it by appeals to your avarice. Invest in land, and someone, either yourself or others, will probably cultivate it so unwisely as to exhaust its resources or send its fertility washing down the streams into the sea. Build a fine house, and in a few years it deteriorates or looks quaint and ridiculous to your children.

Build a business, and someone's laziness and incompetence will let it go to ruin when you are gone. Estates are a burden of expense. Bonds decline in value. Money is debased. The whole world is engaged in a plot to take away from you by fair means or foul whatever you manage to gather of material goods or wealth. All such investments are ephemeral. None of them endures. All are treasures laid up on earth, "where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal."

But invest in youth! Here is the only investment that has a real future. It is one that will mold the character of society and the world through an improved quality of citizenship. An investment in intelligence and character is one that cannot be pillaged or destroyed by the forces that attack all other kinds of investments.

Recently I saw a young couple, married not long ago, church members and graduates of Graceland. As they talked together in the group, splendid, clean in body and mind, they were beautiful to see. They were more beautiful to us because we know what they are. Those young people and many others like them owe what they are to Graceland; and back of Graceland to the church, and to the many people who have given on other College Days.

Investments? "What do I get out of these investments?" asks a selfish man.

We get out of it, sir, the great satisfaction of contributing a little of our money to the enduring good of the world. We are happy to have had a share in producing something beautiful and wonderful—a pair of young people who are working together to build a Christian home, and who will give to the world children who will establish other Christian homes. We have the same happiness that comes to one who composes beautiful music, writes a great book, erects a noble church, or saves the souls of men. It is something creative. It is a work we share with God. That is what we get out of it.

Buildings Needed

A college serves its students with buildings as well as with its staff and organization. Some services cannot be performed at all without adequate buildings.

We have heard from European areas devastated by war how adversely moral and social conditions are affected by lack of buildings to provide privacy and protection for individuals. Only an adequate building program can restore conditions to the desired normal. We realize the importance of buildings.

Every time a new building is added on the Graceland campus, we vastly increase the power of the college to serve the young people, and through them to serve the church.

A student center building is badly needed for committee meetings, for special assignments, for a place of rest for those who need it, for medical examinations, minor treatments, and for light hospitalization, since the community has no such facilities except what can be provided in a doctor's office. Student care and welfare, student social life, require it.

College Day offerings in 1946 were very substantial—$25,000. This was a great help. An additional $35,000 is needed for the student center building.

Economic conditions are not as flush as they were last year. But if we remember what our gifts will do for our young people, there is no question about our giving all that we can.

High Priest Fred O. Davies, his wife, Ada, and daughter, Velma, arrived in Independence on the evening of October 7. Brother Davies, who has been in charge of the European Mission, will work in Independence and the stakes.

A College President Speaks to His Faculty

FOR SOME of you the events of the next few days will be a drama often repeated, for others there await new experiences, but regardless of how long a person has been teaching at Graceland College surely there must come about this time of year, along with the forebodings and misgivings, a quickening spirit of expectancy, and a sense of entering into work of significance.

WHAT DOES THE YEAR PROMISE?

This year shouldn't be a great deal different from last year. The student body will be approximately the same size. We have a little more equipment and help, and in time will have more space. One noticeable difference will be the larger number of men than women. The Student Selection Committee has accepted about 280 women and 360 men. The committee also reports that it has been possible, with the enlargement of our facilities, to accept nearly every applicant giving evidence of capacity to enjoy successful college experiences.

A question which comes to mind is: what of next year? We are finding that with a student body of 600 our instructional cost is showing a per capita decrease. It would be well for us to study the optimum size of the student enrollment of the future. Further reference will be made to this need.

THE FUTURE OF THE SMALL PRIVATE COLLEGE

Many of you have had stimulating summer experiences. Perhaps you investigated as a part of your work the status of the private college, particularly of the four year Liberal Arts College. There are those associated with the faculty of the

Here, in his opening address to the faculty of Graceland College, President Edmund J. Gleazer, Jr., outlines a philosophy of education for the college. His own subtitle: "Graceland vs. Assembly-line Education."

Graduate School of Education at which I studied who warn that the small private college is on its way out. They claim that financially it cannot survive nor can it compete successfully with the kind of teachlems of society which by their very nature become the problems of the school are demanding that educational institutions give their reason for being. It seems appropriate at this opening session of Graceland faculty meetings to examine several elements which might be of interest in a consideration of Graceland's "reason for being."

A CONVICTION THAT OUR WORK IS SIGNIFICANT

A common force which has brought us all to this place, persons certainly of diverse make-up, is the conviction that our work can count for something. This is surely the first element which calls for our recognition. One of the blessings of the work in which we are engaged is the opportunity of seeing the seed which is sown begin to grow. I

- - - an open door

With this article, the Saint's Herald introduces its readers to a new department. Periodically, articles will appear in the pages of the Herald written by members of the faculty, and in some instances by students, of Graceland College.

For some, the articles will be a continuation of days in the classroom at Graceland, as old familiar voices speak. For others, the series will function as a part of their own program of education in the tradition of the instruction to "seek learning by study, and also by faith."

For Graceland students, the West Door of the Administration building is the passageway to a fuller, richer life, made possible through a Graceland education. It is the hope of the Herald that to all who seek learning, this series will mean a doorway to that kind of a life—a doorway to the classrooms of Graceland. An open door.

ing done at the larger state supported schools.

After some experience with graduate assistants, I am not ready to agree that the small private college cannot compete successfully with the teaching done in universities, but there is no doubt that the next several years will be a time of testing for institutions of higher education. The probfound that a frustrating and disturbing element of pastoral work in a large city is that results are not often seen in such a way as to reward effort. Last year, perhaps because it was my first with you in this capacity, will remain as an outstanding memory as I think of the fine men

The author of the accompanying article, Edmund J. Gleazer, Jr., is beginning his second year as President of Graceland College.

He is no newcomer to the title, "president." He bore it first as president of the Junior Safety Council in the sixth grade. That was at the old Columbian school which stood on the grounds where the Auditorium is located today. Then he was president of the Athenian Literary Society at William Chrisman High School in Independence, and president of the young people's group at the Stone Church during the same period. From then on it was one presidential chore after another—president of his graduating class at Graceland, president of the Zion's League of the Southern California District, president of the Philadelphia Branch of the church, president of Lamoni Stake, and president of the Graceland College Alumni Association.

It turns out that he has had other titles, however. He was "Firetender" of his social club at Graceland.

Nor is he a newcomer to educational circles. Graduating from Graceland in 1936, he went on to the University of California at Los Angeles where he received his bachelor's degree in 1938, then to the University of Pennsylvania and Temple University for graduate work. He received his Master of education degree from Temple in 1943. Then in 1945 he was at it again, doing graduate work in rural sociology at Cornell University. More recently he has returned to his presidential duties after a summer of graduate work at Harvard University. At Harvard he is a candidate for the degree of Doctor of Education in the field of social science.

His first full-time appointment for the church was in 1938 when he became pastor of the Philadelphia Branch. He served there as pastor for five years. In 1943 he was ordained a High Priest by President Frederick M. Smith and became president of Lamoni Stake in September, which office he held until his appointment to the Presidency of Graceland on June 1, 1946.

He married Charlene Allen in 1940. They have three children, Allen, 6; Sandra Jo, 4; and John Laurie, born July 18 of this year.

He brings to his job a devotion to the church and a conviction of the need for education among its members.

A portion of his church-related education philosophy is summed up in the accompanying article.

and women who left Graceland after we were able to feel sincerely that, by the help of God, we had contributed something to lives which promised achievement. Who knows where the chain reaction of your impact upon their minds and emotions may end?

I have found that it is impossible to be insensible to what we call "world conditions." We must be alert to the world revolution in which our lives have their setting, but to be concerned in the larger area of world movements produces anxiety and despair unless there can be released in productive service our best desires for an improved society.

Even though we work in a very small circle, a microcosm, we can experience the resurgent thrill of getting in a stroke which counts. Does life offer any more satisfying experiences, any richer honors, or greater rewards than this sense of doing something which is not for this day alone, which is not merely a job, an assembly-line chore, but the making of "able, earnest, great-hearted men." This conception of our vocation is at odds with the shallow concern of some educational institutions which are centered and bounded in intellectual affairs. It recognizes the symphonic character of human life and insists that there must come a synthesis of science and our spiritual tradition. We cannot simply preach the gospel of adapting youth to the changing needs of society. To serve as leaders and guides in the exploration of the world's knowledge is our responsibility to society, but we recognize another dimension. It was Coleridge who rightly said that "common sense is intolerable which is not based on metaphysics." Only the mediocre person is satisfied with a mass of incoherent and isolated knowledge; the educated person wants knowledge not for quantitative reasons, but in order to understand himself, his society, his role he plays in it, and his relation to the universe.

Is the work significant? We may as well ask if the garden needs rain and sunshine.

A CLEAR PICTURE OF THE JOB TO BE DONE

The builder expresses the ideas of the architect as they are revealed in the blueprints for the job. Our work of construction demands nothing less in preparation. Institutionally we must keep clearly before us a picture of the job to be done. And that picture requires a continual changing of focus. Through the years there has come a developing agreement of the distinctive genius of Graceland College, but in the educational world, as well as in the biological, survival demands adjustment, or adaptation, and fitness. And something else is required; adjustment implies for many of us a conformance to the nature of things. Surely there is more to our cause than this. Is it too much to expect that Graceland College, being sensitive to the persistent needs of its youth, will be somewhat prophetic in curricula and direction of development?

Will we best serve the youth of the church by organizing ourselves toward a four-year liberal arts pattern? There is a feeling upon the part of many educators that all youth should not be encouraged to complete four years of college but can find their needs met in two years of general education. Where do we find our best place? The equation of personnel, resources, kind of students equals what? Such a determination of the job to be done is basic to a picture of faculty personnel requirements, plant alterations and additions, and curricula planning. The unfortunate truth is that no one else is going to solve this problem for us. Some studies have been made, but this year and the next one must give us a clearer picture of the work to be done by Graceland College. The Board of Trustees and responsible officers of the general church will be allied with us in study, but the initiative and major responsibility will be ours.

We may be sure that the increasing competition in the field of higher education, and the consequent struggle for survival by the smaller colleges is going to necessitate growing proficiency of staff members and the providing of equipment and resources to match the needs.

This past summer Graceland teachers were busy. In addition to travel, personal study, and participation in church activities, fourteen faculty members were in attendance at thirteen universities, from Harvard to the University of California. Five of our number were awarded Master's degrees. But academic fitness is just a part of it, although a very important part. To lead, the leader must have some sense of direction. He must, if we are to give heed to one of our distinctive principles, be able to inspire participation and provide opportunities for participation. He must be an adult, an individual of maturity, one not unacquainted with reality. Provincialism and narrow dogmatism will mark us as unfit. A smaller world demands greater men (and women) as teachers. Can we work together this year so that each of us arrives at a satisfactory picture of his relationship to the total scene?

RESPONSIBILITY

Each person appointed to our staff has given some evidence of ability and willingness to assume responsibility. There is no person who makes it his business to check on the teaching or other activities of the Graceland faculty member. We wish to preserve an atmosphere of academic freedom for this "community of scholars." It is our belief that each person who comes to Graceland is able to see the totality of the work

What Kind of a Town Is This LAMONI?

A "Between You and Me" feature in the "Lamoni Chronicle" by the editor, Kathryn C. Metz:

"What kind of a town is this Lamoni I hear so much about?" the man who sat next to us at the Iowa Press Columnist meeting at the Wakonda Club in Des Moines wanted to know.

"Oh, we're just an ordinary little village that makes it a practice to do extraordinary things," we said. (Modestly, we hope.)

"It's a town where golden weddings are more common than divorces, and couples get married while they are young, some of them just out of high school.

"It's a town where people will take care of your pets while you are on vacation . . . run in with their best silverware when you have a special guest . . . and loan you their alarm clock when you want to catch an early bus. It's a town where neighbors don't mind listening to Susie practice her music lesson on warm afternoons when the windows are all up . . . and the fellow next door will loan you his new lawn mower.

"No one ever bears sorrow alone in Lamoni. Gracious and thoughtful women are always poised and ready to lend a helping hand in time of trouble, and they come to the rescue with amazing speed. The word goes out and, without fanfare or show, women respond. Some step in and do the housework, some arrange for meals, and others give comfort in a dozen little ways.

"It's a town where oldtimers can insert as many 'begats' as you find in Genesis when figuring out the identity of this generation. It's where the jeweler, cafe operator, garage mechanic, and contractor are members of the fire department, and the fellow who operates the bowling alley preaches on Sunday.

"It's a town that comes to life every fall, after a peaceful and languid summer, when college students return to Graceland. It's a town where everyone knows the meaning of co-operation.

"What's that you say, sir? You want to move to Lamoni!"

"Sorry, sir, no empty houses, but we'll let you know soon as there is a vacancy. We like newcomers."

to be done and will readily accept his part of the whole. You will find no orders being given but every attempt made to maintain a co-operative endeavor of responsible individuals directed toward successful completion of the team objectives. We believe that Graceland can operate best for the interest of all under such a plan. You can clearly see that efficiency, achievement, and equality of load will depend upon a keen sense of individual responsibility.

CONDITIONS BRINGING ABOUT HIGH PERFORMANCE

It is your right to expect that the institution will establish the kind of conditions bringing about high performance. By "institution" we mean faculty, administration, Board of Trustees, alumni, and general church. Again there are unsolved problems, and some solutions which seem apparent retreat under closer investigation due to ramifications not at first seen. We shall continue to make every effort to provide suitable teaching quarters, adequate equipment, supplies, and financial reimbursement sufficient to relieve the mind of persistent monetary concerns. But of even greater importance we believe are the factors already referred to. High performance conditions include essentially a conviction that our work is significant, a clear picture of the work to be done, opportunity for personal growth through assumption of responsibility, and the expectation of being treated as a responsible person.

We believe, in the words of Emerson, that thus "would education conspire with the divine Providence. We shall see that a man is a little thing while he works by and for himself, but, when he gives voice to the rules of love and justice is godlike." And in the conspiring of education with God toward the welfare of young men and women can be found the purposes and objectives of Graceland College.

Policy in Our Religion

By Laurence MacDonald

"Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart."

GOD'S PROGRAM takes time. It calls for workers in every age. Men and women are wanted who see eye to eye with God in this thing and who are willing to help the world along at any cost. And since the divine intention was incarnated in Christ Jesus, and the cost of its realization is set forth in full measure in his sufferings and death, and the reward of the realization is also measured out to us in his resurrection and his session at God's right hand, the present task of believers is simply to be set on being Christians in the full and varied meaning of that name. Our chief business is to seek to get the will of God done on earth as it is in heaven. To crown Jesus king in personal life and to claim the crown for him in every life and in all the relationships of men, is the big business to which we are summoned in the injunction, "I must be about my Father's business."

By so much as the present world conditions are distant from God's program, so is the urgency of the challenge to all of us who take up the work. Our present duty is clearly revealed.

Two men working together can do the work of three men working alone, and five men can possibly do the work of eight working alone, and seventy-five men working together can do the work of one hundred or one hundred-fifty men working alone. And groups of men can do tasks that individuals working alone could never do at all. It has never been figured to an exact formula, but the truth is evident. It behooves us to work with one another, to help each other, to go aggressively forth with that which we have in our possession in the gospel, and above all, to be proud of the associates with whom we work. Give your church that spirit of the group, and you will have an organization which will produce results that will have the admiration of everyone.

In reading of the lives of some very great and successful men in this country, the general trend of one thought that they portray is very astonishing, but from a very close analysis you will find it to be true, and that is, they all say there is a very thin margin between success and failure. That is to say, all men with average advantages have the brains to succeed, and those who do not succeed are the ones that don't use what they have between the ears, thereby portraying the thought that the difference between success and failure is a matter of the exercise of the mind.

So often people in general have misunderstood this difference between success and failure and consider that it is a wide gulf, that it is a part of man's inheritance and a part of his education that furnishes the bridge to cross from failure to success, which you and I know is not true.

THE POLICIES AND ethics of religion in reality are the key to this difference between knowing how to run our Father's business and failing to know how. In other words, why don't we say this, "It is easy to do the job the right way and harder to do it the wrong way." The policies and ethics, or in other words, the rules by which this business is conducted, are the result of the vision and inspiration of the men and women who have made up the church and do now make up the church of Jesus Christ. All of the experiences have been boiled down and formulated into the present policy by which we conduct our business, and when we all join together in an understanding and knowledge of them, we will be able to conduct business with the most efficiency and with the most success.

Charles Schwab, the great steel financier once said, "If you make up your mind you will not do a thing, you will soon find you can't do it."

This all leads up to the background of the subject, and I would like to give you a few points which I believe definitely affect our ability to conduct this business of the kingdom successfully and retard us from the consummation of our goals. There are a lot of angles on this particular subject, a few which I will call to your attention.

THE FIRST is the necessity of vision. We are greatly in need of visions and visionaries, dreams and dreamers, men and women captivated and enthralled by some tremendous ideal which will not let them rest until it has brought salvation to all. The world at present has reached amazing heights in ability to invent and produce. No other age has come near us in achievement. One stands amazed at the fertility of human imagination. But the pity of it is that so often it is not used for any purpose.

Not merely does the world need vision; the church of Jesus Christ also needs to add to the vision which it now has, a vision of Christ supreme and predominant.

We need the dare-devil enthusiasm of the early Christians who were willing to risk all in one great plunge and venture for their Lord and Master, because they had received a vision, a vision of a world in need because it lacked the Christ, a vision of a world saved through Christ. And so they counted not the cost but gave even their own lives. This is the vision and spirit the church needs today, the vision of the world lost, the vision of the power of the Christ to save that lost world. And individuals, too, need vision. A man needs a purpose in life, an ideal, a vision.

A man or a church or a nation can only find those visions which will keep him strong and true in Jesus Christ. For above all he gives men a vision. He is the source of life and vision for you and for me. We must learn to cultivate the secret of his presence, learn to live so that the radiance of his glory will fall upon us and awaken the dull, dim little lives within us to catch something of the gleam and glow of his overflowing life, so that we may catch a vision of what we may yet be, so that we can catch a vision of what the world may yet be, yes, so that we may catch a vision of what the church may yet be by the grace of God and the power of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Before our Lord made his first appearance among men, the way was prepared by John the Baptist. It is not unlike our Lord to give us similar guidance concerning his return. It is part of our belief that Joseph Smith came to this generation as a modern John the Baptist to prepare the way before the coming of the Lord. The church carries forward that work by calling all men to His standard. Our work is urgent and has universal significance. The hope of our Lord's early return must spur us to active and devoted service in preparation for his coming.

Many times we have our emotions stirred and our enthusiasm kindled by experiences on the mountaintop of religious fellowship. The experience on the mountaintop is given to us for the sake of service in the valley. We must gather the full strength to be gained from such places of privilege and then come down to commonplace everyday things and serve Christ faithfully in daily duty and live near to him. This we must do if ever we expect to climb with him to the Mount of Transfiguration.

CHRISt HAS committed the gospel to our hands. It is the best inheritance which heaven can give. We are heirs along with our brothers and sisters. We ourselves when we become members are entitled to our share of this inheritance, but we are only entitled to retain it if we see that those in the outside darkness receive that which belongs to them. We are indebted to all people in the full amount of the gospel inheritance. Unless we give them the gospel, we fail to give them a square deal as well as fail in loyalty to our Lord and Master. Christ in fact demands that a man live for his brother man.

A condition of righteousness implies co-ordination of all phases of life, including economic, spiritual, and social. The achievement of this may necessitate the development of new rules and regulations of life, or they may be achieved through the evolutionary processes resulting from attempts made to attain certain goals. This takes imagination, this takes creative thinking and organization.

"Of one heart and one mind" cannot be achieved without interchange of thought.

There must be developed more fully upon the part of Latter Day Saints an appreciation of the ideals and policy of the church. The ethics of our religion carry us beyond the acceptance of the fundamental principles of the church. In too many cases, these fundamentals have been accepted, but their real significance and meaning has been only partially understood. We have not sufficiently delved into the real meaning of these fundamentals and their relationship to everyday living and to our continuous spiritual growth.

THERE ARE TWO strong schools of thought in the church respecting the accomplishment of its purpose, and these have no little effect both upon the work of the church to reach the world and with respect to spiritual growth of individuals. One of these has taken the position that there is very little man can do to improve the world situation other than to develop a high type of personal life, and that the establishment of the kingdom is entirely dependent upon God. These contend that the accomplishment of our twofold purpose is entirely dependent upon an endowment of power from heaven quite different from our present experience. With this group, I have no common ground. The other school of thought has taken the position that men have definite responsibilities to assume and that working together as stewards, individually and in groups, there may be brought to pass under divine guidance a new way of life, or a new way of community living which would result in the establishment of the kingdom, and that the responsibility is a mutual one resting both upon God and the church, composed of individuals. With this group I heartily agree.

We too often have our eyes fixed upon the promises and have given too little consideration to the stipulations and the conditions under which such promises are to be fulfilled.

RUFUS JONES has pointed out that man lived for thousands of years before he discovered that electrical energy fills all space and touches our lives at every point. It is as close as the air we breathe. But it is revealed only when matter is so organized as to let it come through and operate. What a discovery that was! Likewise a man makes a great discovery when he learns that the deeper forces of the universe are spiritual, and that he can so organize his life as to let them come through and work in him. The responsibility rests upon all of us according to the gifts and callings of each of us. There are scores of ways which we have not yet discovered.

Zion can only become a reality when the philosophy of Jesus Christ is found in the lives and hearts of men who would build the kingdom. Besides making a living, I must produce a man in whom the Spirit of Christ is found. Besides developing a life that reveals the Christ character, I must contribute something for the social weal; I must advance the interest of the group, I must help others to help themselves and in turn become helpers. They, too, must contribute something for the good of the group. It is not enough to make a living; I must help others to live. Socially, economically, ethically, intellectually, and spiritually I must be a source of strength to the group.

As a church we shall always be what we make ourselves. God has designed the plan of salvation; he has called us to our tasks, and he stands ready to assist us in our effort, but he does not lead us faster than we are ready to go.

Let me now give you a text, which is a spiritual manifesto. This text is found in the first chapter of the letter to the Romans and it is the 14th to the 16th verses.

There are three phrases here which seem to express Paul's spiritual manifesto. These are: "I am debtor," "I am ready," and "I am not ashamed."

"I am debtor," indicates obligation.

"I am ready," states preparation.

"I am not ashamed," expresses devotion.

These three also outline our social, personal, and divine relations and obligations. Let us note more particularly these utterances with which the great apostle challenges the church today.

1. "I am debtor." Paul declared himself debtor not because the church at Rome had done him a service, not that they had been favorable to him personally, not that he had borrowed money or goods from them, but because he had that which they did not have, that which they needed, and that which he could provide. Therefore, he declared his indebtedness. Of course, he felt that he was debtor to God, to Christ, and to the Cross; but he also realized his indebtedness to the Greek and the Jews, to the wise and the unwise, to the rich and the poor, to the learned and the ignorant, to all people in all nations. He felt and confessed his obligation to pay a debt by providing the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

The church today must redeclare its responsibility; must face anew its obligation to the unreached, the unchurched, and the unsaved millions which are our charge. When the church today calls for her members to give their money and means, for their bodies and souls, it is not calling for charity, but for the payment of a solemn obligation and debt.

God has given the gospel for mankind. The gospel which we have is owed as a debt. A debt whose magnitude is immense. It is the gospel of good news, and we owe it universal diffusion. It is a debt the justice of which is indisputable. The gospel is given in trust. It has universal provisions for universal man. "Necessity is laid upon me." The conditions of the world make it most imperatively urgent that we discharge this debt. Urgency from the whole unevangelized world, by all of the ignorance, superstition, bigotry, and misery that is here. Payment of the debt is long in arrears. It has been accumulating. It will be on our hands as a judgment if not discharged.

2. "I am ready." Paul declares his personal preparation to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ. It is a wonderful thing to be ready to do a work and how fine to know within yourself that you are equipped to serve. The world stands aside for the man who through preparation of mind, heart, and hand is able to fill his place in the community; who is able to see a need and answer the call; who possesses skill and judgment for effectiveness and efficiency. Paul was that man. Can it be said of the church today that it is ready; that it is trained, that it has put on the whole armor of God?

Margaret Tarrent's painting, "Behold, I Send You Forth," is a picture of Jesus standing in the midst of a group of children. Perhaps for the first time in the history of religious art, most of the children are not facing Jesus, looking up into his face. The assumption is that they have already done that. Now their backs are toward him. His arms are outstretched, waving from him, urging them to go forth and help him build the kingdom.

Personal preparation does not require that we wait until old in age. While the church was not yet one year old the time came when it was in a position to launch its first organized definitely selected mission. In October, 1830, Oliver Cowdery, Peter Whitmer, Jr., Ziba Peterson, and Parley P. Pratt were appointed on a mission west to the Indians. The ages of these men were, Parley P. Pratt, 23; Peter Whitmer, Jr., 21; Oliver Cowdery, 24; Ziba Peterson, age not known. The church had been organized and its affairs administered by young men and women all of them under the age of 26. A young mother, Carrie A. Thomas, wrote one of our favorite hymns, "In the Light." David Smith wrote our hymn, "Let Us Shake Off the Coals From Our Garments," when he was nineteen. Albert McCullough, wrote our hymn, "Consecration," when in his teens. Apostle F. Henry Edwards, now a member of the First Presidency, was ordained an Apostle at the age of 25, George G. Lewis at 30, Arthur A. Oakman at 33, C. George Mesley at 37. Garland A. Tickemyer became pastor of our most important pulpit, the Stone Church, at 25. Be assured, today, young people are being called to active responsible service, and they meet the call with the words of the apostle of old, "I am ready."

3. "I am not ashamed of the gospel." Paul here expressed his devotion to his Heavenly Father. Sometimes I wonder if we understand today the power of the gospel, the satisfaction of its message and the comfort of its presence; that it is just as fresh and full of power to save today as when it was first sealed by the sacrificial blood of the cross. Can it be possible that we are ashamed—ashamed of God who conceived the church and sustains it; ashamed of Christ who died for our redemption and constantly intercedes for our victory; ashamed of the gospel that lifts up the fallen, makes the crooked places straight, encourages the downcast, that restores the soul? In this hour of open doors and broad highways of opportunity, shall we be ashamed of the God who still leads the church as he led Moses; who still does great things through great men and women as he did in the lives of Peter and Paul and others?

Paul was a very great missionary, perhaps the greatest the world has known. His slogan was, "We are laborers together. . . . I have planted, Apollos has watered, but it is God who giveth the increase." There is a very interesting story about Paul that illustrates this thesis. It has to do with a young man named Tertius:

Paul himself seems to have been somewhat awkward with the pen; he could not afford to hire a professional scribe, however; so he inquired whether there was a good writer among the converts there in Corinth. Someone told him about a certain man named Tertius, and Paul sent for him. Would Tertius be kind enough to come to the house of Gaius, sometime this week and write a letter from Paul's dictation? Tertius answered that he would be glad indeed to do so. . . . Arriving at the house of Gaius, Tertius takes his seat at a table to write for Paul. Paul in his enthusiastic manner walks back and forth across the room, perhaps he is seated at times for a few moments. As he rapidly dictates the sentences, Tertius writes them down as best he can. It is quite possible that he takes them down in shorthand, using cheap papyrus for that purpose. A very good system of shorthand had been invented and was widely used. . . . Perhaps a visitor came in and talked with Paul a little while. Possibly Gaius and other friends came into the room. Tertius, as he sits there waiting, thinks, "I know some of the people to whom Paul is writing; I used to know Priscilla and Aquila, when they made tents here in Corinth. I believe I will put in a friendly word to them." So he writes, "I, Tertius, who am writing this letter, salute you in the Lord." And as the visitor goes out of the room Paul continues, "Gaius, my host, salutes you," and after a few closing words the letter is finished. . . .

God set the example for the human race when he worked six days before he allowed himself a rest.

It is not very much that we know about the scribe who wrote the very first copy of one of Paul's letters, but what is known about him is intensely interesting. This Tertius was not a man of genius. He was not an intellectual giant like Paul. Yet he could do something well that Paul could not do—he could write a clear, legible hand, and Paul needed his help. Were it not for this man, Paul might not have been able to write his letter. But Tertius performed the needed service; and he did it not for sake of money or fame, but because he loved the Master. "I, Tertius, . . . salute you in the Lord." These last three words show that he was a Christian and that he was proud of his membership in the church. Moreover he was quick to take the opportunity to extend his Christian influence. "I salute you in the Lord. I'm with you." Tertius seems to say, "Don't forget, I'm on your side, too!"

And so the great Paul and the humble Tertius were workers together in a great missionary enterprise. Reflect in what way your gifts and callings qualify you to help today in the missionary work to which we are called. Do you pay tithing? Do you invite friends to come to church? Is your home available for cottage meetings? Do you lend church literature to prospective members? Do you live a life that commends our work to nonmembers? Do you work in the church school? Do you attend classwork and invite nonmembers to attend with you? Do you help in the music department? What other ways occur to you to help?

Today the church dares not be inarticulate, we must make a highway through the desert; we must build altars in the wilderness. We must know that no work is temporary which touches the immortal soul. The most permanent work the church can do is to bring souls to Christ. Loyalty, devotion, love, and sacrifice are demanded. We must give our all. We can do no more, we would do no less.

The New Theology

It is reported that a certain playwright in Los Angeles said to a friend of his who had dabbled in many kinds of religion, and who was going to Europe: "Now that you are crossing to Europe, you may pick up some new religious creed." And then he added, facetiously: "Be careful coming back—it's hard to get things through 'customs,' you know!"

"Oh, that's all right," his friend replied, "these new creeds never have any duties attached to them."

Many a truth is told in jest. It is perhaps because these various "isms" of our day do not call upon their devotees to live holily, and certainly do not provide the way and the power to do it, that they are popular. Such "faith" is very cheap. It condones sin and furnishes an anaesthetic—new theology and religious works. —The Pilgrim.

Children Are Missionaries

TWO CHILDREN were recently baptized in Phoenix, Arizona—a boy of twelve with a silver-clear singing voice, and a fifteen-year-old girl with a friendly smile. Both these gifts will be put to work in the distinctive missionary work of the branch. Both were baptized out of families of nonmembers. They were brought to church in the first place by member friends.

Being somewhat isolated from missionary service, the branch has concentrated on keeping a live program for the enrolled members, with the result that they do their own missionarying.

Since acquiring a residence property adjacent to the church, there has been opportunity for much youth activity. A weekly scout troupe meet here (two nonmembers). Friday nights are given over to "Family Night," when horseshoes, volleyball, kindergarten games, films, singing, visiting, are planned, so there is suitable recreation for all ages, members and nonmembers alike. Responsibility for refreshments on these nights rotates among five departments, and a "Grub Stake" can be passed to help with expenses.

SUNDAY IS the really busy day. During classwork and preaching in the church building, the Annex, as it is called, has separate classes in each of four rooms. And at 11:00, Junior church, in charge of Juniors (from 12 down) patterned after the adult service, and so arranged that each child will have his turn taking part, if only a short scripture reading or the passing of hymnals.

All afternoon the Annex is open. Department heads and committees meet there. Young people come to read or practice on the piano. A few bring lunches and spend the day. Children can play croquet or checkers, or take their naps on the davenport. One or more members of the priesthood can be found studying in the office.

At 5:30 there is choir practice, and handcraft classes for the juniors; from 6:30 till 8:00, two adult classes and three juniors. During evening preaching, the children have a story hour or hymn sing.

If the names of the leaders in all these activities were to be printed, it would include almost the entire membership. For anyone with any gift, and the humility to offer it selflessly, can find a place to use it in this growing branch.

PHOENIX BRANCH makes no concessions to the tastes of the world. Young nonmembers come into the Zion's League discussions and express amazement to find young people practicing high standards they didn't believe possible. Young people want that and come back. Little children are given opportunity to sing a song, make a little prayer of their own, enter into a rhythm exercise with the others. They love it and come back. They ask good questions and get answers they'll remember years from now. For their leaders spend hours in preparation for their work.

And the children bring in new members — their parents, their friends. People all ages sense the need of worth-while work, and here there is plenty, for they have to grow, largely, by their own efforts.

Miracles

By C. S. Lewis, New York, Macmillan, 1947, 220 pages, price $2.50.

C. S. Lewis is the author of a now famous book, The Screwtape Letters. He has also written a number of other original and excellent works. Professor Lewis is noted as a man who believes in spiritual realities and who takes the side of religion in its struggle against the mistakes of a dominating science. This book begins with the idea held by many scientists that a miracle is something that cannot occur. Mr. Lewis takes the argument up at this point and goes on to discuss the possibility, the credibility, and the probability of miracles. As it is a philosophical work, some readers will find it a little too heavy to enjoy, but those who have some background of knowledge will find it a good work.

It So Happened

By Muriel Lester, New York, Harper, 1947, 240 pages, price $2.00.

The author of this book will be readily identified as one of the world's great social workers and humanitarians. In recent months she visited the United States as a part of a world tour she has been making for a prominent peace organization. She is the English equivalent of our late American Jane Addams. Her work began in the founding of Kingsley Hall in London's East End. This book is written about her experiences just before and during the recent war. Miss Lester has a charming style, a ready sense of humor, and a love and understanding of people that makes all of her writing appreciated even when she is obliged to write of tragic events.

They Learn to Worship

In the Church School

By Wana Black McDole

THE CHURCH SCHOOL should lead children to worship, and create within them an active faith and hope in the future. Dr. William Lyon Phelps said, "My parents neglected my social training. I am sorry they did. They were careless about my clothes and my personal appearances. I am sorry for it. But I am supremely grateful for their religious and spiritual training. Every day of my life, I am grateful. I would rather belong to the church than to belong to any organization or club. I would rather be a church member than receive any honor or decoration in the world."

Children in their great wonderment at a world so large and fascinating ask many questions, "Who is God? Where is he? Who made everything? What does it mean to die? Why did God make night? Where is heaven?" As adults, we must find answers to each of these questions, and the only satisfying answers must come out of our own experiences. We, ourselves, must face the facts of life. What do we believe about the origin of life? How sound are our own philosophies? What do we really believe about death and a hereafter? That which begins as an experiment in "What we believe" becomes an experience. We begin to live in the lives of our children as they expand and develop their faith in the Great Creator, and we grow, too.

A MAN once wrote to Carlyle and asked if he should teach his children to pray. The severe old Scotsman answered, "Yes, but only if you pray yourself. Don't teach them anything in which you yourself do not believe." Teaching children to say prayers when parents never say them is like teaching a puppy a trick to amuse and satisfy adults. To send them to church school when parents stay away leads them to regard church-going, praying, and religion as one of the burdens of childhood which may be escaped as soon as they attain independence.

The teachers in church school realize the importance of creating a bond of confidence between the pupil and themselves. Frank discussions of daily problems, spiritual experiences of the teacher, and an evaluation of life, all help the child to shape a philosophy of life by which he may live.

In the quiet of a church classroom, a child asks a question and the teacher searches his experience and answers. Heads are bowed together in a prayer of thankfulness, and the spirit of worship is born within the heart of the child.

Small hands are clasped together in a kindergarten class as children bow their heads over glasses of fruit juice, and the feeling of reverence and a gratitude for the bounties of life are born within the child.

A young people's class engages in earnest discussion with its teacher. How shall I meet the feeling of indifference toward church activities that I feel among my school friends? Minds are perplexed, and out of the wealth of understanding and a great love of the Creator, the teacher causes to grow within her class the hope in a future. She helps them to see the general social trends and what their part is in the development of a "way of life."

A teacher opens a new book on world brotherhood, and the class discusses the factors that go to make up that feeling of brotherhood and race tolerance. "Come unto me, all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest," Jesus said.

These things our church school tries to accomplish through the devotion of its teachers.

BRUCE BARTON once said, "If I had but one thing to give my child—it would be an enthusiasm for life." There is born a new reverence—a new thrill of living when we look into the face of a child, as we show him the new green shoots that have grown up out of a brown bean seed, and explain to him that the living part of the seed is akin to the life within the body of each of us. God becomes a wonderful being when that kind of faith is born. Life with all its problems, its perplexities, and its mysteries, is a wonderful experience. God in his supreme wisdom realized that a soul does not expand and grow until it has had a chance to make its own choices, to discover things for itself, to be taught by others of experience. When that experience together with faith comes to an individual, no matter what his age, it gives him the strength to bear the misfortunes life may bring.

Then it is, that as men and women we may stand, having had that firm foundation built for us, and say, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

It is that feeling of kinship with God that will be in the hearts of men as they step forward with shining eyes and creative minds to take up the active tasks of building Zion—a place, and a condition.

On Christ's Terms Only By Margaret Gibson

THE BROTHERHOOD of man can never be a reality until mankind accepts the fatherhood of God as the basic truth, and the message and program of Christ as the only means of attaining this social ideal. Nothing less can be effective. Conversely, the moment these basic truths become universally accepted and begin to be put into practice, that moment will the brotherhood of man begin to be experienced.

Neither can the kingdom of God be realized by mankind through simply doing unto others as we would that they should do unto us. When Jesus spoke these words, he was speaking to people who believed in God as a loving, all-powerful Father, and who had, to a large extent, accepted the message, which he had been preaching. Men believing these principles could indeed establish the brotherhood of man by doing to others as they would be done unto.

Judging as Christians, we cannot help realizing that we would certainly be nearer brotherhood by treating others as we would like to be treated. Such a course would recognize our brother man as our brother, which is certainly the first step. It would require justice, generosity, and love, without which the kingdom of God can never come.

But let us remember that only a very small part of the world is even nominally Christian. Two thirds of the population of the earth worship—if they worship at all—not a God of love, justice, and good will, but gods or ideas of fear, cruelty, and vengeance—gods who must be placated and appeased by gifts, flattery, and a degrading, obsequious subservience.

If just the statement or ideal, "Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you" is all that is needed, if put into practice, then the people of India, the people of China, of Russia, of darkest Africa all have an equal right to say, "Splendid, we, too, long for the brotherhood of man. Let's do unto others the way we of India, of China, of Russia, of darkest Africa, have been accustomed to be done by!"

Would it work? Never!

THE PEOPLE of India are not even united themselves upon what they believe, but let us take the Hindus as a type. Would the things which they believe in all sincerity to be right, solve world problems? The devout Hindu believes in marrying young and often, and in raising a very large family. He will not kill meat animals, and the land can hardly raise sufficient grain to support the population. India is seldom without terrible famine, although a third of all the cattle on the earth dwell in India. Caste systems doom unborn millions to poverty, ignorance, filth. Until a few years ago, wives were often burned alive upon the funeral pyres of their husbands. Granting freely all the splendid and beautiful things that India believes, the harmful things—and they are many—have kept India far, far from brotherhood and equality. Brotherhood, or treating others as Hinduism treats its own people, would mean slavery, starvation, ignorance, human sacrifice, for the world.

China, an old and wonderful nation, is starving, too. Would her antiquated methods of labor, her belief in the utter subservience of women, her acceptance of polygamy, if accepted as world ideals, bring comfort and peace to mankind? Naturally not. Let us admit that the Chinese are thrifty, gentle, and peace-loving, and that they seem to receive far more courteous obedience from their children than we do here in the United States. The fact remains that China is hungry, disease-ridden, disunited, and desperate.

NO NATION is more sincere in its belief in world brotherhood, nor more nearly immutably committed to the concept of its mission to bring brotherhood to the world than is Russia. But Russia, as a nation, accepts, and seems to be at least willing to live under a system which brutally kills all of her own people who oppose her government. The individual is a cog in a machine, not a person. Even today the simple noon meal of the average American would be a banquet to the average Russian. The best things that Russia seems to possess have not been developed by Russians, but imported or copied from Christian nations.

We are not, in our pleading, let us state most plainly, desirous of achieving a brotherhood of man built on the present ideals of the United States. Brotherhood isn't simply a matter of accepting the ideals of any nation. What progress and what approach toward the kingdom of God that the United States has made, (and it has made some progress in that direction) have not been because the people of the United States are more brilliant or intelligent than other peoples, but because some few of them have caught a little clearer vision of the mission and purpose of Christ, and have put some of this vision and purpose into practice. As they did so, the world caught glimpses of the kingdom. Since the United States as a nation seems now to be turning from the hope of the kingdom built by love, the world falls back in horror and sees the shadow of the atom bomb darkening the earth—and cast by the hand of that very nation, which on its clearest days, pointed to the spires of the Holy City!

OUR HOPE—and it burns more brightly than ever, if people will not close their eyes because of the smoke of battle which billows around it—is still in the ancient promise. Indeed the rapid destruction of all false ideologies and the nations which put their trust in them, is one of the strongest proofs that God is right, and always has been. Even as we gaze upon it, everything else crumbles to dust.

What are the terms of Christ upon which world brotherhood can and will be built?

The first great truth perhaps was taught in the Lord's Prayer—in the words, "Our Father." Whose Father? Everyone's, of course. Just thinking of him as someone else's too, enlarges our love for humanity. One cannot truly pray the words, "Our Father," without a sense of taking into his presence the gathering multitude of the poor, the sick, and the leprous, and feeling the gnarled hands of his brothers brushing his own, as they, too, are lifted in prayer to Him.

If we have a common Father, we are common brothers, and we cannot eat when our brothers are hungry, be easy when they are sick or lacking, rejoice when they are sad.

Since all men are our brothers, then so is Jesus our brother. With even our limited concepts we know that he has loved us far better than we have ever loved him. We would far rather be loved as he loves us, than as we love him or our other brothers.

Jesus is pleased with even a little of our love, if it is sincere, but how he must long for more of it. "Love the Lord, thy God with all thy heart, might, mind, and strength," he asks—and this not for himself.

IT IS ONLY by loving God sincerely, that we can begin to understand how to love our neighbor wisely. It is a basic truth that we become like what or whom we love—and it is most natural that when one truly loves God, he acquires something of his characteristics.

This commandment, to love God completely, was the first and greatest commandment. It had to be first. Only then could the second great commandment be realized. As we love God completely, we love our-

The "God and Country" Program Builds a Leader

A pastor's testimonial tells of the experience and growth of one of his Boy Scouts under the stimulus of the "God and Country" program.

Department of Religious Education,
The Auditorium
Independence, Missouri

Dear Brethren:

This is the response to your request for a personal letter from Scout Edward Barlow's pastor telling of his progress in the "God and Country" program. I want to say first of all that I can recommend this program to any pastor as a help in the solution of his problems with the boys of his branch. When Edward was twelve, he joined the Scouts. He worked consistently at his various duties and was very soon recognized by this Scoutmaster and his fellow Scouts as a leading Scout. He served as assistant patrol leader, patrol leader, and junior assistant Scoutmaster.

At the annual camp he was voted the best all-around camper, and the runner-up was also an L. D. S. boy. Now at the age of 16, he is an Eagle Scout. He was fortunate in having a member of our church, a priesthood member, as a field executive.

When I saw the article in the Herald regarding the "God and Country" program, I called Edward's attention to it, and he was at first reluctant but finally wrote in and secured the application blanks and was on his way. At that time he was slow to act in church work and seemed to rather shy away from any responsibility, but after embarking with the "God and Country" program, he was willing and eager to find something to do. As each succeeding award required additional hours of church work, he found it necessary to look and ask for assignments that would enable him to perform the necessary work entitling him to each succeeding award.

The final result was that he became very much interested in Zion's League work and worked so energetically at the task that he built up a local Zion's League with a membership of 45 whereas we only had an average attendance of 35 or 40 at church school. And last, but by no means least, it resulted in his call to the priesthood, or at least it contributed to a large degree in so doing, because I contend that the main qualification for work in the church is the willingness to do so. The Gulf States District in conference assembled Saturday, July 12, and approved of the recommendation to ordain Edward a priest after the order of Aaron. Sunday, July 20, Apostle M. L. Draper presented the final or Sixth Award in the "God and Country" program, and pinned the medal on him that was given by the Department of Religious Education.

We give Apostle and Sister Draper, also Brother A. O. Crownover and Brother Henry Porter, the Scout executive, and the Saints of Bay Minette and Mobile Branches credit for Edward's progress as all the above-mentioned assisted and encouraged him. On the last day of the youth camp at Brewton, Edward was ordained by District President W. J. Breshears and Brother A. O. Crownover. One week from that day he preached his first sermon. He is now young people's leader of the Brewton Branch.

We give thanks to God for the progress of our son and hope he may be of much service to the church and to his Creator.

Your brother,

selves wisely and not indulgently. We want no more than is ours, we want nothing more than we need, we love man as Jesus did.

The love of Jesus required everything he had that ordinary people value—his home, his wealth, his prestige, his life—for us. It never called him to sacrifice the greater things—his love, his intelligence, his honor, his promises.

A realization of the price paid for the least of us, establishes the immeasurable dignity of the human soul. As brothers of Jesus, we are "joint heirs" of the kingdom of God. It is the ultimate aim of the Father that every man be a prince of the heavenly kingdom. To him every soul is of infinite worth, bought at a most infinite cost. Each must have his free agency, and must have every opportunity to develop into his full birthright. Each has an equal claim upon the love, compassion, and direction of the Father.

No other system, plan, or ideology has ever had the same beliefs or purposes—nor will any other. The brotherhood of man, when it comes, and it will come, will be built by people who have chosen; of their own desire and love, to obey God and to be as nearly like Jesus Christ as they possibly can be. They will love one another wisely, tenderly, and rightly, for in their experiences with him, they will have learned to understand what he meant when he said, "Love one another, even as I have loved you."

A CREED FOR LIVING

Let me be the Self the Potter dreamed I'd be;
Let me have the faith my Tears demand of me;
Let me grow a Love the World expects of me;
Let me find a Cause that pulls the best from me;
This I make my Creed, and let it plant the seeds
For a life God needs to save a world that bleeds.

—Bishop S. E. Garth.

Fruits of the Spirit — — — By Vassie Sheets

GOD works in various ways to bring about his purpose. Those to whom the fullness of the gospel has come, and who have the promise of the divine unction in the gift of the Holy Ghost and a divinely authorized priesthood—to this Church of Jesus Christ is committed the task of demonstrating to the religious world the beauty and power of righteous living, the light of divine truth, the unction of priesthood divinely called and endowed with the power of God, and the kingdom established as a regenerate society in which each accepts his life as a stewardship.

We are stewards over time and talents, over work and wealth, our health and our habits, our membership, and all things that relate to life, and these things are the sum total of our trust or stewardship. As stewards we must all answer sometime before our Senior Partner.

Jesus said: "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." In order to have the more abundant life, we must do something about it. Mere wishful thinking will not accomplish the task.

A number of years ago, I listened to a sermon that impressed me very much, and while I have forgotten much that was said, the Scripture reading still lingers with me.

"And besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity. For if these things be in you and ABOUND, they make you that ye shall neither be barren or unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord, Jesus Christ. But he that lacketh these things is blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten he was purged from his old sins."

As I thought of these things, the influence of the Spirit bore testimony to me that they must be in our lives, if we wish to please God.

Paul tells us that "Faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." It is also a trust in God.

"Virtue is power for good in persons." This power was fully demonstrated in the life of Jesus Christ.

"Wisdom is the ability to judge soundly and deal sagaciously with facts as they relate to life and conduct."

"Knowledge is a clear perspective of facts which give us light and understanding."

"Temperance is the habitual moderation in the regulation of the appetites and passions."

Over-indulgence in anything is sinful, for we pay the penalty for the lack of self-control, whether it be drinking, eating, or sleeping.

God has told us to "cease to sleep longer than is needful; retire early, that ye may not be weary, arise early, that your bodies and your mind may be invigorated."

"Patience denotes calm endurance, or self-possession." It brings forth the fruits of the spirit; and in patience, we possess our soul.

"Godliness is righteousness, or manifesting God in the flesh." Brotherly kindness is gracious acts to others.

Moroni tells us in the Book of Mormon that "Charity is the pure love of Christ, and it endureth forever, and whoso is found possessed of it at the last day, it shall be well with them."

To ABOUND means: "To be copiously supplied; or in other words our lives should be overflowing with the fruits of the Spirit."

Talking about gifts on a silver platter, here are a couple that you supervisors of junior and junior high departments will welcome. This year in STEPPING STONES there are being presented two Christmas dramas written by our church authors. In November 2 and 9 issues there is a five scene drama of Biblical setting, by May Wilde, "No Room in the Inn." In the November 16 issue is a Christmas drama with a modern setting in three acts, "Kidnapping? No, Catnapping," by Verda E. Bryant. Both of these plays would be excellent for a branch church service.

Don't miss receiving your bundle of STEPPING STONES in November. You'll want to use one of these plays in your branch this year.

Seven Rules for Spiritual Growth and Development

A Motto for Framing

In the spring of 1946, Mrs. John Darling, the editor of "Women's Work in Zion," asked the late President Frederick M. Smith to write an article for it. The paper was to be given to the Conference women visitors as a souvenir. The splendid message that he prepared was his last official word to the women of the church.

At a fall meeting of the Stone Church women's department, Mrs. Grace Krahl, a devoted church worker of many years, suggested that the General Department of Women preserve this message in some suitable way. This suggestion was put in the form of a motion and carried unanimously. Paul N. Craig was asked to illustrate it and made a very fine etching of President Smith, and the Herald Publishing House has printed it in the church colors of purple and gold on parchmentlike paper.

The mottos were placed on sale at the last General Conference for twenty-five cents. There are but 350 left. It has been decided to apply the money derived from their sale on the "President Frederick Madison Smith Library Memorial Fund." When all are sold, there should be about one hundred dollars for this purpose.

For prompt delivery, address your order to the General Department of Women, in care of the Auditorium, Independence, Missouri. Enclose 25c for each motto.

Food for Thought

A tree grows in circles. A cell here multiplies and gives a shove to the next cell. That one then needs room and reaches into the living-quarters of the one next to it. The shoving of neighbors goes on and on—in circles—until there is a tall tree standing in the sun, reaching out in every direction where there is light and air and water. You're only one unit in civilization. "Don't resent a shove!"

Children usually respect parents worthy of respect.

The word "prayer" is found on almost every legal document, and at every court trial. The accused "prays" that the court do thus and so

By the time you make a "prayer" in court, there are many conditions you are expected to meet. Your "prayer" merely opens up negotiations whereby you hope to get what you want from the judge, and plan to sign on the dotted line, committing yourself to any conditions he may impose.

You are willing to pay any damages your carelessness has occasioned, just to be forgiven. You "pray" that you may be permitted to do business, according to certain strict rules—you paying the taxes—you delivering the goods.

The prayers in legal files are all either for forgiveness in wrongdoing, or promises to do something worth-while; according to rule.

It's a good way to pray!

Heard in communion service: "Latter Day Saints have no need for psychiatry. Here, at this table, we have free access to the Master Psychologist, who understands us because he made us, and can set us right as no lesser mind-reader can!"

Bossing Number One

I used to look around me
And find much comfort, too,
In all the things, both large and small
That others failed to do.

I saw their faults and follies
And many other things.
I thought I'd earned my halo
And proudly wore my wings.

In answer to a prayer one day
I heard this painful truth,
"My child, you needn't worry
For anyone but Ruth!"

And when I face the judgment bar
And all my faults are known,
What others did or failed to do
My life cannot atone.

I hope I've learned a lesson
In common charity.
I find I'm busy most the time
Just checking up on me!

God's Plan for Peace

By O. J. Tary

THIS EARTH was created with all the essentials necessary to provide a happy and peaceful abode for mankind. Man was given dominion over everything on or in the earth, the air and the sea. It was the greatest assignment of trust and responsibility ever conferred on man. Failure was inevitable without divine guidance. From the beginning, God graciously made known his will, and therein was the divine guidance, which, if followed guaranteed to man the maximum benefits for human effort.

Thus man was given the greatest possible opportunity to achieve success in the quest for peace and plenty. God might have imposed mandatory conditions from which there could be no deviation, but he would not do anything to deprive the human family of free agency. The right of everyone to make his own choice is fundamental in the divine plan for human happiness and eternal salvation.

FAILURE TO FOLLOW GOD'S WAY ALWAYS DISASTROUS

Among the many examples recorded in the Bible are the unwillingness of the people to heed the warning of Noah's preaching and the rejection of God's counsel by the Israelites, climaxed by Judah's rejection of the promised Messiah when he came to them. It would appear reasonable to assume that the records of the past furnish a safe guide for the people of this age to avoid bringing upon themselves similar penalties for disregarding the way and will of the Lord. But, what are the facts? The modern expansion of scientific research has brought results that have astounded the people, while God, the embodiment of all wisdom, is generally given little or no consideration. Man's ways are glorified by the people, and God's way ignored or disregarded.

Human hopes ran high in anticipation of the world peace which was expected to follow the end of the greatest world war. Two years have passed since the warring nations formally accepted terms to end hostilities, yet world peace is but little better than a mirage or cherished dream. A pernicious disease is spreading among nations as well as individuals, sapping them of moral and spiritual fiber. Until this disease can be checked or cured there is no assurance of permanent peace.

The remedy will not be found in the realm of scientific research nor laboratory experiment. It can be found only when a sufficient number of people give up their own ways and adjust their lives to God's way.

GOD'S WAYS CANNOT BE RECONCILED TO MAN'S WAYS

Speaking to the people through the Prophet Isaiah, the Lord said, "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways."—Isaiah 55:8. Self-exaltation is opposed to the divine plan, and the words of Jesus, "He that exalteth himself shall be abased" had a tragic fulfillment for Hitler, Mussolini, and Hirohito. They were the leading characters that thrust war upon the nations, most of which had given no cause for such action. Justice lay on the side of the nations that were forced to defend themselves, yet the experiences of this ordeal had a baneful effect on many who participated in it. Human nature being what it is, it was to be expected that the horrors of war would generate bitterness and a vengeful attitude which called for extreme measures against the conquered enemies. Not only was this an obstacle in the way of peace, but nations were similarly affected, as is the case of France and some other nations which desire to get even with Germany for the atrocities committed against them.

Some excellent movements have been inaugurated by the people who wish to prevent future wars, and high hopes were entertained that the adoption of the United Nations Charter would solve the perplexing problem. By this time we should have concrete evidence of the successful working of that instrument, but instead we see efforts being made to sabotage the high ideology of the United Nations. The cause of this is obvious—the unholy ambition and dictatorial desire of one nation to dominate others, instead of allowing them their just right to govern themselves. God's way is to allow the greatest degree of liberty to all who are subject to just laws enacted for their benefit, and any encroachment on that right by nation or dictator is purely man's ways and cannot meet divine approval.

ONE WAY THAT NEVER SUCCEEDS

Man's way is to rule by force. God never forces people to obey him. He gives them an understanding of how their own interests will be served by keeping his law, and then leaves them to make their own choice. God's way is to rule by love, reason, and justice. Unfortunately, in this modern time, we see manifest on a world-wide scale a desire to force people to submit to terms dictated by human desire or ambition. In God's plan, there is no room for one nation to crush and hold in subjection another nation or people. Millions are longing and praying for a peace that should be theirs, but

www.LatterDayTruth.org

The Parable of the False Pocket

By Robert Emmett Madden

they are deprived because of selfishness, greed, and the unholy desire of some of their fellow men to rule by force.

The will to dictate terms to others and force their acceptance, regardless of justice or reason, is very much in the limelight in our economic and political activities in the United States.

Such is not God's way, and it cannot bring a peace upon which the prosperity and the happiness of our nation depend. The failure of industrial and labor leaders to adjust their differences has greatly retarded the work of peace. No attempt is here made to affix the responsibility or to favor either side; the purpose is to point out that man's ways have been followed and are incapable of producing a peaceful solution.

God's way cannot function without law—law that is impartial, protecting the rights of all who live within it, and penalizing transgressors who violate the rights of others.

Laws should be enacted with but one purpose—that of giving just and equitable government to the entire population.

The crying need of the world today is for nations and individuals to turn from the faulty and inadequate ways of man and put into operation the law of love. "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

At the present time, there is little room to anticipate reaching such a high objective, but, as was presented to ancient Israel, the opportunity is here to choose between God's ways or man's ways. The former has always succeeded when tried; and the latter has always failed.

Grateful for Prayers

To the many who wrote and remembered our request for prayers on behalf of our son, John, we are glad to report that he is able to attend school this term; the doctor says that in a short while he will be able to walk without crutches. We are thankful for blessings he received through his long illness and are deeply grateful to all who prayed for him.

ELMER AND RUBY KALER.

1614 Hedges Avenue
Independence, Missouri

On a Sabbath morning, I sat in the Lord's House, watching the gathering of his people. Some came in quietly, and some came otherwise. Albeit, they were all glad to see each other, for the moment they forgot that it was the Lord's House.

Through the service, I could see the actions of the congregation of the righteous. Many were alert and attentive. Some were tired and worn, and nodded from time to time. Some wrote little notes to convey a message without disturbing the service. Young lads stole furtive glances at the lasses, and lasses in turn looked demurely at the lads.

And then there was the mother with the child upon her lap. Here was truly a study in love and patience. For the child was full of life and energy, while the mother with an ear turned to listen to the Lord's servant, strove to meet the child's every move with a quieting counter action. Carefully, she replaced the hymnbook after it had been dropped, and then attention was centered upon her pocketbook. And many an article was produced therefrom—even as the magician with his proverbial hat. Soon these possibilities were exhausted.

Presently, the child looked upon the mother's blouse, and his eyes rested on the buttoned flap—as it were, the flap over a pocket. Ah! there was a new field of interest and more things to find. The child worked long and diligently to unbutton the flap, for the button fit very tight. At last it was open—but alas!—it was only a flap and not a pocket at all! What a disappointment!

I pondered this experience of the child and thought how like life it was. For so many times we work and work at something which looks promising, and when it is accomplished, we find only an empty pocket, or no pocket at all.

By this time the Lord's servant had come to the conclusion of his message for the hour, and was saying, "Take heed what ye do" and "Deal courageously and the Lord shall be with the good."—II Chron. 19: 6, 11.

POINTERS

By M. J. Crowley

● THE PARALYSIS creeping over the world and threatening our civilization finds its roots deep in what used to be known as the home. Now it is just a place to go when exhaustion overtakes us—a broken institution limping badly on the road to extinction. "Ye have strayed from mine ordinances and broken mine everlasting covenants." Marriage for many is but a week-end frolic performed by a justice of the peace to satisfy an emotional urge.

● TEN BILLION DOLLARS were spent in 1946 on pleasure by a people in a land blessed above all other lands. Can this waste go unnoticed by the Lord while people in other lands are starving? It's a wonder that he does not close the windows of heaven that we may have no harvest to reap.

● THE WORLD is suffering from terror created by scientific minds delving into the unknown, and therein making discoveries capable of blasting both us and our civilization into oblivion. It's a sad commentary on our state of mind that the first use we make of our new discovery (atomic energy) is to send thousands of our fellow human beings into eternity without a moment's notice. And now men's hearts are failing them for fear.

● "WHEN YE SEE these things come to pass, lift up your heads and rejoice for your redemption draweth nigh." To rejoice under these circumstances requires a sublime faith based on the knowledge that God is, and that he will fulfill his promises. The indwelling of his holy spirit will enable us to surmount the worst the world has to offer. It's impossible for the worldly-minded to rejoice when life is turned into wreckage. Let us forget about "things," for according to the Lord, material progress must ever remain secondary to spiritual growth.

● HEAVEN is the pure in heart with or without material embellishment. Love of God is the first requisite for a perfect social order; then, as a divine sequence, a love for mankind without any exception of persons although they differ from us in race, color, and creed. Hard medicine? Granted, if we put love of man first as do the fraternal and charitable institutions of the world. But if we orient our way of thinking through meditation on Christ and him crucified, we will be able to develop love of God first, then it follows as night the day—peace on earth good will towards men.

It Could Be Zion

By ISABELLA SHAW

Some comments on the "center place" by a native daughter of Calgary.

Since coming to Independence in April to attend General Conference, I have found what I needed all my life—a true conversion to the Restored Gospel. Had anyone dared to suggest to me a year ago that I wasn't really converted, I would have responded indignantly, "Of course I am." Now I realize that it would have been the truth.

Unlike many people in out-lying branches, I had never looked to Independence as a place of complete harmony and bliss. Consequently, I was not disappointed when I didn't find a Utopia. Here it is not uncommon to find neglected homes, broken-down fences, dirty children, and slovenly adults. The average citizen is used to seeing liquor sold in drugstores, some grocery stores, and hearing profane language on the streets. The price of merchandise and groceries is as unreasonable as in every other city; as a result, some cannot afford the necessities of life and are forced to live in poverty. However, one cannot help being impressed with the natural beauty of the land. There is no question in my mind as to why this spot was chosen for the kingdom on earth. How wonderful if we would only accept the challenge and make our lives as rich and beautiful as the country.

I experienced my greatest thrill when I entered the Auditorium for the first time; I truly felt that I was standing on sacred ground and that God was very close to me. I want to always retain this hallowed feeling when I visit it. With the Saints of Independence, I now look forward to the day when this majestic altar will be completed.

One thing which troubled me upon my arrival was the spirit of dissatisfaction and frustration which prevails among so many of the young people. Before long, I found myself deeply concerned, and I sought to find the answer. The reason, I sincerely believe, is that they are not of one heart and one mind and do not have the love for each other which God has said we must develop before we can live together in a Christlike community.

I find that temptations come as forcefully in Independence as they do in Canada. God does not hear our prayers any sooner or answer them more readily here than in any other place. The important factor with him is still the attitude of humility, faith, and unselfishness.

There is a greater tendency to become a sponge and absorb what others have to offer than is found in smaller branches. On the other hand, there are more opportunities to engage in constructive activity. One can participate in the work which he most enjoys, and develop talents in nearly any field.

My first impression of the prayer services which I attended in Independence was not a happy one. Everywhere I went, the ministers in charge urged the people to be brief in their prayers and testimonies. I felt that such an attitude would dispel the Spirit, but I have come to realize that in order for everyone to have an equal opportunity, each participant must be brief and to the point. Now I consider this a challenge to overcome selfishness and develop consideration for others.

Isabella Shaw's home is in Calgary, Alberta. She, with one of her six sisters, came to Independence for General Conference. She received a six months' permit to remain in the United States and, during that time has provided the pleasant voice which answers incoming calls to the switchboard with, "Good morning, Herald Publishing House." While in Independence, she has become active in Zion's League work and has taken every opportunity to meet and know as many of the "Saints" as possible, before she returned to Canada on October 1. As is apparent in her article, she likes it in "Zion's City." As she gave the editor her manuscript, she made this statement: "Oh, I forgot to say something about the lightning bug—we don't have them in Canada, and they are one of the things that make Independence so lovely."

Certainly one of the high points in my experience has been the new conception I received of what we as a church are working toward. Zion doesn't mean a group of saintly people living in blessed seclusion from the rest of the world. It is to be a community of people with common ideals and purposes and can only become as great as the people themselves. I know now that the general church is vitally interested in the gathering and has outlined a definite plan of procedure. I see the need of preparation and prayer on the part of those who would move to Zion. Some must of necessity remain in the out-lying districts if our program of evangelization is to be successful.

My most treasured experience has been the association with friends who share common ideals. If there is any doubt in your mind as to whether you will be made to feel welcome in Independence, dispel it immediately.

Although I must soon return to Canada, the call of the "center place" will always be with me. My great hope is that someday I shall be able to make Independence my home.

"Love your enemies."

"Pray for them that despitefully use you."

"Forgive us our trespasses as [in like manner, or to the extent that] we forgive our fellow men."

Such Scriptures outline a high program of achievement that will take you a long time to acquire. This program may well begin by a careful analysis of the cause of your lack of love. Your avoidance of increased contacts with these few could be a wise second step. Such temporary neutrality could give you time to overcome present feelings that their hatred, malice, or obvious goodness aroused in you. Your prayers in this state could well be directed to the purging of hateful or indifferent attitudes within yourself, thus clearing your own decks for action. You may see in those, unloved by some, qualities that could inspire your respect and generate your affection. Seeing the persons through God's eyes, you would find extenuating reasons for their unloveliness, and moved by the spirit of pity or compassion, love them because they stand in such great need of the helpfulness of your affection. Like faith, love can grow from a grain of mustard seed.

Try a demonstration of the practicality and helpfulness of Christ's instructions. While you do, face the fact that it does not appear humanly possible to love all men as individuals. We can learn to love people for the good that is in them in spite of the evil that possesses them. Christlike affection, like the program of salvation presented by him, is an evolving process. It may take time to develop to the full in you. Don't become overconcerned or morbid about yourself or the few that have not inspired your love. Your sincere desire to love all people and your sane application of inspired instruction will ultimately bring you the satisfaction of some achievement towards loving all men.

If it does not, you have plenty of company — including me. Cheerio, and here's to universal loving to you.

The Trouble-Shooter

QUESTION:

I want very much to "love all people," but there are a few, for whom I have not been able to cultivate even a slight degree of affection. How can I overcome this weakness? Shall I pray for divine help, or shall I just avoid those who annoy me?

ANSWER: By Apostle C. G. Mesley

The problem you present is certainly complex and is age old as Cain.

Do you love Hitler? Have you been able to cultivate the slightest degree of affection for the word "Mussolini"? Has the brutal murder of your neighbor's little girl challenged your respect and tender feelings? Someone undoubtedly loved or loves each of these three reprehensible persons. That someone probably isn't you. Do you think that God expects you to develop an affection for them? Scarcely! Their awful crimes put them beyond the range of human love, save for the few who are kin to them.

In these instances the sin and the sinner are so inextricably enmeshed that the average Christian and even the majority of the extra special Christians cannot separate them. God undoubtedly hates their sin. Knowing all the circumstances of their lives, he may still love them, the sinners, and extend to them the grace of his understanding, compassion, and pity. How much of the warmth of his affection is there, we cannot say. For even the infinite love of God comes to the place where it does not save some sinners. It destroys them as the "sinners of perdition." Does the Creator, God, love that which he is compelled to destroy?

Maybe your problem is not related to the world's beastly murderers or to the "sons of perdition." It happens to be related to the few who do not inspire your affection. You can be thankful that they are few. Your antipathy may have a variety of causes. These few may be crafty and brutally malicious in their public conduct. They may be arrogant, conceited, and treat you hatefully. Some of them even may be among the so sweetly good people that their cloying sainthood annoys you. Others may be so insipid as to fail to inspire you with respect and love. Facing such situations as these, you who want to love all people ask, "What shall I do?" You have plenty of direct statements of Christ the Master to challenge you to some carefully laid long-term plan of action towards love.

"Be ye perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect."

"Overcome evil with good."

"Little children, love one another."

"He that loveth not his brother abideth in death."

LETTERS

Teach Us to Testify

One of his disciples said unto him, "Lord, teach us to pray." As the result of this petition, Jesus gave us what is known as the Lord's Prayer. It is a masterpiece in prayers, a perfect example in form. Many sermons and articles have been given with it as the theme, and consciousness of its perfection grows on one with its study and use.

Today, I think a worthy plea to the Lord through the channels of the church could be, "Lord, teach us to testify." I write specifically of the testifying done in a devotional service known as "bearing a testimony." Frequently and regularly the Saints are warned in these services, "Don't exhort," "be brief," and because the Saints are not obedient, a poor prayer service results. The cause and result are more apparent in large assemblies, as is the case in reunion devotional services.

I believe this error is because of the lack of proper teaching. So much discretion is left to the operation of the Spirit of God and too often the discernment or opinion of the minister in charge has been at variance with those testifying.

We have teachings on how to pray, in school we learn the form of a letter, a composition, a poem. We have recipes for cooking, formulas and prescriptions for medicine. But for such a vital duty as bearing a testimony no form, sample, or formula has been given, to my knowledge.

I would like to see a few views expressed in print on this subject giving instructions in performing this duty. I believe the formula is given in Doctrine and Covenants 59, instructing us to pay our devotions and our vows to the Most High. These duties are fulfilled congregationally through the hymns that are sung and the prayers that are offered for us, but individually it is only possible by "bearing a testimony." But what is the proper form, a good example?

The War on Communism

I am under the impression it would be inconsistent with the spirit of democracy and Christianity to eliminate Communism by force; since as Dorothy Thompson expressed it, "It would give rise to the necessity of eliminating other things by force that we don't like." She feels that, "We are creating another force more sinister in its purpose." One writer exclaimed, "What spiritual hydrophobia! Creating one mad dog to chase another mad dog around the corner."

There are two different ways in which the world can be protected.

First: Through education — starting from the youth and keeping it up all through life. The logical way to meet an idea is by other ideas. It is done in all the educational systems of our country. We met the fear of the theory of evolution just as we meet the fear of anything else in this way. Why not try this in the matter of Communism? What are we afraid of? Is it contrast? If what we have under democracy is unsupportable, the quicker we get rid of it the better.

Secondly: We can work on our representative form of government and make it so inviting the people will not wish for anything else. The masses do not fear Bolshevism. They are the ones that are the victims of our political and social maladjustments. If democracy does not function to their good, they will turn to some other form of political leadership. We have the acute stage of "inflation" upon us. Right now our political leadership is saying, "we cannot stop it." Since they are impotent, it is to be expected the masses will turn for relief to some other form of leadership.

If the challenge of faith is lost to us, we have no other recourse. I say we need to make democracy inviting.

These two positions are the only ones that can possibly be taken in meeting Communism: not by the war of extermination, but by education and the developing within our political system the groundwork for continued faith.

Thanks

I wish to extend thanks to all who showed concern and offered prayers in our behalf. My daughter has improved, and although the heart condition is still there, she is as well as before her illness, and able to attend school. I feel that through the prayers of all she was blessed. My own health has improved immensely.

Four of our five children have accepted the gospel. They were baptized September 6, and confirmed the 7th. To express my gratitude would be impossible. I can only pray in return for those who have been so kind in remembering us.

If I Were Blind

By LOUISE WRIGLEY

If I were blind
I would not ask to see again,
For darkness touches not the souls
Of those who grope, unseeing,
But only those who will not see!

I would not ask to know again
The brilliant summer sun,
The flaming leaves
Of autumn, splashing all the countryside
With tones of warmth.

I would not ask to see
Tall trees, still guarding as they have for centuries,
Clear lakes of restless water, cool and clean.
Nor dancing fairy frost upon the hill,
Nor snowfall on a city
When at night home lights shine out
Like jewels.

I would not ask to see
The slanting, silver rain upon the city street,
Nor small birds drinking greedily
And ruffling dusty feathers in its cooling shower.

For though the eyes see not,
The heart still knows the vision of God's earth
In its dramatic sweep
From palest dawn to sunset's fire.
The heart still knows
The dearness of a loved one's face
And memories are sharp and clear—
And kind.
When you are blind
You see no ugly thing unless you will it so!

To Higher Ground

Broad Sunlit Uplands

Phrases return to the mind from other days. I remember hearing Winston Churchill on the radio addressing the British people during the darkest days of the war. He spoke realistically of the hardship and discouragement of that awful time, and of the bitter days ahead. But as always he ended on a note of hope, looking ahead to the time, "when, once again we shall reach the broad sunlit uplands and the pleasant ways."

It was natural during the war to lift ourselves up to the high grounds of patriotic effort, selfless sacrifice, ideals, and devotion. Now we are wading through the miry lowlands of hatred, suspicion, and fear.

What would we not give to be lifted up once more to higher spiritual levels, to incentives for achievement, to hopes of better days to come!

An Old Song

A man once wrote to me that the great spiritual experience which brought him into the church was connected with one of our hymns—

*Lord, lift me up and let me stand,
By faith, on heaven's tableland.*

That hymn puts a picture into the mind, a picture that will never fade. Life is a pilgrimage, and all our dwellings are but temporary stopping places on our way back to "heaven, which is our home."

So it is that the old songs of the far country, the great sky-land, have their imperishable appeal,

Guide us, O thou great Jehovah, Saints, unto the promised land.

A Modern Challenge

The dangers and conditions of our modern times are such that we can no longer be content to leave these longings and hopes in the land of dreams. We must do something practical about them. They must be put to work in our social and economic life.

It is in times of peril that humanity often moves forward. Well, if peril is needed to make us move, we certainly have enough of it now. But there is one difference. In old times, it was our country that was in danger. Now it is our world that is in danger.

How shall we rise to meet this challenge? What must the individual do—what must the church do?

Individual Development

In the first place, the church organization can be strengthened by individual improvement. Better informed membership and leadership make a stronger branch. Better branches make a greater church.

One factor impresses us every day. The church continues to gain steadily in strength by the efforts of young members to educate themselves for professional life, and at the same time to make a better contribution to the church.

Every doctor, every dentist, every teacher, every professional person that is added to a congregation strengthens the congregation in many ways. These people are naturally qualified leaders in many lines of service not necessarily related to their daily work. They add to the prestige of the congregation, and make many friendly contacts and exchanges of service not otherwise possible. This factor alone is a strong incentive for the training of many of our young people.

Organization

With improved personnel, there is some hope for effective church organization and operation.

Nothing very great can be accomplished in the modern world without organization. Everything from international politics and government, through business and education, down to local social life is intensively organized. Only the most naïve can possibly imagine that religion can play an effective role in the world simply on the basis of individual goodness and private effort. If the world is to move to higher ground, it must be moved there by individuals who have first reached higher ground themselves and then organized in a thorough way for a co-operative effort.

Society, with all its benefits, all its deficiencies, all its qualities, is built upon organization, institutions, and associations. Certainly the ideal of a structural Zion is the only practical hope for lifting the world and its people to higher ground.

The question arises, Can such a society be established and maintained on a workable basis? Organization has accomplished many great things in the hands of devoted and trained people. Surely, with the help of God, the building of his kingdom is not an impossible task.

Missionaries

Land in England

A cablegram from Apostle McConley states that our four new missionaries to the European mission arrived safely this morning, Friday, October 16. We feel sure their many friends and the church at large will be happy to know this. This group consists of Frank and Zeta Fry, Glen and Alice Johnson, Albert and Twila Scherer, and Eugene and Alma Theys. The Frys are from Des Moines, Iowa. The others are from Independence, Missouri.

Travelog

I HAVE HAD an interesting experience: My companion and I were able to spend a few days at the Erie Beach Reunion. Arriving on Friday, August 8, domiciled at the home of Brother and Sister James V. Dent at Chatham, we assisted as best we could during the close of the meetings, speaking at 11 o'clock on Sunday. The reunion was ably conducted by Apostle Jensen and Elders Almer Sheehy and Jack Pray, presidents of the two districts. The session closed with a baptismal service, at which about a dozen were inducted into the church.

This was the first reunion held at Erie Beach after the church had acquired the entire property. Prior thereto, we owned but a small portion, though we had a very well-appointed dining hall.

After the reunion closed, through the courtesy of the Shaws of Brigden, we occupied their cottage for a few days, then left for Palmyra, New York, and proceeded by easy stages through Ottawa, Montreal, and Quebec, to Jonesport, Maine.

Here we were well treated for a few days at "Gray's Tavern," conducted by Pastor Chester Gray, his wife, and her sister. There we met Evangelist and Sister Ray Whiting. Acting on Brother Whiting's suggestion, I spoke at Kennebec, where Brother Wallis O. Foss is pastor; at Beal's Island, Ferrel Lenfesty, pastor; and at Jonesport, of which Elder Chester Gray is in charge; all of these groups are under the direction of District President Newman Wilson. It was a pleasure to meet these church members and to minister, as best I could, through the spoken word.

During our stay, Brother Whiting and I accepted an invitation to go lobster fishing with Brother Charles Lenfesty. We spent eleven hours on the water, learned something about lobster fishing, caught a few fish, and came home with sunburns and good appetites.

From there we sojourned south, and by appointment went to Stonington (Elder Benjamin Carter, pastor), where we were domiciled at the home of Captain and Sister George Billings over night, and where, on Sunday, I occupied the morning hour at the church. Captain Billings came in from his sea duties to add to the pleasure of our visit.

After a midday repast on lobster stew, lobster salad, and other Billings' culinary delicacies, we left on Sunday. We shall long remember our visit to all the Eastern Maine points and the people there who are truly the "salt of the earth," as indeed are all the Saints we visited.

From Maine, we journeyed south to Boston and spent a few days at Onset. Here we occupied the commodious cottage or lodge of Bishop M. C. Fisher. Elder Reed Holmes, district president, piloted us around Boston, Somerville, Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill, Cambridge, and other points of interest, and again around Onset and vicinity.

At Onset, I addressed the Saints, meeting among others there, Bishop and Sister E. L. Traver, and the family of Brother Sanford Fisher. Sister Fisher dined us and escorted us down the Cape to see Sister Clara Hoxie and family at East Sandwich.

After a few days there, we quickly saw points in Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Kentucky, and soon were in Kirtland, where I met, by previous appointment, Apostle Jensen and Elder William McCune for a week of strenuous activity. Leaving Sister Smith in the care of Brother and Sister T. Alma Thomas, we were driven by District President Jerome F. Wildermuth to Youngstown on Saturday morning, September 6. There we were met by Elder McCune and taken to New Castle, stopping for a visit with Elder George B. Franklin (pastor at Youngstown) and family. Brother McCune is president of the new Youngstown District and lives at New Castle. He is a retired Bell Telephone employee. Having been employed myself many years ago in the same business and for a time located at New Castle, we had some things in common to talk about besides the church.

We were well entertained at the home of Brother and Sister McCune. These people have been really desolated by armed service casualties, losing two sons within a few months, a son-in-law, and a nephew. Withal, they are bravely carrying on, and the interests of the church are close to their hearts.

Our first services on this swing around the area were at New Castle. Here Brother Jensen and I assisted in the dedication of the church—a large, well-made residence which meets the needs of that group very well. Their pastor is Elder Lamont Ryhal. Brethren McCune and Ryhal and members of the branch are not resting on past laurels, but are already planning the selection and purchase of a site, looking toward the larger shrine they know they will be needing.

On Sunday night, Brother Jensen preached one of his excellent sermons and on Monday we were on our way. Brother McCune joined us on this hegira, driving for us throughout the week, and sharing our duties and ministry as well as all our most pleasant experiences.

We went first, via Pittsburgh, to Lock Four. Comfortably housed that night at the home of Brother and Sister Henry Winship, president of the Pittsburgh District, Brother Jensen and I occupied at an evening service in charge of Brother Winship and Pastor F. F. Bradford. Among those present were a few of the group known as Bickertonites, one of them being Elder Alma B. Cadman, president of their Quorum of Twelve. We had called that day upon Elder W. H. Cadman, their president, at Monongahela City, en route from New Castle.

On Tuesday, we left for Wellsburg, Brother Winship piloting us as far as Washington, Pennsylvania. On the way we visited Amity, Pennsylvania, and saw the home (now in ruins) and the grave of Solomon Spaulding, and talked with Dr. W. L. Dodd, a prominent citizen.

At Wellsburg, West Virginia, we stayed at the home of Pastor and Sister Samuel Zonker. There we met again his father, Brother Clyde Zonker, stalwart veteran policeman, and another son, Louis. In the afternoon, Louis drove us to Bethany, where Alexander Campbell established the college of that name; after visiting the grave of that notable character, we went on to Wheeling and other points. This district is under the care of Elder R. E. Rodgers.

In the evening, we again occupied and spoke to a large congregation, including many from distant points, some coming as far as Parkersburg, West Virginia. Here we met Pastor Clyde S. Rice, his wife, and daughter, and others.

Wednesday found us en route to New Philadelphia, Ohio—being escorted by Brother McCune in his trustworthy Ford—where we found a haven at the home of Brother and Sister John Carlisle. Again, Brother Jensen and I shared the hour at the church and were privileged to renew acquaintance with the Saints there.

On Thursday, we went to Barborton and were domiciled at the home of Pastor Samuel G. Balzer and wife. We

The Church in the British Isles

By President F. Henry Edwards

The work of the church in the British Isles has been of deep concern to all the Saints ever since that day "on or about the first of June, 1837," when "Heber C. Kimball, one of the Twelve, was set apart by the Spirit of prophecy and revelation, prayer, and the laying on of hands of the First Presidency, to preside over a mission to England, to be the first foreign mission of the Church of Christ in the last days."¹ The success of that first mission is one of the classics of our history. Nowhere else in the story of the church has it been surpassed in the sacrifices involved, the blessings experienced, or the results obtained.

The initial work of the Reorganization in the British Isles was prosecuted in a like spirit of sacrifice by such men as Charles Derry, Jason W. Briggs, and Jeremiah Jeremiah, and was similarly blessed. The story of the church in England and Wales during this period is replete with evidences of divine guidance and favor. The grandchildren of several who were won in those early years still serve in the mother country or have added to the strength of the church in the land of Zion.

Nevertheless, the work of the Reorganization in the British Isles Mission has never since moved forward with the pace and sweep of the thirties and forties of the last century. This slowing up was primarily due to the impact of polygamy. Nowhere in the world has the cause been so greatly impeded by the heresies of Mormonism as in the British Isles. And, in addition, the lack of strength in the parent body in the United States has prevented the church from giving to the Saints in England the sustenance needed if the work was to be firmly planted and aggressively advanced.

The church in the British Isles has always been known as "The British Isles Mission," despite the fact that the Saints in England and Wales have been organized in branches and districts for many years. The chief reason for this "Mission" designation has been distance from headquarters and the consequent cost and difficulty of communication. A related factor in this continuing "Mission" status has been the lack of contact of the body of the Saints in the British Isles with the work in our strongest centers in the United States. These and similar reasons for regarding the work in the British Isles as a mission are fast disappearing, for modern means of transportation and communication are annihilating the barriers set up by time and distance. A month ago Brother DeLapp and I left London in mid-afternoon and had breakfast in New York the next morning. Furthermore, the contacts between the Saints in England and the Saints in the United States are much more frequent and widespread than they were a few years ago. For example, ten English Saints were present and served as delegates at the 1947 General Conference.

Yet there still remain certain important values in treating the work in the British Isles as a unit. Despite our church-wide brotherhood, Saints in the British Isles are naturally more closely related to each other than they are to the body of the church, and have many problems and opportunities in common. Moreover, these Saints can and should have warm and mutually helpful relations with the Saints in other parts of the British Empire and Commonwealth. And it is also becoming constantly more apparent that England should be the base for our work in continental Europe.

CONDITIONS IN APRIL 1947

It has been our tradition for a member of the Quorum of Twelve to have charge of the European field. The Conference of 1947 therefore found Apostle M. A. McConley presiding in England, where he and his wife are located at our present headquarters at 170 Gravelly Hill, Birmingham. With Brother McConley were associated Bishop A. T. Trapp and Evangelist John W. Worth and Elders Davies and Rowe of the missionary force; Elders John Coggan and Samuel Hope, the presidents of the two districts; and an impressive group of High Priests and elders, and members of the Aaronic priesthood.

An important means of contact among the Saints in the British Isles, and among the British Saints and their friends throughout the church, was and is the Mission Courier, an informative, sixteen page monthly, published under the general direction of Brother McConley. The subscription price is 5 s. 0 d. ($1.00), and subscriptions from the United States are solicited. International money orders should be made payable to Brother McConley at Birmingham, England.

For many years the church has had representative branches in such major centers as London, Manchester, and Birmingham, with smaller but well-established groups at Gloucester, Nuneaton, Sutton-in-Ashfield, Clay Cross, Warrington, Wigan, Farnworth, Llanelly, and elsewhere.

The effects of the war, of course, are everywhere apparent. England is in the midst of a struggle for survival which undoubtedly will continue for many years. She must restrict her imports and at the same time increase her production of goods for export, or she will continue to have an unfavorable balance of trade. As a result, the standard of living in England is low as compared with that in the United States; and the people are subjected to many restrictions in such matters as food and clothing, public services and travel and contacts abroad. Almost without exception the people are desperately tired from the strain of six years of war and two years of social and industrial readjustment. Yet their morale is surprisingly high, and those who know and love England are confident that although the next few years will bring many hardships they will also see the emergence of a strong and democratic nation.

The effects of the war are felt at every point in the life of the church. For example, a visitor is immediately impressed by the small number of men in their late teens, twenties, and early thirties in the ranks of the priesthood. This is not because these young men have been uninterested, but because they have been unavailable. Many have been away at war, and many others have been working to the limit of their powers in war activities. Another point where our lack is notably apparent is in the church schools of the mission. In the ordinary course of events most of the officers and teachers of the church schools are drawn from the groups on whom the burden of war fell most heavily. Moreover, older persons who might otherwise have taken the burden were themselves involved in the total war effort. As a result, our church school work in most of the branches needs to be almost entirely rebuilt.

The housing situation in England is as serious as in any country visited by Bishop DeLapp and me, with the sole exception of Germany. Only one of our churches was damaged by enemy action, but building programs which should have been pushed ten years ago have been almost abandoned because of the difficulty of securing supplies, labor, and permits. This is no one's fault. Indeed, much credit is due to those who continue to serve in high faith and hope while making such improvements as they can. But lack of a suitable church home does constitute a major handicap in many of our English branches.

All of these limitations and difficulties are recognized by the key ministers of the mission and, indeed, by many of the Saints. They know, too, that it will take time to rebuild in leadership, membership, organization, and equipment. But they are facing their tasks with typical confidence and courage. Their deep and sincere and sacrificial devotion is not surpassed anywhere in our fraternity. And their hope is based on rich and sustained experience with God through the church.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

At the 1947 General Conference, Elders Frank Fry and Glen Johnson were appointed to the British Mission. They and their families have already sailed to take up these assignments. We are very happy that property recently purchased at Manchester and Nuneaton will be available for their use on arrival, although their labors will extend beyond these centers.

These additions to the appointee forces in the British Isles are off-set by recent transfers of appointees to the United States. Elder Thomas E. Worth came to the United States with his wife and son in April, 1948, and since that time has made an excellent contribution in Independence, Kansas City, Chicago, and elsewhere, while becoming acquainted with the work of the church in these centers. It is expected that Brother Worth will return to England soon after the Conference of 1948.

Elder Fred O. Davies has also been transferred to the United States, and he and his wife and daughter have just completed their trip. Brother Davies has served the church under appointment in the British Mission for about seventeen years, during which time he has ministered with distinction as a missionary, a district president, and acting mission president. We confidently expect that he will make a very helpful contribution while he is extending his experience in the United States.

LOOKING FORWARD

The principles of successful administration in the British Isles are not essentially different from those which must be followed elsewhere. Local needs may require some specific emphases, but parallel situations anywhere else in the church will require similar emphases.

The keynote of our work in England should be missionary. Our most basic and most insistent need is for more truly converted members. For many years we must be concerned with simple and forthright declaration of the principles; and to this end all our branches should be built as missionary centers, all our departmental work should be given missionary emphasis, and all our churches should be located with a view to their missionary effectiveness.

While we have a few adequate and representative church buildings, such as Beresford Road, Manchester, special attention must be given to our churches. In the location and erection or purchase of these churches, the minister in charge, the district presidents, and bishop will naturally be called on to give leadership growing out of the over-all picture and dovetailing with the demands of the local situations. But the task and privilege of securing attractive, representative, and well-located church homes falls in some degree on every member of the church in the British Isles. It is fortunate that the reserves already set aside by the general church will permit loans from the general funds up to the amounts in hand in the various local building funds.

Priesthood institutes, local priesthood study groups, and other means of developing and sharing experience

What Will the Harvest Be?

WILL OUR ATTEMPT TO BUILD A "NEW JERUSALEM" PROVE THE OUTSTANDING SOCIAL SUCCESS WE DREAM OF, OR WILL IT BE FAILURE No. 263 ON THE LIST OF COMMUNITY LIFE EXPERIMENTS? THE FOLLOWING ARTICLE IS RECOMMENDED FOR EVERY ZION-MINDED LATTER DAY SAINT.

THE FOLLOWERS of the teachings of Joseph Smith have not been the only people who have tried to establish a "New Jerusalem," a better social and economic order that would be a "light unto the world," or to build communities as did the early Christians when they had all things in common and sold their possessions and parted to all men as they had need. We are not alone today in our gathering program for a more unified community in church life. Religionists and sociologists have long believed that the community is the basis for service—for the church to serve her people, and the people to serve the church. Numerous social and religious surveys have indicated the handicap of widely scattered membership trying to serve the church or to be served by the church. The nucleated membership in communities has proved an advantage to the church's ministry. Too often, isolated members, families, and small groups have been lost to the church.

The outgrowth of these findings has caused the churches to become concerned—especially so about the rural membership where the population is more sparse. A bargain in a farm away from the influence of the church has too often proved to be a costly experience. From the light of these findings, and the outstanding demonstrations of the German and Scandinavian settlements here in the United States which have so often been church centered (note them as you travel the highways), the Presbyterian, United Brethren, and the Reformed Churches have begun to encourage their membership to purchase in communities where their churches are located. Some of these have gone even farther and helped to select the farm by appraising, soil testing, and financing. It is hoped, too, that these communities shall be more stable and of sufficient membership to support the church, and that this being so, the economic and social life of the people shall be greatly improved.

We cannot help being amazed at the teachings of our own people concerning the Zion program, for it consists of a combination of the good things found in the many co-operative community attempts ("a New Jerusalem," "a new way of life to save men from their madness," "a light unto the world," "a community as the early Christians at Pentecost") plus a Zion to which Jesus Christ shall come at his second coming.

WE MIGHT more seriously and prudently attempt to build such an ideological society if we but knew that out of 262 attempts in the United States alone (to build only a fraction of what we expect Zion to be) thirty-two lasted only one year, fifty only two years, fifty-nine less than five years, ninety-one less than ten years, and only a few one hundred years. They usually died when the leader died or resigned. Those lasting the longest period of time have been religiously motivated but have become so highly institutionalized and so conservative that they certainly are not the type to be a "light" in a modern world. Take a look at your Mennonite friends. Would you care to dress as they do? Would you enjoy living on a farm without a tractor, a car, a telephone, or a radio? Would you be satisfied to attend church in a home, and attend weddings or funerals in a barn?

Let us observe government attempts to build communities to bring about better social and economic conditions for the people. The Federal Security Administration has made numerous attempts—two in Missouri, two in California, and the North Ontario and Quebec settlements in Canada. All have been directed by men who spent most of their lives in the study of community building in this country, in Denmark (where the most successful co-operatives exist), Australia, and New Zealand. They studied the techniques of sociology, psychology, and religion, and were considered expert social engineers—the best the government could secure.

The Farm Security Administration, forced to select from the “disadvantaged” (a term used by the government, in this case, to save embarrassment and a feeling of inferiority, but meaning those of the lower economic groups) had one strike against it from the start. Now let us look at these requirements published under the title, “An Analysis of Methods and Criteria Used in Selecting Families for Colonization Projects,” by John B. Holt in Social Research Report Number One:

1. Technical knowledge, gained chiefly through experience, of the type of agriculture to be practiced in the new farm settlement. Lacking this, the settler needs additional training, intelligence, desire to learn, and perhaps more capital when it is necessary to “tide over” some lean, learning years.
2. A rudimentary education and as much additional education as is in harmony with a favorable attitude toward farm life.
3. Co-operative and harmonious family life—a co-operative wife, and children, who want to live on and help with a farm, and who have experienced agricultural life.
4. A size and age-sex composition of the family that is adjusted to the size and type of farm. The probable future growth or decrease in the size of the family and its needs must be considered as well.
5. The general good health and stamina of the family members necessary for the particular type of farm life—the absence of hereditary disease or hereditary susceptibility to disqualifying disease.
6. Character, stability, and a sense of responsibility.
7. Intelligence, alertness, resourcefulness, and judgment.

8. A favorable attitude toward farm life and the particular opportunity to settle—a wish to farm and a willingness to sacrifice comforts and other values when necessary.

9. Community co-operative ability, where common enterprise is a benefit.

10. Religiosity or loyalty to an idealistic group, if it tends to sanctify the above agricultural virtues, and if the membership in the religious or other group tends to bind the individual to the group with which his interests are identified, rather than to separate him from it.

11. Capital, or other means, for such expenditures as are required to develop the farm to the point of profitable cultivation; also, capital for a sufficient “deposit” investment to guarantee seriousness of purpose and the sacrifices necessary to surmount difficulties.

These requirements suggested are for something far inferior to what we expect Zion to be. If applied to our “regions round about” as a giant sieve, how many of us would be left? If applied to the whole church, how many would we have eligible for such an undertaking? Then, if we should further add the law of tithes and make item ten a requirement instead of a mere suggestion as is done here, how many of us would measure up?

IN CALIFORNIA, the Durham and Delhi communities were planned by the state to prevent exploitation, to colonize with a select class of settlers, and to demonstrate the effectiveness and desirability of state controlled and planned settlements with trained expert advice to direct the developments. Durham, a 6,240 acre project, cost approximately $80 per acre, with three-fourths of the soil rating excellent to good. This sold in tracts from two to one hundred acres. Delhi, an 8,400 acre tract, cost approximately $96 per acre, and the soil was rated good to fair. After the state had helped to develop and settle the land, it had a loss of $250 per acre from Delhi, and a $69 loss per acre from Durham. In addition to this loss, the Delhi farms cost the farmer $229 per acre and those of the Durham cost $3,600 to $15,000 a unit. In the year 1944, these communities were about average with other communities in farm sales. Each had a good community house, park, and recreation center, otherwise they might be classed as average.

As we view these projects with their excellent leadership, time, money, and prospects for success, can we blame Latter Day Saints for asking the questions: Can we do it with our leaders, who are so busy at other tasks they cannot concentrate upon this development? Can we do it with our very limited amount of finance? Can it be done with so many of our people disunited and uneducated as to the real meaning of the word Zion? Can it be done with so many of our people who cannot get along peaceably within their families, much less with their neighbors, groups, or branches? Yet they want to move into Zion (the location) where “they can get along with people.” They decide to move and do so, disregarding the law set forth for the gathering; over this, the church has no control. The other groups at least had this advantage.

PERHAPS SOME light will be thrown on the subject if we turn our attention toward Jerusalem, a place where Christ is also to visit at the time of his second coming. It should be the scene of preparation if we are nearing the second coming of Christ as so many think, and justly so according to what we believe to be the “signs of the times.”

When we speak of a Jew, many of us automatically think of a merchant; but when we consider him connected with Zion, he will be more than just a tradesman. He cannot make a living in a society that is to some degree self-sufficient, by just

trading with someone else; someone must produce, and that production must be agricultural in nature—at least largely so. It is difficult to imagine Jews as farmers, but right here in the United States they have been doing some experimenting in agricultural co-operative communities. They have made some twenty attempts of which, so far, one lasted only nine years, seven lasted from two to five years, and eight lasted one year. From this record, we would conclude that they are no different from any other. Persecution in foreign countries has become such that they have developed an intense desire to settle their home land. (More than six million Jews lost their lives during the reign of Hitler.) Some of them wanted to wait until they were led as was Moses, “a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night.” The movement to re-settle Palestine began in 1855, but met with little or no success because of individual attempts. The first co-operative community was not started until 1908, and this was pressed into action by economic depression and oppression. In 1940, there were seventy-six of these colonies consisting of 20,000 members. In twenty-four years, between 1922 and 1946, the membership increased to 350,000. This is the only pure communistic group in the world (Russia is not communistic). Many adjustments would be necessary before we could class it as Zionist.

This “unfruitful field,” a former barren desert which for thousands of years has neither given nor received, has been changed by modern methods of watering, crop rotation, and mechanized farming into a very fertile and productive region. The Jewish National Fund has poured more than $500,000,000 dollars into this investment, which appears to be a solution without force, for the personal enjoyment, nourishment, and pleasure of her people. It is being colonized without profit to the individual. It has many unsolved problems, the major one being that of opening again the gates of her harbors to the immigration of her people who are willing to give their lives for a site on the promised land.

The success of this movement can largely be attributed to outside oppression wherever else Jews try to settle. One student, H. F. Infield, who was sent to America to study the reasons for the successes and failures of different co-operative communities that he might be of use in helping to develop the homeland, has attributed the success of Palestine to: (1) vital ideological motive, (2) a realization of a historic mission, (3) satisfaction of a spiritual character, (4) a devotion to the cause of humanity.

WHICH OF THESE do Latter Day Saints lack? Do we not have the vital ideological motive? Do we not sense our historic mission? Do we not look forward to building a Zion that shall bring security of a spiritual character? Do we not have the devotion to a cause for humanity? If we have all of these, perhaps we need, or must look forward to days of oppression unless we exert more effort and do something about it. Do we need oppression that will sift out of Zion the “will nots” and stimulate the “wills”? Can we not now see a “world all ready for harvest”? Do we not send out missionaries to preach the gospel to all the world for a witness in such a great harvest? If such a harvest is made, where shall we store the grain? We have no Zion for this harvest, no place for the righteous to flee.

Zion is of a practical nature; it is of appeal to those who desire a better social and economic order. It is easy for us to assume that through study of social and political science we can easily work out such a system. Perhaps some of us are like the Jews in wanting “a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night” that is, we expect something spectacular, something like a great crisis, an atomic war, or great civil strife to cause the elect to build Zion in a short period of time. Jesus compared this kingdom to a seed, something that takes time to grow; something that requires a place for the seed to be planted; a climate and soil of the right nature, proper preparation of seedbed, proper seeding and selection, proper methods of cultivation, but, most important, sufficient rain and sunshine from above. To enter this kingdom, we must be converted and become humble as little children, holding no malice, or prejudice, having an open mind, faith, and repentance. Zion is a process of learning through education, hard knocks, and inspiration. It must not be again polluted (Doctrine and Covenants 98: 3). Further more, He likened the kingdom to a man who sowed good wheat and, while he slept, an enemy came and sowed tares—the land operator allowed this to grow until the time of harvest.

THE ZIONIC attempts that we make will be heaped on the pile as a 263rd failure if we are not sure of our footing. Let us be willing to admit that men, much better trained for the task than we, have failed, therefore, in our clumsy attempts, we must rely on God. This leadership from God, absent at least at times in all other attempts, can come only through its designated course—through the leadership of the church. If we can prepare and be ready as that light shall continue to come, then the task is not too great, nor the gloom of past failures too dark. If we endeavor to do it as small groups or on our own, we can be a discouraging factor to add to this long list of failures. We would not infer that we should not now be training and endeavoring to qualify ourselves, learning to co-operate in righteousness and kingdomward growing. Yet, it is suicide to attempt to build Zion without knowing what it means. If our ultimate goal is the kingdom of God, then we need to learn what there is to know about the kingdom. May God help us to seek first to build the kingdom of God and his righteousness—to give ourselves to the great cause of Zion.

Why Not Serve Him?

By Warren H. Chelline

ONE OF OUR favorite campfire songs is "Jacob's Ladder," a portion of which presents this pair of direct questions:

*Sinner, do you love my Jesus?
If you love him, why not serve him?*

And when we sing those words in the highly inspiring devotional atmosphere of our campfire, the idea of love without service seems absurdly untenable. Tin Pan Alley says the same thing this way,

*There is no love without devotion,
Ask anyone who knows!*¹ proving that the fact must be palpable even outside the cloistered churches and sequestered reunion grounds. But what really caused me to try crystallizing some of my thoughts on this subject was an Easter card which came to me bearing this penned note:

They do not love, who do not show their love.

How difficult it would be for us to try teaching our little ones about the love of God if we did not have some specific examples of the manifestation of that love! How empty and ungodly is the whole picture of creation, life, and worship, when the testimonies of God's love are omitted. Consider a few of our divinely presented gifts and the great love they not only reflect but require of us.

He gave his Only Begotten. It is nearly 2,000 years since the Heavenly Father carefully sent this Christmas present to us with a card reading, "With all my love." One small caravan of Wise Men and a few shepherds were on hand to acknowledge the gift. Through the ensuing thirty-odd years, the Son managed to build up a following among his relatives, some neighbor peasants, a few fishermen, artisans, and even a sprinkling of professional men. Then, seemingly on the verge of success, Christ Jesus found the tide of influence turned against him and went to his death on the ignominious cross. Did the Heavenly Father give us this great gift, his Son, merely so we could crucify him and thus find magical salvation in his blood? Certainly not! Although the Only Begotten came fully intending to spend himself completely for the sake of our salvation, the instrument of the cross and its attempt to frustrate God's will was of our own invention. Jesus came to consume himself in ministering to men by preaching, healing, organizing, teaching, and blessing. God loved us so much that he gave his Only Begotten—that we might observe him and follow his example. Yet some stupid, perverse people ages ago thought they knew better, so they nailed him to a cross.

NOW WE consider ourselves much smarter than that, because we do not go about driving painful spikes into the body of Christ. But the fact is, unless we are serving him and his cause with all our might and holding no reserve, we stand as much condemned as those who crucified him. In fact, we are worse off because those Roman soldiers knew not what they were doing, while we know very well. We are lying and numbering ourselves among the world's greatest hypocrites if we claim to love God and appreciate the gift of his Only Begotten and yet fail to serve him honestly and fully.

God gave us the gift of salvation. This has been called the greatest of all, and one of its strangest and most wonderful features is the amazing fact that we can either take it or leave it. In other words, like all true presents, it is not forced on us, but we accept or reject our salvation whichever we chose. As he created us, he adorned us with that magnificent expression of confidence, the freedom to pick and choose throughout all our lives.

Individually, it does appear to be such a great gamble with so many distracting influences ready to sap our will power and cause us to choose wrongly. But a blessed assurance comes when we view our race in the light of such scripture as this:

*The works, and the designs, and the purposes of God, can not be frustrated, neither can they come to naught, for God doth not walk in crooked paths; neither doth he turn to the right hand nor to the left; neither doth he vary from that which he hath said; therefore his paths are straight and his course is one eternal round.*²

I receive strength as I read that revelation, because I know that one of God's purposeful designs is to help me work out my salvation. It remains for me to co-operate fully with him in service, and his purpose in me cannot be thwarted.

God is giving us the kingdom. It is through his grace that the realm of God is being built.

Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.

To be sure, there is no "silver platter" involved here; the Father gives us the raw materials, the component parts, the plans and blueprints, and expects us to "bring them forth" and effect the assembling.

A FEW BLOCKS down the avenue, where formerly there was only a used-car lot, there is now being constructed a new office building.

Thoughts From a Communion Message

By Robert C. Leibold

PAUL made it very definite that when we partake of the bread and wine, we do so for the sacrifice of Him who was nailed to the cross. What does this memorial mean? What is my knowledge of the reasons why he had those whom he loved prepare the supper? Why was he permitted to go through such a trial? These are questions that cannot be answered in a few minutes. Christ made his sacrifice because he loved you and me. This love which was so characteristic in the life of the Master should predominate within our hearts and souls. It is true, we all sacrifice to a certain degree, or at least we think we do. We consecrate and devote our lives to the church which we love, giving of our talents to the cause of Christ, because of the love of God implanted in us. That love must flow from heart to heart and from soul to soul.

Jesus was criticized on several occasions because of the sympathy and compassion he had for those who were in sin—Mary Magdalene, the woman at the well, and many others—and through that criticism, pain was brought to him because of his exemplification of the teachings of God, that men might enjoy life. While he was being nailed to the cross, he looked into the heavens, and the multitude heard the voice of a dying Saviour say: "Father forgive them." They did not have the knowledge of his purpose and mission. They did not understand or know the reasons why he said, "Love one another—even as I have loved you."

What is the meaning of that love for one another? Can we in all sincerity say, "I love you"? Does Christ really love you? Can you say likewise that you love him? With the love that is in the heart and soul of Christ, can I say that I love all of you? If I say, yes, it means I give my life for you. Do I love some of you more than others? You are all very near and dear to me—yet some of you are closer because of a mutual love of sharing, as the disciple who was leaning on Jesus' bosom, John, the one he loved—the one who walked beside the Master. Is there any sharing of that experience of love that predominated the life of the Master? What do we mean by love?

As we partake of the bread and wine this morning, do we remember the life, the blood shed on Calvary's

Cross—the broken and torn body that he gave for us? May our minds bring to our memory that time when the Master stretched forth his hands and spoke to the people on the land and said: "Behold, I am Jesus Christ; I am the light and life of the world, and I have drunk out of that bitter cup which the Father hath given me." Arise and come forth unto me, that ye may thrust your hands into my side, and feel the prints of the nails in my hands, and in my feet, that ye may know that I am the God of Israel and God of the whole earth, and have been slain for the sins of the world."

What do you see in me? Is there anything worth-while in my character that is characteristic of the goodness of the Master? Are we just ordinary people and children of God trying to get along—living righteously?

Remember when the meal was over, and after Judas had slipped quietly away, causing the prevailing gloom to be somewhat lifted, Jesus talked more freely, and the disciples began to understand. Then the Master was able to talk more clearly than ever before of that which was near his heart. Yes, the Master more freely gave expression, and through his expression, the disciples began to recognize what he was trying to portray to them—the full significance of the Lord's Supper. He arose from the supper, laid aside his garments, took a towel and girded himself—with water in a basin he began to wash his disciples' feet. Great love moved him to humble himself and stoop to wash his disciples' feet.

"Let not your hearts be troubled," he told them, and said that the time would come when he no longer would be with them; he was going on to prepare a place for them, that where he was, they might be also. Christ was ready to leave and re-enter his glory, but the twelve were to continue in the missions assigned to them. After the completion of their missions, they were to enter into the glory with their Master, because of his love found in his redemptive power.

The way of life and truth is found in the life of the Master, and he made this request of his disciples—that they should pray, and pray often. The great love of Christ was planted in the heart of Peter, for when he asked Peter, "Whom say ye that I am?" Peter answered, through that wonderful revelation, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Through the trying events that came in the life of Peter, he remembered always that Christ was the son of the living God, and he would follow him until death should take him from this life.

Love will bring pain to your hearts and souls. The love you have for one another will sometimes bring you wounds and grief. It will cause you to shed many tears. If there should be another war, it will not be those who are physically strong only who survive. Those who endure must be spiritually strong, made so by the gospel, by loving one another, which brings the redemptive power into action.

Siren wailing in the night.

*Somewhere sorrow, pain, or death,
Somewhere tortured human breath
Calls for help and calls for light.*

Speed the helpers for this pain!

*Grant, O God, their gifts may be Gifts of skill and charity,
Not too late, and not in vain!*

MY SON WENT TO JAIL

By a Father

MY SON is a convict. For two years now he has been behind prison bars; he will be there at least three more. He is a "felon," the first one in my family line, as far as I can trace it.

To me it is one of those unbelievable things. I wake up in the night and wonder if it is not all a bad dream. By what twist of fate has this shame been visited upon us? The boy is bright. We gave him everything we could, or at least we thought we did. Yet, ever since he was 16, his record has been a heartbreaker. Why? For a long time I couldn't put my finger on a single reason, but time and circumstance often reveal a lot of things. For what it may be worth to other parents and to the friends of youth, let me tell the whole story.

My wife and I were brought up very strictly. Discipline in our homes was rigid and obedience to parents unquestioned. Father's word was law to the household, and it never occurred to anyone to challenge it.

After our marriage my job took me into a community where moral standards were hazy and everyone was more or less on his own. All this caused a great uneasiness in the minds of my wife and myself as the children arrived—three of them over a period of ten years—and we decided then and there we would hold the line of our parental training at all costs. We would need the implicit obedience of our children if we were to keep them from the fatal indulgences of families all about us.

During those early years we were intensely proud of our success. I was deep in church work, and my wife was active in club and civic affairs. Business kept me on the jump, which I liked. But we felt that we were doing a grand job by our children. We took them to Sunday school while yet in arms. As they grew older, they won gold pins for regular attendance. They were docile in all matters and seemingly content in the program we outlined for them. I saw to it that they had weekly allowances, but now, on looking back, I am forced to admit that I gave them of everything—except of myself. Particularly was this true of Arthur, the oldest. I didn't mean to turn him down that night he came to me and said:

"Dad, our boys' club is having a parents' night tomorrow. Will you come over?"

"Not this time, son; I'm too busy. Let's make it the next meeting."

Art never asked me again. He tried one day in a hesitant manner to question me about things that every father should explain to his son. "You'll learn those things soon enough," I told him—and he did, from smutty talk in an alley.

When Art landed in high school, where he rated above ordinary in brightness, but seemed somewhat unco-operative, I set a rule for him to be in at 10 p. m. One Friday night there was to be a class party. He asked for permission to stay out later. I refused.

"But, Dad," he said, "all the kids are going to stay out until midnight. We can't have a party and be home by 10."

"You know the rule," I told him flatly. "Don't argue with me."

Art went to the party. Then he balanced one factor against another—to face my ire or the ridicule of his classmates. He chose the former. I was sitting up waiting for him. I stormed at him the moment he set foot through the door. He didn't say much—in fact, I don't know whether I gave him a chance to say anything at all. I noticed a tear in his eye as he slumped off to bed.

"He won't do that again," I thought to myself—and he didn't. From that day on he was usually in the house at curfew time.

Letters came to me not long after his imprisonment telling that my son was making an excellent record.

One night months later I was sitting in my easy chair reading the evening paper. Suddenly the doorbell rang. I answered it.

"I am a truant officer," a stranger said out of the darkness.

"You must have the wrong address," I answered.

"Is this Arthur Blank's home?" she countered.

"Y-e-e-ss," I stuttered uneasily, "but what's wrong?"

"Are you his father?"

"Certainly, bu-but."

"Well, I'm sorry to say it, but this must be the right place."

The unfolding record all but paralyzed me. There were five outright trancies, and five absences explained by excuses bearing my signatures, all of them "phonies."

"Police caught your son hopping freight trains, but he begged off by telling them he would go right if they didn't inform you," she told me. "Then they picked him up for speeding in a car with another boy who was truant and who had taken his father's car without permission. Now something's got to be done, because at this rate he's headed for real trouble."

Well, I promised action, but at that very second I felt woefully helpless. It seemed my whole family structure was crashing down around me like a house of cards in a hurricane. I tried my time-honored procedure of a word lashing of the youth. You can imagine the barren results.

The estrangement between us was now all but complete. I think Art's mother was inclined to have patience, but we merely existed with each other, rather than living together. He felt my condemnation, but was too rebellious to attempt compromise.

Before he was through school he joined the Army. There—I found out later—he fell in with a man 15 years older than himself. It happened that the latter was of good character and sympathized with my son, and a fine relationship grew up between them. The kid made a father-substitute out of this veteran fighting man, and lavished on him all the affection which was my due. If that association might have continued until his enlistment was up, I think my son would have come out all right. But Army orders transferred the older man to another outfit, and with the breakup of the association my son's crime career commenced.

I shall pass over that quickly. Art got to drinking heavily to drown out his loneliness. He went AWOL, for which he was disciplined. Next he struck an officer, and was court-martialed and given a prison sentence. He served that term. After his release he went out with another man, got drunk, and broke into a hotel room, stealing a wallet and watch. He was arraigned in court and pleaded guilty, but was given probation. Six weeks later he went on another drinking spree and committed a burglary. This time there was no mercy shown him, and he was given a stiff prison term. Now he is in the penitentiary.

• Originally published in the "Rotarian," reprinted in "The New Area," and "The Outlook."

Letters came to me not long after his imprisonment telling that my son was making an excellent record, adjusting rapidly to confinement, and rising with phenomenal speed to a position of responsibility in the warden's office. For that I was thankful, but I never ceased to wonder why he couldn't have done as well when he was free. He wrote to me that he felt the error of his ways, and I wrote back that I was glad he did.

One day I met a psychiatrist. A thought flashed over me: why not tell him my story in confidence, and maybe he can tell me what's wrong with my son. We spent an evening together in his home, with the shades drawn. I laid bare everything to him. Then I edged my chair up toward him and asked him this question:

"Now, Doctor, can you tell me what is wrong with my son?"

"Yes, I can, but I fear you can't take it."

"Fear I can't take it?" I cried.

"I can take anything after what I have been through."

"Well, you asked for it. Here it is: You are what's wrong with your boy."

"I'm—I'm to blame?"

"Exactly. You've raised your boy by rule of thumb instead of by rule of heart. You've been righteous, but cold as steel. You've had a code, but not a soul. You're sorry for yourself and no one else. You need a little less formality of religion and a lot more of the spirit of Christly love in your heart. Quit professing so much and start practicing a little. You can win your son yet by beckoning him instead of beating him. He's robbed people of goods, but you've robbed him of the birth-right of a father's affection."

That psychiatrist blistered me as I deserved. I see now where I failed my son. I was rigid with righteousness, instead of being Christian with compassion. I estranged my son, and now he is paying the price of my pride.

The Gethsemane through which I am now passing is well deserved. I have failed my son, and he is the sufferer. It is true that we were both to blame, but the preponderant guilt is mine. I could see only my business obligations and my social standing. My children were second in my thoughts. Yet it may not be too late. I have written him that I see the light. Soon I am going to see him and confess to his face and ask him to forgive me. I am determined that when my son walks out of those prison gates and heads home, he will at least find a real father of flesh and blood and love.

Any fool can tell how many apples there are on a tree, but it takes a wise man to tell how many trees are in an apple.—African proverb, quoted by E. Stanley Jones.

Religion in the Home -

By Lila Emmerson Bradbury

This radio address sponsored by the Rhode Island Congress of P. T. A. was given by Mrs. Albert W. Bradbury, who is spiritual and education chairman of the congress.

THE "SIGNS OF THE TIMES" indicate that more and more families are feeling the need of religion in their homes. The "so what" attitude toward life, toward religion, toward church-going and other religious observances, should cause us to stop and ask ourselves some questions. What do we want for our children and for our family life? An abiding sense of security and stability? A serenity and tranquility stemming from voluntary discipline? A deep spirit of understanding? All these things are essential for character-building and a religious home life. Let us, as parents lay this foundation in every home in our communities. It will indeed take earnest seeking, the opening of doors, through study, meditation, and persevering practice to bring religion into our family life.

The purpose of religion in the home is to direct the relations and activities of family life so as to enlarge the sense of "worth-whileness" of living for each member of the family. The relationship in our home—of husband and wife, of parents and children, of brothers and sisters, and also the activities in the home—are the basic elements from which each human being builds up his views of home and the world, and of his own function within these groups. Home-living should, then, be ordered so as to help each member reach out beyond himself and beyond the home toward achieving even larger and more satisfying views and relationships. To this end our home life should be based on a religious philosophy where all members of the family, young and old, will consciously seek common interests and goals, participating in the affairs outside the home but also sharing experiences within the home, thereby enriching the family circle.

THE DISAPPEARANCE from the home, of many of the functions and shared activities that gave strength and purpose to the family in the past and the general speeding up of life demands new means for welding the family into a single unit bound by love and common purpose. Young and old should know that the home is a place where they can discuss their interests—whether they be intergroup relations, economics, or sports—and find a sympathetic audience.

To achieve the "give and take" necessary to understanding, each generation must accept the fact that changing times call for changing ways. So it is with religious worship. The formalized religion of the parents often lacks meaning for the younger generation, but ultimate truths are everlasting and unchanging. The new generation will seek its own forms, but it should feel the sympathy and understanding of older people. Family worship helps more than any other way to bring unity into the home. It doesn't have to be a long or an elaborate worship; just a candle-light service, a short song, and a prayer, is a happy way to end the day. A service for older children can be built around stories from a Bible character picture, a religious song on the record-player or around the piano, and then prayer. There are many good worship themes that can be used and it takes only a little of our time, but it means much to our children, now and in years to come. If you haven't formed the habit of family worship in your home, try it and see how enthused your children will be.

EVERY PARENT wants for his child all that is good. He has heard that religion is good, and guided by the council, "Seek first the kingdom of God," finds that it must enter into the everyday living of the family. Religion is not given any child by birth, but religious growth is a part of all growth. We cannot think of it as a separate thing that comes at a time apart.

The child's idea of God will at first be little more than a somewhat glorified man with many human tendencies. Such an idea is found among primitive or undeveloped peoples. Wise parents will enrich this concept by helping the child to see God in the sunset and in beautiful growing things. For a small child, God is a loving father who provides the world at its best. He is kind and protective and a part of our daily experience. To this beautiful faith in Divinity is added a keener consciousness of human responsibility for the purposes of God. He needs man's assistance and calls even the young to help him.

Such broad principles should be the basis of our religious education of children, in the home as well as elsewhere.

ONE OF THE strange things about religion is that the more fully and genuinely it is lived, the less need there is for talk about it. How then does religion become a part of family living?

First of all, it should so exist in the hearts of parents that children will sense its presence and will come to realize that their parents are living for the sake of something they care more for than self.

Children will see other things in devoted parents. They will come to sense a reliance on an Invisible Being which seems to bring comfort and reassurance and joy. They will also see that mother and father try, together, to reach out for some way of living, better and more wonderful than the way either of them unaided has worked out.

Because they have seen their parents gaining access together to the will of God, they will become more and more prepared for this kind of guidance from their parents when difficulties and disagreements arise in the home and in the neighborhood. This is God at work revealing our essential brotherhood. This is the way, that "peace on earth, good will to man" has to grow. Children sense it first in their parents. Then they gradually learn to extend it to an ever larger community.

FIRST, LIVING themselves a sincerely devoted life, parents are able to give the kind of guidance which will lead their children to a fuller realization of religious values.

The child should be helped to develop loyalty, for religion is loyalty. It is wholehearted devotion to that which is most important for human living. The small child cannot know God all at once. He has to grow in wisdom, and he will grow according to what he gives his loyalty to. Parents must encourage him to be loyal to the best he can know at the time, and then help him grow from one loyalty to the next greater loyalty. In this way, the child grows toward God even before he knows there is a God.

Since God is the source of all values, it is important that each member of the family grow in his understanding of what is better and what is worse, and of what is evil and what is good. Little can be done through general talk. The real learning condition is a behavior situation where a choice is made and where there is a difference of opinion about the goodness or badness of it.

Instruction in religion must be suitable to a child's maturity. It is a temptation to give him regular lessons, but the best introduction to this education is when the child shows signs of wanting a more orderly understanding of all the ideas and experiences which he associates with religion. Orderly instruction is most effective when it comes in answer to a felt need.

Often enough we have heard the quotation that motherhood is a partnership with God, but in this modern day of crisis in the family, that statement should be changed to "parenthood is a partnership with God." It is imperative, if they succeed in the highest human task—home-building, that modern parents should recognize this partnership and not be content with God as a silent partner but learn to talk with him and teach their children to do likewise. Small children learn a short bedtime prayer which is formal and memorized, and as they grow older, they learn to pray from the heart, according to their need.

FAMILY PRAYERS, if they are sincere and judiciously chosen, bring parents and children closer together. Long prayers, however, when forced on children do more harm than good. One must remember the age and personality needs of the children and respect their limitations. The following poem by Naomi Russell expresses prayer in its fullest sincerity:

There are no rules on how to pray,
Each man has his own special way,
And if he kneels, or if he stands,
Or humbly sits with head in hands,
The good Lord hears and understands.

It isn't where his prayers are said,
In the temple or beside his bed,
Or if his praying's long or brief,
Or filled with joy or born of grief,
The answer comes with his belief.

It isn't if he prays at night,
Or while the sun is shining bright,
It isn't when, or why, or where,
Or who—the Lord is always there
Listening—listening for your prayer.

In conclusion, may I quote the words of the great psychiatrist, Dr. Carl Jung: "Religious experience is absolute, it is indisputable. You can only say, 'I have never had such an experience.' Your opponent will answer, 'Sorry, I have,' and there your argument will end. But no matter what the world thinks about religious experience, the one who possesses it has the treasure of a thing that has given to life meaning and beauty and a new splendor to the world and to mankind."

The Church in the British Isles

with the local priesthood have been used quite widely throughout the mission. These should be continued with an emphasis on teaching by showing and learning by doing.

Special effort should be made to strengthen the work of the church schools throughout the mission and to co-ordinate this work with the other activities of the church so that all will minister to our total and stable growth. There is no need for complex organization. The immediate concern is to provide means of instructing and holding children, young people, and adults through the church school ministry.

The Saints in England are deeply interested in the kingdom. They are aware that the gathering involves much more than just moving to Independence and the regions round about. They are therefore fully prepared for the continuance of that fundamental preparation for the gathering which is found in the development of personal righteousness and Sainthood and in maturing those skills which enable us to fit into community and industrial life at a high level. But before any regular flow of Saints gathering from England to Independence and the regions round about will strengthen the church as a whole, it is necessary that the branches in England be built to the point where those who gather can leave behind them others who are able and willing to carry on the work which they leave.

OUR PURPOSE IN THE BRITISH ISLES

In the British Isles, as everywhere, the purpose of the general church is to provide general leadership and over-all co-ordination, and at the same time to develop and use and profit from local leadership and understanding and ministry. It is expected that as the work grows in the British Isles, the burden of the care of the branches will be carried by able and devoted men of the ministry, whose numbers will be augmented steadily from the missionary work which is now in progress and in which the local forces are making such a significant contribution.

In the long run the strength of the church in the British Isles depends, under God, on the strength of the church as a whole. The program contemplated for the work in the mission will involve some financial outlay in addition to what the Saints of the mission contribute, and whatever is necessary will be recommended to the Appropriations Committee for inclusion in the budgets presented to the General Conferences in the next few years. It will be met out of general church funds. But beyond this the mission rightfully looks to the church as a whole for leadership, comradeship, sympathetic understanding, and all those many incentives to fine ministry which flourish in partnerships like ours.

On the other hand, the church rightfully expects that the Saints in the British Isles shall continue to develop their high sense of mission, of having been called to make a distinctive and worthy contribution to the growth of the whole church. As the contacts between the church here and the church elsewhere become more and more intimate and inspiring, and as the work in England is more and more effectively organized in strong centers and vigorous offshoots, the general church will expect the leaven of English Sainthood to be felt in Zion and in the regions round about, and to the farthest reaches of our Zion and missionary enterprise.

THE GRACELAND STORY

Jean Elefsen, Lily Carr, Cleora Williams, Sam Kemple, Gordon Mesley, and Ed Farrand.

A Cappella members

Thirty-five new members have been accepted into the A Cappella choir according to Herbert Lively, director.

The new officers elected for the semester are Earline Draper, social leader; Ronald Manuel, secretary; Mitchel Juergans, librarian; Clarence Stowell, Ronald Lentell, stage hands.

These are the new members. Soprano: Alice Folkes, Betty Lusha, Mae Jorgenson, Virginia Dunlap, Muriel Anderson, Bonny Lou Haferkamp, Arvene Petz, Gwen Morse, Charlotte Engle, Dana Wendelburg.

Alto: Anne Murray, Shirley Mason, Phyllis Key, Aleen Lucas, Jo Ann Baeth, Joy Hield, Georgie Trotter, Helen Amundson, Melva Shippy.

Tenor: Ronald Mortimore, Elma Blair, Sam Kemple, Bob Trimble, Eldon Hart, Charles Vreeland, Dick Davis, Ronald Young, Kenneth Green.

Bass: Robert Buckingham, Vernon Drown, Bob Simmons, Paul Shaw, John Faurot, Ed Farrand, Howard Moore.

Our College Day

Graceland also celebrates College Day with a special observance. This year the theme for College Day at Graceland is, "We Would Be Building." To be held on the same date as College Day throughout the church, October 26, Graceland's observance will be in charge of Velma Ruch, a member of the faculty; and Ronald Young, a student.

A special offering will be taken toward the erection of the Memorial Student Center building.

Honor Thompson

Granville Thompson, business manager, has received an award recently for a paper written for a class in School Business and Hospital Administration at the University of Chicago last year. The subject of the theme was, "How can the governing board be best assured that a high quality of medical service is being maintained in its institution?"

The presentation of $50 was made by Dr. Garhard Hartman, Director of Iowa Hospitals and president of the Alumni Association, at an alumni banquet held in St. Louis in Thompson's honor recently.

This is the second chapter in the day by day story of Graceland which is to appear regularly in the Saint's Herald. First chapter appeared in the issue of October 11.

Cloonan to board

In a recent student election, Ted Cloonan, a sophomore from Independence, Mo., was elected to the Student Publication Board, a group which governs the student paper and yearbook.

A student writes her pastor

Dear _____:

I guess this is the first letter I've written to you as an official member of the Graceland student body.

But I want to ask you to help me—me along with 639 other students here on the campus. We have enjoyed our fellowship together here, but we have a fear. Will the future youth of the church have the same chance that we have?

You see, Graceland is growing. More and more young people are taking advantage of the opportunities and are coming to the college. Because of this growth, certain facilities here at Graceland have become greatly inadequate to handle the student's needs.

One of our biggest worries at the present time is the lack of a place where the student body may center their social activities. As it is now, the only places that can be used for this purpose are the gymnasium, and the reception room in the largest girls' dorm. The gym, besides taking care of all our indoor athletics, serves as an auditorium for religious activities, assemblies, drama productions, and social gatherings. Walker Hall reception room is used as a general gather-

Football successes

As the Graceland Story goes to press, the Graceland football team has piled up an impressive record of three wins and no losses this season. Defender of the Interstate Conference title won last year, the Yellow Jackets have downed Fort Dodge 13 to 0, Kansas City, Kansas, Junior College 7 to 2, and Chillicothe Business College 40 to 7, in games played thus far this season.

ing place, a place to meet and get acquainted.

We do need a student center, or, as the college enrollment increases, the social and recreational side of the student will become warped.

The goal to be raised was set at $60,000, of which $25,000 was raised last year. The remainder we want to see raised this year. But it cannot be done unless every branch, small and large, across the country, supports us in our aims.

We at the college now will not be able to enjoy the building ourselves, but we would like to see the funds raised. We want to feel confident that the youth who come after us will have the necessary opportunities. Won't you help us all that you can, so that our goal will be reached.

Sincerely,

lowing: John Smith, Independence; Charlotte Engle, Brielle, New Jersey; Janet Harris, Brooklyn, New York; Dana Wendleburg, Independence; Ann Whiteford, East Jordan, Michigan; and Virginia Chandler, Manson, Washington.

Tower officers

The Graceland Tower, student newspaper which became a weekly last year, has announced its staff for the semester.

Stan Johnson, elected last spring, will be managing editor, with Ronald Manuel as business manager, and Leonard Garlick as advertising manager.

Newly appointed associate editors are Beatrice Spencer and Wilda Thorsen, both freshmen. Byron Werges will be sports editor, and Ted Cloonan will be feature editor. Max Mathews has been appointed picture editor.

Executive visits

Dr. Jesse P. Bogue, executive secretary of the American Association of Junior Colleges, was a guest of the college recently. Graceland was chosen as one of two private junior colleges in Iowa to be visited by Dr. Bogue in a nationwide tour.

Play cast

Cast in the lead role of the Homecoming play, "A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court," a three-act comedy by Mark Twain, presented on October 17, was Joseph Anway, of Independence, Missouri, who also had lead roles in two of last year's productions.

Anway played the part of the young college scientist visiting in King Arthur's court.

Cast in other roles were Jean Elefson of Butler, Missouri; Louise Steckel, Omaha, Nebraska; Madaleen Montgomery, Fairland, Oklahoma; Mary Jo Wilder, Mercedes, Texas; Claire Weldon, Warrensburg, Missouri; Howard Moore, Independence, Missouri; Della Mae Nunn, El Reno, Oklahoma; Sam Anderson, Albin, Wyoming; Sam Kemple, Ontario, California; Burdina Root, Houston, Texas; and Arthur Edwards, Sparrows Point, Maryland.

Intramural managers

Athletic managers of all men's groups have been selected to direct the various groups in the intramural program of the college. Each is in charge of a certain district which includes several houses.

Managers of the districts are: James Renfroe, Independence; William Miller, Oronogo, Missouri; Roy Hanes, Wellsburg, West Virginia; Kenneth Graybill, Council Bluffs, Iowa; Lindal Mark, Los Angeles, California; Max Mathews, Mt. Vernon, Illinois; Kenneth Ward, Independence; Dean Miller, Oronogo, Missouri; Jack Jones, Cedar Falls, Iowa; and Leon Simmons, Independence.

Band and orchestra

Graceland instrumental music has returned to its former enviable status, and then some, under the direction of William Graves, conductor of band and orchestra. A full year of activities is scheduled for both organizations under his direction.

The band this year is composed of 55 pieces, largest in the history of Graceland bands. Forty are enrolled in the Lamoni-Graceland orchestra.

The instrumental groups will each present three concerts on the college campus as well as concerts on tour.

Name contest

A contest, sponsored by the Graceland Tower, is open on the campus for the naming of the new classroom building recently completed. A semester pass to the Coliseum theater will be given the winner of the contest.

Carnegie room

Music at its best is presented to the students of Graceland through a grant

A faculty member speaks out

I'd like to see the necessary development within the next ten years that will enable the church, through Graceland, its educational institution, to provide its youth and other productive forces of the church with the tools and training which are necessary today to establish His Zion.

Ten years is undoubtedly too short to accomplish the ultimate, however, it is not impossible, but should be expected that we will establish an "adequacy for our day."

Such a goal will necessitate the achievement of certain objectives:

1. An awareness on the part of us who are members of His church of the significance of our mission.
2. A "burning" motivation to carry the evangel to the world of the twentieth century.
3. An attempt on the part of all who serve to become "craftsmen" in their stewardship.
4. A re-evaluation and study of the "Zionic Process."
5. A greater humility and steadfast devotion on the part of the administration and faculty of Graceland, her students and alumni, and other members of the church.

Although these goals may seem rather general and abstract, a great miracle will be accomplished in our day if these hopes become realities. An experiment in the social science laboratory of human living will rapidly gain recognition and renown. Mars, that great Roman god, might be overcome by such a miracle and World War III never become a reality.

Mankind today appears to be enslaved of the best listening equipment available, made by the Carnegie Foundation several years ago. Over six hundred records were also received with the grant, including music of all periods and forms. These have been placed in a room, on the third floor of the Administration Building, known as the Carnegie Room. It is open to all students who wish to enjoy good classical music.

Office redecorated

The President's office has been redecorated as the result of a gift for that purpose from Mrs. Loretta Slavick of St. Louis. Among the new furnishings are colorful drapes, a combination desk-lamp and clock, a walnut bookcase, and several paintings.

This statement of Zionic objectives first appeared as an article in a series entitled, "I'd Like to See—" currently appearing in the Graceland Tower, student newspaper. Each article is written by a different member of the Graceland faculty and outlines what that faculty member would like to see at Graceland. The article reprinted here is by Jerry C. Runkle, teacher of economics and business.

to a meretricious spirit, similar to that of the Mephistopheles, in medieval legend.

It is my firm conviction that the salient objectives mentioned above are both possible and desirable. As F. M. McDowell said at a recent assembly, "May Graceland keep her date with destiny."

Facilities, tools, and means of many kinds will be needed if our hope is to become implemented in the lives of people. The accomplishment of the mission of the church is not a simple matter. In fact, "The concept of Zion is the greatest thing ever to challenge the mind of man," Apostle Hanson has said.

If our people have the necessary balance in philosophy between idealism and realism; if our faith is as large as the mustard seed; if the love of Christ is dominant in our lives, then the accomplishment of our purpose is sure. It appears, however, that we are still lacking in some of the requirements. If true, it must be that in the next few years, Graceland will add to this progress in a significant and meaningful way. What achievement in the next decade could be of more value?

More Than Anything in the World

BY SADI ANKA MOON

JANE WAS FORTY years old. She sat at her ivory desk and stared at the picture before her of two children, a boy with a cowlick and a girl with a ribbon in her hair. They were not Jane's children; they belonged to her sister, Louisa. Jane did not have any children, except those who were yelling and giggling down the halls outside her door. Jane was not married.

Most people presumed that it was by choice that Jane Leeper did not have a husband. At the same time, many stopped to wonder why some man with a lick of sense hadn't snapped her up years ago. She should have been the first of her city high graduating class to get married, because she was the prettiest, the cleverest, and the friendliest. In fact, the people of Grant City had pointed with pride at Jane and said, "My, if all our girls could be like her. She's our outstanding Grant City girl." Jane had gone to junior college and then to the university, where she had graduated magna cum laude. She was given every honor from Mortar Board on up the scale. She was liked and respected by everyone who knew her, because she liked people first.

And then she had a bright period of minor fame in mid-western educational circles, resulting from some experimentation in junior high school progressive teaching. Students of education will always study the Leeper modification of the Winnetka plan. And now she had chosen to come back to Grant City and establish her system firmly in the junior high schools of the town. That had been during the past eight years. Jane Leeper was a shining light in the city and in the state. Her boundless energy allowed her to do five times as much as her next busiest friend in town. Her home was a constant scene of comfort and delight to children, to visiting luminaries, and to her friends—both male and female.

Jane's heart beat heavily within her this morning. Loneliness possessed this sparkling, wonderful woman who loved the world and was loved in return. The indispensable citizen was the loneliest woman in the town.

She still watched the children in the molded frame on her desk. Who knew that more than anything in the world she would like to have mothered some children like them and helped a husband? "Why," she asked herself, "may I not have this that I want more than anything else? Would I have been a poor mother—a bad wife?"

SHE LET her head fall into her hands. The spicy smell of the carnations and roses on her desk seized her momentarily with a sickness. She felt panic run in ripples through her veins and out to the tips of her fingers. Fear and dread reached inside her and pulled out shreds of self-confidence. Before her eyes swept visions of cold, lonely years storming her walls and breaking down the smiles which guarded them. The thing from which she had sought to escape arose again from half-forgotten fancies. The day before she was seven years old, her mother had walked into the nursery and found Jane wearing her high heels and best dress. The mother's cold flintlike eyes had looked steadily into hers and, in a quiet tone that hid dark anger, she had said, "Jane, I don't love you any more."

"You little tin god," she smiled as she turned and dabbed powder on her nose before the full length mirror.

Never before or since had Jane heard her mother say anything like that; and even though her mother's temper had often been raised against her, Jane never again saw that look. But just once was enough to strike fear and aloneness into the sensitive little girl who wanted to be loved more than anything in the world.

Jane Leeper knew enough about psychology to understand clearly her own home background. She knew now that mother always had loved her, that on that day so long ago, she had taken seriously words her mother had not meant. As she grew, Jane learned to trust this good woman and to depend upon her guidance. But Jane had spent her whole life making up for the one statement, "I don't love you."

Deep inside was the unspoken challenge to herself, "I'm going to make people love me. I'm going to love them so hard and be so necessary to them that they can't live without me."

To the world, she became an aggressive, independent woman. Inside she was soft and wanted to be loved by someone of her own, like Louisa.

ALMOST BITTERLY she thought of this younger sister who seemed to have grown up so easily. Louisa was fourteen years younger than Jane. She wasn't sparkling and exciting. No one ever had pointed to her and said, "I wish all our girls were like her." She had married Joe Timm two days after she had finished high school. It had all been so simple for Louisa, Jane thought enviously. When their mother had died, Jane had cared for her younger sister. And Louisa was a gay, pleasant girl without thought or ambition. She had fallen in love simply and had her family just as simply. Even Louisa's children were easy to care for. Louisa had known no driving challenge, had suffered no mental anguish about life. People said, "How can two sisters be so different? One so dynamic and successful, the other so prosaic." Prosaic, Jane thought—I wish I were.

A tear slipped down between her well-manicured fingers. "Why was I born to fight the world? Why wasn't I like my sister? Why did everything I do in my life lead to rob me of the one thing I wanted most?"

"Oh, God, if it isn't too late, let me know thy will for my life. Let me find peace. I cannot ask for that which I have not earned, but if it is yet in thy plan, let me have someone to love of my very own. But if it isn't, give me strength and the will to love alone."

A sob wrenched her body. Jane wanted desperately to do right.

The drapery blew with a gentle breeze from the window. She turned her head toward it and looked down upon the empty playground. Above the sparse grass stood the trees, bright and warm in autumn colors. Her eyes were drawn up, and her gaze wandered over the blue sky to a bird which circled slowly.

IN HER mind, someone spoke, "Patiently, patiently, wait upon the Lord."

Anger and hurt drained from her heart. She lifted her head and arose to stand before the window.

"I understand," she whispered. "Too long I've done the managing of my life. God hasn't really had a nickel's worth of say in it. When he has shown me a good man, I have passed a stern forbidding judgment." She stretched up on tiptoes and laughed at her own picture of herself.

"You little tin god," she smiled to herself as she turned and dabbed powder on her nose before the full-length mirror across the room. "You don't know what humility is, nor faith, nor patience—no, nor real love."

It wasn't too late to learn. Not for Jane. She picked up the telephone and dialed a number.

"Hello, Louisa? I just wanted to call and tell you that I love you. . . . How are Mickey and Kaye?" She smiled and her heart was full. God had been waiting for her a long time.

Tribute to Harry Passman

Our late pastor, Brother Harry Passman, passed away last February. We do miss him very much. No one has taken his place, and consequently we have given up our place of worship for the time being, but are to meet in the homes here for study classes.

Our gratitude to Brother Passman is too deep for words. The last few months when he made his trip out to administer to us taxed his strength so that he had to sit down to preach to us, but the wonderful sermons and teachings he brought to us will never be forgotten. His last sermon was about the "Garden of Gethsemane," and on that Friday he was taken. We all seemed to know it, but still had hope he would recover from his illness. So it was a shock to us, as my husband and I had been there for dinner the day before, and he seemed to be so well. He never was bedfast.

We can never thank him enough and only pray we will try in some measure to live up to his standards and live our lives for others and God as he did. He seemed to be a father to us all and when we would take our troubles to him, we were greatly strengthened. We also pray that the young people who are called to do God's will, will be as faithful in their calling as was he.

A Peculiar People

By BOB ANDERSON

BECAUSE WE are Latter Day Saints, we have a mission in this mortal life that needs to be fulfilled. Indeed, the Doctrine and Covenants warns us that we must be a peculiar people. However, before we go scurrying to Malaya to buy gold rings for our noses, we should decide what we mean by being peculiar.

Through the history of religion, we find many marked instances of peculiar peoples. Peculiarities marked by difference in dress, speech, doctrine, and other assorted ways. Sometimes, it has been hard for us to determine whether they were truly peculiar or just plain odd—squares in teen-age phraseology. In most instances, the oddities are marked by something from which the group or individual must abstain. In my community lives a family that belongs to a religious body that believes, no doubt sincerely, that children should take no part in public entertainment, even plays or programs presented at the public school. The Quakers had their silent meetings. We even blushingly admit that we have had Latter Day Saints with forms of negative peculiarity—or might we say oddity.

OUR PARTICULAR mission as a church is to spread the gospel “to every kindred, tongue, and people.” We might make ourselves peculiar by advocating, as a church, that we all wear neon signs proclaiming the fact that we belong to the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Such a move would indeed attract a great deal of attention, but would it bring a corresponding number of baptisms?

While struggling through my high school algebra, I somehow arrived at the decision that numbers can be either positive or negative—much to the happiness of my instructor, who spent many unhappy hours impressing the processes of adding and subtracting such numbers on my unsuspecting gray matter. Likewise, our differences as Latter Day Saints can be made positive by the addition of “do” to replace the frequently used “don’t.” Of course, we have certain acts and procedures that must necessarily be classed as undesirable, and we must insist that as Saints we are not free to indulge. Yet, if we make one or two such acts our test of goodness and righteousness to the

Here Is the Writer . . .

BOB ANDERSON is twenty-two years old, single, and thankful (he says) to be a freshman at Graceland, where he is studying preparatory journalism. He holds the office of priest and was, before entering Graceland, an active worker in Mission Branch near Marseilles, Illinois. His hobbies include athletics, model airplane research, and (of all things) work.

exclusion of other principles, we soon became as Dr. Cheville once wrote, “objectionably odd,” without being constructively peculiar.

WHAT THEN must be our Latter Day Saint peculiarities? As we have seen, we cannot risk becoming classed only as odd, but must become, as a people, peculiarly different and yet retain our citizenship with the world—a task that deserves the effort and must have the effort of every Latter Day Saint if we are to succeed. Our peculiarities must have the element of something better than the average run. They must inspire rather than antagonize our fellow men through a mere spirit of selfish attainment. Our church is peculiar in as much as it is Christ’s church established on earth; there is none like it, simply because God has no need for more than one church. Suppose a mechanic were working on your automobile, using a wrench to replace or remove some part. If one wrench could do the job, he would not sensibly use two. Our church is God’s tool for working with his people. Our lives must make our peculiarities stand for good and right as did the life of Christ.

I LIKE TO think of being peculiar as an adventure. Next time you yearn for something exciting, thrilling to do, try emulating the life of the Master in your living! You’ll be thrilled, and excited, if you accept your role wholeheartedly. And in this very earthly, sensual world you will indeed be peculiar. Pray for God’s wisdom that you don’t become just a “character,” but rather one who is so peculiar that your neighbors and friends would gladly accept the peculiarity for the privilege and promise that we have.

TIME OUT FOR RELIGION

QUESTION:

Now that I am in college, my studies make it almost impossible for me to find time to read church literature and do active branch work. Because of this inability to take part in the way I used to, I find my contact with God weakening. My original desire for an education was that I could serve better in the church, but in the process of obtaining that education, I'm losing touch with the thing that inspired it. What can I do to orient my education with my religion?

ANSWER: By Dr. L. O. Brockway

YOUR OWN appreciation of the inadequacies of an education without religion is the key to the answer of your question. An education brings a partial understanding of the world and its problems, but unless this understanding is matched by a growing appreciation of the power of religion to direct acquired skills in the solution of the problem, education is barren indeed. Religion helps the student to know why he wants an education, and the person who has education without religion is as tragically unbalanced as the person whose religion fails to inspire the development of all his powers.

The schedule of work at school may require such concentrated study that you feel the desire for relaxation and recreation in hours outside of school. Somewhere in these hours, a place must be found for the study of basic church programs, because this is the study which shows how your other education may truly be applied to solving the problems of the modern world. If this study is left out, have you any really good reason for going to college? Of course, most of your study time will be taken up for school, but one or two regular hours every week for a growing church appreciation should be a part of the serious curriculum.

Perhaps you can find other people on the campus who share your perplexities. Frequent informal fellowship in discussions with other church students may be the beginning of a campus group where some of these problems can be thrashed out. It is comforting to know that you are not alone in these problems, and bringing them to articulate expression is the first step in solving them. Even a small number of students will find that sympathetic older persons and church officers are glad to meet with them for honest talk.

The inspiration for self-improvement depends on "a love of God and of all men," and your inspiration can be renewed among people who are learning the lessons of love, humility, forbearance, and charity. For this reason, an active association with the local branch, if there is one, is an essential part of balancing religion with education. If, in the local branch of your college town you do not happen to find people who are sympathetic to the perplexities of college students, this emphasizes the need of the church for pioneers in specialized ministry among college students. Your own effort to grow in understanding the place of the church in the world today may help to set the pattern for effective ministry in building the kingdom, and your initiative is challenged by the lack of ready-made answers.

Salt of the Earth

In the third century, men began to despair of the world; nothing could be done about it; so high-minded individuals went out and set up housekeeping in suitable caves. More and more followed, until there were anchorite communities which devoted themselves entirely to piety. The world, meantime, went from bad to worse—with the best people withdrawn, the worst had it their own way. The escape into monasticism paved the way for the Dark Ages.

Monasticism seems very antique to most of us, yet it still flourishes. I am surrounded by people—scholars, engineers, professional men, preachers, writers, a large part of the intelligentsia—who are convinced that the world is in an awful mess and that the less we have to do with it the better. This prevailing political creed is simply a new monasticism. And if the best among us withdraw from public life, governments will again grow more and more rotten. "You are the salt of the earth," yes—but monasticism forgets that the place for salt is on the meat, not on the shelf.—Edgar J. Goodspeed in Harper's.

DEATHS

SOPHER.—Mary Elizabeth, daughter of George W. and Mary Bootman, was born August 6, 1894, at West Plains, Missouri, and died after a year of intense suffering on August 28, 1947, in St. Joseph, Missouri. She was married to Claude W. Sopher in November, 1923, who preceded her in death ten years ago. She then moved to St. Joseph to be near her aged mother; here she engaged in the profession of nursing until illness overtook her. For many years she was an active worker in the Methodist Church. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since January, 1947.

SEDORE.—Mabel G. Thomas, was born June 30, 1890, in Lapeer County, and died at her home in Detroit, Michigan, on September 10, 1947, following a heart attack. She was married to Charles H. Sedore on December 25, 1906; seven children were born to this union. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church by Elder A. Burr in November, 1916.

Besides her husband, she leaves three daughters: Hollie Isaacks, Dorothy Sharpe, and Nora Craig; four sons: Charles F., Ralph W., Hugh D., and Robert E.; six grandchildren; a brother, George Thomas; and two sisters: Mrs. Alfred Dunbar and Mrs. William Sleeman. A short service was held at the Hillecker Funeral Home in Detroit. Interment was in the Campbellers Corners Cemetery with Elder Ben Ouder Kirk conducting the service.

BLACKBURN.—Dorothy May Davies, was born March 27, 1918, at Scranton, Pennsylvania, and died September 14, 1947, following an automobile accident. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on September 5, 1926, and was married to Earl S. Blackburn of the United States Navy on March 27, 1941.

She is survived by her husband; a son, Earl Stewal, Jr., her parents; two brothers; and three sisters. Elder James Jenkins officiated at the funeral service. Interment was in Olive Branch Cemetery, Portsmouth, Virginia.

WARD.—Kenneth Leigh, was born March 10, 1898, in Seattle, Washington, and died at his home in Henderson, Nevada, on July 19, 1947. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church by Elder F. G. Pitt in 1909. During World War I, he served in the Marine Corps. By profession, he was a certified public accountant.

He is survived by his mother, Mrs. G. E. Ward of Bellingham, Washington; three sisters: Mrs. H. G. Ade of Portland, Oregon; Mrs. L. E. Hunt of Bellingham; and Mrs. W. J. Jones of Noxon, Montana; and a brother, Charles Ward of Bellingham. Funeral services were held at the Pal Memorial Chapel in Las Vegas, Nevada. The Reverend E. A. Wessel officiated.

spent most of the day visiting prospective building sites, as our church there has been sold. We then visited some of our members in Akron. In the evening, we addressed the congregation and closed an eventful day.

On Friday, I returned to Kirtland, where I found Sister Smith well at the Thomas home. That night, Brother Thomas took Brother R. J. Ashenhurst and me to Elyria, where we again occupied conjointly with Brother Jensen. Following the death of their pastor, Elder Clifford G. Minkler, a former pastor, Elder Joseph Kochis, again took charge. We tried to comfort Sister Minkler and the bereaved Saints. They occupy a fine residence as a church.

Saturday was an open date, well filled with efforts for the general good. We enjoyed a visit at the Garfield home in Mentor, after which we had dinner with Brother and Sister Earl Curry, and looked over their interesting home and ceramic studio.

On Sunday, Sister Smith accompanied me to a dedication service at Painesville; District President Wildermuth and Pastor Walter M. Davis were in charge. I spoke that night at Cleveland Central. At Painesville, a faithful group some years ago purchased a school building, which has served its purpose well as a church and gives promise of doing so for some time. At noon, luncheon was served by the ladies of the group. A dinner at Brother Wildermuth's, with Sister Smith, Brother Jensen, Brother and Sister Ashenhurst and Brother and Sister Thomas, and the service at Cleveland, brought a busy day to an end. I met again many old friends. Brother Nikel seems to have presiding and pastoral ability. Brother Jensen was with us at Painesville, taking part in the services; he was also with us at Cleveland.

I was pleased indeed to have this opportunity of meeting so many of our faithful members and of laboring with Brother Jensen and Brother McCune. Brother McCune left us on Sunday afternoon for home, saying that he too had spent a profitable week.

A few days later, we found ourselves home and—Joint Council and the usual "grist" which always comes to the "mill" at the Presidency's office.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

Note of Thanks

Edgar A. Chevalier of Miami Branch wishes to thank all who remembered him in prayer during his recent illness. He is now home from the hospital and regaining his health.

Why Not Serve Him?

The noisy earth-moving machines have excavated the basement, the riggers have placed the steel beams, the stonemasons have laid the foundation and reared the walls. Now the carpenters and decorators and glaziers are putting on the finishing touches. In just such a manner, the Father has given us the materials and directions for the construction of his kingdom. We are the builders, and we can labor only in the strength that stems from that divine source.

Surely God has expressed his love for us by the richness of his blessings, the fullness of his gifts. Can we do less in return? There is only ridicule in store for those who bear empty testimonies. The man who says to his wife, "I love you," and then neglects her, and refuses to provide for her is not much of a husband. The lover who tells his sweetheart, "I love you," and then fails to express that love in thoughtful kindnesses and devoted trust is not much of a swain. And a member of the body of Christ who refuses to present full service to His cause is like a malignant cancer to that body. The challenge rings out to all those who have named his name,

If you love him, why not serve him?

Graceland's Best Home-coming

Graceland students and alumni were delighted with the fine home-coming game, Saturday, October 18. Graceland men took the good end of a 13 to 6 score against Wentworth Military Academy of Lexington, Missouri. It was a fast, clean game, played at a speed that often amazed those who were used to the slower tempo of old-time football. These boys moved like P-80's on the same ground where their daddies were satisfied to lumber around like army tanks. Maybe they operate on atomic power. At the same time there were fewer hurt feelings and injuries, and less unfortunate language than in the contests of other days. Football seems to be solving its problems in the hands of young coaches and young players. Coach Richard Carter and his men are to be congratulated for giving Graceland a fine representation. When it was over, a Lexington man stepped up to this reporter and said, "It was a fine game, and I'm glad I came. We'd rather have won, but it was fun anyway." And that reflects a fine spirit of good sportsmanship.

Graceland has done something nice about the usual chaos of the intermission at the end of the first half. The band marched led by a bevy of warm but determined majorettes, and presented a program under the title "Campus Life" which was picturesque and entertaining. It conveyed to the visitors a pleasant picture of life on "The Hill." It also gave friendly recognition to the visiting team and their friends.

If Graceland College Home-comings get any bigger, they will have to borrow the Lamoni reunion ground to handle the overflow crowd. And if the present size of the student body (640) continues to grow, it seems very likely that Graceland will bulge not only the walls of the buildings but the boundaries of the campus as well.

Old-timers who couldn't attend this year missed something—a lot of things, in fact. Alums greatly appreciated and generously patronized the comfortable "Center" a big tent where there were many chairs for resting, tables for writing, an information and registration bureau, a refreshment stand and a restaurant. We hope this service can be repeated in coming years.

Progress Hall is the new "temporary" building, very attractive, but wisely placed where it will not interfere with the permanent building program nor detract from the beauty of the campus. Since it was built on very favorable terms from structures obtained from the Federal Government, students call it "Surplus Hall," but that title will not be recognized in the official literature. Anyway, the space it provides is going to be very helpful since all buildings are desperately crowded.

If you want to experience the thrill of beautiful old memories, try a picnic lunch, shared with a party of friends, in the lovely quadrangle formed by Briggs and Zimmerman Halls, the Ad Building and the screen of trees and shrubs by the old power plant. Among the many beauty spots on the Graceland Campus, this one will hold its own with the best.

We believe that "The Center" tent demonstrated to everybody the need of the permanent "Student Center" building for the campus. Six hundred students must have some place to go besides a room which is also occupied by three or four other students, some of them noisy. Incidentally, it was brought out at one meeting that health service for sick students is not now planned for The Center, to avoid possible danger, so those who were concerned on this point will be satisfied. There are many other urgent needs for the building, and besides, Graceland has already devoted a small building to this purpose.

For the Alumni, a Graceland Homecoming is unique among experiences. To visit the loved old scenes, now greatly improved, to meet friends, and to see the splendid young generation of church people training for professional life and service is a privilege and a pleasure worth a great deal of expense and effort.

Friday night entertainment consisted of a presentation of a comedy based on Mark Twain's humorous story, "A Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court." As expected, some touches more modern than Twain were added. The Saturday morning pep meeting was a good show in itself, with many lively novelties. The usual Alumni banquet was impossible this year on account of the size of the crowd. It was replaced by "Home-comer's Night" at Zimmerman Hall, which was so good that it should be a permanent change.

At 9:30 Sunday morning the theme was "Graceland Takes Her World Mission," sending packages to missionaries in foreign lands. Letters were read. A notable event was the sending of a package to Peter Choso, a Japanese student before the days of the First World War. Music for these services was by the Graceland A Cappella Chorus (directed by Herbert Lively) and the Oratorio Society (directed by Henry Anderson).

The closing event was the address by Bishop G. L. DeLapp on the theme, "Youth's Opportunity in a Time of Crisis."

God of Love

Conditions of Earth

Out of the sufferings, inequalities, and injustices of life, many Christians, and many who are not, think of the Creator as a God of wrath and vengeance. They consider his judgments as penalties for wrongdoing. In every illness they see a moral judgment inflicted upon them for some imagined sin. Because they believe that God is in charge of everything, they blame him for all that goes wrong in their lives, and gradually they cease to love him. In the worst of extremities, they even come to hate him.

Nobody can feel that way about God without suffering a terrible hurt and loss in mind and spirit. It separates him from God. It opens the door for the entrance of evil and rebellion. It is in the promotion of this incorrect view of God that the Adversary finds one of his great opportunities.

The truth is that when God placed us upon earth and gave us our agency, he placed us "on our own"—that is, he told us to take care of ourselves, make our own decisions, and bear our own responsibilities. At the same time, he did not cease to love and care for us. As a father will help his growing child to adjust himself to the dangers and experiences of life, in order to train him to take care of himself, so the Heavenly Father helps his children and loves them. He knows, too, that sometimes they will run into trouble or disaster. It is a chance all parents must take when they send their children out into life. Even God has to take this risk with us. It is the only alternative to mental and spiritual incompetence.

If we examine our lives carefully and realistically, we will see that most of our troubles are consequences of the "conditions of earth," of our own decisions, limitations, follies, mistakes, or of the acts of others. Trouble, sickness, death, worry, fear—these things are not the will of God. But he will help us through them.

Wherever I go I find some victim of trouble or grief placing upon God the responsibility for circumstances that are caused by the "conditions of earth." God does not enter our life to give us trouble. He enters our lives to help us through troubles.

The Law of Love

We have heard people speak as if the "Law of Love" were a discovery made in New Testament times, as if it were something first presented by Jesus, and first given a prolonged statement by John. But that is a mistake.

Jeremiah, who applied so fierce a lashing of condemnation to Israel for its sins and transgressions, still gave this word from the Lord to the people, "Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee." (31: 3). The remainder of the chapter continues in that vein.

Jesus was not making up something when he answered the tricky lawyer on the question about "the great commandment of the law" (Matthew 22: 35-40). He simply quoted something that came from the earliest literature known to the people. The "Law of Love" is explicit: "Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Leviticus 19: 18); and "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Deuteronomy 6: 5).

Thus the "Law of Love" reaches in three directions, and its obligations and commandments reach in three directions: from God to man, from man to God, and from man to his neighbors. And this is the trinity of love.

It would be quite impossible for men and women to love a God who did not love them. Jesus added something, it is true, to what the Old Testament had to say. It was this: "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." This is the central fact of the whole plan of redemption. Without it, there is nothing at all. All the afflictions and wanderings of Israel have but one destined end: a return to the love of God.

God Loves Us

When a man who has enjoyed good health and prosperity all his life says, "God loves us," we know he is sincere, but we think also that he does not speak from the full range of life's experience. But when a man who has known pain, ill-health, and physical affliction says, "God loves us," we are sure that he knows what he is talking about. Those who have seen the depths and torments of hell can appreciate the glories of heaven. Those who have known what it is to lose their loved ones, and with them lose all that brought them happiness, and can still testify to the love of God—these people, and there are many of them, know what they are talking about.

There is one supreme fact, "God is love" (1 John 4: 8). Those who have been helped through the fires of affliction by that love can testify truly for it.

Let Us Love God

In time of trouble, we need not be concerned as to whether God loves us. That is as assured as the Rock of Ages. He does.

What we need to be concerned about is whether we love him. For it is only as our love reaches up to him that we can contact his love reaching down to us. It is when the little child reaches up for his father's hand that he learns it has been there the branch budget $7,151.48. If our priesthood could match the work and enthusiasm of the women we would go places. Last year we had twelve groups in the women's department. One has now been disorganized but three new ones are in the process of organization which will make us fourteen women's groups this year.

We have a large Zion's League and also a Junior League recently organized. We have three choirs or choruses, namely: the adult choir (which is growing in numbers until we hardly have room for them on the platform), the Cecilian Singers which is a group of about twenty-five young ladies and girls, (they have recently purchased new robes which they paid for by earning the money themselves) and a boy's chorus consisting of about 15 boys. All three of these groups are making a fine contribution to the services.

The church school has long ago reached the capacity of our building so that we can hardly expand any more. However, the business meeting authorized us to try to rent a hall in the vicinity of the church where some of the church school classes could meet on Sunday morning. That will help us some until we can get our new building.

I baptized two young ladies (18 and 19 years old) on September 10. That makes a total of 58 baptisms for this calendar year. We are planning some cottage meetings to get started this month from which we hope to get several more converts before the year is over.

Brother Glen Johnson, who has been visiting with his parents at Underwood before sailing for Europe, has preached twice for us during the month. Apostle Williams preached both sermons on the 21st which was conference Sunday. Besides those four sermons, O. A. Currie, Charles O. Cary, and I preached a sermon each.

As has been customary here for several years the public schools allow the 7th and 8th graders to go to the church of their choice on Wednesday afternoons for an hour of religious instruction. This year I have 30 youngsters in that class. Twelve of them are nonmembers.

Kinds regards and best wishes to all of you.

Elder V. D. Ruch, of Omaha, writes a good report of work and achievement among the people of that congregation:

The busy month of September has become history. The annual district conference was held on the 21st. Apostle Williams, Seventies Hunker and Glen Johnson were visiting church representatives. We had a fine conference and an interesting day together. An ordination service was held at 7 p. m. when five Council Bluffs young men were ordained to the priesthood. One (James C. Reneau) who is appointed as a missionary to the Portland District was ordained an elder. Three other young men were ordained to the office of priest, and one was ordained a deacon. Elder Amos D. Graybill was elected district president to succeed Nels P. Johnson.

Our annual branch business meeting was held on the 15th. The various reports indicated a fine year of progress. We added $29,102.27 to our building fund, making a total of cash on hand besides the new lot, of $47,382.65. Besides that we raised $4,728.50 for branch expenses and also sent $12,951.46 to the general church in tithes and offerings. That is the best financial year the branch has ever had. For the fiscal year ending August 31, 1947, we baptized 61 people, which also we consider to be a good record.

Our departments are functioning very well. We have a wonderful women's department. It is growing and doing an ever-increasing amount of work. Here are some of the things the department did last year as reported to the business meeting: 2,164 home visits made, 1,256 hospital visits, 1,813 telephone calls to those needing ministry, 2,751 cards sent, 633 pieces of church literature given out, 1,267 garments given to needy ones at home and overseas, 158 sprays and bouquets of flowers sent, 3,781 hours of service given in homes where sickness or death had come, and 130 letters written. All of this besides the numerous dinners and other money-making projects sponsored. They made a lot of money, having turned in to the building fund and

* DISAPPOINTMENTS fall thick and fast into our pathway if we expect much of life. Rather largely we have to create our own happiness, provide for our own needs, and take care of ourselves; and, in addition to these, produce a really measurable surplus to give to others who are temporarily or permanently in need. Do not load yourself with grief or regret when plans fail or you must endure losses. . . . Starting from this point, expecting nothing of life, you will be surprised and delighted with the number of unanticipated pleasures and blessings that come your way. Give out, and the tides of the social sea will come flooding back to you, bearing argosies of good things like gifts from God.

* You may be twenty years in building a friendship. But you can lose one in twenty minutes—or even two.

* Content

Paul wrote to Philemon, "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." You have met people who always wear a discontented frown, others who always wear a smile. Such surface appearances are indications of the mental and spiritual condition within. In the same situation one person is happy, another is sad. Both of them could be happy if conscious effort were made. I have come to believe that happiness must be based upon appreciation of what you have, of your friends, and upon gratitude for blessings received. Discontented people are those who ask life for more than they receive, and probably more than they deserve.

Contentment should not keep us from trying to improve our minds, our lives, and our conditions. It permits us to enjoy what we have now while we look ahead in hope for better things in the future.

Gog and Magog Prepare for Battle

By Apostle D. T. Williams

IN THE thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel is a prophecy which almost all Bible commentators are agreed pictures the future activity of Russia. In this future activity of Russia. In this vivid description of the land of the great white bear, we see pictured an outstanding world disaster. Here is portrayed a monstrous earth-shaking power which has collected about her numerous allies whose leadership she arrogantly assumes and whose multitudes she leads to ultimate destruction by fire and sword.

This colossus of deceit and disaster is even now preparing itself for its furious attack against the citadel of human freedom. The iron curtain has been drawn down in the face of civilization in preparation for the last acts preparatory to the vicious onslaught on all that our democracies of human hope have held most precious. To this evil power, nothing is sacred. To it there is neither God nor Devil, neither good nor bad, except as you walk the chalkline of the party—which is good, or as you disobey the mandate of the dictatorship—which is bad. With it, blasphemy against God is a virtue, whereas a word spoken in favor of God is considered a diabolical propaganda against the state, since there is supposed to be no power greater than that of the state.

Is it any wonder then that God, through the prophet, delivers himself of the following?

And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Son of man, set thy face against Gog, of the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, and prophesy against him, And say, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold I am against thee, O Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal; And I will turn thee back, and put hooks into thy jaws, and I will bring thee forth, and all thine army, horses and horsemen, all of them clothed with all sorts of armour, even a great company with bucklers and shields, all of them handling swords; Persia, Ethiopia, and Libya with them; all of them with shield and helmet; Gomer, and all his bands; the house of Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his bands; and many people with thee. Be thou prepared, and prepare for thyself, thou, and all thy company that are assembled unto thee, and be thou a guard unto them.

AS WE HAVE already said, Bible commentators are almost unanimous in the conclusion that this scripture refers to Russia and the character of leadership she will possess in the "latter years." It should be observed that God's wrath is not kindled against the land of Magog (Russia) as such, but against the leadership of Magog which has set itself in opposition to God. The fact is the Russian people stand to suffer far more than any other nation, because they will allow themselves to be influenced against their Maker. Thus they will become an instrument of blasphemy in the face of the Almighty. Is it any wonder that the God of battle should say, "I am against thee, O Gog"?

Here the prophet under the inspiration of heaven has foretold the present gathering of Gog's vast host.

Naming some of the nations, now brought into bondage behind the iron curtain, by their ancient names, he yet is not satisfied but adds, "And many people with thee." Undoubtedly, these lands were named not as regards their present boundaries but in keeping with the geographical situation of the prophet's time. Much vaster domains were attached to some of these lands in that far-off day, while yet others have later enlarged their borders.

Just how many of the nations, which at this moment are behind the iron curtain, will be in the ranks of Gog when he begins his march against the forces of freedom and God, or just how many will yet be added, we may not with accuracy be able to say. The reason for this, as we have just said, is that the geographical situation has been radically changed in the intervening centuries since the word of prophecy was delivered. It is difficult, if not impossible, to detect the exact boundaries of the nations named, but the general outline of the prophetic description is clear enough. Speaking of Gog, Ezekiel says, "Thou shalt come from thy place out of the north parts, thou and many people with thee."

The "north parts," from the place occupied by the prophet, could mean none other than Russia, or "Rosh, Meshech and Tubal," as a portion of the second verse of the prophecy is rendered in the American Standard Version of the Bible. It is fair to conclude that the "many people with thee" would be, in most instances, peoples of reasonably close proximity. For instance, Persia (Iran) is one such nation named specifically in the prophecy. She would long since have been dragged behind the metallic curtain were it not that the United States and Great Britain have compelled the great bear to pull its claws back empty handed. But we need not fool ourselves, Stalin or his successor will yet take his prey.

GOMER (GERMANY) is not only of close proximity, but has already by one third been swallowed by the hungry vulture of totalitarianism. Let us look at the list of nations which, at the present writing, are huddled under the cracking whip of Rosh—look at “the bands and the many people” whom Gog is preparing by coercion and force to march “against the mountains of Israel” in “the latter years.” The list is terrifying. Think how many of those people hoped that the last two world wars they were fighting would bring freedom for themselves and their children after them. Contrary to that hope, here are the nations which are held in political and economic slavery:

- Poland
- Yugoslavia
- Czechoslovakia
- Bulgaria
- Romania
- Hungary
- Germany (at least one third)
- Finland (the nation that tried to be honest)
- Estonia
- Latvia
- Lithuania

The last three were given their freedom when the peace treaties were written at the conclusion of the First World War. One of our democratic crimes was that at Yalta we handed back to the talons dictatorship these little peoples who had just tasted the fruitage of liberty and who hungered for its continuance.

Pass It On

By Robert Miller

A SHORT offering in the “Herald” entitled “Pass it on” brought to my mind a good deed by a Y.M.C.A. man named Mr. Sutton, who served overseas with the “Y” during the First World War. I think it worth the telling.

I had been shifted about so often I had received no pay for several months and found myself without funds. Mr. Sutton loaned me five dollars, but before I could repay him, our outfit moved to another point.

Months later, our paths crossed again and I offered to pay my debt. He refused to take the money, telling me to keep it until I found someone in need, then I was to pass it on with the instruction that when his need of it had ended, he too “should pass it on” under the same condition.

Shortly thereafter I gave it to a buddy whom we affectionately called “Dug-out Brown.” But when his need of it ended, he returned it to me rather than fulfill the conditions. Later on I gave it to Clarence Kowalsky, an Iowa boy, with the instruction to “pass it on.”

Soon we were separated, and for a long time I did not hear from him. Then one day following his discharge and return home, he too returned the money to me rather than “pass it on.”

It reached me in Syracuse, New York, shortly before Christmas of 1919; but knowing no one in need, yet wishing to see it used by Christmas Day, I consulted the Reverend Downey, pastor of the Methodist Church I was then attending. He mentioned a very poor family that was in serious need of coal. I gave the money to him to deliver and told him the wishes of Mr. Sutton regarding it.

There my knowledge of the five dollars with a blessing upon it ends, but I have often wondered if this one good and generous deed of Mr. Sutton’s is still working—if it is still doing missionary work. At least, the memory of it is to be treasured, and the idea is well worth copying.

CAN THERE be any doubt that Gog is making ready for an attempted conquest of the world? And yet the number of nations which he will bring with him are not all included in the above list. Think of the vast expanse of the Soviet Union and the peoples of many and varied languages within its confines still to be counted. All these, too, are victims of a stupendous scheme to bring the whole world under the bondage of Gog.

In other articles, we shall see what is to be the fate of this gigantic intrigue, and how it is sealed up and canceled out by the will and through the might and power of God as the battle of God verses Gog is terminated.

Does God Speak Today?

By Garland E. Tickemyer

A LITTLE OVER a hundred years ago, a young man hunted out a secluded spot in the woods and knelt in prayer. Later he told the world that in answer to that earnest plea for light and understanding, God had spoken to him.

The response on the part of the people is what might be expected in an age when men believed that the avenues of communication between God and man were forever closed. A few years later, that young man—the first prophet of the Restored Gospel—died at the hands of an indignant mob who charged that he “openly blasphemes the most high God and casts contempt on his holy religion by pretending to receive revelations direct from heaven.” His death, however, did not remove the question that he placed in the minds of the people: “Is it possible that God will speak to us today?”

DID GOD SPEAK TO ELIJAH?

Several thousand years before the tragic death of this young man, another prophet of God fled before an angry mob which sought his life because he dared to reveal the will of God to them.

Elijah fled before them to Horeb, the mount of God, and lodged in a cave. And a great wind rent the mountains and brake in pieces the rocks, but the Lord was not in the wind. And after the wind an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a still, small voice, and when Elijah heard it, he wrapped his face in his mantle and went out and stood in the entering in of the cave. And behold a voice came unto him and said: “What doest thou here, Elijah?” (I Kings 19).

Did God actually speak to Elijah? The tendency of many people today is to reject outright any such idea. These modern critics say, “The men and women who claim to hear God’s voice belong to a highly imaginative and essentially unstable human type.” An even larger group believes that God has revealed all that is necessary for the salvation of men and that the canon of scripture is forever closed.

HAS GOD REVEALED ALL?

As late as 1883, the creed of one of our most popular protestant churches contained the following statement:

The whole counsel of God, concerning all things necessary for his own glory, man’s salvation, faith and life, is either expressly set down in scripture, or by good and necessary consequence may be deducted from scripture, unto which nothing at any time is to be added whether by new revelations of the spirit or traditions of men.

In attacking a modern-day revelation during the well-known Kelley-Braden debate, Mr. Braden said, “It was not given or translated by inspiration, for the Bible teaches that inspiration and miraculous power ceased nearly 1800 years ago.”

Those who deny the possibility of new revelations from God take refuge in the twenty second chapter of Revelation, which reads:

For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book.

It is held that because this statement is found in almost the last paragraph of the last book of the Bible it means that there are to be no more revelations from God. Actually, it does not say that at all. It only says that man shall not add, and there is not even a suggestion that God himself would not add. On the contrary, Isaiah speaks of God revealing knowledge to man “precept upon precept . . . line upon line . . . here a little, and there a little” (Isaiah 28:10). Amos tells us, “Surely the Lord God will do nothing, until he revealeth the secret unto his servants the prophets” (Amos 3:7).

To assume that John had reference to the entire Bible when he used the expression “this book” is also an error, he could have meant only the Book of Revelation, for the present collection of books which comprise the canon of scripture was not assembled until hundreds of years later. Even then all of the books were not located, for there are some twenty-one books mentioned in the Bible that have never been found.

It will also be of interest to note that prophecies contained in the Book of Revelation itself could not be fulfilled without further revelations. In Revelation 11:3, John speaks of two prophets who shall prophesy 1,260 days before the end.

Finally, those who persist in the belief that the statement in Revelation 22 means there could be no further revelations will have difficulty in justifying the existence of nearly all of the Old and New Testaments when they discover that almost the not adding to the word of God is identical statement regarding man not adding to the word of God is found in the fifth book of the Old Testament:

Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish ought from it, that ye may keep the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you.—Deuteronomy 4: 2.

MODERN REVELATION NEVER POPULAR

In attempting to establish the sufficiency of past revelations for all ages, some have asked whether or not the revelations of God to Paul were sufficient to save him. Receiving an affirmative answer, they have come back with the comment, "If it was sufficient to save Paul, isn't it sufficient to save us?"

We must agree that the revelations of God in all ages have been sufficient to save those who received them. God's revelations to repentant Adam and righteous Abel were sufficient to save them, but it took a new revelation to save Noah from the flood. Although Lot was a righteous man, he would never have escaped the shower of fire and brimstone about to be poured out upon the plains had he not believed in new revelations. Those who perished in the cities believed that past revelations were sufficient.

When Jesus offered new revelations to the Hebrews, they appealed to the old ones, saying: "We know that God spoke unto Moses; but as for this man [Jesus] we know not from whence he is." Like well-ceemented cisterns, the Pharisees carefully treasured the revelations of the past and their stock expression was, "Verily it hath been said of old." Jesus, on the other hand, was like an ever-flowing fountain of new truth. While honoring the past, he expressed new truths by the authority of his divine sonship. He used the expression, "Verily I say unto thee."

One minister has aptly pointed out that those who are busiest painting and garnishing the tombs of dead prophets are generally the first to bring the stone, the fagot, and the cross for living ones. Those who make themselves hoarse in crying, "We know that God spake to Moses," are generally ready to vary their speech with an occasional "Away with him! Crucify him!" when a new prophet appears.

NEW REVELATION NEEDED

It is a great error to suppose that the revelations of God to one individual, race, or generation are sufficient to fully establish the duties of men in all succeeding generations. Every generation should grow beyond the religious stature of the previous generation and must therefore receive new revelations from God couched in present-day thought forms and suited to the peculiar conditions of its age.

RELIGIOUS LEADERS SEEK NEW REVELATIONS

In his sermon, "The Nature of Religion," Dr. Lynn Hough, pastor of the Central Methodist Church in Detroit, Michigan, said:

To keep the note of discovery is the great battle of the historic religions. There are forces at work in all of them which tend to reduce the whole structure to commonplaceness, dullness, and convention. The battle between the prophets and the priests is the perpetual conflict between the discoverers and those who have had no fresh contact with reality.

In this sense it is rather unfortunate that we think of the cannon of the Old and New Testaments as closed. For a closed form of experience is all too likely to mean for many men a literary prison beyond whose walls they dare not go.

Principal Fairbairn once said, "Of every religion, revelation is an integral part; the man who does not believe that God can speak to him, will not speak to God." Therefore, the possibility of religion involves the possibility of revelation.

A HEBREW SPEAKS OUT

In his splendid book, Peace of Mind, Rabbi Joshua Loth Liebman makes an appeal for new revelations:

But wiser religious teachers today are coming to see the fallacy of identifying truth with the frozen concepts of the past. They insist that whatever aids mankind in its quest for self-fulfillment is a new revelation of God's working in history. . . . Today's cringing world needs the support of a peace-giving faith that combines the substance of the old with the light of the new.

HOW DOES GOD SPEAK

A beautiful expression of faith in the revealing power of God and a willingness to let God speak to him in whatever way he chose was penned by the late Dr. Frederick M. Smith, who served for thirty-two years as president and prophet of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. He wrote:

At a certain time of my life it became necessary for me, especially since I was asked to accept a position that is unique among all the organizations of the world, to give considerable thought to the question of how God shall reveal himself to his people. There was a disposition at one time on my part to limit God as to how he should reveal his will. But I passed this point and have been able to say, If thou, O God, art desirous of revealing thy will to us, or to me, be it far from me to say how. If it be that thou desirest to write across the arch of thy heaven those words that thou shalt see fit to transmit to thy people, then give me the wisdom to read. Or if thou dost choose to manifest thy power in the thunderous tones that thou art capable of giving, so that they will ring through all the arch of heaven, let my ears be open. Or if, in the still, small voice that comes from within, thou shalt choose to reveal thy will to me, then let thy Spirit attune my spiritual ear to the reception of thy word. Or if thou dost choose to utilize those powers with which thou hast by nature endowed me, quicken by thine own processes of development, to transmit through them the message that thou hast to give to thy people, then my pen shall be ready. Or if thou dost choose to bathe my soul in thy Spirit until my spiritual vision shall behold what thou dost desire thy people to accomplish, even then shall I endeavor as thy instrument to transmit the message to thy people.—Saints' Herald, Volume 67, October 6, 1918, page 49.

A MODERN PARABLE

Our hearts go out to those people to whom God has become an abstract being who once revealed his will to humankind, ministered to their needs, and then withdrew the glory of his presence and ceased to give further revelation of his will, leaving mankind to work out his own salvation through obedience to that portion of his revealed will recorded in the Holy Scriptures. This calls to mind a modern parable told by Dr. Joseph Luff:

An earthly parent with a large family once placarded his palace with announcements of his impartiality and unchangeability, then spread his tables bounteously with all the health and joy-giving products of air, and earth, and sea—the cereals, vegetables, fruits, flowers, and delicious beverages. He then invited the older members of his family to enter the banquet hall where the great arc and incandescent lamps furnished light, and permitted them to gaze upon and enjoy a most magnificent spectacle and royal banquet. They feasted and rejoiced, and chatted one with another in happiness akin to bliss, and wrote and recited paeans of praise to their father, who was so generous and considerate. As they were thus engaged, their speeches and expressions of joy were noted down, together with a list of the meats and drinks upon which they feasted. This was done by certain of them whom the father had selected and requested so to do. The records were preserved, the tables were cleared and the happy company passed out of a door at the opposite end of the hall from which they entered. The lights were extinguished and the father, who, with his gorgeously attired servants, had been conversing with and waiting upon his children, withdrew from the banqueting-hall, and retired to his parlor for a season, and had all of his actions published, that his character and will and whereabouts might be everywhere known. His riches continued, and his estate was magnificent.

In a short time the younger members of the family grew up, read the records, rejoiced in their prospects, entered the banqueting-hall by the same door and under the same directions as had the older ones, marched around the immense room, read all the placards which told of the father's unchangeability, impartiality, etc., toward all his household and finally seated themselves on the same chairs once occupied by the others. Upon each plate before them was found a copy of the record which had been kept of the things eaten, drunk and said. There were none of those things remaining, however—no flowers, fruits, nuts, cereals, vegetables, or beverages, as of old; the lights were not burning, and they had to supply themselves with matches or candles to read the records referred to. The father and the brilliantly attired servants were not there; but they waited on the strength of what the wall placards announced and what they had learned in the accounts of himself published by their father. Still he came not, nor those servants, nor were the electric lights turned on. They murmured, and often looked at the empty dishes before them, and cried out for the father's approach and the supplies indicated.

Just then there entered a few poorly attired persons, claiming to be servants of the father, and requested the children to refrain from such complaint and supplication, as it was displeasing to the father, who was too busy or too little interested in them to visit them. These servants also informed the children that their portion was to be found in the printed records before them on their dishes.

Astonished at this, the children asked how they could feed on the mere story of what their older brothers and sisters enjoyed; they asked why they were being so treated; why this discrimination by a self-claimed unchangeable and impartial father. The answer given was: "Simply because you were not born soon enough." The children asked whether they were responsible for that, but were turned away with the reply that the "record of what had taken place at the great banquet was to be their portion" but that all the evidences of loyalty and affection for their father, such as were displayed by the others of whom they read, were required of them also without diminution, under penalty of disinheritance and final destruction.

"What think you, dear friends, of such a parent and such a case?" asked Elder Luff. "Of course you don't believe it, no father could be so manifestly unjust and partial to his children while he retained his senses and riches, and especially while he published himself to the contrary.

"The Bible tells such a story of spiritual feasting by our brothers, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Peter, John, Paul, and thousands of others. It tells of what they ate, drank, said, and did; of the Father being with them by his spirit and the Son and the angels who ministered to them—the light of direct revelation let in upon them; and how their souls were enriched by Pentecostal baptisms of miracle and of glory. A picture that would bring retribution to any earthly father is thus offered as a photograph of 'Our Father which art in heaven.'"

A PLEA FOR LIGHT

The power of God to make his voice heard by his children is as great today as it was in the dawn of human history, and we must never despair of receiving divine aid. Furthermore, the need of God's special direction is as great today as it ever was, for man's condition is exhibiting features of necessity which the wisdom of man can never supply. Every purely human effort to supply that need only magnifies the trouble, adding to the chaos of religious and political disorder and discontent. Our God is not the God of favored centuries or people, but the Father of the human race, and, as such, his obligations are the same to all people in all ages. When we place ourselves in an attitude to receive His counsel, God will speak to us today.

The Bread of Life

A GREAT SAINT of the Middle Ages once penned these words among his literary notes, "All our life is a search for God, and we are restless and dissatisfied until we find him."

There is in every awakened soul a hunger for truth, for knowledge, for reality, for contact with ultimate origins and causes. It was a consciousness of this universal human hunger that led Jesus to declare, "I am the bread of life." He used the term "bread" as a symbol of all the forces that sustain our mortal existence, but particularly he referred to the eternal life.

Jesus found his disciples too often concerned with the cares of this world. Their thoughts were dominated by their backs and their stomachs. They were too much concerned with food and clothing, and so he declared to them (Luke 12: 23), "The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment."

Everyone of us leads a double life. We are citizens of two worlds, and we must obey the laws of survival in both of them. We are born to this earth and must pass our allotted span of years upon it, but our destiny is heaven. We are at once carnal and spiritual: at once mortal and immortal. Jesus sought on another occasion to turn the thoughts of his disciples from earthly possessions to spiritual views. He declared to them (Luke 12: 15), "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth."

The important part of our life consists in what we are, not in what we have. What we do is important, not what we acquire.

THE BREAD AND THE STONES

TO THOSE who are hungry, all the earth consists either of things that can be eaten or those that cannot. Among all the starving nations there is an abundance of stones, but there is a dearth of bread. Though the stones be precious jewels, they will not sustain life, and it is especially true that they contribute nothing to eternal life.

A sermon delivered at Stone Church, Sunday, August 31, 1947, Scripture reading: John 6: 32-35.

Jesus pointed this lesson to his followers when he asked them the question, "What man is there of you, whom if his son asked bread, would he give him a stone?"—Luke 7: 10.

There are those who, in answer to the world's hunger and need, are passing out spiritual stones—things that will not and cannot sustain spiritual life. There are not many fathers who would actually give their children stones instead of bread, or serpents instead of fish, as indicated by the question of Jesus. We are not troubled with that sort of thing in our modern civilization, but we are faced with the problem of sons and daughters—and older ones, too—who demand the stones instead of the bread of life.

This, also, was true in the time of the Prophet Isaiah who challenged the children of Israel with the question, "Wherefore do you spend money for that which is not bread, and who labor for that which satisfieth not?"—Isaiah 55: 2.

As in Isaiah's time, the people are still clamoring for stones, spending their money for things that do not satisfy hunger and that do them no good.

THE BREAD OF LIFE

THERE ARE times when the bread of life may consist of many things. It may be anything that preserves us from death and destruction, either physical or spiritual.

By Leonard J. Lea

There are times when knowledge may be the bread of life. Hosea (4: 6) delivered the word of the Lord declaring, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge." We can see this happening all over our country and in our own city today. People living in ignorance are destroying themselves physically and spiritually by what they drink and by what they eat and by what they do with their lives. They perish of poison and disease.

During the depression, we saw people who were suffering from malnutrition—fathers and mothers and little children who could not help themselves. They were in need of physical food, and it was the bread of life for them.

There are times when righteousness is the bread of life, and people die because they know nothing about it. They must learn that sin is a destroyer and that it cuts short their lives and leaves them in pain and misery.

There are times when wisdom is the bread of life, when people perish from bad judgment and folly.

There are times when friendship, the companionship of church people is the bread of life, and too many of our members thoughtlessly move away, scatter their families about the country, deprive them of church privileges and association with church members until they lose all knowledge of the gospel of salvation. This is tragic, since little children cannot help themselves. Many children would love to attend church school but do not have the opportunity to do so because their parents have thoughtlessly moved away for supposed opportunities and employment.

There are times when books, music, education, culture, poetry—when these things are the bread of life. They are as necessary to the mind and spirit as food is to the body, and people deprive themselves of these cultural things—cut themselves off from life, being content with mere physical welfare and existence.

TOO MANY of the people are choosing stones and rejecting bread of life. If we are to live in the fullest and richest and happiest possibilities that have been placed within us, we should choose the superior things of life and superior people as our friends. This does not mean that we are to be snobs. It means that we must learn from the best people we can find, and in turn, after we have enriched our own minds, we must teach others who have had fewer opportunities than we. The bread of life is the means by which we must live.

Sometimes the bread of physical life is a stone for spiritual life. Some people prefer the stones, and some prefer the wine of death.

THE STONES OF OUR AGE

THE STONES of our age which people are taking instead of the bread of life are in some instances the social—the social and economic institutions which produce want, suffering, and inequality. They produce a pagan way of life with a lack of brotherhood and an abundance of suffering. The people of America have nothing but the economic stones with which they starved through the last depression and on which they fought through the last war. Since we have had so many depressions before in the history of our country, it is not at all improbable that hard times will come again. The social and economic society with which we tried ineffectually to meet the last depression and from which so many people suffered is all that we have to meet future depressions. We have nothing to protect us that we did not have before. We have made no single step of progress unless we take precautions to keep out of debt and to accumulate reserves and resources that will help us in hard times to come. It is all still on a personal basis. There is nothing that we have done as a group with which to protect ourselves.

The bread of life needed by our age is the kingdom of God, and Jesus declared to us, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God" (Matthew 6:33). The Inspired Version rendering is even better. "Seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God and to establish his righteousness." This was Jesus' message to a materialistic nation in his own time. It was his message to all succeeding generations and peoples. It is his message to us today.

But in spite of all his teaching, there are Christians today who take a materialistic view of the bread of life. So many of them regard it as simply another sandwich to stave off hunger for a little while. They do not see its eternal aspects.

It is not alone the material resources of a community that can save it. It is the spirit of the community—the organization that brings salvation. Will Rogers once said that this was the only nation in the world where people were standing in bread lines up to their knees in wheat.

Have we done anything to bring the kingdom of God, the bread of life, the Christian community any nearer to our people?

To be deprived of what you need is partial death. It prevents the fulfillment of your life. Some people suffer continual death. A scientist has said the universe is like a great thought conceived in the mind of God. The Greek philosophers declared that everything in the world existed first in the form of ideas before they could be made as material objects. Every good thing in the world had its origin in the thoughts of God. So it is literally true that the bread of life is something given to us by Divinity. We must turn to God, or we shall be choosing stones instead of the bread of life.

all the time. And it is when our love reaches up to God for help that we learn it has been there all the time, waiting for us. When we pray, "Lord, I am lost. What is wrong?" He answers, "You do not love me enough." And when we pray, "Lord, what shall I do?" He answers, "Love me more, and I can give you greater help."

The secret of love is to practice it yourself, and you will find it returning to you with heavenly help, in glory and power.

Baptisms in European Mission

A note to the Department of Statistics from Apostle M. A. McConley indicates that up to July 29 there have been twenty-two baptisms in the British Isles, and one in Denmark.

From Germany, he has received figures showing the following baptisms in various cities: Uetersen, six; Hannover, four; Brandenburg, four; Berlin, five; Grossraschen, thirty-four; Nurnberg, seven; Offenbach, four; making sixty-four altogether.

Nauvoo Grape Festival

Mrs. Harold Smith of Nauvoo, Illinois, sends a copy of the official souvenir program of the Nauvoo Grape Festival which was held September 12 to 14 this year. The book is of fine quality, well illustrated, and of special interest because of the main feature article, "The History of Nauvoo," by Brother Roderic A. Lewis, which puts a great many facts into the hands of the general public who might never otherwise learn of them. Two other principal contributions are by Brother Lewis, an account of the development of the "Nauvoo Blue Cheese," for which the city is also famous, and a poem, "Beautiful Place," written in the style of Hiawatha. He also made a number of good photographs of historical buildings used in the book.

Wants to Meet Members

East Los Angeles Church, California

East Los Angeles Branch Opens

The opening of the new East Los Angeles Church, located on the corner of Olympic and Concourse Boulevard, was held August 17, 1947. Services commenced at 9:30 a.m., and continued throughout the day until 9:00 p.m. The auditorium was beautifully decorated with fifteen floral bouquets and two potted palms given by community florists. Approximately two hundred fifty to three hundred attended the services throughout the day. There was congregational singing, special music, and solos furnished by the East Los Angeles choir. Pastor V. L. Lum gave the address of welcome followed by brief messages from District President Louis J. Ostertag and District Bishop David Carmichael. The district director of religious education, Glen E. Holmes, gave the welcome and address of the church school. At the noon hour, a basket lunch was served by the women's department. In the afternoon there was a baptismal service. High Priest L. L. Sutherland gave the sermon on baptism. Mrs. Helen Filer and Mrs. Bobetta Johnson were baptized by Elder Louis J. Ostertag. The closing sermon was by District President Louis J. Ostertag.

This new edifice is of stucco construction. Some of its features include the colonial style in church building, especially on the inside. The main auditorium will seat approximately two hundred, and there is a wing for church school classes that will seat approximately fifty. The cost of the building is between $20,000.00 and $25,000.00.

"You Can't Take It With You"

I said, "No, I can't go to a show tonight. I'm over my ears in work, and no theater in the world will make me forget it."

"Come," said my wife with finality.

So I went. We saw the Pulitzer prize play, "You Can't Take It with You." Of course you can't take it with you—your money and worldly success—to the next world. Nor can you take your work with you to that hilarious comedy. It chains you to the present.

It's the story of a successful business man who started for the office one day and discovered in the elevator that he didn't want to make any more money. So he rode down and never returned to business again. Farcically, but none the less convincingly, everybody in the play makes himself happy by the very simple rule of not postponing what he most enjoys.

During the past two years I have asked 2,997 persons, "What do you live for?" I discovered that 94 per cent are merely enduring the present while hopefully waiting for some Utopia in the future.

Poor souls! They are wasting today's realities for tomorrow's speculations, sitting bored at a great entertainment, waiting for a better show which may never open.

Let's Improve Our Ministry

By Karl Schoepke (of Germany)

Man's curiosity imposes upon him the feeling of an obligation to explore both visible and invisible things. Men fear the things they do not know. Progress is not possible for the lazy, the indifferent. Naturally men try to understand the universe. Spiritual things—those which "hold the world together" (Goethe, Faust)—call for exploration.

What shall the individual study? Professional men must understand the laws and changing conditions of their work. They must be masters of theory as well as of practice; they must keep informed of new discoveries. Continual study accompanying practical experience has many advantages. The man who studies thus will climb to higher positions, earn greater rewards, receive honor, and perhaps even be envied.

Hand laborers may sometimes think that these considerations do not concern them, but this is an error. A bricklayer, for example, needs manual skills and spiritual capacities too. A good mind will help the hand laborer to find happiness in his work, and help him to avoid accidents and injury to his health. The workman may not see the book that he needs to improve his skill and understanding, and he may feel too tired to read. But he must consider that no progress is possible without labor and sweat in his leisure time, too. A good remedy for his weariness is a short rest before turning to study. The morning hours are very good for learning.

On the other hand, study may require some sacrifices. The student must withdraw from many amusements and conversations; he must forego the enjoyment of nature and some healthful exercise. Great knowledge can be obtained only in quietness. Hard study may impair the health. Fortunately, these dangers are not so great for those who carry on studies in their leisure time, because work and experience provide variety and give the encouragement of contact with other people.

We as members of the church are under obligation to learn the divine will. This is not the work of a day or a year. There are good books ("Learn wisdom out of the best books" says a revelation) that we ought to read. They must be examined and compared with previously won knowledge. If we do this, we come nearer to God, to perfection, and finally Zion. Great blessings will come to our church if we as members (and especially the priesthood) understand our many tasks. Nobody can say that he is not able to read the Standard Books of the church. Nobody can answer that he cannot buy them, for they are inexpensive. German members are not happy because many church books were lost in the flames in the past war. New books do not exist in Germany. Nobody may reply that reading and learning is exclusively a task of the ministers. Those who do not understand may ask the minister, who must displease God if he does not know. God sometimes does not answer our questions because we may learn the answers by ourselves in the course of study and time.

Members who have the advantage of college or university study may be glad. The world of the present and future needs them to solve its problems. They are among the leaders of mankind. But it is their duty to bring the things they have learned to the service of the cause of the kingdom of God. Let us consider also that we are responsible for the use we make of our science and knowledge.

The statement of Jesus, which is borne by the German university of Freiburg, "The truth shall make you free," contains a challenge to long for and to seek the truth. The truth is concealed, but it can be found. It is worthy of seeking, worthy of thought; and it will give us peace within ourselves and finally everlasting life.

"We can redeem the man who again and again continues to strive."—Faust.

Life Spared by Administration

After reading Brother Elbert's account of a little girl's being healed, I remembered what my brother, Arthur, told me before he passed away. The doctors had pronounced me dead when I was eleven months old, but Elders E. C. Briggs and David Smith administered to me anyway. As soon as they removed their hands from my head, I sat up and was completely well. That was in 1870; I am now seventy-eight years old.

Leola LaLone Sheppard

By BONITA PEARSON

About twelve years ago Leola LaLone moved with her family from Cheboygan, Michigan, to Joplin, Missouri, Branch. With several other families, they had come to the Spring River District. Later, her home was in Pittsburg, Kansas.

Leola's advantages were limited, but her desire to reach higher levels of learning and living was boundless. The establishment of her own home, following her marriage to David Sheppard, was one of the major steps toward those higher levels. She loved her home and adored her family.

Life bore down very heavily when David was taken into the armed service, leaving her the care of three small children, the baby just a few months old. And then came the shock of learning that her affliction was of an incurable nature. It was during the years of this illness that she obeyed the urge to write which she had always felt. Her literary work was developing, and though it showed promise of greater growth had she lived, it possessed a quality that always seemed to fit some given situation.

Leola's talent included a flair for drama. She was able to give a reading or story with just the right feeling, often doing these things to the detriment of her health. She was always eager to write and present things for her home branch (then Pittsburg, Kansas), and was more than happy to know she had offered something (worship services published in the "Herald") that the general church could use. Her death (at twenty-eight years of age) snuffed out a promising career, but what she has given will be held dear in the memories of many people.

My People Must Know

By BISHOP J. A. KOEHLER

WHEN AUGIE, one of my grandsons, was four years old, I made for him a six-cornered kite with one of those long tails. Augie was anxious to fly that kite—so anxious that he did not hear “instruction’s warning voice.” So everything went wrong. The kite would not fly.

Augie knew that kites would fly in the hands of people who knew how to fly them. So he said, “What’s the matter, Grandpa, why won’t it fly? Why can’t I make it fly?”

So I showed him how to hold his kite—the proper position in relation to the wind, the way the tail should lie on the ground; and a half-dozen other particulars. And when I had finished my explanation, Augie said: “Well, you have to know a lot of things to fly a kite, don’t you, Grandpa?” “Yes, son,” I said, “if it’s only to fly a kite, there are things one must know.”

MUST KNOW

COULD SCIENCE and technology have made an atomic bomb before it knew? Could “medicine” cure the diseases of the human body unless it knew? Could “industry” make automobiles if it did not know? Could you keep books if you did not know? Could you make oyster soup, even—soup in which the milk is not curdled—if you did not know? What can anyone do on his own—anyone who doesn’t know?

Everyone should know that to do things on his own he “must know.” Still, many times I have seen forty-year-old boys try (figuratively speaking) to fly their kites—big boys, who had no better success than my little boy; grown-up boys who did not seem to sense the truth that to “fly their kites” successfully they must know.

THE BADNESS OF IGNORANCE

You have heard the story, have you not, of the man who hoed the farmer’s corn so that when the hoeing was all done there was no corn left in the field? Surely you must know from personal experience something of the badness of ignorance.

Some of my choicest flowers have been uprooted, destroyed, by the hand of ignorance. Suckling babes have gone to their graves because female parents, called “mothers” (and male parents, too) did not know.

And now the explanation of the ineffectiveness of the Christian spirit is: Christendom does not know. “In part [in large part] the cause of this disappointment [this failure of “the Christian spirit” to achieve social amelioration through the right ordering of human relations] is to be found in the vagueness of our own ideas [in that which we do not know], and in the consequent uncertainty as to our methods and objectives”—in the obscurity of our knowledges. The explanation of Christendom’s failure is, in part: Christendom does not know.

That may not be the explanation of the “lower downs,” but it is the explanation of the real “higher ups.” Those who know that they do not know are saying: “Oh, Lord, God, Why won’t it fly? Why can’t we make it fly?”

The prophet of the Restoration said the same thing about Latter Day Saint people. He said (see Doctrine and Covenants 102: 3 in particular): “My people” has not been able to fly its kite—to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion, that is—because “my people” do not know.

“MY PEOPLE”

Isaiah, “the” prophet of the Kingdom to come, makes frequent use of the designation, “My people.” He means the people who are called to do a very special work for God. That work is to bless all nations by lifting up “a standard” of government. See chapters 2, 40, and 62 in particular.

Sometimes the term, “My people,” denotes the group; the whole body of persons who compose the community, or light-of-the-world “City,” which that people is called to build; and sometimes it refers to those persons individually. The verb, in each instance, reveals the specific meaning—whether it means the group or the individual.

The prophet of “Restoration”—which is to be the fulfillment of Isaiah’s coming Kingdom prophecy—uses the term “My people” as applying to the Latter Day Saint Church, or to the persons (both individually and collectively) who compose that church. See Doctrine and Covenants 102: 2 in particular. And that is the sense in which “My people” is used in this discussion.

WHAT NOT-KNOWING DOES TO OTHERS

When people do not know, they not only fail in their own affairs, they make ineffective the work of others. One needs only to be “alive” to see that even in “the” church, because “my people” do not know, bad things are voted up and good things down.

Sometimes in the church the best men have been “laughed out of court” by the ignorance of the worst. Roger Bacon, one of the best men the Christian Church ever had, said: “It is on account of the ignorance of those with whom I have had to deal that I have been unable to accomplish more.” In Roger’s day, in the church, ignorance was exalted and knowledge was made low; the mystic who knew so much that was not true exercised authority over the realist who knew a little that was and is true.

If you have read the lives of the great men of science, surely you must know something of their sufferings at the hands of ignorance. The ignorance of some can destroy more in ten minutes than the knowledge of others can accomplish in ten years.

ESPECIALLY “RELIGION”

But, despite the ignorance of men, both high and low, the genius of science has succeeded in “flying its kite.” It has been able to “do its stuff.” The genius of kingdom religion has not. It only looks forward in faith to the time of its accomplishment, saying, “It shall come to pass.”

The genius of true religion has suffered more than the genius of science at the hands of ignorance because the latter has power within itself to do its stuff. The scientist may implement his truth with his own hands. Louis Pasteur, for instance, made the truth work in his little, stuffy, old laboratory, notwithstanding the ridicule of the schools of medicine that flourished in his day—each of which was sillier than the other. What others did not know made no difference to that scientist. It was only what he knew that mattered.

But that is not true of the genius of Kingdom religion, for that genius is utterly helpless in the face of ignorance; it cannot possibly do its stuff except as the people catch the vision, except as they know something of that which it seeks to bring to pass. For that genius is concerned with the business to which only peoples who know can effectually attend. Contemplate the “Kingdom” prophets.

www.LatterDayTruth.org

See what ignorance has done to the business to which those men of social vision—which is ethical vision—have been devoted.

I once said to "a great church man," who has since gone to his reward, "Why don't you institute measures to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion?" He said it was because of the ignorance of the people. "No, Gus," said he, "to succeed in that enterprise, my people must know." He said, as Roger Bacon said: "It is on account of the ignorance of those with whom I have had to deal that I have not been able to accomplish more."

I do not say he told the whole truth and nothing but the truth. I only say that his explanation of his own performance was, "My people" do not know.

WHAT IT IS TO KNOW

St. Paul observed that some men are "ever learning, and never able to come to a knowledge of the truth"—ever memorizing, and never knowing; ever gathering data, statistics, information, and never "gathering wisdom." Of the former, there is no ending; of the latter, little more than a beginning.

The important question in information-gathering is: "Understandest thou what thou readest"—(or seest)? Do we interpret the language we read or the facts we find? Do we reason? Or do we only memorize?

Once when I was recovering from an operation in a hospital, a nurse came into my room at the close of day to take away my cut flowers. I asked, "Why do you take those flowers away at the close of day?" The nurse said, "Because it is not good to keep them in your room overnight." I said, "How do you know?" She said, "Why, I thought everyone knew that. It is an established rule of nursing." "Yes," I said, "that may be so. But do you 'know' that the rule you have memorized is true? If you do, tell me how you know."

Well, at the moment, that nurse could give no reason for her belief because she did not "know" that it was true. That is to say, she did not apprehend the relation between cut flowers in dark rooms and the health of the occupant.

So we chattered about metabolism and catabolism, about that which happens to cut flowers in particular in the absence of light (especially sunlight), and about the known effects of excesses of carbon dioxide upon the blood, and so on. And after a bit, the nurse said, "Oh, I see. Now I know."

To "know," in the sense in which we use that word on this occasion—when we say, "My people must know"—is to understand the necessary relations arising from the nature of things. To know is to have "the light of truth."

I make it a rule, it is a habit of mine, to try to say in my own words that which I apprehend to be the meanings of the words used by others. When I read: "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God," I say that means that in ethical relations a man's emotional attachments condition his thought movement. I say it means that as respects the essence and crux of true religion, the man who feels crooked cannot see straight.

When I read, "If you continue in my word . . . the truth shall make you free," I say that means that the truth is for consequences through implementation. And I do that because it seems to me that until I can do it, I do not distinctly and clearly "know."

Memorizing is not knowing. Aping the sayings of others is not "knowing" that which they say. Information and conception are not the same thing. The having of foggy ideas which provide no anchorages in the storms of life is not knowing. Feeling is not knowing. Knowing is understanding—it is interpretation. That is what I mean when I say, "My people must know."

My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge.— Hosea 4: 6.

In a discussion of a religious question in which a variety of opinions were expressed, one person said, "I don't know what to believe. One person says this and another says that. I don't know what is true."

I said, "Would you know what to believe, would you know what is true, if everyone said the same thing—if they all seemed to be of one opinion? My dear friend," I said, "the Christian Church never knew less about the truth, it was never more deeply in apostasy, than when everyone said the same thing."

What difference does it make to the man who "knows," if one says this and another says that? The man who knows is not in the seventh heaven today because there is religious accord, and in the seventh hell tomorrow because there is religious discord. The man who knows does not build his religious house on a "hearsay" foundation of superstitions, traditions, or what—on a foundation which cannot withstand the storms of life. He builds in the "light" of "truth." To "see" the "light" of "truth"—that is what it is to know.

THERE ARE PLACES TO GO IN OUR KNOWING

Even in the work of the church there is a division of labor. Some "prie'st's" specialize in apostleing, some in bishoping, some in pastoring, some in this, and some in that. I am a bishop. Even within that specific field, I have specialized. I have had to, to learn a few of the things I did not know. All bishops, in common with all "apostles and prophets" and the rest, have places to go and things to do—many places and many things—before their knowledges shall come to be adequate, even for the present.

WHAT MUST MY PEOPLE KNOW?

The answer to the question, "What must the individual know," is at once the answer to the question, "What must my people know?" It is simply: the individual must know his business, his task, the thing that he must do. He must know his own "kite-flying."

To be a successful farmer, one must know farming. To be a successful engineer, one must know engineering. To be a successful musician, one must know music. And so on and on. The individual must know that which he wishes to do. He must know how to perform his specific task.

"My people," any people, is the whole body of persons, or individuals, that compose the community, or who live together under one government.

A true community is an organized society; it is a body politic; it is the persons who reside in one locality as subjects of one government. The business of the people is government. It is not farming. It is not engineering. It is not the mothering (as a parent) of children. It is none of the specific functions which individuals are called upon to perform under the division of labor. The business of "my people" is to give direction to the life of the whole body of persons who compose it—social life in its totality and unity—and to exercise the control that is requisite to make its life (as a community, or as "a body" politic) orderly, efficient, and just. The business of "my people" is to govern its own affairs—the affairs of "my people"—so that society may be peaceful, prosperous, and happy; so that the sum of the functions performed both privately and publicly shall enrich human life or promote the well-being of the soul. It is, specifically, to lift up "a standard" of "government" for universal enlightenment. And that is what "my people" must know.

EACH MUST KNOW THE BUSINESS OF "ALL"

But peoples are composed of persons. A true people is a body of persons engaged in the business of self-government. Peoples can know that business only as the persons who compose it know that business—as “the team” on the gridiron for example, can know football only as the persons who compose the team know football. As no member of the team can play the game except as he knows it, so no person—no citizen of Zion—can “play the game” except as he knows the Zion-redeeming business—which is the business, specifically, of internal economic self-governance. Internal economic self-governance—that business of “all”—is what “my people” (collectively and severally) must know.

THIS IS REQUISITE

Let the farmer and the physician, the mechanic and the merchant—let everyone remember, let him never lose sight of the fact, that besides his individual business he must know the business of his people—if he is to be party to the successful conduct of that business. Let every Latter Day Saint remember that the right to “judge all things pertaining to Zion,” or to judge the business of “My people,” involves the duty of knowing how to judge those things aright—for no man has right to do wrong.

Let every member of the church remember that it is his duty to have an understanding of “all things pertaining to the church.” Let every one who has anything to do on his own (which it is his duty to know how to do) remember—let him never forget—that it is his duty to know also “the kite-flying business” of “my people.”

Citizenship is a common responsibility of all free men. It is not requisite that “all” should know how to perform the tasks of each, but it is requisite that each should know the task of “all.”

THE DARKNESS THAT COVERETH THE EARTH

The race is not in darkness as respects crop rotation, baby feeding, navigation, and all such like. It is not in the area of the physical sciences and the practical arts that darkness covereth the earth and “gross darkness the People.” (See Isaiah 60. See the whole prophecy: chapters 58 to 62 inclusive.) It is in respect to the business of “peoples.”

As respects the business of peoples, this deep-sleep-ness is the theme of several prophecies, particularly the prophecy of Isaiah, chapter 59. The darkness which covers the earth is so impenetrable that “none calleth for justice”—for the right ordering of human relations, that is, “nor any pleadeth for truth: [instead] they trust in lies; they conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity.” “My people perish for lack of knowledge.” Gross darkness shall cover the earth so that all peoples shall perish, said the prophets. And in 1947 we know that is true.

“The way of peace they know not”—not in 1947. Consequently “there is no judgment in their goings: they make them crooked paths [since they see crooked]: whosoever goeth therein shall not know peace.” “Gross darkness covereth the earth.”

“Wasting and destruction are in their paths.” Ignorance is destructive.

“We grope for the wall like the blind” as if we had no eyes with which to see. “We stumble at noonday as [we stumble] in the night. . . .”

“Yea, truth faileth.” There is no knowledge of the “truth” in which the business of peoples should be grounded. “And he that departeth not from evil maketh himself a prey.”

Daniel, too, features that darkness in his prophecy of the coming Kingdom. Chapter two. Every kite that every people (except “my people”) shall ever try to fly shall be dashed to pieces. They shall all be “broken in pieces together”—because peoples do not know. “And gross darkness [covers] the people.”

Strange how much you've got to know, before you know how little you know.
--Anon.

THE EFFECT: THE DOOM OF MAN

Ignorance of the truth of human-living-together is man’s “fatal” ignorance. The fruitage of that ignorance is “the calamity which shall come upon the inhabitants of the earth.”

Contemplate our bungling of government. Of our ineffectual endeavors as peoples to deliver ourselves from the evils which “our” ignorance of that business has visited upon us, every one should know. Politically, we have jumped from “frying pans into fires.” Even the nation that leads the world in political experimentation—even England—is enmeshed in a net of ignorance of the business of peoples: the business of self-governance. There would be no crisis of civilization but for this ignorance.

THE LAMENTATION OF THE PROPHETS

Because that is the ignorance which has ruined the business of the Kingdom, that ignorance of “My people” is the lamentation of the prophets. In the very nature of things, that is their lamentation. For the business of the Kingdom—which is the business of self-governance—is the business for the establishment of which the prophets give their lives. Neither lions’ dens nor fiery furnaces can turn the energies of the prophets of the Kingdom away from that business. Since it has always made their labors abortive, why should not that ignorance of “my people”—that ignorance of the business of the Kingdom—be the lamentation of the prophets?

“The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master’s crib” (Isaiah 1: 3). But “my people” do not consider; they are not given to reflection; they will not do their own knowing. “Give us a king,” they say; let him attend to the people’s business. So, “my people are destroyed,” even in the year 1947, “for lack of knowledge” (Hosea 4: 6). “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem,” “hadst thou but known.” O Zion, Zion, hadst thou but known. If thou hadst, it would now be a very different day for thee.

“MY PEOPLE” MUST DO ITS OWN THINKING

Can an unprophetic people perform the singular offices of the prophet? Must not God have a prophetic people in his service? Amos said (chapter 3, verse 7) that assuredly “the Lord God doeth nothing, but he revealeth his secret [the thing he would have known and done] to his servants the prophets.”

It is necessary that a prophetic people should be called to do God’s “marvellous work and a wonder.” Kingdom builder, must be conceptual forerunners. They must have creative vision. They must be both Kingdom-designer and Kingdom-builder; they must conceive the Kingdom on their own and devise their own ways of implementing their Kingdom concept: from beginning to end, they must know the Kingdom-building business.

Do you know of any source of true Kingdom concepts except God’s prophets? (I do not mean the kind of prophets that are “made” by ordination. I mean the kind of prophets that are mentally constituted for the Kingdom-building business.)

Can the Russians or any other people teach “my people,” can they cause it to know the business of the Kingdom? Can “Uncle Sam” do it? Can any “Christian” people do it? Can even the intelligentsia of Christendom do it? Must not “my people” do its own cultivating of its Kingdom-building capacities? Must not “my people” educate itself? “My people” must do their own knowing.

THE SCHOOLS OF “MY PEOPLE”

It is requisite, therefore, that “my people” should have schools of its own, in which to do its own (distinctive) teaching of itself. The highest institution of learning of my people (which exists only as an idea and only in a few brains) is “the school of the prophets.”

See Doctrine and Covenants 85. Graceland is one of the schools of "my people." And so is the church school. Through these instrumentalities "my people" may (I say they "may") come to do their own knowing.

One of the subjects taught at Graceland is history. I do not know how it is done, for I have not had opportunity to observe, but this I do know: Graceland may interpret the message of the Latter Day prophet in the light of history. History may be interpreted in the light of that message. Graceland may teach economics and sociology and psychology and ethics and government so as to greatly advance the knowing of "my people."

Further advancement in that knowing (on the part of the ministry) is intended to have been made through the instrumentality of the school of the prophets, the highest school of learning of "my people."

And the church school of "my people"—Well, perhaps in your lifetime even it may become an effectual instrumentality for the teaching of "the" distinctive thing which my people "must" know.

THE CURRICULUM OF "MY PEOPLE"

"I give unto you a commandment, that you shall teach one another the doctrine of the kingdom . . . that ye may be instructed more perfectly [in respect to that business, that is] in theory [or rational explanation or philosophy], in principle [in the very laws of nature, and particularly the laws of human life], in doctrine, in the law of my gospel [of which economic laws are a part. See Doctrine and Covenants 101: 2], in all things that pertain to the Kingdom of God [the "Restoration" Kingdom of God: Zion], that is expedient for you to understand [or know]; the things which have been [history]; things which are [especially current events]; things which must shortly come to pass [as they may be seen by contemplating industry and government in particular, social trends]; things which are at home [domestic affairs]; things which are abroad [foreign affairs]; the wars and perplexities of the nations [even the Dis-United Nations]; and the judgments which are on the land; and a knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms, That Ye May Be Prepared in all things [through learning that which "my people" must know] to magnify the calling whereunto I called you, and the mission with which I have commissioned you"—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21.

Does it require a second thought to convince anyone that that is of necessity the curriculum of "my people"—the people whose mission it is "to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion"? Is not that manifestly, indisputably, the proper curriculum of "My people"? If there is to be real Kingdom-kite-flying, are not these the things which "my people" must know?

Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21 may be "strong meat"—too strong for some people to "digest"; but it is not too strong for those who are truly the "elect." It is strong. But without it, "my people" cannot nurture itself. It cannot come to "know."

WHY MY PEOPLE DO NOT KNOW

Hosea said: "Hear this, O priests. It is 'ye' who have been a snare to my people; it is 'ye' who have entrapped their minds" (Chapter 5, verse 1). As a rule, religious peoples follow their leaders, and their real "leaders" are more often priests than prophets.

St. Paul said that the church would go into apostasy because of the "perverse" teachings of "wolves" which would enter the flock—Acts 20: 28-30. Perverse teachings—teachings within the church that pervert the truth—lead to ignorance of that which "my people" must know.

I take all knowledge to be my province.--Bacon.

St. Paul said things to Timothy, also, which reveal why "my people" do not know. Seeing the apostasy in the making, Paul admonished Timothy to avoid "fables and endless genealogies"—which do not edify because they are not of God.

"Shun profane and vain babblings," of which there is a great variety, said Paul, because "they increase unto more ungodliness." They lead from bad to worse. "Foolish and unlearned questions"—things which no one can "know"—do engender strifes." But they do not cause "my people" to know. Nor does much else that goes for "education" within the Christian church.

Doctrine and Covenants 102: 2 makes specific mention of causes of ignorance of "my people." The church (which is one of the meanings of "my people") does not know; not only because its teachers have not taught it; it does not know because it does not (it did not) care to know. It does not know some things because there is much that may be known only through doing. There are things which "my people" must do, if it would know.

Think now: when you have truly endeavored (with all your heart, mind, and strength) to do that which it is your duty under God to do, have you not experienced a breaking through of light? Has there not been "revelation"? Have you not fulfilled conditions of your own enlightenment—through doing? Yes, there is much which "my people" may know provided only that "my people" shall do.

I do not know precisely how matters stood in the church in the days of St. Paul. But Hebrews 5: 12-14 (and other of his writings) sounds as if they stood then (as respects the function of teaching) as they stand now.

BY REASON OF USE

Whether or not it is hard for "my people" (the Church) to know the things which they (the real builders of the Kingdom) must know depends, in great degree, upon how they use their thinking apparatus. People who accustom themselves to "skim milk," to "baby talk," to mind wandering (which some call "thinking"), to quibbling or speculating that leads to nowhere—people who have such habits cannot hope to know that which "my people" must know.

Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21 may be too heavy a meal for even some adult church people. (I say nothing about the teaching of little children. But I have heard Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21 stepped down, even to their understanding.) But if that "meat" is too strong for "my people," it is because they have not exercised their senses, as St. Paul said, "to discern both the good and the evil" which they—the builders of the Kingdom—must know. It is because they have not cultivated their capacity for the consumption of "meat."

For strong meat "belongeth" to them that are of full age. It is their natural diet. It is the stuff which "my people" the people of "full age"—must have to satisfy their requirements.

I do not say that we should never have any "fun." A little "pepper" on our meat may do some good in some circumstances. Chit-chatting, fiddle-faddling, folderoling, rigamaroling, and other such like, may add a little "spice" to life; it may be somewhat recreative. As individuals, in private life, on some "social" occasions, such spice may be wholesome.

But in the serious business of my people, in the affairs of the Church, men of God—especially in the "world's momentous day"—should have done with "lesser things." They should "rise up" to moral heights (to do which they must "rise up" to intellectual heights) that they may make the Church great—so that no one will think of saying, "Just another church."

Let us remember, let us never forget: The church of Restoration is the rallying point of the "elect," it is the instrument of their work. It was not designed to be a nursery for "babes"; it was intended to be a laboratory for "men."

"THY LIGHT SHALL COME"

Restless? Unsatisfied? Anxious, in the circumstances of "my people"? Of course. But not utterly cast down. We do not give up the ghost; we do not throw in the sponge; we do not abandon the cause because "Thy light" has not come—not if we are truly "My people." Not if we are prophetic. For the prophetic are sure that, some day, my people shall know; some day "Thy light shall come."

And when "thy light" shall come, "my people" shall "arise, shine." They will arise and shine because their light has come. (See Isaiah 60.) "My people" shall fly its kite because it shall come to know.

Then shall the "Gentiles" see "thy light," and "kings shall come to the brightness of thy [be]coming." Yes, then there will be a day in which the lamentation of the prophets shall no longer be "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem," "O Zion, Zion," "O My people," "my people," "hadst thou but known."

The Resurrection of the Dead

By APOSTLE M. L. DRAPER

WHEN WE READ in the Revelation of John, chapter 20, verse 13, that, "Death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them, and they were judged every man according to their works," we may jar the thinking of some who believe that hell is the final agonizing end of the wicked. But there it is, the statement that hell shall some day deliver up its dead, and the further thought that the judgment takes place after the spirits of the wicked are released from hell, instead of before they enter. If this were the only passage supporting such a view, we might be justified in thinking there has been a mistake somewhere, and that John didn't mean that at all. However, this is not the only passage. Indeed, Jesus himself taught the same thing, which is also mentioned by the Apostle Paul and others.

Jesus said, ". . . for the hour is coming, in the which all who are in their graves shall hear his voice, And shall come forth; they who have done good in the resurrection of the just; and they who have done evil in the resurrection of the unjust." (John 5: 28, 29) Paul said, ". . . that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust." (Acts 24: 15) There is no mistake about it. The unjust, rebellious, wicked souls who have been in hell shall some day come forth in the resurrection. Since Peter tells us that the gospel is preached in hell for the sake of saving what may still be worth saving of the rebellious ones who are there, and since the Master himself visited hell to preach to the disobedient spirits there (I Peter 3: 18-20; 4: 6), we have no reason to doubt the justice and wisdom of releasing the spirits which have been there that they may be judged, not only for their evil works, but also for the good works they may have done. (Revelation 20: 13.)

MOST CHRISTIANS believe that the righteous shall be resurrected; that this is true is borne out in the Scriptures quoted above. Just what is the resurrection, when shall it be, and what is it for?

While the idea of the resurrection of the dead includes the reuniting of the spirit with a body, we do not know exactly what the resurrected body will be like. We can only say with the Apostle Paul that "it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." This indicates that the resurrected body will be one best suited to our spiritual capacities and nature. John said, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it does not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." (I John 3: 2.)

The exact time of the resurrection of the dead is unknown. Nor shall it be known until the time arrives, for it is associated with the return of Christ, about which the Master said that not even the angels in heaven know the day nor the hour. In I Thessalonians 4: 16, 17, we read, "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout . . . and the dead in Christ shall rise first." This thought is expanded in the Revelation of John 20: 4, 5, ". . . and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God . . . and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished." This scripture shows that there shall be two resurrections—that of the just and obedient at the time of the return of Christ, after which they shall reign with him for a thousand years, and that of the unjust and rebellious after the thousand years are finished.

THE STATEMENT of Jesus to the penitent thief that they would be together in Paradise, and that of the Apostle Paul that he was torn between the desire to remain on the earth and to be with Christ, indicates that the repentant spirits await the time of their resurrection in Paradise. They are the ones who come forth in the first resurrection. Who, then, are they who come forth in the last resurrection but those who have been in rebellion, and must therefore have been restrained in hell? When John wrote that the rest of the dead come forth at the end of the thousand years, the only ones left who could be "the rest of the dead" are those of whom he wrote later in the same chapter, ". . . and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them." (Revelation 20: 13.)

What is the purpose of the resurrection? The answer to this question is found in our present experience. It is clearly revealed in the words of President F. Henry Edwards, "Our bodies are given us for a definite purpose. Their union with our spirits is necessary in order that we might receive the fullness of joy, which is only possible when the intrusion of death can no longer interrupt our best work. In this life, where the body and spirit are not inseparably connected, but may be divided at any moment, any work that we attempt is subject to frustration at the caprice of death. Our major works of art, like the cathedrals, have to be left to others for completion; our ideals of freedom and justice are never expressed in their fullness. But in the resurrection the spirit is joined to a body which is suited to its needs, and the fear of death is removed from all but those who are utterly rebellious. The achievement of this inseparable union constitutes the 'redemption of the soul' and gives promise of an opportunity to share in the creative work which properly belongs to the 'power of an endless life.'"—Fundamentals.

THE FACT of the resurrection is real. It is not wishful thinking nor imaginative daydreaming. It has already been accomplished in the life of Jesus, which is proof that what he taught about the resurrection as it applies to us is true. In his own triumph over death, the Master made it forever plain that obedience to law not only carries its rewards in this life but also provides even greater rewards in the future life. It shows us that if man can solve mathematical problems by obeying the rules of mathematics, he can also solve the more perplexing problems of his own behavior by obeying the laws of the gospel, which is the rule of human behavior. It also shows us that obedience to this law will not only solve these problems for this life but gives us power to subdue even death itself in an inseparable union of our spirits with bodies capable of performing the righteous will of the spirit.

How many of us are satisfied with our achievements in this life? The artist who spends the most of his life painting a great masterpiece could paint an even greater work if he had the time. The physician who contributes a priceless discovery in the cure of bodily ills could magnify his work many times with his experience and judgment if he had several lifetimes instead of one. The statesman who has learned the ways of nations and the lessons of world crises would discover the way to international peace if he could live to help the coming children of the race even to the fourth or fifth generation. And how many of us have opportunity to read all the good books we would like to read, see all the beautiful places of the earth's scenic marvels, hear all the good music of the masters, and develop our own talents as we would like to do? Not one! This, then, is the promise of the resurrection—opportunity to become all that is in us, to do all that our capacities will permit in every way, to reach the full measure of the purpose of our creation, which is to do the works of eternity.

Worship Suggestions for December By Katherine A. Wilson

Theme for the Month: THE SPIRIT OF CHRISTMAS

Theme Appreciation:

It's Christmas and we celebrate a great birthday! Few realized His greatness during his stay on earth, and even now some do not recognize it, but this lowly Nazarene gave greater riches to men than any benefactor before or since. He had nothing but his own glorious character and winsome love, yet every life he touched was uplifted and purified. He brought new hope, new joy, and new love—a new way of living was given to us by Jesus the Christ!

It is appropriate to meditate on the quality of his life as a part of that birthday celebration. The beautiful stories of the babe in the manger, the visit of the poor and humble shepherds, the bringing of gifts by the Wise Men, the adoration of the mother will all be re-enacted at this season of the year. But the babe grew to manhood, and gave us the spirit of Christmas!

The Christmas spirit! What does it cover? What does it signify? Christmas is God's method of seeking to establish a new order of love, peace on earth to men of good will. It stands in constant rebuke to man's designs to establish a new order through pressure, coercion, and war. For nineteen centuries, men have barely glimpsed what human life can become under the leadership of Christ. Now, we have the task of working and praying that the ideal for which Christmas stands may be transformed into reality—Zion the beautiful beckons us on!

DECEMBER 7, 1947

"COME, ALL YE FAITHFUL"

Prelude: Use familiar carols or hymns.

Call to Worship:

The old familiar hymns we hear,
"It came upon a midnight clear."
Our children hear the story told
Of long ago, that's never old.
The world a brand new meaning finds
This Christmas, in those simple lines.

'Tis good that men should hear again
Of "peace on earth, good will to men."
For some day, sure as Christmas comes,
Good will shall quiet hatred's drums,
And through a world where war has ceased,
Shall flow a sweetly throbbing peace.

Yes, Christmas brings a prophecy
That some day all men shall be free.
—Martha Ford Floro.

Hymn: "Oh, Come, All Ye Faithful," Saints' Hymnal, No. 145.

(A soloist or selected group may sing the verses; all join in the chorus.)

Theme Appreciation:

"I will sing with the spirit and with the understanding also," wrote Paul to the Corinthians. Our understanding of the hymns we love telling the story of Christmas gives us new appreciation of their beauty and power. What is their message? Who composed their music—music that carries the words to us on the wings of melody? We know that beautiful hymns can become a great spiritual force in our lives, a vital aid to worship. "Oh, Come, All Ye Faithful" is a Latin hymn of the seventeenth century, the words of which were translated by Frederick Oakeley, an English clergyman in 1841. It is uncertain who wrote the music, but it has been ascribed to John Reading. This spirited hymn is a popular one, and as "ye faithful, joyful, and triumphant" come together in praise, the Christmas spirit of love enriches our lives.

Scripture: Isaiah 9: 6, 7.

Suggested Activity for Zion's League:

Christmas caroling is a custom that should never be forgotten. Plan to visit from five to ten homes singing several carols at each.

DECEMBER 14, 1947

"STARLIGHT AND SONG"

Prelude: Use familiar carols or hymns.

Call to Worship:

The door is on the latch tonight;
The hearth fire is aglow;
I seem to hear soft passing feet,
The Christ child in the snow.

My heart is open wide tonight
For stranger, kith, and kin.
I would not bar a single door
Where love might enter in.
—Kate Douglas Wiggin.

Hymn: "Starlight and Song," Saints' Hymnal, No. 148. (A selected quartet is suggested.)

Theme Appreciation:

"This hymn, 'Starlight and Song,' brings us the age-old picture that is ever new. We rejoice with the angels 'singing peace and joy and cheer.' In the stillness of that night, under shining star and chanted song, we look from the baby Saviour to the Saviour King enthroned, feeling deep desire that by his messengers of love he will lead us to himself."—Stories of Our Hymns, page 144.

The words were written by Elbert A. Smith, author of a splendid collection of poems, who has served many years as editor and writer of articles, books, and sermons. The music is from the pen of his cousin, Audentia Anderson, who has furnished the music for numbers of hymns in the Saints' Hymnal.

O wondrous Child of Bethlehem!
O Man of majesty!
Who lifted high above the star
The cross of Calvary!

Christ of the lowly manger,
Christ of Gethsemane,
Bless any heart this Christmas time
That takes the road to thee!
—Dorothy Louise Thomas.

Scripture: Luke 2: 1-20.

Worship Center:

A manger near the front of the room, with a bright light shining from it suggests the light of the Christ child.

DECEMBER 21, 1947

"O LITTLE TOWN OF BETHLEHEM"

Prelude: Use familiar carols or hymns.

Call to Worship:

Ye who have scorned each other,
Or injured friend or brother,
In this fast-fading year;

Ye, who, by word or deed,
Have made a kind heart bleed,
Come, gather here!

Let sinned against and sinning
Forget their strife's beginning,
And join in friendship now.
Be links no longer broken;
Be sweet forgiveness spoken,
Under the holly bough.

—Charles Mackey.

Hymn: "O Little Town of Bethlehem," Saints' Hymnal, No. 144.

Theme Appreciation:

This lovely Christmas carol was written in 1868 by Phillips Brooks after he had visited Bethlehem, where he visited the scenes of the Bible stories and pictured Christ's life there. He said, "The whole country, every hill and valley, seemed marked with his footprints." The beautiful scenes of the holy land remained in Phillips Brooks' memory long after he had returned to Philadelphia. Three years later, when he wanted a Christmas song for the children of his church school, he decided to write verses that would picture the beauties of this night in Bethlehem. When the song was finished, he took it to his organist, Lewis H. Redner, and asked him to compose a tune for his "simple little carol" in order that the children might sing it the next Sunday, Christmas Day. Although he had thought much about it during the week, Redner went to bed on Christmas Eve without having found the right melody. Suddenly, in the night, he was awakened by an angel strain ringing in his ears. Mr. Redner always said that melody was "a gift from heaven."

Other "gifts from heaven" are friends. Christmas is a friendship-revival time. "When you see a friend slipping away from you," says David Grayson, "drop whatever you are doing and bring him back, for friendship is the one thing that you cannot afford to do without." The Christmas card remains for many of us our only contact with many old friends. We intend to make visits, we intend to write, but time flies, and soon it is Christmas again. We reach out through the distance with greetings to bring back the friends that may be slipping away.

If you have a friend worth loving,
Love him. Yes, and let him know
That you love him, ere life's evening
Tinge his brow with sunset glow.
Why should good words ne'er be said
Of a friend—till he is dead?

Scatter thus your seeds of kindness
All enriching as you go—
Leave them. Trust the Harvest-Giver;
He will make each seed to grow.
So, until the happy end,
Your life shall never lack a friend.
—Saints' Herald, December 12, 1942.

Scripture: Matthew 3: 1-11, Inspired Version. (Matthew 2: 1-11, King James, but the Inspired Version wording is preferred.)

Christmas Suggestions:

Form a Christmas friendship circle by writing personal notes to five friends who have helped you. Tell them of your appreciation and that by knowing them, they have enriched your life.

"SILENT NIGHT, HOLY NIGHT"

Prelude: Use familiar carols or hymns.

Call to Worship:

They gave him their treasure, those Wise Men of old;

Their treasures of spices and perfumes and gold;

No gift they could bring was too costly or rare,
To lay at the feet of the Infant so fair.

We cannot lay gifts at his feet as did they,
But gifts we can offer to Jesus today;
Our help to the poor and despised we can bring,
And giving to them is a gift to our King.

The hungry and thirsting and sinful are here,
And—list to a voice that is tender and clear:
"The treasures you give unto these that you see, Lo, I will accept as if given to me."
—Saints' Herald, December 19, 1942.

Hymn: "Silent Night," Saints' Hymnal, No.
147. (Use as violin solo.)

Theme Appreciation:

Few literary products have known such a curious history as this best-known and most-beloved of all Christmas songs. Truly inspired, it represents the combined efforts of Franz Gruber and Joseph Mohr, schoolmaster and assistant priest respectively, of the tiny Bavarian village of Oberndorf. Joseph Mohr, a priest, was approached by his friend, Franz Gruber, the night before Christmas Eve to write a hymn that could be sung without an organ for the Christmas service because the organ was broken. That same night he was called to administer the last rites to a dying woman. On his way home he was unusually impressed by the snow-capped peaks of the Austrian Alps as they rose in grandeur above the peaceful valley in the Tyrol. The thought occurred to the priest that the night when Christ was born must have been like this. He hurried home and wrote the words which came into his mind. Peace and joy filled his heart as he read the stanzas again and again. The next morning he took the manuscript to Franz Gruber.

Catching the spirit of the hymn, Gruber began to set down the simple, flowing tune as it came to him. When it was finished, he sang it to his wife. "We will die, you and I," she remarked, "but this song will live." Gruber's real contribution lies in the beauty and simplicity of the tune.

On Christmas Eve the organ did not sound in the church at Oberndorf. At first the congregation did not miss it, until, with Father Mohr singing and Franz Gruber playing on his guitar, the strains of "Silent Night" fell on their ears. They were deeply touched, though they did not realize they were hearing the first rendition of one of the greatest Christmas hymns ever written, now familiar to the entire civilized world.—Saints' Herald, November 30, 1940.

What are you giving for Christmas?
Be sure you give more than you get;
The free giver is truly more blessed
Than is one who gives only for debt.

Give sunshine and mirth without stinting;
The world's sad enough of its strife;
Let your smiles of true friendship give hinting;

Tack some love into somebody's life.

Give with extravagant pouring,
True happiness strive to impart.
Spread happiness 'round you increasing,
Light a candle in somebody's heart!
—Author Unknown.

BULLETIN BOARD

Central Michigan District Conference

The annual Central Michigan District Conference will be held at Beaverton on November 15 and 16. Services on Saturday will include a 9:30 a.m. prayer meeting; business session at 10:30 for the reading of reports; election of officers and routine business at 2 p.m.; song service and preaching at 8. Sunday will begin with a 9 o'clock prayer service, followed by preaching at 11. Apostle E. J. Gleazer is expected to be present. The final business meeting will be held at 2 p.m., at which time the report of the budget committee will be presented. Several counties in the old Western Michigan District will become a part of the Central Michigan District at this conference. As before, members are requested to bring well-filled baskets. Visiting Saints will be cared for Saturday night at the homes of local members. Meals will be served during conference in the lower auditorium of the church.

B. H. DOTY,
District President.

Priesthood Institute

The annual priesthood institute of the Rich Hill and Spring River Districts will convene Saturday, November 8, at 3 p.m., and continue through Sunday, November 9, until 3 p.m., at the Reunion of the Ozarks grounds in Racine, Missouri. Apostle A. A. Oakman and Bishop C. A. Skinner are to be present. Those desiring reservations may write to Arthur J. Rock, 1927 Picher Street, Joplin, Missouri.

WILLIAM PATTERSON,
District President.

Northwestern Ohio District

The notice appearing in the September 27 issue of the Herald should have read, "Elder John Booth of Columbus is expected to be present. Alvin Wadsworth, District President," instead of "Evangelist John Booth"

HARRY RIES,
District President.

Books Wanted

Rubie Ballantyne, Rural Route 2, Cameron, Missouri, wishes to borrow Elbert Smith's Joe Pine for two weeks. Rubie, who is thirteen, would like to read it to her ten-year-old brother, Michael.

Vernes Collins, Centerton, Indiana, is anxious to obtain Volumes 1, 2, and 4 of the Church History and Daniel McGregor's Miraculous Work and a Wonder.

Attention, Kansas State College Students

There are several R. I. D. S. students attending Kansas State College who meet weekly for study and a social evening. Other students or students' wives who belong to the church or are interested, please contact Mrs. George E. Brinkmann, Longs Park, Manhattan, Kansas (Telephone, Manhattan 3996).

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Howard Norton, Route 4, Box 496, Traverse City, Michigan, requests prayers for himself and his brother.

Mrs. Maud Davis, Glencoe, Oklahoma, asks the prayers of the Saints for her neighbors, Mr. and Mrs. John Gant, who lost their four-year-old daughter in an automobile accident, and for Mrs. Roy Gant, who received head injuries and a broken shoulder. Although they are not members, the Gants are active in the work of the church.

Anna L. Jones, 839 Woodville Drive, El Monte, California, who is suffering from arthritis, requests the prayers of the Saints.

Elder Lee Quick, one of the superannuated ministers, is in the Burk Street Hospital in Ft. Scott, Kansas. He will appreciate being remembered in the prayers of the Saints.

The family of six-year-old Dee Dee Collin, 607 South Zane Highway, Martins Ferry, Ohio, requests prayers for her that she may be healed of a serious affliction.

DEATHS

MADDEN.—Betsey Bonner, was born May 8, 1880, and died September 15, 1947, at her home in McPherson, Kansas, following a heart attack. On October 16, 1904, she was married to Silas A. Madden. A member of the Reorganized Church, she was a devoted worker throughout her life.

Surviving are her husband; three sons: A. M., R. E., and Paul A.; six grandchildren, and two sisters. The Reverend T. Comer Turpen officiated at the funeral held at Danielson-Ball Chapel.

HOWARD.—Nancy Elizabeth, daughter of Talton and Sarah Blevins, was born April 1, 1861, at Dewitt, Missouri, and died at St. Joseph, Missouri, on September 12, 1947. She was married to John Howard on December 24, 1879; thirteen children were born to this marriage. Mr. Howard and eight children preceded her in death. She was a devoted mother and, as long as her health permitted, an enthusiastic church worker.

She leaves five children: Mrs. Mae McComas and James Howard of Hardin, Missouri; Mrs. Lillian Matney of Iola, Kansas; Mrs. Rose Gisch of Portland, Oregon; and Joe Howard of Jefferson City, Missouri; twenty-five grandchildren; fifty great-grandchildren; and three great-great-grandchildren. The funeral service was held in the Christian Church in Hardin, Elders O. W. Okerlind and William Ferguson officiating. Burial was in the Hardin cemetery.

BEAN.—Burton Lester, was born March 2, 1874, at Concordia, Kansas, and died August 8, 1947, at Cameron, Missouri. After graduating from high school in Concordia, he attended college at Salina, Kansas, after which he taught school in Illinois. Later he moved to Cameron where he engaged in farming and stock raising. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church at the age of twenty and was later ordained a teacher. On December 2, 1898, he married Etta Bramwell; four children were born to this union. Mrs. Bramwell passed away on December 17, 1930.

Surviving are two sons: Warren of St. Joseph, Missouri, and Donald of Kidder, Missouri; a daughter, Mrs. Margaret Swank of St. Joseph; one grandchild; a brother, Wilbur Bean of Farmington, Missouri; and a sister, Mrs. Ruby Simmons of Cameron. Funeral services were held at the Cameron Church, Elders Ward Hougas and Emery Jennings officiating. Interment was in the Memorial Park Cemetery in St. Joseph.

GRABSKE.—Theodore Thomas, was born November 18, 1868, and died at his home in Independence, Missouri, on October 4, 1947, as the result of a heart attack. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in 1896 and was ordained a priest on March 4, 1900. On April 27, 1891, he married Othilla Henrietta Stahelin; four children were born to them. By profession, Brother Grabske was a steamfitter. He was greatly interested in the church and was influential in organizing the Malvern Hill Mission in Kansas City.

He is survived by his wife; two daughters: Mrs. Ida Trefz of the home and Mrs. Clarence White of Aurora, Illinois; two sons: Dr. Charles F. Grabske and Dr. Paul R. Grabske, both of Independence; two sisters: Mrs. Minnie Groeschner and Mrs. Anna Grotefeld of Chicago, Illinois; a brother, George Grabske of Chicago; six grandchildren, and three great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Stone Church, Apostle George Mesley and Elder Charles Graham officiating. Burial was in the Mound Grove Cemetery.

FLEGEL.—Dorothy Grace, was born January 14, 1906, in Carleton Place, Ontario, and died August 9, 1947, at Westboro, Ontario. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since 1939. She attended Ottawa Branch and was secretary for that group. She is survived by her husband, Hermand Flegel, Jr., of Westboro; two sons: Kenneth and Donald; and one daughter, Lois.

Attention, Young Marrieds!

By Louise Wrigley

Yes, it's you I'm fixing with the baleful eye! You "still-almost-honey-mooners" and you "oh-dear-we've-been-married-five-years-already" ones. Did you know that you are desperately needed? Let me tell you. . . .

It's the togetherness that makes being married so special. It's the feeling that you are not alone in your dreams and hopes for the future, and that you aren't alone in your blackest moments of despair. Sharing a burden makes it lighter. Sharing a blessing doubles it. You can carry this togetherness with you into your church—your community—and make it help other people.

You know within your own heart what a pleasure it is to mount the steps of your church together on a clear, cool Sunday morning and enter the open door side by side. The day seems fresher, the music sweeter, the sermon more meaningful than if you were sitting there alone. And when you go out again into the sunshine, there goes with you an air of peace and calm which shields you, fortifies you for the busy week ahead.

Why not carry that feeling of well-being into the week, into everything you do? Don't forget how important your partner is to the success of everything you touch, and never forget how important your approval and encouragement are too. Don't take for granted this precious merger which God has blessed for you. Make it outstanding by the way you treat it. Then get ready, from your own security, to answer the call for help when it comes.

You know within your own heart what a pleasure it is to mount the steps of your own church together on a clear, cool Sunday morning.

If you were sitting on the beach when you suddenly heard a cry for help, chances are you would dash right in to save the troubled swimmer, wouldn't you? Yet when the church cries, "Help, we need you!" you go placidly on your way, not allowing it to disturb you even a little. Is that fair?

Perhaps the church school class you are attending is getting duller and duller. Every Sunday poor old Brother McAfee gets up there and drones on and on, boring everyone. Did it ever occur to you that it's a mighty hard load he's pulling all by himself? Did it ever occur to you that the blank faces staring at him with wool-gathering eyes every Sunday morning have him a trifle discouraged? Or that if you looked a little intelligent and interested for a change, it might put new life and hope into him? Did you ever realize that you could spark-plug the class into some lively discussions which might bring out vital points?

Are church people ever invited into your home? Does your welcome mat really say "welcome" or does it read "R. L. D. S. stay away!" In other words, where do you choose your friends—from people who believe as you do or the run-of-the-mill crowd?

When there's a banquet to be given or an all-church function for raising building-fund money, do both of you get behind and push? Do you sell just a few more than your share of the tickets? Do you cast an anxious and eager glance around to see if there is anything anyone has forgotten that you can do? Or do you think you've already paid for your particular pew and can sit in it until you die, though the church be mortgaged around you?

If the church caught fire and all the little primary folks were trapped downstairs by licking flames, you would be among the first to rush after them, fighting to save them from disaster. Yet, you'd let these same little ones go to church school week after week in classes that were only meant to "keep the children quiet." You would let them perish at the hands of an incompetent, disinterested teacher who is only "doing her duty." Think how much you have to offer children, a young man and woman keenly alive, interested in everything around you, filled with a love of life and all its beauties. Think what you could give these children in human appreciation, in your intelligent interpretation of everyday occurrences to bring them closer to a personal Christ. Think how much you could do to revive their interest, keep them growing and living upward and outward instead of downward and into themselves!

Zion's League needs leaders and followers—those who follow a little less like sheep and a little more like people who have a few ideas of their own and those who can also show a little eagerness and enthusiasm for someone else's ideas.

Orioles and Blue Birds need wide-awake young women to help them. If you are interested in guiding girls in paths of serenity and charm and helping them establish a real purpose in their lives, there is no better medium for your talents than here. As for young married men . . . whoever heard of too many Scout leaders? Can anyone underestimate the value of a man who teaches a group of boys in a church school class or fail to realize that these boys cannot help unconsciously absorbing his principles? Can anyone deny the sense of fun and fellowship young marrieds get when they know they're both in the same boat rowing for the same shore? Can anyone suggest a satisfactory substitute for the comradeship and closeness which comes as a result of thinking alike and working for the same objective?

Each person has been given some talent. Think how much greater your talents can be, locked together by the force of love, pushing upward like new, green shoots in the warm sun to blossom into beauty which delights the hearts of all who see you and touch your lives.

You young marrieds are at the beginning of the peak of your lives. You have grown and learned, have sought love and found it the most beautiful thing in your lives, have blended yourselves into one and now you are stronger, surer than ever. You have the strength, the courage, and the ability of two, with the heart and will of one.

Don't think you are biting off a great big piece you can't chew. No one is asking you to do that. You are only being asked to do a small task within your range of capabilities and to do it well. You are asked to be only a little piece of a great picture and to be proud of being a part of the completed whole. You are only being asked to do something which will bring more satisfying days over the horizon of your own lives. For it is in being needed and working together that you will find the peace and contentment of a rich and happy life.

Visitors

In 1935, moved by the fact that nothing beyond sporadic visits and programs at Christmas were offered the chronic sick of her community, Mrs. Paul Bedford of Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, wrote each shut-in, asking which was most desired: a radio, flowers, or a visitor. With one accord they replied, "A visitor." So Mrs. Bedford recruited twenty of her friends, and they set out to make calls—not as Lady Bountifuls, but in a spirit of discovering new friends.

The club has no dues and no formal meetings but keeps exact records, visiting members reporting their activities once a month. Each shut-in who had no radio has been given one; there are twenty-one wheel chairs in circulation; typewriters are loaned, medical treatment arranged for. Visiting members who have motion picture projectors take them to invalids, many of whom have never seen a movie.

It is hard to tell whether visiting or home members get most out of the club. Many visiting members confess that they had long wanted to do something of the sort but had not known how to go about it. One

The Trouble-Shooter

QUESTION:

Is it justifiable to buy a new automobile or any of the other so-called luxuries if one pays tithing on them and generously supports the church in other ways, or should all surplus left after the necessities of life have been purchased be contributed to foreign relief?

ANSWER:

By H. L. Livingston

We would say that the matter of purchase of an automobile would be entirely up to the person who has raised the question. So far as the law is concerned, it is satisfied in payment of the tithe and the support of the church by offerings. At least, it is so until such time as the surplus can be handled in accordance with the intent of the law, which contemplates the setting up of the storehouse and the organization of our people.

There might be some question about the use of surplus to give general foreign relief; however, people who wish to help in this matter can do so by their contributions to the oblation fund. We are using a considerable amount of oblation funds for the taking care of our foreign relief today; but we would see no reason for the contribution of all surplus above the necessities of life to foreign relief.

of them commented, "I had begun to think there was no place for me but the bridge table"; while a shut-in, blind, lame, and alone, said, "I thought no one knew I was alive."

Special Christmas Program Helps

Pageants . . .

The Quest of the East

By Edward Thomas Kirkley

The familiar Bible story of the Three Wise Men who followed the star to Bethlehem has been developed into a Christmas pageant of real quality and effectiveness. Classic Christmas hymns furnish a background to the action and make it possible to utilize the church choir in connection with the presentation. Divided into six parts, requiring twenty characters (thirteen men and seven women). Playing time approximately one hour. Price, each, 10c; $1 a dozen.

The Holy Nativity

How Will the Kingdom Come?

By Evan A. Fry

The Lonely Ones

God, help me love the lonely ones.

Though I would keep a chosen few

Forever at my fingertips,

Help me to see beyond them

Those who stand with empty eyes,

And empty hearts, and empty souls.

They have not asked to live apart,

Unwanted.

But for the goodness of a few who cared,

I would have been the same.

In payment for that blessing, I

Would learn to love each unbelonging one

Who kneels, perhaps this very hour,

And asks thee for a friend.

—Naomi Russell

A Missionary in Your Home

You may be surprised to hear of it, but there is a missionary in your home. You may say there is not, but it is nevertheless a fact.

Your missionary may be inactive, uninformed, indifferent, incapable. Or, on the contrary, he may be a very able and well-informed worker. If he is not active, he may be suffering from an inferiority complex. Any way you take it, he is there.

A Common Lament

At a recent district prayer meeting in a home, a number of good people expressed regret that, no matter how much they studied, they were poorly prepared when the time came to tell a friend about the gospel. Some of them were not a little discouraged with themselves.

Discouragement and self-criticism should not be carried to the point of making one give up the effort to tell the story of the church to others.

What Anybody Can Do

There are three simple things that any member can do when there is a chance to talk about the church.

1. You can tell as much as you know now. This may be enough to answer a few immediate questions and bring out further inquiries.

2. You can bear a testimony of God's goodness to you, relate your experiences in the gospel work, and leave a conviction of your earnestness and sincerity.

3. For the questions that you cannot immediately answer, you can ask for time, and promise to bring information in the near future. As soon as you are home, look up the answers, or call some church friend who may be better informed than you are.

If you follow this program for a while, you will soon be well informed enough to take care of any situation by yourself. It has the advantage of dealing with real questions and specific problems. This kind of study is the most practical and profitable of all, for it does not spread over the whole general field; it concentrates upon what is needed.

Why Your Missionary Is Needed

By this time you realize that your "missionary" is you.

You may think there are plenty of others in the church who can do missionary work, that the full-time workers are meant to take care of it, that your task is confined to church attendance, financial support, and obedience to the law.

It is important to realize that your missionary is needed. . . . There is a work waiting for you that no other person can do. You have certain contacts with friends that are known to no other members of the church. They will listen to you because you are their friend. If you don't introduce the church to them, they will never know of it. That is why your missionary is truly indispensable.

Training Your Missionary

Of course, if you are interested in the church at all, you should be interested in the training of your missionary.

After you have acquired the "Three Standard Books" of the church—the Bible, the Doctrine and Covenants and the Book of Mormon—and have begun a systematic reading of them, you will find some other aids necessary. These are your missionary's tools. One of the most compact and useful is Doctrinal References by Alvin Knisley. It is inexpensive, and has been a valued and well-classified reference in the hands of many people. More complete is the Compendium of Faith, which should be added to the working library. As the training goes on, a Cruden's Concordance to the Bible, and many other items listed in the catalogue of church publications will be found useful.

The training of your missionary should be regular and systematic. Certain evenings or hours each week should be devoted to study. If you wish to accomplish anything, you will have to work at it regularly and intensively.

Don't Wait Forever

Don't spend all your life training your missionary, keeping him inactive, waiting for a perfection that never comes, and restraining him from service. If you do this, you may have gained much, but you have contributed little. And it is the contribution of service that counts.

Let your missionary begin his work with what he has, and learn as he goes along.

Paul wrote of people, "Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth" (II Timothy 3: 7). Too many personal missionaries are like that. They are always preparing, but they never start. They are like the fig tree that Jesus cursed: beautiful and full of leaves, but they bear no fruit.

The first point in the life of the missionary is to begin now. He will learn by experience. "You learn to do by doing," said a psychologist.

Your Missionary's Personality

Strange as it may seem, your missionary may be doing some of his most important work when he is not thinking of it at all. This is true of the negative as well as the positive aspects of his work. If he leads a type of life worthy of his ideals, if his conversation reflects his principles and philosophy, he will have a standing with people that will bear a good influence. If his life and conversation fall below the standard, no amount of talk will do much good. The most powerful influence in the world, so far as an individual is concerned, is a record of good conduct, and a readiness to explain the gospel that stands back of it.

Editorial

Notes From Headquarters

President Israel A. Smith has recently been honored with invitations to serve as trustee in the following organizations: Missouri Historical Society, Jackson County Tuberculosis Society, and Kansas City Tuberculosis Society.

Across the Desk

APOSTLE PAUL M. HANSON, on the eve of departure for points in New England, writes with fervor about the work:

I am inclined to believe with rather deep conviction that our church will become conspicuously noted for missionary zeal when its leading spiritual councils proclaim in preaching and set forth in writing the whole counsel of God, giving emphasis to the distinctive place of Christianity, which is Latter Day Saintism, in accord with the needs of the present age. For instance, it is not enough to state Christ said so and so. Many do not know who he is. His deity must be declared with all the knowledge and power of the priesthood available. The leading reason for the existence of the Book of Mormon is to convince Jew and Gentile that Jesus is the Christ, the Eternal God, manifesting himself, etc.

What an age for setting forth what Christianity makes clear about death, the future state, and immortality!

There is need for a crystal clear presentation of the apostasy of the New Testament church.

What a theme—the restoration of the church, with all that such implies!

In such a confused state of the world, it is for the leading spiritual authorities of the church to give an interpretation of the present age in the light of prophecy.

The second coming of Christ is near!

Introducing The Beacon, Volume 1, Number 1, published on behalf of Central Church at Los Angeles, in the language of Pastor Garland Tickemyer, "to keep ourselves from exploding from pent-up news." Success to the Beacon. We are getting quite a number of such bulletins from all over. Perhaps we should give them editorial notice, too. We may try it.

Doctor Wanted

There is a shortage of 35,000 medical physicians in this country at the present time, and the people of many small towns and communities suffer distress and inconvenience because of the difficulty of obtaining medical care.

A church member writes that her community needs a doctor (M.D.) and has a good opportunity for a good man. If he could be a church member also, many other benefits would derive from his help. If there is a Medical Doctor interested, he may write the editors for information.

How Will the Kingdom Come?

By Evan A. Fry

Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new, And receiveth all the things of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; To wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God. For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. We, then, as workers together with Christ, beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain.
—II Corinthians 5: 17-21; 6: 1.

THERE ARE TWO sharply opposing ideas or concepts of how the world is to be saved—or as some people phrase it, God's kingdom ushered in—and a great middle ground between, where I suspect that most people will be found. The first idea is that of the atheist, the materialist, and perhaps the humanist. This concept is that man is the center of the universe. Whatever of change or improvement or progress has occurred or will occur in the world is completely the result of man's intelligence. Man is in the saddle; he shapes his own destiny without any outside help. The way to world salvation lies through human thinking, human planning, human research, invention, improvement, and evolution. Eventually, when man has thought and planned and delved and invented and improved and evolved enough, we shall have a golden age, in which everybody will be rich and happy and healthy and at peace with himself and his neighbors.

The second idea or concept is that the coming of the kingdom of God will be sudden, spectacular, cataclysmic, and miraculous—that God will do it all. Man will only be able to sit back in wonder, in awe, and probably in fear, while God ruthlessly destroys all the wicked and their works, and sets up a new world order. In that process, men are to be passive, submissive, without volition or action; they will not be called upon to act or to work or to strive, but only to stand still and see the glory of God as it miraculously makes all things new.

LET US LOOK for a moment at the first concept of how the world is to be saved. The idea that man can or will do it all is one which shows a lack of faith—but perhaps even more important, it shows a blindness to past history and an ignoring of the plain facts of life. Man is a queer mixture of good and bad. Sometimes he wills and does good; but more often he wills and does bad. I believe, however, that history will amply prove that when left to himself, man is more bad than good. As a recent writer has so aptly expressed it, the “noble savage” is usually not noble at all, but only savage. The veneer of civilization is dangerously thin on even the best of us. If you need any proof of that, study the record of lynchings in the United States, or the horrible history of Nazi Germany, or the history of Japanese war atrocities, or our own frantic efforts to stock-pile the atomic bomb before Russia beats us to it.

There is no good in the world which has not been contrived and planned and worked for, and oftentimes died for by men who were inspired by something above and beyond themselves—men who were able to rise above the inherent sin and depravity which every man can find in his own heart and his own body, and grasp higher and better and nobler things. Man cannot lift himself by his own bootstraps. A stream cannot rise higher than its source. If man is a product of blind, senseless, inert matter, how is it ever possible for him to be better than a clod? The theory of evolution confesses an apparent PLAN—the working out of some purpose, as plant and animal forms progressed from lower to higher. Man has proved by his own experiments in biology and botany that the evolutionary processes may be immensely speeded up by intelligent application of certain relatively simple laws. Who formulated those laws? Who started man on his way and determined his course of development through the millions of years the evolutionist says it took us to reach our present state? Who supplied the materials of the world, of which man is made, and with which he works? No—the purely materialistic view of life, which excludes God from the picture, offers a very small hope for humanity or its golden age. Whenever we get to feeling proud of our achievements, it would be well for us to remember that the world has not yet seen the great civilization which cannot fall because of human sinfulness and greed and degradation. Thirteen out of the twenty-one great civilizations of the world have already perished in dust and ashes, and atheism offers small guarantee that those still remaining—including our own—will not perish just as ignominiously if we forget the God who gave us life and created this world as our home.

ON THE OTHER HAND, God cannot do everything towards the ushering in of his kingdom, or the dawning of the golden age. As some writer has so aptly phrased it, “God cannot build the golden age out of leaden men.” If he were to perform a miracle tonight, and wake us up tomorrow morning in the golden age of the kingdom of God, most of us—perhaps all of us, wouldn’t know how to behave ourselves in it. Destroying all the wicked—which many people confidently expect God to do—would not solve the problem. Anybody, even a fool, could destroy all his mistakes and start over. But God’s father-love is redemptive, Christ’s mission was and is redemptive.

God wants to save all men who wish to be saved. He is going to bend every effort, go the last inch of the way, to achieve this end. He has all eternity in which to complete his work. He need be in no hurry. He can afford to wait patiently for men to heed his counsel. But perhaps you and I cannot afford to wait. Our time is limited to this life. It is for the deeds done in the body—not in the spirit—that we shall be judged in the great day of judgment. And as the consequences of men’s error and sin and folly and rebellion close in around us, ever tighter and tighter, inexorably drawing the day nearer and nearer when this sin and folly shall bring its inevitable consequences of disaster and destruction and calamity upon us, we should be increasingly aware of our need for haste in the building of God’s kingdom.

We are made in the spiritual image of God. There is much of good within us. We feel not only the downward pull of sin, but the upward pull of our godly origin and likeness. We are destined to be with God. We are foreordained to be workers together with him in this life, to bring about his purposes, to establish his kingdom, to create the golden age in which godly men shall live in brotherhood and peace and prosperity.

Our first task, as workers TOGETHER with God, is to purify, direct, and shape our own lives so that we can be fit material for the kingdom. If we see within ourselves certain lacks and faults, our first task is to remove the beam from our own eye. Then we can see clearly to enter upon the second task—that of influencing others to purify and change and re-create their lives so they will be fit material for the kingdom of God.

Then, together with God and each other, we may enter upon the third part of our task, the setting up of those social, economic, political, and spiritual forces which will implement our ideals and make possible Christian living in EVERY phase of life. In all of these tasks, we need help and strength and inspiration from above and outside ourselves. Man does not stand alone; he cannot. We need to remember

The Good Life

A Tribute to the Late Christina Hanson

By G. G. Lewis and L. F. P. Curry

Nearing the age of ninety-one years, Christina Christensen Hanson entered into her eternal rest on August 25, 1947, at Independence, Missouri. She was born in Denmark, October 7, 1856. It was in her early years that her parents heard the Restoration Message and gave obedience to the gospel. Because of this, her young life was colorful, for her parents moved to the United States and trekked to the Great Salt Valley by oxcart and prairie schooner before the first railroad was built—all because of an ideal. She went along, walking most of the way, only to find disillusionment and then a return to the United States. But let us read her own account of this, which she wrote some years ago:

My parents, Michael W. and Anna Christensen, learned in Denmark, their home, of the work of God restored to earth through the prophet, Joseph Smith, and such teachings as the unchangeability of God, the fullness of the gospel, the ideal of Zion, and of the present age being the latter days.

Many wonderful prophecies of Holy Writ to be fulfilled appealed to them. They investigated the claim of the elders for several years before requesting baptism.

Our family, consisting of my parents and three girls, of whom I was the eldest, bade farewell to relatives and friends and native land and embarked on a sailing boat at Fredericia and started for Zion in Utah.

We were seven weeks on the Atlantic Ocean, packed with others like sardines in a box. One of my sisters contracted the measles. Mother prayed that she might not have to be buried at sea. She was buried some place on the trail to Nebraska.

Though only nine years of age at the time, I remember quite clearly many of the things that took place at her burial.

We finally reached Omaha, and at Florence, a suburb, the people got fitted out with oxen, wagons, and supplies that were needed for the long trip across the plains. Everything was advanced in price. When Father went to buy what he needed, he found he did not have sufficient money, so he said, "Let us stop here," but Mother said, "No, we have left everything to go to Zion." Both Father and Mother worked so that we could proceed on our way.

I walked most of the distance from Omaha to Utah. There was much to do as we camped for the night, breadmaking in iron kettles, milking, etc. We children gathered buffalo chips for fuel.

At this time there were no railways. There were many buffalo and thousands of Indians. Hundreds in our caravan walked. When we camped, the wagons were formed into a circle. I remember one day at noon we started to feed the stock. One of the company had not yet arrived when the men drove the stock to water. Indians were hidden near by and tried to steal some of the oxen, but they came running back into the corral. Warfare developed, resulting in men of our company being wounded by arrows which had to be cut out. Among some of the company who were walking and had not arrived were a husband and wife and a son about nine years of age. My father saw the Indians take the mother on a pony, and soon they were gone. She was never heard from again.

As soon as the Indians left, the captain of our company gave orders to drive on and through most of the night. Next morning, some of the oxen died; cows were hitched up in their stead.

Before we reached Salt Lake, snow was on the ground. Though only a child, I remember seeing Brigham Young. He was sitting in a camp and had come to welcome the people.

How great was the disappointment of my parents. They realized soon after arriving in the Salt Lake Valley they had not found Zion. Teachings new and strange, different from what they had heard in Denmark, were taught the people.

My friends learned of the Reorganized Church through Mother's relatives living at Provo, Utah, who had journeyed to Zion and then joined the Reorganized Church in Utah. My parents were baptized at night in Provo.

In returning to the States, I walked most of the way. We children knew little of the hardships our parents endured on the trip. On one occasion, in fording a river, the oxen stampeded, and a woman was killed. The company ran short of provisions, and we got meat from oxen that had died.

Upon our return to Omaha, father had twenty dollars with which to start house-keeping. At ten years of age, I started to work to help.

I was baptized at Crescent, Iowa, September 7, 1871. Many times I thank my Heavenly Father for his blessings to me, spiritual and physical. I have sensed his goodness until my heart has often overflowed with gladness.

So runs the life story of Christina Hanson. It is the material from which romantic novels of the frontier and historical biographies are made. Hers was a good life, achieved despite obstacles so forbidding that a lesser spirit would have ceased to strive.

The process which evolves the good life requires years to unfold—and pain and grief and hardships, as well as comfort and happiness. The former, Sister Hanson had in abundance on the trip to and from Utah, which has been described. Despite having walked from Omaha much of the way there and back, witnessing during the journeys the cruelties and deaths of Indian raids, suffering with others of the wagon trains for lack of food—despite these things, she remembers not her own deprivations, but rather the difficulties and worries of her parents.

The parents themselves were bitterly disappointed at what they found in the land of the Great Salt Lake. Yet this, and the rigors and losses of the return journey, as well as the extreme severity of their trials in re-establishing their home in the midwest, brought no word of complaint from them. Her parents were of saintly stuff, and to some extent her growth must be attributed to a fine parental background.

In the closing months of life, her mind was clear, although her body had wasted to a shadow of her former self. Wonderfully patient, she endured the daily discomforts which she could not control. Prior to her death she told her daughter, who with others had given such loving care, "I am thankful for everything." Thus she expressed her appreciation of the services of her loved ones, and the blessings of an ever-loving Father who had been so kind to her.

Yes, hers was the good life, well "furnished unto all good works," because she lived daily in touch with God.

What Makes Johnnie TELL STORIES

By ALICE CROSSAN

I have known—and so have you, if you have often been in close contact with children—many boys and girls who tell very colorful stories. Haven't you often wondered why they do it? Being grown up, of course, we can easily distinguish between truth and untruth in children's stories. We realize that unless something is done for our little "storytellers" they are apt to grow up with the reputation of being liars. This is not a pretty thought, and it is certainly not a descriptive term we wish to have applied to our children. It is a handicap we must not allow them to develop.

Is there actually much we can do about it?

Truth is truth. A lie is a lie. This is the principle upon which admirable character is built. And yet, truth should be tempered with tact. How to teach this to a little child is recognized to be one of the hardest training problems parents and teachers face.

A child is employing tact when he is offered a portion of some food particularly distasteful to him, and he replies, simply, "No, thank you." Very few of us would want him to be so absolutely truthful that, instead of this polite refusal, he would blurt out, "No! I HATE cornstarch pudding!"

We ourselves follow this same principle. If we receive six identical sets of mixing bowls at our shower (Penney's were having a sale on them just before the invitations went out) we say, "Oh, I always need lots of bowls. And these are such a convenient size." Even the most puritanical bride would hardly wail disappointedly, "Oh, for goodness sake, ANOTHER set of mixing bowls!"

Tact is a thing that we should teach with truth, just as we teach phonics with reading. Tact is kindness. Even if we do not like a thing, there is almost always something truthful and yet nice that we can say about it. For instance, if we are asked our opinion of a dress we do not particularly care for, we can still be truthful in saying the color is attractive. After all, might it not be a good habit to form to always look for the good points in the things about us?

Emily Post, in her entertaining and instructive book, Children Are People, uses an apt illustration in reconciling truth with tact. Truth, she says, is a never-distinguished pure white light, and around this are rings of the colors of the rainbow. Through these rainbow colors shines the light of truth. The colors stand for tact, kindness, appreciation, generosity, mercy, and protection. Beyond this rainbow is the glow of sunset. And here, beyond the rainbow, is also the lovely land of make-believe. But where there is no light at all—in the utter blackness beyond the sunset glow, here are the willful lies.

All little children like to play "lets pretend." They can eat with alacrity from imaginary dishes, ride in a fairy boat, or turn into a bear or a lion at will. And they seem to have little difficulty, at the end of their games, in returning to the real "wash-your-hands-and-face" world.

Our problem with the little child is to teach him that he may imagine as much as he pleases in the land of make-believe, but that he must employ truth in the real world that exists around him.

If he understands this, there is little likelihood that he will ever be more than a highly imaginative child. If he does not understand it, he may be perpetually confused. We know that lying is all tied up with emotions. Lie detectors work on this principle. The child may seek to withdraw into his dream world, believing to be true the things that he tells and expecting others to believe also.

One mother illustrated the difference between fact and fiction to her son by means of books. She showed him that while poems and many stories and plays are fictional, newspapers, histories, dictionaries, and science books must be true. The Bible is true. Tales from Shakespeare are not. Yet both are excellent reading material.

The most common lies are told because of fear of punishment. In most cases, when a misdemeanor has been committed and a falsehood in connection with it is suspected, the child should be given the benefit of the doubt. But if he has actually been seen doing the deed, or if there is other positive evidence against him showing that he has lied, then it is necessary to inflict punishment and to tell him why he is being punished. To tell a lie in cowardice, or to tell one to avoid punishment, or for personal gain is an extremely serious fault.

Those of us who are associated with children should be mindful of the example we set them in the matter of truth. If we ourselves tell stories, they are going to know it, and we can hardly be surprised if they soon follow our example. We must employ tact and truth with other adults as well as children and maintain at all times the highest regard for integrity.

Some parents, unable to discern accurately themselves between the delights of make-believe and the code of truth, go so far as to refuse children the joy of knowing Santa Claus.

Did you ever know anyone who became a liar because he once believed that age-old story? We think children are able to understand the boundaries between fact and fairyland in stories—why cannot they understand, when they are older—that Santa did exist, but only in the spirit of love?

Emily Post, who in spite of her very modern ideas on child-training approves of letting children believe in Santa, makes her plea so sweetly for giving them this pleasure that it may be well to give her exact words.

Says she, "If sometimes, when they are very little, if they do mix Heaven with the House of Santa Claus—does it matter very much?"

Have you noticed that teachings considered "gospel truth" in one generation change to new or revert to old beliefs in the next generation or even shorter time? In ten years we have seen the pendulum swing from a severe by-the-clock schedule of baby care to the new-old method of natural-demand schedule in feeding and sleeping. Babies may now be cuddled and enjoyed with a clear conscience.

Another thing—it is now accepted that the I. Q. (Intelligence Quotient) is not static condition but may be improved under favorable conditions or environment. Someday heredity and environment as personality factors will find their proper balance in our teachings and some new thought will claim its ardent adherents. Those who read widely, think deeply, act without hasty conclusions but with steady purpose will live sanely and well.—Enid S. DeBarthe in The Lamoni Stake Record.

FOUNDATIONS

of Modern Society and Education

TO CREATE a good society is the experience of the lifetime of the human race. Each generation, from the first to the last, must play its part in the course of time, making whatever contribution it can according to its sensitiveness and response to the needs of its time in relation to individuals, groups, and eternal values. With birth into the human family comes this responsibility; it is inescapable.

Over the years, both society and education have risen and fallen together. As society rises toward "real good," so does education, and vice versa. With Plato and Aristotle, we would agree society and education are inseparable. They go hand in hand, each pulling the other in the direction it is going; each using the other as its chief support; each trying to respond to the apparent and real needs of its time.

As I see it, the basic fundamental goals of both society and education are and ever shall be the same. Plato and Aristotle expressed it as the "virtuous" man. Today we might, and do say, that our goal in both society and education is the good citizen. Our frame of reference remains the same—the development and use of each individual to his highest possibilities for his satisfaction and the satisfaction of society. He needs the outlet of society for his developing contribution, and developing society needs his constant contribution to both stabilize and change it. Plato and Aristotle, to a lesser degree, tended to limit a man's contribution by conscious external forces (laws) while we intend that interaction between external and internal forces of the time and place in which we live be the only inhibiting power, though in neither case does the limiting power necessarily limit. Hence, there must be another force—that of the "up-ternal," with which we haven't reckoned too concretely in either society or education, past or present. We see the war child amid external turmoil, held by internal peace modified or intensified in his influence on society and society's influence on him. So it isn't necessarily Plato's simple formula of good heredity plus good society plus good education equals good boy, nor bad heredity plus bad society plus bad education equals bad boy, in the end. There seems to be the other factor, the "up-ternal" or eternal with which we must reckon.

WE HAVE seen the Nazi children of superior stock—mentally and physically—placed in superior mental and physical environment yield the most arrogant, ungraceful, nonvirtuous adults. Their frame of reference was the same "development and use of each individual according to his highest possibilities for his satisfaction and the satisfaction of society." Society and education worked together for twenty-five years to produce such a good citizen. In his society, he was good, but in reference to all human society, he was not.

So this larger loyalty is needed—loyalty of both politics and education, to a higher power.

THOUGH THE BASIC goal of Plato and Aristotle and ourselves is the same—the "virtuous man"—we use different ways of developing him. Plato and Aristotle used only the formal school in developing the virtuous man and developed only a small per cent of even the citizenry. Today, we recognize as education anything that changes behavior if for good (i. e., of man and society and eternal values) good education; if for one to the exclusion of the others, bad education. Hence, we are exposed to much education of both qualities throughout our lives—through radio, press, movie, religion, clubs, etc. We conceive of education as something that happens inside individuals—not institutions. Mark Twain said "I have never let my schooling interfere with my education." To say this in another way, "I must discover the divine purpose within me and fulfill that; my school and society may or may not help or hinder. I must, by this contemplative power which Plato allows chiefly to old men, discover early in life my place in the scheme of things. I must learn to know myself in constant change, and Deity in constant change, my environment in constant change according to my increasing understanding of Him, and to discover the likenesses and the difference in each, and blend each with the other. The discovery of this "ultimate good" that Plato and Aristotle students and they themselves sought is made by constant interaction of you, me and the author of the universe and life, and not that "man can perfect himself," as Plato said. His three caste system permitted only a very limited interaction between you, me, and Him. Society and education today is disposed to take whoever is available, teachable, and usable. Plato sees education as the source of moral energy of a city, while we today recognize Deity or spirit as the source with which we may or may not co-operate. With something so visible as education as the source, simple strict obedience was of high concern. With spirit or duty as the source and agency recognized, a different quality of obedience emerges—one not so strictly measurable at a particular point of time but requires time for its vindication.

IN PLATO AND Aristotle's time, each class passed on to its children its particular economic and industrial skills and felt secure for themselves and children. In our time the spread of use of skills is so vast. A thinking child must consult himself (his heredity), needs of others of his time, and decide where to throw his influence. With this wide range of opportunity and larger degree of agency to choose, he accepts also his responsibility for the choice. He knows he must choose for himself. He does so. He compares, evaluates, and finds satisfaction.

Plato and Aristotle wanted what we want for society, individually and collectively, but held too strict control over both education and religion. In both they were held by the past instead of linking past with future through the present. To found and perpetuate a society that humans could control, they had to make it simple static and with many "stops." Our society and education which recognize a third influence—the "up-ternal" or spiritual—can be more complex, changing, with many "goes." The introduction of the spiritual influence brings even more powerful factors to bear on life and living than internal and external. Plato recognized the need of it and wanted this spiritual value in his education system, but his had only a religious value that of holding the person responsible to state alone, without the state being responsible to higher spiritual powers. If he could have admitted this quality which would have changed the expressed goal to one of peace instead of war, his education system would have produced what he really was seeking. In his visionary, mystical way, Plato saw the need of what we, in a measure, have today. In his practical, realistic way, Aristotle also saw this same need. They both wanted their truth tested by living but felt the most good would come from "thinking alone" then "living among"—while we recognize a value in "thinking together" as well as "living together." We do not idealize contemplation, but we recognize its value and desire its expression for the good of the group.

WITH ARISTOTLE, we want to see that much of life is explainable, but with Plato, we recognize the importance of contact with the spiritual for that which we, of ourselves, cannot explain. We with Aristotle and Plato need the logos (divine facts) and realize the power of education to condition for good or evil but believe education to be more than the trivium and quadrivium. We need and use both Aristotle's reason and Plato's inspiration to progress politically and educationally, and we realize the years of evolution the change indicates.

Mental Food

Some members of Lamoni Branch and rural communities have been meeting in class session endeavoring to determine what constitutes Zionics individuals and what condition may be recognized as Zion. Most of us will list near the top of our qualities of a Zionics individual "Christlike attributes." But more specifically did we include "an insatiable desire for knowledge and wisdom" and "optimum personality growth under existing conditions."

"Eternal maturation"—or the idea that one never fully matures but is eternally maturing was brought out in our study. Zion is perfection—is perfection ever attained? Perfection means "without flaw."

Zion is not a static condition. To say "Zion is the Pure in Heart" is not specific enough. Each of us has his own personal concept of words and phrases and needs to recognize that fact. Out of our study and discussion came for me this definition of Zion:

Zion is the church (the kingdom-

Mary Jane Williams

Mary Jane Williams, daughter of Theopolis and Dinah Morgan Walters, was born at Oak Hill, Ohio, on April 7, 1856, and died August 10, 1947, at Wellston, Ohio. She was baptized at Syracuse, Ohio, in 1871 and was a member of the first branch said to have been organized in Ohio. Many rich spiritual experiences were enjoyed here, and the gospel went forth to southern parts of the state. Inspired by the zeal of her home branch, Sister Williams and her family moved to Wellston where their home became headquarters for missionaries. The first new member of the Wellston group was baptized there. A never-tiring worker, Sister Williams was a faithful attendant at all church services until two months before she died. Her husband, Thomas Williams, a son, Daniel, and a daughter, Ethel, preceded her in death.

The surviving children are John T. and David Williams, Mrs. Jeanette Marlow and Mrs. Edward W. Montgomery, all of Wellston; and Thomas and Arthur Williams of Springfield, Ohio. She also leaves a brother, William Walters of Illinois; a sister, Mrs. Elizabeth Stone of Wellston; ten grandchildren; and six great-grandchildren. The funeral was conducted by Patriarch J. E. Matthews and Elder Kenneth Kribel.

building organization) functioning to provide optimum opportunity for the personality (soul) development of each individual.

Zion-building requires deep, original thinking. Perhaps digesting these ideas will increase our ability to think creatively.—Enid S. DeBarthe, in The Lamoni Stake Record.

THE LETTER By Don V. Higgins

My mind took a journey last night—a familiar path to a small plot of this earth's surface which cost more than the world can pay in the rest of its years. It cost lives—lives which were not yet ready to be ended. It removed from the world the type of mind and heart which has made God consistently see hope for this civilization.

Many times my thoughts have returned there. Yesterday, as I talked to a friend, the whole scene rushed back. Something she said about giving and about true values reminded me of a letter I wrote one night. I lay beneath a poncho on a dry spot of ground . . . the only dry place on the Island of Luzon, I believe. We had parked our jeep before going on patrol. At that time it wasn't raining. The jeep had protected an area large enough for two of us to lie down. We backed it off and quickly covered it with ponchos, then we crawled under and began writing our letters home, by flashlight. If I may, I would like to quote from the letter I wrote that night.

"It seems that tonight the whole world is a damp, cold place. The fellows out there are just like Gene and me. They are tired and wet and lonely. The one bit of paradise they seek right now is a place where they could lie down and be warm and dry with someone to talk to.

"I can't help thinking how suddenly our concepts of the 'ideal' changes from time to time—how our sense of value changes. Three years ago, or even a year ago when we were on New Guinea, we would have thought of this as being the ultimate of inconvenience. Sleeping here where it is dry, even though it is on the bare ground in the rain, is a pleasure comparable to a night at the Waldorf for most of you back home.

"But, really, I can't help thinking if there were some place in the world which could be preserved from this scourge of destruction and chaos, it would be like our finding this dry spot—if there were some place of shelter for all people who sincerely seek a place of peace and refuge. And when I say seek, I mean actively work toward, and not those who sit back and wish for Utopia while they beat their neighbor out of his last dollar. Until men are worthy, and until their desires become more wholesome, such a haven will not exist."

As I closed the paragraph, the sharp crack of rifle fire broke the heavy silence. Gene and I dropped flat, doused our flashlights and automatically cocked our carbines. Carefully we peeked our heads out of the poncho . . . the fire was getting heavier. We saw, or at least were aware of someone being near us. We could see no target or even the direction of the fire. The whole skirmish seemed to be disorganized. The Jap fire was more effective than ours, showing that it was a planned attack. Gene slid along the ground and crawled into the jeep. As quickly as possible, he was on the radio trying to get information and help. He returned in a moment telling me that two armored units were within a couple of miles, and were on their way. It seemed like half an hour, but it was actually five minutes at the most before the armored units came up. We got everyone into holes, sent up flares to locate the enemy positions, and let the armored cars do the rest.

When we started checking up, we found we had lost seventeen men and twenty-five more had been injured. A sergeant who had been hit in the hip lay near us. I gave him emergency first aid and some water, then he told us what had happened. His story made me gasp for breath. Two men had seen a Jap patrol heading toward our jeep. They ran toward us, trying to warn us so we would have a chance. They were both killed before they reached us. That is what the first shooting was. Two others had supported them with heavy fire, trying to stop the Japs before they reached us. What they had thought was a patrol turned out to be a raiding party, nearly a company of Jap reconnaissance troops. They had discovered our positions without our knowing it.

Perhaps it was out of tribute to the men who had been killed to save Gene and me, or because I suddenly felt a responsibility to someone that I wrote some more. It was impossible for me to write what had actually happened, so instead I wrote this:

"Suddenly I realize how costly a haven of peace might be. A little dry spot here in the Philippines cost ten billion dollars, down payment only. How much would it cost for a nation or a world? We attempted it once in 1917; we are attempting it again now. This is only a temporary victory which we are winning. We are securing our nation protection for only a short season. We realize that our battles here are only the beginning. When we return home—those of us who do—we must unceasingly continue that battle. Our battle must be against those ideas and philosophies which might prevent a lasting world peace, yet we must have tolerance for other interpretations of those ideas.

"I can't help bringing this up . . . about giving. Gibran said something like 'Giving of your worldly gifts is not really giving. The only true gift is when we give of ourselves.' Did you ever think how selfish we really are? We even begrudge a smile when we meet people on the street. We find it hard to give an hour of our time to some worthy cause. And we put such value on the dollar that it governs our lives. Our sense of value is so perverted we can't realize the only important thing in this world is that which can bring collective happiness to people everywhere—that which will bring lasting and true peace embodying the basic freedoms which are the birthright of not only every American, but of all people on earth, And, necessarily, the peace of which I speak must make it impossible for human blood to be shed in international conflict again.

"I thank God that I lived to see and understand the meaning of the infinitive, 'to give' and to catch a faint comprehension of true values. Don't ever let me forget January 23, 1945, —That's tonight."

Four Empty Cups

A Parable by Jennie F. Paulson

To the Great Giver of All Good Things there came one day, four men, each with an empty vessel in his hand to receive the gifts he desired. They were all good men, but each of them purposed to use the gifts in a different way.

As the first man stood before him, the Lord of the Gifts said, "I cannot grant your request because you use your blessings for yourself alone."

When the second man appeared, the Lord told him, "I cannot grant your request in full because you lack wisdom in dispensing to others. Your desire is good, and your vessel will be partly filled."

As the third man came forward, he received the reply, "You have received abundantly, but have failed to render thanks for your blessings, so I cannot fill your cup."

Finally the fourth man came before the Lord of the Gifts. As he made his request, the Lord said to him, "Have you another vessel also? The blessings you will receive will overflow the one you have. You have always received your blessings with gratitude, and have passed them on to others with unselfishness and wisdom, so you will always receive according to your request, and more."

Gog Versus His Maker

By Apostle D. T. Williams

God Has Been So Good

*God has been so good!
He called me in my reckless youth,
And patiently each day
He strove to keep my blundering feet
Within his way.*

*In sorrow, he was by my side,
His peace a healing power
Was given me for comfort
In my darkest hour.*

*He led me through the valley;
When, as a broken reed—
My body bent with pain—his grace
Supplied my need.*

*And I?
What have I done in gratitude
For all his loving care?
Have I, in patience, called some youth
To pastures fair?*

*Have I, in sorrow, found some friend
And failed to meet the test,
Or brought him peace and comfort that
His soul might rest?*

*God has been so good!
How could I fail to see
My gratitude can best be shown by My own ministry?*

The United Nations

The Cost of Failure

After the First World War, the League of Nations was set up to take care of all major problems arising among the peoples of the world and their governments. Many thoughtful persons predicted that if the League of Nations failed—and their warning can be found in the records—it might mean the end of civilization. Too many people regarded the League cynically or lightly.

One of the results of the failure of the League of Nations was the most terrible war in history, 1939 to 1946. The Second World War almost destroyed civilization, and it is a question now whether we shall be able to preserve the free society we have known against the attacks of retrogressive powers.

If the cost of the failure of the League of Nations was the Second World War, what would be the potential cost of a possible failure of the United Nations?

We do not want it to fail, and we should do all we can to keep it from failing. A failure could result not only in the destruction of civilization, it could cause the destruction of the human race.

Areas of Success

Not long ago a distinguished Australian, one of our church members, Perce Judd, made a return visit to Independence. A group of our leaders here were given an opportunity to talk with him and ask him questions at a dinner meeting. He is an economic relations officer for the United Nations. During the next year he will participate in the formation of an international economic organization at Havana, Cuba, a cotton conference at Cairo, Egypt, a rice conference elsewhere, and other important meetings. All these gatherings will deal with the exchange of commodity surpluses between nations. Such meetings have been arranged to meet emergencies that grew out of the war; but the future of world trends may indicate the necessity of continuous consultation among nations to facilitate the exchange of goods for the welfare of all. If we are to have international relationships at all, they must include economic relationships. Here is an area not only of successful operation, but an absolute necessity.

The work of the Cultural and Economic Council of the United Nations has also met with many fine successes. The cultural, literary, and educational resources of the world have been called upon, and have responded, for aid in rehabilitating the schools, the libraries, the social organizations, the relief forces of the devastated areas. The UNESCO has accomplished a great work.

So, while the world is aware of the failure of the Security Council to agree, and of the disturbances of disagreeing delegates in the General Assembly, it has not heard enough of the successes of other organs of the United Nations.

A Point of Danger

Few people remember now the many fine services and achievements of the League of Nations, along economic, cultural, educational, and scientific lines. They remember only that a major failure in the fields of politics and military affairs wiped out all other gains.

We face that danger again. All the good work and achievements in the work of reconstruction and mercy, of culture and education, can be wiped out by a failure of the Security Council and of the General Assembly. The consequences of such a possible failure are made almost certain in the light of history. Independent diplomacy and military defense have never been able to produce anything better than war. And war has destroyed the contributions of writers, artists, educators, humanitarians, and all the good people who have labored for peace. No matter what gains are accumulated for civilization, war destroys them.

Our Only Chance

If we have any chance at all for peace, it must come through an effort to implement in an organization like the United Nations the principles of peace, righteousness, and responsibility which all Christian people find in their faith. An organization alone is not enough. Behind it there must be the spirit of international good will, understanding, patience, compromise, and tolerance. It is in the Spirit of Christ, and in that spirit alone that the hatreds can be banished, the fears calmed, the selfishness set aside. These things have poisoned and ruined world relationships since the dawn of history. We must conquer them now if we are to survive. We can conquer them only with the help of God.

“Then Shall the End Come”

Where shall we look for a ray of light and hope? Certainly we must consider the teachings of Jesus. And we can find it, rather oddly, among the most terrible of apocalyptic warnings, in Matthew 24: 14:

And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come.

The character of that end would be ambiguous, but for a few important words added by the Inspired Version, verse 32:

And then shall the end come, or the destruction of the wicked.

Wars can destroy wicked people, but they do not destroy wickedness. It continues after wars sometimes as bad or worse than before. How then can wickedness be destroyed? The

Headquarters Reports

OFFICIAL

President J. F. Garver and Bishop Walter N. Johnson completed their work in Hawaii, and took plane to New Zealand on November 1. Apostle Charles R. Hield will remain in Hawaii to complete some work there until December 5, when he will return to California.

Karl Schoepke writes that there have been twenty-one baptisms in Gros Räschen, Germany.

Lyle W. Woodstock was appointed by the recent Joint Council session to a full-time position for the church. He is a son of the late Charles B. Woodstock, so well-known for his long service in the Department of Religious Education; also a cousin of Apostle Charles R. Hield.

Evangelist John R. Grice recently completed a series of services at Miami, Oklahoma, and baptized nine persons. He is now at Stewartville, Missouri, where an excellent beginning is reported.

Elder John F. Sheehy, pastor of the Toronto congregation, has become president of the district, a change made necessary by additional work involved with the shifting of district boundaries. Elder W. J. Bavington has served in the post of president of that district for many years, doing an excellent and faithful work for the church there.

Bishop Harold Cackler recently terminated his business connections at Des Moines, Iowa, and entered upon his duties as assistant to the Presiding Bishopric on November 3. His first tasks are to direct the rapidly growing volume of work of Relief Work in Europe. He also takes responsibility for directing the educational and quorum work of the Aaronic priesthood.

Property in Europe for the use of missions and missionaries has been increased by the purchase of a building in Rotterdam, Holland, a transaction that is now in the process of completion. It will be used by two missionary families: those of Eugene Theys and Albert Scherer. . . . Two properties have been purchased in England: one for the use of Frank Fry at Nuneaton, and a double house in Manchester to house missionaries. These are in addition to the church headquarters at Birmingham.

Apostles Paul M. Hanson and G. G. Lewis are traveling together for a part of their itineraries in the East.

Apostle Blair Jensen reports an upward trend in baptisms in recent months. In his field new branches have been organized at Kirkland Lake, Ontario, and at Springfield, Ohio.

West Texas members had an all-day meet at State Park in Lubbock, on October 19. Sixty-one present, about a dozen of them nonmembers, some driving 160 miles to attend, and three families from New Mexico attending. This is a report from Brother Ralph L. Wilt, to Apostle D. T. Williams.

Dr. F. M. McDowell and John R. Darling of the Department of Religious Education recently held an institute at Aurora, Illinois, and have gone on to Flint, Michigan, for further work with young people's organization.

In accordance with previous district action and approval of the general officers concerned, the Johnson City, New York, Mission was organized officially as a branch of the church, to be known as the Johnson City, New York, Branch.

Organization was effected by Apostles G. G. Lewis and P. M.

Sister Blanche Carpenter has been asked to serve as Acting Statistician, pending the appointment of a successor to Elder Carroll L. Olson.

All correspondence having to do with statistics should be addressed to the Department of Statistics at the Auditorium and will be handled by Sister Carpenter and other members of the staff.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
F. Henry Edwards

Hanson assisted by District President Walter Simpson, at a business meeting on Saturday, October 25, 1947, in the home of Brother Clive Peters. Elder Stanley I. Hayes, 24 Moeller Street, Binghamton, New York, was elected as the first pastor. The branch is in process of building a basement church in a fine location.

Literature for Missions Abroad

Editorial mention was made recently of church literature to be printed in languages other than English for use in the missions abroad. At the present time, production of this literature is limited, as it is being produced for free distribution in specific missions. It is not for sale under current conditions, and orders for it cannot be filled at the Herald Publishing House.

Correction

An error was made recently in a statement in our issue of November 1, page 4, describing Brother V. D. Ruch as "of Omaha." Brother Ruch is serving in Council Bluffs. The work in Omaha is under the direction of Brother John Blackmore.

Gog Versus His Maker

By Apostle D. T. Williams

IN A PREVIOUS article, "God and Magog Prepare for Battle," we set forth the premise that God's wrath was not kindled against the land of Magog, Russia, so much as against the presumptive self-appointed leadership which has arrogantly acquired power and authority over 180,000,000 Russians and millions of their people in the subjected nations of the Baltic and Balkan regions, not to mention Germany and Poland.

The Prophet Ezekiel, speaking for the Creator, said, "I am against thee, O Gog, chief prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal, and I will turn thee around and put hooks into thy jaws, and I will bring thee forth, thee and all thy army." The evidence is clearly set forth here that the party bearing the responsibility for this vast movement of many nations is one named by the Almighty as "Gog."

It is quite conceivable that this Gog who comes to battle may not be the present dictator of Russia but a successor who shall have inherited all the ruthless power and dictatorial disposition of the present Red Warrior. However, he and Carl Marx, who conceived and promulgated the communist doctrine, and Nichole Lenin, who inaugurated it as a political system by which the Russian people are compelled to live, will be quite as responsible at the bar of divine and human justice as this Gog who will yet set his armies rolling over mountain and plain to the battle so graphically described by the prophet in Ezekiel, chapters 38 and 39.

In light of these factors, then, let us see how matters are shaping up to place the finger of indication and judgment on the party responsible for the future universal catastrophe which shall shake the nations to their centers, for it must follow that if such dire implications as are set out above have any foundation in fact there should be, even now, some signs indicative of the future campaign for world conquest.

Why should God select this one ruler from among all others to whom to say, "I am against thee, O Gog"? God is not against anyone without some good reason, nor would he select this one from among all other world leaders to advertise his antagonism toward unless there was some real and potent purpose in such a move. It will be self-evident, as we proceed with reason and prophecy, that Jehovah is against Gog, the chief prince of Rosh, because Gog is against the Almighty. The fact is, Gog's opposition to Divinity will be so plentifully documented in the following paragraphs that we will have no doubt as to whom the Ruler of all Nations has in mind.

FIRST OF ALL, let us have a look at the constitution of the Red dictatorship. On the occasion of the original pronouncement concerning this official document, it was colorfully advertised as such an instrument of super-liberty as would usher in the millennium of peace, power, and prosperity for the common man. Not one of these three, after twenty years, has yet graced the banners of the Bolshevik state, nor does it seem now that any one of the three will soon appear to bless the masses of the great Soviet Empire. However, our immediate interest in this official document has to do with its failure to allow religious liberty by constitutional right to a people who, by their deepest instincts, are inclined toward a supreme deity.

The official quotation under consideration is extracted from the document known as the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR). It is Article 124, and reads as follows: "In order to insure to citizens freedom of conscience, the church in the USSR is separated from the state, and the school from the church. Freedom of religious worship and freedom of anti-religious propaganda is recognized for all citizens."

At a first and cursory reading this sounds very fair and very democratic. The first sentence is, in fact, in faithful keeping with our own traditions of liberty and political well-being. However, it is when we examine the second and last sentence of this article that we are faced with the bald fact that there is no freedom of religion in Russia today, as there was none prior to the inception of this so-called constitution.

I have read earlier versions of this Soviet instrument in which this sentiment was given in the identical terms here used. I had hoped that when the Russian dictatorship got around to the matter of revamping its supposedly fundamental law, that it would make such a change as would admit real religious freedom throughout the vast expanse of its territory and for its many millions of people who must suffer for want of it.

However, such a hope is blighted in the fact that Article 124 still reads: "Freedom of religious worship and freedom of anti-religious propaganda is recognized for all citizens."

THE POINT OF importance here is that there is no freedom for the full exercise of religion, but only and simply freedom of worship. You can bow before the altars of religion but cannot call others to do likewise. Religion is made up of much more than worship. In fact, worship is but one element of religious experience; a very essential element, without a doubt, but such an one as will not be exercised for long without the other necessary, complimentary parts which give worship life and vitality.

Of course we are thinking here of the right to teach and preach the way of Christ. These are not guaranteed in the Soviet Constitution, but the opposite is guaranteed. The enemy of Christianity can teach and preach its godless philosophy with the encouragement of the state. But please notice again that the Constitution says, "freedom of anti-religious propaganda is recognized for all citizens," but no such freedom of propaganda or teaching of belief is allowed to those who accept God and his son Jesus Christ or the Christian way of life.

You can pray, but you cannot preach. You can worship, but dare not teach. Without the right to promulgate the gospel, the desire to worship God must soon die out among the people. Do you think the Soviet sacreligionists did not have this ultimate result in mind when they did what to them was a slick piece of work? They are against God and all he stands for in human behavior.

But the right of all who are against God to promulgate their pernicious "doctrine of devils" was preserved and encouraged under "freedom of anti-religious propaganda." You can have a Sunday school under this godless constitution, but it must be such a Sunday school as will teach its little children not to believe in any "silly tradition" of a God in heaven; such a Sunday school as will smear the child's mind with invectives against his Creator.

Many such Sunday schools have been organized throughout Russia; they are so effective in their teaching that in a very few years, under the protection of this fundamental law of the Soviets, they will help the "Society of the Godless" grow to an adherence of 12,000,000 people.

WE ARE NOW beginning to see that the Almighty is against Gog only because Gog is against his Maker. If the above has not convinced some of communism's pernicious intent, let us add such evidence as will be incontrovertible.

Such Sunday schools as are described above debauch not alone the soil and air of Russia, they have been reported in other nations where communism has spread its fiendish and ruthless tentacles. Even England and America have not escaped. The crude poets of these institutions contaminate the very hymnology of Christianity by such parodies as the following:

*The whole world at last is beginning to see,
The blight of the world is Jesus!
Like sunshine at noonday, free thought has shown me,
The blight of the world is Jesus!
Keep off the blight or blighted you'll
be,
Blighted for life by credulity.
Once I believed but now I can see
The blight of the world is Jesus.*

Of course, Gog of the prophecy is the high priest of Communism and heads up a "church of the Devil," whose altars are all ablaze with his denial of God's existence. He is anti-Christ as well as anti-God. When President Roosevelt proclaimed there was as much freedom of religion in Russia as in the United States, he was just leaning over backward to help cement the ties of two great nations for a war which was to be a struggle for national existence.

When Stalin, at a banquet, raised his cup in a toast to the president and said, "May God help him in his task," some pink Christians ran with the tidings that Stalin, the man of steel, had been converted to Christ. He, the head of the greatest dictatorship under heaven, was only leaning far-forward to meet the complimentary concession made by the head of the greatest democracy on earth. I do not believe that either was sincere in his statement. It was simply a matter of international politeness and an attempt to bridge the unsurpassable gulf of acknowledged differences between American democracy and Russian totalitarianism.

HOW WIDE is that gap? Let us see.

What Communism thinks about Christ is well illustrated in a production coming from the pen of the Negro poet, Langston Hughes, a confirmed communist. The poem was delivered by its author at a luncheon given for communists and fellow-travelers at Vista Del Arroyo Hotel in Pasadena, California, Friday, November 19, 1940. If you have reverence for the name of Christ, this will make you think twice before you accept Communism as a way of life or even give it backyard space in your mind.

"GOOD-BY CHRIST"

*"Listen, Christ,
You did all right in your day, I reckon—
But that day's gone now.
They ghosted you up a swell story, too.
Called it Bible—
But it's dead now.
The popes and the preachers 've
Made too much money from it
You ain't no good no more.
They've pawned you
Till you've done worn out.
Good-by,
Christ Jesus, Lord God Jehova,
Beat it on away from here now.
Make way for a new guy with no religion at all—
A real guy named
Marx Communist Lenin Peasant Stalin
Worker ME—
I said, ME!
Go ahead on now
And step on the gas, Christ!
The world is mine from now on—
Move!
Don't be so slow about movin'!
And nobody's gonna sell ME
To a king, or a general,
Or a millionaire.*

This is the fruitage of Gog's gospel. It is quite probable that Langston Hughes' black mammy was a devout Christian with the simple faith of her race. But here is what Communism did to him and to his confidence in his Creator. It is affecting millions of others likewise. I am sure you would not want the life of your child infiltrated with this
www.LatterDayTruth.org

evil virus. If Communism were only an economic and political way of life, our attitude toward it would be very much different.

I wonder if this will be enough to convince Christians that their philosophy is a doctrine of devils. If not, we will present further evidence which should be known to all in another article, "GOG'S USURPATION OF POWER."

A Prayer

Free my mind, O Lord, from the shackles of prejudice
That I may think clearly in the light of divine intelligence;
Not in cold, calculating thought alone,
But warmed by the love of fellow men.

I pray not for favors, Lord,
Only let me live in dignity
With all thy children of the world,
Sharing their common destiny,
Knowing their fears and loves,
Working with them as a brother
To bring a better day.

Give me the courage, Lord,
To live by these convictions,
Forged slowly through the everyday of life,
Solid, simple truths, made my own
By experience and reason.

Thank you, Lord, for all great men
Who have prophesied a better day
By their own lives;
Their words take root in us,
Unmindful of their source,
Except, that in a common heritage,
They came from thee.

O Lord, who holds us accountable
For being true to the highest we know,
Grant us humility in which to grow
Unfettered by our childish concepts, Striving always for the will to keep alive
This spirit of youthful adventure.

Hear this, my prayer, O Lord,
Arising from the sincerity of my heart.

APPRECIATES LETTERS

Mrs. Rose Abbott, 504 North Second Street, Yakima Nursing Home, Yakima, Washington, who is recovering from a broken hip, wishes to thank all who remembered her with cards and letters following her request for prayers in the Herald.

Patriarchal Blessings of Joseph and Hyrum Smith of the occurrence in her book, Joseph Smith, The Prophet, and His Progenitors, and I quote from page 266 of the edition which I have, a very old print of that book (See also Church History, Volume 2, pages 262, 263).

"My son, Hyrum, I seal upon your head your patriarchal blessing, which I placed upon your head before, for that shall be verified. In addition to this, I now give you my dying blessing. You shall have a season of peace, so that you shall have sufficient rest to accomplish the work which God has given you to do. You shall be as firm as the pillars of heaven unto the end of your days. I now seal upon your head the patriarchal power, and you shall bless the people. This is my dying blessing upon your head in the name of Jesus. Amen."

"Joseph, my son, you are called to a high and holy calling. You are even called to do the work of the Lord. Hold out faithful, and you shall be blessed, and your children after you. You shall even live to finish your work." At this Joseph cried out, weeping, "Oh! my father, shall I?" "Yes," said his father, "you shall live to lay out the plan of all the work which God has given you to do. This is my dying blessing on your head in the name of Jesus. I also confirm your former blessing upon your head; for it shall be fulfilled. Even so. Amen."

You will note two things from these blessings bestowed upon Hyrum and Joseph. In both instances, reference is made to a previous blessing given to them. So far as I know, there is no record of those blessings and their content. These blessings which Lucy Smith reports in her book were patriarchal blessings, special in their nature, given by the Presiding Patriarch just before his death to Joseph and Hyrum, but they were not their first patriarchal blessings.

The second thing you will note is that in the blessing bestowed upon Joseph, the Seer, it is said that his children should be blessed after him; and, of course, it is a historical fact that in the Reorganization the three successive presidents of the church are his descendants. I refer to Joseph Smith, the third, Frederick Madison Smith, and Israel A. Smith; and the three Presiding Patriarchs in the Reorganization also were of his posterity. I refer to Alexander H. Smith, Frederick A. Smith, and the undersigned. Also these three patriarchs were lineal descendants of Joseph Smith, Sr., the first Presiding Patriarch.

You will observe that in the blessing of Hyrum, no promise is made concerning his posterity.

Mistakes In the Bible

By Evan A. Fry

If you have any questions on the truth of the Bible
If you have doubts about it If you are willing to consider a few plain facts about it This transcript of a recent radio discussion will give you help.

OUR SUBJECT may seem to be a shocking, or perhaps even a sacrilegious one. Certainly it is timely with more and more modern translations of the Bible coming to use every year, each one attempting to correct some of the errors of the past, or at least to render the Bible truths into language which can readily be understood by modern readers. Each of these new translations is met with approval and scholarly consideration by some, and with bitter accusation and disapproval by others. Most disapproval of new translations of the Bible is by people who are totally unfamiliar with the story of how our Bible was translated and brought to us in this modern day.

There are several very erroneous ideas about the Bible held even by otherwise well-educated and well-informed people. One idea is that the King James Bible is "the original Bible." It was not even the first English translation, having been preceded by partial translations by Cædmon, Bede, and Aelfric, and by complete translations from Wycliffe, Tyndale, and Coverdale; by the Geneva Bible, the Great Bible, the Bishops' Bible, and the Douay Bible published by English-Catholic refugees in France. Another idea is that the King James Bible is sole, unique, divinely inspired, and therefore infallible. Its translators never claimed any such distinction for it. They were university professors and scholars—not prophets. So uncertain were they that they had the last word on many difficult translations that they inserted marginal notes, giving the reader his choice of two or more possible renderings.

When the King James translation of the Bible appeared, it aroused a storm of protest and criticism. "Have we been deceived before?" certain doubters asked. "Was not the previous translation good? If it was good, why mend it? If it was not good, why was it obtruded upon us before?" In the translators' preface (which unfortunately is omitted from nearly every edition of the King James Bible today) the scholars responsible for this new translation expressed themselves thus, in answer to these critics: "So we, building upon their foundation that went before us, and being holpen by their labors, do endeavor to make that better which they left so good." Since the publication of this translation in 1611, there have been dozens, if not hundreds of new translations presented to the public. Which one is correct? Which one is infallible? We answer, "None of them, for the ultimate and final in Biblical translation will never be reached. Each generation will have need of certain revision and modernization, in keeping with changes in word meaning, and advances in scholarship."

WHEN JOSEPH SMITH undertook to correct some of the errors of the Bible, claiming inspiration for that task, people fumed and wrathfully protested against his presumption. They asserted again, as critics had before 1611, that the Bible was final, perfect, infallible, not to be touched by mortal minds or hands. Since 1833, when Joseph Smith finished this task, there have been many new translations;

but all of them have left a great many of the same old errors. The Inspired Version, as we call this revision by Joseph Smith, does not claim to have corrected them all. But it has corrected a remarkable number of them, some of which we shall examine presently.

Our purpose is not to tear down or discredit the Bible, but to encourage men to approach the study of it sanely and reasonably. Questioning the errors of the Bible is not the same as questioning the Bible, for no Bible writer or translator ever claimed infallibility for his work. The Bible is the word of God; but it is not the perfect word of God. To quote again from the Translators' Preface to the King James Translation, "As the King's speech, which he uttereth in Parliament, being translated into French, Dutch, Italian, and Latin, is still the King's speech, though it be not interpreted by every translator with the like grace, nor peradventure so fitly for phrase, nor so expressly for sense everywhere." In spite of clumsiness and error in copying or in translation, the Bible is still the word of God. But we shall do well to avoid superstitious veneration of an imperfect book, and to guard against error and deception by recognizing the difficulties through which the Bible has passed to reach us, and the possibilities and even certainties of error in such a devious process.

WHY can we be so sure that there are errors in the Bible? First, because we do not have all the books of the Bible. The King James version mentions, in all, twenty-one books which are not included in our canon of scripture. Second, because nowhere in the Bible are we told that God would ever cease inspiring men to write scripture. Third, because the versification, punctuation, and capitalization we have in our modern versions were not part of the original manuscripts, and meaning can often be changed by versification and punctuation. Fourth, because of the possibility that the original writer, though inspired, did not express himself clearly. Fifth, because of the possibility that his writings were not copied correctly—and so far as anyone knows, there is not a single original manuscript of the Bible in existence—that is, one actually written by the author. Sixth, there is the possibility that if correctly expressed and correctly copied, the sense was not translated correctly. And seventh, because of the probability that the translation which was correct in the day it was made will come to convey a wrong meaning in the future, because of shifts in word meanings and usage.

Let us briefly point out some examples of what we mean by this last point. Today the verb let means to permit, to allow. As used in II Thessalonians 2: 7, it means exactly the opposite—to prevent, to hinder. And that word prevent, used in I Thessalonians 4: 15, does not mean to hinder or to forbid at all, but to precede or outrun. When Paul says in I Corinthians 10: 24, "Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth," he doesn't mean that we are all to go around trying to grab each other's money. Wealth does not mean money at all, but weal-th, or well-being. When Jesus said that he would send another comforter, he did not mean something to console us, or to express pity for us, but one to give strength to us. The word atonement in the day when the King James Bible was translated had nothing of the meaning of expiation as it has come to have today, but simply meant setting at one with each other—bringing together again—the at-one-ment.

The person who has blindly accepted the Bible as infallible, and has never bothered to look inside it, has no idea of how many mistakes and contradictions and incongruities and anachronisms he can find therein. May we invite you to get your Bible and join us in looking for a few—not in a spirit of carping impiety, but in a spirit of sound reason.

We would all agree that God is a perfect being. He can do no evil. If he never does evil, he never needs to repent. He can and does revoke punishment when men repent, but he does not repent of the punishment. Yet the King James version in dozens of places pictures God as repenting of the punishment he has brought on sinful men. Genesis 6: 6 says that God repented of having made man as he saw the wickedness in the days of Noah. Exodus 32: 14 says that God repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people. In I Samuel 15: 11, God repents at having made Saul king. Numbers 23: 19, and I Samuel 15: 29 say that God is not a man, and does not ever need to repent. Which is wrong? Or does the translation need to be clarified? The Inspired Version clarifies these and other similar passages by making men repent, instead of God, in order to revoke the punishment for sin.

A verse in Amos (3: 6) makes God an all-out sinner. It reads: "Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?" The Inspired Version changes it to read, "Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not known it." There are some other very puzzling verses in I Samuel which make God a source of evil. Four times in the 16th chapter (verses 14, 15, 16, 23), once in the 18th chapter (verse 10), and once in the 19th chapter (verse 9), the King James says that an evil spirit from God troubled Saul. The Inspired Version changes it to read, "An evil spirit not of God."

David was a good man, but far from perfect. He was the murderer of Uriah, and an adulterer with Uriah's wife. Yet in I Kings 11: 4; 11: 6; and 11: 33, it is stated that David's heart was perfect, that he went fully after the Lord, and that he kept all God's statutes. The Inspired Version makes David like his son Solomon in not being perfect, or going fully after the Lord, or walking in all his statutes.

THE KING JAMES BIBLE, and practically all the modern translations have preserved the queer anomaly of a son two years older than his father. II Chronicles 21: 20 says that Jehoram began to reign at the age of thirty-two, reigned eight years, and died. The second verse of the following chapter tells of the immediate accession of Ahaziah, Jehoram's son, who was forty-two years old when he began to reign, or two years older than his deceased father. A minor slip, but a ludicrous one, is to be found in Matthew 8: 12, which reads, "The children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness." The Inspired Version makes Ahaziah twenty and two years old as he began to reign, and renders the verse from Matthew, "But the children of the wicked one shall be cast out"

Both Matthew 27: 44, and Mark 15: 32 say that both of the thieves crucified with Jesus railed at him as they hung side by side on the three crosses. Luke 23: 39-41 explains that one railed, while the other confessed his guilt, and said, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." The Inspired Version harmonizes these three passages.

Jesus is made to say in John 10: 8, "All that came before me were thieves and robbers," which seems a little harsh on such good men as Noah, Enoch, Abraham, Moses, and the prophets. The Inspired Version adds, "All that came before me who testified not of me" which is quite another story.

In the original account of Saul's vision, in Acts 9: 7, it is told that the men with him heard the voice, but saw no man. Paul's account of the same incident, told to the people of Jerusalem from the palace stairs, Acts 22: 9, says, "And they that were with me saw indeed the light, but heard not the voice of him that spake to me." The Inspired Version harmonizes these two contradictory passages in keeping with Paul's further account before Agrippa, as told in Acts 26: 13.

Ephesians 4: 26 says, "Be ye angry, and sin not." Then in verse 31 of the same chapter, Paul says, "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger . . . be put away from you." Which does he mean? The Inspired Version reads, "Can ye be angry, and sin not? Let not the sun go down upon your wrath."

Out of the many mistakes which we could point out, we bring you one more and desist, for fear of wearying you. Did you know that the King James tells of a man far more wonderful and unusual than Christ himself? It is Melchisedec, who according to Hebrews 7: 3 was "without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life" But in the Inspired Version, it is the priesthood of Melchisedec which is without father or mother or descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life.

WHAT is our object in rehearsing all these mistakes of the Bible? (And there are literally hundreds more which could be listed had we the time.) What lesson is to be learned from them? The thing which this prevalence of mistakes seems to indicate to me is that we should read our Bibles with intelligence, rather than with blind credulity; that we should read them in faith, but not in superstition; that we should seek to find in them the word of God, but not expect to find it infallibly expressed in every word, syllable, and punctuation mark. Because it has come to us through devious human sources, the Bible is fallible. Because the capacities and understandings of men are constantly changing and enlarging, because new words are constantly being coined, and old ones discarded or changed in meaning, there will always be need for new translations to help us share the best scholarship and research of our generation.

And as a Latter Day Saint, after even a short survey of the mistakes of the King James Bible, I am grateful for the Inspired Version, completed by Joseph Smith in 1833. It is not perfect either; but it has corrected literally hundreds of mistakes, many of which have since been corrected in some way by modern scholars, but many of which remain in even the modern translations to plague and puzzle the Bible student who seeks the truth.

Something for Nothing

By Arthur E. Dempsey

“SOMETHING for nothing!” A simple phrase to be sure, but what a meaning one finds tied up in those words.

“Something for nothing,” said Satan (in effect) to Cain, and righteous Abel’s blood cried from the ground to proclaim the first murder on this earth. (Genesis 5, Inspired Version.)

“Something for nothing,” cried countless robbers, thieves, and conspirators, both as individuals and as bands, tribes, and nations, and thus millions have been forced to give up lands, goods, loved ones, and lives to satisfy this doctrine of his Satanic Majesty.

“Something for nothing,” shouts that broad, red stream ever darkening the floors of gangsters’ and gamblers’ dens.

“Something for nothing,” whispers the kidnaper, while an innocent child is torn from its home, and despairing parents wring their hands and carry out various expedients in vain and terror.

“Something for nothing,” purrs the confidence man as he clutches the hard-earned cash and life savings of the unwary and gullible.

“Something for nothing,” gloats the business man, as he lays traps to victimize the unsuspecting and robs the worker of a fair wage.

“Something for nothing,” grits the laborer as he loafs on the job and takes his ease at his employer’s expense.

“Something for nothing,” suggests the punch board at the candy counter to customers of tender age who are thus baptized into a system that may lead them to the slot machine, raffling wheel, and gambling halls.

“Something for nothing,” blaze the dazzling signs at the theater of a Friday night while saints and sinners crowd in with the breathless anticipation of “bank night.”

And so we might go on and on, listing all the countless ways and means by which those who listen to the seductive arts of the enticer are drawn into the vicious net.

Many are the explanations and philosophies offered by those whose lusts lead them on until they are warped to the extent that they can believe any lie. Nearly every highway man, thief, and murderer has a doctrine or philosophy to support his misdeeds. In fact, it may not be fatal to a goodly degree of accuracy if we were to divide the human race into two general classes: those mentioned above and those who accept the highest and holiest doctrine ever given to man, and then deliberately set about the task of shaping their lives to conform to that divine pattern.

The early mandate of God given to Adam and inherited by us is: “By the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread” (Genesis 3: 25; 4: 1, Inspired Version.) This law is vital to our happiness and well-being, for only that person who earns what he has, can really enjoy the true happiness and deep satisfaction which come with the fulfilling of the divine command.

Jesus said, “It is more blessed to give than to receive,” and every honest disciple who has tested that truth is a witness of its verity.

The servant of his own lusts says, “It is more blessed to receive than to give.” And every disciple of this doctrine can testify (if he would) that while he may have received a momentary thrill of selfish exaltation, the pleasure passes quickly, leaving him disillusioned and unhappy. And so to fill the void, he goes out to find another thrill of the same kind, and so on and on—ever seeking but never finding lasting satisfaction or peace of mind.

Let us take the pattern offered by our Lord, remembering that “he cannot look upon sin with the least degree of allowance,” and that we are not acceptable to him unless we determine to become “perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect.” Paul said, “Be not conformed to this world but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God.” Let “bank night” and all the other devices for obtaining “something for nothing” call in vain, so that we may prepare ourselves for the critical days ahead in which “Satan shall have power over his own, but God will have his people.” Let us not assume that because our names are on the church roster we are God’s people. Remember ancient Israel, the chosen people, who magnified the honor of their calling until they looked with disdain on all others and forgot the work that the call involved and so failed in their mission, reaping a harvest of misery and woe.

In the uncertain future, the true disciples of Christ are advised to lift up their heads for their redemption draweth nigh. Those who have power to lift up their heads will not be those who expect “something for nothing,” but those who hear and obey the voice of their Redeemer.

clear implication of the scripture is that it must be preceded by the preaching of the gospel for a witness “unto all nations.”

How great a missionary task that imposes upon us! What a work there is for us to do. How many must be called and trained for the task ahead. How great is our responsibility. We must not be afraid of the size of the task. We must realize what a Strength will be given us when we are determined and dedicated to the work. L. L.

Christian Faith

An Iowa University “doctor” made the trip from Nauvoo to Salt Lake City with the Mormon “caravan” last summer, and pays tribute to their religious conviction. “I have many friends among the [Mormon] young men on missions, and they are examples of what one would expect of an exponent of the Christian faith.” We question if the implication intended is that their faith is not Christian—hence the wonder. It is demonstrable that their beliefs on marriage are directly opposed to the law laid down by Jesus Christ.

Eternal Judgment

By Apostle M. L. Draper

These words are written in the twentieth chapter of the Revelation of John, verses eleven to thirteen, "And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened, which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works."

Whenever we hear the words "eternal judgment," we are inclined to think of this final day of judgment when every person shall be revealed for what he is, for what he has become by reason of his works. And, as a matter of fact, this is correct, for this final day of judgment is indeed a part of the process of eternal judgment, and it deserves our careful thought. But, lest we postpone the process to the point at which it may be too late for us to reconsider the deeds of this life, let it also be understood that judgment is a process, an eternal process, which has always been going on, is functioning right now, and which shall continue through eternity. That it is an endless process, past, present, and future, is as much reason why it should be called eternal judgment as is the fact that its consequences determine the nature of our eternal future.

We are being constantly judged for the things we think, say, and do. Each of us today is the sum total of our experiences, choices, and deeds, up to the present. If we would be something different ten years from now, we must begin now to do the things which will make of us the kind of person we want to be. This is the process of eternal judgment. And it is in this process that the whole idea of Christian repentance has its effectiveness. We want to be better, so, in repentance, we cease doing evil and begin doing good. Judgment then decrees that we shall be better persons. This is the process which is referred to in other words as the law of cause and effect. If the cause is righteous, the effect will be good—this is eternal judgment.

The eternal consequences of our present deeds is finally revealed at the event referred to in the scripture reading from Revelation, the day of final judgment. This experience is described by one speaker as the time when "our conduct with our fellow men shall be revealed." In other words, the day of final judgment does not change the nature of the continuous process of judgment which is even now determining the kind of people we shall be, but it is only a revelation of the results. If we are rebellious now, on the day of final judgment our rebellion will be revealed for eternity. If we seek truth and live by the standards of Christ now, on the day of final judgment our Christian nature will be revealed for eternity. But the revelation, it must be emphasized, will be of what we have become by our deeds, and the fact of the revelation will not change our natures.

John mentions repeatedly that this judgment is by our works. Belief is most important as a guide to our works. Faith is the vitally necessary balance wheel for the machinery of life, but neither faith nor intellectual beliefs are the basis of our judgment. They are the well-spring sources of the river of life, but it is the course of the river bed which determines whether it will ever reach the sea. So it is the course of our lives, in the deeds we do, which determine our eternal destination.

In an earlier article on the nature of hell, attention was given to the popular error that the final experience of man depends upon just two places or conditions—heaven and hell. It has already been shown that hell cannot possibly be a part of the final experiences of man, because hell itself delivers up the dead which are there even before the day of final judgment. Read again Revelation 20: 13. Then in the next verse, we are told that hell is to be destroyed afterward, having achieved its purpose.

These facts, together with the plain statement of John that we are to be judged by our works, prove beyond any doubt that the popular concept of the two place judgment—heaven or hell—is erroneous and unscriptural. Taking into account the opportunities we have had to know the truth, our Heavenly Father provides for each of us in eternity, by the process of eternal judgment, a nature and condition which result from our works. This judgment is closely related to the resurrection. Note that John speaks of them as almost the same thing—"death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works." Again John, speaking of the resurrection, tells us that we do not know just what kind of bodies we shall have, but that, in the process of judgment and resurrection, when Christ "shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." (I John 3: 2.)

In speaking further of the kind of people we shall be in the day of final judgment following the resurrection, the Apostle Paul states explicitly that there is more than one state of reward for the good deeds of this life; in I Corinthians 15: 41, 42, "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead." What is this he is saying? Is there more than one kind of heaven, or different conditions in heaven? It would appear so from this statement, and from those of the Prophet John when he says we are judged by our works. There is one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars, with as much variation in these glories as between the sun, the moon, and the stars, and as much difference within the glories as between the various stars themselves.

Now let us return to the popular idea of heaven. Suppose you were the judge on the great white throne, and according to the Scriptures all men small and great, good and evil, stand before you to be judged. According to the popular concept, you must draw a line somewhere, sending some of these people into eternal oblivion or eternal suffering, while others enter into the same glorious experience together with God and Christ. There are only two alternatives according to popular teaching, nothing in between the eternal suffering and eternal bliss. Where would you draw the line?

If you were to line up everybody with Jesus on one end and the Devil on the other, which group would you send to heaven, and which to eternal misery? Where would you draw the line? If you draw it in the middle, you would be separating two persons who are so much alike that only a very minor misdeed or a single thoughtless act makes the difference between them. You would be telling this person, who just barely missed heaven, that he may as well have been as bad as the Devil himself, for his end is the same. On the other hand, you would be telling the person who just barely got into heaven, that his careless life was just as acceptable as that of the best man in the line, for their rewards are the same. And not only would you have this difficulty by drawing the line in the middle, but, wherever it is drawn, the same situation would exist if the popular idea is correct. The result is absurd. It contradicts all that the Bible teaches us about the mercy and justice of God. It even does violence to our own limited, human sense of justice. What then is the answer?

It is in the teaching of the Apostle Paul that there are three general groups, which in turn are divided into as many classifications as may be necessary to account for every person. Every man shall be judged by his works. As one star differs from another star in glory, so also is the resurrection of the dead. Even the wicked who have paid the penalty for their rebellion in hell and have there learned through the Gospel of Christ the better way of life, may be rewarded for the good that they may have done. For many people who rebel against some laws may be capable of good deeds, and when they have learned better of their rebellion, they shall be rewarded for their good works. Some of them may be compared to some very dim stars, but that reward will be theirs for their good works.

How simple this is—how in keeping with the nature of God and how consistent with his works in all the universe. It is amazing that in the face of such plain and simple scriptural teaching there should be such confusion about this matter of judgment, punishment, and reward. The story is so easy to understand. This life is the time when we develop our spiritual capacities for eternity. At death, those who have eagerly sought truth await their resurrection in the condition of peace and rest known as paradise.¹ Those who have rebelled must learn by the punishment and restraint of hell that rebellion is dangerous both to the rebel and to other people.² The teaching of the gospel to the prisoners in hell will make possible their repentance.³ Then, in the resurrection, the righteous will be restored body and spirit to reign with Christ for a thousand years.⁴ Death and hell shall deliver up the dead that are in them,⁵ hell shall be destroyed,⁶ and all men shall be revealed for what they have become through their works, in a day of final judgment.⁷ Their differing works will result in differing glories, that of the sun, the moon, and the stars, and as one star differs from another in glory, so also is the resurrection of the dead.⁸

Judgment is eternal. It is going on right now. Let us choose now to do the works of the kingdom of God, that through these works we may invite the world to Christ and save as many as will be saved in the celestial glory of the sun for the wonders of eternity.

Expectations

By Grace L. Krahl

What Do We Expect of Our Religion?

WE EXPECT OUR religion to change us of course, recognizing the fact that we need to be changed, once the "Light of life" has touched our spiritual sight and shown us our immature and defective spiritual stature.

The story is told of an elderly lady who upon experiencing the thrill of her religious conversion, arose in meeting and said, "I ain't what I want to be, but I ain't what I wuz." While the impact of her rhetoric upon her listeners must have been amusing, still there was evidence of a deep sincerity as she saw herself in the process of change that signified improvement to her.

So largely are we controlled by our emotions, not only our loves, our sympathies, and our benevolences, but also by our apathies, our aversions, and resentments, that Solomon in his wisdom summarized human proclivities in the statement, "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." But religion of the heart, even when the best in us is expressed, is not sufficient; it must be balanced with reason, which gives explanation for that which should be done. Thus the Lord exhorts us to serve him "with all our heart, might, mind, and strength."

The primary task of religion is to enable us to conquer our worst self. It is in the inner life where we expect religion to do something for us, and to this fact there is no lack of testimony. Religion can do just that.

It is a slow transition—this changing of human nature into the divine; but how great is the purpose of it all—that we may build the kingdom of God on earth. Would that it were otherwise, but perhaps the slowness of the process makes more sure its permanency and thoroughness.

A goldsmith was refining some gold in a crucible. A bystander watching the procedure saw no change in the molten mass as time passed. Suddenly the smith removed the seething metal. Then the onlooker was more curious. "Why did you remove it at that particular moment?" he asked. "I can see my image in it now," was the significant reply. It is the ultimate of followers of Christ to see his image reflected in the work they do.

We expect our religion to make us quality people—a people voluntarily disciplined to build the kingdom of God in God's own way. "Let my army become very great and let it become sanctified before me."—Doctrine and Covenants 102. Can we hasten the sanctifying process in the army that we have?

What Does Our Religion Expect of Us?

First of all, religion is not something to possess (would it be safe in our hands?) but something to possess us. It is a life that will bear the inspection of men and God. It expects us to love our neighbor as ourselves. It demands loyalty and fidelity to truth, not wavering faith. It urges us to diffuse knowledge among the people of our community concerning the plan of salvation as contained in the restored gospel and the joy and happiness of an abiding faith in God.

Jesus said, "Let your light shine." T. L. Cuyler has written these lines: "Let your religion be seen. Lamps do not talk, but they do shine. A lighthouse sounds no drum, it beats no gong; yet, far over the waters, its friendly light is seen by the mariner."

A sinner is a human being who has become a problem to himself.—Dr. McKay, quoted by E. Stanley Jones, p. 150, Is Kingdom of God Realism.

SO THERE ARE NO FRONTIERS!

By Norma Anne Kirkendall

MOST YOUNG people thoroughly enjoy frontier stories and avidly peruse the life of Betty Zane or some other frontier hero or heroine. Daniel Boone, David Crockett, and Buffalo Bill are now more powerful inspirations than they were in their own lifetimes. And now people sigh and say, "Yes, but there are no frontiers any more."

Several years ago, the snowmobile to be used by Admiral Byrd in the Antarctic was taken through the town where I taught in the high school. When word reached the school that this large vehicle was nearing town, the principal dismissed the school, and everyone rushed out to see the unusual car. This huge, lumbering auto was going to the South Pole—a land of mystery and I can imagine that every person there along the path (adult and child alike) secretly wished he could join in such an expedition to discover new truths. But they also said, "We'll never get to do anything like that, because there are no more frontiers."

In my high school classes in American history I told the pupils of how I had watched the development of the automobile, the airplane, and the radio. They found it hard to believe that these things were of such recent discovery, and I think some of them regarded me as being either ancient or a downright fibber. Their attitude was that the patent office in Washington might as well close, for there was nothing of major importance yet to be discovered or invented.

In recent months, I have done quite a bit of lecturing with the aid of Kodachrome pictures which I have taken of the archaeological ruins in Latin America. Sometimes, I am startled by the amount of interest shown in this subject. The common reaction is that, "It would have been wonderful to have been on one of those expeditions when such fine discoveries were excavated and brought to light." Those same people are astounded to know that only about seven per cent of the now-known archaeological regions have been thoroughly explored. Ninety-three per cent of this territory remains untouched. Wouldn't you call that a frontier?

Twenty years ago pneumonia was fatal in a large percentage of cases. Now an oxygen tent assures almost immediate relief. The marvels of the iron lung are now almost commonplace. Shots and vitamin pills are preventative measures against well-known maladies, and many people employ doctors only for broken bones. Yet, I know a man who suffers, along with thousands of others, with a type of palsy and muscle wasting known as Parkinson's Disease. Little is known of cause or cure for this troublesome and persistent disturbance. It is true that you may never be called upon to sacrifice your life in some far off leper colony, but a neighbor may even now have this shaking palsy. Someone, somewhere, someday, is going to find the cure for the disease. Why not try it yourself? Whenever you go into unknown territory, that's a frontier, isn't it?

Within the past few years, many of our leading publishers have started printing their magazines in languages other than English. The sales of these foreign editions have increased many times since their introduction, and advertisements carried in those pages have boosted the sale of those products in the foreign lands. Many of these companies are on the outlook for executive and clerical help who know the language and customs of other countries. Ecuador recently offered large homestead tracts free of charge to any resident of any other American nation who will come and settle there. Our government still offers land and many opportunities to settlers in Alaska. There are still geographical frontiers.

Have you ever read a book and said, "Well, for goodness sake, I could write better than that"? Why not write? There are hundreds of ordinary people writing books and articles every day. If you have something to say, then no one is stopping you from saying it. After having talked about the government "suggestion plan," I finally got up nerve enough to write about a very simple idea which had occurred to me. In a couple of weeks, I received a check. That too was a frontier. Have you felt intellectually stagnant? Why not learn Spanish, or Sanskrit, or civil engineering, or judo, or ballet? There are courses in all of these and innumerable other fields too, and any one of them would be a frontier for you.

If a frontier is defined only by a covered wagon or a buckskin suit, then there are none. But if a frontier as characterized by the opportunity to do something new—then there are frontiers galore, virgin territory in every direction, and the forest “primeval” lies beckoning in every field of human endeavor.

Anybody Want a Dog?

He is just a little dog—a very much mixed little dog. His coat, like Joseph’s, is of many colors, and his ancestry of many breeds. He is of mixed dispositions, too, and some of his parts do not co-ordinate with other parts. When he dances, as he often does, the rear half does the rumba while the front end does a two-step. When the front end rises to plead, the rear end flattens to the earth in obeisance.

When he first appeared at our house, he regarded us intently with beady but friendly black eyes peering out at us from beneath a tousled topknot of fuzz. He was prone on the ground, with an empty dog-food can between his paws. I threw the can into the trash box back of the hedge, but two minutes later he was on the doorstep again, the can between his paws. He is convinced that food comes in cans, and would I please fill up his can again?

He has appointed himself as guardian of our place, and gave my relatives a vicious reception when they came to call. He digs for hidden treasure, or bones, about my little evergreen trees.

We have no basement to keep him in. We are not home in the daytime to feed him. We cannot and will not keep him in the house. And, above all, we do not want a dog. But he has adopted us, and he will not give us up. I wish I could tell him a few things and make him understand. He has everything figured out wrong in his dog way.

Is there anybody who would like a little dog? A dog that is part clown, part tramp, part watchman, friend, and pure mutt? He looks like something concocted out of a rag bag and a disordered imagination, but he’s all dog.

Tonight when I go home, he will be waiting there on the doorstep—hungry, friendly, unshakable. He cannot be driven away, and he refuses to be discouraged. All he wants is just one more meal and a pat on the head. But every crust I give him is a mortgage on my future.

Naomi Russell.

Let There Be Light

A young girl once said to her minister, “I can’t stick it out any longer. I’m the only Christian in the place where I work. The folks make fun of my religion at home, and I get nothing but taunts and sneers in the factory as well. It’s more than I can stand. I’m going to give it all up.”

“Will you tell me,” asked the minister, “where we put lights?”

“What’s that got to do with it?” the girl asked.

“Never mind,” he replied. “Answer my question. Where do we put lights?”

“I suppose in dark places,” she replied.

“Yes, and that’s why you’ve been put in that home, in that place of work where there is such spiritual darkness, where there are no other Christians to shine for their Lord.”

The young girl realized for the first time the opportunity that was hers. She knew she couldn’t let God down by allowing her lights to go out. She went back to the factory with renewed determination to let her light shine in that dark corner. Before long she was the means of leading nine other girls into the light of Christ’s love.

THE DAYS grow cold and hearth fires glow
And Jack Frost’s heralding the snow.
The trees are scarlet everywhere
The smell of autumn’s in the air.

THE EARTH prepares her large estate
And covers up to hibernate;
I, too, prepare my small retreat
Against the winter winds and sleet.

WITH coalbin full and larder stocked,
With wheat all threshed and corn all shocked,
We’ll rest until spring sets us free
And God inspires the earth and me.

Education and the Church

By ROBERT BRACKENBURY

Education, in a broad sense, is the process of changing the behavior of human beings. Education, thus conceived, is a vital concern of the church since it is the sole means by which the church can hope to achieve its objectives. There is no point in preaching the gospel to all the world unless it is done to bring about a change in the life of those to whom it is preached. Zion can only be established if the church can change individuals into good, wise, and unselfish beings. It is only through education that men become Christian.

We all recognize, however, that the school and the church are not synonymous. No one would deny that the school is concerned with education. I have just suggested that the church must also be concerned with it. What then is the difference between these two institutions? The difference would seem to be mainly one of emphasis. The school is primarily concerned with training the intellect; the church with the soul of man. A basic occupation of both institutions, however, is the search for truth or God.

There are few who would disagree that the church should be concerned with the soul and that it should help men learn about God. There are many, however, who would disagree that our schools should be primarily devoted to the training of the intellect in order to aid men in their search for truth or God. A casual observation of our schools is sufficient to reveal that most of them are devoting most of their efforts towards training youth to earn money. However, it does not necessarily follow that our schools ought to continue to do that which they are now doing.

At this point it might be well to consider the role of the intellect in our religion. I sincerely believe that for far too long, many of our church people have feared submitting our doctrine to critical examination. This fear was recently exemplified when a college student questioned some point of church doctrine. He was reprimanded and told that he had no right to question it. We are prone to forget that all revelation is challenged by the general church in conference before it becomes doctrine. Surely the act of accepting revelation does not prohibit it from being further examined.

Our schools train youth to challenge, to question, and to criticize. But these processes are not pursued for their own sake but rather as a means of seeking truth. Thus, to question some point of church doctrine does not necessarily indicate a lack of faith. In fact, it may represent an attempt to establish it.

Faith and intelligence are not opposites. Faith is not necessarily a belief in something which we cannot prove. It has been defined as the belief that that which our intelligence tells us ought to be, will be. If taken in this sense, faith along with intelligence becomes a necessary aid in the search for truth. Or perhaps faith and intelligence are even more. Perhaps they are both roads which can lead to God.

Reconstruction

As a direct consequence to the years of a world at war, the global keynote today is reconstruction. Like the war that has been waged, never before has this been on such an intensely scientific basis.

This is as essential to us as it is welcome—nothing but the best was good enough in strength of arms—nothing but the best is good enough in reconstruction.

While our political leaders are struggling for reconstruction in the gigantic tasks of national finance and economy, the business man and the workers are reconstructing their industry and relationships to achieve the best possible and most lasting advantage in their fields. While we, individually, are reconstructing our own little units of economy and society, institutions (including our church,) are reconstructing to meet the needs of a generation with demands as different as the rockets of our age are to the cannon of a decade ago.

Have you noticed how little we change our national constitutions? And yet how differently it is used to govern the people. "I will build my church" is a never-ending process. Together with God we must grow and reconstruct to become a virile force in the world of Christian endeavor today. That doesn't mean changing our doctrine or basic principles. It means using the God-given restoration intelligently, and in its entirety to create a spirit and desire among the people of the world to accept the true Christian way of life.

Like our constitution, new revelation is not the key to reconstruction in the church, but it will only be achieved by clear thinking and prayerful adaptation of the foundations already laid. Sure, we believe in continuity of revelation, but God is no more going to keep altering his blueprints for religion than we are going to tamper with our blueprints for democracy.

"Go ye" a few years ago may have meant street meetings and tent missions. I wonder if, today, it means films and radio, day schools and social centuries? It could quite easily. We're in a period of reconstruction.

Curiosity

By Ruth Meehan Selzer

“CURIOSITY KILLED the cat,” a mother said, and her young son promptly asked, “Mama, what did the cat want to know?” That little boy was not silly. The seeds of wisdom were already sprouting in his intellectual system. Curiosity is one of the most annoying traits of childhood, and it is also one of the most important factors of human development. God planted it in a chicken—the chick breaks the egg. And so children are born with curiosity keen enough to break the bonds of ignorance.

The child who drives his elders to distraction with his questions reveals the characteristics of a vigorous intellect. The stupid one is not curious—does not ask questions. Curiosity in our offspring should be encouraged and directed.

Curiosity deserves credit for most of the progress man has made. It has pulled a good portion of the peoples of the world out of caves and skin tents into the splendidly equipped homes of our modern day.

Franklin’s curiosity helped to open the door to the miracles of electricity. Gutenberg’s curiosity led to the invention of the printing arts. Burbank’s curiosity to know what would happen to plants resulted in improvements from which the race will benefit forever.

Curiosity plays an important role in the success of an individual. He becomes a better student, for the more he learns, the more curious he becomes. He learns all he can about his job. His curiosity will equip him and lead him to more remunerative posts.

Every normal adult has the capacity to learn, but in many, curiosity is absent. “Old age” does not arrive until curiosity goes.

We are encouraged to be curious about the word of God—“to ask”—“to seek.” Why not try God out

THE MAN WHO KILLED TIME!

Question: Do we want more leisure time in which to spend our money, or more money to spend in our leisure time?

America has the 40-hour week, the five-day week. Now we are after the 30-hour week, the four-day week. When we have that, we will campaign for the three-day week, the two-day week, the one-day week, the . . . But aren't we slow in reaching our ultimate objective? The boys in the county jail and the 52-20 crew are there already. They have all the leisure there is: no occupations, no business engagements. Said the guard to the prisoner who asked for the time, “How come you want to know? You're not going anywhere.”

If a man wants to live on beans and stale bread, wear old clothes and sleep in a shack, I guess one day a week will get him by. But let's not stop the man from working who wants a lot of nice things that can only be had by working for them.

I suppose I'm what the world calls a busy man. I've never taken time out to learn golf; I have no time for fishing, billiards, reading fiction, going to movies, teas, luncheons. I couldn't tell you how Orphan Annie, Superman, Blondie, Jack Benny, Susie of the Suds Opera or Joe Louis are doing. I'm too busy learning and working to cultivate my mind in that way.

But I'll guarantee you I'm having more fun than the boys who read the some time and see if he keeps his promises? We need not be ignorant of his powers. To know him and be able to benefit by this knowledge is to be curious about him. Not a day goes by that we cannot go to him in humility and “ask” of him, what about this and what about that. The results will lift our soul, and we will have joy. It is not silly to want to know about God; it is a sign of an intellectual improvement.

funnies, more thrills than the followers of the radio serials, more pleasure than the folks who chase the sun across the sky in their rocking chairs, and more genuine enjoyment than the gentlemen of leisure in jail.

Frankly, the raptures of the copywriters over retirement plans and insurance annuities leave me cold. Give the other fellow the fishing line and hand me a tough mechanical problem, a 2H drawing pencil, some paper and a board, and let me build a bigger, more powerful, faster machine. Then I like to tell out the Gospel of Jesus Christ, because it has more power than the biggest machine and because I want to hear my Lord say, “Well done.” And keeping busy helps to keep me out of mischief.

But I realize we are not all constituted the same. Some people definitely like leisure. I'd suggest that all such go in for it well-heeled, because leisure without the wherewithal can be plenty dull. And the way to make more, to enjoy leisure more, is to work harder.

To me, killing time is not true leisure; it is appalling murder. The right way to kill time is to work it to death. We ought to budget our time as carefully as we budget our money. The Psalmist prayed: “So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts to wisdom.” And the Apostle counseled the Ephesians to be “redeeming [buying up, ransoming] the time, because the days are evil.”

If You Only Would

Just as sure as the morning comes
There's a chance for you to do good,
You can rise above what troubles you,
There's a chance, if you only would.

God did not intend that you should weep,
You won't—if you'll do as you should.
Every promise he gave—he'll surely keep,
You can prove it—if you only would.

Just as sure as the morning comes
You can sing—and you really should,
For a song and a prayer will banish despair,
There's a chance, if you only would.

Grateful for Blessing

I was born August 18, 1866, in Prescott County, Ontario. When I was fourteen, we moved to Michigan, where I lived until my twenty-fifth year. We then moved to Minnesota, where I have lived since. My wife, now deceased, and I united with the Reorganized Church in Alcona County, Michigan; we were the first members to move into the Duluth area.

I had enjoyed extremely good health during my eighty-one years until last July, when the formation of a growth in my digestive system began to cause me much discomfort. The doctor said my condition was serious and as soon as a bed was available at the hospital I should have an operation. Three days before I was scheduled to go to surgery, I was administered to by Elders Vere Turney and J. F. Sumption. To the astonishment of my doctor, the final X-ray taken before the operation was to be performed showed that the growth had completely disappeared. I was sent home and have been in perfect health since. For this remarkable blessing, I am indeed grateful. I hope that my testimony of it will increase the faith of others in the ordinance of administration.

Marriage Outside the Church

Marriage has several aspects. It is a civil contract by which a man and a woman are joined together. It is a sacred covenant instituted by God for the propagation of mankind and to enable the parties so contracting to be a mutual help and comfort to each other, with equal interests, equal participation for the upbuilding of a kingdom of God on earth.

The marriage covenant is typical of the union between God and his church, wherein God graciously promises to be the Father of his people, and to forgive and sanctify them through the merits of Jesus Christ and the influences of his Spirit, and so make them an obedient people. The union between husband and wife is so near, that thereby is represented the sacred and spiritual marriage of Christ with his church.

The mission of the Restoration is to raise up a righteous people and establish Zion. This cannot be done with homes divided in regard to religion without delaying the work. Since the husband is the head of the home (as Christ is the head of the church), it is very important that the husband take the initiative in setting the home in order, establishing family worship, teaching the children, filing the inventory, paying tithing regularly. Read Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6-8. God was speaking to the husbands. If the husband does not believe or is not a member, the wife is deprived of living up to this part of the law, and the children are robbed of their spiritual training in their early years. A wife may spend years of prayers and tears and be deprived of living up to the laws of the church, and of helping build Zion as she longs to do, and run a risk that her children may not accept the gospel, as the children are his also. Is it worth the chance?

A husband of your own faith, who has obeyed the laws of the church, such as filing inventory and paying his tithing regularly, must without doubt have the other good qualities that would make him an ideal companion to be the father of your children, one that you could work with in harmony and mutual interests, which would bring about happiness that would be lasting, as God has promised to bless those that keep his laws. Read Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4, also section 111. Those marrying outside the church will be considered weak in the faith of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. When we are in doubt, search the Scriptures and obey God's laws. This is the best way to find happiness.

Healed Through Prayer

I am writing to inform all who were kind enough to remember Jonathan Collins in prayer during his recent illness that he has completely recovered and is at home with his family again. (His address is Route 2, Bloomingdale, Indiana.)

I also wish to state that we are still conducting meetings every fourth Sunday; thirty-six attended our last Sunday morning service. We welcome the Saints from Danville and Rantoul and sincerely hope others may join the group.

Note of Thanks

So many of our church friends remembered us as we celebrated our golden wedding anniversary that we take this method of expressing to all our sincere appreciation for the cards and letters of congratulation we received.

Editor's Note: (While on his first mission to Australia, Elder G. R. Wells was married to Adelaide M. Pascoe at New Castle, New South Wales, on October 21, 1897.)

Thanks

We wish to express our appreciation for the many prayers and kindnesses shown us during my illness. It cheers one greatly to be remembered in so many ways by our friends in the gospel.

From a New Member

My wife and I were baptized this summer at the Erie Beach Reunion. I am extremely happy to now be a member of the Reorganized Church. I believe any person with an open mind who is willing to read the word of God will see that this is the true church. There are still some things I don't fully understand, but I have faith that someday I will. Please pray for me that I may make my life really count in the work of the church. I want to give the best that I have.

A Testimony of Gratitude

I am in the sunset of life and have been a member of the Reorganized Church for forty years. God has been most merciful to me during this time, and I take advantage of every opportunity I have to testify of his goodness. I have suffered pain many times, but always God has sent his peace. Just recently I was healed through administration and the use of consecrated oil. Pray for me that, like Job, I can say, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him."

MINOR STANDARDS

By Sadi Anka Moon

You probably go to church every Sunday. And it wouldn't be hard to believe if you're in the thirty per cent who pay tithing. Two to one, you're honest in your dealings in business or in school. You keep the Ten Commandments, of course. It wouldn't be surprising if you teach a church school class and read the Herald from cover to cover. But you haven't established Zion yet. What's wrong? Naturally something is amiss or God wouldn't still be "waiting upon his people."

Let's take a look at these little episodes which follow. They illustrate what we might call minor standards. For the most part, they aren't very obvious in people. Your neighbors will call you a good Latter Day Saint even if you're delinquent in these things. But, how about it, aren't these some of the things that make the real difference? There are only a few. You can add to the list yourself. There are scores more, and—surprise—they constitute commandments of God right along with those first ten.

Study First

The little branch was standing on its ear. By some implausible circumstance, the members had managed to get themselves all fired up with missionary zeal. Someone had suggested a plan for individual missionary work. The impetus began with Sister Amy McPheeters who had borne an eloquent testimony at a recent prayer service, charging the little group that "we are a peculiar people; we can't just sit by and nod our heads about the wonders of the gospel; we've got to go out and tell the world." The idea caught like a storm. Everybody got the spirit.

The branch was now having a business session. There was a breathless quality in the air as the congregation waited upon Brother James Judson, the pastor.

He picked up his Book of Mormon and thumbed through the pages. Then he looked up and smiled. "We can't do anything until we know what to do. It is not our place to charge out blindly. As God's people, we must act in wisdom. This spirit of action must indeed be encouraged. Now we must seek guidance. We should first study."

Brother Judson read from his Book of Mormon, "'Wherefore, we search the prophets; and we have many revelations, and the spirit of prophecy, and having all these witnesses, we obtain a hope, and our faith becometh unshaken.'

"We must have it in our hearts first to do God's will. Then we must pray for insight and guidance. We must, throughout all this, study prayerfully. Patient study is harder than plunging headlong into some activity. But if we study properly—that is with diligence and prayer—we shall receive light and guidance. The work of the branch will progress according to pattern, with the impetus of God."

Pray—Honestly

Rebecca knelt by her bed and prayed, "Help me to love."

The Heavenly Father looked down and shook his head sadly, "My child must learn to pray honestly," he said.

Rebecca puzzled and puzzled. "Honestly!" she said to herself. "Well, maybe I'm not getting down to the bottom of the trouble." She thought the situation over. There was the boy next door who had hurt her feelings. Rebecca had never quite forgiven him for that. And there was her grandmother who whistled through her teeth; that irritated Rebecca. And there was the problem of father who insisted that Rebecca be in by 10:30. That made her angry, being told "every little thing she could or couldn't do."

Yes, there was more than could be seen from the surface about praying.

Rebecca prayed once more. "Help me to remove irritations from my heart. Help me to want to forgive the boy who hurt my feelings. Help me to use good sense in my daily life, and not be angry about things I have to do."

The Heavenly Father looked down and smiled and placed peace in the heart of Rebecca.

Your Home Is as Big as Your Heart Is

Phoebe and Hortense just sat and brooded in their little apartment. Both of them were stenographers at a sizable business firm. About them worked other young girls. Phoebe and Hortense couldn't understand why people talked and laughed and had such fun as these other girls did. But at the same time Phoebe and Hortense wondered why nobody ever invited them to any parties or out to dinner.

They themselves never thought of issuing an invitation. They were too tired at night. Company would be a bother. They sat over their glum meals and stared stonily at each other. They frowned when the baby upstairs cried. They answered a terse, "Hello," when the friendly neighbor smiled a cheery, "Nice day, isn't it?" They never invited anybody out, and they never went anywhere, and they wondered why no one liked them.

Phoebe and Hortense became discouraged and left town. Into the apartment moved Cherry and Bea. They worked in the same office as had the other two girls. Over sandwiches on their first evening in the apartment, they glowed and said, "Let's have a housewarming party."

So they did. It was a party occasion every time anyone came over for supper—which was often. They had lots of people in on Saturday nights, and they talked about pleasant things. In this home, under the loving tutelage of Cherry and Bea, three young women learned that being a Latter Day Saint was a happy thing and joined the church.

I'll Be Glad To

"This has been perfect," sighed Marcia. "I don't see why life can't just go on like this."

Janet lay back on the bed and dangled her feet. She stared up at the tent ceiling above her. A tree twig scratched on the outside. Down on the ground beside the bed a cricket chirped. "Yes," she answered, "why can't it?"

Reunion was almost over. This was Saturday morning. Breakfast was finished and the two girls were relaxing a bit before going to the first service of the day. The flaps of the tent were open and people walked by, waving a cheerful morning greeting. Marcia was stretched out on her bed reading John, the seventeenth chapter. That had been suggested for study in preparation for today's prayer service.

Sister Thelma Walker poked her head in the tent. "My, I'm glad to find you girls in! A state of emergency is declared. Gladys Lant was to sing soprano in the trio at the dedication service tomorrow, and she was called out of town to her mother's bedside. Janet, will you practice with the ladies and sing tomorrow morning?"

"I'd love to," Janet smiled. "Thank you for asking me." Janet had been busy all reunion, sharing her talent with the Saints.

"And Marcia, will you do something, too?"

"If I can, I'll be glad to," answered the girl.

"Will you help me out—play the piano for the junior choir? They're to sing tomorrow morning at church, and the pianist has to leave reunion early."

"Yes, I'll be happy to. When do you practice?"

This afternoon at two in the big tent," answered Mrs. Walker. "You girls are good people. Besides having talents, you're willing to use them in service. That's why reunion is such a happy place, I think—people are so interested in helping each other."

The two girls looked at each other. "I hadn't exactly thought of it that way before," said Marcia. "Maybe that's one reason why reunion is so wonderful. If everybody was willing to help out all the time, we'd have had Zion long before this."

Ugh! Prayer Meeting

"I'm sorry, but I just can't go to prayer meeting. I only sit there and think nasty thoughts about those people. It makes me feel cynical," complained Steve Jones. Everybody else planned to attend prayer meeting, but Steve was going home.

"But why, Steve?" pleaded Kaye.

"It's obvious. Most of the testimonies are morbid, borne by people who can't even speak good English. They expect the world to end in five years, and so they stand around feeling righteous because they have the gospel and they'll be saved. I don't think they'll be saved any more than anyone else will be if the world is going to blow up. Or else the old folks all plan to die, and make a big issue of eternal life, and a bunch of stuff which isn't nearly as important as our doctrine of stewardship, and Zion and all the other creative, affirmative things they could talk about. It just plain makes me boil. Latter Day Saints aren't good church members, it seems to me, if they go about being so primitive."

New Horizons

"Mighty strong language, Steve," commented Harry.

Kaye was always understanding. "I know how you feel, Steve. It's hard to sit by and watch our people being pessimistic or not living up to the best that is in them. But it certainly isn't our place as young people, who've had the advantages, to sit back and jeer at folks who haven't been so fortunate."

"I know you're right, but I'm still not going," Steve said stubbornly. "I'd rather avoid prayer meetings, because it's too hard for me to bear my testimony and say something on a more pleasant subject. And even if I could, I'd probably be so disgusted I'd be in the wrong frame of mind to participate in the meeting. I'll see you afterwards, kids." And he was gone.

Harry looked concerned. "Whose fault is it, I wonder?" he commented. "Boy, I sympathize with him about the fact that people in our church should be cultured and optimistic and all that. But still, I wish he could find it in his heart to love them in spite of their lack of foresight, and at the same time do everything he can to create a different outlook in the branch."

"I feel the same as you," said Kaye. "We've got to do everything we can. We're sort of in the middle. We've got to love both the pessimists at prayer meeting and the impatient ones who won't go. Some job!"

The Missionary Wagon

There ought to be more people like the Browns. James Brown and his wife, Viola, live on the other side of Centerville from the little Latter Day Saint church. Every Sunday, they bundle their own three children into the station wagon and start for church. All along the way, they pick up passengers—old Sister Peterson, usually; one of son Jimmy's friends; or the twins who are in daughter Cecily's class.

In fact, the station wagon is always full. If it is a family picnic, the Browns take the family next door and talk about the gospel. (The family next door don't belong to the church, but through the Browns they're becoming interested.)

On Wednesday nights, Jimmy Brown and his sister Cecily fill the vacant seats with their friends and transport them to prayer meeting. Mother and dad always have the invitation ready, "Come on over after meeting, kids; we'll have popcorn and fudge and talk about the service—and we'll see that you're all taken home."

During the week, the faithful wagon serves as delivery truck and errand machine for all the neighbors. Behind it might be dragged the hay rake for Mr. Harrington on the acreage down the road. When the new family moved into the neighborhood, the Browns used their station wagon to help with the odds and ends—dishes, baby crib, and left-overs that the moving truck missed.

That's why the Brown's station wagon, although seven years old and somewhat battered, is the favorite automobile in Centerville.

Thanksgiving

My thanks shall ring through highest heaven
And in a whisper lie warm against the heart of God.
I cannot sing my praise, nor stand before men and pray,
But in the silence of my soul I speak,
And these are my words:
For friends who understand,
For beauty,
For voices lifted in laughter,
And the deep strength of those who weep together;
The last note of a bird hung high
In a forest stillness,
And the intimacy of a friendly silence shared.
For rain and sunshine,
Wind and calm,
Each in his season;
The harvest of field and life together,
And the bounty of intangible goodness in all things,
Since these I have in great abundance,
Know I humility.

Jo Skelton.

Let Us Give Thanks

OUR HEAVENLY FATHER has been almost unbelievably gracious to all of us throughout our lives, and throughout the life of the church. Thanksgiving is therefore a becoming spiritual courtesy on our part. Indeed spiritual good manners, and the refinement which underlies these good manners, both demand that all of us who acknowledge God as our loving Father shall express the gratitude which his goodness calls forth. Such thanksgiving enriches us and gives joy to him.

The gifts which our Heavenly Father has showered upon us are too numerous for us to count. To name any of them is to suggest others, and these in turn suggest still others. Some of these gifts have been cited so many times as reasons for gratitude that they have lost the power to stir us to wide-awake realization of our indebtedness. But some other causes for thanksgiving have been considered all too rarely. Among these is the exalted sense of public duty manifested in civic, national, and international affairs. We have heard much of men who have proved renegade. Let us thank God for men who have proved true.

And if we are to thank God for nobility expressed in the field of citizenship, how much more eagerly should we thank him for the exalted fraternity of the church and kingdom in which we share and rejoice together. Here, too, we may have known some who seemed to participate from unworthy motives. But if so, these cases have been very exceptional. In many lives, we have seen the kingdom already in action as godly men and women have walked together by the light of truth.

So we lift up our hearts together in grateful praise for the spirit of brotherhood so richly felt throughout the church and uniting in one fellowship the Saints in every land. We give thanks, too, for the growing missionary fervor of our people, fervor which has already led many to unite with the cause of Christ and in so doing has strengthened the branches and advanced the kingdom. We are most deeply grateful, also, for the material resources now in the hands of the church, which constitutes one of the many tokens of the sacrificial devotion of our people. These contributions have already made possible the wider preaching of the gospel, the relief of the needy, the maintenance of our institutions, and the erection and equipment of many churches in which the life of praise is being nurtured.

And, finally, we are grateful for the things which await us and which are guaranteed of God; the wider preaching of the gospel, the sure establishment of the kingdom, the coming of the Lord in glory, and the reunion of the Saints with other Saints who have gone before. These are among the exceeding great and precious promises by which Peter says that the Saints shall live.

So we move forward with heartfelt gratitude for the love of God which we have known and with confident trust in the divine purpose for each and everyone of us.

Across the Desk

A letter from Apostle M. A. McConley dated October 23, 1947, reports the arrival of the four missionary families at Southampton on the afternoon of October 15. They were met at Waterloo station in the early evening, and on the next evening attended a reception sponsored by the Enfield Branch. Elders Theys and Scherer, whose assignments will take them to the continent in the near future, stayed in London over the week end with their families. Elder Frank Fry went to Nuneaton where the local Saints had prepared the new home for their arrival. Brother and Sister Johnson went to Birmingham for the week end and were joined there by the Frys (Nuneaton being about twenty miles away) for a reception by the Birmingham Branch on Saturday evening. This was something of a home-coming for Brother Fry, whose grandmother and great-grandmother were converted in Birmingham by Elder Charles Derry many years ago.

Bishop Trapp and Elder James Barrington had worked wonders to prepare the Manchester missionary home for the arrival of the Johnsons. Brother and Sister Johnson and Brother and Sister Eric Rowe are now settled in Manchester.

Final arrangements looking toward the work of Brother and Sister Scherer in Holland are moving forward nicely with the co-operation of the Dutch government.

All in all, Brother McConley reports an excellent spirit and fine prospects.

Readers of the Herald may be interested to learn of the recent death of Elder Lewis B. Shippy of Alhambra, California. Brother Rushton writes, "Brother Shippy was pastor of the South Pasadena church from its organization until two years ago, when ill-health caused him to reduce his activities.

"For many years he was in Portland, Oregon, where he and his wife Mary were energetic workers. They also were in San Jose, and Danvers Street, and Golden Gate Branches before going south to Los Angeles. He presided over the San Jose and Danvers Street Branches for some time. Brother and Sister Shippy were good workers in the Los Angeles Central church until they moved to Pasadena.

"Always devoted to the church and naturally artistic in temperament, Brother Shippy brought to his church work a rare dignity and grace which enriched the services. His ministry was sympathetic, devout, and deeply spiritual. In his companion, he found a helpmeet of harmonious quality.

"Brother Shippy's passing is an irreplaceable loss, and many will miss his brotherly and inspired ministry."

Amazing

A recent story in Life magazine about the much-married Mormon Apostle Charles C. Rich and his (now) two thousand (and more) descendants prove the arid plains of the West need take no back seat for any of the Turkish or other Eastern Moguls. Life comments (about Rich): "He was recently praised by a son for the considerable accomplishment of living 'all his married life peaceably with six wives . . . without a serious quarrel and without a thought of divorce'"—though that may be an unfounded presumption (?).

Notice of Appointments of Bishop's Agents for Norway and Sweden

In view of the fact that it has been difficult for Brother Jens W. Blume to handle funds from Norway and Sweden as Bishop's Agent of the Scandinavian countries, we are hereby authorizing Brother Carl Carlsen to serve as Bishop's Agent in Norway and ask the Saints to send their payments of tithing and other contributions to him at his address, which is Norrønagt 12, V. Porsgrunn, Norway.

We also wish to make appointment of Brother L. E. Lindberg as Bishop's Agent for the church in Sweden, and ask the Saints to send tithing and other contributions to him at his address, which is Lannesta near Stockholm, Sweden.

Brother Blume will continue to serve as Bishop's Agent to the Saints in Denmark. His address is Viby, Sjælland, Denmark.

We appreciate the good support given by the Saints in these countries during past years and sincerely trust that their good work will be continued.

2,000 Reasons for Peace

By Samuel Toomey

Elder Samuel Toomey, a graduate of the University of Hawaii, served during the war as a lieutenant colonel in the infantry, and saw action on Guadalcanal, Kwajalein, and Saipan. A civilian now, he and his family are making their home at 503 North Pleasant in Independence. Hawaiian by birth, he is of Irish and English descent. Mrs. Toomey is Dutch, Danish, German, and Hawaiian. "The children," they conclude, "are sort of a United Nations mixture."

The Toomeys have selected Slover Park as their congregation. Mrs. Toomey is in charge of the nursery, and Elder Toomey serves as junior pastor.

UNTIL DECEMBER 7, 1941, we lived in a house 300 yards from Pearl Harbor. We were getting ready to attend an early morning prayer service when the first planes flew over.

"Sam, it's a raid," cried Winifred, my wife, looking out at the harbor.

"No, darling," I smiled, "it's just the army on maneuvers. But," I added, "this gives you an idea of what the real thing would be like." Then I saw the columns of black smoke rising from what had been the battleships "Arizona," "Oklahoma," and "West Virginia," and I knew the real thing was happening.

"Under the bed," I pointed to my bewildered six-year-old son and three-year-old twin daughters. "You, too, Winifred," I ordered as I piled all the mattresses we had on the bed. By that time, the strafing had begun, and we were in the line of fire. When the bombing subsided, we hurried to the car—which miraculously still ran—and headed for the McConleys.

"Take care of my family for me," I told them as I drove off. "It may be a while before I get back." And I drove on two wheels around all the corners en route to headquarters.

Seventeen days later, I returned. By then we were all aware of our precarious situation. "There's an order for evacuation," I told Winifred. "Perhaps you and the children had better go to the States." Fortunately, they were able to find a home in Independence. I was glad, because if they ever needed the stability and encouragement of the church, it was then.

THE FOLLOWING four years brought a sickening procession of scenes of misery and horrors even yet I keep remembering. We won the war, true enough, but the loss in human life that victory cost is a scar on my heart and the hearts of a million other Americans that will never heal.

I shut my eyes and see the company of which I was in charge on Guadalcanal and Saipan. For fourteen months, I slept and ate and worked with these 264 men I was to lead into battle. Ours was a brotherhood blood—strong—and that is what made it such a tough job. We had been fighting for days and knew the Japs would soon be making a banzai rush. We had witnessed other banzais, and we knew that if this one couldn't be stopped, many of us were destined to die. When cornered, a Jap will drink enough saki to set him crazy, then he goes out to kill and be killed.

Two men from my outfit were to act as scouts and locate the enemy's position. I didn't want to be responsible for sending any of them to an almost certain death, so I decided to put it on a volunteer basis. After explaining the problem, I told my men to line up in two ranks. Then I turned my back to them and said those who wished to volunteer would please step forward one pace. I turned and found two unbroken rows. I was surprised and not very proud of them, but I decided to give them another chance. I repeated my statement and turned around again. I found two perfectly straight lines, just as before.

"Look, men," I said, "if you won't volunteer, I'll have to draw names. I don't want to do this, but it has to be done. I'll turn my back just once more, and if no one steps up, we'll get ready for the draw."

The same two rows were before me when I looked around—the same, except they were closer. Then I realized what had happened: each time the entire group had stepped up. Every man was willing to go.

The two whose names were drawn were given specific directions and told to return as soon as they could get the necessary information. One never did come back. The other returned eighteen hours later, but by then it was too late. Within three hours, the banzai rush was upon us.

We were not prepared, and three of our companies were nearly annihilated. The final count was 3,000 Japanese fatalities, 2,000 American. I found the scout who did not return tied to a tree; he had obviously been used as a Japanese bayonet target.

DURING THOSE days, I almost lost my faith in God. I couldn't write justice into the things I saw, and the church became only a memory. Yet, sometimes in the midst of battle, God is very near. When only twelve of our battalion remained, one of the fellows suggested we pray. He was hardly the man I expected to make such a request—I had gone to the jail innumerable times to get him following his drinking sprees in our less hectic days. "Sorry," I said, "I don't think I could pray. Go ahead if you wish."

"I've never done it before," he confessed, "but I'll try."

That prayer must have transcended the holocaust and risen straight to heaven, because the twelve of us came through.

Upon my return to Honolulu, I was called to the office of elder. Feeling that I had not lived up to my duties as a priest, and knowing that I should soon be sent to the front again where killing was inevitable, I refused. Then I began to think the matter over. "If God still wants me in his service," I reasoned, "it is not for me to say 'no.'" I was ordained in November, 1942.

Now that the war is technically over, I have come to the center place to live. I am still trying to make the necessary adjustment from army to civilian life—from soldier to husband and father. It is not easy. One doesn't put away the memory of 2,000 white crosses as he puts away his uniform. You don't forget the men who died before your eyes, although you yourself happened to be one who came back. That is why I am so unsympathetic with those who have never witnessed death, when they toy with the making of wars.

WAR IS NOT glorious; its heroes are soon forgotten. Just last year I flew over the hard-won Pacific Islands. The cemeteries where good Americans lie buried were being neglected. Still, preparations for the next war are well in order. I grew a little sick when I read, recently, of our latest development in rocket warfare. Countries are developing bombs that can destroy our major cities in a few minutes.

It isn't a nice picture, but it can happen—and it will happen if we don't begin now to expend a little more time and money on the building of better men instead of bigger bombs. We Latter Day Saints know the answer. We know, too, that unless we take the initiative in creating this Zion which will be a light for the rest of the world, we can be blown to bits with the other well-meaning but complacent people.

I am alive today because God, somehow, saw fit to let me help in this great project. If I give less than my best to it, he may not grant another chance. If I give less than my best, I may be writing the death warrant for my family, my church, and my nation.

Earth's Other Children

So pale and helpless there he lay—
Our only child. So short his stay
If he were then to leave;
Great God, in those dark hours,
We would have traded all for higher powers.

'Twas not till then we keenly felt
Our memories cringe in burning guilt;
These other children, weak and frail
From lack of food, so wan and pale;
These we had quite forgotten—these,
The victims of a world diseased.

God, those few hours of agony
Are multiplied to make us see
Where other parents weep and wait,
And pray for help which never comes—
Or comes too late.

Back Tracks

By Norma Anne Kirkendall

*He who fights and runs away
Lives to fight another day.*

Nor need he necessarily be a coward. I firmly believe that there are times when one should run away. It is the better part of valor for a bull-fighter to sidestep when the bull ignores the intentions of the cape and rushes toward the matador. Nobody blames a commander when he deems it necessary for his army to retreat in order to save the lives of his men. Stepping directly in the path of a runaway horse reflects more foolishness than bravery. It is not cowardice when a nonswimmer refuses to jump in after a drowning man; he knows his limitations and realizes that his struggles would make a double task for the real rescuer.

I know a man who formerly found days of his life lost because of his desire for alcohol. A doctor finally warned him of ill health if he did not cure his drinking habit, and he made a solemn vow not to touch liquor again. Daily he walks three blocks out of his way to avoid passing the saloon he formerly frequented. Likewise, he refuses to visit the homes of those he knows always serve cocktails to their guests. I have heard this man strongly criticized for his lack of will power. There are those who say that he should daily pass that former tempting location, and that he should merely refuse the drink when it is offered. They say he is weak, but I think he is wise. The main thing is that this man is no longer a drunkard. If he must retreat to win his battle, it is his strategy.

General McArthur retreated from Bataan in order to gain the needed strength to recapture all of the Philippines. He went back, of course and that's the whole point. If you retreat for a purpose, make sure that purpose is not forgotten. He who makes a habit of retreat is lost, but he who retreats in order to gain new strength is wise.

The Worth of Souls

Then said Jesus unto his disciples, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me . . . for whosoever will save his life in this world, shall lose it in the world to come, And whosoever will lose his life in this world for my sake, shall find it in the world to come . . . for what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works.—Matthew 16: 25, 27-30.

YEARS AGO, a tornado ripped its way through one of our States leaving great destruction as it passed. A woman, who was in the path of that terrible storm, lived to tell about it. She was elderly when we met her. Her husband had passed away, and all her children had left her to go out and establish homes of their own. But though years had passed since the experience, she told the story as feelingly as if it had just happened.

She told how she and her husband had purchased a farm, built a house and barn, and bought needed equipment and live stock, all with much sacrifice and hard work. They and their three children were getting along very well and were quite happy with their success on the farm, when one day, while the father was away, a heavy wind came up. The mother and children were out in the yard taking care of things that might be damaged, when they saw the tornado coming. In desperation, they jumped into a shallow hotbed which was not far away and lay flat on the ground side by side while the storm worked its terrible destruction around them. It passed quickly. Fearfully the mother raised up and looked about. Their home, their barn, everything they owned was in ruins. She anxiously reached out her hands to her children, calling each by name. All were there and uninjured, except for minor cuts and bruises from flying debris. Gathering them into her arms, she lifted up her eyes to heaven in the midst of that wreckage and thanked God.

The worth of souls is great in the sight of God. When we speak of souls, we refer to the definition found in Genesis, the second chapter and seventh verse. We are told there that when God breathed the "breath of life" into the earthly body of the man which he had formed, man became a living soul. We mean, then, that living human beings, like the mother and her children, are of great worth in the sight of God. He gave his only Begotten Son that they might not perish, but have everlasting life. His Son, our Lord and Redeemer, labored and sacrificed and suffered even death; he paid a big price in his effort to turn men from that which is destructive to that which would develop all the treasures of personality to the utmost. We are told in the Gospel (St. Luke, chapter 15, verse 7) that there is joy in heaven over that change taking place in the life of even one person. There is joy in heaven over even one sinner who repents.

We have put all too little effort and time and attention into the task of nurturing and developing the best in human personality. We have put much into developing things—new and useful things. We would not want to be without our electric refrigerators, washing machines, automobiles, telephones, radios, streamlined trains, and airplanes. We glory in the progress made in modern medicine and surgery, and in many other fine things that contribute to the physical needs of men. But there is grave danger for our world if we continue to neglect that which is of primary importance—the proper development of the persons themselves, who have all these good things to use.

By Glaude A. Smith

When the wrong persons get into their hands the marvelously developed things that are available today, they make serious trouble. To avoid that, we have in the past adopted plans among the nations to try to keep these things which can be used for destructive purposes away from those who might use them wrongfully. We called it "limitation of armament." But so far the trouble has come upon us in spite of those plans. Perhaps we need to follow Christ in this. He placed his whole emphasis on teaching and training the men themselves, that they may become the kind of persons who would not use anything wrongfully.

When Jesus says, "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you," the meaning is plain in the light of what the world is passing through today. Consideration must be given to the kind of persons being produced in our world and the kind of social relationships being developed. First, get the man right within himself and try to establish right relationships between him and his fellows. If this is done, then right men, rightly adjusted to each other, will see to it that all are fed and clothed, have good homes, and are provided with all the necessities of life, and they will find out, perhaps to their surprise, that of "things" God has provided enough for all and some to spare.

We commend to all "the way, the truth, and the life" as Jesus has made it known. We know of no better plan, no plainer presentation of the truth concerning life, and we have yet to find anything that has a more transforming and enriching effect on the lives of men than that which is brought to us in the gospel of Christ. It would be well for us, if, for a few moments, we could cease thinking about the word of God as something someone desires to put off on us with a heavy institutional bias, and realize that the reason the word of God is called "good news" is because it presents the rule of life which will help us to become the best of persons: fine companions in marriage, good sons and daughters, and the right kind of neighbors.

And yet, in our busy world of today, even the best of men and women seem to find it very difficult to realize the need of putting more time into the training of children in the greatest of all the arts—the art of living together. It is so hard to find time to do anything other than prepare and continually improve "things." Right now, the Christ would undoubtedly say anew to all his followers what he said to his disciples during his earthly life, "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth labourers into his harvest." In the sight of God, the worth of every living soul, of every man, is great—not only for his own sake, but for the good that he may be able to carry into the developing lives of others.

We Thank Thee

We thank thee, Lord, for every gift
Sent to us from above,
We thank thee for our neighbors kind
And for the friends we love.

We thank thee for the food we eat,
And for the clothes we wear,
And that thou givest us each day
Such loving, thoughtful care.

We thank thee for the sun that shines
And for the rains that fall;
But for the gift of thy dear Son,
We thank thee most of all.

BOOKS

Edifying Discourses

By Soren Kierkegaard, Augsburg, 1947, 123 pages, price $1.50.

A little over one hundred years ago, a Danish writer began a series of literary productions which did not fit into any of the regular publishing classifications. He was not a theologian, but his writing was concerned with God and religion. He was not a philosopher in the usual sense, but he had the deep understanding of a philosophical mind. Along with his great understanding, he had a gentleness and sympathy of manner, a lack of pomposity and pretention that endeared him to people. Without knowing it he was to help in the launching of a new explanation of religion which was to find its influence in the "Crisis theology" developed by Karl Barth and others in later times.

These little discourses have a heart-warming quality for those who are willing to read carefully and patiently. They are not remote from human experience because they are philosophical. On the contrary, they stem from the author's reactions to the incidents of ordinary life and to the overruling power of God. The translation from the Danish is by David and Lillian Swenson. This is the first of four volumes of the same material to be published.

The Protestant Pulpit

An anthology of master sermons from the Reformation to our own day, compiled by Andrew W. Blackwood, Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1947, 318 pages, price $2.75.

Perusing this volume, the reader finds sermons all the way from Martin Luther up to the present time. Divided into two parts, the book presents nineteen sermons by great religious leaders of the past, and twenty sermons by great preachers of the present time. They are well printed and should give the pastor and preacher many good thoughts and suggestions for the enrichment of pulpit ministry.

One of the hardest tasks of the preacher is to bring comfort to those who are in trouble or bereavement. Sermon number twenty-four, by Arthur John Gossip, entitled, "When Life Tumbles In," is a splendid message for such a need. It is only one of many excellent sermons in the volume. They are well selected to cover a variety of needs in human experience.

THE QUESTING SPIRIT, an anthology of religious literature of our time. Edited by Halford E. Luccock and Frances Brentano. Coward-McCann, N. Y. 1947. 717 pages. Price, $5.

Here is a publisher's item that makes a notable event in the library offerings of the book trade. Great literary resources and fine scholarship, discriminating taste and careful selection have gone into its making. It is no exaggeration to say that this book is as significant in its way as The World's Great Religious Poetry, which is still selling well twenty-five years after its first publication. The Questing Spirit should still be selling steadily twenty years from now.

The central motive of this volume is "Man's Endless Search for God." Some of the seekers have found assurance and faith. Some of them have not. Some are hurt and bitter and cynical because they have failed, and we are sorry for them. But they are in the minority, and the major emphasis is on faith and trust. The seekers are from all races, all nations, all creeds, all religions. They have sought according to their light and understanding, and they have sought sincerely. They have not all agreed on what they have found, which is human. But there are some great general agreements which show that the Divine Reality is there. Some of the selections are stories, some poems, some essays, some brief paragraphs of philosophy.

Not all of the material will be useful in church work. But church workers and leaders will find splendid resources here. They will be grateful for the rich treasures it holds.

The Glory OF THE CHURCH

By ELDER D. B. SORDEN

The word "glory" is one of the beautiful words in our language. The very utterance of it pushes the horizon of life farther and farther away and we have new vistas opening up before the mind and the word fires the imagination of men. We find glory in various areas of life.

We find glory in nature, and we have all felt akin to the Psalmist when he said: "The heavens declare the glory of God." Sunsets show the glory of nature. It is peculiar, but wherever we happen to be—on the desert, in the mountains, on the prairies, on the ocean, winter or summer—the sky may change from a dull gray, if the sun first breaks through before going down, to a blue; the blues turn to gold and then to crimson. Vivid colors on an irregular range of snow-halted mountains show us the Master Artist of all the worlds painting a sketch for us to enjoy briefly.

There is a glory in certain spots in various lands because events of supreme importance have occurred in these specific places. Such a glory immediately comes to mind as one crosses the old cobblestone square in Florence where Savonarola was burned to death rather than sacrifice principles which meant more to him than life. Joseph Smith hallowed Nauvoo and Carthage, Illinois, because he, too, held some things more sacred than life. He went to jail innocent of wrongdoing and said, as he left home the last time, "I go like a lamb to the slaughter." The catacombs of Rome are glorified by the Christians who lived and worshiped and died there when the wrath of the Caesars was turned against all who refused to bow to the gods of state. Oxford has its Martyr's Monument opposite Balliol College where Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer were burned. As the flames licked at these martyrs, Latimer cried out: "We shall this day light such a candle in England, I trust, as shall never be put out." Such a glory hovers over many spots on earth.

I believe that for countless people, there is glory found in the house of God, the place where mortals commune with the Divine. The particular house need not be large, if it has blessed and holy memories for us. If we have made sincere vows at her altars, the church has a glorious heritage for us.

What gives glory to the house of God? If it truly be a holy place it will have glory. If, for us, it has been a house of prayer, if it has brought God nearer to us in our daily life, if it has been a place where men may secure and maintain fellowship with the Divine, it will be a place of glory. Visions of God, convictions of sin, inspirations for service most frequently come to men and women when they go into a house of God and make it a house of prayer.

Here, too, we have a place of hallowed associations, because men and God have somehow been linked together. When we look at our church, we frequently do not see the building; we see far more. Worshiping here, we are encompassed by a great cloud of witnesses, past and present. Hallowed memories are ours—memories of faces, now gone, memories of old hymns, maybe not too well sung but for us on a certain day, like the song of angels, memories of messages which renewed our lives and stirred our souls, memories of the days when we gave our lives to God. Yes, there is a glory here in the house of God, because it is the place of hallowed memories.

There is a glory in the house of God because it is a house of hope. If it links man with God in the past, it also links him with the future; and if God is in us, that future is filled with hope. If we are linked with the power that created the universe, our lives surely can have hope. Every church house is a symbol of the reality of God and a reminder of his interest in the affairs of men. Every church spire pointing upward testifies to the hope of the Christian in an eternal life with the Master.

No greater glory can be in any place than the glory of the house of God. The church is creative of spiritual and priceless ideals by which men live and for which some have died. The church is the mother of heroes, crowned and uncrowned. The vigor of the noblest manhood has been nourished by the church. She has made weak men strong and has helped the mighty to be holy. The church has been the bringer of good news to many. The church is a teacher of righteousness, justice, and brotherhood. The church has been a place of refuge for the oppressed and has ministered to the sick and the desolate, the sorrowing and the stricken, as well as to the bewildered and the downcast. The church has been a guardian of the public peace, has conserved abiding interests, has been a friend of worthy causes. Without the saving presence of the church, the law of the land would become the law of the jungle, and the financial fabric of our country could not long endure.

It is an inspiration to belong to any great organization, but it is a greater inspiration to belong to the church of God whose glory will one day shine forth in brilliance. The church has undergone untold hardships and, in many lands, has had to fight for its very existence. Persecution and prohibition of the church and its activities have been endured. Its flame has burned low and given but little light at times, but it has always been fanned to new brilliance by the lives of some who were willing to die for it.

I suggest, that we all renew our allegiance to the church so that its light may shine before men. We know that the goal of the church is a good goal; its ends are worthy. Do not let personalities throw you off the course. Because some members are not as good Christians as they ought to be, do not stay away. But come to the aid of the church now. Unto him be glory in the church by Jesus Christ throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.—Ephesians 3: 21.

Premonition

One day Robert Louis Stevenson read us a prayer he had just written. In it were words none of us ever forgot: "When the day returns, call us up with morning faces and with morning hearts, eager to labor, happy if happiness be our portion, and if the day be marked for sorrow, strong to endure."

We waked on the morrow with happy morning faces; only Louis' wife was troubled with a premonition that the day was marked for sorrow. That day, at the height of his fame, in the best health he had ever enjoyed, Louis went out of this life suddenly, quietly, painlessly.—Isobel Field (R. L. S.'s stepdaughter), This Life I've Loved.

Preamble to a Communion Service

By ALMER SHEEHY

The Latter Day Saint religion is not an individualistic one, but the religion of a fellowship, of a society dedicated to the doing of Christ's will to the carrying out of the divine purpose. Saints are bound into a corporate unity by their common task of winning the world to the carrying out of God's intent. They are an international corps of God-servers, called out from among the secular nations, not dependent upon geography, not restricted by race.

Saints are not inhuman apparitions surrounded with halos of glory, ethereal beyond temptation. Saints in the New Testament meant just plain, ordinary people except that they knew God had chosen them to be his servants and co-workers—hard-pressed, struggling co-laborers with Deity, first of all here in a world that rejected both them and God, and then forever in that state of life which comes when years on earth are done. St. Paul over and over again addresses his fellow Christians as those who are "called to be saints." He does not mean that they were paragons of virtue, but that they knew they had been summoned to be partners with Jesus, God Incarnate, sharing by virtue of difficult and redemptive labor a true friendship with one another and with him.

Into that divine companionship Christ calls, in every generation, those who perceive the inadequacy of life as it is lived by the great majority—those who know that society is ruinously out of joint, and that men and women need salvation from a blind self-centeredness. He calls those who perceive the inevitable failure of this worldly secularism. He calls those who, knowing this, are willing to live daringly, not only for their own sakes but also for the salvation of a society otherwise hopelessly self-destructive. Saints by no means always succeed in living a wholly devoted life. It is not by the lives they live that the world is made better, but by the lives that they really try to live. The way of life for those within the Latter Day Saint fellowship is never easy. They who would serve nobler ends than the multitude pursues are sure to find themselves in opposition to that multitude and, more often than not, hated and persecuted by it. Anyone who desires a quiet and easy existence would do well to give Latter Day Saintism a wide berth. It costs, always much and sometimes everything, to deny the short-range wisdom of the crowd and to labor in accordance with God's desire. In social intercourse, the sincere Latter Day Saint tries to see in each human being whom he meets, a child of God, potentially dignified and beautiful, to be respected, loved, and served. The world acts on other premises.

Because they are in a decided minority, because they are dedicated to another wisdom than the world is content to follow, because it is hard to stand against the failing but compelling crowd, there is great need for Latter Day Saints to receive the emblems.

Because Jesus knew that they who are his would always want not only communion and fellowship with one another but also companionship with him, he ordained this way to give himself to his own. Where the faithful are gathered together, he comes into the midst of them—the Commander—to be with his soldiers, servants, and friends, to cheer and encourage and rest and empower. At the altar, the Saints draw near to him and he, the Master, passes among them, vibrant, vigorous, dynamic—the King who died and yet lives—giving authority to bear witness to the truth by word and deed and power to those who have the burden of the day before them.

Too soon Communion is over. Out the faithful must go to the tasks that are set before them. They have work to do, for the world is at work; there is life to be lived for love and truth, life to be given away and won; but in so doing, they are not lone integers, beating single wings against inexorable confusion; they are members of a fellowship which cannot be routed or frustrated, because it is of God.

Holy Communion is not to be entered into by all men. It is not for cowards. It is not for souls content with compromise. It is not for those who are conformed to the pattern of a chaotic world. It is for brave men, brave women, brave children—glad in God's cause to stand. The King's body and his blood are for the food and drink of warriors. To them alone can he be the source of peace and courage. Only those who company with him become both conquerors and benefactors.

Gratitude

Not only for the harvest reaped
 And for the year-crowned festive board,
 With all thy bounteous blessings heaped,
 We bow our heads to thank thee, Lord.

Not only for the home-fire's glow
 With all the peace our hearths afford
 And all the joys we daily know,
 We lift our hearts to thank thee, Lord!

But for the help which thou hast given
 In steep ascent and rocky way,
 We ask no primrose path to heaven,
 But only for thy help, we pray.

We thank thee for the wealth of mind,
 The peace and calm, by sorrow wrought;
 For thy support and mercies kind
 In hard-won battles we have fought.

We thank thee for each newborn day—
 New tasks, achievement still to be!
 For hope's sweet light—a deathless ray—
 That beckons onward, up to thee.
 —Ruth McNickle Kirby.

Forty Years of Pastoral Service

Elder Harold Muir retired from the pastorate of the Valley Center, Michigan, Branch, on October 1, 1947, following forty years of service in this capacity. He assumed leadership of the group in 1908, when there were but two families; he was then twenty-two years of age. Under his prayerful guidance, the membership increased to 100. Then the Brown City Branch was organized, cutting the membership of the Valley Center congregation to about sixty. Continued missionary endeavor by Elder Muir added family after family to the congregation, until the number again reached 100.

Experiences were many and varied during the passing of years. Two churches have been purchased since the organization of the branch. The present brick structure was built by the Methodist Church and was made available after most of the congregation had been baptized by Elder Muir. When purchased by the Saints, the rostrum was rebuilt, a full basement constructed, and a large vestibule added. These and other improvements cost the group approximately $3,500.

The name Latter Day Saint became an honored one, and many friends have been made for the church during Elder Muir's pastorate. Although he is retiring from this phase of ministry, he will continue to serve his church as a representative of the Bishopric in the Eastern Michigan District. In this activity, he will be assisted by his wife, the former Susie Beubou, who has stood shoulder to shoulder with him in his past years of ministry.

ON SUNDAY, October 19, I was privileged to meet with the Denver Saints and have a humble but enjoyable part in a memorable event. Arriving the evening before, I was kindly cared for during my stay at the home of Brother and Sister Marshall Chapman.

I spoke on the Book of Mormon at the morning service in the old church at Speer Boulevard and Logan Street, which has been sold. Apostle W. Wallace Smith shared ministry with me, for the first time, at this meeting. This I deemed a privilege. After a fine dinner at the home of my nephew, Elder Richard S. Salyards, Jr., I joined Pastor Merle Howard, District President Houston Hobart, former pastors Garrett Walling and E. J. Williams, in the colorful and meaningful ground-breaking service which was held at the corner of Marion and Fifth Avenue, in the presence of a large gathering of enthusiastic members from Denver and other near branches. Elder E. W. Fishburn was in charge. Music was provided by a select choir with Clarence R. Hoagland as organist.

Evangelist W. W. Hield offered a prayer long to be remembered, and a double quartet sang, "Bless This House," bringing this happy event to a close.

Pressing matters called me to Nebraska, where I spent the next day at Omaha visiting my sister, Audentia, and her husband, Benjamin M. Anderson, who drove me to Macy, Nebraska, to see some of the brethren there.

The next Sunday (October 26) found me making a short but interesting visit at Warrensburg, Missouri. There Stake President Ward A. Hougas and Bishop T. A. Beck were conducting, in one of the college buildings, a meeting of the Central Missouri Stake officers, priesthood members, and their wives. As usual, when Brother Hougas does the planning, it was well organized.

I got my cue while listening to Brother Beck and added my best, rather extempore, but I hope it was profitable.

As I write, I am en route to Washington, D. C., in company with Bishop G. L. DeLapp and Brother Russell E. Resch, technician, to consult with advisers relative to prospective radio matters, pursuant to General Conference authorization. From there, I fly to Portland, Oregon, where Apostle Davey and I will officiate with District President Jack L. Verhei at a district conference.

Six Stories from the Bible

Taken directly from the Scriptures, here are beautiful, reverently produced Bible stories in a musical setting that you will want to hear over and over again. The stories are of the two major events of the Christian year: our Saviour's birth and his Passion and Resurrection.

Authentic and approved, the stories follow the text itself, based on the new Revised Standard Version. In modern language, the careful listener will note that in this translation some phrases have been altered from the earlier King James Version. For instance, "swaddling clothes" becomes "swaddling cloths."

Easy to understand, the Scriptures come alive with a professional dramatic cast and music played by the Spire Symphonette.

PROCEDURES IN PRESENTING CALLS TO MINISTRY

By Lorne S. White

“Called of God as was Aaron” might be taken as the theme of this book, for this is the foundation of our whole concept of priesthood and ministerial leadership. How calls are to be recognized, safeguarded, and acted upon is carefully discussed and considered in this volume which summarizes the best that has been written upon this subject by our people. A book of special value for pastors and leaders.

How Are We Saved?

By M. L. DRAPER

FOLLOWING AN earlier article on eternal judgment, a good friend, who is a member of another church, asked me about grace as the means of our salvation. He asked, "Don't you believe that we are saved by grace?" And other questions were asked about the statements quoted from the Scriptures in Revelation, the twentieth chapter, that we shall be judged at the last day by our works. A stimulating conversation followed, in which an attempt was made to suggest how grace and works are related in the matter of salvation. From that conversation was born the idea that it would be fitting to write on the question, "How are we saved?" from the point of view of the means, principles, and medium of salvation.

Those who believe that we are saved by grace are absolutely correct. Let us read from Ephesians 2: 8, 9 as follows: "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; but it is the gift of God; Not of works, lest any man should boast." But note, in the very next verse, the reason why we are created and why the grace of God is granted unto us: "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." Here is stated in no uncertain terms that the very purpose of the creation of man is to do good works. If we do not achieve the purpose of our creation, then we are creatures unworthy of salvation. But if we do achieve the purpose of our creation, it will be because we do good works—which John says in Revelation 20: 12-15 is the basis of our judgment.

THIS IS NOT strange, for all judgment is based upon whether or not a thing or person, whichever it may be, is answering the purpose of its creation. Knives are made to cut with, so one with a keen edge and fine blade is judged a good knife. Automobiles are made for transportation, but if one has so many defects that it will not run, then it is not a good automobile, and it is either junked or abandoned. Men are made for good works. If they do them, they are judged good and rewarded accordingly, but if they fail to do them, they are not answering the purpose of their creation, so are accordingly judged to be bad and treated in a suitable manner. The grace of God permits us to answer the end of our creation. Without his loving care and the inspiring direction of his Holy Spirit, we fail even to know why we are here. But since his grace is upon us, we learn by the leadings of his Spirit that we are here for the purpose of doing good works. Read again Ephesians 2: 10 where Paul says that we are saved by grace, because "we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works."

NOT ONLY are we saved by grace, but my many other truths as well. In Acts 16: 31, we are told that we can be saved by belief. In Romans 8: 24, we find that we are saved by hope. In I Corinthians 1: 21, we discover the Apostle Paul saying that we can be saved by the foolishness of preaching. In other places we read of being saved by baptism, by the gospel, by belief and confession, by calling on the name of the Lord, by the name of the Lord, and by obedience to the gospel. Now all these statements come from the same Bible, and most of them from the pen of the same Apostle Paul who wrote that we are saved by grace. Was Paul contradicting himself when he said we are saved first by one thing, then another? Not at all.

He was simply indicating the needs of the particular people to whom he was writing and teaching the broad scope of the gospel. By all these things and more, we are saved.

When I was a youth at home, my parents sensed at least to some degree the nature of my future life and needs if I were to be qualified for that life. Their visions and hopes for me shall probably never be fulfilled as they should be, but if they are fulfilled in any measure at all, it will be largely because of the parental grace which they bestowed on me. They could have selfishly required of me, as some parents do of their children, such duties that education beyond the required attendance up to sixteen years in California would have been impossible. But by their grace, there was extended to me an opportunity to finish high school and to attend college. Their sacrifices eased the burden of feeding and clothing me, of meeting many of the obligations in the bare maintenance of life in such a way that attendance at the school was possible. But did their grace in providing me with the opportunity to attend the classes and laboratories of the college give me my education? Not at all. It required, in addition, hours of study, attention to the lectures, care in performing experiments in the chemistry and physics laboratories, conscientious reading, and active participation in all the functions of my classwork. In other words, it took many different kinds of good works.

IN THIS illustration can be found several of the principles of eternal salvation through the gospel. By grace, I was privileged to go to school. In hope I studied the lessons and met the laboratory requirements. By the "foolishness" of the professors' lectures, to use the words of the Apostle Paul, the information was presented to me. By immersion in the spirit of education, a kind of baptism, I absorbed the ideas and philosophy of education. By calling on the names and examining the lives of authorities in political science, mathematics, chemistry, physics, languages, history, and so on, I discovered truth. By obedience to the principles discovered and revealed by the master teachers and scientists of the ages, truth was confirmed and made a part of my own experience. Does this sound so much different from the gospel of Christ? None of this would have been possible but for the grace of my parents. Yet, in addition to grace were needed all these other principles and functions in order for me to receive the benefits of the grace thus extended.

BY HIS HEAVENLY grace, the Father of all men extends to his children the opportunity to know him and to become like him. Without his loving-kindness in permitting us this great opportunity, nothing that we can do will give it to us. We do not know enough, nor do we appear ever to be capable of knowing enough without his Holy Spirit about the life in which we find ourselves to do the thing that God by his grace will help us do. Our works, without his grace, are the blind gropings of confused and bewildered children, and in them we find no reason for boasting. But because of the grace of God, our works become the means of fulfilling the purpose of our creation—of becoming Godlike by taking advantage of the opportunities given us to establish the kingdom of God on earth in the name of Jesus and through the gospel in which we believe and have hope.

Grace is the graciousness of our Heavenly Parent, through which we find it possible to do the works of God on the basis of which we shall be judged in order to determine how well we have accomplished the purpose of our creation. But unless we respond eagerly, with hope and faith, the grace of God is meaningless to us. By grace we are saved, through hope, through faith, through obedience to the gospel, in the name of Jesus Christ, that man may be blessed in the kingdom of God.

The approach to God must be upward—not downward.

Questions People Ask

Would it not be better for the world if the endeavor to force the Christian way of thought on people was banished and people and society were allowed freely and naturally to express themselves?

ANSWER: I feel that behind this question are several misunderstandings. Firstly: The Christian way of life is not a code of laws forced on anybody. It is a way of life demonstrated by Jesus Christ and verified by millions in all ages as the only solution of all the problems and needs of man. Wherever and whenever freely accepted and experienced, it has always proved its truth and brought freedom and liberty—social, economic and personal justice, and righteousness. Wherever endeavors have been made to force it on the people as a code of law and they have been regimented to that end, rebellion, resentment and degeneration have always followed.

Secondly: The best things in the world are not found where nature is wild and fruits, vegetables, flowers, birds, and animals, have naturally expressed themselves. Our beautiful roses, sweet peas, apples, tomatoes, sheep, and cattle in their wild, natural, self-expressed state, are of little value. It is only as the potential good, which is hidden in their wild state, is revealed by cultivation, selective breeding, pruning, control of growth; and other methods of cultivation that they achieve perfection and are of such value to man.

Thirdly: In like manner, it is only as men and women choose to freely become adjusted to "the way" Jesus revealed in his life, (John 14: 6), by becoming grafted into Jesus Christ and sharing his life, that the highest and best in them can be revealed and made available for universal good. Self-control, not self-expression; self-sacrifice, not selfishness; goodness, not greatness; giving, not getting; service, not personal security; perfection, not popularity; truth, not power; peace, not riches, are some of the beautiful flowers and fruit of the Christian way of life. It is the only way which can take man in his natural state and transform him, so that, under the freely accepted inspiration of a new spirit and life, he achieves his destiny.

Fourthly: The "Christian Way" is the way of true liberty and freedom. It is certainly a straight and narrow way, but, in the end, it is the easy and best way. No motorist wants to leave the straight cement or asphalt-coated roads for paddocks and rough country, because he knows his car is at its best on the good road. He is free on the good road in the same sense that the Christian is free in the "Christian Way."

Isolated Members

Many times we have been greatly impressed by the friendship and kindness shown by members of the church in writing to those whose letters have been published in our pages.

Recently a letter came to us from one of our members who is living far from church privileges and feels the loneliness of her situation. It occurred to us then that if our readers could know, many of them would write letters of friendship and encouragement.

A part of the letter follows:

Our nearest church is forty miles from here. The elder there has come several times and administered to our sick when requested. We have prayed many times that the way would be opened so we could attend our nearest church, but for some reason it never has been. I married out of the church. . . . We have five lovely children. There have been times when I was so starved for the gospel and association with the Saints I felt I would surely die spiritually. I've had such terrible disappointments . . . however, time and again our family's lives have been so miraculously spared from accidents and sickness that we believe God surely has a blessing for us someday. . . . The church was interested enough in us to get us as members twenty or more years ago, and we lived right here. Can't it do something to keep the spark alive now, especially when there are so many lives at stake? There were two then; there are twelve now.

They Twain Shall Be One Flesh

By Evan A. Fry

And the Pharisees came to him and asked him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? This they said, thinking to tempt him. And he answered and said unto them, What did Moses command you? And they said, Moses suffered to write a bill of divorcement, and to put her away. And Jesus answered and said unto them, For the hardness of your hearts he wrote you this precept; But from the beginning of the creation, God made them male and female. For this cause shall a man leave his father, and mother, and cleave unto his wife; and they twain shall be one flesh; so then they are no more twain but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.—Mark 10: 2-9.

LIFE MAGAZINE, in the issue of October 27, carries a three-page story about a centennial reunion in Salt Lake City, Utah, participated in by some 400 of the 2,000 living descendants of an early Mormon pioneer and his six wives. The magazine story asserts that in the year 1834, one Charles C. Rich first met Joseph Smith. "In 1843, Revelator Smith 'revealed' a new doctrine which sanctified the institution of plural marriages. Follower Rich soon began to practice polygamy. By the time Rich arrived in Salt Lake City, Utah, on October 2, 1847, he had six wives, and a growing family," says Life.

The Reorganized Church asserts now, and has from the beginning, that Joseph Smith never revealed, preached, practiced, sanctioned, or condoned polygamy. The law he gave to the church in his lifetime was plain and completely in harmony with the Biblical law that one man and one woman—"they twain," not three or six or any other plural number—should be one flesh. A revelation received on February 9, 1831, and published to this day in the Utah edition of the Doctrine and Covenants as well as our own, commands: "Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart, and shall cleave unto her and none else" (Section 42, paragraph 7). The following month, another revelation contained this language: "... marriage is ordained of God unto man; wherefore it is lawful that he should have one wife, and they twain shall be one flesh, and all this that the earth might answer the end of its creation."—Doctrine and Covenants 49: 3. On August 18, 1835, a conference of the church considered the form of marriage ceremony to be used in the church and adopted the following covenant, which is used in every marriage ceremony in this church to the present day: "You both mutually agree to be each other's companion, husband and wife, observing the legal rights belonging to this condition; that is, keeping yourselves wholly for each other and from all others during your lives?" (Doctrine and Covenants 111: 2.) The same section which includes this marriage covenant incorporates also this declaration of belief from the church: "... we declare that we believe that one man should have one wife; and one woman one husband . . ." (This section was removed from the Utah edition in 1876, and the "revelation" on polygamy substituted.) The Book of Mormon, which was translated by Joseph Smith, calls polygamy an abomination and states the rule that one man shall have one wife, and concubines he shall have none (Jacob 2: 36. Authorized Edition).

JOSEPH SMITH was killed on June 27, 1844. Polygamy was first publicly proclaimed by Brigham Young in Salt Lake on August 29, 1852, eight years and two months after the prophet's death. It was presented as a revelation from Smith, received in 1843, but kept secret for all those years. Young stated as he read it to the conference, "Though that doctrine [polygamy] has not been practiced by the elders, this people have believed in it for years." Therefore, if the magazine story is correct, Mr. Rich arrived in Utah with six wives almost five years before Brigham Young proclaimed polygamy with the assertion that it had not yet been practiced by the church. Young predicted on this occasion, "And I tell you . . . it [the principle of polygamy] will sail over and ride triumphantly above all the prejudice and priestcraft of the day." How that prediction has been fulfilled, I leave you to decide.

THE PURPORTING revelation (Section 132, Utah Edition of the Doctrine and Covenants) presented thus in 1852 quotes Joseph Smith as inquiring of the Lord as to how he "justified" the patriarchs of old in polygamy—when the Bible contains no mention of such a justification, and the Book of Mormon calls polygamy an abomination. It commands Joseph to "prepare thy heart to receive and obey the instructions which I AM ABOUT TO GIVE unto you," (verse 1) and in a later paragraph commands Emma Smith to "receive all those that HAVE BEEN GIVEN unto my servant Joseph," (verse 52). The purported revelation teaches not only a plurality of wives, but makes salvation dependent on obedience to the principle of polygamy (verse 4). It teaches also a plurality of gods, and promises that those who practice polygamy “shall pass by the angels, and the gods, which are set there, to their exaltation and glory in all things” (verses 20 and 21). It promises that if a man marry a wife according to this law, any sin save shedding of innocent blood will be forgiven him (verse 26). Contrast this with the teachings of Joseph Smith in his lifetime, and it is like contrasting black with white. He taught that there is one God; that only belief in and obedience to the gospel of Christ—not polygamy—cancels and forgives sin; that men must respect and obey the laws of the land as well as the law of God and be judged according to the deeds done in the flesh. We have already quoted his teachings regarding marriage.

After the declaration of this document in 1852, many women in Utah claimed to have been wives to Joseph Smith, but examination of each claim will reveal that the marriage was performed BY PROXY after Smith’s death. In all of Utah—in all of the world—not a single child of Joseph Smith has ever been produced save by his one and only wife, Emma Hale Smith. When you consider that the so-called revelation promised Joseph that he would be blessed and multiplied an hundredfold in this world of wives and children (see verse 55), and when you consider the pride and satisfaction in polygamous ancestry which still exists in Utah (exemplified by the family gathering described in Life), does it seem probable that there could have been a single polygamous child begotten by Joseph Smith who would not blazon that fact from the housetops? You may be sure that if even one such child—let alone the hundreds promised to him—could have been produced in evidence, he would have been produced long before this.

EMMA SMITH, who was the wife of Joseph’s youth, testified in her old age: “He had no other wife but me; nor did he to my knowledge ever have . . . He did not have any

The Twins Start School

By Lois Ernsberger

“Mother, is my face clean?”

“Mom, can we take our aprons off now?”

“Mother, can’t we go now?”

A weary nod of assent, the door slams and the twins are gone. Yes, quite definitely school has started.

The silence is deafening. I slowly start to clear the breakfast table. “It just doesn’t seem possible,” I remark to the cat. “Why, only yesterday they were taking their first steps.”

My reverie is broken by a tap at the door and my neighbor pokes her head in—

“Children gone?” At my silent nod she continues. “Well, you haven’t any babies anymore. In fact, once they start school they’re really not yours at all.”

I’m startled and show it. “What do you mean?”

“Oh, they belong to the world now! ’Stoo bad too. You must feel awful to see them start. I know when my Georgie started school I cried for hours.”

Her voice goes on, but my mind resumes its own train of thought. Feel bad? Hate to see them go? How foolish! I’d feel much worse if they couldn’t go. What if they were abnormal and I couldn’t send them to that great American institution, the public school! What if they had to be sent to some special school for the mentally incompetent!

Why do so many parents dread the day their small fry start school? Because they’re losing their babies? Would they truly want to keep them babies forever? What is more pitiful than the grown person who has been tied to his mother’s apron strings all his life and is left suddenly alone?

No, I don’t mind seeing them start school. It’s downright fun to hear them chatter about it. Yesterday, upon arriving home, Jeanne sang out, “Jo Ann had to sit in the corner!” Her eyes shone and she giggled.

“What for?” I gasped, bristling a little. Was that teacher going to start picking on my baby? I’d go tell her, I’d—I’d—

“Oh, she iss kep’ talkin’.”

I looked at Jo Ann, who already had her head buried in my apron sobbing.

“I don’ like ’at teacher!” Now what to do! Suddenly I remembered a little girl some years ago and an exasperated teacher who exclaimed, “Lois, if you don’t stop that talking I’m going to put some tape across your mouth!” The way seemed clear, and I told of some of the times I, too, had to be punished in school. In a few minutes the crisis was past, and Jo Ann was relating happy experiences of the day.

That is a small example of some of the hardships my little ones will suffer. But in their growing and suffering, they are building character, learning new things, seeing a whole new world open before their eyes. It’s the heritage every American child has—the one thing that all parents can give their offspring, be they rich or poverty stricken—the privilege of growing up to be good Christian men and women.

For what more can we ask?

General Council of Women
The Auditorium
Independence, Missouri

170 Gravely Hill
Birmingham 23, England

Dear Council Members:

Several months have passed since we left Independence. It has been an interesting and busy period.

Before leaving the States, we spent two days in Washington, D.C., where we visited the Capitol, the White House, Washington Monument, Lincoln's Memorial, Arlington, and most of the other places of interest. They were all familiar to us, but because we were leaving America, I think we bade them farewell with a little more respect and affection than we had on previous occasions. From there we went on to New York. We were met in Jersey City by the Roy Squires. Although we had only a day and a half in New York, every minute was full. On our last day, we visited Radio City and saw The Yearling (which, by the way, is now in London and creating quite a sensation). In the evening, we attended prayer service and a reception at the church; we were later escorted down to the ship. All came aboard and presented us with fruit, flowers, and candy. They toured the big ship with us until midnight, when a deep blast from the whistle warned visitors to go ashore.

We sailed before dawn. I was sorry, because I had wanted to watch the Statue of Liberty and sky line of New York City fade into the horizon.

The "Queen Elizabeth" is a magnificent ship nearly four city blocks long. We had a fine trip across, although for two days we were in the swells from a storm to the north of us. The ship rolled so much that it was necessary to anchor all the chairs to the floor and put sideboards on the tables. The rolling bothered us a little, but neither of us missed a meal—an achievement we recall with satisfaction, having lived under English rationing since.

We docked in Southampton on time but were dismayed to learn that all dock hands had just gone on strike. We waited aboard ship for nine hours while the striking men held meetings. It was 9 o'clock at night when we left the ship, and a cold, penetrating fog was beginning to roll in from the ocean. You can imagine the confusion which would result from dumping 2,300 people and all their baggage on the dock with only a few porters and customs officers on duty. There is no system of checking baggage here, such as in the States. You locate your own (including trunks), find an available porter, go with him to the baggage compartment, and personally see that everything gets into the car.

Trains were waiting to take us to London. Everyone was frantic--especially the customs officials. Finally, with no more inspection than merely having us point out which trunks were ours, they marked them OK and shooed us out of their way. After much huffing and puffing, we managed to get our baggage and ourselves aboard an overcrowded train bound for London. The crowding had one advantage--it kept us warm.

We arrived at Waterloo station in London at midnight, and another mad scramble for baggage began. The people who were to meet us had gone home, thinking the train from Southampton would not be in until morning. It was foggy, frosty, and miserably cold. Railway stations here are not enclosed; they are a series of platforms with a roof over them, much like our train sheds. Usually there is a small enclosure where tickets are sold (bookings here) and another one or two for the rest rooms, and sometimes a tearoom. But there is no large building called the station.

After two and a half hours of searching for and collecting baggage, and vainly telephoning hotels for accommodations, we decided to look through the directory for familiar names. After drawing several blanks, we finally reached a John Worth--not the John Worth we thought it was, but his son. He gave us a most gracious invitation to come to their house at once, and by 3 o'clock we were drinking tea before the fireplace in their lovely home. Needless to say, we called down the blessings of heaven upon their heads for their kind hospitality at that strange hour.

On our way to the station the next day, we saw many interesting buildings; visible also were the cruel scars of war. As we crossed Westminster Bridge, I was thrilled to see the beautiful Houses of Parliament. We looked at them standing there so majestically, with the placid water of the Thames flowing slowly by, and marveled that they had escaped the tragedy of war which was so evident on every hand. In a little side street, we saw a lonely church spire standing with nothing at its base except a partial shell of what had once been a beautiful church. Strangely, a few panes of glass remained in the twisted steel framework of what had once been a large, stained-glass window. In London, Birmingham, Leeds, Manchester, and Liverpool, we saw endless streets of rubble and the hollow shells of buildings.

Brother McConley recently returned from Germany with the report that the devastation here in England fades into insignificance when one sees Berlin.

We have learned in the few months we've been here that war-torn cities have their counterpart in the lives of people. Those who experience and survive such tragedies do so at a tremendous cost, physically, spiritually, and emotionally.

Birmingham is a city of more than 2,000,000, located about 100 miles northwest of London. We had six weeks of bitter cold after arriving here, and getting settled was a slow task.

Immediately upon our arrival, we reported to the Alien Registration Office at the police department. We are foreigners, now. Recently, I overheard two ladies in a department store. One remarked, "She is a foreigner." The other replied, "Yes, she is American; look at her shoes." I pretended I hadn't heard a word.

I am well acquainted in Birmingham now, but it was quite confusing at first. I used to wonder where Boston got its pattern for growth, but now I know. The map of any English city looks like a spider web.

Following the bitter winter, we had a wet, cold spring with heavy rains and floods. The losses from floods and cold were appalling--30,000 head of cattle, 3,000,000 head of sheep, and countless other farm animals, feed, and equipment, not to mention the loss of homes, businesses, and properties. Whole villages and large sections of cities were under water.

Summer finally came, and it was lovely. The climate is much like that of the Pacific Northwest, and things grow luxuriantly. Many of the stone cottages have thatched roofs and are surrounded by stone fences covered with roses and ivy. The tiny fields are separated by hedgerows, and there are pastures dotted with trees and sheep or cattle. Wild swans add their beauty to every little bit of water. They are protected, so we see them everywhere.

There are castles, some occupied and some in ruins. Only the spire of the great thirteenth century Cathedral of Coventry remains standing. We have visited the ever-famous Stratford-on-Avon three times since we arrived.

We saw a section of the old Roman road built 1,000 years ago. Some of the walls are still standing too. Years ago in school, when I was worrying through Caesar's description of his roads and bridges, I might have enjoyed the translations more had I known that I would some day actually see one of them.

But enough of this rambling. Now for the women's work. Most groups did not meet at all during the war, which is easy to understand. They didn't meet in Hawaii then, either. There have been some classes conducted, mostly on doctrinal subjects; these were taught by a member of the priesthood. Several bazaars and a harvest festival or two have been held since the war ended. I have worked out a tentative year's program and will report on it later.

So far, I have conducted a three-months' course (once a week) here in Birmingham. I used The Church and the Home quarterly, and the women seemed to like it very much. They said it was new and refreshing. I have also held classes at two week-end institutes, one here and one at Sutton-in-Ashfield. Besides the two groups in Birmingham, I have met with and spoken to the women at Clay Cross, Sutton-in-Ashfield, Nuneaton, and Warrington. I spoke at three mother-daughter occasions and have also met with and spoken at all of the church schools and some of the Zion's Leagues in the above mentioned places.

I always think of you and miss you on "council days." Then I think of the wonderful people I am meeting here, the experiences I am having, and the things I am seeing, and I thank my Heavenly Father for having granted me such a rare privilege.

Sincerely,

Emma McConley

A Day for Thanksgiving

THE CONTINUAL clattering of the train wheels as they contacted the hard steel rails beneath them sent vibrant little shivers down Joe's spine. He stirred uneasily and blinked his eyes hard. Sometimes he had the oddest feeling that someone was trying to communicate with him or that something was going to happen. He seemed always to be listening, waiting, expecting. Sometimes it scared him, clear down to the pit of his stomach. Sometimes he wondered if he were quite normal. He had heard about people losing their minds because they dwelt too much in the "make believe." Was that to be his fate?

The clanking of the wheels continued. Over and over and over the sound echoed and resounded upon his ears. But suddenly, without warning, his head cleared and he was able to throw aside the confusion which always seemed to be in his mind. Everything was as it had been a few minutes ago. Bert and Dick were still there beside him in the crowded coach. Bert, with his long legs stretched out to span the space between his seat and Joe's, rested his feet on Joe's seat. Dick was sprawled out in the little space left in the seat unoccupied by Bert. Both fellows were asleep.

HOW SILLY IT was for him to imagine that the train wheels were telling him to "go back." What possible reason could there be for his going back to Graceland only an hour or so after he had left it? Besides, this was Thanksgiving vacation and everyone that could, would be going home, too. What would his mother say if suddenly he was to call her and say he had decided not to come home because the train wheels had told him not to? He smiled at the absurdity of his thinking and laid his head back against the soft cushion of the seat. Take Bert there, for instance, his thoughts continued, nothing ever bothered Bert. He was just a happy-go-lucky guy with no worries and no fears for the future—just living every day as it came and never thinking beyond the hour he was living. And Dick, too—nothing ever seemed to bother those two. It was just like the first few days at Graceland; Dick and Bert had fitted right in—made friends the first day—took what was offered them and never complained, while he had been restless and uncertain and homesick. It just didn't seem fair that some people had to be so different from others.

Dick opened his eyes, yawned and sat up. "What time is it?" he asked. "Quarter after ten. Why?"

Dick shrugged, "No reason. Just curious."

There it was again, Joe thought, no reason, no purpose, no nothing.

"Couldn't you sleep?"

Joe shook his head. "Never could sleep on a train. Too noisy, I guess."

"Noisy?"

"Yeah. Wheels make so much racket."

"After being in the Army, I can sleep anywhere."

BETTY SANFORD

THERE WAS a short silence. Dick took out a comb and gave his hair a quick smoothing down, while Joe stared out of the window. The night was dark, and objects could hardly be seen from his seat on the moving train, but he knew what was out there in the blackness in front of them. Fields of corn and big white farmhouses and people sleeping soundly on soft, wide beds. People who had found their place in life and were doing something about it. Farmers who knew what it meant to feel the rich, deep softness of the earth beneath their feet and the satisfaction of knowing they were creating something worth-while from the materials God had given them. Satisfied, busy people doing their part—while kids like Joe sat on trains looking forward to a few days at home and then back to college—for what? If you didn't know where you were going in life or what you would be called upon to do, how could you know what to prepare yourself for?

"Joe, you do more deep thinking than any one person has a right to do. What are you dreaming about now?"

Joe stiffened. Why couldn't they leave him alone? He knew he was different, and so did they, but they didn't have to "rub it in." Immediately, he was contrite. How could Dick possibly understand him when he couldn't even understand himself sometimes. He attempted a laugh. "Thinking about how good it's going to seem to sit down to a turkey dinner at home," he lied.

"You're thinking about food?" Dick chided. "I'm thinking about sleep. You know—that wonderful stuff we never seem to get enough of? I'm gonna sleep every minute I'm at home."

They lapsed into another silence.

New Horizons

That night Joe wrote a long letter to his mother. His closing lines were, "It has truly been a day for thanksgiving, Mom"

Joe wasn't in the mood to talk, and Dick was sleepy. The train wheels were bothering Joe again. "Go back to Graceland," they seemed to say, "back to Graceland, go back"

HE REMEMBERED his first impression of the Hill as he had started up it that Sunday morning in early September. He had looked at the Tower, and his thoughts had been, "Here I will find the answer. By Thanksgiving I shall have found the purpose for my having been created. I shall know what it is I want to do in life. I shall live with people who feel as I do, and think as I do, and live as I do. Graceland will open all new doors for me." He remembered the first fellowship when four missionaries and their wives took their leave for foreign lands. He had felt a thrill seeing them come down from the platform with their heads held high in determination and with faith in their hearts for that which they were to undertake. He had thought, "They know where they're going. They know what they're going to do. Everyone seems to know but me."

And then the fellowship of the "open door." That was the night when he had got his first glimpse into the lives of his fellow Gracelanders and had seen their souls bared, for an instant, to his. He had met and lived and worked with members of his own faith, but he was still lonely. There was no one yet who understood him. He had still not found himself. One shouldn't expect miracles, he reasoned, but he had been so sure that Graceland would tell him what he wanted to know. If he wasted every day of his two years at college, as he had wasted every day of his past nineteen years, then there was no future to look forward to at all. Being a good Latter Day Saint was not enough. There had to be a job for him to do.

THE TRAIN jerked to a halt and suddenly, without any forethought at all, Joe stood up and began taking down his suitcase.

"Where ya going, Freshman?" Both Bert and Dick were awake, now.

The expression on Joe's face stopped their inquiries. "I'm going back," he said. "See you later."

Graceland was the same as it had been the day before when he had boarded the train. As he walked slowly up the hill toward the Ad building, Joe felt an exhilaration he had never known before. Maybe he was crazy for coming back, but he was here and, strangely enough, he was very happy about it.

Joe had always liked Sunday mornings, and, as he dressed for church, the feeling he had had on the train came back to him more forcibly than it had before. This was what he had been waiting for.

BEFORE THE general church service began, Joe walked off by himself under a big tree that stood out by itself on the campus. There he knelt and asked God's direction and advice. He was so sure that his coming back had not been a mistake and yet, with as vivid an imagination as he had, could he not have imagined everything? While he was kneeling there, he seemed to gain a closeness to God that he had never known before. He arose and went into the service, satisfied that he had been right in returning.

The organist was playing, "Rock of Ages" as he entered the building; he selected a seat near the back. There was a spirit almost tangible in the room, and Joe was awed into deep thinking. As the prayer service began and the young people about him bore their testimonies, Joe felt God's Spirit grow stronger within him. When it seemed that his soul could consume no more of this overpowering influence, a man at the front of the room arose, and as he did so a strange new peace came into Joe's heart. His eyes were riveted on the man's face, and it was as if in a dream that Joe heard the words which came from the man's lips.

"There is one among you who comes today seeking God's help. God has heard this young brother's supplications and he is ready now to instruct. Joe, you are to prepare yourself in the sight of God for a task which shall require much from you. You have stumbled along in darkness long enough. You have shown yourself worthy in God's sight, and he has now chosen you to be a missionary for him. You are to carry his gospel into all parts of the world. You are to go forth and preach unto all people. This is the task for which you have asked."

THAT NIGHT Joe wrote a long letter to his mother. His closing lines were, "It has truly been a day for thanksgiving, Mom. I know now the path in life which I am to travel. I go down on my knees before God that he has given this day to me."

Harvest Home

By BARBARA McFARLANE

I walked on a November day. I pressed the chill of the fall against me, and breathed the smell of it into my body. I trod the sunlight into a carpet of golden leaves beneath my feet and returned the scarlet hue of my cheek which the wind had bestowed to the leaves that yet clung to the branches overhead. I ran down a hill with the wind behind me, pushing, and into a knot of laughing young people, my friends.

Together we proceeded to the little church. At the threshold, however, the hush from within bade us be silent, and we entered and sat down near the rear. The organ was playing, and wave after wave of the music washed over us and intensified the feeling of unity with the other worshipers. Suddenly the choir filled the room with the joyful Thanksgiving hymn:

Come, ye thankful people, come,
Raise the song of harvest home
All is safely gathered in,
Ere the winter storms begin.

I was oblivious to the remainder of the service. Although the remarks of the speaker were no doubt affluent, my mind was turning backward along the corridors of time:

It was the first Thanksgiving Day with its grave men pausing to pay tribute to the God who had guided them to a new land and preserved them in their incipient struggle with the virgin wilderness. Before them lay the Herculean task of building a nation, and the gravity of their responsibility tempered their merry-making. From these pilgrim progenitors, the day with its wealth of tradition has become a part of the American heritage.

There were other thanksgiving days with more of feasting and gaiety and less of thought. These days came when there were many blessings from a beneficent Creator. And in sharp contrast were the dark days of doubt and depression, when clouds of contention hung low. But as the years marched by, the days free of a troubled exterior became fewer, and the Thanksgiving celebrations were modulated with the cog- nizance of existing strife.

And, now, Thanksgiving, 1947. Could we live in a better, more chal- lenging period of the world's his- tory? We are citizens of a nation avowed to protect the freedom of the individual. We are a part of the organization of Christ's Church which has been restored to man. An oppressed and hungry world—hun- gry for a way of life—pleads for the very thing that we hold. Yes, the grandness of our age is a blessing for which we should be enduringly grate- ful.

We should thank God for the prick of conscience that will not al- low us to sit down to our Thanks- giving dinner with a "God's in his heaven, all's right with the world" complacency. True, our homes were not destroyed by bombs; our tables are groaning with an abundance of food; and we are looking forward to a secure, comfortable winter. Our world is still intact. Or is it? Have we forgotten two Thanksgivings ago when our friends were scattered all around the globe? Perhaps we should petition the Lord for a longer memory.

Can we accept Thanksgiving, 1947, with a paeon of gratitude for the stewardship of personality; and for the years that stretch ahead of us—years with which we can do so much? Life, the grand adventure, is ours.

The service was over. I walked on a November evening and saw the sun display a pageant of color. Night took its place, and I received the freshness of it to myself. I walked

Names and Addresses Wanted

If you have relatives, friends, or former neighbors who have moved from the east, south, middle west, or southwest to the Pacific northwest (Idaho, Washington, Oregon, or British Columbia), Seventy Arthur F. Gibbs, 3824 Southeast Grant Court, Portland, Oregon, will appreciate your sending him their names and addresses. He suggests the following people be included: members of the church who have not been officially transferred from records elsewhere; nonmember relatives who would appreciate receiving missionary calls; friends who have had contact with the church in other areas, or those who would like the missionary to call on them. Give family name; address (if street and number are unknown, give locality); contact with the church, if any; interests; relationship; any other information that may be helpful in ministering to them. It is suggested that branch secretaries check their home through the brooding peace. Thoughts of family and friends and a great feast should have quickened my pace. But the dark and the presence of a great Father who cares for his millions of children arrested my steps, and I raised an overflowing heart to heaven.

DEATHS

NORRIS.—Wayne Mark, son of Mrs. Eleanor L. Hoffman, was born April 27, 1924, in Menominee, Michigan, and died September 15, 1947, at Lansing, Michigan, following a motorcycle accident. A member of the Reorganized Church, he was graduated from Eastern High School in Lansing and served in the Army Air Force from November, 1942, until September, 1945, and saw action in the European theater.

He is survived by his mother, Mrs. Eleanor Hoffman of Lansing; and his grandmother, Mrs. Ina Wetherell of DeWitt, Michigan. Services were held at the Gorsline-Runciman Funeral Home, Elder Luther S. Troyer officiating. Interment was in the DeWitt cemetery.

SCHRAMM.—Ninna A., was born August 14, 1876, in Germany and died September 16, 1947, at her home in Dallas, Texas. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on June 9, 1938. Because of ill health, she was confined to her home for the past few years, but was always ready to donate to any church project.

Surviving are two daughters: Mrs. Irma S. Pratt of Dallas and Mrs. Sophie S. Dunbar of Allendale, South Carolina; three sons: Max of Austin, Texas; Ben E. and Robert of Dallas; a sister, Mrs. Anna Hassenpring of Austin; a brother, Paul Henz of Oakland, California; seven grandchildren, and one great-grandchild. Elders H. E. Davenport and Linden Wheeler officiated at the funeral.

HARBSTREIT.—Emma, J., was born August 7, 1872, in Indiana, and died September 30 at her home north of Washington, Indiana. In 1892, she married Joseph D. Harbstreit and on March 19, 1898, was baptized into the Reorganized Church. She was highly respected by all who knew her. She is survived by her husband and seven children: Mrs. Mary Bush, Walter, Zedda, Mrs. Esther Petty, Joseph D., Jr., Andrew, and Mrs. Nellie Orender. One son preceded her in death. The funeral was held at the church, Elders J. O. Dutton and Chester Metcalf officiating. Interment was in the Plainville cemetery.

BRIGGS.—Edwin D., was born February 22, 1859, at Council Bluffs, Iowa, and died August 7, 1947, at Independence, Missouri. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on September 13, 1875, and spent many years in church school and religio work at Nebraska City. He was married on June 30, 1887, to Sarah Alice Armstrong, who preceded him in death seven years ago.

He leaves one foster daughter, Mrs. Elsie Scott of Camas, Washington. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

REEDY.—Margo Louise, eight-months-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. L. P. Reedy of Abingdon, Illinois, died at the Cottage Hospital in Galesburg (no date given). She was born February 13, 1947, in Aurora, Illinois. In addition to her parents, she is survived by a sister, Phyllis; a brother, Paul; her grandfather, Frank A. Dorner of Burlington, Iowa; and her grandmother, Mrs. Clara Reedy of Aurora. Elder Arnold Settles was in charge of the funeral service. Interment was in the Lincoln Highway Cemetery.

improper relation with any woman that ever came to my knowledge . . . I know that he had no other wife, or wives, than myself, in any sense—spiritual, or otherwise." "Young Joseph," the son of Joseph and Emma, though not quite twelve years old at his father's death, was old enough to know whether his father's family life was all that it should be, and his evidence corroborates the statement of his mother.

In a court trial involving possession of certain real estate, Judge John F. Phillips, of the Circuit Court of the United States Western District of Missouri, found as follows in his decision given March 16, 1894: ". . . that the church in Utah has largely departed from the faith, doctrines, laws, ordinances, and usages of said original church . . . and has incorporated into its system of faith the doctrines of celestial marriages and a plurality of wives . . ."

We stand on this record to deny again that Joseph Smith ever revealed, preached, practiced, condoned, or sanctioned polygamy.

A Prayer

*Dear God,
I place my faith in thee,
With heart of love
And conscience free,
To give what thou wouldst have of me—
Myself.*

*To tell,
As thy words should be told,
And lead another
Into the fold;
To give thee what I can't withhold—Myself.*

*To do,
As good deeds should be done,
Fight thy good battle,
Make sure I've won;
Then give thee, fully, when life is done—
Myself.*

Tableaux

A Cup of Poison

Some accounts say that the great Russian composer, Tchaikovsky, died of cholera contracted from drinking a glass of water while at lunch with his brother and biographer, Modest. Thus in the tragic mood of the "Adagio Lamentoso" of his famous Symphony Pathétique, the musical creator passed from life in agony and delirium. There ended an artistic career that might have contributed many more works of beauty to the world.

The glass of water that Tchaikovsky drank was, unknown to the men, contaminated. Boiling would have rendered it safe to drink. There was no label on the glass to warn the unsuspecting victim of danger.

When one reads of the vast amounts of liquor consumed in the United States, and thinks of the millions of people who are steadily poisoning themselves with something slower but no less deadly than the cholera, he is amazed that they do it in realization of their danger. It is true that there is no label marked "Poison!" to warn them. But everyone who can read should be aware. Tchaikovsky did not know he was drinking death in that glass of water. But millions who drink alcoholic liquors do.

Viewpoint

Two of my friends knew the same facts about a certain local situation. One of them was disturbed and unhappy concerning it; the other friend was happy. The three of us met and talked.

"Look," I said, and explained the facts to my unhappy friend.

"That makes it appear different," he said, as we concluded. When we parted company, all three were happy.

Knowing the facts is hardly enough. It is also important to understand them.

It is a good plan never to make up your mind concerning anything until you have heard more than one report, or until you have read more than one book about it.

If church people would follow this rule, a great deal of unhappiness could be prevented. When life tries to rush you, reserve your judgment, defer your decision until you are sure.

The Cloudy Day

My friend was badly discouraged. Someone had been talking to him and filled him with doubt and gloom. The people, the city, the church, its officials—everybody, in fact—had come in for their share of criticism. My friend was in despair. He felt there was no hope.

So I asked him some questions.

"Do you know any other city in America where you would find as many good people as you know here?"

"No, I don't," he replied.

"If you were to become sick or get into trouble, do you know any other place where so many people would come to help you and befriend you?"

"No, I don't," he said again.

"Don't you think it is a wonderful privilege to live here among so many good people?"

"Yes, I really do," he answered.

"Is there any other place you would rather be than here?"

"No, there isn't," was his decision. And he added, "I'm never going to let that fellow get me down again!"

Too many fact-finders are looking for only one kind of truth. As long as we have only ordinary human beings to work with, there will be faults. But there are virtues, too. And when somebody is adding up the social liabilities, it is a good thing to make a list of the social assets.

Tuesday

Tuesday is the time appointed for us to make the rounds of the offices to report what is happening at headquarters. These notes are given in another section of our publication.

From the outside of a department office door, everything seems very quiet. But when one goes in, he finds officers and workers laboring over stacks of correspondence, reports, projects. Here is the business of the church pouring into headquarters, receiving attention, being classified, and filed.

Church work touches the lives of the people at thousands of different points. Every letter has some important human situation, some pressing need, in it. The problems are of all kinds. Incredible complications appear. Officers search the law, probe their experience, consult with each other, for solutions.

Every day is like Tuesday, of course. But it is on Tuesday that we look in the door, learn what is going on, take notes and write up the accounts. Tuesday is a sort of journalistic visitor's day. And our people like to be informed.

Growth

The people of Independence have been gathered from many parts of the world; some of them from the wide-open spaces of the West, some from the crowded cities of the East, some from lands afar. There are no foreigners, because everybody belongs here, has a right here, is welcome, and feels at home. But you can hear the accents of many lands in any little prayer meeting.

This mingled population is growing up together. Children, in general, go farther than their parents. All kinds and conditions of men are here, with all sorts of cultures, educations, backgrounds. Steadily we are becoming united in this unique and interesting meeting ground. We know what we wish to do, and as time goes on we shall learn how to do it together in peace and brotherhood.

Headquarters Reports

THE AUDITORIUM, November 18, 1947.—President J. F. Garver and Bishop Walter Johnson landed by plane at Sydney, Australia, after a trip from Auckland, New Zealand, the last stage of their journey from Hawaii. They report a fine reception given them by Australian members and officials.

President Israel A. Smith is still in the West, spending Sunday (November 9) at Vancouver, and the preceding Sunday at Portland, Oregon.

APOSTLE D. T. WILLIAMS and Bishop G. L. DeLapp were the speakers, Sunday, November 9, morning and afternoon respectively, at the dedication of the church at Nauvoo, Illinois. A fine historical pageant representing the history of the branch opened the afternoon activities. The church was presented by the pastor, R. H. Atkinson, and was received for the church by Bishop DeLapp, who gave the address, and Apostle Williams gave the dedicatory prayer.

APOSTLE M. A. McCONLEY writes from Hyacinth Straat, 41 B, Rotterdam Z, Holland:

Brethren Theys, Scherer, and I arrived in Holland last Saturday morning, after a smooth crossing on the night boat from Harwich.

We lined up the program for all of us to be in Rotterdam over the first Sunday and through to Saturday the eighth. Brother Scherer will go with Brother Jac de Wild to Friesland over the week end leaving here tomorrow. Brother Theys and I remain here to continue such business as remains yet undone and to assist in services in Rotterdam and vicinity.

A fine spirit prevailed over Sunday. Brethren Theys and Scherer have both fallen in love with the land of Holland and her people. Brother Scherer is beginning to converse in Dutch, and though using an interpreter still for preaching, he read his Scripture lesson in Dutch

Comparative Statement of Income for the First Nine Months of 1946 and 1947

We are submitting herewith for the information of our church members the following statement of income by months for the period ending in September:

COMPARATIVE INCOME—GENERAL FUND FOR YEARS 1946 AND 1947 TO OCTOBER 1

	Increase
	1947	1947	1946
January	$ 22,129.07	$160,665.75	$138,536.68
February	7,795.67	111,667.24	103,871.57
March	1,041.22	85,209.88	84,168.66
April	3,201.55	67,779.72	64,578.17
May	17,648.67	83,224.64	65,575.97
June	7,082.70	82,991.92	75,909.22
July	—15,245.84	54,455.89	69,701.73
August	—11,639.74	62,019.13	73,658.87
September	— 7,784.43	63,499.85	71,284.28
TOTAL	$ 24,228.87	$771,514.02	$747,285.15

Note: Above figures do not include Oblation and Bequests.

It is to be noted that a substantial increase took place for the first half of the year, which increase was partially offset by a decrease of income for the months of July, August, and September. Letters are being sent to the Bishops, Bishop's Agents, and Solicitors asking that all possible effort be put forth not only to hold, but to strengthen our position during the closing months of this year.

We wish to take this opportunity of thanking those who have made such a favorable showing possible. We realize that increased living costs have been a factor in the decrease which occurred during the three months referred to, and that there are certain inflationary trends which make problems for wage earners, businessmen, and housewives.

We wish to emphasize the need for every member of the church complying with the financial law. We have found from experience that such compliance not only brings financial strength to the church as a whole, but brings spiritual blessings to those complying.

Respectfully submitted,
THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC,
By G. L. DeLapp.

Gog's Usurpation of Power

By Apostle D. T. Williams

IN OUR PREVIOUS ARTICLE, we expressed the thought that Gog is the high priest of Satan. Let us see how far we are justified in making such an assumption. As a beginning, in the cataloguing of the necessary array of facts, we quote the following from the Inspired Version of the Holy Scriptures:

And I, the Lord God, spake unto Moses, saying, That Satan whom thou hast commanded in the name of mine Only Begotten, is the same which was from the beginning;

And he came before me, saying, Behold, I, send me, I will be thy Son, and I will redeem all mankind, that one soul shall not be lost, and surely I will do it; wherefore, give me thine honor.

But behold, my beloved Son, which was my beloved and chosen from the beginning, said unto me; Father, thy will be done, and the glory be thine for ever.

Wherefore, because that Satan rebelled against me, and sought to destroy the agency of man, which I, the Lord God, had given him; and also that I should give unto him mine own power, by the power of mine Only Begotten I caused that he should be cast down; and he became Satan.—Genesis 3: 1-5.

Notice these words in the fourth verse: "Satan . . . sought to destroy the agency of man, which I, the Lord God, had given him." The manner in which the destruction of this most precious gift, the agency of man, was to be accomplished is set forth in the second verse of this reading, in which Satan says, "I will redeem all mankind that not one soul shall be lost."

THE FATHER of the human race was cognizant of the fact that with the full recognition of man's right to self-determination, as granted in his free agency, no one, not even an angel from glory, could guarantee the unanimous salvation of the human family without the loss of one soul and still allow the exercise of man's free will as God had planned it.

So when Satan, who was then a celestial being, certified that he would "redeem all mankind that not one soul shall be lost," God knew that Lucifer would seek to fulfill his boast by stripping humanity of its freedom of choice, which God had given as a very special gift, essential to salvation. Here was the attempt of Satan to get the stamp of Divinity on his soul-scorching doctrine of totalitarianism, which God has always abhorred and which is the plague that humanity must always set its face against if it is to be in unity with its Creator.

But Satan was not to be rebuffed with a simple denial. His power in persistence has become proverbial—and for good reasons as we shall see. He did not desist, nor in any way cease his activity, once he had laid down the blueprints of his campaign. What happened gives vivid testimony of this fact. This powerful leader, of whom God said in the first verse of the above quotation, "He was with me from the beginning," began a ruthless and, yet, undoubtedly a suave infiltration of the hosts of heaven with his deceptive philosophy. He thus sought to unseat God from his high place. This was the first usurpation of power attempted so far as the record shows.

IT SHOULD BE self-evident that not even God would allow such a fifth column to work unresisted in his courts and bring to pass the unlimited corruption of his otherwise faithful adherents. As a result, this false movement created to install a dictatorship in the stead of the liberty promised by God to the children of his creation, came to a climax in the ousting of Lucifer from his high place near the throne of God. Heaven was sickened with the stench of such philosophy and opened her doors to eject Satan and those whom he had won for his followers.

It was in light of these events that we hear Jesus saying, "As lightning falleth from heaven, I beheld Satan also falling" (Luke 10: 19). For a further and more colorful description:

And there was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon and his angels fought against Michael, . . . and prevailed not . . . neither was there place found in heaven for the great dragon who was cast out; that old serpent, called the devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him.—Revelation 12: 6, 7, 8.

Having had partial success in heaven, Satan was not satisfied, so he went about the business of deceiving "the whole world." The war against heaven has now changed only its theater of operation. It is still the same war, and the same cause is still the crux of this colossal struggle. Shall man forever be under the grip of the compulsion which Satan and his host would inflict upon him, or shall he have the liberating truth with which Christ would make him free?

WHEREVER YOU SEE the hosts of totalitarianism gathered for the battle, remember they are not on God's side. Whose side they are on, then, is self-evident. We fought the last World War to subdue Hitler and his vast power, which power was being used to unseat democracy with what degree of freedom it has attained in behalf of human betterment. This is not to contend that our present forms of democracy are perfect—from it. However, I do mean to say that those who fight for an ever-increasing liberty for humanity are on the right track and should be encouraged in their struggle.

After all this has been said, we come now to face this earth-shaking fact: We, at this moment, are looking into the glaring eyes of a third world war. And what is the crux of the meaning of this impending catastrophe? What will men and women die for who are sucked into this catastrophic maelstrom?

IT IS STILL the age-old problem of free agency, the right of choice, of liberty for human souls. This Gog, who is coming to battle "against the mountains of Israel . . . in the latter days," is set on taking from man the hard-won freedom for which he and his ancestors for many generations have shed their life blood and staked their sacred honor.

Again, why does the Almighty say, "I am against thee, O Gog, chief prince of Rosh"? It is because Gog has taken the side of Satan in this great struggle against God. God is for freedom, while Satan is for bondage. God is for free moral agency, while Satan is for the eternal regimentation of the souls and bodies of men. Those who believe in God's way can and must have no part nor lot with those who seek to regiment mankind either in body or soul.

GOG, IN HIS WAY, is Satan's chief emissary in seeking these unholy ends. With him there is no freedom of speech, no freedom of press, no freedom of religion, no freedom from fear, nor freedom from want. Right now, the present Gog, who sits with such imperious might upon his throne of power, brushes aside the efforts of our own nation to bring about a condition whereby the hungry of Europe might be fed. What difference is it to him if millions starve? Did he not create a man-made famine to reduce to death three million of his own growers of grain? And this, because they yearned for a crumb of the freedom which God has said belongs, by right, to all His sons and daughters.

Thus, the high priest of totalitarianism is none other than the high priest of Satan, and as Satan sought to usurp the powers of God and make them of no effect, so Gog seeks to elevate himself to the throne of righteousness by stealing the freedom of mankind.

That the present ruler of Russia is against God and His way of life and therefore, at variance with all that represents God, should be acknowledged by all. But still there are those who, like the one third of the heavenly host who were cast out, may need fuller evidence than that already presented of modern Gog's disposition.

IT IS RELATED that the New York World cabled Joseph Stalin in February, 1930, asking if there were some "good Communists" who were out of sympathy with the party's requirement—that all its members should be atheists.

Mr. Stalin answered by cable as follows:

I do not know of any such good Communists. It is hardly likely that such exist . . . cases occur when certain members of the Party hamper the complete development of anti-religious propaganda. If such members are expelled, it is a good thing, because there is no room for such Communists in the ranks of our Party.

So, if you are a Communist, you cannot be a good one unless you are an anti-religionist. If you stand up in defense of God and His church, "there is no room for such Communist in the ranks of our Party."

As we have already said, Communism is not just an economic way of life. It is an evil philosophy, seeking to turn men against God. If the above is not enough to prove this to you, then allow us to show that this sort of soul-deceiving doctrine permeated the channels of Communism through the years. Listen to Bakunin, a Red orator, speaking seven decades ago:

Brethren, I come to announce unto you a new gospel, which must penetrate to the very ends of the world. . . . The old world must be destroyed and replaced by a new one. . . . The Lie must be stamped out and give way to Truth. . . . The first Lie is God; the second lie is Right . . . and when you have freed your minds from the fear of a God, and from that childish respect for the fiction of Right, then all the remaining chains that bind you, and which are called science, civilization, property, marriage, morality, and justice, will snap asunder like threads. . . . Let your own happiness be your only law. . . . Our first work must be destruction and annihilation of everything as it now exists; you must accustom yourself to destroy everything, the good with the bad; for if but an atom of the old world remains, the new will never be created.

Does not this sound as though Communism were a doctrine of devils? It testifies in words of thunder that its way of life is a counterfeit for the gospel of the Son of God. Do not be so naïve as to accept such silly frothings of evil distilled genius representing itself in God, truth, right, morality, marriage, justice—"let your own happiness be your only law." This is Gog's doctrine.

To be a Communist, you must be an iconoclast (one who assails all the traditions of the fathers, no matter how good or wholesome they may be). "Our first work must be destruction and annihilation of everything as it now exists. You must accustom yourself to destroy everything, the good with the bad."

AGAIN THUNDERS the prophetic words: "I am against thee, O Gog, prince of Rosh." Is it necessary that we add more to convince Christian people that they should have no dealings with this counterpart of Satan's plan to unseat God in the minds of men and put Lucifer on his throne?

But there are still those who will go their way, or Satan's way, and hide their heads in the blinding sounds of atheism, thus fulfilling Paul's prophesy concerning them:

But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost; In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them.—II Corinthians 4: 3, 4.

A Voice From the Dust

Years of study have brought the author into contact with many arguments against the Book of Mormon, and have brought him evidence that they are not true. In this article, he examines some of the principal points of interest. Permission to use the photographs has been given him by the American Museum of Natural History, New York.

BY H. V. FISHER

MANY AND VARIED have been the theories concerning the riddle of the land of the Americas, and often those theories have been altered to conform to the findings of the archæologist, for America has surely been a land of mystery. Scientists seeking to decipher the dark pages of the past have exploited the privilege of speculating wildly and later retracing their statements in the light of new discovery.¹

The position which the Book of Mormon assumed in professing to be the history of ancient America, compiled firsthand by the aborigines themselves,² was a unique one indeed; it may also be added, it was a most unenviable position as well, for the Book of Mormon has not been accorded the same privilege of speculation engaged in by the scientific world. There has been permitted no conjecture regarding events of the past, no retracing of statements, for the Book of Mormon is not a history based upon deductions, but the actual record of the ancients who were the participants.³

At its inception, there were honest people who doubted the genuineness of the Book of Mormon, and there were also many who saw an opportunity of amassing wealth by publishing an exposé of the book. The lucrative riches to be gained in the sale of books against the "Golden Bible"⁴ enticed able talent and noted scholars to attempt to refute its claims. The number of authors who have written against it is legion, but, to its great credit, the Book of Mormon has stood invincible against the onslaught of a thousand poison pens and has sustained its position as a "revealer of truth."

IT WAS PLAINLY OBVIOUS that no person, nor set of persons, could produce a history of ancient America with even a semblance of accuracy without having access to the actual facts. Exploration and research would prove such an attempt false in a thousand unmistakable instances. So, in view of the fact that the Book of Mormon was at variance with the popular thinking of that time—having portrayed civilizations that were not generally acceded to the earlier peoples of America and also having referred to the use of certain metals and domestic animals that were thought unknown to the New World, it seemed that here was the vulnerable point for attack, and it was over the differences between popular opinion and the claims of the Book of Mormon that the greater number of the book's critics launched their attack. It appeared that the authors of the Book of Mormon in their deviation from the beaten path had set and sprung their own trap and the enemies rushed blindly in for the kill. However, after the manner of the Arctic lemmings that swim out to sea in swarms and are drowned, the critics of the book soon found themselves in deep water, for the things which the scholars had not expected and the Book of Mormon had declared were eventually discovered to be true.

In the account of the Jaredite sojourn in the Western Hemisphere it is stated that there were horses and elephants here, and that they were used as beasts of burden by the early inhabitants.

And they also had horses, and asses, and there were elephants, and cureloms, and cumoms: all of which were useful unto man, and more especially the elephants, and cureloms, and cumoms.—Ether 4: 21.

As late as the year 1884, the Reverend Clark Braden, professor and champion debator of the Campbellite church, in a public discussion with Bishop E. L. Kelley at Kirtland, Ohio, declared:

We will now resume our analysis of the Book of Mormon. We are told on page 517 that the Asiatic horse, ox, and cow, the same blunder as in the case of the Nephites, the sheep, the ass, and swine were common in America thousands of years ago. Science declares that these species of animals were introduced by Columbus and his successors.—Braden and Kelley Debate, p. 140.

Again in 1912, the Reverend Bruce Kinney, D. D., superintendent of Baptist missions for the state of Utah, in his book, Mormonism, the Islam of America, still clings to the erroneous idea so universally shared at the time the Book of Mormon was published. On page 67, he states:

We have abundant evidence as to the fauna of this country, but there is not the slightest evidence for believing that previous to the coming of the Europeans there existed here any of our present domestic animals or even others at all similar.

Unless bigotry has sealed one's ears, he surely would be aware of the voice still speaking low out of the dust of ages past⁵ which bears witness of the truthfulness of the *Marvelous Work and a Wonder*⁶ which had its inception in the coming forth of the Book of Mormon. It is now known that North and South America was the home of many different species of horses. The fossils of nine different species which ranged over America have been discovered; from the fossilized remains, it would appear that they were at one time more plenteous than the bison that roamed in great herds over the western plains. Dr. J. Cossor Ewart, F.R.S., writing in the annual report of the Smithsonian Institute for 1904, page 437, says that it is generally admitted that the horse originated in the New World and emigrated to the Old over land bridges. The Encyclopedia Americana points out that the fossil remains of the horse have been found scattered over Nebraska, Oregon, South Carolina, Florida, Texas, Arizona, Kansas, Louisiana, and even Alaska. In fact, it states they are so often found in lake and river beds of the Pleistocene epoch that the formation in western United States has been named Equus Beds, which translated means "horse beds."—(See article, "Fossil Horses of the Age of Man," 1928 edition.)

THE THEORY that horses originated in America and found their way to Asia may very well be true and in no way conflicts with the Book of Mormon account, for there is no record of the Jaredites bringing them over on their trip from the Old World. The account merely says that after they were in this new land the space of sixty-two years, "they also had horses" (Ether 4: 19-21). The Nephite record states that upon their arrival they found these animals in the forest (1 Nephi 5: 216). We cannot be certain of where the horses originated but of one thing we can be sure; whether Braden and Kinney were aware of it or not, horses were here in America before Columbus and here in abundance.

America may well have been the home of the first elephants also, for scattered from the southwest throughout the entire United States and Alaska to the Arctic Ocean are found the fossilized remains of several species of extinct elephants. The Elephas Columbi, equal in size to the elephants now existing in India and Africa, ranged over the entire United States. Another species known as E. Imperator found in the southwestern United States was larger than elephants of today, being thirteen feet high at the shoulders. Then there was also the hairy species called "mammoth" by the Russians, who also found their remains in Siberia. Mammonteous Pre-megenius resembled the existing Indian elephant but had very long, upwardly curving tusks and a long, thick hairy coat. The imperial mammoth (Archidiskodon Imperator) of the American Pleistocene, is the largest known member of the elephant family, reaching a height of nearly fourteen feet. Another American elephant of the Pleistocene age was the Mastodon Americanus, which differed slightly from present elephants in the tooth structure. (See Encyclopedia Americana, article: "Elephants Fossil, also Mammoth," and Webster's Unabridged Dictionary words "elephant" and "mammoth.")

THE OBJECTION has been raised that the horse and the elephant, though perhaps once having inhabited America, were not coexistent with man and, therefore, the Book of Mormon account is false. However, if there is any solace in that position, it must be of short duration, for it has been conclusively proved by a great number of separate discoveries that man did live on the American continent during the same period as these animals, and that he hunted the animals for food. In a 1938 issue of American Weekly, there appeared a copyrighted article of considerable interest. The author submits the photos of reconstructed horses and elephants whose fossils have been found in America. His article, under the heading, "Who Was the First Woman in America?" contains the following statements:

Who were the first men in North America? When did they appear? Did they come from some place else, or did they evolve from local apes as was presumably the case in Asia? Such questions have been asked since the time of Columbus and have received a wide variety of answers. Today they are especially interesting because of recent scientific discoveries which bear upon them.

While excavating recently in Clovis, New Mexico, at a spot which thousands of years ago was a lake and is now a gravel pit, Dr. Edger B. Howard of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Science came upon the bones of an extinct variety of American elephant. A spear point found with the bones lent them far more significance than usually attaches to such relics.

Its position in contact with the elephant's leg bone indicated that the point had been used in an assault on the beast. . . . Other finds in New Mexico and Arizona of spear points and meat scrapers, exhibiting work similar to that of Dr. Howard's recent discovery and frequently buried along with the remains of such other extinct glacial period animals as small horses, one-humped camels, mastodons, bison, musk oxen, dire wolves and so on, prove conclusively that the man who threw the spear at the mammoth was not a unique specimen of his race; he was merely one of many men and presumably women and children who lived in North America while the last glaciers were melting.

Too many similar discoveries have been made to question its authenticity. In various localities, notably in gravel deposits at Frederick, Oklahoma, and Raton, New Mexico, human artifacts have been found associated with the skeletons of known Pleistocene period animals. Among these were mastodons, camels, ground sloths, glyptodons, horses, and elephants. Perhaps if we had only one instance to go by, we might question this, but similar relics have been found among the fossil bones of Pleistocene animals in at least fifty localities in North America. And in more than one case, as at Colorado, Texas, the flint weapons had obviously killed the creatures, some being within the skeletons and others embedded in the bones.

IN 1937, archaeologists searching a limestone cave near Albuquerque, New Mexico, came upon the claw of a giant sloth. Later they found evidences of campfires and weapons of man intermingled with camels and other prehistoric animals. This discovery labeled Sandia Man by Frank C. Hibben of the Museum of Anthropology, University of New Mexico, as described in the Scientific American for July, 1940, regards it as the greatest discovery of all time relating to coexistence of man and the horse and camels and mammoths. While the discovery in the past of spear and arrow heads intermingled with the bones of these prehistoric creatures has been so prolific as to satisfy some scientists of the presence of man with these beasts, yet some have been cautious lest earth disturbances and animals burrowing might have brought the bones and weapons together. The Sandia Man discovery definitely proves the former conclusions—that man was contemporaneous with these animals, since each successive age was sealed under its own crust or strata of limestone formed by the dripping of calcium carbonate from the cave ceiling.

Mr. Hibben says:

The Sandia cave, happily, is well stratified. On the top surface throughout the cave is a heavy deposit of dust, bat guano, and broken fragments fallen from the roof. Mingled with this dust at the front of the cave are fragments of pottery, baskets and yucca sandals of the pueblo era. Below the uppermost layer of dust is a crust of stalagmitic material some three to six inches thick. This records a period when the cave was wet and when water containing calcium carbonate in solution dripped from the ceiling and spread out over the cave floor in a sheet which was deposited as the water evaporated. Under ordinary conditions only a fraction of an inch of this material is formed in a century. More important than its possibilities of indicating age in the cave, it was effective in sealing in the deposits below it, and thus prevented any mixture of recent material with the ancient that lies beneath. Thus the remains of extinct mammals and the cultures which accompany them have been completely enclosed and unaffected by disturbing influences until the sledge and the pick of the archaeologist broke through.

Again he writes:

Gradually there has come to light a human story which could be pieced together from evidence gathered during the last three years in this cavern home. Here there was a fine hearth with the blackened fragments of a camel jaw beside it, though many thousands of years have elapsed since the camel, which originally evolved in the new world, was native to the south west. Dart points were scattered among the broken bones of the animals which had been killed. . . . At first it was thought that the Sandia evidence was only another phase of the Folsom, a variation of another tribe. Results of the latest digging have, however, given conclusive evidence of a group of men who hunted the green hills of New Mexico long before even Folsom man. These were contemporaneous of the mammoth and the mastodon and of the American horse and the camel and the savage predators who preyed upon them. Evidences of these earlier animals are not founded on guesswork or even on clues, but based on the science of stratigraphy.

Mr. Hibben concludes by saying:

That Sandia man lived, loved, hunted, and died in the time of the mammoth and sloth we now know. Perhaps the as yet unexcavated portions of the cave will answer the question of his appearance.

Headquarters Reports

on Wednesday night and did it very well. They have won the hearts of the people, and a good work awaits them.

Sunday night, Brother Scherer went with Brother Mosterdijk to preach at the new mission recently opened at Schiedam, using Brother Compier as interpreter. And Brother Theys addressed the young people of the Rotterdam Branch. The outlook here is indeed promising.

DEATH HAS taken a toll from the ranks of church men.

High Priest Earl F. Hoisington passed away October 25. He formerly served the church as a missionary in Europe. Elder D. A. Coleman of Mead, Washington, died on October 18.

Though he had reached his seventies, Brother Coleman gave splendid service to the church until the last.

JOHAN T. CONWAY reports the baptism of seven persons at Des Moines, Iowa, as a result of missionary cottage meetings. He is now conducting meetings at Knoxville, Iowa.

THE DEPARTMENT OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION officers have been very active in events away from headquarters. Dr. F. M. McDowell, John Darling, and Edna Easter were at Aurora, Illinois, October 24 to 26, where they conducted the second annual conference on religious education for three districts combined: Chicagoland, Northeast Illinois, and Wisconsin. Another large meeting was held at Flint, Michigan, for all districts in that state, October 31 to November 2. The theme was: "Building a more up-to-date youth program." Key workers from the districts attended. Emphasis was on the Zion's League Program, the Light of Life Award for girls, the God and Country Award for boys, camping, and improved teaching and leadership. . . . They report sales are going well on the first Zion's League Annual. . . . During the Christmas holidays there will be meetings for the Zion's League Advisory Council with the department, also the Religious Education Advisory Council Board. A major concern will be the church school curriculum. . . . Looking to the future, Dr. McDowell says that his department is working now on the schedule of the 1948 youth camps and that a search is being made for young people interested in leadership and staff work; officers of the department will visit Graceland College to contact students interested in this work. Plans are now being made also for the 1948 summer vacation schools, religious education conference, youth conferences, and educational activities at reunions.

EVANSVILLE, INDIANA, Branch celebrated its tenth anniversary with special services on October 18 and 19. It was organized October 3, 1937, by Apostle M. A. McConley and Elder J. O. Dutton. Through these years there has been a steady increase in membership and financial contributions. Today there are fifty-two members meeting in a building rented for the purpose. With many faithful members, the branch has good prospects. Apostle Maurice L. Draper, in charge of this area, reports his satisfaction with the good work being done.

APOSTLE MAURICE L. DRAPER reports a resurgence of missionary interest and vitality throughout the Southern Mission. The Mobile Branch is doing well this year under Elder A. O. Crownover. There are also good reports from the Arkansas and Louisiana district.

EUROPEAN RELIEF activity has grown to considerable proportions since it was begun under church supervision last March. Bishop G. L. DeLapp gave the following information, which was compiled by Bishop Harold Cackler, who was recently assigned to the supervision of this work.

From March to the end of October, 3,531 packages have been sent from the Auditorium to our members in Europe and England. Weights of the packages ranged from an average of 10.8 pounds in March to 14.6 pounds in October, and the cost of each package ranged during the same time from $2.73 to $3.69. The total money spent on the shipments was $12,415.23. This money was spent for postage and foodstuffs, as the clothing, which formed the principal part of the shipments, was donated. Total value of the packages would be much greater. This money came from the general oblation fund, which is intended for such purposes.

Packing of these shipments has been done at the Auditorium under the direction of L. R. Holmes. Clothing for European relief first goes to the Campus Shop (operated under the direction of Mrs. Russell Rowland), where it is sorted and reconditioned when necessary.

This report does not include the many packages that have been sent by individuals and groups throughout the church.

BISHOP D. O. CHESWORTH, in charge of church financial affairs in the North Atlantic States Mission, reports fine progress among the people of that area in the filing of inventories and payment of tithing, as a result of systematic visiting, counseling and instruction. Brother Chesworth finds the willingness of the people to respond very encouraging. Basing his appeal upon the power of example among branches and local leaders, and upon a genuine spiritual ministry, he finds the members answering the call of the church in increasing numbers.

HARRY SIMONS, at Flint, Michigan, reports three persons baptized on October 12, and two more ready for a later date.

James Menzies, who was transferred from Saskatchewan to the St.

Louis district, has baptized fifteen people during three missionary series of services.

James Daugherty has been doing excellent work among the members in Wisconsin, and has lately been engaged in missionary activity at Lancaster.

Fifty have been baptized in the East Central States in the last two months. This area is under the direction of Apostle Arthur A. Oakman.

L. L.

WE WISH to pass on to the people of the church in America the heartfelt thanks of our people in Europe who have been the recipients of the contributions of food and clothing which have been made. We receive many letters from them, acknowledging receipt of the packages and stating that words cannot express their appreciation. The contributions have literally meant life to many of these people.

The co-operation of the membership throughout the church has been splendid on this program. However, we would like to call to your attention some very important ways in which you can be of further assistance.

1. Be sure that all clothing contributions are sent to the CAMPUS SHOP, 406 South Pleasant Street, Independence, Missouri.
2. Make sure that clothing sent in is CLEANED and MENDED, and that there is a SIZE TAG attached to each garment.

This will not involve a great amount of work for each group or individual, but when the total of these contributions converge into one place without the above-mentioned work having been done, it creates a tremendous task.

We feel it is imperative that the clothing we send to Europe is in good usable condition because in most instances the recipients do not have the necessary material to do the mending. The attaching of a size tag to each garment by the contributor will expedite handling and greatly reduce the sorting work at the Campus Shop.

Your co-operation in these matters will be an added contribution of great value.

H. W. CACKLER, Bishop,
For the Presiding Bishopric

Lapses*

Lapsus Linguae is Latin for "slip of the tongue." I do not know what a slip of the pencil would be in Latin. Howsoever it came about, I am wondering, out here in Oregon, if, and how, if so, I called the home of Brother and Sister Chester Gray at Jonesport, "Gray's Tavern," in a recent travelog. My memory fails me. Likely it was Gray's Inn. I cannot check out here. I make haste to get this note in the hands of Editor Lea, so if I am guilty of any sort of a faux pas, I now make the amende honorable.

To some, tavern means only a hotel. To others, it means something more. Tavern or inn, the Gray establishment is certainly "tops," using a well-known expression. And I trust I may some day again walk among the wonderful people at Jonesport and hold up my head, conscious that if any wrong was done it was entirely unintentional and has been charged to inadvertence.

ISRAEL A. SMITH

*(In "Travelog" on page 4 of the issue of October 25, President Smith used the word "tavern" which was misunderstood by some of our readers. His note refers to this passage.)

Knows the Difference

From the Scottish Rite News Bulletin for August 5, 1947, we cull the following:

Mormons Re-enact Exodus from Nauvoo, Illinois

On July 15, 1947, there set out from the town of Nauvoo, Illinois, a caravan of 72 autos with 148 persons in all. The autos were rigged up with plywood and canvas to represent prairie schooners and with plywood oxen in front, and were headed for Salt Lake City just as their ancestors were 100 years ago—only then it was in winter with snow and sleet to face, and a hostile populace driving them out. After weary weeks of travel and endless discouragements in 1847, the Mormons reached what is now Garden Grove, Iowa—but now with modern hard-surfaced roads, up-to-the-minute autos, and a friendly countryside instead of a hostile one, the caravan made that city in one day. They reached Salt Lake City on July 22 or exactly 100 years after Brigham Young exclaimed, "This is the Place," as he looked from his sick cot in a covered wagon and saw a desert region in the Great Basin, to which hundreds of other pioneers en route to Oregon and California had refused to pay any heed, but which the Mormons in a century have turned into a vast empire.

E. Cecil McGavin, writing of The Mormon Pioneers, quotes Brigham Young as remarking to Col. Thomas L. Kane, at their first meeting on the Missouri: "We intend settling in the Rocky Mountains, within the basin of the Great Salt Lake or Bear River Valley, believing that to be a point where a good living will require hard labor and consequently will be coveted by no other people, while it is surrounded by so unpopulous but fertile country."

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints located in Salt Lake City now has about a million members scattered throughout the United States and other parts of the globe. Brigham Young was its head, and the descendants of Hyrum Smith, brother of the Prophet Joseph Smith, joined this group. The posterity of Joseph Smith are affiliated with the Reorganized Church with headquarters at Independence, Missouri, and its membership is about 110,000.¹ The Church of Christ (Temple Lot), also with its headquarters at Independence, has some 2,000 members, while at Monongahela City, Pennsylvania, the Church of Jesus Christ has around 2,000 members, mostly Italians or Americans of Italian descent.

The Reorganized Church at Independence does not believe in polygamy and never did, and this was the main reason for the split with the members of the Latter Day Saints who went to Utah.

The Utah Mormons are not permitted to become Freemasons, though the Independence, Missouri, group has a goodly number of members who are Freemasons. The head of the Church at Independence is a 32nd Degree Mason and active in the Fraternity.²—S. W.

The Christian way of life is not that of outer controls, but of inner direction.

What Latter Day Saints Believe

WHEN A MAN is brought into court, one of the first things the court considers is whether or not the accused was a free agent, accountable for his deeds at the time he committed the crime. If the accused can prove that he was insane or mentally incompetent at the time the crime was perpetrated, he cannot be punished for the crime, although he may be confined as a dangerous lunatic. In the case of many crimes and misdemeanors, ignorance of the exact provisions of the law excuses a violation of that law. For example, if no signs are posted giving speed limits and parking restrictions (which vary in different sections of the city) a driver can hardly be held responsible if he unwittingly breaks one of the laws governing speed or parking.

A third factor very often considered in a trial court is the degree of will exercised in the commission of the crime. Other things being equal, the punishment will be more severe if the crime has been willful, deliberate, and premeditated, than if it has been committed in the heat of passion or on the spur of the moment. Or in other words, the degree of free moral will or agency exercised has a great deal to do with the degree of guilt punishable in the case of any certain crime.

THE DOCTRINE of man's free moral will or agency is one of the most important, and in some respects the most important doctrine in all of our Christian theology. Even if we would place in first importance the fact of Christ's divinity, it would be within a man's power of agency to reject the atonement of Christ, and in his own case at least, render the fact of Christ's divinity of no avail. The idea of free moral will or agency is of primary importance, then, in any consideration of doctrine. And Latter Day Saints believe that in the Book of Mormon, and in the revelations given through Joseph Smith and contained in our Book of Doctrine and Covenants, we have additional basis for a firm belief in the doctrine of free moral will or agency. In some respects, the Bible is vague on this doctrine, but in the other two books mentioned, free moral will or agency is taught clearly and unequivocally.

For example, let us go back to that period of time preceding the creation of the earth. The Bible mentions, almost incidentally, a great war in heaven, in which Lucifer, Son of the Morning, and one third of the hosts of heaven were cast out. That indicates first that there was free moral will or agency among the spirits of men in their preworldly existence. But do you know what that war in heaven was about? Section 28 of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants gives what seems to us to be an adequate reason—that Satan rebelled, and sought the honor and power of God for himself. In the Inspired Version of the Bible, as corrected by Joseph Smith, the third chapter of Genesis adds to that an even more important reason. Lucifer wanted to come to earth as God's son. His plan was to destroy the agency of men, and force them to be saved whether they chose to be or not, and by that means to gain God's honor and glory for himself. Christ offered to redeem mankind in God's way, by giving each man his agency, with no thought of glory for himself. That was the difference of opinion that caused a war in heaven. So, you see that the clash of the two ideologies—dictatorship and democracy—is older than the world itself.

WHEN THE EARTH was created, and man and woman placed upon it, this principle of agency was again stated. God commanded man to be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; to have dominion over the fish of the sea and the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moves upon the face of the earth. He was placed in a garden, and commanded to dress it and tend it. Man was designed to have dominion over everything in the earth—mineral, animal, or vegetable; and he was to have dominion over himself. As the Book of Mormon phrases it in several passages, he was created to act, and not to be acted upon—he was not to be pushed around as a blind, helpless puppet by blind purposeless forces, but he was to have the power to rule over and dominate his environment, and make of it what he would within the limits set by the Creator.

Agency was granted to our first parents. They were told what they might do; the two ways were shown to them, with the results accruing to each—life if they obeyed, and death if they disobeyed. They were not forcibly prevented from a wrong choice; they had their agency. They had knowledge of what God had commanded and what he had forbidden; and they had the power to choose for themselves. It was by using his agency that man fell in the beginning. It is by using his free moral will and agency that he still falls today.

Cain and Abel also exercised their agency. A choice was presented to them with the admonition, "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? but if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door." Abel chose to do well, and Cain chose to commit the first murder—each by exercising his own free moral agency.

ON MANY OCCASIONS, a choice was given to the Israelites. God promised in the twenty-sixth chapter of Leviticus that if they would hearken and do his commandments, they would receive rain in due season, and their trees should bring forth fruit. But if they did not obey, there would be terror, consumption, and burning. Deuteronomy contains many such contrasting promises—life and good, death and evil—blessing and curse—and warns the people that it is their privilege to choose. Joshua, in a time of increasing idolatry appealed to them to “Choose ye this day whom ye will serve.” There was no compulsion—only free agency to do as they pleased, with promises attending the right choice, and dire forebodings and warnings of what was to follow the wrong choice.

WHY DO WE Latter Day Saints believe that this doctrine of agency is so important? There are four principal reasons, which we perhaps have already hinted at in passing, but which we should now examine in some detail. First, when God created man, he created him in the image of Himself. He made him a little lower than the angels, and gave him glory, and honor, and dominion over the works of the divine hand. God was not creating a toy, or a puppet to jerk on a string, but a creature who could be like himself, who could partake of his intelligence and his glory, who could return his Creator's love. Love cannot be forced. True fellowship, where mind meets mind, cannot be forced or coerced. It has to be free. Therefore God made man free to choose for himself, intelligent enough to know right from wrong, and capable of fellowship with his Creator if he chose.

THE SECOND REASON for free agency in man is that character can be developed only by choice. The old method of trial and error is still the method we very frequently have to use to determine just what is the best method of procedure. That is not to say that we have to learn everything by trial and error. Instinct or reason can sometimes tell us in advance what the result of a certain action is bound to be. We have the advice and the example of others who have tried and found out. We have the commands of God and the distilled wisdom of all the human race as recorded in history. With all these it should not be necessary for us to keep on making the same old errors over and over. But we may choose to do so, if we will.

There is a positive, as well as a negative side to this matter of developing character through free moral will, or agency. Other things being equal, who gets farther in the world—the man who waits to be told what to do in the most insignificant situation, or the man who can move out on his own, plan his course of action, venture into new fields, making his choices as he goes? The answer I believe is obvious. This principle is set forth in a passage from the fifty-eighth section of our Doctrine and Covenants, which reads: “It is not meet that I should command in all things, for he that is compelled in all things, the same is a slothful and not a wise servant; wherefore, he receiveth no reward. Verily I say, men should be anxiously engaged in a good cause, and do many things of their own free will, and bring to pass much righteousness, for the power is in them, wherein they are agents unto themselves. . . . And inasmuch as men do good, they shall in no wise lose their reward. But he that doeth not anything until he is commanded, and receiveth a commandment with doubtful heart, and keepeth it with slothfulness, the same is damned.”

THE THIRD REASON for man's free moral will and agency is that such agency is essential to accountability. Only a fool would bestow his love, his fellowship, his esteem on a machine which could run only as it had been constructed to run.

Only a fool would lavish gifts or rewards on that machine because it had performed its duties well. Only a fool would lose his temper and kick or beat a machine in punishment if it failed to run. Only a foolish God would reward a man who couldn't help doing good; and only a fiendish God would punish a man for sin that he was compelled or forced to do. To vindicate God's judgment, to make man accountable for the things he does, and deserving of either reward or punishment, free moral agency is necessary. That places the responsibility squarely on man, and not on his Creator, for he has intelligence to know right from wrong, and he may act for himself. He is not a blind, helpless creature who can only be acted upon by outside, uncontrollable forces. He is the master of his own fate, and the captain of his own soul, by reason of his inalienable right of choice.

THE FOURTH REASON for free agency in man is closely bound up with our American beliefs in democracy and freedom and the functions of government. Agency and choice are essential to freedom. A man who is forced to make his decision, who has no choice, is a slave. He cannot be held legally or morally accountable for his actions if they are forced upon him from without, against his will. Speaking to this church through Joseph Smith in a revelation of 1833, God said that his hand had been in the making of the Constitution and the laws of this nation, that men's rights might be protected, and “that every man may act in doctrine, and principle pertaining to futurity, according to the moral agency which I have given unto them, that every man may be accountable for his own sins in the day of judgment. Therefore, it is not right that any man should be in bondage one to another. And for this purpose have I established the constitution of this land, by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood.”

The dictator decides what is good for himself, and all under his power, and forces compliance with his will. The slave holder may require his slave to do that which the slave believes to be morally wrong, but which he may not refuse to do. Therefore, the best reason in the world for religious and political freedom—and for economic and intellectual and all other kinds of freedom—is that man’s agency must never be destroyed. Latter Day Saints therefore believe that it is a religious, as well as a civic duty, to support and uphold the government which guaranteed and protects this freedom; to help in selecting by ballot the men who will implement and extend this freedom; to respect and, if necessary, defend the constitutional law which is the charter of our liberty.

MAN IS, THEN, a free moral agent. He is free to choose for himself. He is responsible for his own acts. He will be rewarded with the fruits of his own choices and acts—good for good, evil for evil; for that is the law of Nature, the law of life, the law of God. Not only this day, but every day, and every moment of every day, we must choose whom we would serve, exercising our God-given agency, using our God-given intelligence in determining what our choice shall be, standing or falling by the result of those choices, both in time and in eternity.

A Time for Faith

IN THE INFINITE wisdom and perfect understanding of God, it was seen that we mortals, young and old, should have certain experiences that would stabilize us and act as an anchor to our souls, so that our faith would remain steadfast regardless of what might happen to us.

To this end and for this purpose, the Master has promised that if any man shall do the will of the Father, he has a right to know of the doctrine, to know that God lives, and that the gospel is true. This is brought about through the work of the Holy Spirit. There are many so-called believers of Christianity who do not believe in the virgin birth of Jesus, nor in the literal resurrection of the body, nor in many of the beautiful principles of truth given by the Master. Because their human wisdom does not permit an explanation of these things, they deny them. Christ foresaw this, and he promised that when the spirit of truth should come, it would testify of him. That is to say, the spirit of truth will bestow upon all who receive, the positive knowledge that Jesus is the Christ and the gospel in all its parts is true.

Our church was founded upon the rock of God’s revealed truth. There is nothing in all the world that can take the place of that rock in our lives.

Let us then come and stand upon that rock, and, in so doing, we shall never be moved from our place. Our faith will not then be standing in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. The ancient worthies stood upon that rock. That is why they were able to say, as did Job, “I know that my redeemer liveth.” The Spirit of God had manifested to Job that his body would be redeemed from the powers of the grave, and that he would stand with Christ upon the earth in the latter days. Paul had the same experience so that he could joyfully exclaim, “O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?”

By Lewis Herbst

The claim of our church has ever been that God remains the same throughout the ages. That being true, his spirit remains the same and will do for us exactly as it did for the holy men of old if we will give it place in our lives. It is evident that we are living in a time when everything that can be shaken is being shaken. Surely, then, we need to be ready and grounded in the truth, to be stabilized in the faith of Jesus Christ our Lord.

Good—But Not Perfect

A recent incident recalled to my memory a striking thought I once read in one of Grace Richmond’s wholesome novels.

The circumstance was this: A stern doctor, adverse to the church—or rather to the hypocrisy of so many formal believers—had, through his intimate association with a new minister, whose genuine ministry had broken down the barrier, offered himself to the church. Fellow townsmen and trustees of the church were incredulous yet, knowing the sterling integrity of the man, they could not attribute his action to hypocrisy or other low motives. They could not turn him down. (I quote):

“So they accepted Red, the doctor, as well they might, though he was as far from being a saint as anyone of themselves, or ever would be one, while he remained under the stars. The church militant is no place for saints, only for human beings who would keep one another company on a difficult road—and the company of One who went before and knows all the hardships—and the glories of the way.”

What Price Zion?

By ROBERT J. MILLER

“ZION THE BEAUTIFUL Beckons Us On” is a song all Saints love to sing, and rightly so, for it embraces in its verses the purpose, desire, and fondest ambitions of the disciples of Christ. Zion—the city of the pure in heart, where the will of God is obeyed with enthusiasm. Zion—the city of prosperity, where there are no poor and needy, no filth and rags, no sorrow or pain, no arrogant rich or vain and selfish people. These things the followers of the Master look forward to with keen anticipation.

And yet, over one hundred years ago, Christ spoke to this people and told them Zion could have been redeemed even then were it not for the transgressions of the Saints. To quote:

Behold, I say unto you, Were it not for the transgressions of my people, speaking concerning the church and not individuals, they might have been redeemed even now; but, behold, they have not learned to be obedient to the things which I require at their hands, but are full of all manner of evil, and do not impart of their substance, as becometh saints, to the poor and afflicted among them, and are not united according to the union required by the law of the celestial kingdom; and Zion can not be built up unless it is by the principles of the law of the celestial kingdom, otherwise I cannot receive her unto myself; and my people must needs be chastened until they learn obedience, if it must needs be, by the things which they suffer.—Doctrine and Covenants 102: 2.

FROM THIS, we are assured there is no definite time for Zion to be established. God has not said, “I command you to establish Zion at such and such a time.” Yet he has set a time for its establishment—not in point of years, but in point of human behavior. We, the children of God, can have Zion whenever we want it enough to follow the pattern Christ gave us; whenever we ourselves appoint the time for its founding by righteous conduct. Inspired by the love of God in our hearts, and sustained and guided by the fellowship of his holy spirit, we will, when that day comes, obey his word.

Of a surety, Zion will not come so long as we withhold our goods from those in need and place our trust in the power of money more than in the power of God. Neither will it come so long as we compromise with worldly things. We cannot have Zion until we willingly surrender the things we now love which are detrimental to a fullness of life.

We believe in Zion, but it is a sad fact that we are not yet ready for it. We have not worked hard enough at our belief to desire it with all our hearts. The realization will never come to us as a lukewarm or double-minded people. We cannot serve God and Mammon and have Zion. A zeal such as the Master had must be ours if we hope to see our affairs shaping themselves into a Holy City.

JOHN THE BELOVED, John the Baptist, Paul the Apostle, Joseph the Seer, and many others in their appointed day experienced a zeal and high resolve which caused them to “present themselves a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable, unto God, . . . not conformed to the things of this world, but transformed by the renewing of their minds,” and by such service, such personal stewardship, they were able “to prove what that good, acceptable, and perfect will of God” is.

We are invited to study an account of their lives graven in the records of immortal history and seek to understand the things that inspired their devotion and drove them relentlessly toward the goal they sought. And, in such study and meditation, we may hope to find inspiration to lift us out of the sordid surroundings we have helped to create, placing us on a higher plane where we shall have clearer vision to guide our footsteps to the heights.

The price of Zion is high, not because it is so precious, but because we find ourselves so poor in godly things—in the coin of the heavenly realm. It is high because we have elected to reach it by the “things which we suffer.”

GOD HAS ENDOWED each of us with agency and reason. He has given us the mental powers to reason this thing out. We have reasoned and are agreed that sin must be cast out, and that—supplanting it—the love of God must reign in our hearts, if we are to have Zion. We have perceived the need for it and are sure of the blessings it will bring, yet we choose to discard reason and cling to the things our animal senses crave and our vanity desires. We have elected to learn by the things which we suffer—the pain of war, hunger, disease, strikes, and hatreds. We have not placed our trust in God.

We hear a lot about vanishing frontiers, yet the greatest frontier of them all is ahead of us—the frontier of Zion. It beckons us, just as the country west of the Appalachians did the colonists in Daniel Boone's day, and as the plains and Rocky Mountains did in the days when Independence was the "jumping off" place.

Talk to an old frontiersman or his good wife and ask them the price of settling in a new country—of advancing the frontier. You know the answer without my telling you. It means good-by to loved ones, breaking old ties, facing a new life—but with a great hope to spur the pioneer on. It means trusting others in the group; it means sacrifice, courage, patience, faith and vision—with some bloodshed along the way. It means gambling with life for things that are believed to be worth more than existence.

THE FRONTIER OF ZION demands all this of those who would be disciples for Christ—and somewhat more. It demands, first of all, a firm belief in God and in the word Christ gave; it calls for trust in God and the willingness to obey; it requires highest allegiance to the Master, even though it necessitates leaving family and friends. It means trusting and helping fellow travelers along the way. It demands sacrifice, courage, loyalty, patience, and perseverance. All this and more—for it demands complete victory over one's self—the ability to love God with all one's heart, mind, and soul, and the ability to love friend and enemy as one's self.

No other frontier asks so much, for on all others the passions, desires, and whims of men defeat their best purposes. On this one, there is freedom directed by a great sense of responsibility—flexibility for the individual within a framework of principles and ideals. No other frontier offers eternal rewards or a fullness of spiritual power.

The price of Zion is not too high.

THE REVEREND SHOOK in his book, Cumorah Revisited, seems to have informed himself better than most Book of Mormon critics since he acknowledges the fact that there were these animals in the new world contemporaneously with man, but he takes a position that it was not with the civilizations mentioned in the Book of Mormon.

A massive earthen mound, 140 feet long and seventy-two feet wide is situated near Wyalusing, Wisconsin. Its resemblance to a huge elephant has caused it to be identified from other mounds by the name "Elephant Mound." It indicates that at a time when the inhabitants were sufficiently civilized and organized to construct extensive and imposing structures, many of which have survived for centuries, they had a knowledge of the elephant.

THE EARTH gradually gives up her secrets that have been hidden for centuries, and although the Book of Mormon has been measured by a yardstick that is exacting, it has been found correct in every instance. Though often it has been assailed by men not too well informed, nor too particular of the facts, it has completely vindicated itself and demonstrated the fact that truth has nothing to fear, either from the errors or willful deception of men. It may be eclipsed for a time by the clouds of falsehood, but it will eventually penetrate the darkness and shine forth in all its splendor. As time goes on, truth will continue to spring forth from the earth⁷ adding greater proofs to the divinity of the Book of Mormon which declares that God is not a God of one race alone, but of all the peoples of the earth.⁸

A Musical Setting of the Christmas Story

By
GOLDIE
GRAHAM
ZION

First presentation: By the choir of Liberty Street Church, Independence, Missouri, Ora Beardsley, Director and Narrator; Charles F. Church, Jr., Choir Director, December 22, 1946.

Description of the Decorations

THE familiar, old, red brick Liberty Street Church in itself invites peaceful worship; but with the effort of the capable vice-president of the choir, Mrs. Julia West, the presentation of the Christmas story was made beautiful and sacred.

Garlands of fir boughs with bright-colored balls and lights around the church door upon which a holly wreath hung, cordially invited both young and old to come inside and worship.

Inside, beneath soft yellow lights, a beautifully decorated, lighted eight-foot Christmas tree took one back to the happy expectant feeling everyone has at the time of the year to commemorate the birth of our Master. In front of the altar, palms, ferns, and lively red poinsettia gave a fitting setting for the choir which was to furnish the music.

The baptismal font, later in the presentation to be the manger scene, was outlined with fir boughs, bright balls, and bells. The manger scene was perfected by appropriately costumed Wise Men, kings, and the beautiful Mary with her babe in a real manger bed of hay.

The special lighting system consisted of the large red candles, fitted in fir boughs and tied in the center with huge red bows, placed in the side windows. Only these candles, the soft lights of the Christmas tree, and the overhead yellow lights were used. When the manger scene came into view, special lights were thrown upon the characters, which made the on-lookers feel the full beauty of the birth of the Saviour of man.

GOD SO LOVED THE WORLD

Choir: (In back hall, "O Little Town of Bethlehem," No. 144, verses 1, 2, 4).

Choir: (In back hall, "Silent Night," No. 147, verses 1, 2, 3, then hum once).

Choir: Processional, "Adeste Fideles," No. 145, verses 1, 2, 3.

Narrator:

'Tis an old, old story, yet ever so new
This story of our Saviour's birth,
A story loved by all—the ages through,
On this beautiful, good old earth.

For through the years, both rich and poor,
Have worshiped this King of kings,
The Son of God in the manger is born,
While rejoicing angels sing.

'Tis Christmas time—ah, let's put aside
All the cares of the world we bear,
And sing the glad song of the Yuletide—
Let's one happy hour together share.

Choir: "Blest Be Thou, O God of Israel," No. 121, verse 1, then hum very softly behind.

Narrator:

All through the study of our Bible, our Book of Mormon, and our latter-day revelations, we see the great love of God for mankind manifested. Yea, everything from the beginning of creation was made by the Great Creator for the good of man. Man's every want was provided for in the material and spiritual way. The need of every living creature on the face of the earth was in the mind of the loving God from the beginning, even until now.

But man has not always been obedient and appreciative to the will of that loving Father. Man became sinful, indifferent, and willful. Thus he went into transgression, and became in a lost or fallen state.

A sad state, indeed, but again the wonderful, tender, and merciful love of the great Creator was made manifest.

Seeing the condition of man, and still desiring his salvation, God so loved him that he provided a way whereby his sins would be forgiven. He chose to send his beloved Son, Jesus the Christ, into the world, to live, to die, and to rise from the dead, that man might live eternally.

God chose a maiden, dear to his heart and pure in his sight, to be made the earthly mother of this precious gift to mankind, and thus the Scripture reads:

And in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God, unto the city of Galilee, named Nazareth, to a virgin, espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary.

And the angel came in unto her and said, Hail, thou virgin, who art highly favoured of the Lord. The Lord is with thee, for thou art chosen and blessed among women.

And when she saw the angel, she was troubled at his saying, and pondered in her mind what manner of salutation this should be.

But the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favour with God.

And behold thou shalt conceive, and bring forth a son, and shall call his name Jesus.

He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David.

And he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end.

Then said Mary unto the angel, How can this be?

And the angel answered and said unto her, Of the Holy Ghost, and the power of the Highest. Therefore also, that holy child that shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.

Choir: "To Us a Child of Hope Is Born," No. 140, verses 1, 2, 3.

Narrator:

Behold, on this continent, the coming of Christ was prophesied, as recorded in our Book of Mormon, 600 years before his birth.

It was due to the continued wickedness of the people that God raised up prophets among them to tell them of his coming.

Choir: "Hark, Ye Mortals," No. 407, verse 1, changing to verse 4 at fifth measure.

Narrator:

And it came to pass there was one Samuel, a Lamanite, who came into the land of Zarahemla, and began preaching repentance unto the people.

And they cast him out and he was about to return to his own land. But behold, the voice of the Lord came unto him, that he should remain and prophesy unto the people whatsoever things should come into his heart.

And it came to pass that they would not suffer that he enter into the city; therefore he stood upon the wall thereof, and stretched forth his hand and cried with a loud voice, and prophesied unto the people whatsoever things the Lord put into his heart.

And he said unto them, Behold, I, Samuel, a Lamanite, do speak words of the Lord which he doth put into my heart; and behold, he hath put it into my heart to say unto this people that the Lord Jesus Christ shall surely come unto the world and shall suffer many things, and shall be slain for his people. And behold, an angel of the Lord has declared it unto me, and did bring glad tidings to my soul.

And I was sent to declare it unto you also, that ye might have glad tidings.

Choir: Anthem, "God So Loved the World," Stainer.

Narrator:

Now it came to pass that the ninety and first year had passed away; and it was 600 years from the time that Lehi left Jerusalem.

And in the commencement of the ninety and second year, behold the prophecies of the prophets began to be fulfilled, for there were greater signs and greater miracles wrought among the people.

But there were some who said that the time was past for the words to be fulfilled, which were spoken by Samuel, the Lamanite.

And they began to rejoice over their brethren, saying, Behold, the time is past, and the words of Samuel are not fulfilled; therefore, your joy and your faith concerning this thing hath been in vain.

Now it came to pass that there was a day set apart by the unbelievers that all those who believed in those traditions should be put to death, except the sign should come to pass which had been given by Samuel, the prophet.

Choir: "Angels From the Realms of Glory," No. 135, verses 1, 2, 3.

Narrator:

Now when Nephi, the son of Nephi, saw this wickedness of his people, his heart was exceedingly sorrowful. And he went out and bowed himself down upon the earth, and cried mightily to God, in behalf of his people; those who were about to be destroyed because of their faith in the traditions of their fathers.

Yea, he cried mightily unto the Lord, all that day; and behold, the voice of the Lord came unto him, saying, Lift up your head and be of good cheer, for behold the time is at hand, and on this night shall the sign be given.

And on the morrow come I into the world, to show unto the world that I will fulfill all that which I have caused to be spoken by the mouth of my holy prophets.

And behold, the time is at hand, and this night shall the sign be given.

Choir: "Star of the East," Kennedy.

Narrator:

And it came to pass that the words which came unto Nephi were fulfilled, according as they had been spoken; for behold, at the going down of the sun, there was no darkness when the night came.

And many who had not believed the words of the prophets, fell to the earth, and became as if they were dead, for they knew that the great plan of destruction which they had laid for those who believed in the words of the prophets had been frustrated, for the sign which had been given was already at hand; and they began to know that the Son of God must shortly appear.

Yea, in fine, all the people upon the face of the whole earth, from the west to the east, both in the land north and in the land south, were so exceedingly astonished, that they fell to the earth;

And it came to pass that the sun did rise in the morning again, according to its proper order, and lo, there had been no darkness in all that night, but it was as light as though it was midday; and they knew that it was the day that the Lord should be born, because of the sign which had been given.

Choir: "The First Noel," No. 146, verses 1, 2.

Narrator:

Now, behold, in Jerusalem at this time it came to pass that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all his empire should be taxed.

And Joseph also went up from Galilee into Judea unto the city of David which is called Bethlehem, to be taxed, with Mary his espoused wife, she being great with child.

And so it was, that while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered.

And she brought forth her firstborn son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes and laid him in a manger, because there was none to give room for them in the inn.

Choir: "Away in a Manger," No. 149, verse 1, then hum once (while curtains of manger scene open), then sing verse 2.

Narrator:

And there were in the same country, shepherds abiding in the fields, keeping watch over their flocks by night.

And lo, an angel of the Lord appeared unto them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they were sore afraid.

Choir: "While Shepherds Watched Their Flocks," No. 139, verses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

Narrator:

But the angel said unto them, Fear not, for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord. And this is the way you shall find the babe, he is wrapped in swaddling clothes and is lying in a manger.

Choir: "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing," No. 136, verses 1, 2, 3.

Narrator:

And it came to pass, when the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, "Let us now go, even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord has made known unto us."

And they came with haste, and found Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger.

Choir: Anthem, "Lo, How a Rose E'er Blooming," Praetorius.

Narrator:

And when they had seen, they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child.

And they who heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds.

But Mary kept all these things and pondered them in her heart.

And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all the things which they had heard and seen, as they were manifested unto them.

Narrator:

And behold, there was a man at Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon; and the same man was just and devout waiting for the consolation of Israel; and the Holy Ghost was upon him.

And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death before he had seen the Lord's Christ.

And he came by the Spirit into the temple; and when the parents brought the child, even Jesus, to do for him after the custom of the law, Simeon took him up in his arms and blessed God, and said, "Lord, now lettest thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word.

For mine eyes have seen thy salvation,

"God and Country" Scout Program

IN THE Herald of October 18 (page 15) we published an article on the "God and Country" Scout program for church boys, giving information about one of our fine young men of the church at Brewton, Alabama. We are sorry we did not at that time have information concerning the other young church member, John Coley Gowey. Further information has now been received, and we are glad to add it to that already published.

John Gowey has a reputation as a devoted member of the church, a hard worker, sincere in his purposes. He has attended the last two General Conferences, where he worked to build the record and win his award. He is one of the few away from the center place to receive the "God and Country Award." He is sixteen years of age, a first class Scout, and has given fine service to the church in many ways. He is a member of the Mobile Branch.

Which thou hast prepared before the face of all people.

A Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people, Israel."

Our Democratic Society By Kleta Finley

IT IS APPARENT as one looks around the world that a basic human problem today is that of government. We see our Russian brother attacking the problem with a fifteen-year experimentation set up according to Communistic ideology. We saw our Italian and German brothers try to order themselves and their societies by Fascistic principles, and we have seen them fail to accomplish what they desire for the individual and society.

Every member of the human family has the same basic needs and wants. Neither individually nor collectively can one person live without other persons; nor without food, clothing, shelter, work, play, love—nor without government. Various ideologies have selected one need as being of greater importance than another and attempted to organize proper government around it. To the Fascist, politico-economic security was the important thing, while to the Communist, proper economic organization and relations will solve the problem of government. All have tried and failed, or are failing, to achieve their goal of good government. To us it seems perfectly clear that life individually and collectively is made up of many facets, those basic ones mentioned above plus all the other interests a growing individual or society can understand and assimilate, and that when either lets one facet dominate all others, both society and the person fail to grow and ultimately die. Such is a principle of the universe. Were the flower to say, "It is most important that I get food; all my energy shall go to extracting food from the soil; I shall live for food only," that need would soon be filled, its life realized, and its end accomplished. Or the converse would occur. But the good life, or good government that men want is not so simple an achievement. It must recognize the many differences as important to the individual and to society. So we find democratic government continuing, growing up and out, reaching its roots deeper into the souls of men, liberating and integrating them into a scheme of life which they are making. Not simple, not easy, not achieved, but challenging, vital, and ever to be achieved.

DEMOCRACY has been called a "way of life" and rightly so. Life, of course, is more than food or clothing, so it follows that any government which seeks to build on but one of these many facets of life is doomed to a very brief existence.

The democratic way came with the beginning of human existence. Adam and Eve chose and took the consequence of their choice together. Being born into the human family places the responsibility of "choice" upon each of us. By this token, too, we see that God requires us to do our own choosing; he will not choose for us. Always it remains for man to accept or reject—to choose for himself. Between Adam's time and that of Christ's, people went through the same process of choosing, consciously or otherwise, a type of government according to their needs or values placed on those needs. Through various types of totalitarian attempts, they sensed the need of a new kind of government. Hebrew literature for centuries anticipated the coming of one who could show the people how to satisfy their re-evaluated needs. They, too, had tried all but the democratic approach to the problem. They had set one group against another to achieve, by war, a unified, stable society maintained by coercion and handed status quo to the next generation—if it lasted that long. It was not apparent to them that such a government could have no life or continuity since it was contrary to a fundamental principle of the universe—that man is an individual and responsible for his choices. Of course, the proof was before them, but, steeped in the "status quo" philosophy, their perception and insight negated a philosophy that valued individual differences.

WHEN RECOGNITION of the individual and the many facets of the good life as the determining factor of good government were presented and exemplified by their Messiah, only a few were courageous enough to leave the traditions, think honestly, and act accordingly for self and society. Again, the democratic way of life was tried to a degree and to a certain extent. But, because it demands intelligence, choice, and constant re-evaluation, it waned with the passing of the next few centuries and man again tried various totalitarian ideas in an attempt to make a start toward what he most wanted. Each group followed the same pattern of thinking. Each though his the one and only, eliminating opposition by coercion and limiting the group for purposes of control; such societies existed only until a stronger group overcame them.

Individual differences was a problem too big to cope with. All persons had to be alike, sometimes one way, sometimes another, but of the same mold. Historically, we can see the rise and fall of various societies following this pattern all around the world—our country included.

While our early settlers came with the germ of a democratic philosophy in their values, they began to practice totalitarian philosophy: all must be Baptists, all must be land owners, all must be white, etc. But the germ grew, and soon those desiring for themselves the democratic way of life had to recognize that what they wanted would have to be granted others also in order for them to have any at all. So freedom was born. Through the growing pains of many interpretations, it has come to us as the cornerstone of the democratic way of life. However, it requires constant re-evaluation to have meaning and value. The philosophy is sound, squaring with the basic principles of the universe—those of individual worth and individual responsibility for choice—and, if our re-interpretations can become sound, the satisfaction man seeks can be achieved.

THE DEMOCRATIC WAY of life requires vision and faith. The vision consists of seeing that alone man can do little or nothing, but that, co-operating with other free men, good can accrue to each individually and collectively. The vision requires faith sufficient to practice such a way of life; democracy must be lived to be appreciated. It can't be written as a code or a creed because it permeates all phases of living and all persons. It is a definite attitude, but it does not define the specific acts that will result from the attitude. It recognizes the intrinsic worth of every individual, allows for and demands individual differences by liberating and letting each man develop himself to the extent he desires, and in the channel of his choice. It recognizes the need of constant re-evaluation and the testing of former ways in the light of present experiences, not casting aside the former, not condemning the old, but allowing freedom to change if new consequences are desired. This requires a broader intelligence, patience enough to seek, through trial, all the facts, an understanding of the issues involved, and an arriving at an enduring agreement. It is vital, challenging, and always to be achieved. In other ideologies, the end is defined, and any means is legitimate to achieve that end. Democracy is a way—a means to constantly changing ends determined by each individual according to his interest and willing participation. Each may participate at varying levels, but together

Square Thyself . . .

By Sarah Van Fleet

Square thyself, for a stone that is squared to fit a corner will in nowise be discarded by the builder.

"Wake up! What are you sitting here dreaming about? Don't you know the 'youngsters' need you on their team? They lost."

I sat up startled. Brother Andrews stood there laughing at me, and I couldn't help smiling at him in return. Brother Andrews is like that. Things had been quiet in the bookstore that afternoon as all the people from the reunion grounds had gone to see the "old men" and the "youngsters" play baseball. I had come into the main room of the lodge and sat down on one of the comfortable benches to look out over the Pacific. It was beautiful. The sun shone down warmly, and I could see white caps on the blue green water stretching out to the horizon. I knew that in three days I would be returning to Independence, leaving behind all the wonderful things that had happened to me in the past summer.

"I'm not really dreaming," I said, laughing at his teasing.

"You certainly did seem deep in thought."

"I guess I was," I replied. "Brother Andrews, I've been sitting here thinking about myself in relation to the church. I feel as if God will use me if I'll let him, but I often wonder how. I know I teach Sunday school and go to church regularly and take part in League activities, but how can I fit into the plan? I feel sort of at loose ends. The things I do don't seem to count. Know what I mean?"

He stood and looked at me for a minute, laughed, and then said, "I think I do." A discussion followed that helped me to realize why I felt as I did.

"The feeling you have is that you aren't 'squared' to fit a corner as yet. The things you are doing are important to the church, but you feel as if you aren't prepared to do anything definite, and that all the little things you do are not directed to any specific end. I think directed might be the word. Here is something that might help you—it's a favorite of mine. 'Square thyself, for a stone that is squared to fit a corner will in nowise be discarded by the builder.' You want to feel a definite part of the church—to be needed."

I sat there turning that over in my mind. He was right. I was not "squared" to do anything specific for the church. I could do a lot of little things, but what I needed to do to feel a part of this thing was to become necessary because I could do something definite. I was eager to hear the rest of what he had to say.

Brother Andrews went on to tell me that study would be important. Study of our own church literature in order that I might have the foundation or knowledge of our belief, as well as knowing the commandments of God. Although I was working days, I could attend night school at the university. And whenever I studied, I must learn to think—to co-ordinate my thoughts so that I could pass on intelligently the things I was learning. I could choose one particular field to serve in—women's work, children's work, or youth work. All of these things

Here Is the Writer . . .

Sarah Van Fleet is secretary to Kenneth Graham, manager of the Herald Publishing House, which position she has held since August, 1946. She is a native of Southern California, where she grew up on a citrus ranch. smacked of college advice, but I could see the wisdom of choosing.

"You, Sarah, have an advantage, living in Independence where you can attend many different classes, and hear speakers in every field of activity. You have the opportunity of drawing from many sources. Attend these classes and services, as many as it is possible for you to. Take notes so you can retain the things that are being taught you, then classify them.

www.LatterDayTruth.org

New Horizons

Pick the things you want to learn about. Pick and take, for you own the things you hear. Retain them for future use. Pray often and always pray that God's will concerning you be done. Pray often and seek to establish your contact with the Almighty. Pray with intelligence. Listen to the prayers others offer. Do the tasks that are given you, because in doing you learn.

"Take advantage of the young people's prayer services by participating. Take advantage of all prayer services. Learn to speak, and speak well. Speak whenever you have an opportunity—that is the way in which you learn to think on your feet. You'll be giving something to the service, and you'll come away with more.

"It is the having of this goal that is going to make the difference in how God uses you in his plan. If you 'square' yourself, he will provide a work for you to do."

The ocean looked more beautiful as I sat watching the waves and thinking over what Brother Andrews was saying. There was one thing, however, he had neglected to mention.

"What about the social part of my life . . . parties, dates, and recreation? When will I ever find time? I want them, too, you know."

"It is right that you should. All of the things I have mentioned should be done with wisdom as to how much you can handle. God intended that you should marry, that you should have a happy, well-rounded life, and it is only by doing all things with wisdom that you can have it. You meet people at parties and socials, and it is important that these be kept up, but remember to use wisdom. You can swing the pendulum too far this way, also, and have only a social life. Does that answer your question?"

"Yes, it does. So many of these things I have heard before, but not quite in the way you put them. 'Squaring' ourselves is important if we want to be used. That is what makes the difference."

Brother Andrews looked at me rather seriously for a minute, then grinned and said, "I'm keeping you from your customers. Several are waiting for you to take care of them. If there is any other way I can help you, just let me know."

I told him good-by and went back to work, but something had happened to me during that talk. I'd found what I had been seeking. Per-

This Matter of Lineage

QUESTION:

I'd like to understand the relationships and implications of the lineage of Latter Day Saints. We seem to place more emphasis upon this matter than do any other people. What is the importance of such designations as Ephraim, Manasseh, House of Israel, and Gentile, which are used in patriarchal blessings?

ANSWER:

By Patriarch J. A. Gunsolley

EPHRAIM AND MANASSEH were sons of Joseph who was sold by his brothers into Egyptian bondage. They were grandsons of Jacob (Israel). Their grandfather, in blessing them along with his sons, acknowledged them as his children and heads of two of the tribes of Israel, and he wittingly placed Ephraim above Manasseh over the protest of their father. Ephraim's posterity was to become more numerous and more powerful and important than was the posterity of Manasseh, who also was to become numerous and important. The patriarch's statement "set Ephraim above Manasseh," was at variance with the regular order by which the elder sons came first in inheriting the family's name and fortune.

In the division of Israel into two kingdoms following the reign of King Solomon, Ephraim joined with the revolting tribes and became, in time, the most powerful of the ten tribes, which were later known as the "ten lost tribes," inasmuch that the Kingdom of Israel, consisting of the revolting tribes, was often spoken of as the kingdom of Ephraim. The word "Ephraim" is held by some to be indicative of power, fruitfulness, devotion, and faithfulness.

The British Isles and northern and western Europe are believed by many to be peopled by descendants of the "lost tribes," and, if so, the posterity of Ephraim naturally would constitute a large percentage.

The Book of Mormon clearly states haps it was just being told to "square" myself that did the trick—at least, I came back to Independence with definite plans as to what I wanted to do. I had wasted time in the past, but I needn't waste it in the future. I at last knew what I wanted to do. Every movement would be squared in every way so that I could live in accordance with God's will.

that Lehi was a descendant of Manasseh, so it would follow that the native Americans are of the lineage of Manasseh in large part. This fact is indicated generally in patriarchal blessings upon the heads of the Lamanite members of our church.

Gentiles are those who are not Jews. Judah became the leading and ruling tribe of the other kingdom, which was called the Kingdom of Judah after that tribe. Those constituting that kingdom are known as Jews, while those of the other are known as Israelites, or sometimes Ephraimites.

The restoration of the gospel in this last dispensation came by way of the Gentiles, a large percentage of whom are in strong probability descendants of Ephraim. Joseph and some of his associates, in bringing forth and establishing the church, have been designated in their patriarchal blessings as of the lineage of Ephraim. A number of Scriptural prophecies are understood to indicate that, in this dispensation, Ephraim and the House of Israel have been entrusted with the leading part in building the kingdom of God upon earth and preparing for the coming of our Lord to reign over his universal kingdom.

While to some the assurance of being of the lineage of Ephraim, or being of Latter Day Israel by lineage or adoption, or both, is of much interest and some importance; however, it can in no degree lessen the responsibility of faithfulness in keeping the commandments of God to insure a heritage in the celestial kingdom.

Requests for Prayers

Mrs. E. J. Lankford, Box 115, Ferris, Illinois, is recovering from a serious illness and requests the prayers of the Saints.

Ezra Miller, Delavan, Kansas, (a nonmember) requests prayers that he may be healed of a heart ailment and receive a greater understanding of the gospel.

Mrs. G. S. Phillips of Stotesbury, Missouri, requests prayers for her husband, who has been bedfast for six years, and for a neighbor, Mrs. Goldie Bousman, who is to undergo an operation for cancer on December 9. If there is an elder near Stotesbury, the Phillips would appreciate his calling on them.

DEATHS

PARRISH.—Mary Estella, daughter of the late Ernzy and Harriet Byrne, was born June 19, 1873, and died October 2, 1947, at the home of her brother-in-law, Frank Martin, with whom she had made her home since the death of her husband. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since December 24, 1905. Funeral services were held at the Byrneville Church, Elder John R. Bryn officiating.

FELKER.—Addie Cordelia Smith, was born in Olmstead County, Minnesota, on July 2, 1861, and died August 6, 1947, near Audubon, Minnesota. She was married to Alfred D. Felker on December 10, 1880, and was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on May 29, 1898. She was ever ready, even in her advanced years, to lend a helping hand to any who stood in need.

She is survived by her husband and eight sons: Claud and Darrel of Audubon; Charles, Roy, Lionel, and Ward, of Spokane, Washington; Clinton of Cordova, Alaska; and Martin of Sunnyside, Washington. She also leaves twenty-eight grandchildren and sixteen great-grandchildren. Three daughters and one son preceded her in death. Funeral services were conducted at the Reorganized Church in Audubon, Elders C. F. Young and C. Rotzien officiating. Interment was in the Oak Lake Cemetery.

CLOSSON.—William Oscar, was born in Kane County, Illinois, on January 13, 1854, and died September 18, 1947, in Independence, Missouri. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on November 8, 1876, and was ordained a priest on January 14, 1880. On October 6 of the same year, he was married to Phoebe F. Wood; five children were born to this union, three of whom are now dead. Since 1884, the Clossons have made their home in Independence, where Mr. Closson was employed by the Sheffield Steel Company until 1939 when he retired.

Besides his wife, he leaves two daughters: Mrs. Madge Shepherd and Mrs. Estella Tappan of Kansas City, Missouri; and three grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elders R. V. Hopkins, Glaude A. Smith, and Amos T. Higdon. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

TRUE.—Bartlett Nelson, was born August 4, 1927, at Hawthorne, California, and died of a heart attack in Bakersfield, California, on September 24, 1947. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in 1942. During the war, he served in the Navy, being honorably discharged in 1946.

He is survived by his parents, Mr. and Mrs.

A. E. Hicks; seven sisters: Mrs. Lahoma Koehler, Mrs. Felix Little, Mrs. A. E. Williams, Mrs. Alfred Thompson, Mrs. B. C. Eason, Mrs. Dora Sullivan, and Mrs. Robert Richards; two brothers: W. E. and W. S. Hicks; his grandfather and grandmother. The funeral service was conducted by Elders Louis J. Ostertag and Harry E. Hampton. Interment was in Greenlawn Memorial Park.

MOORE.—Mancie Link, was born December 30, 1875, in Humphreys, Missouri, and died September 30, 1947, at Mt. Carmel Hospital in Pittsburg, Kansas, following three years of ill health. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church in 1896 and was an active member of the Weir, Kansas, congregation as long as her health permitted. Her husband, Grant W. Moore, died in 1942.

Surviving are four sons: Nathan V. of Pittsburg; Leo and Louis of San Diego, California; and Homa of Kansas City, Kansas; four daughters: Mrs. R. M. Brown, Leominster, Massachusetts; Mrs. John Sullivan, Worcester, Massachusetts; Mrs. Jack Collins, Cherokee, Kansas; and Mrs. John Russell, Oakland, California; a half-brother, Riley Link of Lyons, Kansas; ten grandchildren; and one great-grandchild. Funeral services were held at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Collins, Elder A. J. Jones officiating. Burial was in the Mt. Olive Cemetery in Pittsburg.

CORWIN.—Richard V., was born on August 24, 1870, and died October 5, 1947, at St. Joseph Hospital in Flint, Michigan. He joined the Reorganized Church on May 16, 1920, and remained a faithful member until his passing. Surviving are his wife, Frankie; a son, George, of Flint; three daughters: Mrs. Hazel Oligney of Beulah, Michigan; Miss Nettie Corwin of the home; and Mrs. L. Lina Easlick of Mt. Morris, Michigan; two brothers: Ray of Reed City, Michigan; and Thomas of Mayville, Michigan; fifteen grandchildren; and five great-grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elders H. J. Simons and J. Groombridge at the Newall Street Church in Flint. Burial was at Flint Memorial Park Cemetery.

CLIFFORD.—Harry J., was born in Ontario, Canada, on January 5, 1869, and passed away at Hurley Hospital in Flint, Michigan, on October 8, 1947. He had lived with his son in Flint for the past nineteen years. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on March 25, 1914, and in 1916 was ordained to the office of elder. He remained diligent in his ministry throughout life, although because of poor health in recent months, he was unable to attend church.

Surviving are two sons: C. M. Clifford of Flint, and George H. Clifford of Detroit; one brother, Cornelius Clifford of Lloydminster, Saskatchewan; and two sisters: Mrs. Guy Wright of Brides, Oregon; and Mrs. Harry Guthrie of Superior, Wisconsin. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Harry Simons at the Newall Street Church in Flint. Burial was in Sunset Hills Cemetery in Flint.

HOGUE.—Ethel Alma Drucilla, was born June 7, 1894, near Mena, Arkansas, and died unexpectedly in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on October 5, 1947, after returning home from church. She was baptized thirty-three years ago and was a faithful member until the end of her life. On January 16, 1912, she married Ambrose Elliott Hogue in Arkansas, moving the same year to Oklahoma, where she had resided ever since.

Besides her husband, she leaves three daughters: Mrs. C. I. Tinkler, Mrs. E. D. Mortson, and Mrs. S. J. Hunt, all of Turley, Oklahoma; her parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Neighbors of Mena; two sisters: Mrs. Virgie McDaniels of Mena and Mrs. Eula Johnson of Oneida, New York; a brother, Raymond Neighbors of Houston, Texas; and five grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Tulsa, Elders V. D. Ruch and L. W. Kohlman officiating. Burial was in the Rose Hill Cemetery in Tulsa.

SCHAAF.—Loretta May Kirkendall, was born in Wilber Township, Michigan, on May 27, 1886, and died at the Henry Ford Hospital in Detroit, Michigan, on October 3, 1947. She was married to Andrew W. Schaaf on June 24, 1903; three children were born to this union: Floyd of Wilber; Russell of Royal Oak; and Mrs. Leona Alverson of Wilber. She also leaves seven grandchildren. Mrs. Schaaf had been a member of the Reorganized Church since March, 1944, and had held the office of treasurer for Wilber Township since 1937. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Harry Simons at the Moffatt Funeral Home in East Tawas, Michigan. Interment was in the Wilber cemetery.

McKENZIE.—Marjorie Lucille, daughter of Mrs. Alma Winkler and the late Casper Winkler, was born at Papineau, Illinois, on April 12, 1922, and died August 11, 1947, at Saline, Michigan, following a brief illness. She was baptized on June 28, 1933, at Detroit and was married to Floyd Raymond McKenzie on October 26, 1940.

She leaves her husband; her mother; five brothers: Kenneth of Ypsilanti, Michigan; Casper of Graceland College; Leonard of the Philippines; Louis and Vernon of Belleville, Michigan. Services were conducted by Elder Willard Shotwell and Priest John F. Loeding from the Roberts Funeral Home. Interment was in Cadillac Memorial Park.

GROVENER.—Jennie Herring, was born November 8, 1857, in New London, New York. She was married to George Eckhardt on March 12, 1876; eleven children were born to this union. Soon after their marriage, they moved to a farm in Kalkaska County, Michigan, where Mr. Eckhardt passed away on July 11, 1922. In November, 1929, she was married to Warren Grovener, who died on December 29, 1940. After his death, she made her home with her son Claud on the farm where she had lived many years and reared her family. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church for over half a century; she was patient and kind and loved by all who knew her. She will be especially missed by the Saints of Kalkaska County with whom she worshipped; her humble prayers and comforting testimonies were always an inspiration to those who heard them. Death came unexpectedly while she was visiting her daughter in Detroit.

She is survived by five children: Mrs. Clara Taylor of Mishawaka, Indiana; Mrs. Cora Motz of Detroit, Michigan; Mrs. Ruth Hewitt of Benton Harbor, Michigan; Clayton and Claud of Kalkaska, Michigan; three brothers and one sister of New York; sixteen grandchildren; and seventeen great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held September 1 at the Berg Funeral Chapel in Kalkaska, Elders A. R. Ellis and B. S. Lambkin officiating. Interment was in the Evergreen Cemetery in Kalkaska.

PEASE.—Dow L., was born in Sycamore, Ohio, on November 18, 1856. In 1894, he and his wife moved to a farm in Inland Township, Michigan. In 1917, he was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church. His wife and all but one of his five children preceded him in death. Since 1917, he had made his home with his daughter, Mrs. Peter Paauwe of Thomsonville, Michigan, where he passed away on October 9, 1947. He also leaves four grandchildren and six great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held in the Inland Church where the family had held membership; Elder A. R. Ellis officiated. Burial was in the Inland cemetery.

Our Democratic Society

all learn to co-operate, be considerate of others, and be responsible for choices made. Each develops in relation to others, not in relation to a set code or creed. Each is integrated into the society he helps to make. Life is not for special-ists—for the elite or the "golden" man—but for all. Birth confers that privilege. Democracy allows man to develop in, participate in, and re-create the society into which he is born.

The "democratic way" is basic to and permeates all of the life of persons and peoples in all of their avenues of expression. It is the way of all persons, hence it will have defects, since persons are at varying levels of perfection and in varying fields. But each will be richer by the sharing and can change or be changed when modification is required. So there results a flexible society, responsible to the needs of individuals as they see them collectively. Individual and collective needs can be reconciled in a democratic society. It is not "I" or "you," as in the Fascist and Communist society, but "we."

PROCEDURES IN PRESENTING CALLS TO MINISTRY

By Lorne S. White

“Called of God as was Aaron” might be taken as the theme of this book, for this is the foundation of our whole concept of priesthood and ministerial leadership. How calls are to be recognized, safeguarded, and acted upon is carefully discussed and considered in this volume which summarizes the best that has been written upon this subject by our people. A book of special value for pastors and leaders.

P. S.

*What is the blessing that we seek?
 Must we lay down the law to God
 Or shall we trust his judgment
 When we seek surcease from fear—
 Or peace
 Within a weary world of pain.*

*How can we deem that we know best
 Who are but frailest mortal flesh
 Not yet divine?*

*For we presume too much
 Who ask of God
 And then direct him
 In the way we may desire
 When it is by his gracious hand
 We are thus blessed.
 And surely he can know more wisely than can we
 How best to help us
 Who are his own.*

* Holiday Precaution

The family was gathered for Thanksgiving Dinner, and the Littlest One was asked to say grace.

She got through the phrases her mother had taught her, and it seemed that she had reached a good place for the "Amen," when she decided to add a little idea of her own. "And please don't let me eat too much," she petitioned earnestly, "so I won't get sick and keep Mama awake tonight!"

How many of us could say "Amen" to that prayer!

* Lift It Out

"Lift It Out, Give It Away." Some friend of yours will be interested in the message of the church, and the center section of this issue of the "Herald" is planned for him or her. You may not be able to tell the gospel story yourself, but you do have a talent for friendship, and that will enable you to put this section in the hands of somebody you wish to help.

Evan Fry's radio talks are always friendly in tone, logical, and appealing. He has won wide recognition and many friends. The good qualities of his messages carry over into his writing. We are glad to have his articles for publication, since they make excellent tract material.

* TROUBLE has thousands of causes, but only a few cures. . . . Including people, of course.

* THE SWAN, a graceful aristocrat floating on the park lagoon, admired and fed with dainties, is just the descendant of a duck who stuck his neck out.

* IT IS BETTER to be tactful than full of tacks.

* A WORD TO THE WISE is sufficient, if it is a pleasant word.

* THE MAN who pinched his penny scared away a dollar.

* THE FATHERS built a fortress in which to defend themselves and to protect their families against the perils and destruction of a cruel and rapacious world. The fathers loved their fortress and the security it gave them. But to the children it was only a prison that kept them from the bright cities that they could see lighted like jewels at night, and shining like fairyland under the sun by day. . . . Have you ever considered that your idea of heaven may be somebody else's idea of hell?

* There is not in normal human nature a capacity for people to live together in peace and harmony. Until we have been transformed by Christ, we quarrel, misunderstand, envy, and disagree until we make each other miserable. But when transformed by the gospel, we find that all human relationships are made happier and better.

* One of God's most wonderful gifts is the happiness of sharing something beautiful with someone you love.

The clock always moves slowest toward the end of the day. The last mile of the journey is always the hardest to cover. The last bit of work is always the hardest to do. Weak men may falter before the goal is reached. He who continues to the end wins the prize.

The Friendship Train

Last night over the radio I heard a gentleman from England being interviewed by the President of the Women's Chamber of Commerce. He was saying, "I would like to tell you how much we appreciate the Friendship Train, loaded with flour for the relief of the people of Europe. We are very grateful for the many packages of food which you send to add variety to our monotonous diet. It is possible to live on what we get at home, but not to be very happy on it. But as much as we appreciate the material help in these gifts, we appreciate even more the spirit in which you send them. They are tokens of your friendship, symbols of your care for us."

Yesterday's paper said that the Friendship Train now has 167 cars of flour in it. It will take two strong locomotives to pull that train. Many sections will be required when it reaches the eastern port. And besides this, thousands of packages are going out by trains and ships to individuals and organizations.

Bishop J. A. Koehler points out that all this giving is, in a way, related to the principles of our ideals of Zion. We have a surplus of things for which the peoples of the world are hungry and in desperate need. We recognize our responsibility, we hear the voice of need, the call of mercy. Although there is much that is sordid and selfish, foolish and wrong in America and among her people, there is still a quality of generosity and nobility that will respond when it is called.

A Visit at Home

Often I am asked to visit the small district meetings on Wednesday evening to make a short talk at the opening of the service. I enjoy these meetings because they are so friendly, and one always gains a good measure of spiritual strength from them, if he comes prepared.

Recently I was invited to take dinner on such a Wednesday evening at the home of the temporary presiding elder, and to visit until time to go to the meeting. It was a fine and memorable experience. This is a family that thinks about its religious life and about the church in a creative way. They had a number of questions to ask, and some viewpoints to discuss. Without any formal announcement, they brought up matters that had engaged their attention, and at no point were there any complaints or arguments. In the kindest of ways and in the most intelligent manner, they made it possible for the visitor to give them the best that his experience in the church had taught him.

And, though they may not have realized it, they brought a family ministry and a valued blessing to the visitor. It was an honor and a pleasure to be in that home for an evening. They had something splendid to give. Surely, that is the kind of family and home of which Zion can be built—of which the very foundations of Zion are being laid at this present time.

I thought of it for days afterward. That was an ideal visit for a church officer. There was no hint of a family being corralled and brought in unwillingly. They were glad to have the visitor. I sincerely hope there was nothing pompous or pontifical about him. It was all so good and friendly. When there are more homes like this one, priesthood visiting will be what it was intended to be.

The Back Seats

At concerts and lectures where famous people appear, the audience generally crowds up toward the front, occupying all seats, even though they are the most costly ones. Latecomers can generally buy cheap seats far to the rear, where it is more difficult to see and hear.

Movie crowds have a different habit. Mature persons seek the middle seats. Only the children are enthusiastic enough to go to the front where the flicker will affect their eyes. The tardy and unfortunate get the undesirable seats at the rear.

But church crowds are different. All but a few persons like and take the back seats. The pastor can talk to them, and perhaps move them forward once or twice. But the moment he lets down on his vigilance, they drop back to the old habits and the old places. They are Peter's disciples, who followed Jesus "afar off."

I have tried various methods of bringing them forward in churches and prayer meetings. Sometimes I say to them, smiling of course, "You look like the Scattered Saints; or perhaps you are just the Lost Tribes of Israel. They say there is a gulf between the preacher and the congregation. I can't move the pulpit closer to you. Only you can move closer to me. You can bridge the gulf. While we sing the next song, will everybody please move forward at least six rows? We must leave room for the stragglers who come late." Something like that generally does it.

Perhaps churches are built wrong. It takes the longest walk to reach the front seats. If I ever build a church, and I am permitted to have my way, I shall build it with its back to the street, so that as the people enter they will be near the front seats, and it will require a long, long walk to reach the back ones. Christians may be ever so bold and vigorous when they are in the world, but at church they are a timid, tired crowd. They will never reach the back seats in my church, except when it is crowded.

Didn't Jesus compare his followers with sheep? Perhaps there was a tiny trace of prophetic irony in that metaphor. So many of them still act like sheep. A few determined souls could take the lead, and they would follow, right up to the very front seats. L. L.

Headquarters Reports

MISSIONARY EDWARD BUTTERWORTH recently conducted a series of services at Tulsa, Oklahoma; which Apostle D. T. Williams says brought "the greatest enthusiasm in the history of the branch." Brother Butterworth has been doing splendid work wherever he has gone, and church people have greatly appreciated his contribution.

APOSTLE D. T. WILLIAMS spent November 16 at Oklahoma City and the 23rd at Tulsa, also conducting other meetings at El Reno, Oilton, Skiatook, and Sperry.

BISHOP HAROLD CACKLER recently had a car accident on the highway just south of Bethany, Missouri. A car coming in the opposite direction went out of control, crossed the center line and crashed headon into Brother Cackler's car. A car behind him crashed the other end, and Brother Cackler's car was telescoped between the two of them and demolished. Very fortunately, he, his wife and son escaped with minor injuries, and after a night spent in the hospital were released to be brought home by Bishop DeLapp.

GLEN H. JOHNSON writes a very interesting letter from his new location at 611 Manchester Road, Denton, Manchester, England. The many friends of the family will be glad to hear from them:

After a very interesting trip across the Atlantic, and visiting several places in London, we visited the McConleys in Birmingham, then went on to Manchester. We have been working around the house to make it comfortable. Then, too, we have been busy visiting the branches of the church in the North of England. . . . We enjoy it very much here. It is one thing to read about England in a history book, and another to come here and absorb the atmosphere of the abbeys and other buildings, including one where Captain Miles Standish lived. . . .

We are pleased to have Brother and Sister Eric Rowe with us. Recently married, she was busy as a nurse, and Eric has been busy as pastor and missionary for the past few years.

Glenda Fern has started to school. She is already speaking English in contrast to our American brand, and is making her adjustment nicely.

Some very fine people here in England. We have enjoyed meeting them and visiting in their homes. We feel blessed in our efforts thus far. We do want to be worthy of God's blessing. Those Heralds are like a letter from home.

HOLLAND NOW has its own church publication, Zion's Roepstem, of which the October issue comes to us. This is number 11 of the first year's issues. It is a neat work done in mimeograph, and carries articles containing church history, recent news, and doctrinal material. It is conducted for the church by Brother A. J. Mosterdijk, Hyacinthstraat 41b, Rotterdam, Holland, with the help of a number of assistants.

GENERATIONS OF church members appear in a letter from Brother Lester Hunt, of Glenwood, Iowa, a region that has an important place in church history. His son, Jon, was baptized, representing the sixth generation of the Hunt family. Margaret Utterback was confirmed by her uncle, Charles Fry; she is of the fourth generation in the church. A seven-year-old girl sang a solo at a program celebrating the eighty-first anniversary of the work in Glenwood; she is the seventh generation of the Forney family.

HAROLD I. VELT writes of his missionary work in Canada:

Wabash, Ontario, Branch had an attendance of twelve to fourteen until we held a series here last January. Since then fifteen fine people have been baptized (twelve men and boys, three girls) and interest and attendance have so increased that they have built a basement with other improvements, including a font. Before I leave, we expect a goodly number of baptisms. Attendance Saturday night was 101, including twenty-one nonmembers.

CASIMIR NIKEL writes from Cleveland, Ohio, that as a result of a series of services eight have been baptized, which could have been thirteen but for the intervention of illness. Others will be baptized later. Two of those baptized were from outlying places, Mentor and Willoughby.

BISHOP C. A. SKINNER has just returned from a month's stay in Ontario, Canada, where he has represented the Presiding Bishopric in visiting the branches in company with John F. Sheehy (president of the Toronto district) and with Almer Sheehy (president of the London district). He reports a kindly reception by the people, good response to the efforts made, and pleasant weather.

Social Atonement

By Apostle Maurice L. Draper

A sermon given at Stone Church on November 16

Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do.—John 14:12.

AT THE HEART of the Christian philosophy is the concept of the kingdom of God on earth. Jesus began his earthly public ministry with the declaration, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."¹ Following this initial statement, Jesus continued in reference to the kingdom at almost every point in his ministry. The Lord's Prayer is significant in the petition, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven." The parables almost always begin with, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto" with references in great variety to the daily life situations in which the eternal life principles are revealed.

This social concept strikes at the roots of human behavior. In the words of modern sociologists, men are not what they are simply as isolated individuals, but as part of a social situation. The customs, traditions, and social habits of generations past, together with the multitudinous social pressures of the present, combine to mold the habits, ideals, and personality traits of every person who is part of the social system. Since we have become what we are in relation to our fellows, it is apparent that the existence of sin is also related to these social situations. It is a logical conclusion that any plan of redemption by which men overcome their sins must be fundamentally a social plan.

"The distinctive note of Christianity was 'redemption'—not simply of the individual but of the world. For it looked to the establishment of a social order in which the divine will should be realized—a kingdom of God—an order which should make of humanity one large family with peace, justice, and good will among all its members."²

There can be no redemption, however, without atonement, by which the life that is out of adjustment because of sin is harmonized with eternal purpose and law. There must be not only personal atonement, but also a process by which society is re-ordered to be "at-one" with the Divine.

JESUS IN HIS ministry effected the example of personal righteousness, and, insofar as one person is able to do so, demonstrated the attitudes and skills necessary to social righteousness. But he could not demonstrate social righteousness itself, although he was the Son of God. It requires at least two persons, sharing in the life qualities revealed in Jesus, to actually demonstrate the social principles involved. It is also apparent that the extent of such demonstration depends upon the number of individuals who are thus united in social purpose. There can be a simultaneous demonstration of social righteousness in a modern community which includes the production and distribution of goods, government, professional and civil services, etc., only if there be a sufficient number of people of Christian quality to produce and distribute the goods, to serve as government officials, and to render the necessary services. It is obvious that Jesus alone could not do this, but it is equally true that this is part of the process of the redemption of men from their sins—sins which bear a relation to the social situation in which the sinner finds himself.

The principles of personal atonement are revealed in the personal life of Jesus. But the principles of social atonement are as yet not fully expressed in life processes. Paul aptly declared that the church is the "body of Christ."³ The necessity of the church is indicated by the positive stand taken on the matter by Jesus, and the action which followed his statement to Peter, "I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." In Jesus, men see God, and God sees man in an experience which is shared by both. This, however, is personal. In the church, it must become increasingly true that it (the church) is the social incarnation in the same sense, and in an extension of the Christian example, as Jesus is the personal incarnation of Divinity. Thus, in the church we find the common ground of experience in which men see God in the social sense, and God sees men in their social situations, and the fellowship of men and God in this respect may effect an "at-one-ment" which involves the social patterns of life as well as our personal attitudes.

Social redemption transcends racial lines, crosses national boundaries, and runs the scale of economic classes. To do less would leave unsolved our problems of race prejudice, international injustice, and economic maladjustment.

A WEAKNESS of historical Christianity lies in its denial of this social aspect of the teaching of Jesus and the fundamental need of men. Rather, there has been an unwarranted emphasis on personal redemption and individual salvation. The appeal in many evangelistic services is, "You come to the altar and accept Christ as your personal Saviour, and when you die, you will go to heaven." This attitude has tended to render "the religious life of Protestant peoples a socially sterile, subjectivism and to narrow the object of religious enthusiasm from the redemption of humanity to the redemption of a few individuals."⁴ Is there any wonder that political and economic life in modern society, as indeed it has been in most ages, is shot through with the selfish version of the Golden Rule, "Do the other fellow before he does you first"? Much of our religious philosophy, while extolling the virtue of unselfish sacrificial service, in the next paragraph encourages greed and self-interest by appealing to men for personal salvation—let the rest of mankind take care of itself. "Every man for himself" in religion is hardly a sound basis for brotherhood in economics.

This same weakness, though not inherent in the teaching, is noted in the attitude of many Latter Day Saints. Too many times Zion is considered as the "place of safety" and of economic security, rather than the self-sacrificing ministry of social messiahship. There can be no question, however, but that the "greater works" to which Jesus refers in our Scripture include the extension of the atoning powers of the gospel into social relationships. To do this requires a vehicle of expression, just as the earthly life of Jesus was the vehicle for such expression in a personal way. This vehicle of expression is the social structure we call Zion. Some may think of Zion as a creation by God for obedient Latter Day Saints. How much more noble it is to think of Zion as a creation by obedient Latter Day Saints, with the help of God, for the purpose of demonstrating salvation in this larger sense as Jesus intended it should when he organized his church.

It becomes increasingly clear in our growing experience and understanding that the Restoration Movement promises no salvation in a complete sense merely by obeying the ordinances and in church membership. In a fuller measure, the salvation of the individual can be accomplished only as he grows beyond a concern for his own welfare by losing himself in responding to the desperate needs of others. In other words, when he becomes so concerned for the salvation of others that he forgets to be anxious for his own, he is already well on the way to a more comprehensive salvation than a selfish person can even imagine. This kind of service becomes possible in growing effectiveness through the social relations of the kingdom of God as it is more fully achieved. It is in this service that salvation is realized. The ordinances are the processes of the integration of obedient individuals into a society of right relationships. Church membership makes available to the persons thus integrated resources and social machinery for the development and extension of social righteousness. But let us not mistake the processes and machinery for their purposes and end—which are the actual conditions of justice and harmony envisioned in the kingdom.

THE WORLD NEEDS a social messiah, to expand the work of atonement into humanity-wide relationships. We believe that the Zion program, in actual practice, may be this Messianic social movement. But the church shall accomplish this mission only as it comes to regard these social ministries in the same Spirit as Jesus delivered his sacrificial labors. As did he, the church must serve the needs of humanity first, considering its own welfare as incidental to this service. As did he, the church—and its members—must come to regard the object of its ministry (suffering humanity) as so important that it justifies any effort and is worth the suffering of all things. It will come to consider the obstacles to the social righteousness of the kingdom as social sins equally obnoxious with the most degrading of personal evils, and as demanding of repentance. It will be continually so disturbed by the needs of sinful men that it cannot rest and can find no peace except in sacrificial labor for the benefit of its beloved, though rebellious, charges.

As Jesus took upon himself in a personal ministry all the sins of the world, so his church must take upon itself all the sins of the world in a social ministry of adjustment and atonement by example and aid. Christianity had its beginnings, historically, in the life of Jesus. But "Christianity is not a static thing. To regard Jesus himself as standing other than at the beginning of a great new movement in human culture is to misunderstand him culturally and historically."⁵ The work of social atonement and redemption is the development of the theme which was set in the life of Jesus. It is the projection of the powers resulting in an individual life through individual obedience to law into the sphere of humanity-wide relationships. By such projection, we may gain powers unlimited by the conservation of individual achievements through their integration into a social unit of which the individuals are a part.

Men need to be set "at-one" with God as individuals. They also need to be set "at-one" with each other and God in social relations. The former without the latter is partial and incomplete. The latter without the former is impossible.

The Language of the Book of Mormon

THE LANGUAGE OF the Nephites, the great majority of the people who inhabited ancient America, was the Hebrew language, which was the language of Jerusalem at the time both the Nephites and the Mulekites left there. Yet, Hebrew was not the language of the engravings on the plates from which Joseph Smith translated the Book of Mormon.

Moroni, the last of the Nephites to handle the plates, in referring to the language used, says, “. . . we have written . . . in characters, which are called among us the reformed Egyptian, being handed down and altered by us, according to our manner of speech.” He explains that they did not write in Hebrew for the sake of brevity, and then adds, “but the Hebrew hath been altered by us also” and declares “none other people knoweth our language” which necessitated the use of the Urim and Thummim for its translation (Mormon 4: 98-100).

Nephi, in the very beginning of the Book of Mormon, made a statement about the language of his records. He said he was writing “in the language of my father, which consists of the learning of the Jews and the language of the Egyptians” (1 Nephi 1: 1). Notice, he does not say reformed Egyptian, but the language of the Egyptians. The “alterations” gradually developed through usage throughout the centuries.

Nephi was a descendant of the Joseph who was sold into Egypt, whose family went there in time of famine, where, according to the prophecy of Abraham, they were to be “afflicted, and serve them four hundred years” (Genesis 15: 17, Inspired Version). There they developed into the great nation of Israelites which was led to the land of Canaan by Moses. During their sojourn in Egypt, the Israelites had acquired knowledge of the language of the Egyptians, but the Hebrew language continued to be their national language until it gave way to the Greek language shortly before the New Testament period.

THE DATE OF THE exodus from Egypt has been stated as 1491 B. C., and the date of the departure of the Nephites from Jerusalem was 600 B. C. Hence, that the Nephites used a form of the Egyptian language, gradually altered by their usage, indicates that for nearly 900 years before they left Jerusalem, and for approximately 1,000 years more after they came to this land, the Egyptian language was kept alive as a “cultural” language among a certain class of Israelites—a language studied by certain individuals for certain purposes.

Not all were allowed to write upon the records. This privilege and duty fell upon a distinct class, who kept the records and made recordings of national history. These evidently had special training for their work. That they who wrote the records were especially taught the Egyptian language is shown by Enos, who said, “my father . . . taught me in his language” (Enos 1:1). Jacob, his father, had written upon the plates and then handed them to his son, Enos, for his additions—in the Egyptian of his fathers.

The three princes, Mosiah, Helorum, and Helaman, the sons of King Benjamin, were given special tutorage in this “cultural” language, too, for the record states, “And he caused that they should be taught in all the language of his fathers . . . that they might know concerning the prophecies which had been spoken by the mouths of their fathers . . . And he also taught them concerning the records which were engraven on the plates of brass . . .” (Mosiah 1: 3, 4). The natural language of these

By THELONA D. STEVENS

Nephites, which they spoke without this special teaching, was Hebrew.

THE OLD TESTAMENT of the Jews today is in Hebrew, and only those Jews who are taught to read and write the Hebrew language are able to read the Scriptures. So it was with the brass plates. They were written in the Egyptian language, and only those who had this cultural training could read them. Lehi had this knowledge and was able to pass it on to his children (Mosiah 1: 5, 6).

Zeniff had been “taught in all the language of the Nephites,” but he does not say he had been taught “in the language of his fathers.” Hence, Zeniff’s record may have been written in the Hebrew of the Nephites, which accounts for the fact that it apparently was added to the larger plates of Nephi.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE JAREDITES

THE LANGUAGE of the Jaredites was not “reformed Egyptian,” but presumably the language of Adam. In Genesis 6: 5, 6, Inspired Version, there is a description of the language of Adam, and of those who chose to qualify to write in the beginning. There is nothing to indicate otherwise than that this language continued until the wicked peoples at the Tower of Babel were scattered and their languages confounded. Since the Jaredites escaped having their language confounded, theirs was, logically, the Adamic language, and it was from their writings in this language, then, that Moroni abridged the record to form the Book of Ether, translating their writings by the use of the Urim and Thummim (Ether 1:99). Hence, the record of the Jaredites that came into the hands of Joseph Smith was in "reformed Egyptian" also.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE BRASS PLATES

WHEN THE JAREDITES came to America from the Tower of Babel, they brought with them the Scriptures which undoubtedly were the complete, original Scriptures from Adam's time to theirs, for Genesis 6:5, indicates that precious recordings were made in "a book of remembrance"; verse 9 tells that they kept "a genealogy of the children of God. And this was the book of the generations of Adam" written "according to the pattern given us by the finger of God; and it is in our own language" (verse 47); and Ether 3:80, tells that they brought ancient records with them and the nature of the reference shows that these records contained knowledge from the beginning, from the days of Cain. Enoch also wrote a book (Doctrine and Covenants 104:29), which in all probability the Jaredites brought with their sacred records, since they left comparatively soon after Enoch's city was translated.

Conceding that the Jaredites took the original Scriptures from the Eastern Hemisphere, one understands why God revealed to Moses (see Doctrine and Covenants 22 for the circumstances) everything necessary for the enlightenment and the salvation of man from the creation of the world to the time of Moses. God commanded Moses to write the things which He revealed (Genesis 1:1). Moses does not say, however, in what language he was to write these things.

MOSES HAD COMMAND of his native Hebrew language, and also the Egyptian language of the nation which had adopted him. Perhaps God commanded him to write in the Egyptian language. If so, perhaps it was, in part for the same reason that the Nephites gave for using it—that it took much less space than did Hebrew (Mormon 4:99).

Moses wrote of the creation, and all things from the beginning, as well as the law by which the Israelites were governed, and also the national events to the end of his days. After the death of Moses, other scribes made entries upon the national records. These are the exact things which the Nephites say were upon the plates of brass up to the first year of the reign of King Zedekiah (1 Nephi 1:158-166), and these records were written not in the "reformed" Egyptian (Mosiah 1:4-6), but in the cultured Egyptian as Moses had learned it in the palace of Pharaoh—evidently the hieratic, or priestly Egyptian.

If one accepts the theory that Moses was the first author of the brass plates, he acknowledges that he wrote in Egyptian, for the Nephites state this to be the language of these plates. Perhaps that is one of the very reasons why this language was used for the Book of Mormon plates—Moses began them in this language and other eligible recorders (undoubtedly at God's command) followed his example, studying this language in order to qualify to make their entries upon the records.

RECORDERS WERE HIGHLY EDUCATED

RECORDS WERE kept by Israelites of high rank (II Samuel 8:16, 17; I Kings 4:3; II Kings 18:18, 37; II Chronicles 34:8). Not just anyone had the right to make official recordings on the sacred records. The privilege of serving as a recorder and scribe seems to have been performed by priests, as shown by numerous Bible references (I Chronicles 16:4; Isaiah 8:2; Deuteronomy 17:18; Numbers 5:23), and apparently was kept within certain families. Nephi's statement substantiates this: "Laban was a descendant of Joseph, wherefore he and his fathers kept the records" (1 Nephi 1:168). Lehi, also a descendant of Joseph (1 Nephi 1:165), had this right, too.

"The special training for a scribe's office began, probably, about the age of thirteen. The boy who was destined by his parents to the calling of a scribe went to Jerusalem and applied for admission to the school of some famous rabbi. After a sufficient period of training, probably at the age of thirty, the probationer was solemnly admitted to his office."—Smith's Bible Dictionary, Teacher's Edition, page 596.

While the above quotation probably refers to the training required of scribes after the return of the Jews from captivity, it is evident that specific training was required of all who made engravings upon the sacred records.

Lehi, a relative of Laban, was educated in "the learning of the Jews and the language of the Egyptians" (1 Nephi 1:1; Mosiah 1:6) and thus could read the brass plates (1 Nephi 1:158; Mosiah 1:4). He then proceeded to make a record of his own (1 Nephi 1:15, 16; 2:1), which was abridged by Nephi (1 Nephi 1:17).

A DIFFICULT LANGUAGE

THAT THE REFORMED Egyptian was a more difficult language than that of the Jaredites is indicated by Moroni's statement, "Behold, thou has not made us mighty in writing like unto the brother of Jared" and he mentions, too, the "awkwardness of our hands" (Ether 5:24, 25).

Self-consciousness born of writing a language learned with difficulty is indicated in Moroni's words, "when we write, we behold our weakness, and stumble because of the placing of our words; and fear lest the Gentiles shall mock at our words" (Ether 1:26).

The "placing" of their words in the "altered" Egyptian evidently was different than it was in Hebrew, which made them self-conscious, because they knew it was not done correctly. Indeed, that they had lapsed into the word arrangement of the Hebrew language is suggested in Joseph Smith's statement concerning the last leaf of the plates which he translated. He makes a statement concerning the title page of the Book of Mormon and refers to the "language of the whole running the same as all Hebrew writing in general." —Church History, Volume 1, page 74. Hebrew, of course, runs from right to left. Mormon himself claimed only the use of the Egyptian characters (Mormon 4: 98). Thus, it seems they may actually have been using the Egyptian characters, but Hebrew placement of words, as part of the changes which the Egyptian language underwent throughout the centuries, especially by those who made their final entries upon the plates.

It would have been much easier for them to have written in their spoken language, the "altered" Hebrew, in which Moroni says, "ye would have had no imperfections in our record" (Mormon 4: 99), but their plates were not large enough, and they were evidently acting in obedience to God's instructions.

THE ENGLISH OF THE BOOK OF MORMON

THE SIMPLICITY of the Book of Mormon language as it is translated into English has brought forth comment by some because of the lack of beauty that is found in Biblical writings, but the great humility and simplicity of the language is a joy to the average student of the book, who fervently thanks God for his planning, directing, and protecting of these records so pregnant with truths for the salvation of mankind, even thanking him that the language has been kept simple for our simple understanding, and that so few errors have crept in to reduce our knowledge and appreciation of this great record.

May we prove our thankful hearts by consistent and earnest study of the records so painstakingly written, preserved, and given to us.

We don't love people because they are beautiful, but they seem beautiful to us because we love them.—Russian proverb.

Dedication of the Church at Nauvoo, Illinois

By MABEL ATKINSON

THE CHURCH AT NAUVOO, ILLINOIS, was formally dedicated on Sunday, November 9. The day began with a fellowship service at 9:30, followed by a sermon by Apostle D. T. Williams at 10:50. Soloist for this service was Harold Smith, who sang a song composed especially for the occasion. A basket dinner was served at noon in the lower auditorium.

At 2 p. m., Mayor Horton gave an address of welcome, after which a pageant, written by Roberta Garret with scenes by Mabel Atkinson, was presented. Madalyn Hartman represented the branch; Edith Fusselman, the past; Florence Ourth, the future; Darrell Tripp, the priesthood; Tot Stevenson, the adult; Cheryl Tripp, the youth; and Rogene Smith, the child. Pastor and Mrs. R. H. Atkinson portrayed the arrival of Mr. and Mrs. Layton, in Nauvoo in 1918 to care for the church property. They welcomed Mr. and Mrs. August Lee, who were the first Saints to open a business in Nauvoo. Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Galbraith and Joan Klingelmueller reenacted Thanksgiving Day, 1946, when the church was cleared of indebtedness. The congregation then sang a hymn of dedication, the words of which were written by Roderic Lewis.

The pastor, on behalf of the congregation, presented the deed and key to Bishop G. L. DeLapp, who responded with a charge to the pastor and members of the branch regarding the responsibilities that were theirs. He then returned the key to Pastor Atkinson, after which he spoke to the group relating some of his recent experiences in Europe. Margaret Lewis sang a solo which was composed by her husband, and Apostle D. T. Williams gave the dedication prayer. Organ preludes were played by Edith Fusselman and Bernard Galbraith preceding each service.

Open the Windows of Heaven

By Bishop D. O. Chesworth

IN THE THIRD chapter of Malachi, verses eight to ten, we read a challenging question, "Will a man rob God?" Continuing, "Yet ye have robbed me . . . in tithes and offerings. Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

How often have you heard this Scripture as a preface for a sermon? How many times have you read it in a printed message? Nevertheless, it has been there in the concluding book of the Old Testament all during our lives. The Bible begins with the account of how light dawned upon the natural world (Genesis 1: 1-3) and the prophecy of Malachi, given somewhere around 460 B. C., concluding this epoch, closes with the announcement of the coming of the mess" (Malachi 4: 2).

The temple, on which Haggai and Zechariah had set such high hopes, was standing, but they had become pathetically disappointed. There had been sixty years of disillusion and misery, so that the situation to which Malachi addressed himself was melancholy beyond words. A curse was upon the land—the not unfamiliar experience of drought and locusts—it went deeper than that. The "blight" was on men's hearts and on their faith. Apathy and niggardliness prevailed, and priests and people alike were guilty. Vows were made and not kept. People acted as if anything was good enough for the Heavenly Father. They offered blemished and imperfect beasts for sacrifice, they robbed God by keeping back the tithes and offerings. True, they would have been ashamed spiritual light, "the Sun of righteousness to offer blind, lame, and sick animals to the Persian governor, yet they said, "where is harm?" What bother it is to conduct the service! They treated God with hardly disguised contempt. A low form of social life was associated with this low religious life. Read about it in the second and third chapters. A spirit of scepticism prevailed. The prophet was constantly challenged at every turn. Many of the populace and so-called pious men cried in anguish, "Where is the God of justice?"

Jehovah had been robbed by their failure to bring in, as the law demanded (Deuteronomy 14: 22-27; Leviticus 27: 30-32), the tithes and offerings to the treasury of the temple. Dishonesty had brought a curse in the form of a drought and devouring locusts. The invitation was given to return and show repentance by paying their dues, and God would send rain in abundance from heaven. Their prosperity would be so conspicuous that they would be the envy of all nations.

Malachi, meaning "my messenger" or "messenger of the Lord," denounced their carelessness in offering unworthy sacrifices, contrasting their ingratitude with the favor which they had received from God. Unworthy sacrifices were not desired, but surely an invitation was extended for worthy giving of tithes and offerings. Furthermore, a promise was made that the windows of heaven would be opened.

TODAY, MANY PEOPLE, including ministry and laity, are trying to open the windows of heaven. They know that if we do things of such a worthy note as to open these windows, God will pour out a blessing. What appeals to people in general today? Almost anything of a spectacular nature. Every week, wherever I may be in the mission, I look at the pages of the Saints' Herald hoping for something startling, or official, of change in appointments or of new missionaries appointed. Unnecessary worry about prestige and rank has wounded many a person and destroyed his effectiveness.

What type of a sermon do you like to hear? We immediately list them, but who lists the subject that is discussed by Malachi? Only a precious few, but it is that precious few who carry the banner proclaiming the only hope of our present and increasingly complex future society. It has always been the precious few, the consecrated minority, that has stood for principle with enlarged vision. One of the oldest living elders in the church (Elder Levi Gamet, born June, 1848), who used to be a member of my congregation in Kansas, once ventured to use this subject for a prayer meeting theme. He had served as a solicitor fifty-five years before and knew the value of such a theme. To be sure, I was fearful of the outcome, but the service that night was excellent, and the windows of heaven were opened. Very few "open the windows," yet, we read in Biblical history that the righteousness of such a few was sufficient reason for saving a city.

WHEN THERE SEEMS to be a spiritual drought, general indifference among the people, falling away from the Restoration Interest, we might well consider our treasury. Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also (Matthew 6: 21). If part of our treasury has been invested in "tithes," then our hearts are concerned with tithes and stewardship. Constantly, there is before us the divine challenge: prove me.

Let us focus the spotlight on ourselves. Boastfully, at times, we may have taken the prominent places and declared, "This is the way, follow us!" For a century we have promulgated stewardship—some reluctantly, others with Malachian zeal—but occasionally we need to impose a self-analysis to ascertain whether or not we believe. We have quoted Revelation 14: 6, for many years to prove the angel's message. Often we have quoted from Genesis, Ezekiel, and Isaiah to support the Book of Mormon. It is time for us to increase our portfolio to include Malachi 3: 10, and use it until we remember it as well as the world remembers John 3: 16.

There is a joy in bringing tithes to the Lord which 30,000 or more members enjoy each year. Some isolated Saints remember each month and make certain that their tithes and offerings are received. For such we are grateful. Consider this an invitation to make sure that you are listed in 1947 among those who have paid into the treasury.

ARE THE windows of heaven opening? Are blessings being received? Read this testimony which I received in the mail a few weeks ago: "Sickness came upon me. The assistance of the doctor and administration seemingly failed. My husband, a nonmember, suggested that we send fifty dollars tithing to the bishop. Within an hour I was feeling better and much stronger. In a few days, I had regained my good health." Another member writes: "At fifteen years of age (1903), I wanted to keep the financial law and tithed my first check to avoid robbing God. Later, I had $7.00 tithing accumulated, ready to be sent, but since my health had been poor and I might need the money, I was tempted to keep it. My mother had taught me that if I ever saved money for the Lord, I must be sure to use it that way, so I bought the money order and sent it. Having failed to stamp it, the letter was returned and my temptation came again. In my room, with tears, I sought the Lord in prayer to help me have needed funds to return home; then I mailed my tithing again. Almost at once I began to feel like a different person.

What Latter Day Saints Believe

BY EVAN A. FRY

HOW OLD IS THE GOSPEL? Did it originate with the birth of Christ, or when he first began teaching? Was the law of Moses only a preparation for it? Were there two gospels—the law of Moses and the Gospel of Christ, or were both of them a part of the same thing? What was the gospel that saved Adam? To what did Noah ask those to whom he preached to be obedient? On the answers to those questions depend a number of other conclusions, such as the nature of God, the nature of the atonement of Christ, the ultimate destiny of the human family which lived before Christ and before Moses. By our answers to them here, we shall attempt to demonstrate that God is an unchangeable God, whose purpose was announced even before creation, whose gospel has been preached to men since the beginning and will be preached to the end, whose Son made atonement for original sin in all men, and whose salvation is offered on identical terms to every son and daughter of Adam.

First, let us turn to Galatians 1: 8, 9, and read: "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed." Here Paul is emphatic—so emphatic that he repeats the same words—that there is only one gospel, by which men may be saved, and that if any man preaches any other, he shall be accursed.

BUT WHEN WE BEGIN to go back to the beginning of creation and try to find some clear indication in our Scriptures as to just what that gospel was in the beginning, we are met with what seems to be a conspiracy of silence. In the King James version of the Bible there is not a word to indicate that Adam believed in any kind of a gospel or accepted any kind of salvation. We are told that Cain and Abel offered sacrifices, but there is nothing to indicate who told them to make such an offering, or for what purpose, or to carry out what symbolism. Paul tells us in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews that "by faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him: for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God. But without faith it is impossible to please him." In what did Enoch have faith? To what law or gospel was he obedient?

Paul further says that by faith Noah prepared an ark, and that by faith Abraham obeyed God's command to seek a new land of inheritance. In what did Noah and Abraham have faith—the specific command of God or some larger and more inclusive promise of God? Paul makes another peculiar statement in this same eleventh chapter of Hebrews when he says that Moses chose to suffer affliction with the people of God, rather than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, "esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt . . ." Was Moses following Christ? Did he have the gospel of Christ? There is little or nothing in the King James version of the Old Testament to indicate that this was true, except that we have in Deuteronomy 18:18 the promise given to Moses that the Lord would raise up a prophet like unto him, which prophet was presumably Christ.

PAUL'S LETTER to the Galatians presents some more questions, which, to the alert mind, seem to indicate that our Old Testament Scriptures are in many respects incomplete and fragmentary. In the third chapter, verses 7 and 8, Paul says: "Know ye therefore that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham. And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." It seems from this that Abraham knew the gospel—the gospel of Christ; and this conclusion is further borne out in the verses 16 and 17 of this same chapter. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ. And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect." The import of this verse is that the covenant with Abraham was a gospel covenant; that Abraham was under the gospel, and that the law of Moses which was given four hundred thirty years later could not alter the original gospel, or disannul or cancel the covenant of God with Abraham.

Now turn to the fourth chapter of Hebrews, and read with us the second verse in which Paul is speaking of ancient Israel: "For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them: but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it." The gospel was preached, then, to the ancient Israelites under Moses, but because they heard it without faith, it did not profit them, and they wandered forty years in the wilderness. In I Corinthians 10: 1-4, Paul tells how all Israelites were baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea and ate the same spiritual meat, "And did all drink the same spiritual drink; for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ." The ancient Israelites, then, drank of the Rock of Christ; they had his gospel before the law was given.

HOW THE LAW came to be given is best explained in Paul's allegory of Isaac and Ishmael, found in the fourth chapter of Galatians. Abraham had been promised a child by Sarah, his lawful wife. Lacking faith in that promise, Abraham tried to claim the promise through Ishmael, the son of Hagar, his bond-woman, but God would not recognize that claim. The promise was through the first and lawful wife, Sarah. If Abraham had trusted in that promise, Ishmael would never have been born. Isaac was the child of promise. So, completing his allegory, Paul says, "these are the two covenants." The covenant through Isaac represents the gospel, which was in existence long before the law was given; Ishmael represents the law of Moses which had to be added to the gospel covenant as a school-master to bring them to Christ, because of their transgressions and lack of faith.

We have not space here to list the many prophecies of Christ's birth, life, death, and resurrection. New Testament writers and preachers were constantly referring to the ancient prophets who had foretold Christ, the lamb slain from the foundation of the world. As far back as Adam, God gave the promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head—which is usually conceded to be a foreshadowing of the coming of Christ and his conquest of Satan's weapon, death. A great prophet was promised through Moses, as we have already mentioned, and Peter quoted that promise in preaching to the Jews in the temple at Jerusalem (Acts 3: 22, 23). But we repeat, there is practically nothing in the Old Testament to show that the gospel of Christ was taught before the law of Moses—nothing to indicate the religious beliefs or faiths or practices of Adam, Cain, Abel, Enoch, Noah, or Abraham.

LATTER DAY SAINTS believe in the antiquity of the gospel. They believe that the gospel of Christ was preached in the beginning—that Adam, Seth, Enoch, Noah, and other ancient men believed it and were obedient to it. They believe that although the law of Moses was added, the gospel covenant, and the requirement of faith in Christ for salvation, remained unchanged. They believed that the gospel which was preached in the beginning, and in the days of the apostles, is being preached now, and that its principles and requirements for salvation are the same.

We base our firm belief in these conclusions as far as we may on the generally accepted King James version of the Bible; but we have tried to show you that at best, the Bible leaves out more on this subject than it tells. Where the King James Bible stops, we go on to appeal to two added witnesses; first, the Book of Mormon, and second, the Inspired Version of the Bible. This is the version which we believe was corrected by Joseph Smith under prophetic inspiration. It adds a considerable amount of material to the opening chapters of Genesis—material which clears up many discrepancies in the King James version and gives more information on some of the subjects which we have treated in this article. For example, the opening verse of the gospel of John in the Inspired Version reads: "In the beginning was the gospel preached through the Son." That is a plain statement that the gospel was in the beginning—that God's plan of salvation and his provision of his Son was all thought out and provided for before the foundation of the world.

But let us note a few more passages from Genesis, according to this Inspired Version. Chapter five, verses one and two, read: "And the Lord God called upon men, by the Holy Ghost, everywhere, and commanded them that they should repent; And as many as believed in the Son, and repented of their sins, should be saved . . ." And later in the same chapter, these words: "And thus the gospel began to be preached from the beginning, being declared by holy angels, sent forth from the presence of God, and by his own voice, and by the gift of the Holy Ghost. And thus all things were confirmed unto Adam by an holy ordinance; and the gospel preached; and a decree sent forth that it should be in the world until the end thereof . . ." In the sixth chapter of Genesis, after a listing of some of the genealogy of Adam's posterity, we find this verse: "And they were preachers of righteousness, and spake and prophesied, and called upon all men everywhere to repent. And faith was taught to the children of men."

THERE IS ALSO an account given of God's instruction to Adam, his baptism in water, and his belief on the name of Jesus Christ, "the only name which shall be given under heaven, whereby salvation shall come unto the children of men." In answer to Adam's inquiry as to why he must be baptized, this answer is given: "And the Lord said unto Adam, Behold, I have forgiven thee thy transgression in the Garden of Eden. Hence came the saying abroad among the people that the Son of God hath atoned for original guilt, wherein the sins of the parents cannot be answered upon the heads of the children, for they are whole from the foundation of the world." In the seventh chapter of Genesis much more of the story of Enoch is told, including a vision in which Enoch saw the coming of the Christ. In the eighth chapter of Genesis, the Inspired version tells how Noah was ordained, and sent forth to declare the gospel to the children of men, even as it was given to Enoch. In the fifteenth chapter of Genesis, we find this verse: "Abraham looked forth and saw the days of the Son of Man, and was glad, and his soul found rest, and he believed in the Lord; and the Lord counted it unto him for righteousness."

Still more conclusive and interesting proof of the antiquity of the gospel is found in the Book of Mormon. We do not have space to review half of the passages concerning the coming of Christ, written by the ancient Americans from 600 B. C. to the beginning of the Christian era or the prophecies by ancient Nephite and Lamanite prophets concerning his coming. Here is a characteristic passage from 2 Nephi 8: 7-9: "Behold, my soul delighteth in proving unto my people the truth of the coming of Christ: For, for this end hath the law of Moses been given: And all things which have been given of God from the beginning of the world unto men are the typifying of him." Here is another statement from the same author, who lived more than 500 years before Christ but looked forward to his coming: "We labor diligently to write to persuade our children and brethren to believe in Christ, and to be reconciled to God. For we know that it is by grace that we are saved, after all we can do. And notwithstanding we believe in Christ, we keep the law of Moses [these people were from Jerusalem and of Jewish descent] and look forward with steadfastness unto Christ, until the law shall be fulfilled; for for this end was the law given: And we talk of Christ, we rejoice in Christ, we preach of Christ, we prophesy of Christ, and we write according to our prophecies, that our children may know to what

They Also Serve Who Wait

A tribute to the late Howard M. Mousley

By Apostle G. G. Lewis

ON SEPTEMBER 24, word was brought to us that Howard Monroe Mousley of Elizabeth, New Jersey, had died. Naturally, to those who knew of him and his good works, there came a feeling of sadness and sorrow. He will be greatly missed in his local congregation of Newark, New Jersey.

All the traveling ministers in the Atlantic States Mission have known of the Mousleys—Martha and Howard. They have enjoyed their hospitality; they have looked upon a companionship that was sweet, considerate and—in a world of social upheaval—unusual. But this was not the only outstanding thing about Brother Howard.

First, he was a minister for Christ. He regarded his membership in the Church of Jesus Christ as paramount and, though for many years he was a layman, being called later to serve in the office of deacon, he felt it a privilege to be able to serve his Lord through serving his fellow men. Responsible and dependable in his ministry, he was there to greet people and welcome them; by personal invitation, card, or telephone, he sought after those who did not come. He believed he should "invite all to come to Christ." He never wanted to give a formal sermon, but he preached effectively by his life. His was truly of the "standing ministry."

For a number of years, his home was the scene of evening meetings. He and his wife lived in an apartment, but they were happy to invite people to their home and sing hymns and hold prayer meeting or preaching services. They "waited on the Lord," and so served.

Through the efforts of others and the continued diligence of the Mousleys, a branch of the church was finally established in Newark. It was a happy day for them. The work had taken root and was blossoming. Howard was then ordained to minister as a priest, but he will always be remembered as the man who, as a deacon, served devotedly and fostered the work—a fine example for the standing ministry throughout the church.

Ill-health dogged his steps, yet he never faltered in the faith. An indispensable workman in industry, it is said that his particular knowledge and ability cannot be duplicated in New York City, for there was a Christian sincerity that went with it. The church was honored where he served, and the influence of the Christ was felt by all whom he served.

We give this tribute to one who walked with us but now has joined the ranks of the heavenly host.

source they may look for a remission of their sins."

So, we of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints believe in a Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. We believe in a gospel which was preached from the very beginning, which was believed and obeyed by Adam, Abel, Seth, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Moses, and all the Old Testament prophets. We believe in a gospel which was not abrogated or done away in the law of Moses, which was added because of transgression, for the purpose of bringing the people of Israel back again to the gospel of Christ. We believe there is only one name given under heaven whereby men may be saved, and that salvation was, is, and shall come through the name of Jesus Christ. We believe that men must have faith on this Saviour, repent of their sins, be baptized in water to signify his death and burial and resurrection, and have hands laid on their heads for the gift of the Holy Ghost. We are thankful for the added testimony we believe we have, signifying that these principles, this gospel, this Saviour, were taught from the beginning and for this further proof that God is the same yesterday, today, and forever.

PEACE?

By George Kenneth Floro

This is a subject on which there is much difference of opinion and some controversy. The author, a veteran of the late World War, represents a viewpoint held by many people. Other people, equally sincere, may have other ideas. We would be glad to hear from those who wish to discuss the subject further. Articles or letters for publication should have fair literary quality, a knowledge of the facts, and a spirit of tolerance.—EDITORS.

THERE IS TOO much complacency in the United States today. No one wants war, we are told. It is uneconomical, inhumane, irrational, etc., and yet we continually move in the direction of war in the face of apparent indifference and unconcern.

We are confronted with the problem of how this complacency can be changed into a desirable concern. We have developed little self-criticism, and we have little awareness of our Christian responsibility.

Repentance seemingly has been done away with and, in its place, have come convenient substitutes. The most common is blaming someone else. Some people tell us that war is inevitable. The State Department seems to be operating on this premise. We are told by a few that we must trust our politicians; if they say we must go to war to save the world, then we must do our duty. Another substitute for repentance is the attitude that the world is going on the rocks anyway. All of these have one thing in common. They direct our attention away from our responsibilities and obscure the need of quiet worship and genuine repentance.

During World War II, $2,000,000,000 were spent to develop the atom bomb. No comparable amount was spent on the social sciences. Our technological advance is called progress. Bigness and speed are deceptive, and our society swaggers along technologically drunk. How much shame for such lack of insight? How much repentance?

Our country has been the first to use the atomic bomb to destroy whole cities. It does not require much imagination to identify oneself with those who suffered and died under those assaults, yet few apparently have done so. It is difficult, probably impossible, to understand what others think of us until we are able to take this step.

Some have wondered why France, Sweden, Norway, and other countries have not been more eager to come over to our side against Russia. It is not that they care for Russia as much as it is that they do not trust us. We, too, are a sovereign power, acting pretty much as sovereign countries always have acted—selfishly in their own interests.

Frequently we hear people say that it is so fortunate the atomic bomb was given to us. They seem to overlook the fact that it was almost given to the Germans first. Apparently other countries have not been convinced that we are supposed to be the exception. We are attempting to avoid war and win it at the same time. Real repentance should help us to see ourselves as we really are.

Much has been said about the lack of Christian ethics in the Treaty of Versailles. The shameful Potsdam Treaty is even more vengeful. Our nationalism has made for indifference; there can be no repentance without a social awareness.

Several people have suggested that war with Russia would be a war between the good and bad forces of the world. As long as it would be a war between sovereigns, there would be much good and bad on both sides. Not until world government exists will this idea be conceivable at all. The present United Nations is little more than a military alliance among the great powers.

We say that famine and chaos are on the side of Russia. Let us not forget that war will bring more of such chaos and suffering. This is no time for complacency. It is a time for effective Christianity—love, humility, repentance, and work to build a better world.

Real repentance will break our impossible psychological struggle to make peace and war at the same time. It can give clear vision for the necessary steps ahead: feeding of hungry peoples, (including Russians), universal disarmament, world government, and the abolition of war.

It is a strenuous age in which we live; everyone tries to get ahead faster than the other fellow. Ideals are forgotten in the mad rush for supremacy. Brotherly love is something that seems to make a good subject for essays, but that is about all. Charity has been commercialized until all the sweetness has been squeezed out of it. The surest method of receiving consideration is to give it. It is much more pleasant to slap a fellow on the back than to punch him on the jaw.—Scottish Rite News Bulletin.

BEGIN TODAY

Dream not too much of what you'll do tomorrow;

How well you'll work perhaps another year; Tomorrow's chance you do not need to borrow—

Today's is here.

Hymn: "Jesus Is Calling Today," Saints Hymnal, No. 332.

Prayer:

It would be well for the person who offers the prayer to keep in mind the specific goals and resolutions outlined for the coming year.

Prayer:

The prayer should be concerning the specific needs of the church school, asking a special blessing that this particular phase of the Lord's work may advance through the new year.

Suggested Presentation:

A NEW START

I will start anew this morning
With a higher, fairer creed;
I will cease to stand complaining
Of my ruthless neighbor's greed;
I will cease to sit repining
While my duty's call is clear;
I will waste no moment whining,
And my heart shall know no fear.

I will look sometimes about me
For the things that merit praise;
I will search for hidden beauties
That elude the grumbler's gaze.
I will try to find contentment
In the paths that I must tread;
I will cease to have resentment
When another moves ahead.

I will not be swayed by envy
When my rival's strength is shown;
I will not deny his merit,
But I'll strive to prove my own;
I will try to see the beauty
Spread before me, rain or shine;
I will cease to preach thy duty,
And be more concerned with mine.

I BELIEVE IN THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

By J. Edgar Hoover, Director,
Federal Bureau of Investigation

"There is no substitute for religion and the Sunday school!

"By the same token, there is no synthetic replacement for a decent home life. Our high crime rate, particularly among juveniles, is directly traceable to a breakdown in moral fiber—to the disintegration of home and family life. Religion and home life are supplementary. Each strengthens the other. It is seldom that a solid and wholesome home life can be found in the absence of religious inspiration. And the filaments of religion and family life burn brightest and most effectually when children have attended the Sunday school "In the United States criminals force us to spend each year more than four and two thirds as much on them as we spend on all forms of education, both public and private. We spend for their detection, arrest, conviction, and punishment nearly thirty times as much money as the combined budgets of all church and religious organizations in the country. Each year that crime continues, it will cost every man, woman and child in the United States approximately $110. That is too much!

"Each of these laws is an outgrowth of one of the world's ten basic laws—of the Ten Commandments which are taught, or should be taught, in every Sunday school. I have never seen a true adherent of these Commandments stand at the bar of a criminal court!

"A few months ago, three youngsters—two aged thirteen and one aged fourteen—were arrested for the theft of eight automobiles. All three were given sentences by the court. We discovered that lack of religion had played a most important part in the tragedy. These boys came from homes in which there was no religion, no family prayers, no acknowledgment of God, no emphasis upon that Commandment which tells youth, 'Thou shalt not steal!

"A few years back, a vicious murderer still in his twenties threatened Special Agents of the FBI. As a gang leader he was responsible for several deaths, and now he planned to kidnap certain key FBI men. When the showdown came in New Orleans, the criminal meekly surrendered. I wish his lesson could be taught in every Sunday school. I wish our youngsters could understand that this man-without-God was brave only on the surface, and brave only when he knew he was safe. Force was the only authority he respected. He lacked the sustaining power of religion, and when his personal assurance was gone there remained only the shattered hulk of a man.

"The Sunday school can help here as no other institution can, for the Sunday school offers a moral, ethical and spiritual way of life that is of unsurpassed value in our times. It is true and sound. In fitting our young folks for the future, in guaranteeing the permanency of democratic principles, there is no more potent or vital force in our nation. The Sunday school can become our guarantee for tomorrow!"—Saints' Herald, January 12, 1946.

Presentation Summary:

A very definite, practical way of helping in local church school should be considered for those unfortunates who are underprivileged in spiritual growth. Plans should be presented for constructive aids today (special emphasis on the present) as tomorrow the need for help will no longer be shared with the church school, for delinquents will have already committed their crimes. Stress importance of self-examination to see that parents are not delinquent.

Because women necessarily form the backbone of the home, creating therein a sanctuary of love and happiness, it is well to devote some thought to the make-up of the home, and the types of personalities best suited to a happy atmosphere. The following is adapted from an article appearing in the January 5, 1946, issue of the Saints' Herald, titled "The New Year and the Women of the Church," by Pauline Aranson.

"The goals of the women of the church should be quite familiar to the membership,

Inspirational Talk:

This should be in the form of a lesson, presented with a definite view to stimulating the thoughts of the listeners toward making a new beginning toward a higher life. As stewards over the time allotted to us, we must make wise use of that time, establishing in each moment a greater awareness of those great qualities, "faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, brotherly kindness, godliness, charity, humility, diligence."

Call to Worship:

YOUR MISSION

If you are too weak to journey
Up the mountain steep and high,
You can stand within the valley
While the multitudes go by;
You can chant in happy measure
As they slowly pass along;
Though they may forget the singer,
They will not forget the song.

If you have not gold and silver
Ever ready to command;
If you cannot toward the needy,
Reach an ever open hand;
You can visit the afflicted,
O'er the erring you can weep;
You can be a true disciple
Sitting at the Saviour's feet.

If you cannot be the watchman
Standing high on Zion's wall,
Pointing out the path to heaven,
Offering life and peace to all;
With your prayers and with your bounties
You can do what heaven demands,
You can be like faithful Aaron,
Holding up the prophet's hands.

Do not, then, stand idly waiting
For some greater work to do;
Fortune is a lazy goddess,
She will never come to you.
Go and toil in any vineyard,
Do not fear to do or dare;
If you want a field of labor,
You can find it anywhere.

New Year Meditations (Adapted):

It is our earnest desire that we shall have neither joy nor sorrow, success nor failure by incurring a debt to others greater than we can pay. We would give value received for all we draw of the Bank of Life.

We would have friends who know us for what we are and who love us in spite of what we are. In turn for such friendship, we give our pledge to foster in ourselves what we ask of others.

We want some work to do which has such value that without it the day in which we live, and all the days to follow, would feel poorer were we to fail and richer if we succeeded, and we want to do our work without taxing the purse, sympathy, or patience of others beyond the value we give.

We desire to cultivate such courage of mind and heart that we shall not be afraid to travel where there is no blazed trail, and we shall not hesitate to sacrifice, when by sacrifice we can make contributions to others.

We court such growth in grace as shall enable us to understand those who rejoice or weep or suffer, and to enter into the secret place with them as though their joys or tears or suffering were our own. We would enter into their joy and success without covetousness, into their tears with such understanding silence as speaks of eloquence surpassing words, and into their suffering with such sympathy as will give rise to courage and Wings of Hope.

We would have a deeper appreciation of nature in all her moods and aspects, and a profounder respect for man as he seeks to labor together with God for the highest good of humanity.

We would cultivate a sense of humor, for without it we discover life is likely to become so serious a business that it will be unlivable.

We would learn to patiently endure little folk with the full knowledge that if they will set their hearts to do the will of God, they will have all eternity in which to grow, and if they will not set their hearts to know God, time will soon release us from the annoyance of their littleness.

We would have a little leisure in which to do nothing. To keep the bow tightly strung all the time is, we have learned, to finally rob it of its spring and power. Too, we must have time to cultivate the fine art of meditation. God has his best chance at us when we are full of HUSH. Finally, we would have patience to wait for the best things and the wisdom to know them when they come.—

Words of Wisdom

In the years of my work as a chef, I acquired a fondness for hot coffee, despite the fact that caffeine caused sleeplessness, indigestion, headache, etc. I clung to the "cup" because it was ever handy, and I needed its daily stimulation. Sometimes I would quit, and after a period of time turned to it again.

In May, 1947, I became very ill. No doctor was needed to tell me that I was in the shadow. While praying earnestly that I might live, a voice spoke to me, saying, "If thou wouldst live, follow the Word of Wisdom, which thou knowest well."

In four months I have not drunk either tea or coffee. It has not been easy to drop a habit of years; but too well the instruction given me has made the impression that will last for life—"If thou wouldst live"

for they are fundamental to the progress of the church as a whole. Yet, constantly new members are being added, young women are becoming adults, and need to be taught and informed so that they can join the legion of good and conscientious women who are attempting to reach these objectives. Let us recall to mind the most important one which catches up and includes all the lesser goals—the establishment of Zion homes and families.

"The meaning of this is clear to Latter Day Saint members. So that all may understand and to clarify: Zion means all that is best in the way of the physical home as well as the development of the spiritual lives of the family. We think of a home that is adequate in size for the number of the family, artistic in arrangement and decoration, clean inside and out, but more than this, with a friendly
Christian warmth, indicating the type of people who reside there. We think of a home which is built on love and dedicated to the Heavenly Father in its beginning, whose occupants are striving to build in their lives a firm foundation and knowledge of the teachings of the church, that they may be capable of passing this philosophy down to their children.

"This great task is worthy of the best that is within the women of the church and should challenge them to constant endeavor. It will require prayerful and wise application of effort to accomplish such, and in order to do so and not become discouraged in the enormity of the task, these objectives must be broken down into small divisions and some one particular phase of the task be undertaken each year, with a firm resolution that at the end of the year some real progress will have been made. It is an easy thing to have good aims but more difficult to direct toward the aim with intent to hit or reach it.

"A serious study of the gospel should be made to find the beautiful truths of our distinct philosophy that we may have a renewed fervor and give thanks to our Heavenly Father that he has allowed us to have a part in his great work on earth. It follows that before we can have good homes, there must be good people, strongly convinced that the gospel was restored by divine instrumentality, for it is this conviction that will bring about ultimately the distinct type of family we are trying to build.

"So this coming year, the members in the family might decide to have as their goal the purchase of the church books for each one in the family. Ownership creates interest. If the Herald does not visit the home regularly, order it and find the many good things it contains for all ages.

"Appropriate for this season are the words of Jesus to his disciples: 'Be of good cheer;
Here am I; Be not afraid.' They should stimulate us to more courageous acts in his service and give us assurance that he is with us in all things and will help us accomplish the righteous desires of our hearts."

Presentation Summary:

"The Latter Day Saint home is founded, unified, and motivated in love, a mutual and abiding love for each other, grounded and glorified in the love of Christ. This basic love warms and stabilizes the home atmosphere and is dynamic for continual spiritual growth."—

Helping the Primary Child Appreciate Church History

By Emma M. Phillips

READING A CHAPTER from our church history will create about as much enthusiasm in a child of primary age as a meal of yellow sawdust and green pears would enkindle our enthusiasm. To a child, such a reading would be above his understanding and imagination; such a reading would not be interesting enough to receive his attention.

In order for a primary child to understand church history, he must enjoy it; and in order to thoroughly enjoy it, he must be able to use his hands. Urim and Thummim are nothing more than two unique words, but a few pieces of colored paper, a jar of paste, and an opportunity to manipulate ten little fingers, can furnish a pair of "magic glasses" that creates a lasting impression on a child.

If church history, instead of being divided into sections or chapters, is divided into short stories with interesting beginnings, thrilling bodies, and satisfactory conclusions, it will hold the child's attention. Because the primary child has little sense of time or sequence of events concerning authentic characters, it is best to stress God's dealings with the figures of the story. Help the child to realize that God is pleased or "happy" when the people of the story live righteously, and that he gives them divine assistance in their endeavors. Most children of this age have had no outstanding religious experiences to think about. They lay the foundations for their own lives on the experiences of characters found in the stories they enjoy.

AT ABOUT SIX years of age, the child discovers that he is an individual. He is interested in the antics of the baby, but he considers himself very superior to the infant. He can read letters, go to the store alone, and dress himself. Even what he can't do, he attempts to do. In his own estimation, he will soon be an adult. And like the adult he imitates, he wants to build and to construct. Nourish this desire by letting the primary child construct some simple object to illustrate the story, or part of the story, that he hears about the church.

Here is a suggestive outline.

1. The question that needed an answer. This story presents Joseph Smith and the method in which he secured an answer to his question. It concludes with the vision in the woods and the solution to the problem. Construction: Make the woods in which Joseph Smith prayed. Trees are drawn on pieces of white or manila paper measuring two by three inches. Cut out the upper half of the tree without cutting into the paper border that surrounds the tree figure. This border is folded back and serves as an easel or support for the tree. Make several trees for the woods. Flowers can be drawn around the trunks and wee birds and butterflies can be pasted on the trees. Let the child use his own imagination as much as possible in the coloring of the trees.

2. The story the angel told. This story introduces Moroni, the messenger. Primary children can be easily fascinated by the "movie" that was shown to Joseph Smith in his room, by the method Moroni used in descending and ascending, and by the way the holy light filled the room. Construction: Make a cut-paper picture of the room. Use a sheet of manila paper about six by eight inches. The window, the first step to be taken, is made by cutting a rectangle shape at the proper height. Behind this, paste a dark piece of paper, thus giving the illusion of darkness outside and light inside. The window frame is made from strips of paper, and beneath the top piece can be fashioned a tissue paper curtain. Cut simple furniture from brown paper and paste in the room picture. Paste pictures on the wall and a cloth spread on the bed.

3. The secret box. This story presents the patience of Joseph Smith in visiting Hill Cumorah and concludes with his bringing the plates safely home in the buggy. And remember, a few extra remarks about the horse and buggy will please the child. This story should also introduce Emma Smith. Construction: Make a Book of Mormon by cutting heavy gold colored paper into sheets three inches by four inches and punching holes in them so they can be fastened together like a modern loose-leaf notebook. Chicken leg bands or even string can be used as rings. Paste a band of paper securely around the last few sheets of the book. Children are enthused to learn that one of their group of friends might be the person who receives permission to break that band and to translate the remainder of the Book of Mormon.

4. The strange writing. The bewitching object of this story is the "magic glasses." This story introduces Oliver Cowdery and the system used in translating the Book of Mormon. Make sure the child has an understanding of the word transparent. Construction: Make the Urim and Thummim. From copper colored heavy paper cut a mask shape, or a shape like the bow and rim of ordinary spectacles. In the center of each rim paste a light colored triangle of paper to represent the transparent stone. At the far side of one rim paste a stripe of heavy paper or a piece of light wood such as the flat stick from a lollipop. This is the stem staff used to support the Urim and Thummim. It is an interesting and educational fact to note that the child cannot see through these glasses just as the ordinary person could not see through the Urim and Thummim.

5. This is the church. This story should tell about the first meeting, then compare it to a present meeting. Describe the room, the mannerisms, and dress of characters. The primary child is not curious to know the details of why this church is the same as the church that Jesus Christ had while on this earth. He is satisfied to learn that it is. Construction: Make a stand-up church bookmark. Fold a piece of paper about four by eight inches evenly through the center in book fashion. On the front part draw a church door, and cut it at the top, bottom, and right side. The other side serves as hinges for the door. On the inside part of the paper and so it is visible through the open door, draw the interior of the church, showing the congregation. This can be stood up as a book can be when opened. Folded, it serves as a bookmark.

6. The chain of friends. Make this, the last story, about some enterprize of the local branch, some activity about which the child has a knowledge. For example, the storyteller may tell about a church supper, detailing the work in kitchen and in dining hall, the purchasing of material, the methods used to collect funds, the co-operation of various members of the branch. Construction: Make a friendship chain. Use strips of colored paper about four inches by one inch. Write on each slip of paper the name of a church worker, but be sure to leave the ends of each strip free for pasting. Form the first strip of paper into a circle by pasting the two ends of it together, one over the other. Do likewise with the other strips, only join each circle in chain fashion to the circle previously made. One person alone is just a link, not a chain. Several people working together in a branch make a chain—a friendship chain.

THESE STORIES may be supplemented by a series of pictures or a poster. The pictures consecutively numbered might be: 1-tree, 2-angel, 3-box, 4-exact copy of the hieroglyphic writing, 5-small ancient church, and 6-modern church.

Make the review period a time for fun and play. Call the review a game. Point to a picture, and let the child tell one piece of knowledge he has gleaned from the accompanying story. Reverse the procedure, or "play the game backwards," by making the statement and letting the child point to the proper illustration.

This is a very flexible outline. It can be used for one child or for a class of primary children. The construction work is to be done by the child, the teacher assisting only as the individual child demands guidance. In some children, the smaller muscles are not developed sufficiently to permit quick manipulation of the fingers. The primary child is venturing into a strange world—a world to which he must adjust his pattern of living. In order to live properly, he must be carefully guided. In order to know church history, he must be properly instructed.

Tribute to Kate Moffett

My attention has been called to the very recent death of Mrs. Kate Moffett, probably one of the oldest pioneers in this section. She was born in Manti when it was a thriving village of the early days, serviced by stage coach. She then moved with her family to Shenandoah when it was only a village composed of a few houses, no sidewalks, muddy roads, weeds, and slough grass. It was a period when good neighbors prevailed and were necessary. It was then that Kate Leedingham was employed by my father and mother as a nurse for me. Of course, the knowledge of this fact has endeared her to me.

She was a good woman, serving the neighborhood as best she could. I have known her ever since I can remember. The village grew, however, developing into a town and then a city, and Kate was known only in her immediate neighborhood. I think she must have been one of the noblest women who ever lived in Shenandoah. Her willingness to serve was her outstanding trait. She was a typical representative of the pioneers who had to depend upon the help of their neighbors, and she played her part well.

She reared a fine family and put all she had into life for the benefit of others. I wish I could say something that would perpetuate her wonderful name for posterity as an example for others to follow. —Earl R. Ferguson, from the Evening Sentinel, Shenandoah, Iowa.

Prayers Bring Blessings

I am isolated and have been practically an invalid for years. I became so discouraged that I requested prayers several weeks ago, and thanks to those who prayed for me and to my Heavenly Father, I have been truly blessed. The gospel grows dearer to me as the years roll by. My greatest desire is to serve the Lord and help in every way I can to build the kingdom here on earth.

Swords or Plowshares?

By MELVIN L. FOWLER

MAN, down through the dark corridor of time, has constantly longed to live at peace with his fellow men but has consistently been frustrated in his efforts. Since the dawn of history, the world has been torn by one conflict after another until strife has become commonplace and is accepted by the peoples of the world as being almost inevitable. In our time, we are faced with the age-old problem of achieving peace on earth. The last struggle that plagued the world was a mighty show of power and nearly proved disastrous to the "high" civilization that brought it about. The next conflict may prove even more terrible and may actually be the death-dealing blow to a culture, that in some sense, is already reeling under the impact of its perplexities.

Realizing this, the nations of the world have already established an organization that is dedicated to the purpose of achieving peace. If they are not sincere in their efforts, they are at least playing the game like seasoned actors and, to continue the metaphor, some are showing great skill at stealing a scene now and then. The question comes to us then with great clarity: Can there be peace in our time? It seems highly possible, if the true principles of Christianity are applied in all phases of life. There are, however, certain factors in our thinking that lessen the chances of peace. These attitudes can best be illustrated by referring to periods in American history when they were dominant in the thinking of the people.

The first of these is the idea of political hermitage or isolationism which was the dominant policy of this country before 1940. It was thought that by withdrawal from the problems which involved the world, America would be safe from any conflict that might arise. George Washington's famous admonition to "avoid entangling alliances" was quoted as proof positive that we had no business being concerned in the problems of the world. It was during this period when America vacillated between doing nothing and less than nothing that the atrocities of Ethiopia, China, and Spain were committed by the disciples of militarism. Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland were auctioned to the highest bidder, and still the policies of seclusion were adhered to. The prophecy of the times went unheeded and soon the expositors of "peace at any price" were engulfed and almost completely swallowed in a war that they had been so glibly talking of preventing.

This philosophy is very similar to the erroneous concept that Zion is a place of refuge, a place to flee to and be "safe" from the world. Those who hold this belief think of Zion as something apart from the world and separated completely from the society in which we live. Separation, seclusion, and isolation can lead to only one thing—destruction. To build society, one must live in society. To establish world peace, one (nation and individual) must live in the world and be a functioning part of it.

The other factor that endangers the possibilities of peace can be illustrated by the postwar era in which we are living. It can best be described as a period in which we are crying, "Wolf! Wolf!" and there is no wolf. Perhaps this attitude is much more dangerous than the other, for it seems that it can lead us more directly into the hysteria that is necessary for war. Then, to, it is a more real danger, for it has begun to embed itself very firmly into the minds of the American people. In the words of Justice Holmes, it is indeed a "clear and present danger."

This mob psychology has brought about the greatest paradox of modern times—the present attitudes of the American people. The United States presents itself to the world as the Apostle of Peace crying out in the wilderness for unity and faith among the nations of the world, yet it continues to manufacture quantities of atomic bombs and is continuing to talk of arming for the conflict to come. Our people speak daily of peace and the establishment of world order while their words are completely lost in the screaming headlines of the day. War-mongering has become the main story. It takes many different forms, subtle articles, emotional editorials, blaring headlines, front page stories, confidential inside reports, and innocent news items, yet the content is the same: we must fight, fight, fight, for we are being subversively encircled, and plans are being made for our destruction.

The people of the nation are no doubt mystified, and many have fallen into the blind alley that is being prepared for them. The question now is one of the possibilities of peace when the attitude of the people shows that they are not working toward peace. Can a nation establish (or help establish) peace when it does not manifest an attitude that would lead others to believe that it has faith in or truly desires peace?

It seems, then, that for the possibilities of peace to be enhanced, there must be a conscious development of at least two attitudes: (1) we must show to the nations of the world that we are sincerely interested in their problems for the betterment of humanity as a whole rather than for our own personal gain, and (2) we must cease the cry of "Wolf! Wolf!" and cry tolerance and understanding instead. I believe that if we extend the hand of brotherhood to the world in all sincerity, we shall be overwhelmed by the response of a world that is embittered and heartsick. Only if this is done can there be peace.

The Old-Time Religion

Someone has said, "If we could get religion like a Baptist, experience it like a Methodist, be positive about it like a Disciple, be proud of it like an Episcopalian, pay for it like a Presbyterian, propagate it like an Adventist, and enjoy it like a Negro—that would be some religion!"—Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick.

Random Thoughts

By EDWARD CHAPIN

DURING my "earlier years," I served as editor of a Civilian Conservation Camp publication which demanded a great quantity of material covering a variety of subjects. Besides being editor-in-chief, I also cut the stencils, turned the mimeograph, put the pages together, and delivered the finished product to an eager two hundred enrollees who anxiously scanned each page until they found their names staring back at them. The percentage of satisfied name-searchers was amazingly large, and it would be quite dishonest for me not to record that my name and full-blown title usually required an entire page.

Like myself, these men were the depression-bred youth of America, forever distrustful of their opportunities, yet eager for reward from some fancied abnormality. Many had already fought so hard that war, when it came, was just another battle. Can these same people, who have seen so much strife, accept peace and prosperity with its accompanying dullness and routine? I often wonder if the present international crisis is not a collective manifestation of the people of the world in emotional upheaval. If true, what better example could be found to illustrate man's ego . . . a world full of name-searchers.

Occasional daydreaming is a rather harmless pastime, so long as the millions who are doing it stay in different paths and limit themselves to the recommended dreams offered by our society. But the dream of power, the dream of the warrior, these are the ones so easily stirred and so easily controlled. To parachute, wounded, from a flaming B-24, to be captured and interned in a German prison camp—ah! this is the secret life of Walter Mitty come true, and within the reach of all. This is the stuff of radio, novels, movies, and just wait till the folks back home hear about this. Many found the dream ended with reality, but hesitate to reveal they were duped by this fraud. How many times have you heard or felt, "I wouldn't have missed living in the time of Franklin D. Roosevelt"?

Yet, apparently, our only hope is a society like our own with its millions of substitutes for the desire of death. I can see no hope for a communistic state with its false premise. In fact, the most outstanding trait I noticed in the Russian people was their dissatisfaction with their way of life. Of course, I was there only sixty days, and thirty of those under close guard. Nor do I think we could live peacefully together as a family of nations. Too many of us would envy and fear, creating a core of strife within each state. Distrust and secretiveness are the banners of today.

Several men have had an answer—One we claim to worship. Yet that philosophy has failed because the millions who claim to live by it only use it to seek relief from their sins and go right on sinning. Perhaps a good ending would start like this: "Our Father who art in heaven—"

The Judgment of Solomon

Paul Kruger, President of the Transvaal, once decided a dispute between two brothers about an inheritance of land in South Africa thus: "Let one brother divide the land, and let the other have first choice."—Sarah Gertrude Millin, Cecil Rhodes (Harper).

Attention, Saints in Southern Missouri

We are attempting to visit and minister to our nonresident members in the Southern Missouri District. We shall appreciate hearing from any who desire such visits, or from any who know of other members who do not take the Herald and so will not see this notice. Where there are several families close enough to assemble for services, we shall make regular appointments and, if sufficient interest is shown, arrange for a missionary series to be held later.

BEVARD.—Bert Richard, was born in Kellog, Michigan, and died November 11, 1947, at the age of sixty-five, at his home in Grass Valley, California, where he had lived for the past ten years. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church when a young man.

He leaves his wife, Nettie; five sons: Bert, Homer, Thaddeus, Douglas, and John; three daughters: Mrs. Genevieve Neilson of Vallejo, California; Mrs. June Cline of Sacramento, California; and Mrs. Della Dobson of Washington; a sister, Mrs. Blanche Sherman of Los Angeles, California; and eighteen grandchildren. Evangelist W. H. Dawson officiated at the funeral. Burial was at Grass Valley.

PEAKE.—Sylvia Peake, was born September 30, 1895, at Netawaka, Kansas, and died November 14, 1947, at the Independence Sanitarium. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church when eight years old and remained a faithful member throughout her life. She was a graduate of the Kansas State Teachers' College, Pittsburg, Kansas, and was a high school teacher and music supervisor for a number of years. She was formerly married to James Kerr and is survived by a daughter, Mary Margaret; her mother, Mary Peake of the home; her father, Warren Peake of Cameron, Missouri; and two sisters: Mrs. Clinton Cooper and Mrs. Earl Brown of Los Angeles, California. Services were conducted at the Carson Funeral Home in Independence. President F. Henry Edwards and Elder Claude Smith officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

FISHEL.—Agnes Mary Fletcher, was born in Fenton, Michigan, on July 27, 1861, and passed away in Flint, Michigan, on November 14, 1947. She was first married to Robert Gardiner, who died in 1896; ten children were born to this union. In 1904, she was married to Wesley O. Fishel, who died in 1907. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on March 17, 1899, at AuGres, Michigan. Since then, she has lived in Akron and Cleveland, Ohio, and for the past twenty years, made her home with her daughter, Mrs. Frank Atwood. She leaves one son; three daughters; sixteen grandchildren; and seventeen great-grandchildren. Elder Harry Simons was in charge of the funeral service. Interment was in Sunset Hills Cemetery.

MORGAN.—Marie Hollonze, was born February 22, 1873, at Keokuk, Iowa, and died at her home in Kansas City, Missouri, on November 15, 1947. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on June 3, 1894, and was married to Abraham Morgan on May 6, 1903. She was a student of the Book of Mormon and archaeology. For many years, she acted as official stenographer at the General Conferences. In her passing, the church loses a staunch member and a true mother in Israel.

She is survived by her husband; three daughters: Mrs. Nina Welch, Mrs. Anna Curry, and Mrs. Vera Thomason, all of Independence, Missouri; five sons: Donald C. and Gordon N. of Kansas City, Missouri; Hollister D. of Raytown, Missouri; Dave D. of Burlington, Iowa; and Roy T.; two sisters: Mrs. J. C. Goodwin of Lee's Summit, Missouri, and Mrs. A. A. Pitt of Park Ridge, Illinois; a brother, Clarence Clark of Milton, Florida; and twelve grandchildren. Bishops James F. Keir and Mark Siegfried officiated at the funeral. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

WOLFE.—John Franklin, son of Jacob and Letitia Wolfe, was born June 26, 1868, in Jessup, Iowa, and died November 11, 1947, in Kansas City, Missouri. Early in life, he moved with his family to a farm near Harveyville, Kansas. Later, as an employee of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe line, he made his home in Scranton, where he married Elizabeth Cairns on December 30, 1895. He became a member of the Reorganized Church on March 6, 1921, in Topeka. His hobby was music, and he belonged to a number of choruses including the Modoc Men's Chorus and the Messiah Choir. He also directed music at Fourth Church in Kansas City during his residence there. After twenty-three years with the railroad, he entered the mercantile business, owning and operating five stores. For two years prior to his illness, he was employed by the Kansas City Park Department. He was a member of the Masonic Lodge in Scranton.

He is survived by his wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Wolfe, and a daughter, Mrs. Florence Short, both of the home; two sons: Clayton Wolfe of Independence, Missouri, and Raleigh Wolfe of the home; a brother, Cyrus Wolfe of Emmett, Idaho; and five grandchildren. Services were held at the Roland Speaks Funeral Chapel in Independence. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

HOLMES.—Marie E., was born on February 4, 1883, at Stewartville, Missouri, and died at her home in Independence, Missouri, on October 2, 1947. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on March 7, 1897, at St. Joseph, Missouri, and remained a faithful and devoted member throughout her life. She was married to Lon R. Holmes in July, 1903; three children were born to this union. Her husband and all of her children, her sisters and brothers have become members of the church also.

She is survived by her husband; one son, Glen E. of Compton, California; two daughters: Una M. Young of Independence, and Grace E. Hampton of Yakima, Washington; a sister, Georgia Ingram of Detroit, Michigan; her step-mother, Mrs. Mary Jackson; a half-brother, William Leach; two half-sisters: Mrs. Della Cline of St. Joseph and Mrs. Minnie Mulhback of Omaha, Nebraska; and seven grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted at Stone Church, Elders Claude A. Smith and Hubert Case officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

HOISINGTON.—Earl F., son of George A. and Ruth E. Hoisington, was born December 30, 1889, at Little Sioux, Iowa, and died October 24, 1947, at his home in Portland, Oregon. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on August 22, 1900, at Harlan, Iowa. He married Ada B. Bunnell on July 16, 1917. He was ordained a priest on September 25, 1912; an elder on February 1, 1920; and a high priest on July 15, 1934, faithfully performing in that office until his death. A never-tiring worker, he served eight years as pastor at Boise, Idaho; also as district president and bishop's agent in the Idaho district. While residing in Independence, Missouri, he served as group supervisor, assisted the church auditor, and acted as pastor at Lee's Summit for a time. On moving to Portland, Oregon, he served one year as pastor, and as local and district church school supervisor. He was a veteran of World War I, receiving the purple heart and silver star for distinguished service. He was loved and admired by all who knew him for his gentleness, humility, and devotion to his family, friends, and church.

He is survived by his wife, Ada, and two children: Mrs. Emerald Hickman of Dallas, Texas; Earl E. of the home; his mother, Mrs. Ruth Hoisington Smith of Harlan, Iowa; three brothers: Leonard G. of Portland, Oregon; Glen R. of Chicago, Illinois; Cecil I. of Denver, Colorado; and two grandchildren. Apostle Roscoe E. Davey officiated at the funeral, assisted by Elder Elmer A. Larson. Interment was in the Lincoln Memorial Park Cemetery.

YEAGER.—George, son of Frederick and Angeline Yeager, was born January 19, 1874, at Riga, Michigan, and died October 21, 1947, at Toledo Hospital, where he was taken nine days before when he suffered a coronary heart attack. On July 7, 1898, he was married to Alma Haak; three children were born to them.

He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on December 27, 1908. In 1909, he was ordained a teacher; in 1915, a priest; and in 1916, an elder. Moving from Mecosta, Michigan, to Sylvania, Ohio, in 1914, he was instrumental in organizing the branch there. He remained a faithful worker throughout his life. He leaves his wife; two sons: Roy G. and Clyde C.; a daughter, Mrs. Susie Clark, all of Sylvania; three sisters: Mrs. Anna Reed, Mrs. Eliza Griffin, and Mrs. Mary Engleheart; two brothers: Henry and John, of Sylvania; six grandchildren; and two great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the church, with Elder H. W. Crandall in charge, assisted by Elder Lloyd Linn. Interment was in Toledo Memorial Park Cemetery in Sylvania.

ELIASON.—John, was born in Soda Springs, Idaho, on September 1, 1867, and died at his home in Deer Lodge, Montana, on September 24, 1947, following a long illness. He was an active member of the Reorganized Church, serving as an elder from his youth. He was married to Annie Beck on June 14, 1893; nine children were born to this union.

He is survived by his wife; six sons: Ernest of Independence, Missouri; Warren of Leon, Iowa; Harvey and Leonard of Deer Lodge; Kenneth of Dillon, Montana; and Howard of Fresno, California; and three daughters: Mrs. Harry Lorange of Lamoni, Iowa; Mrs. Lee Landon of Council Bluffs, Iowa; and Mrs. Harley Lorange of Missoula, Montana. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Deer Lodge, Elders F. M. Dowell and Joseph Beck officiating.

FENN.—Charles E., was born in a covered wagon at Fort Bridger, Wyoming, en route to Utah on August 28, 1861. He operated several farms near Carson, Iowa, until 1906, at which time he moved to Boulder, Colorado, because of ill health. In 1919, he moved to Denver where, after a lingering illness, he passed away October 18, 1947. On October 28, 1884, he was married to Myrtle Heft; had he lived until October 28, this year, they could have celebrated their sixty-third wedding anniversary. To this union seven children were born, two having preceded their father in death. Survivors include the widow; two daughters: Mrs. T. S. Pointer of Denver, and Mrs. Anna Poland of Sacramento, California; three sons: Ervin, Earl, and Weaver Fenn, all of Carson, Iowa; nineteen grandchildren, and twenty-five great-grandchildren.

Mr. Fenn was a member of the Reorganized Church, having been baptized forty-eight years ago in Carson by Elder David Chambers. A service was held in Denver, after which the body was shipped back to Carson where the final service was held in the church with Elder V. D. Ruch in charge, assisted by Elders O. A. Currie and Peter Heuermann. Burial was in the Carson cemetery.

EPPERLY.—Arthur Herbert, was born December 14, 1881, at Joy, Illinois, and was fatally injured in a motor car accident on September 20 while returning home from a visit with his brother. He died in the Independence Sanitarium on September 25. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on May 23, 1897, in Duncan, Illinois, and was a member of the Buffalo Prairie Branch, one of the oldest churches in the Reorganization. Throughout most of his life, Brother Epperly was a farmer in Illinois. For the past two years, however, he had made his home in Independence, Missouri, with his nieces, Mrs. Nora Etter and Mrs. Mabel Rathmann. Here he assisted in caring for church property.

He is survived by a brother, Hyrum Epperly of Kewanee, Illinois; and a sister, Myrtle Jones of Forestburg, Alberta. Services were held at the Speaks Chapel, Elders Glaude A. Smith and Everett West officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

ARNOLD.—F. M., was born at Toulon, Illinois, on May 29, 1859, and died at his home in Houston, Texas, on August 1, 1947. He united with the Reorganized Church in 1890 and was called to the priesthood in 1929. Before moving to Texas in 1924, his home was in Mapleton, Kansas. He is survived by his wife, Carrie; a daughter, Mrs. Pearl Holstein; and three sons: Frank L., Allen V., and Glenn G., all of Houston.

JENSEN.—Soren K., son of Mrs. Ora Jensen and the late J. P. Jensen, was born in Nebraska on September 8, 1905, and died at a hospital in Grand Island, Nebraska, of a heart attack (date of death not given). After graduation from the Blair, Nebraska, high school, he studied engineering at the University of Nebraska. He was employed for a number of years by the state highway department, later becoming a project engineer for the PWA. At the time of his death, he was an official of the Diamond Engineering Company. He was a member of the Reorganized Church, the Masonic Lodge, the Engineers Club, the Grand Island Chamber of Commerce, Liederkrantz, and the Elks Lodge. On October 12, 1934, he was married to Frances Lucille Bradt.

Besides his wife and mother, he leaves two small children: Soren, Jr., and Linda Ann; three brothers: Howard Jensen of Arlington; John J. Jensen of Kearney; and Dr. Alfred C. Jensen of Los Angeles; two sisters: Mrs. Eldred Larson of Des Moines, and Mrs. Warren R. Baller of Lincoln. Funeral services were held at Grand Island and Blair, Elder John Blackmore officiating at each. Interment was in the Blair cemetery.

HARRISON.—Emma Caroline, was born at Neola, Iowa, in 1872, and died September 21, 1947, in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in 1895. She was the granddaughter of Elder John Galop, who was among those escaping from Utah in the early days of Mormonism.

Surviving are her husband, Herbert Harrison; two sons: Lloyd Cheeseman, who served during the war with the R. C. A. F.; and Dyke Cheeseman, formerly pastor of the Topeka, Kansas, congregation; two daughters: Bessey Abbey of Hamilton, Ontario, and Millie Waddell of Saskatoon; eighteen grandchildren; and fourteen great-grandchildren. Elder W. J. Cornish and Seventy E. A. Ledsworth officiated at the funeral service.

SHIPPY.—Lewis B., was born in March, 1886, at Chatham, Ontario, the son of Mr. and Mrs. George Shippy, and died suddenly on October 28, 1947, at Los Angeles, California. He was baptized at Blenheim, Ontario, at the age of eight. During his life, he was ordained to the offices of teacher, priest, and elder; he served as pastor in San Jose, Danvers Street Church in San Francisco, and Pasadena. He was also an active worker in the Portland, Oregon, and Los Angeles, California, branches. He never spared himself in his devotion to what he considered his duty in ministering to the needs of others. All things were subordinated to the interests of the church, in which he found his truest joy. Especially did he give himself to pastoral visitation, and the many who have received of this ministry will bless his memory. Supporting him always in his work was his wife, Mary. He had held several responsible positions on the west coast and for the last six years of his life, he was employed as treasurer of the Win-throat Pump Company in Alhambra, California.

He is survived by his wife; four daughters: Mrs. Luella Hurst, San Carlos, California; Mrs. Mary Knowlton, Avana, California; Mrs. Wanda J. Quilici, South Arcadia, California; and Mrs. Margaret C. Heistand, Independence, Missouri; three brothers: Frank of Lexington, Missouri; Harry of Independence; and William of Mexico City, Mexico. He also leaves six grandchildren. The funeral was conducted by Patriarch Walter Barker and Elder John Rushton at the Little Stone Church in Alhambra. Interment was at Independence, Missouri.

COLEMAN.—David Albert, was born February 2, 1875, and died at his home in Spokane, Washington, on October 18, 1947. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on November 6, 1906, and ordained an elder on October 28, 1934. His life of service to the Saints in Spokane will stand as a challenge to them for many years. By trade, he was a carpenter.

Surviving are his wife, Sarah Ellen of the home; six daughters: Mrs. Orpha Curtis and Mrs. Edna Woods of Spokane; Mrs. Faye Walter, Mrs. Catherine Lawson, and Mrs. Sadie Belle Smiley, all of Seattle, Washington; and Mrs. LaRayne Wheeler of Puyallup, Washington; six sons: N. P., Albert F., Harvey H., and Delbert E. of Spokane; Dave V. and Clark E. of Seattle; three sisters: Mrs. S. A. Tyler and Mrs. James G. Patrick of Spokane, and Mrs. William Wright of California; twentyseven grandchildren; and four great-grandchildren. Seventy Phillip Moore and Elder L. A. Whiting officiated at the funeral.

BEEM.—Lovina H., daughter of John and Sarah Joslin, was born February 7, 1860, near Anamosa, Iowa, and died October 28, 1947, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Maude Larson, in Independence, Missouri. At the age of twenty, she was married to Alonzo J. Beem; five children were born to this marriage. Until 1885, they lived on a farm near Anamosa; from there they moved to Smith Center, Kansas, returning to Anamosa in 1893. Mrs. Beem became a member of the Reorganized Church in 1911. Following the death of her husband in 1937, she made her home with her daughter in Independence.

She is survived by two sons: Ray E. of Independence, and Cash C. of Los Angeles, California; three daughters: Mrs. Maude Larson and Josephine Welch of Independence, and Merta Drago of Martelle, Iowa; one brother, John G. Joslin, Lyndonville, New York; twenty-five grandchildren; forty-one great-grandchildren; and five great-great-grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elders Clair Green and Amos Higdon. Interment was in the Anamosa cemetery.

MINKLER.—Clifford G., was born June 28, 1897, in Lorain, Ohio, and died September 1, 1947, at the Cleveland Clinic following an illness which lasted nine months. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on October 11, 1908, and was ordained to the office of elder in 1928. For eighteen years, he served as pastor of the Lorain-Elyria Branch. On March 8, 1922, he was married to Eleanor Buck of Avon, Ohio; one son was born to this union. For thirty-one years, he was an employee of the National Bank of Commerce in Lorain.

He leaves his wife; his son, Dale; and other relatives. Elder Guy E. Hammond of Akron officiated at the funeral service. Burial was in Riverside Cemetery, Berlin Heights, Ohio.

Headquarters Reports

REPRESENTATIVES of the Department of Religious Education, F. M. McDowell, John Darling, and Edna Easter recently visited Grace-land College and interviewed about forty young people, members of the Camp and Kit Club, in an effort to recruit young leaders to assist in conducting church camps next year. In a group session, there was a fine presentation of the history and aspects of camping and a panel discussion.

GUIDE-LINES TO LEADERSHIP will be issued from the press soon with its January-February-March issue. It is filled with good material for local leaders and the programs they need. A subscription to this fine publication is worth many times the one dollar a year it costs.

Such Strength Has He

The wind blows harsh and bitter breath
 Across the country side.
 Atop a hillock, standing in its simple strength,
 An oak tree spreads protecting arms about his friends.
 The sumac, bare of flame, now sighing in the cold;
 An infant ash, bent low in suppliant prayer;
 Young maple, swaying with each thrust of rapier ice.
 They look to him, the oak, and seem to move
 Their winter-withered branches near,
 As if to borrow from that strength
 To quiet fear.

AUDITORIUM NEWS

Lamoni, Iowa.—Apostle C. G. Mesley was in this city November 20 to plan the stake missionary program for the first half of 1948. Evangelist John R. Grice is scheduled to be assigned to labor there during the first three months. James Daugherty, seventy, will be there in January. Elder Fred O. Davies, recently from England, will conduct services at several places in April and May. A Yuletide priesthood conference is planned for the stake, to meet December 27 and 28 at the Coliseum.

San Diego, California.—The visit of President Israel A. Smith to this city was given good attention in the "San Diego Union" for November 28, displaying also a photograph of President Smith and Elder Peter S. Whalley, general church appointee there. Apostle W. Wallace Smith also participated in the services at this time.

Baptisms.—For the ten months ending October 31, we have had a total of 2,987 baptisms. This is the best record for any similar period in several years. It is in excess of the total baptisms for any one of twelve out of the last twenty years. Our baptisms in September totaled 436; in October, 269. Lansing, Michigan, and Des Moines, Iowa, each report eight baptisms in October.

Southern Mission.—President F. Henry Edwards and Apostle Maurice L. Draper were scheduled to participate in the dedication of the church at Marlin, Texas, December 7. Also on their itinerary were San Antonio, Houston, Texas; and Escatawpa, Mississippi. The Gulf States Priesthood Institute will be held at Pensacola, Florida, December 12 to 14.

Miami, Florida.—Plans are in progress for a new church here, modern in architecture, to be erected of concrete block surfaced in white stucco, with white tile roof, aluminum window frames, and blue stained glass windows.

Houston, Texas.—A fine ordination service here November 23 gave the church the strength of the following officers: elders, Lon Mitchell, Ed Thompson, and Roy Vandel; deacon, Don Bailey; priest, Bun Bobbitt.

College and University Members.—At a fall meeting, Dr. F. M. McDowell and others discussed with representatives of our members on the faculties and student bodies of several colleges and universities the question, "How can the church better minister to the young people in college and university groups?" Many fine suggestions were received and progress made toward better service. On December 5 to 7, Brother McDowell will meet with church members at Oklahoma A. & M. College at Stillwater, in social fellowship, forum discussion, and individual conferences. We have about twenty-five members there, and in addition a number of young people of high school age in the city, who will also be present. Grant Dobson, formerly of Independence, who served in the European Theatre in the late war, is giving fine service as leader of this group.

Guide-Lines to Leadership.—This excellent quarterly publication carries many fine articles of benefit in local work and leadership. It needs much wider use and circulation, and every pastor should be sure that it is available for the use of departmental workers.

Meditations Between Thanksgiving and Christmas

By Elbert A. Smith

OUR ANNUAL Thanksgiving Day is fading into the past, and Christmas is drawing rapidly nearer. Those two great days of celebration coming so close together stimulate our thinking, our emotions, our imagination, and our impulses to demonstrate in action something of their meaning. Hence, this is by way of expressing between Thanksgiving Day and Christmas reflections.

An annual day of Thanksgiving, a religious festival, is a typical American institution. It goes back something like three hundred and twenty-six years to the first Thanksgiving Day observed by our Pilgrim Fathers. They had just completed their harvest and met for feasting and prayer with some of their Indian friends. In material things, compared to us, they had little for which to be thankful. Their harvest consisted of six acres of barley and peas and twenty acres of corn—only twenty acres of corn. It goes beyond saying that the sandy soil of Cape Cod did not produce the best corn. The short and stocky and irascible Captain Miles Standish would be lost in a field of Iowa corn.

I AM REMINDED that at one time when I was a very small boy, I was lost in a field of Iowa corn. I was in a lumber wagon while the hired man was picking the corn when the team became frightened and ran away helter-skelter. I was thrown out in the middle of forty acres of tall Iowa corn. When I picked myself up out of the dirt, I was confused and lost. I scarcely knew one direction from another, excepting straight up. I knew straight up because the tall corn pointed that direction, far above my head. By the simple expedient of trudging along between two corn rows, at last I came to the edge of the field and fortunately to a familiar road which led home. Strangely enough I was still lost and confused, the directions were "turned around," and the familiar road looked strange and seemed to lead in the wrong direction. For a time I feared to trust that old road home. Today the whole world seems to be confused and lost. People long for peace and security and a degree of prosperity, and there is a road marked out long ago by the One whose birthday we soon celebrate, that would lead all the nations of the earth to peace and happiness and plenty but few there be who seem to trust that road.

GOING BACK to the Pilgrim Fathers—compared to us, they had little of material things for which to return thanks. They had established a frail bridgehead on the beach of a new continent. The ocean was behind them, and the wilderness was ahead of them. About half of their number had died during the preceding winter. I have stood on burial hill at Plymouth and marveled at their courage and their faith. They had spiritual things to be thankful for in abundance. They had found that which they sought, religious and political liberty. They rejoiced in this though they had paid a grievous price. On the tomb of their Governor Bradford is an inscription in Latin which has been interpreted to read: "Do not basely relinquish that which the fathers with great difficulty won."

The Pilgrims had another thing to be thankful for. They had negotiated peace between themselves and some formerly hostile Indians; and had adjusted quarrels between warring tribes of Indians. So Governor Bradford wrote: "There is now great peace among the Indians themselves, which was not formerly; neither would have been but for us; and we, for our parts, walk as safely in the wood, as in the highways of England." This happy situation they had promoted by a combination of patient diplomacy and a courageous show of strength. They built stockades, looked to their weapons and kept their powder dry. When the Indians sent a threatening message accompanied by a bundle of arrows wrapped in the skin of a rattlesnake, Captain Standish returned the skin filled with bullets; and with the message that they wished peace but were quite ready to defend themselves.

Alas even yet today, while we wish for peace, it is necessary and for a long time past has been necessary to remain adequately armed with up-to-date weapons of defense. (Even Christ on a certain occasion of emergency said to his disciples, "He who hath a purse, let him take it, and likewise his scrip: and he who hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one."—Luke 22: 36.) But let us not forget that the Book of Mormon promise of protection to America was also contingent upon righteousness.

IN THE FAVORED land of America, we have had many material things for which to give thanks; for example, the greatest harvest of wheat ever gathered by any nation in the history of the world. We have had the necessities of life and an abundance of comforts and even luxuries such as the Pilgrim Fathers

Across the Desk

Last week Elders Leonard Lea and Kenneth Graham and I talked with Sister Christiana Steadman Salyards for a couple of hours in her home in Independence. It was a very pleasant and stimulating experience. Despite her eighty-six years, Sister Salyards is an intelligent and amusing conversationalist. Her mind is certainly not old, nor has she lost her lifetime interest in the young people of the church. This was apparent when she turned aside from the main business of our visit long enough to give us a very vigorous suggestion concerning the publication of a young people's monthly magazine.

We met to discuss Sister Salyard's autobiography, which has been in course of preparation for several months, and which is now being revised in preparation for publication within a year. I have known Sister Salyards rather well for about a quarter of a century, but it was not until this visit that I learned that she was a granddaughter of Father John Landers, an elder in the early church who made a significant contribution in the early days of the Reorganization. He died fifty-five years ago at the age of ninety-five. Sister Salyards took up her life work for the church during that same year.

She will always be known for her work in connection with the quarterlies. She told us some fascinating stories of the beginning of this work. Among other things, I learned for the first time that Sister Marietta Walked pledged her property to make good any loss sustained in publishing the first quarterlies, but it was after we came away that I learned some of the details of the sacrifices which Sister Salyards herself made in connection with them.

In her conversation, as in her writing, there is a strong note of testimony. I thoroughly enjoyed the time we spent with her, and I am already looking forward to the publication of some sections from her book in the Herald and, later, to the publication of the book itself.

Convention of the Quorums of Twelve and Seventy

A convention of the Quorums of Twelve and Seventy will be held at Central Church, Thirtieth and Tracy, Kansas City, Missouri, beginning January 3 and ending January 9, 1948. Apostle G. G. Lewis writes that this is the first such convention to be held during his experience, and that it is expected much benefit will be had. Because the church at large will be interested in this convention, and because the topics discussed may give suggestions to many others, the program follows:

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3

Fellowship Dinner, 7:30 p.m., C. G. Mesley in charge, Central Church, Kansas City.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 4

Fellowship of Prayer and Testimony, 2:30 p.m., P. M. Hanson and E. Y. Hunker.
Preaching 7:30 p.m., P. M. Hanson.

MONDAY, JANUARY 5; FRIDAY, JANUARY 9

Devotions, 9:30 a.m. Theme: "Go Ye Into All the World"—D. Blair Jensen in charge.

Lecture, 10:00 a.m.

Monday, "The Apostle Paul and World Evangelism," D. Blair Jensen.

Tuesday and Wednesday, "Gateways of Personal Approach," E. Y. Hunker.

Thursday and Friday, "Elements of Spiritual Power," George Njeim.

Missionary Themes, 11:00 a.m.

Monday, "The Deity of Christ," D. T. Williams.

Tuesday, "The Apostasy of the New Testament Church," E. J. Gleazer.

Wednesday, "The Fullness of the Gospel Restored," W. Wallace Smith.

Thursday, "The Use of the Book of Mormon in Missionary Work," H. I. Velt.

Friday, "After Death—What?" C. G. Mesley. Dinner, 12:00 noon.

Forum, 2:00 p.m., "Missionary Perspectives," W. Wallace Smith in charge.

Monday, "The Missionary Task of the Church," A. A. Oakman.

Tuesday, "Our Missionary Policy and Goal," G. G. Lewis.

Wednesday, "Missionary Administration," C. R. Hield.

Thursday, "Distinctive Functions of the Seventy," Percy Farrow and D. T. Williams.

Friday, "Great Missionary Preaching," E. J. Gleazer.

Recreation, 3:30 p.m., F. E. Butterworth and Phillip Moore.

Supper, 6:00 p.m.

Fellowship, 6:30 p.m., Music and Archaeological Slides, A. A. Oakman, P. M. Hanson, C. R. Hield.

Monday, "Visual Aids," R. E. Davey.

Tuesday, "Procedure in Closing—With Prospects," Z. Z. Renfroe.

Wednesday, "Cottage Meetings," James C. Daugherty.

Thursday, "Tracting and Visiting," M. L. Draper.

Evening Devotions, 9:30 p.m., Donald E. Harvey in charge.

Monday, January 5, these items will be re-arranged to permit all to attend the Kansas City Stake Men's Club Dinner and Program, 7:00 to 9:00 p.m.

Corrections

Several errors are found in the article, "Gog Versus His Maker," by Apostle D. T. Williams, in the Herald of November 15. Readers are requested to note the following corrections.

On page 5, first line, the word should be "Gog" instead of "God." In the first paragraph, line 10, the word "their" should be "other." On page 6, first column, fourth line from bottom, the tense is incorrect, and the phrase should read "they helped," instead of "they will help."

An error has been found in the new edition of A Commentary on the Doctrine and Covenants, page 65, line 13. The phrase "made of glass" should read, "made of brass."

Kelley Hall

Graceland College alumni who visited the campus during the recent Homecoming were pleased to find a new building on the campus, a wooden structure neatly made and attractively painted, located a little south and east of Zimmerman Hall. A search for a name was made and, according to the Lamoni Chronicle of November 27, it is to be named "Kelley Hall," in honor of Bishop E. L. Kelley who directed church finances at the time Graceland College was established and who did so much for it. This is an appropriate move, and it should bring satisfaction to church people. The building can be made permanent at any time with a covering of brick.

A Spiritual Giant

By Reed M. Holmes

WE WALK AS giants on the earth. Our eyes, equipped with lenses, reach out and bring the stars near to us, or they may probe the cells and tiny things of earth. Our arms, lengthened by transport, reach out to grasp food and metals from all the earth. Our legs, transformed by airplane, are better than Seven League boots—we can step to Europe by tomorrow. Our fingers, lengthened by drills, may probe the earth and bring forth riches, or, strengthened by bulldozers, may move mountains. Our speech, given wing by radio, may call to the farthest reaches of the earth. Our fists, made mighty by atomic power, can fell 100,000 in one foul swing. We walk as giants on the earth, but like the giant dinosaur, we lack a knowledge of ourselves . . . we have a tiny soul.

Occasionally, a spiritual giant walks the earth. He may be a Michael Farraday or George Washington Carver of science. He may be a Bates or Bok of business. He may be a Kreisler or DaVinci in music and art. He may be a Moses, a Jeremiah, a Luther, a Wesley, a Roger Williams in religion. Spiritual giants bring meaning to life. They consider themselves as instruments in the hands of God to accomplish his purposes.

We want to tell you of such a spiritual giant, one whom we believe to have been a Prophet of God.

WE BRING YOU the story of a lad who was born in Sharon, Vermont, to humble folk of fine heritage. In childhood, he was a boy's boy. He was active and vigorous. He was helpful to his parents. He knew how to play games with others. He was adventurous. And he had faith and serious thoughts.

He was to grow into manhood as a tall, well-built, and strong individual. He was to be a man of light complexion, light hair, blue eyes, a man of mild countenance, friendly appearance, and with a steady penetrating glance which could pierce the innermost heart.

We are speaking of Joseph Smith, an American prophet.

In 1820, when the Smiths were living near Palmyra, New York, three of the local churches combined to present a revival. It was well-attended, enthusiasm was high, and many "decided for Christ." Then the revival ended, and each denomination grabbed for the converts. A most unchristian squabble ensued.

The lad, Joseph, felt that something was wrong when the disciples of the Prince of Peace fell to battle with each other. He wanted to join a church, but which one of these quarreling factions should it be? For a lad of fourteen, he did a very wise thing—he turned to the Bible. No, he didn't find a catalogue of denominations with a star after the good ones. He did find the following statement in James: "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him."

Acting in faith, Joseph went into a grove near his home and knelt to pray. As he prayed, a light stronger than the sun at midday surrounded him, and he heard a voice say, "This is my beloved Son, hear him." Soon after, he was instructed to join none of the churches; then he was told that he would become an instrument in the hands of God in restoring the Church of Jesus Christ.

LET US NOT BE surprised at this, neither at the faith of the lad who sincerely expected God to reveal His will, nor at the foretelling of a Restoration. Our Bible, our observation of continuing creation, and our hearts all unite to tell us that God is unchangeable. If he spoke yesterday to further the work of redemption, he will speak today as well. If we are to be true to our spiritual heritage, we must believe in a God who reveals himself. As for the Restoration, it is not without Scriptural backing, and the leaders of the Reformation—Martin Luther, John Wesley, and Roger Williams—had also spoken of it.

Joseph was told that the creeds and practices were wrong, and we have but to view the revision of creeds and practices since 1820 to realize this was true. We have but to remember such beliefs as hell fire and brimstone and infant damnation to see that the message to Joseph was right.

He was told to prepare for a great work. In the next ten years, he had other experiences of inspiration. Perhaps the most remarkable during this time was his being directed to the spot where he found a stone box in the earth of Hill Cumorah. Among the things discovered was a set of records which proved to be the story of the Ancient Americans. Joseph was given power to translate the hieroglyphics of these ancient people. The book is now known as the Book of Mormon. Its remarkable story is being authenticated by each discovery in the ruins of South and Central America. Its most significant message—that the great and revered culture hero, Quetzalcoatl, was indeed Jesus Christ who had come to minister to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

THE BOOK OF MORMON was published in 1830 and, in that same year, Joseph and five other young men (their average age was less than twenty-five) met to organize the church. They did organize a church which they felt to be a Restoration of the Church of Jesus Christ. They incorporated a fullness of the gospel with the ancient gifts, patterned after the New Testament church, and with a ministry called by revelation from God.

The new church was neither Catholic nor Protestant. Believing that Catholicism, through the process of apostasy, had lost authority to represent Christ, and had, indeed, become quite different from the original through moral decadence, preoccupation with temporal authority, and the accretion of paganism, the new church could not and would not claim connection. Believing that any continuity of authority was broken and lost, the new church felt that only God had the right to plant that authority again, and that Reformation could not restore it to its original potency. In the mind of Joseph and his followers, the new church was a Restoration of the "ancient order of things" with God the Father and Christ the Son taking the initiative.

In the fourteen years between 1830 and 1844, Joseph Smith lived an active and fruitful life. He rallied more than 200,000 people to the cause, sent missionary forces abroad, built schools, temples, cities and molded a great organization.

IN THE EARLY 1830's, a portion of the church was instructed to move to Independence, Missouri, to establish communities based on stewardship and equality. "From each according to his ability, to each according to his need"—this was to be the mode of life. By diligence and industry, each was to secure for himself and family sufficient to care for their "just needs and just wants" and the surplus was to be consecrated to the good of the community. A system of brotherhood economics under God was to be developed.

They ran into difficulty in Independence. They were Yankees, many of them, and abolitionists at that. Missouri was a slave state and the center of slave disputes. Frontier tempers were very near the surface. There were arguments about religion, politics, and property. Eventually, there was conflict and the Saints were driven to Illinois. The State of Missouri has since acknowledged its regret at the dark stain on its history.

In Illinois, the story was different. The political parties in this free state catered to their vote and all was rosy. A liberal charter was granted to the city of Nauvoo, Joseph's city beautiful. The church grew, and the city grew. As the city became the largest in the state, it became more and more important politically. There came a time when the Saints could hardly agree with either of the dominant parties. Joseph, wisely or unwisely, signified his opposition by filing for the presidency of the United States. His platform was a monument to his integrity and foresight, especially in his proposed treatment of the slavery question.

By withdrawing the possibility of support for either of the prominent parties, Joseph and the Saints cleared the way for persecution. It was quick in coming. Political feeling ran high. A group of men, ousted from the church for loose living, took advantage of the turmoil and published an attack in a new paper. The Nauvoo city council ruled the paper a nuisance and ordered the mayor to have the establishment and paper removed without delay. The order to destroy the press was not uncommon for that frontier day but it was unwise and precipitated rash action.

THERE WAS MUCH agitation against the Saints, and the destruction of the press touched off the flame. Joseph Smith made a report of the affair to the governor and stated that if there was any doubt as to the legality of proceedings, all officials involved would submit to investigation. Mob violence was threatened as Joseph and his brother Hyrum went to Carthage to await the decision of the tribunal. The governor ordered the militia to protect them. On the date fixed for the examination, the militia was diminished. An armed mob invaded the jail and shot Joseph and Hyrum Smith to death.

Within a few years, his work was taken up and carried on by his son, Joseph Smith III. The term, "Reorganized," was added to the name of the church to signify difference from those who had done dishonor to the name of the church in Utah and elsewhere. Brigham Young had taken about 10,000 members with him to Utah and there introduced beliefs and practices contrary to the original teachings of the church.

Once more the Saints dwell in Nauvoo and Independence. By their industry and integrity, their position has become one of honor and respect. The son and grandsons of the Prophet have given wise leadership to the church. Once more there is an implementation of the dream of communities based on loyalty to Christ, as a type and prophecy of the kingdom of God.

BELIEFS IN THE CHURCH today are the same as they were in the early days of the Restoration, which, incidentally, establishes the legal right of succession. There is belief in God as our Heavenly Father—a Father ever interested in his children and seeking to restore them to their sonship, and ever willing to reveal his will to them, which is basic to all else. Belief in Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God, runs parallel in importance. Belief in continuous revelation carries provision for and the expectancy of an open canon of scripture. The church believes in an authoritative priesthood, called by revelation, an honor not taken unto oneself nor automatically qualified for in education, but a calling by divine designation on the basis of integrity, devotion, and capacity for service. Offices of the priesthood found in the New Testament are to be found in the organization of the church. The principles of faith, repentance, baptisms of water and the Holy Spirit, the laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment are to be found in the church. The spiritual gifts are given expression in the life of the people. The ideal of stewardship is taught. The City of Zion, a community of brotherhood in which men and women of faith, objectified and implemented in stewardship, become an ensign to the nations, is the object of our prayers and our efforts.

WAS JOSEPH SMITH A PROPHET? He carried the earmarks. First of all, and basic to every prophet, he was honest and upright. He was true to the vision of Christ which motivated him. He was a critic of his times, bringing the light of God to bear upon the inconsistencies of his day. He established the Word of God as all prophets have sought to do through the ages. He prophesied. Many of his prophecies have been fulfilled already, while others are even now in the process of fulfillment. In 1832, he gave warning of the war between the States, even to designating the place of its beginning, the nations which should become involved, and other elements which were fulfilled to the smallest detail. In a world which needs prophetic guidance, he offers light and interpretation. And, like so many other prophets, he sealed his testimony by giving his life.

We believe he was a prophet, an instrument in the hands of God, a spiritual giant.

Having Been Commissioned

BY RAY WHITING

AUTHORITY IS AN important factor in Latter Day Saint religion. We believe that no one has the right to represent God, or to officiate for him in any way unless he is "called of God, as was Aaron." But having been "called," this authority has meaning and binding power.

When one so authorized raises his voice in baptism and says, "having been commissioned," it means that the minister is really baptizing by the authority of Jesus Christ, and that both God and the candidate are under great responsibility. When one who has been "commissioned" places his hands on another in confirmation, ordination, or in blessing, a binding act is performed, and the sanction and blessing of heaven follows.

It is because of this "authority" of God—this act by one "having been commissioned" which unites God and man and which bestows His blessing and powers—that this church is so vitally concerned about the solemnization of marriages. Something divine should and will occur if this is done by the "authority" of God. This is the reason for the instruction given in Doctrine and Covenants 111: 1, which says: "Therefore, we believe . . . that the solemnization should be performed by a presiding high priest, high priest, bishop, elder, or priest" all of whom have been called of God and authorized to speak and to act in His stead in contracting marriages. God wants a hand in the establishing of every Latter Day Saint home. He wants his blessing and authority upon it. By being married by a minister who has the right to speak for God, a couple can truly say, "God hath joined together."

THE CHURCH, however, as further reading indicates, does not prohibit "those persons who are desirous to get married of being married by other authority." If a couple does not want the "authority of God" nor the blessing of the church upon their marriage, they can go to a justice of the peace, who has only the authority of some county, or to someone else who may have the authority granted by the laws and customs of a state. The church will recognize this couple as being legally married according to the civil law, for, quoting again, "We believe that it is not right to prohibit members of this church from marrying out of the church, if it be their determination to do so." Meaning, "out of the church authority" or laws, if it "be their determination to do so." The instruction is dealing with the authority to be used in marriage and has no reference to marrying non-members.

Furthermore, it is inferred that those who do not sense the significance of God's authority, (and this would apply in baptism, ordination, or in marriage) and who fail to comprehend the value of having the blessing of heaven upon such an important act, are "considered weak in the faith of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." Again, nothing is said about marrying persons not of the church.

LATTER DAY SAINTS who are so firmly grounded in the deep and significant beliefs of the Restoration as to insist that, whether they be baptized, ordained, or married, it be by the authority and under the blessing of heaven are "strong in the faith," and have gone a long way toward converting their nonmember companions to this church.

Such can truthfully say, "God hath joined together," while those who are so indifferent to the will of God as to enter into the most sacred and vital of human relation-

Zion's Communion

By Glen N. Johnson

MINISTERS OF THE Reorganized Church are often asked the question, "Why are you people close communionists?" It is a proper question and must be answered. It does seem rather strange for a group to take such a position regarding the Lord's Supper. Other organizations inform us that partaking of the Lord's Supper is one of the finest expressions of Christian fellowship—that this fellowship binds them into a great spiritual family. A brief explanation is due those seeking information regarding this subject.

The first consideration must be that any principle, ordinance, or sacrament has only relative value and significance—relative in the sense that it is not an end in itself but a means to a higher end. That higher end is the expression of a higher will in the experiences of the human family.

Let us look at this problem from the background of New Testament literature. All Christendom, as such, has its historical roots in this early period and, having its source there, must find its same basic material for discussion of problems common to all. A close reading of this material will reveal that Jesus was concerned with the problem of ministerial leadership. He chose his disciples for a definite purpose and that was to lead men into the kingdom of God. Those to whom he gave authority to lead men into the kingdom were prophets in their own rights; they were men who were commissioned to perform the ordinances and sacraments of his church. These men had a moral obligation to do the things which they saw him do. Any departure from this meant rebellion against the God of heaven who revealed the way.

THE TIME AND ENERGY expended by Jesus to bring forth the kingdom has never been measured by any man before or since His advent. All we can do is learn to appreciate in the measure of our devotion to the task assigned us those things which were common to His ministry and related to it. He began a ministry which was to culminate in the realization of the will of God in the lives of men. One of the first movements to bring this to pass was the instrument of priesthood as a part of the ecclesiastical system called the church. Growing out of the very nature of the ministry of these men, many were baptized into the church, which was his spiritual representation on earth. The priesthood of his church was to perform the ordinances of the church, and those ordinances were to lead men into the kingdom of God. The ordinances were highly important principles of salvation when related to the coming kingdom. The ordinances and sacraments became nothing more than rituals when not so related.

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was the greatest symbol of the atonement offered by the Master for the church. This offering was to be efficacious to those who would repent and obey the requirements of the laws of the kingdom. Those who remained outside the church were not partakers of the spirit and power which belonged to those who were disciples of the kingdom.

The Apostle Paul understood that the church was the spiritual body of Christ. The then existing organizations of religion were never accepted by the Master as being representative of the means of bringing forth the kingdom of God on earth. The church (New Testament) which Paul represented was that body. He informed the Corinthian Saints, who were a branch of the parent body, "Ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular." Paul could say this because of his initial experience with Christ. "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" was enough to make him know that the church was the body of Christ, at least the body and spirit potential.

WE BELIEVE there was an apostasy of the New Testament Church because its first love was forgotten. That love was centered in its commission to bring forth the kingdom of God. The redirection of the kingdom emphasis was one of the primary causes of the apostasy. The kingdom became an "other-world" affair. Therefore, the spirit of Christ, which was a kingdom spirit, could not remain either in priesthood or laity. Darkness was the result, and the ordinances were changed to suit the fancy of pressure groups within the church. Compromise was the moving principle of the times. This spirit was not consistent with the Spirit of Christ or the spirit of truth. As a result, the ordinances and sacraments were inconsistent with the true purpose of the kingdom. They became rituals rather than regenerating experiences.

We also believe that modern Christianity has not approximated the original pattern of Christ's church in spirit and purpose. That is not a judgment but a statement of fact. From the very nature of things, the prophecies of Restoration were to be fulfilled regarding the coming kingdom on earth in these latter days. Prophetic and priestly functions were assigned again to men, and the church arose once more out of that type of ministry. Again men were invited to obey the ordinances of the church to the end that the kingdom might come on earth. Such has been the purpose of the Restoration Movement in restoring men to rightful association with God in terms of ordinances and sacraments and lawful obedience to commandments revealed from heaven for the never even dreamed of. Economists estimate that the average American family has one hundred and sixty-five slaves working for it—not alone the electrical and other appliances in the home but all those mechanical servants throughout the nation which serve us—our systems of transportation and communication, the telephone and telegraph, railroads, automobiles, airplanes, steamships, great factories crammed with machinery, and the mechanized farm equipment which makes such a harvest of wheat possible.

We have much more than the Pilgrim Fathers had in material things plus all that they had in spiritual things, and more. We can evaluate those things in the light of the restoration of the gospel, the light concerning America found in the Book of Mormon and in our modern revelations, and the fullness of the gospel doctrinally and personally as applied to our own lives. It is the power of God unto salvation. It has saved us from evil things and saved us to things of eternal importance, including the call to service. Perhaps the Pilgrim Fathers caught a little vision of the Restoration Movement. At least their pastor, John Robinson, in his farewell message to them as they were embarking on the "Mayflower," gave them this charge:

If God hath anything to reveal to you, by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive any truth by my ministry. For I am very persuaded, I am confident, that the Lord hath more truth to break forth from his holy word.

AT THANKSGIVING TIME I endeavored to enumerate a few of the outstanding things for which I had to be thankful. I jotted down four, and I noticed that when Bishop DeLapp preached a Thanksgiving sermon, he enumerated the same four items, though in different order. I began at home. Beyond words to express I have been thankful for my home and family, and not for them alone but for so many other Latter Day Saint homes. In many of them I have been a guest at different times over a long period of years, from coast to coast in America, far up into Canada and down into the deep South; and there are many homes that I have never visited, splendid Latter Day Saint homes, Zion in their ideals and ways of life.

Secondly, I am very thankful for my friends, and that goes back many years to the men of an earlier generation, President Joseph Smith and his associates, and on down to the present time to include old friends and young ones of more recent acquaintance.

Certainly I am thankful for our country. It is the land of promise mentioned in the Book of Mormon, favored so richly in material things and, as we are told, with "the good will of him that dwelt in the bush," blessings of freedom and opportunity, and material things that make us thankful and also humble, not proud, but filled with a sense of responsibility.

Finally, I am thankful for the church and its message, for the gospel of Jesus Christ, for that message gives meaning to all the other things that I have enumerated. It gives meaning to our home life, to make it rich and enduring; it sanctifies our friendships, even as Jesus said, "I will call you friends." It brings to us a sense of responsibility and high ideals concerning our country. In speaking of America, I am not thinking alone of the United States. The Book of Mormon was written when there were few arbitrary boundary lines such as are now drawn in North and South America.

AT THIS TIME, then, as we approach Christmas Day, we do so regarding it as something more than just a time of feasting and a gathering together of families, happy and beautiful though the occasion may be. It celebrates the birth of him who came to save us individually and to save the whole world:

he gave the commission, "Go preach the gospel in all the world." He said also, "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." We are not universalists; we do not believe that all men will be saved. We do believe that sometime, somewhere, here or hereafter, all men will hear the gospel and feel the drawing impulses toward Christ. Some will accept it and be steadfast; others will accept it and fall away; and some will utterly refuse to accept it at all. Jesus wept over Jerusalem and said: "How often would I have gathered your children together . . . but ye would not." The rich young man was drawn to him in love and came running to ask, "What good thing shall I do," but he turned away sorrowing. Under the preaching of Paul, King Agrippa felt drawn to Christ, and said, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." Many who had been drawn to Christ and had followed him became offended and "walked no more with him." Many years ago, my father, reflecting upon these things in the light of what he had already seen, even in young manhood, wrote these lines:

God's work goes on; its course the same;

Now loved by many, now by few;
Many who now despise the same,

At last may serve it well and true;
Many who now stand proudly fast,
Shall, tried and tempted, fall—at last.

John said of Jesus that he was the "light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." We believe that sometime, somewhere, every man will see that light. Again we are not Universalists, we do not believe that all men will be saved. Some will reject the light because they "love darkness rather than light." Some will accept it for a time and the turn from it. Some will accept it and abide in it so that their path shall shine brighter and brighter to the perfect day. "'Tis a glorious thing to be in the light!" Let us gladly receive and steadfastly abide in the light of Christ.

Music Appreciation in Home and Branch

By FRANKLYN S. WEDDLE, Director of Music

A LITTLE BOOKLET called Music and Childhood, published several years ago by the National Child Welfare Association, makes the following statement: "Very few understand that musical instinct is as deeply rooted as the speech instinct, and that to deprive a child of music is to rob him of his birthright."

Most of the institutions of primary and secondary education have recognized this truth by including the study of music in their curriculum so that in this day it is almost impossible to conceive an education acquired entirely without music. Many men and women of today can look back and see how music has influenced their lives, even though the effect was not appreciated in those earlier years.

The influence of music in the lives of men has long been recognized. Plato is the author of the following: "Music is a moral law. It gives soul to the universe, wings to the mind, flight to the imagination, a charm to sadness, gaiety and life to everything else. It is the essence of order and leads to all that is good, just, and beautiful—of which it is the invisible, but nevertheless dazzling, passionate and eternal form."

The development of this appreciation must not wait for school age and should continue in the home and church with school development.

Music is no longer considered a luxury in our homes. It has become a necessity, recognized by both rich and poor as one of the most important impulses for better living. It is the duty of the home and church to foster every impulse for better living, for a greater appreciation of the beautiful, of which God is the essence. Nearly every modern home contains some sort of a musical instrument, even if only a radio. The use to which that instrument is put is truly important.

MANY PARENTS ASK about the correct time for starting to give children lessons on a musical instrument. Of course, there is no complete answer as to the correct age because of the individual differences of children. If, however, the child has had the opportunity of hearing good music in the home and has learned to love music, he will naturally want to learn to have the experience of making music himself. When the child shows this urge, it is time to begin formal instruction. The age will vary also according to the encouragement and help and guidance the child receives from his parents. If his home is lacking in the opportunity to experience good music, his growth in appreciation will be retarded or altogether arrested.

The radio and phonograph are not intended solely for amusement. It is quite possible to bring all of the greatest musical literature, interpreted by the world's greatest artists, right into the home, through these so-called mechanical instruments—an impossibility a few short decades ago. By a judicious use of these instruments in the home and church, a broader intellectual horizon will be opened to our children, not only in music but also a truer appreciation of all that is beautiful in all art.

The names of Bach, Beethoven, Sibelius, Brahms, and other of the great composers will be household words with which our children will be acquainted.

THE CREED OF THE CHURCH is "all truth"—this embraces music and all that is beautiful. We must do more than sing about "Zion the Beautiful," first of all, we must make it beautiful. We are not capable of making any place beautiful until we can appreciate the beauty of good music, painting, sculpture, literature, and architecture.

A technical training is not always necessary to insure an appreciation of the great works of art, although we will concede that it will aid greatly in a better understanding. Few of the multitude of lovers of the arts possess the technical skill to reproduce those works. We must, by the same token not feel that we can be incapable of an appreciation of music unless we have the technical skill to perform or compose it. We must realize the importance of training our ears and minds to listen intelligently and appreciatively. It is in our homes and church that this training has its logical beginning and importance.

The music we love is the music with which we are most familiar. If our familiarity with music stops with the popular and inconsequential melodies of the day, that is the kind of music we will love and appreciate. If our familiarity with literature is of the True Confession or Detective Stories kind, then that is as far as our appreciation of literature will go.

Obviously, if we are to improve our taste, discrimination, and appreciation of the fine arts, we must apply our minds to familiarizing ourselves with that literature, sculpture, painting and, in this case, music that is recognized as the world's greatest. When we have attained a familiarity with great music and other arts, we shall have raised our entire cultural level, and we shall have attained an appreciation of the fine things in life of which no one or no circumstance can ever deprive us. The home and the church are the basic and logical places to begin. There is much material available for this study in the home, by oneself, with a small family group, or even in a church-sponsored class. Recorded music is the basis of material with which to carry on the listening lessons. Zion's League, Orioles, Blue Birds, Boy and Girl Scouts, and other organized groups offer excellent opportunities.

EVERY CHILD who shows an interest in or a desire for music lessons should be given the opportunity to take them. It is the duty of the parents and church leaders to see that he is not robbed of this birth-right.

There is now a wealth of material available for music in the home and for class study. For those who would like to begin to acquire a good recorded library, we suggest the following books:

Syd Skolsky, Evenings With Music, E. P. Dutton and Company, Inc., New York, 1944, $3.00. This book contains twenty-seven evening listening lessons. If you choose to use this book as a basis for home or class study, you should be guided by it in the selections of recorded music. The lessons are excellent.

What Latter Day Saints Believe

IN LAST WEEK'S ARTICLE, we stated that Latter Day Saints believe in the antiquity of the gospel—that the gospel was preached to and by such men as Adam, Seth, Enoch, Noah, Abraham and Moses—that the gospel was not abrogated by the law of Moses, but that the law was added because of transgression for the purpose of bringing the people of Israel to the Christ. We stated our belief in the principle that there is only one name in earth or under heaven by which men may be saved—the name of Christ, which was preached from the beginning of the world, and through which all of our forefathers, even Adam, found it possible to be saved.

We wish now to examine some of our Latter Day Saint beliefs about the subject of priesthood. We shall find that this discussion is closely related to the discussion of last week, because we believe that in all ages God has sought the salvation of men through the use of priesthood or by delegating his authority to certain men who acted in his stead.

Priesthood is as old as the gospel, because wherever the gospel has been preached, or wherever its saving ordinances have been administered, priesthood has been necessary. Therefore, if our conclusions of last week regarding the antiquity of the gospel were correct, priesthood, too, goes back to the days of Adam, Seth, Abel, Enoch, Methuselah, Abraham, and Moses. Speaking of the Melchisedec priesthood, Paul says in Hebrews 7: 3, "without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God." The King James version is very confusing at this point, making this phrase refer to Melchisedec himself. But obviously no man could be "without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life." The Inspired Version, corrected by Joseph Smith renders this verse, "For this Melchisedec was ordained a priest after the order of the Son of God, which order was without father, without mother, etc."

SMITH'S BIBLE DICTIONARY states: "The priesthood was first established in the family of Aaron, and all the sons of Aaron were priests." And in a previous passage, "No trace of an hereditary or caste-priesthood meets us in the worship of the patriarchal age." And yet that statement leaves all unexplained the question of who taught Abel to offer sacrifices, and by what authority or priesthood he officiated in the rites that were symbolic of the sacrifice of the Lamb of God slain from the foundation of the world. It leaves unexplained the question of Noah's priesthood, where he received his commission to preach repentance before the flood, and by what authority he offered sacrifice on an altar of his own building after emerging from the ark. It leaves unanswered the question of why Abraham gave tithes to Melchisedec, and Melchisedec blessed him, (as Paul says in the seventh chapter of Hebrews) the greater blessing the lesser. Where did Abraham get his priesthood? Where did Melchisedec get his priesthood, which was greater than Abraham's, if there was no priesthood before Aaron?

Latter Day Saints believe that the Scriptures bear out the conclusion that there were two orders or degrees of priesthood; that both these orders were eternal and unchangeable; that the two orders were the Melchisedec and the Aaronic, being named for two great occupants in those orders; that the Melchisedec priesthood was removed from Israel with the death of Moses, leaving only the Aaronic to function under the Mosaic law; that the Melchisedec was restored by Christ, in whose dispensation the Aaronic priesthood was continued, but placed in a condition to function in the full gospel, instead of under the limited and restricted confines of the law.

Our book of Doctrine and Covenants, containing the modern revelations of God through the Prophet Joseph Smith, teaches that "Abraham received the priesthood from Melchisedec, who received it through the lineage of his fathers, even till Noah, and from Noah till Enoch, through the lineage of their fathers; and from Enoch to Abel . . . who received the priesthood by the commandments of God, by the hand of his father, Adam, who was the first man, which priesthood continueth in the church of God in all generations, and is without beginning of days or end of years. And the Lord confirmed a priesthood also upon Aaron and his seed through all generations, which priesthood also continueth and abideth for ever, with the priesthood [Melchisedec] which is after the holiest order of God."—Doctrine and Covenants 83: 2, 3.

The law of Moses—the "schoolmaster to bring us to Christ" (Galatians 3: 24) was administered by the Aaronic priesthood. But that is not to say that the Aaronic priesthood originated at that time. Evidently, it had been in existence much earlier, for the instruction to Moses was that he select and ordain Aaron "to stand in the priest's office." Evidently the office already existed, and Aaron merely filled it.

The royal law, (James 2: 28) the perfect law of liberty, (James 1: 25) which was the power of God unto salvation, (Romans 1: 16) was administered by the Melchisedec priesthood, which priesthood "is to hold the keys of all the spiritual blessings of the church; to have the privilege of receiving the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; to have the heavens opened unto them; to commune with the general assembly and church of the First-born; and to enjoy the communion and presence of God the Father, and Jesus the mediator of the new covenant.”—Doctrine and Covenants 104: 9. The lesser or Aaronic priesthood “is to hold the keys of the ministering of angels, and to administer in outward ordinances—the letter of the gospel—the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins, agreeably to the covenants and commandments.”—Doctrine and Covenants 104: 10.

THE FUNCTIONS AND differences of these two priesthoods are illustrated in the lives of John the Baptist and Christ. John, by the inheritance of both his father and mother, was an hereditary priest of the Aaronic order. He came as the forerunner to prepare the way for a higher, or Melchisedec priesthood. He functioned in the outward ordinances, preaching repentance, and baptizing in Jordan. But he did not lay on hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. He promised that another who should come after him would baptize with fire and the Holy Ghost. The Aaronic priesthood of John the Baptist continued in the Christian church, though changed from the duty of administering in the rites of the Mosaic law. The apostles, deeming it unwise that they should leave the more important things of God and “wait tables” selected seven men and ordained them to this priesthood. Philip, functioning under this priesthood, could baptize, but could not give the gift of the Holy Ghost to those he baptized. That was the prerogative of the higher priesthood and had to wait on the arrival of Peter and John (Acts 8: 14-16). In the New Testament church, then, the services of the two priesthoods were blended, as they had been in the days of Moses, Abraham, and Melchisedec.

The Melchisedec priesthood, of course, was represented in the person of Christ. He was the great high priest, “a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec” (Hebrews 5: 6, and 6: 20). He had no hereditary right to Aaronic priesthood, being of the tribe of Judah. He did not minister in the rights or ceremonies of the law, but came preaching the gospel of the kingdom (Mark 1:14). He was made not after the law of the carnal commandments, but after the power of an endless life (Hebrews 7: 16). His new covenant, the gospel, went first to the Jews; but they were looking for quite another sort of kingdom, and they rejected Christ. Then the gospel was taken to the Gentiles under the power of the Melchisedec priesthood.

Some have held that Christ was made a high priest only that he might offer a last and final sacrifice for sin. If that were true, there was no need of the Melchisedec priesthood. An Aaronic priesthood was already extant, and officiating regularly. The Aaronic priesthood had power and authority to offer sacrifices. But because the law made nothing perfect (Hebrews 7: 19) there was need that another priest should arise after the order of Melchisedec, restoring the order of priesthood which had been taken away at the inception of the Mosaic law, restoring to the Aaronic priesthood their original duties and prerogatives which existed under the gospel before the law was added. Though the order of the Aaronic priesthood was itself eternal and unchangeable, its functions were modified under the law. With the coming of Christ and his kingdom, the Aaronic priesthood assumed its original place in the gospel plan, supplementing the work of the Melchisedec.

LATTER DAY SAINTS believe that priesthood and priesthood authority are necessary. We plan a fuller discussion of this question under the subject of Authority, at some later date, but for now let us state this belief, as set forth in the Doctrine and Covenants, section 83, paragraph 3: “Therefore, in the ordinances thereof [that is, of the priesthood] the power of godliness is manifest; and without the ordinances thereof, and the authority of the priesthood, the power of godliness is not manifest unto men in the flesh.” Priesthood is primarily the authority of God to act in his stead; but secondarily it is the authority of the people to represent them before God. Therefore this promise is also given to us, and proved in our experience. “If my people will respect the officers whom I have called and set in the church, I will respect these officers; and if they do not, they can not expect the riches of gifts, and the blessings of direction.”—Doctrine and Covenants 125: 14.

Latter Day Saints believe that no one is justified in assuming priesthood without the command and authority of God. We frequently point to examples in both the Old and New Testaments which illustrate this point. Saul lost his kingdom when he got impatient and made a burnt offering himself because Samuel was delayed (I Samuel 13). King Uzziah’s heart was lifted up to destruction when he became strong; and he presumed to enter the temple of the Lord and burn incense, which was the sole prerogative of the priests of Aaron; and he was stricken with leprosy while the censer was yet in his hand (II Chronicles 26: 18). Simon the sorcerer, after his conversion to Christianity, offered Peter money to give him the power to confer the Holy Ghost, which was a prerogative of priesthood, but Peter rebuked him sternly (Acts 8: 19-24). Even Christ did not choose himself, or assume his office, but was called of God. “And no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that was called of God, as was Aaron. So also Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest, but he that said unto him, Thou art my Son, today have I begotten thee." —Hebrews 5: 4, 5.

Latter Day Saints believe that the offices in these two priesthoods are perpetual, just as the office of president under the Constitution of the United States is perpetual, though it may be filled by different men in succession. We shall give a more detailed discussion of what these offices are which are to be perpetually found in the church when we treat the subject of church organization a little later in this series. For now, suffice it to say that we believe the offices of apostle, prophet, elder, seventy, high priest, bishop, evangelist, priest, and deacon, are all perpetual offices in God's church.

WE BELIEVE, THEN, that priesthood, like the whole gospel economy, is of very great antiquity, having neither beginning of days nor end of years. Priesthood was granted to Adam and his posterity, as well as to Noah, Abraham, and Moses. Priesthood was of two orders: the Melchisedec, which held the right of ruling or presiding and officiating in the spiritual laws and ordinances; and the Aaronic, which was concerned with outward ordinances and temporalities. We believe that the Melchisedec priesthood was removed from the church with the death of Moses, and restored with Christ. We believe that all priesthood authority was lost during the dark ages of apostasy, and restored through Joseph Smith in 1830. We believe that God always has and always will work through priesthood, and that it is essential to the salvation of men. We believe that God, not men or congregations, must call men to priesthood responsibility, and that those so called then must be ordained before they are authorized to serve in their offices. We believe that through priesthood is the power of godliness made manifest.

Where Are We Going?

Where are we going, as a nation and as a world? That is a question which many wise men of today are pondering. A prophetic answer to the question is being spoken in the United Nations Organization which now is in session. Editorials in the newspapers and magazines are everyday spreading the prophecy. Radio speakers and news commentators are crying it from the housetops. The Saints will do well to take notice. Read the current news reports of the sessions. Read the speeches made by the representatives of the various nations. They are prophecies of the future. You cannot afford to neglect this important reading.

It is evident that we are living in a badly divided world. Two great military confederations, which are antagonistic to each other, are arising. One is the Anglo-Saxon confederation of peoples with the United States the central power and the British Commonwealth of Nations closely allied in military policy. The other confederation is Russia and her satellite nations—Rumania, Bulgaria, Poland, Czechoslovakia, etc. These two great confederations are poles apart in their philosophy of government and their mode of economic life. Apparently there is no middle ground upon which they can stand together.

The Marshall Plan is designed to gain friends for the United States among the European nations. On the other hand, Russia has her plans to frustrate the United States and to expand her own powers and influence. The real facts are, we are at war with Russia. To be sure, it is not a shooting war; it is a diplomatic war—but a real war. It is a contest to gain international political advantages. It is a struggle for strategic positions and military strength. It is the preliminary maneuvers for the eventual "shooting and bombing" war.

Follow closely the speeches and the action of the United Nations Organization which is now in session. Watch for the speeches and the events which will indicate to you the trends leading into the future. As you read, remember your church and its mission. Neglect not your own calling. We must work together to establish the church and to build Zion. Security is to be found only in God's work and kingdom.

—John Blackmore, in "Ray-O-Lite," Omaha.

The Pastor's Handbook 1948

Once again the First Presidency has planned and issued a handbook for pastors. This booklet is published as an aid to pastors in planning their work for the year, their sermons, their oblation talks, prayer meeting themes, and special day observances. Also a monthly theme is suggested for church-wide use.* The First Presidency sends one copy to all Pastors, Bishop's Agents, and General Church Appointees. Additional copies are

50c each

*This theme will be carried out in the wall calendar which the Herald Publishing House plans to issue the first of the year. A notice concerning the calendar will appear later.

Conquering Fear By Hazel Napier

FEAR AND WORRY attack so insidiously that the victim is often unaware of the destructive forces raging within him. It is therefore imperative that we recognize the damaging effects of these emotions and acquaint ourselves with a proved method of control. Although powerful, they can be conquered by the reserves every Saint has at his command.

"Men's hearts are failing them for fear of the things coming on the earth." Natural fear, a protective instinct against danger, is a good thing. Exaggerated or abnormal, it has disastrous mental and physical results. It is estimated that half the people are afflicted with mental or nervous disorders, many of which originate in inner fear. Medical men and psychiatrists agree that this emotion is a prominent cause of shingles, neuritis, chronic appendicitis, ulcers, and certain glandular disturbances.

Fear is also responsible for the indecision which prevents the full realization of potential power. Ruled by this emotion, people doubt their moral strength and ability to solve problems and are therefore unable to make decisions. In this way, a man becomes a "leaner." Actuated by the advice of associates, he is in danger of exploitation by persons of compelling charm and personality who, nevertheless, have neurasthenic personalities. Even though he is consecrated and of the best intentions, such a man, if elected president of a branch, unwittingly places the welfare of his people and, consequently, the church in jeopardy.

OUT OF THE FEAR of insecurity arise jealousy and hate, which have a similar effect upon the system. These twin evils, authorities tell us, poison as surely as any dangerous chemical. When the hate-thought wriggles into the mind and coils like a striking serpent, some glands overwork and discharge their secretions into the brain and blood stream. The stomach is upset, and the liver, becoming agitated, overflows surplus bile in the digestive organs. The entire body is poisoned and subject to pain.

Equally vicious is the effect upon the functioning power of the brain. Unable to think straight, the jealous person is the focal point of upheaval in home, office, or church. One such person can keep a branch in constant turmoil. When his unjust criticisms and unreasonable oppositions cause offense or contention, he finds self-justification and may even consider himself the injured one. There is a cessation or retrogression of spiritual growth, for a distorted perspective prevents the seeing of God. So it is with the one who hates. He loses his sense of values and becomes incapable of logical thinking and sound judgment.

TO MY MIND comes the memory of a talented girl who was actively engaged in the work of a small Protestant church in which I formerly had membership. Gloria possessed a lyric soprano voice of distinctive quality. She was considered the best singer in the choir until Dorothy moved to town and attended church. The first time the newcomer sang a solo, the sweet, stirring timbre of her voice brought tears to many eyes. But Gloria turned pale and moved her lips as if tasting something bitter. After the service, she met Dorothy's friendly advances with thinly-veiled animosity.

That was the beginning of a hectic struggle for supremacy. Gloria was determined to surpass the other girl, whose injured feelings prompted her to retaliate. Whenever they came together, harsh words usually passed between them. Members who upheld Gloria were resentful and suspicious of Dorothy's sympathizers. The spirituality of the group as well as attendance suffered a sharp decline.

At a social a few weeks later, Gloria's disparaging remarks about her rival precipitated a quarrel which involved the entire group. After quelling the disturbance, our pastor turned reprovingly to the guilty young woman, who hastened to defend herself. "I couldn't help it, Brother Butler—honest I couldn't. Dorothy"—giving the weeping girl a reproachful glance—"has had it in for me ever since she came here. I can't open my mouth but what she becomes offended and—"

"Gloria," he interrupted, his gentle voice sterner than I had ever heard it, "don't excuse yourself. Your jealousy of Dorothy is the cause of this."

"Me—jealous?" Her eyes widened with obvious surprise. "What makes you think I am jealous of her?"

"Because you are afraid. You're afraid she sings better than you do. You're afraid she will take your place in the choir. If you keep this up, you will ruin your life and be a source of trouble wherever you go. Look what your influence has done to these boys and girls. The Spirit cannot prevail where there is enmity among the people. Peace cannot be restored to this group until you get rid of your jealousy. Get rid of it by overcoming your fears."

"I'm sorry," she whispered, tears gathering in her eyes. "I didn't think I was jealous. I didn't realize—I didn't know I was afraid."

Since many of us, like Gloria, fail to recognize our fears, we would do well to follow a plan which develops the antithesis of fear, and that is courage.

FIRST, LET US cultivate right habits of thinking. For example, I will not say, "I'm afraid it is going to storm." I will say, "It looks as if it is going to storm, but I am not afraid." Constructive thinking is especially efficacious right before going to sleep, psychiatrists tell us, for this is the best time to influence the powerful subconscious mind. During those last wakeful moments, repeat a strengthening scripture. One woman uses the Twenty-third Psalm, reiterating as she falls asleep, "I will fear no evil, for thou art with me."

Prayers also should be positive. Frantic pleas for help, often uttered in times of stress, defeat our purpose. Relaxation, poise, and faith accompany the effectual prayer. We should approach our Father's throne with calmness and gratitude for previous care, thinking of him as the gentle shepherd who loves, protects, and would lay down his life for the sheep. Terrors cannot assail the one who patterns his daily prayer after the Twenty-third Psalm or any other affirmative expression of trust and confidence.

Prayer is to be followed by constructive activity. We must do what we fear to do, providing, of course, it is consistent with a saintly character. The one who is afraid to teach a class, sing a solo, greet visitors, or enter into discussions should do so at every opportunity. We must not run from the object of our fear. For instance, if a person is afraid of lightning, he should not jump into bed and pull the cover over his head, but should busy himself with an absorbing occupation. Fear is not compatible with work that is loved, for "perfect love casteth out fear." We can fall in love with our work by throwing ourselves wholeheartedly into it, ready to brave all for its promulgation and ultimate triumph. That is exemplified in the lives of saints of all ages.

THE PROCEDURE outlined above was used very successfully by a woman who, at the age of twenty-five, was so dominated by abnormal fear she dreaded the dawning of each succeeding day. Once she would cross the street to keep from meeting people; now she eagerly seeks the company of others. Once she would not set her foot outside the door if the wind blew or a cloud darkened the sky; now she puts on her galoshes and splashes through rain and snow to the home of friends or to church, where she takes an active part. Once she was, by her own admission, "the unhappiest, most miserable creature in all the world." Now she is one of the happiest, and walks through life with a springing step of gladness. It is a joy to be near her, to see her smiling face. By overcoming fear, she has made her part of the world a brighter place in which to live.

Next to fear, worry is considered by some psychologists to be the most prevalent ill in this "age of frustration." A small amount of worry, or intelligent concern, is incentive to frugality, conservation, wise money management, clean living, and right conduct. In the extreme, it is injurious to health and morals. The worrier unknowingly raises his basal metabolism and blood pressure. He goes to bed tired, unconsciously struggles with his problem during sleep, and arises even more fatigued. Depleted vitality not only invites disease but also susceptibility to wrong suggestion. The worried man, his defenses weakened by negativism and defeatism, yields to temptation.

"I know it is harmful to worry," I was told by a harrassed mother of several young children. "I worry myself sick, but how can I help it? There are so many distressing things to think about: the high cost of living, another depression, the next war, our children growing up in a world of perplexity and disorder. It seems to me that worry is an unavoidable part of the life we live."

Once she was, by her own admission, "the unhappiest, most miserable creature in all the world." Now she is one of the happiest.

"Worry is unnecessary," I declared with the conviction of the experienced. "It can be overcome and also prevented."

"Don't you ever worry?" she demanded incredulously. "Didn't you worry when your eyesight began to fail and the doctors thought you would go totally blind?"

"No, I didn't. Will you follow my instructions?"

When she agreed, I added, "Then you, too, can say good-by to worry."

That was weeks ago. Recently I met her again. The improvement in her health and mental attitude was obvious even to my defective gaze. She looked younger, prettier, happier and, somehow, so free.

"You were right," she smiled, pressing my hand gratefully. "It is working, and I am much better in every way."

IN OVERCOMING this foe to health and happiness, the first step is to recognize the futility of undue anxiety. Sit right down and analyze your problem. If you can do something about it, act immediately. It is surprising how many people worry about their health or teeth, yet neglect to see a doctor or dentist. If you cannot do anything about it, you might as well accept the inevitable. Can we, "by taking thought, add one cubit unto our stature"? Can we change the course of the sun and the direction of the wind, or prevent the vicissitudes of human existence? Fretting over prevailing high prices will not lower them, but it will lower your resistance. It is needless and foolish to worry about future uncertainties and unknown dangers, for calamities, like storms, appear darkest on the horizon and often disintegrate without ill effect. We should then, intelligently adapt ourselves to unalterable conditions, no matter how unpleasant, and face the future with a philosophical attitude.

To do this, you may have to reconstruct your pattern of thinking. Replace negative expressions such as, "I just know I will make a mistake," or, "What in the world will become of me?" with the faith-building declaration: "I know I will succeed; I know I will be protected, for God is with me." This is one of the great lessons of the Sermon on the Mount. After saying the evening prayer, which should be one of thankfulness as well as supplication, read the sixth chapter of Matthew, paying particular attention to these words of Jesus: "Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which today is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven, how much more will he not provide for you, if ye are not of little faith. Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? Why is it that ye murmur among yourselves, saying, We cannot obey thy word because ye have not all these things, and seek to excuse yourselves, saying that, After all these things do the Gentiles seek. Behold I say unto you, that your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. Wherefore, seek not the things of this world but seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God, and to establish his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

As you go to sleep, repeat the following or a similar assertion of faith: "I do not need to worry, for the God who clothes the flowers and feeds the birds will clothe and feed me and mine. I am in the church, helping to build the kingdom, seeking to establish his righteousness, so all needful things will be provided."

CHRIST, THE GREAT psychiatrist, offered a solution to the problem when he said, "Take, therefore, no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day shall be the evil thereof." "Live one day at a time," the psychologist tells the worrier, who is largely concerned with the past or future. The man who has repented and made restitution should not recall dead sins, unless by so doing he can help others. Many hospital beds would stay empty if people would quit worrying about past mistakes or future expectancies. Yesterday is out of our hands, tomorrow belongs to God, but today is ours to make as beautiful and fruitful as we choose. If we live each day to the fullest, properly dividing work, recreation, study, constructive thinking and praying, our future is assured, for the success of tomorrow, next week, or next year is contingent on what we do now.

One other thing is needed to conquer worry and fear—a private retreat, an inner refuge known to you and God alone. Such a shelter, not made with hands, can be built by the recollection of the protection and assistance that he has given you. Do you remember during the depression when food appeared almost miraculously on the table? Then take these jewels of remembrance and lay them in the foundation of your building. Do you recall physical blessings received through administration? Here are sapphires and diamonds to adorn the alabaster walls. And then there was the time you were unable to properly prepare a sermon and worried for fear of failure. After praying for help, what happened? Under the divine influence, you preached the best sermon of your experience. Each inspired word is a shingle of gold to cover the roof of your sanctuary. There it stands, polished stones fitted together with the mortar of insight and understanding, gleaming and iridescent in the light of God's love. When the winds of trouble blow, open the crystal door, which bears the inscription "faith, enter therein and find safety and peace."

Zion's Communion

sake of kingdom purposes. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper is one of those ordinances designed to remind men again of the fact and significance of the atonement of Christ.

THUS WE HOLD TO the idea that for man to enjoy the benefits of the cleansing blood of Jesus, he must respond to the prophetic and priestly ministry of the Restoration and find his rightful place in the building of Zion, the kingdom of God on earth. This movement calls for repentance to the highest degree, both in its personal and social aspects, so the Spirit can reveal, lead, and purify. This calls for unreserved obedience to all the requirements of God's will.

His atoning grace is still being revealed through the church. Not only is it necessary for the person outside this fellowship to be baptized and confirmed through the ordinances relating to entrance into the kingdom, but there must also be a strict, understanding and worthy partaking on the part of each member of the church. We must discern the Lord's body, the purpose of the atonement in bringing us individually and collectively into the presence of the Father through Christ. When we have dedicated our lives to missionary work and Zion building, then our sacrament of the Lord's Supper will have value. The Master has said that he would not partake of it until he did so in his Father's kingdom when he came. The Zionite community will be the realization of the purpose of the atonement which the communion signifies. When we are one as They are one, then at-onement is complete. How can we do this outside of the Zionite community? Thus obedience to the ordinances and commandments is imperative.

McKinney and Anderson, Discovering Music, American Book Company, New York, 1934. This is another excellent book and should be in every music lover's library. If you choose it as a basis for your study, you may be guided by it in the acquisition of your recorded music library. The book is an excellent reference book and very readable. Highly recommended whether or not you use it for a study guide.

B. H. Haggin, Music On Records, Alfred A. Knopf, New York, 1941, $2.00. This is a guide to music, performances, and recordings. A good, thought-provoking book, and a handy guide in the selection of which recording of a given work is best (according to the author's standards).

Elie Siegmeister, The Music Lover's Handbook, William Morrow and Company, New York, 1943. This book contains 156 short articles by fifty authors, the list of which reads like a musical "Who's Who." These articles are about music and things musical and are very stimulating. A good reference work.

The Gramophone Shop Encyclopedia of Recorded Music, Simon and Schuster, New York, 1942, $3.95. This is a standard work that lists the best performances of the best music. It contains tens of thousands of listings, and over 700 composers are represented.

If you can afford them, your library should include all of these books. Each will high light the other, and all will aid you in selecting the music you will want to have, and also in developing your appreciation and discrimination.

A WELL-ROUNDED MUSIC appreciation is to be desired. Even if you distinctly prefer one certain type of music, it is best to also include many other types in your library. You will probably find that your tastes will change and develop as you progress. For example, you may develop an interest in symphonic music, but for your own development, it would be well for you to acquire operatic, vocal, piano, violin, and choral records in the interest of a well-rounded musical appreciation.

Children enjoy music which contains a story, in other words, program music. The children's list contains music which is appealing to them particularly, but which also appeals to adults. The albums will contain a little booklet explaining the program of the music.

The adult list represents what might be considered the representative works of each category. Personal taste and preference enters into this choice but these few works in each division do represent the outstanding styles and an over-all summary of the great works of each category. Using these as a basis, one can then fill in with other works to round out a good library. I would consider these the basic standard works with which to start a library. I have, as far as possible, placed them in the order in each category that I think they should be acquired. It would be better, I believe, to get a few in each category before filling any one category.

Greetings From Australia

(Extracts from a letter to the First Presidency)

I have taken the liberty of writing you and conveying to you and your colleagues our deepest appreciation of the thought and action of sending Brother Garver and Brother Johnson to Australia. These two good men arrived safely and immediately began to win their way into the hearts of the people with whom they come in contact. My wife inspired the thought of writing to you while we were talking together, after a most uplifting Communion service at which approximately 300 Saints and friends gathered at the Balmain church. . . . We were privileged to have Brother Garver at lunch in the home of High Priest J. A. Corbett, and we enjoyed the visit of our brother as he talked of his experiences during his many years of active ministry.

My memory is ever bright with the help and encouragement given by Brother C. G. Mesley, and I am full of hope and confidence that our great evangelical program will be accelerated as more men become imbued with the conviction that we have the ingredients and tools and message necessary to cure the world of the sore position it finds itself in at the present time.

On behalf of my wife and myself, I have pleasure in again thanking the ones responsible for giving to us personally, and I feel sure collectively, the privilege of hearing from those who hold such responsible positions in this great church. Our prayers are forever for you, that our Lord may grant you health and strength to carry forward the ever-increasing demands for service from you.

Letter From Evangelist Fligg

I have just returned from an extended visit in sections of the Eastern Michigan District where I first served as a missionary from 1917 to 1924. Upon invitation from District President James Phillips, I spoke at a banquet sponsored by the adult class of the Sandusky Branch. I then attended an all-day meeting at Caseville, Michigan, and stayed until the following Thursday, visiting in the daytime and speaking at night. I next went to Valley Center, Michigan, where I met many Saints I had known in the days of my earlier ministry. Following the all-day service at Sandusky, I conducted evening meetings until Wednesday night. From there, I went to Crosswell, Michigan, where all seemed to rejoice in the message presented. My final visit was at the District Conference in McGregor, Michigan. Apostle E. J. Gleazer and District President James Phillips were in charge. I was the Saturday evening speaker and also assisted in the prayer service on Sunday morning which brought a feast of good things from God. Apostle Gleazer spoke at 11 and 7:30 o'clock.

So ended my visit, which was a happy and profitable experience.

The Importance of Obedience

The Saviour said, "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me; and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him and will manifest myself to him." Through obedience and love, we have the assurance that the Father and Son will be with us. This is truly a wonderful promise. I pray for all who have his commandments that they will keep them, for such as do will be numbered with the blessed and holy. They will deny themselves of all ungodliness and every worldly lust. May the Saints rejoice in the truth and be a light unto others. Pray for me.

The Power of Suggestion Versus Zion

IONE SARTWELL

I SHALL NEVER forget the time we mistook Venus for a saboteur

It was during the time of “war nerves” that someone first spied the “mystery balloon.” Soon another, then others, then many others, then the whole community bore witness to the fact that each night a bright light appeared in the sky about 9 o’clock, hovering over the river. Then it came to our town—a sparkling, glittering, shimmering light that would have reminded us of the Star of Bethlehem if our minds hadn’t been warped by the fear planted there by that first casual observer, for, although we couldn’t actually see the balloon—well, we thought, it must be there because someone saw it.

Its appearance each night aroused many indignant comments. Where was the FBI? Why didn’t it do something? There was little doubt in anyone’s mind but that enemy agents were right then charting the course of the Mississippi and laying plans to blow up one or more of the near-by ordnance plants.

Finally, the local newspaper carried the welcome news that the “mystery balloon” was really not a balloon at all. It was none other than the planet Venus. What genius made this phenomenal discovery—for Venus wasn’t due to be “out” for several years yet—or from what scientific facts he drew his conclusion, we never knew, but this bit of information, source unknown, nevertheless calmed all fears and Venus was promptly forgotten.

Venus was “out” for several nights after that, and often as I gazed at her iridescent beauty, I chided myself for believing such a silly story and wondered why no one now ever took the time to stop to admire where once he had feared and complained.

POWER OF SUGGESTION, you say. True—but I wonder if we do not often let the power of suggestion affect our efforts to establish right relationships, an absolute essential to the building of Zion. For instance

You have just met a new person, a young wife who has moved into your neighborhood and seems exceptionally friendly and eager to become acquainted. You decide you like her and want to be friends with her, and your mind starts working over plans for calling on her and her husband. Then some individual with pretended insight remarks, “I’ll bet she’s hard to get along with at home!” Your smile fades, your mind wavers. That’s right, you remember, she did have that hard-to-get-along-with look—behind a sparkling smile. Oh, you’ll be friendly all right, but maybe you hadn’t better be too hasty to call on her. You don’t like to visit in a home where there isn’t harmony. Yes, you’ll call on her some time, but, in the press of your own home business—since you don’t make a specific point of it—you put it off until the desire is completely squelched, and you don’t even remember it until the next time you meet her.

By then, your neighbor may be pretty disappointed in you because she had thought that you were going to be friendly. Evidently, she thinks, her first impression was wrong. Maybe, in the meantime, some neighbor has hinted that you are hard to get along with, or that you don’t bring back what you borrow, or that you fight with your husband, so if she refuses that teaspoon of salt you ran short of, you think she’s stingy, and if your husband runs into a door and blacks his eye— And so, a beautiful friendship is nipped in the bud.

THAT’S A CRUDE example, but isn’t it true that we go on and on day after day seeing the un-beautiful behind the beautiful, seeing what isn’t even behind, for that matter, because some short-sighted person said it was there. It’s a sad fact, but true, that one sees what one looks for. We looked for a balloon, and we saw a balloon; we looked for Venus and we saw Venus. But then we weren’t interested any more.

It goes deeper than a matter of mere vision, too. A person is what he is to you, and a person will, to a certain extent, try to be what you think he is. Consider yourself, for example. If someone sees you as beautiful, you never want to be seen by that someone with your hair in curlers, do you? Or, once you get a reputation for being charming, you’re going to try to keep it, aren’t you, by never ceasing to be charm-

The Trouble-Shooter

As a Man Prays

QUESTION:

YOU HAVE just dutifully intoned grace and are reaching for an appetizing platter of roast beef and vegetables. Your prayer ran something like this: "Almighty God, we ask thee to bless this food to our good that it may give us health and strength to better serve thee. Amen."

Does it make sense to have an attack of food poisoning immediately following the meal?

ANSWER: By Charles V. Graham

WE SHALL TRY FIRST to analyze the wording of the subject, and then we shall deal with the question asked.

"You have just dutifully intoned grace." Dutiful means performing, or ready to perform, duties; obedient; controlled by, or proceeding from, a sense of duty. Duty is defined as conduct due to superiors, as shown in obedience or submission—that which is required by one's station or occupation—that which a ing? Likewise, if you are considered honest and faithful and otherwise full of Zionistic characteristics, even if you've been on the borderline sometimes, you're going to try to maintain your character at least to those who see you that way, aren't you? Maybe we could supplement the Golden Rule with "Look for, in others, whatsoever you would that they should see in you," and if we give it the broadest of applications, we see that soon everyone would be striving to be what everyone else thought he was—which would be of the best—and then we would know why God put so much stress on loving each other.

Perhaps we think of Zion as a city full of Venuses, but we can find mystery balloons there, too—if we look for them. Let us train our minds to record and interpret properly the impressions picked up by our eyes and ears, and thus we shall achieve another goal in our trek to Zion.

person is bound by moral obligation to do. It is a mockery to offer grace at the table if for the sake of obedience or mere duty. Christ has said, "Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain."—Matthew 5: 41. He more than likely made this statement as a result of his observing Roman soldiers force those whom they passed to carry their heavy packs and burdens. It was the duty of the person to carry the burden a mile, but can you imagine the effect that would result in the mind and feeling of the soldier if at the end of the distance the burden bearer would say of his own accord, "I'll carry your pack another mile"? It is with this attitude that we should petition Deity at the table, not in the attitude of a duty to perform but a genuine privilege and opportunity to return thanks to God for his blessings.

On another occasion, the Master stated, "When ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants. We have done that which was no more than our duty to do."—Luke 17: 10. If grace is intoned as a sense of duty, we are unprofitable servants and therefore cannot rightfully expect any particular blessing from God.

We shall now consider the petition.

"Almighty God, we ask thee to bless this food to our good that it may give us health and strength to better serve thee. Amen." Such a statement is common, but it might be put in a more effective manner as, "Almighty God, we thank thee for this food. We desire to use the strength derived therefrom in serving thee." The principle part of the prayer should be one of sincere thanksgiving.

NOW WE SHALL TRY to answer the question as stated. "Does it make sense to have an attack of food poisoning immediately following the meal?" Yes, it does make sense to have an attack of food poisoning for the following reasons:

1. God is a God of law, a God of order, and a God of justice. From the very beginning of God's creation he endowed man with free agency. This power to choose between right and wrong is both a great privilege and a serious responsibility.

The universe is one of law and order. Man can do certain things and expect certain results. We each possess a certain amount of intelligence. It is said, "The glory of God is intelligence."—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6. God expects us to use this intelligence in the selecting, storing, preparing, and eating of food.

Eat food (especially meat), that has become poisoned through lack of caution, inspection, and care, and you can expect the reasonable result—illness. When this happens, God has not forsaken us, nor has he broken a law or promise. Someone else has broken a law. “Therefore wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead and can not save you.”—James 2: 18. From this statement, we conclude that one might pray over his food in faith, but faith without works is dead. Works is that part of the responsibility that we must accept and carry out—it is the proper purchasing, storing, and preparing of the food. If this is done, God is then freed by his law, through us, to give the blessing.

If you purchased a steak that was tough and dry, would you expect it to become juicy and tender as a result of your prayer? If a cake falls during the baking process, you would not expect it to become light and fluffy by asking a blessing upon it. God’s laws are unchangeable.

2. Asking the blessing may outwardly reflect a devotion to the Creator, but in reality it may be asked for selfish purposes. If this is done, one might reasonably expect nothing to happen that would indicate God’s part in the experience. James said, “Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts.”

In the stated problem after grace was offered, the party reached for an appetizing platter of roast beef and vegetables. If this was done in a gluttonous manner, you could expect God’s laws to operate in your system and the result might rightly be illness.

Paul says, “Every man that striveth for mastery is temperate in all things.”—I Corinthians 10: 25. Being temperate in all things certainly includes the food that we prepare and eat. If we fail to be temperate in our eating, we break a physical law of God and can expect trouble to follow.

The Lord has said, “No one can assist in this work, except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity, being temperate in all things whatsoever shall be intrusted to his care.”—Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4. If a person failed in any or all of these qualities—that is if he failed to be humble or full of love or lacked faith, hope, and charity, or was not temperate in all things intrusted to his care—his prayer could easily be just a vain repetition. God has intrusted certain things to our care such as choice, storage, preparation, and quantity of foods.

“Add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance.”—II Peter 1: 5, 6.

In other words, in our lives, our hearts, and our minds, there must be faith, virtue, knowledge, and temperance in operation. When they are, we can expect the perfect laws of God to function so as to bring blessings of health and strength into our bodies.

The Good Shepherd has given us these words, “Ye cannot serve God and mammon.”—Matthew 6: 24. One might indulge freely at his own table after having dutifully intoned grace but lack the true love of God in his heart. He might actually be consumed in the passion for rich foods in quantity without regard for his neighbor’s welfare or with a passive allegiance to Christ. If this were the case, the individual would be serving mammon and not God, thereby disqualifying himself from the rich abundant blessings of our Creator. We have been told that we are to have an eye single to the glory of God. This being true, if we had any other purpose in mind than to bring glory to God, his blessing would be absent.

3. Mental and nervous disorders are common causes of upset stomachs. Two persons in a family of any number might find themselves in a heated argument or a person in a given family might have been recently engaged in a controversy with a neighbor or someone outside the family. The mental reaction upsets the person’s digestive system. The family sits down to eat, grace is offered, and the dinner is eaten. The parties who were upset mentally and emotionally suffered almost immediate illness from the food, the rest of the family enjoyed the dinner and showed no signs of illness. Our personal attitudes and dispositions have much to do in determining the results from food we eat.

4. Failing to use wisdom as to when to eat certain foods may cause serious discomfort and illness. In the word of wisdom we are told, “flesh also of the beasts and of the fowls of the air, I, the Lord, hath ordained for the use of man, with thanksgiving. Nevertheless, they are to be used sparingly; and it is pleasing unto me that they should not be used only in times of winter, or of cold, or famine.”—Doctrine and Covenants 86: 2. From the light of this quotation, a person could eat too much meat (especially in hot weather) in the place of other foods more suitable and thereby suffer ill effects.

5. We might innocently or knowingly fail to be obedient to the laws of God.

The Lord has said, “And again, verily I say unto you, that which is governed by law, is also preserved by law, and perfected and sanctified by the same. That which breaketh a law, and abideth not by the law, but seeketh to become a law unto itself, and willeth to abide in sin, can not be sanctified by law, neither by mercy, justice, or judgment; therefore, they must remain filthy still.”—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 8.

We thus realize that we are governed, preserved, perfected, and sanctified by law. Both the lives of the persons concerned and the prayer at the table must be governed by and within the law. If so, the blessing of Almighty God will grace the individuals and the prayer.

“My people must needs be chastened until they learn obedience, if it must needs be by the things which they suffer.”—Doctrine and Covenants 102: 2. God has given us laws for our good and, through his Son,

there has been revealed for man's benefit the way to live. God has given each of us intelligence. He is constantly reaching down to us through his spirit and by and through his eternal laws. He expects us to study, learn, and follow him. When we are disobedient to his law, even through ignorance, the breaking of that law causes unpleasant results to follow. Thus we are chastened by the law, with God hoping that we will carefully examine and determine what may have caused the food poisoning and thereby learn obedience to the laws of life that make for health.

Finally, "Where there is no vision, the people perish: but he that keepeth the law, happy is he."—Proverbs 29: 18. With no vision or understanding on the part of those who prepare the food and eat it, they sooner or later perish. Happy is he that keeps the laws of health, for he is better mentally, spiritually, and physically. Keep the laws of God, intone grace at the table thankfully and not dutifully, and his laws are released by you and through you to function and bring peace to your soul and strength to your body.

Christ challenges us, "If ye love me, keep my commandments."—John 14: 15. With this thought in mind, we quote, "Whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight."—I John 3: 22. The keeping of God's commandments is basic to life and health. Those who strive to keep all the commandments can ask and expect to receive. Why? Because they keep the commandments of life and, in so doing, they ask for God to give according to his eternal laws, which are unchangeable.

Jesus said, "It is written, man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."—Matthew 4: 4.

Therefore, when we approach our Creator with a life filled with righteousness, loving our neighbors as ourselves, and actually trying to let all the commandments and laws of

V. B. Inions, Mirror, Alberta, wishes to purchase a copy of the Priesthood Manual. Please write stating cost and condition of book before mailing it.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Mrs. Joseph T. McGuire, 2219 North Twenty-seventh Street, Tacoma 3, Washington, requests prayers that she may be restored to normal health. She is suffering with a heart ailment.

Mrs. Ethel Sheppard, 203 West Church Street, Lexington, Tennessee, asks to be remembered in the prayers of the Saints. She believes that, if it is God's will, she may be completely healed.

Mrs. Anna L. Jones, 839 Woodville Drive, El Monte, California, expresses her appreciation for the prayers offered in her behalf, and also for the cards and letters she received. She now asks that the Saints pray for her fifteen-year-old grandson, Barrey Jones, who is afflicted with a spinal ailment.

John Schrunk of Atkinson, Nebraska, requests prayers for his wife that, if it is God's will, she may be able to walk again.

God operate in our lives, we can rightfully expect rich, happy, and good results from a sincere prayer of thanksgiving offered in our homes at the table of the Lord.

DEATHS

JENSEN.—William C., was born in Denmark on August 20, 1884. He came to this country with his parents when he was four years old and lived in Pottawattomie County, Iowa, until his death. After a brief illness, he passed away unexpectedly on November 20, 1947. He was united in marriage to Bessie Scott on August 15, 1906, at Hazel Dell, Iowa, with Elder Frank Hough performing the ceremony. To this union four sons were born. Those left to mourn his passing are his widow, Bessie, of Council Bluffs; four sons: Vernon, Donald, and Raymond of Underwood, Iowa; and Irvin of Oakland, Iowa; one brother, James C. Jensen of Council Bluffs; three sisters: Mrs. Fred Paulson of Kimball, South Dakota; Mrs. Mary Parrish of Neola, Iowa; and Mrs. Hannah Nielsen of Underwood, Iowa; and eight grandchildren. He was a member of the Reorganized Church, having been baptized on July 26, 1896, when he was about twelve years of age. His funeral service was held from the Woodring Funeral Home in Council Bluffs with Elder V. D. Ruch in charge. Burial was in Walnut Hill Cemetery, Council Bluffs.

GRAY.—Charles E., son of Josephine and Sidney N. Gray, was born November 25, 1873, at Avoca, Iowa, where he lived until 1890 when he moved with his family to Missouri. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on January 14, 1896, at Turner, Missouri, and on January 19, 1902, was ordained a deacon. To this calling, he was faithful throughout his life. On August 22, 1927, he married Elinor Hufford of Independence, Missouri, who shared his joys and sorrows until his death. Their home was in Joplin, Missouri, where Mr. Gray has resided for the past thirty-two years.

Besides his wife, he leaves a sister, Mrs. Mary Abby Parker of Joplin; and three brothers: A. T. and Seward E. Gray of Lincoln, California; and William A. Gray of Pasadena, California.

SHELDON.—William Thompson, was born February 4, 1862, in Clinton County, Iowa, and died at the Twin Falls County General Hospital, Twin Falls, Idaho, on October 29, 1947. He moved from Iowa to Ellensburg, Washington, at the age of twenty and later made his home on a farm near Filer. He also farmed extensively in Emmett, Jerome, and Wendell. On September 9, 1882, he married Elizabeth Hayes. He was a life-long member of the Reorganized Church.

Surviving are his wife, Elizabeth, of Twin Falls; three daughters: Mrs. Villa McMahan of Grandview, Washington; Mrs. Clara Hoehn and Mrs. Dorcas Peck of Twin Falls; three sons: Milo P. of Kirkland, Washington; Iram S. of Buhl, Idaho; and Howard M. of Pattonsburg, Missouri; three brothers; a sister; fourteen grandchildren; and six great-grandchildren. A son, Dr. Willard B. Sheldon, preceded him in death. Services were conducted by Elder Silas Condit of Hagerman, Idaho.

MOUSLEY.—Howard Monroe, was born June 28, 1890, at Holyoak, Delaware, and died at his home in Elizabeth, New Jersey, on September 24, 1947. He married Martha Love Carr on November 16, 1912, in the Reorganized Church in Elk Mills, Maryland; on March 15, 1914, he became a member of the church. He was ordained a deacon on March 31, 1929, and a priest on March 24, 1946.

He is survived by his wife; his father, Levi Monroe; two sisters, Jessie and Phebe; and four brothers: Lewis, Robert, William, and Archie. Two daughters, Ruth Ann and Dorothy, died in infancy. The funeral service was conducted by Elder Thomas M. Carr, assisted by Elder Adolphus H. D. Edwards.

FLANDERS.—Roland O., son of Oliver and Emma Flanders, was born June 11, 1892, at Stewartville, Missouri, and died unexpectedly on October 24, 1947, at Zanesville, Ohio, as he was returning from work to his home at 81 Oakland Avenue, Columbus, Ohio. He was baptized at an early age into the Reorganized Church and was ordained to the office of priest when a young man. On June 7, 1928, he married Lillian Williams; two children were born to this union. He was a graduate of Kansas State Agricultural College and the University of Kansas.

Surviving are his wife; a son, Robert Bruce of Graceland; a daughter, Nancy Ellen of the home; a sister, Mrs. Pearle Turner of Independence, Missouri; and three brothers: A. Douglas and L. Eugene of Independence, and Oliver E. of Elsinore, California. Funeral services were conducted at the Stone Church, Apostle D. T. Williams and Elder L. F. P. Curry officiating. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

No Room

We know You not,
And yet you come to us
In the tradition of a feast prepared
To lay before the stranger who may knock,
Both cold and weary, on our sheltering door.

We know You not,
And yet you speak in gently falling snow,
In every thought of truest Christmas giving
And in the reverent hush
Of Christmas vespers.

We wait a little anxiously for You to come—
And wonder at the waiting,
Thinking ourselves to be prepared at last;
And while we wait in welcome at the hearth,
Our hearts are tuned to hear the tumult of the world
And not your anguished cry for warmth
Against the wintry blast.

So Christmas comes and goes,
And once again
The Christ child finds but lowly manger
Wherein to lay his head,
And is alone
And cold!

AUDITORIUM NEWS

Northfield Mission, Detroit.—It is believed that this mission has the distinction of organizing the first Oriole Circle with all colored members. Mrs. Jennie Ephraim is the leader.

President Israel A. Smith has returned to headquarters from his recent trips and will be here for several weeks. Apparently taking all duties as they come, he is in good health and ready for the work of his office.

President F. Henry Edwards, now on tour of the Southern Mission with Apostle M. L. Draper, is scheduled to address the Lamoni congregation on December 28.

Bishop G. L. DeLapp was in Minneapolis over the week end of December 5-7, and spoke to the congregation there on Sunday. He read the wedding service on the preceding Friday for one of our leaders there, Leslie Lynch, who was united in marriage with Maxine Hammel.

Eugene Theys, our missionary to Holland and Germany, located in Rotterdam, is to receive a new Ford car for use of missionaries in the church work there. It was driven from Independence to New York by Elder Lyle Woodstock, who recently went under church appointment. The car was to be shipped December 10. Brother Woodstock was accompanied by his wife, Doris. Both have been loyal church workers for years. . . . The new car will increase the effectiveness of the work of our missionary personnel in that area.

Elder John R. Grice, of the Order of Evangelists, is laboring in the stakes. Recently he has held revival meetings in Stewartsville, Maple Grove, and Osborn, Far West Stake; also conducted prayer services and a priesthood meeting. He reports excellent attendance. In November he preached 32 sermons, visited 42 homes, and gave 11 Patriarchal blessings, doing his own stenographic work in typing—he uses the "Soundscriber" to record blessings.

Mrs. Roy T. Haler, Examiner for the Spring River District, in a recent report includes this statement: "I am trying to keep up with my grading of papers and their prompt return. They do keep me very busy, and I'm glad!"

The Miami, Oklahoma, Branch is quite active in study work, and a new class in Church History has just started with Mrs. E. G. Gilbert as teacher, and one in Book of Mormon study with Mrs. M. Shipley as teacher.

Brother F. Eldon Oliver, of Hamilton, Ontario, is the new District Director of Religious Education, and it pleases the Department of Religious Education that he has written for helps for starting his new work.

Southern California continues to be one of the most active areas in the church in leadership training. Brother Glen E. Holmes, District Religious Education Director, has recently reported two students are ready for their First Certificates of Progress. Dorothy Jean McCombs and Vern Webb will be presented their certificates by their pastor.

Meetings.—The Zion's League Advisory Council will meet in Independence during the holidays, December 29. The Religious Education Advisory Council Board will meet December 30.

Michigan.—Bishop H. L. Livingston will visit the churches of this area in company with Apostle D. Blair Jensen.

CHRISTMAS GREETINGS

The First Presidency

WITHIN RECENT WEEKS I have been privileged to meet personally a large number of the Saints in New England States, Ohio, and on the Pacific slope. I should like to have an opportunity thus to get acquainted with all members of the church—obviously a desire that cannot be gratified. However, at this season, when our minds turn to blessings received, I count myself rich in friendships created through the years, and to all members of the church and all “friends for the Master’s sake,” I send Holiday Greetings. I can make no better wish for the New Year than that they should grasp opportunities always at hand to demonstrate to the world that we as children of the covenant are indeed the sons of God.

ISRAEL A. SMITH, President.

The Quorum of Twelve

Rich in blessings to the whole world was the advent of Jesus in Bethlehem. So impressive and full of significance was his birth that an angelic choir sang near the town: “Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men.” Most appropriately could such sentiment be thus harmoniously expressed for there was born, a “Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.” So great was he that it was divinely enjoined, “Let all the angels of God worship him!” It is well that we have the festival of Christmas commemorating the gift of God’s only Begotten Son to the world. The birth of Jesus constitutes the greatest missionary enterprise of all time, its purpose being to win men to the true way of life, joy, and peace. The Christmas spirit partakes therefore of the missionary spirit, a desire to share with others what has been experienced of the love, blessings, and knowledge of God. The world in its darkness and confusion needs what the missionary spirit of Christ has to contribute, and his church is challenged at this period to move actively forward in accomplishing what is entrusted to its care. The Quorum of Twelve sends greeting to the church at this happy Christmas season, and its members express gratitude for the generous support received from members of the church during the year. May God’s blessing be upon the church as it looks forward to the new year of 1948 full of rich missionary possibilities.

PAUL M. HANSON,
President, Quorum of Twelve

The Presiding Bishopric

As we approach the anniversary of the birth of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, we wish to express our gratitude to God for his great gift to us. Undoubtedly, we feel this more keenly this year than ever before in our experience. The chaotic condition of the world; the suffering and poverty that exists in countries abroad make us aware of the responsibility which is ours as a church.

The church is beginning the extension of its ministry to some of these people who have so much need for it. For the assistance given by our church membership that has made this possible, we also wish to express our thanks; and we take advantage of this opportunity to extend to our church membership everywhere our best wishes for a joyous Christmas, which we trust will be touched with the divine Spirit.

BY G. L. DELAPP,
The Presiding Bishopric.

Order of Evangelists

On behalf of the Order of Evangelists and Patriarchs, I extend greetings to the Saints everywhere. The present condition of world affairs is such that the traditional greeting, “Merry Christmas,” seems scarcely appropriate. And yet the experiences of the Saints of old and in modern times remind us that in the service of the Man of Galilee whose birth we celebrate and in the fellowship of the church there may be rejoicing even in the midst of difficulties. The Book of Mormon assures us that it is the will of God that men should have joy—and that is something deeper than merriment. Our prayer is that those who are heavy burdened with secular or religious duties or perplexed by problems may find strength and wisdom from on high. May those in sorrow be comforted, the tempted be helped to overcome, the disinterested, the embittered, the estranged be revived and restored to the fellowship of Christ and the brethren. May our general church officers, the “standing ministry” in stakes, districts, and branches, and all the missionaries receive an increased endowment of power. May an especial blessing be with those who are overseas and the groups to whom they minister. May our Lord and Saviour bless you all.

Yours in gospel bonds,
ELBERT A. SMITH,
Presiding Patriarch.

First Quorum of Seventy

Christmas season reminds us of the most significant gift ever presented to man. The recalling of this wonderful event mellows our hearts and touches us with realization of our Heavenly Father’s unfathomable love because of which he “gave his only Begotten Son.” When we contemplate this infinite yearning and movement of Deity, we join the Apostle Paul who so fittingly wrote, “Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.” And this should likewise serve to remind us that every member of the church has the privilege to be, and is intended to be, a personal witness for Jesus and his great message of truth and life which constitute the gospel, "the power of God unto salvation unto every one that believeth." As you are greeted in the fraternal bonds of our great fellowship, you are also urged to be a witness for Christ. There is no finer way to commemorate his birth and to make the spirit of Christmas effective throughout the year. May God bless you to this end.

E. Y. HUNKER, President.

Quorum of High Priests

The shepherds who slept in the chill of that memorable night awoke to see those familiar hills of Judea lighted by a strangely unfamiliar light. Then they saw a star—a new star—at least they had never noticed it before. They arose and followed the star to the feet of the Christ. The Quorum of High Priests greet you and, with you, pledge themselves to awaken and to follow the star again to the feet of the Master. May God bless us all to that end.

WARD A. HOUGAS, President

The Aaronic Priesthood

In recent years the ministry of the Aaronic priesthood has become increasingly more significant and important to the movement of Zion. Increased understanding of the relationship of this priesthood to progress in the branch and in the attainment of our Zion goals is being realized.

In behalf of the Aaronic priesthood we wish to extend to the Saints everywhere our best wishes for a good Christmas and a successful year in 1948.

G. L. DELAPP, Presiding Bishop.

Department of Religious Education

It is the Christmas season again in your home and mine and that of our neighbors'. In your home we trust there are all the elements that will make for a truly peaceful, happy observance of the day the world recognizes as the birthday of our Lord Jesus Christ.

We believe that no thought of Christ is true and no tribute to him genuine which does not stir one's mind and soul to renewed appreciation of those with whom he has continued to share, both joy and sorrow, progress and disappointment, play and toil, in mutual endeavor.

To administrative officers, department heads, and the many volunteer leaders and workers, our staff extends season's greetings and best wishes. We find it impossible to express adequately our gratitude for your friendly good will and loyal helpfulness during the year as we have endeavored with you to serve Christ and his church.

May God bless and sustain you at this Yuletide and throughout the year.

THE DEPARTMENT OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

Graceland College

At this Christmas season, the staff and students of Graceland College commit themselves anew to seeking through study and by faith the way of life prophesied in the birth of the Christ child and verified in his unfolding life. To the thousands of fellow workers in the church who make possible our privilege of exploration, we send our sincere expressions of regard and a prayer that the richness of this season might have full revelation in you and through you.

E. J. GLEAZER, JR., President.

Independence Sanitarium and Hospital

The board of directors, medical staff, graduate nursing staff, school of nursing, and all other personnel of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital send Season's Greetings to our friends everywhere. As we celebrate the anniversary of the birth of our Lord, we hope his peace will come to men of good will throughout the world, and that happiness shall abound in every home.

GERTRUDE E. COPELAND, R. N., Superintendent.

The Health Department

Your Health Department wishes you a very happy Christmas time, and, for the year ahead, vigorous health and much more of the abundance of life. These well wishes come to you from the nurses and supervisors, the administration, and entire personnel of your Sanitarium here in the Center Place. Associates in my own office, who know so many of you so well, join me in expressing our desire that you enjoy an abundance of the best things of life in the year ahead.

CHARLES F. GRABSKÉ, M. D.,
Church Physician.

Church Historian

To the officers and members of the church, who daily are making its history, and to the local historians who are gathering and reporting the history of its mission, stake, district, and branch activities, the Historical Department extends heartfelt greetings at this Christmas season in memory of our Lord Jesus Christ, who instituted the church as the greatest and most precious spiritual Brotherhood that ever blessed mankind.

May his peace be with you all, and may his grace implement your every service in his most glorious cause and thus hasten preparation

The Hope of Christmas

Adapted from a sermon given at Cleveland, Ohio, 1946

By CASIMIR NIKEL

CHRISTMAS, despite the extraordinary conditions and problems of the modern world, is still a thing apart, something that belongs to the ages existing side by side with events so ephemeral that they rise and fall within a single day or week. Christmas to us is still the mystery it was when humble shepherds on a hill wondered about the angelic choir and its relationship to the birth of a carpenter's son in a lowly manger. Divines through the ages have attempted to explain the meaning of Christ. Stacks of books have been written about the lowly Nazarene. After nineteen centuries, we still find the mystery a subject of debate. The Jews are still looking for "shiloh" to come, and the Christians are still trying to prove the divinity of their Messiah. Thoughtful men, however, find Christmas increasingly significant inasmuch as it is a prophecy of, "Peace on earth among men of good will."

In such times as ours, it may seem ironical that people should venture to observe Christmas with rejoicing. It is probable that mankind has never experienced less of a feeling of security and peace of mind than now. History reveals few instances of human suffering greater than we see today. Hunger, disease, exposure, and uncertainty afflict approximately a fourth of the world's population as a result of the late war. There is a struggle of classes and parties within nations. The Jewish population of the world has been reduced by seven millions, most of them perishing violently and painfully in Europe. The specter of another conflict employing nuclear energy, with unimaginable destruction, would suggest a season of mourning rather than celebration. These are times for remorse. This Yuletide season is no time for flip-pant revelry.

Serious men and women are looking for some glimmer of light which will cast a ray of hope upon the uncertain way before us. We had hoped for much from the United Nations; it is an understatement to say that our hopes have been diminished there. . . . But among men and women of faith there will be those everywhere who will prayerfully listen for a word of hope as we worship another time in memory of a birth in humble Bethlehem.

There is in the message of Christmas a practical value and a hope for us, which we find upon closer examination of that which followed the event in the manger at Bethlehem's Inn. Today, after nineteen centuries, we find Christ at the head of the list among the great personalities of history. H. G. Wells, in reference to Jesus Christ, said: "Now it is interesting and significant that a historian, without any theological bias whatever, should find that he cannot portray the progress of humanity honestly without giving a foremost place to a penniless teacher from Nazareth." Such is the reward of a good life devoted to human service.

EXAMINING the life of Jesus Christ, we find the solution to his power and influence a simple one. He had no weapon except the naked power of a life spent in doing good. However, he was not only good. Christ was good for something. His was a good life devoted to the service of mankind. The power of that good life split history in two. It has annihilated empires and elevated humanity. The world today is definitely a better place in which to live because Jesus of Nazareth lived.

It staggers the imagination as to what would happen if the millions of Christians on earth today, would match the life of their Master with its concomitant power to move human events toward the consummation of life rich with the sense of security arising out of a near relation to the forces of eternity. Five hundred million lives, acting in concert as one, would sweep war and economic dislocations into oblivion so quickly that comparatively speaking, it would be a moment in eternity, but an epic in human experience. Few persons would deny that living a completely Christlike life for one hour is not impossible. Then why don't we do it? After we once begin, it is possible to continue just one hour at a time until the hours become a day. This process extended into weeks, months, and years would revolutionize the world. His kingdom of peace and good will then would be a reality. It is as simple as that. And that is the hope of good folk at Christmas time.

The thought of Christmas in the foregoing is well epitomized in the following words by an unknown author:

Here is a man [Christ] who was born in an obscure village, the child of a peasant woman. He grew up in another village, and that a despised one. He worked in a carpenter shop for thirty years, and then for three years he was an itinerant preacher. He never wrote a book. He never held an office. He never owned a home. He never had a family. He never went to college. He never put his foot inside a really big city. He never traveled, except in his infancy, more than two hundred miles from the place where he was born. He had no credentials but himself.

While still a young man, the tide of popular opinion turned against him. His friends ran away. One of them betrayed him. He was turned over to his enemies. He went through the mockery of a trial. He was nailed upon a cross between two thieves. His executors gambled for the only piece of property he had on earth, and that was his coat. When he was dead, he was taken down from the cross and laid in a borrowed grave through the pity of a friend.

Nineteen wide centuries have come and gone, and today Jesus is the centerpiece of the human race, and the leader in the column of all human progress. I am well within the mark when I say that all the armies that ever marched, all the navies that were ever built, all the parliaments that have ever sat, and all the kings who have ever ruled put together have not affected the life of man upon this earth like this one solitary personality.

All time dates from his birth, and it is impossible to understand or interpret the progress of human civilization in any nation on earth apart from his influence. Slowly through the ages man is coming to realize that the greatest necessity in the world is not water, iron, gold, food and clothing, or even nitrate in the soil; but rather Christ enshrined in human hearts, thoughts and motives.

It is apparent that even though the mystery of Christmas remains unresolved, a significant meaning is concomitant. We find the hope of humanity is bolstered at this yuletide season in the realization that the same process which gave dynamic to the life of Christ, if repeated in the life of every individual today, would change morbid fear and imminent chaos into a Kingdom of Peace on earth among men of good will.

Yuletide Across the World

Where are their glowing holly wreaths, the gaily lighted trees?

The gleam of Christmas mystery that shines from laughing eyes?

What of the age-old carols drifting on a snow-borne breeze?

Their only music is the wail of hungry children's cries.

Amidst the celebrations and exchange of lavish goods,

The listening ear will hear the call, his tryst with God to keep:

“Choose ye this day the high-flung path of human brotherhood!”

For those who strive to keep the faith, there is no rest, no sleep

—Martha Ford Floro.

Radio Broadcast, Handel's "The Messiah"

The thirty-first annual Christmas performance of Handel's "The Messiah," by the Independence Messiah Choir will be offered to the nation by KMBC of Kansas City and the Columbia Broadcasting System on Christmas night, December 25, from 11:30 to 12:30 Eastern Standard Time, or 10:30 to 11:30 p. m. Central Standard Time. Because of the time differential and the necessity of repeating commercial programs for the west coast, it is probable that CBS stations in the Mountain and Pacific time zones will not carry this broadcast. It will be offered sustaining to stations in the Eastern and Central time zones. Each station may then elect to carry it, or substitute a local program. Inquiry at your local CBS station will be necessary to determine whether that station will carry this broadcast.

The performance will be under the direction of Franklyn S. Weddle, Director of Music for the church, and will be accompanied by the full Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra. Orchestral portions of the performance will be directed by Mr. Efreim Kurtz, director of the orchestra. Soloists will be Josephine Crinklaw Mader, soprano; Sally Moore, contralto; Garland E. Tickemyer, tenor; and Hardin Van Deursen, bass. This will be the tenth CBS performance for the Messiah Choir. The arrangements with the Columbia Broadcasting System for this broadcast have been negotiated by Mr. Arthur Church and his staff at KMBC, whose help is hereby gratefully acknowledged.

Because of lack of adequate space for a chorus of 293 and an orchestra of seventy-five in the Stone Church, the broadcast will originate in the ball room of the Hotel Muehlebach in Kansas City.

Behold the Man!

By Maurice L. Draper

JESUS WAS A MAN. He had a body like ours. He was born, grew, and died, by the same processes which are the universal experiences of humanity. He became hungry, tired, thirsty; he satisfied these bodily needs as we do. He suffered pain, and when the strain on his body became too great, he died, as any man. He experienced sorrow and sympathized with one in trouble. He knew joy and shared in the pleasures of his fellows. Jesus was a man.

He was also God. This was not so obvious to those who saw him on the occasion described in the above Scripture. While it is indeed, the greatest of mysteries that God should be clothed in flesh and dwell among us, there is some reason to believe that we may grow in our appreciation of the breadth and depth of the love of God and of the eternal powers of the gospel as we seek to understand.

Jesus is called the "Son of God." This concept is helpful. Our experience being limited to this mortal sphere (at least in our present conscious memory), it is necessary that eternal values be expressed in terms which have meaning to us within the range of this experience. As our insight grows and deepens, these terms take on increasing significance, and in some cases our understanding outgrows the term. Then we are able to comprehend certain inexpressible relationships for which we cannot find the vocabulary to define. In a sense, this happens as we contemplate the term, Son of God. It is the most apt phrase we can use to direct our thinking toward the relationship between the Father and the Son. It expresses much truth but, like all parables, cannot be made to explain everything in the situation to which it applies. Because we do not understand the relationship which existed prior to the Incarnation, we are sometimes confused in attempting to explain the whole story in terms of the Father-Son concept and, failing to do so, may then reject the concept altogether. This is not only mentally confusing, but damaging to our faith and spiritual life. Let us, then, examine the term critically but constructively.

"And I, John, saw that he received not of the fullness at the first, but received grace for grace; and he received not of the fullness at first, but continued from grace to grace, until he received a fullness; and thus he was called the Son of God, because he received not of the fullness at the first."¹ This, together with the statements relative to Jesus' growth, as recorded in Luke 2, indicates that he is called the Son of God, because, as all sons grow in fundamental life processes into the likeness of their fathers, he grew until he had become the full expression of the personality of God in the flesh. Thus, as John says, "And he received all power, both in heaven and on earth; and the glory of the Father was with him, for he dwelt in him."²

AGAIN, THE TERM, Son of God, is helpful when we remember that Jesus was begotten, in the flesh, by the Father through the Holy Spirit. As a father begets his son, so God, begetting the body of Jesus, is said to have begotten his Son. There are also involved here the emotional, mental, and spiritual considerations in the efforts of good fathers to stimulate and challenge their sons toward the fullness of life. This, too, is significant in the relationship between the Creator and Jesus.

Jesus was pre-existent. That is, he apparently exercised agency in response to situations of which he was conscious before the Incarnation. In Pilate therefore went forth again, and saith unto them, Behold, I bring him forth to you, that ye may know that I find no fault in him. Then came Jesus forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and the purple robe. And Pilate saith unto them, BEHOLD THE MAN!—John 19: 4, 5.

this condition, the reference to Jesus as the Son of God must have been in a prophetic sense, and it is here that we cannot be sure of the nature of the relationship. There were other pre-existent beings, among whom was Satan. He said, "I will be thy Son, and I will redeem all mankind, that one soul shall not be lost, and surely I will do it; wherefore, give me thine honor."³ It appears that the selection of the Messiah was not yet settled, and Satan's attempt to destroy the agency of man, if successful, would have prevented forever the kind of growth God designed for men. This attitude, and his subsequent rebellion indicate that God could not allow Satan to become his Son (be born among men and work out salvation according to Satan's own plan), without doing violence to the divine purpose. The Scripture continues in reference to the Only Begotten, who was the Only Begotten from the beginning. (See note). This is a prophetic reference to the development of the plan of salvation as it pertains to the Incarnation of The One chosen to be born among men to live as men ought to live, to show men what they can do by obedience to the eternal law. Just when the choice of the Messiah was made is not so important as the fact that when the choice was made, the spirit selected became the "Only Begotten from the beginning, selected to inhabit a body begotten by the power of the Spirit of God, and to become a man (union of spirit and human body) who should grow up into the perfect likeness of God.

ON OCCASION, Jesus referred to himself as being one with the Father,⁴ and, in the Book of Mormon,⁵ the personage appearing to the brother of Jared is called the Father and the Son; the Father because, firstly, the quality of the spirit was revelatory of the nature of the Father, and secondly, the fellowship was so complete that the spirit chosen to become the Son through the Incarnation was identified with the Father; and the Son, because the body of Incarnation was begotten by the Father.⁶ Jesus had not yet lived in the flesh, but according to the plan already adopted, he had become the intermediary between God and man for all time. This appearance (to the brother of Jared) was prophetic of the coming Incarnation⁷ and revelatory of the spiritual power of the Father, which was the nature of the Son before the Incarnation and into which he was to grow while in the flesh.⁸

Jesus is God-Man, or the Son of God. His fellowship with the Creator was so complete that his ministry in the flesh amounted to an extension of the personality of the Father into the experience of human-bodily life. Perhaps the above discussion may be summarized in the following points—

1. Jesus was a man (union of body and immortal spirit).
2. His spirit was pre-existent—i. e., he was a conscious entity before his birth in the flesh.
3. His body was in nature like any other man's, but conceived by the Spirit of God.
4. Being so begotten in the flesh and growing (in the experiences of the body) into the same glory previously his, into the perfect likeness of the Father, he is called the Son of God.
5. Being in the likeness of the Father in his spiritual nature, and growing into this likeness in his earthly life, Jesus is so perfect a revelation of the Father that he is likewise called the Father.
6. The "Father-Son" concept is helpful, but cannot explain all the factors in this relationship. Therefore we should not become disturbed when the concept fails at some point to answer all our questions.

7. Jesus was the Only Begotten Son, since his was the only body begotten by the Father. We should not extend this concept too far, for spiritually we are all the children of God, at least from the standpoint of our state before conception and birth.
8. Because these things were designed from the "beginning," Jesus has always been the medium of Divine Revelation, even from the beginning. (See note). This was in prophetic revelation of his bodily form before the Incarnation and in the resurrected body afterwards.

FROM THESE thoughts, we may proceed to draw some conclusions. The question of the necessity of the Incarnation has been a matter of discussion. It might be argued that it was necessary from God's point of view—that he could know the needs and experiences of men first hand only by being a man and living among men. This may be true, but even more significant is the fact that man could be satisfied that God does know our needs, and that the standards of the gospel are attainable in the mortal life (which is the life Jesus lived—subject to the same conditions as the rest of mankind) only by seeing it done. It is now forever impossible for men to shrug their shoulders at the gospel with the criticism that God has set standards for us in a life about which he knows nothing.

Another reason for the Incarnation is that God can only make himself fully known to us in terms we can understand. This means in terms of the physical, mental, moral, and social situations that are a part of our experience. This is a revelation that grows in meaning as our experience accumulates and particularly as we strive to live that same kind of life which Jesus lived. A carpenter's apprentice of a year's experience is capable of understanding a great deal more about a demonstration in construction methods than the inexperienced onlooker, even though the visual and audio stimuli in the demonstration are the same for each. Similarly, one who practices the art of Christian living deepens his insight and enlarges his understanding of this revelation of God to a degree the rebellious or careless man can never achieve.

IN THE INCARNATION, man sees himself as he ought to be. We frequently think of Jesus as the revelation of God, but how important it is that we shall think of him as a revelation of our own possible achievements. "In Jesus Christ we see God in terms of our own experience . . . [and] God sees us in terms of our experience."⁹ This common ground where God and man meet is a challenge to man to repentance and obedience as he realizes that the divine nature revealed in Jesus is a prophecy of himself.

If Jesus was the human expression of Divinity, then why did he have to die? The answer to this question is rooted in the fact just stated. He is not only a revelation of God but of man as he ought to be. This revelation is not complete without the demonstration of the power of righteousness over death. The fact of death in our sinful condition needs to be confronted by the more powerful truth that death is subject to control by the powers of righteousness. Indeed it may be said that this experience with death is not only essential to the revelation of the powers of righteous men but is, in fact, a part of the process of the subduing of the flesh by Jesus which is essential to the revelation of divine power. In other words, to stop short of death would have left both revelations incomplete—that of the nature of God with his power over death, and that of the nature of man who, through obedience, may also lay hold upon the same power.

One of the significant features of Christmas at Home

By VERDA BRYANT

TO SPEND CHRISTMAS AT HOME was the unexpressed desire of our hearts six years ago as we experienced our first Christmas away from our native home town and loved ones. Oh, that we might have a magic carpet to span the 900 miles which lay between us and that home!

As the Christmas season progressed and each of us attempted to hide the piercing homesickness which swept over us, we could not help recalling our previous Christmases. Christmas Eve was always a gay, hilarious affair. The whole family—grandma, grandpa, uncles, aunts, and cousins—gathered for the occasion. The jingle of Santa's sleigh bells was the signal for the doors of the living room to be thrown open to reveal a huge, brilliantly decorated Christmas tree, bulging with a bounteous array of gifts. We remembered the delighted squeals of the children, the jolly laughs of the adults, and the appreciative "thank-yous" which followed. The quieter Christmas Day was always happy, spent in the fellowship of those whom we loved. The memory of these past Christmases, and the thoughts of the lonely one to come, brought fresh waves of nostalgia.

Inasmuch as we had no magic carpet, and since—whether we liked it or not—this Christmas was to be unlike any previous ones, we decided to make it really different. To the bewilderment of our seven-year-old Barbara (and with knowing winks from nine-year-old Blair), as soon as the tree was decorated, the wrapped gifts began to appear—but they mustn't be touched until Christmas. Peculiarly shaped gifts were cleverly disguised by their wrappings, but no attempt was made to hide the presents. Packages from home were opened and the gaily wrapped objects were added to the growing mound.

IN KEEPING WITH OUR desire to make this Christmas different, we decided not to open our gifts until Christmas morning—but Daddy couldn't wait. Over the Christmas Eve supper, his casual, "How would you like to open them tonight?" was all that was needed to change the decision. Never before were dishes whisked through so quickly.

The day before Christmas, the children labored for hours to make a nativity scene. Crude though it was, it became the center for our different Christmas. It stood on the floor in front of the Christmas tree and had a definite part in the more or less elaborate ceremony with which we opened our gifts. The leaf was put in the dining room table for Christmas dinner, and the nativity scene occupied one end of it. After the Christmas fowl and all the trimmings were carried to the poinsettia decorated holiday table, we took our places. Each of us had a predetermined part in the planned dinner service. One read the story of the birth of Jesus from the Bible, another read a poem, another told a short Christmas story, and the fourth offered the prayer of blessing. This short worship service, with attention centered on the little manger scene, took but a few moments; but it prepared us to enjoy more fully the slightly cooled food. Many hands made light work, and the dinner was cleared away and dishes were done in a twinkling.

We spent the remainder of the day playing games and just thoroughly enjoying ourselves. At bedtime, all agreed that it had been a truly pleasant Christmas.

THE FOLLOWING CHRISTMASSES have all been patterned very closely after our first different Christmas. The simple little manger scene became a brilliantly lithographed cardboard one, and this year will appear on our Christmas dinner table a new plaster cast scene, recently purchased at the dime store, only the basic characters will be there, but as future years roll by others will be added.

As a family, we find our different Christmas very satisfying. Now, when it is possible for us to go to our former home town for Christmas, we all feel as Barbara did when she said, "Let's go to Grandma's for Thanksgiving or New Years, but let's have Christmas at home."

The Power of a Woman

A talk given at the Kansas City Stake Women's Meeting, October 16, 1947

A LADIES' HOME JOURNAL advertisement generally plays up the theme, "Never underestimate the power of a woman." Then it shows her accomplishing something by the use of brains that a man has just failed to do by the use of force. Emerson once wrote that he tried for an hour to get a calf into a barn. The calf resisted with fury every effort he made. Then an Irish servant girl came along, put her finger into the calf's mouth and it willingly followed her into the barn. It is more important to know how to do something than it is to be strong.

Women today need to realize what their power is and their need to use that power for good purposes. Women can accomplish many good things by what they know, even when they are not strong.

A lot is said about a woman's power to change her mind, but not very much has been said about her power to change a man's mind. This is one of her great functions in life. By changing men's minds, she can get them to do a great many good things that she is not able to do by herself. Her influence is important. She has great power when she is aroused against wrong.

It has always been a woman's job to make a better, cleaner, finer world. In this good work, she has had opposition, some of it from men who have a financial interest in preserving the world and its abuses as they already exist.

IN THEIR STRUGGLE to improve their own condition and to improve the world, women have had powerful friends and organizations through which to work. The principal ones are the school, the church, the government, and the press. Along with these, they have had the help of many good men who have been sympathetic with their ideals. Women will be wise if they keep the friendship of these institutions and exert their power upon them as well as through them. A woman is not very different in great fundamental human qualities from a man. Many people have made an effort to set men and women in opposition to each other. This is a betrayal of the best interests of both of them. Men and women have a great work to do together. They will achieve it much more quickly if they work together in friendly co-operation.

A woman's rights for which she has had to contend through the ages are human rights. Her dignity is a human dignity. Her intelligence, her integrity, her goodness are all human qualities. Her mercy and gentleness also are human in character. Nature has given her a special task, as it has given to man a special task. But men and women share many great human qualities together.

One thing woman can contribute to the world is cleanness and purity. A clean womanhood is the strongest force in the world. A soiled woman soon perishes. A woman's defense, her irresistible power, is her purity. The great business of the world often gets dirty in the hands of blundering nearsighted men who become so obsessed with immediate goals that they lose sight of the great and more distant purposes. Women can supply a corrective in this way.

THROUGHOUT THE world's history, women have passed through tragic suffering, injustice, mistreatment, and pain. Her very virtues as a woman have been used as a means to oppress her. Now her situation is vastly improved, due in large measure to her own efforts. She was sometimes a chattel slave, and her children were merely property.

Now she is free, she can own property, she can manage a business, and go to law. She can protect her children. She can get an education, she can establish her own home, she can defend her own freedom. She can do anything that a man can do and without a man's help if she chooses. This is her new freedom. It imposes a greater responsibility upon her. Elbert Hubbard once paid splendid tribute to women. He said that there are times in a man's life when it seems that the whole world is engaged in a conspiracy of incompetence and opposition, determined to defeat him; and that he will fail unless the Lord sends him an angel of light in the form of a good wife who brings order out of chaos. A good wife can make a good man better, stronger, nobler, and more successful in any work he undertakes to do. A weak, silly, vain, or selfish wife can ruin the best man on earth.

There is a tremendous need in the world for good women. We do not need more politicians, but we do need righteous women to take an interest in cleaning up politics. We do not necessarily need women to run businesses unless they choose to do so, but we do need good women to see that businesses do not exploit the weak and helpless, the little children, the poor, and the mothers of the country. Women have their place in journalism. It is not necessary that women in the press should go into evil places to report crime, but we do need women to turn the light and power of publicity upon wrong wherever they find it. They can use as effectively as men can the power of publicity in molding public opinion.

Here are some important things women can do to help our world:

1. They can arouse public opinion to give radio a badly needed cleaning up.

2. They can clean up juvenile entertainment.

3. They can fight the liquor evil until it is corrected.

4. They can fight gambling and vice in our communities and cities.

5. They can help underprivileged mothers and children.

6. They can take the men and children to church.

Order of Evangelists

(From the office of Elbert A. Smith)

Evangelist Roland W. Scott of Omaha, is one of our local patriarchs who has carried a heavy load of secular work and yet has found time to render a fine spiritual ministry to the local people who love him and give him their confidence. In a letter sometime ago addressed to the Presiding Patriarch he closed with these pithy comments on the ministry of counseling:

Quite continuously, opportunity has been given to counsel, as there are so many problems arising, due to the economic changes of the times, the extension of the moral limits, or lowering perhaps, which occasions wrong and varied problems puzzling to the extreme, until I have about come to the conclusion that a patriarch should be in one of two classes: A thorough student of psychology, psychotherapy, physiology, with more than a smattering of medicine, a certain diagnostic ability, understanding the teachings of the Bible as interpreted by Jesus Christ, coupled with the wisdom of Solomon; or, a thorough student of the teachings of Jesus with wisdom and patience plus, and last but not least great common sense. Sense enough perhaps to place the counselee, if the case be extreme, in his proper classification and recommend one or the other of experts. I assure you I speak advisedly and find myself in hearty accord with the statements in your report advising care in posing as an amateur psychiatrist.

Candle Fires

By NORMA ANNE KIRKENDALL

CHRISTMAS ISN'T CHRISTMAS without a Christmas tree. My tree must be straight and tall, for the star there on the top must twinkle as if in the sky. About the base will be cotton and, in its folds, the manger scene with its tiny figures will often be rearranged as I kneel close by. Upon the long-needed branches will shine the sparkling icicles, and the multi-colored glass balls and bells will symmetrically dangle there. And now I will light the candles.

Here, among the lower outspread limbs is a tiny red taper—exactly like the one I glimpsed there on the first Christmas in my memory. Santa came and brought my tree that year, and with it a big doll with chestnut hair, exactly the same shade as mine.

This green candle, within my reach on the higher branch, flickers in the mild movement of the room's breeze, and I remember other candles—the midnight procession of scarlet robed choirboys, the incense, and the wonderment of a waxen Mary whose carved features could not change expression.

Now an outstretched needled arm holds a yellow candle, whose flame burns steadily and bright. Two drops of melted wax slide slowly down to harden once again. Another weeping drop, and still another.

Yet, at arm's length is a candle, red as was the first. That hue seems symbolic of the meaning of Christmas. I see it now in holly berries, in a silken ribbon bow, in the color of the child's sled as he gallops joyfully across the newly fallen snow. Yes, Christmas is a bright season; the very colors reflect the joy and glorious spirit of this happy season.

NOW I MUST CLIMB a step up my household ladder or mount the rungs of a near-by chair to carry my flame to the next candle—white and pure as that blanket of snow beyond my door.

A few inches to the right, an orange candle; to the left, one of blue. The heat of the small fires and excitement of my lighting them mounts as I spread each candle's glow. The brightness grows, and the light surely reflects in my eyes.

Somehow, I'm sorry when the tapers are aglow. I wish that I could go on and on, lighting all the candles in the world, for each new burning wick brings thoughts of past joys or future hopes.

As I stand back now and view my brilliant tree, I'm sure that in other homes there are other trees, and that in each, the Star of Bethlehem, the light of God's gift to his world, still shines and guides. For—as long as there are Christmases, as long as there are memories of the joys of unselfishness and love, as long as candles gleam, there will be light, a light that reflects truth; and there is no greater truth than the story of that first Christmas morn. So once again, I gaze upon the manger scene now nestled 'neath the lights of my beloved Christmas tree.

*The pagan heroes, so the legends say,
Sprang into being, full grown and armed for strife,*

From rocks and trees, or out of dragon's dens.

*They made the world afraid,
But never one was loved.*

*Their power could break, but never win
The hearts of men.*

*God knew the world would love a Child
And sent his Son.*

*For all our hearts bow down
Before the sweet innocence*

What Latter Day Saints Believe

IT IS A REASONABLE and a basic rule of law that men are responsible only for their own acts or for those of their duly authorized agents. No man may act for another without authority. If I should sign your name to a promissory note, the man who took that note as security for a loan would do so at his own risk. You would not be obligated in the least, and the holder of the note would have no recourse upon the man whose name had thus been signed by one not having authority. Not only that, but the law itself would step in to prosecute the man who had executed the forgery and to punish him for his presumptiveness in assuming to act for another without proper authorization.

This same principle runs through almost every aspect of life. The mere fact that I knew the postal laws and regulations by heart or carried them in a book under my arm, would not authorize me to go into a post-office of the United States government and take over the duties of postmaster. The fact that I knew all there was to be known about law would not entitle me to enter a court room and sit upon the bench without first having received proper authorization from the government which I presumed to represent. And please note this, the mere fact that people accepted me in that position would not make my act any the more binding. The fact that they came to me at the postoffice to buy their stamps and otherwise to transact the business of the postmaster, or the fact that they came to me sitting as a judge in the courtroom to decide their issues at law, would not make my decision or my act in either case representative of the government which I purported to serve. Even if I had a million dollars to back up a promissory note for a mere one hundred, that would not entitle me to sign your name to that promissory note without your authorization.

IT IS ALSO A principle in law, however, that authority may be delegated. I may give a power of attorney to another man, who then becomes authorized to transact business for me. During the period of the war, we have had numerous instances, at least in the state of Kansas, of marriages performed by proxy. A soldier who was on duty overseas gave a written authorization to someone at home who would take the vows of marriage with the selected girl, in the name and by the authority of the absent soldier. Such marriages have been held legal and binding when properly executed according to law.

Jesus thus delegated his authority when he was here upon earth. He chose twelve disciples and ordained them, delegating his authority to act in the ordinances of God to these men. He promised them that whatever they should bind on earth should be bound in heaven, and whatever they should loose on earth should be loosed in heaven. He promised that the work he did, they also should do after him. He gave the twelve disciples power and authority over all devils and to cure diseases. He also commissioned the seventies to go and preach the gospel and granted to them certain authority. We find that when they returned from their first mission, they came with joy saying, "Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name."

To the observer who recognizes this principle that authority must always be delegated to the man who acts for another, the world today presents an amusing and an amazing spectacle. We have literally hundreds of different denominations, the ministry of each one claiming to represent God in the ordinances and teachings of that church. Most of these churches claim that God does not speak to men today, that he ceased all such communication in the days of the apostles. Yet if God has ceased to speak to men, how is it possible for any man to be commissioned of God and to be called and authorized to function in his stead?

LATTER DAY SAINTS believe that he who would represent God must have authority directly from God. He cannot give himself such authority; the people of the congregation or the church which he serves cannot give him any authority from God; no amount of education or experience or learning can give him such authority, even though it may qualify him to receive authority if it should come through the proper channel. Even Christ did not call himself to the ministry, according to Paul in the fifth chapter of his Hebrew letter. He says, "And no man taketh this honor unto himself [that is the honor of the priesthood] but he that is called of God as was Aaron. So also Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest; but he that said unto him, thou art my son, today have I begotten thee."

How was Aaron called? If we examine his call carefully, we should have the law or the pattern by which all the ministry of God in the future may be called. The account of his first call may be found in the fourth chapter of Exodus. Moses desired a spokesman to assist him in the work of liberating the children of Israel. It had not occurred to him to ask his brother Aaron to undertake such an office until God spoke to him and commanded that he call his brother Aaron to be his spokesman and mouthpiece. It had not occurred to Aaron that he would be called to such an office; neither had it occurred to the children of Israel. The call came through Moses, the prophet of God, and was then relayed to Aaron, and submitted to the people for their approval. That should be the pattern for all calls to priesthood authority—a call direct from God through the prophetic ministry of one already in authority in the church, followed by a ratification by the congregation. No man has the right to assume this authority himself; no congregation has the right to delegate God's authority to any man.

About Authority

BY EVAN A. FRY

WE DO NOT HAVE to hunt very far in the Bible to discover that God has several times punished men who arrogated authority to themselves without the divine command. It is stated, for example, in the eighteenth chapter of Numbers, the seventh verse, that Aaron and his sons are given the priest's office as a service of gifts; "and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death." In the sixteenth chapter of Numbers will be found the story of Korah and the several men of his company who already held the Levitical priesthood, but who decided that Moses was presuming to take too much upon himself in acting as the high priest of God; and who argued that all the people of Israel were holy and needed no priests to represent God before them. Moses rebuked them in great wrath and promised that on the morrow it should be shown who was the authorized representative of God in the high priesthood. He commanded every man to take his censer and put incense in it and bring it before the Lord. Korah and his followers and those of the congregation who sided with them stood in one place; Moses and those on his side of the argument stood in another, and the earth opened and swallowed up all of the rebels and those who had sided with them. In II Chronicles, chapter twenty-six, is found the story of King Uzziah. Uzziah was a good man and a good king; he reigned for fifty-two years in righteousness, and then suddenly his success and his high position went to his head. Now read the sixteenth verse: "But when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for he transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the temple of the Lord to burn incense upon the altar of incense." When Azariah, the chief priest, and fourscore other priests of the Lord interfered and rebuked Uzziah the King, it made him very angry, and instead of confessing his fault he only proceeded more stubbornly on his way. His punishment was a scourge of leprosy which stayed with him to the end of his days.

In the sixth chapter of I Samuel, we find the death penalty meted out again for such a slight misdemeanor as touching the ark, which was sacred and which might be touched only by consecrated members of the priesthood. In the thirteenth chapter of I Samuel is the story of how Saul got into trouble and eventually lost his kingdom, because, in his impatience, he offered sacrifice rather than to wait for the arrival of Samuel who was authorized to make such sacrifice in the name of Jehovah. With the doing away of the Mosaic law in the Christian dispensation, the death penalty was abolished; nevertheless, you can read in the eighth chapter of Acts the strong rebuke given by Peter to Simon, the sorcerer, who presumed to offer money for the privilege of bestowing the gift of the Holy Ghost as he had seen Peter do. This was likewise the sole prerogative and function of priesthood. Jesus himself foretold that many would come in his name, although not having authority to use it. In the seventh chapter of Matthew, the twenty-second verse, he says: "Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you:

depart from me, ye that work iniquity."

LATTER DAY SAINTS believe, then, that no man takes this honor except he be called of God as was Aaron. They believe that men must have authority to officiate in the priesthood of the church. They believe that this authority is twofold. First, and most important, it must be given by God in whose name the man will act as a priest. This call comes through the prophetic ministry of one who is already in authority in the church, but, since the priestly minister represents the people before God as well as representing God before the people, he must also be authorized to function by the congregation or the church which he serves. Therefore, each call to the priesthood must be ratified by the people concerned before ordination can take place.

We also believe there are two aspects of authority, once it has been granted to a man. First is the legal authority which comes through his call by God and the official ordination which makes him legally accepted as a minister of the church. Second is that authority which comes from preparation, from inherent native ability or capacity, from experience, and growth and development. Calling a man to the priesthood, or even ordaining him, does not necessarily fit him at once to perform all the duties of his office any more than preparing a man by education or prayer or other dutiful means can authorize him to function in God's name as a member of the ministry.

PRIESTHOOD IS AN opportunity and not a goal; it is a responsibility and not a license to dictate or to exploit or to use others for selfish ends. Peter exhorts the elders of the church of God to "feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint but willing; not for filthy lucre; but of a ready mind; Neither as being lords over God's heritage; but being ensamples to the flock" (I Peter 5: 2, 3). The thirty-fourth chapter of Ezekiel also gives us a test by which we may determine whether a man is truly functioning as a priest or a minister of God. Paraphrasing in modern language, Ezekiel says that a false priest will grow fat as the flock grows lean, but that the test of the true shepherd will be the safety and the well-being of the flock which he is commissioned to feed.

Paul, in his second letter to Timothy, chapter three, verse five, warned that in the last days there shall arise people having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof. Jesus promised the disciples, whom he had commissioned, that certain signs would follow the believer as the result of their ministry. Paul, in the twelfth chapter of I Corinthians, lists some other signs which should follow the ministry of an authorized representative of Christ. One legitimate way in which we may test the authority of those who purport to minister in the name of Christ in our day is the test of whether or not these signs follow the believer, whether or not these fruits of the spirit are made manifest in the ministry of those who profess to be Christ's ambassadors.

PERHAPS YOU ARE wondering where Latter Day Saints claim to have received their authority. That is a very pertinent and proper question, but one which is easy for us to answer. The Christian world today must choose between two horns of a dilemma. On one horn we find the theory that priesthood authority which was placed in the church in the beginning by Christ, has been handed down from one generation to another until the present day. One great body of Christians claims to be able to trace the authority of its priesthood clear back to Peter, who is said to have been the first head of the church following Christ's ascension. But another great body of Christians subscribes to the belief that the early Christian church went into a great apostasy in which its priesthood and its lay members alike lost sight of the commands of God, changed the pure doctrine which had been originally taught in that Christian church, and so far departed from the original pattern that they lost all semblance of authority to represent God. Now authority either continued in the church from the beginning until now, or it did not. If it did not, no Protestant church today has any claim to authority from God—if you accept at its face value, the scriptural injunction that no man take this honor unto himself save he be called of God as was Aaron.

LATTER DAY SAINTS believe that following the apostasy and the Dark Ages, God set his hand to restore to earth the priesthood and the church organization which had been lost during those years in which the church had strayed from the original pattern. The prophetic minister through whom this restoration was accomplished, was Joseph Smith. To him and to his companion, Oliver Cowdery, the priesthood was restored by an angel, and that priesthood has been handed down from generation to generation ever since. Almost any minister in our church can trace the ancestry, so to speak, of his priesthood from man to man clear back to the original delegation of that priesthood to Joseph Smith through angelic ministry.

But this alone would not prove our authority to officiate in the name of Christ. If there is power in that ministry, if the signs follow the believer, if the fruits of the spirit are made manifest in the lives of those to whom we minister, if the spiritual gifts which Paul named in the twelfth chapter of I Corinthians are brought to men by this ministry, then we may justly say and claim that our authority is of God. We have no desire to boast of their mighty works, but we do testify that in our experience the signs do follow those who believe when priesthood functions with diligence and with humility. If you are not enjoying the signs that follow and the power of an authoritative ministry in your church, we suggest you investigate our claims further, and if you find them to be true, we invite you to join us in our enjoyment of these blessings.

In our next sermon in this series, we plan to consider the organization of the church, showing how the various members and officers of the priesthood are so organized as to carry on the work of the body of Christ.

The Meaning of Christmas

By RICHARD SALYARDS

CHRISTMAS is the season when Christian people celebrate the birth of the Lord Jesus Christ. While it is true that many think only of presents, abundance of rich food, wine and liquor, shows and parties at Christmas time, and whenever they hear the word "Christmas," it is also true that many people think of the Son of God. To them, it is an anniversary of the glorious coming into the world of the Christ child, who became the Saviour of mankind, the Redeemer of the race. In fact, the love of Christ is so strong in many hearts and minds that they live each day in praise and gratitude to God for the priceless gift of his divine Son. Truly blessed is he "who every morn feels in his heart the Lord Christ born," as John G. Whittier expressed it in one of his poems.

At Christmas, we hear much of charity in the sense of giving to the poor—which is commendable; but charity means more than this. Mormon said, "Charity is the pure love of Christ, and it endureth forever." The love of Christ is pure, unselfish, all-embracing; it extends to every nation, tongue, and people, and it endures forever. Saint Paul understood the love of Christ and exclaimed: "For we know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich."

What does this statement mean? One definition of grace is divine favor. It helps us to understand what divine favor Christ has bestowed upon us if we realize that he possessed all the riches of eternity with his Father before the worlds were made. Wealth untold, power unlimited, and glory indescribable were his in the courts of glory in his Father's house, where he was stationed at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens. Yet, for our sakes, he left it all to come to earth. He renounced the wealth of heaven, lived in poverty and endured hunger, thirst, fatigue, misrepresentation, abuse, persecution, and, finally, a cruel death, that he might show people how to live. He became poor that we, through his poverty, might become rich: rich in faith, hope, and love—rich in this present phase of life, and rich in the assurance of immortality and eternal life. His is a love we cannot fully understand, a love that will not give us up, a love that continually seeks us, beautifully expressed by George Matheson:

O Love that wilt not let me go,
I rest my weary soul in thee;

I give thee back the life I owe,
That in thine ocean depths its flow
May richer, fuller be.

God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved.

Seven hundred years before the birth of Christ, Isaiah foretold his coming: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given." No more true and comforting words are found in all the Scriptures. For not only was he given to the people of his own day, but unto us in this, our day, and unto all who shall yet be born into the world; for he is given to every man and woman from Adam's day to the end of time. Christmas, to every real Christian, is a celebration of the birth of the Son of God, the Saviour and Redeemer of the people of every nation and tongue.

DIVINE LOVE is threefold: the love of God for us, our love for him, our love for each other.

The love of God for us, or for mankind: We have already touched on this, but we might add that people will love their friends and do good for them; and some would even lay down their lives for their friends, but God expressed his love for us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.

Our love for Christ: No one can understand the real significance of Christmas unless he loves Christ. To one who knows not Jesus, or knows a little about him but does not love him, Christmas means the pleasure of having an abundance of the goods of this world and a host of fair-weather friends. To one who has a knowledge of Christ and loves him, Christmas has a spiritual meaning. It is a time of joy and gladness in the very thought of the coming into the world of the Christ child, and the angel saying to the shepherds: "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people, for unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord," and the "heavenly host praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men." It means a time of thanksgiving and gratitude to God, a season when one's heart goes out to him in love, praise and prayer. And our love for God means the keeping of his commandments. A man once said to Jesus: "Blessed is the woman who gave thee birth and cared for thee." Jesus replied: "Blessed are they who know my commandments and do them." That is the test of our love for him.

Our love for one another: This is the third aspect of this divine love that we have been discussing. Someone will say that we know the Creator loves mankind, and it is easy for mankind to love him; but as for people loving each other, that is another matter. It is difficult, and in many instances impossible. But we believe it is not impossible. The Lord has admonished us to love our neighbor, to seek each other's good; and he has never asked any man to do the impossible. Someone may say, "Tell us one thing we may do, and are able to do, in the way of helping one another." One thing we can do is to rededicate ourselves to the cause for which Christ gave himself, his life, everything he had, the cause for which he renounced the riches of immortal glory and came down here to an ignorant, sin-sick, suffering world, in a mortal body susceptible to hunger, weariness, and persecution—the cause for which he came into the world two thousand years ago.

THE CHURCH that Jesus established went into apostasy because of sin and carelessness within and persecution without. It was restored in 1830 when God, pointing to his Son, said to young Joseph: "This is my beloved Son; hear him." There was a disruption after the death of the Martyrs. This necessitated a reorganization in 1860, effected by those who held true to the original faith, "pure as preached from the Saviour's lips," as young Joseph said, "for in him was no guile, and in his teachings there was no deceit."

I certify to you, my brothers and sisters, that this is still God's own church. It has a distinctive work to do among men. The power of God is in it, and his promises are sure. If we have dropped out, let us re-enlist; if we have become careless and negligent, let us renew our diligence and take up our duties with determination. Let us not allow anyone or any allurement to separate us from each other and from the work whereunto we are called. The one and only sure way that we can love one another is by joining ourselves together in the great work that is entrusted to all.

The reason we say this is that the only way people can be entirely unselfish and always love one another is by the Spirit of God. And the place where one experiences the workings of the Spirit in the greatest degree is in this work—in his church.

"And the Glory of the Lord"

IT WAS THE NIGHT before Christmas. A soft snow was falling outside; huge flakes tumbled down in undisturbed beauty upon the brown, barren earth, transforming it from ugly deadness to a picture of purity and cleanliness.

In the dusk of the winter's evening, the little white cottage against the hill shed its golden lights in friendly welcome to the passers-by. In one window, a carefully decorated tree stood amid piles of presents. A steady flow of gray smoke from the chimney spoke of warmth and comfort within.

In her kitchen, Mary Fulton hurried to prepare the evening meal. She whisked a syrup-orange cake out of the oven and put a pan of light rolls in to bake.

"A quarter of six," she said, half aloud. "Those should be done in twenty minutes. At least, supper will be on time!" She smiled wryly at her last statement. "On time, my eye! The phrase has utterly lost its meaning in the past few months."

Snatching a clean dish towel and a milk pan, she started to the basement to strain the milk.

"I wanna' go, too, Mama." Four-year-old Nancy rushed headlong toward the door, stubbed her toe en route, and landed on her nose at her mother's feet. A volume of loud wails convinced Mary that life was still there, so with a shower of kisses and consoling embraces, she helped the little girl to her feet and down the steps to the basement. "Now, keep close to Mama, Nancy, and don't fall into the milk. I want you to keep your dress clean until Daddy sees it." Nancy stuck out her stomach and smoothed her dress. Twisting in feminine fashion, she strutted about, admiring herself in the old mirror that hung above the washstand. Then, with her usual resourcefulness, she went about her business, entertaining herself with all the curious assortment of basement riffraff.

In a few minutes Mary had finished her work and headed for the kitchen.

"Come, Nancy, up we go," she called. "Sounds as though your sister's moving every pan in the cabinet. Oh, Nancy, you bad girl!"

A coal-smear'd mite emerged from a pile of boards and papers.

"See my baby house, Mama," she chuckled, cupping her little hands to show how very small the structure really was. "I made it for Kathlene." (Kathlene was the brand new cousin she had never seen.)

Mary wiped the surplus coal from her offspring and proceeded to usher her back to the kitchen where baby Susan sat blissfully on the floor amidst a host of cooking utensils, banging a pan with the cream ladle.

Using a bit of strategy, Mary said cheefully, "Time to eat, Susan!" Immediately the chubby cherub made for her high chair and rattled the footrest until she was lifted to the seat.

Then Art came in from his chores. "Whatta a mess! Looks like my girls have been cooking supper. Mom, you have good help these days." They exchanged significant glances and smiled a trifle.

When supper was on the table, the family seated, and grace said, Mary sighed and rested for a moment, the first of the day.

"Tired, Mommy? Had a hard day?" Art knew the answer even before he asked the question.

"Just the usual routine, I guess, but it is wearing on my patience. So much to be done, and so much interference."

"I work, Daddy," Nancy chimed in. "I help Mama. Susan was bad today and I spanked her bottom!"

"You see what I mean?" Mary asked.

"I think I do," Art said, with a twinkle in his eye. And then he added, "You know, darling, I've been thinking, you deserve a vacation—maybe a few days in the city. Seems to me you're looking a trifle worn of late. The girls and I would manage somehow."

THE WHOLE PROPOSAL struck Mary smack in the heart. Once she had remarked, after an unusually messy day, that she wondered if her house would ever be orderly again. Another time she said, rather angrily, that she needed a little help with the general cleaning, that her time and strength both wore out before it was half done. Another time, oh, there seemed to be so many "other times" that popped into her mind all at once. A feeling of guilt surged through her breast. After all, Art was working hard to make her happy and comfortable.

"What do you say, Mommy?"

"I'll think it over," she answered. "And it's sweet of you to be so concerned."

Supper was over. The girls began to tear down the house in their usual way. A swarm of dolls was on the davenport, an assortment of cards adorned the piano, the pull toys were lined up in the middle of the floor, ready for a take-off, cans and lids of various sizes were arranged systematically in the bookcase. Every now and then Nancy played a few notes on the piano and sang lustily off key. Then, as a choice thought, she dumped her crayolas on the floor and proceeded to color. Susan toddled to the precious articles, and a series of warnings and threats finally resulted in tiny hands slapping, and a battle was on for the survival of the fittest.

"Hey, Mom, what do you do in a case like this?" Art had used all the psychology he knew and was calling upon outside assistance.

"Try the storybook," Mary called from the kitchen sink. "Read them the Christmas story."

IN A FEW MOMENTS, the atmosphere was cleared of all noise and confusion. Daddy evidently had the situation well in hand. Mary could hear him reading slowly and softly to the two little girls. She hurriedly finished her work, and walked quietly to the living room door in time to catch the closing statement of the old, old story of the Christ child, "And the Glory of the Lord shone round about." Tears came to her eyes. In the armchair sat the three people she loved most on earth, and in the particular sentiment of the Christmas season, she thought she beheld a certain sacredness, almost holiness, about them. All worry, resentment, and self-pity were gone as she looked at them.

Art smiled, "Come on in, Mommy. Let's sing a Christmas hymn before the girls go to bed." Parking Susan on the big chair with a book, he and Nancy joined Mary at the piano.

Together they sang, "Away in a Manger," and then the little ones were changed into their fuzzy pajamas and scooted off to bed. Nancy stretched full length, gave a kick or two, pulled the cover up to her chin, and looked like a mischievous puppy ready for a spring. Susan plopped onto her stomach, socked a thumb in her mouth, blinked her eyes a few times, and looked like a fat little cub tucked in for a snooze.

"That's my answer, Daddy." Mary snuggled close to Art, and he put his arm around her.

"Answer to what, my dear?"

"To the vacation you offered to give me," she said. "There are times that life is crammed with the chores of housework, the nervousness of baby tending, the continual hurry of getting things done on time, and I get a little out of patience, but that doesn't mean I'm ready to quit. There's something about our home with its endless round of tasks, its love, and charity, and understanding that I can't leave, even for a vacation. It's you and the girls that spell happiness for me. It's you and the girls that make it easy for me to say, in the words of the Christmas story, "And the Glory of the Lord shone round about."

"Bless you, Mary." Art choked slightly as he added, "God has given me a most wonderful wife! The Glory of the Lord surely shines when you say that."

Together they sang
"Away In a Manger."

The White Gift

By LOUISE WRIGLEY

Helga looked eagerly at the darkened stage as it became lighter and lighter and the shepherds appeared.

HELGA JENSEN brushed the cold snow from her feet and pulled open the heavy church door. She accepted a program from Brother Amos and slipped her knitted purple scarf back from her whitening hair as she walked silently up the darkened church aisle. She was almost late, but there had been so much to do.

Wearily she eased down into her seat. How tired she was! Even though this was Christmas Eve, she had swept and scrubbed and dusted the office buildings early because they were closed for the holidays. Her back ached. She wasn't getting any younger she reflected as she looked at her work-worn hands. Once she had been young and strong but now . . . it had been quite a strain to hurry home on the crowded bus to see that the children were washed and fed and hustled down to the parsonage on time.

As Marian Lafferty played softly on the little bellows organ, Helga closed her eyes to say a prayer of thanks to God. At home, tucked away in the closet of her clean, modest home was a nice gift for each of her four children. They had been so understanding about not wanting anything this Christmas—the first since Papa Jensen died. They realized that feeding and clothing them was not easy, and that there was little left for extras.

She smiled as she remembered their shouts of joy when she had brought in the little Christmas tree tonight. It was small, but fresh and beautiful. Kind Mr. Bannister had saved it for her at the store. He knew how much a tree meant to children.

She had carefully unpacked the small box of ornaments which she cherished from year to year. How the delicate pieces glistened! Some of them had been sent from Norway by her mother's sisters and brothers and had been carefully preserved through the years. They were reminders of better, happier times when she and Papa Jensen had decorated Christmas trees to delight four pairs of wondering eyes while the older children were yet small.

IT WOULD BE hard this year without Papa Jensen. They would all miss his gentle teasing and the rich appreciation he brought to the Christmas season. Always he sat in the big chair and the children gathered around him to hear the beloved lines of "The Night Before Christmas." How lovingly he held the worn copy which had been saved since the oldest girl, Kristina, was small. It had become a part of their Christmas tradition. And then, when he was through, the littlest boy, Paul, would bring the Bible and Papa Jensen's big fingers would find the immortal story of the birth of the Christmas child. This was the climax of their Christmas Eve, listening to the deep voice and watching the kindly eyes and feeling the loveliness of that night in Bethlehem come alive in their own hearts once again.

Jens must be the man of the family now, thought Helga. He must read the beautiful words and trace the story for the family this year. After the service, they would all walk home through the snow, merry and excited, feeling the warm fellowship of five people loving each other. Jens would sit in the big chair, and the spirit of Christmas would rest upon the house.

Helga thought gratefully of the hot kaker which she had just taken out of the oven before she left, and the fresh little Christmas cookies she had baked from carefully hoarded stores of sugar and shortening. Christmas meant so much to her children that she tried in every way to anticipate the needs of the season so that they would not feel that their Christmas had been meager. What she was not able to provide in material things, she had always made up in warmth and love of giving. So it was to be this year also.

Behind her someone stirred. There was a whisper and someone cleared his throat. Then down the aisles, two by two, came the children of the junior choir in white surplices. Like young angels, she thought as they passed, their earnest faces glowing in the uncertain light of the candles they held. Her own Kristina there—look at her pink cheeks and her soft hair. And stern little Paul—the flickering candle, held tightly in his small fist, was quivering!

The children walked in almost-perfect rhythm with proud dignity. For some of them, this was their first Christmas candlelighting service and a great event in the small branch.

They had practiced diligently, and now their sweet voices caroled joyously.

*O come all ye faithful Joyful and triumphant
Come ye, oh, come ye
To Bethlehem.*

A little shiver of excitement ran over Helga. Then she wondered about Jens and Hans. This year they were to be shepherds in the Christmas pageant. Would Jens remember how to tie that wide waistband? He was twelve but impatient with things that did not go right. And would Hans forget that one cue he had so much trouble with? She sighed.

SHE CAUGHT THE SCENT of fir and pine. The children of the branch had gathered early this morning to go to the country for the fragrant boughs with which to bank the altar rail and the platform. They had cut down the big Christmas tree from Parsons' farm and brought it in to decorate it and put it at the side of the stage. Its tinsel-branches shimmered mysteriously now in the half light.

Helga could remember how, as a child in Norway, she had joined a merry group of children who dragged the long-needed boughs through the snow to the back door of their little home. What a lot of stamping and shouting and laughter there had been as they scampered into the warm kitchen, pulling off snowy mittens and sniffing hungrily at the lefse baking on the hearth.

A carol broke her reverie.

*It came upon a midnight clear
That glorious song of old
From angels bending near the earth
To touch their harps of gold Peace on the earth, good will to men*

*From heav'n's all glorious king
The earth in solemn stillness lay
To hear the angels sing.*

The music seemed to penetrate into Helga's very soul. What a beautiful night that must have been . . . clear and calm with that lovely shining star hanging low over the sleeping city of Bethlehem. And now the choir was telling the story in song as the tableaux began to unfold upon the stage.

*O little town of Bethlehem
How still we see thee lie
Above thy deep and dreamless sleep
While silent stars go by.*

HELGA LOOKED eagerly at the darkened stage as it became lighter and lighter and the shepherds appeared. She noticed that Jen's sash was twisted. She had to smile as Hans began to speak in a jerky voice—he must be a little frightened.

As the pageant progressed from one familiar scene to another, Helga sat entranced. She did not see the faces of her neighbors and hear the voices of her neighbors' children. She saw the faces of Mary and Joseph and the Holy Child and heard the heavenly music which the angels sang on that holy night.

When it was over, Helga sat very quietly, still under the spell of the ever-new Christmas story and all that it could mean to a confused and heartsick world. As she waited for the lights to be turned on, she noticed people ahead standing in their places. Each seemed to be holding something in his hand. Silently they began to file forward and up the aisle to the glistening Christmas tree. Helga looked more closely and realized that each held something wrapped in white.

Her heart lurched! How could she have forgotten? This pageant was to have been followed by a white gift service. She looked, horrified, at her empty hands. Never before had she forgotten—it was just because she had had so much on her mind these past few weeks. Desperately she turned, her eyes seeking the entrance. Around her, people were getting ready to rise. The row in front of her was standing up to move into the aisle.

"I can't slip out now," she thought frantically. "What shall I do?" To be without a gift for the Christ child on Christmas Eve! Tears trembled in her faded eyes as she searched in her purse for a handkerchief.

Then her fingers touched the clean white envelope in which her neighbor, little old Mrs. Trimble had tucked a Christmas hankie. She had hurried out into the snow with it as she saw Helga pass on the way to church. Why, there was even a little piece of white paper in which she had wrapped it. Helga fumbled for the poorly sharpened pencil which she kept in her purse.

NOW SHE KNEW what she could do. Hurriedly she wrote something on the card and slipped it into the envelope.

People around her were standing. On weakened legs, she also stood and took her place behind crippled Mr. Bean in the side aisle. Slowly, the procession moved up the aisle. There was Mrs. Peterson putting down an odd shaped package tied in white tissue and ribbon. Surely that would be a jar of her delicious homemade black raspberry jelly. She was giving a gift to Christ by providing something nourishing for some needy family. Helga's gift was not like that. She wondered if God would be displeased. Even yet, she wondered if she should leave the line rather than go empty-handed to the foot of the Christmas tree. Her gift was so little to give.

Now it was too late. Mr. Bean laid his big square box under the tree and passed on by. Helga stood for a moment, frozen with fear that she might be doing the wrong thing. Then she slipped the envelope under

A Personal Gift -- By Alice Crossan

MISS NORMAN sat rigidly behind her desk, her brow furrowed and her eyes watching the slow progress of the minute hand on her watch. Almost four o'clock. Almost time for school to be out. Within ten more minutes she would be alone in the room. Only ten more minutes to wait! She glanced up at the rows of desks in front of her. Ilene was still chewing her pencil. She had not even looked inside her social studies book. And Robert was drawing faces on his thumbnails.

I ought to keep Harriet in again and talk to her about taking Joan's paints, she thought wearily. Harriet was the problem child. It would not be the first time she had been kept in and talked to—but regardless of what approach was used, it seemed to do very little good.

Edith Norman looked across the rows of seats at Harriet. She shook her head. Harriet was certainly nothing much to look at. She was tall for her age, too thin, her straight, blonde hair was too long and hung about her shoulders in disorder. There was too much space between her front teeth. Her blue eyes were too light. It was impossible to feel much affection for such a nondescript child. Children should be loved, perhaps, but who could love a child such as this?

The minute hand reached twelve.

"You may put away your work," she announced.

There was instant and vigorous response. Books disappeared inside desks immediately. She sensed that the children, too, were eager to be gone. But her relationship with the children no longer worried or even interested her. She was paid to teach them, wasn't she? There was no extra bonus handed out for loving them. They were nothing to her but a list of names in a grade book.

She went through the little exercise of excusing them. They fled from the room, and she could hear them in the hall, pushing and shoving in their hurry to be gone. She went to the door.

"Harriet," she said, "may I see you a moment?"

HARRIET, in the act of getting her thin arms into her plaid coat, turned and without a word followed the teacher back into the fifth-grade room.

It was the week before Christmas. Things ought to be gay, Edith Norman thought ruefully. The windows of the room were decorated with snow men and falling flakes of snow; holly hung above the blackboard, and gay red and green paper chains were draped from the ceiling.

The room was trying to be cheerful. But it isn't, she thought. None of us in this room is cheerful. This room is just like me. I suppose I look successful, poised, capable, but inside I have nothing! No hope, no happiness, no anything. And the children know how empty I am as well as I do.

She had been teaching school for nine years. And the truth of the matter was, although she seemed outwardly so satisfied and capable, she hated the very thought of being a teacher.

What I really want, she told herself, is a home of my own. I want my own children—three of my own, not twenty of someone else's. And is that so much to want? Am I supposed to be an automaton just because I teach school? Isn't it perfectly natural for me to want what others have?

*With a happy little cry, she grabbed Miss Norman's hand.
"Let's hurry," she said.*

Ah, my dear, she admonished, you're getting to be a good example of what they call neurotic old maid schoolteachers.

OF COURSE, there were men in her life. She had wrapped up two pairs of sleek kidskin gloves for two of the town's more prominent young men—Stanley Deering, the new dentist, and Ernest Hawthorne, one of the young merchants. They were both nice. She supposed they would bring her boxes of chocolates for Christmas. She liked them equally well, but she had no desire to marry either of them, and they entertained no romantic notions about her.

"Will I ever fall in love?—really in love?" she asked herself. And because she believed she never would, her heart sank within her, and she turned crossly to the miserable child who had followed her.

"Please sit down," she said.

On the way to her own chair she passed the mirror that hung back of the coat rack. She caught a glimpse of her face, the brows puckered, the mouth thin and grim. Certainly not a very attractive reflection. And not at all a look suited to the holiday season.

MOMENTARILY she was ashamed of herself. "Oh, come, Edith," she thought, "cheer up a bit. Give us a smile. Even if you have to think of your new fur coat." And she did smile, suddenly and disarmingly, directly at the little girl, who was nervously twisting a button on her coat.

"Harriet," she began, and suddenly the words she had been about to say melted out of her consciousness. The smile spread across her face. "Harriet—you did some lovely work on the fifth grade mural. I was thinking, I have some old poster paints at home, and several sheets of drawing paper I will never use. How would you like to have them? I know you like to draw."

The girl opened her eyes wide. "Oh, Miss Norman," she breathed, "Thanks!" Then, because she was not accustomed to looking anyone directly in the eye for very long, she turned back to the button she had been playing with. But her face glowed.

Miss Norman was surprised at what she had said. The words she had uttered were not at all the words she had planned to speak. But it was just as well. Seeing the effect of what she had said, she was pleased. It made her even more generous.

"Why don't you walk home with me this afternoon, Harriet?" she invited. "Then you can have them all during Christmas vacation."

THE CHILD no longer tried to conceal her joy. With a happy little cry, she grabbed Miss Norman's hand.

"Let's hurry," she said.

As she got into her coat, Edith Norman did some thinking. "I know what was wrong with Harriet now. I was what was wrong with her. No wonder she did naughty things. Of course she feels different from the others. She's such a homely little thing. She needs to feel that she can do something really well. Why didn't I mention her drawing before? I knew she had talent for it."

The sudden success of her new method actually made Miss Norman smile with happiness. Looking down at the child, they exchanged glances so intimately that she knew she would never have trouble with Harriet again. Not if she were as wise as she had been today.

And it wasn't only Harriet who changed. Edith herself felt better, younger, stronger. She forgot she was tired. The brief moment of kindness and sympathy for the child gave her a lift, warmed her heart. She had a feeling that it might prove the beginning of better things for herself, as well as for Harriet. "Give a bit of love," she thought, "and you get more in return." There was a flush in her cheek, a smile on her lips, as she went toward the door with Harriet.

AS THEY CAME out of the room, two men swung into sight around the corner. Mr. Gibbs, the principal, was coming towards them, and with him was the most interesting looking man Edith had ever seen. He was tall and dark, and his voice was deep and warm. Her heart, usually so calm and sensible, for no reason at all leaped up on her sleeve.

Mr. Gibbs had seen her. He came forward heartily, shoving the young man along ahead of him.

"Oh, Miss Norman," he boomed, "I thought you had gone. I want you to meet our new junior high instructor, Mr. Jennings."

Then Edith remembered. Mrs. Rowland was leaving after Christmas vacation. Why had she never thought of this happening? Why had she supposed all teachers were sour old women? Teaching certainly didn't seem to have done anything damaging to the personality of Mr. Jennings.

"How do you do," she said pleasantly.

"Well, hello," he beamed, "and a very merry Christmas to you!"

Edith no longer found it difficult to smile. "But it's five days until Christmas," she said.

"I know—but you look so happy—so in a holiday mood—I couldn't resist it," he told her.

"Well," admitted Edith, "I was feeling particularly happy just now. Perhaps that explains it." She might have gone on just looking at him the way he was looking at her if Harriet hadn't tugged at her hand.

"Let's go, Miss Norman. I have to get home."

As they walked away, Edith heard Mr. Jennings telling the principal that he was sure he was going to like it here.

"And we'll be happy to have you!" she thought.

There was certainly more to Christmas giving than spending money for gifts. There was giving of your own personal self. She had given understanding to Harriet . . . and she felt that it was just the beginning of her giving. The world was a beautiful place, after all. For no special reason, she began to hum "Jingle Bells."

She wondered what might happen if she put a piece of mistletoe over her door.

One day a rich but miserly Chassid came to a Rabbi. The Rabbi led him to the window. "Look out there," he said, "and tell me what you see."

"People," answered the rich man.

Then the Rabbi led him to a mirror. "What do you see now?" he asked.

"I see myself," answered the Chassid.

Then the Rabbi said, "Behold—in the window there is glass and in the mirror there is glass. But the glass of the mirror is covered with a little silver, and no sooner is a little silver added than you cease to see others and see only yourself." S. Ansky, The Dybbuk (Liveright Pub. Corp.).

The European Mission

To the Saints of all the World:

EUROPE

Greetings. For many centuries, Europe has been the home of leading nations of the world. Here America has her ancestral roots. But this Christmas finds Europe in sore need, her currency devalued, her food supply dependent on other lands, her progress toward rehabilitation halted by international disagreement among some of the world's greatest powers, and some of her leading nations beset with internal disorders closely bordering on revolution.

Under these conditions, to those with an intelligent faith in God, the Star of Bethlehem burns brighter and with added meaning. And such are to be found today in the membership of the church in all the nations of Europe where the Restored Gospel has been planted.

GERMANY

Here is a nation with her great cities in ruins, her best farmlands in the hands of Russia and her great industrial areas dominated by the United States, Britain, and France. About all our people there have left is their belief in the eternal verities—their faith and confidence in God and his promises. To them, the teachings of the gospel shine out in greater beauty because of their contrast to the conditions under which they live. To them the gospel is indeed the Law of Life, and they see the need for its application among men and nations, if civilization is to survive. Through the eye of faith, Zion to them is a coming reality.

HOLLAND

Holland is a clean little country, doggedly working to rebuild her bombed-out areas, and seeking to recoup her losses in the East Indies. To the Saints of Holland, no less than to those of Germany, the Zion-ic plan is one of practical beauty, and its promise of attainment gives comfort and strength for the tasks yet ahead.

SCANDINAVIA

Norway, Sweden, and Denmark I know must be disappointed that the church has not yet sent missionaries there to help begin the definite rehabilitation of the work. However, we are getting both literature and man power ready for this work, and we hope that following the conference of 1948, more definite help will be forthcoming. The courage and devotion of the Saints of Scandinavia during the many years when just a "very few" had to stand almost alone, proves their right to be classed as "Saints of Latter Days." And as Christmas comes again, I know their hearts will be warmed amidst their northern winter, by the joy of anticipating what the gospel restored will yet do in their fair lands.

BRITAIN

Britain is in the midst of a social revolution, plagued by the backwash of war expenditures and war commitments, her people worn by the hard war years of stress and bombing and sleepless nights, and handicapped by the necessity of competing on a world market in an industrial age, with her own machinery and rolling stock largely outdated, which she feels she cannot take time out to rebuild. She has tightened her belt and is on a program of austerity such as few nations could endure and keep going.

So here, too, the thought of Zion and her social program with the spirit of genuine co-operation and brotherhood makes Christmas more desirable and meaningful.

With this background and with deep sympathy and confidence in the ultimate triumph of the church in Europe, on behalf of the Saints of the many lands comprising the European Mission we wish the Saints of all the world a happy Christmas. And we trust that no matter what their hardships, they shall find joy in the abiding faith that "Right makes might," and that right and truth shall eventually prevail. To that end the Saints of Europe solicit an interest in your faith and prayers for the leaders of both church and state, that all may be humble instruments toward the coming of that day.

The White Gift

the tree in an inconspicuous place and followed the others back to her seat.

The kindly pastor, Brother Barton, lifted his voice in the hush which followed. "Before the closing prayer in which we will ask God's blessing upon our homes and hearts as we depart from this remembrance of the Christ child's birth, I am impressed to say that there is one among us who is uncertain of the quality of her gift. She need have no fear. Service for Christ is the greatest gift of all, and the Master is pleased."

A warm spirit of rejoicing flowed over Helga. That message had been for her. She thought joyously of the hastily written but sincere words tucked into the white envelope. She would sweep and scrub and polish the little church every Saturday through the coming year with a willing hand and a glad heart for Christ.

Behold the Man!

the Incarnation is the importance which it attaches to the body. That God should reveal himself in this way points up the importance of our bodily stewardship. Men with understanding will not choose to abuse their bodies. They will not poison them with drugs, overburden them with strains they were not intended to endure, or limit their usefulness as the vehicles for the expression of intelligence by over-indulgence and careless habits. To do any of these things is to contradict the purpose of the Incarnation in our own lives. We always need to remember that it is through our experience in the body, stimulated by the spirit of eternal intelligence, that we also may grow into the divine likeness.

THE INCARNATION is a process which reveals God to man and man to God in terms of an experience shared by both. It results from the union of an eternal spirit with a body like ours in a combination which is called the Son of God. It continues in the growing spiritual power of men who consider themselves also the sons of God in the spiritual sense, and who follow the example of Christ, the elder brother, in making their bodies the vehicle of divine expression. As they grow, they to, in increasing measure, become the incarnation of Divinity—the purpose toward which the Great Incarnation is directed.

NOTE.—Wherever the word beginning is used, either in Scriptural quotations or in the text of the article, it is intended to refer to the beginning of the works of God with man on this earth. This may include the preparations for the actual physical creations and the spiritual concepts involved. This interpretation is taken from the statement in Doctrine and Covenants 22: 21, as follows: "But only an account of this earth and the inhabitants thereof, give I unto you." Eternity has no beginning. Therefore, any beginning spoken of must refer to some section of eternity, which, for the sake of convenience, we divide into the measurements of "time." The beginning can refer, then, only to the point at which the "time" begins—in this case, to the cosmic and spiritual events having to do with man as we know him on this earth.

BULLETIN BOARD

St. Louis District Conference

The St. Louis District Conference will be held at the church in St. Louis, corner of Grand Boulevard and Carter Avenue, on January 17 and 18. All members of the Zion's League are invited to attend the League banquet at the church on Saturday evening. Sunday's activities include the 8:30 a.m. prayer services (for adults and young people); classes at 9:30; preaching at 11; basket lunch in the lower auditorium at noon; and a service at 2 p.m. conducted by the music department. All district members and those living near St. Louis are invited to attend. Please bring a basket lunch; warm drinks will be furnished.

EDWARD M. JOY,
Publicity Department.

Attention, All Members in or Near Port Arthur and Orange, Texas

Please contact the Central Texas District president, Earl Moore, Box 566, Ft. Worth, Texas, or the nonresident pastor, Hal E. Davenport, 2401 South Buckner Boulevard, Dallas 17, Texas, with reference to the possibility of starting a mission in your community.

Names and Addresses Wanted

If you have relatives, friends, or former neighbors who have moved from the east, south, middle west, or southwest to the Pacific northwest (Idaho, Washington, Oregon, or British Columbia), Seventy Arthur F. Gibbs, 8747 Phinney Avenue, Seattle, Washington, will appreciate your sending him their names and addresses. He suggests the following people be included: members of the church who have not been officially transferred from records elsewhere; nonmember relatives who would appreciate receiving missionary calls; friends who have had contact with the church in other areas, or those who would like the missionary to call on them. Give family name; address (if street and number are unknown, give locality); contact with the church, if any; interests; relationship; any other information that may be helpful in ministering to them. It is suggested that branch secretaries check their records for those who should be transferred to the Northwest.

ENGAGEMENTS Heath-Ballinger

Mr. and Mrs. Forrest Ballinger of Grain Valley, Missouri, announce the engagement of their daughter, Virginia Mae, to Mac Heath, son of Mr. and Mrs. Clive Heath of Oak Grove, Missouri. The wedding will take place on December 24 at the Reorganized Church in Blue Springs, Missouri.

Morse-Maxwell

Mrs. L. P. Maxwell of Dallas, Texas, announces the engagement of her daughter, Lillian Pauline, to Bonard E. Morse, son of Mrs. Etta Morse of Council Bluffs, Iowa. The wedding will take place on December 28. Miss Maxwell is a graduate of Graceland College and the University of Texas. Mr. Morse is now attending Texas University.

MARRIAGES Kipp-Fritschle

Jeannette Edna Fritschle, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Reginald Fritschle of Nampa, Idaho, and Ivor Perry Kipp, son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Kipp of Caldwell, Idaho, were married on November 23 at the Reorganized Church in Boise, Idaho. The bride's father officiated at the double-ring ceremony. The couple will reside in San Diego, California, where Mr. Kipp is stationed at the United States Naval Hospital.

DEATHS

PARKER.—Thomas, was born in Grant Township, Huron County, Michigan, on July 12, 1873, and died August 28, 1947, at the home of his sister in Owendale, Michigan. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on October 27, 1901.

Surviving are three sisters: Emily Commins and Ephie Hall of Flint, Michigan, and Elizabeth Andrews of Owendale; and one brother, Silas B. of Owendale. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Owendale. Interment was in the Grant Cemetery.

DELLER.—Samuel, son of Henry and Caroline Deller, was born March 11, 1868, at Ironton, Ohio, and died at the home of his daughter in Rich Hill, Missouri, on August 10, 1947. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on March 9, 1890, and remained a devoted member until his death. On April 22, 1890, he married Minnie Duffield; five children were born to this union.

He is survived by his wife; three daughters: Mrs. Ola Alien and Mrs. Ada Baetge of Rich Hill, and Mrs. Etta Reeves of Portsmouth, Virginia; two sons: John D. and W. H. Deller of Rich Hill; seven grandchildren; and three great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the church, Elder Arlie Allen officiating. Burial was in the Green Lawn Cemetery in Rich Hill.

SWENSON.—Mary Alice (Rowe), was born November 8, 1875, at Stratford, Ontario, and died at Rest Haven Home near Independence, Missouri, on November 21, 1947. She was baptized on July 7, 1901, at McBain, Michigan, and was among the first members of the branch there. She moved to Ribstone, Alberta, in October, 1909, then to Edgerton, Alberta, from there to Michigan, Saskatchewan, and finally to Independence, Missouri, in 1913. In April, 1917, her husband, Fred Rowe, was sent to the southern states under general church appointment; she later joined him and was there during the flu epidemic of 1918. During this time, she gave herself unsparingly to the service of others. In 1919, she and Brother Rowe were sent to Arkansas and Louisiana; in 1920, to Texas; and in 1922, back to Independence. Brother Rowe passed away in February, 1928, and on December 17, 1930, she was married to Swen Swenson, who died January 4, 1944. Funeral services were conducted at the Roland Speaks Funeral Chapel in Independence. Elders Glaude Smith and Amos Higdon officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

Calendar

This attractive calendar printed in two colors (brown and green) follows the church-wide theme for every month. On each page is a photograph of church significance illustrating this theme. Special dates in Latter Day Saint history are listed by the month and are emphasized on the calendar in green. Our calendar was especially prepared to be used with the Pastor's Handbook for 1948 issued by the First Presidency.

TIME keeps adding to his birthdays, but—

HE WON'T GROW OLD!

Just the way you've always wanted to see him—with his Colonel's Hat on, and "looking pleasant."

Couldn't catch him to retire him—he was much too busy. Couldn't catch him to take a decent photo of him—he was getting shots with his own camera. For years his personality has been the joy of the church, and pictures of him, the despair of editors. Until Iris Palmer, one of his camera disciples, got out her lariat. When this picture came in, everybody exclaimed, "At last, a good picture of Uncle Ed!" We celebrate the event in offering the picture to you.

C. ED MILLER

Missioner to lands abroad, lecturer, author, visual education expert, enthusiast and idea man, Brother Miller has served the church in many ways, and always with a great love of people. He never took his age seriously, but keeps working as if he were still twenty-five.

Our prediction: When he reaches heaven, he will ask Gabriel for permission to take pictures of the blowing of the Trumpet, or the Last Judgment.

AUDITORIUM NEWS

Kansas City.—Student members of the church from Kansas City University, Junior College and other city institutions met in the Liberal Arts Building at Kansas City University on Wednesday afternoon, December 10, with Apostle C. G. Mesley, Bishop G. L. DeLapp, Fred O. Davies (of England), Edward Butterworth (recently returned from French Oceania) for a period of fellowship and discussion. Bishop DeLapp addressed the group on "The Progress of the Church," and after a dinner meeting, Brother Davies spoke on "Expanding Horizons." Other meetings of the kind are planned for the future.

Ottawa, Canada.—While visiting in this city, Bishop H. L. Livingston and Apostle D. B. Jensen met Leroy Bowerman, a member of the church who is also a member of the Canadian Parliament representing Saskatchewan, now attending a special session.

Brethren Livingston and Jensen also included Toronto, Hamilton, London, and Chatham among Canadian cities visited, and the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, stopping at Sault Ste. Marie, Gladstone, and Gulliver. They found the people in good spirits, with large congregations in most places. The trip occupied from November 28 to December 13.

Des Moines District.—Apostle D. T. Williams is working out with local leaders a system of missionary organization that will give every member some task to do, and make this church activity more effective.

Religious Education.—Dr. F. M. McDowell has been engaged to deliver a series of addresses to the priesthood of Central Missouri Stake by the president, Ward A. Hougas. A new feature of Brother Hougas' plan, which gives good success, is to have each man bring his wife, who attends her own meetings as well as the general gathering. This insures good support at home for the work of the priesthood. Brother McDowell's schedule is as follows: Warrensburg, January 6; Cross Timbers and Sedalia, January 8; Buckner, January 16; Pleasant Hill, January 20; Bates City, January 30. These will include current conditions and problems of Restoration leadership.

Zion's League.—Plans are completed for the meeting of the Zion's League Advisory Council on December 29. Discussions will include, an evaluation of "Zion's League Annual Number One"; a review and criticism of Number Two for 1948-49; special projects, Missions Abroad, Leadership School for Youth Leaders; reunions and camp work.

Religious Education Advisory Council.—Will meet December 30, with the aim, "To explore needs and consider possibilities in the uniquely L. D. S. curricular materials in special areas." Members of this council include: President F. H. Edwards, E. J. Gleazer, Jr., President of Graceland College; Apostle C. G. Mesley, Dr. R. A. Cheville, Graceland; Superintendent of Schools Harry Lorange, Lamoni; Bishop Wayne Updike, Kansas City; Miss Ruby Williamson, school principal, Independence; Dr. F. M. McDowell and John Darling of the Department of Religious Education.

Interlude

IN THIS SHORT INTERVAL of days between the red-green-and-gold glory of Christmas and the icicles and silver of New Year's, we linger in a state of consciousness like pale starlight, waiting for dawn. For those who think only of Santa Claus, he and his noisy, stomping reindeer have departed across the roofs of the little homes, and fields encrusted in drifts of crystalline snow. And for those who knelt with the shepherds and the Wise Men beside the manger where the Christ child lay, the stairways of celestial light have been withdrawn, taking the heavenly host and the angel chorus with them. We linger in meditation and memory, our eyes still shining with the vision of something from another world; we linger bemused, pondering these things in our hearts as Mary did, while our hands turn slowly and reluctantly to the tasks of every day.

For this time, our preoccupations with practical living, our prevalent materialism, our concern with the husks and wrappings of an existence whose real core is spiritual, have been retired to their proper places, secondary to the ideals by which the soul is prepared for its destiny in eternal life. For these few days we have put aside the masks and costumes in which we have lived, hidden so long that our friends identify us by them; and we have been ourselves. We have experienced, if we have any capacity for wonder and fantasy at all, a return to childhood; either as the children of this world playing at the foot of a beautiful tree, or as the children of a Heavenly Father, worshipping at the foot of his throne, set down for a moment upon the earth while he revealed his hand in performing, on a larger and more significant scale, the old miracle of new life which gave us his Son. A return to childhood—with its un-studied faith and innocence—for did he not say himself, "Except ye become as little children . . ."

THE YEAR'S CLIMAX is definitely Christmas. It lives in its highest ecstasy in that festival, and when Christmas night ends and the lights are put out, it dies. All the rest, in the few days that remain, is a cleaning and tidying up, putting the old year away for its rest, and preparing the house for another guest. Christmas is rich, old age, laden with treasures and honor, feasting its friends and paying a last tribute before taking its departure for eternity. New Year's is a bare, brawling stranger demanding room and fare, telling us that our festival of dreams is over, and calling us back to the realities of daily living.

Here we rest a few days, making our final summary of the old, preparing our estimates of the new. No one sees the old year depart without making plans for a new one, just as no one sees the physical form of a loved one consigned to earth without trying to prepare his mind and heart for a long journey he must make alone, a pilgrimage whose end he cannot know.

A very few days now, and we face the long succession of weeks and months, of travel through winter's cold, of labor through slowly lengthening hours of light, of worries, work, planning, and responsibility. Our destiny is only partly in our hands, for we share the fate of our world too.

AS WE PAUSE HERE in this short interlude of time, should we not cast our sight backward over the old year, seeing its little successes and its big failures, and learn the lessons that we should find in our mistakes? And then as we turn our faces to the future and put our shoulders under our burdens, can we not determine that we will try to do better another time?

Let us think of all our relationships in the coming year—our relationships with people—our relationships in the home, at the office or shop, in school or university, at church, and on the street. In many ways we have fumbled and made a poor job of it during the last year.

Wouldn't it be a pity if we learned nothing from all our hurts and bruises, our misfortunes and mistakes? And wouldn't it be wonderful if we look ahead and plan so that nothing would take us unaware and that we would keep ourselves under restraint and control, so that we would act as Christian men and women at all times?

SO MUCH OF our suffering and trouble is a result of our own mistakes. So much of our happiness and peace comes to us when we sacrifice ourselves in the Christian manner, and live for something greater than ourselves, outside of ourselves, and bigger than ourselves. How long it takes us to learn the lesson that Christ does not seek to impose his way of life upon us to make miserable and pitiable sacrifices of us, but to save us from ourselves and to release us from the prisons of our own selfish interests in order that we may enjoy the great liberty of the larger way of life!

It is not until you give yourself that you find yourself. It is not until you serve that you can receive the full riches of life from your fellow men. It is not until you yield to God that you will find he has given himself to you.

This life is something that we cannot conduct as independent, self-contained individuals without losing all the best that life contains. We go to the fountains with small buckets, bringing away too little because we try to bring for ourselves alone. It is when we go to God together—when we live together—when we live for each other, that we learn to live at all.

The winter snows help to determine what the summer harvests will be. So the plans we make at the beginning of the year help to determine our success or failure, our joy or sorrow, our usefulness in the work of the church and the world.

Editorial

Across the Desk

From Elder Eugene Theys, Rotterdam, Holland, November 27, 1947:

"We are happy to announce our arrival in Holland and to say that our trunks and crates from America have arrived.

"We left New York the afternoon of October 8 and landed in Southampton on October 15. We spent a week in Enfield, and from there we went to Nuneaton, where we stayed with Brother and Sister Fry.

"During our stay at Nuneaton, we spent one week end at Birmingham and the other in Nuneaton, where we preached to the Saints. We received a hearty welcome from the Saints wherever we went. Although we did not find economic conditions so good in England, we did see many things of interest. One of the most enjoyable days of my life was spent visiting some historical places in London.

"On November 1, Brethren McConley, Scherer, and I made a trip to Holland to check on the sale of the house and to buy some necessary furniture. We stayed here until about the tenth, during which time we bought furniture and insured both the house and furniture. Our return across the North Sea was quite rough, and Brother McConley spent a very unpleasant night.

"We left Nuneaton with our families on November 18, arriving in Rotterdam the following morning. A number of Saints met us at Station D.P. with bouquets of flowers, and from there the whole group went to the house on Annastraat. The ladies of the branch proceeded to clean a few rooms and to make them more liveable.

"We are now partially settled in our new homes with all the crates and trunks unpacked. The third family is still in the house. These people must wait for our official permits from the government before they can move. They have a house to go to, provided the housing bureau will issue their release from this one. They do not want to start action on their move until we have our permits, otherwise, it will embarrass us in our present position. We have word that by the first of next week our permit will be granted; then we can help them arrange to move.

"I am quite anxious to get into my field of labor in Germany and to face the problems with our people there.

Brother McConley has been directing most of the correspondence from there to me lately, which I find is going to keep me quite busy until my German comes a little faster. I am not paying too much attention to the Dutch language, because I do not want to be confused with my German. I do find, though, that I am becoming accustomed to it and am beginning to understand a lot of what is being said.

"We all like Holland very much and find it to be an interesting little country."

From Elder Albert A. Scherer, Rotterdam, Holland, November 27, 1947:

"We regret that we are so slow in acknowledging the encouraging greetings sent us by telegram on the date of our departure from America. We assure you that we do appreciate your expressed interest in us; with such support, we certainly feel like giving our best to the work before us.

"After a stay of some four weeks in England, Sister Scherer and I are now settled in our home at Annastraat 2. We are pleased with the place and take great pleasure in trying to equip it to meet the needs of the mission. With the preparation that I received at the Berlitz school, I am now able to understand most of the common conversation and make myself understood. Sister Scherer is able to go shopping alone—which is another way of saying that she, too, is learning the language very rapidly.

"Since my arrival here, I have had opportunity to visit most of our groups in Holland, and already I feel myself strongly attached to these humble yet zealous people. When I look into their eyes, I seem to read these words: 'We've prayed and waited long for help and leadership from America. Now that it has arrived, what shall we do?' Already I see limitless possibilities. There has come testimony to me that the work here has the favor of our Heavenly Father and that many souls shall be brought to a knowledge of the truth. I pray God that I may measure up to these challenges.

"We like Holland. We find it easy to feel at home in our new surroundings. The Dutch are grateful to the Americans, and a warm look of welcome greets me wherever I turn. Many things are rationed and prices are very high, but the food situation is not too bad. Clothing is more urgently needed just now. Fuel, too, is quite scarce, since most of it must be imported. In all of this, however, we fare quite well, thanks to the Presiding Bishopric, and the many "breaks" we've had here. Things have been working out so nicely for us that we can say of a surety, the Lord is watching over us and providing for us.

"We are all well. We had a very light frost last night—the first this year in Holland. There are many cloudy days, but it is taken for granted by everyone, so we, too, will try to do likewise and watch for the silver linings.

"As we become organized here at Annastraat, we will keep you better informed on proceedings. In the meantime, we send our best wishes to all of the Saints in America, and especially you brethren of the leading quorums. Our prayers are for you and all others who give themselves to the Lord's work."

Word From Australia

The First Presidency:

It has been a rich experience for me and the general and local church representatives, as well as the church members, to receive the ministry which President Garver and Bishop Johnson are giving here.

A number of priesthood members and Saints, as well as the Johnson family, met the flying boat on its arrival from New Zealand, and, through the offices of Pastor E. Parkes of Leichhardt, they were through the customs in a few minutes.

During the two weeks to date, President Garver has domiciled at my home in Sydney and at the mission home with Pastor C. A. Davies in

THE WAY OF GOD

By Robert J. Miller

THE LAW OF SHARING

THERE IS A LAW of sharing that appears to be common to all creation—a law of God under which nothing renders its greatest service nor receives its greatest reward by itself. It was conceived by the Creator to insure unity in his works and bring all things into harmony with a single divine plan. No part can say, "I am sufficient unto myself and have no need of thee."

The Apostle Paul expressed this thought in the twelfth chapter of Romans and the first letter to the Corinthians when speaking of the body of Christ. He stated very clearly the importance of each member and its relationship and responsibility to the entire body. He also left no doubt as to the inability of any member being a complete entity by itself.

The plan of God demands a perfect love among men for each other, a sincere recognition of personal importance, and the acknowledgment of one's responsibility as a steward over oneself. Above all, it demands absolute love for God and all that he stands for, with perfect obedience to his will. These are the two great commandments concerning the law.

The conformance of a people to such a program permits none to say, "I am sufficient unto myself, and have no need of thee." For God has willed our well-being to come through a law of love, which requires sharing, unity in action, and a centered purpose. Through it, we can have a full, rounded life in this world and in the world to come.

The law of sharing does not deal with men only but reaches into all existence. Things of nature are governed in part by their surroundings and are dependent in part upon them. Plant life requires the grain and the germ within, plus soil, air, sunshine, and rain. Animal life requires mating, the bounties of the land for sustenance, air to breathe, water to drink, and so on. All things blend into a common purpose, fill a need, and garner a blessing.

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY unite in bringing man the blessings of modern living by working with and through the fundamental truths of God. By uniting elements according to varying formulae which research has made known, they bring us new substances. Because of a law of sharing, all things find greater usefulness in the surrendering of themselves to a greater purpose. One would be amazed to hear how often this law is applied in creating an automobile, radio, refrigerator, or any of the numerous items, which men have devised from the things from God for our use.

Hydrogen and oxygen unite to give us water; iron, carbon, nickel, molybdenum, vanadium, tungsten, manganese, silicon and other elements unite and share their properties to give us steels of various types for different uses.

Men share with the world the truths they have discovered, adding to the vast storehouse of knowledge already in use. So, by concerted efforts, practical dreams come true. Picture in your mind, if you can, the extent to which the law of sharing is applied in this world of ours. Then in humble recognition of God's wisdom and beneficence, give thanks to him.

SELF-MADE MAN

OCCASIONALLY WE may hear one who has evaluated his talents highly and attained a fair degree of success boast that he is a "self-made man." Nothing could be farther from the truth. Such a one has glorified his Maker by using his talents rightly and by proving in a degree the inherent powers with which God has endowed him—godly powers that often lie dormant in us, awaiting the right exercise of will. Such a man has pleased and glorified his Maker insofar as he has used his talents wisely and well, multiplying his blessings meanwhile. But he is not a "self-made man," for his spirit came from God and was not born of itself. He had nothing to do with his creation, nor did he set the time of his birth or choose his parents or the place where he would be born. And after his birth, he started his journey in the condition of society created by the millions who had preceded him, with access to the knowledge they had contributed to the world.

Each generation has a better start with fewer handicaps than the one preceding it, for each starts with the advantage of the total of all which has gone before: the lessons of history for good or ill; the products of industry and science which make life easier and allow more time for special pursuits aside from earning a living; the accumulated textbooks with their vast knowledge in all branches of learning; the advantage of better health, due to the rapid strides of research in the field of medicine, and a much saner view of life and death—for as knowledge increases, witchcrafts and sorceries cease.

Tennyson clearly recognized the values of the past and present; he appreciated the society of which he was a part, and expressed himself in these words, "I am a part of all that I have met."

Service, who appreciated the fact that we are inter-related and inter-dependent, expressed his thought thus:

"Try to get the Chemic view:
A million, million lives made you,
And in a million you will be Immortal down eternity."

THE CORN OF WHEAT

EXCEPT A CORN of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit."—John 12: 24. This is the lesson we have tried to make clear. Except we be willing to give of our life (die unto ourselves), sharing that which we have to give to others and availing ourselves of the blessings they in turn have to offer us, our lives will be barren and, as the corn of wheat we shall die. But if we will "present our bodies a willing sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is our reasonable service" (Rom. 12:1), we shall share our blessings from God with all humanity and keep our lives throughout eternity. For "he that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal."—John 12: 25.

Professor James, an eminent American psychologist said, "Truth is that which will work." All good things work and come from God, for all truth comes from God. The fact that we have so much sin and distress in the world is not because of achievement, but because of the fact that men's minds are "conformed to the things of this world" and subject to the spiritual temptations of greed, jealousy, selfishness, ambition, lust for power, and the physical temptations which come to us through the five senses. The pity is that the good things of God are being wrongly used to satiate these evil desires.

When men are "transformed by the renewing of their minds," they "prove what that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God is." (Romans 12: 2.) Here is the meaning of baptism: "We are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin."—Romans 6: 4, 6. For "it is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing." The blessings that have accrued to our generation will be multiplied a thousandfold when governed and utilized by a quickening spirit.

FELLOWSHIP OF THE MYSTERY

LOVE, WHICH IS another word for sharing, is a vital part of the "fellowship of the mystery" mentioned by Paul. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." He so loved his creation that he became a part of it, for only as he gave of the power of his spirit could things come into existence. The law of sharing, the law of love, began with God.

Christ, by like example, yielded himself to the great purpose, "the immortality and eternal life of man" (Doctrine and Covenants 22: 23). He shared his life with those about him and gave it for us all. He lost his life in this world but saved it unto life eternal. God dwelt in him, and he in God. As we enter into newness of life, we too shall dwell in God, and God and Christ in us (John 17: 20-23; 14: 23). Here is the "fellowship of the mystery."

SELF-MADE MEN? Impossible! The fullness of life can come to us only through sharing the talents and blessings God has given each of us, accepting and using the blessings common humanity has to offer, and sharing our lives with God for his purpose in us.

We must recognize the plan of God for one father—one family—and one way of life. We are too much a part of each other for life to be full or joyful otherwise. None of us can say, "I am self-sufficient and have no need of thee."

Newcastle. Brother Johnson is with his own people in each place.

The ministry of Brethren Garver and Johnson is being greatly appreciated by the Saints. Their wise counsel and addresses to the priesthood, men, youth, and women's groups are both timely and fundamental to future activities. The people are sensing the value of contact with the General Church which they are experiencing in the person of representatives of the leading quorums of the church.

I am happy in the association I am experiencing personally. Already, I feel my ministry enriched by the contact, wise counsel, and personal association I have had with the brethren.

From Newcastle we go to Northern New South Wales and Queensland, then return to Sydney for a General Conference Appointee Institute before the Tiona Reunion. After the institute, Brethren Garver and Johnson will be visiting churches in the Tiona area.

The past month brings news of progress in various centers, each of which have reported a number of baptisms and some further prospects. While most of them are children, some are adults.

I would like to mention that the Saints are all enjoying and appreciating Brother Garver's ministry and personality. They are sharing the wonderful development Brother Walter Johnson has made and the very fine ministry he is able to give.

With all good wishes and prayers for God's blessing on the ministry of your quorum and especially that of President Garver.

Yours in Gospel Bonds,

So You'd Like to Write?

Footnotes on a glamorous profession

THE SUCCESSFUL WRITER, according to popular views, belongs to one of the world's most privileged classes. He doesn't have to punch a time clock. He can go where he pleases. He can work or loaf, according to his inclination, if he can afford it; for nobody is around to compel him to work, nor to fire him if he doesn't. He doesn't even have to see his employer, for the U. S. mail takes his products to the office and (if all goes well) returns a check to him a little later.

It is not surprising that this idyllic picture attracts many thousands of people into the field of writing. They fill the mails with manuscripts and editors' offices with problems. And the manuscripts are as diverse in variety and merit as the authors themselves.

When you see a good story or article in a magazine or book, you think of the wonderful rewards, the leisure, the pleasant way of life that this person enjoys. You do not think much about the long years of preparation and toil, the many discouragements and the mountains of rejection slips he has survived.

THE SUCCESSFUL EDITOR of a big publishing house, who is actually the friend of many writers, is not often imagined in the same glamorous terms. He is seen by the public through the eyes of the many unsuccessful writers, as a hard-hearted villain whose mission in life, for some unaccountable reason, is to thwart and defeat them.

To understand the writer-editor relationship, think of it this way. Writers are manufacturers, seeking markets for their wares. Editors and publishers are retail merchants, trying to buy what they think the public will want. They survive or perish according to whether their judgment is good or poor.

The competition among writers is keen. There are thousands writing for the hundreds who get into print at all, and for the tens who make really big money at it. In the larger publishing houses, manuscripts arrive by hundreds, and only a moderate handful can be used in any one month for a single magazine. Those who get into "the money" have to be good.

WHAT MAKES A WRITER GOOD? Quality of workmanship is the writer's problem. Writing for the "slick" magazines requires certain qualities. Writing for the "pulp" calls for another kind. Serious and religious journals take something even different. But they all demand quality of some kind. So it is the writer's problem to produce good workmanship.

No sensible person chooses a profession or life work without trying to learn what his capacities and aptitudes are. It would be a mistake for a tone-deaf person to try to be a musician, or for a color-blind person to try to be a painter in oils. I was amazed once to meet a young person who hated English composition and wanted to be a writer. She thought she could do it without benefit of grammar and English. "After all," she said, "the sports writers and confession mills are making money!" And it seems that she had a point there, but she never made her theory work. She changed her mind and got married.

What makes a writer good? He (or she) needs three things: 1. basic capacities or talents; 2. trained skills; and 3. experience. If you lack the basic capacities and talents, you probably will not be interested; though many such are attracted by the lure of money. If you have those basic capacities and talents, you must train them. This should include the completion of high school, with further work at college or the university. With this all back of you, you seek experience.

HOW TO GET EXPERIENCE. The experience needed includes more than plain writing. It includes evaluation and discussion of the writer's work, identification of his mistakes, a clear comprehension of his problems, and finding solutions for them. Friends can help the writer, and families can help too, if they are intelligent, discriminating, and honest. Otherwise they are a hindrance. And they have the usual handicaps of all amateurs.

Aspiring writers should study carefully the writer's professional magazines. A writer's best chance for experience is contact with a friendly editor. If he has really made a serious effort to learn how to write, he will be worth some editor's time and attention, no matter how busy the editor may be.

The great publishers who pay big prices for manuscripts do not have the time to consider how to remedy faults in scripts nor how to help writers. They have an abundant supply of good scripts—more than they can use. They just send the others back with rejection slips, and the writers never know why, unless someone tells them.

Editors of smaller publications, and especially those that cannot pay for manuscripts, however, can help the struggling writer. They need help themselves, and they are willing to trade it for scripts for their publications. This is the aspiring writer's chance.

Writers who have given their work to church publications, receiving help in return, have gone on to successful writing careers and have made money. A woman who received her first critical help from our juvenile editor later sold many stories and articles; and she always remained friendly and continued to contribute to our paper out of gratitude. A young woman who has done much writing for our church publications has just placed her first novel with a big eastern publisher. It is probable that she will continue to sell.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR WRITERS to get experience and criticism is thus furnished by our church publications. The editors are happy to assist, encourage, and help those who are judged capable of profiting by comment.

Of course, when a manuscript is hopeless, and nothing on earth could make it good, it would be cruel for an editor to go through it, pointing out all mistakes. It would also take too much time, and nothing would be gained for the editor but an enemy, and nothing for the writer but hurt feelings. So the editor sends a short kindly note saying that it cannot be used, and making no suggestions.

If, however, the article has some good ideas, if it shows enough promise that moderate revision would put it in shape for publication, or if the writer shows promise that he might produce another article that could be used, the editor sits down and writes a longer letter, with encouragement, suggestions, criticisms, and discussion of problems.

Our two juvenile publications, Zion's Hope and Stepping Stones, need stories and articles. While editors are not permitted to make payment for manuscripts, they can give help and encouragement which will be of value to the writer. The Saints' Herald operates on the same basis. Study the publication you wish to write for and then try to match its needs.

Church people also write for our publications because of their devotion and their desire to help and contribute. Writing is one of the most honorable and necessary services church members can perform. Their work reaches thousands of people.

CRITICISM of some kind is necessary to progress for the writer.

Why can't the writer criticize his own work? Because he judges it with the same limitations, blind spots, areas of ignorance, and errors with which he wrote it. Another reader can see what the writer cannot. The writer is like a mother—she can see no fault in her own child, because they are her own faults!

Writers, like mothers, are sensitive about these children of their minds. They identify themselves with their creations, and any criticism of the creation is received as an attack on the creator. This makes it difficult for an editor to help. Not many writers can profit by criticism, or even accept it reasonably. Some become angry, some want to waste endless hours arguing, and some desire to fight or get the editor fired. This makes editors wary and reluctant to help. They know it often brings trouble. Better to decline in polite language and say nothing about reasons, in general. Thus writers defeat themselves by becoming angry.

But some good people are intelligent about criticism. That does not mean they slavishly accept the editor's opinion. It means they give it consideration, which is all any editor can ask. At the same time, the editor's long training and experience make him a better judge than an inexperienced writer.

TIME AND WORK are required to make a writer. It can't be done overnight. It takes years of effort. Writing is a great art, and a difficult one. Proficiency in any great art takes years of patient practice.

Once when I was young I saw an advertisement for a "Poet's Pencil." The ad did not promise that the pencil would make a poet of me, but that was the idea I had. Well, the pencil looked quite ordinary when I got it, and if the magic had worked

I would be a poet now.

Last year, many people thought if they could get one of the new ball point pens, they could write a lot of fine things. Ball point pens are a drug on the market now, but the world still has a shortage of great writers. Next year it will be a new typewriter, after that, who knows? It is something in the head—not in the hand—that makes a writer.

THE EDITORS are trying to serve the church by preparing our publications with the best material they can obtain. There are never enough of the best quality articles; there is a fair supply of rather good ones, and too many that cannot be used at all.

THE TRAGEDY of writing is the author who has a good idea, but cannot put it into articulate form. It is easy to send back the incompetent, hopeless article. But the piece that is partly good, partly weak, because the author has not prepared, is hard to use, hard to reject. If more of our people would study the art of writing, and develop it as a service to the cause of Christ, we would have an abundance of good articles for our church papers at all times.

The editors are glad to hear from those who have taken the trouble to train, and will be glad to give help to those who can use it.

Turn About

I once did something good for God
—'Twas just a little thing—
But, oh, the many blessings that
One tiny deed did bring!
Our good deeds live forever,
While God forgives each sin,
And we're repaid a hundredfold,
When we do things for him.

When God did something good for me,

How quickly I forgot
To give him all the credit for
The blessings that he brought!
Oh, that I might remember to Do something good each day,
To show appreciation for
The good he sends my way.

Composition of the Plates of the Book of Mormon

By Thelona D. Stevens

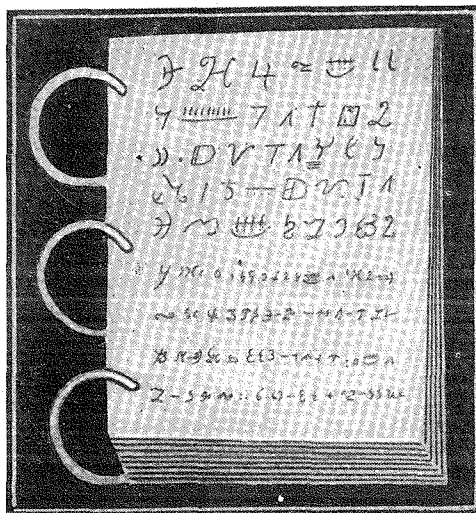

VARIOUS METALS were used in the making of the plates which bore the sacred records of the ancients with whom the Book of Mormon deals. Within the book there is mention of plates of brass (1 Nephi 1: 61), of ore—gold, silver, and copper (1 Nephi 5: 217, 218), and of pure gold (Mosiah 5: 64).

There is abundant proof, too, that ancients in the Eastern Hemisphere also wrote on plates and tablets of various kinds (Jacob 3: 2). Though papyrus (made of reeds) and parchment (made of skins) anciently were used for certain writings and copies, for durable, permanent records engravings were made on plates and tablets. The tables of the covenant were engraved on stone (Exodus 34: 4, 28). The following quotation offers proof of the general use of another type of tablets for engravings:

During the last thirty years a considerable amount of light has been thrown on the first few chapters of Genesis by the recovery and interpretation of an extensive Babylonian literature. The Assyrian king, Asurbanipal, who reigned in the middle of the seventh century B. C., caused copies of immense numbers of documents from other libraries in the country to be made for his library at Nineveh, some of these writings dating from many hundred years earlier. They comprised works on religion, history, mathematics, law, magic, and astronomy. The copies, like the originals, were on tablets of fine clay, inscribed, whilst in a soft state, with wedge-shaped (cuneiform) characters, and then burned in a furnace till they became hard and dry. These clay tablets are of all sizes, from an inch to more than a foot long, and the museums of Europe and America now possess thousands of them, derived from Asurbanipal's library and other places. Excavations are still being carried on, with the result that every year sees a large addition to the recovered treasures.—The One Volume Bible Commentary, edited by J. R. Dummelow, page xxxii.

This ancient Assyrian king used tables of clay for collections for his library, but the Lord directed his people to use the more durable substances, the precious metals, for the records he commanded to be written. Clay tablets would be quite acceptable for a private library, but for the priceless Scriptures, it is understandable that God would demand and his children would wish that they would be on the best of metals—gold, silver, and brass. Such were used for the tabernacle, the ark of the covenant, and the temple, and one would expect records kept at God's command to be likewise on these metals.

THE FIRST MENTION in the Bible of record-keeping is in Genesis 6: 5, 9, 47, but there is no mention of the material on which their "book of remembrance" and "genealogy . . . of the children of Adam" were kept, nor do the Jaredites name the kind of material on which the record was made which they "brought across the great deep" (Ether 3:80). This record, however, was undoubtedly the original record of the Scriptures, which probably included "the Book of Enoch" (Doctrine and Covenants 104: 29) and, since they brought it with them to America, it was not available to the Israelites. Therefore, the Lord revealed to Moses the marvels of the creation of the world and all things from the beginning, which he commanded him to write (Genesis 1: 1), but Moses does not state on what he wrote, nor the language in which he wrote, but it is believed to be Egyptian (probably by way of commandment), the brevity of this language doubtlessly being one reason.

The Ten Commandments were engraved on tables of stone, but obviously, for practical reasons, stone could not have been used for all the copious writings of Moses. Exodus 39:30 shows that the making of metal plates and engraving upon them was an art practiced during the days of Moses, and since among the Israelites there were artisans in metal, including brass (1 Kings 7: 14), it is easily seen how Moses could have used this metal for the writing of his complete testimony. God commanded Moses: ". . . in the ark thou shalt put the testimony that I shall give thee" (Exodus 25: 21).

When Moses finally completed his writings (which seems to have been near the time of his death), he commanded that they be kept in the ark of the covenant (Deuteronomy 31: 24-29), in which were kept also the two tables of the covenant, the golden pot of manna, and Aaron's rod (Hebrews 9: 4). However, at the time the ark of the covenant was taken by the Philistines, the sacred records were evidently protected. (Nephi declares that God preserved them in 1 Nephi 1: 166.)

THE ARK OF THE covenant brought woes to the Philistines, and they gladly returned it to Israel, after which it was kept by Levitical families (I Samuel 7: 1, 2; II Samuel 6: 3, 11; I Chronicles 13: 13, 14; 15: 24-26) until the time of David, who prepared a tent for it (I Chronicles 16: 1). When Solomon's Temple was dedicated, the ark was placed there (II Chronicles 35: 3; I Kings 8: 3, 9), but at that time, only the tables of stone were in it; the book of the law was not there. Why the law was no longer kept in the ark of the covenant is not stated. Perhaps it was part of God's way of making it possible for the Nephites to secure these writings, for they were in the treasury of Laban, the custodian of the temple records (1 Nephi 1: 124-129). Laban was a greedy, murderous man, who shared the wickedness of the Jews that helped bring about the destruction of Jerusalem. Therefore, the Lord decreed that he should perish because of his sins (1 Nephi 1: 87, 88, 114, 115). Had he been the righteous priest that his office called for, he no doubt would have taken the records and joined Lehi's family in their flight from Jerusalem. The Nephites described the records which they secured as the plates of brass.

The records were obtained by God's intervention. Doubtlessly, there would have been great difficulty in getting them from the ark of the covenant in the temple without detection by the Jews. As it was, the Jews had sought the life of Lehi, even before the brass plates were taken, but with the death of Laban and the records gone, it is easily understood why God did not permit the Nephites much fire in the wilderness (1 Nephi 1: 20, 21; 5: 75), which would obviously have been a means of their enemies locating them. For this reason, the Lord sweetened their food so that it did not need cooking (1 Nephi 5: 57).

One can readily see that the original writings of Moses would be valued highly as the temple edition of the Scriptures. No doubt it was a part of God's direction that copies be made for use among the Israelites and eventually for the whole world after the originals had been taken by the Nephites. No doubt, too, this accounts for the fact that none of the original manuscripts of these early writings were ever found.

What became of the precious writings of Moses no one has attempted to say. Were they on the plates of brass? It is consistent with God's economy that something of such value should be preserved and brought forth in his own time and way for an added testimony. If these writings of Moses were on the plates of brass, we know that they are being preserved yet by God, for he promised that the plates of brass should "never perish, neither should they be dimmed any more by time" (1 Nephi 1: 170).

LETTERS

Invitation to Write

Today I received an air mail letter from Elder Robert J. Taylor of Hamilton, N.S.W., Australia, which reached my home in five days. Brother Taylor was a young man when I was born in the missionary cottage at Tunncurry, New South Wales.

I was reminded of a promise given to me in 1905 by Patriarch Henry Kemp, that I would live to see many wonderful and marvelous things transpire on earth. The receipt of an air mail letter in five days from far-off Australia (which takes over a month by regular steamship mail) is only one of the many wonderful things in science and progress I have seen come to pass.

The United States Postal Department has issued a folder similar to the V-Mail letter of war times, which can be mailed by air anywhere in the world for only ten cents. I might suggest that our church members use these to write our missionaries in foreign fields. In the Herald are also the names and addresses of members in other lands who I am sure, would appreciate hearing from America via these quickly delivered air mail folders.

I write many letters to those who request prayers in the Herald, and the answers I receive repay me many times for the effort I make. Going through the past months of affliction myself makes me deeply sympathetic for all who are in ill health.

I was taught to have faith in God and his church in my childhood. Since then, I have had many wonderful experiences to increase my faith. I desire to live close to God and to help the church in any way I may. Pray for me that I will be able to teach my son to be a good member

Christmas In a Dutch Hospital

By Nurse Tansji Velshus of Groningen, Holland

It was several days before Christmas. The booksellers were taking orders for Christmas cards, and the nurses were trying to see that each patient was satisfied. Cards were plentiful before the war, but now there was a shortage—as with all other articles.

"Will I be able to go home for Christmas?" was the question on the lips of every patient. A very understandable question, to be sure. With the whole family at home, there would be the telling of the Christmas story, a service at the church in the morning, and then an invitation to friends to come share in the festivities of a yuletide feast—if food for one could be obtained. Then on December 26, the second Christmas Day, there would be more visiting, and the young would go skating or build snow men while the less agile watched, smiling over the memory of their own adventures on past Christmases.

One disconsolate patient, well aware of the fact that she would spend Christmas in bed, said, "I'm going to sleep both days." Across from her lay a younger woman who had been ill many weeks. "Sleep?" she questioned softly, "I pray that this will be a truly merry Christmas—and a peaceful one, too, heavenly peace for each of us."

"Nurse, what are you going to do?" asked another. "Will you stay with us? Will we have a tree?"

"Perhaps," answered the uniformed woman in charge of the ward, and began to think of a way to make this greatest of all holidays a happy one for those in her care.

* * * * *

On Christmas morning there were evergreen branches in each of the hospital windows. A Christmas tree, covered with angel hair and bright candles stood on a table at the end of the ward. On each bed, a small branch with red berries was pinned to the blanket. Just before dawn, the candles were lighted and, outside the ward door, a chorus of young voices sang the ever-beautiful "Silent Night, Holy Night."

It was the beginning of a wonderful Christmas Day.

Grateful for Healing

I am deeply grateful today as I think of the many blessings I have received in the past year. During this time, I have undergone several operations—one for cancer. Through the grace of God, I have recovered fully and am able to care for my family again. The Saints of this district were very helpful to me, my husband, and my children during my illness. My stay in Denver, during which time I received X-ray treatments, was made pleasant by the friendship of the members there. I have been active in church work for years, but I feel that

A Member for Fifty-one Years

I have been a member of the Reorganized Church for fifty-one years. During this time, I have had temptations and heartaches, but I have not borne my cross alone. God has been merciful and has blessed me in my hours of need.

Here in Ponca City we have a small group of Saints. We hope to be able soon to find a suitable place to hold services so that those who have never heard the gospel message may come and worship with us. Pray for us that we may succeed.

What Latter Day Saints Believe

LAST WEEK WE told you what Latter Day Saints believe about authority. Two weeks ago, we explained our theories concerning priesthood, pointing out its antiquity, its necessity to salvation, its continuity after Christ as well as before. Now we wish to carry each of those ideas forward to its next logical step and explain to you our beliefs concerning church organization.

First, perhaps, we should repeat at least this much of what we said last week. Latter Day Saints believe that offices are perpetual in the church, though officers change; just as the organs and members of the body remain fixed and constant as to function, number, and structural relationship with the rest of the body, even though the individual cells which form those organs and members are undergoing constant change. Hence, if we can discover what the organization of the primitive Christian church was, the organization of the modern church in today's world should be exactly the same. Christ said, "I will build my church." He was not experimenting with that building; he knew what he wanted, and gave a perfect plan or pattern in the beginning, which should likewise be our pattern for church organization today.

Let us bear in mind, too, that the Scriptures do not give us a complete account of the organization of the church, nor a complete description of the duties and responsibilities of each of the officers. Nor was the church complete in its organization at the time of Christ's ascension, nor in the days of the apostles. The offices were all there and provided for; but the officers came into those offices gradually, as the need for them developed. Here again, the analogy of the body will be helpful. All newborn babies lack teeth, but once the baby begins to grow, teeth are provided in due time. Provision for them was present in the newborn infant, but nature waits for the need and then supplies it. As the church grew, its needs grew and changed, and officers were added to it to fill the offices which were provided from the beginning. If you accept this concept of church organization, you will see at once why we sometimes have to depend on modern revelation to point out the specific functions and duties of high priests, elders, priests, teachers, deacons, bishops, evangelists, etc., who are oftentimes mentioned so casually and so incompletely in the New Testament.

ORGANIZATION IS IMPORTANT — supremely important. In even so simple a mechanism as a pair of shears, it is essential to have the two blades and the connecting bolt in proper organizational relationship with each other, or the shears will not cut. In the human body, with its countless intricate inter-relationships, organization is even more important. Life itself depends upon it. If any part of the body organization gets out of order or ceases to function, the whole body is thrown out of balance and illness, handicap, or even death may result.

The church, says Paul, is the body of Christ. Through it, his spirit functions in the world—his will is done on earth as it is done in heaven. Any lack in the organization of that body, or any disruption of the relationship of one part and one function to the other parts, organs, and functions, will result in disaster to the body of Christ, and hindrance or even complete frustration to the work that the body is expected to accomplish for Christ. Latter Day Saints believe, then, that church organization is of much more than casual importance. A human body may continue to exist with only one leg and one arm; it may survive the removal of the tonsils and the appendix and the gall bladder and sundry other organs; it can exist in spite of blindness or deafness or paralysis, and other handicaps. But certainly no one would argue that a body thus curtailed or handicapped could do as complete and full a job of living as one that is all there and functioning perfectly in every part. A church organization may exist without some of the officers and offices set in the New Testament church by its Master, but, if the analogy holds good, such a church will be crippled and impotent and handicapped in the work of Christ and his kingdom.

As we told you in a previous discourse, Latter Day Saints believe that there are two main divisions of priesthood—the Melchisedec, or high priesthood, which is primarily concerned with the spiritual oversight of the church; and the Aaronic, or lesser priesthood, which is primarily concerned with the outward ordinances and the physical properties of the church. If, during our discussion, you will keep these two main divisions in mind, and then also bear in mind that each of these two orders of priesthood functions both in the general church and in the local congregation, it will help you to understand what may seem at first glance to be a very intricate church organization, but which, in reality, is very simple.

PRESIDING OVER THE whole church, by reason of his presidency over the Melchisedec priesthood, is the president of the church, supported and assisted by two counselors. He is also the prophet who receives God's instructions for the guidance and government of the whole church. It is the right of the presidency to preside over the whole church and to have direct supervision over all its spiritual activities, to regulate it, to set it in order. We believe that Moses was president of the Old Testament church, and that Aaron and Hur were his two counselors, but that when the Melchisedec priesthood was taken from that church upon the death of Moses, the church organization necessarily became changed and fragmentary. In the New Testament church, Christ was the president, of course, so long as he remained on earth, acting without counselors. After Christ's ascension, James, the Lord's brother became the first president. James was the officer who directed that Paul should be received by the church at Jerusalem after his conversion. (See Galatians 1: 19 and Acts 9: 27.) It was to James that Peter instructed the worshipers at the home of John Mark to tell the story of his release from prison (Acts 12: 17). It was James who rendered the famous decision regarding the requirements of the Jewish law and their application to the Christian church (Acts 15: 13, 19). Paul reported to James at Jerusalem, after Agabus had predicted that he would be imprisoned there. James remained in Jerusalem, the seat of church government and, according to tradition, met his death there while the apostles, under Peter, were scattered abroad or traveling under their commission to go into all the world and preach the gospel.

Constituting a quorum equal in authority to the Presidency, but designed for a specialized function, is the quorum of twelve apostles, who are special witnesses for Christ in all the world and a traveling presiding high council. Peter was the first president of the twelve, but since—as we have already seen—he was subject to James and, on one occasion, was rebuked even by Paul, he was not the president of the church.

OTHER QUORUMS equal in authority to the Presidency and Twelve, but having still further specialized functions, are the seven quorums of seventies. The tenth chapter of Luke tells of their first selection and commission. They were to labor as traveling missionaries under the supervision of the Twelve, preaching the gospel in all the world. They had their parallel in the seventy elders of Israel under Moses.

Another quorum equal in authority to those already named is the standing high council of the church, consisting of twelve high priests, which acts in an advisory capacity to the presidency and other quorums in settling controversial issues, and which functions also as the supreme court of the church, taking cases on appeal from the courts of original jurisdiction.

Also under the supervision of the general church, but without the responsibility of engaging in administrative affairs, are the evangelists or patriarchs, whose function it is to be fathers to the church, to confer spiritual blessings, to advise, revive, and strengthen the church by individual counsel and public meetings.

The head of the Aaronic order of priesthood for the general church is the Presiding Bishop, who with two counselors form another quorum equal in its field with the authority of the Presidency. The Presiding Bishop is trustee-in-trust for all the property and funds of the church and the initiator and administrator of its financial policies. Under his authority, labor the bishops and other members of the Aaronic priesthood engaged in congregational or district work. The bishops also form certain courts of original jurisdiction to try offenders against church discipline.

When we come to the organization of the local congregation, we find the same two divisions into Melchisedec and Aaronic priesthood, with specialized functions for each grand division. Presiding over a branch or congregation is usually a high priest or elder of the Melchisedec priesthood. There may be other elders or high priests in the congregation, but one is called upon to preside. These members of the Melchisedec priesthood have spiritual supervision of the local churches. They may baptize, lay on hands for the blessing of infants, the healing of sick, or the conferring of the Holy Ghost to newly-baptized believers. They may ordain others to the high priesthood. Through the prophetic ministry of the presiding branch officers come calls to the priesthood. They take the lead in all meetings and administer the communion. They are called upon to teach, expound, exhort, and watch over the church.

IN EACH BRANCH, there should ideally be at least one member of each grade of the Aaronic priesthood, which includes priests, teachers, and deacons—or in districts and larger branches, a bishop as well. It is the function of the priest to teach, preach, expound, exhort, baptize, administer the communion, to ordain other members of the Aaronic order, to take the lead of meetings when there is no one of the Melchisedec priesthood present, and to be a visiting officer, visiting the homes of the members, teaching them to pray and to be diligent in all family and church duties. He is also authorized to perform marriages. He is not authorized to lay on hands.

The next officer in the branch's Aaronic priesthood is the teacher. His duties are not, as the name would imply, primarily those of teaching but of watching over the

DEATHS

BROWN.—Louisa Jane Grable, affectionately known as "Aunt Lou," was born March 16, 1867, in Iowa, and died at Macon, Missouri, on November 13, 1947. She was married to William Westly Brown in April, 1890. Uniting with the Christian Church early in life, she was later baptized into the Reorganized Church, of which she was a faithful and active member until her death.

She is survived by a son, Earl Brown, of Bonne Terre, Missouri; a brother, Sylvester Grable of Boulder, Wyoming; and three grandchildren. Mr. Brown preceded her in death on June 13, 1928. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Macon, Elder F. T. Mussell officiating. Burial was in the Bevier, Missouri, cemetery.

FISHER.—Elizabeth B. Cassaw, was born September 29, 1865, in New York and died November 17, 1947. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on October 26, 1947. She had been making her home with Mr. and Mrs. D. L. Kyser of Miami, Oklahoma. The funeral service was held in the church at Miami, Elder B. F. Kyser and Arthur Rock officiating. There are no immediate survivors.

TURNER.—Joseph W., was born January 2, 1894, in Hocking County, Ohio, and died at his home in Columbus, Ohio, on November 25, 1947. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on July 13, 1924.

Surviving are four sons: William of Lancaster, Ohio; Francis of the home; Walter and Vernon of Columbus, Ohio; one daughter, Mrs. Peter Allen, also of Columbus; and eleven grandchildren. Elder Albert Griffen was in charge of the funeral service. Burial was at Lancaster, Ohio.

PATTERSON.—Hugh Victor, son of H. F. and Hattie Bell Patterson, was born June 29, 1902, near Argonia, Kansas. He attended high school in Wichita, Kansas, and on August 25, 1922 was married to Ethel Loughmiller. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on March 22, 1936, serving as district treasurer and member of the building committee of Wichita Branch until his death. His honesty, sincerity, and stability made him an invaluable worker and friend. His cheerfulness and benevolence endeared him to all who knew him.

He is survived by his wife; his parents; two sisters: Mrs. Viola Guenther of Newport,

What L. D. S. Believe About the Organization of the Church

members, being with them in all meetings, strengthening them, seeing that there is no iniquity, hardness, lying, backbiting, or evil speaking among them; seeing that they attend church regularly and perform their religious duties faithfully. He does all this not as a policeman, but as a friend—a kindly advisor and counselor, and a minister for Christ. He may take the lead of meetings, or even preside over the branch if there is no elder or priest available.

The last officer of the Aaronic order, functioning in the local branch, is the deacon. His duty is to assist the teacher, to be responsible for the local church building and the funds of the local congregation; to keep order in the meetings; to provide for heating, lighting, and ventilation adjustments during the services; to act as the agent of the Bishop in collecting funds for the general church; to see that none of the members of his branch lack the physical necessities of life. If the occasion warrants, he may preach or preside over meetings.

When all these officers are in their proper places in the church, each functioning in his proper manner, the body of Christ is healthy and the work of his kingdom goes forward. If some of the officers are missing, or slothful, or rebellious, the body is hampered and hindered; the work of the kingdom languishes or stops altogether. We believe that a careful study of this system of organization and a comparison of it with the fragmentary description of the New Testament church available in the Bible will convince you of its scriptural background, its divine authority, and its efficiency in the conduct of the affairs of Christ's kingdom.

Rhode Island, and Mrs. Betty Kerwin of Wichita; two brothers: Merlin C. of Pittsburg, California, and Leo R. of Coldwater, Kansas; and his grandmother, Mrs. Bessie Patterson. Services were conducted by Elder D. J. Williams at the Downing Mortuary.

Christian Courtship

Boy Meets Girl

Why are pickups dangerous? Where can you meet boys and girls of high ideals? Are there places other than the church? Why does an introduction add dignity to a friendship? How do you introduce your date to your parents? How long should a boy know a girl before asking her for a date?

Boy Dates Girl

How important is dating in the lives of young people? What is the purpose of dating? Should a girl date a boy whom she does not want her family to meet? What does going to church together do for a couple's friendship? What are the disadvantages of necking and petting? How can a young person develop clean, wholesome, Christian attitudes about sex?

Boy Marries Girl

Is marriage a career? What are the reasons for our high divorce rate? What are the "best ages to marry"? How can you tell when you are in love? How long should the engagement be? During this period, should the couple check on the cost of living, decide on the matter of religion, and talk over the matter of children? How important is religion in marriage? What does it mean to dedicate a marriage to God?

The Christian Family

What are the characteristics of a Christian home and Christian family life? What are the advantages of running a home democratically? How about the family council plan? Should a parent shield his child from responsibilities? Should children be paid for doing chores around the house? Is a family being Christian if they do not pay tithes? Does a Christian family enjoy life more than a non-Christian family?
